Throughout his life, Kleist wrote many letters. Those which he wrote to his elder half sister Ulrike, the one person he felt never abandoned him, show a sensitive nature torn between grandiose ambition and keen despair. His first play, The Family Schrockenstein (1803), was a gloomy tragedy that debated the adequacy of reason as a guide for human existence. He next began Robert Guiscard, a TRAGEDY based on the life of the historical Norman adventurer, but frustration with his progress led him to burn the manuscript in a fit of temper. Also in 1803 he began work on The Broken Jug, inspired by a competition among his friends. Completed in 1806, the play, a FARCE of justice taking place in a courtroom where the judge himself is the perpetrator of the crime, emerged as one of the best German comedies. Amphitryon, begun in 1803 as a translation of the play by MOLÈRE, examines in detail the inner torment of its female character, Alcmene. In Penthesilea (1807), Kleist drew on his own anguish to create the violent, passionate tale of the doomed Amazon queen who loved and destroyed Achilles. In Kate of Heilbronn (1810), a medieval fairy tale with knights and maidens, he created a different sort of heroine, patterned on his ideal of the virtuous, self-sacrificing woman. His Battle of the Teutoburger Wald (begun in 1808) shows the stirrings of a nationalism that would culminate in the patriotic spirit of his last and best work, Prince Friedrich of Homburg, written in 1810. Friedrich was never staged during Kleist’s life because his patrons did not approve of a Prussian soldier feeling such a desperate fear of death, but the play, subtle in its psychology, rather emphasizes the ideals of enlightened devotion and service to country.

Kleist also wrote a number of short stories, which survive, and a novel, which likely met the same fate as Robert Guiscard. Some critics hail Kleist as a forerunner of the age of modern drama, and had he been born a hundred years later, it is possible audiences would have appreciated him. The criticism of his contemporary GOETHE, who had a low opinion of the German Romantic spirit in general, did much to discourage Kleist. His writings return again and again to the impact of fate on human life, the causes and consequences of chaos, and the imperative to find some means of spiritual protection or understanding of the broader design. If Kleist failed in anything, it was in finding a way to reconcile his vivid interior world with the forces at work in the outer one. Though he never succeeded in surpassing the brilliance of Goethe or SCHILLER, his influence on later dramatists and thinkers grounds him firmly in the tradition of great German literature.

English Versions of Works by Heinrich von Kleist

The Marquise of O—and Other Stories. Translated by Martin Greenberg. New York: Ungar, 1973.

Heinrich von Kleist: Three Major Plays. Translated by Carl R. Mueller. Lyme, N.H.: Smith and Kraus, 2001.

Works about Heinrich von Kleist

Allan, Sian. The Plays of Heinrich von Kleist: Ideals and Illusions. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Brown, Hilda Meldrum. Heinrich von Kleist: The Ambiguity of Art and the Necessity of Form. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Klopstock, Friedrich Gottlieb

(1724–1803) poet, essayist, playwright

Friedrich Klopstock was born in the city of Quedlinburg to the lawyer and government adviser Gottlieb Klopstock and his wife, Anna Maria. He attended high school in his hometown before going on to study theology at the universities of Jena and Leipzig.

In Leipzig, Klopstock published the first three cantos from his Messiah, a work that engaged him for the next 50 years and established his reputation as a poet of extraordinary talent. After stays in Switzerland and Denmark, Klopstock settled in Hamburg, where he produced the bulk of his literary work and spent the rest of his life.

A mild-mannered, religious man, Klopstock reveals his personality and disposition in many ways in his writing. Messiah is his best and most representative work, which he himself referred to as his “primary life’s purpose.” This long poem recounts the story of the death and resurrection of Jesus and his redemption of humankind. Written in hexameters, an unfamiliar verse form for German poetry at the time, the work stands out not only for the density and beauty of the language but also for its unique representation of Christ.

ENLIGHTENMENT thinkers portrayed Jesus as a kind of exemplary moralist, but Klopstock depicts him as an intermediary between God and man, a medium of God’s eternal nature. Klopstock’s intentions in writing the work were not only literary but also spiritual, as he sought to set down Christian revelatory experience in an enduring form that would speak to all human beings.

Though Klopstock also wrote literary essays and biblical dramas, it is chiefly for Messiah, as well as his lyric poetry, that he is now remembered. GOETHE, SCHILLER, Hölderlin, and the great German Romantic writers were among the admirers of Klopstock’s work. His influence on German poetry has been and continues to be fundamental.

An English Version of Works by Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock

Kohl, Karin M. Rhetoric, the Bible, and the Origins of Free Verse: The Early Hymns of Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock. New York: W. de Gruyter, 1990.

Works about Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock

Hilliard, Kevin. Philosophy, Letters, and the Fine Arts in Klopstock’s Thought. London: Institute of Germanic Studies, 1987.

Lee, Meredith. Displacing Authority: Goethe’s Poetic Reception of Klopstock. Heidelberg: Universitätsverlag C. Winter, 1999.

Knight, Sarah Kemble (1666–1727) diarist
Sarah Kemble Knight was the oldest daughter of Elizabeth and Thomas Kemble, a merchant. Sometime in the late 1680s, she married Richard Knight, an older man who, it is believed, worked as a shipmaster and London agent for an American business. She gave birth to her only child in 1689, the same year that her father died. Upon his passing, she was rumored to have taken charge of the family business affairs. Over time, she developed expertise in legal matters, became adept at settling estates, worked as a shopkeeper, and taught school. Legend has it that Benjamin FRANKLIN was one of her pupils, but no official documentation exists to support this claim. Knight's active participation in the workforce reveals that not all Puritan women were consigned to the domestic world of hearth and home.

In 1704, two years before her husband's death, Knight embarked alone on a horseback journey from her home in Boston to Connecticut, reportedly to settle the estate of one of her cousins. The Journal of Madam Knight (1825), the chronicle of her courageous expedition, is filled with descriptions of the rocky and mountainous roads she traveled with her various guides; the difficulties she encountered when trying to cross rivers; her attempts at steeling her nerves as she made her way through dark, dangerous nights; the manner in which her hosts prepared meals; and the sometimes comical manners and customs of the people she met. Emory Elliott notes that Knight adopted "techniques of the mock-epic and elements of the picaresque," a genre that is autobiographical in nature and makes use of satire, especially when describing the social classes. The content of Knight's journal, which was published nearly a century after her death, points to its significance in the history of American literature. Her narrative provides us with a woman's perspective of 18th-century American life. The worldliness of her account stands in stark contrast to the more inward and spiritually-oriented journals kept by her Puritan predecessors and contemporaries.

A Work by Sarah Kemble Knight

The Journal of Madam Knight. Boston: D.R. Godine, 1972.

A Work about Sarah Kemble Knight

Bush, Sargent. "Introduction," in Journeys in New Worlds: Early American Women's Narratives.

Edited by William L. Andrews. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1990.

Kobayashi Issa (Yatarô) (1763–1827) poet
Kobayashi Issa is one of the few acknowledged masters of the Japanese poetic art of HAIKU. Haiku is a form of unrhymed poetry consisting of 17 syllables in three lines of five, seven, and five syllables, respectively. Haiku often deal with the natural world, focusing on a single moment that is transformed by the poet's vision into an idea of enduring significance. Kobayashi's poetry is especially beloved by the Japanese because of its humor and simplicity.

Kobayashi Issa was born Kobayashi Yatarô on May 5, in Kashiwabara, Shinano province, Japan. Later in life, he adopted the pseudonym Issa, which means "cup of tea." Issa's father was a poor farmer who was widowed not long after his son was born. His remarriage a few years later created difficulties for Issa, who was mistreated by his stepmother.

At age 14, he was sent to Tokyo to study with the poet Nirokuan Chikua, who taught the boy haiku. After Chikua's death, Kobayashi traveled throughout the southwestern part of Japan, publishing his first collection of poetry Tabishui (Travel Gleanings) in 1795. This work was followed by many others, including Chichi No Shuen Nikki (Diary of My Father's Last Days, 1801), Shichiban-Nikki (Seventh Diary, 1810), and Oraga Haru (The Year of My Life).

During his lifetime, Kobayashi wrote more than 20,000 haiku. His sweet sense of humor is evident in this simple poem in which he finds affinity with a frog:

Frog and I eyeball
To eyeball.

And his love of nature and ability to observe acutely can be seen in this poem about the wind:

Cool breeze Tangled
In a grass-blade.

Kobayashi led a lonely life for many years, a fact reflected in many of his haiku. This one in particular evokes a sense of the lonely boy sent from home at an early age:

*Come with me
and play
Parentless sparrow.*

After the death of Kobayashi's father in 1801, his stepmother tried to prevent him from inheriting the property his father had left him. It was not until 1813 that he finally was able to collect his inheritance. In the next year he married for the first time at age 52, but his married life was to be filled with sorrow. Four children died in infancy, and his wife, Kiku, died in childbirth. Of her death he wrote:

*My grumbling wife—
if only she were here!
This moon tonight . . .*

His second marriage was a failure, ending in divorce after only a few months. He married a third time but died on June 1, before the birth of his fifth child, a daughter.

A poem titled "Kobayashi Issa" by Victor Hernandez Cruz beautifully sums up Kobayashi's genius and his ability to see so much in the tiniest aspects of existence:

*His eyes were binoculars small things
Had the fury of the cosmos.
.
.
.
The horizon smiles with Issa. . . .*

English Versions of Works by Kobayashi Issa

Spring of My Life. Translated by Sam Hamill. Boston: Shambhala Publications, 1997.

The Year of My Life. Translated by Nobuyuki Yuasa. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972.

Works about Kobayashi Issa

Gollub, Matthew. Cool Melons—Turn to Frogs! The Life and Poems of Issa. New York: Lee and Low Books, 1998.

Ueda, Makoto, trans. Dew on the Grass: The Life and Poetry of Kobayashi Issa. The Netherlands: Brill Academic Publishers, 2004.

Kochanowski, Jan (1530–1584) poet

Jan Kochanowski was born in Sycyna in central Poland. Because his family was of the Polish gentry, he was able to receive an excellent education in the classics. He enrolled in the Krakow Academy in 1544, but left in 1547 after the death of his father. After leaving Krakow, he went to the University of Wittenberg in present-day Germany. In 1552 he studied in Italy after receiving funds from Prince Albrecht of Königsberg. Little is known about Kochanowski's studies there, because none of his letters or journals of that time exist or have been found.

When Kochanowski returned to Poland, he held appointments at the royal court of King Zygmunt August and wrote poetry in Latin and Polish. Some of his poetry was commissioned by various noblemen to commemorate special occasions or political events. His works include A Game of Chess (1562), Susanna (1562), Concord (1564), and The Satyr (1564). Kochanowski retired from court life in 1570 and lived at Czarnolas, a country estate, where he composed the bulk of his poetry, including his tragedy, Dismissal of the Grecian Envoys, between 1570 and his death in 1584.

His poetry was based on the classical traditions of Greek, Roman, and early Christian writings. He translated the Psalms into Polish between 1570 and 1578. His cycle of poems Laments was written in 1580, after the death of his daughter. These poems describe man's relation to God and are considered to be the greatest works written in the early Polish language. After Kochanowski's death in 1584, his collected Epigrams were published, as well as the first printing of his early Songs. While Kochanowski wrote his early works in Latin, he was among the first to use Polish to write poetry, for which he achieved lasting fame.

Works by Jan Kochanowski

Poems of Jan Kochanowski. Edited by George R. Noyes, et al. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1928.

Treny: The Laments of Kochanowski. Translated by Adam Czeriawski and edited by Piotr Wilczek. Oxford: Legenda, 2001.

A Work about Jan Kochanowski

Welsh, David. Jan Kochanowski. New York: Twayne, 1974.

Komam Q'Anil, Epic of (Xhuwan Q'Anil, El Q'Anil, El Kanil, Man of Lightning) (n.d.–present) Mayan epic

The Epic of Komam Q'Anil tells the story of El Q'anil, the “Man of Lightning.” Myths of El Q'anil are part of the oral tradition of the Jakalteq Maya people of Guatemala. In the EPIC, the narrator recounts the history of the Jakalteq Maya, explaining how their lands were given to them by the first father and how they learned the knowledge of hieroglyphics. Eventually, they were dispersed from their land by natural disasters and wandered in the wilderness until they came to Ajul, near the present-day village of Jacaltenango, which became their new land.

When the people heard news of a distant war and felt pains for those dying, they decided to join the fight. El Q'anil, the “Man of Lightning,” is introduced in the form of a boy named Xhuwan, who is chosen to carry the Jakalteqs' supplies to battle. He is forbidden, however, to return to his people after engaging in the war. Xhuwan summons lightning to save his people from destruction, undertakes a great adventure journey, and then leads the people to victory in the fight. Unable to return to Ajul, he retires to the southern volcano called El Q'Anil, from where he can watch over his people as an immortal.

The Epic of Komam Q'Anil is known today by the Jakalteq Maya and taught to all of their children to reinforce their people's identity. It is also an important symbolic image of endurance through adversity for an indigenous people whose very existence today is challenged by the modern world.

A Work about the Epic of Komam Q'Anil

Montejo, Victor. El Q'Anil, Man of Lightning: A Legend of Jacaltenango. Translated by Wallace Kaufman and Susan G. Rascon. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 2001.

Kong Shangren (Kung Shang-jen) (1648–1718) scholar, playwright, poet

Kong Shangren was one of the major playwrights of the K'ang-hsi era. A descendant of Confucius, Kong Shangren spent the early years of his life in the traditional studies of the literati. As a scholar, he was an exponent of Kaozhengxue (Kao-cheng hsueh; “Empirical studies”).

In 1684 he served as a lecturer to the Kangxi (K'ang-hsi) emperor, who visited the writer's native province of Chufu. As a result of this meeting, Kong Shangren was appointed to a position in the Directorate of Education. From 1685 to 1689, he served on an irrigation project in Yangchow. In this capacity, he traveled to various historical landmarks and became acquainted with the remnants of the Ming dynasty. His poems and prose, reflective of this time, are collected in a volume called Hu hai ji (Hu-hai chi; Poems from the Lakes and Seas).

In 1694 Kong Shangren began composing dramas. His first, Xiao hu lei (Hsiao-hu lei; The Little Thunderclap), was based on a Tang dynasty instrument in his collection. Kong Shangren researched its historical origins and created a story of a love affair between a poet and a palace concubine. The play's exhaustive factual information was far in advance of other attempts at historical drama.

Taohuashan (T'ao-hua shan; Peach Blossom Fan) was Kong Shangren's next theatrical effort and shows even more exhaustive research, including bibliographical notes and a chronology of events of the reign of Chong-Zhen (Ch'ung-chen) in the southern Ming dynasty. In addition, the characters are all based on real people. The play was written to demonstrate Kong Shangren's idea that social obligations are more important than individual rights. The play includes the story of a group of honest intellectuals who wish to save their country from invasion and anarchy. They are opposed by a group of power-hungry politicians.

Soon after the play's premiere, Kong Shangren retired from his official position, but he continued writing, producing two more collections of poems before his death.

Peach Blossom Fan has become one of China's most famous historical dramas, for which critics have praised Kong Shangren for his skillful handling of a complex plot, innovative theatrical form, and tragic vision.

An English Version of a Work by Kong Shangren

Peach Blossom Fan. Translated by Chen Shih-Hsiang, Cyril Birch, and Harold Action. Boston: Cheng and Tsui, 2000.

A Work about Kong Shangren

Lu, Tina. Persons, Roles and Minds: Identity in Peony Pavilion and Peach Blossom Fan. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 2001.

Krylov, Ivan (1768–1844) fabulist, journalist, playwright

Ivan Krylov was born in Moscow to a poor officer who, though informally educated, loved to read. Ivan was nine when his father died, leaving his wife and two sons with little legacy except for a chest full of books. Krylov began working as a copyist to support the family.

At age 14, Krylov moved to St. Petersburg. He worked as a government clerk, explored theatrical and literary circles, and tried his hand at literature. His first important work, the opera Coffee Mill, satirized the hypocrisy of seemingly progressive thinkers. The publisher to whom Krylov brought Coffee Mill praised the work and encouraged the young writer with a considerable sum of money, but refused to publish the opera.

After writing a sequence of scarcely successful tragedies and comedies, Krylov finished a harshly critical comedy called Mischief-Makers. In the main characters of the comedy, Krylov's contemporaries easily recognized influential figures of the theatrical and literary world, some of whom were Krylov's patrons or supporters. His benefactors were outraged and the opera was banned.

In 1789 Krylov began a monthly publication called Supernatural Mail. The journal caricatured Russian society in the form of a fantastic correspondence between gnomes and a wizard. Censors soon shut the journal down. In 1790 Krylov decided to devote himself to literary work and retired from his public service.

He then began another project, the Spectator, another journal that did not survive the censors. Its closure was not surprising considering the severely satirical nature of the work, which mercilessly criticized the tendencies of Russian society to imitate the West, to admire all things French, and to neglect the native language and culture. Some of Krylov's important works of the period include the articles "Speech Made by a Scapegrace in a Gathering of Fools," "Thoughts of a Fashionable Philosopher," and a play, Praise to the Science of Killing Time, all of which demonstrate his use of satire to expose social ills.

Krylov's real fame followed his discovery that his satirical talent could be best expressed in fables. This genre had enjoyed popularity across many cultures and all ages, as evidenced by the fables of Aesop, Phaedrus, the Indian Panchatantra, and the poetess Marie de France. Krylov began in 1805 by translating and publishing two fables by the French poet Jean de LA FONTAINE, which received the critics' highest praise. In 1809 Krylov published a separate edition of his own fables, which brought him enormous success. The Fables became a classic during his lifetime; the books were sold in huge numbers, and the czar personally asked Krylov to accept the title of Honorary Academician of the Russian Academy.

In his fables, Krylov combines a well-developed skill of observation with his trademark ironic skepticism. His satire did not reproach society for its sins but invited people to see their own shortcomings and laugh at them. The fable Quartet, for example, describes four animals attempting to play a brass quartet without knowing how to play or read music. Though the animals change places, the quality of their music does not improve. "However you seat yourselves, my friends, you are still not good musicians," the fable concludes. Similarly, A Crow and a Fox describes a vain crow, tricked by the shameless flattery of an artful fox into letting go of a piece of cheese. One of the most famous fables, A Fox and Grapes, tells a story of a fox who fails to get hold of grapes growing too high and mollifies herself by concluding that “the grapes must not be ripe, anyway.”

Krylov was the first to step out of the tradition of using bookish words and poeticisms in the fables. By visiting fairs, markets, and public holidays, he acquired a thorough knowledge of colloquial or everyday language, which he then used in his writing. Sharp, proverbial phrases make his fables catchy and easy to remember. He often minimizes the traditional moral that concludes a fable, or else disposes of it completely. His fables are not dry moralizations but rather picturesque and engaging portrayals of real life. Over time, his fables have become an integral part of Russian literature, contributing through their popularity to conversational phrases in the Russian language and becoming a deeply embedded part of the country’s folklore.

English Versions of Works by Ivan Krylov

15 Fables of Krylov. Translated by Guy Daniels. New York: Macmillan, 1965.

Krylov’s Fables. Translated by Ivan Krylov. Westport, Conn.: Hyperion Press, 1977.

Russian Satiric Comedy: Six Plays. Edited and translated by Laurence Senelick. New York: Performing Arts Journal Publications, 1983.

Works about Ivan Krylov

Hamburger, Henri. The Function of the Predicate in the Fables of Krylov. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1981.

Stepanov, Nikolay. Ivan Krylov. New York: Twayne, 1973.

Kyogen (1300s–present)

The Kyogen (pronounced kee-OH-gen; “crazy words”) are Japanese folk plays that portray the simple emotions and everyday experiences of regular people. The plays, which developed into their modern form in the 14th century, are meant to encourage a quiet sort of comic joy at the follies of a common life.

The modern form of Kyogen theater developed out of a combination of the comic farcical productions of Sarugaku and the athletic dance performances called Dengaku. Kwanami Kiyot-sugu and his son ZEAMI Motokiyo honed the art form, presenting a performance in front of Shogun Yoshimitsu in 1374. Kwanami named the performance style Kyogen, which means “mad words” to emphasize the subtle comic effect of the plays.

Kyogen were handed down orally, with only the general outline and a sketchy sense of the dialogue preserved from generation to generation. This gave the plays flexibility and encouraged continual innovation. Various schools developed over the years, including Okura, Sagi, Izumi and Nomura. In more recent centuries the works have been written down and presented in various volumes, few of which are still in print.

The productions of Kyogen plays are simple, performed on a plain stage with minimal props. Fans are frequently used, as are weapons such as spears, swords, and bows and arrows. The players often wear wooden masks that represent, most commonly, a rogue, a woman, an old man, a young man, a monkey, and a fox. The comic elements of the performances are physical in nature, a matter of situation rather than of character. Popular superstitions play an important role, and there is little or no love interest portrayed.

English Versions of Kyogen

Morley, Carolyn Anne. Transformation, Miracles, and Mischief: The Mountain Priest Plays of Kyogen. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University East Asia Program, 1993.

Sakanishi, Shio. Japanese Folk Plays: The Ink-smearred Lady and Other Kyogen. Tokyo: C.E. Tuttle, 1960.

Works about Kyogen

Keene, Donald. Seeds in the Heart: Japanese Literature from Earliest Times to the Late Sixteenth Century. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.

Takeda, Sharon Sadako. Miracles and Mischief: Noh and Kyogen Theater in Japan. Los Angeles: Los Angeles County Museum of Art Agency for Cultural Affairs, 2002.

Labé, Louise (ca. 1520–1566) poet

Louise Labé was the daughter of a middle-class rope maker in Lyon, France, and as a child received education in languages, music, and riding. In 1543 she married another rope maker, Ennemond Perrin, her senior by almost three decades. Around 1556, she left the literary circles of Lyon to live in the countryside, where the plague brought a premature end to her life.

Labé began writing her first SONNETS in 1546. In these sonnets she employs not only the form but also many of the themes used by the Italian poet PETRARCH. In 1552 she began to write The Debate Between Folly and Love, an expressive work full of diverse structures and several voices. In the next year she began writing her Elegies and in 1555 published The Complete Works of Louise Labé of Lyon, which was reprinted several times within the next year. Some biographers attribute Labé's popularity to the increasing social prominence of women in the mid-16th century, when literature by and about women became fashionable. Certain critics accused Labé of being immodest and unwomanly, while others praised her lavishly, considering her an admirable writer and exemplary woman.

Labé's narrative voice is that of a woman who possesses intellectual and poetic power and is highly aware of herself. In her verse she combines the Italian forms with the traditions of the early Greek poet Sappho to write about female desire and to characterize women as being both intellectual and erotic, with mental as well as material abilities. Labé continually resisted prevailing cultural notions that limited women to roles as courtesans, companions, or domestic servants; instead, her poetry presents women as active, independent subjects who are capable of thought as well as feeling. In The Debate Between Folly and Love, Labé scatters her poetry with allusions to classical mythology that demonstrate her learning, and gives her characters sly observations about the way wisdom is underappreciated in society. For instance, the character of Mercury makes a point about how often folly prevails in the world, observing that "for every wise man who is talked about on earth, there will be ten thousand fools who will be popular with the common people."

Labé's shorter poems abound with themes and images that express passionate love and lofty heights of feeling, as can be seen in these lines from Sonnet 18 (translated by Edith Farrell):

*Kiss me. Again. More kisses I desire.
Give me one your sweetness to express.*

*Give me the most passionate you possess.
Four I'll return, and hotter than the fire.*

Labé's women are not crushed by disappointment or despair, however; when the narrator of the second elegy addresses a lover who has left her for another, she taunts him for not seeing her worth, declaring:

*And know that elsewhere there's no one like me.
I don't say that she might have more beauty,
But never will a woman love you more
Nor bring more fame to lay it at your door.*

Throughout her work, Labé demanded that women be recognized and acknowledged as capable of intelligent action as well as desire.

Labé's manuscripts and their circulation are proof that women had active roles as authors, readers, and patrons of the artistic RENAISSANCE taking place in France in the 16th century. Labé herself was known to entertain poets, writers, and other learned people in her private salon, and the writer Pernette du Guillet was a great friend of hers. In her writing Labé encouraged women to write and sell their own works and also to support each other in a female literary community. She firmly believed in self-improvement through education for women, and expressed this in the dedication of her Works. Addressing her friend Clemence de Bourges, she conveys her characteristic beliefs that writing is a form of self-knowledge and that intellectual pleasures are preferable to sensual ones. She encourages her female readers to exercise their minds, inspire one another, and devote themselves to the study of literature and the sciences to gain recognition from and equality with men. Like an earlier Frenchwoman, Christine de PISAN, Labé's work expresses the voice of an educated and feeling woman who was skilled enough to use and refuse convention where necessary, making a valuable contribution to the French Renaissance as well as a call for the emancipation of women.

English Versions of Works by Louise Labé

Debate of Folly and Love: A New English Translation with the Original French Text. Translated by Anne-Marie Bourbon. New York: Peter Lang, 2000.

Louise Labé: Sonnets. Translated by Graham D. Martin. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1972.

Louise Labé's Complete Works. Edited and translated by Edith R. Farrell. Troy, N.Y.: Whitson Publishing, 1986.

Works about Louise Labé

Baker, Deborah Lesko. The Subject of Desire: Petrarchan Poetics and the Female Voice in Louise Labé. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1996.

Cameron, Keith. Louise Labé: Renaissance Poet and Feminist. Oxford, England: Berg Publishers, 1991.

Moore, Mary B. Desiring Voices: Women Sonneteers and Petrarchism. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.

La Bruyère, Jean de (1645–1696)

moralist, nonfiction writer

Jean de la Bruyère was born in Paris to a controller general of municipal revenue. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced until 1673, when he purchased a position from the treasurer of finances of Caen. La Bruyère stayed in Paris until he became history tutor to the duc de Condé's son and moved to the duke's chateau in Chantilly. He became friends with the duke and eventually received a pension that allowed him to stay with the duke's household. He became a member of the ACADEMIE FRANÇAISE in 1693 and died of apoplexy in 1696.

La Bruyère is principally remembered for a book he published anonymously in 1688, Les Caractères de Théophraste, traduits du Grec, avec les caractères et les moeurs de ce siècle (The Characters of Theophrastes, translated from the Greek, with por- traits and mores of this century). While the first part is a translation of an ancient Greek work, the second half is a collection of character sketches and moral observations that have yielded plenty of meaningful quotations still used today. For example, “Life is a tragedy for those who feel and a comedy for those who think” comes from La Bruyère.

His aphorisms reveal an amused distance that allows him to make unflattering observations about human nature and society without sounding outraged or pompous. La Bruyère recognized that love sometimes fades, people follow their own interests, and God does not always reward the deserving with wealth and power, but his laconic phrasing does not betray anger or disgust.

La Bruyère’s simple, well-balanced phrasing, appropriate diction, and keen observations make him admirable not only as a stylist but also as an observer of human nature whose truths can still surprise and inspire.

An English Version of a Work by Jean de La Bruyère

Van Laun, Henri, trans. Characters. London: Oxford University Press, 1963.

Works about Jean de La Bruyère

Knox, Edward C. Jean de la Bruyère. New York: Twayne, 1974.

Mourgues, Odette de. Two French Moralists: La Rochefoucauld & La Bruyère. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1978.

Laclos, Pierre Choderlos de (Pierre- Ambroise-François Choderlos de Laclos) (1741–1803) novelist

Pierre Choderlos de Laclos was born in Amiens, France. As an adult, he entered the French army and, in 1782, when he was an artillery captain, he wrote and published his only novel, Les liaisons dangereuses (Dangerous Liaisons). It was a best-seller, albeit a scandalous one. After the Reign of Terror ended and Napoleon came to power, Napoleon promoted Laclos to general, and Laclos’s first command was in Taranto, Italy, where he died of dysentery.

What makes Dangerous Liaisons such a significant novel is how it perfectly encapsulates 18th-century Western fiction while exploring universal human themes and psychology. Laclos admired the epistolary NOVELS of Samuel RICHARDSON and used the form to reveal his characters’ social facades, as well as their real thoughts and motivations. His novel also operates as a response to the philosophy of Jean-Jacques ROUSSEAU, while touching on themes later explored by the Marquis de SADE.

On the one hand, Laclos seems to side with Rousseau’s contempt for the vanity, hypocrisy, and unnaturalness of contemporary French society, but in his depiction of Madame de Tourvel, Laclos implicitly critiques Rousseau’s idealism. Rousseau’s belief in humanity’s inherent goodness also seems to have influenced the character of Valmont. Valmont eventually reveals a capacity for intimacy and empathy when he falls in love with Madame de Tourvel, which reveals that his libertine behavior is learned rather than innate. His death, however, like Madame de Tourvel’s, indicates that morally upright and emotionally vulnerable people cannot survive in a society that is dominated by people like the Marquise de Merteuil.

The marquise is an impressive portrait of complete egotism that looks forward to some of Sade’s notorious libertine philosophers. She is a fascinating, multifaceted monster who thrives in a society where the appearance of sincerity and virtue matters more than those qualities themselves.

In 1987 Christopher Hampton adapted the novel for the stage, which Stephen Frears later filmed. Laclos’s mastery of the epistolary form and his acute psychological portraits have made Dangerous Liaisons a widely read and well-regarded classic.

English Versions of a Work by Pierre Choderlos de Laclos

Parmée, Douglas, trans. Les Liaisons Dangereuses. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Stone, P. W. K., trans. Les Liaisons Dangereuses. New York: Penguin Classics, 1961.

Works about Pierre Choderlos de Laclos

Byrne, P. W. "The Moral of Les Liaisons Dangereuses: A Review of the Arguments." Essays in French Literature 23 (1986): 1–18.

Rosbottom, Ron. Choderlos de Laclos. Boston: Twayne, 1978.

Thelander, Dorothy R. Laclos and the Epistolary Novel. Geneva: Librairie Droz, 1963.

Lafayette, Madame de (Marie-Madeleine Pioche de la Vergne, comtesse de Lafayette) (1634–1693) novelist

Marie-Madeleine Pioche de la Vergne was born to parents of the minor nobility. Her father died when she was 15, and her mother promptly remarried de Sévigné, whose niece, the Marquise de SÉVIGNÉ, would become one of Madame de Lafayette's closest friends. Another girlhood friend, Henriette, the English princess exiled in France, provided Marie-Madeleine with access to the court of the Sun King, Louis XIV, and later employed her as a memoirist. In 1655, by marrying Comte Jean-François Motier, she became Madame de Lafayette. Later she set up permanent residency in Paris, where she presided over frequent gatherings of famous intellectuals, artisans, nobility, and political figures, and entertained occasional visits from her husband, who remained at their country estate.

Though she had a markedly ungrammatical writing style, as shown in both her letters and her manuscripts, Madame de Lafayette had a keen mind informed by her early education in languages and literature, provided in part by her friend Ménéage. A cultivated intellect was an uncommon thing for women of her day, since popular opinion held that all knowledge necessary to success could be learned in polite company, and too much learning spoiled a woman by turning her into a "blue-stocking." Madame de Lafayette was admired in her own day for her wit, her honesty, her fine qualities of mind, and what her friend Madame de Sévigné called her "divine reason." Though a prominent and influential figure, Madame de Lafayette kept quiet about her personal affairs, and in fact never claimed authorship of the books she published. For this reason several works were later attributed to her whose true authorship remains doubtful.

No doubt exists, however, that Madame de Lafayette authored The Princess of Cleves, the book that has established her place in literary history. She first proved her abilities for astute understanding and acute perception through her first literary effort, a written portrait of her friend the marquise. She then wrote a novel called The Princess of Montpensier and undertook a collaborative enterprise with her friends LA ROCHEFOUCAULD and Segrais to write Zaïde, a colorful pseudo-history. Reading historical sources for her novel The Princess of Cleves and associating with contemporary artists MONTAIGNE and LA FONTAINE broadened Madame's literary horizons, and her circulation among aristocratic company sharpened her perceptions of human nature while spoiling what had never been an optimistic attitude about romantic love. She recorded the intrigues of the court of Louis XIV in her Memoirs on the Court of France 1688–1689 and The Secret History of Henrietta of England. Her last work, The Countess of Tende, appeared in print several years after her death.

The Princess of Cleves can be called the first historical novel, since it takes place in a French court of the 16th century. It is also the first psychological novel for, while telling the story of the princess's illicit love for the dashing duke of Nemours, the prose steers away from conventional depictions of romance in order to study the characters' desires and motivations for their actions. Published in 1678, the book provoked vivid response and sparked the first-ever reader survey in the Mercure Galant, which asked readers if they felt the princess was right or wrong to confess to her husband. The storm of public opinion proved that the novel was something out of the ordinary, embodying all the principles of classicism but departing from the traditions of the romance novel to set a new standard. More than history, more than romance, The Princess of Cleves is ultimately a tale about doomed passions and moral dilemmas.

Madame de Lafayette's outlook on love was never romantic and continued to sour as she aged, confirmed in part by the painful experiences she observed around her, including the excesses of her friend Henriette, who suffered a sudden and extremely painful death. She used her work to examine the views of her own time and to explore ethical issues with analytical precision. Translator J. M. Shelmerdine attributes her greatness to "a power to observe human nature, to create characters and tell a story, an ability to understand human difficulties and sympathize with human weaknesses."

English Versions of Works by Madame de Lafayette

Madame de Lafayette: The Princesse de Clèves. Translated by Terence Cave. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

The Secret History of Henrietta, Princess of England. Translated by J. M. Shelmerdine. New York: Howard Fertig, 1993.

Works about Madame de Lafayette

Haig, Stirling. Madame de Lafayette. New York: Twayne, 1970.

Raitt, Janet. Madame de Lafayette and 'La Princesse de Clèves'. London: George G. Harrap, 1971.

La Fontaine, Jean de (1621–1695) poet, novelist

Jean de La Fontaine was born in Château-Thierry to Charles, a government official, and Françoise Pidoux, the daughter of King Henry IV's physician. At age 20, after a classical secondary education, he began religious studies in Paris. Monastic life, however, did not agree with La Fontaine's temperament, and, after briefly dabbling in law studies, he returned to Château-Thierry, where he spent days of leisure reading the classics of Ovid, Virgil, and Horace, to whom he alludes in his poetry, as well as the works of French poets RABELAIS, Malherbe, and MAROT.

In 1647 the dreamy poet obliged his father by marrying 14-year-old Marie Héricart, with whom he had one son. But La Fontaine was neither a good husband nor a good father. He craved variety and excitement and was patently unable to remain loyal to one woman. His cheery sensuality, gracious manners, and simplicity endeared him to the many women he courted and led to various shameful adventures. La Fontaine himself alludes reflectively to this character flaw in his poem "Pappillon du Parnasse" ("Poetic Butterfly") as translated by Marie-Odile Sweetser in La Fontaine:

*I go from flower to flower, from one object of love to another.
To many pleasures, I add a little reputation.
I would go higher perhaps in the temple of Fame
If in one genre only I had spent my life
But after all I am flighty in verse as in love.*

La Fontaine started writing near midlife and soon became the protégé of Louis XIV's minister of finances, Nicolas Fouquet, who built the opulent chateau of Vaux-le-Vicomte. La Fontaine frequented the salons of Paris, where he befriended such illustrious courtiers as Mademoiselle de SCUDÉRY, Madame de LAFAYETTE, Madame de SÉVIGNÉ, Charles PERRAULT, LA ROCHEFOUCAULD, and MOLIÈRE, among others.

After the duchess of Orléans became his patroness in 1665, La Fontaine gained wealth and fame with the publication of his first volume of Contes et nouvelles en vers (Tales and Novels in Verse), a four-volume series of lively, salacious tales that was published between 1665 and 1674 and quickly gained notoriety. In Cognitive Space and Patterns of Deceit in La Fontaine's Contes, Catherine Grisé states, "The narratives he chose present typical trickster motifs in sexual contexts. La Fontaine's choice of this focus is one of the strong identifying characteristics of the Contes." Given the author's natural propensity for love and intrigue, the success of his provocative tales came as no surprise.

Critical Analysis

La Fontaine quickly reached the pinnacle of his career with the publication in 1668 of his world-renowned Fables choisies, mises en vers (Selected Fables, Put into Verse). Inscribing himself in the lineage of the Greco-Roman fabulists Aesop and Phaedrus, he also drew on the Indian fables by Pilpay and the wildly popular emblem books of his generation. Fables has been translated into countless languages and illustrated by great artists, such as Oudry, Doré, Fragonard, and Chagall. La Fontaine's genius lies in the transformation of a merely didactic genre into an entirely new mold where witty, playful, and elegant styles turn each fable into a little masterpiece, regardless of the moral lesson it conveys. The fables' human comedy unfolds in a countryside setting where wild and domestic animals, men, women, gods, and fairies enact or personify human foibles. For example, in the brief fable "The Fox and the Grapes," as translated by James Michie in La Fontaine: Selected Fables, a fox cannot reach a bunch of mouth-watering grapes he craves for lunch. Instead of dwelling on his failure, the fox reassures himself that the grapes are not worth the picking:

*He would have dearly liked them for his lunch,
But when he tried and failed to reach the bunch:
"Ah, well, it's more than likely they're not sweet—
Good only for fools to eat!"
Wasn't he wise to say they were unripe
Rather than whine and gripe?*

Remarks David Rubin in A Pact with Silence, "the unique excellence of the Fables has inspired most critics and historians to sequester them, to see them as a miracle without precedent. . . ."

Over the course of 30 years, La Fontaine completed three volumes of fables, 12,000 verses in all. Even so, his election to the prestigious ACADEMIE

FRANÇAISE was fraught with difficulty before King Louis XIV finally ratified it in 1684.

Concludes Geoffrey Grigson in La Fontaine: Selected Fables, "Brevity, structure, matters of style, choice of language, insertion of old among new, quick movement . . . La Fontaine was expert in them all. . . . Sainte-Beuve once called Mozart, for grace, lightness and facility, 'the La Fontaine of music.'"

English Versions of Works by Jean de La Fontaine

Complete Tales in Verse. Translated by Guido Waldman. London: Routledge, 2001.

La Fontaine: Selected Fables. Translated by James Michie. New York: Viking Press, 1979.

Works about Jean de La Fontaine

Fumaroli, Marc, and Jean Marie Todd, trans. The Poet and the King: Jean de la Fontaine and His Century. Chicago: University of Notre Dame Press, 2002.

Rubin, David Lee. A Pact with Silence: Art and Thought in The Fables of Jean de La Fontaine. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1991.

Sweetser, Marie-Odile. La Fontaine. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Langland, William (1330–1386?) poet

Little is known about the identity of the author of the poem known as The Vision of Piers Plowman. Certain notes on the surviving manuscripts lead scholars to believe that his name was William Langland, and he was most likely born in western England. He was educated to enter the church but, because he married, he was not allowed to enter the higher (and more wealthy) orders of the priesthood. Most scholars assume that the narrator of Piers Plowman, a poor itinerant clerk referred to as Will, reflects the author very closely.

The Vision of Piers Plowman is a complex creation. The text exists in three versions, which literary historians have named the A, B, and C texts. The A text, incomplete, is presumably the first draft; the B text, which is complete and was published during the author's lifetime, is considered the best example of Langland's poetry; and the C text reflects revisions the author continued to make throughout his life. Scholars use the language of the poem and references to outside historical events to determine when the poet was writing. Langland lived at the same time as Geoffrey CHAUCER and the poet who wrote Pearl and SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT.

The poem is structured as a dream vision, which was an extremely popular poetic technique in French and English literature from the 12th to the 14th centuries. The poem is an ALLEGORY, which means that its fictional characters and events are meant to parallel if not actual people, then at least actual situations. The language is in Middle English, which, because it strikes the modern eye as peculiar, can be off-putting for some readers. In lines 5–6 the poet sets his scene as follows:

*Ac on a May morwenynge on Malverne hilles
Me bifel a ferly, of Fairye me thoughte.*

In modern English, the poet is simply saying that on a May morning, while he was wandering in the Malvern hills, he met a creature whom he thought was a fairy. The straightforward voice, pleasant surroundings, and dreamy quality of the poetry as introduced here continue throughout the poem.

To understand the Vision's deeper messages, one must understand that English culture at this time was completely fused with and governed by the institutions of the monarchy and the Christian Church, which were seen as the human and divine authorities for life. The journey Will undertakes to search for truth and to discover how to live well represents a real concern of the 14th-century English citizen. Facing a world that had been transformed by plague and living in the midst of transition, many readers would have shared Will's disgust over the hypocrisy, greed, and idleness he saw around him, and would have identified with his wish for a return to order and meaning.

The character of Piers Plowman—who appears only briefly in the poem but with such impact that he lends the whole work his name—was probably not invented by the author but was borrowed from folk legend. (Another example of a popular, enduring English folk legend is Robin Hood.) A record of the 1381 Peasant's Revolt lists Piers Plowman as one of the leaders. Though historically inaccurate, this reference suggests that Piers was a representative figure for the newly mobile working class, perhaps because his message was that every person had a valuable role to play in society, and every person, king or peasant, could expect an equal reward in heaven if he performed his role well. As a symbol of the farmer working his field, Piers represents the lowest estate or class of medieval society, but he is also an icon for useful industry and, most important, his work provided food for all.

Translator A. V. C. Schmidt calls Piers Plowman a “truthful picture of the life of the common people in the fourteenth century” and considers it “a masterpiece of medieval English literature, worthy to stand beside Chaucer's Canterbury Tales as representative of the culture of its age.” The poem also contains a modern relevance, however, in its complaints about dishonesty and lack of charity, the sophisticated insights into the workings of human society and human nature, and the poem's message that love, kindness, and tolerance are the foundational values of human life. Beyond that, the lyric and intricate poetic styles are a sheer joy to read. Little could William Langland have guessed he was writing a work that would thrill audiences seven centuries later, just as it did his own.

An English Version of a Work by William Langland

William Langland: Piers Plowman. Translated and edited by A. V. C. Schmidt. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Works about William Langland

Boulay, F. R. H. The England of Piers Plowman: William Langland and His Vision of the Fourteenth Century. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell and Brewer, 1991.

Hewett-Smith, Kathleen M. William Langland's Piers Plowman: A Book of Essays. New York: Routledge, 2001.

La Rochefoucauld, François, duc de (1613–1680) historian, moralist

François de La Rochefoucauld was born into a noble family of ancient lineage. He came of age during the Fronde, or French civil wars, when the French monarchy fought to consolidate its power against the nobility. These wars eventually led to Louis XIV's decision to create an absolute monarchy in which the nobles were divested of real political power. La Rochefoucauld fought against the monarchy and its prime ministers and, in 1652, surrendered and went into self-imposed exile on his estates in Angoumois. He missed the social and intellectual stimulation of court life and later settled in Paris, where he attended salons, the literary gatherings of noblemen and women that welcomed philosophers, critics, and writers. La Rochefoucauld developed a very close friendship with the writer Madame de LAFAYETTE; some of her detractors even thought he wrote her novels. In reality, he probably served as a trusted sounding board for her ideas and drafts.

While La Rochefoucauld published memoirs that have been invaluable to scholars of 17th-century France, his literary fame rests on his collection of elegantly worded, worldly aphorisms, Réflexions ou sentences et maxims morales (Reflections or moral sentences and maxims, 1665). La Rochefoucauld's cynical and pessimistic attitude toward humans' self-absorption and vanity does not detract from the insight and elegance of his phrases: "Our virtues are most frequently but vices disguised" and "Hypocrisy is the homage vice pays to virtue" are examples of his well-balanced sentences and awareness of people's ability to delude themselves. To La Rochefoucauld, words such as love, honor, and virtue were meant to disguise people's baser emotions from themselves in order to maintain a favorable self-image or amour propre. At the dawn of the ENLIGHTENMENT, La Rochefoucauld knew that "the understanding is always the dupe of the heart."

English Versions of Works by François, duc de La Rochefoucauld

Moral Maxims. Edited by Irwin Primer. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2002.

The Maxims of La Rochefoucauld. Translated by Louis Kronenberger. New York: Random House, 1959.

Works about François, duc de La Rochefoucauld

Bishop, Morris. The Life and Adventures of La Rochefoucauld. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1951.

Hodgson, Richard G. Falsehood Disguised: Unmasking the Truth in La Rochefoucauld. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1995.

Horowitz, Louise K. Love and Language: A Study of the Classical French Moralists Writers. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1977.

Mourgues, Odette de. Two French Moralists: La Rochefoucauld & La Bruyère. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978.

Las Casas, Bartolomé de (1474–1566) historian, activist

Bartolomé de Las Casas was the son of a Spanish merchant and served as a soldier in his youth. He studied Latin at the University of Seville and in 1502 traveled to Hispaniola, in the West Indies. After becoming a Dominican priest in 1524, Las Casas made valiant efforts to minister to the Indians and improve their treatment at the hands of the invaders. In his later years, Las Casas figured greatly at the Spanish court, and was also a prolific writer of treatises, petitions, histories, and correspondence.

His first work, The Only Way (1537), outlined his policies for evangelizing the Indians. In his Brief Report of the Destruction of the Indians (1542), he took a stance in defense of the Indian peoples and harshly criticized Spanish colonial policy for the cruelties inflicted on the native populations. Upon a return to America in 1545, Las Casas issued his famous Confessionario, or Regulations for the Confessors of Spaniards, in which he declared that absolution should be withheld from landowners who owned slaves. Forced by opposition to return to Spain, Las Casas began writing his General History of the Indies (1561), which describes events in the New World from 1492 to 1520. The work has special interest as a biography of Columbus and is considered to be the single best source of information on Columbus's discovery of America. In its entirety, the 417 chapters take up three books and suggest that God will punish Spain for its treatment of the Indians.

Though critics considered Las Casas an enemy of Spain, his admirers hailed him as one of the great spiritual leaders of the Spanish conquest of the New World. His large body of work made important contributions to political theory, history, and anthropology, and his idealization of the American Indian, whom he considered to be naturally rational and good, was an early version of the "noble savage" idea that influenced philosophy for hundreds of years.

English Versions of Works by Bartolomé de Las Casas

In Defense of the Indians. Translated by Stafford Poole. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1992.

Short Account of the Destruction of the Indies. Translated by Nigel Griffin. New York: Penguin, 1999.

Works about Bartolomé de Las Casas

Hanke, Lewis. All Mankind Is One: A Study. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1994.

Remesal, Antonion de. Bartolome De Las Casas, 1474–1566. Translated by Felix Jay. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 2002.

Lee Yul Kok (Yi Yulgok, Yi Yi) (1536–1584) philosopher

One of the most famous Neo-Confucian scholars of Korea, Yi Yi is more commonly known by his pen name Lee Yul Kok, which means "chestnut valley." Born near Kangnung, he passed the literary examination and achieved the scholarly title of Chinsa by age 13. His widowed mother Sin Saimdang, a remarkably learned woman, was responsible for his education.

In his teens Lee Yul Kok absorbed Chinese classics, like Laozi and Zhuangzi, as well as Buddhist writings. At age 15, when his mother died, he retired to the Buddhist sanctuary at Kumgang Mountains for three years and studied Chan Buddhism.

On returning home in 1556, Lee Yul Kok rejected Buddhism for its otherworldliness and embraced Confucianism for its commitment to political and social life. At age 22, he spent two days at Tosan with the elder sage T'oegyē; both men were impressed with each other.

After astonishing success in the civil service examinations, he entered public office in 1559. Though often in poor health, he quickly rose to the highest ranks of government. In 1572 he moved to Haeju. Falling ill there, he resigned his position to devote his time to scholarship. By then his own thinking had evolved, and he had come to disagree with the fundamental basis of T'oegyē's philosophy. Lee Yul Kok emphasized practicality in contrast to T'oegyē's introspection. He participated in the famous Four-Seven Debate ("Four Beginnings, Seven Emotions"), which attempted to resolve the most complex issues and tensions within Korean Neo-Confucianism. To this controversy, he introduced two new terms: tosim ("original goodness") and insim ("concupiscence").

In his later years, he resumed government service and proposed new policies in taxation, education, and defense. While serving as minister of defense, he proposed a standing army; while the proposal was rejected, subsequent invasions by Japan would prove the need for such an army.

Lee Yul Kok's productive life spanned a period of relative stability. He died at the peak of his career at age 48. His writings, seen as a reflection of not only his life but also the 16th-century world in which he lived, have been preserved in Yulgok Chip. They include his major work Kyongmong Yogyol (A Key to Annihilating Ignorance) and a sijo, or poem-cycle, called Kosan Kugok (Nine Songs of Kosan).

An English Version of a Work by Lee Yul Kok

The Four-Seven Debate: An Annotated Translation of the Most Famous Controversy in Korean Neo-Confucian Thought. Translated by Michael C. Kalton, et al. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

Works about Lee Yul Kok

Chung, Edward Y. Korean Neo-Confucianism of Yi T'oegye and Yi Yulgok: A Reappraisal of the "Four-Seven Thesis" and Its Practical Implications for Self-Cultivation. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Ro, Young-chan. Korean Neo-Confucianism of Yi Yulgok. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1988.

Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm (1646–1716)

philosopher, mathematician, nonfiction writer

During the age of the Scientific Revolution and the first stirring of the ENLIGHTENMENT, European thinkers were exploring a variety of new fields of thought in both science and philosophy. One of the most influential of these intellectuals was Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz, who made key contributions to philosophy, theology, mathematics, and political theory.

Leibniz was born in the German city of Leipzig, to Friedrich Leibniz, a professor of moral philosophy at the University of Leipzig, and his wife, Catharina, the daughter of a lawyer. Although his father died not long after Leibniz was born, the young man grew up in the scholarly atmosphere of a university town and spent a great deal of time studying in his father's library. He eventually became a student at the University of Leipzig, where he studied philosophy and law.

Leibniz entered the diplomatic service of the elector of Mainz and, in 1672, was sent as an ambassador to Paris, then the center of European art and culture, and home to Leibniz for the next four years. During his time there, Leibniz would meet and befriend some of the greatest minds at work in Europe, including the Dutch astronomer Christian Huygens and the French philosopher Nicolas de Malebranche. Leibniz also traveled to London during this time and met several leading English scientists. After demonstrating a calculating machine he had invented, Leibniz was elected to the prestigious Royal Society.

Leibniz showed his mathematical genius during his years in Paris. He invented the mathematical system now known as differential calculus, unaware that the great English scientist Isaac Newton had already done so many years before. Leibniz published his findings in a book titled Nova Methodus Pro Maximus et Minimus, which means "New Method for the Greatest and the Least." The publication of Leibniz's work before Newton's gave rise to a furious dispute between the two men, each accusing the other of claiming credit for the discovery. In truth, both men independently discovered the same thing.

In 1676 Leibniz left Paris and settled in Hanover, his home for the rest of his life when he was not traveling. He undertook a variety of administrative tasks for the duke of Hanover but devoted most of his time and energy to his own intellectual pursuits.

In the late 1680s, Leibniz wrote Discourse on Metaphysics, which presented his concept of metaphysics and the nature of existence. Leibniz was one of the most influential Western thinkers in the field of metaphysics, and the philosophical system he conceived is one of the most complex philosophical works in all of Western thought.

Essentially, Leibniz saw all of reality as being composed of immaterial particles, including human thought, which he called monads. According to Leibniz, monads are not matter, but matter is somehow composed of monads. By this system of metaphysics, Leibniz sought to reconcile empiricists (those who believed all existence was purely physical) with dualists (those who saw reality as being made up of both physical and non-physical qualities). Toward the end of his life, Leibniz elaborated and expanded on this idea in his work Monadology.

Leibniz was also very influential in the field of theology. Some philosophers had stated that if God were all-powerful and all-good, evil would not exist. Therefore, according to these thinkers, God either was not good and all-powerful or simply did not exist. In Théodicée, Leibniz claims evil itself does not exist, that everything that happens is for the best, and that the best possible world for people must include free will. VOLTAIRE later ridiculed this idea in his famous novel Candide, which includes a bumbling character named Dr. Pangloss, who many scholars believe is a caricature of Leibniz.

Throughout his career, Leibniz energetically worked to create scientific and philosophical societies throughout Europe to allow intellectuals from many countries to exchange scholarly information. In 1700 the Berlin Society for the Sciences was established, with Leibniz as its first president. He met Peter the Great, czar of Russia, and urged him to adopt radical educational and social reforms throughout Russia.

In mathematics and philosophy, Leibniz earned a place as one of the foremost thinkers of Western civilization. His writings would later influence Immanuel KANT, and his mathematical work would greatly contribute to the efforts of future mathematicians.

English Versions of Works by Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz

Correspondence. Edited by Samuel Clarke and Roger Ariew. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 2000.

Monadology and Other Philosophical Essays. Translated by Paul Schrecker and Anne Martin Schrecker. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill, 1965.

Philosophical Texts. Edited by R. S. Woolhouse and Richard Francks. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Works about Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz

Kynell, Kurt von S. Mind of Leibniz: A Study in Genius. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.

Lefevre, Wolfgang. Between Leibniz, Newton, and Kant: Philosophy and Science in the Eighteenth Century. Hingham, Mass.: Kluwer Academic Publishers, 2001.

Rescher, Nicholas. On Leibniz. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 2003.

Leonardo da Vinci (1452–1519) painter, architect, sculptor, engineer, scientist

In the 15th century, Italy was experiencing a period of cultural and intellectual vitality known as the RENAISSANCE. It was a time of brilliance in literature, science, and the arts. Among the great geniuses of this time was Leonardo da Vinci. He is remembered today not only as the creator of some of the greatest works of art in human history but also as a man whose interests and passions encompassed an incredibly wide variety of fields, including painting, sculpture, architecture, engineering, music, geology, anatomy, biology, astronomy, and cartography.

Leonardo was born on April 15 in the town of Vinci, just outside Florence. He was the illegitimate son of a lawyer and lived out his childhood with his grandparents. When he was an adolescent, his father brought him to Florence to learn a trade. Because his illegitimate birth prevented Leonardo from joining the legal profession, his father set him up as an apprentice artist in the studio of Andrea del Verrocchio, a respected artist and craftsman. Leonardo spent several years in Verrocchio's workshop, gradually mastering the arts of painting, sculpture, and architecture.

In his youth, Leonardo developed an overriding and passionate curiosity about the natural world. He had a strong affinity for animals, particularly birds and horses, and became a vegetarian. He was fascinated by flora and other plants, as well as scenes of natural beauty, such as mountains or waterfalls. He expressed this curiosity about the natural world in his sketchbooks. Leonardo customarily carried a notebook with him wherever he went and filled them with drawings of anything that caught his attention. Many of these sketchbooks survive to this day, filled with Leonardo's observations and brilliant drawings.

By the late 1470s, Leonardo had left Verrocchio's workshop and had set himself up as an independent artist. He was commissioned by the monks of San Donato to create a painting for their main altar. Although the Adoration of the Magi is considered by many art historians to have been Leonardo's first great masterpiece, he never finished it. Indeed, a tragic element of his life was his seeming inability to complete many of his most important works.

In the early 1480s, Leonardo left Florence and moved to the city-state of Milan, then ruled by Duke Ludovico Sforza. Leonardo spent nearly two decades in Milan, and it was during this period that his genius reached its height. He became a trusted adviser to Duke Ludovico Sforza on matters of art and culture, as well as military engineering.

Leonardo's scientific work soon became an important part of his life. His notebooks from this period are filled with sketches and jotted notes concerning his scientific theories. Although his scientific work was unknown to the general public, it can now be seen that his understanding of physics and many other fields of science far surpassed that of anyone else in his time.

It was also during his years in Milan that Leonardo attempted to fulfill one of his great dreams: building a machine that would allow him to fly. He had long been fascinated by the flight of birds and studied the subject intensely, hoping for knowledge that would allow him to build a flying machine. His notebooks are filled with sketches of proposed designs, including one for a helicopter-type machine and others of various gliders and machines with flapping wings. It is not known if he actually built prototypes of any of these machines or if he attempted to fly any of them.

Through all this time, Leonardo continued to work on his art. Indeed, in the late 1490s, he created one of the most famous pieces of art in the world, The Last Supper, in which he depicts the famous scene from the Bible in which Jesus announces to his apostles that one of them will betray him. Leonardo created the painting for the monastery of Santa Maria delle Grazie, where it still exists today.

Leonardo's other great artistic project during this period was the creation of a giant bronze statue of a horse and rider, which was to memorialize the father of Duke Ludovico. The artist spent many years on this project, which was to be of unprecedented size. His notebooks are filled with preparatory sketches, and he created a full-scale clay statue as a model. Unfortunately, just as Leonardo was to begin casting the bronze, Milan was attacked by its enemies and the bronze had to be used for cannon. Later, the highly regarded clay model was destroyed by soldiers using it for target practice.

In 1499, fleeing a French invasion of northern Italy, Leonardo left Milan and spent the next few years wandering through Italy. He advised the leaders of Venice in how to defend their city from the Turks and spent a few months working as a military engineer for Cesare Borgia, a warlord famous for both his brilliance and his cruelty. During this period, Leonardo met and befriended the political philosopher Niccolò MACHIAVELLI.

During the next few years, Leonardo moved among Florence, Milan, and Rome. He painted some of his greatest works, including the portrait known as the Mona Lisa, one of the most famous paintings in history, and continued his scientific investigations into nature, filling his notebooks with his thoughts.

Toward the end of his life, Leonardo left Italy and took up residence in France, living as a guest of the French king. He died in the town of Cloux on May 2.

The life of Leonardo da Vinci has come to symbolize the great potential of the human mind. Leonardo himself has become the idealization of the "Renaissance Man," one who does not concern himself with only one particular activity, but whose skills and talents embrace a wide variety of different fields and interests.

Critical Analysis

Although he is best known as a painter, Leonardo's notebooks, taken collectively, constitute a great literary masterpiece. Throughout his life, he would record his observations about people or nature in these notebooks, and he eventually amassed an incredible amount of information.

Leonardo does not seem to have organized his notebooks in any particular manner. Each of them seems to be filled randomly, so that a single page might have preparatory sketches of horses, observations concerning the flow of a river, or even shopping lists. Nor do the individual notebooks concern any individual themes. In addition, for reasons which are not clear, the notebooks were written backward and in reverse, from right to left. One can read the notebooks clearly only by holding a mirror up to the page.

Apart from a story of seeing a kite as a boy and a possibly fictitious story about exploring a dark cave, there are remarkably few details about Leonardo's personal life. This may be because he did not wish information about his private life to become known, or it may simply be that he did not consider such matters to be of particular importance.

Leonardo's notebooks are famous largely for the incredible scientific speculations they contain. Sketches of cannon firing projectiles demonstrate his knowledge of ballistics, while his numerous sketches of flowing rivers betray a highly advanced knowledge of hydrodynamics. He also recorded numerous astronomical observations, as well as astonishing designs for new inventions, including flying machines, proposals for submarines, tanks, bicycles, parachutes, gear shifts, and water pumps.

Leonardo's notebooks reveal a mind of the highest order and knowledge that was far in advance of his time. However, because his notebooks were not published until many centuries after his death, his discoveries did not make any significant impact on Western civilization. Had his scientific breakthroughs and inventions become widely known among his contemporaries, the course of history would likely have been very different.

Works by Leonardo da Vinci

Leonardo on Art and the Artist. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2002.

The Notebooks of Leonardo da Vinci. IndyPublish.com, 2003.

The Wisdom of Leonardo da Vinci. Translated by Wade Baskins. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2004.

Works about Leonardo da Vinci

Atalay, Bulent. Math and the Mona Lisa: The Art and Science of Leonardo da Vinci. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 2004.

Baskins, Wade, trans. The Wisdom of Leonardo da Vinci. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2004.

Bramly, Serge. Leonardo: The Artist and the Man. Translated by Sian Reynolds. New York: Penguin Books, 1994.

Nicholl, Charles. Leonardo da Vinci: Flights of the Mind. New York: Viking, 2004.

White, Michael. Leonardo: The First Scientist. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 2000.

Léry, Jean de (1534–1613) historian, clergyman

A French Protestant during an age of violent religious conflict, Jean de Léry wrote his now famous work, History of a Voyage to the Land of Brazil (Histoire d'un voyage fait en la terre de Brésil), when, at age 23, he was invited to join a mission to establish a refuge for persecuted Protestants on a French-controlled island off the coast of Brazil. In this history, Jean de Léry tells of his 10-month stay among a Brazilian tribe allied to the French. His strategy consists in foregrounding his cultural biases, while critically observing the customs of the Brazilians as well as the French, and in rendering each relative to the other. For instance, the intertribal cannibalism practiced by their Brazilian hosts horrifies the Europeans, but when his fellows kill the tribe's egg-laying hens for meat, he conveys the Brazilians' dismay at the Europeans' uncivilized behavior.

Jean de Léry published his celebrated history in 1578, 20 years after his return to France. During the intervening years, religious civil wars had raged throughout Europe. Trapped for seven months during the siege of Sancerre, a city in central France, de L ry wrote another history, Histoire memorable de la ville de Sancerre (A Memorable History of the City of Sancerre, 1574), in which he recounts the hardship, famine, and cannibalism he witnessed during that siege. De L ry's vivid descriptions and close attention to behavior have placed him among the forebears of modern ethnography.

An English Version of a Work by Jean de L ry

Whatley, Janet, trans. History of a Voyage to the Land of Brazil. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

A Work about Jean de L ry

Lestrington, Frank. "The Philosopher's Breviary: Jean de L ry in the Enlightenment," in New World Encounters. Edited by Stephen Greenblatt. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Lessing, Gotthold (1729–1781) critic, dramatist

Gotthold Lessing is considered the first modern German intellectual, an innovator in the fields of drama, literary criticism, and religious theory. Born in Saxony to a pastor and his wife, Lessing was sent to an elite school where he learned Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and French. He attended the University of Leipzig, where he studied theology, then medicine, and found himself drawn to the theater. He received his master of arts in 1752 and moved to Berlin, aspiring to be the German MOLI RE. After joining the Prussian army in 1760, he served five years as a secretary and then returned to Berlin. Never financially secure, he joined the National Theater, which closed; he then attempted to establish a publishing house, which failed. Finally he accepted a post as librarian to the duke of Braunschweig. In 1776 he married Eva Koenig, who died a year later in childbirth.

Though notoriously unexpressive about his private life, Lessing was known for being argumentative and having an opinion on virtually every topic, none of which he feared to express in print.

His first literary efforts were as a reviewer and critic, and he wholeheartedly aspired to establish a German literary tradition and nurture good taste in the reading public. Though unafraid of risk, Lessing was eminently rational. His greatest influences were Aristotle, SHAKESPEARE, and most of all Denis DIDEROT, whose essays and plays he translated into German in 1760. In 1754 he wrote The Rehabilitations of Horace and began to translate Sophocles, though he left that project unfinished. In 1759 he published a collection of fables, and in 1766 he released Laocoon, a critique on painting and poetry. This series of essays shows Lessing as a developed, efficient judge and critic at the height of his style.

At a young age Lessing composed Damon and The Young Scholar (1747), both strongly influenced by the French tradition. He followed this with The Freethinker (1748), The Old Maid (1749), and The Jews (1749), which reflect his concern with religion. The Treatise and Women Will Be Women (1750) show the influence of Plautus, while The Misogynist (1755) depicts a classic love-triangle. In Miss Sara Sampson (1755) Lessing turned to the English countryside, borrowing the theme of the sentimental tragedy and the domestic atmosphere from English novels by RICHARDSON and Fielding. Philotas (1759) looks at kings and princes at war, exploring themes of patriotism, honor, love of glory, and filial devotion. Though very Greek in its plot, development, and execution, the artistry of Philotas is marred by long monologues that weaken the action. The playwright at this point was interested in ideas, not character.

Minna von Barnhelm (1767) is a comedy of manners, perhaps the most frequently performed German comedy, full of scheming characters and a playful, ironic tone. Emilia Galotti (1722), a tragedy set in an Italian court, contains all the standard elements of a plotting minister, a desirous prince, and a doomed maiden. Though quite carefully constructed, the play was perhaps too political to please audiences. The jewel of Lessing's dramatic output is Nathan the Wise (1779), a sophisticated comedy disguised as a fairy tale, which is essentially a dialogue between the three main religions of the West. Nathan was hailed by critics as a new kind of play, a modern morality play whose characters have a symbolic value far beyond their temporal existence.

Lessing's humanitarian goals and his concern with ethics rather than orthodoxy emerge in his treatises. After joining the Freemasons, he published Conversation for the Freemasons (1780), which portrays his disillusionment with the aristocratic elite. Proof of the Spirit and of Power (1777), The Testament of John (1777), The Religion of Christ (1780), and The Education of the Human Race (1780) reflect his efforts to separate the truth of the Christian religion from its historical foundation. Lessing appreciated the ethical significance of Christian thought but remained skeptical about certain historical proofs.

Above all, Lessing maintained a position as an independent thinker, loyal to moral feeling but not to institutions. As a humanist, Lessing believed freedom was the ultimate ideal, and friendship the means through which true humanity proves itself. Lessing's beliefs transcended the rationalist approach of the ENLIGHTENMENT, which held reason as the highest pursuit; for Lessing, compassion, not reason, guided spiritual development. His commitment to free-thinking, fraternity, and to building a native tradition have led Lessing to be identified as the founder of German literature.

English Versions of Works by Gotthold Lessing

Laocoon: An Essay on the Limits of Painting and Poetry.

Translated by Edward A. McCormick. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990.

Lessing's Theological Writings: Selections in Translation. Translated by Henry Chadwick. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1994.

Nathan the Wise, Minna von Barnhelm, and Other Plays and Writings. Edited by Peter Demetz. New York: Continuum, 1991.

Works about Gotthold Lessing

Brown, F. Andrew. Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. New York: Twayne, 1971.

Yasukata, Toshimasa. Lessing's Philosophy of Religion and the German Enlightenment. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Li Yu (Li Yü) (1611–ca. 1680) playwright, critic, novelist, essayist

Born into a family of literati, Li Yu was acknowledged in his lifetime as a literary genius. However, because he failed the civil service examination, he was forced to earn a living by his writing.

Being a resourceful man, Li Yu organized a successful theater company and soon was able to lead a life of luxury and move in high circles. His epicurean lifestyle is reflected in his prose work Xian-qing ou-ji (Hsien ch'ing ou-chi; Random Ventures in Idleness). The philosophy of this book is summarized by a Chinese phrase that means "enjoy oneself," for Li Yu rejected Confucian pedantry and moral strictures, as well as the Daoist notion of the simple life, the practice of foot-binding, and education for women. In his day, the ideas Li Yu put forth in Random Ventures in Idleness were quite radical. Not all of the work was seen as such, however; he includes a rather tame section, in comparison, that is devoted to architecture and landscape, which influenced Japanese aesthetic taste.

For the theater, Li Yu wrote 10 romantic comedies, which are characterized by risqué elements and often deal with controversial topics. Not content to be a mere playwright, however, Li Yu also wrote a treatise on stagecraft. In this work, he criticizes works of extreme length and proposes the idea of "one principal character, one plot." He used this theory in his own works, especially his short stories in which, conversely, the influence of the theater can also be seen.

Li Yu's first collection of short stories, Wu-sheng xi (Wu-sheng hsi; Silent Operas, 1654), features an intrusive narrator and achieves ironic effects by pitting appearance versus reality. His next collection, Shi-er Lou (Shih-erh lou; Twelve Towers), is a series of 12 tales linked by the word for "tower" in each title and written in the Chinese vernacular.

In addition, Li Yu also wrote an erotic novel, Jou pu tuan (The Carnal Prayer Mat), which tells the story of Scholar Vesperus, an orphan who turns from his amoral life to Zen Buddhism and a life of enlightenment. To avoid censorship, Li Yu disguised the book under different titles.

Li Yu's works were banned a century later in the reign of Qianlung (Ch'ien-lung). Since the May Fourth Movement, however, his works have resurfaced, and Li Yu's contribution to the development of Chinese fiction has been recognized.

English Versions of Works by Li Yu

Carnal Prayer Mat. Translated by Patrick Hanan.

Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1996.

Chinese Amusement: The Lively Plays of Li Yu. Translated by Eric P. Henry. North Haven, Conn.: Shoe String Press, 1980.

Tower for the Summer Heat. Translated by Patrick Hanan. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.

Works about Li Yu

Chun-shu Chang, and Shelley H. Chang. Crisis and Transformation in Seventeenth-Century China.

Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1998.

Hanan, Patrick. Invention of Li Yu. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1988.

Llorona, La (1500s) Aztec legend

The legend of La Llorona (The Weeping Woman) evolved from stories in the Mexican oral tradition. It evolved from the convergence of two tragic female heroines: one in Aztec mythology and another in Spanish history.

La Llorona originates with the Aztec goddess Cihuacoatl, who warned of the impending Spanish conquest of Montezuma's empire. The mother goddess wandered through the city of Tenochtitlán as a weeping woman draped in flowing white cloth. In the darkness, she was heard lamenting: "Oh, my sons! Now has come the time for your destruction."

The legend of La Llorona is also mixed with Spanish history. In 1519 Spanish conquistador Hernán CORTÉS landed on the shores of Mexico and eventually succeeded in overcoming the Aztec people. Cortés's triumph had been contingent on an Aztec captive, La Malinche, also known as Doña Marina. The indigenous woman served as an invaluable translator during Cortés's military efforts. She is a controversial character in Mexican history. Some portray her as a traitor to her people; others see her as an unwilling participant. Cortés eventually took Doña Marina as his mistress, and she bore him a son. When the time came for the conquistador to return to Spain, however, Cortés took the boy with him and left his Aztec mistress behind. Devastated by the loss of her son, Doña Marina died shortly after. According to legend, her restless soul searches for her lost child and she wails in endless pain.

Literary critics explain the image of a lost Aztec woman in mourning as analogous to the demise of indigenous culture after the Spanish conquest. In modern-day Mexican and Mexican-American culture, numerous adaptations of the legend of La Llorona are still told to children.

A Work about La Llorona

Kraul, Edward Garcia, and Judith Beatty. The Weeping Woman: Encounters with La Llorona. Santa Fe, N.M.: Word Process, 1988.

Lomonosov, Mikhail (1711–1765)

scientist, poet, grammarian

Mikhail Lomonosov was born near Kholmogory, a town in northern Russia. His mother, Elena, was the daughter of a deacon, and his father a merchant of peasant origins. When Lomonosov was 10 years old, he began accompanying his father on business, but he remained more interested in academics. In 1731 he traveled to Moscow and gained admission to the Slavo-Greco-Latin Academy by pretending to be a nobleman's son.

Lomonosov's intellectual promise rapidly became clear. In 1736 he was one of 12 students chosen to enroll in the new University of St. Petersburg. He then attended universities in Marburg and Freiburg to study mathematics, chemistry, metallurgy, and related subjects. In 1740 he married Elizabeth Zilch in Marburg. After returning to St. Petersburg the following year, he received a post at the Russian Academy of Sciences, where he remained for the rest of his career. Lomonosov helped to found the University of Moscow in 1755. His career declined during the reign of CATHERINE THE GREAT.

Lomonosov's wide-ranging scientific activities, like those of his contemporary Benjamin FRANKLIN, typify the RATIONALISM of the ENLIGHTENMENT. His scientific works, most written in Latin, include Reflections on the Causes of Heat and Cold (1744), Oration on Aerial Phenomena, proceeding from the Force of Electricity (1753), A Dissertation on Greater Exactitude in Navigation (1759), and The First Principles of Metallurgy (1763). Lomonosov also carried out numerous experiments with porcelain and with colored glass for mosaics. In 1752 the Russian Senate gave him permission to establish a glass factory, and an imperial decree the next year provided him with land and 212 serfs to work there. The factory eventually manufactured a number of glass products, including a large mosaic for one of Catherine II's palaces, although Lomonosov struggled to make the enterprise profitable.

Lomonosov burst upon the Russian literary scene in 1739, when he sent a "Letter on the Rules of Russian Poetry" to the Academy of Sciences and accompanied it with an ode celebrating a Russian military victory over the Turks. In the "Letter," Lomonosov insists that Russian poets should consider not only the number of syllables in each line, but also the placement of accented syllables. The ode, written in iambic tetrameter, illustrates his argument. It greatly impressed academy members.

Lomonosov's output includes historical works, translations of poems by Horace and ROUSSEAU, two dramas, and a number of odes celebrating special occasions at the Russian court. His poetry is thick with imagery, often involving allusions to Roman and Greek mythology. He praises Russia, the good ruler (who usually resembles Peter I), science, and learning.

Lomonosov's rival Alexander SUMAROKOV mocked his poems as bombastic and exaggerated, but he respected his competitor's lyricism. This lyricism is evident in two of Lomonosov's most significant poems, the "Morning" and "Evening Meditations on the Majesty of God" (1743). In the "Evening Meditation," the appearance of the northern lights causes the poet to reflect on their possible causes and the vast universe God has created. In the "Morning Meditation," Lomonosov writes that the sun is "an ocean burning evermore." Yet, "This awe-inspiring enormity / Is but a mere spark" before God. A later work, "Letter on the Use of Glass" (1752), also combines Lomonosov's scientific interests with religion and poetry. The poem begins with a list of the various uses of glass, including windows, mirrors, and jewelry. Men have killed for gold, but no wars have begun over glass; instead, Lomonosov writes, the glass in telescopes has allowed scientists to confirm the theories of Nicolaus COPERNICUS about the solar system. "Through optics," the poet exclaims, "glass leads us to [God], having expelled from us the profound darkness of ignorance!"

Lomonosov's theoretical works contributed significantly to the development of the Russian language. His Rhetoric (1748) offers advice to would-be poets, complete with examples from ancients like Homer, Anacreon, Juvenal, Seneca, and Martial, as well as the modern LA FONTAINE. On the Use of Church Books in the Russian Language (1757) regulates Russian vocabulary by categorizing words as either "high," "middle," or "low." Finally, Lomonosov's Grammar (1757), the first in Russian, remained definitive through 1831.

Alexander Pushkin summed up Lomonosov's wide-ranging career in the following words:

Combining unusual will power with an unusual power of comprehension, Lomonosov embraced all the branches of knowledge. . . . Historian, rhetorician, mechanic, chemist, mineralogist, artist, and poet—he scrutinized and fathomed everything.

English Versions of Works by Mikhail Lomonosov

Mikhail Vasil'evich Lomonosov on the Corpuscular Theory. Translated by Henry M. Leicester. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1970.

"Mikhail V. Lomonosov," in The Literature of Eighteenth-Century Russia, vol. 1. Translated by Harold Segel. New York: Dutton, 1967.

Works about Mikhail Lomonosov

Brown, William Edward. "Mikhail Lomonosov and the Solemn Ode," in A History of Eighteenth-Century Russian Literature. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1980.

Menshutkin, Boris N. Russia's Lomonosov: Chemist, Courtier, Physicist, Poet. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1952.

Pavolova, Galina Evgen'evna. Mikhail Vasilievich Lomonosov: His Life and Work. Translated by Arthur Aksenov. Moscow: Mir, 1984.

Lope de Vega Carpio, Félix (1562–1635) dramatist, poet

Lope de Vega was born in Madrid to Félix, an embroiderer, and Francisca Fernandez Flores. At age 10, he began studies in Latin and Castilian under the poet Vicente Espinel, and the following year entered the Jesuit Imperial College, where he began to study the rudiments of the humanities. In 1577 the bishop of Avila (Jerónimo Manrique), impressed by Lope de Vega's talent, took him to the Alcalá de Henares to study for the priesthood. This did not agree with Lope de Vega's tempestuous nature, however, and he soon left the school in pursuit of a married woman. He continued his education through intensive readings in anthologies.

By 1583, Lope de Vega had begun to establish himself as a poet in Madrid and also acted as attendant to various nobles. In addition, his sensual nature led him on a course of numerous passionate entanglements. His romantic involvement with the actress Elena Osorio, which lasted five years, was marred by his intense jealousy. When she left him, he wrote poems of such a libelous nature against her and her family that a court case was brought against him. As a result, Lope de Vega was sentenced to eight years of exile from Castile. In the midst of this scandal, he abducted 16-year-old Isabel de Urbina (the "Belisa" of many of his poems) and was forced to marry her. Only a few weeks later, Lope de Vega set sail with the Spanish Armada in an excursion against the English (1588). During his time on board, he wrote La hermosura de Angélica and other poems in which Isabel, his wife, is addressed as "Belisa."

Upon returning from the voyage, Lope de Vega retrieved Isabel and spent the remainder of his exile in Valencia, a dramatic center where he began to write ballads plays in earnest. When his exile ended, he moved to Toledo and became secretary to the duke of Alba. Isabel died in 1594 in childbirth, after which Lope de Vega moved to Madrid. He married Juana de Guardo in 1598. During their marriage, Lope de Vega had an affair with actress Micaela de Luján, which created quite a scandal, as he wrote numerous poems to Micaela, and contributed to his reputation as a womanizer. Despite his personal intrigues and upheavals, Lope de Vega continued to read and write profusely, and while his personal life is certainly interesting, it is his literature that gained him the greatest recognition.

Critical Analysis

Lope de Vega was a prolific writer who became increasingly identified as a playwright of the comedia, a term applied to the new drama of Spain's Golden Age. He was influenced by Horace, PETERARCH, ARIOSTO, TASSO, and CERVANTES, among others. From 1593 to 1632, he wrote more than 1,500 plays, as well as PASTORAL romances, EPIC poems, verse biographies of Spanish saints, and various lyric compositions. Many of these works reflect Lope de Vega's thoughts and feelings concerning his loves, exile, marriage, and friends. Lyricism and originality abound in all of his works. Sadly, most of these works have not survived.

In regard to his comedias, the influence of Valencian playwright Cristobal de Virues was profound. It was Lope de Vega, however, who took the form to its greatest heights. Many of his plays were historic and cloak-and-sword plays (capa y espada), which focused on contemporary manners and intrigue. His cloak-and-sword plays are largely made up of the same basic characters and situations: ladies and gallants falling in and out of love, a “point of honor” being engaged, and servants who imitate and parody the main characters, thereby exposing the follies of their superiors.

The “point of honor” was one of Lope de Vega’s favorite devices. He called it the best theme “since there are none but are strongly moved thereby.” In the context of his plays and the society of his day, honor was largely equivalent to social reputation. Men were to be brave, proud, and unwilling to accept any insult to their integrity. Women were generally required to maintain their chastity and fidelity. Upholding this point of honor usually led to an accumulation of tragic events with an emphasis on misunderstandings, intrigues, and other intricate plot devices, sometimes at the expense of in-depth character portrayals.

In the play, El perro del hortelano (The Gardener’s Dog), the countess Diana becomes enamoured of her employee, Teodoro, but accepts the impossibility of their union until she learns of her lady-in-waiting’s intent to wed him. This causes Diana to pursue him with renewed vigor until he becomes elevated to a social status suitable for her consideration. Edward H. Friedman remarks in “Sign Language: the Semiotics of Love in Lope’s El Perro del Hortelano”: “[The play] . . . is ostensibly about love, passion and caste, but the leading characters, showing signs of distress over what they fear are unattainable goals, seem to be more captivated by the psychological challenges than the human object.” Other famous plays of this type include La dama boba (The Lady Nit-Wit), La moza de cántaro (The Girl with the Jug), and Por la puente Juana (Across the Bridge, Juana).

From 1605 until his death, Lope de Vega maintained a relationship as secretary to the duke of Sessa, who paid for Lope de Vega’s funeral. Their correspondence, along with Lope de Vega’s written works, is the best source of critical study of Lope de Vega’s personal feelings about the people and events of his life.

In 1608 Lope de Vega was promoted to a position as a familiar of the Inquisition and became widely known as “the phoenix of Spanish wits,” or simply, “the Phoenix.” Several years later he wrote his famous Arte nuevo de hacer comedias en este tiempo (New Art of Writing Plays at This Time), which effectively served as a manual for writing comedias. In this work, he rejects classical and neo-classical standards of writing and proposes a distinctive style that blends TRAGEDY, comedy, and metrical variety. This new style of writing, he suggests, gives lyricism to the dramatic form.

In 1610, after having been married several times and experienced many passionate scandals, Lope de Vega moved his household from Toledo to Madrid. Following the death of his wife, Juana, in 1613 and his favorite son Carlos Felix, age seven, he experienced a religious crisis and entered the first of various religious orders. He began to write almost exclusively religious works and became a priest in 1614. Following the publication of his verse epic La corona trágica (The Tragic Queen), he was awarded a doctorate in theology from the Collegium Sapientiae and the cross of the order of Malta, which allowed him the proud use of the title Fray (“brother”).

Though Lope de Vega’s final years were fraught with gloom, he wrote in his treatise on the comedia form: “Tragedy with comedy—Terence with Seneca—will cause much delight. Nature gives us the example, being through such variety beautiful.” His most enduring and popular works include La Dorotea (1632), a semi-autobiographical novel; the lyric poems of La vega del Parnaso (1637); the SONNETS of La hermosura de Angélica (1602), which were influenced by Petrarch and included La Dragontea, an epic poem in which Vega criticizes Sir Francis Drake; and, of course, his numerous plays, of which Fuenteovejuna, Punishment without Revenge, and The Knight from Olmedo are among his most entertaining.

While Lope de Vega is most remembered for his dramatic works, he was also a remarkably skilled poet. In his later poetry, we see a different, more mature and religious Lope de Vega than the impassioned youth who penned The Gardener's Dog. In "The Good Shepherd," for example, the poet addresses Christ, pleading:

*Lead me to mercy's ever-flowing fountains;
For Thou my shepherd, guard, and guide shalt be;
I will obey Thy voice, and wait to see
Thy feet all beautiful upon the mountains.*
(trans. by Henry W. Longfellow)

In another vein, more attuned to the transience of life, is Lope de Vega's appreciation for the power of nature, as can be seen in "O Navis":

*Poor bark of Life, upon the billows hoarse
Assailed by storms of envy and deceit,
Across what cruel seas in passage fleet
My pen and sword alone direct thy course!
My pen is dull; my sword of little force;
Thy side lies open to the wild waves' beat
As out from Favor's harbors we retreat, Pursued by hopes deceived and vain remorse.*

(trans. by Roderick Gill)

Lope de Vega's ability to metaphorically transcribe the challenges of life and the struggles of the soul into words can also be seen in "A Christmas Cradle," in which the poet pits the "stormy winds," "sorrows," and "cold blasts" of the world against the innocence of baby Jesus. And in "Tomorrow," the poet recognizes that he was called to his faith many times:

*How oft my guardian angel gently cried,
"Soul from thy casement look, and thou shalt see How He persists to knock and wait for thee!"*

Yet the poet's desire to experience earthly pleasures kept him ever denying the call:

*. . . how often to that Voice of sorrow,
"Tomorrow we will open," I replied,
And when the morrow came I answered still "Tomorrow."*

(trans. by Henry W. Longfellow)

In Ten Centuries of Spanish Poetry, Elizabeth Turnbull comments on Lope de Vega's use of nature and his inner struggles:

[Lope de Vega] is the precursor of modernism, a man in constant struggle with himself. There is a great deal of the romantic in him. The romantic, for his direct awareness, converts his own vital experience into poetry. . . . He was extremely natural, but he was also a man of culture who aspired to express in a certain ordered way that natural element converted into poetry.

The quality of Lope de Vega's poetic lyricism and the fluency of his language, as well as the contributions he made to Spanish drama have made him one of the most well known and appreciated writers in the history of world literature.

English Versions of Works by Félix Lope de Vega Carpio

Desire's Experience Transformed: A Representative Anthology of Lope de Vega's Lyric Poetry. Translated by Carl W. Cobb. Rock Hill, S.C.: Spanish Literature Publications, 1991.

La Dorotea. Translated by Edwin Honig and Alan S. Trueblood. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.

Lady Nitwit/La Dama Boda. Translated by William I. Oliver. Melbourne: Bilingual Press, 1997.

Madness in Valencia and Peribanez. Translated by David Johnston. Bath, England: Absolute Classics, 1995.

The Best Boy in Spain. Translated by David M. Gitlitz. Melbourne: Bilingual Press, 1999.

Three Major Plays: Fente Ovejuna, The Knight from Olmedo, Punishment without Revenge. Translated by Gwynne Edwards. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Works about Félix Lope de Vega Carpio

Drake, Dana, and Jose A. Madrigal. Studies in the Spanish Golden Age: Cervantes and Lope de Vega. Miami, Fla.: Ediciones Universal, 2001.

Love's Dialectic: Mimesis and Allegory in the Romances of Lope de Vega. University, Miss.: Romance Monographs, 2000.

McKendrick, Melveena. Playing the King: Lope de Vega and the Limits of Conformity. Suffolk, U.K.: Tamesis Books, 2002.

Ostlund, DeLys. The Re-Creation of History in the Fernando and Isabel Plays of Lope de Vega. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.

Yarbro-Bejarano, Yvonne M. Feminism and the Honor Plays of Lope de Vega. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1994.

López de Gómara, Francisco

(ca. 1512–ca. 1572) historian

Francisco López de Gómara studied at Alcalá and was later ordained as a priest. He joined the Spanish household of Hernán Cortés as secretary-chaplain. He accompanied Cortés on an expedition to Algiers and, after Cortés's death, continued employment in the household of Cortés's son, Martín.

Although López de Gómara reportedly never traveled to the New World, he joined the ranks of other authors of 16th-century histories who wrote about the heroic adventures of the conquistadors and their campaigns in the New World. He gathered the information secondhand from his famous employer, crafting a glowing biography of Cortés and an historical accounting of his exploits.

Published in 1552, López de Gómara's chronicle is written in two parts. In contrast to other New World chroniclers, he takes a geographic approach to his narrative, as opposed to a chronological one. Part one, Crónica de la conquista de la Nueva España, covers the discovery and conquest of areas of the New World other than Mexico. Part two, La historia de las Indias y conquista de México, relates the adventures of Cortés in Mexico.

Also, in contrast to the majority of authors of firsthand accounts of New World travels, López de Gómara was a trained man of letters and composed his narrative in a highly literary manner. He makes use of irony, puns, and allusions, and illustrates universal themes through the circumstances of Cortés's exploits.

López de Gómara portrays Cortés as a hero bordering on EPIC proportions. This drew public objection from Bernal DÍAZ DEL CASTILLO, another popular Spanish historian of the time. He published Verdadera historia in reply to López de Gómara's work. López de Gómara's history also criticized certain decisions of Carlos V, resulting in a ban by Philip II upon the circulation of the work in 1553. These censures contributed to the obscurity of the publication until after 1727, when the ban was finally lifted.

López de Gómara also authored Crónica de los muy nombrados Omiche y Haradin Barbarrojas and collected materials for a history of the reign of Charles V, which were published during the 20th century as Annals of the Emperor Charles V.

English Versions of Works by Francisco López de Gómara

Conquest of the West Indies. Delmas, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1940.

Cortés: The Life of the Conqueror of Mexico by His Secretary, Francisco López de Gómara. Edited by Lesley B. Simpson. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977.

A Work about Francisco López de Gómara

Carman, Glen Edgar. Cortes, Gomara, and the Rhetoric of Empire. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1993.

Luo Guanzhong (Luo Kuan-chung)

(ca. 1330–1400) playwright, novelist

Luo Guanzhong was a native of Taiyuan and a novelist and playwright of reserved character living at the end of the Yuan dynasty. Three plays have been attributed to him, including Song Taizong longhu fengyan hui (Sung T'ai-tsu lung-hu feng-yun hui; The wind-cloud meeting of the Sung founder) and Zhongzheng xiaozhi lianhuan qian (Chung-cheng hsiao-tzu lien-huan chien; The repeated admonition of an upright devoted son).

Not much is known of Luo Guanzhong, but he has become a semi-mythical figure for having begun the tradition of full-length novels in Chinese. Six major novels are also attributed to him, the most famous of which is Sanguozhi yanyi (San-guo zhi yan-yi; The Romance of the Three Kingdoms). In this work, Luo creates one of the first Chinese novels and describes through his characters the power, diplomacy, and war that contributed to the disintegration of the Han dynasty.

Luo is also credited with being one of the authors, along with SHI NAIAN, of the novel Shui-huzhuan (Shui-hu chuan; Outlaws of the Marsh), which was compiled from the 1300s to the 1500s. His other novels include Sui Tang Liangchao Jizhuan (Sui T'ang Liang-ch'ao chi-chuan; Romance of the Sui and Tang Dynasties) and Can-Tang Wudai shi yanyi (Ts'an-T'ang Wu-tai shih yen-i; Romance of the Late Tang and the Five Dynasties).

Luo Guanzhong's works have provided fertile ground for scholarly explorations of the craft of professional storytelling, the modification of texts over time, and the processes of transmission and publication. For all the mystery surrounding his life, his name has become synonymous with popular Chinese literature.

English Versions of Works by Luo Guanzhong

Romance of the Three Kingdoms, vols. 1 and 2. Translated by C. H. Brewitt-Taylor. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2002.

Three Kingdoms: A Historical Novel. Translated by John S. Service and Moss Roberts. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994.

Luther, Martin (1483–1546) theologian

Martin Luther, the founder of Protestant Christianity, is one of the most important figures in Western religious history. Before Luther, the Roman Catholic Church was the single religious authority over all of Western Europe; after Luther, numerous other churches arose, and Christian unity was a thing of the past. Luther's actions fundamentally altered the structure of Christianity, and his writings greatly influenced religious thought. In addition, he had a significant impact on the German language.

Martin Luther was born in the German town of Eisleben on November 10, the son of a moderately prosperous miner. After receiving an excellent education, he planned to become a lawyer. However, in 1505, while walking down a road near the town of Stotternheim, he was caught in a terrifying thunderstorm and feared he would be killed. According to the story, which has become a famous part of the Luther legend, he called out to God, offering to become a monk if his life were spared. Having survived the storm, he kept his word and was ordained as an Augustinian monk in 1507.

Luther served as a relatively ordinary and undistinguished monk for 10 years, during which time he visited Rome. He eventually became a college professor at the University of Wittenberg. However, Luther gradually became disturbed and disillusioned by what he saw as the corruption of Roman Catholic leadership. In particular, he was upset over the practice of selling indulgences, which the church claimed would allow a person to avoid damnation merely by paying money to the church.

In 1517 Martin Luther produced a list of complaints and suggestions for reform called the Ninety-five Theses. In writing this, he blasted the church's use of indulgences as well as other aspects of church corruption and, in his view, misinterpretation of theology. Following the custom of the day, he nailed this list to the door of the Castle Church at Wittenberg. Much to his surprise, this action made him famous within a few weeks, for the Ninety-five Theses were quickly translated into German and, through the use of the newly invented printing press, rapidly spread throughout Germany.

Church authorities were greatly distressed by what they saw as Luther's defiance of church dogma. Over the next few years, Luther's ideas continued to spread and became increasingly independent of the Catholic hierarchy. He believed in the doctrine of justification by faith rather than works, and he also believed that ordinary people should be allowed to interpret the Bible for themselves.

In 1521 the church summoned Luther to the town of Worms and demanded that he give up his heretical ideas. He refused, and the church excommunicated him. Luther escaped capture with the help of sympathetic German noblemen and then embarked on the daunting task of creating an entirely new church. Those who followed Luther's ideas became known as Protestants.

Now under the protection of a Protestant German prince at the castle of Wartburg, Luther began the great stage of his literary career. Working zealously for 11 weeks, he translated the entire New Testament into German, as he wanted to make it possible for ordinary people to read the Scriptures. This work was one of Luther's masterpieces and would have a substantial impact on the development of the German language. Almost immediately after completing this work, Luther embarked upon a German translation of the Old Testament, which he completed in 1532. He continued to revise and perfect these two translations until his death.

For the rest of his life, Luther produced a constant stream of religious texts, covering all manner of religious subjects. He sought to create an entirely new theology for Protestantism. His works stress his conviction that all Christian beliefs should be firmly based on the Bible itself, rather than on theological tradition. Many of his works were commentaries on the various books of the Bible, and his writings reveal a mind with an incredible grasp both of theology and language.

Luther also wrote on political matters when they affected his religious concerns. In the early 1520s, he wrote On Secular Authority and How Far

One Should Be Obedient to It. In this work, he argued that secular rulers have authority over their subjects in all worldly matters, but that they have no authority over matters of religious faith. In other words, a king may order you to pay taxes or serve in the army, but he cannot rightfully order you to change your religious beliefs.

Luther could be a bitter and vengeful person. He constantly launched personal attacks against any person, Catholic or Protestant, who disagreed with his views. He denounced the scientific ideas of Nicolaus COPERNICUS and also wrote an anti-Semitic tract titled Against the Jews and Their Lies. When the peasants of Germany rose in revolt against their noble lords in 1525, Luther called for the rebellious peasants to be exterminated.

By the time of Luther's death, Protestantism was firmly established. His writings helped transform religious thought throughout Western civilization and his influence on the German language was immense.

English Versions of Works by Martin Luther

Bondage of the Will. Greenville, S.C.: Emerald House Group, 2004.

Luther: Letters of Spiritual Counsel. Library of Christian Classics Series, vol. 18. Edited by Theodore G. Tappert. Vancouver, B.C.: Regent College Publishing, 2003.

Works, 56 vols. Edited by Jaroslav Jan Pelikan, et al. St. Louis: Concordia Publishing House, 1955–86.

Works about Martin Luther

Kolb, Robert. Martin Luther as Prophet, Teacher, and Hero: Images of the Reformer, 1520–1620. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Baker Books, 1999.

Lohse, Bernhard. Martin Luther: An Introduction to His Life and Work. Translated by Robert Schultz. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1986.

Lohse, Bernhard. Martin Luther's Theology: Its Historical and Systematic Development. Translated by Roy A. Harrisville. Minneapolis, Minn.: Augsburg Fortress, 1999.

Mullett, Michael. Martin Luther. London: Taylor and Francis, 2004.

Lydgate, John (ca. 1370–1450) poet

Born in Lidgate in Suffolk, John Lydgate began his education at the abbey of Bury Saint Edmunds and later became a priest. After attending Gloucester College, Oxford, he returned to Bury Saint Edmunds and taught rhetoric to sons of noble families. Upon his return home, he began writing prolifically.

Lydgate's works are numerous and wide-ranging, and despite his varied style, he was criticized repeatedly for being too ornate and wordy. Included among his works, which exhibit both depth and breadth, are didactic poems, religious prayers, lyrics, fables, satires, and mummings, poems recited alongside performers who gesture and move but who do not speak.

Two of his most important works are The Siege of Thebes (1420–22) and The Fall of Princes (1431–38). The Siege of Thebes is a verse translation of an anonymous Old French poem titled Roman de Thebes (ca. 1150). In Lydgate's version, the author-narrator imagines himself a fellow pilgrim accompanying those featured in CHAUCER's Canterbury Tales. Offering to tell a tale to help pass the time on the return trip to London, the author-narrator tells a story about the siege of Thebes. This story depicts events leading up to the time when the story told by Chaucer's "Knight's Tale" begins. The narrative frame, as well as the many instances in the text where Lydgate mimics Chaucer's language, attests to Lydgate's well-known admiration of Chaucer.

Despite the readability of The Siege of Thebes, The Fall of Princes was Lydgate's most popular work during his lifetime. It is a verse translation, with creative additions by Lydgate, of a French version of BOCCACCIO's De Casibus Virorum Illustrium. As his longest work, The Fall of Princes offers innumerable biblical and classical stories detailing the rise and fall, and the ambitions and disastrous grave mistakes of aspiring individuals. The work's ultimate purpose is to show that sin results from immoral action.

During the 15th through the 17th centuries, Lydgate was considered equal to Chaucer and GOWER as a poet of estimable skill. In addition, the sheer volume of his work helped develop the East Midland dialect as part of the Modern English language.

Works by John Lydgate

Bergen, Henry, ed. Lydgate's Fall of Princes. London: Boydell and Brewer, 1967.

Erdmann, Axel. Lydgate's Siege of Thebes I. London: Boydell and Brewer, 1996.

Works about John Lydgate

Ebin, Lois A. John Lydgate. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Schirmer, Walter F. John Lydgate: A Study in the Culture of the XVth Century. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1979.

Machiavelli, Niccolò (1469–1527)

political philosopher, nonfiction writer

Niccolò Machiavelli is one of the most famous and influential political philosophers in Western history. His very name was used to coin the word Machiavellian, which describes a deceitful and ruthless person, willing to do anything to achieve his or her objectives. The ideas and principles Machiavelli introduced into political philosophy have influenced our world ever since, and continue to do so today. Many of his ideas, however, have been greatly misunderstood.

The time and place in which Machiavelli lived had a profound effect on his political views. He was born in Florence, the son of a wealthy lawyer. During his lifetime, Italy was going through a cultural revolution known as the RENAISSANCE, which produced art and literature greater than anything seen since the time of the ancient Romans. However, it was also an age of political instability. Rival city-states competed for power and influence throughout Italy and were often engaged in full-scale warfare. Within individual city-states themselves, different political factions struggled for dominance, often resorting to violence and murder to get what they wanted. Often, these factions were focused around powerful families, such as the Medicis and the Borgias. Machiavelli's own city of Florence experienced a great deal of political violence, and this eventually led to fateful consequences for him.

Machiavelli would not begin writing until rather late in life. He almost certainly received an excellent education, and throughout his life he displayed an astonishing knowledge of classical history. In 1494 he took an administrative job with a new Florentine government, which had just overthrown the Medici family in a coup d'état.

A few years later, Machiavelli was given a diplomatic position in the government. As a result, he spent several years traveling through Italy, France, and Germany. His observations and experiences during these years would greatly influence his political ideas. He met with powerful rulers and officials, including the pope, the king of France and the Holy Roman Emperor. He also met and befriended the great artist, LEONARDO DA VINCI. Most important of all, he encountered the infamous Cesare Borgia, the brilliant but ruthless warlord who then dominated much of central Italy. Later, Borgia would become the inspiration for Machiavelli's masterpiece, The Prince.

Machiavelli held other important positions in the Florentine government and helped reorganize the city-state's military. But in 1512, with the assistance of a foreign army, the Medici once again seized control of Florence. Because he had served the government that had earlier overthrown them, Machiavelli was arrested by the Medici. For some time, he suffered imprisonment and torture, which undoubtedly affected him for the rest of his life. In 1513 he was released from prison and banished to the country estate of San Casciano, forbidden to play any role in Florentine politics.

It was during his exile in San Casciano that Machiavelli began his literary career. It was partly an effort to gain favor with the Medici, but Machiavelli also desired some activity to lessen the dullness of his exile. In a relatively short time, he produced a body of work that completely revolutionized political philosophy and changed the way Western civilization thought about affairs of state for the next several centuries.

His first book, The Prince, was quite short, but it was by far his most famous and influential work. In it, Machiavelli describes the ideal ruler, one who is best able to seize and control political power. Although written in 1513, The Prince was not published until 1532, after Machiavelli's death.

Between 1513 and 1517, Machiavelli wrote Discourses on the First Decade of Titus Livy, which is usually known simply as the Discourses. In this work, Machiavelli analyzes the history of the Roman Republic by studying the work of the Roman historian Livy, using the information to lay out his own theories of government and political organization. While The Prince seems to favor an authoritarian and monarchist form of government, Discourses takes the opposite viewpoint, seeming to favor a republican form of government. This contradiction in Machiavelli's views has puzzled many historians and created much confusion concerning what form of government Machiavelli truly favored.

Despite its focus on a republican form of government, Discourses contains rather frank and cynical political views. Machiavelli argues that politics must be completely divorced from ethical and moral considerations and through repeated examples shows leaders being ruined because they allowed their ethical views to blind them to political reality. Machiavelli also presents his view that, in the end, brute force is the key element in affairs of state.

During the same time period in which Machiavelli wrote The Prince and Discourses, he also produced The Art of War, in which he presents his ideas concerning the interrelationship between politics and warfare. Many of his conclusions were later shown to be quite flawed; for example, he dismissed the value of artillery, which later came to dominate military tactics. His most important assertion in The Art of War, which he also discusses in The Prince, is that a city-state should rely on a military made up of its own citizens, rather than on one made up of mercenary soldiers. Citizen-soldiers, he claims, will obviously be more loyal to the state, because they will serve out of patriotic loyalty, rather than merely a desire to be paid.

In addition to his treatises on political philosophy, Machiavelli became a playwright. He wrote Andria in 1517 and Mandragola in 1518. Between 1520 and 1525, he also wrote a history of Florence. While well-written and interesting, these works are not nearly as famous as Machiavelli's work on political philosophy.

After Machiavelli's death, his political writings became extremely popular and were read throughout Europe. Much of what he wrote was banned by the Catholic Church, but this likely increased the works' reputation rather than decreased it. Over the next several centuries, Machiavelli was condemned as an evil man whose vision in The Prince contributed to the rise of such villains as Adolf Hitler and Joseph Stalin. Machiavelli did not advocate authoritarian government when he wrote The Prince; he merely stated what, to him, was the reality of his time. Machiavelli has been criticized for his cynical view of human nature and his belief that political theory should be divorced from ethics. Nevertheless, he remains perhaps the most influential political philosopher of the Western world.

Critical Analysis

Of all his writings, Machiavelli is most renowned for The Prince, which is one of the most famous pieces of Western literature. In this work, Machiavelli describes his view of the ideal prince, who is able to seize and maintain power in a nation or city-state. Although intended to describe the circumstances of 16th-century Italy, the author's insights into human nature and the affairs of state have a universal applicability, irrespective of time or place.

On many occasions in The Prince, Machiavelli states that the exercise of political power must be completely detached from any ethical or moral consideration. He believed that any prince who acted out of moral principle would inevitably be destroyed, because he would be surrounded by rival princes who would not be so constrained. However, in order to maintain appearances, Machiavelli believed a prince should always work hard to appear moral and ethical, even if it would be foolish to actually be moral and ethical.

To Machiavelli, this attitude could not be judged as morally right or wrong; it was simply reality. He was not attempting to advocate a particular way in which princes should govern, but was simply attempting to describe the actual way in which such governing was done. He did not see anything necessarily immoral in authoritarian rule, so long as it benefited the people. He recognized that a strong authoritarian government often provided order and stability, whereas a weak republican government often resulted in chaos and disorder. Through the use of his superior knowledge of classical and contemporary history, he provided many examples of such events.

Another important quality of The Prince is Machiavelli's sense of realism. Throughout the work, he stresses the role played by "Fortune," and warns princes to beware of sudden and unexpected shifts in the balance of power. He states that wise princes should be prepared for such unforeseen events by constantly training themselves in the methods of warfare and diplomacy and always anticipating the worst.

After its publication in 1532, The Prince became widely popular and influential throughout Europe and gained a reputation as a textbook for those who sought to win political power. Its influence remains with us to this day.

English Versions of Works by Niccolò Machiavelli

Art of War. Edited by Christopher Lynch. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.

Discourses on Livy. Translated by Julia C. and Peter Bondanella. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Florentine History. Translated by W. K. Marriott. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2004.

The Prince. Translated by Luigi Ricci. New York: Penguin Group, 1980.

Works about Niccolò Machiavelli

De Grazia, Sebastian. Machiavelli in Hell. New York: Vintage Books, 1989.

Falco, Maria J., ed. Feminist Interpretations of Niccolò Machiavelli. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.

Skinner, Quentin. Machiavelli: A Very Short Introduction. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Viroli, Maurizio. Niccolò's Smile: A Biography of Machiavelli. Translated by Anthony Shugaar. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2000.

Malory, Thomas (1410?–1471) novelist

The enduring status of King Arthur as the most popular hero of English literature is due in large part to a man whose own origins remain mysterious. Little is known for certain about Thomas Malory aside from the facts that he was a knight, he was at some point a prisoner, and he finished Le Morte D'Arthur (The Death of Arthur) in the year 1469. The consensus holds that he was born in Warwickshire and knighted in 1441. After he served in the English army and in Parliament, the next records show him in prison for charges of robbery, vandalism, assault, rape, and attempted murder. He insisted on his innocence. Despite two dramatic escape attempts—once by swimming the castle moat—he spent the last years of his life in Newgate prison, where he composed his epic work.

Malory's English sources are the alliterative Morte Arthur and the anonymous SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT. He probably drew on Geoffrey of Monmouth's legendary history of Britain for the characters of Merlin, Guinevere, and Mordred. The rest of Malory's material—the characters of Lancelot, Tristan, the quest for the Holy Grail, and the codes of chivalry and courtly love—came from the large body of French romances that circulated on the continent. Of these, the Lais of Marie de France, the romances of Chrétien de Troyes, and an anonymous work called the Prose Lancelot all have their echoes in Malory's collection. Several Arthurian characters are also the subject of the collection of Welsh tales known as The Mabinogion, but it is unknown whether Malory knew the Celtic tradition.

Malory also drew extensively on the cultural climate of his own time. The upper class in 15th-century England followed a veritable cult of chivalry, engaging in tournaments, combat, and romance nearly as frequently as Malory's characters do. Knights errant traveled the countryside, and organizations such as the Order of the Garter modeled themselves after the Round Table. In a world fraught with disorder, adherence to a code of ethics and loyalty proved a stabilizing force. This is the theme Malory took up in his work.

Le Morte D'Arthur encompasses the entire life of Arthur, although its title suggests that it focuses on the elements that lead to the king's eventual demise. The colorful characters of Arthur's court form a constellation around the ideal of knighthood embodied by Arthur himself. Destiny is a driving force in the Arthurian saga, and mysterious supernatural beings intervene in the course of events. Yet all of Malory's characters possess the ability to make their own choices, and tragedy often results from the flaws in human nature, not from the caprices of the world outside.

The plot, structured as a series of individual stories, develops through a series of tests: Knights are tested for their courage, their skill at arms, and their loyalty to king and lady. Though Malory delights much more in describing battle scenes than in analyzing a character's emotion, the reader can enjoy Malory's conversational tone, his extravagant dialogue, his alternating moments of irony and pathos, and the subtle humor that surfaces throughout, as in this passage:

“Wherefore this is my counsel: that our king and sovereign lord send unto the kings Ban and Bors by two trusty knights with letters well devised, that and they will come . . . to help him in his wars, that he would be sworn unto them to help them in their wars. . . . Now, what say ye unto this counsel?” said Merlin.

“This is well counselled,” said the King.

Thomas Caxton printed the first edition of Le Morte D'Arthur in 1485. Despite the French title, Le Morte D'Arthur was written in Middle English. In 1934 a manuscript was discovered at Winchester College that contains elements that the printed edition left out. Many scholars consider the Winchester manuscript closer to Malory's true vision for the tale.

The number of reprints, editions, and retellings of Malory's stories stand as proof of the popularity of the Arthurian legends. Malory was read and admired by such later British writers as Philip SIDNEY, Sir Walter Scott, Edmund Spenser, and Alfred Tennyson. The never-ending fascination with the myth of Arthur suggests that these narratives satisfy some deep need on the part of reading audiences—a need, perhaps, to believe in a world in which justice prevails, the mighty are committed to high ideals, the vulnerable are defended and evil defeated, and magic is a very real force.

Works by Thomas Malory

Le Morte D'Arthur: Complete, Unabridged, Illustrated Edition. Edited by John Matthews. London: Casell, 2003.

Le Morte D'Arthur: The Winchester Manuscript. Edited by Helen Cooper. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Works about Thomas Malory

Armstrong, Dorsey. Gender and the Chivalric Community of Malory's Morte D'Arthur. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2003.

Field, P. J. C. The Life and Times of Sir Thomas Malory. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell and Brewer, 1999.

March, Ausiàs (ca. 1397–1459) poet

Ausiàs March was a Catalan poet especially concerned with the emotions of life: love, death, pain, and spirituality. Born in Gandia in the kingdom of Valencia, March wrote his poems in his native language, much to the displeasure of one of his editors. “Had March written in Spanish,” argues Robert Archer, “he would by now undoubtedly be more widely recognized as the finest lyric poet in the Iberian Peninsula before the sixteenth century.”

March's immense poetic talent focused on womanly beauty and love. He believed that “as a ‘composite’ being . . . man is pulled by body and soul towards two opposed forms” of good (Archer). This sensation of torment, the stretching of one's nature in two seemingly opposing directions, became the topic of March's poems about love. His greatest work was “Cant spiritual” (“Spiritual Song”), in which the poet confesses that his fear of God is greater than his love for God.

March was greatly interested in the works of Aristotle and Dante and was influenced by the Provençal troubadours, including Arnaut Daniel. March created courtly love poems that went far beyond the physical realm, as well as poems in which he took hold of the metaphysical to explore death and faith through poetry. He is remembered for having founded Catalan poetry, and his works are valued for their eloquent presentation of love as a moral and spiritual experience.

English Versions of Works by Ausiàs March

Ausiàs March: A Key Anthology. Edited by Robert Archer. Oxford: Anglo-Catalan Society Occasional Publications, 1992.

Ausiàs March: Selected Poems. Edited by Arthur Terry. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1976.

Works about Ausiàs March

Archer, Robert. The Pervasive Image: The Role of Analogy in the Poetry of Ausiàs March. Philadelphia: John Benjamins Publishing, 1985.

McNerney, Kathleen. The Influence of Ausiàs March on Early Golden Age Castilian Poetry. Amsterdam: Rodopi B.V., 1982.

Marguerite de Navarre (Marguerite d'Angoulême, Marguerite d'Alençon, Marguerite of Navarre) (1492–1549) poet, dramatist, novelist

The daughter of Charles d'Orléans, comte d'Angoulême, Marguerite was raised in Angoulême, in western France, by her widowed mother, Louise de Savoie, who ensured that her children were thoroughly educated. At age 17, Marguerite was married to the duc d'Alençon and went to live with him at Alençon, in Normandy. In 1515 her younger brother François succeeded his cousin Louis XII as king of France. François continued military campaigns in Italy that Louis XII had begun; in his absences, his mother acted as regent, and Marguerite began to spend much of her time at court. She was interested in all the arts, supported writers, and transformed the court into a brilliant literary center. She was also deeply engaged by religious thought. She had contacts among many of the leaders of the religious reform movement that was developing at the time, among them John CALVIN. In the early 1520s, she began to write religious poetry.

The duc d'Alençon died in battle in 1525, and two years later Marguerite married Henri d'Albret, king of Navarre, at the time a separate country in the Pyrenees Mountains, now part of France. She divided her time between François's court and her husband's. She and Henri had two children: a daughter, Jeanne d'Albret, who inherited the throne of Navarre, and a son who died in 1530, a few months after birth.

The death of her son, and of her mother the following year, seem to have made writing more important to Marguerite. In 1530 she published her first poem, Miroir de l'âme pécheresse (Mirror of the Sinful Soul), which was banned by theologians at the Sorbonne for what they considered to be heresy. During the 1530s she wrote both religious and secular lyrics, as well as plays that were staged at both courts. She also began this decade with a great deal of influence over François and his policies, but gradually the two became estranged as François began to feel threatened by the religious reformers close to Marguerite. By 1540 she was no longer welcome at François's court.

It was probably in the early 1540s that Marguerite wrote her two long philosophical poems, La Coche, ou le Debat sur l'Amour (The Coach, or the Debate on Love) and Le Triomphe de l'Aigneau (The Triumph of the Lamb). In 1547 she published two collections of her works: Les Marguerites de la Marguerite des Princesses tres Illustre Roynne de Navarre (The Pearls of the Pearl of Princesses, the Illustrious Queen of Navarre) and Suyte des Marguerites . . . (More Pearls . . .) Each book contained examples of all the genres she had attempted: plays, FARCE, lyrics, sacred allegories (see ALLEGORY), and longer poems.

At the time of her death, Marguerite was working on a collection of stories modeled on BOCCACCIO's Decameron. The plots are drawn from French folklore, and the focus is generally on the trials endured by women and their need to maintain their chastity and love of God. But they include much humor and a wealth of fascinating detail about everyday life. Marguerite completed only 72 of the 100 stories she had planned. Two themes that run throughout the stories are sorrow over the death of loved ones and, primarily, love, which is, in turn, related to her social and religious subjects. The collection was published in 1558 under the title Heptameron des Nouvelles (Heptameron of Stories), the work for which Marguerite of Navarre is best known today.

English Versions of Works by Marguerite de Navarre

Marguerite de Navarre: The Coach and the Triumph of the Lamb. Translated by Hilda Dale. Bristol, U.K.: Intellect, 2003.

The Heptameron. Translated by P. A. Chilton. New York: Viking Penguin, 1984.

Works about Marguerite de Navarre

Cottrell, Robert D. The Grammar of Silence: A Reading of Marguerite de Navarre's Poetry. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1986.

Lyons, John D., and Mary B. McKinley, eds. Critical Tales: New Studies of the Heptameron and Early Modern Culture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.

Stephenson, Barbara. Power and Patronage of Marguerite de Navarre. Aldershot, Hampshire, U.K.: Ashgate Publishing, 2004.

Thysell, Carol. The Pleasure of Discernment: Marguerite de Navarre as Theologian. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Wertheimer, Molly Meijer, ed. Listening to Their Voices: The Rhetorical Activities of Historical Women. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Williams, H. Noel. The Pearl of Princesses: The Life of Marguerite D'Angouleme, Queen of Navarre. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2004.

Marieke van Nimwegen (Mariken van Nieumeghen, Mary of Nemmegen) (ca. 1500) medieval Dutch story

The Dutch story Marieke van Nimwegen dates to the late medieval period, around 1500. At that time, belief in witchcraft was very prominent, and witches were believed to be women who had sexual relationships with the devil. Marieke van Nimwegen is the story of such a woman and her eventual redemption. The story is a “miracle play,” a medieval drama dealing with religious subjects.

The story’s main character is Marieke, a young and beautiful orphan who lives with her uncle Gijsbrecht, a pious priest, near the town of Nimwegen. After her father and mother, Gijsbrecht’s sister, died, she came to live with her uncle to keep his house for him. One evening, Marieke goes to the market in Nimwegen and accidentally gets caught away from home in the dark. She begs refuge with her aunt, Gijsbrecht’s other sister, but her aunt refuses her and accuses her of prostitution and drunkenness. Marieke is enraged and storms out of the town to find some bushes by the road to sleep under.

When Marieke angrily swears that she does not care whether it is God or the devil who comes to her aid, a one-eyed devil appears in the road before her. He introduces himself as Moenen, the Master of Arts. He says that if she comes to live with him in Antwerp, he can teach her seven arts: grammar, rhetoric, logic, arithmetic, geometry, music, and alchemy. Marieke badly wants to learn these things and agrees to live with him. Before they leave, Moenen makes her change her name to Emmeken (since Marieke means Mary, a name unpleasant for the devil) and swear never to make the sign of the cross.

When Marieke does not return from the market, Gijsbrecht gets worried and goes to Nimwegen to ask his sister if she has seen her. His sister first denies it but finally tells Gijsbrecht that she had turned his niece away. Gijsbrecht returns home deeply saddened and worried.

After living with Moenen for seven years and learning many things from him, Marieke becomes homesick and tired of the sinful life they live. She convinces the devil to take her back to Nimwegen, where she immediately slips away and returns to Gijsbrecht. The devil attempts to murder her but is prevented by God because Marieke is repentant. Marieke and Gijsbrecht travel to Rome, where she visits the pope to repent for betraying God and living with the devil. Three rings of iron are put around her neck and arms, and she is told that if the rings fall off, everything she has done will be forgiven. Deeply repentant, Marieke spends the next 24 years at a monastery for converted sinners with the weight of the rings upon her. Finally, an angel comes to her and removes the rings, and Marieke is at last redeemed.

The story of Marieke van Nimwegen is a famous tale in the Netherlands and was made into a movie titled Mariken Van Nieumeghen in 1974. Today, a statue of Marieke stands in Nimwegen, Holland.

English Versions of Marieke van Nimwegen

Raferty, Margaret M., ed. Mary of Nemmegen. Medieval and Renaissance Texts, vol. 5. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill Academic Publishers, 1991.

Rietbergen, P. J. A. N. Europe: A Cultural History. New York: Routledge, 1999.

Warner, Marina. From the Beast to the Blonde: On Fairy Tales and their Tellers. New York: Noonday Press, 1996.

Marivaux, Pierre Carlet de Chamblain de (1688–1763) playwright, novelist

Pierre Carlet was born in Paris to Nicolas Carlet, a military officer, and Marie-Anne Bullet. In 1698 the Carlet family moved to Riom, where Nicolas had taken a job as director of the royal mint. Pierre began studying law in Paris in 1710. A few years later, he settled in Paris, where he gained entrance to literary salons and began to publish under the name Marivaux. In 1717 Marivaux married Colombe Bollogne, with whom he had a daughter. Soon after, he unfortunately lost most of the family’s money in land speculation. Although he eventually finished his law degree (1721), he devoted most of his time to literature. In 1742, he was honored with election to the ACADÉMIE FRANCAISE.

As a writer, Marivaux was influenced by CORNEILLE, RACINE, LA FONTAINE, and BOILEAU. His novels include a number of FARCES. In Pharsamon (written 1713, published 1737), which paid homage to CERVANTES's Don Quixote, the protagonists suffer through a series of adventures because they have read too many ROMANCES. Telemachus, a Parody (1714, published 1736) rewrites FÉNELON's Telemachus in a way that mocks social conditions in France. In 1716 Marivaux even attempted a mock EPIC parodying Homer's Iliad.

The following year, as Oscar Haac notes, Marivaux abandoned parody and "began writing in the realistic style that became his distinguishing mark and brought him success." The Life of Marianne (1731–41) and The Peasant Who Gets Ahead in the World (1734–35) feature narrators looking back on how they achieved their comfortable social positions. Marianne almost certainly influenced Samuel RICHARDSON. Along with Madame de LAFAYETTE's work, it set the standard for the modern novel.

Marivaux also composed some three dozen plays. Unlike Molière, whose work Marivaux disliked, he emphasizes dialogue over plot. His plays observe the traditional UNITIES, but their style is original, and his tragedies are far less gloomy than those of his predecessors and contemporaries. He wrote his comedies in prose, rather than verse, and they contain not only noble but even tragic elements. More important, as Haac argues, for Marivaux "comedy becomes an effective technique for analysis," notable for its "realism, the comic imitation of refined manners on the part of servants who never succeed in mastering them, the ambiguity of human motives ever present even in refined speech which barely covers up greed and sensuous desire." This realism is evident in one of Marivaux's best plays, The Game of Love and Chance, a three-act comedy first performed in 1730. In the opening scenes, Silvia awaits the arrival of her intended husband, Dorante. She decides to switch places with her servant Lisette so that she can observe Dorante without his knowledge. Unbeknownst to her, however, Dorante has switched places with his servant Harlequin. Thus, Silvia finds herself falling in love with a "menial servant" (the disguised Dorante), as does Dorante (with the disguised Silvia). Meanwhile, Lisette and Harlequin parade their version of noble airs, but each worries that the other is in love with who they are pretending to be. It is only after much soul-searching on the nobles' part, and comical dialogue on the servants' part, that a happy ending is reached.

At the time in which the play was written, not everyone appreciated Marivaux's works. VOLTAIRE complained that Marivaux's plots involved "weighing flies' eggs in scales of gossamer," and the term marivaudage came to be applied to exaggerated, overly refined speech. Over time, a larger audience has begun to agree with Haac that Marivaux's works possess both emotional and intellectual appeal. His plays are now produced more often in France than any except those of Molière.

See also ENLIGHTENMENT.

English Versions of Works by Marivaux

Le Paysan Parvenu: or, The Fortunate Peasant. New York: Garland, 1979.

Pharsamond. New York: Garland, 1974.

Plays. London: Methuen, 1988.

Seven Comedies by Marivaux. Edited by Oscar Mandel and translated by Oscar and Adrienne S. Mandel. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1968.

Works about Marivaux

Greene, E. J. H. Marivaux. Toronto: Toronto University Press, 1965.

Haac, Oscar A. Marivaux. New York: Twayne, 1973.

Jamieson, Ruth. Marivaux, A Study in Sensibility. New York: King's Crown Press, 1941.

Showalter, English. The Evolution of the French Novel, 1641–1782. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1972.

Marlowe, Christopher (1564–1593)

dramatist, poet, translator

Christopher Marlowe was born in Canterbury to Catherine and John Marlowe, a cobbler. He attended the King's School, Canterbury, and Corpus Christi College at the University of Cambridge on scholarship. He graduated with a B.A. in 1584 and went on to pursue a master's degree. When the university refused to grant his degree in 1587, influential members of Elizabeth I's privy council interceded on his behalf by writing a letter. From this letter, scholars deduce that Marlowe was a governmental spy. In the following years, a combination of events and evidence arose that, taken together with Marlowe's controversial writings, led critics to consider him an atheist, possibly a reason for which he was murdered.

As a writer, Marlowe began his career by writing for the Admiral's Men at the Rose Theatre, quickly becoming the city's most popular playwright. He was also the author of numerous poems and translations. Perhaps his most famous lyric poem is "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" (ca. 1587), in which the speaker invites his mistress to join him in a PASTORAL setting, rendering physical love an innocent part of nature. Marlowe's greatest contribution to world literature, however, is his dramatic verse.

Instead of rhymed verse, Marlowe wrote his dramas in blank verse, unrhymed iambic pentameter, creating a poetic form paralleling the natural rapidity, power, and flow of spoken language: "Was this the face that launched a thousand ships, / And burnt the topless towers of Ilium?"

Marlowe's numerous plays include The Jew of Malta (ca. 1590) and Doctor Faustus (1593). In The Jew of Malta, he presents a Jewish villain far more charming than his Christian counterparts. Barabas is a brutal stereotype of a miser and hideous criminal whose crimes constitute revenge against Christian discrimination. T. S. Eliot called The Jew of Malta a "savage farce."

In Doctor Faustus, Faustus is a scholar who sells his soul to the devil, Mephistopheles, for years of power and knowledge. The play focuses on his vain pursuits as he confronts the pleasures and the mysteries of the world.

Other of Marlowe's works include Dido, Queen of Carthage (ca. 1586), which ponders the devastating effects of an empire upon women; The Masacre at Paris (ca. 1590), which highlights the dangerously thin line separating the Protestant monarchy in France from the Catholic one it had replaced; and Edward II (ca. 1592), the TRAGEDY of a homosexual king who is deposed and brutally murdered. One of Marlowe's most important works, however, is Tamburlaine, a tragedy in which a "Scythian shepherd"—Tamburlaine—rises to power by his martial and rhetorical brilliance.

Marlowe wrote Part I of Tamburlaine, which ends with Tamburlaine's marriage to an Egyptian princess, around 1587, while he wrote Part II, which traces Tamburlaine's demise and destruction, in 1588. The work was published in 1590.

Emily C. Bartels states that alienation is the tragic state for most of Marlowe's protagonists, and it is Tamburlaine's ambition that both defines him as great and ultimately alienates him. Particularly telling of Tamburlaine's character and tragic end is the failure of his sons to carry on his legacy; in essence, he has created a world no one else can sustain.

In Part II, Tamburlaine is blinded by pride from his triumph over Islamic nations: "In vain, I see, men worship Mahomet: / My sword hath sent millions of Turks to hell, / Slew all his priests, his kinsmen, and his friends, / And yet I live untouched by Mahomet." He burns copies of the Koran, but a few moments later announces, "I feel myself distempered suddenly," signaling the beginning of his downfall, which is tied to this blasphemous action. Critics argue the purpose of this scene. Some believe it implies Marlowe's approval of Tamburlaine's destruction of the enemies of the Christian world. Other critics argue that Marlowe's purpose was more orthodox, that he presents Tamburlaine's burning of the Koran as blasphemy (the Koran figures allegorically as the Bible here) and that will be punished in the end.

Marlowe's ability to make Tamburlaine a character with whom readers can identify, led critic Harry Levin to claim that "no other poet has been, so fully as Marlowe, a fellow-traveler with the subversive currents of his age." During his age, Marlowe was greatly admired, and his works influenced other, greater writers who followed, including SHAKESPEARE, JONSON, Chapman, and Drayton.

Other Works by Christopher Marlowe

Complete Plays and Poems. Rutland, Vt.: Charles E. Tuttle, 2002.

Ovid's Elegies and Lucan's First Book, in Christopher Marlowe: The Complete Poems and Translations.

Edited by Stephen Orgel. Middlesex, England: Penguin, 1971.

Works about Christopher Marlowe

Bartels, Emily C. Spectacles of Strangeness: Imperialism, Alienation, and Marlowe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.

Eliot, T. S. Elizabethan Dramatists. London: Faber, 1963.

Kuriyama, Constance Brown. Christopher Marlowe: A Renaissance Life. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002.

Marot, Clément (ca. 1496–1544) poet

Clément Marot was born in Cahors, France, to Jean Marot, a poet who held a post at the court of Anne de Bretagne, and later was court poet to Francis I. Marot studied law at the University of Paris and spent much of his life in court service. Upon his father's death, he took the post of valet du chambre to Francis I. His Protestant sympathies led to his arrest on several occasions, and he spent time in exile in both Geneva and Italy.

Marot is widely acknowledged as one of the greatest poets of the French RENAISSANCE. He used his vast knowledge of Latin classics and Italian literary forms to great effect, introducing a number of forms into French poetry, including the elegy and the epigram, a form for which he is renowned. He also translated many Latin works into French, including those of Ovid, Catullus, and Virgil. In addition, CALVIN much admired Marot's translations of the Psalms (1541–43).

Marot also invented a lyrical form called the blason, a type of satiric verse generally describing a part of the female body in great detail. This form achieved great popularity in France in his time, inspiring a slew of imitators. Two epigrams written in the blason style are “Du beau tétin” and “Du laid tétin.”

Marot's first collection of poems, L'Adolescence clémentine, was published in 1532, and his second collection, Suite de l'Adolescence clémentine, in 1533. His poetry is noted for its grace, warmth, and elegance and was admired by the Elizabethan poets, most notably Edmund Spenser.

English Versions of Works by Clément Marot

Le Ton Beau de Marot: In Praise of the Music of Language. Edited by Douglas R. Hofstadter. New York: Basic Books, 1997.

Lyrics of the French Renaissance: Marot, Du Bellay, Ronsard. Edited by Norman Shapiro. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2002.

Works about Clément Marot

Screch, M. A. A. Clément Marot: A Renaissance Poet Discovers the Gospel. Netherlands: Brill Academic Publishers, 1993.

Williams, Annwyl. Clément Marot: Figure, Text and Intertext. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1990.

Marulić, Marko (Marcus Larulus Spalatensis) (1450–1524) poet, scholar

Marko Marulić was born in the ancient Croatian city of Split, located on the coast of the Adriatic Sea. A scholar and a poet, Marulić became famous as the “Humanist from Split,” one of the most notable figures of the Central European RENAISSANCE.

Until the 16th century, Croatian literary works were exclusively religious and devotional in character. In 1521, Marulić's The History of the Holy Widow Judith broke the tradition. This first Croatian EPIC tells the biblical story from the book of Judith and the slaying of Holofernes.

The History of the Holy Widow Judith is an Old Testament story that was extremely popular with the population of Croatia. It was especially loved by women and girls, who were untrained in Latin, the official language of the literature of the time. The work had a social purpose, as well as literary value; it was meant to unite the Croatian nation in the spirit of Christianity in its struggle with the Turks of the Ottoman Empire.

The spirit of patriotism is also central to Marulić's other works, notably The Prayer Against the Turks, a poem simple in form and deep in emotion in which the speaker claims, "We suffer every moment from the evil barbarian hands!"

As was customary at the time, Marulić also wrote under his Latin name. As Marcus Larulus Spalaten-sis, he was the author of works covering a broad range of subjects, including religious morality, history, and archaeology. He also wrote poetry in Latin. Marulić is important as the author of the first secular work in the history of Croatian literature.

An English Version of a Work by Marko Marulić

Judita, in English and Croatian. Edited and translated by Henry R. Cooper Jr. New York: Columbia University Press, 1991.

A Work about Marko Marulić

Lansperger, Johannes. Epistle in the Person of Christ to the Faithfull Soule, Written First by . . . Lanspergivs, and after Translated into English by One of No Small Fame. Microfilm. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1955.

Mather, Cotton (1663–1728) theologian, historian, scientist

Cotton Mather was born into one of the most eminent New England families. His father, Increase MATHER, was a renowned minister, and both of his grandfathers (Richard Mather and John Cotton) were highly regarded members of the first generation of New England Puritan divines.

Though frail and weakly as a child, Mather pursued his studies wholeheartedly. Biographer Kenneth Silverman notes that by the time he entered Harvard at age 11, he had "read in Cato, Tully, Ovid, and Virgil, gone through a great part of the New Testament in Greek . . . and begun Hebrew grammar."

College life was not easy for him. He stuttered and was often abused by other students. Yet, as Silverman observes, Mather's "stutter played into his scientific interests." The "impediment led him almost to despair of becoming a minister, and to apply himself to becoming a physician." The fruits of his early scientific research manifested themselves in his later works. His The Christian Philosopher (1721) was the first general scientific book to be written in America, and The Angel of Bethesda . . . An Essay upon the Common Maladies of Mankind . . . and direction for the Preservation of Health (1722) was an influential medical text. In 1721, during a smallpox epidemic, Mather advocated the use of inoculation and managed to institute a successful program of vaccination. Emory Elliott explains that the success of this program turned Mather into "a hero in the history of eighteenth-century American medicine.

Though his stammering caused him to worry about entering an occupation like the ministry, Mather followed in the footsteps of his forefathers. Shortly after graduating from Harvard at age 15, he began delivering sermons to his father's congregation and those once led by his illustrious grandfathers. From 1685 to 1723, Mather served under his father as teacher of the Old North Church, and when Increase died, he assumed responsibility for the flock until his own death four years later.

Life did not get much easier for Mather after leaving Harvard. Each of his three marriages ended painfully; his first two wives died, and his third wife, who was mentally ill, left him. Nine of his 13 children died. Four of his children and one of his wives died from the measles within just a few days of each other. Moreover, according to Vernon Parrington, Mather was, at times, "intensely emotional, high-strung and nervous, . . . subject to ecstatic exaltations and . . . given to seeing visions."

Nevertheless, he was remarkably prolific and composed a number of important works.

In his 65 years of life, Mather wrote more than 400 sermons, historical treatises, and scientific works. He is often remembered for the two books he published on the Salem witchcraft crisis of the 1690s. Memorable Providences, Relating to Witchcrafts and Possessions (1689) and The Wonders of the Invisible World (1693) are based both on official documents and on his firsthand experience with individuals appearing to be bewitched or possessed. However, Mather's most significant work was Magnalia Christi Americana; Or, the Ecclesiastical History of New England, from Its First Planting in the Year 1620, unto the Year of our Lord, 1698 (1702). The 800-page book is divided into seven sections that describe the settlement of New England; contain biographies of the colony's leading ministers and governors; provide a chronicle of Harvard College and the lives of its most notable graduates; comment upon church polity; document memorable divine providences in the colony; and address problems associated with heretical activity, Indians, and the devil.

Mather declared that his goals were to "write the Wonders of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION, flying from the Depravations of Europe, to the American Strand" and to use this "Report" of the "Wonderful Displays" of God's "Infinite Power" and "Wisdom" as a means of keeping "Alive . . . the Interests of Religion in our Churches." Mather's father once lamented that no document existed that would preserve the "memory of the great things the Lord hath done for us." The Magnalia ensured that the history of the early decades of the New England colonies would be "transmitted to posterity," and, as Silverman points out, "lifted New England history into the realm of heroic action."

Works by Cotton Mather

A Family Well-Ordered. Edited by Don Kistler. Morgan, Pa.: Soli Deo Gloria Ministries, 2001.

Selections from Cotton Mather. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1926.

The Christian Philosopher. Edited by Winton U. Solberg. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 2000.

Works about Cotton Mather

Boas, Ralph, and Louise Boas. Cotton Mather, Keeper of the Puritan Conscience. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.

Lutz, Nora Jean. Cotton Mather: Author, Clergyman and Scholar. Minneapolis, Minn.: Sagebrush Education Resources, 2000.

Silverman, Kenneth. The Life and Times of Cotton Mather. New York: Harper and Row, 1984.

Mather, Increase (1639–1723) theologian

Increase Mather was born in Dorchester, Massachusetts, where his father, Richard, was a minister. Mather received his early education at home, at school in Boston, and at Harvard. After graduating in 1656, he traveled to Ireland, where his older brother was a minister, and earned a master's degree at Trinity College. Shortly after his return to New England in 1661, he accepted a ministerial appointment at Boston's Old North Church and wed Maria Cotton, daughter of John Cotton, a highly respected Puritan preacher. The first child born to the couple was Cotton MATHER, who became one of the most prominent thinkers of his age.

The stern theologian spent about 16 hours each day in his study. A colleague remarked that Mather "lov'd this Study to a kind of excess, and in a manner liv'd in it from his Youth to a great Old Age." The fruits of Mather's intellectual and spiritual diligence were many: He composed and published nearly 150 treatises, histories, and sermons. An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences (1684), one of his most popular works, describes how signs of God's presence are revealed in natural phenomena, like thunderstorms, as well as in scripture. In Cases of Conscience Concerning Evil Spirits (1693), which Mather wrote in response to the witchcraft hysteria that seized New England in the early 1690s, he attempted to establish a legiti-mate and reliable means of discerning whether or not an individual was a witch. The titles of just a few of his many sermons—"Sleeping at Sermons, is a Great and Dangerous Evil" (1682), "Wo to Drunkards" (1673), "The Renewal of the Covenant the Great Duty" (1677), and "The Divine Right of Infant-Baptisme" (1680)—point to the range of practical, moral, and theological issues Mather concentrated on when preaching to his congregation. In The Puritans: A Sourcebook of Their Writings, Perry Miller notes that Mather was an "exponent of the plain style" and wrote in a "solid, logical, and learned" manner.

Works by Increase Mather

An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences. Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1977.

Relation of the Troubles Which Have Happened in New England by Reason of the Indians There. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.

Remarkable Providences. Introduction by George Offor. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.

Works about Increase Mather

Hall, Michael G. The Last American Puritan: The Life of Increase Mather, 1639–1723. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1990.

Murdock, Kenneth B. Increase Mather, the Foremost American Puritan. Temecula, Calif.: Reprint Services, 1991.

Maya epics and fables (n.d.–present)

The Maya are the largest and most homogenous group of indigenous peoples to populate the American continents north of Peru. The first Maya settlements date to 4000 B.C., and during the Classic Period, between 200 and 900 A.D., several million Maya lived in present-day Guatemala, Belize, the Yucatán Peninsula, and the western portions of Honduras and El Salvador. The Maya developed soaring architecture, a sophisticated system of writing and mathematics, and the most accurate calendar to predate the modern era. Following 900, Maya culture benefited from contact with the Toltec cultures, but in the late Post-Classic period, the years 1200–1500, famine, wars, and internal strife greatly weakened the empire. At the time of the arrival of Spanish explorers in 1519, only about 2 million Maya remained.

During the Spanish conquest, from 1519 to 1546, many valuable records of Maya civilization were lost or destroyed. What present-day cultures are able to learn about Maya culture comes from three major sources: three preconquest documents that escaped destruction; two postconquest documents, the Book of the Jaguar Priest (1593) and the POPOL VUH; and the lively tradition of oral literature that descendants of the Maya keep alive in the form of epics, fables, and folktales.

In Maya societies, anyone can tell a story. Words and sounds play a considerable role in the way people communicate. The Maya like to play with words, and they listen to the sound of the words as they would listen to the song of birds. The spoken word carries power in the Maya world, and performance dominates their oral literature. The FABLES, EPICS, and folktales the Maya share are frequently short, and rather than depending on a detailed description of events or their context, these narratives use gestures, repetition of words and phrases, and audience behavior to create effect. One might call a Maya story a drama rather than a poem or story.

There are various types of epics and fables in Maya culture. First and foremost, there are creation myths and historical narratives. These are divided between the "True Ancient Narrative," which refers to the creation of the Earth and humans, and the "True Recent Narrative," which refers to modern history as well as contemporary events. The story of the assistants who worked with the Germans, which relates how electricity arrived in Guatemala, is a good example of the latter. There is also an important tradition of joke-telling among the Maya, which is reflected in their oral literature. Some of the narratives are called "Lies" or "Frivolous Language” because they are deliberate fabrications, intended only for amusement and wordplay. The beginning of “The Destruction of the First People,” narrated by Salvador López Sethol in Telling Maya Tales, a collection by Gary H. Gossen, shows this. Although it is a historical narrative, it is a good illustration of the frivolous language that marks the fables:

Monkeys were still people long ago.
 The people became monkeys because they were evil.
 And what were the deeds of these people long ago?
 They used to eat their children long ago.
 What size were their children when they ate them?
 They were already nearly grown up when they ate them.

Spirituality and religion figure greatly in Maya society and therefore are important themes in the fables. Maya society was organized under a king, who was considered the mediator between the gods and the common people. All strata of society practiced rituals with religious significance, meant to ensure the favor of the gods in protecting crops and guarding against war and famine. Though the king was the chief authority, and was aided by priests who helped interpret the will of the gods and led important ceremonies, all members of Maya society were expected to play their parts in religious observance. Thus, a story of a farmer making an offering in his fields has no less importance than a ritual wherein the king offers a cup of his blood to please the gods.

A widespread adoption of the Christian faith caused a change in the spiritual beliefs and religious practice of the Maya and their descendants, but many of the fables preserve beliefs that predate Spanish or even Aztec influence. These tales burst with images drawn from the ancient world: sorcerers, animals transforming into gods, and rituals so old that their meaning has been forgotten.

Maya epics and fables depict an extremely rich world, where animals play key roles in the natural world and everything that exists has a meaning. The ancient Maya believed in a series of gods and goddesses who governed human existence, but they also believed in the power of animals. The beginning of a fable called “Story of the Owl,” told by Ignacio Bizarro Ujpán and translated by James D. Sexton in Heart of Heaven, Heart of Earth and Other Mayan Folktales, explains the significance of the owl:

As a very old story goes, our old folks of earlier times and those of present times maintain the idea that one must be careful not to kill owls, because they are guardians and policemen of the world. They only follow orders of the duenos del mundo [guardians of the world]. That is why when one [an owl] comes into a homesite or alights and hoots above the house of a person, the person must not bother it, because if one bothers or hurts an owl, that person can easily die within a few days.

What is most fascinating about Maya epics and fables is their amazing ability to assimilate new and old influences into one original corpus of oral literature, where the cyclical time of an ancient culture meets modern concepts. Several of the older fables preserve much of their ancient nature, while also embracing the values and ideals of Christianity. In the same way, the Maya adopted the Aztec MYTH OF QUETZALCOATL, renaming him Kukulcán in their language.

The subjects and events of Maya fables frequently echo the fables and tales of other cultures, such as African and Native American. Tales of tricksters, like the coyote tales of native North American peoples, appear often in the Maya fables. On the whole, these fables, still passed among descendants of the Maya and enjoyed in translation by readers all over the world, preserve valuable information about the beliefs, practices, and values of a culture the knowledge of which might otherwise be utterly and entirely lost.

See also BOOK OF CHILAM BALAM OF CHUMAYEL; CHILAM BALAM, THE BOOKS OF; EPIC OF KOMAM Q'ANIL; MESOAMERICAN MYTHOLOGY.

English Versions of Maya Epics and Fables

Baldwin, Neil. Legends of the Plumed Serpent. New York: Public Affairs, 1998.

Gossen, Gary H. Telling Maya Tales. New York: Routledge, 1999.

Mayan Folktales: Folklore from Lake Atitlán, Guatemala. Edited and translated by James D. Sexton. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1999.

Sexton, James D., and Ignacio Bizarro Ujpàn. Heart of Heaven, Heart of Earth and Other Mayan Folktales. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1999.

Tedlock, Dennis. Popol Vuh: The Definitive Edition of the Maya Book of Dawn of Life and the Glories of Gods and Kings. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.

Works about Maya Epics and Fables

Bennett, Evan. The Maya Epic. River Falls: University of Wisconsin River Falls Press, 1974.

Bierlein, J. F. Parallel Myths. New York: Ballantine Books, 1994.

Burns, Allan Franck. An Epoch of Miracles: Oral Literature of the Yucatec Maya. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1983.

Schuman, Michael A. Mayan and Aztec Mythology. Berkeley Heights, N.J.: Enslow Publishers, 2001.

Medici, Lorenzo de' (il Magnifico, The Magificent) (1449–1492) political figure, poet

During the 15th century, the city-states of Italy experienced a dramatic flourishing of culture, with new heights being reached in art, architecture, and literature. This time period is known as the RENAISSANCE, or “rebirth.” The city-state of Florence stood at the center of this cultural flowering, and Florence itself reached its height under the rule of Lorenzo de' Medici.

De' Medici came from one of the richest and most powerful families in all of Europe. The Medici family controlled the Italian banking system, which gave them tremendous political and economic influence. This made the Medicis the virtual rulers of Florence for generations, although they held no formal title.

Lorenzo de' Medici and his brother Giuliano assumed the rule of Florence when their father died in 1469. After Giuliano's assassination in 1478, Lorenzo became the sole ruler, reigning until his death. During his rule, he proved to be both tyrannical as well as artistically inclined. He made Florence greatly prosperous and became a fabulous patron of the arts, supporting artists such as Sandro Botticelli, MICHELANGELO, and LEONARDO DA VINCI. His patronage helped make Florence the cultural center of Europe.

In addition to being a patron of the arts, de' Medici was himself a gifted poet. He wrote philosophical love poems, all of them in the Tuscan vernacular language, which focused on the enjoyment of life, the pleasures of nature, and love. De' Medici wrote a collection of poems titled Comento de' miei sonetti (Comment on My Sonnets) and cowrote with POLIZIANO the Raccolta aragonese, a collection of Tuscan verse written by numerous writers, including Dante and de' Medici himself.

When de' Medici was criticized for his use of the vernacular and his choice of subject matter (love), he defended his choices by stating that even the great writers Dante and BOCCACCIO wrote in the vernacular. His poetry is a reflection of both the political power of the Medicis in Florence and the true Renaissance spirit of the time.

English Versions of Works by Lorenzo de' Medici

Lorenzo de' Medici: Selected Poems and Prose. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992.

Political Philosophy of the Great de' Medici as Revealed by Their Correspondence. Edited by Cosimo Giovanni. Albuquerque, N.M.: Institute for Economic and Political World Strategic Studies, 1985.

Works about Lorenzo de' Medici

Greenblatt, Miriam. Lorenzo de' Medici and Renaissance Italy. Tarrytown, N.Y.: Marshall Cavendish, 2002.

Hook, Judith. Lorenzo de' Medici: A Historical Biography. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1984.

Kent, F. W. Lorenzo de' Medici and the Art of Magnificence. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2004.

Melanchthon, Philipp (1497–1540) theologian

The man to be known as Melanchthon was born in Bretten, Germany, to an armor maker named Georg Schwartzerd, whose name meant “black earth.” Philipp’s tutor, Reichlin, called him by the Greek equivalent, Melanchthon, which the young man adopted. A prodigious student, he earned his B.A. from the University of Heidelberg in 1511 and his M.A. from the University of Tübingen in 1514. Martin LUTHER posted his famous theses at the University of Wittenberg in 1517; Melanchthon began teaching there in 1518. Students crowded the auditoriums to hear his commentaries on Scripture and then published his lecture notes to share with others. He earned the distinguished title of Preceptor (teacher) of Germany and was often asked by other schools to advise them on curricula. In 1520 he married Katherine Krapp, the mayor’s daughter, with whom he had four children. He stayed at Wittenberg throughout his career and died of a fever early in 1540.

The practice of commentary had begun with the Greeks, with short glosses on the texts of Homer. This practice continued throughout the Middle Ages and by Melanchthon’s time had become a rhetorical art. Though his Annotations on Corinthians (1522) are simply collected notes on the Scripture, the commentaries on Romans (1532) and Daniel (1543) show the power of his focused thought as well as his commitment to the ideals of the Reformation. Melanchthon believed wholeheartedly in the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith, which maintained that faith alone led to salvation without the need for the rituals demanded by the Catholic Church. Melanchthon’s contributions to the Lutheran Church proved to be enormous. He wrote its confession text, the Augsburg Confession, and collected its major points of dogma in the Loci Communes (1522). As Luther’s successor, he represented the new faith at the councils of Leipzig and Worms. He continually came into conflict with radicals who proposed reform through strong action. Melanchthon, like Luther, advocated reform through moderation and the ideals of humanism as taught by ERASMUS. Melanchthon’s ultimate message is a call to “love the simple truth . . . and guard it.”

English Versions of Works by Philipp Melanchthon

Annotations on the First Epistle to the Corinthians.
Translated and edited by John Patrick Donnelly.
Milwaukee, Wis.: Marquette University Press, 1995.

Commentary on Romans by Philipp Melanchthon.
Translated by Fred Kramer. St. Louis: Concordia Publishing House, 1992.

Works about Philipp Melanchthon

Maag, Karin. Melanchthon in Europe. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Baker Books, 1999.

Stump, Joseph. The Life of Melanchthon. Murrieta, Calif.: New Library Press, 2003.

Mesoamerican mythology (n.d.–present)

The term Mesoamerican is used to refer to the civilizations existing in Central America and Mexico at the time of the arrival of the Spanish at the beginning of the 16th century. Justification for its use rests on the fact that these peoples, despite geographical, linguistic, and ethnic differences, shared similar cultural and religious systems. These systems have four common themes: representations of the cosmos; beings of power; transformation in time; and sacrifice.

Mesoamerican cosmos were divided into layers that could vary from four to as many as 14, such as the heavens, the earth, the waters, and the underworld. In each of these worlds resided beings, whether animals, humans, or deities, who embodied powers that caused them to exist. However, both the beings and the space that they inhabited were subject to constant change. Thus the idea of transience, or the impermanent nature of life, is repeatedly expressed in the works of poets like NEZAHUALCOYOTL:

*May your heart find its way:
here no one will live forever.*

The POPOL VUH, a narrative of the Maya, tells of a succession of five ages in which the gods attempt to perfect their creation through various transformations. These civilizations also produced elaborate calendars to commemorate these events.

Lastly, sacrificial rites were an important aspect of Mesoamerican religious life. Accounts tell of dramatic acts of human sacrifice, though these were actually rare. More common were acts of bloodletting on special occasions, such as the naming of children and state ceremonies. The more routine forms of sacrifice were of harvests and animals. Such rituals were intended to bring about renewal and were seen as a continuation of life.

In the eyes of the invading Spanish, such beliefs seemed misguided. Unwilling to tolerate a worldview different from their own, they imposed Catholicism on the natives. Despite the ensuing decline of native religions, some aspects have merged with and become indistinct from Catholic beliefs. This process is called syncretism. For example, stories of floods exist in both traditions.

Although it is tempting to view Mesoamerican religions as pagan mythologies, they were in fact sophisticated institutions that played an important role in regulating the daily lives and nurturing the morals of Mesoamerican peoples. The myths of these ancient peoples continue to be told and retold through the oral tradition, as well as through printed texts. They reflect not only old world values and customs, but also contemporary concerns, such as those relating to the destruction of the environment.

Works of Mesoamerican Mythology

Bierhorst, John. Mythology of Mexico and Central America. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Spence, Lewis. Myths of Mexico and Peru. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.

Works about Mesoamerican Mythology

Read, Kay Almere, and Jason J. Gonzalez. Handbook of Mesoamerican Mythology. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Wilcox, Joan Parisi. Masters of the Living Energy: The Mystical World of the Q'ero of Peru. Rochester, Vt.: Inner Traditions International, 2004.

Yamase, Shinji. History and Legend of the Colonial Maya of Guatemala. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.

Metastasio, Pietro (1698–1782) poet, librettist

Pietro Armando Dominico Trapassi was born into a butcher's family in Rome and at a young age began working as a goldsmith's apprentice. At age 10, his skill at improvising verse brought him to the attention of Vincenzo Gravina, a jurist and a man of letters. Gravina took the boy into his household, provided him with a solid education, and left him a considerable inheritance, which made the young man financially independent. Gravina also convinced Pietro to take the Greek translation of his name, Metastasio. Metastasio's early writing earned him admittance into the prestigious Academy of Arcadia in 1718.

In 1719 he moved to Naples, began practicing law, and gained access to aristocratic circles with his occasional verse. After producing several notable melodramas, he traveled to Vienna in 1730 to become poet laureate to the Austrian Empire under the patronage of Charles VI. After Maria Theresa took the throne in 1740, Metastasio kept his place and continued to write librettos, verse, and literary criticism until his death.

Metastasio wrote his first drama at age 14. Justin, a tragedy in the style of Seneca, was considered remarkable for its considerable quality and its highly musical verse. Metastasio published a book of verse in 1717, but his true genius lay in the melodramma, or romantic TRAGEDY. His first serenade, composed in 1721 to honor the birthday of the empress of Austria, was performed by the celebrated prima donna La Romanina. At her request, he gave up his law practice and turned full-time to writing opera librettos.

An extremely prolific author, Metastasio composed about 1,800 pieces, including 28 operas, more than 70 melodramas, a number of ballets, and canzonette, which were celebrations of festivals combining dialogue, poetry recital, music, and drama. His first lyric tragedy, Dido Forsaken, was performed in 1724 and followed by several others: Siroe, Catone in Utica, Semiramis, Alexander in the Indies, and Artaserse. Attilio Regolo (1750) is considered Metastasio's masterpiece. It tells the heroic story of how Attilio, sent in chains from Carthage to Rome, triumphs over his enemies in a stirring display of nobility and justice.

Metastasio's other writings include his Letters and a work of criticism, a response to the Poetics of Aristotle (1782), in which he outlined his own theories of dramatic composition. Metastasio's lyric poetry was ever popular for its rich handling of the musical repertoire of the Italian language and its universal themes: the torments of love, freedom, and infidelity. In his "Introduction to Volate," set to music by Nicola Vacca, Metastasio compares faithfulness to a white snow cover: It is destroyed by a single footprint left on it. While these themes are not particularly new, Metastasio employs them with noticeable diversity. He borrows from a rich variety of sources, spanning the mythology and history of the ancient world.

Most likely, Metastasio's success with the public rested on his careful avoidance of unhappy endings and his lively, witty dialogues, which were often interrupted by appealing musical moments. He was considered a model poet, and his work, published in several editions even during his own lifetime, was widely translated into other European languages.

One of the most influential librettists of his period, Metastasio was the first to draw a sharp dividing line between serious and comic opera. His librettos were set to music by many composers, including Gluck, Handel, Mozart, Pergolesi, and Rossini, making him the most popular librettist of his century and earning him fame as the father of serious opera.

English Versions of Works by Pietro Metastasio

Temistocle: Opera Seria in Three Acts. Edited by Ernest Warburton. New York: Garland Publishers, 1988.
Three Melodramas. Translated by Joseph G. Fucilla. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1981.

Works about Pietro Metastasio

Burney, Charles. Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Abate Metastasio. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 1971.
Stendhal, Maurice. Lives of Haydn, Mozart and Metastasio. Translated by Richard N. Coe. New York: Grossman Publishers, 1972.
Talbot, George, ed. Lord Charlemont's History of Italian Poetry from Dante to Metastasio. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 2000.

Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475–1564) artist, poet

During the 15th and 16th centuries, Europe experienced an incredible revival of its intellectual and artistic culture. This time period became known as the RENAISSANCE and marked the end of the Middle Ages. The Renaissance was most pronounced in Italy, and one of the greatest figures of the period was Michelangelo, whose achievements would make him one of the most legendary artists in human history.

Michelangelo was born near Florence, Italy. Throughout his life, which lasted nearly 90 years, Italy was never a unified nation-state but instead a collection of small kingdoms and city-states that were almost always in conflict with one another. Europe in general and Italy in particular experienced immense political, social, and religious convulsions as various powers and interests fought for supremacy. Michelangelo lived through the discovery of the New World, the Protestant Reformation, the Turkish invasion of Europe, and a multitude of other life-altering events.

Michelangelo came from a somewhat distinguished family that had fallen on hard times. In his youth, he received a good education, and his fascination with art and sculpture dated from his early years. When he was 13, in the face of his father's stern disapproval, Michelangelo decided to pursue an artistic career, studying both painting and sculpture.

By a stroke of luck, he soon found himself a member of the household of Lorenzo de' MEDICI. The Medici family was extremely powerful throughout Renaissance Italy and effectively controlled the political and economic institutions of Florence. During his years in the Medici household, Michelangelo intensively studied art, gradually becoming a master of both painting and sculpture. He also learned the philosophy of Neoplatonism and developed a profound love of literature during this period, inspired by those writers who visited the Medici.

The 1490s were a time of political turmoil in Florence, with various rival powers gaining and losing control of the city as the years passed. To escape the chaos, Michelangelo left Florence for Rome.

Beginning with his time in the Medici home and lasting throughout his life, Michelangelo spent time with many learned and powerful men, some of whom were his patrons. Arising from these contacts were two of Michelangelo's ambitions—his desire to be accepted and his desire not only to surpass Greek and Roman classical sculptors, whose works he studied, but also to ever improve his own skill.

In Rome, Michelangelo began producing a number of outstanding sculptures. Few had pagan themes, for he was a devout Christian and most of the subjects of his painting and sculpture were taken from the Bible. In 1500 he completed his first great masterpiece, a sculpture known as the Pieta, which depicts a grieving Virgin Mary holding the body of Christ. It is one of the most famous sculptures in the world.

Following the restoration of political stability in Florence, Michelangelo returned there in 1501. In 1504 his greatest work of all was unveiled, David, an enormous statue of the biblical king. During this time, as a result of some sort of misunderstanding, he engaged in a bitter feud with LEONARDO DA VINCI. Michelangelo always had a terrible temper and bore grudges for a very long time.

In addition to his sculpture, Michelangelo was continuing to develop as a painter. In 1508 the pope called him to Rome, asking that he paint the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. Although reluctant to do so, Michelangelo eventually agreed and spent the next few years working on the monumental project, often spending days in the rafters without food or water. When the project was completed, it was universally hailed as a masterpiece.

Taken together, the Pieta, the David, and the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel are usually regarded as the greatest of Michelangelo's artistic achievements. But the artist still had many years to live, and although the rest of his life was often filled with disappointment and even despair, he continued to create great works of art.

Michelangelo moved back and forth between Rome and Venice for many years. In the 1540s, still productive and skillful despite his advancing age, he turned to architecture when the pope commissioned him to construct St. Peter's Basilica. The plans had already been drawn up by the architect Donato Bramante, but it fell to Michelangelo to complete the work.

In addition to being a masterly sculptor and painter, Michelangelo was also a writer of much skill. He left behind a series of letters and diary entries that illuminate the complicated and often tormented nature of his personality. He was homosexual and never married or had children.

Much of his personal writing is taken up with his inner struggles, but he expresses his feelings most forcefully in his poetry.

Michelangelo's long life came to an end on February 18 in Rome, and he was buried in Florence. During the course of his life, he had witnessed astonishing changes in the world around him and had created some of the greatest works of art the world has ever known.

Critical Analysis

Michelangelo is known to history because of his extraordinary achievements in sculpture and painting, and it is said that he preferred the physical labor involved with both. However, he wrote numerous works, including letters, diary entries, and poems. While his letters and diary entries are often overlooked, they reflect his complicated and contradictory personality, as well as his view of the world, which was shaped by the time in which he lived.

His literary abilities are most marked in his poetry, which he wrote throughout his long life. Many of his poems are addressed to both men and women, while his mystical religious poems are addressed to no one in particular. Dealing with deep emotional issues, his poetry is not so subtle as that of many other poets, which perhaps is a reflection of his artistic inclinations.

At times, Michelangelo wrote of his sculpting, giving form to the thoughts and emotions he experienced while performing his master talent. In "On the Painting of the Sistine Chapel," for example, he describes the physical demands of painting on a ceiling:

*In front my skin grows loose and long; behind,
By bending it becomes more taut and strait;
Crosswise I strain me like a Syrian bow. . . .*

(trans. by W. S. Merwin)

At other times, he speaks of love—either for sculpting stone or for God. He combines both passions in "Night" in the Medici Chapel":

*Sleep's very dear to me, but being stone's
Far more, so long as evil persevere.
It's my good fortune not to see nor hear:
Do not wake me; speak in the softest tones.*
(trans. by William Jay Smith)

Some of his best poetry was addressed to a woman named Vittoria Colonna, who was a cultured woman, poet, and Michelangelo's closest friend. The two of them engaged in an enduring exchange of letters and poems, celebrating their friendship and respect for each other, combining their mutual interests of Platonic philosophy and devout Catholicism. Their relationship was apparently entirely platonic in nature.

Michelangelo also wrote numerous SONNETS and other poems to various men that subtly reflect his underlying homosexuality. His style seems to have been influenced by PETRARCH and POLIZIANO.

Although Michelangelo will forever be known for his sculpture and paintings, his poetry is also an expression of his brilliant mind. The influence of his creative talents continues to change the perceptions of what art and artists are supposed to be.

English Versions of Works by Michelangelo Buonarroti

The Complete Poems and Selected Letters of Michelangelo. Translated by Creighton E. Gilbert and edited by Robert N. Linscott. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1990.

The Drawings of Michelangelo. Introduction by Irving Stone. Master Draughtsman Series. Los Angeles: Borden Publishing, 1999.

The Poetry of Michelangelo: An Annotated Translation. Translated by James M. Saslow. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1993.

Works about Michelangelo Buonarroti

Bull, George. Michelangelo: A Biography. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 1995.

Cagno, Gabriella di, et al. Michelangelo. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2000.

Symonds, John A. Life of Michelangelo Buonarroti. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

Milton, John (1608–1674) poet, essayist, dramatist

John Milton was born in London and educated at Christ Church College, Oxford. In the years following college graduation, he wrote several enduring poetic works, including Comus (1634), a masque or verse play, with musical interludes; Lycidas (1637), an elegy for a drowned classmate; and L'Allegro and Il Penseroso (ca. 1632), a contrasting pair of poems celebrating, respectively, convivial pleasures and the solitary, contemplative life.

A journey to France and Italy, begun in 1638, was cut short by the political situation in England. King Charles I's long-brewing conflict with Parliament was about to explode in the English Civil War, which would culminate in Charles's execution (1649) and a period of non-monarchical government called the Commonwealth, in which Milton became an important official.

Milton devoted much of his early career to writing polemical tracts. Among the more famous is The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1642), in which he argues that the grounds for divorce should include spiritual incompatibility. The essay was probably inspired by his estrangement from his wife, Mary Powell, who returned to her parents shortly after her marriage to Milton. Mary later reunited with her husband and bore him three daughters before her death, at age 27, in 1652. Milton married twice more. His second wife died in childbirth in 1658, which led Milton, in his sorrow, to write the moving SONNET that begins, "Methought I saw my late espoused saint. . ."

The title of the Areopagitica (1644) refers to a tract of the same name by Isocrates. The essay was a response to an act of Parliament that instituted prepublication censorship. Milton argues that truth can emerge through only debate:

Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?

Although it had little impact in its day, the Areopagitica influenced the arguments of many later proponents of freedom of the press, including the framers of the U.S. Bill of Rights.

One of Milton's most famous sonnets, "On His Blindness," was composed during this period. By 1652, Milton's eyesight, which had been failing for many years, was gone. After this, Milton wrote through dictation.

Milton's greatest works, published during the late 1660s and early 1670s, are the epic poem Paradise Lost (1667), which tells the story of the fall of Adam and Eve; its sequel, Paradise Regained (1671), which deals with the redemption of humanity through Christ; and the drama Samson Agonistes (1671), which portrays the revenge of the blind biblical hero Samson.

Many consider Paradise Lost one of the greatest poetic works in English and world literature, sublime in both subject and style. Milton summarizes the poem in his opening invocation to the muse, in which he urges her to sing:

*Of Mans First Disobedience, and the Fruit
Of that Forbidden Tree, whose mortal tast Brought Death into the World, and all our woe. . . .*

He concludes the first section with a plea to the muse to help him "justify the wayes of God to men."

The action opens in Hell, as Satan and his followers recover from defeat after their rebellion against God. Satan vows to continue his revenge on Earth and to tempt Adam and Eve to evil. Despite warnings by Raphael, Eve succumbs to Satan's praise of her beauty and the seeming reasonableness of his arguments. She then tries to convince Adam to do as she has done and taste the forbidden fruit. Despite his understanding of the consequences, Adam eats the fruit because he cannot bear to have eternal life while Eve is condemned to die. The central dilemma of faith at the heart of Milton's epic is that human reason is flawed, for God's truth cannot be arrived at by reason.

Many scholars and critics who have read Paradise Lost have been seduced by Satan fully as much as Eve was. The Romantics, in particular, found Satan to be magnificent in his defiance and admirable in his rebellion. In the 20th century, Milton's Eve has inspired almost as much controversy as his Satan. Although modern readers may be somewhat put off by many of Milton's attitudes toward women, which are indicative of his time, no one with a taste for poetry can ignore the sheer beauty of his verse.

Works by John Milton

Areopagitica and Other Prose Works. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2004.

The Poetical Works of John Milton. IndyPublish.com, 2003.

The Riverside Milton. Edited by Roy Flannagan. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1998.

Works about John Milton

Fish, Stanley Eugene. How Milton Works. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2001.

Lewalski, Barbara. The Life of John Milton: A Critical Biography. Oxford: Blackwell, 2002.

Molière (Jean-Baptiste Poquelin)

(1622–1673) playwright, actor

Molière was born the oldest of six children at the so-called Monkey House, a large, centuries-old dwelling in an elegant quarter of Paris near the Louvre, to Jean Poquelin the younger, King Louis XIII's tapissier (master merchant upholsterer/furnisher), and Marie Cressé, the daughter of a prosperous colleague in the trade who also carried the title of bourgeois de Paris, an honor bestowed on those Parisians who attained a certain level of affluence and social refinement. Molière lost his mother at age 10, his stepmother Catherine Fleurette at age 14, and both his maternal grandparents at age 16.

As an adolescent, he attended the Collège de Clermont located in the Latin Quarter near the Seine River. This large, competitive Jesuit school attended by the elite was the trendiest secondary school in Paris at the time, offering a rigorous classical humanities curriculum including Latin and Greek, rhetoric, acting, debate, philosophy, science, and theology. Evidence suggests he later studied law, possibly at Orléans, and perhaps philosophy as well.

On December 14, 1637, Molière inherited his father's title and office of tapissier du roi and spent at least one summer on the royal military campaign trail by the Mediterranean shores. He was in charge of arranging one of two tents that served as royal field palaces and contained identical sets of King Louis's furnishings. But the lure of the stage, stimulated by his grandfather Cressé's passion for the theater, the many plays staged at the Collège de Clermont, and the numerous street performances he undoubtedly witnessed in his native Paris neighborhood, proved too intense for the young Jean-Baptiste to ignore. In 1643 he ceded his royal office to his brother Jean, equally shedding the status of a potential law career, and formed the Illustre Théâtre troupe with his mistress, Madeleine Béjart, a beautiful and talented actress four years his elder. The troupe's beginnings, however, were fraught with difficulty. Catering to the tastes of the time, the actors performed traditional tragedies featuring male heroes, with Madeleine as their star actress. They produced their plays inside a leased indoor tennis court, yet they failed to attract a sufficiently large audience. Soon they could not make ends meet. Molière was arrested and jailed until a friend posted bail, and after only two years the Illustre Théâtre was doomed.

For the next 13 years, Molière and Madeleine lived the lives of itinerant artists, mostly in the southern provinces where they obtained the patronage of the prince de Conti, under whom Molière embarked on his career as a playwright. In 1658 the actors returned to Paris to perform at court under the protection of Monsieur, King Louis XIV's brother. Molière's first successful play, Les Précieuses ridicules (The Folly of Affection), which ran for 34 almost-sold-out consecutive performances, testified to the author's extraordinary talent and ingenuity for comedy. King Louis XIV was enthralled by the play, and henceforth Molière was destined to become, as Judd Hubert remarks in his Molière and the Comedy of Intellect, "by far the greatest creator of dramatic forms in the entire history of French literature, comparable in this respect to Shakespeare."

Molière worked incessantly, completing 19 plays in quick succession, most of them commissioned, during a decade that witnessed a series of magnificent masterpieces such as The Misanthrope, Dom Juan, Tartuffe, The School for Wives, The Would-be Gentleman, and The Miser. Besides his busy role as author, he functioned as manager and accountant of his troupe, as well as producer, director, and main actor of its plays. The band performed theater in Paris but also provided often elaborate entertainments—such as the renowned Pleasures of the Enchanted Isle—featuring sophisticated set design, music, dance, fireworks, reflecting pools, fountain shows, and dramatic amusement. All of this entertainment was provided at the king's behest during special festivals at various châteaux when the court resided outside the capital.

When he was 40, Molière married Armande Béjart, 20 years his junior and daughter of his former mistress, Madeleine, and, some unconventional historians intimate, perhaps his very own. In his writing, he turned completely to comedy, and the public, both noblemen and bourgeois, regularly thronged the Palais-Royal Theater to see his plays. However, the plays' increasingly satirical vein and strong social criticism, which often clashed with traditional morality as well as religious and social norms, made Molière some enemies. In Molière, A Theatrical Life, Virginia Scott states, "Molière argues that since the duty of comedy is to correct men while diverting them, he had thought it appropriate to render this service to the honorable people of the kingdom." He mocked the high aristocracy, the nouveaux-riches, physicians, pedants, cuckolds, précieuses (women espousing a style of excessive refinement), and, of course, religious hypocrites. The notable Tartuffe controversy pitting the author against ecclesiastical authority raged for five years until Louis XIV finally allowed a modified version of the play to be staged. Later, Molière's falling-out with composer Lully, with whom he had a very successful partnership for the production of comédie-ballets, caused him the loss of his rights to several of his works. But Molière also had influential courtly and literary allies at Versailles, such as LA FONTAINE, RACINE, and BOILEAU, not to mention the Sun King himself.

On February 17, 1673, an ill and weak Molière acted the role of the Hypochondriac in the fourth performance of the play by the same name. Aware of his feebleness, his wife begged him not to perform that day but he refused to let down all the theater workers who depended on him for their livelihood. He managed to get through nearly all his lines until he was seized with a convulsion, which he attempted to cover up with laughter. He died an hour later while awaiting the arrival of a priest; because he had not renounced his life as an actor, Armande had to appeal to the king to be allowed to bury her husband in consecrated ground, albeit in a nighttime ceremony. The very chair in which Molière acted during his last performance remains on display to this day at the Comédie-Française.

In his Life of Monsieur de Molière, Mikhail Bulgakov tells of his colleague Zotov recounting a scene that may well have taken place between Molière's friend, the prince de Condé, and King Louis XIV:

"The king is coming. He wishes to see Molière. Molière! What's happened to him?" the prince asks.

"He died," someone tells him.

The prince, running to Louis, exclaims, "Sire, Molière is dead!"

Louis removes his hat and states with confidence: “Molière is deathless!”

Seven years after his death, Molière’s troupe merged with two other Parisian companies, giving birth to the illustrious Comédie-Française, to this day the premier stage in all of France and the rightful “House of Molière.”

Critical Analysis

Virginia Scott recounts Molière biographer Grimarest’s recording of the following exchange between Louis XIV and Molière at a court dinner: “Look, isn’t that your doctor? What does he do for you?” “Sire,” answered Molière, “we reason together; he orders remedies for me; I don’t take them, and I get well.” Discouraged by his declining health and the inability of the medical profession to cure him, Molière satirizes its inefficient and dogmatic procedures in his last comédie-ballet entitled Le Malade imaginaire (The Hypochondriac; The Imaginary Invalid). Ever the sharp observer of society, Molière once again chose a major character flaw as his comedy’s subject. Its star is Argan, played by Molière himself, who lives among his potions and drugs, and surrounds himself with a bevy of doctors and apothecaries. They rule his world, often confusing medicine with religion, as they require strict adherence to a barrage of ritual bleedings, purges, and prescriptions. When Argan misses one of his treatments, the irate doctor Purgon chastises him and condemns him to a litany of ailments and even death: “dysentery, dropsy, and deprivation of life.” Against the wishes of his distraught daughter, Argan vows to provide himself with a physician son-in-law to have at his beck and call.

In step with a recurrent leitmotiv in Molière’s plays, here, too, the servant provides the voice of reason amidst the madness. Keenly aware that pretense can be cured only by make-believe, chambermaid Toinette enters her master’s realm of fakery by impersonating an illustrious physician in this famous exchange from Act III, Scene 10:

TOINETTE: What on earth are you doing with this arm?

ARGAN: What?

TOINETTE: There is an arm I would cut off straight away if I were you.

ARGAN: But why?

TOINETTE: Don’t you see that it is taking all of the nutrients, and that it is keeping the other side from benefiting?

The play ends in a frenzied grand finale where the hypochondriac is consecrated as a doctor during a farcical music and dance ceremony conducted in hilarious macaronic Latin. Here comedy and entertainment reign supreme, and while it is perhaps the greatest comedic irony and paradox that Molière died in the very role of an imaginary invalid—during which he actually impersonated a corpse—this very fact underscores more than anything, in Hallam Walker’s words, that “his final physical efforts, like his whole existence, had been dedicated to the service of his art.”

English Versions of Works by Molière

Doctor in Spite of Himself. Translated by S. H. Landes and edited by William-Alan Landes. Studio City, Calif.: Players Press, 2003.

Misanthrope. Translated by Charles H. Wall. Studio City, Calif.: Players Press, 2003.

Tartuffe. Translated by Ranjit Bolf. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2003.

The Blunderer. Holicong, Pa.: Wildside Press, 2003.

The Imaginary Invalid (Le Malade Imaginaire). Indianapolis: Publish.com 2004.

Works about Molière

Koppisch, Michael S. Rivalry and the Disruption of Order in Molière’s Theater. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2004.

Polsky, Zachary. The Comic Machine, the Narrative Machine, and the Political Machine in the Works of Molière. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.

Scott, Virginia. Molière, A Theatrical Life. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Walker, Hallam. Molière. Boston: Twayne, 1990.

Weiskel, Portia Williams, and Harold Bloom. Molière. Langhorne, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2003.

Montaigne, Michel de (1533–1592)

moralist, essayist

Celebrated for more than 400 years as the father of the essay form, Michel Eyquem de Montaigne was born on February 28 to an influential family in Bordeaux. The family was named to the nobility when Montaigne's great-grandfather Raymon Eyquem acquired the land and house of Montaigne in 1477, located about 30 miles from Bordeaux.

Montaigne was born to a Catholic father and a Protestant mother at a time when Catholic-Protestant tensions were mounting in many parts of Europe. The marriage between Pierre Eyquem de Montaigne and Antoinette de Louppes withstood religious friction, although family relations were not always harmonious. Catholic Montaigne spoke little about his mother, and Antoinette expressed marked bitterness toward her children and marriage after her husband's death.

Montaigne's education was thorough, marked by the singularity that he was trained to speak and write Latin by his tutors, family, and others as if it were the everyday language of the region. This is not to say, however, that Montaigne was not instructed in other languages or that he was not encouraged to learn French. His lower-class godparents taught him French and, at the same time, humility.

Montaigne was sent at age six to the Collège de Guyenne, where he acquired over a period of seven years a distaste for the structured educational system and its methods of discipline. From there, he continued his education, but exactly where and for what duration scholars are uncertain.

In the mid-1550s, Montaigne received a counselorship when his father, who had purchased a seat in the Cour des Aides of Périgueux, resigned the position. When the court was incorporated into the parliament of Bordeaux in 1557, Montaigne and fellow Pirigordians were met with political hostility. He persevered for 13 years in various positions before resigning, finding his work largely unmeaningful and unrewarding. Nonetheless, one of the greatest events of Montaigne's life occurred while he was in Bordeaux: He met Étienne de La Boétie, who became his most cherished friend and confidant.

For two years, Montaigne sought more rewarding employment in Paris, to no avail, and in 1565 he married Françoise de la Chassigne, with whom he had six girls, only one of whom survived childhood. His relationship with his wife, which continued until his death, never matched his great friendship with La Boétie, which reveals, in part, Montaigne's tepid attitude toward marriage. Shortly after his marriage to Françoise, his father died in 1568, and Montaigne inherited the title and estate. He persisted in seeking service in Paris that he judged to be of merit, but he returned home at age 38. The adjustment to such living was not an easy one. During this period, Montaigne began to contemplate the composition of Essays, although it would take him several years to realize his project fully.

Critical Analysis

The death of Montaigne's dearest friend in 1563 served as a catalyst for his most well-known and superior achievement, the Essays. The first edition, including books one and two only, was printed on March 1, 1580, in Bordeaux. Two subsequent editions were printed thereafter, with the third edition of 1588, including books one, two, and three, published in Paris. This third edition is known as the "Bordeaux Copy."

The title of Montaigne's Essays derives from the Latin exagium, meaning "a weighing." In this sense, then, essays are explorations wherein attitudes toward a particular subject are weighed, measured, and considered. Each of the three books of Essays contains many essays, what Montaigne calls "chapters." Book one is composed of 57 chapters; book two has 37; and book three has 13. Although these chapters appear to be haphazardly arranged and attempts to understand the essays according to an overall philosophical pattern invariably fall short, their arrangement suggests some development. Pierre Villey, for example, argues that the work moves from the stoic to the skeptical to the natural, and Marcel Tetel observes that “[a]s the essays progress . . . , Montaigne exhibits more and more intimate details about himself,” such as “[t]he wines and dishes he likes or does not like.” Donald Frame’s remark that “Montaigne resists simple definitions” is most compelling.

Montaigne began writing essays with the intent to keep a record of his past and present experiences as well as his thoughts and observations, but the Essays function additionally as mirrors to the human condition, reflecting its follies, foibles, hardships, habits, pleasures, and relationships. The chapters are rich in variation both within themselves and in juxtaposition and comparison to one another. Together, they form a mosaic that offers readers vehicles for exploring the self. As readers engage Montaigne’s revolving habit-of-mind, they find themselves delving into their own minds as well.

Several essays begin with “Of” followed by some state of being, such as “Of Idleness,” “Of Constancy,” “Of Drunkenness,” “Of Anger,” “Of Conscience,” and “Of Repentance.” Other chapter titles take the form of a proverb, such as “That the Taste of Good and Evil Depends in Large Part on the Opinion We Have of Them,” “Fortune is Often Met in the Path of Reason,” and “That Our Desire Is Increased by Difficulty.” These titles reflect the then-popular pastime of recording aphoristic statements in small books and memorizing and reciting such sayings and pithy statements to others as if the words sprang instantly to mind.

In “Of the Inconsistency of Our Actions,” Montaigne comments on the contradiction of human actions, stating, “irresolution seems to me the most common and apparent defect of our nature.” He goes on to say: “In all antiquity it is hard to pick out a dozen men who set their lives to a certain and constant course, which is the principal goal of wisdom.” Throughout the essay, Montaigne quotes such ancient philosophers and writers as Horace, Lucretius, Homer, and Tibullus; yet, in the end, he shows a somewhat humorous bent:

[A] sound intellect will refuse to judge men simply by their outward actions; we must probe the inside and discover what springs set men in motion. But since this is an arduous and hazardous undertaking, I wish fewer people would meddle with it.

In another essay on the theme of human inconstancy titled “Apology for Raymond Sebond,” Montaigne states that “Presumption is our natural and original malady. The most vulnerable and frail of all creatures is man, and at the same time the most arrogant.”

Then, in the essay, “Of Repentance,” Montaigne states what perhaps can be considered his purpose for writing—to simply tell others what is on his mind:

Let me here excuse what I often say, that I rarely repent and that my conscience is content with itself—not as the conscience of an angel or a horse, but as the conscience of a man; always adding this refrain, not perfunctorily but in sincere and complete submission: that I speak as an ignorant inquirer, referring the decision purely and simply to the common and authorized beliefs. I do not teach, I tell.

Often an essay’s content does not initially appear to relate to the piece’s respective title. Such is the case with “Of Cannibals,” which opens with an account of Roman history, then moves to discuss a person who had dwelled in Brazil, or “Antartic France” as the area was known during Montaigne’s time. From there, Montaigne discusses an act of cannibalism and then behavior he deems barbarous, observing “[t]he most valiant are sometimes the most unfortunate.”

Montaigne’s meandering, detached, and ironical style, while awkward to most present-day readers unfamiliar with the Essays, was not unique to this work. His essays reflect a keen, discerning eye and a thorough understanding of history, literature, and philosophy. His displays of knowledge border on the encyclopedic, which discourages readers who regard copious examples and quotations as impediments to understanding the essay's points. But these examples are essential to grasping the context of the Essays and function as important keys to understanding their messages.

Montaigne influenced such writers as DIDEROT and ROUSSEAU. His ability to combine personal thoughts and beliefs with quotations, allusions, theories, and interpretations not only gives readers of later ages a glimpse into the progression of one man's intellect, but also makes his Essays a classic in French and world literature.

English Versions of Works by Michel de Montaigne

Apology for Raymond Sebond. Translated by Marjorie Glicksman Grene and Roger Ariew. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 2003.

Autobiography of Michel de Montaigne. Edited by Marvin Lowenthal. Boston: David R. Godine, 1999.

The Complete Essays of Montaigne. Translated by Donald M. Frame. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1965.

Works about Michel de Montaigne

Hartel, Anne. Michel de Montaigne: Accidental Philosopher. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Hoffmann, George. Montaigne's Career. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Leschemelle, Pierre. Montaigne: The Fool of the Farce. Translated by William J. Beck. New York: Peter Lang, 1995.

Sichel, Edith. Michel de Montaigne. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2003.

Tetel, Marcel. Montaigne. Boston: Twayne, 1990.

Montesquieu, Charles-Louis de Secondat, baron de (1689–1755) novelist, philosopher

Born into an old and aristocratic French family, young Charles-Louis was schooled near Paris, where he was first exposed to ENLIGHTENMENT ideals. He studied at the University of Bordeaux, married, and in 1716 inherited the estate of Montesquieu. The estate entailed a position in parliament, and Montesquieu settled down to practice law.

He published his first important work in 1721, Lettres Persanes (Persian Letters). This bold and witty satire features two fictitious visitors from Persia who travel the world and write letters home, commenting on what they see. Following the success of the work, Montesquieu undertook a grand tour of Europe, and returned home convinced that his best contributions to the world of ideas could be made through literature.

In 1734 he printed The Universal Monarchy, later revoked, and Reflections on the Romans, in which he analyzes the causes for the grandeur and decline of the Roman Empire. By far his most influential work was The Spirit of Laws (1748), which became a classic text of political philosophy and outlines Montesquieu's theory of government. Using a historical approach to examine different forms of government, Montesquieu concludes that the animating principle of a government was either honor or fear. He advocates the separation of powers into executive, legislative, and judicial bodies, and he suggests that a country's climate influences its policy. The immense work also includes a discussion of religion and an analysis of the creation of French law.

The Spirit of Laws won Montesquieu a place among the greatest figures of the Enlightenment. Controversy led him to publish a Defense in 1751, but his fame was secure. He wrote his last work, Essay on Taste, for the ENCYCLOPEDIA of Denis DIDEROT and Jean Le Rond d'ALEMBERT.

Montesquieu's political ideals have become a permanent feature of democracy: His belief in the separation of powers influenced the French Revolution and was incorporated into the American Constitution.

English Versions of Works by Charles-Louis de Secondat, baron de Montesquieu

Considerations on the Causes of the Greatness of the Romans and Their Decline. Translated by David Lowenthal. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 1999.

The Spirit of Laws. Edited by Anne M. Cohler. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Persian Letters. Translated by C. J. Betts. New York: Penguin, 1977.

Works about Charles-Louis de Secondat, baron de Montesquieu

Carrithers, David Wallace, Michael A. Mosher, and Paul A. Rahe, eds. Montesquieu's Science of Politics. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000.

Conroy, Peter V. Montesquieu Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Moore, Milcah Martha (1740–1829)

poet, pedagogical writer

Milcah Martha Moore's Book circulated in the 18th century but appeared in print only recently. Moore was both a contributor to and primary organizer of this handwritten “commonplace” book, which consists of poetry and prose by more than 16 different authors. The book is “a documentary testament to the significance of women’s literacy for forming relationships and expressing sentiments” about politics, marriage, housework, and life during the American Revolution (Wulf).

The daughter of Richard Hill and Deborah Moore, both Quakers from Maryland, Milcah Martha Moore was born in the town of Funchal on the island of Madeira. In 1751 Moore’s mother died, and her aunt escorted her and her brother back to Philadelphia, where she entered a house full of sisters and new relations. In 1767 Moore married her cousin, Dr. Charles Moore. The Quakers at the time were attempting to move away from intermarriage. Thus, Moore’s marriage was not sanctioned, and she and her husband were formally removed from the Quaker Society of Friends. However, Moore remained a Quaker her entire life and rejoined the society after her husband’s death in 1801.

Moore corresponded with numerous women during her day, including the other prominent contributors to the book: Susanna Wright, Hannah Griffiths, and Elizabeth Graeme Ferguson. Their letters often included poems, excerpts from books they were reading, jottings from religious texts, and “trifles.” These writings were used for entertainment purposes as well as spiritual instruction. Often, religious and political sentiments were expressed, either in prose or poetic form. Though shared and passed around, these books were rarely formally published.

Due to their belief in pacifism, many Quakers including Moore had mixed feelings about America’s war for independence. Though they sympathized with the patriots, their religious beliefs mandated neutrality. Some of the contributors to the book were clearly loyal to the British cause, but others expressed support for the colonists. Much of the poetry found in Milcah Martha Moore's Book “expresses this ambivalence” (Wulf). It is interesting to note that Moore copied everything into her book during the American Revolution.

During the war, Moore and her husband moved from Philadelphia to the Montgomery township in the northern area of the county. Her husband practiced medicine while she kept at her correspondence. She also opened a school for girls, and in 1787 published an educational primer called Miscellanies, Moral and Instructive.

Moore’s contribution to early American literature has only recently been acknowledged. Her Book testifies to the importance and role of education and written communication among women within the Quaker foundations of early America.

A Work by Milcah Martha Moore

Le Courreye, Blecki, and Karin A. Wulf, eds. Milcah Martha Moore's Book: A Commonplace Book from Revolutionary America. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.

Moquihuitzín (Macuilxochitzín)

(ca. 1435–unknown) poet

Moquihuitzín was the daughter of Tlacaélel, a powerful adviser to the leaders of Mexico-

Tenochtitlán. She was named after the goddess of art, song, and dance, so that from birth she seemed destined to be a great poet.

Moquihuitzín lived at the time when Tenochtitlán had become an important commercial center and dominated the Mexica (Aztec) Empire, then at its peak. As a woman of noble birth, she most certainly enjoyed a life of leisure and could devote herself to traditional arts and crafts, but she also took an uncommon interest in her father's political activities.

In the capacity of chief adviser to the rulers of Tenochtitlán, Tlacaélel had planned the successful series of military campaigns that helped Tenochtitlán to assert its power in the region. During one of these conquests, AXAYACATL, the leader of Tenochtitlán, was seriously wounded by an Otomi captain. It was only the sudden arrival of the Mexica army that saved him. Moquihuitzín, who followed affairs of state with great interest, composed the song "Macuilxochitlín Icuic," or "Song of Macuilxocitl," to record this event for posterity. She begins it by giving thanks to the supreme god of the Mexica people:

*I raise my songs,
I, Macuilxochitl with these I gladden the Giver of Life, may the dance begin!*

This celebratory song is also notable for telling the story of the Otomi women who pleaded with Axayacatl to spare the life of the man who wounded him:

He was full of fear, the Otomi, but then his women made supplication for him to Axayatacl.

Such details indicate that her interest in public affairs was so deep that she took trouble to be intimate with even the secondary incidents connected with important matters.

No other poems of Moquihuitzín survive. The chronicler Tezozomoc writes that "of her was born the prince Cuauhtlaptalzén." But little else is known; though it is likely that she lived out the remaining years of the century. The survival of her song is confirmation of the claims of the Mexican chroniclers that women too were highly educated and skilled in the art of poetry.

See also NAHUATL POETRY; NEZAHUALCOYOTL; NEZAHUALPILLI.

English Versions of Works by Moquihuitzín

Bierhorst, John, trans. Cantares Mexicanos: Songs of the Aztecs. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1985.

León-Portilla, Miguel, ed. Fifteen Poets of the Aztec World. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.

More, Sir Thomas (1478–1535) novelist, nonfiction writer

Thomas More was born in London, the son of John More, a prominent lawyer and later a judge. He became a page in the household of Archbishop Morton at age 13, and went to Oxford the following year. He received a B.A. in 1494, going on to study law. In 1529 he was appointed lord chancellor of England, the most powerful position in the kingdom below the king himself. He later resigned, however, was convicted of treason, and beheaded. In 1935 the Catholic Church acknowledged his loyalty by making him a saint.

More was perhaps the single most important intellectual in early-16th-century England, and was instrumental in helping introduce HUMANISM to England. As early as 1505, when it is believed he considered entering the priesthood, he was translating The Life of Pico (1509), about the famous 15th-century Italian humanist. Richard J. Schoeck notes that More's translation of Pico's biography is "important for being a serious effort in English, at a time when nearly any imaginative effort in English was experimental and involved a manifesto, implicitly or explicitly, on the potential of the use of the vernacular," or the native tongue. The biography also sheds light on how Italian humanism traveled to England.

Also a historian, More wrote The History of Richard III between 1514 and 1518, in which he innovatively forges a symbolic connection between Richard's physical and moral deformity. This history helped establish the myth that Richard III was an evil, physically deformed dictator who murdered his brothers and nephews to become king of England, a myth that continued to be taught as historical truth in British grammar schools well into the 20th century.

More's most famous work is his philosophical romance Utopia (1516), in which a mariner tells a story about an ideal state. The novel was written in Latin and spawned numerous imitations. Utopia, which means "nowhere" and is the name More gave to his fictional island, reads like a call for social reform. "When I run over in my mind," says Raphael Hythlodæus, the character who describes Utopia, "the various commonwealths flourishing today, so help me God, I can see nothing in them but a conspiracy of the rich, who are fattening up their own interests under the name and title of the commonwealth," a word that simultaneously suggests a state and the common wealth in the 16th century. In this passage, according to the RENAISSANCE critic Jonathan Dollimore, More acknowledges not only that the laws are corrupt, but also "that law and morality have their origins in custom rather than with an eternal order of things." The argument is strengthened, Dollimore argues, because of the book's explicit comparison of Utopian society with European society.

Hythlodæus also advances religious views that are extremely liberal, especially since throughout early 16th-century Europe people were required to accept the pope's authority. The punishment for dissent, or heresy, was death. In Utopia, though:

"There are different forms of religion throughout the island," Hythlodæus explains, "and in each particular city as well. Some worship as a god the sun, others the moon, and still others the planets. There are some who worship a man of past ages who was conspicuous either for virtue or glory; they consider him not only a god but the supreme god."

Such ideas make More seem like a forerunner of the Reformation, the religious movement that undermined the hold the Catholic Church had over Europe. Indeed, More's ideas are more radical than those of any of the reformers, since in each place where a reformed church appeared, its citizens were required to conform to the tenets of the new church. According to scholar Stephen Greenblatt, while Utopians are allowed their own religious beliefs, most Utopians "believe in a single power, unknown, eternal, infinite, inexplicable, far beyond the grasp of the human mind, and diffused throughout the universe" and everyone is required to attend the same house of worship and to believe in life after death. In Utopia, the people do not count one who denies this belief "as one of their citizens, since he would undoubtedly betray all the laws and customs of society." Utopia, envisioned by More is not a state of freedom, but a state in which dissent is impossible. Such ideas were considered radical at the time Utopia was published, and the kind of religious toleration proposed by More would not be achieved until the 18th century.

Works by Sir Thomas More

Saint Thomas More: Selected Writings. Edited by John F. Thornton and Susan B. Varenne. Vancouver, Wash.: Vintage Books, 2003.

Utopia. Translated by Paul Turner. New York: Penguin, 1965.

Works about Sir Thomas More

Greenblatt, Stephen. Renaissance Self-Fashioning: From More to Shakespeare. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.

Murphy, Anne. Thomas More. Liguori, Mo.: Liguori Publications, 1997.

Sargent, Daniel. Thomas More. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.

Motolinía, Toribio de (ca. 1495–ca. 1569) missionary, historian

“Motolinía” is the name assumed by the Spanish Franciscan Fray Toribio de Benavente. Motolinía was a lifelong student of Indian lore who wrote about the indigenous Indian civilizations of New Spain with deep insight and appreciation. As a Franciscan friar in 1524, he was one of the first clergy to receive orders to go to Mexico. Repeatedly hearing the Aztec word motolinía, meaning “poor,” during his first visit to Mexico City, he adopted it as his own name. His change of name also was deliberately symbolic of his affection for the Indians.

As a Franciscan, Motolinía helped to establish convents, churches, and the city of Puebla. He worked to protect the Indians despite experiencing legal difficulties with authorities. In 1529 he was sent to Guatemala and Nicaragua to evangelize Indian populations. He learned Indian languages and experienced considerable success with his work. When he died in Mexico City, he was considered by many to be a saint.

Motolinía’s most important work deals with the history and culture of the indigenous peoples he served. As a part of his work, he was instructed to write an account of the Indians in pre-Spanish times and a history of the work of the Franciscans among them. Completed in 1541, Historia de los indios de Nueva España is considered to be the first history of the Mexican Indians written by a Spaniard.

An English Version of a Work by Toribio de Motolinía

History of the Indians of New Spain, vol. 4. Translated by Elizabeth A. Foster. Oxford, U.K.: Greenwood Publishing, 1970.

Munford, Robert (ca. 1737–1783) playwright

Robert Munford was born in Virginia to Anna Bland and Robert Munford II, both descendants of prominent if not wealthy colonial families. Mun-ford’s father was a landowner, but his heavy drinking led to the ruin of the family estate and to his death in 1745. Munford’s uncle, William Beverly, raised the boy until Munford was 14. He was then sent to England with Beverly’s own children to be educated at Wakefield Grammar School. When Beverly died in 1756, leaving no provisions for Munford in his will, Munford returned to Virginia, where he studied law with his cousin, Peyton Randolph.

In 1760 or 1761, Munford married his cousin and childhood friend, Anna Beverly. In the next few years he extended his family’s tobacco plantations and rose to prominence as a wealthy landowner. After Mecklenburg County was formed in Virginia in 1765, he held several important political offices, including county lieutenant, Burgess, and member of the Virginia House of Delegates (1779–81). Politically, Munford was a moderate, but he was an early supporter of American independence and signed the anti-Stamp Act resolutions with Patrick Henry in 1774. He also helped recruit troops for the war and even served as a major in 1781.

Munford’s background would figure into his literary output, which included two plays, a few poems, and an unfinished translation of Ovid’s Metamorphoses. However, none of his works seem to have been published or produced onstage during his lifetime. Indeed, it was Munford’s son, William, who helped to posthumously publish his father’s work in 1798 as A Collection of Plays and Poems, by the Late Colonel Robert Munford, of Mecklenburg County, in the State of Virginia.

Munford’s plays are regarded by some literary historians to be the first comedic works by an American dramatist. The Candidates, perhaps “the first real American farce” (Kemp), was a sharp-witted look at the electoral system in the Virginia colonies and, like his play The Patriots, was filled with sly satires and caricatures of Munford’s contemporaries. The Patriots uses the traditional five-act plot structure that was common in much theater of the time and revolves around three romances, “the first serious, the second comic, and the third farcical” (Kemp). The play, which dealt with two men falsely accused of being Tories or British sympathizers, was a direct reflection of Munford’s political views, as it argued that patriotism was a good thing to exercise, but only on reasoned moderation. Today, Munford’s works are valued for the insight they provide into historical events and people of 18th-century Virginia.

Works by Robert Munford

The Plays of Robert Munford. Tucson, Ariz.: American Eagle Publications, 1992.

A Work about Robert Munford

Baine, Rodney M. Robert Munford, America’s First Comic Dramatist. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1967.

Muratori, Ludovico Antonio

(1672–1750) historian

Ludovico Antonio Muratori was born to poor parents and became a Roman Catholic priest. Early in his career, he served as a librarian in Milan. In 1700 he became chief archivist and ducal librarian at the city of Modena, and in this post developed a reputation as one of the leading scholars in Europe. He achieved renown for his discovery of the so-called Muratorian Canon, a second-century Christian document containing the earliest known list of New Testament books. He also edited a 28-volume collection of medieval manuscripts, as well as a 12-volume history of Italy, but is best remembered today for A Relation of the Missions of Paraguay (1750). The only work of Muratori available in an English translation, A Relation of the Missions of Paraguay is a chronicle and description of the Jesuit settlements in South America.

Muratori had never been to South America, and compiled his research mainly from discussions with travelers and letters from the missionaries. As a result, in the opinion of the historian R. B. Cunningham Graham, the books of Muratori and another, similar chronicler “contain the faults and mistakes of men . . . writing of countries of which they were personally ignorant. Both give a good account of the customs and regimen of the missions, but both seem to have believed too readily fabulous accounts of the flora and fauna of Paraguay.” After his death, Muratori was remembered as one of the greatest scholars and medievalists of his time. His reputation was particularly great in his native Italy, where his ideas helped inspire the 19th-century nationalist Risorgimento.

A Work about Ludovico Antonio Muratori

Cunninghame Graham, R. B. A Vanished Arcadia: Being Some Account of the Jesuits in Paraguay. New York: Haskell House, 1968 [1901].

Murray, Judith Sargent (1751–1820)

essayist, poet, playwright

Judith Sargent Murray was born in Gloucester, Massachusetts, the eldest of eight children born to Winthrop and Judith Saunders Sargent. Her father was a prosperous merchant, as well as ship owner and sea captain. Because the Sargents cared about education, they allowed Judith to receive tutoring alongside her brothers. Such schooling was rare for women at the time, and even rarer for them to be taught Greek, Latin, and math.

In 1788 she married John Murray, with whom she had two children: a daughter born in 1791, and a son who died shortly after birth. His death led to Murray’s first forays into poetry, when she composed “Lines, occasioned by the Death of an Infant.” Her other verse was “didactic and marked by the conventional couplet typical of the eighteenth century” (Lawton).

Murray is best known for a series of essays that she published in the Massachusetts Magazine in the 1790s, often under the pen name Constantia. The essays were eventually collected and published in 1798 under the title The Gleaner. The book contained, among other things, essays on history, women’s education, and political affairs. Murray was a strong advocate for female education, arguing that women needed education as much as men to better support their families and themselves. As a strong nationalist, she also praised the excellence of American literature in both essays and poetry.

When the ban on performing plays was struck down in 1793, the same year Murray and her husband moved to Boston, Murray turned her creative energies to writing plays, making her “one of only three women to attempt play writing in New England before 1800” (Hornstein). The two plays she wrote, The Medium (1795), retitled Virtue Triumphant in 1798, and The Traveller Returned (1796), were both performed in Boston, though neither met with much success.

After her husband’s death in 1814, Murray oversaw the publication of his memoirs and sermons. Her own works are valued for the insight they give to a woman’s perspective in 18th-century America.

Works by Judith Sargent Murray

Selected Writings of Judith Sargent Murray. Edited by Sharon M. Harris. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.

The Gleaner: A Miscellany. Edited by Nina Baym. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1993.

A Work about Judith Sargent Murray

Skemp, Sheila L. Judith Sargent Murray: A Brief Biography with Documents. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1998.

Nahuatl poetry

Nahuatl was the language of the various indigenous peoples of central Mexico, commonly known as the Aztec, at the time of the arrival of the Spanish. Although strictly speaking the word Aztec refers only to the ancestors of the Mexica and Tenochca of the twin cities of Tenochtitlán and Tlatelolco, it is often employed as a generic term to describe peoples who spoke dialects of a common Nahuatl language. Sharing a similar culture, they organized themselves into a powerful coalition of three, consisting of Tenochtitlán, Texcoco, and Tlacopan.

A member of the Uto-Aztecan family of languages, Nahuatl evolved as a pictographic writing system based on images. In this respect, it resembles Egyptian and Chinese writing forms. It was employed for both secular and religious purposes. Among the documents written in Nahuatl were sacred texts, genealogies, maps, and historical records. However, the xochicuicatl (“flower songs”), the name for poetry, represent the highest achievement of this language before the unexpected invasion of the Spanish.

The most distinctive feature of this literary form is derived from the pictorial nature of Nahuatl writing. Thus the flower songs uniquely fuse poetry and painting into a single art. The pictorial elements aside, Nahuatl poetry frequently used other literary devices. One of the most common is the repetition of grammatical patterns:

[M]y heart has tasted it, my heart has been inebriated the flowering chocolate drink is foaming the flowery tobacco is passed around.

Another noticeable trait of this poetry is the merging of two metaphors, or figurative terms. An example of this is the compound word flower song. These words come together to produce a meaning that can be translated as poetry, art, or symbolism.

Among the famous composers of Nahuatl flower songs are NEZAHUALCOYOTL, his son NEZAHUALPILLI, and the female poet MOQUIHUITZÍN. The social rank of these poets suggests that poetry was an exclusively aristocratic art.

In the wake of the Spanish conquest, the ability to read Nahuatl was gradually lost. However, several Nahuatl manuscripts were preserved, transcribed into alphabetic script and, eventually, translated into Spanish, English, and other languages.

The most comprehensive anthologies of Nahuatl poetry are Cantares mexicanas and Romances de los señores de la Nueva España.

See also MESOAMERICAN MYTHOLOGY.

English Versions of Nahuatl Poetry

Bierhorst, John, trans. Cantares Mexicanos: Songs of the Aztecs. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1985.

León-Portilla, Miguel, ed. Fifteen Poets of the Aztec World. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.

neoclassicism (1600s–1700s)

In a broad sense, neoclassical literature is that which embraces prescribed, formal conventions and styles of literature existing in previous eras, especially those of classical Rome and Greece. Such literature focuses upon the control of human passions and the search for order in all aspects of life, and emphasizes the importance of societal needs over individual ones. Neoclassical writing often excludes a sense of optimism, although some texts feature a strong satirical element that coincides with this sense.

In France, neoclassical literature flourished in the 17th century during the reign of the Sun King, Louis XIV (1638–1715). Three master playwrights, Pierre CORNEILLE, Jean RACINE, and MOLIÈRE (Jean Baptiste Poquelin), are most often recognized as producers of the best neoclassical drama of the period. In keeping with neoclassical tenets, these playwrights wrote with the rules of classical dramatic UNITIES in mind. These rules, as suggested by Aristotle, pertain to unities of time, place, and action. Aristotle also calls for the distinct separation of tragedy and comedy. Corneille's Le Cid (1636), Racine's Andromaque (1667), and Molière's Amphitryon (1668) are emblematic of this popular style in France. Other French neoclassical texts include Molière's Tartuffe and François-Marie Arouet VOLTAIRE's Candide.

In England, neoclassical literature was en vogue from approximately 1660 to 1798. John Dryden's All for Love, Jonathan SWIFT's Gulliver's Travels, Alexander POPE's Essay on Criticism and Rape of the Lock, and Samuel Johnson's Rambler essays and preface to SHAKESPEARE's dramatic works are but a few examples of neoclassical writing of the period in England.

Works about Neoclassicism

Cronk, Nicholas. The Classical Sublime and the Language of Literature. Charlottesville, Va.: Rookwood, 2002.

Irwin, David. Neoclassicism. Boston: Phaidon Press, 1997.

Simon, Irene. Neo-Classical Criticism 1600–1800. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1971.

Nezahualcoyotl (ca. 1402–ca. 1473) poet, philosopher-king, architect

The name Nezahualcoyotl literally means “hungry coyote,” and many literary historians consider his “flower songs,” or xochicuicatl, to be the highest achievement of Ancient Mexican literature.

“Flower Song” is the name given to the poetry and art practiced by the ancient Mexicans. The lyrics were composed in a language called Nahuatl, spoken by peoples who called themselves Mexica or Tenochca, now known as the Aztec.

Nezahualcoyotl was the king of Texcoco and the most influential intellectual in a period of extraordinary cultural development. Aside from his enduring fame as a lyric poet, he also enjoyed a considerable reputation as a builder, legislator, and philosopher. Among his many works are the construction of Texcoco's library of pictographic or “painted” books, a zoological and botanical garden, and a university dedicated to scholarship and the arts. Under his rule, Texcoco also forged a political alliance with Tenochtitlán, the most powerful state of the Mexica Empire, which became the cultural center of the Nahuatl-speaking world.

The flower songs of Nezahualcoyotl are now preserved in various anthologies. The best known are the Cantares mexicanos, or Mexican Songs, and the Romances de los señores de la Nueva España, or The Romances of the Sages of New Spain. In one of his compositions, Nezahualcoyotl gives a lyrical illustration of the ideals embodied in the flower songs:

*With flowers You paint,
O Giver of Life!
With songs You give color, with songs You shade
those who will live on the earth. . . .
We live only in Your book of paintings, here on the earth.*

This poem expresses the theme of transience, or the temporary nature of life. Nezahualcoyotl's emphasis of transience, however, is not negative; it is, rather, a positive ideal that allows him to distill the lasting spiritual essence that connects society to the cosmos and the after-life.

Sadly and ironically, within a century of Nezahualcoyotl's death, Mexican civilization would be devastated as Spanish colonization abruptly ended its remarkable achievements.

See also NAHUATL POETRY.

English Versions of Works by Nezahualcoyotl

Cantares Mexicanos: Songs of the Aztecs. Translated by John Bierhorst. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1985.

Chants of Nezahualcoyotl and Obsidian Glyph. Translated by Prospero Saiz. Madison, Wis.: Ghost Pony Press, 1996.

A Work about Nezahualcoyotl

Gillmor, Frances. Flute of the Smoking Mirror: A Portrait of Nezahualcoyotl, Poet-King of the Aztecs. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1983.

Nezahualpilli (1464–1515) poet, king

Nezahualpilli, or “fasting son,” succeeded his father NEZAHUALCOYOTL in 1473 as king of Texcoco, one of the kingdoms of the triple alliance of the Mexica (Aztec) Empire.

Throughout his life, Nezahualpilli exhibited a strong sense of filial piety so that he consciously modeled his life on the example of his illustrious father. Nezahualpilli thus continued the legacy of promoting learning. The chronicler Juan Torquemada writes that Nezahualpilli's enthusiasm for science led him to erect an observatory in his palace. Above all, Nezahualpilli inherited his father's humane spirit and fair-mindedness. He is thus credited with abolishing capital punishment for lesser crimes and displaying leniency toward the lower classes of society.

Nezahualpilli also emulated his father as a composer of “flower songs,” the pictographic lyrics of the Nahuatl language. Unfortunately, of his work only a long fragment survives. Called Icuic Nezahualpilli yc Tlamato Huexotzinco, or Song of Nezahualpilli during the War with Huexotzinco, this poem celebrates victory in battle while lamenting the loss of life:

*My heart is sad,
I am young Nezahualpilli.
I look for my captains,
the lord has gone,
the flowering quetzal,
the young and strong warrior has gone,
the blue of the sky is his house.
Perhaps Tlatohuetzin and Acapipyol will come to drink the flowery liquor, here where I weep?*

Characteristic of flower songs, Nezahualpilli refers to death as intoxicating and expresses the theme of life's impermanence in relation to its eternal nature.

As the poem also reveals, Nezahualpilli's reign was a constant struggle to maintain the independence of Texcoco at a time of increasing centralization of power in Tenochtitlán. He was thus obliged against his own judgment to take part in such wars to maintain strategic alliance with Tenochtitlán.

Eventually, his relations with Montezuma, the ruler of Tenochtitlán, became strained, and toward the end of his life he undermined Montezuma's political ambitions with a startling prediction. He foretold the coming of a new people who would become masters of the land. Soon after Nezahualpilli's death, Hernan CORTÉS arrived with his army, and Montezuma was stoned to death by his own people.

See also NAHUATL POETRY; MOQUIHUITZÍN.

English Versions of Works by Nezahualpilli

Cantares Mexicanos: Songs of the Aztecs. Translated by John Bierhorst. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1985.

León-Portilla, Miguel, ed. Fifteen Poets of the Aztec World. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.

Nguyen Trai (1380–1442) poet

Nguyen Trai was born in Nhi Khe, Ha Dong province, North Vietnam. He was the son of Nguyen Phi Khanh, a scholar-official of the Vietnamese court. Nguyen Trai received his degree when he was 20, and was appointed to the position of deputy head provincial administrator soon after. When his father was taken as a prisoner of war after the Ming dynasty's successful occupation of North Vietnam, Nguyen Trai joined the liberation army of King Le Loi. Le Loi defeated the Ming Chinese in 1428 and made Nguyen Trai a high official in his bureaucracy. When the new emperor Le Thai Tong ascended the throne, Nguyen Trai retired and lived a simple life in Con Son. He married Nguyen Thi Lo, a country girl with whom the new emperor became smitten. In 1442 Le Thai Tong died mysteriously after paying a visit to Nguyen Trai and his wife. Nguyen Trai was accused of committing regicide and his whole family was executed.

As a close adviser to Le Loi during his campaign, Nguyen Trai allegedly wrote many pronouncements and letters, which were sent in Le Loi's name to the Ming generals during the war of liberation. These letters were all collected in Quang Trung Tu Menh Tap (Letters and commands from the time of military service, 1418–28). In these writings, Nguyen Trai showed his clever use of propaganda and verse. He wrote most of his poems in the Chu Nom script, but his best known poem, "Binh Ngo Sach" (Book on defeating the Wu), was written in classical Chinese in 1428, in the aftermath of Le Loi's victory. The poem became Vietnam's declaration of independence.

All of Nguyen Trai's Vietnamese poems were collected in Quoc Am Thi Tap (Volume of poems in the national tongue, 1480). His poetry expresses deep concern for filial piety, loyalty, and moral duties. His texts set the precedent for proper actions and behavior for Vietnamese leaders such as Le Loi. Nguyen Trai's honorable character and idealism mark him as a well-loved poet in Vietnamese history.

An English Version of Works by Nguyen Trai

Nguyen Trai, One of the Greatest Figures of Vietnamese History and Literature. Hanoi: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1980.

A Work about Nguyen Trai

A Thousand Years of Vietnam Poetry. Edited and translated by Ngoc Bich Nguyen. New York: Knopf, 1974.

Nikitin, Afanasij (early 1400s–1472) travel writer

Afanasij Nikitin was a merchant from the Muscovite city of Tver. He composed a travelogue entitled Journey Across Three Seas. First published by Nikolai KARAMZIN, the Journey describes Nikitin's travels through the Caspian, Indian, and Black Sea regions.

In 1466 Nikitin sailed down the Volga River on a trading expedition to Persia. Pirates robbed him of everything en route. He nevertheless continued on to Persia and India, where he spent three years (1469–72). Nikitin also visited Armenia, Ethiopia, and Arabia. He died at the city of Smolensk on the way home.

The Journey contains some fictional material, but it also includes a great deal of factual information. Nikitin describes his activities and observations abroad; lists distances, travel times, and prices; and ruminates on religion and culture. He emphasizes practical matters. “Thank God, I reached Junnar in good health,” he writes, “but the passage cost me a hundred rubles.” Later, he notes that “pepper and dyes are cheap . . . [But] the duty is high and, moreover, there are many pirates at sea.”

Nikitin’s Journey is significant because it describes a commercial voyage; most European travel tales of the time depict religious pilgrimages. Nikitin was also one of the first, if not the first, Europeans to explore and write about India. His stories offer fascinating glimpses into Indian and Middle Eastern cultures as he saw them. Perhaps most notably, Nikitin shows surprising tolerance for other religions and cultures. He wrote parts of the Journey in a Middle Eastern trading dialect. In the words of Lowell Tillett, the Journey “has something of interest for the psychologist, sociologist, and theologian, as well as for the historian, geographer, and economist.”

An English Version of a Work by Afanasij Nikitin

Afanasy Nikitin’s Journey Across Three Seas, in Medieval Russia’s Epics, Chronicles, and Tales, rev. ed. Edited and translated by Serge A. Zenkovsky. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1974.

Nikolev, Nikolai Petrovich (1758–1815) poet, playwright

Nikolai Petrovich Nikolev was born in Russia and lost his parents at a young age. He was raised by the duchess Dashkova, a distant relative and one of the most respected and highly educated women of her time. Nikolev entered military service, but after an encounter that cost him his eyesight, he retired and devoted himself to literature. He became a member of the Russian Academy, and many influential figures, including Czar Paul I, patronized Nikolev and highly valued his work. After Nikolev’s death, his friends established a society that met regularly and held literary readings in his honor.

Nikolev’s writings included pseudo-classical odes, sentimental folk-style songs, and tragedies. He gained the most success with his dramas Palmyra, The Self-Enamored Poet, Genuine Consistency, and Phoenix. These dramas appeared in the influential journal Russian Theater. The Self-Enamored Poet, which appeared in 1781, parodied the tragedies of the great Russian dramatist Alexander SUMAROKOV. The play, like most of Nikolev’s works, incorporated the ideals of NEOCLASSICISM, which were highly regarded by educated tastes, but mercilessly exposed Sumarokov’s tendency to begrudge other playwrights their success.

Between 1795 and 1798, Nikolev published five volumes of his works under the title Creations. In the literary world, Nikolev was known as the Russian MILTON. Czar Paul I called Nikolev “the blind clairvoyant.”

A Work about Nikolai Petrovich Nikolev

Maltseva, T. V. Literaturnaia Polemika i Protsess Zhanroobrazovaniia v Komediografii XVIII Veka. Monografiia. (Literary Polemics and the Process of Genre Emergence in 18th Century Comediography.) Monograph St. Petersburg: Leningradskii Gosudarstvennyi Oblastnoi Universitet Im. A.S. Pushkina, 2000.

Noh (Nō) (1300s–present) classical Japanese form of performance

The Noh form of performance, developed in 14th- and 15th-century Japan, includes elements of dance drama, music, and poetry, which are combined to create a subtle and aesthetic stage art. The central unifying concept of Noh is that of yugen, which translates as “gentle gracefulness,” implying a focus on expressing beauty through simplicity, restraint, and suggestion.

Noh drama was developed largely by Kannami Kiyotsugu (1333–84) and his son ZEAMI Motokiyo (1364–43). Zeami, a prolific writer, wrote 100 of the 240 plays still in the active repertoire, enjoying the patronage of the military ruler, Shogun Ashikaga Yoshimitsu. During the Edo period (1603–1868), the military regime proclaimed Noh the government’s official performance art. The Meiji period (1868–1912) brought many reforms to Japanese society, one of which was an end to the patronage of Noh drama. Private sponsors, however, kept the classical art form active.

Noh plays can be classified in five subject categories, those that feature: gods, warriors, women, supernatural creatures, and miscellaneous characters (often mad women). Action in the play is usually focused on one central character called the shite (pronounced “sh’tay”), who often appears as an ordinary person in the first half of a play in disguise and reappears in the second half in his true form, such as the ghost of a long-dead famous personage. An accompanying character called tsure often appears as well, along with the waki, or secondary character, who is often a traveling priest who develops the story line by questioning the main character.

Accompanying chorus and instrumentalists are important for the full expression of Noh drama. The eight-person chorus, called jiutai, is located to the side of the stage and narrates the background and action of the story, often explaining characters’ thoughts and emotions. The instrumentalists, or hayashi, are located at the back of the stage and include a transverse flute and three drums of different types. The highly prescribed rhythms of the drums, called kakegoe, add an important texture to the sound of the performance.

The setting and accessories for Noh performances are elaborate and intended to portray exquisite beauty by creating certain moods and emotions. Almost every character wears a finely carved, expressive, and superbly beautiful mask. The costumes are similarly gorgeous and expressive, created in elaborate patterns of dyed silk meant to reveal the character’s nature. The elaborate color and design of Noh costumes finds a suitable arena for display on the simple stage on which the plays are performed. The stage has no curtain and is composed of a square connected to the backstage with a bridge, whereby the characters enter and exit.

Today, Noh is still actively performed. Though not widely popular in the whole of Japanese society, its professional practitioners are well trained and enjoy devoted and enthusiastic supporters. Busy at teaching and performing their art, as many as 1,500 performers today make their living through Noh. The tradition of the Noh performance is passed down within families, especially in the cities of Tokyo, Osaka, and Kyoto. There is a thriving community of amateur practitioners, as well, who perform the chant, dance, and instrumental elements of Noh.

English Versions of Noh

Chifumi Shimazaki. Warrior Ghost Plays from the Japanese Noh Theater: Parallel Translations with Running Commentary. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1993.

Zeami Motokiyo. On the Art of the No Drama: The Major Treatises of Zeami. Translated by J. Thomas Rimer, edited by Masakazu Yamazaki. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.

Works about Noh

Fenollosa, Ernest, and Ezra Pound. ‘Noh’ or Accomplishment: A Study of the Classical Stage of Japan. Gretna, La.: Pelican Publishing, 1999.

Smethurst, Mae J., and Christina Laffin, eds. Noh Ominameshi: A Flower Viewed from Many Directions. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.

Novalis (Friedrich Leopold von Hardenberg) (1772–1801) poet, novelist

The second of 11 children born to Heinrich, Baron von Hardenberg, Fritz, as he was called, took the penname Novalis from one of the family’s ancient titles. Born into the early German romantic movement, he himself became a figure of romance. Blond, tall, handsome, with wide eyes and a gentle disposition, his biographers maintain that he was a dreamy youth who, at 22, fell in love at first sight with Sophie von Kühn, who died of consumption a year before they could be married. Novalis himself died of consumption (known today as tuberculosis) before he turned 29.

In truth, Novalis was more than a dreamy poet. He studied philosophy, history, literature, and law, and privately pursued interests in mathematics, science, and language theory. He wrote on religious and philosophical issues as well as poetry and prose. Some of his ideas were quite scandalous to contemporaries, leading to heavy editing when the first edition of his collected works was published in 1802.

Novalis's ideas about philosophy and science, influenced by SCHILLER and GOETHE, gained less attention than his theories of poetry as a combination of inspired genius and meticulous craft. Of his writings, the works most studied today are two poetic compositions, Hymns to the Night and Spiritual Songs, and two unfinished novels, Henry of Ofterdingen and The Novices of Saïs, all composed between 1799 and 1801.

Though Novalis had practical concerns in science, medicine, and mathematics, which surface in his fiction, he is best remembered for the mystical, brooding spirit captured in Hymns to the Night and so characteristic of the romantic age:

*Far off lies the world
With its motley of pleasures.
Elsewhere doth the Light
Pitch its airy encampment.
What if it never returned . . . ?*

English Versions of Works by Novalis

Henry von Ofterdingen. Translated by Palmer Hilty. Long Grove, Ill.: Waveland Press, 1990.
Novalis: Hymns to the Night. Translated by Dick Higgins. New York: McPherson & Co., 1998.

Works about Novalis

O'Brien, William Arctander. Novalis: Signs of Revolution. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1994.
Stoljar, Margaret Mahony, trans. Novalis: Philosophical Writings. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997.

novel, epistolary (1700s)

The epistolary novel, which enjoyed its greatest popularity during the late 18th century, is a genre of prose fiction that uses letters of correspondence to narrate a story. Practically more than any other fictional genre, the epistolary novel calls for the reader's participation in interpreting and understanding the letters that create the narrative.

Samuel RICHARDSON's three novels—Pamela (1740), Clarissa (1748), and The History of Sir Charles Grandison (1754)—opened the doors to the creative and psychological possibilities of fiction writing. Richardson created distinctively different voices for each of his characters and explored their emotional states in traumatic situations. His characters reveal as much in their unconscious emotions as their consciously stated feelings and thoughts. Richardson claimed that his epistolary novels were morally instructive, to be read as much for self-education as for entertainment.

Richardson is often referred to as the inventor of the modern novel, and his influence had far-reaching effects. In England and France, Charles de MONTESQUIEU, Françoise de GRAFFIGNY, Jean-Jacques ROUSSEAU, and Pierre-Choderlos de LACLOS all wrote epistolary novels influenced by Richardson, as did Johann Wolfgang von GOETHE, whose The Sorrows of Young Werther became a best-seller in Germany.

Other writers of the epistolary novel who followed or were influenced by Richardson include Henry Fielding (1707–54), whose Joseph Andrews (1742) is a parody of Richardson's Pamela; Tobias Smollett (1721–71), whose masterpiece Humphry Clinker (1771) is a collection of comedic letters shared among members of a traveling party; and Laurence Sterne (1713–68), whose novel The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (1760–67) takes the epistolary form to new heights in its use of psychological time, rather than chronological, as a framework for storytelling.

By the early 19th century, the epistolary novel no longer dominated fiction, but the exploration of characters' thoughts and emotions, to which the epistolary novel gave birth, live on today in every aspect of modern fiction.

See also PRÉVOST; SÉVIGNÉ.

English Versions of Epistolary Novels

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von. The Sorrows of Young Werther, and Selected writings. Translated by Catherine Hutter. New York: New American Library, 1982.

Richardson, Samuel. Clarissa, or the History of a Young Lady. New York: Penguin Books, 1985.

Works about Epistolary Novels

Black, F. G. The Epistolary Novel in the Late Eighteenth Century. Eugene: University of Oregon Press, 1940.

Jensen, Katharine Ann. Writing Love: Letters, Women, and the Novel in France, 1605–1776. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1995.

Occom, Samson (1723–1792) missionary, clergyman, schoolmaster, hymnist

Samson Occom, a Moghegan Indian, was influenced by evangelism during the “Great Awakening” and converted to Christianity in 1739. From 1743 to 1747 he was educated by Eleazar Wheelock, who later became the first president of Dartmouth College. Through missionary work, Occom offered an alternative spiritual vision for eastern Indians in 18th-century America. He mastered Latin, dressed like a Puritan, and served as a Christian missionary to the Indians, using native languages and traditions in support of his ministry. White contemporaries referred to Occom as the “Pious Mohegan,” “Indian Preacher,” “Red Christian,” and “Praying Indian.”

In 1749 Occom became schoolmaster and minister to the Montauk tribe and later the Oneida tribe in the areas of New York and Connecticut. As a Native American, he was able to gain the trust and respect of his students. In contrast to the white missionaries, Occom did not believe that Christianity and Western culture should replace Indian culture. He used Indian culture to teach Christianity and the English language alongside native traditions. He taught a phonetic approach to learning English, using letter recognition games and flash cards fashioned of paper and cedar chips.

Although Occom did not have formal theological training, he was ordained by the Long Island Presbytery in 1759 because of his success as a missionary. In 1765 he visited England and helped to raise money that was later used to establish Dartmouth College as a college for Native-American students.

English Versions of Works by Samson Occom

An Account of the Montauk Indians, on Long Island, Massachusetts Historical Collections (ser. 1, 10 (1809): 105–111.

Samson Occom, Mohegan: Collected Writings by the Founder of Native American Literature. Edited by Joanne Brooks. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Works about Samson Occom

De Loss Love, William. Samson Occom and the Christian Indians of New England. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1999.

Peyer, Bernd. The Tutor'd Mind: Indian Missionary-Writers in Antebellum America. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1997.

Olivares, Miguel de (1675–1768) historian
Born at Chillán in Chile, Father Miguel de Olivares wrote Historia militar, civil y sagrada de lo acaecido en la conquista y pacificación del Reino de Chile. This chronicle, not published until 1864, remains the best source of information about indigenous Chilean customs during the period of Spanish colonization. His other notable work is Breve noticia de la provincia de la Compañía de Jesús en Chile 1593–1736, published in 1870. Unfortunately, no English translations of his work are in print.

Olivares entered the Jesuit order, became a missionary, and began his travels in 1701 to cities in Chile, including Quillota, Polpaico, Tiltill, and Limache. From 1712 to 1720, he was the director of the Calubco and Nahuelhuapi missions. Ten years later, he witnessed the earthquake that destroyed the city of Concepción. In the course of his travels, Olivares studied the Jesuit archives and, beginning in 1736, while in Santiago, began to compile his history.

From 1740 to 1758, Olivares served in the Araucanía missions. Like the earlier Jesuit historian of Chile, Diego de ROSALES, he learned the language of the natives and continued writing.

When Charles III issued a decree exiling the Jesuits, Olivares, by then an old man, was obliged to leave the country. On his way through Lima, he encountered more misfortune when the viceroy had his manuscripts confiscated. After reaching Imola in Italy, he petitioned for their return. The king himself responded favorably by ordering that the histories be sent to Spain, but Olivares died before they arrived in Madrid.

Compared to Rosales, Olivares was more attentive to the details of life around him. Through careful and precise observation, he describes the beliefs and customs he encountered firsthand.

Olmedo, José Joaquín (1780–1847) poet
José Joaquín Olmedo was born in Guayaquil, in the then-Spanish colony of Ecuador, to a Spanish father and Ecuadorean mother. He studied law and became a civil servant and politician, holding several governmental posts in Spain and the newly liberated Ecuador. He was instrumental in the liberation of Ecuador and its establishment as a separate country, and when Ecuador had gained its independence from Spain in 1830, he became the country's first vice president.

Olmedo is known as a neoclassical poet, and his poems were highly praised during his lifetime. His long poem La victoria de Junín (The Victory of Junín, 1825) celebrates the famous South American liberator Simón Bolívar, a compatriot and comrade of Olmedo. The following passage illustrates its heroic tone:

So in the centuries of courage and glory where the lone warrior and the poet were worthy of honor and memory.

Olmedo's poems were published first in Obras poéticas (Poetical Works, 1848) and again in Poesías completas (Complete Poems, 1947). His inspirational outlook remains influential. Unfortunately, English translations of his works are not in print.

A Work about José Joaquín Olmedo

Harvey, Robert. Liberators: Latin America's Struggle for Independence 1810–1830. New York: Overlook Press, 2000.

Orléans, Charles d' (1394–1465) poet
Charles d'Orléans was born in the midst of the Hundred Years' War. His mother, Valentina Visconti, was the daughter of the duke of Milan, and his father, Louis d'Orléans, was the brother of King Charles VI. As a youth he was exposed to the tradition of French lyrical poetry through his father's patronage of such artists as Jean FROISSART and Christine de PISAN. D'Orléans's first poetic effort was The Retinue of Love, an imitation of the allegorical style (see ALLEGORY) of the courtly love poetry inherited from the southern troubadours and developed by Jean de Meun.

Captured by the English king at the Battle of Agincourt in 1415, d'Orléans was held hostage at a series of English castles for 25 years. With only books, servants, and visits, as well as messages from friends in France to amuse him, d'Orléans turned to writing poetry. Though a great number of his poems draw on the formulaic images and language of the courtly love motif, the themes of solitude and imprisonment add an original and introspective touch to the poetry he composed during his exile. By the time of his release in 1440, he had written another long narrative poem called Dream in the Form of a Complaint, a collection of carols, more than 86 songs, and almost 100 ballads. Two manuscripts of these works exist, the English version containing elements not found in the French.

Following failed efforts to negotiate peace between England and France and to restore properties taken from him during his imprisonment, d'Orléans retired to Blois, where he led a court known for its poetic activity and lively entertainment. He continued composing poetry, largely in the form of the rondeau, and mentored several younger poets, among them François VILLON. The wry humor and cynicism of the aging d'Orléans mark his later poems. As a whole the body of his work demonstrates the evolution of French poetry from the highly stylized patterns of the later Middle Ages to the observations of direct experience and inward thought that signaled the HUMANISM of the RENAISSANCE.

An English Version of Works by Charles d'Orléans

Fox, John. The Lyric Poetry of Charles d'Orléans. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1969.

A Work about Charles d'Orléans

McLeod, Enid. Charles of Orleans: Prince and Poet. New York: Viking Press, 1970.

Ozerov, Vladislav Aleksandrovich

(1769–1816) dramatist

Vladislav Aleksandrovich Ozerov was born and raised in Russia. He graduated at the top of his class from a military school and, once in military service, participated in several campaigns. Ozerov's literary tastes were hugely influenced by 17th- and 18th-century French literature, which he read in great quantities. As a consequence, he wrote his first poems in French.

Ozerov's first works were odes and fables, which, while they showed the extent of his familiarity with the French traditions, were not considered unduly remarkable. His first TRAGEDY, Death of Oleg Drevlianskii, staged in St. Petersburg in 1798, did not bring its author any considerable recognition, either. Great success, however, followed his second tragedy, Oedipus in Athens. Ozerov did not read Greek, so he borrowed his Oedipus not from the classical dramatist Sophocles, but from the French playwright Dussie. This altered the entire tone of tragedy, forgoing all the antique solemnity. Ozerov's Oedipus is not a severe, fate-driven king but a weak, sensitive, forgiving old man.

Ozerov's most acclaimed tragedy was Fingal. His interpretation of the plot, borrowed from the poems of Ossian, concentrated on the contradiction between the vicious, plotting character of Swaran and the pure, sincere love of Fingal and Moïna. The tragedy was deeply touching and evoked storms of emotion among audiences.

Ozerov's fame reached its zenith in 1807, when his tragedy Dmitrii Donskoi was staged. The work with its patriotic themes roused the loyalties of its Russian audiences, who were feeling particularly nationalistic due to the war with Napoleon. The elements of a touching love story combined with lofty heroism never failed to produce a thunderstorm of applause.

Historically speaking, Ozerov is mainly known as the dramatist who brought the elements of sentimentality into Russian tragedy, while strictly following the formal canons of pseudo-classical drama.

P

Paine, Thomas (1737–1809) journalist, essayist, pamphleteer

Thomas Paine, one of the most influential revolutionary writers of the modern era, was born into a British family of modest means. At the Thetford Grammar School, the inquisitive young boy studied mathematics, science, and poetry. Paine was particularly fond of John MILTON and John Bunyan, authors known for their radical perspectives on politics and religion. At age 13, however, Frances and Joseph Paine, members of the working class, withdrew their only child from school so that he could become apprenticed to his father, a corset maker. Paine went along with the decision but eventually escaped his obligations by running off to sea and working as a privateer. Over the years, he found employment selling tobacco products, teaching school, and serving as an exciseman (a governmental employee who imposed taxes on domestic commodities).

At 37 years of age, Paine made a decision that was to have momentous consequences: He resolved to go to America. A letter of introduction from Benjamin FRANKLIN, whom he had met earlier, served him well. In 1774, after a difficult voyage on the London Packet, Paine arrived in Philadelphia, the city founded by Quaker William Penn, and was soon employed by a local printer. A year later, he was appointed editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine, a publication that flourished under his direction. The man who had spent years struggling just to eke out a living finally discovered a professional niche for himself.

Paine did more than edit articles submitted to the magazine; he also became a journalist and essayist. In Thomas Paine: Firebrand of the Revolution, Harvey J. Kaye observes that “the paradox of . . . black bondage in the midst of a prosperous, liberty-loving, and spiritual people astounded him” and inspired him to write “African Slavery in America” (1775), an article that advocated abolition.

Paine also found himself becoming increasingly critical of the ways in which Great Britain wielded its authority over the colonies. He expressed his outrage in Common Sense (1776), a pamphlet that Thomas Gustafson, in Representative Words: Politics, Literature, and the American Language, 1776–1865, argues effected a “transformation in the terms of the political debate between Britain and the Colonies.”

In American Crisis (1776), a series of 13 pamphlets Paine composed during the American Revolution, he continued to probe issues related to the quest for liberty. In the first of these leaflets, Paine writes of how these are “times that try men’s souls,” and he declares that those who do not “shrink from the service of this country” deserve the “love and thanks of man and woman” for having fought against the tyrannical rule of the British. Legend has it that selections from this particular booklet were read to George Washington’s troops in order to bolster their spirits as they prepared for an attack on the oppressor.

In 1787 Paine returned to England and turned his attention to writing Rights of Man (1791–92). In part one, he expressed his support of the French Revolution and challenged the idea of hereditary monarchy. In part two, he extended his argument to include the problem of inequalities based on social class. Paine held that “something must be wrong in the system of government” when we see, “in countries that are called civilized,” the aged being sent “to the workhouse and [the] youth to the gallows.” “Why is it,” he asked, “that scarcely any are executed but the poor?” Kaye explains that Paine wanted the government to “provide income to the poor and special relief to families with children; pensions for the elderly; public funding of education; financial support for newly married couples and new mothers; funeral expenses for the working poor; and job centers to address unemployment.”

Rights of Man met with immediate success: More than 50,000 copies of it were sold within a month of its first publication. Conservative forces, however, were quick to condemn the work, and they claimed his work was treasonous libel. Paine never attended his trial. Instead, he fled to France, where he attained citizenship and celebrity-like status for having so boldly defended the country’s cause. Yet when he objected to the execution of King Louis XVI, who as Kaye points out, had “corresponded and conspired with France’s enemies,” he found himself imprisoned. Fortunately, an American ambassador granted him American citizenship and promised to assist him in traveling back to New York.

The last decades of Paine’s life were not easy ones, and he died, impoverished, in 1809.

Critical Analysis

Common Sense, a pamphlet in which Paine called for the inhabitants of America to separate from Britain, is without a doubt Paine’s most significant work. The pamphlet was extraordinarily popular. Within a year of its publication, nearly half a million copies were sold. Kaye remarks that Paine “sought no material rewards” from his booklet: He “declined all royalties, insisting that any profits due him be used to purchase mittens for Washington’s troops.”

In a letter Paine wrote toward the end of his life, he explained that the “motive and object in” all of his “political works” was “to rescue man from tyranny and false systems and false principles of government, and enable him to be free.” Paine’s genius lay in the way he recognized the extent to which language and thinking could be used to either enslave or liberate humankind. In “Reflections on Titles” (1775), for instance, he analyzes the influence that “high sounding names” have on different types of people. The “reasonable freeman,” he explains, “sees through the magic of a title, and examines the man before he approves him.” Paine claimed, however, that titles “overawe the superstitious vulgar, and forbid them to inquire into the character of the possessor.” He went on to declare that “this sacrifice of common sense is the certain badge which distinguishes slavery from freedom: for when men yield up the privilege of thinking, the last shadow of liberty quits the horizon.” In the first chapter of Common Sense, Paine builds on his earlier critique of titles in order to challenge the concepts of monarchical rule and the hereditary succession of power. He argues that while “male and female are the distinctions of nature, good and bad the distinctions of heaven,” there exist “no truly natural or religious reason” behind the “distinction of men into KINGS AND SUBJECTS.” “That difference,” as Gustafson observes, has been “created by words and by words alone or by words enforced by fraud and brute force.” Denouncing the British form of government was just the first step Paine took in his effort to release the linguistic and mental shackles that bound the colonies to Britain.

In the second and most important chapter, Paine engages in a revolutionary analysis of the specific terms that had been used to describe the relationship between Britain and the colonies. Britain had long been considered the parent country and the colonies her children. As Gustafson notes, debates centered on “whether it was time for Britain to fulfill its role by ending its protection and granting the colonies their independence or whether the colonies were still obliged to be obedient.” Drawing upon his “common sense,” Paine declares:

Europe, and not England, is the parent country of America. This new world hath been the asylum for the persecuted lovers of civil and religious liberty from every part of Europe. Hither have they fled, not from the tender embraces of the mother, but from the cruelty of the monster; and it is so far true of England, that the same tyranny which drove the first emigrants from home, pursues their descendents still.

In this passage, according to Gustafson, we can see how Paine renounced as “misapplications” the “very words that had defined the relationship between the colonies and Britain.” The rulers of Britain had used—or abused—language in order to perpetuate their control over the colonies. Paine, on the other hand, demonstrated to the colonists how they could employ language for other, more liberating purposes.

The reading public was ready to hear what Paine had to say. As Kaye remarks, Common Sense “transformed the colonial rebellion into a war for independence” by harnessing the Americans’ “shared (but as yet unstated) thoughts” and communicating them in language that was “bold and clear.”

Other Works by Thomas Paine

Age of Reason. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2004.

American Crisis. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2004.

Common Sense. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2004.

Rights of Man. Introduction by David Taffel. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2004.

Thomas Paine: Collected Writings. New York: Library of America, 1995.

Works about Thomas Paine

Gustafson, Thomas. Representative Words: Politics, Literature, and the American Language, 1776–1865. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Kaye, Harvey J. Thomas Paine: Firebrand of the Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Keane, John. Tom Paine: A Political Life. New York: Grove/Atlantic, 2003.

McLeese, Don. Thomas Paine. Vero Beach, Fla.: Rourke Publishing, 2004.

Parini, Giuseppe (1729–1799) poet

Giuseppe Parini was born in Bosisio, a small village near Milan, Italy. His father later moved the family to Milan so that Giuseppe could acquire a formal education. Parini began writing poetry under the anagram of Ripano Eupilino and published Some Verses by Ripano Eupilino in 1752, which won him a place in the selective Academy of the Transformed in Milan.

In 1754 Parini was ordained as a priest and eventually became a tutor in the Serbelloni family, a post that pleased him only in that it provided material for his Dialogue on Nobility (1762), in which the corpses of a nobleman and a poet converse on the true nature of nobility. The publication of “Morning” and “Midday” in 1763, his poetic satire on the aristocracy later collected as The Day, improved Parini’s circumstances. He became a professor of literature at the Palatine School, and one of his plays, Ascanio in Alba, was put to music by Mozart and performed as an opera in 1771. During the French occupation, Parini reluctantly held a government post but was said to have distributed his stipend among the poor in protest of Bonaparte’s rule.

Parini also published his Odes (1795) and several literary treatises, including a tract on aesthetics, Principles of Literature (1801), but The Day is his most accomplished work. In the form of a mock EPIC similar to Alexander POPE's The Rape of the Lock, The Day chronicles the daily routine of an idle fop as though his activities were heroic deeds. The poem's satire skewered the Milanese aristocracy, exposing the elaborate and superficial rituals of fashionable society by using the dandified nature of its hero.

After Parini's death, "Evening" and "Night" were found among his papers, and the first complete edition of The Day was published in Milan in 1801. Its elegant verse, playful tone, and sharp insights into the follies of the idle life provided a model for later poets who, following Parini's lead, hoped to use laughter to arouse shame and curb error.

An English Version of a Work by Giuseppe Parini

The Day: Morning, Midday, Evening, and Night.
Translated by Herbert Morris Bower. Westport, Conn.: Hyperion Press, 1978.

Works about Giuseppe Parini

Griffiths, C. E. J., and R. Hastings, eds. The Cultural Heritage of the Italian Renaissance. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993.

Tusiani, Joseph. "Giuseppe Parini, Poet of Education." Paideia 3, no. 1 (1974): 26–33.

Pascal, Blaise (1623–1662) scientist, mathematician, theologian

The 17th century was a time of tremendous intellectual activity in many different fields. The scientific revolution was in full swing and many of Europe's leading minds were turning their attention to the mysteries of the physical world. At the same time, scholars and philosophers were debating profound questions of religion and ethics. Among the great thinkers who emerged during this period was the French genius, Blaise Pascal.

Pascal was born in the town of Clermont. His mother died when he was only three, and he was raised almost entirely by his father, Étienne Pascal, who was a moderately prosperous civil servant.

Etienne devoted himself to the education of his son, and moved the family to Paris in 1631. Rather than rely on uncertain tutors, Etienne himself took the largest responsibility for the teaching of his son. Under the tutelage of his father, Pascal soon proved to be a mathematical prodigy. Through his father, Pascal was introduced to a group known as the Académie Mersenne, which contained some of the leading mathematical minds in Paris.

The Pascal family moved to the city of Rouen in 1639. A few years later, Pascal invented a machine that could do mathematical calculations. This invention was widely admired by many of the intellectual elite of France, although it was never manufactured on a large scale. Pascal also engaged in scientific work, conducting experiments in an attempt to discover the nature of a vacuum. In 1640, when he was still a teenager, he published an essay titled "Essai sur les coniques," which dealt with highly complicated geometrical problems. Although he was still quite young, it had become clear that he possessed great intellectual abilities.

Also during the years in Rouen, Pascal came under the influence of the religious sect known as the Jansenists. The Jansenists followed an unconventional form of Catholicism but, unlike the Protestant sects, remained nominally loyal to the Roman Catholic Church. The effect of Jansenist teachings turned Pascal's attention toward religious matters, although he also remained extremely interested in mathematical and scientific subjects.

Pascal returned to Paris in 1647, intending to devote himself to serious academic studies. On two occasions, he met the famous French scientist and philosopher, Rene DESCARTES. Pascal published a work entitled Expériences Nouvelles, in which he describes many of his ideas concerning physics. It was well received by the scientific thinkers of Paris. During all this time, Pascal engaged in academic debates, in which he distinguished himself, with some of the foremost intellectuals of the day.

The more time he spent in Paris, the more attracted he became to its frivolous and lighthearted lifestyle. Paris was, at this time, the most cultured and refined city in the world, with innumerable pleasurable distractions. Gradually, Pascal began spending more of his time in idle social amusements than in doing his work. His fondness for social interaction conflicted with his religious beliefs and desire to make intellectual contributions. On November 23, 1654, he apparently had an intense religious experience, during which he renounced his social lifestyle and resolved to devote himself to religion.

After his experience, Pascal moved to the Jansenist convent of Port-Royal, although he did not take holy orders to become a monk. From then on, he lived an austere life, thinking and writing on religious and mathematical subjects, until his death eight years later.

In his first literary effort after his 1654 experience, Pascal became involved in disputes between the Jansenists and the Jesuit order. A Jansenist professor, Antoine Arnauld, has been criticized by the Jesuits for his views. Pascal wrote out a spirited defense of Arnauld titled Lettres Provinciales. Using both logical and moral arguments, Pascal refuted the attacks of the Jesuits, while criticizing them for their biased attitude toward the Jansenists.

During this time, Pascal engaged in other literary battles in defense of Jansenism and was preparing a complete defense of the Christian religion in general. He also wrote on the subject of miracles, which was in stark contrast to the developing scientific and rational atmosphere of the age.

In the late 1650s, Pascal began writing the fragments of work that would later be put together to form his most famous and influential work, the Pensées, or Thoughts. He was, however, in extremely poor health, and the intellectual energy that had once characterized his work was beginning to fade. On August 19, 1662, at age 39, Pascal died in the home of his sister.

Critical Analysis

The most famous of Pascal's works is the Pensées, which were written in patchy form in the last few years of his life. Technically, it is not a book at all, but simply a collection of scattered fragments in which he jotted his thoughts on religious matters.

He had intended to unify these disconnected pieces into a comprehensive defense of the Christian religion, but this project was still incomplete when he died.

Despite its incompleteness and lack of organization, the Pensées remains a masterpiece of theological thought. Some of Pascal's arguments, such as the discussion of prophecies and miracles, had been used by many theologians before him. But the most innovative and influential idea presented in the work was quite original. It is known as "Pascal's Wager."

Pascal presents the idea that accepting Christianity might not appear reasonable to a rational person, but neither can it appear unreasonable. Therefore, a rational person should accept Christianity for the following reason. If a person accepts Christianity and Christianity is true, the rewards for the person are infinite, but if a person accepts Christianity and Christianity is not true, the person loses nothing. On the other hand, if a person rejects Christianity and Christianity is true, the person faces the penalties of damnation, while if a person rejects Christianity and Christianity is not true, he has gained nothing. For all these reasons, Pascal argues, a reasonable person should accept Christianity.

This argument has certain flaws. For example, it does not take into account the existence of other religions, simply presenting the choice as being between Christianity and atheism. Furthermore, the idea of choosing salvation entirely for reasons of self-interest has been criticized by many theologians. Nevertheless, Pascal's Wager became an important part of theological thought.

Although his life was comparatively short, Pascal made great contributions to a variety of fields. The clarity of his style made a significant impact on the French language. He was an excellent mathematician and significantly advanced the study of geometry. His scientific work, though overshadowed by such scientists as Isaac Newton and Galileo GALILEI, was also quite important. However, it is in the subjects of theology and religion that the true importance of Pascal's work remains. Although Jansenism has disappeared, Pascal's work in defense of the sect caused him to devise some of the most important theological arguments of the 17th century. Furthermore, the ideas contained in the Pensees influence religious thought to the present day.

English Versions of Works by Blaise Pascal

Contradictions, Oppositions and Denials in the Life of the Mind. Albuquerque, N.M.: American Classical College Press, 1987.

Mind on Fire: A Faith for the Skeptical and Indifferent.

Edited by James M. Houston. Vancouver, B.C.: Regent College Publishing, 2003.

Pensées. Translated by W. F. Trotter. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2003.

Provincial Letters. Eugene, Ore.: Wipf and Stock Publishers, 1997.

The Gospel of the Gospels. Torino, Italy: Allemandi, Umberto & Company, 2000.

Works about Blaise Pascal

Davidson, Hugh M. Blaise Pascal. Boston: Twayne, 1983.

Ludwin, Dawn M. Blaise Pascal's Quest for the Ineffable. New York: Peter Lang, 2001.

O'Connell, Marvin R., et al. Blaise Pascal: Reasons of the Heart. Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdmans, 1997.

Shea, William R. Designing Experiments and Games of Chance: The Unconventional Science of Blaise Pascal. Sagamore Beach, Mass.: Watson Publishing, 2003.

pastoral (200s B.C.–A.D. 1800s)

Named after the Latin word pastor, meaning "shepherd," pastorals are poems that idealize rustic, country life and feature shepherds and other rural persons. Typically, the shepherds of these poems speak in elevated language and dress in a manner above their status. The first pastorals were penned by Theocritus (ca. 310–ca. 250 B.C.) in his Idylls.

Pastorals are organized according to three main groups: monologues, eclogues, and laments. Pastoral monologues are poems praising or complaining about a particular person; eclogues are those poems involving the notion of a singing contest; and laments mourn a dead loved one.

The pastoral style has contributed to the creation of other literary forms, including the pastoral drama, pastoral romance, and pastoral elegy. Pastoral dramas developed in RENAISSANCE Italy and emerged thereafter in England. Aminta by the Italian Torquato TASSO, is an example of the form, as is William SHAKESPEARE's play As You Like It.

Pastoral romances are stories written in prose that involve characters with pastoral names, such as Cuddie, Colin, and Meliboeus, and feature complicated plotlines interspersed with songs. Examples of pastoral romances include the Italian romance Ameto by Giovanni BOCCACCIO, Arcadia by Sir Philip SIDNEY of England, and Diana enamorada by the Spanish writer Jorge de Montemayor.

Pastoral elegies evolved from Virgil's models of traditional pastorals, as seen in his Eclogues. In a pastoral elegy, the speaker of the poem, usually a shepherd-poet, asks a muse for inspiration, mourns the loss of a fellow shepherd-poet, criticizes the dead shepherd's guardians (usually nymphs) for their neglect, introduces a procession of fellow mourners, questions divine providence, and offers a closing consolation. This formula is referred to as Conventions and can best be seen in John MILTON's "Lycidas."

See also Christopher MARLOWE.

English Versions of Pastorals

Pope, Alexander. Pastoral Poetry and an Essay on Criticism. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1961.

Theocritus. Idylls. Translated by Richard Hunter and Anthony Verity. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Virgil. The Eclogues of Virgil. Translated by David Ferry. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2000.

Works about Pastorals

Empson, William. Some Versions of Pastoral. London: Chatto and Windus, 1935.

Greg, W. W. Pastoral Poetry and Pastoral Drama: A Literary Inquiry. New York: Russell and Russell, 1959.

Metzger, Lore. One Foot in Eden: Modes of Pastoral in Romantic Poetry. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986.

Rosenmeyer, Thomas G. Green Cabinet: Theocritus and European Pastoral Poetry. London: Bristol Classic Press, 2003.

Pearl poet (1300s) poet

The identity of the Pearl poet remains unknown, but he is attributed with the writing of four Middle English poems: Pearl, Patience, Purity (or Cleanness), and SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT, all composed in the latter half of the 14th century and written down around 1400. The poet's work suggests that he was well read, perhaps trained as a clerk, and he was acquainted with life in the higher social classes. Though he lived at the same time as CHAUCER and LANGLAND, he seems not to have been influenced by them. The Pearl poet was more at home in the countryside and traditions of northern and western Britain and had little to do with the fashionable circles of London.

The Pearl poet was part of the Alliterative Revival, which involved a resurgence of interest in earlier English heroic themes and the style of alliterative verse, which uses frequent repetition of sound for musical effect. His use of scripture proves the poet knew the Latin Bible, and the motif of the allegorical dream-vision along with the stanza formats and rhyme schemes are inherited from French tradition.

The plot of Pearl is simple: The narrator, sorrowing over the grave of his two-year-old daughter, has a vision in which she appears to him. His address to her conveys his sorrow:

“O Pearl!” said I, “in pearls arrayed,
Are you my pearl whose loss I mourn?
Lament alone by night I made. . . .”

As the poem proceeds, the young girl converses with the narrator about the joys of heaven and the errors of human grief. She grants him a glimpse of Paradise, which so excites him that, when he tries to join her, he is rudely awakened.

Composed in an intricate rhyme pattern, the poem uses the image of the pearl on multiple levels to represent the young girl, the delights of paradise, and the wisdom of Christian understanding. The poem is at once an elegy for the daughter, a consolation for loss, and an illumination of Christian doctrine, rendered in an artistic unity that makes it a work of singular beauty in the canon of Middle English literature.

Works by the Pearl Poet

The Complete Works of the Pearl Poet. Translated by Casey Finch and edited by Malcolm Andrew and C. Peterson. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

The Pearl Poem in Middle and Modern English. Edited by William Vantuono. New York: University Press of America, 1987.

Works about the Pearl Poet

Moorman, Charles. The Pearl-Poet. New York: Twayne, 1968.

Rhodes, James Francis. Poetry Does Theology: Chaucer, Grosseteste, and the Pearl-Poet. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 2001.

Pepys, Samuel (1633–1703) diarist

Samuel Pepys (pronounced “peeps”) was born in 1633, the fifth of 11 children of a tailor, John Pepys. He attended Magdalene College, Cambridge, on a scholarship, receiving his bachelor's degree in 1654. He secured a job as secretary to his relative Sir Edward Montagu, and the following year married 15-year-old Elizabeth St. Michel.

In 1660 Pepys began his Diary. He wrote in code, solely for his own enjoyment. He begins with the adventure of going to sea with his employer, Sir Edward Montagu, to escort Charles Stuart from Holland for his coronation as King Charles II (since the execution of Charles I in 1649 England had been without a king). On the return journey from Holland, Pepys heard the king's stories of his flight from the army that destroyed his father:

It made me ready to weep to hear the stories that he told. . . . As his traveling four days and three nights on foot, every step up to the knees in dirt . . . with nothing but a green coat and a pair of country breeches on and a pair of country shoes, that made him so sore all over his feet that he could scarce stir.

Soon after the royal party's arrival in London, Pepys was appointed to an administrative job in the Royal Navy Dockyards; he served the navy for the rest of his working life.

In 1661 Pepys observed the coronation of Charles II. Pepys's description of this day is so detailed that he even includes the memory of desperately needing an outhouse and of sneaking into the banquet hall to get a bit of food from the tables. Pepys admits to drinking too much that night, and vomiting as a result.

Pepys's journal is full of accounts of parties where the wine flows freely. He is something of a womanizer, and writes of his adventures with women quite freely, yet his affairs do not alienate the reader; rather, they allow Pepys to be seen as a believable, real person. His tender regard for his wife is convincing too, as well as his pride in her beauty.

Pepys loved the theater, and the diary is an important source of information about the theatrical scene in Restoration London. He was intellectually curious and was friends with many of the important thinkers of his day, whose conversations can be reconstructed through his records.

His career was another focus of the Diary. Pepys advanced through the ranks of the navy by being a sharp observer, both of the people he worked with and what needed to be done. Pepys's meticulous journal-keeping may have given him skills that helped him do well professionally.

In 1665 he recorded London's terrible epidemic of bubonic plague:

This day, much against my Will, I did in Drury-lane, see two or three houses marked with a red cross upon the doors, and "Lord have mercy upon us" writ there; which was a sad sight to me. . . . It put me into an ill conception of myself and my smell, so that I was forced to buy some roll-tobacco to smell and to chew, which took away the apprehension.

One-fourth of the population of London was killed by the plague.

The next year another tragedy struck London: the Great Fire. Strong easterly winds and a summer drought culminated in the worst destruction the city would see until the Blitz of 1940. Pepys's birthplace was destroyed, but his home and office were spared. He admits he was "much terrified in the nights . . ., with dreams of fire and falling down of houses."

In 1669 Pepys discontinued his diary because he feared that his eyesight was failing. His wife died of a fever the next year, but Pepys lived for another 34 years, achieving considerable rank in the navy and winning an enviable sociable position. In 1684 he was made president of the Royal Society. His friend John Evelyn described him as "universally beloved, hospitable, generous, learned in many things, skilled in music, a very great treasurer of learned men."

Pepys bequeathed his diary to his alma mater, Magdalene College, but it was not deciphered until the 19th century; an edited version was published in 1825, and the full diary of almost 4,000 pages in 1893. One of Pepys's most famous admirers was the novelist Robert Louis Stevenson (1850–94), who notes Pepys's sincerity:

He was not unconscious of his errors—far from it; he was often startled into shame, often reformed, often made and broke his vows of change. But whether he did ill or well, he was still his own unequalled self; still that entrancing ego of whom alone he cared to write. . . . He shows himself throughout a sterling humanist. Indeed, he who loves himself, not in idle vanity, but with a plenitude of knowledge, is the best equipped of all to love his neighbors.

Works by Samuel Pepys

Particular Friends: The Correspondence of Samuel Pepys and John Evelyn. Edited by Guy de la Bedoyere. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell and Brewer, 1997.

The Diary of Samuel Pepys (Abridged). Edited by Richard Le Gallienne. New York: Random House, 2003.

Works about Samuel Pepys

Coote, Stephen. Samuel Pepys. New York: Palgrave, 2001.

Taylor, Ivan E. Samuel Pepys. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

Tomalin, Claire. Samuel Pepys: The Unequalled Self. New York: Vintage, 2003.

Peralta Barnuevo, Pedro de (1664–1743) poet, dramatist, scholar

The Peruvian scholar Pedro de Peralta Barnuevo produced more than 80 works covering a diverse range of subjects, including history, religion, medicine, literature, astronomy, and military engineering.

Born in Lima, Peralta was a Criollo or Creole, the name given to persons of Spanish origin born in the colonies. After studying law at the University of San Marcos, he became professor of mathematics and later rector of that institution.

From 1718 to 1743 Peralta held the office of cosmographer, completing Conocimientos de los Tiempos, begun in 1680 by his predecessor, Juan Ramón Koenig. Peralta also served as chief engineer of Peru and comptroller of the audiencia, or tribunal, of Lima. When the ancient wall of Callao was destroyed by the earthquake of 1687, it was Peralta who devised plans for its reconstruction.

Among his literary works for the stage are a number of plays in the baroque style. They include comedies such as Triunfo de amor y muerte (The Triumph of Love and Death, 1710) and Afectos vencen finezas (Affections Conquer Finenesses, 1720). His tragedy La Rodoguna (1710) shows the influence of the French playwright CORNEILLE.

Fluent in six languages, Peralta could write poetry in each of them. Perhaps the best known of his poetic works is the epic Lima fundada o conquista del Peru (The Founding of Lima or Conquest of Peru, 1732), which deals with the life of Pizarro. His other major work of poetry was Pasión y triunfo de Cristo (Passion and Triumph of Christ, 1737).

Until 1730, when he published Historia de España vindicada, Peralta's work reflected a European worldview. With Lima fundada, however, he began to target a Criollo readership. Like many Criollos, Peralta was dissatisfied with the political and cultural censorship exercised by Spain over its colonies.

In Diálogo de los muertos: la causa académica (Dialogue of the Dead: The Academic Case), modeled on the Roman satirist Lucian, Peralta ridiculed the institutions with which he had been associated as an official. While he did not break completely with traditional Spanish culture, he nonetheless began to articulate a Criollo viewpoint from which later radical intellectuals would develop a distinct Latin American identity.

English Versions of Works by Pedro de Peralta Barnuevo

Censorship and Art in Pre-Enlightenment Lima: Pedro de Peralta Barnuevo's Dialogo de Las Muertos: La Causa Academica. Translated by Jerry M. Williams. Madrid, Spain: Scripta Humanistica, 1994.

Peralta Barnuevo and the Discourse of Loyalty: A Critical Edition of Four Selected Texts. Translated by Jerry M. Williams. Phoenix: Arizona State University, Center for Latin American Studies, 1997.

A Work about Pedro de Peralta Barnuevo

Hill, Ruth Ann. Sceptres and Sciences in the Spains: Four Humanists and the New Philosophy. Liverpool, U.K.: Liverpool University Press, 2000.

Perrault, Charles (1628–1703) poet, fiction writer

The son of Pierre Perrault, a magistrate in the Paris Parlement, Charles Perrault received a law degree in 1651. In 1662 he became a member of the Petite Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, and in that capacity designed and wrote inscriptions for the palaces of the Louvre and Versailles. In 1672 he married Marie Guichon and had three children.

In 1671 Perrault was elected to the ACADEMIE FRANÇAISE. He resigned his government post in 1682, however, to dedicate his life to writing. He described his public life in his Mémoires, which remained unpublished until the 19th century. His other works include Parallèle des Anciens et des Modernes (1688–97), in which he claimed that modern writers were superior to ancient classical authors, and the poem “Le Siècle de Louis le Grand” (1687), in which he claimed the age of Louis XIV should have a Christian culture distinct from that of the ancient world.

Perrault also authored numerous fairy tales, including “Cinderella,” “Sleeping Beauty” and “Puss in Boots.” He originally titled his collection Contes de ma Mère l’oye, or Tales of Mother Goose (1697), a traditional French expression for folktales. They became immensely popular in France and first appeared in English in 1729.

Perrault based many of his tales on earlier stories, including works by Italian writers Basile and Straparola, contributing his own elegant and witty style to each. “Little Red Riding Hood,” however, is said to be a Perrault original.

The settings of the tales are contemporary, and each comes with a stated or implied moral. The setting, for instance, in “Sleeping Beauty” is a palace with a hall of mirrors resembling the one at Versailles. And, according to Perrault, the moral of the story is that, while it is a fine thing to wait 100 years for the right husband, “we can no longer find a girl who would sleep so tranquilly.”

Perrault said that he wrote the Contes as moral tales for children, but he also intended them to be modern works that could be appreciated by a sophisticated, adult audience. As Jeanne Morgan Zarucchi notes, Perrault wrote “one of the handful of works whose message is accessible to later generations, and whose readership crosses barriers of time and nationality.”

An English Version of Works by Charles Perrault

Cinderella, Puss in Boots, and Other Favorite Tales as told by Charles Perrault. Translated by A. E. Johnson. New York: Abrams, 2000.

A Work about Charles Perrault

Zarucchi, Morgan, Jeanne. Perrault’s Morals for Moderns. New York: Peter Lang, 1985.

Petrarch (Francesco Petrarco)

(1304–1374) poet

Petrarch was born at Arezzo, in Tuscany. The young poet who later signed his works “Petrarca” grew up in Marseilles, France, studying Latin grammar and rhetoric. In 1316 his father sent him to the University of Montpellier to study law, but Francesco was more interested in reading Latin classics. When his father attempted to burn the books he felt were wasting his son’s time, young Francesco protested so loudly that his father reached into the fire to rescue his two favorites: Virgil and the Rhetorics of Cicero.

After his father’s death in 1326, Petrarch abandoned the legal profession and returned home to write. A pivotal moment of his life took place on April 6, 1327, when he saw and instantly fell in love with a young woman whom he called Laura. Although the two never married, the poems he wrote for her completely transformed the genre of lyrical poetry, ensuring Petrarch’s fame.

Petrarch moved to Vaucluse to devote himself to a solitary life of study, correspondence with close companions, and the writing of both Latin and Italian poetry and prose. In 1341 he was crowned poet laureate at Rome, a coveted honor. He began to study the Greek language and found inspiration in the Greek ideals of philosophy and literature. In 1348 the Black Plague swept Italy, claiming the lives of thousands, including his beloved Laura, which lent a deep melancholy to Petrarch's poetry. In 1350 he received a letter from an admirer named Giovanni BOCCACCIO, and a life-long friendship began.

A restless spirit all his life, beginning works and then putting them aside or finishing them and not sending them to their intended recipients, Petrarch traveled frequently throughout his life. He lived successively in Milan, Padua, and Verona, Italy, and in his later years turned to revising, editing, and collecting his finished works. He died at Arqua at age 70.

For Petrarch, his contentment with the quiet serenity of solitary life vied constantly with his desire to travel and be of use to others. A peaceful soul, he lived in a century characterized by famine, plague, and the advent of the Hundred Years' War. Poets tended to see it as a century of moral decline and looked with nostalgia to the Golden Age of classical times. Though he loved the voices from the past and addressed letters to some of his favorites, including Seneca and Horace, Petrarch delighted in the artists of his own time, including Dante and Boccaccio. Standing between the Middle Ages and the RENAISSANCE, and at the forefront of Italian HUMANISM, Petrarch reaches us as the voice of one man feeling the greatness within and around him and captivated by the simplest moments of life.

While most famous as the plaintive lover of the Canzoniere (the Lyrical Poems, also called the Rhymes), Petrarch tried his hand at a variety of works, including a scholarly edition of Livy's Decades. In 1337 he began On Illustrious Men, a series of biographies he later extended to include Old Testament and Christian heroes as well as those of classical antiquity. He also wrote a series of Triumphs, designed as allegorical contemplations on Love, Chastity, Death, Fame, Time, and Eternity.

In 1343 Petrarch began the Secretum (Secret Book), modeled on a work he adored, the Confessions of Augustine. In these soul-searchings composed as a dialogue between two characters named Petrarch and Augustine, the distressed poet analyzes his sins and imagines himself bound by two golden chains: his love for Laura and his desire for glory. His other works included On the Life of Solitude (1346), addressed to his friend Philippe; On Religious Leisure (1356), addressed to his brother Gherardo; and Remedies for Fortune Fair and Foul (1354). In 1367 he wrote On His Own Ignorance and That of Many Others partly to dispel rumors that he was excessively wealthy. In 1370 he composed his last will and testament.

Throughout his life, Petrarch wrote letters in verse, collected in Metrical Letters, sometimes separated as the Letters on Familiar Affairs and Letters of Riper Years. One of his most read letters is his epistle addressed to Posterity. Creating work that would survive him was one of Petrarch's life-long concerns. He could not have foreseen that his collection of Canzoniere would become one of the most influential books of Western literature, that the forms he used would be named after him (the Petrarchan SONNET), or that his style would so inspire future generations that later writers would not dare to call themselves poets unless they had thoroughly read and studied Petrarch's work.

Critical Analysis

The poems collected in the Canzoniere show an impressive range of forms: There are 317 sonnets, 29 canzoni, nine sestinas, seven ballads, and four madrigals. The metaphors and conceits that Petrarch used to create a poetic language of love have been so often imitated as to be extremely familiar to contemporary readers, but in Petrarch's time these images were refreshingly new, such as his description of love at first sight in poem 61:

*Oh blessed be the day, the month, the year,
the season and the time, the hour, the instant, the gracious countryside, the place where I was struck by those two lovely eyes that bound me.*

He goes on to describe himself as a prisoner held in bondage by the force of love, calling Laura's eyes and Laura's presence the bows and arrows of love that have wounded his heart.

In his collection of poetry, Petrarch shows an impressive depth of knowledge about the Latin tradition of poetry (he had long studied authors such as Ovid and Catullus), but he also takes advantage of the new respect for Italian writing won by his predecessor, Dante. Petrarch opposes the medieval tradition of writing solely to provide moral instruction and instead, in the poetic introduction to his works, points out that they are full of literary, moral, and other defects. The author seems to write out of a sense of deep shame and awareness of his self-absorption and vanity. Even so, he vows that the extent of his passion presses him to write, and he goes on to do so with such innovative expressions of beauty that, despite the errors, he raises the experience of heartbreak to a sublime transformation.

Throughout the Canzoniere, Petrarch explores his inner feelings in great detail, exposing the peaks of emotional ecstasy and the depths of human sincerity, looking first at the vastness of creation and then tenderly observing a single moment of wonder. The poems contain a subtle irony, revealing an author adept at describing natural works as well as accurately portraying human nature. Some critics accused Petrarch of worshiping Laura to the point of idolatry, but some felt his ability to understand and render the intricacies of human experience inspired in others a new respect for individuality and potential, a foundation of humanistic thought.

Along with Dante and Boccaccio, the other two crowns in the "three crowns of Italy," Petrarch's writing left an enduring stamp on European writers to follow. Poets such as France's Pierre de RONSARD and England's Geoffrey CHAUCER employed and elaborated on Petrarch's language of love, as did authors of the medieval romances. Significantly, Petrarch's influence is due not to his ambitious works of epic scope but to his studies of the complex and bewildering human heart. Of Petrarch's poetry, translator Mark Musa says, "the pleasure of reading the Canzoniere [comes] suddenly, from its many small revelations . . . inviting us to rage, weep, or laugh." In a modern gallery of illustrious men, Petrarch would certainly claim a place.

English Versions of Works by Petrarch

My Secret Book. Translated by J. G. Nichols. London: Hesperus Press, 2002.

Selections from the Canzoniere and Other Works. Translated by Mark Musa. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Shearer, Susan, S., ed. Petrarch: On Religious Leisure. New York: Italica Press, 2002.

Works about Petrarch

Hainsworth, Peter. Petrarch the Poet. New York: Routledge, 1988.

Petrie, Jennifer. Petrarch. Dublin: Irish Academic Press, 1983.

Reeve, Henry. Petrarch. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2002.

Robinson, James H. Petrarch: The First Modern Scholar and Man of Letters. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2003.

Pico della Mirandola, Count Giovanni

(1463–1494) poet, nonfiction writer

One of the greatest and most influential writers of the Italian RENAISSANCE, Giovanni Pico della Mirandola is celebrated for his contributions to the HUMANISM movement, which emphasized the importance of humankind in the universe and sought to reconcile or integrate the classical, pagan past with the Christian present.

Pico was born in Mirandola, a territory near Modena, Italy. He received a thorough education, including training in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic. As a result of his studies, Pico ardently believed that all philosophies and theologies contained important insights and were deserving of study. A humanist and defender of scholastic philosophy, Pico wrote several works, including Apologia, a defense of his Oration; Heptaplus, an interpretation of the Creation story in Genesis; De Ente et Uno (On Being and Unity), a philosophical work that attempts to reconcile Aristotelianism and Platonism; as well as poems in Italian and Latin.

Oration on the Dignity of Man is his most celebrated work. In it, Pico elaborates upon Marcilio Ficino's belief in humankind's universality and argues further that humans possess the freedom to choose to live however they desire. In the following passage, for example, God tells Adam:

Thou . . . art the molder and maker of thyself;
 thou mayest sculpt thyself into whatever shape thou dost prefer. Thou canst grow downward into the lower natures which are brutes. Thou canst again grow upward from thy soul's reason into the higher natures which are divine.

In this passage and in others, Pico present humans not as entities who are forced to act within a fixed hierarchy of order, but as agents free to become whatever they choose.

In his later years, Pico became increasingly concerned with conflicts between religion and philosophy, but his interest in reconciling multiple philosophies and cultural beliefs and in the importance of individual agency did not waver. His embracing of multiple viewpoints from a variety of cultures and his interest in the nature of humankind made him a model scholar for fellow humanists and for those future humanist thinkers who followed.

An English Version of a Work by Count Giovanni Pico della Mirandola

Pico Della Mirandola: On the Dignity of Man, On Being and the One, Heptaplus. Translated by Charles Glenn Wallis. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1940.

A Work about Count Giovanni Pico della Mirandola

Craven, William G. Giovanni Pico della Mirandola: Symbol of His Age: Modern Interpretations. Geneva: Libraire Droz, 1981.

Pisan, Christine de (Pizan) (ca. 1364–ca. 1431) poet, scholar

Christine de Pisan is considered one of the first professional female writers. Born in Venice to Thomas of Pisan, a physician and astrologer, the young Christine moved with her family to Paris in 1368. In 1379 she married Étienne de Castel, a royal secretary. The ascension of Charles VI in 1380 and the death of her father in 1385 caused difficulties in the family's fortunes, and then the death of her husband left Christine with three small children to support. Where most women would have remarried or entered a convent, Christine, who had received more than the usual education for women, thanks to her father, began to write. She first composed love poetry and devotional texts, and then turned to longer prose works. In 1418 she fled a collapsing political scene and lived in seclusion for 11 years. In 1429 she wrote a celebration of the life of Joan of Arc and, perhaps fortunately, did not live to see her hero betrayed and executed.

Though she composed in French, Christine's writing shows a familiarity with Latin prose and traditions. Her poetry and prose demonstrate her versatility, technical mastery, and intellectual refinement. Born at court and practiced in courtesy, she was subtle rather than revolutionary in her critiques of society, particularly its attitudes toward women. She participated in the famous quarrel over Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meun's The Romance of the Rose, which she maintained was immoral and unflattering in its representations of women. In works such as the Book of Feats of Arms and Chivalry (1410) and Book of the Three Virtues (1405), the reader can see, cunningly concealed behind her words, the outrage she felt over the way women were treated in French society. This outrage achieved its best expression in her work in defense of women most familiar to readers today, The Book of the City of Ladies (1404–05).

In this book Christine uses a popular medieval literary convention, the author's conversation with a series of allegorical figures, to celebrate the deeds of valiant women of the past. This series of revelations has the effect of highlighting the positive contributions women have made to history and challenging current stereotypes of the nature and accepted social status of women. In the City of Ladies the narrator, who is female, converses with other female characters named Reason, Justice, and Rectitude, who offer instruction to the reader in the ways of right-thinking and right action. This passage from the Book shows Christine's style, theme, and sly humor:

"After Lady Rectitude had told me all this, I answered her, 'Certainly, my lady, it seems to me an outstanding honor to the feminine sex to hear about so many excellent ladies. Everyone should be extremely pleased that, in addition to their other virtues, such great love could reside in a woman's heart. . . . Let Mathéolus and all the other prattlers who have spoken against women with such envy and falsehood go to sleep and stay quiet.'"

(II.19.1)

Scholar Maria Warner writes "The Book of the City of Ladies represents a determined and clear-headed woman's attempt to take apart the structure of her contemporaries' prejudices." Warner also observes, "Christine here is at her best as a storyteller when she writes from personal truth and emotion, and her rebukes rise from within the sting of lived experience." Though her advocating for education for women was revolutionary for her time, Christine meant only to question, not overturn, social order. Critic Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski states Christine's "dearest wishes were that women should be recognized for their true worth and be treated well," and that "people should treasure learning." Christine used her pen as a tool in a larger struggle to resist the social prejudices and pressures of her day, and her work raises questions about violence toward and treatment of women that have yet to be resolved.

English Versions of Works by Christine de Pisan

Selected Writings of Christine de Pizan. Edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski. New York: W.W. Norton, 1997.

The Book of the City of Ladies. Translated by Earl Jeffreys Richards. New York: Persea Books, 1982.

Works about Christine de Pisan

Richard, Earl Jeffreys, ed. Christine de Pizan and Medieval French Lyric. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2000.

Willard, Charity Cannon. Christine de Pizan: Her Life and Works. New York: Persea Books, 1984.

Pléiade (1549–1589)

The Pléiade was a 16th-century group of poets and critics who revolutionized French poetry. They named themselves after a group of seven Hellenistic tragic poets who flourished in Alexandria during the third century B.C. "Pleiad" is also the astronomer's name for a group of seven stars in the constellation Taurus, as well as the term referring to seven lovely mountain nymphs in Greek mythology. It is an appropriate term for the seven men who banded together to introduce classical forms and clarity to French poetry during the RENAISSANCE. The group consisted of its leader Pierre de RONSARD, and Joachim du BELLAY, Rémy Belleau, Étienne Jodelle, Pontus de Tyard, Jean-Antoine Baif, and the humanist scholar Jean Daurat.

The official manifesto of the Pléiade, La Defense et Illustration de la Langue Françoise (The Defense and Illustration of the French Language), was written by du Bellay and appeared in 1549. This work clearly demands a break from the medieval poetic traditions and forms and embraces the Renaissance rediscovery of classical models. Du Bellay demands that poets should find new themes of inspiration and create new genres based upon Greek and Latin writers. Like Dante Aligheri had argued almost 300 years before, du Bellay urges writers to use French, rather than Latin, for their serious work. However, he admits that the French language needs help in becoming as expressive as Latin or Greek and suggests that writers borrow from the two classical languages, as well as from Old French, and collect unusual words from the special vocabularies of hunting, falconry, and various handicrafts. The Pléiades introduced such important forms as the alexandrine, the sestina, and the SONNET into French poetry.

Ronsard and du Bellay were the strongest poets of the Pléiade. They not only mastered classical forms and found inspiration in classical themes, but they also used fresh, innovative language and images to capture universal human feelings that transcend cultures. Both men believed in the French language's potential for great poetic expression, and both used their knowledge of classical languages to enrich French without Latinizing it. Ronsard, especially, seemed aware of time's passage and the fleeting sweetness of love and life; this infuses his poetry with an appealing wistfulness. Du Bellay wrote two great sonnet sequences, L'Olive and Antiquitez de Rome; the former is heavily influenced by PETRARCH's love sonnets, but the latter is more personal and original as it charts du Bellay's stay in Rome and his reactions to the ruins of the great classical past and their comparison to the present.

Even though they would be repudiated by later critics and poets, the Pléiade's acknowledgment and embrace of classical forms and inspiration helped spring French poetry into the Renaissance and set it on its path as one of the most important national literatures of Europe.

An English Version of Works by the Pléiade

Leitch, Vincent B., ed. The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism. New York: Norton, 2001.

Works about the Pléiade

Bailey, John Cann. The Claims of French Poetry: Nine Studies in the Greater French Poets. Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries Press, 1967.

Castor, Grahame. Pléiade Poetics: A Study in Sixteenth-Century Thought and Terminology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1964.

Clements, Robert J. Critical Theory and Practice of The Pléiade. New York: Octagon Books, 1970.

Satterthwaite, Alfred W. Spenser, Ronsard, and Du Bellay: A Renaissance Comparison. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1972.

Poliziano, Angelo Ambrogini (Politian)

(1454–1494) poet, humanist

Poliziano is considered by many to be the most brilliant humanist of the RENAISSANCE. Born in Tuscany, he went to Florence at age 10 to further his education. He was talented and precocious, and began to translate Homer at age 16. Several of his Greek and Latin epigrams attracted the attention of the powerful Lorenzo de' MEDICI, who later assigned Poliziano the task of tutoring his son.

Poliziano's first major literary effort was his translation of books two through five of Homer's Iliad into Latin. Between 1473 and 1478, the years when he was part of the Medici household and had access to Lorenzo's formidable library, Poliziano produced a variety of verses that are now considered exemplars of the poetics of HUMANISM. His epigrams, elegies, and odes show the influence of the Latin and Italian masters PETRARCH, Ovid, and Dante Alighieri. In style and form, Poliziano not only adopted and improved upon the works of his predecessors but also positioned himself within a great historical tradition of Latinate poetry reaching back to the time of the Roman Empire. Far from being trapped in the past, however, Poliziano, like other Renaissance thinkers, looked to CLASSICISM as a way to renew and revitalize ancient forms of poetry in order to reflect new ways of thinking. He became something of a cultural celebrity, socializing with the most renowned scholars and artists of his time. Poliziano was a personal friend of PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA and Marsilio Ficino, and his poetry was said to have inspired the paintings of Botticelli and MICHELANGELO.

Poliziano's poetic masterpiece is his Stanze, written in Italian between 1475 and 1478. The poem praises the victory of Lorenzo's brother Giuliano de' Medici at a Florentine tournament in 1475. These tournaments were organized regularly by the Medici to provide a public spectacle and a demonstration of Medici power. Poliziano's poem describes the passion between Giuliano (the "Julio" of the poem) and Simonetta, the young and beautiful wife of Mario Vespucci (cousin of Amerigo VESPUCCI).

The poem has become one of the masterworks of Italian literature and expresses the themes and atmosphere of the Renaissance. It infuses the stylistic rigor of classical poetry with the lyrical spontaneity of the vernacular Italian language, giving the contemporary events of the poem a classical setting and an antique flavor (complete with animal chases, the chase of love, and the appearance of the love-god Cupid). The poem's praise of beauty reflected humanist thinking, which elevated human gifts and powers. Due to Simonetta's death in 1476, followed by Giuliano's murder in 1478 in an incident of civil unrest, Poliziano left the Stanze incomplete.

Poliziano also wrote nonfiction along with his poetry. Aided by Lorenzo's approval, Poliziano's Stanze inspired a general appreciation for the beauties of vernacular (non-Latin) literature, which Poliziano supported in his introduction to The Aragon Collection (1477), a collection of Tuscan verse. In the letter of dedication, Poliziano analyzes the history of vernacular poetry and defends its value as a form of poetic expression. He also wrote a dramatic report of Giuliano's death in 1478.

Following an argument with Lorenzo's wife, Poliziano left the Medici household in 1479 and traveled throughout Italy in search of a new patron. One remarkable work from this time is his dramatic Orfeo, which recounts the legend of Orpheus and Eurydice. In 1480 he was granted a post at the University of Florence, where between 1482 and 1486 he gave a series of lectures in verse, known collectively as the Sylvae, or Trees.

In addition to his poetic works in Italian, Latin, and Greek, Poliziano also composed a series of Latin letters addressing stylistic problems in literature. He later published his extensive commentaries on classical texts as the Miscellany (1489), comprising two collections of notes. This collection, along with his other works, introduced the field of classical philology, or the study of language.

Due to his extensive writings covering everything from poetry and literature to language and politics, Poliziano can truly be regarded as a formative scholar of the Renaissance. His variety of interests, his talent with a pen, and his memorable poetry provided models both literary and personal for many Italian scholars and poets to follow.

English Versions of Works by Angelo Ambrogini Poliziano

Sylvae. Translated by Charles Fantazzi. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2004.

The Stanze of Angelo Poliziano. Translated by David Quint. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993.

A Translation of the Orpheus of Angelo Politian and the Aminta of Torquato Tasso. Edited by Louis E. Lord. Westport, Conn.: Hyperion Press, 1979.

Works about Angelo Ambrogini Poliziano

Colilli, Paul. Poliziano's Science of Tropes. New York: Peter Lang, 1989.

Godman, Peter. From Poliziano to Machiavelli. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1998.

Pirrotta, Nina, and Elena Povoledo. Music and Theatre From Poliziano to Monteverdi. Translated by Karen Eales. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1981.

Pope, Alexander (1688–1744) poet, satirist
Alexander Pope was born in London, the son of a Catholic linen merchant, also named Alexander, and Edith Turner. Pope's aunt, Elizabeth Turner, taught him to read, and, as he told his friend Joseph Spence, he taught himself to write "by copying from printed books." Although he received instruction in Greek and Latin from the family priests and spent several years in private schools, Pope remained mostly self-taught.

At age 12, Pope contracted Pott's disease, tuberculosis of the vertebrae that caused the gradual collapse of his spine, pain, insomnia, depression, and deformity. (Years later, one insensitive critic called Pope "a hunch-back'd toad.")

Despite his affliction, Pope was ambitious. At age 16, he wrote his Pastorals (1709), which he modeled after Virgil, and at age 18, he edited William Wycherley's Miscellany Poems. These early PASTORAL were mainly an exercise in technique and experimentation for Pope.

As Pope read, translated, and imitated such classical writers as Homer and Horace, he began to formulate guiding rules for writers and critics based on the ancients' admonishments, techniques, and styles. In 1711 he published An Essay on Criticism, 744 didactic lines of rhymed heroic couplets (iambic pentameter verse), which Samuel Johnson praised as a work of distinction and comprehension. In An Essay on Criticism, Pope creates delightful and memorable nuggets of wisdom and advice:

*True ease in writing comes from art, not chance,
As those move easiest who have learn'd to dance.
'Tis not enough no harshness gives offense,
The sound must seem an echo to the sense.*

He also provides a fitting definition of the term wit: "True wit is Nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought but ne'er so well expressed." For Pope, "Nature" means the way in which the world reflects God's grand design. The poem sums up neoclassical assertions (a revival of the literary standards of Greek and Roman writers) that literature should both instruct and delight through wit, reason, restraint, and balance (see NEOCLASSICISM.)

During the next nine years, Pope published an extraordinary number of works, including his mock-heroic masterpiece The Rape of the Lock (1712, 1714); the pastoral Windsor Forest (1713); The Temple of Fame (1715), which contains his plea, "Oh grant an honest fame, or grant me none"; and Eloise to Abelard (1717). The Rape of the Lock, one of his best-known poems, is a mock-epic that treats the simple event of cutting a snip of hair in the elevated style of such epics as the Aeneid, complete with invocation to the Muse; prophetic dreams; the use of epic similes; descriptions of sacrifices, battles, feasts, supernatural beings; and transformations, all to reveal, "What mighty contests rise from trivial things." In true EPIC form, Pope also published his six-volume translation of the Iliad (1715–20), which made him famous and wealthy enough to buy a house at Twickenham on the Thames.

Almost 20 years later, Pope's poetry took a philosophical turn with the publication of his Essay on Man (1733–34), in which he aimed to "vindicate the ways of God to man." VOLTAIRE called it "the most beautiful, the most useful, and the most sublime didactic poem ever written in any language." It is perhaps most famous for the line "One truth is clear; Whatever is, is right."

If Essay on Man represents the upbeat, generous, positive side of Pope, then The Dunciad (1743), his masterpiece of satire against "dulness" or bad writing, shows us his dark, vengeful side where, "Art after art goes out, and all is Night."

Despite Pope's fervent dislike for critics and "dunces" (bad writers), at his death Lord Bolingbroke said, "I never in my life knew a man that had so tender a heart for his particular friends, or a more general friendship for mankind." Biographer Peter Quennell concludes, "His reforming influence on English language and literature was exerted primarily through the use of words, which he handled more boldly, yet more delicately and sensitively, with a finer appreciation of their lightest shades of meaning, than almost any other English poet."

Works by Alexander Pope

Alexander Pope. Edited by Douglas Brooks-Davis. London: Everyman Poetry Library, 1997.

Essay on Man and Other Poems. London: Dover Publications, 1994.

The Complete Poems of Alexander Pope. New York: Penguin, 1999.

Works about Alexander Pope

Quennell, Peter. Alexander Pope: The Education of a Genius. New York: Stein and Day, 1970.

Rogers, Pat. The Alexander Pope Encyclopedia. Oxford, U.K.: Greenwood Publishing Group, 2004.
 Rosslyn, Felicity. Alexander Pope: A Literary Life. London: Macmillan, 1990.

Popol Vuh (1500s) epic poem

The Popol Vuh records, in 5,237 lines of poetry, the history of the ancient Quiché Maya people of Guatemala from creation to the 16th century. It relates the mythic adventures of the Maya gods, and also includes a list of all the Quiché Maya rulers up to 1550. It is considered the most important document of Maya civilization. Its title can be translated as “The Book of Council.”

The book opens with a preamble in which the unknown 16th-century writer who wrote it down explains, in enigmatic terms, the purpose of recording the old traditions of the Quiché Maya, writing as he does “amid the preaching of God, in Christendom now.”

The beginning tells of the creation of the world and of the first efforts of the gods to create human beings. The gods’ goal is to make creatures that will be able to work, to multiply, to live in an orderly way, and to praise the gods. First they try to teach the animals they have already made to fulfill these tasks. But the animals fail to learn to speak words of praise, and are condemned to live in the forests as prey for the people who are to come. The gods’ second attempt at making people, out of mud this time, also fails, as does the third attempt, when the gods use wood as the material. The wood figures look like people and talk like people. They also succeed in multiplying, but they fail to remember to praise the gods, and are ultimately destroyed, partly through a flood sent by the gods, partly through a revolt by their own cooking utensils and domestic animals. Their descendants remain on earth as monkeys.

The following extract from the first part of the poem, in Dennis Tedlock’s 1985 translation, describing the state of affairs before the world’s creation, gives the flavor of the work’s poetic style:

Whatever might be is simply not there: only murmurs, ripples, in the dark, in the night. Only the Maker, Modeler alone, Sovereign Plumed Serpent, the Bearers, Begetters are in the water, a glittering light.

In Part Two, the narrator drops the creation story, for the time being, to tell of how the powerful and arrogant god Seven Macaw and his two sons, whose amusement is to stomp around the Earth causing earthquakes, are overthrown by the trickery of the hero twins, Hunahpú and Xbalanqué.

Part Three goes back in time to relate the miraculous birth of Hunahpú and Xbalanqué and their adventures in the gruesome kingdom of Xibalba, the underworld. Hunahpú and Xbalanqué are passionate ball-players. They make so much noise playing ball that they can be heard in Xibalba, and the lords of death, annoyed by the noise, summon them to come to Xibalba and play ball against the lords. After a complex series of reversals, in which the trickery on each side escalates, the twins conquer death both metaphorically and literally, and are lifted up into the sky as stars.

Part Four returns to the theme of the creation of human beings. Xmucané, the grandmother of Hunahpú and Xbalanqué, makes dough out of corn meal and from it forms people who are handsome, intelligent, and perceptive, and who thank the Heart of Heaven for having created them. In spite of the new people’s gratitude, their perfect vision and perfect knowledge are potentially a threat to the gods. After a discussion, the gods decide to fog human eyes so that they will see only what is near to them. One result of this limited vision is that the people, as they multiply, begin to break into different groups with different languages; another is that they begin to worship idols and lesser gods instead of the true god, the Heart of Heaven. Part Four concludes with an account of the early migrations of the Quiché Maya and their domination by the god Tohil, who gives them fire.

Part Five, the last part, details how Tohil’s domination and protection, and the human sacrifices he demanded, led to both the prosperity and the destruction of the Quiché Maya. The very last section is a genealogy of the tribes of the Quiché.

Modern knowledge of the Popol Vuh has developed over a long period of time. When Spanish conquerors invaded Guatemala in the 16th century, the Roman Catholic missionaries who accompanied them deliberately destroyed any Maya manuscripts they could find, believing them to be products of an alien and heretical religion. Great bonfires were lighted, and today only a handful of Maya hieroglyphic manuscripts survive. However, to disseminate Christian knowledge, the missionaries taught the Maya the Roman alphabet, and between 1554 and 1558, a Quiché Maya writer, or perhaps several, used Roman writing to record, in the Quiché language, the Popol Vuh.

Although the writers must have kept their manuscript hidden from the prying eyes of the missionaries, Don Francisco Ximénez, an 18th-century Guatemalan priest, was able to borrow the manuscript from one of his parishioners long enough to make a copy of it. Next to his copy, on the right sides of the pages, Ximénez composed a Spanish translation. His manuscript was seen in the 19th century by a French scholar, Father Charles-Étienne Brasseur, who published a French translation. This became the first introduction of Maya thought to the European public. The Ximénez manuscript vanished, and was not found again until the 1940s, when the Guatemalan diplomat Adrian Recinos found it in a library in Chicago, bound with another Ximénez manuscript and not yet cataloged.

Recinos published the Spanish text and arranged for the first English translation, which was published in 1951. Since then, many versions and studies have been published. Numerous Latin American authors, especially the 20th-century, Nobel Prize-winning novelist Miguel Angel Asturias, have been influenced by the Popol Vuh. As Sylvanus Morley states in the foreword to his translation, "The chance preservation of this manuscript only serves to emphasize the magnitude of the loss which the world has suffered in the almost total destruction of aboriginal American literature."

English Versions of the Popol Vuh

Moraga, Cherrie L., and Irma Mayorga. The Hungry Woman: A Mexican Medea: Heart of the Earth. A Popol Vuh Story. Victoria, Australia: West End Press, 2001.

Morley, Sylvanus G., and Delia Goetz, trans. The Popol Vuh: The Sacred Book of the Mayas. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1991.

Tedlock, Dennis, trans. Popol Vuh: The Mayan Book of the Dawn of Life. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.

Works about the Popol Vuh

Preuss, Mary H. Gods of the Popol Vuh: Xmukane', K'ucumatz, Tojil, and Jurakan. Culver City, Calif.: Labyrinthos, 1988.

Tedlock, Dennis. "What the Popol Vuh Tells Us About Itself," in The Book, Spiritual Instrument. Edited by Jerome Rothenberg and David Guss. New York: Granary Books, 1996.

Prado, Diego de (de Prado y Tovar)

(ca. 1570–after 1615)

Little is known of the life of Don Diego de Prado beyond what can be gathered from his surviving works, which consist of two letters to Spanish government officials, written after a voyage of exploration in the southern Pacific, and the Relación (Relation), a document reporting on that voyage and addressed to the king of Spain.

Knowledge of the Relación was lost until the early 1920s, when a copy in Prado's own handwriting was found among some miscellaneous Spanish manuscripts. It forced historians to revise their understanding of the European discovery of Australia, which had previously been credited to Pedro Fernandez de Quirós and Luis Vaez de Torres (after whom the Torres Strait, which separates Australia from New Guinea, is named). In Prado's account we learn dramatic facts about the expedition that set out from Peru in December 1605. There were three vessels in the fleet: the Capitana, commanded by Prado; the Almirante, commanded by Torres; and a much smaller launch. Quirós was the overall commander of the expedition and berthed on the Capitana. He rapidly lost the confidence of the Capitana's crew. A mutiny ensued, which resulted in the Capitana sailing back to Mexico with Quirós as a prisoner, as Prado learned many months later after arriving in the Philippines.

At the time, the people on the Almirante knew only that the Capitana had disappeared. They decided to continue their mission to find out what land there might be in the Pacific south of 20 degrees latitude. They proceeded to sail along the southern coast of what is now Papua New Guinea, stopping on islands along the way, many of which are now considered part of Australia.

Apart from the events surrounding the disappearance of the Capitana, Prado's account focuses primarily on the physical details most relevant to sailors and to the king's ambitions for his empire: the presence of natural harbors and drinkable water, the edible plants and animals available, and the presence of mountains that might contain valuable minerals. There is also information about the customs of the inhabitants of the islands, but the often violent encounters with them, most often settled by the Spanish use of firearms, are related in an offhand way. Prado is a devout Catholic (he became a monk after his return to Spain) who assumes that capturing people and taking them away from their homes forever is perfectly Christian so long as an effort is made to convert them to Christianity. On one occasion Prado does command that a beautiful young girl be released to the care of "a good old woman of her own people"—lest some on the ship "might fall away with her and offend God."

The Relación is important for the details it provides about the southern Pacific in the early days of European imperialism, Spain's initial exploration of the area, and the life and culture of Spanish sailors and the people they encountered.

An English Version of a Work by Diego de Prado

New Light on the Discovery of Australia: As Revealed by the Journal of Captain Don Diego de Prado y Tovar.
Translated by George F. Barwick. London: Hakluyt

Society, 1930; reprinted Millwood, N.Y.: Kraus, 1967.

Prévost, Antoine-François (Abbé Prévost) (1697–1763) novelist, translator

Antoine-François Prévost was born to a wealthy attorney in Artois and was educated by Jesuits at their schools in Hesdin and Paris. From 1716 to 1719, he served in the army and then joined the Benedictine order in 1720. He was ordained a priest in 1726 and became the abbot of Saint-Germain de Pres (Paris) in 1728. He left the abbey without leave in 1728 and a lettre de cachet (royal arrest warrant) was issued for him. Prévost fled to England and later to Holland, where he stayed until 1734, when he reconciled with the Benedictine superiors. He took positions in monasteries until he became an almoner of the prince de Conti and, in 1754, became prior at St. Georges de Gesnes. He died in Chantilly.

Prévost began writing fiction before 1728 and published his most important work, Mémoires et aventures d'un homme de qualité qui s'est retiré du monde (Memoirs of a Man of Quality Retired from the World) in seven volumes (1728–30). He also wrote several historical novels based in England, such as L'Histoire de Monsieur Cleveland (The History of Mr. Cleveland, 1731–39) and Le Doyen de la Killarine (The Master of Killarney, 1735–40). Prévost's fascination with English history and culture led him to translate Samuel RICHARDSON's great novels into French, thus spreading their influence throughout Europe.

Prévost's greatest contribution to world literature is the love story of the Chevalier des Grieux and Manon Lescaut, which appeared in The Memoirs of a Man of Quality's last volume and was republished separately in 1731. The tale of a well-bred, naïve young man involved in a self-destructive love affair with a beautiful amoral prostitute resounded in the European imagination for more than a century. Prévost's genius lay in capturing the psychological complexities of a dysfunctional love without judgment; he lets the characters, especially des Grieux the narrator, implicate themselves with their own actions and rationalizations. Manon Lescaut was so popular that both Puccini (1893) and Massenet (1884) created operas based on the novel; both versions are still performed and recorded today.

An English Version of a Work by Antoine-François Prévost

Larkin, Steven, trans. Manon Lescaut. New York: Penguin Classics, 1992.

Works about Antoine-François Prévost

Francis, R. A. Prévost, Manon Lescaut. London: Grant and Cutler, 1993.

Segal, Naomi. The Unintended Reader: Feminism and Manon Lescaut. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986.

Prokopovitch, Feofan (Eleazar Prokopovitch) (1681–1736) sermonist, dramatist, political philosopher

Feofan Prokopovitch came from a merchant family in the Ukrainian city of Kiev. He attended the Kiev Academy, then studied in several Polish and Italian cities. After completing his studies, Prokopovitch became a monk and took the name Feofan. By 1705 he held a teaching position at the Kiev Academy. In 1715 Peter I called him to St. Petersburg, where he worked as the Czar's ardent supporter. He became bishop of Pskov in 1718 and archbishop of Novgorod in 1725.

Prokopovitch wrote treatises in support of Peter I's policies. In Justice of the Monarch's Will (1722), he argues that the Czar has the right to choose his own successor. His Spiritual Regulation (1721) subjects the Russian Orthodox Church to state authority. James Cracraft notes that Prokopovitch may only have edited these works, not written them. Nevertheless, they reflect his ENLIGHTENMENT position as an innovator rather than a traditionalist.

In 1725 Prokopovitch spoke at Peter's funeral. "Oh, how certain is our misfortune!" he lamented. "In a brief sermon can we encompass his glory, which is beyond all reckoning?" Prokopovitch's many panegyrics to Peter I later influenced Mikhail LOMONOSOV.

Prokopovitch also led the "learned band," a group of writers that included Dimitrie CANTEMIR's son Antiokh. Writing in Latin, Polish, and Russian, Prokopovitch composed discourses on theology and rhetoric as well as sermons, a play, and poems commemorating Russian military victories. According to Harold Segel, Prokopovitch's sermons are notable for their "clarity and directness of communication." His tragic-comedy Vladimir (1705), about Russia's conversion to Orthodoxy, was one of Russia's earliest dramas.

In the realm of poetry, Prokopovitch broke with his predecessors' reliance on rhyming couplets and introduced the rhyme scheme abab into Russian literature. Recognizing Prokopovitch's contributions to Russian literature, particularly in the field of oratory, Alexander SUMAROKOV called him "an adornment of the Slavic people."

English Versions of Works by Feofan Prokopovitch

"Sermon on the Interment of the Most Illustrious, Most Sovereign Peter the Great," in The Literature of Eighteenth-Century Russia, vol. I. Edited by Harold Segel. New York: Dutton, 1967.

The Spiritual Regulation of Peter the Great. Translated and edited by Alexander V. Muller. Seattle and London: University of Washington Press, 1972.

Works about Feofan Prokopovitch

Cracraft, James. "Did Feofan Prokopovitch Really Write Pravda voli monarshei?" Slavic Review 40, no. 2 (Summer 1981): 173–193.

Sherech, Jurij. "On Teofan Prokopovitch as Writer and Preacher in His Kiev Period." Harvard Slavic Studies 2 (1954): 211–223.

Pulci, Luigi (1432–1484) poet, humanist

Luigi Pulci has been called the first Romantic poet after Dante Alighieri. Pulci's Florentine family had given birth to several writers during the RENAISSANCE; Luigi's brothers, Luca and Bernardo, along with Bernardo's wife, were also poets. Lorenzo de' MEDICI brought Pulci into his circle of artists and scholars of HUMANISM, including Angelo POLIZIANO and PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA. For a time Pulci served Lorenzo as an emissary and diplomat, but later in life took a more quiet post with a patron in the north, Roberto Sanseverino.

Pulci wrote prodigiously, all in his native language of Italian. Critics have pointed out a certain burlesque quality of his work. Pulci's taste for parody caused him more than a few problems with the church, and though he was extremely popular among intellectual circles, many disapproved his parodies of biblical scriptures. The fact that he was never arrested or declared a heretic is probably due to the Medici family's protection.

Pulci's most famous poem is the chivalrous and romantic "Morgante," based on the classic Carolingian EPIC, the Song of Roland. Pulci takes this exemplary heroic tale of chivalry in the Middle Ages and turns it into a humorous parody, thanks to a character of his invention: Morgante, a giant converted to Christianity by Roland. By infusing the mock-heroic chivalric tone with a humor to be found only in the streets of Florence, Pulci created a work that blended an at-times serious and even bitterly contemplative tone with a biting comic romp. Morgante not only contains insight into the morals of the time but also reflects the fate of religious ideals in a world in which salvation could be won through personal achievement rather than through faith.

Later poets greatly admired Pulci, and he had a major influence on the English Romantic poets, including Lord Byron. The 28 cantos of Morgante, published in 1483, are often studied as an exemplary work of the Renaissance.

An English Version of a Work by Luigi Pulci

Morgante: The Epic Adventures of Orlando and His Giant Friend Morgante. Translated by Joseph Tusiani. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2000.

Works about Luigi Pulci

Davie, Mark. Half-Serious Rhymes: The Narrative Poetry of Luigi Pulci. Dublin: Irish Academic Press, 1997.

Jordan, Constance. Pulci's Morgante: Poetry and History in Fifteenth Century Florence. Washington, D.C.: Folger Books, 1986.

Pushkin, Vasilii L'vovich (Pushkin, Vvasilii L'vovich) (1766–1830) poet

Vasilii L'vovich Pushkin is perhaps most famous for his relation to one of Russia's most noted poets, Aleksander Pushkin, who was his nephew. But Vasilii Pushkin also led a comfortable, and at times critiqued, life in the Russian public eye as a poet.

Pushkin's childhood, along with his brother Sergei's (father of Aleksander), was relaxed and lavish, with both boys tutored at home in the style of the French. This early appreciation of French language and customs influenced Vasilii throughout his life. Several poems in the language and style of French literature appear in his first poetic works, published in 1793.

In his public life, Pushkin aligned himself with the Russian literary group called the Karamzinians, whose goal was to elevate the respect for and reception of Russian language and literature within Western Europe. Pushkin's poem commemorating V. A. Zhuskovskomu reflected the Russian ENLIGHTENMENT and the grandeur of Peter the Great. The poem received grand praises by the Karamzinian party and harsh criticism from their opposition, the Slavic party, which read it as a major attack.

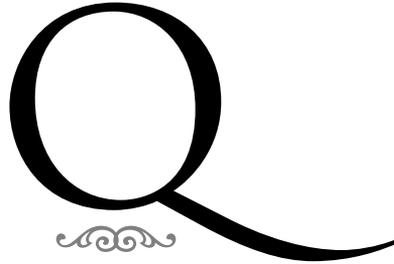

Pushkin likewise received great praise for his next work, "Opasnyi sosed" ("The Dangerous Neighbor"), a short narrative poem imitating the typical style of Russian EPICS of the time. Though written between 1810 and 1811, the poem, which included scenes that took place inside a brothel, was considered too scandalous to be published until 1901.

Pushkin published another collection of his poetry in 1822, in which most of the poems were either representations of French poetry or adaptations and imitations from other Russian poets. His collected works appeared in 1855, well after his death. Though cherished for his own merit and not solely for his patronage of his talented nephew, Vasilii Pushkin's place in Russian literature is as a poet known best for his playful verse and his spirited style of living.

Works about Vasilii L'vovich Pushkin

- Rydel, Christine A. Russian Literature in the Age of Pushkin and Gogol: Poetry and Drama, in Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 205. Farmington Hills, Mich.: Gale Group, 1999.
- Thompson, Ewa M., ed. The Search for Self-definition in Russian Literature. Amsterdam: J. Benjamins, 1991.

Quetzalcoatl, myth of (n.d.–1558)

The Quetzalcoatl myth is the epic creation myth of the Mesoamerican cultures of the Aztec and Toltec peoples. Although no complete version of the myth survived the Spanish Conquest of 1519, scholars have since been able to piece together much of the story, which looks to be a mixture of fact and fiction. Quetzalcoatl comes from two Nahuatl words: quetzal, which is a Guatemalan bird with very long, green tail feathers, and coatl, which means serpent. The easiest translation of Quetzalcoatl is therefore “feathered serpent.”

In an ironic twist, the story itself is partly to blame for its being mostly lost to history. Since part of the myth entailed Quetzalcoatl coming back to save the Aztec Empire, many Aztec mistakenly assumed that Spanish conqueror Hernán CORTÉS was the returning god when his army swept through Mexico in 1519. All that remains comes from a handful of pre-Columbian sources, later Aztec accounts (which were heavily influenced by Christianity), and a fragmentary archaeological record.

One of the Aztec’s principal gods, Quetzalcoatl was the creator of all life, forming humans by splashing his blood on the bones and ashes of previous generations to give birth to new life. He took on many forms, including that of high priests, and is responsible for the end of human sacrifice, substituting the sacrifice of snakes, butterflies, and birds for humans by preaching that, if human blood is to be sacrificed, it should be given directly by the person making the sacrifice.

English Versions of the Myth of Quetzalcoatl

Baldwin, Neil, trans. Legends of the Plumed Serpent: Biography of a Mexican God. New York: Public Affairs, 1998.

Florescano, Enrique, and Lysa Hochroth, trans. The Myth of Quetzalcoatl. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.

Quevedo, Francisco de (1580–1645)

poet, playwright, novelist, essayist

Francisco de Quevedo was born in Madrid to the royal administrator Pedro Gómez de Quevedo and his wife, María de Santibáñez. Quevedo studied at a Jesuit college before going on to the universities of Alcalá and Valladolid, where he received a degree in theology.

From a young age Quevedo earned a reputation as a talented and controversial writer, inspiring the animosity of the prominent poet GÓNGORA Y AR-

GOTE and a distant friendship with the playwright LOPE DE VEGA. He composed his most well known work, the picaresque novel Historia de la vida del buscón (The Scavenger, 1604), while still a student. Over the following years Quevedo also published work in an amazing variety of genres, including satires, historical essays, and lyric poetry.

In the years 1612 and 1613 Quevedo underwent a spiritual crisis that would find expression in much of his later writing. As a functionary of the viceroy of Sicily, he traveled frequently between Italy and Madrid. For his role in a political intrigue against the ruling party in Venice, he was imprisoned in 1621–22, and this began a period of intense literary activity. He finished his Sueños (Dreams), a series of what might be called satiric, allegorical fantasies on political and moral themes. His attacks against public figures and his outspoken political opinions continued to earn him enemies, and despite his successful career as a diplomat he became increasingly isolated. After marrying, becoming a widower, and serving again as a political prisoner, he died in Villanueva de los Infantes.

Quevedo left behind a wide variety of writings, both political and religious. The tone and style of his work varied from sober religious reflection to vulgar comedy. Yet in all his works, Quevedo demonstrated a mastery of literary forms, flexible language, and much originality. The Scavenger is considered the prototype of picaresque fiction, and his lyric poetry is among the most accomplished in the Spanish language.

English Versions of Works by Francisco de Quevedo

Lazarillo de Tormes and the Swindler: Two Spanish Picaresque Novels. Edited by Michael Alpert. New York: Penguin, 2003.

Six Masters of the Spanish Sonnet. Translated by Willis Barnstone. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1997.

Works about Francisco de Quevedo

Mariscal, George. Contradictory Subjects: Quevedo, Cervantes, and Seventeenth Century Spanish Culture. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991.

Walters, D. Gareth. Francisco de Quevedo: Love Poet. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1986.

R

Rabelais, François (ca. 1494–1553) comic novelist

During the late 15th and early 16th centuries, the new ideas and intellectual attitudes of the RENAISSANCE were pouring out of Italy and sweeping through Europe. The spread of knowledge fostered a new humanist scholarship, which was changing the way people think. HUMANISM caused a shift away from the focus of religious ways of thinking and, aided by the rediscovery of the knowledge of ancient Greece and Rome, turned scholars toward an in-depth study of human beings. The recent invention of the printing press allowed writers to produce works more quickly and in greater numbers than ever before. One of the most profound thinkers of this stimulating period was the French writer François Rabelais.

Little is known of Rabelais's public life, and even less of his private life. Studies have revealed that his father was a lawyer in Chinon in the Loire valley and that he influenced his son's study of law. Rabelais, however, found that the law was not a profession that suited him; he decided instead to join the Franciscan monastery of Le Puy Saint-Martin in Fontenay-le-Comte in 1510. He remained there, gaining a solid education, until 1524. Evidence suggests that during this time he began translating Greek philosopher Lucian's works into Latin, but the translation is no longer extant. Because the Franciscans frowned upon Greek philosophy, Rabelais moved to the Benedictine monastery Saint-Pierre-de-Maillezais some time around 1523 or 1524.

Through his studies with the Benedictines, Rabelais became well versed in Greek and Latin and received a broad education in law, philosophy, and the classics. He abandoned his holy orders, however, to pursue a secular life. In the early 1530s, he studied medicine at the University of Montpellier, where he translated the works of Hippocrates and Galen from the original Greek and Latin. After completing his medical education, he began a career as a doctor and published several medical works no longer extant. By this time, he had come under the influence of the great humanist scholar Desiderius ERASMUS, who inspired Rabelais and perhaps turned his thoughts toward a literary life.

In 1532 Rabelais produced his first book, Pantagruel, which he wrote under the fictitious name of Alcofribas Nasier. The character Pantagruel was known in popular French culture as a small devil; in Rabelais's work, he is transformed into a giant who, in later books, becomes the symbol of wisdom, a foil for the character Panurge, who is foolish and self-absorbed, and who also appears in Rabelais's later work Tiers livre. Pantagruel is a comic story about a giant who spreads thirst. It was an immediate success, despite being criticized by at least one professor at the Sorbonne, the leading university of France.

After a trip to Rome, Rabelais produced his second book, Gargantua, in 1534. The character Gargantua is the father of Pantagruel, and their stories are similar in the telling of their lives, as children, warriors, and heroes. Gargantua was also a comic story but differed from Pantagruel in that Rabelais's use of language as a means to express his views on some of the controversial issues then shaking Europe became more imaginative and inventive. His comic tale, set within an ideal society (based loosely on Thomas MORE's Utopia), includes a battle in which Rabelais satirizes the evil emperor (often alluded to by critics as Charles V). The characters in Gargantua include those from Arthurian legends, and the story operates on multiple levels—contemporary, as well as classical and biblical.

Rabelais's works include numerous digressions and stilted transitions from one scene to another. These digressions, and Rabelais's narrative style as a whole, are meant to disconcert readers at critical points in the stories. Thus, what scholars and other readers have come to value in Gargantua and other of Rabelais's writings is his ability to invent with unparalleled language and sensibility a comic criticism of historical and social events and issues of his day. For this reason, it is important to read Rabelais's works not as "modern" novels, but as burlesque portrayals of the 16th-century way of life, and not as formal philosophical criticisms of social vice, but as comic stories of human nature.

After publishing Pantagruel and Gargantua, Rabelais wandered through France, Italy, and Germany, spending time in the late 1530s and early 1540s teaching and practicing medicine. His opinions on religious and political matters caused him trouble with the authorities of various states, and he only narrowly avoided persecution.

In 1546 he published Tiers livre, which means "The Third Book." It was completely unlike his two earlier works. The plot concerns the question of whether a man named Panurge should get married, but the story line is exceedingly thin. Through the events that happen to Panurge, Rabelais expresses his views not only of marriage, but also of war, money, and politics. However, because of Rabelais's subtle and ironic style, his views can be interpreted in many different ways, providing much fodder for current scholarship. Tiers livre was condemned by the Sorbonne and other authorities, who considered the work heretical. As a result, Rabelais fled France and moved to the German city of Metz. In 1552 he published The Fourth Book, which was also condemned by the Sorbonne.

Some years after Rabelais's death, The Fifth Book was published. Although this work was credited to Rabelais, many historians question whether he actually wrote it.

Rabelais was one of the major literary figures of the 16th century, when such writers as Thomas More and Erasmus were producing brilliant work. He influenced such writers as MONTAIGNE, Hugo, and Flaubert. In a time of political uncertainty, increased by the Protestant Reformation, Rabelais stood as a literary giant, using wit and comedy in an attempt to express reasonable views in an unreasonable age.

English Versions of Works by François Rabelais

Complete Works of François Rabelais. Translated by Donald M. Frame. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.

Five Books of The Lives, Heroic Deeds and Sayings of Gargantua and His Son Pantagruel. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2004.

Gargantua and Pantagruel. Herts, U.K.: Wordsworth Editions, 2001.

Works about François Rabelais

Berry, Alice F. Charm of Catastrophe: A Study of Rabelais's Quart Livre. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.

Carron, Jean-Claude. François Rabelais: Critical Assessments. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1995.

Frame, Donald M. François Rabelais: A Study. New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich, 1977.

Plattard, Jean. Life of François Rabelais. Translated by L. D. Roache. London: Taylor and Francis, 1968.

Rabinal Achi (700s) Maya play

The Rabinal Achi is the only pre-Columbian Maya play known today. The residents of Rabinal, a small town in Guatemala, still perform it as they have for centuries. The play, originally written in the Maya language of K'iche (Quiche), became available outside Guatemala when Charles-Étienne Brasseur, a 19th-century French scholar also known as "l'abbé Bourbourg," published a French translation. He obtained the play from a resident of Rabinal, Bartolo Sis.

Dennis Tedlock recently translated the play into English from the original K'iche. He notes that it is a representation of both Maya history and culture and that elements in the play have roots in pre-Columbian court dramas. Tedlock compares the style of the play to Japanese NOH theatre.

The Rabinal Achi includes musical accompaniment and the actors perform stylized dances that reveal the relationships of characters to one another, but they do not speak while dancing. Actors wear masks specific to each character. The dialogue is a series of speeches in which characters frequently repeat and respond to another character's dialogue.

In the opening scenes, Cawek of the Forest People and the Man of Rabinal challenge each other. The Man of Rabinal takes Cawek captive, and a long exchange occurs between the two in which they describe the conflict between them. Eventually, Cawek appears before Lord Five Thunder, and there is a debate about Cawek's wrongdoing. Finally, the play ends with Cawek's ritual execution, represented by a dance sequence, during which Cawek urges his executioners to "do your duty." He ends with a prayer for them that echoes other prayers in the drama: "May Sky and Earth be with you too / little Eagle, little Jaguar."

The Rabinal Achi has inspired other artists. The contemporary playwright Luis Valdez told the San Diego Union Tribune that he translated the play from Spanish to help him create dialogue in a recent multimedia work. The play's influence rests upon its action and plot; combination of dance, dialogue, and music; and its representation of Guatemalan history.

An English Version of the Rabinal Achi

Tedlock, Dennis, trans. Rabinal Achi: A Mayan Drama of War and Sacrifice. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Racine, Jean (1639–1699) playwright

For most of the 17th century, France was ruled by the powerful, ambitious and energetic King Louis XIV. Under his rule, France would not only become the most powerful nation in Europe, but would also develop into the intellectual and cultural center of the world, superseding both England and Italy. Among the great achievements of this golden age of French culture was an amazing flourishing of literature, and one of the most important French writers during the reign of Louis XIV was Jean Racine.

Racine was born on December 20 in La Ferté-Milon in Aisne to a middle-class family. Both of his parents died within a few years of his birth, and he was raised by his paternal grandmother. During his youth, he received an outstanding education from members of a religious group known as the Jansenists. The Jansenists were ostensibly loyal to the Roman Catholic Church but held unorthodox views about how the church should be reformed. As a result, they were regarded by the authorities with a great deal of suspicion.

Under the tutelage of Jansenist teachers, Racine gained extensive knowledge about classical literature, as well as a generally broad-based education. His teachers thought he would make an excellent lawyer and sent him to study law at a university in Paris. The city was not only the political capital of France, but also the center of French culture and literature. Once he arrived, Racine became utterly enchanted with Paris and resolved to make his mark on society. He worked to curry favor with high French officials, including some who had been persecuting the Jansenists.

Eventually, Racine decided that the best way of becoming famous in Parisian society would be to become a playwright. This would damage his relationship with the Jansenists, to whom the theater was abhorrent, but by then Racine was focused entirely on his own social progress. He sought out Jean-Baptiste Poquelin MOLIERE, who was not only the leading writer of French theater, but also controller of one of France's most important theatrical production companies.

Molière agreed to produce Racine's play La Thébaïde, (The Story of Thebes), which was based upon the rivalry among Oedipus's sons. It appeared on the Paris stage in 1664 and was a considerable success, running for 17 consecutive nights. A year later, Molière's company produced Racine's second play, Alexandre le Grand (Alexander the Great), which was a heroic portrayal of King Louis XIV as a victorious conqueror. The play was an even greater success than La Thébaïde and confirmed Racine's place in the world of the French theater.

Racine then double-crossed Molière, both professionally and personally. Without Molière's knowledge, Racine arranged for a rival theater company, the Hotel de Bourgogne, to produce a second showing of Alexandre le Grand. This production was presented at the court of Louis XIV and was a striking success. On a personal level, Racine had an affair with the leading actress from Molière's troupe, Thérèse Du Parc, and he persuaded her to leave Molière's employ and join him. As in his relationship with the Jansenists, these actions demonstrate Racine's willingness to forgo honor in the pursuit of professional and social success.

With his work now being produced by the Hôtel de Bourgogne, Racine continued to write plays. In 1667, his third play, Andromaque, was performed both in the court of Louis XIV and to the general public. This dramatic tale of tragic love was a huge success, ensuring Racine's place among the greatest of contemporary French playwrights.

Racine, whose energy for writing and work was enormous, produced several plays in the years that followed. Les Plaideurs, his only comedy, which satirizes the legal profession, was produced in 1668, to great acclaim. The TRAGEDY Britannicus, which was produced in 1669, did not fare as well, although the members of the king's court still appreciated it. Bérénice was produced in 1671, Bajazet in 1672, Mithridate in 1673, and Iphigénie in 1674. All of these plays were successful. Racine was elected to the ACADÉMIE FRANÇAISE in 1672, which was a great honor.

The themes Racine dealt with in his writings were not overly complex but were intensely human and thus had broad appeal. The ideas of unrequited love, sibling rivalry, sadness at the loss of loved ones, and the ruthless impartiality of fate were all subjects to which Racine's audiences could easily relate. He developed characters that were recognizably human, rather than the idealistic heroes that featured so prominently in others' plays.

Racine was appointed royal historiographer to King Louis XIV in 1677, one of the greatest honors the monarch could bestow upon a writer. In the same year, Racine produced his ultimate masterpiece, Phèdre. A few years later, the Hôtel de Bourgogne merged with another theater company to create the Comédie-Française, the greatest of all French theater companies. Phèdre was selected as the company's inaugural performance.

For the next several years, Racine devoted his energies to his duties as royal historiographer and dealt with difficult issues in his personal life. He married Catherine de Romanet, who, strangely, was said to have never read a word of Racine's writings during her lifetime. In addition, he was involved in a vicious scandal when he was accused of poisoning his mistress, Marquise Du Parc, but no formal charges were ever brought against him.

Toward the end of his life, Racine produced two religious plays. Esther premiered in 1689, and Athalie in 1691. Both plays were performed by the female students at the school of Saint-Cyr. Some of his historical works were also published during this time, but they were little more than royalist propaganda designed to ingratiate him with King Louis XIV. Racine died of cancer on April 21, and was buried in the church of Saint-Etienne du Mont in Paris.

Critical Analysis

Of all the many plays Racine produced, none has greater fame or reputation than his masterpiece, Phèdre. It is upon this play that Racine's own fame as a tragic playwright chiefly rests.

In writing the story of Phèdre, Racine was following in the footsteps of the Greek tragedian Euripides, who composed the story in his play Hippolytus. In subsequent ages, other writers returned to the story and continually adapted it, but Racine's effort has become the most famous.

The plot of Phèdre is recognizably classical in origin. Phèdre is the wife of Thésée, the strong and heroic king of Athens. However, she has a secret, burning passion for her stepson, Hippolyte. Thus, the stage is set for tragic love. After Phèdre is incorrectly told that her husband is dead, she declares her love for Hippolyte. He does not return her affection, because he loves another, named Aricie; thus, Phèdre's emotional anguish is futile.

King Thésée, who is very much alive, returns to Athens and is given a false report of what has happened. Told by the queen's treacherous confidant, Oenone, that Hippolyte has seduced his wife, he executes his own son. When informed of these events, Phèdre holds herself responsible for Hippolyte's death and commits suicide.

Phèdre contains many classical themes of drama. Unreciprocated love leads to despair; the father and the son regard each other with jealousy and suspicion; and trust in a confidant is betrayed. These are not only aspects of life that most people can easily relate to, but also classical examples of tragic fate; thus, it is not surprising that Racine's portrayal of human nature—in all its virtue and vice—made him greatly popular with French audiences and monarchs alike.

Racine was perhaps the greatest French dramatist of his age. Although he engaged in fierce and bitter competition with Molière and Pierre CORNEILLE, he both influenced and was influenced by them. During the century after Racine's death, the style and content of the great French playwright VOLTAIRE would be heavily affected by Racine's work, although Voltaire often criticized Racine for the similarity of his characters. Despite his personal shortcomings, Racine stands as a shining example of the literature of one of the golden ages of European culture.

English Versions of Works by Jean Racine

Bajazet. Translated by Alan Hollinghurst. New York: Random House, 1992.

Berenice. St. Paul, Minn.: Consortium Book Sales, 1991.

Racine: Mithridate. Edited by Gustave Rudler. London: Bristol Classic Press, 1979.

Three Plays of Racine: Andromache, Britannicus, Phaedra. Translated by George Dillon. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.

Works about Jean Racine

Caldicott, Edric E., and Derval Conroy, eds. Racine: The Power and the Pleasure. Dublin: University College of Dublin Press, 2001.

Goodkin, Richard E. Birth Marks: The Tragedy of Primogeniture in Pierre Corneille, Thomas Corneille, and Jean Racine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000.

Hawcroft, Michael. Word as Action: Racine, Rhetoric, and Theatrical Language. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Knapp, Bettina L. Jean Racine: Mythos and Renewal in Modern Theater. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1971.

Lemaitre, Jules. Jean Racine. Murrieta, Calif.: Classic Books, 2001.

Tobin, Ronald W. Jean Racine Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1999.

Radishchev, Aleksander Nikolayevich
(1749–1802) political polemicist

Aleksander Radishchev was born into a wealthy Russian family. His obvious intelligence earned him the opportunity to study at Leipzig University at the state's expense; after five years there, he returned to Russia and entered government service. Radishchev resigned from service upon his marriage in 1775, but he soon found the income from his 300 serfs to be inadequate. In 1777 he assumed a post in the College of Commerce, where he spent the next 13 years rising through the ranks.

Radishchev's minor publications include "Diary of a Week" (1770s), a sentimental chronicle of seven days spent apart from friends, and a historical translation and a biography in which he condemns absolutism and injustice.

His most significant work, however, is A Journey from St. Petersburg to Moscow (1790), a travelogue modeled on Laurence Sterne's Sentimental Journey. Radishchev's Journey became famous not for its stilted, archaic prose (which Nikolai KARAMZIN's fluid style would soon supersede), but for its content. Within the Journey, Radishchev denounces the many evils he sees in society, especially serfdom. The work also includes an ALLEGORY in which a self-satisfied ruler suddenly sees that his "glittering garments" are "stained with blood and drenched with tears." R. P. Thaler notes that Radishchev "condemned equally the sovereign's despotism, the gentry's tyranny, and the peasants' violence. He did not want a revolution. . . . He wanted reforms."

CATHERINE THE GREAT saw the Journey as a criminal attack on authority. She deduced that the anonymous author was Radishchev and had him arrested and sentenced to death, a sentence she eventually commuted to ten years' exile in Siberia. Educated Russians, meanwhile, read illicit copies of the book, and Catherine's son Paul pardoned Radishchev in 1796. In 1801 Radishchev completed a poem (including praise of Catherine) about the 18th century. He also joined a commission studying legal reform. After the commission's chair threatened him with another exile, he committed suicide.

See also TRAVEL NARRATIVE.

An English Version of a Work by Aleksander Nikolayevich Radishchev

A Journey from St. Petersburg to Moscow. Translated by Leo Wiener and edited by R. P. Thaler. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1958.

Works about Aleksander Nikolayevich Radishchev

Clardy, Jesse. The Philosophical Ideas of Aleksander Radishchev. New York: Astra Books, 1964.

Lang, David Marshall. The First Russian Radical: Aleksander Radishchev, 1749–1802. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1977.

McConnell, Alan. A Russian Philosopher: Aleksander Radishchev, 1749–1802. Westport, Conn.: Hyperion Press, 1981.

rationalism

During the 18th century, an intellectual movement known as the ENLIGHTENMENT swept across Europe. For several generations, it dominated the literary, artistic, musical, and philosophical worlds of much of Europe, as well as the European colonies in the New World. The idea that formed the basis of the Enlightenment was called rationalism.

In the 18th century, French writers and thinkers known as philosophes applied the scientific method, developed the century before, to philosophical, religious, and social questions. They believed that all questions about life must be approached rationally and that truth must be discovered through reason.

The most famous of these writers was unquestionably VOLTAIRE, whose works represent perhaps the clearest statement of Enlightenment ideals. Other important philosophes included MONTESSQUIEU, Denis DIDEROT, Jean d'ALEMBERT, and Jean-Jacques ROUSSEAU.

Rationalist thinkers were skeptical of ideas that had been accepted in Europe for centuries. Many questioned the absolute right of monarchs to rule their countries, while others discarded traditional religion to become deists or atheists. Because their religious and political opinions challenged established authority, rationalists were often persecuted for their beliefs.

During the Enlightenment, rationalism led to the production of several important works. The novel Candide, Voltaire's most famous work, explores the nature of good and evil, and the question of fate versus free will. The ENCYCLOPEDIA, a joint effort by both Diderot and d'Alembert, represents an effort on the part of the philosophes to systematize all human knowledge using the principles of rationalism.

During the 19th century, rationalism, and the Enlightenment as a whole, was superseded by the emergence of romanticism, and the cultural focus of Europe shifted from France to England and Germany. The influence of rationalism on world literatures and cultures, however, continues to the present day.

Works of Rationalism

Descartes, René, and Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz. Rationalists: Five Basic Works on Rationalism. New York: Doubleday, 1989.

Diderot, Denis. Thoughts on the Interpretation of Nature and Other Philosophical Works. Translated by Lorna Sandler and David Adams. Manchester, U.K.: Clinamen Press, 2000.

Works about Rationalism

Cottingham, John. Rationalism. Bristol, U.K.: Thoemmes Press, 1998.

Hartpole-Lecky, William E. History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2001.

Parkinson, G. H. R. The Renaissance and 17th-Century Rationalism. Routledge History of Philosophy Series, vol. 4. London: Routledge, 2003.

Rej, Mikkolaj (1505–1569) poet, fiction writer, translator

Mikkolaj Rej was a Polish country squire. He received no formal education, but his literary talent, humanistic views, and patriotic sentiment helped him become one of the central figures of the Polish Renaissance.

Rej is traditionally called the Father of Polish national literature. He wrote all his works in Polish, although at the time it was traditional to write in Latin, and he wrote his philosophical works in the form of dialogue. His main works include A Short Conversation between Three Persons: Pan, Voit, and Pleban (1543); a didactic poem aimed at explaining and instructing, titled A Real Account of the Life of a Respectable Person (1558); and a prosaic version of David's Psalms (1545).

Rej was especially popular for his secular satirical works, such as The Zoo (1562) and Trifles (1562). His short witty epigrams were known and widely quoted. A distinguishing feature of Rej's satirical writing is his vast use of colloquial language, which was a novelty for the literature of the corresponding epoch. The persistent use of dialectal language was deliberate: It was a tool to awaken Polish national identity, to introduce folk language into the official sphere of literature and education. Mikkolaj Rej is a distinguished humanist, whose input into the development of Polish literature and culture is hard to overestimate. Sadly, English translations of his works are not currently in print.

Renaissance (1300s–1500s)

The term Renaissance, a French word meaning “rebirth,” describes a period of time in Western Europe marked by significant changes in politics, art, and scholarship. Though the term may refer to any period characterized by artistic vitality or advanced thought, it traditionally refers to the 14th-, 15th-, and 16th-century cultures of Italy, France, Spain, England, Germany, and the Low Countries.

The “rebirth” of the Renaissance departed from the modes of thought that had dominated the Middle Ages in Europe. The decline of feudalism, the increase in trade and commerce, and the growth of cities all changed the fabric of society. The bubonic plague, or Black Death, swept through Europe several times, killing up to one-third of the population. The Protestant Reformation led by Martin LUTHER and John CALVIN splintered the Catholic Church. Scholars and artists of the 14th century felt they lived in a world being reborn from the ignorance, darkness, and superstition of the medieval period. Political, social, and scientific changes followed, but the greatest achievements of the Renaissance were in literature and the arts.

Italy during the 1300s witnessed the beginning of two movements that characterized the Renaissance. The first was a renewed interest in the literature of ancient Greece and Rome, a movement known as CLASSICISM, largely begun by the scholar and poet PETRARCH. The second was the influence of HUMANISM, which began as a reform of the traditional humanistic education in rhetoric and evolved into a mode of thought focused on the human instead of on God. Scholars and artists gathering in Florence under the patronage of the powerful Medici family, which included Lorenzo de' MEDICI, reflected this interest in their art, most famously in the work of MICHELANGELO. Popes and monarchs began collecting their own personal libraries, and universities flourished.

In addition, authors wrote less frequently in Latin and more frequently in the vernacular or native languages, while Johannes Gutenberg's invention of moveable type around 1440 made printing possible. These changes made education, scholarship, and literature more widely available than ever before. Some landmark authors of the Italian Renaissance were Giovanni BOCCACCIO, Pietro BEMBO, Baldessare CASTIGLIONE, Niccolò MACHIAVELLI, and Ludovico ARIOSTO. LEONARDO DA VINCI—painter, architect, engineer, and musician—exemplified the Renaissance ideal of the “universal man” who was highly educated, accomplished in the arts as well as the sciences, and unfailingly pleasant in all company.

From Italy, the values of the Renaissance spread to France, where they were best modeled in the poetry of Pierre de RONSARD, the fiction of François RABELAIS, and the essays of Michel de MONTAIGNE. In Germany, Desiderius ERASMUS was the most renowned Renaissance scholar, famed for his refinement of humanistic ideals and his influence on many other thinkers and poets, particularly the English Sir Thomas MORE, whose Utopia (1516), which described the values of a perfect society, was modeled after Plato's Republic. English arts and literature in the Renaissance flourished in the poetry of Philip SIDNEY and Edmund Spenser, but the highest achievement was in drama, in the works of William SHAKESPEARE, Christopher MARLOWE, Ben JONSON, and their contemporaries.

In Spain, the most celebrated authors of the Renaissance were LOPE DE VEGA, who wrote hundreds of plays, and Miguel de CERVANTES, whose Don Quixote (1605) is still considered by many to be the greatest modern novel. Spanish explorers led the Europe of the Renaissance in world exploration, stretching the boundaries of the known world. In addition, developments in science significantly changed established doctrines. In 1543 COPERNICUS dared to suggest that the Earth orbited the Sun, and around 1600 Galileo GALILEI began his experiments in physics.

Though a span of time marked by war, plague, and resistance to new ideas, the Renaissance in Europe profoundly and irrevocably changed the social structure. The renewed interest in the human form and the human mind, the advances in knowledge, the spread of learning, and the zeal for discovery that took place during the Renaissance led to the ENLIGHTENMENT and still underlie European and European-influenced cultures to this day.

English Versions of Works from the Renaissance

Boccaccio, Giovanni. The Decameron. Translated by Mark Musa. New York: Signet, 2002.

Cervantes, Miguel de. Don Quixote. Translated by Tobias Smollett. London: Modern Library, 2004.

Erasmus, Desiderius. The Praise of Folly and Other Writings. Edited by Robert M. Adams. New York: W.W. Norton, 1989.

Montaigne, Michel de. The Complete Essays. Translated by M. A. Screech. New York: Penguin, 1993.

Shakespeare, William. The Complete Works. Edited by Stanley Wells and Gary Taylor. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Works about the Renaissance

Grendler, Paul, et al., eds. Renaissance Encyclopedia for Students. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 2003.

Manchester, William. A World Lit Only by Fire. Boston: Back Bay Books, 1993.

Rabb, Theodore. Renaissance Lives: Portraits of an Age. New York: Basic Books, 2001.

Tuchman, Barbara W. A Distant Mirror. New York: Ballantine Books, 1987.

Richardson, Samuel (1689–1761) novelist

Samuel Richardson was born in Mackworth, Derbyshire, to Samuel Richardson, a joiner or woodworker, and his wife, Elizabeth. Richardson attended Merchant Taylor's school for some years and at age 17 became apprenticed to a printer. When his apprenticeship ended in 1715, he became a compositor for a printer in London. Six years later he set up his own printing shop and married Martha Wilde, daughter of the man under whom he had apprenticed. Richardson initially printed political material and in 1733 became the House of Commons' official printer.

Richardson's first complete work, The Apprentice's Vade Mecum (Young Man's Pocket Companion, 1733), was written for apprentices. In 1739 he was commissioned to write a collection of letters for rural readers to copy for their own use. Eventually published as Familiar Letters (1741), it inspired Richardson's better-known work, Pamela (1740), an epistolary NOVEL (a novel written in letters) about a virtuous servant girl fending off the advances of Mr. B, her master. Richardson packaged the work as nonfiction, but its success forced him to admit the disguise. While Pamela drew the admiration of the masses, one of its detractors was Henry Fielding, who parodied the work in Shamela (1741).

Richardson published a sequel, commonly referred to as Pamela II, following the heroine's fate after she marries Mr. B. In another novel, Clarissa (1748), Richardson retained the epistolary structure; the focus on a young, virtuous woman; and the sentimentality of his Pamela novels. He altered the formula, making the heroine an heiress, rewriting romance as tragedy, and increasing the novel's length and number of letter-writers. Richardson continued to revise Clarissa throughout his life.

Even more successful than Pamela, Clarissa sparked a fashion for sentimental and epistolary novels, including GOETHE's The Sorrows of Young Werther and ROUSSEAU's Julie. Richardson also completed The History of Sir Charles Grandison (1753–54), an epistolary novel about a man torn between two women.

Richardson's novels have provided fruitful ground for critics. Marxist critic Terry Eagleton claims: "These novels are an agent, rather than a mere account, of the English bourgeoisie's attempt to wrest a degree of ideological hegemony from the aristocracy in the decades which follow the political settlement of 1688." And critic Ira Konigsberg writes: "Richardson analyzed more deeply the characters of the novel and displayed in them a larger number of mental and emotional states. He was able to accomplish this in large part by his skillful writing of letters in which the fictitious correspondent explicitly recreates his or her inward being."

Elizabeth Brophy has commented on his first novel's psychological vividness: "By 'writing to the moment' he enabled readers to follow the inward struggles of Pamela, to participate in her uncertainties, and to undergo her trials."

Recent critical debates about Clarissa concern the heroine's degree of power. Michael Suarez contends that Clarissa's power is her ability to refuse: "Clarissa's 'No' is an attempt to assert her own autonomy, to secure her right to a will of her own"; and Donnalee Frega regards Clarissa's self-imposed starvation as a form of power.

The title character of Richardson's Sir Charles Grandison is an idealized man: "In his aspect there is something great and noble, that shews him to be of rank. Were kings to be chosen for beauty and majesty of person, Sir Charles Grandison would have few competitors." Richardson explains:

The Example of a Man acting uniformly well thro' a Variety of trying Scenes, because all his Actions are regulated by one steady Principle: A Man of Religion and Virtue; of Liveliness and Spirit; accomplished and agreeable; happy in himself, and a Blessing to others.

Critic Jocelyn Harris holds that "Grandison as an individual work is often an advance on Clarissa. The variety, the gaiety smoothly integrated with seriousness, the deft handling of a large group of characters . . . such matters frequently outclass anything that Richardson had done before."

Finally, in The Rise of the Novel, Ian Watt remarks:

Richardson's deep imaginative commitment to all the problems of the new sexual ideology and his personal devotion to the exploration of the private and subjective aspects of human experience produced a novel where the relationship between the protagonists embodies a universe of moral and social conflicts of a scale and complexity beyond anything in previous fiction.

Other Works by Samuel Richardson

The Clarissa Project. Edited by Florian Stuber. New York: AMS Press, 1990.

Selected Letters. Edited by John Carroll. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1964.

Works about Samuel Richardson

Blewett, David, ed. Passion and Virtue: Essays on the Novels of Samuel Richardson. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2001.

Eaves, T. C. Duncan, and Ben D. Kimpel. Samuel Richardson: A Biography. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1971.

Warner, William Beatty. Reading Clarissa: The Struggles of Interpretation. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1979.

Riebeeck, Jan van (1618–1677) diarist

Jan Anthoniszoon van Riebeeck was born in Culemborg in the Netherlands. At age 20, he joined the mighty Dutch East India Company as an assistant surgeon and was posted to Batavia (modern Jakarta, Indonesia). In 1645 the company gave the ambitious Riebeeck command of a trading station in present-day Vietnam. He was soon dismissed from this post for engaging in his own trading ventures, a practice strictly discouraged by the East India Company.

Riebeeck remained in their black books until 1652, when the company ordered him to establish a station to provision the company's ships at the Cape of Good Hope, midway on their long journey around Africa to the East Indies. Riebeeck arrived at the site of modern-day Cape Town in April of that year. He landed with 100 men and built a fort and infirmary as well as a primitive port. Food shortages bedeviled the settlement, however, and in 1655 Riebeeck advocated sending "free burghers" from Holland to work their own farms (as opposed to slaves or indentured servants). He thus paved the way for the settlement of South Africa and the origins of the Boer people, descendants of the first settlers who began arriving in 1657. Under his leadership, the colonists fought a bloody war with the nearby Hottentot people in 1659–60.

Riebeeck had long believed his talents were being wasted, and in 1662 he was delighted to be appointed governor of Malacca in the East Indies. Three years later, he became secretary to the Council of India, one of the most prestigious offices in the company's Asian empire. He died in Batavia, and occupies a hallowed place in Boer memory, the "Father of South Africa" after whom many streets, towns, and landmarks are named. His voluminous Journals, though rather ponderous reading by modern standards, are detailed accounts of the founding of Cape Town.

A Work by Jan van Riebeeck

Journal, 3 vols. Cape Town: Van Riebeeck Society, 1952–58.

A Work about Jan van Riebeeck

Spilhaus, Margaret Whiting. Company's Men. Cape Town: J. Malherbe, 1973.

romance

In literature, the term romance encompasses several types of writing. To modern readers, a romance is simply a love story where plot and event are secondary to the emotions of the characters. The first important romance was Daphnis and Chloe, written by Longus in ancient Greek. The romance genre began to evolve in the Middle Ages and initially referred to any narrative written in the vernacular or native language. The medieval romance differed from the EPIC in that it featured lighter subject matter; though they might borrow epic events and involve issues of heroism, strength, or greatness, the romances typically featured knights and ladies and described their adventures in terms of chivalry and courtly love. The romance possessed qualities of lightness and mystery, and tended to be looser in construction than the weighty epic.

During the RENAISSANCE, the romance transformed into a new genre, the romantic epic. The style gained popularity and achieved credibility as a lengthy narrative poem combining aspects of medieval romance with features of the classical epic. The traditional elements of the romance, such as a loose structure and an emphasis on love, incorporated such epic conventions as elaborate similes, long speeches, and an invocation to a muse to turn love into the greatest and most lofty pursuit available to the human soul.

Italian Renaissance poets Matteo Maria Boiardo and Ludovico ARIOSTO used the romantic epic form in their lengthy verse narratives on Roland, which elaborate on the medieval Song of Roland. Torquato TASSO added a stronger moral element to the form with his Jerusalem Delivered (1581). English poet Edmund Spenser used the form for a religious, moral, and nationalistic purpose in his dense poem The Faerie Queene (1596, unfinished).

Don Quixote (1605) by Miguel de CERVANTES was and still is lauded as the greatest prose romance, as well as the precursor to the modern novel, which often incorporates a romantic storyline. The domestic fiction, which took form in 18th-century England, often involved a romance between characters, as seen in the works of Samuel RICHARDSON and Henry Fielding. The Gothic tales of Matthew Lewis, Horace Walpole, and Ann Radcliffe introduced a supernatural element into the romance, and the Romantic movements in England, Germany, France, and Spain spread to the Americas and left an enduring imprint on literature to come. Today, the romance is a popular genre of the mass media market and comprises a significant segment of book sales around the world.

Works of Romance

Lewis, Matthew Gregory. The Monk: A Romance.

Edited by Christopher Maclachlan. New York: Penguin, 1999.

Middle English Romances. Edited by Stephen Shepherd. New York: W.W. Norton, 1995.

Seven Viking Romances. Edited by Hermann Palsson. New York: Penguin, 1986.

Works about Romance

Brackett, Virginia. Classic Love and Romance Literature: An Encyclopedia of Works, Characters, Authors, and Themes. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO, 1999.

Gwara, Joseph, and E. Michael Gerli. Studies on the Spanish Sentimental Romance (1440–1550). London: Tamesis Books, 1997.

Keller, Hans-Erich. Romance Epic. Kalamazoo: Western Michigan University, 1987.

Mussell, Kay, ed. Where's Love Gone: Transformations in the Romance Genre. Los Angeles: Delta Productions, 1997.

Sommer, Doris. Foundational Fictions: The National Romances of Latin America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Ronsard, Pierre de (1524–1585) poet

The day after his birth to Louis de Ronsard and Jeanne de Chaudrier in the Vendômois of France, the infant Pierre was dropped while being carried to the church for christening. The story goes that the flowers caught him gently, and that moment established his affinity with the natural world that would emerge so skillfully in his poetry. Son to a knight of the king, Pierre de Ronsard became a page to the French court in 1536 and, in 1539, entered the Royal Riding School in Paris for the sons of noblemen. At college in Paris he studied Greek and Latin, which exposed him to the myths and characters of classical antiquity. While recovering from bouts of fever that left him partially deaf, the adolescent Ronsard began composing poetry. Several successful early publications brought him to court, where he had various important patrons but was most dear to Charles IX, for whom he became court poet. After the death of the king, he retired to the priories or church domains that had been granted to him and continued to compose, revise, and publish successive editions of his work. Following prolonged bouts of illness, Ronsard died in 1585, having earned an enduring reputation as “the prince of poets.”

Ronsard’s combined poetic endeavors constitute nearly 20 volumes of work. His first Odes, published in 1550, marked a turning point in the history of French poetry. Ronsard scorned the traditions that treated poetry as a mere craft and instead advocated a return to the ideals of the Greco-Roman age in which poetry was inspired by the muses and poets were considered prophets, seers, and interpreters of the divine mystery of the universe. Ronsard, who modeled his Odes on Pindar and Horace, was often criticized for using this artificial and ancient form to capture and describe contemporary events. But the Odes exhibit the familiarity with metaphor and myth as well as the control of poetic feeling and technique that established his fame.

In 1552 Ronsard published his first collection of SONNETS, a form he borrowed from PETRARCH. The abundance of classical allusions in these poems can strike readers as being excessive or even tedious, but the topics and language show the Ronsard who is best remembered as a sensitive lover of nature, mourning for beauty that inevitably fades. He frequently incorporated the theme of carpe diem, to seize the delights of life before they pass, and skillfully refreshed conventional images of nature, adding a poignant touch, as in these lines translated by Nicholas Kilmer:

*Fall chases summer,
And the harsh raging of wind
Falls after storm.
But the pain
Of love’s grieving
Stays constant in me
And will not falter.*

Though best remembered for his lyric poetry, much of which was set to music during his lifetime, Ronsard tried his hand at a variety of forms, among them elegies and occasional verse. Two books of Hymns were published in 1555 and 1556. His poems from the period 1559–74 show the consequences of being court poet in a climate of civil-religious wars, in which Ronsard took the side of the Catholics against the Protestants. These poems have a patriotic tone and contain pleas for peace, moderation, and loyalty to king and church.

After he withdrew from court following Charles’s death in 1574, Ronsard wrote poems that often contain a personal touch and a mature consciousness, best reflected in the Sonnets to Helene (1578). Here the conventional themes and restrained form of the sonnet clash with the poet’s disillusionment with love and convey, in some cases, a note of irony or, as in these lines, hopelessness:

The wound is to the bone. I am no longer the man I was.

*I see my death abandoned to despair.
Patience is cast off. . . .*

As he aged, Ronsard turned more and more to the great themes of the ancients: the changeability of fortune and the vanity of human wishes. His last poems, published the year of his death, are elegiac in tone, full of philosophical speculation.

Despite popularity in his lifetime, fashions in French poetry changed, and Ronsard was forgotten until the 1830s. While critical opinion still varies on Ronsard's depth and complexity as a poet, he represents the humanist spirit of the French Renaissance and is remembered as one of the greatest and most influential lyric poets ever to compose in that language.

English Versions of Works by Pierre de Ronsard

Poems of Pierre de Ronsard. Translated and edited by Nicholas Kilmer. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1979.

Pierre de Ronsard: Selected Poems. Translated by Malcolm Quainton and Elizabeth Vinestock. New York: Penguin Books, 2002.

A Work about Pierre de Ronsard

Jones, K. R. W. Pierre de Ronsard. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1970.

Rosales, Diego de (1601–1677) chronicler
Father Diego de Rosales was one of the first chroniclers and writers of Chile in the era of Spanish colonization. His most important work, Historia general del Reino de Chile (General History of the Kingdom of Chile), is one of the first eyewitness accounts written in Spanish about the region.

Rosales was born in Madrid, where he entered the order of Jesuits. In 1629 he went to Chile to serve as army chaplain. While there he took keen interest in the customs of the Mapuche tribes. His knowledge of the Araucan language of the natives made him especially valuable to successive Spanish governors of Chile. Thus, Rosales was asked in 1641 and again in 1647 to accompany officials on missions to assist in negotiations with the native inhabitants of Chile.

In 1650 he received a commission to make a systematic study of the tribes and went on two journeys for this purpose. However, due to Spanish exploitation of the natives for slave labor in the mines, a revolt ensued in 1655, leading to the evacuation of Baroa by the Spanish.

Thereafter, Rosales was transferred to Concepción, where he was appointed director of the Jesuit school. He continued his steady climb up the ranks of the Jesuit order and in 1662 moved to the capital at Santiago, where he assumed leadership of the Jesuit order in Chile. In 1666 he also took charge of the Jesuit college there.

Rosales's history of Chile contains some of the earliest descriptions of the geographical features, flora, fauna, and indigenous peoples of the region, as well as events occurring there up to the 1655 revolt.

Among other works by Diego Rosales worthy of note is a history of the Jesuits in Chile. It is a series of biographical portraits, typical of the writing of this time, of the major missionaries with numerous accounts of miracles. Unfortunately, only parts of the work have survived.

Despite the flaws that make them unreliable for historical study, Rosales's books are still of immense importance for the insight they provide into Spanish colonization and the spread of Christianity in Chile. Unfortunately, English translations of his works are no longer in print.

Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778) philosopher

During the 18th century, a wave of intellectual activity known as the ENLIGHTENMENT swept over Europe, affecting such fields as philosophy, religion, science, and politics. The writers and thinkers of the age, many of whom were known as philosophes, challenged long-accepted beliefs and traditions, arguing that RATIONALISM should be the primary tool through which people discovered the truth. Toward the end of the Enlightenment, however, the views of the philosophes would be challenged by the powerful ideas of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, who turned the intellectual currents of European thought away from pure reason and toward human emotion and intuition, setting the stage for the rise of romanticism. Furthermore, the political ideas espoused by Rousseau helped spark the French Revolution and would subsequently contribute to the many revolutions that would shake Europe throughout the 19th century.

Rousseau was born in the independent Swiss city of Geneva, then an independent republic. Ten days after his birth, his mother died from complications of childbirth. He was raised by his father, a watchmaker, and other relatives. Geneva was then a Calvinist state, adhering to a strict form of Protestantism, and it was in this religious environment that Rousseau grew up. Irritated with life in Geneva, he moved to Savoy, a Catholic region, where he was taken in by Madame de Warens, an agent of the king of Savoy. Under her influence, he rejected Protestantism and converted to Catholicism.

Rousseau lived with Madame de Warens for eight years as both a friend and a lover, during which time he undertook an intense program of self-study. He studied Latin, literature, science, philosophy, and music. Surrounded by the beautiful countryside, he also developed a strong love of nature.

Rousseau worked briefly as the secretary to the French ambassador to Venice. When Madame de Warens took another lover in 1742, he moved to Paris, where he was determined to become respected and famous. He earned his wages as a copier of music, while writing his own musical compositions. Although his musical works were not particularly successful, music remained one of Rousseau's great loves. During this time, he also became acquainted with a number of philosophes, including Denis DIDEROT and wrote several articles on music and economics for the famous ENCYCLOPEDIA.

In 1749 Rousseau learned that the Academy of Dijon was sponsoring an essay competition, the question being whether or not the revival of the arts and sciences had helped or hurt the human race. He pondered this question as he walked along a country road on his way to visit Diderot, who was in prison in Vincennes at the time. During this walk, Rousseau experienced a sudden "awakening," or awareness, which he later described in terms resembling a religious experience. He resolved to enter the contest and wrote an essay setting out his belief that the arts and sciences had, in fact, hurt the human race.

His essay, Discourse on the Arts and Sciences, won the Académie de Dijon prize after its publication in 1751 and made him famous virtually overnight. In this work, Rousseau explains his belief that the development of science—in the form of agriculture, which necessitated the need for private property and the division of labor—made humanity lose sight of its true nature and thus helped destroy individual liberty. Such loss and destruction, he reasoned, created political power based on and serving the wealthy. As for the arts, Rousseau believed that they merely distracted people from the fact that their liberty had been lost.

Rousseau argued that people should turn their backs on civilization and return to a more natural state of existence, for this was where he believed true nobility of spirit could be found. Thus, the idea of the "noble savage" was born. This idea became very fashionable among the French upper class, but it proved to be little more than a fad, as it did not allow for the luxuries to which the nobility was accustomed.

Rather than enjoying his fame, Rousseau became uncomfortable with the attention he received. He decided to practice what he preached and abandoned his life in Paris for a cottage in the countryside, where he lived with his barely literate mistress, Thérèse Levasseur, whom he did not marry until late in life. He later gained the patronage of the marshal- duke of Luxembourg, and during the years from 1756 to 1762 produced his three greatest and most well-known works (The Social Contract, Émile, and Julie, or the New Heloise), as well as Moral Letters (which he addressed to Sophie d'Houdetor, a former lover) and Letter to d'Alembert (in response to d'ALEMBERT's Encyclopedia articles on Geneva).

In 1761 Rousseau published La Nouvelle Héloïse, a love story told in the form of letters between a young woman named Julie and her tutor, St. Preux, who develop a passionate affair. Although the book was said to be based upon Rousseau's dreams and fantasies of love, Rousseau used the tale he created in reality as a means to express his own views of morality to his European audience. The book met with great success.

A year after the publication of La Nouvelle Héloïse, Rousseau published two works: Émile and The Social Contract. In Émile, Rousseau uses the tale of a young man as a device to convey his views on education, which were revolutionary at the time. Rousseau believed that natural judgment and intuition, rather than intellect, should be nurtured. Furthermore, he believed that teachers should endeavor to discover what the natural inclinations and interests of a child were and then labor to develop them within the child, rather than try to steer the child in directions society expected the child to go. The Social Contract presents Rousseau's ideas in the field of political theory. Both Émile and The Social Contract would prove to be powerful contributions to Western intellectual thought.

In the last years of his life, Rousseau seemed to become increasingly unstable. He broke with his friend Diderot and engaged in a long-running dispute with VOLTAIRE, who held Rousseau in contempt after he dared to criticize the theater. He also wrote Letter to Christophe de Beaumont (1763), in which he criticizes the archbishop of Paris, and Letters Written on the Mountain (1764), in which he describes his distaste for the power of the elite. Due to the unorthodox ideas presented in Émile, the French authorities ordered the book confiscated and the author arrested. Rousseau fled to Great Britain, where he received the generous help of the Scottish philosopher, David Hume. However, Rousseau proved ungrateful to Hume, accusing the Scot of plotting against him. Rousseau became increasingly paranoid, convinced that everyone was seeking to undermine or persecute him. To some extent, this was true.

During these years, Rousseau wrote the Confessions, which is perhaps the first modern autobiography. He also composed Letter on French Music (1753), Essay on the Origin of Languages (1753), Dictionary of Music (1767), two works on politics, several works on botany, and enough correspondence with friends and enemies alike to fill more than 50 volumes (which were collected and edited by R. A. Leigh in 1965). In his last years, Rousseau returned to France, finally married his longtime mistress, with whom he had five children, and later died at Ermenonville, in the home of a sympathetic friend, the marquis de Girardin. As a hero of the French Revolution, which began approximately eight years after Rousseau's death, the author's remains were later moved to the Pantheon in Paris, where he would lay beside such other notables as Voltaire and Mirabeau.

Critical Analysis

The Social Contract, published in 1762, is perhaps Rousseau's most influential work. The ideas contained in the work were not wholly original, however; English philosopher John LOCKE had discussed similar ideas a century before. But by systematizing the concept of the social contract and presenting it so that it was accessible to the public, Rousseau made a powerful contribution to the spread of the new political ideas of the 18th century.

The general concept of a social contract is fairly easy to illustrate. Rousseau, like Locke, believed that human beings once lived in a natural state, each person trying to survive on his or her own. However, for mutual benefit, people gradually united together to take advantage of the strengths of a group. This was the origin of society and civilization that allowed people to enjoy certain advantages, such as mutual protection from common enemies, and that required people to agree to follow the rules society imposed. For example, in the state of nature, there is no protection against being murdered, but in a society, rules and safeguards are put into place to try and prevent murder. The price a person pays for accepting such protection is to agree not to commit murder; thus, a social contract is formed.

In The Social Contract, Rousseau presents the idea of the General Will, the collective desire of all the members of a society. This is similar to the idea of the Volksgeist articulated by Johann HERDER. The idea of the General Will formed the basis for the nationalist movements that transformed Europe after Rousseau's death. In particular, The Social Contract was regarded almost as a textbook by the activists of the French Revolution, who used it to justify their destruction of the old order.

Rousseau's influence is difficult to overstate. He is certainly one of the most influential writers in all of Western thought. His renunciation of rationalism in favor of pure nature and the power of human emotion set the stage for the advent of Romanticism, which dominated European intellectual and cultural life throughout the 19th century. The political ideas expressed in The Social Contract set the stage for both the French Revolution and many nationalistic revolutions that followed. While some, such as Leo Tolstoy, viewed Rousseau in a positive light, others claimed the author was responsible for the destruction of society as they knew it. Throughout the 19th and 20th centuries, it is fair to say that there was not a single important thinker or writer who was not, directly or indirectly, influenced by the ideas of Rousseau.

English Versions of Works by Jean-Jacques Rousseau

The Collected Writings of Jean-Jacques Rousseau.

Edited by Roger D. Masters and Christopher Kelly. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1989.

Confessions. Translated by Patrick Coleman and edited by Angela Scholar. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Emile, or Treatise on Education. Translated by William H. Payne. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 2003.

The Social Contract and The First and Second Discourses. Edited by Gita May and Susan Dunn. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002.

Works about Jean-Jacques Rousseau

Compayre, Gabriel. Jean Jacques Rousseau and Education from Nature. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2002.

Friedlander, Eli. J. J. Rousseau: An Afterlife of Words. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2004.

Lange, Lynda, ed. Feminist Interpretations of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Preface by Nancy Tuana. University Park: Pennsylvania University Press, 2002.

O'Hagan, Timothy. Rousseau. London: Routledge, 2003.

Qvortrup, Mads. The Political Philosophy of Jean-Jacques Rousseau: The Impossibility of Reason. Manchester, U.K.: Manchester University Press, 2004.

Reisert, Joseph R. Jean-Jacques Rousseau: A Friend of Virtue. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.

Rowlandson, Mary (ca. 1635–ca. 1711) memoirist

Mary White was born in England to John and Joane White and immigrated to Massachusetts with her family in 1639. In 1656, when in her early 20s, she wed Joseph Rowlandson, a minister of the town of Lancaster, and in the following years gave birth to four children.

In 1682 Rowlandson published A Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson, an autobiographical account of her capture by Native Americans at the height of King Philip's War. The war began in 1675, when Metacomet (called King Philip) formed an alliance to fight the colonists' usurpation of Native American lands. Rowlandson's narrative opens with a description of the extremely bloody attack on Lancaster. Several members of her family were murdered, while both Rowlandson and her youngest daughter were taken captive. Rowlandson's account, divided into sections called "Removes," details the physical, spiritual, and psychological challenges she faced during her 11 weeks and five days of captivity.

Rowlandson's captivity narrative was enormously popular: It was reprinted three times in 1682 and more than a dozen editions of it appeared in the following centuries. Like the many captivity narratives that followed in its wake, Rowlandson's text is highly religious in its tone and incorporates a moral theme in its conclusions that her "punishment" was brought about by failure in her Christian duties. Rowlandson's narrative is important to scholars because it allows readers to witness one woman's private struggle to make sense of a painful experience in terms of her Puritan belief. In addition, the autobiography documents the transformation of a colonist's perceptions of Native Americans. At first Rowlandson considers them inhumane and devilish creatures, but over time she comes to recognize their humanity and to experience their compassion.

After her husband ransomed her, Rowlandson returned home. She remarried after her husband's death in 1678 and lived in Connecticut until her death in 1711.

A Work by Mary Rowlandson

Sovereignty and Goodness of God, Together With the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed: Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson. New York: Bedford/St. Martin's, 1997.

Works about Mary Rowlandson

Breitwieser, Mitchell R. American Puritanism and the Defense of Mourning: Religion, Grief, and Ethnology in Mary White Rowlandson's Captivity Narrative. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1992.

Casiglia, Christopher. Bound and Determined: Captivity, Culture-Crossing, and White Womanhood from Mary Rowlandson to Patty Hearst. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

Rowson, Susanna (1762–1824) fiction writer Susanna Haswell Rowson was born in Portsmouth, England, the daughter of a lieutenant in the British navy. When Rowson was a baby, her father moved to Massachusetts to pursue a career as a royal customs officer. As a young adult, Rowson became a governess in the household of the duchess of Devonshire. She also began writing and publishing stories and poems. The duchess encouraged Rowson's literary aspirations and subsidized the publication of her first novel, Victoria (1786). She married William Rowson in 1786 and continue to write assiduously, publishing four more novels in quick succession in the 1790s, the most famous of which is Charlotte: A Tale of Truth (1791), later titled Charlotte Temple. In 1797, Rowson opened a girls' school in Boston. She ran the school for the next 25 years, becoming highly respected as an educator.

An American edition of Charlotte: A Tale of Truth appeared in Philadelphia in 1794. Written as a cautionary tale "for the perusal of the young and thoughtless of the fair sex," it captivated its mostly female readers. A seductive British officer, John Montraville, persuades the attractive and innocent Charlotte to accompany him to colonial New York, where he abandons her for another woman. Charlotte dies after bearing Montraville's child and after he has turned her away when she seeks refuge with him during a snowstorm. The novel's prose, often overwrought, carries a powerful moral message, and Charlotte: A Tale of Truth became one of the most celebrated novels in the new republic.

One of the reasons for the popularity of Rowson's novels was their subtext that pitted democratic values against aristocratic corruption and immorality. Charlotte Temple continues to interest critics and scholars of the present day.

Works by Susanna Rowson

Charlotte Temple. Introduction by Jane Smiley. New York: Random House, 2004.

Mary: Or the Test of Honour. Temecula, Calif.: Reprint Services Corp., 1999.

Miscellaneous Poems. Murieta, Calif.: Classic Books, 2004.

Slaves in Algiers: A Struggle for Freedom. Edited by Jennifer Margulis and Karen M. Poremski. Acton, Mass.: Copley Publishing, 2000.

Victoria, 1786: The Inquisitor: Or, Invisible Rambler. Temecula, Calif.: Reprint Services Corp., 1999.

Works about Susanna Rowson

Bontatibus, Donna. The Seduction Novel of the Early Nation. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1999.

Parker, Patricia L. Susanna Rowson. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

Ruiz de Alarcón, Juan (de Alarcón y Mendoza) (1580–1639) playwright

Juan Ruiz de Alarcón is one of the four greatest dramatists of the Spanish Siglo de Oro, or Golden Age. He was born in Mexico to Spanish parents and was deformed from birth with a hunchback. At age 33, Ruiz de Alarcón established himself in Spain for the longer and more productive part of his life. Although he is remembered primarily as a playwright, he was by profession a lawyer. By self-admission, he wrote his plays primarily for income, yet it is apparent that he took pride and care in crafting his 24 plays.

It is thought that a combination of Ruiz de Alarcón's deformity, his personality, and persecution from other writers of the age created the moral resentment that he expresses in his plays. He wrote comedies of manners in which he illustrates particular moral truths. As a keen observer of social abuses and follies, he attacks vices such as lying, slander, and inconstancy through his characters. Surprisingly, however, his plays display very little bitterness; rather, they convey concern with human values, conduct, and relationships.

His best-known work is La verdad sospechosa (The Truth Suspect). It is considered to be Alarcón's best drama and has firmly established him among the great playwrights of Spain and the world. Both Pierre CORNEILLE and Carlo GOLDONI used this play as a source for some of their works.

Other works by Ruiz de Alarcón include La prueba de las promesas (The Test of Promises), another structural and thematic masterpiece and a study of ingratitude; Las paredes oyen (The Walls Have Ears), a COMEDY OF MANNERS that illustrates the ill effects of slander; and No hay mal que por bien no venga (It Is an Ill Wind That Blows No Good), in which Ruiz de Alarcón creates a psychological picture, rather than a moral lesson, through characterization.

Ruiz de Alarcón's contributions to the comedia, the Spanish stage, and to world theater include carefully crafted plots, a minimum of extraneous activity, a direct and straightforward style, and masterful psychological development.

An English Version of a Work by Juan Ruiz de Alarcón

Truth Can't Be Trusted or the Liar. Translated by Daikin Matthews. New Orleans, La.: University Press of the South, 1998.

A Work about Juan Ruiz de Alarcón

Poesse, Walter. Juan Ruiz De Alarcón. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1972.

Ruusbroec, Jan van (1293–1381) theologian

Jan van Ruusbroec was born in the small town of Ruusbroec (or Ruisbroek), just south of Brussels in what was then the province of Brabant. At age 11 he left his mother and moved to Brussels, where his uncle, Jan Hinckaert, took charge of his education in Latin, grammar and rhetoric, and the arts. In 1317 he was ordained and made a chaplain at St. Gudula. In 1343 he withdrew with his uncle and his friend Vrank van Coudenberg to the forest of Soignes to lead a more secluded and contemplative life. The community, Groenendaal, adopted the Rule of St. Augustine in 1350 and thus became an official monastery, of which Ruusbroec was made prior. He spent the remainder of his life there pursuing what he considered his calling: a life of prayer and of helping others discover their own spiritual mission.

Ruusbroec's writings about his spiritual experiences have earned him recognition as one of the finest theologians of the late medieval period and an important contributor to trinitarian thinking. Ruusbroec lived during times troubled by plague, the Hundred Years' War, political revolts, and radical social changes. In addition, the church was troubled by movements outside of the accepted religious orders, including the Beguines and the Brethern of the Free Spirit who did not recognize official church authority. Himself an orthodox Catholic, Ruusbroec saw a widespread need for spiritual instruction, and by writing in Dutch hoped to make his teachings accessible to a broader audience.

Ruusbroec's first book, The Kingdom of Lovers, written between 1330 and 1340, was not intended for publication, and Ruusbroec expressed dismay when he realized his clerk had circulated it. The book described the spiritual life as a progress toward God through a series of seven holy gifts. The text proved difficult for some readers, and Ruusbroec strove to organize his thoughts on the development of the spiritual life in his second and major work, The Spiritual Espousals (ca. 1335). In three parts, the text addresses human growth toward a personal encounter with God through three levels: the active life or the life of virtue, the life of yearning, and the contemplative life.

The next treatise Ruusbroec wrote, The Sparkling Stone, summarizes the main points of the Spiritual Espousals and transcribes a conversation he reportedly had with a hermit on how to achieve the contemplative life. The Four Temptations describes the dangers that can lead one away from the spiritual life, including pursuit of bodily pleasures, hypocrisy, arrogance, and laziness. The Christian Faith was a simple explanation of the 12 articles of the creed. The Spiritual Tabernacle, the last of the works written in Brussels, proved to be his longest work and the most popular during his own time, judging from the number of existing manuscripts. The text provided a detailed and elaborate allegorical narrative from the Old Testament about the building of the Ark of the Covenant.

Ruusbroec composed his next works, which have a female audience in mind, after 1350. The Beguines were women who decided to live a religious life but did not take vows in a convent. Some contemporaries reviled the practice and considered the Beguines heretics, but Ruusbroec did not appear to share this opinion. The Seven Enclosures (1350), The Mirror of Eternal Blessedness (1359), and the later Seven Rungs were addressed to Margareta van Meerbeke, a nun of Clare whom Ruusbroec often visited. The Little Book of Clarification, probably composed after 1360, provided commentary on Ruusbroec's first book. His last work is The Twelve Beguines. He also left behind a set of letters.

During his life, translations of his works in German and Latin appeared, and after his death in English, Italian, French, and Spanish. The breadth of circulation affirms the number of people interested in Ruusbroec's recommendations for leading the spiritual and contemplative life. Based largely on his personal experience but also borrowing from orthodox sources and deeply respectful to church authority, Ruusbroec's writings exemplify the joyful faith and loving relationship with the divine that have proved inspirational for later generations seeking a spiritual path. Among other Middle Dutch or Flemish exponents of theories of love-mysticism such as Beatrice of Nazareth and Hadewijch of Antwerp, Ruusbroec remains, in the words of scholar Paul Verdeyen, "the brightest star in a constellation of spiritual writers."

An English Version of Works by Jan van Ruusbroec

John Ruusbroec: The Spiritual Espousals and Other Works. Translated by James A. Wiseman. Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist Press, 1986.

A Work about Jan van Ruusbroec

Verdeyen, Paul. Ruusbroec and His Mysticism. Translated by André Lefevere. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1994.

Ryokan (Yamamoto Eizo) (1758–1831) poet, Zen Buddhist priest

The Zen poet Ryokan was born Yamamoto Eizo in Izumozaki on the northwest coast of the big island of Japan. His father was a HAIKU poet, village leader, and custodian of the local Shinto shrine. At age 17, Yamamoto began religious training at a local Zen Buddhist temple, shaved his head, became a monk, and took the religious name Ryokan.

Ryokan spent from 1779 to 1789 as a disciple of the Zen master Kokusen. After achieving full enlightenment, he became a Zen master and spent five years wandering about the country. Little is known of his whereabouts or what he did during this period.

After his father committed suicide in 1795, Ryokan came back to his native region, where he stayed in a number of temples before settling into a small hut on Mount Kugami in 1804. He remained there for 13 years. While many Zen masters had a temple of their own, Ryokan spent his time alone, meditating and writing poetry, dubbing himself the “Great Fool” because of his hermetic existence. Despite his self-disparaging nickname, he lived a long, productive life.

Ryokan primarily wrote tanka—31-syllable poems divided among five lines. His subjects ranged from daily chores, to the seasons, to talks with friends. Though he achieved renown as a poet and calligrapher, he did not collect his work in volumes. Instead, he gave occasional pieces to friends or acquaintances who shared his great talents with others. Scholars have accumulated more than 1,800 of his poems written in both Japanese and Chinese, many of which have been collected in English translations.

English Versions of Works by Ryokan

Between the Floating Mist Poems of Ryokan. Translated by Dennis Maloney and Hide Oshiro. Buffalo, N.Y.: Springhouse Editions, 1992.

Great Fool: Zen Master Ryokan—Poems, Letters, and Other Writings. Translated by Ryuichi Abe and Peter Haskel. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1996.

The Zen Poems of Ryokan. Translated by Nobuyuki Yuasa. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981.

Works about Ryokan

Kownacki, Mary Lou. Between Two Should: Conversations with Ryokan. Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdmans, 2004.

Stevens, John. Three Zen Masters: Ikkyu, Hakuin, Ryokan. New York: Kodansha America, 1993.

Sachs, Hans (1494–1576) poet, dramatist, essayist, Meistersinger

Hans Sachs was born in the city of Nuremberg to a tailor family. As a youth he attended a Latin school, which allowed him to become familiar with the classical literary tradition. After finishing school, he was trained to be a shoemaker, the trade he would practice, along with singing and writing, for the rest of his life. At age 16, Sachs set out on foot on a journey through the cultural centers of southwestern Germany. It was on this trip that he was exposed to the art of Meistergesang, a German tradition of popular song and performance that dates to the Middle Ages. Upon his return to Nuremberg, he established his own shoemaking shop, married, began writing carnival plays, and studied to become a Meistersinger.

As the Reformation spread through Germany and Europe, Sachs immersed himself in Martin LUTHER's writings. Sachs was very much moved by the reformist's message and in 1523 wrote a pamphlet in defense of Luther's principles and beliefs. The so-called Wittenbergisch Nachtigall (Wittenbergischer Nightingale) was popular, but also sparked fierce controversy, and Sachs soon found himself in the middle of a fierce dialectical battle. At the same time the shoemaker's poems and versions of the psalms had also become popular, and he was thus a well-known figure not just in Nuremberg but also throughout Germany. His bitter verbal attacks on the pope and clergy were, however, frowned upon by Nuremberg authorities, and in 1527 he was prohibited from publishing there.

Sachs's Ode to the City of Nuremberg (1530), in which he characterizes the city as a kind of paradise where citizens and the city council work together in blissful harmony, may very well have motivated the lifting of the publication ban against him. Thereafter he once again began writing and publishing essays on religious and political themes, though his writing seemed to be less controversial. From this time on he lived comfortably with his family, practicing the trade of shoemaking and continuing his literary and artistic activities, which included directing a singing school and producing his own theatrical works. He died at age 82 in his native city of Nuremberg.

It is not any single work by Sachs, but the incredible extent of his writing and the influence it had on his own and future generations that distinguishes him as a major figure in German literature. His work can be divided into various genres, though there is some crossover between styles and forms. His extensive works of Meistergesang were and are less well known, as they were typically performed only by private societies and rarely published. Yet it was precisely the nonpublic nature of these compositions that allowed Sachs to experiment with themes and language that would otherwise have been censored. His poetry offers a stark contrast to the Meistergesang in that it had a much broader audience and conformed for the most part to the established lyrical tradition of the age. His prose dialogues, though a less important facet of his literary work, were revolutionary both for their form and content. In these he took on themes related to Christian faith and the role of the common man in religious and governmental institutions. His dramatic writings included both carnival plays and classical drama, and were often based on biblical scenes or works of medieval and ancient literature.

In more ways than one Sachs represented a new kind of author for his time. For one, he combined his artistic activities with his profession as a tradesman. This trade afforded him financial independence from aristocratic or religious patrons and, as a result, afforded him a unique freedom in choosing subject, style, and genre. For the breadth of his writings, as well as for his humanistic perspective and intense political engagement, the Nuremberg shoemaker stands out as an enigmatic but crucial figure in the development of German thought and literature.

An English Version of Works by Hans Sachs

Nine Carnival Plays. Translated by Randall Listerman.

Ottawa: Dovehouse Editions, 1990.

Sade, marquis de (Donatien-Alphonse-François de Sade) (1740–1814) novelist

The word sadist describes a person who enjoys inflicting cruel pain on others. The word comes from the name of the French novelist, the marquis de Sade, who lived and worked in France during the 18th and early 19th centuries. His writings contain flashes of literary skill mixed with foul and disgusting descriptions of excessive vice. He is famous today for his graphic descriptions of sexual exploitation, as well as for the bizarre events of his life.

The marquis de Sade was born in Paris. His parents were nobles associated with the court of Louis XV, king of France. During the mid-18th century, the upper class of France was enjoying an age of pleasure-seeking and luxurious overindulgence. It was also the Age of ENLIGHTENMENT, when philosophically minded writers such as VOLTAIRE and Denis DIDEROT were challenging conventional traditions regarding politics, science, and religion.

After receiving an education at a Jesuit school, Sade joined the French army and served as a cavalry officer during the Seven Years' War. He began the life of a libertine after the fighting ended. He had affairs with actresses in Paris and constantly solicited the services of prostitutes. These activities shocked the people of Paris, and the police kept Sade under observation. Despite his marriage in 1763 to Renée-Pélagie de Montreuil, his immoral way of life continued, and many people who came into contact with him accused him of assault.

The French authorities became increasingly disturbed at Sade's behavior, and he was arrested in 1777. In 1784 he was transferred to the Bastille, the most notorious of all French prisons. It was during his imprisonment in the Bastille that he wrote 120 Days of Sodom, his first major work and the one for which he is best known.

120 Days of Sodom is the story of four men who have achieved sudden wealth through corruption and the murder of their own relatives. The characters are utter scoundrels whose only goals in life are to satisfy their own perverted desires and to cause pain and suffering to other human beings. The plot is simple, with the four characters spending 120 days together at the chateau of Silling. They go to considerable trouble to bring in the most alluring young men and women to serve as subjects for their perverse experiments. In addition to being sexually exploitive, the activities of the four characters often feature bizarre insults to religious symbols. The entire story is, in essence, a collection of the foulest and most disturbing thoughts that emanated from the marquis de Sade's mind.

Sade was released from prison when the Bastille was destroyed at the beginning of the French Revolution. However, after some involvement in revolutionary politics, he was once again thrown in jail and only narrowly escaped being executed.

During this time period, he continued to write novels and plays. His novel Justine is the story of two sisters, one of whom is moral while the other is wicked. In keeping with Sade's view of the world, the virtuous sister experiences a life of sadness and horrible misfortune, while the unscrupulous sister lives in ease and comfort, wealthy after having murdered her husband and receiving a large inheritance.

In 1801, with France now under the rule of Napoleon, Sade was once again arrested for scandalous writings. A few years later, he was transferred to the insane asylum of Charenton. He lived out the rest of his life there, continuing to secretly write despite the efforts of authorities to deny him writing materials. He died in 1814. Much of the material Sade produced during this time was burned by his son after his death.

Sade is best remembered as a perverse and rather sickening author whose works were written chiefly to shock the public. He seemed to delight in everything that was foul and disturbing, and his writings reflect a belief that behaving with decency was a useless exercise and a waste of time. Nevertheless, despite his well-deserved reputation for vulgarity, many see his repeated imprisonments as symbolic of the struggle for literary freedom, saying that the marquis de Sade should have been free to write whatever he chose.

An English Version of a Work by the Marquis de Sade

120 Days of Sodom and Other Writings. Translated by Austryn Wainhouse and Richard Seaver. New York: Grove Press, 1987.

Works about the Marquis de Sade

Lever, Maurice. Sade: A Biography. Translated by Arthur Goldhammer. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1993.

Schaeffer, Neil. The Marquis de Sade: A Life. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1999.

Santa Cruz y Espejo, Francisco Javier Eugenio de (ca. 1747–1795) nonfiction writer

One of the first intellectuals of Latin America to call for political independence from Spain, Francisco Javier Eugenio de Santa Cruz y Espejo was an Ecuadorian writer, doctor, and social activist. He was born in Quito, and was a meztizo, a person of mixed Indian, African, and Spanish ancestry.

It is said that Santa Cruz y Espejo wrote his first lessons in the sand, because the small school that he attended lacked the most basic resources. In spite of conditions, he excelled at his studies, attending the Dominican Seminary and later the University of Santo Tomás, where he took a doctoral degree. However, it was his father, an assistant to the doctors in the hospital at Quito, who inspired him to study further for a medical degree.

His scientific spirit and his compassion attracted Santa Cruz y Espejo to the ideals expressed by the leading thinkers of the ENLIGHTENMENT. Following their example, he set about exposing the deficiencies of Spanish culture in El nuevo Luciano de Quito, (The New Lucian of Quito, 1779), a harsh critique of Jesuit education and a defense of the practice of vaccination.

In 1781 he wrote a controversial piece titled Retrato de golilla (Portrait of a ruffled collar), in which he criticized the Spanish king. His political enemies used it as a pretext to exile him to Colombia some years later. While there, he forged a political alliance with Antonio de Nariño, another kindred spirit.

He later returned home and became a member of the Society of Patriots of Chile, which was set up with the king's consent. As secretary of this organization, Santa Cruz y Espejo was responsible for the publication of a bi-monthly newspaper called Primicias de la cultura de Quito, through which he planted the seeds that would later lead to political independence.

In 1792 he became the first director of the Public Library of Ecuador, which now bears his name. Despite these appointments, he continued to be harassed by the local authorities who felt threatened by his radical views. Unwavering in his commitment to justice, Santa Cruz y Espejo met his end in prison in 1795. English translations of his works are no longer in print.

Schiller, Friedrich von (1759–1805)

playwright, essayist, poet

Born in Marbach, Württemberg (present day Germany), to Johannes Kaspar Schiller, an army officer and surgeon, and Elizabeth Schiller, Friedrich von Schiller was raised in a pious Lutheran home. His father disapproved of his interests in literature and theater and forbade him to write poetry. When he was 14, Schiller went to an academy to study law and later medicine. He was expelled from medical school in 1780 for writing On The Relation Between Man's Animal and Spiritual Nature, an essay that questioned LUTHER's official theology. Schiller returned to Marbach and joined his father's army regiment, but he hated army life and avoided his duties so often that he was almost arrested for neglecting them.

Schiller did not abandon writing, and his first play, The Robbers, appeared in 1781. Depicting a noble outlaw, Karl Moor, who violently and passionately rejects his father's conservative ideology in his quest for justice, The Robbers simultaneously reflects Schiller's conflict with his father and the ideological struggle between conservative and liberal political forces in Germany. The play was warmly greeted in Germany and was admired by the English Romantics. The theme of liberty that appears in The Robbers permeates virtually everything Schiller wrote. The play Don Carlos (1787), for instance, is about the conflict between Philip II of Spain and his son, who is torn between passionate love and the political intrigues of his father's ministers.

Between 1783 and 1784, Schiller worked as a playwright and stage manager for the theater in Mannheim. Five years later, in 1789, he became professor of history at the University of Jena and worked on a history of the Thirty Years' War for the next three years. Declining health obliged Schiller to abandon his professorship, and he became an assistant to Johann Wolfgang von GOETHE, then director of the Weimar court theater.

Schiller also distinguished himself as a poet. "Ode to Joy" (1785), which was set to music by Ludwig van Beethoven, is the anthem of the European Union. More significant, in poems like Wilhelm Tell (1804), which describes the close relationship that the Swiss hero had with nature, Schiller helped to forge a Romantic aesthetic. The attention to nature, human emotions, and the ideals of liberty and political freedom found in his works are in fact the primary ingredients in most Romantic art.

Schiller's interest in history resulted in several historical plays. Mary Stuart (1800) describes the turbulent relationship between Elizabeth I and Mary Queen of Scots in the final days before Mary's execution. The captive, wild environment of the castle of Fotheringay provides a dark, melancholy background that amplifies Mary as a tragic figure in the play. The dramatic trilogy Wallenstein (1796–99) depicts Germany during the Thirty Years' War and captures the deep fragmentation of society along the lines of religion. German national identity and the idea of nationhood are juxtaposed with the ruinous conflict created by the religious strife and the political scheming of the rulers.

Many of Schiller's ideas were influenced by the works of 18th-century German philosopher Immanuel KANT. In On the Aesthetic Education of Man (1795), Schiller deals with the bloody aftermath of the French Revolution and how it changed the way humans thought about freedom. The key to freedom, he argues, is the fundamental aesthetic development of the individual and society, and a true sense of freedom and liberty is connected to one's experience of the sublime and the beautiful—two important philosophical categories in Kant's works.

In On the Naïve and Sentimental in Literature (1795), Schiller creates a series of dialectical dichotomies, such as feeling and thought, nature and culture, finitude and infinity, and finally sentimental and naïve modes of writing. Although describing himself as a sentimental or "reflective" writer, Schiller paid homage to his close friend Goethe, whom he described as the ultimate archetype of the naïve genius. Here, naïve is not used in the conventional sense of the word, but rather as a philosophical term that describes something that is utterly pure and good and closely connected with nature.

Today, Schiller is considered one of the foremost German writers. His drama and poetry contributed significantly to the literature of the Romantic movement, and his magnificent control and elegant use of the German language have inspired generations of readers, writers, and poets.

English Versions of Works by Friedrich von Schiller

Essays. Edited by Walter Hinderer and Daniel Dahlstrom. New York: Continuum, 1993.

Schiller's Five Plays: The Robbers, Passion and Politics, Don Carlos, Mary Stuart, and Joan of Arc. Translated by Robert McDonald. New York: Consortium Books, 1998.

Works about Friedrich von Schiller

Carlyle, Thomas. The Life of Friedrich Schiller. Edited by Jeffrey Sammons. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1992.

Sharpe, Lesley. Friedrich Schiller: Drama, Thought, and Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Thomas, Calvin. The Life and Works of Friedrich Schiller. McLean, Va.: Indypublish.com, 2004.

Schlegel, Friedrich (1772–1829) critic, novelist, philosopher, scholar

Friedrich Schlegel was born in the city of Hanover in northern Germany to the family of a Protestant minister. After completing school in his native city, he went on to study law and linguistics, first in Göttingen and then in Leipzig. As a student he developed close intellectual friendships with his brother August Wilhelm as well as NOVALIS, the great German Romantic poet.

The History of Greek and Roman Poetry (1798) was the first fruit of Schlegel's lifelong engagement with classic literature and philosophy. In this work he examines the relation between ancient and contemporary poetry and argues that, rather than turning away from the classics, artists should strive to incorporate into their work the balance and harmony of classical poetry and drama. Between 1798 and 1800, Schlegel and his brother edited the influential literary journal Athenaeum, in which works by virtually all of the most important writers of the age appeared.

In 1802 Schlegel moved to Paris and began a new intellectual phase. After reading extensively in French and Portuguese literature and studying European fine art and architecture, he began to learn Sanskrit and to study Indian philosophy. These studies greatly influenced his On the Language and Wisdom of India (1808), a book that would have a profound influence on his generation. Also in 1808, Schlegel converted to Catholicism and moved to Vienna, where he spent the rest of his life.

In Vienna Schlegel became active in the movement to overthrow Napoleon's regime, worked as an editor of another literary journal, and published his collected works. In 1827 he began work on what was to be a series of lectures on the history of Western literature and philosophy, in which he hoped to summarize the evolution of his intellectual development, a project he never completed.

Though Schlegel left behind no single work of overwhelming importance, the influence of his creative, critical, and scholarly work on his own and later ages is not to be underestimated. He defined many of the principles of poetry and philosophy that would become characteristic of German Romanticism, and his ideas continue to be influential among German artists and intellectuals.

An English Version of a Work by Friedrich Schlegel

Philosophical Fragments. Translated by Peter Firchow. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991.

A Work about Friedrich Schlegel

Eichner, Hans. Friedrich Schlegel. New York: Twayne, 1970.

Schopenhauer, Arthur (1788–1860) philosopher

Arthur Schopenhauer was born into a wealthy family in the city of Danzig. He spent much of his youth traveling from one country to another, during which time he mastered many languages and received a good education. He earned a doctorate in philosophy from the University of Jena. After his father's death, Schopenhauer received a large inheritance, which freed him from having to work for a living. Ensured of financial independence, he devoted the rest of his life to scholarship and philosophy.

The main ideas of Schopenhauer's philosophy were presented in his work The World as Will and Representation (1818), in which he argues that the world can exist only as an idea in the mind of a person trying to perceive the world. Schopenhauer saw human will as the primary agent of existence and believed that it controlled every human action, no matter how insignificant.

Schopenhauer was heavily influenced by Plato, Immanuel KANT, and Johann Wolfgang von GOETHE. In addition, he was the first major Western philosopher who undertook a serious study of Buddhism and Hinduism, which also had a great effect on him. On the other hand, he was very hostile to the thinking of his contemporary, philosopher Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel.

Schopenhauer was not seen as being an important philosopher during his own lifetime, but after his death, his influence on others, particularly German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, would be profound. By the mid-20th century, Schopenhauer had been recognized as being a major figure in the development of Western thought.

English Versions of Works by Arthur Schopenhauer

The Art of Controversy. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2004.

The Art of Literature. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2004.

The Wisdom of Life. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2004.

The World as Will and Representation. Translated by E. F. J. Payne. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 1966.

Works about Arthur Schopenhauer

Janaway, Christopher. Schopenhauer: A Very Short Introduction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Safranski, Rudiger. Schopenhauer and the Wild Years of Philosophy. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1990.

Wallace, W. Life of Arthur Schopenhauer. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2003.

Scottish poets of the fifteenth century (1400s)

Fostered by the presence of a refined court society, the literature of Scotland in the 15th century experienced a concentrated period of poetic achievement. During this time King James I of Scotland, Robert Henryson, Gavin Douglas, and William Dunbar all produced works that imitated the poetry of Geoffrey CHAUCER in form, rhetorical style, subject matter, and technique. Some of the works follow Chaucer's model of parody and the form of his allegorical dream visions (see ALLEGORY). For this reason, the poets of this group are often referred to as the "Scottish Chaucerians." The group is part of a larger tradition sometimes called the "Middle Scots Poets," a label that often extends back to the 14th century to include John Barbour (1320–95) and the poet known as "Blind Harry," author of Schir William Wallace (ca. 1450). William Dunbar himself called his contemporaries the "Makars" (makers) in the poem "Lament for the Makars."

The first remarkable work of the period is the poem The Kingis Quair (sometimes Quhair, 1423), an allegorical dream vision usually attributed to King James I of Scotland. Scholars have interpreted this poem as an autobiographical work in which James I describes his courtship of Jane Beaufort, the daughter of the English earl of Somerset, in 1424. This poem is a prototype of Chaucerian imitation, borrowing both the dream-vision narrative frame and rhyme royal meter from Chaucer. It also makes reference to Palamon and Arcite, two of the central characters in "The Knight's Tale" from Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.

Perhaps the most famous of the Scottish Chaucerians, Robert Henryson (ca. 1425–1506) was master of the Benedictine Abbey Grammar School at Dunfermline and a member of the newly founded University of Glasgow. He was the author of a number of fables and several allegorical poems offering moral instruction. His most famous poem, the Testament of Cresseid, often appears in anthologies and offers a type of sequel to Chaucer's famous Troilus and Creseyde. This poem is harsh and graphic, but not unsympathetic, in its portrayal of Chaucer's heroine. In it, Henryson paints Cresseid as a faithless lover punished with leprosy and disease but shows her later redemption as she enters a nunnery in repentance for her sins. It is a work grim and serious in tone. However, Henryson displays an ability to produce more cheerful work with poems such as "Robene and Makyne," a lighthearted parody of the courtly love tradition. This poem reverses the traditional gender roles assigned in courtly love lyrics; here the rustic girl Makyne tries to instruct the shepherd boy Robene in matters of love. He resists her advice, but later he realizes his mistake and returns to seek her counsel, only to have Makyne say that he has waited too long to act. The poem's theme of carpe diem ("seize the day") anticipates some of the poetry of the 16th century.

In addition to being influenced by Chaucer, William Dunbar also possessed a fascination with the language of alliterative poetry, a form still popular in Scotland in the 15th century though its popularity had waned in England. Dunbar wrote many occasional poems inspired by events associated with the court of King James IV of Scotland, as well as a number of divine poems and parodies like "The Flyting of Dunbar and Kennedie," a humorous address to one of his rivals. By contrast, the "Lament for the Makars" is a more serious devotion that contemplates the mortality of the poet and gives tribute to the "brother" poets whom death has claimed: "In Dunfermline he [death] hes done roune / With maister Robert Henrisoun." Because he offers commentary on both the court and his contemporaries, Dunbar contributes greatly to our knowledge of this period of Scottish literature.

As a member of a prominent Scottish clan, Gavin Douglas (1474–1522) was very well educated, having attended schools at St. Andrews and perhaps Paris. Like his contemporaries, he wrote some works in imitation of Chaucer, such as his early work The Palice of Honour, a long allegorical dream vision based loosely on Chaucer's House of Fame, but also bearing the influence of Ovid and BOCCACCIO. However, Douglas's translation of Virgil's Aeneid into Middle Scots, the Aeneis, arguably displays his best work. He divides his translation into 13 books, each with a prologue in which he often discusses subject matter, style, or circumstances of composition. His translation, regarded by many to be one of the best translations of the EPIC, strikes a balance between Virgil's classic language and Douglas's own lively Scots verse. After the passing of Douglas, the power of Scottish poetry would decline until the career of Robert Burns in the late 18th century.

Works by Scottish Poets of the Fifteenth Century

Dunbar, William. William Dunbar: Selected Poems. Edited by Harriet H. Wood. London: Routledge, 2003.

Henryson, Robert. Poems and Fables. Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, 1958.

A Work about the Scottish Poets

Henderson, T. F. Scottish Vernacular Literature: A Succinct History. Edinburgh: Scotpress, 1988.

Scudéry, Madeleine de (1607–1701) novelist

Madeleine de Scudéry was born in Provence, France, to impoverished lower nobility. Orphaned at an early age, she was educated by her uncle and joined her brother Georges, a minor playwright and critic, in Paris in 1637. Intelligent, charming, and kind, she became involved in the intellectual gatherings known as salons, where noble and upper-class women, male scholars, writers, and artists met to discuss a variety of topics. Madeleine never married, but served as a hostess and collaborator with her brother.

Scudéry wrote several long historical romances that made her one of the best-selling and most influential writers in western European prose fiction. Her novels include Ibrahim, ou le basse illustre (Ibrahim, or the Illustrious Basha, 1641); Artamene, ou le grande Cyrus (Artamene or the Great Cyrus, 1649–53); and Clélie (1654–60). These novels used historical characters and exotic settings to explore contemporary concerns, such as politics and proper relationships between men and women. Scudéry based many of her characters on friends and contemporaries, so people read the novels eagerly for gossip about one another. The novels were translated into English and other languages and spread French ideas about platonic love, elegant speech, and social behavior throughout Europe.

Scudéry was not just a popular novelist, but also an influential theorist about fiction. In her preface to Ibrahim, she claimed prose fiction could be just as instructive and serious as EPIC poetry, and she proposed a theory of literary realism based on realistic characters and probable incidents: “As for me, I hold, that the more natural adventures are, the more satisfaction they give; and the ordinary course of the Sun seemes more mervailous to me, than the Strange and deadly rayes of Comets.”

When the vogue for long, multivolume romances faded in the 1670s, Scudéry wrote and published shorter essays on polite behavior and conversation, which influenced other essayists. She herself rose above the common stereotype, which depicted women as ignorant and frivolous, to gain respect for her learning and intellectual curiosity. She was recognized by the ACADÉMIE FRANÇAISE, awarded a pension by King Louis XIV, and elected to the Academia dei Ricovrati of Padua (1684). Scudéry’s works are not widely available today, but scholars of world literature study them for what they reveal about the intellectual and cultural changes in early modern France, and especially the change in the status of women.

English Versions of Works by Madeleine de Scudéry

Selected Letters, Orations, and Rhetorical Dialogues.

Edited by Jane Donawerth. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.

The Story of Sapho. Translated by Karen Newman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.

Works about Madeleine de Scudéry

Aronson, Nicole. Madeleine de Scudéry. New York: Twayne, 1978.

DeJean, Joan. Tender Geographies: Women and the Origins of the Novel in France. New York: Columbia University Press, 1991.

Se-jong (1397–1450) nonfiction writer, king

Se-jong was one of the greatest rulers of Korea. He was the fourth king of the Joseon or Choson dynasty (1392–1910), coming to the throne in 1418 at age 22, when his father T’aejong abdicated to allow his son to rule. King Se-jong was a devout Confucian and a humanist who enacted policies to help the poorest of his subjects. His policies included establishing relief programs to help people in the wake of natural disasters and providing government loans to help farmers who lost their crops.

King Se-jong’s literary achievements were many, including the invention of a system to write the Korean language, called Hunmin jeongeum (“correct sounds to teach the people”), that was simple enough for everyone to learn. Until Se-jong’s time, Korean had been written using Chinese characters, which were so numerous that few ordinary people could master them. His alphabet, now called Hangeul, contains 11 vowels and 17 consonants and can be learned in a very short period of time, even by people with little education.

Se-jong himself wrote Dongguk jeong-un (Dictionary of Proper Sino-Korean Pronunciation, 1447), and he used his new alphabet to write Yongbi eocheon ga (Songs of Flying Dragons, 1445), a series of 125 cantos celebrating the accomplishments of the Choson dynasty. Among the most beautiful of lines in this work are these from the second canto, celebrating the strength and endurance of Se-jong's ancestors:

*Trees with deep roots do not sway in the wind,
But bear fine flowers and bountiful fruit,
Water welling from deep springs never dries up,
But becomes rivers and flow to the seas.*

King Se-jong was a man of many talents. In addition to his literary and social accomplishments, he was also a scientist and inventor. He gathered the best scientists in the country to his court and supported their work in medicine and astronomy. He himself invented a water clock and a rain gauge.

King Se-jong died at age 52 and was succeeded by his son Munjong. A performing arts center in Seoul and Korea's base in Antarctica are both named for this great ruler.

A Work about Se-jong

Kim-Renaud, Young-Key. King Se-jong the Great: The Light of Fifteenth-Century Korea. Seoul, Korea: International Circle of Korean Linguistics, 1997.

Sévigné, Madame de (Marie de Rabutin-Chantal, marquise de Sévigné) (1626–1696) correspondent

Marie de Rabutin-Chantal was born into a long-standing aristocratic family; her father, Celse Bénigne de Rabutin, was the baron de Chantal, and her mother, Marie de Coulanges, possessed an equally distinguished lineage. Wealth did not ensure health, however, and upon being orphaned at age seven, Marie was raised by her maternal grandparents and then, upon their deaths, by her uncle Christophe. Her uncle provided her with generous financial support, advice, and an excellent education; one of her tutors was Ménage, whose instruction she shared with her lifelong friend Madame de LAFAYETTE. Marie knew both Italian and Spanish, read widely, and had a charming personality; one admirer described her as vivacious and animated, musical and neat, a woman altogether pleasing in manner and pretty in looks, from which her square nose and different-colored eyes did nothing to detract. At age 18 she married Henri, marquis de Sévigné, and had two children: Françoise was born in 1646 and Charles in 1648. After her unfaithful, irresponsible husband was killed in a duel in 1651, Madame de Sévigné maintained a happy and comfortable widowhood, devoting herself to her family and friends. She traveled, entertained, took an active interest in political and social events, and managed to satisfactorily arrange the marriages of her children and grandchildren. She died of smallpox in 1696.

Madame de Sévigné earned her fame through her prodigious correspondence, which she kept throughout her life and which spans 10 volumes. She lived in the reign of both Louis XIII and Louis XIV, in a France that was increasingly becoming the center of the civilized world, and a Paris that was the cultural center of France. The high society of Madame de Sévigné's day revolved around the drawing room, the salon, where people met to exchange news, politics, and gossip, and the leisured wealthy fostered the creative work of artists and writers. Madame de Sévigné is one of the best examples of these inhabitants of the salon, the fashionable, cultivated woman combining intellect with charm. Her letters reveal the habits and ideals of her culture as well as the advantages and prejudices of her class. Though the effusive praise of her admirers can be as excessive as the unflattering accusations of her enemies, the native voice of her letters reveals a lively personality, a quick wit, and a warm heart. An early epistle to her beloved daughter, to whom she addressed the bulk of her correspondence, displays all the devotion of an adoring mother:

Even if you could succeed in loving me as much as I love you, which is not possible or even in God's order of things, my little girl would have to have the advantage; it is the overspill of the love I feel for you. . . . I shall be so grateful if for love of me you take a great deal of care of yourself. Ah, my dear, how easy it will always be to pay your debt to me! Could treasures and all the wealth in the world give me as much joy as your affection?

She adds in this letter a teasing, meddling note to her daughter's husband:

... although you are of all men the most fortunate in being loved, you have never been loved, nor can be, by anybody more sincerely than by me. I wish you were here in my mall every day, but you are proud, and I see quite well that you want me to come and see you first. You are very fortunate that I am not an old granny.

A typical letter to her friend Madame de Lafayette is full of the most ordinary details as well as salacious gossip, told in a voice that makes everything interesting:

I don't know of any news to send you today, for I have not seen the Gazette for three days. But you must know that Mme de N—is dead, and that Trévigny, her lover, nearly died of grief. For my part I would have preferred him really to die of it for the honour of the ladies.

Madame de Sévigné was aware that her letters had a wide audience; she knew the recipient would circulate them among her acquaintances. But she could not know that, even centuries later, readers would enjoy her zest for gossip and her accounts of the important events of her day. She was, without knowing it, a journalist, a social historian, and a great writer whose legacy clearly evokes the spirit of her age.

An English Version of Madame de Sévigné's Letters

Madame de Sévigné: Selected Letters. Translated by Leonard Tancock. New York: Penguin Books, 1982.

A Work about Madame de Sévigné

Mossiker, Frances. Madame de Sévigné. New York: Columbia University Press, 1983.

Shakespeare, William (1564–1616) dramatist, poet

William Shakespeare was born in Stratford-on-Avon, England, to middle-class parents. He was probably educated at a local grammar school, where he would have learned Latin, rhetoric (how to be persuasive and argue a case), and classical literature. He married young and had a twin son and daughter, Hamnet and Judith, by the time he was 21. Not long after their birth, he went to London, alone, to seek his fortune.

He found work as an actor first, in the lively theatrical scene that was burgeoning in late 16th-century London, encouraged by Queen Elizabeth I's enthusiasm. Before long he was writing plays. All told, he wrote or cowrote at least 35 dramas, not to mention a remarkable SONNET sequence and other short poems. The first collection of Shakespeare's plays was published in 1622–23, several years after his death. By the end of his career, Shakespeare was already considered by his peers to be one of the greatest writers in England.

Critical Analysis

Shakespeare's earliest known plays are comedies, typically focusing on romantic relationships and ending in marriage. The early comedies The Taming of the Shrew and The Comedy of Errors, both of which are on record as first being staged in 1594, are less complex than the later masterpieces As You Like It (ca. 1599) and Twelfth Night (ca. 1600–01), but they contain evidence of Shakespeare's genius—complex language, unique characters, and interesting plots.

The first two plays are sometimes referred to as citizen comedies, or urban comedies, because they portray nonroyal figures in public settings, such as marketplaces and town squares. The Comedy of Errors is a story of mistaken identity (a popular theme in English comedy), while the Taming of the Shrew explores issues of romance and female identity. The latter two plays are considered PASTORAL, because, like the Italian plays in whose tradition they follow, the story shifts from the city to the country. In As You Like It, the participants in the drama retreat to the forest of Arden (a real place near Stratford, where Shakespeare grew up) before returning home to the city, a bit older and wiser as a result of their adventures.

The tragedies King Lear (ca. 1605) and Macbeth (ca. 1606) are mature examples of Shakespeare's turn toward the darker themes of murder and madness and how they relate to politics (both title characters are national leaders who lose their minds and lives). Othello (ca. 1604), Antony and Cleopatra (ca. 1606–07), and, of course, Hamlet (ca. 1600) are considered to be among the greatest achievements in world literature. All of these plays depict the demise of military or royal figures, honorable men who are fatally flawed or self-destructive.

The final works of Shakespeare's career are best described as "problem plays" or tragicomedies—dramatic stories that combine elements of both tragedy and comedy while exploring the complexities of human existence. The Winter's Tale (ca. 1610–11) and The Tempest (ca. 1611) address a variety of issues, ranging from the personal (parenthood, friendship, and ambition) to the social (politics, sexuality, and slavery).

In his plays, Shakespeare developed what today has become recognized as a modern understanding of human character. The critic Joel Fineman credits Shakespeare with inventing the psychological view of the self that is assumed in modern thought. Harold Bloom, in a similar vein, has argued that Shakespeare is responsible for "the invention of the human."

One of the themes that Shakespeare develops in depth is the complicated relationship between the outer self and the inward self. In Hamlet, Queen Gertrude, Hamlet's mother, attempts to convince her son that it is time to stop mourning for his dead father. When she asks Hamlet why he seems to mourn so deeply, he replies:

'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,
Nor customary suits of solemn black, . . .
That can denote me truly. These indeed seem,
For they are actions that a man might play;
But I have that within which passes show,
These but the trappings and the suits of woe.

Hamlet begins this speech assuring his mother of the authenticity of his behavior. He does not seem to mourn; he truly mourns. His exterior, the way he dresses in mourning for his dead father, cannot reveal his true inner self, just as outward signs—sighs, tears, and dejected behavior—cannot truly represent that which is within: the human spirit, or individual identity.

While much criticism has been and continues to be written about Hamlet's character, one might assume that Shakespeare intended Hamlet to represent his opinion that the "outward" person can never be anything more than an inauthentic representation of the "inward." This, in turn, reflects the disappearance of the traditional social order taking place in England at the time.

Perhaps the play that best represents Shakespeare's understanding of social change is King Lear, in which an elderly king, who is foolishly taken in by his daughters' flattery, relinquishes his power and ultimately loses not only his throne but also his sense of self. The playwright reflects how the medieval monarchical system, in which power passed in an orderly way from father to son and position was essentially fixed at birth, was being called into question by ambitious individuals seeking to reinvent themselves—and sometimes succeeding. Lear's tragedy is, thus, an English TRAGEDY, a national problem.

Although Shakespeare was not the only playwright to write about this problem, his drama is unique because he is able to address social issues through stories about individual people, like Lear and Macbeth. A theme that runs through both is that thirst for power corrupts. While Elizabeth in the final years of the 16th century was relatively secure, members of the aristocracy were in constant fear of losing their power, money, and lives. Shakespeare suggests that these threats are more than just individual problems. Rather, they are at the heart of social unrest and damage the nation as a whole. When Lear loses his sense of reality, we are meant to question what happens when non-kings can gain power through evil deeds.

What differentiates Shakespeare's most memorable and lifelike characters from those of other Elizabethan dramatists is their self-awareness. Renowned scholar Harold Bloom considers Sir John Falstaff—of the history plays Henry IV, parts one and two, Henry V, Henry VI part one, and The Merry Wives of Windsor—to be, along with Hamlet, the most psychologically realistic of Shakespeare's characters. He is a larger-than-life figure, an overweight, over-the-hill knight whose main interests are alcohol, food, money, and bragging. What is so interesting about his character is that he is the childhood friend of Prince Hal (the boy who becomes King Henry V) and has a sensitive side that is occasionally visible. Falstaff understands that his existence is meaningless compared to that of his young friend; he recognizes that he is not a noble being. There is something pathetic and even touching in his sense of humor, which makes him someone who simultaneously laughs at others and is laughed at:

Men of all sorts take pride to gird at me. The brain of this foolish-compounded clay, man, is not able to invent any thing that intends to laughter more than I invent or is invented on me: I am not only witty in myself, but the cause that wit is in other men.

The word invention is important because it refers to the ability to create oneself, or to play a role. This concept echoes Jaques's famous line about how life is a drama from As You Like It: "All the world's a stage, / And all the men and women merely players." For modern audiences, the outlook that society is composed of actors is not as pessimistic as it might seem. For Shakespeare, the theater is a place of possibility and wonder.

What Shakespeare ultimately suggests about human character is that there is always a difference between what people consider to be their authentic selves and how people reveal themselves to others. One is always obliged, in a sense, to act like, rather than to be, one's self. This idea is the same message that 20th-century novelists package as selfhood. Shakespeare's greatest achievement, Bloom thus argues, is that he was able to demonstrate "how new modes of consciousness come into being."

Works by William Shakespeare

Complete Works. Edited by Richard Proudfoot, et al. New York: Arden, 2001.

The Portable Shakespeare. New York: Penguin Classics, 2004.

Works about William Shakespeare

Bloom, Allan. Shakespeare on Love and Friendship. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993.

Bloom, Harold. Shakespeare: The Invention of the Human. New York: Riverhead, 1998.

Boyce, Charles. Critical Companion to William Shakespeare. New York: Facts On File, 2005.

De Sousa, Geraldo U. Shakespeare's Cross-Cultural Encounters. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.

Foakes, R. A. Hamlet Versus Lear: Cultural Politics and Shakespeare's Art. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

Greenblatt, Stephen. Will in the World: How Shakespeare Became Shakespeare. New York: W.W. Norton, 2004.

Honan, Park. Shakespeare: A Life. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Knapp, Jeffrey. Shakespeare's Tribe: Church, Nation, and Theater in Renaissance England. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.

Shen Fu (1763–after 1809) nonfiction writer Shen Fu is remembered for one work, Six Records of a Floating Life, a memoir of his life and especially of his relationship with his beloved wife, Chen Yun (Ch'en Yün). Shen Fu arranged his memories thematically, not chronologically. The first section, "The Joys of the Wedding Chamber," tells how he first met Yün and about their life together, including, surprisingly for modern Western readers, the story of Yün's attempt to secure a concubine for her husband. "The Pleasures of Leisure" gives details of the couple's daily life; it tells how they achieved beautiful effects in their home for not much money and about the ingenious entertainments they devised for each other and their friends. "The Sorrows of Misfortune" relates the underside of the beauty described in the first two sections, revealing how the couple became alienated from Shen Fu's family and went ever more deeply into debt, while Yün's health became progressively worse. In this section we first hear of the existence of their two children, when Shen Fu describes the wrenching parting from them that ensued when they decided to stay with a friend in the country for the sake of Yun's health. It also includes the tragic scene of Yun's death at age 40, but it ends with Shen Fu's accepting from a friend the gift of a concubine, whom he describes as "a young woman who renewed in me the spring dreams of life." The fourth section, "The Delights of Roaming Afar," is a travelogue, evoking the beauties of temples, gardens, and landscapes all over eastern China that Shen Fu visited in the course of his work as a secretary for government officials, and showing something of his relationships with friends and courtesans.

Nothing is known of Shen Fu's life after 1809, when according to Six Records he was working on the book. The manuscript, containing only four sections, was discovered and published in the 1870s. An allegedly complete version was published in Shanghai in the 1930s, but scholars agree that the fifth and sixth sections given there are forgeries.

Incomplete as it is, the book provides readers with a uniquely intimate view of life in late imperial China and gives access to a world view that, with its combination of romanticism and frankness, has great appeal. As Leonard Pratt and Chiang Su-Hui remark in the introduction to their translation, "Shen Fu has left us a lively portrait of his era that in places strikes chords that are remarkably resonant with those of our own times."

An English Version of a Work by Shen Fu

Six Records of a Floating Life. Translated by Leonard Pratt and Chiang Su-hui. New York: Penguin, 1983.

Shi Naian (Shih Nai-an) (fl.? 1400s) novelist
Shi Naian is considered by most critics to be the principal author of the influential novel Shuihu zhuan (Shui-hu chuan, 1300s–1500s). The other author is believed to be LUO GUANZHONG (ca. 1330–1400), although, in truth, more authors could have contributed to the story. Perhaps the problem of determining exact authorship is related to how early modern Chinese novels were written; authors of Chinese vernacular literature often borrowed parts of other works—whether fiction, poetry, songs, drama, or stories from the oral tradition—and developed them into their own stories. Given this form of "borrowing," it is speculated that Shi Naian took part of one of Luo Guanzhong's works and either added to it or adapted it. Shuihu zhuan has been given several English titles, depending on its translator, including Wild Boar Forest, Water Margin, Outlaws of the Marsh, and The Men of the Marshes.

In its most complete, printed form, Shuihu zhuan has 120 chapters. John and Alex Dent Young's recent translation is titled Marshes of Mount Liang and divides the lengthy story into four parts. The story is about 108 bandits who try to help the Chinese emperor overthrow the prime minister, whom Shi Naian depicts as cruel and despotic. These bandits and their struggle against unfair or uncivil authority have often been compared to the tales of Robin Hood and his band of men.

Pearl S. Buck translated the novel as All Men Are Brothers. She discussed the novel in her Nobel speech in 1938, stating that Shi Naian's novel is considered a great work of fiction because "it portrays so distinctly one hundred and eight characters that each is to be seen separate from the others."

The outlaw protagonists of the work continue to have a hold on the popular imagination. The Japanese name of the tale, "Suikoden," is also the name of a video game. More significant, an anonymous author in the early 17th century developed an event described in Shuihu zhuan into one of the greatest Chinese novels ever written, JIN PING MEI (Golden Lotus, 1617).

English Versions of Works by Shi Naian

All Men Are Brothers. Translated by Pearl S. Buck. Kingston, R.I.: Asphodel Press, 2001.

Outlaws of the Marsh. Translated by Sidney Shapiro. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press, 1998.

The Broken Seals: Part One of the Marshes of Liang. Translated by John and Alex Dent-Young. Hong Kong: Chinese University Press, 1994.

Wild Boar Forest. Translated by Li Shau Chwun and edited by John D. Mitchell. Midland, Mich.: Northwood University Press, 1995.

Sidney, Sir Philip (1554–1586) fiction writer, critic, poet

Philip Sidney was born at Penshurst, Kent, the son of Sir Henry Sidney and Lady Mary Dudley. The Sidneys were a prominent family with close ties to the court of Queen Elizabeth I. Sidney was educated at the Shrewsbury School and at Christ Church, Oxford, after which he traveled in Europe for three years under the tutelage of Hubert Languet, a humanist scholar.

Returning to England in 1576, Sidney was appointed to the honorary position of cupbearer to the queen and spent some time in Ireland assisting his father. His first published work, a treatise called Discourse on Irish Affairs (1577), supported his father's harsh anti-Irish policies. When Sidney went back to England the following year, he wrote The Lady of May, a PASTORAL entertainment in the queen's honor.

Sidney began to take an active interest in diplomatic affairs, and to write about the issues of the day. Serving in parliament in 1581 and again in 1584–85, he became an avid supporter of the New World explorations of Sir Martin Frobisher and others, and helped promote plans to settle an English colony in Virginia. Sidney maintained a rich correspondence with artists and intellectuals, many of whom sought his patronage or dedicated works to him.

In 1586 Sidney volunteered in a campaign to thwart Spanish military maneuvers in Zutphen, Holland, and was mortally wounded there. The courage with which he faced death became legendary, and his death occasioned deep mourning throughout Europe.

Like most aristocratic writers of the time, Sidney considered it beneath him to attempt to gain financially from his writings by publishing them. It was not until 1598, some 11 years after his death, that his sister published his significant works in a collection called The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia.

Sidney's most prolific period as a writer spanned the nine years from 1577, when he started writing his most acclaimed work, The Arcadia, until his death. Probably completed in 1580, the earliest version of Arcadia was a ROMANCE in five books, whose muse was undoubtedly his sister, Mary, of whom he wrote: "You desired me to do it, and your desire to my heart is an absolute commandment." In crafting this masterwork, Sidney drew on his considerable knowledge of chivalric romances in French and Italian as well as the Arthurian legends in English. Critics have also pointed out the influence of classical works, including Apuleius's Golden Ass and Heliodorus's Æthiopian Historie. Replete with damsels in distress, knights in shining armor, gender reversals, and sexual license, Arcadia in many ways epitomizes the cult of courtly love. Arcadia also draws heavily on the forms of pastoral poetry, making it reminiscent of Virgil's Eclogues.

Sidney's SONNET sequence, Astrophel and Stella (ca. 1582; published 1591), tracks the unhappy love of Astrophel for Stella, who can be identified with a real (married) lady of Sidney's circle. The 108 sonnets are written in variations of the sonnet form invented by PETRARCH. The collection was a success and sparked a craze for sonnet sequences.

Sidney's other most important work, The Defence of Poesie, was written in 1579 or 1580 and published in 1595 (another edition, published in the same year, was titled An Apologie for Poetry). In this essay Sidney demonstrates the power of poetry to persuade and teach, laments the decline in poetry since classical times, and expresses confidence in the English language as a medium for the finest poetry in every genre, which he prophetically declares is yet to come. Sidney's eloquence and his wide-ranging examples made the work popular, and the boost he gave to the confidence of writers working in English may be credited with contributing to the great flowering of English literature that took place over the next two decades.

Sidney also undertook a new English rendition of the Old Testament Psalms of David. He completed only 43 of the 150 psalms, each of which he wrote in a different metrical form; his sister, Mary, continued the project after his death. Some of the psalms are still sung as hymns today.

According to biographer Allen Stewart, “Among the gilded youth of Elizabethan England, no one was more golden than Philip Sidney. Courtier, poet, soldier, diplomat—he was one of the most promising young men of his time.”

Works by Sir Philip Sidney

Sidney's Defence of Poesy and Selected Renaissance Literary Criticism. Edited and with an introduction by Gavin Alexander. New York: Penguin Classics, 2004.

Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Prose and Poetry. Edited by Robert Kimbrough. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994.

Sir Philip Sidney: The Major Works. Edited by Katherine Duncan-Jones. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Works about Sir Philip Sidney

Berry, Edward I. The Making of Sir Philip Sidney. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1998.

Stewart, Alan. Philip Sidney: A Double Life. New York: Thomas Dunne Books/St. Martin's Press, 2001.

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight

(late 1300s) poem

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight survives in a single medieval manuscript along with the poems Patience, Purity (also called Cleanness), and PEARL. Though it is clear that the same person composed these poems in the latter half of the 14th century, the author's identity has been a subject of long debate. Well-educated and highly literate, which suggests training by or for the church, the poet also reveals through his detailed descriptions of hunting and etiquette that he was familiar with life in the higher social classes. He may have been attached to a noble household; we might imagine the poem read or sung aloud in the hall of a castle by a skilled minstrel who would need to employ every trick he knew to keep his listeners enthralled and thus earn his dinner.

Though he little knew it, the Gawain poet lived in a time when the social order was changing: The feudal system in England was slowly turning into a constitutional monarchy; a new way of life and a new middle class were emerging in the growing towns; and the long-accepted authority of the Catholic Church was being questioned. The Hundred Years' War introduced a climate of constant violence and devastation, but the close contact with France also exposed the literate class to a rich tradition of poetry. The subject matter of the troubadours' songs and tales such as Jean de Meun's Romance of the Rose had a powerful effect on English literature, as shown in the works of Geoffrey CHAUCER and others.

But in telling the story of the Green Knight, the Gawain poet called on an already-ancient native legend. King Arthur and his warriors had been a subject of popular literature for centuries, for instance in the pseudo-chronicle of Geoffrey of Monmouth and the romances of Marie de France and Chrétien de Troyes. The figures of Merlin, Gawain, Guinevere, and the fairy princess Morgan had their roots in Celtic myth but took on new forms in the Arthurian romances of the 14th century and later in the works of Thomas MALORY and Edward Spenser. Just as there is a real man behind the legendary Arthur, the motifs of the green knight and his chapel, the beheading ceremony, and the plot device of the tested hero contain echoes of a distant past with its rituals of death and regeneration.

The poem reflects the paradox of knighthood: The demands of courtly love created a conflict of loyalties, and the chivalric code romanticized the real-life violence. The poem embodies this conflict in the spectacle of the Green Knight, who barges in on Arthur's feast and challenges the best knight to a beheading contest. When Gawain responds with ease, the knight picks up his head and issues another challenge: A year hence, Gawain must let the Green Knight behead him in turn. Thus Gawain, the most exemplary of knights, takes up the quest to find the Green Knight's chapel and stand good on his oath. During the course of the poem his integrity is repeatedly tested, most famously by the seductive wife of his host. Gawain's nobility is perhaps best shown in the lines where he takes leave of Arthur, feeling himself bound to uphold the terms of his dreadful promise. In a stanzaic form peculiar to this poem alone, he conveys his resolution to face his fate, no matter what:

*"The knight ever made good cheer, saying, 'Why should I be dismayed?
Of doom the fair or drear
by a man must be assayed.'"*

The poem continually returns to the themes of fidelity to promise, upright behavior, honesty, and bravery even in the face of certain doom, while the active language and vivid detail create a textured world full of suspense, magic, and mystery.

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight is a favorite in the canon of English literature for its gripping narrative and fascinating language and detail. Readers find themselves, like Gawain, undertaking a dangerous and perplexing task, and though new discoveries lie in wait with each return, part of the poem's appeal is that it is continually baffling. Critic W. S. Merwin says: "In the figure of the Green Knight the poet has summoned up an original spirit with the unsounded depth of a primal myth, a presence more vital and commanding than any analysis of it could be." Gawain reminds readers of the sheer power—and pleasure—of a good story.

English Versions of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight

Harrison, Keith, trans. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Merwin, W. S. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2002.

Works about Sir Gawain and the Green Knight

Brewer, Derek, and Jonathan Gibson, eds. A Companion to the Gawain-Poet. New York: Boydell and Brewer, 1999.

Morgan, Gerald. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight and the Idea of Righteousness. Dublin: Irish Academic Press, 1992.

Putter, Ad. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight and the French Arthurian Romance. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Skelton, John (ca. 1460–1529) poet, dramatist, translator

John Skelton was educated at both Cambridge, Oxford, and the university at Louvain in Belgium. He was already well known as a translator and rhetorician when he became tutor (1496–1501) to the future king, Henry VIII. ERASMUS, in a 1500 ode entitled "De Laudibus Britanniae" ("In Praise of Britain"), congratulated the prince on having Skelton, "a light of British letters," as his teacher.

In 1498 Skelton was ordained a priest. That year he wrote a satirical poem, "The Bowge of Court," about life at the king's court ("bowge" means "reward"). In a dream in the poem, the narrator meets characters who represent the qualities of royalty's hangers-on; Favell represents flattery and Hervy Hafter represents deceit.

"Philip Sparrow," which Skelton wrote before retiring from court life in 1508, reflects elements of PASTORAL life. The poem is addressed to a young lady whose pet sparrow was killed by a cat. The bird and his mistress's grief are described at length, and all the birds are called to the funeral. The poem shows Skelton's lively awareness of the natural world.

In 1512, when Henry VII died, Skelton wrote an elegy for him. Henry VIII soon brought Skelton back to court as an official poet, and Skelton wrote several poems celebrating English military victories. He also wrote a play, Magnyfycence (1515–16), a morality play with characters named Felicity, Counterfeit Countenance, Fancy, Liberty, Despair, and Magnificence (the word magnificence in Skelton's time meant the ostentatious display of wealth). The play's message is that no mortal happiness can be relied upon: "Today it is well; tomorrow it is all amiss. . . ."

Skelton also wrote several poems attacking the powerful Cardinal Wolsey for his worldly ways, and spent some time in prison at Wolsey's behest. While Skelton died before the great upheavals of Henry VIII's court, he is remembered for his lively verse and form, for which Skeltonics (poetry written in short lines of two or three stresses and with a variable, rough rhythm) were named.

Works by John Skelton

John Skelton, the Complete English Poems. Edited by John Scattergood. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1983.

Magnifycence. Edited by Robert Lee Ramsay. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Works about John Skelton

Kinney, Arthur F. John Skelton, Priest as Poet: Seasons of Discovery. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

Walker, Greg, et al. John Skelton and the Politics of the 1520s. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Smith, John (1580–1631) essayist

John Smith was born in Lincolnshire, England, to Alice and George Smith, a farmer. Little is known about his early life other than that he attended grammar school, where he learned to write and was introduced to Latin.

From his teenage years onward, Smith led the life of an enterprising adventurer: He was an apprentice to a merchant; traveled to the Netherlands to help free the Dutch from Spanish rule; fought against the Turks, was captured, and escaped enslavement with the help of a woman to whom he was given as a gift. In addition, he was selected to become a member of the governing body of the Virginia colony; embarked for America in 1606; returned to England a few years later, after suffering injury from a gunpowder explosion; and later managed to find a backer for an expedition to New England in 1614.

Smith wrote about his experiences and the first 13 months of the Jamestown Colony in A True Relation of Such Occurrences and Accidents of Note as Happened in Virginia (1608). A Map of Virginia and The Proceedings of the English Colony in Virginia (1612) continues the story of the colony up until 1610. In A Description of New England (1616), Smith coins the phrase “New England.” He also wrote New England’s Trials (1620–22) and later revised and collected all of these works, with other books on America, in The General History of Virginia, New England and the Summer Isles (1624).

Smith’s writings describe the profits that could be made by turning the country’s resources into commodities, and they contain an early expression of the American Dream. Smith came to see that America was a place where commoners could, through their own merit, rise above the social class into which they were born. J. A. Leo Lemay points out that Smith is “our primary source for Virginia’s earliest years. He gave more detailed and exact information than any other early writer; his writings are more exiting than others . . . and his plain style is more readable.”

Works by John Smith

Captain John Smith: A Select Edition of His Writings. Edited by Karen Ordahl Kupperman. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.

A Work about John Smith

Vaughan, Alden T., and Oscar Handlin. American Genesis: Captain John Smith and the Founding of Virginia. New York: Harper Collins, 1995.

sonnet

The sonnet, a name derived from the Italian sonnetto, meaning song, is a 14-line poetic form that developed near the close of the Middle Ages. Italian Giacomo da Lentino (1188–1240) and other members of the court of Frederick II (1194–1250) are known as the inventors of the form, and Provençal courtly love poetry was an important influence. The sonnet increased in popularity throughout Europe during the RENAISSANCE. Many writers sought to model their verses upon those of another Italian, Francesco PETRARCH (1304–74), who created what is known as the Petrarchan sonnet.

A sonnet is typified by three distinct forms, the Italian form being the most common. Developed from the Sicilian strambotto (meaning a Sicilian peasant song), this verse form consists of two quatrains and two tercets. In the Italian sonnet, the octave develops one thought, and the sestet grows out of the octave's thought, varying and completing it as if the sestet were a response to the octave, with a possible change in point of view. The usual rhyme scheme is abba abba (the octave) and cde cde (the sestet). The octave may be known as two quatrains if printed in quatrains, and the sestet may be known as two tercets.

Following the introduction of the Italian sonnet into English poetry by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (1517–47), and its further development by Sir Thomas Wyatt (1503–42), two other major forms developed. They are the Shakespearean sonnet (named after William SHAKESPEARE) and the Spenserian sonnet (named after Edmund Spenser). These English sonnet forms were conceived during the reign (1509–47) of Henry VIII and came into their own during the reign (1558–1603) of Elizabeth I.

The Shakespearean sonnet is written in iambic pentameter and consists of three quatrains concluded by a rhyming couplet. The rhyme scheme is abab cdcd efef gg. Different from the Shakespearean sonnet in its rhyme scheme is the Spenserian sonnet, which rhymes abab bcbc cdcd ee. The key distinguishing feature of this form is interlocking quatrains, or enveloped quatrains, with the repetition of the rhyme from one quatrain's last line to the next quatrain's first line.

Both sonnet forms typically function as miniature essays, whose main points are arranged according to their respective rhyme scheme. In Shakespearean sonnets, for example, each quatrain has a rhetorical function and a poetic function. The first quatrain presents the argument and premise that lead to the theme expressed in the second quatrain. The third quatrain presents a paradox (the dialectic) that furthers the argument and theme. The rhyming couplet acts as the conclusion to the argument and binds together the preceding three quatrains, making sense of them. Thus, the Shakespearean sonnet resembles a poetic essay in three paragraphs with a two-line conclusion.

Although the sonnets' rhyme schemes vary according to the tastes of the particular poet and the limitations of the language the poem is written in, the verses generally follow the established forms and argumentative patterns.

Many poets wrote sonnets not as stand-alone pieces but as parts of a larger whole. Such collections, which are arranged according to a central theme, are called sonnet sequences. Three famous sequences are Petrarch's Canzoniere (Rime), du Bellay's L'Olive, and Shakespeare's Sonnets. Many more sequences were written during the Renaissance, and many have been written since. As with most sequences, these collections revolve around love and the delights, trials, joys, and sadness of the poem's speaker.

Numerous poets from the Middle Ages and the Renaissance continue to be celebrated as masters of the sonnet form. Well-known sonneteers include Shakespeare and Petrarch, as mentioned, as well as Pierre de RONSARD and Joachim du BELLAY of France; Gottfried August Burger and Johann Wolfgang von GOETHE of Germany; Luis de GÓNGORA Y ARGOTE and Juan Boscán of Spain; and Luíz Vaz de CAMÕES of Portugal.

Works of Sonnets and Sonnet Sequences

- Bellay, Joachim du. Ordered Text: The Sonnet Sequences of Du Bellay. Edited by Richard A. Katz. New York: Peter Lang, 1985.
- Hollander, John, ed. Sonnets: From Dante to the Present. New York: Knopf, 2001.
- Ronsard, Pierre De. Songs and Sonnets of Pierre de Ronsard. New York: Hyperion Books, 1985.
- Wordsworth, William. Sonnet Series and Itinerary Poems, 1820–1845. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2004.

Works about Sonnets and Sonnet Sequences

- Bermann, Sandra L. The Sonnet Over Time: A Study in the Sonnets of Petrarch, Shakespeare, and Baude-laire. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Oppenheimer, Paul. The Birth of the Modern Mind: Self, Consciousness, and the Invention of the Sonnet. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Sonsan of Kaarta, Epic of (after 1650)
African epic

The state of Kaarta was located on the upper Niger River in what is now Mali. Founded by the Bambara, who occupied the region beginning in 1650, the state of Kaarta was consistently overshadowed by its neighbor Segu in a northwest region now known as Beledugu (north of Bamako). Kaarta was not as prosperous or powerful as Segu, and there are various records of attacks from Segu on Kaarta, the former being almost always the winner. However, the founders of Segu and Kaarta are said to descend from the same ancestors, which is described in the Epic of Sonsan of Kaarta. Both peoples belonged to the Kulubali clan and thus are related to Sonsan's ancestor, the hunter Kalajan, who is said to have come from the east. The descendants of the son of Sonsan became the rulers of Kaarta.

The Epic of Sonsan of Kaarta is the story of the rivalry between two brothers who share the same father but have different mothers. Sonsan's charisma provokes jealousy among his stepbrothers. This EPIC also illustrates the resistance of the Bamana Empire to the influence of Islam. Unlike most people in West Africa, the people of Bamana converted to Islam fairly late.

As in the EPIC OF BAMANA SEGU, the storyteller performing the Epic of Sonsan of Kaarta is accompanied by the ngoni, a small string instrument resembling the lute, which punctuates the narrative with musical interludes. Like other epics of old Mali, for instance the Epic of Son-Jara, the Epic of Sonsan of Kaarta remains a valuable cultural record for describing the rituals and culture of this ancient state and its people.

An English Version of the Epic of Sonsan of Kaarta

Johnson, John-William, Thomas A. Hale, and Stephen Belchers, eds. Oral Epics from Africa. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.

Works about the Epic of Sonsan of Kaarta

Belcher, Stephen. Epic Traditions of Africa. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999.

Courlander, Harold, and Ousmane Sako. The Heart of the Ngoni, Heroes of the African Kingdom of Segu. New York: Crown, 1982.

Spinoza, Benedictus (Baruch) de
(1632–1677) philosopher

During the 17th century, the country of the Netherlands was unique in Europe for possessing an open tolerance of new and unorthodox ideas. Because of this, it became a center of science, art, and philosophy. This time period is known as the Dutch Golden Age, during which many brilliant artists, writers, and thinkers made extraordinary achievements. One of the greatest philosophers who worked in the Netherlands during the Dutch Golden Age was Benedictus de Spinoza.

Spinoza was the son of Jewish parents who fled the anti-Semitic persecutions of Portugal and settled in the city of Amsterdam. Unlike other nations, the Netherlands permitted Jews to practice their religion freely. As a young man, Spinoza was educated according to Jewish tradition and intended to become a businessman, but he was also fascinated by science and philosophy. In 1656 the Jewish leaders of Amsterdam angrily excommunicated Spinoza for criticizing biblical scriptures, casting him out of the Dutch Jewish community forever. Most likely, his unusual philosophical and religious ideas upset the tradition-minded Jewish leaders.

Spinoza spent the rest of his life studying philosophy and producing his own philosophical works. Although he was given an inheritance by his father, Spinoza gave it away and supported himself financially by working as a lens grinder. After his excommunication, he became a loner, concentrating exclusively on his philosophy and his writings. Only one of his works, A Theologico-Political Treatise (1670), was published during his lifetime.

In terms of his philosophy, Spinoza was heavily influenced by medieval Jewish thought, as well as the more contemporary philosophy of René DESCARTES, which is especially evident in Spinoza's belief that the philosophical foundations of the universe might be understandable in the same precise manner as geometry. In other words, Spinoza believed that if one started with a few basic and self-evident truths, all other truths about the universe could be deduced; in geometry, all geometric facts can be deduced from a few basic geometric axioms.

Much of Spinoza's philosophy deals with his ideas concerning God, which were very different from most theological concepts. Rather than perceiving God as a separate being, Spinoza saw God as being an all-encompassing entity. In other words, everything that existed was part of or caused by God. This theological idea is known as pantheism. Spinoza's ideas about pantheism would greatly influence many thinkers in later centuries. However, the unusual nature of the idea at the time led to charges that Spinoza was an atheist.

Spinoza's most famous and lasting work is undoubtedly Ethics, which he finished around 1665 (published 1677). It essentially sums up all of Spinoza's thoughts concerning religion, philosophy, and morality, and is considered to be one of the most original philosophical works in Western history.

Ethics is divided into five books, each dealing with a particular aspect of Spinoza's philosophy. Throughout the work, the author organizes his writing in the manner of a complicated geometry problem, laying out a number of axioms and propositions that lead to logical conclusions.

The first book of Ethics is titled On God and expresses the pantheism that marked Spinoza as a truly unique philosopher. The other books discuss his views on metaphysics and human morality. He denied the existence of free will, believing that everything that occurred must come from logical necessity.

Spinoza was highly regarded by Albert Einstein, and his work influenced the development of German philosophy, as well as such writers and philosophers as LESSING, HERDER, and GOETHE.

English Versions of Works by Benedictus de Spinoza

Correspondence of Spinoza. Translated by A. Wolf. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2003.

Ethics: Treatise on the Emendation of the Intellect and Selected Letters. Translated by Samuel Shirley. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 1998.

The Collected Works of Spinoza. Translated by Edwin Curley. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1985.

Works about Benedictus de Spinoza

Gullan-Whur, Margaret. Within Reason: A Life of Spinoza. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Nadler, Steven. Spinoza: A Life. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

Staden, Hans (1520–ca. 1565) travel writer, biographer

Hans Staden was a Hessian soldier who traveled to Brazil on Portuguese ships. While serving in a coastal Portuguese fort in 1552, he was captured by Tupinamba Indian warriors. After months in captivity, he escaped and subsequently wrote a two-part narrative on his confinement and Tupinamba captors.

Published in 1557, Hans Staden: The True History of His Captivity, became an immediate bestseller. It contains important ethnographic descriptions of many aspects of the now extinct Tupinamba culture, including descriptions of villages, subsistence, crafts, customs, political practices, and cannibalism. The work is an absorbing account of an incredible experience.

The first part of the work contains a narration of Staden's first two voyages to Brazil up to the time of his capture. The second part focuses on descriptions of Tupinamba culture and practices. Significantly, graphic woodcuts depicting cannibalism and other elements of Tupinamba life are included with the narrative. These represent the earliest published images of Native Americans and served to present to European audiences an authentic, graphic view of Native American life.

Through his narratives and images, Staden brought the world closer to understanding Native American culture by placing cannibalism and other practices within their proper cultural context.

Instead of sensationalizing the pagan practices as demonic, Staden illustrates the practices as part of a complex tribal social system in which retribution is taken against the cruelties of Spanish and Portuguese enemies as acts of war.

English Versions of Works by Hans Staden

The Adventures of Hans Staden. Washington, D.C.: Alhambra, 1998.

The Captivity of Hans Staden of Hesse, in A.D. 1547–1555: Among the Wild Tribes of Eastern Brazil. Translated by A. Tootal and edited by R. F. Burton. New York: Burt Franklin, 1964.

Works about Hans Staden

Goodman, Edward J. The Explorers of South America. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.

Moffit, John F., and Sebastián Santiago. O Brave New People: The European Adventure of the American Indian. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico, 1998.

Sumarokov, Alexander Petrovich

(1718–1777) poet, dramatist

Alexander Sumarokov was born into the nobility in St. Petersburg. When he was 14, he entered the Corps of Cadets. After graduating in 1740, he held positions at court and eventually served as the director of the Russian Imperial Theater. His ego and quarrelsome nature made his work difficult, however, and in 1761 he was forced to retire.

Sumarokov's writings include a literary journal, The Industrious Bee, nine tragedies, 12 comedies, approximately 150 love songs, 374 verse fables, satirical verses, SONNETS, elegies, odes, and more. These works reflect Sumarokov's ENLIGHTENMENT belief that literature should instruct as well as entertain.

Sumarokov admired French CLASSICISM but used a simpler, more direct style than that of Mikhail LOMONOSOV and Feofan PROKOPOVITCH, whose poetry he disdained. He also observes the UNITIES in plays such as Hamlet (1748), a loose adaptation of SHAKESPEARE's work; and Dimitrii the Impostor (1771), a well-received work set in Russia's Time of Troubles.

Two of Sumarokov's most significant works appeared in 1747: "Epistle on the Russian Language" and "Epistle on the Art of Poetry." Both are composed of rhyming couplets in iambic hexameter. In the first, Sumarokov asserts that Russian is an excellent literary language awaiting only competent writers. In the second, which includes references to Greek mythology, he explains the style and subject matter appropriate to each type of poetry. Sumarokov holds up as models modern poets such as MOLIÈRE, LA FONTAINE, MILTON, POPE, and BOILEAU-DESPRÉAUX, as well as ancients such as Homer, Sophocles, Ovid, and Virgil.

Sumarokov's poems, dramas, and theoretical works influenced Russian writers for decades. He was, in William Brown's words, an "astonishingly versatile innovator."

See also NEOCLASSICISM; TRAGEDY.

English Versions of Works by Alexander Petrovich Sumarokov

Selected Aesthetic Works of Sumarokov and Karamzin.

Translated by Henry M. Nebel Jr. Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1981.

Selected Tragedies of A. P. Sumarokov. Translated by Richard and Raymond Fortune. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1970.

A Work about Alexander Petrovich Sumarokov

Brown, William Edward. "Alexander Sumarokov and Russian Classicism," in A History of Eighteenth-Century Russian Literature. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1980.

Swedenborg, Emanuel (Emanuel Swedborg) (1688–1772) scientist, mystic

Emanuel Swedenborg was born to Sara Behm and her husband Jesper Swedberg, a Lutheran bishop, in the city of Stockholm. Little is known about Swedenborg's childhood, but he graduated from the University of Uppsala before traveling to England to study physics under Isaac Newton.

Over the next several years, in Holland, France, Germany, and his native Sweden, Swedenborg devoted himself to the study of science, publishing important papers, and working on various inventions. Principia (1734) would have important implications for Western philosophy, as it was in this work that the idea of the nebulae was first expounded, a theory later appropriated by the German philosopher Immanuel KANT.

The years 1743 through 1745 signaled a dramatic transition for Swedenborg, as the focus of his thought and writing shifted from science and philosophy to religion and mysticism. Swedenborg professed that around 1743 his intelligence was miraculously opened, and that he was able to see into the next world and speak with spirits and angels. From this time until his death, he documented his spiritual visions and beliefs in books and essays on various spiritual themes. Among his most important works is On Heaven and Its Wonders and on Hell (1758), in which he recounts his mystical experiences and communications with angels.

For the incredible variety and extent of his writings, Swedenborg is a remarkable figure in the intellectual history of Europe. His philosophical and religious works have influenced successive generations of writers and philosophers in Europe and throughout the world.

English Versions of Works by Emanuel Swedenborg

Apocalypse Explained, Vol. 3. Translated by John Whitehead. West Chester, Pa.: Swedenborg Foundation, 1995.

Essential Readings. Edited by Michael Stanley. Berkeley, Calif.: North Atlantic Books, 2003.

Works about Emanuel Swedenborg

Benz, Ernst. Emanuel Swedenborg: Visionary Savant in the Age of Reason. Translated by Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke. West Chester, Pa.: Swedenborg Foundation, 2002.

Dusen, Wilson Van. The Presence of Other Worlds.

West Chester, Pa.: Swedenborg Foundation, 2004.

Swainson, W. P. Emanuel Swedenborg: The Swedish Seer. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.

Swift, Jonathan (1667–1745) poet, satirist

Jonathan Swift was born in Dublin to Abigail Erick Swift and Jonathan Swift, an English couple who immigrated to Ireland in 1660. Swift had an unusual early life: His father died before Swift was born, and Swift was kidnapped as a baby for several years by a former nurse. After he was returned to his mother, he was sent to grammar school in Kilkenny. He later earned a B.A. from Trinity College, Dublin, and then traveled to England to work as a secretary for Sir William Temple. Swift received an M.A. from Oxford in 1692, and in 1695 became a priest of the Church of Ireland. He took a doctor of divinity degree from Trinity in 1702.

Swift suffered throughout his life from Ménière's syndrome, an inner ear disorder that causes vertigo, deafness, and giddiness. Because of this condition, he was rumored to have gone mad in the last years of his life. He aided this impression by leaving his money to a madhouse.

Critical Analysis

During his frequent visits to London, Swift joined the literary circle surrounding Joseph Addison and Richard Steele and contributed essays to Steele's Tatler. Swift created a memorable narrative persona in the Bickerstaff Papers (1708–09), in which the character Bickerstaff is a parody of the astrologer John Partridge.

By 1710, Swift had become associated with the ruling Tory party. He shifted his allegiance from the Whiggish Addison and Steele to a new group that included Alexander POPE, John Gay, and Dr. John Arbuthnot, who formed the Scriblerus club. The Scriblerians met weekly in 1714 collaborating on satirical works. A decade later, Swift wrote Drapier's Letters (1724), in which an Irish drapier protests against the corruption of a scheme of the Walpole administration to flood Ireland with worthless currency. Because Swift called attention to this scheme, it was withdrawn, and he became a national hero.

Swift was also a poet. Two of his most notable poems are “The Lady’s Dressing Room” (1730) and “A Beautiful Young Nymph Going to Bed” (1731), which display an apparent misogyny. Feminist critic Margaret Doody, however, argues that Swift was actually more respectful toward women than many 18th-century writers: “When Swift deals with the dirty or disagreeable in females, or when his tone is scolding, he is still urging self-respect, and he never imposes the injunctions to docility, obedience, and mental lethargy so commonly repeated to women throughout the century.”

Swift’s first major work was A Tale of a Tub (1704), a wildly experimental satire accompanied by The Battle of the Books, a more straightforward, comic piece in which he dramatizes the “ancients vs. moderns” debate (the hotly contested debate over whether modern learning had surpassed that of the Greek and Roman classics) as a literal battle between ancient and modern books.

Critic Nigel Wood comments that A Tale of a Tub is “one of the most self-conscious pieces of writing. The Teller’s desperate desire to please his readers by incessantly putting them in the picture so determines the mood of the writing that it usurps what would seem to be its main function: to tell a tale.” Before the tale even begins, readers encounter a parody in the form of a list of other works by the author, including “A Panegyric Essay upon the Number THREE” and “A general History of Ears.” The text then goes through dozens of pages of prefatory material before beginning its ostensible subject, an allegorical story of three brothers, Peter, Martin, and Jack, who represent Catholicism, the Church of England, and Protestant Dissenters, respectively. The narrator continually strays from his subject, even including “A Digression in Praise of Digressions.” Swift scholar Ricardo Quintana has attempted to summarize the text’s main themes: “The two themes of zeal in religion and of enthusiasm in learning and knowledge have been inextricably woven into one.”

Norman O. Brown, critic of psychoanalysis, has analyzed what he terms Swift’s “excremental vision”: “Any reader of Jonathan Swift knows . . . his analysis of human nature . . . becomes the decisive weapon in his assault on the pretensions, the pride, even the self-respect of mankind.” Examples of this can be found in almost all of Swift’s writings, but is perhaps most pronounced in his poetry. His early poem “Description of a City Shower” (1710) vividly portrays the filth of urban living: “Sweepings from Butchers Stalls, Dung, Guts, and Blood, / Drown’d Puppies, stinking Sprats, all drench’d in Mud, / Dead Cats and Turnip-Tops come tumbling down the Flood.” In “The Lady’s Dressing Room” Swift humanizes a poetic nymph by revealing what goes on behind the scenes of a lady’s boudoir. Strephon is disgusted to learn that “Celia, Celia, Celia shits!” but the moral of the poem seems to be that this is only natural: “Such Order from Confusion sprung, / Such gaudy Tulips rais’d from Dung.”

In his later writings, Swift became concerned about the condition of the Irish people, most famously in “A Modest Proposal” (1729), which is also a masterpiece of irony. Taking on the persona of a “projector,” he proposes a novel and strikingly satirical solution to Irish poverty and famine:

I have been assured by a very knowing American of my Acquaintance in London; that a young healthy Child, well nursed, is, at a Year old, a most delicious, nourishing, and wholesome Food; whether Stewed, Roasted, Baked, or Boiled; and, I make no doubt, that it will equally serve in a Fricasie, or a Ragoust.

His ironic intentions reveal themselves by the end of the essay. The projector lists a series of other solutions, including taxing absentee landlords and buying Irish rather than imported goods, but dismisses them: “let no Man talk to me of these and the like Expedients; till he hath, at least, a Glimpse of Hope, that there will ever be some hearty and sincere Attempt to put them in Practice.”

In his masterpiece, Gulliver's Travels (1726), Swift touches on all his major themes: disgust with the human body, misanthropy, the satire of modern learning, human nature, and a criticism of English policies toward Ireland. Attempting to conceal his authorship of the work, Swift brought the manuscript with him on a trip to London, sent it anonymously to a publisher, and returned to Ireland before it was printed. Despite these precautions, the reading public recognized Swift's hand. It became his greatest success and inspired an array of “Gulliveriana,” including verses by Pope and a poem that Henry Fielding attributed to Gulliver.

The deceptively simple text purports to be a travel tale by Lemuel Gulliver, who undertakes four fantastic voyages to Lilliput, inhabited by a miniature race of people; Brobdingnag, a land of giants; the floating island of Laputa; and the country of the Houyhnhnms, talking horses who rule over the Yahoos, a degenerated form of humanity. Critics remain divided about Swift's ultimate object of satire. Critic James Clifford identified two interpretations, which he terms “hard” and “soft.” “Hard” interpreters see Swift as a misanthrope who condemns humanity, while the “soft” believe that “Swift's basic attack is not upon man but upon the various false ideals which have misled him—rationalism, inevitable progress, and the essential goodness of human nature.”

Swift is perhaps the most gifted and complex satirist in the English language. His rampant mis-anthropy, misogyny, and revulsion with the human body make much of his work difficult for more sensitive readers, but the complexity of his irony, his use of narrative personae, and his philosophical ruminations on human nature are superb. His work is often compared to those of his contemporaries Pope and Gay, and his influences include RABELAIS, CERVANTES, and Lucian. Critic Robert Mahony remarks, “Toward the end of the twentieth century, Swift remains a presence in Irish culture more vivid than that of any other from eighteenth-century Ireland—more vivid, indeed, than most from any historical period.”

Works by Jonathan Swift

The Basic Writings of Jonathan Swift. Edited by Claude Rawson. New York: Modern Library, 2002.

The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift. Edited by Harold Williams. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1963.

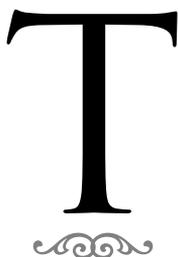

The Writings of Jonathan Swift. Edited by Robert A. Greenberg and William B. Piper. New York: W.W. Norton, 1973.

Works about Jonathan Swift

Kelly, Ann Cline. Jonathan Swift and Popular Culture: Myth, Media, and the Man. New York: Palgrave, 2002.

Mahony, Robert. Jonathan Swift: The Irish Identity. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.

Palmeri, Frank, ed. Critical Essays on Jonathan Swift. New York: G.K. Hall, 1993.

Takeda Izumo (1691–1756) dramatist

This master of BUNRAKU or ninyo joruri (puppet plays) was originally a theater promoter, which was also his father's profession. A prolific author, Takeda wrote many plays, including the well-known Chushingura, sometimes called 47 Ronin. Variations of this piece, written for the stock puppets of Bunraku, are also performed in KABUKI theater. Izumo's contributions to Japanese literature are enduring, and his tomb in Osaka is a modern-day tourist attraction.

Translator Donald Keene explains that the story of Chushingura, attributed to Izumo and two other authors, Miyoshi Shoraku and Namiki Senryu, is based on a true-crime story from the early 18th century. Using a trick typical of writers at the time, the authors set the play in the distant past to skirt government restrictions on writing about real events.

The lengthy play begins with tension between samurai over etiquette, but more serious matters quickly arise. Moranao, a samurai lord, attempts to instigate an affair with another lord's wife. The virtuous woman turns him down in a note. Her husband, Enya Hangen, is present when the rejected man receives the note. Moranao turns his anger against Hangen, who, offended, attacks him. Hangen must commit ritual suicide (seppuku) for this crime, but he tells his samurai: "Yuranosuke, I leave you this dagger as a memento of me! Avenge me!" Hangen's loyal warriors, the 47 Ronin, eventually decapitate Moranao.

Chushingura still attracts audiences, and story variations continue to appear in Japanese drama, film, and television. Scholar Alan Atkinson comments in a gallery guide to Japanese prints that the play "has proved as inspirational to Japanese artists over the years as it has to Japanese theater goers."

An English Version of a Work by Takeda Izumo

Chushingura: The Treasury of Loyal Retainers. A Puppet Play by Takeda Izumo, Miyoshi Shoraku and Namiki Senryu. Translated by Donald Keene. New York: Columbia University Press, 1971.

A Work about Takeda Izumo

Brandon, James R., ed. Chushingura: Studies in Kabuki and the Puppet Theatre. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1982.

Tang Xianzu (T'ang Hsien-tsu, T'ang Hsien-Tzu) (1550–1616) dramatist

Tang Xianzu was a minor government official in the Ming dynasty, but he was also a revered Chinese playwright. His most famous work is The Peony Pavilion, part of a set of pieces called The Four Dreams of Linchuan. This drama uses the conventions of zhuanji (chuan-chi; “grand music drama” or “kun music drama,” also known as kunju opera), a style typical of the Ming dynasty. The plays of this era featured music and very complicated plots.

The Peony Pavilion tells the story of a well-to-do young girl who dies while waiting for the lover who has appeared to her in dreams. She leaves behind a painting of herself. The lover, a young scholar, finds the painting and in turn falls in love with her ghost. After many difficulties and trials, the young scholar and the girl, who turns out to be alive after all, are reunited and live happily ever after.

Tang Xianzu drew on earlier works for his plots and used known music for his melodies, but he is recognized as an innovative, original playwright. Today, certain portions of The Peony Pavilion are still performed.

An English Version of a Work by Tang Xianzu

The Peony Pavilion by Tang Xianzu (Tang Hsien-Tzu).

Translated by Cyril Birch. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1980.

Tasso, Torquato (1544–1595) poet, dramatist

Torquato Tasso was born near Sorrento, south of Naples, the second child of Bernardo Tasso, a courtier and poet. At age 10, the younger Tasso joined his father in Rome, leaving behind his mother, who died in 1556. In 1560 Tasso enrolled in the University of Padua to study law but instead concentrated on poetry. In 1565 he went to Ferrara to join the service of Cardinal Luigi d’Este and later of Duke Alfonso de’Este. In 1579, after making a scene at the duke’s marriage festivities, Tasso was confined at the Hospital of St. Anna under suspicion of madness. He was kept there, comfortably housed and supplied with books and writing materials, until 1586. He spent the last years of his life traveling in search of a patron, and died in Rome.

Tasso published his first work, a ROMANCE narrative named Rinaldo (1562), when he was only 18. Rinaldo was a figure from the popular legends of Charlemagne, which provided the subject matter for many a song and story. Tasso had studied the classic EPICS—Homer’s Odyssey and Virgil’s Aeneid—and he knew ARIOSTO’S Orlando Furioso. These masters, Tasso felt, had already covered the traditional ground of battles, heroics, and damsels in distress; for his own epic, therefore, he turned to the Christian wars and chose the setting of the First Crusade.

In response to the Reformation taking place in the north of Europe, begun by Martin LUTHER, the Catholic Church launched the Counter-Reformation. Fearing the Inquisition and the Council of Trent, which had banned books by many, including CASTIGLIONE and ERASMUS, Tasso circulated the manuscript of his epic among friends and asked their advice. Tasso’s anxieties over the work are probably what led to his nervous collapse. Jerusalem Revisited appeared in print in 1581 to widespread acclaim. The Council of Trent found nothing unorthodox in the book, but Tasso was never completely satisfied with it. A new version, Jerusalem Conquered, appeared in 1593.

Tasso also wrote a tragicomedy called Aminta, first performed in 1573, and the TRAGEDY King Torrismondo (1587), as well as a collection of 28 dialogues, most while residing at St. Anna.

Tasso’s Dialogues borrows a great deal from Plato and reveals his interest in philosophy, which he studied while at Padua. Aminta, which shows the influence of the Poetics of Aristotle, contributes to the genre of the PASTORAL play that developed in the courts of Italy during the 16th century. The pastoral drama used rustic settings and drew a simple, romantic picture of country life. In Tasso’s play, Sybil is a pretty nymph and Aminta, the shepherd, falls madly in love with her. The play ends happily, unlike King Torrismondo, a classic tragedy. Tasso’s later long poem On the Creation of the World (1592) has been considered artistically arid and is an example used by critics when they suggest that the quality of Tasso’s poetic output is uneven.

Composed in 20 chapters or cantos and arranged in rhymed stanzas, Jerusalem Revisited is an epic romance in the tradition of Ariosto but calls itself a true history. Though in the heroic style, its tone is one of lyric melancholy. The story focuses on the knightly crusader Godfrey and the hero Rinaldo, who comes to help Godfrey besiege Jerusalem. The subplots follow three heroines, Clorinda, Armida, and Ermina, and their adventures in love. Scholar Ralph Nash praises the poem for its “genuine zest for the sheer drama of history in the making,” as in this passage where the Christian hosts make ready their final assault on the city:

The one and the other army seems to be a lofty forest thick with trees, with so many spears each one abounds. The bows are drawn, the lances are set in rest, the darts are waving and every sling is whirling; every war-horse too is ready for battle . . . he stamps, he paws, he curvets and neighs, he flares his nostrils and breathes forth smoke and flame.

Like the cousins in the legends of Charlemagne, Tasso, who championed Rinaldo, felt a lifelong rivalry with Ariosto's Orlando. Alexander POPE, VOLTAIRE, ROUSSEAU, and Lord Byron would all count themselves among Tasso's admirers. He inspired Edmund Spenser and MILTON to take up the tradition of the epic romance, and several other poems, operas, and the drama Tasso by GOETHE are based on his work.

English Versions of Works by Torquato Tasso

Jerusalem Delivered. Edited by Anthony M. Esolen. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000.
King Torrismondo by Torquato Tasso. Translated by Maria Pastore Passaro. New York: Fordham University Press, 1997.

A Work about Torquato Tasso

Finucci, Valeria. Renaissance Transactions: Ariosto and Tasso. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1999.

Taylor, Edward (1642–1729) theologian, poet

Edward Taylor was born into a farming family in rural England. He received his early education in England and for a time worked as a teacher. However, as Donald E. Stanford points out, his Puritan convictions ultimately made it impossible for him to obtain the license needed to “preach, teach, or attend the universities of Cambridge or Oxford.” In 1688 he sailed to New England, where, at age 29, he entered Harvard College. Thereafter, he served as a minister in Westfield, Connecticut (now a part of Massachusetts), married twice, and had 14 children.

Taylor wrote thousands of lines of poetry, only a few of which were published during his lifetime. It was not until the 1930s, when a manuscript containing almost 400 pages of verse was discovered, that the minister's significance to American literature became clear. Samuel Eliot Morison notes that in poems like “Huswifery,” Taylor draws “similes from the humble occupations” of “spinning and weaving” as a way of imaginatively exploring the relationship between God and humans. His most sophisticated poems are contained in a collection titled Preparatory Meditations. Taylor used these poetic meditations (at least 217 of which have survived) to prepare his heart and soul for the sacred act of administering the Lord's Supper. These devotional poems grant insight into the way in which the early American literary imagination emerged out of Puritan theological beliefs and practices. Norman Grabo notes that the recovery of Taylor's poetry challenged the earlier tendency to “ignore the artistic side of colonial literature for its more attractive intellectual sister” and revealed the “influence of a vital emotional tradition on the thought and expression of American Puritans.”

Works by Edward Taylor

The Poems of Edward Taylor. Edited by Donald E. Stanford. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.

Works about Edward Taylor

Gatta, John. Gracious Laughter: The Meditative Wit of Edward Taylor. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1989.

Hammond, Jeffrey A. Edward Taylor: Fifty Years of Scholarship and Criticism. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell and Brewer, 1993.

Schuldiner, Michael. Studies in Puritan American Spirituality: Essays on Anne Bradstreet, Edward Taylor, Nathaniel Hawthorne and Catharine Maria Sedgwick, vol. 7. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2001.

Tench, Watkin (ca. 1758–1833) travel writer, historiographer

Watkin Tench was born in England, but spent part of his childhood in France. In 1778 he was commissioned a lieutenant in the Royal Marines and fought against the rebels in the American War of Independence until taken prisoner in Maryland. A captain by 1786, he volunteered for guard duties on the first ships transporting convicts to Australia. The “First Fleet” arrived at Botany Bay on January 20, 1788. Tench remained behind to guard the convict settlers. One year later, he published in London A Narrative of the Expedition to Botany Bay, an account of the arduous sea voyage.

In 1791 Tench led an expedition into the unexplored areas north and west of present-day Sydney, accompanied by Governor Philip, of the principal settlement at Port Jackson. He returned to England later that same year, and in 1793 published A Complete Account of the Settlement at Port Jackson. This work describes the physical environment of the new colony, the struggles of the convict settlers, and relations with the local aborigines. The Complete Account proved a popular sourcebook on Australia and was translated into several European languages during Tench’s lifetime.

Serving again in the Royal Marines, Tench was taken prisoner by French forces in 1794, and remained in captivity for six months. In 1796 he published an account of this experience, Letters Written in France to a Friend in London. He retired from the marines in 1821 with the rank of lieutenant-general and died in Devonshire.

Tench’s writings are noteworthy for their convivial tone and humility. According to the historian Tim Flannery, “Tench was a great wit, always ready to enjoy a joke at his own expense.” He was also a thoughtful and humane man who was fascinated by the customs and language of the aborigines and treated them as equals, as illustrated by this passage from the Complete Account: “Soon after they [aborigine guides] bade us adieu, in unabated friendship and good humour . . . and we shook them by the hand, which they returned lustily.” In a sense, it is appropriate that the birth of Australia became, in Tench’s writings, the occasion for the birth of Australian literature.

Works by Watkin Tench

1788: Comprising 'A Narrative of the Expedition to Botany Bay' and 'A Complete Account of the Settlement at Port Jackson'. Melbourne: Text Publishing, 1996.

Letters from Revolutionary France. Edited by Gavin Edwards. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 2001.

The Explorers: Stories of Discovery and Adventure from the Australian Frontier. Edited by Tim Flannery. New York: Grove Press, 2000.

Teresa of Avila, St. (1515–1582)

autobiographer, theologian

Teresa de Cepeda y Ahumada was born in the Spanish city of Ávila, the third child of Alonso Sánchez de Cepeda and his second wife, Beatriz de Ahumada y Tapia. Both were of the nobility. As a child, Teresa loved novels of chivalry. Teresa’s mother died in 1528, and in 1531 Teresa’s father sent her to stay in a convent, where she fell ill. She was sent to stay with her uncle to speed her recovery.

At the time, Spaniards such as Ignatius of LOYOLA were beginning to launch a Counter-Reformation against the activities of Martin LUTHER and John CALVIN, while Spanish missionaries labored to convert Native Americans to Christianity. Religious fervor was in the air. Reading St. Jerome's letters, Teresa began to fear purgatory and hell. Against her father's wishes, she reentered convent life and in 1536 became a Carmelite nun under the name Teresa de Jesús.

Her illness, however, returned. She suffered severe pain, vomiting, and even partial paralysis. During her slow recovery, she became more spiritual. She began to have visions and noticed the ways in which the convent, with its relaxed rules, had become worldly. In 1562 Teresa received permission to found the first Discalced Carmelite convent, which would observe a stricter rule. She went on to travel across Spain, founding more than a dozen convents and contributing to the establishment of two dozen more. She mentored younger individuals, including St. JOHN OF THE CROSS, and impressed almost everyone with her piety and inner drive. She died while visiting the duchess of Alba.

Teresa's literary works include the Book of Her Life, an autobiography begun in 1562 and finished in 1565; The Way of Perfection (1562), which taught nuns the best way to pray; Spiritual Relations (1563–79), a continuation of the Life's description of her mystic experiences; Book of the Foundations (1573–82), descriptions of her work establishing convents; and The Interior Castle (1577), which describes the soul as a castle with seven concentric mansions or levels of spirituality. She also composed 31 poems and more than 450 letters.

Writing in the Castilian literary language that King Alfonso X had established centuries before, she impressed readers with vivid images that helped them to understand religious experiences. Helmut Hatzfeld notes that her works display not only "originality [and] spontaneity" but also "pedagogical skill in the expression of concepts usually considered ineffable."

Along with The Interior Castle, Teresa's most admired work is her Life. In a famous passage, she describes a vision she had in 1559 of a cherubim:

... not tall, but short, and very beautiful, his face so aflame that he appeared to be one of the highest types of angel. . . . In his hands I saw a long golden spear and at the end of the iron tip I seemed to see a point of fire. With this he seemed to pierce my heart several times so that it penetrated to my entrails. When he drew it out, I thought he was drawing them out with it and he left me completely afire with a great love for God.

In another well-known section of the Life, Teresa compares four kinds of prayer to the four ways in which one can water a garden: pulling the water up by hand, turning a waterwheel, using a flowing stream or river, and receiving rain. Each successive stage involves less labor on the part of the gardener. If one achieves the final stage, in which prayer comes as easily as rain sent to water the dry soul, "there is no feeling, but only rejoicing, unaccompanied by any understanding of the thing in which the soul is rejoicing."

The Catholic Church made Teresa a saint in 1622. Luis de GÓNGORA Y ARGOTE paid her literary tribute, and LOPE DE VEGA wrote two plays about her. She eventually became co-patron saint of Spain. Francisco de QUEVEDO later argued that she was too feminine to hold this honor. The Catholic Church and most of its members disagreed with him, however. In 1970 St. Teresa became the first woman honored as a Doctor of the Church. Her works remain widely read.

English Versions of Works by St. Teresa of Avila

The Complete Poetry of St. Teresa de Avila: A Bilingual Edition. Translated by Eric W. Vogt. New Orleans: University Press of the South, 1996.

The Complete Works of Saint Teresa of Jesus, 3 vols. London: Sheed and Ward, 1944–46.

The Letters of St. Teresa of Jesús, 2 vols. Translated and edited by E. Allison Peers. London: Burns, Oates and Washbourne, 1951.

The Life of Saint Teresa of Avila by Herself. Translated by J. M. Cohen. London: Penguin, 1987.

Works about St. Teresa of Avila

Hoornaert, R. Saint Teresa in Writings. London: Trend and Co., 1931.

Lincoln, Victoria. Teresa: A Woman, A Biography of Teresa of Avila. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1984.

Medwick, Cathleen. Teresa of Avila: The Progress of a Soul. New York: Knopf, 2000.

Peers, E. Allison. Handbook to the Life and Times of St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross. Westminster, Md.: Newman Press, 1954.

Thomas à Kempis (1380–1471) theologian

Thomas Hammerken was born in Kempin, near Cologne, Germany, which accounts for the surname by which he is known (à Kempis is Latin for “from Kempis”). At age 12 he was sent to Deventer, in the Netherlands, to join the Brethren of the Common Life. Co-founded by Gerard Groote (1340–84) and Florentius Radewyn (1350–1400), this community strove to live simply and in harmony under the rule set up by Augustine. Later Thomas went to Mount St. Agnes to join his brother John. He was ordained a priest at age 33 and remained at St. Agnes for the rest of his life.

Kempis trained as a copyist of manuscripts, which exposed him to the works of the greatest thinkers of pagan and Christian antiquity, not just Augustine, Bernard of Clairvaux, Francis of Assisi, Thomas Aquinas, and Gregory the Great, but also Aristotle, Ovid, and Seneca. The Brethren habitually kept notes on what they read, and Thomas used these records to inform and arrange The Imitation of Christ, now considered a devotional masterpiece for the Christian faith.

Begun in 1420 and first circulated in 1429, The Imitation of Christ has four parts. The first examines the spiritual life, the second contemplates the interior life, the third looks at finding consolation within, and the fourth reflects on the sacrament of the altar. Kempis’s themes stress the humanity of Christ, knowledge of self, the practice of virtue, and the reading of scripture as a form of meditation.

The Imitation of Christ is often considered a companion piece to the Christian Bible. Since its first translation into English in 1503, it has never been out of print. Perhaps it appeals because its ideals are so modest. Humility and simplicity are its foundation, and the author, feeling no need for fame or fortune, celebrates the simple life. Kempis speaks to the human need to know God, and in the tradition of the medieval mystics, he seeks guidance from the soul within, suggesting that the spark of the divine is contained within us all.

An English Version of a Work by Thomas à Kempis

The Imitation of Christ in Four Books: A Translation from the Latin. Translated by Joseph N. Tylenda. New York: Vintage Books, 1998.

A Work about Thomas à Kempis

Montmorency, J. E. G. de. Thomas à Kempis: His Age and Book. New York: Kennikat Press, 1970.

Till Eulenspiegel (1519)

Till Eulenspiegel is a collection of folktales about a German peasant named Till Eulenspiegel who lived around 1300. “Eulenspiegel” was a German surname at the time, but the literal translation of the word is “owl-mirror.” As owls are often a symbol of wisdom, it has been suggested that the character and tales in Till Eulenspiegel acted as a kind of “wise mirror” held up to society to point out foolishness. However, in medieval times, the owl also was viewed as the “devil’s bird,” representing stupidity or evil, which makes it an appropriate symbol for the character Till’s nasty antics. Till is a typical trickster, one whose pranks poke fun at or teach lessons to the rich, mean, or pompous. Tricksters in other world literatures include Anansi the Spider from Africa, Loki from Norse mythology, and Reynard the Fox from France.

Through an anonymous narrator named “N,” the tales of Till Eulenspiegel relate Till’s life and how he uses his tricks to get by in medieval Germany. In many of these tales, Till points out the silliness of people’s words by following directions literally. In the 11th tale, for example, he is hired by a rich merchant who tells him to cook a roast “coolly and slowly” so as not to burn it. Instead, Till puts the roast on a spit over two barrels of beer to keep it cool. When the merchant fires Till and tells him to “clear out,” Till obediently takes all the furniture out of the house and puts it in the street. Typical of Till, these incidents “hold a mirror” back at the speaker, reflecting their words.

Till Eulenspiegel supposedly died in 1350, but there is no evidence that proves he ever truly existed. According to legend, he was buried beneath a gravestone marked by a carving of an owl holding a mirror. Nevertheless, the legend of Till Eulenspiegel and his antics lives on. The first publication of the tales appeared in 1519, and was followed by William Copland’s translation, titled A merye jest of a man that was called Howleglas, in 1555 or 1560. In Germany, there are statues, restaurants, and a museum honoring Till Eulenspiegel. There also has been a Till Eulenspiegel ballet and an EPIC poem based on his life. The most famous Eulenspiegel-inspired work of art is composer Richard Strauss’s 1895 tone poem, Till Eulenspiegel’s Merry Pranks.

An English Version of Till Eulenspiegel

Till Eulenspiegel. Introduction by Paul Oppenheimer.
London: Routledge, 2001.

Tirso de Molina (Gabriel Téllez)

(ca. 1580–1648) dramatist

Tirso de Molina was the pseudonym of Gabriel Téllez, who was born in Madrid and educated at the University of Alcalá. He joined the Order of Mercy in 1601 and was made the superior of the monasteries in Trujillo in 1626 and Soria in 1645.

Despite his religious profession, Tirso de Molina was very active in the literary circles that flourished during the Spanish Golden Age. He wrote between 300 and 400 plays during the course of his life, of which about 86 survive. The plays range from historical and religious dramas to palace comedies and romantic tragedies. Tirso de Molina was greatly influenced by the Golden Age dramatist LOPE DE VEGA, particularly in his principles of dramatic composition. However, Tirso de Molina’s plays are individualized by his own theological interests, which often surface in themes of the human will in conflict with the divine, and by his geographical and historical knowledge, gathered from the trips he took throughout Spain, Portugal, and even the West Indies.

Tirso de Molina also tried his hand at short prose, releasing a collection of stories called The Gardens of Toledo in 1621 and in 1635 Pleasure with Profit, a collection of stories, plays, and verse. Tirso de Molina’s real skill, however, emerged in his plays, which were made remarkable by the vivid characters he created, whose psychological torments he portrayed with accuracy and depth. Some of his more memorable dramas were Prudence in Woman (1634) and The Rape of Tamar (1634), which were both chillingly realistic in their portrayal of human agony. In contrast, in The Bashful Man in the Palace (1621) and Don Gil of the Green Stockings (1635), events unfold with a merry and light-hearted rapidity.

Tirso de Molina is most celebrated for his two most sophisticated and mature plays, El condenado por desconfiado (The Doubted Damned, 1635) and El burlador de Sevilla (The Seducer of Seville, also translated as Don Juan and the Stone Guest, 1634). In the second of these, the infamous character Don Juan makes his first appearance in dramatic literature. Drawing on popular legends of the wily seducer, Tirso de Molina created a literary figure that would inspire several later writers and dramatists, including MOLIÈRE, Byron, and George Bernard Shaw, as well as move Mozart to compose Don Giovanni.

The Don Juan of Tirso's play is very different from later versions of the character. He is not the middle-aged Casanova but rather a very young and inexperienced man. In The Seducer of Seville, he searches for his own limits and explores the limits of the society in which he lives in order to transcend them. His character, in essence, is a reflection of the aristocratic young Spaniards of Tirso de Molina's day. In her introduction to Don Juan of Seville, Lynne Alvarez writes:

It is the blind thoughtlessness, the youthful arrogance of this famous character that ultimately destroys him. Because it never occurs to Don Juan he will encounter a situation which he cannot somehow talk his way out of. Aristocratic Spaniards could talk their way out of just about anything. . . . Just as one could travel from wealth to rags at the snap of an imperial finger, so one could transform oneself from great sinner to great saint via a well-spoken confession.

Tirso de Molina's portrayal of Don Juan did not meet with absolute approval; the council of Castile denounced him as a "corrupter of public morals" in 1625. Later, however, Tirso de Molina's General History of the Order of Mercy (1637), a work he undertook as part of his role as the order's official historian, established him as a respectable theologian. As a playwright, he was for a long time eclipsed by the popularity of CALDERÓN DE LA BARCA, but Tirso de Molina is now considered an outstanding figure of 17th-century Spanish literature. His ability to scale the heights and depths of human experience has caused some critics to compare him to William SHAKESPEARE, and his mastery of a number of genres ranging from prose and poetry to drama and fiction has established him permanently in the history of Spanish letters.

English Versions of Works by Tirso de Molina

Damned for Despair. Translated by Lawrence Boswell. Hygiene, Colo.: Eridanos Press, 1992.

Don Juan of Seville. Translated by Lynne Alvarez. New York: Playwright's Press, 1989.

Don Juan: The Beguiler of Seville and The Stone Guest. Translated by Max Oppenheimer. Lawrence, Kans.: Coronado Press, 1976.

The Rape of Tamar. Translated by Paul Whitworth. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1999.

Works about Tirso de Molina

Albrecht, Jane White. Playgoing Public of Madrid in the Time of Tirso de Molina. New Orleans: University Press of the South, 2001.

Galoppe, Raul. Tirso de Molina: His Originality Then and Now. Edited by Henry Sullivan. Toronto: Dovehouse Editions, 1996.

Sola-Sole, Josep M. Tirso's Don Juan: The Metamorphosis of a Theme. Edited by Georges E. Gingras. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1989.

tragedy

The word tragedy derives from the Greek word tragoida, meaning "goat song." Originally, it referred to the ancient act of sacrificing a goat to the Greek god, Dionysus, and later came to be associated with the dramas performed as festivals honoring the god. In his Poetics, Aristotle defined the critical components of a tragedy as "Plot, Character, Language, Thought, Spectacle, and Melody," of which character and plot are the most important. According to Aristotle, tragedies depict "an action that is serious, complete, and possessing magnitude" and arouses emotions of "pity and fear."

The "tragic hero" is typically of high stature and encounters a reversal of fortune through a fault of character or an uncontrollable accident. Happy at the outset, a tragic hero experiences a succession of hardships resulting from his or her hamartia or “tragic flaw.” The narrative movement plunges from an elevated state of happiness to one of sadness and misery, and the impact on the audience is a catharsis, a purgation that releases individuals from the grip of a powerful emotion. Tragedies of the present day more or less still meet Aristotle’s criteria, though the term may be loosely applied to any story that ends unhappily.

The revenge tragedy developed in England in the mid-to-late 1500s and was heavily influenced by the works of the Roman playwright Seneca. Besides the revenge theme, these tragedies contain lurid, ritualistic action and have ornate and bombastic dialogue, multiple plotlines (both serious and comic), and vengeful ghosts. Unlike conventional tragic heroes, the hero of the revenge tragedy begins as, rather than developing into, a malcontent. Thomas Kyd’s The Spanish Tragedy functioned as a model for subsequent revenge tragedies.

Tragedies have always worked best on the stage, and some of the greatest examples are Aeschylus’s Oresteia, Christopher MARLOWE’s Dr. Faustus, William SHAKESPEARE’s Macbeth, Jean RACINE’s Andromaque, Pedro CALDERÓN DE LA BARCA’s The Painter of His Own Dishonour, TIRSO DE MOLINA’s The Seducer of Seville, and LOPE DE VEGA’s The Knight from Olmeda.

Works of Tragedy

Classical Tragedy. Edited by Robert Corrigan. New York: Applause Books, 1991.

Four Revenge Tragedies. Edited by Katharine Maus. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Shakespeare, William. The Tragedies. New York: Modern Library, 1994.

Sophocles. The Complete Greek Tragedies. Edited by David Grene and Richmond Lattimore. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.

Works about Tragedy

Frye, Prosser H. Romance and Tragedy. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1980.

Kitto, H. D. F. Greek Tragedy: A Literary Study. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Spencer, Theodore. Death and Elizabethan Tragedy. St. Clair Shores, Mich.: Scholarly Press, 1985.

travel narrative (travel log)

Travel, due to military, merchant, religious, or personal reasons, has always been a part of human activity, and the retelling of adventures experienced during traveling is one of the earliest forms of oral literature. Travelers’ diaries, letters home, and memoirs of exploration are all examples of travel narratives, from the Tosa Diary of Ki no Tsurayuki to the journals kept by world explorer Amerigo VESPUCCI. Travel as part of the human quest emerges at the very beginnings of literature, in the journey of Gilgamesh in the Epic of Gilgamesh and in the adventures of Odysseus in Homer’s Odyssey. Even the rituals described in the Egyptian Book of the Dead entail travel from this world to the next.

As a literary genre, the travel narrative began to grow in popularity in the West during the 15th-century Age of Exploration. The spirit of the RENAISSANCE and its accompanying belief of HUMANISM, which valued the power and inventiveness of human abilities, inspired the desire for discovery and a readiness to explore the wide world and make it familiar. Travel literature provided people with a chance to learn about the world without actually having to undertake a risky journey. In the 18th-century, travel narratives abounded as Europeans became more curious about cultures beyond their own borders. Women as well as men kept diaries, travel logs, and correspondence; two popular examples are The Journeys of Celia Fiennes (1697) and Lady Mary Wortley Montagu’s Turkish Embassy Letters (1717).

Travel narratives might be accounts of actual travel, such as adventures inside colonial America or travels taken to the Old World from the New, for instance, the autobiographical account of Olaudah EQUIANO. Some popular narratives were descriptions of imaginary journeys, like Gulliver's Travels by Jonathan SWIFT. Travel narratives also varied in their function. They could be purely entertaining, like the later adventure fiction of Jules Verne, or they could recount a spiritual journey or pilgrimage. These narratives were as frequently written by disappointed high society dandies as they were by devoted missionaries.

Travel narratives could also be highly political: A Journey from St. Petersburg to Moscow by Aleksandr RADISHCHEV was considered so dangerous from a political point of view that czarist censorship prohibited its publication. The lead character of the Journey, a young, conscientious nobleman, travels between two major Russian cities. He makes subtle and revealing observations of the common people's life, which boil down to harsh criticism of czarist Russia.

The popularity of the travel narrative as a genre has endured over the last several centuries. The works belonging to this vast field provide not only entertaining reading full of adventure, exoticism, and the spirit of discovery, allowing readers to explore the distant places and peoples of the world, but also a comparative perspective, helping readers to better understand their own culture and identity.

English Versions of Travel Narratives

Fish, Cheryl J. Black and White Women's Travel Narratives: Antebellum Explorations. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2004.

Homer. The Odyssey. Translated by Rodney Merrill. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2002.

Maiden Voyages and Infant Colonies: Two Women's Travel Narratives of the 1790s. London: Cassell Academic, 1999.

Martin, Wendy, ed. Colonial American Travel Narratives. New York: Penguin, 1994.

Vivies, Jean, ed. English Travel Narratives in the Eighteenth Century. Translated by Claire Davison. Aldershot, Hampshire, U.K.: Ashgate Publishing, 2002.

Works about Travel Narratives

Brown, Christopher. Encyclopedia of Travel Literature. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO, 2000.

Brown, Sharon Rogers. American Travel Narratives as a Literary Genre from 1542 to 1832. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993.

Gilroy, Amanda, ed. Romantic Geographies: Discourses of Travel, 1775–1844. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.

Westrem, Scott D. Broader Horizons: A Study of Johannes Witte de Hese's Itinerarius and Medieval Travel Narratives. Cambridge, Mass.: Medieval Academy of America, 2001.

typology

Typology is a form of interpretation. It originated as a branch of hermeneutics, which originally referred to principles for interpreting the Bible and has since become the term used for the general interpretation of texts. Typology established relationships between the people and events in the Old and New Testaments and was originally aimed at making both Testaments into one cohesive work. St. Augustine, an early medieval theologian, explained in a letter that "In the Old Testament the New Testament is concealed; in the New Testament the Old Testament is revealed."

Typology supports the idea that the events of the New Testament fulfilled the prophecies of the Old Testament. Often, Old Testament figures are called types, and the New Testament characters they prefigure are called anti-types. One example is reading Adam as a prefigure of Christ. Another example is the idea that the manna provided to the children of Israel wandering in the wilderness prefigures the bread used in the sacrament of Communion. St. Paul and the early church founders were the first to use this sort of biblical interpretation in order to give their new religion a sense of tradition. Typology became a literary device used in much of the Christian literature that followed, including John MILTON's Paradise lost.

See also ALLEGORY.

Works about Typology

- Keenan, Hugh T., ed. Typology and Medieval English Literature. Stoughton, Mass.: AMS Press, 1992.
- Lodge, David. The Modes of Modern Writing: Metaphor, Metonymy, and the Typology of Modern Literature. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1977.
- Lupton, Julia Reinhard. Afterlives of the Saints: Hagiography, Typology, and Renaissance Literature. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1996.
- Miner, Earl, ed. Literary Uses of Typology: From the Late Middle Ages to the Present. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1977.

U

unities

The term unities is used in drama criticism to refer to the use of action, time, and place. In his Poetics, Aristotle emphasizes that unity of action was the most important factor in TRAGEDY, which he calls “an imitation of an action that is complete and whole and of a certain magnitude.” Completion means having a beginning, middle, and end. Aristotle also states that unity cannot be achieved simply by making one character the focus of tragedy; instead it comes from structural unity of smaller actions that constitute one larger, complete action. Aristotle does not explicitly comment on unity of time and place, but it can be inferred from Poetics and such examples as Sophocles’ Oedipus Rex and Euripides’ Medea that unity of action assumes a limited time span and location.

Aristotle’s descriptions of tragedies and unities have been molded over time into a series of rules for judging contemporary drama. These rules were most strongly influenced, especially during the 16th century and the development of NEOCLASSICISM, by Italian critic Ludovico Castelvetro, in his commentary on Aristotle’s Poetics.

During the 17th century, the great French dramatist Pierre CORNEILLE relied on Aristotle’s definition of unity in discussing plot, but he narrowed the definition by arguing that a play’s action should cover no more than a day because such restraint would support the imitation of reality and probability that audiences expect. Since he was a working playwright, Corneille admitted that dramatists might have to bend these rules to satisfy their audiences.

Another playwright, John Dryden, showed the advantages and disadvantages of strictly following the unities, which he did not fully support, in his Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668). While the unities make for neat, symmetrical drama in which nothing is wasted, they also can make a play claustrophobic and lifeless if too literally obeyed. Dryden upholds the English tradition of multiple plots and variety in actions as more lively and appealing.

The unities continued to be an important factor, though less rigidly observed, in the 19th century, especially with the rise of Henrik Ibsen and realism in drama.

See also CLASSICISM.

Works about the Unities

Aristotle. Aristotle’s Theory of Poetry and Fine Art. Translated by S. H. Butcher. New York: Dover, 1955.

Corneille, Pierre. “Of the Three Unities,” in The Continental Model: Selected French Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century. Edited by Scott Elledge and Donald Schier. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1960.

Dryden, John. "An Essay of Dramatic Poesy," in Critical Theory Since Plato. Edited by Hazard Adams. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich College Publishers, 1992.

utopia

Utopia, meaning an imaginary ideal world, comes from the Greek words for "no place." The term was first used by Thomas MORE in his satirical Utopia (1516), in which a man named Raphael Hythloday, who had sailed with Amerigo VESPUCCI, gives a detailed description of the island of Utopia, where there is no private property.

More was not the first to come up with a plan for an ideal society. Plato described his ideal of the state in his Republic, but More was the first to give a detailed narrative about a society that was supposed to exist in the present or future. Such narratives have been called "Utopias" ever since. According to Krishna Kumar in Utopianism, "Utopia was born with modernity." During the RENAISSANCE, the period when the New World was discovered, curiosity began to grow about unknown societies. At the same time, people began to believe that humankind could be perfected by use of reason, and that an ideal society might be established. Many people began to write about such societies.

In Francis BACON's The New Atlantis (1627), the most important institution of the island of Bensalem is Salomon's House, or the College of the Six Days' Works, made up of scientists who seek to "enlarge the bounds of Human Empire, to the effecting of all things possible." In Tommaso CAMPANELLA's, The City of the Sun (1623), the perfect society is devoted to the life of the mind, especially the arts and sciences. Other utopias were political. The ideal government in James Harrington's Oceana (1656) has a series of checks and balances to prevent too much power being invested in any one body. His work may have influenced John Adams, one of the framers of the U.S. Constitution (1787). In 1770 Louis-Sébastien Mercier wrote the first utopia to be set in the definitive future: The Year 2440, in which government is based on science and reason.

Early 19th-century utopianism was largely devoted not to literary works, but to social theory and experiments in utopian communal living, such as those of Robert Owen and Charles Fourier. Literary utopias revived again in the late 19th and 20th centuries.

Works of Utopia

Bruce, Susan, ed. Three Early Modern Utopias: Utopia, New Atlantis, the Isle of Pines. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

A Work about Utopia

Kumar, Krishna. Utopianism. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991.

Vesalius, Andreas (1514–1564) nonfiction writer

Vesalius's voluminous medical text, De Humanis Corporis Fabrica Libri Septem (Seven Books on the Construction of the Human Body, 1543), challenged long-held concepts about the anatomy of the human body that were based largely upon the writings of Galen, who was the recognized authority on the human body until the time of Vesalius.

Born in Brussels, Vesalius was the son of Andreas Vesalius, the court apothecary to Holy Roman Emperor Charles IV. Vesalius attended the University of Louvain and later studied at Padua, where he received a doctor of medicine degree and taught as professor of anatomy and surgery. Following the publication of De Humanis Corporis Fabrica, Vesalius was appointed court physician to Emperor Charles V. Not long after he became physician to Philip II, Vesalius died while on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem and Mount Sinai.

Composed in Latin, the language of scholarly discourse during the period, De Humanis Corporis Fabrica is a lengthy prose work detailing human anatomy. Vesalius modeled his writing upon classical Latin rhetoric, most notably that of Marcus Tullius Cicero. Such an antiquated style was unusual for medical texts of the period, but Vesalius wished to model his sentences upon the great stylists of antiquity; he considered his work to fit within the context of the spirit of great texts written by anatomists and physicians from the classical past.

De Humanis Corporis Fabrica's seven books are divided according to major components of the body, each of which is discussed at length: bones, muscles, blood vessels, nerves, abdominal organs, chest and neck, and brain. Each section contains many intelligent, detailed, and graphic renderings of the human body that are keyed to textual descriptions. These illustrations were executed by skilled artisans, one of whom is believed to be artist Jan Stephan van Calcar, a pupil of Titian. Vesalius's work was deemed superior to earlier works by scholars of his day, in part because his book resulted from firsthand experience dissecting the body.

De Humanis Corporis, while strikingly innovative and highly valuable to physicians and students of anatomy and surgery, was believed controversial and remained under constant scrutiny. Nevertheless, the publication marked the birth of modern medicine.

A Work about Andreas Vesalius

O'Malley, Charles Donald. Andreas Vesalius: 1514–1564. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1964.

Vespucci, Amerigo (ca. 1451–1512) cosmographer, navigator, explorer

Amerigo Vespucci was a clerk in the commercial office of the rich and powerful rulers of Florence, the House of Medici, when word of Columbus's successful crossing of the ocean reached Italy. Although Vespucci had a successful career as a Florentine merchant, in his student days he acquired an interest in the natural sciences, cosmography, and navigation. The news about Columbus's crossing aroused his curiosity of the newly found lands and inspired him to immediately set off for Spain in search of a contract to furnish supplies for Columbus's next voyage.

Little reliable information exists on the number of voyages Vespucci made to the New World. Traditional accounts place the number at four, but later scholarship suggests that there may have been as few as two voyages. This information is largely based on cartographic information and three handwritten letters by Vespucci discovered in Florentine archives during the last half of the 18th century. In one account of doubtful authenticity, Vespucci was purported to have sailed between 1497 and 1498 on his first voyage to Paria. This information is based on a "Letter to Soderini," first printed in 1505, and attributed to Vespucci.

By 1499 Vespucci was reported to have interested the court in his own expedition to the lands across the Atlantic. He sailed from southern Spain to South America under the command of Alonzo de Ojeda as the representative of the financial interests backing the voyage. The report of this voyage is believed to be authentic.

In 1502 his second or third voyage landed on the coast of Brazil. A short account of this 1501–02 voyage down the coast of South America was detailed by Vespucci in a 1503 letter he sent to former Florentine employer, Lorenzo di Pier Francesco de' Medici. The account was later popularized in a pamphlet as Mundus novus. The manuscript experienced a large circulation in Italian before being published in Latin in 1504. The work was widely popular and may have been the most influential of all the early New World travel writings.

Mundus novus and a second pamphlet, Lettera . . . quattri . . . viaggi, circulating between 1504 and 1506, are characterized by vivid and fantastic descriptions of the New World and its inhabitants. The prose style of both works is very readable. Detailed descriptions of exotic places as well as lurid accounts of cannibalism, naked savages, and sexual practices made the pamphlets a popular success.

A copy of Mundus novus was acquired by the German geographer Martin WALDSEEMÜLLER. In a 1507 treatise entitled Cosmographiae Introductio, Waldseemüller comments: "A fourth part of the earth has been discovered by Amerigo Vespucci. . . . I see no reason why anyone could justly object to naming this part Amerige, that is, the land of Amerigo, or America, after its discoverer." Waldseemüller's comment is credited, in large part, to the naming of the American continents.

Vespucci may have taken two subsequent voyages (1501–02 and 1503–04) under the service of Portugal. The authenticity of reports of these voyages, however, remains unsubstantiated. In 1506 Vespucci was appointed first piloto mayor of Spain by Queen Juana, a position he retained until his death. He provided instruction for individuals headed for the Indies, as well as elaborated and updated the official nautical chart.

An English Version of Works by Amerigo Vespucci

Letters of Amerigo Vespucci and Other Documents Illustrative of His Career. Edited by Clements R. Markham. New York: Burt Franklin, 1994.

Works about Amerigo Vespucci

Fitzpatrick, Ann. Forgotten Voyager: The Story of Amerigo Vespucci. Minneapolis, Minn.: Lerner Publishing Group, 1991.

Marsh, David. "Letters from a New World: Amerigo Vespucci's Discovery of America," Renaissance Quarterly 27, no. 2 (Summer 1994): 398(3).

Ray, Kurt. Amerigo Vespucci: Italian Explorer of the Americas. New York: Rosen Publishing, 2003.

Vico, Giambattista (1668–1744)
philosopher

Giambattista Vico was born into a world transitioning from the RENAISSANCE to the ENLIGHTENMENT. The son of a Neapolitan bookseller, Vico's passion for learning led him from a career in law to a position as tutor to the nephews of his mentor, the bishop of Ischia. Later he returned to Naples and in 1695 married Teresa Destito. In 1699 he became a professor of rhetoric at the University of Naples. Before his death, he briefly served as royal historiographer for Charles III.

Vico's lifework, New Science, was first published in 1725. In it he introduced new theories about the nature of human knowledge and the formation of history. Though Peter Burke calls it "a book stuffed so full of ideas that it almost bursts at the seams," Vico's "new critical art" was so little understood by his peers that he found it necessary to print a second and fuller edition in 1730. He continued revising throughout his life.

Among many original ideas in New Science was Vico's pattern of the history of nations, where the age of gods led to the age of heroes, and then to the age of humans. He believed that mythology is the first science. Imagination, the power by which humans understand and order the world, eventually gives way to logic and reason. To Vico, knowledge was "made" or invented, and fields like mathematics or history were simply human inventions. Since the physical sciences required experimentation with nature, they could not be fully understood. Truth, Vico claimed, was knowable only to whoever created the truth.

In addition, he believed the purpose of education was to cultivate the divine within the human mind through self-knowledge and the pursuit of wisdom. Vico's disagreements with the theories of René DESCARTES, which he regarded as too narrow and misinformed about the nature of scientific knowledge, led to unpopularity in his own lifetime and the neglect of his works after his death.

Many modern scholars think that Vico was simply ahead of his time. His ideas influenced such later writers as Samuel Taylor Coleridge and James Joyce.

An English Version of a Work by Giambattista Vico

The New Science of Giambattista Vico, 2nd ed. Translated by Thomas Bergin and Max Harold Fisch. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1983.

Works about Giambattista Vico

Burke, Peter. Vico. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Pompa, Leon. Vico: A Study of the 'New Science'. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Villon, François (1431–after 1463) poet

François de Montcorbier was born in Paris and later took his name from the guardian who raised and educated him, Guillaume de Villon. Aside from the existence of certain scholastic and criminal records, what is known of Villon's biography comes from his poetry. He received his B.A. in 1449 and his M.A. in 1452 from the University of Paris. He had a restless mind, was often in trouble for brawling, and was a notorious prankster. While at university he angered officials by being part of a squad of reckless youths who stole street signs and performed mock marriages with them. As he matured, however, his crimes grew serious; in 1455 Villon was charged with killing a priest but was pardoned because the death was proved accidental. A year later he and four conspirators robbed the College of Navarre, and to avoid capture Villon left Paris. Records from 1461 list him as a prisoner in Orléans, but he was freed with the other city prisoners, as was custom, when the newly crowned Louis XI passed through the town. In 1462 an arrest for petty theft in Paris brought him to the attention of authorities from the College of Navarre who begrudged the earlier loss and had him imprisoned, tortured, and sentenced to death. Through eloquent pleading he managed to get the sentence commuted to banishment for 10 years.

After Villon left Paris in 1463, he was never heard from again.

Villon's poetic inventions are closely tied to his personal trials and experiences and reflect the opinions of an outsider and rebel. The social world into which he was born had two authorities, the church and the law, both of which Villon managed to offend. The literary culture that he entered had two authorities, sacred scripture and the authors of classical antiquity, both of which Villon used in his poetry. Villon had studied the Bible as well as Greek and Roman philosophers, and he was well-versed in the tradition of French literature, especially the works of Guillaume de Machaut and Eustace Deschamps.

The mock will was a popular genre, and Villon employed this form in composing The Legacy in 1456 as he prepared to leave Paris. These 300 verses about disillusioned love, lovers going astray, or lovers in distress are full of wry counterpoints, irony, and dark humor, as in these lines in which a lover speaks of leave-taking with no assurance of return:

*I'm not without my faults, nor made of tougher stuff than other men; human life is an uncertain thing and there's no respite from death;
also, I have far to go. . . .*

The work that does Villon the most credit is The Testament, which he composed in 1461. This work also is structured like a will, wherein he addresses friends, enemies, and his own alter ego using dialogue, self-examination, and jokes. This long poem, somewhat more elevated in tone, contains dark insights, as in these lines:

*So, have your fill of love, go to parties and to banquets, in the end you'll be no better off and the only thing you'll break will be your head.
Foolish love makes beasts of men . . .
That man is lucky who has nothing.*

Villon also wrote many shorter pieces, many of them addressed to people who aided him, among them Charles d'Orléans, the parliamentarian who ultimately pardoned him, and his jailer in prison. He has been accused of being a poet insensitive to beauty, but the scarcity of pleasant moments in his poetry may reflect the scarcity of pleasurable moments in his life. Many of the so-called slang poems, those written in the jargon of the criminal underworld, are manipulative, sarcastic, and even vitriolic. Throughout his work his outlook is pessimistic but honest, and his poems emerge from his attempts to come to terms with his experiences. Criticism of Villon's criminal activities has traditionally colored criticism of his work, but virtually all students of literature have heard the echo, in some form, of Villon's most melancholy line: "Where are the snows of yesteryear?" Though his morals are questionable, his influence is a fact. As biographer Anthony Bonner states, in a mere six years Villon "turned out a body of poetry great enough to leave him with few rivals in the literature of his own country or in that of any other."

English Versions of Works by François Villon

Book of François Villon: The Little Testament and Ballads. Translated by Algernon C. Swinburne. New York: Branden Publishing, 1997.

Poems of François Villon. Translated by Peter Dale. London: Anvil Press Poetry, 2001.

Works about François Villon

Burl, Aubrey. Danse Macabre: François Villon. New York: Sutton, 2000.

Fein, David A. François Villon Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1997.

Voltaire (François-Marie Arouet) (1694–1778) novelist, playwright, poet, historian

François-Marie Arouet, universally known as Voltaire (an assumed name), is perhaps the best-known literary figure of the European ENLIGHTENMENT. During his long and eventful life, he experimented with virtually every genre of literature—EPIC poetry, history, philosophy, fiction, and drama—and produced a prodigious amount of work. Although he was best known in his own time for his plays, his most widely read work today is his novel Candide.

Voltaire was born in Paris and was provided with a classical education by the religious order of the Jesuits at Louis-le-Grand. Although his father, a successful notary and member of the bourgeoisie, wanted him to become a lawyer, Voltaire disliked the legal profession and preferred to pursue a life of literature. His first great success was his play Cedipe (1718), a story based upon the tragic Greek legend of Oedipus. He spent some time in jail for writing scandalous poetry and was later exiled to England. While in England, he met famous literary figures and became interested in philosophy and science. He also wrote La Henriade (originally titled La Ligue; published in 1723), an epic poem in 10 cantos based upon Henry III's siege of Paris in 1589, and Histoire de Charles XII (1731), a history of the reign of King Charles XII of Sweden.

Upon his return from England, Voltaire wrote his first masterpiece, Letters Concerning the English Nation. In this collection of essays, he contrasts the general freedom and tolerance of England with the oppressive religious and political climate of France. This made him very unpopular with the French government.

From the early 1730s to the mid-1740s, Voltaire mostly lived in his château of Cirey with his mistress, Madame du Châtelet. During his time there, he wrote a number of plays and historical works, including Brutus (1730), in which the character Titus is torn between his love for a tyrant's daughter and his responsibility to help liberate his country; La Mort de César (1731), on the death of the Roman general and statesman Julius Caesar; and Zaïre (1732), the story of a Christian child, who is kidnapped by a Turkish army, and her father, whose attempt to save her instead results in her murder. Voltaire also translated the scientific works of Sir Isaac Newton in Éléments de la Philosophie de Newton (1736), which did much to make science more popular in France; and began a famous correspondence with Frederick the Great, king of Prussia. He was also appointed court poet despite his enemies (who favored neither his literary attacks on established social, political, and religious issues nor his success and wealth), and wrote La Princesse de Navarre (1744) and Poème de Fontenoy (1745). In the late 1740s, he began writing short stories in prose, including Zadig, ou la Destinée (1748), a story about a young man who loses his fortune and then experiences a series of "fateful" incidents that only Providence (or destiny) can understand. Voltaire was also appointed to the ACADÉMIE FRANÇAISE in 1746, and completed three more tragedies: Sémiramis (1746), Oreste (1749), and Rome sauvée (1749).

After Madame du Châtelet's death in 1749, Voltaire spent a few years living in Berlin at the court of Frederick the Great. During this time, he continued to add to a collection of essays that he had begun during his time at Cirey with Madame du Châtelet. The essays were eventually published as Essay on the Manners and the Spirit of Nations (1756). In this historical and highly philosophical work, Voltaire states that people are responsible for their own destinies, that they have the will and the means to overcome all obstacles, including those that are religious, political, cultural, and economical. Voltaire also began to develop, in concept, what would become The Philosophical Dictionary (1764), a series of 73 critical social essays that was repeatedly banned by authorities for Voltaire's portrayal of the social ills and unrest caused not only by the government, but also by the established church. In addition to this work, Voltaire finished writing Le Siècle de Louis XIV and Poème sur la loi naturelle.

At age 60, Voltaire moved to the small town of Ferney, where he bought an estate in 1758, and lived there almost the rest of his life. Once he had settled down, he produced a massive amount of literature in almost every genre. He continued writing plays, produced historical works concerning King Louis XIV of France and Czar Peter the Great of Russia, wrote the dramatic poem The Lisbon Earthquake and the novel Candide, as well as completed The Philosophical Dictionary. It is for these works and the place in which they were written that Voltaire is often referred to as the “Sage of Ferney.”

Throughout his life, Voltaire was bitterly hostile toward organized religion. He viewed the ignorance of those who unethically and immorally used faith and church law to further their own causes as both the cause itself of much human suffering and the enemy of “enlightened” thought. He even went so far as to sign many of his letters with the phrase “Ecrasez L’infame,” or “Crush the Infamous,” which stood for his position that people should fight the oppression and bigotry caused by organized religion. In keeping with his penchant for ever-changing styles and topics, however, Voltaire also published A Treatise on Tolerance, in which he begs people to overlook their religious differences and treat one another with respect. From his home at Ferney, Voltaire used his writing abilities and his immense network of personal connections to fight campaigns against injustice throughout Europe, particularly in cases of religious persecution or unfair criminal justice systems.

In 1778, with only a few months left to live, Voltaire returned to Paris, not having visited the city for nearly a quarter of a century. He was welcomed home by the Parisian people as a hero, and the premiere of his final play, Irène, was a smashing success. Voltaire died in Paris on May 30. In the “Introduction” to Voltaire: Candide, Zadig, and Selected Stories, Donald M. Frame states that “for much of his life Voltaire’s greatest fame was as the leading successor to Corneille and Racine in classical French verse tragedy, which he spiced with themes from Shakespeare and the East, colorful and violent visual effects, and thinly veiled social and religious criticism.”

Critical Analysis

In nearly all of his writing, Voltaire employed a brilliant sarcastic wit and a highly developed sense of irony; in Candide, these gifts reached their full expression.

Candide is the fanciful story of a young man who wanders around the world, experiencing horrible disasters and witnessing terrifying events. Voltaire uses the story to present his views on the nature of good and evil, the absurdity of life, and the futility of hope. The entire work is, in effect, an attack on the views of other writers and philosophers such as Alexander POPE and Gottfried Wilhelm LEIBNIZ who believed that the human race lived in “the best of all possible worlds.” Voltaire’s message in Candide is that the world could be better, that it is not yet what it could be.

In the story, the character of Candide falls in love with the beautiful Cunegonde, the daughter of the castle’s baron. As a result, he is kicked out of the castle where he grew up. For the rest of the story, Candide wanders, sometimes searching for Cunegonde but often simply trying to escape from various disasters that continually befall him.

Candide is forcibly recruited into the Bulgar army (which is really a thinly disguised Prussian army, led by a thinly disguised Frederick the Great). He is caught in the Lisbon earthquake, persecuted by the Inquisition, finds and loses a fabulous treasure in El Dorado, and sees many friends die horrible deaths. Until the very end, Candide believes everything that happens is for the best, for that is what he has been taught by his teacher, Doctor Pangloss (who may simply be a caricature of Leibniz).

In addition to directly experiencing great hardships, Candide also bears witness to others’ hardships. At one point, he encounters six men at a dinner. It is soon revealed that these men were once powerful monarchs who had been overthrown. Through part of his adventure, Candide is accompanied by a character known simply as “the old woman,” the pope’s illegitimate daughter, who was enslaved by North African pirates and who had half of her buttock cut off by Turkish soldiers during the siege of Azov.

In addition, Candide witnesses the execution of an English captain whose only crime was not engaging the enemy closely enough. This particular part of the story provides one of Voltaire's celebrated quotes: "[I]n this country it is considered a good thing to kill an admiral from time to time so as to encourage the others." The episode was inspired by the actual execution of Admiral Sir John Byng on March 14, 1757, and is an excellent example of how Voltaire uses his writing as commentary about social and political events.

In his adventures, Candide is accompanied by various unusual characters, many of whom seemingly die only to puzzlingly reappear later in the story. There is Doctor Pangloss, who stubbornly continues to believe, despite all the evidence, that everything in the world happens for the best. There are Martin, a cynic and realist who seems to be the only voice of true reason in the story; Cacambo, a faithful servant to Candide despite the fact that his connection to Candide brings him nothing but misfortune; and finally, Cunegonde, a rather simple-minded young woman who remains the object of Candide's affections.

The story ends in the city of Constantinople, where Candide and his friends settle down to a simple life of gardening. At the conclusion, Pangloss still believes that they live in the best of all possible worlds, but Candide has become disillusioned. Having seen and suffered so much, the young man decides that the only way to achieve any happiness in life is, as Voltaire puts it, to "cultivate our garden."

Among his many other works, Candide helped make Voltaire one of the most famous writers of the European Enlightenment and, in the opinion of many, the greatest. Certainly he was the most prolific, leaving behind more than 10,000 letters on every subject imaginable, hundreds of pamphlets, plays, short stories, poems, and novels. The central theme running through all of his work is the power of human reason to overcome prejudice and to improve life for all humanity.

English Versions of Works by Voltaire

Candide. Holicong, Pa.: Wildside Press, 2003.

Complete Romances of Voltaire. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2003.

Voltaire and His Letters. Translated by S. G. Tallentyre. Miami: International Law and Taxation, 2004.

Voltaire: Candide, Zadig, and Selected Stories. Translated by Donald M. Frame. New York: New American Library, 1961.

Voltaire: Treatise on Tolerance. Edited by Simon Harvey. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Voltaire's Correspondence: An Epistolary Novel, vol. 5. Edited by Deidre Dawson and Gita May. New York: Peter Lang, 1994.

Works about Voltaire

Bonhome, Denise. What Voltaire Tries to Tell Us. Lincoln, Neb.: iUniverse, 2000.

Hugo, Victor. Oration on Voltaire. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2003.

Knapp, Bettina Liebowitz. Voltaire Revisited. New York: Macmillan Library Reference, 2000.

Tallentyre, S. G. Life of Voltaire. Miami: International Law and Taxation, 2004.

Thaddeus, Victor. Voltaire, Genius of Mockery. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2003.

Walsh, Thomas. Readings on Candide. Farmington Hills, Mich.: Gale Group, 2000.

Vondel, Joost van den (1587–1679)

dramatist

Joost van den Vondel, known as Holland's national playwright and "Prince of Poets," was originally born in Cologne but moved to the Netherlands as a child and settled with his family in Amsterdam. His father hoped he would take up the family trade of being a hatter, but the younger Vondel married the daughter of a Flemish clothier who looked after the family business while Vondel wrote. His long life was marked by personal tragedy, including the early deaths of his wife and two children and near-bankruptcy caused by a son who was then banished to the East Indies and died at sea. At age 70, Vondel was obliged to find a job in a bank but was eventually allowed to retire.

Over the course of his life Vondel produced a huge body of work, including 30 full-length dramas, beginning with Het Pascha (The Passover) in 1612. He also wrote lyrical and religious poetry and printed translations of Greek and Latin classics. His plays frequently feature biblical themes, adhere to classical forms, and show impressive cadences of thought and language. The 10 volumes of Vondel's work, collected after his death, illustrate in words the Dutch and Flemish Golden Age that Rembrandt, Van Dyck, and Rubens rendered in their paintings.

In addition to being a dramatist and poet, Vondel was also a patriot and a campaigner for political and religious freedom. Lucifer (1654) probably inspired John MILTON with its portrayal of the fallen archangel torn by personal ambition and perceived injustice. The portrayal of heavenly beings as capable of all-too-human frailty caused such outrage that the play was banned after its second performance. Lucifer was followed by Exile (1664) and Noah (1667), creating a trio of tales from the Bible. Lucifer and Gijsbrecht van Aemstel (1637) are considered the best works of an author remembered as one of the greatest poets and certainly the greatest dramatist of the Netherlands.

English Versions of a Work by Joost van den Vondel

Lucifer: Joost Van den Vondel. Translated by Noel Clark. Bath, U.K.: Absolute Classics, 1990.

Lucifer. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1991.

A Work about Joost van den Vondel

Mody, Jehangir R. Vondel and Milton. Norwood, Pa.: Norwood Editions, 1977.

Waldseemüller, Martin (1470–ca. 1521)
cartographer

Martin Waldseemüller was born near Lake Constance in the southern reaches of the Black Forest in what is now Germany. He studied theology at the University of Freiburg and served as a cleric in his native diocese of Constance. He also spent time at Strasburg and Basel studying geography, particularly the ancient maps of Ptolemy. By 1507 he came to the monastery at St. Die in the mountains of Lorraine, where he was made a canon in 1514. In typical humanistic fashion he often used a Greco-Latinized form of his name, Martinus Ilacomilus.

In Waldseemüller's lifetime, the voyages of COLUMBUS, Amerigo VESPUCCI, and other explorers significantly revised the scope of the known world. After his third voyage, Vespucci published an account of his survey of the coastline of South America. He named the accounts, and the lands he had explored, Mundus Novus (The New World). Up to this point, Columbus and his contemporary Europeans insisted that the lands they had reached were islands, but Vespucci was aware he had reached a new continent, inhabited he said, "by more numerous peoples and animals than in our Europe or Asia or Africa." When Vespucci's Mundus Novus reached the small community of scholars, geographers, and cartographers at St. Die, Waldseemüller immediately began working on a new map of the world.

In 1507 Waldseemüller published the Introduction to Cosmography, With Certain Necessary Principles of Geometry and Astronomy, To Which Are Added The Four Voyages of Amerigo Vespucci. In addition to the core treatise on cosmography, the work includes two maps, one a globe and one a plane projection map, as well as the already-famous letter written by Amerigo Vespucci to the duke of Lorraine, describing the voyages he conducted between 1497 and 1503. Recognizing the debt that modern cartography owed to the ancients, Waldseemüller included a figure of Ptolemy on the map, overlooking the world as Waldseemüller imagined it.

The 1507 map is unique in many respects. It is the first published map to represent all 360 degrees of the known world. It is the first to label the new continent "America," since, as Waldseemüller declared, "I see no reason why anyone should justly object to calling this part Amerige, i.e., the land of Amerigo, or America, after Amerigo, its discoverer." In addition, Waldseemüller speculated that if the new lands were indeed a continent, then another ocean must lie between them and the Orient. Thus his map depicts the Pacific Ocean a full six years before its sighting was recorded by Vasco Nuñez de Balboa, who crossed the Isthmus of Panama in 1513.

In comparison to the 12 different woodcuts of the map, which hold a more immediate interest, particularly for students of American history, the Cosmography often has been overlooked. It contains a detailed analysis of the sciences of astronomy and geometry, which Waldseemüller considered crucial to the study of geography. The nine chapters cover Waldseemüller's knowledge on geometrical and astronomical terms, the circles of the heavens and the five celestial zones, the climates of the Earth as well as the winds, and various seas and islands, including their distances from one another. In his account he drew not only on Ptolemy but also on the voyages of Marco Polo. All four parts of the Cosmography were immediately popular. Though the 1516 reprint of the map left out the name America, Waldseemüller's suggestion had already come into common usage. His 1507 map is considered "the birth certificate of America."

An English Version of a Work by Martin Waldseemüller

Cosmographiae Introductio of Martin Waldseemüller in Facsimile. Translated by Joseph Fischer and Franz von Wieser. Manchester, N.H.: Ayer Co., 1977.

A Work about Martin Waldseemüller

Arcinieges, Germán. Why America? 500 Years of a Name: The Life and Times of Amerigo Vespucci. Translated by Harriet de Onís. Washington, D.C.: Villegas Editores, 2002.

Warren, Mercy Otis (1728–1814)

playwright, poet, historian

Throughout her life, Mercy Otis Warren excelled at many literary forms, including poetry and drama, but her legacy rests largely on her three-volume history of the American Revolutionary War, written in the later years of her life. She was also a prodigious letter writer, and her correspondents included John and Abigail Adams and George and Martha Washington.

Born in Barnstable, Massachusetts, Warren was the daughter of James and Mary Allyne Otis, who also had 12 other children. Warren received no formal education, but she was able to study with her brother's tutor, Reverend Jonathan Russell, who encouraged her early literary interests.

In 1754 Mercy Otis married James Warren, a prominent local farmer and merchant who would later become a Revolutionary War general. The Warrens settled in Plymouth, where Warren raised her five sons and explored her literary pursuits.

Her earliest works, satirical plays, targeted the British colonial government. She was spurred to write such works after an incident in which her brother James was beaten violently in a Boston coffeehouse by a British Tory. Her first published play—The Adulateur, A Tragedy, As it is now acted in Upper Servia—was written in verse and published anonymously in 1772 in the Massachusetts Spy. It was "the first play published by a woman born and residing in English America" (Richards). Though couched in neoclassical names and techniques, the play is an obvious attack on Governor Thomas Hutchinson, who in this play is named "Rapatio." Her other plays—including The Group (1775) and The Blockheads (1776)—were also politically satirical, though none of them was ever staged. Though written in "a refined, academic style," Warren's "primary purpose [was] to create strong political satire" (Gartner). Two additional satiric plays appeared in her Poems, Dramatic and Miscellaneous in 1790.

Mercy Otis Warren is best remembered for her three-volume account of the war, History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution, Interspersed with Biographical, Political and Moral Observations (1805). Her account provides personal and political views of an army wife who corresponded with many of the great figures of the time.

The history was Warren's last published work. After her husband died in 1808, she continued writing her letters, which, though often overdramatic and florid, remain important documents of female thought and life during the Revolutionary era.

A Work about Mercy Otis Warren

Zagari, Rosemarie. A Woman's Dilemma: Mercy Otis Warren and the American Revolution. Wheeling, Ill.: Harlan Davidson, 1995.

Watling, Thomas (1762–ca. 1815) correspondent, painter

Thomas Watling was born in Dumfries, Scotland, the son of a soldier. He showed talent as an artist and briefly worked as a drawing teacher and coach painter. In 1788 he was arrested for counterfeiting and only narrowly escaped hanging. In 1791, still in prison, he volunteered for transportation to the new penal colony in Australia. After an abortive escape attempt at the Cape of Good Hope, he reached Port Jackson, New South Wales, late in 1792. The first professional artist in the colony, Watling became an assistant to a surgeon, an amateur naturalist who was compiling a record of the settlement's flora and fauna and who needed Watling to draw the illustrations.

In 1794 Watling wrote Letters from an Exile at Botany Bay to His Aunt in Dumfries, an irreverent, informal account of life in the Australian colony. Published in England, the book was a collection of actual letters Watling wrote to his elderly Aunt Marion. In some of the letters, he describes the aborigines:

Irascibility, ferocity, cunning, treachery, revenge, filth and immodesty are strikingly their dark characteristics, their virtues are so far from conspicuous that I have not, as yet, been able to discern them. One thing I may adduce to their credit, that they are not cannibals.

In addition to writing letters, Watling also painted many portraits of the land and its people. Before his pardon and return to England in 1797, he made more than 500 drawings of animals, landscapes, and other scenes of the new land, almost all of them remarkable for their draftsmanship and detail. His drawings of birds proved of considerable value to later naturalists, and his portraits of local aboriginal life are an invaluable early depiction of aboriginal and colonial culture. His most famous work of art is "Sydney Cove in 1794," apparently the first oil painting ever made on Australian soil.

In 1805 Watling was again charged with forgery but was later acquitted. There is no record of him after 1814, and some historians believe he died soon afterward. His works, both in prose and paint, are unique in Australian colonial art. Watling's letters are valued not only as a classic of Australian settlement, but also as literature written from the perspective of a convict.

A Work about Thomas Watling

Thomas Watling: Dumfries' Convict Artist. Dumfries, Scotland: Dumfries Museum, 1988.

Wheatley, Phillis (ca. 1753–1784) poet

Phillis Wheatley was brought to Boston from Africa after having been purchased by John Wheatley, an affluent tailor, as a companion for his wife, Susannah. She was named for the slave ship, the Phillis, which transported her to America, and she assumed the surname of her master. Susannah Wheatley taught her slave to read and write, and within 16 months the gifted young girl mastered the English language. She was particularly fond of the writings of Alexander POPE, Thomas Gray, and John MILTON.

In her teen years, Wheatley composed a series of 39 poems, which were published in London (1773) as Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (1773). Her style was not particularly original, for she relied heavily on established poetic conventions, especially on the heroic couplets and elegies favored by Pope.

Many of Wheatley's poems are conciliatory in nature. For instance, in "On Being Brought from Africa to America" (1773) and "To the University of Cambridge, in New England" (1767), she expresses gratitude for having been taken from her "Pagan land" to a place where her soul could come to recognize "That there's a God, that there's a Saviour too." Moreover, she sought to revive people's yearning to turn their souls toward God.

In other poems, Wheatley was not so conciliatory, speaking out against slavery and hypocrisy. For example, in "On the Death of General Wooster" (1778), she questions the "disgrace" of holding "in bondage Africa's blameless race."

After Wheatley was emancipated, she became active in promoting her works. As a result, her reputation as an important African-American poet grew. Even though her poetry collection was reissued a number of times, she received no financial remuneration and died in poverty at age 31.

Phillis Wheatley is remembered for having been one of the rare African-American slaves to receive an education and for having written some of the best and most poignant poetry of early American literature.

Works by Phillis Wheatley

Phillis Wheatley: Complete Writings. Edited by Vincent Carretta. New York: Penguin Classics, 2001.

The Collected Works of Phillis Wheatley. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Works about Phillis Wheatley

Bloom, Harold, ed. African-American Poets: Phillis Wheatley through Countee Cullen. Langhorne, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2001.

Gates, Henry Louis. The Trials of Phillis Wheatley: America's First Black Poet and Encounters with the Founding Fathers. New York: Basic Books, 2003.

Wigglesworth, Michael (1631–1705) poet

Born in England, Michael Wigglesworth immigrated to America in 1638 with his Puritan parents, Edward and Esther Wigglesworth. The family eventually settled in New Haven, Connecticut.

Wigglesworth entered Harvard College at age 17, eventually earning both bachelor and master degrees. He stayed at Harvard to teach, but he also occasionally preached during this time. In 1654 he became minister at the Puritan church in Malden, married the first of three wives the next year, and was officially ordained in 1656. He also maintained a medical practice over the years.

Wigglesworth's most famous work was the poem The Day of Doom, published in 1662. To modern readers, the work reads more like a sermon than a poem, with its "Puritan plain style and a conviction of the rightness of New [England's] brand of Calvinism" (Bosco). Wigglesworth states his purpose for writing the poem in these lines:

*Oh! guide me by thy sacred Sprite
So to indite, and so to write,
That I thine holy Name may praise,
And teach the Sons of men thy ways.*

The Day of Doom was written in ballad meter, and is filled with biblical references. It was quite popular in its time, with more than 1,800 copies sold in 1662.

His next poem, God's Controversy with New England, was perhaps a response to a great drought that occurred in 1661 and 1662, which Wigglesworth believed was brought on by God due to the sinful and lapsed ways of New Englanders.

In 1670 he published Meat Out of the Eater, a 2,000-line rhyming poem written in various meters. It is perhaps Wigglesworth's most personal poem, consisting of "a series of song . . . written as much to console as to edify 'enduring' Christians" (Bosco).

In 1670 Wigglesworth turned most of his energy to preaching in Malden. Indeed, it appears that he made very few poetic efforts during these later years. When he died, he left behind his third wife and eight children.

Works by Michael Wigglesworth

The Day of Doom or a Description of the Great and Last Judgment. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.

The Diary of Michael Wigglesworth, 1653–1657: The Conscience of a Puritan. Edited by Edmund S. Morgan. Magnolia, Mass.: Smith Peter, 1990.

The Poems of Michael Wigglesworth. Edited by Ronald A. Bosco. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1989.

Works about Michael Wigglesworth

Crowder, Richard. No Featherbed to Heaven: A Biography of Michael Wigglesworth, 1631. Textbook Publishers, 2003.

Dean, John W. Memoir of the Revised. Michael Wigglesworth, Author of the Day of Doom. Murieta, Calif.: New Library Press, 2003.

Williams, Roger (1603–1683) nonfiction

writer, poet, grammarian

Roger Williams was born to a wealthy merchant, who sent him to Cambridge University, where he graduated in 1627. He later became a clergyman with Puritan sympathies and sailed to the Massachusetts colony in 1630. The colonists originally welcomed Williams, but his questioning of the validity of taking Native American lands proved too radical. Upon hearing from the colony's governor, John WINTHROP, that a warrant had been issued for his arrest, Williams fled with a handful of followers into the southern territory of sympathetic Indians. In 1636 he founded Providence Plantations, which became the colony and later the state of Rhode Island. Native Americans trusted Williams, even as their relationships with other colonists deteriorated. Williams acted unsuccessfully as peacemaker between the two warring sides in the 1660s and 1670s. He died in Providence.

In 1643 he wrote the Key Into the Languages of America, the first Indian grammar in English, which included rhymes depicting Native Americans as more tolerant, peaceful, and fair than contemporary European peoples. His most influential work at the time was The Bloudy Tenent (1644), in which he criticizes religious wars and the union of church and state. Williams wrote The Bloudy Tenent as a dialog between Truth and Peace in which he states that “enforced uniformity (sooner or later) is the greatest occasion of civil war, ravishing of conscience, persecution of Christ Jesus in his servants, and of the hypocrisy and destruction of millions of souls.” He argued that civil governments should confine themselves to secular affairs and allow freedom of religion to their citizens. Williams's belief in religious tolerance was considered so dangerous that The Bloudy Tenent was burned in England in 1645.

While Williams's initial followers were English religious and political radicals of the 1640s and 1650s, his most lasting legacy is the influence he had on later American writers and political thinkers, such as Benjamin FRANKLIN and Thomas JEFFERSON.

Works by Roger Williams

A Key into the Language of America. Bedford, Mass.: Applewood Books, 1997.

The Complete Writings of Roger Williams. New York: Russell and Russell, 1963.

A Work about Roger Williams

Gaustad, Edwin S. Roger Williams: Prophet of Liberty. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Winthrop, John (1588–1649) historian, essayist

John Winthrop was born into a family of wealthy clothiers and lawyers in Suffolk, England. He entered Trinity College of Cambridge University in 1602, but left in 1604. He became a magistrate in 1609, studied law, and in 1626 became an attorney in the Court of Wards and Liveries. Winthrop was elected governor of the Massachusetts colony in 1629, and the following year arrived in Charlestown, Massachusetts. The colonists elected Winthrop governor annually until 1634, and then again from 1637 to 1640, 1642 to 1644, and 1646 to 1649, when he died in Boston. As the first governor of Massachusetts, he dealt with such issues as religious freedom, interactions with Native Americans, and the basic survival of the new settlements.

Like his fellow colonist Roger WILLIAMS, he wrote about government and religion. Two of his most important essays are “Arbitrary Government Described” (1644), concerning the legislative and judicial powers of the colonial government, and “Model of Christian Charity” (1629–30), a description of the type of human decency and charity Winthrop expected citizens of the Massachusetts colony to exhibit.

Winthrop also diligently kept a journal, titled The History of New England 1630–1649. It was not published until 1825–26, almost two centuries after his death, yet it stands as one of the most complete firsthand accounts of the early years of New England.

Works by John Winthrop

Journal of John Winthrop: 1630–1649. Edited by Richard S. Dunn, et al. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap/Harvard University Press, 1996.

Short Story of the Rise, Reign and Ruin of the Antinomians, Familists and Libertines that Infected the Churches of New England (1644). Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.

Works about John Winthrop

Aronson, Marc. John Winthrop, Oliver Cromwell, and the Land of Promise. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 2004.

Bremer, Francis J. John Winthrop: America's Forgotten Founding Father. New York: University Press, 2003.

Connelly, Elizabeth R. John Winthrop: Politician and Statesman. Langhorne, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2000.

Morgan, Edmund S. The Puritan Dilemma: The Story of John Winthrop. Lebanon, Ind.: Pearson, 1998.

Woolman, John (1720–1772)

humanitarian, journal writer

John Woolman is best known for writing a journal that is considered to be one of the finest statements of Quaker life. Journal and Major Essays, published in 1774, is a classic of American spiritual experience. Woolman was also a powerful early voice in opposition to slavery, poverty, and war.

A New Jersey Quaker, Woolman was raised in Quaker schools and meetings and began his public ministry at age 22. He carried Quaker ideals of peace and Christian brotherhood across the Atlantic, ranging from the south to Pennsylvania. He worked as a storekeeper, tailor, orchard keeper, teacher, surveyor, and conveyer of deeds, leases, and bills of sale, including bills of sale for human property. Woolman died of smallpox in England while traveling for an antislavery cause.

In his Journal and Major Essays, Woolman relates how these transactions troubled him so much that he gave up his job rather than prepare another indenture for servitude or slave transaction. He focuses on his internal process of reasoning leading to his change of vocation. He also gives the reader a view of his private, intimate moment of conversion in this record of personal spiritual experience. The work is historically valuable in Woolman's treatment of the human drama and the injustice of the slave trade in the early United States.

Works by John Woolman

Journal of John Woolman and Plea for the Poor. Eugene, Ore.: Wipf and Stock, 1998.

Walking Humbly with God: Selected Writings of John Woolman. Nashville, Tenn.: Upper Room Books, 2000.

Works about John Woolman

Birkel, Michael Lawrence. A Near Sympathy: The Timeless Quaker Wisdom of John Woolman. Richmond, Ind.: Friends United Press, 2003.

Sox, David. John Woolman: Quintessential Quaker, 1720–1772. Richmond, Ind.: Friends United Press, 1999.

Wu Chengen (Wu Ch'eng-en) (ca. 1500–ca. 1582) novelist, poet

Wu Chengen was born in Kiangsu province in eastern China. His father was a merchant who loved literature, and Wu was noted for his own literary accomplishments at a very young age. Nevertheless, he repeatedly failed the arduous examinations for the imperial civil service. Finally, at the advanced age of 63, he became a provincial magistrate, only to be imprisoned two years later on groundless charges of corruption. After clearing Wu's name, the imperial court offered him another post, which he refused, preferring to devote the remainder of his life to writing.

Wu Chengen composed many works of verse that convey strong emotions. Two volumes of his poems survive, most of them discovered in imperial palaces in Kiangsu many years after his death. He is best known as the presumed author of The Journey to the West [Hsi Yu Chi], an EPIC prose novel that appeared anonymously in 1592, 10 years after his death. Since then, The Journey to the West has appeared in many different forms and been the inspiration if not the source for various works. A picture book of the story was published in 1806. In 2000 the movie Lost Empire, based upon Wu's book, was released. It tells the story of journalist Nick Orton's search for the lost manuscript of Hsi Yu Chi. The book also served as the basis of the Japanese television series Saiyuki (Monkey, also known as Monkey Magic), which ran from 1978 to 1990. Finally, the computer-animated video Monkey (1996) by Miles Inada and Evan Carroll is also based upon The Journey to the West, as is the popular anime Dragonball series.

Critical Analysis

Like all Chinese novels of the Ming dynasty period, The Journey to the West was written in the vernacular rather than the formal, officially accepted classical style, and was probably published anonymously to protect its author's reputation. The theory that Wu was the novel's true author appears to have originated in his home province during the 16th century. Not all modern scholars are convinced of Wu's authorship, as there were similar published tales that existed before Wu's version. However, most scholars believe the poet's lifelong "love of strange stories [and] popular novels" (as he wrote in a preface to a collection of classical short stories) is significant evidence in his favor.

Wu was inspired to write Journey to the West by the epic pilgrimage of the 7th-century Buddhist monk Hsuan-Tsang (596?–664), who traveled on foot to India, today known as the birthplace of Buddhism. Hsuan-Tsang walked for many years along the fabled Silk Road in search of his faith's sacred texts, called the Sutra. After finding them, he returned to China and began translating the scriptures into Chinese. By Wu's time, Hsuan-Tsang's pilgrimage had become the subject of many fantastic legends, which had already inspired a short verse novel and a six-part drama titled Monkey. Wu thus had much source material for his 100-chapter novel.

In "The Story of the Monkey," comprising the first seven chapters of Journey to the West, the novel's protagonist Monkey is born from a magical stone egg, learns the supernatural abilities of shape-shifting and flight, and makes himself king of all the monkeys on Earth. Throughout the tale, we see Monkey transform himself into a bird, a beast of prey, and a bug. We also see him dive into the mouth of a dragon to retrieve a horse. Monkey gets into trouble on a visit to heaven, however, as his hunger for knowledge and his abuse of his powers lead to chaos. The god Erhlang subdues him, and Buddha sentences him to live under a mountain for 500 years.

The next five chapters, "The Story of Hsuan-Tsang and the Origin of the Mission to India," recount the life of Hsuan-Tsang (here called Tripitaka), whom the emperor dispatches on a journey to the "Western Paradise," where good Buddhists go after they die. Monkey is given a chance to prove himself by becoming Tripitaka's disciple and protector, and accompanying him on his pilgrimage. Monkey proves his worth by killing beasts, such as a tiger who tries to kill them, and human ruffians who try to steal Tripitaka's horse. Such events continue in the remaining chapters, called "The Pilgrimage to India," in which Wu Chengen recounts 81 separate, supernatural adventures of the monk, Monkey, and two other magical animals. The slow-witted Pigsy and the fish Sandy serve as additional protectors for Tripitaka as they journey to the Western Paradise.

While Monkey is an allegorical character with many complexities and discrepancies, Pigsy is a clear-cut representation of human desire and often sloth. In the “Editor’s Notes” to the journal Figure in the Carpet, Jian Leng summarizes the characters and what they represent in this way:

Readers of Journey to the West soon realize that the bizarre main characters are, in many ways, archetypal figures representing universal qualities of human nature. [Tripitaka], the monk sent by the king to gather the scriptures, represents “everyman” searching for meaning. The disciple Piggy embodies sensuality and appetite as well as the vitality and energy necessary to undertake a demanding journey. The disciple Sandy represents sincerity. And then, there is Monkey, who symbolizes the undisciplined intellect that must be tamed before the journey—the spiritual transformation—can be undertaken and successfully completed.

During their journey, the four friends, led by the trickster-warrior Monkey, encounter and often do battle with demons, dragons, and gods from Chinese mythology, all of which Wu Chengen vividly describes. Monkey thwarts many of these enemies with a cudgel he can reduce to the size of a needle, which he carries behind his ear. He also visits hell and reads the book of death, in which he notices his own name. He erases it, thus ensuring himself everlasting life. Perhaps most famous, however, is the novel’s biting satire of the hidebound, inefficient, and inescapable Chinese bureaucracy. When Monkey visits heaven early in the novel, he meets the Jade Emperor, who is less a mighty divinity than prosaic administrator, presiding over a bloated civil service composed of numerous useless officials with pompous titles who attempt to control every aspect of life on Earth:

Heavenly carpenters were ordered to build the office of the Great Sage to the right of the Peach Garden. It had two departments, one called

Peace and Quiet and the other Calm Spirit. In each were Immortal Officers who attended Monkey wherever he went. A Star Spirit was detailed to escort Monkey to his new quarters, and he was allowed a ration of two jars of Imperial wine and ten sprays of gold-leaf flowers.

Wu’s readers immediately would have recognized the analogy between the hierarchy of Wu’s heaven and that of China. The scene also points out that Monkey, rather than Tripitaka, is the protagonist in the book. In her article “Getting a Jump on Dragon Ball,” Alysson Wyatt states:

The reason for this, most critics agree, is that Monkey embodies the theme that the original author tried to convey to his readers: a rebellious spirit can defy even the most untouchable of feudal rulers. This idea of defying authority was highly frowned upon in China, as the ideas of Confucianism again took hold over the newer religions in the region, Buddhism and Taoism. Confucianism was returned to its original place as the official orthodoxy of the state of China during the Tang dynasty (c.e. 618) by an iron-fisted ruling body of high-level bureaucrats. Unlike Confucianism, which teaches conformity and proper behavior within an ideal social system, Taoism and Buddhism advocate an approach to life more receptive to new ideas and change. The monk’s character was necessary because it masked the importance of Monkey’s rebellious nature.

Despite Tripitaka’s despairing that he will ever succeed, the novel ends with the band’s discovery of the sacred scrolls. For his efforts in defense of his friend the monk, the formerly disreputable Monkey is made a saint, with the new name Buddha Victorious in Strife.

In the words of its translator Arthur Waley, Journey to the West is “unique in its combination of beauty with absurdity, of profundity with nonsense. Folk-lore, allegory, religion, history, anti-bureaucratic satire and pure poetry—such are the singularly diverse elements of which the book is compounded.”

Journey to the West is widely read in many Asian countries, Europe, and North America. In China, it proved very influential during the Cultural Revolution of the 1960s, when its satirical passages inspired the radical youth cadres who opposed bureaucracy and tradition. Today, the story is seen as both a rejoining of individual spirit and an odyssey in which the characters travel toward Buddhist enlightenment. Monkey’s playful humor and Tripitaka’s Buddhist-like detachment continue to enthrall readers of all ages and cultures.

Works by Wu Chengen

Monkey: Selections from Hsi Yu Chi. Translated by Arthur Waley. New York: Grove, 1984.

The Journey to the West, 4 vols. Translated by Anthony C. Yu. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977.

Works about Wu Chengen

Dudbridge, Glen. The Hsi-yu Chi: A Study of Antecedents to the Sixteenth-Century Chinese Novel. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970.

Liu Ts’un-jen. Wu Ch’eng-en, His Life and Career. Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1967.

Wu Jingzi (Wu Ching-tzu) (1701–1754) novelist

Wu Jingzi came from a well-educated family in southeastern China. Like others in his family, he was a member of the civil service. His father died when he was a young man, and Wu Jingzi wasted the considerable inheritance he received. His financial problems persisted throughout his life, and he had difficulties at work. In his later life, he chose to withdraw from society.

Wu Jingzi wrote in many genres, including poetry, but he is best known for his novel, The Scholars (Bulin Waishi [Ju-lin wai-shih]), sometimes called Unofficial History of the Literati. The book was the first satirical novel written in Chinese, and many scholars consider it to be the best of the genre.

The Scholars has an unusual structure; it is more like a collection of short stories with common links than a conventional linear novel. The number of chapters is in dispute, but the earliest known manuscript (1803) includes 55 chapters.

In The Scholars, Wu Jingzi attacks the corruption he sees in the government and society of his time. Because of his subject, he purposely avoids using elevated language. In his book Wu Ching-tzu, Timothy Wong points out that “Wu Ching-tzu chose to render his novel in a nonliterary language, and thus to place it also into the tradition of vernacular Chinese fiction,” thus making it more accessible to the common people.

In contrast to earlier authors such as TANG Xi-anzu, who drew upon earlier stories or legends, Wu Jingzi took a more personal approach to his writing by basing his characters on people he knew, including himself.

André Levy asserts that the “episodic structure” of The Scholars had “a decisive influence on this subgenre at the end of the nineteenth and the start of the twentieth centuries” (Chinese Literature, Ancient and Classical). With its modern structure and universal themes, The Scholars continues to have worldwide appeal and is considered a classic of Chinese literature.

An English Version of a Work by Wu Jingzi

The Scholars. Translated by Gladys Yang and Yang Hsien-Yi. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2001.

A Work about Wu Jingzi

Wong, Timothy C. Wu Ching-Tzu. Boston: G.K. Hall, 1978.

Wycliffe, John (John Wyclif) (1324–1387) essayist, translator

John Wycliffe was born in a small town in the county of York, England. Little is known about his childhood or family, but he received a traditional education before studying at the University of Oxford. As a university student, he established a great reputation for his talents and went on to receive a doctorate in theology before being ordained and assuming pastorates in Lutterworth and Lincoln.

Having become a well-known public figure throughout England for his writings and outspoken opinions, Wycliffe was entrusted by the royal family with important diplomatic missions. Though one of these missions was to resolve various conflicts between the pope and the English government, Wyclif was himself first censored and then condemned by the Catholic Church for his unorthodox beliefs and criticism of the clergy.

Wycliffe questioned fundamental teachings of the church in his pamphlets and essays, for the most part written in Latin and devoted to a single theological or philosophical theme. In The Truth of the Sacred Scriptures (1378), he argues that Christian faith should be derived directly from the Bible without the mediation of a corrupt church or clergy. Though excommunicated in 1380, he continued to receive support from the English royal family and continued to produce theological works until his death in Lutterworth.

Wycliffe's writings were extremely influential in Protestant theology, but his most important work was his translation of the Bible into English. Working from the Latin Vulgate, he sought to make a text comprehensible for all readers. The result was a text that not only would have important religious implications, but also would, at least indirectly, have a decisive impact on English prose and poetry for centuries to come. His work served as part of the basis of the King James Bible (1611), one of the most important texts in the history of English-language literature.

A Work by John Wycliffe

Select English Writings. Edited by Herbert E. Winn. New York: AMS Press, 1976.

A Work about John Wycliffe

Kenny, Anthony, ed. Wyclif in His Times. New York: Clarendon Press, 1986.

Yuan Hungdao (Yüan Hung-tao)
(1568–1610) poet, nonfiction writer

Yuan Hungdao was a government official during the last years of the Ming dynasty. He and his brothers, Yuan Zongdao (Yüan Tsung-tao) and Yuan Zhongdao (Yüan Chung-tao), were all writers from a small town, and their group became known by the town's name, the Kung-an School. They wrote at a time noted in Chinese history for its increased intellectual activity. Like their contemporary, dramatist TANG XIANZU, they were innovative in their poetry, rejecting traditional, formal styles for more individual and personal ones.

Yuan Hungdao's poems often address simple moments in life, with titles such as "Writing Down What I See" or "Improvised on the Road." In this excerpt from "Things Experienced," he blends the ordinary elements of the day with the daily news:

People gossip of invasions in the east; rumors fly: "We've sent ships from the north!"

I buy some Ch'ü-chou oranges, spotted with frost:

listen all day to famous women singers.

(trans. by Jonathan Chaves, Pilgrim of the Clouds)

In addition to writing poetry, Yuan Hungdao wrote many prose pieces, all of which are noted for their expressive language and detail. Yuan Hungdao's poetry and his prose, as well as that of his brothers, laid the early foundations for the modern period of Chinese literature.

An English Version of Works by Yuan Hungdao

Pilgrim of the Clouds: Poems and Essays from Ming China. Translated by Jonathan Chaves. New York:
Weatherhill, 1992.

A Work about Yuan Hungdao

Chih-P'ing Chou. Yuan Hung-tao and the Kung-an School. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

Z

Zeami (Zeami Motokiyo, Motokiyo

Kanze) (1363–1443) actor, playwright, critic
Zeami was born in Nagaoka, Japan. His mother was the daughter of a priest, and his father was the great NOH actor and playwright Kannami, also known by his stage name Kanze.

Zeami appeared in plays with his father's acting troupe, the Kanze-za, from a very early age. When he was 12, he and his father performed in front of the third shogun, Yoshimitsu. The young Zeami quickly became a favorite of the 17-year-old shogun and thus procured his first patron.

Yoshimitsu's patronage gave Zeami, a commoner, access to people in the court. One of these was Yoshimitsu's cultural adviser and poet, Nijō Yoshimoto. Whether to gain favor with the shogun or because he was actually fond of the young man, Yoshimoto took Zeami under his wing and taught him appreciation for the finer, more refined pastimes of the aristocrat, such as renga, or linked verse.

In 1384 Kannami died, passing on to Zeami, then 22, the direction of his theater troupe, his stage name, and the Noh knowledge and tradition. This was an auspicious time for the young artist, as he enjoyed the threefold advantage of having the shogun for a patron, Nijō Yoshimoto for a friend, and the reputation and theater troupe of his father at his disposal.

This was not to last, however. In 1408 Yoshimitsu died and his son Yoshimochi became the fourth shogun. Yoshimochi had little interest in the Noh drama that Zeami was developing and refining, preferring the more boisterous Dengaku style. Up to this time, Zeami had been revising his father's plays and writing new ones for the Kanze-za, creating more than 90 plays that are still in the Noh repertoire today. His masterpieces include such works as Takasago and Matsukaze. Under Yoshimochi's rule, however, Zeami was unable to perform his plays and so turned to writing treatises on Noh, critical and philosophical works on the aesthetics of the form. Along with his plays, these critical essays were crucial in refining Noh as a dramatic form. As Hare states in Zeami's Style: The Noh Plays of Zeami Motokiyo, "His treatises on performance represent the first pragmatically centered work on aesthetics in Japanese intellectual history."

Zeami's first such treatise, and undoubtedly his most famous, was completed when he was near 40. Entitled Fūshi Kaden, it was largely based on his father's experiences and achievements. He also presented several concepts on the aesthetics of Noh. Three of these deserve special note: yūgen, a visual sense of beauty that is both mysterious and ineffable; monomane, dramatic mimicry; and hana, or flower, a metaphor for those qualities that make a Noh performance successful. These concepts appear again and again in Zeami's work and have defined the art of Noh theater in literary form.

In 1424 Zeami's life was interrupted again when the sixth shogun, Yoshinori, came to power. Yoshinori had no taste for Zeami's Noh aesthetics and revoked all the privileges that Zeami had enjoyed. Still, Zeami continued to write treatises. One of his major works of this time was Kakyo (The Mirror of the Flower, 1424), a summary of his own experience in the theater, meant to be passed on in confidence to his son Motomasa.

In 1432 Motomasa died. When told to accept his nephew Onnami as his successor, Zeami refused. As a result, he was exiled to Sado Island in 1434. He was 74 years old. When Zeami died, it was unclear whether he was still in exile or had been allowed to return home.

In the Fūshi Kade, Zeami said of Noh, "Everything in Noh has its own style, based upon the meaning of the words, for it is language by which the profound meaning is conveyed." Zeami's works of instruction for actors and his thoughtful, detailed theories about the writing and production of Noh plays elevated Noh theater to an art form rivaling the dignity of court poetry. His works, with their dense imagery and textured allusions to myths, legend, and literature, still captivate audiences to this day, earning Zeami his reputation as the greatest playwright in the history of Noh theater.

An English Version of Works by Zeami

On the Art of the No Drama: Major Treatises by Zeami.

Translated by J. Thomas Rimer, Yamazaki Masakazu, and Wallace Chappell. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.

Works about Zeami

Nogami, Toyochiro. Zeami and His Theories on Noh.

Tokyo: Hinoki, 1973

Zeami and the No Theatre in the World. Edited by Samuel L. Leiter, et al. New York: Martin E. Segal Theatre Center, 1998.

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Abdallah, Sayyid. Al-Inkishafi: The Soul's Awakening. Translated by William Hichens. Nairobi: Oxford University Press, 1972.
- Acosta, José de. Natural and Moral History of the East and West Indies. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2003.
- . Natural and Moral History of the Indies. Translated by Frances M. Lopez-Morillas. Raleigh, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2002.
- Adachi, Barbara C. Backstage at Bunraku: A Behind-the-Scenes Look at Traditional Japanese Theater. New York: Weatherhill, 1985.
- Addington, John. Giovanni Boccaccio as Man and Author. New York: AMS Press, 1968.
- Ainsworth, Peter. Jean Froissart and the Fabric of History. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- Alarcón, Juan Ruiz de. Truth Can't Be Trusted or the Liar. Translated by Daikin Matthews. New Orleans, La.: University Press of the South, 1998.
- Al-Azmeh, Aziz. Ibn Khaldun: An Essay in Reinterpretation. New York and Budapest: Central European University Press, 2003.
- Alberti, Leon Battista. On the Art of Building in Ten Books. Translated by Joseph Rykwert, Neil Leach, and Robert Tavenor. Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1991.
- Albrecht, Jane White. Playgoing Public of Madrid in the Time of Tirso de Molina. New Orleans: University Press of the South, 2001.
- d'Alembert, Jean le Rond. Preliminary Discourse to the Encyclopedia of Diderot. Translated by Richard N. Schwab. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill, 1963.
- . Preliminary Discourse to the Encyclopedia of Diderot. Translated by Richard N. Schwab. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Alexander, John T. Catherine the Great: Life and Legend. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Alfieri, Vittorio. Of Tyranny. Edited and translated by Julius A. Molinaro and Beatrice Corrigan. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1961.
- . The Tragedies of Vittorio Alfieri. Edited by Edgar Alfred Bowrin. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1970.
- Allan, Sian. The Plays of Heinrich von Kleist: Ideals and Illusions. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Allen, Gay Wilson, and Roger Asselineau. American Farmer: The Life of St. John de Crèvecoeur. New York: Penguin, 1990.
- Allison, Henry E. Kant's Transcendental Idealism: An Interpretation and Defense. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2004.
- Amaral, Ricardo C. Jose Bonifacio de Andrada e Silva. Brazil: Brazilian Communications Group, 1999.
- Anderson, Douglas. William Bradford's Books: Of Plimmoth Plantation and the Printed Word. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003.

- Anderson-Gold, Sharon. Unnecessary Evil: History and Moral Progress in the Philosophy of Immanuel Kant. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001.
- Appiah, Peggy. The Pineapple Child and Other Tales from Ashanti. London: Carlton Books, 1995.
- Archer, Robert. The Pervasive Image: The Role of Analogy in the Poetry of Ausiàs March. Philadelphia: John Benjamins Publishing Company, 1985.
- Arciniegas, Germán. Knight of El Dorado: The Tale of Don Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada and His Conquest of New Granada. Translated by Mildred Adams. Oxford, U.K.: Greenwood, 1968.
- . Why America? 500 Years of a Name: The Life and Times of Amerigo Vespucci. Translated by Harriet de Onis. Washington, D.C.: Villegas Editores, 2002.
- Aretino, Pietro. Aretino's Dialogues. Translated by Raymond Rosenthal and edited by Margaret Rosenthal. New York: Marsilio, 1999.
- . The Marescalco. Edited and translated by Leonard G. Sbrocchi and J. Douglas Campbell. New York: Italica, 2003.
- Ariew, Roger, and Marjorie Grene, eds. Descartes and His Contemporaries: Meditations, Objections, and Replies. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Ariosto, Ludovico. Orlando Furioso. Translated by Guido Waldman. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- . Orlando Furioso: Part One. Translated by Barbara Reynolds. New York: Viking Press, 1975.
- Aristotle. Aristotle's Theory of Poetry and Fine Art. Translated by S. H. Butcher. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 1955.
- Armitage, Angus. Copernicus: The Founder of Modern Astronomy. New York and London: Thomas Yoseloff, 1957.
- Armstrong, Dorsey. Gender and the Chivalric Community of Malory's Morte D'Arthur. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2003.
- Aronson, Marc. John Winthrop, Oliver Cromwell, and the Land of Promise. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2004.
- Aronson, Nicole. Madeleine de Scudéry. New York: Twayne, 1978.
- Atalay, Bulent. Math and the Mona Lisa: The Art and Science of Leonardo da Vinci. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 2004.
- Aubigné, Agrippa d'. His Life, to His Children. Edited and translated by John Nothnagle. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1989.
- Augustijn, Cornelis. Erasmus: His Life, Works and Influence. Translated by J. C. Grayson. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1991.
- Austin, Mary. Philip Freneau: The Poet of the Revolution. Temecula, Calif.: Reprint Services Corporation, 1993.
- Avvakum. The Life of Archpriest Avvakum by Himself. Translated by Kenneth N. Brostrom. Ann Arbor: Michigan Slavic Publications, University of Michigan, 1979.
- Axayacatl of Tenochtitlan. Flower and Song: Poems of the Aztec Peoples. Translated by Edward Kissam and Michael Schmidt. Ypsilanti, Mich.: Bilingual Press, 1983.
- Aylett, Robert, ed. Hans Sachs and Folk Theatre in the Late Middle Ages. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen, 1995.
- Baali, Fuad. Social Institutions: Ibn Khaldun's Social Thought. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1992.
- Bacon, Francis. Francis Bacon: The Major Works. Edited by Brian Vickers. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- . The Advancement of Learning. Edited by Michael Kiernan. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Bailey, John Cann. The Claims of French Poetry: Nine Studies in the Greater French Poets. Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries Press, 1967.
- Baine, Rodney M. Robert Munford, America's First Comic Dramatist. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1967.
- Baker, Deborah Lesko. The Subject of Desire: Petrarchan Poetics and the Female Voice in Louise Labé. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1996.
- Baker, Denise Nowakowski. Julian of Norwich's Showings: From Vision to Book. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994.

- Baker, Mona, ed. Routledge Encyclopedia of Translation Studies. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Balbuena, Bernardo de. The Heroic Poem of the Spanish Golden Age. Edited by Frank Pierce. New York: Oxford University Press, 1947.
- Baldwin, Neil, trans. Legends of the Plumed Serpent: Biography of a Mexican God. New York: Public Affairs, 1998.
- Banbera, Tayiru. A State of Intrigue, The Epic of Bamaana Segu. Edited by David C. Conrad. London: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Banks, Joseph. The Letters of Joseph Banks: A Selection, 1768–1820. Edited by Neil Chambers. London: Imperial College Press, 2000.
- Bartels, Emily C. Spectacles of Strangeness: Imperialism, Alienation, and Marlowe. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Bartram, William. William Bartram: Travels and Other Writings. New York: Library of America, 1996.
- Barzun, Jacques, and Ralph H. Bowen, trans. Rameau's Nephew and Other Works. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett, 2001.
- Baskins, Wade, trans. The Wisdom of Leonardo da Vinci. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2004.
- Beadle, Richard, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Medieval English Theatre. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Beccaria, Cesare. On Crimes and Punishments. Translated by David Young. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett, 1997.
- Bellay, Joachim du. Ordered Text: The Sonnet Sequences of Du Bellay. Edited by Richard A. Katz. New York: Peter Lang, 1985.
- . The Regrets. Translated by David R. Slavitt. Boston: Northwestern University Press, 2003.
- Bembo, Pietro. Gli Asolani. Translated by Rudolf B. Gottfried. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1954.
- . The Prettiest Love Letters in the World: Letters between Lucrezia Borgia and Pietro Bembo. Translated by Hugh Shankland. London: Collins Harvill, 1987.
- Bennett, Benjamin. Modern Drama and German Classicism: Renaissance from Lessing to Brecht. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1986.
- Bennett, Evan. The Maya Epic. River Falls: University of Wisconsin River Falls Press, 1974.
- Benson, Larry D., and Theodore M. Andersson. The Literary Content of Chaucer's Fabliaux: Texts and Translations. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill, 1971.
- Benz, Ernst. Emanuel Swedenborg: Visionary Savant in the Age of Reason. Translated by Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke. West Chester, Pa.: Swedenborg Foundation, 2002.
- Bergen, Henry, ed. Lydgate's Fall of Princes. London: Boydell and Brewer, 1967.
- Berger, Harry. The Absence of Grace: Sprezzatura and Suspicion in Two Renaissance Courtesy Books. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 2000.
- Bergerac, Cyrano de. Other Worlds: The Comical History of the States and Empires of the Moon and Sun. Translated by Geoffrey Strachan. London: New English Library, 1976.
- Bermann, Sandra L. The Sonnet over Time: A Study in the Sonnets of Petrarch, Shakespeare, and Baude-laire. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Bermel, Albert. Farce: A History from Aristophanes to Woody Allen. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982.
- Bermel, Albert, ed. and trans. A Dozen French Farces: Medieval to Modern. New York: Limelight Editions, 1997.
- Berry, Alice F. Charm of Catastrophe: A Study of Rabelais's Quart Livre. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.
- Berry, Edward I. The Making of Sir Philip Sidney. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1998.
- Betti, Franco. Vittorio Alfieri. Boston: Twayne, 1984.
- Beverley, John. Aspects of Gongora's "Soledades". Amsterdam: Benjamins, 1980.
- Biagioli, Mario. Galileo Courtier: The Practice of Science in the Culture of Absolutism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Bierlein, J. F. Parallel Myths. New York: Ballantine Books, 1994.
- Birkel, Michael Lawrence. A Near Sympathy: The Timeless Quaker Wisdom of John Woolman. Richmond, Ind.: Friends United Press, 2003.

- Bishop, Morris. The Life and Adventures of La Rochefoucauld. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1951.
- Bisson, Lillian M. Chaucer and the Late Medieval World. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2000.
- Black, F. G. The Epistolary Novel in the Late Eighteenth Century. Eugene: University of Oregon Press, 1940.
- Blackburn, Carole. Harvest of Souls: The Jesuit Missions and Colonialism in North America, 1632–1650. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2004.
- Blackie, John Stuart. The Wisdom of Goethe. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2004.
- Blewett, David, ed. Passion and Virtue: Essays on the Novels of Samuel Richardson. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2001.
- Bloch, Howard R. The Scandal of the Fables. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Bloom, Allan. Shakespeare on Love and Friendship. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993.
- Bloom, Harold. Geoffrey Chaucer. Bloom's Modern Critical Views Series. Langhorne, Pa.: Chelsea House Publishers, 2003.
- . Shakespeare: The Invention of the Human. New York: Riverhead, 1998.
- . ed. African-American Poets: Phillis Wheatley through Countee Cullen. Langhorne, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2001.
- Boas, Ralph, and Louise Boas. Cotton Mather, Keeper of the Puritan Conscience. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.
- Boccaccio, Giovanni. Famous Women. Edited and translated by Virginia Brown. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- . Life of Dante. Translated by F. G. Nichols. London: Hesperus Press, 2002.
- . Nymphs of Fiesole. Translated by Joseph Tusiani. Cranbury, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1971.
- . The Decameron. Translated by Mark Musa. New York: Signet, 2002.
- Boileau-Despréaux, Nicolas. Nicholas Boileau-Despréaux: Selected Criticism. Translated by Ernest Dilworth. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1965.
- Bonansa, Bernardino M. Tommaso Campanella: Renaissance Pioneer of Modern Thought. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1969.
- Bondanella, Peter E. Francesco Guicciardini. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1976.
- Bonhomme, Denise. What Voltaire Tries to Tell Us. Lincoln, Neb.: iUniverse, Inc., 2000.
- Bontatibus, Donna. The Seduction Novel of the Early Nation. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1999.
- Bossuet, Jacques-Benigne. Discourse on Universal History. Translated by Elborg Forster and edited by Orest Ranum. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976.
- . Politics Drawn from the Very Words of Holy Scripture. Translated by Patrick Riley. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Boswell, James. Journal of a Tour to Corsica and Memoirs of Pascal Paoli. New York: Turtle Point Press, 2002.
- . Life of Johnson. IndyPublish.com, 2002.
- Boulay, F. R. H. The England of Piers Plowman: William Langland and His Vision of the Fourteenth Century. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell and Brewer, 1991.
- Bourbon, Anne-Marie, trans. Debate of Folly and Love: A New English Translation with the Original French Text. New York: Peter Lang, 2000.
- Bowring, John, ed. Specimens of the Russian Poets, 2 vols. Boston: Cummings and Hilliard, 1822.
- Boyce, Charles. Critical Companion to William Shakespeare. New York: Facts On File, 2005.
- Brackett, Virginia. Classic Love and Romance Literature: An Encyclopedia of Works, Characters, Authors, and Themes. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO, 1999.
- Bradford, M. E. A Better Guide than Reason: Federalists and Anti-Federalists. Introduction by Russell Kirk. Somerset, N.J.: Transaction Publishers, 1994.
- Bradford, William. Of Plymouth Plantation. Introduction by Samuel Eliot Morison. New York: Knopf, 2001.
- Bradstreet, Anne Dudley. The Works of Anne Bradstreet. Edited by Jeannie Hensley. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1981.

- Bramly, Serge. Leonardo: The Artist and the Man. Translated by Sian Reynolds. New York: Penguin Books, 1994.
- Branca, Vittore. Boccaccio: The Man and His Works. Translated by Richard Monges. New York: New York University Press, 1976.
- Brand, Peter, and Lino Pertile. The Cambridge History of Italian Literature. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999; 193–196.
- Brandon, James R., ed. Chushingura: Studies in Kabuki and the Puppet Theatre. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1982.
- Brandon, James R., trans. Kabuki: Five Classic Plays. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1992.
- Brands, H. W. The First American: The Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin. New York: Doubleday, 2000.
- Brandt, Sebastian. The Ship of Fools. Translated by Edwin H. Zeydel. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 1988.
- Bredero, Gerbrand. The Spanish Brabanter. Translated by David H. Brumble III. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1982.
- Breitwieser, Mitchell R. American Puritanism and the Defense of Mourning: Religion, Grief, and Ethnology in Mary White Rowlandson's Captivity Narrative. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1992.
- Bremer, Francis J. John Winthrop: America's Forgotten Founding Father. New York: New York University Press, 2003.
- Brett, Michael. Ibn Khaldun and the Medieval Maghrib. Brookfield, Vt.: Ashgate Variorum, 1999.
- Brewer, Derek, and Jonathan Gibson, eds. A Companion to the Gawain-Poet. New York: Boydell and Brewer, 1999.
- Brown, Charles Brockden. Three Gothic Novels. New York: Library of America, 1998.
- Brown, Charles Henry. William Cullen Bryant. New York: Scribner, 1971.
- Brown, Christopher. Encyclopedia of Travel Literature. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO, 2000.
- Brown, F. Andrew. Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. New York: Twayne, 1971.
- Brown, Hilda Meldrum. Heinrich von Kleist: The Ambiguity of Art and the Necessity of Form. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Brown, Sharon Rogers. American Travel Narratives as a Literary Genre from 1542 to 1832. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993.
- Bruce, Susan, ed. Three Early Modern Utopias: Utopia, New Atlantis, the Isle of Pines. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Bruno, Giordano. Cause, Principle and Unity and Essays on Magic. Translated by Robert D. Lucca and Richard J. Blackwell. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- . The Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast. Translated by Arthur D. Imerti. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992.
- Buffon, Georges-Louis Leclerc. Natural History, General and Particular. Translated by William Smellie. Bristol, England: Thoemmes Press, 2001.
- Bull, George. Michelangelo: A Biography. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 1995.
- Bunyan, John. The Pilgrim's Progress. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2003.
- Burgaleta, Claudio M. Jose De Acosta, S.J. (1540–1600): His Life and Thought. Chicago: Loyola Press, 1999.
- Burke, Peter. Vico. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Burl, Aubrey. Danse Macabre: François Villon. New York: Sutton, 2000.
- Burney, Charles. Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Abate Metastasio. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 1971.
- Burns, Allan Franck. An Epoch of Miracles: Oral Literature of the Yucatec Maya. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1983.
- Burns, E. Bradford. A History of Brazil, 3rd ed. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.
- Burrows, Ruth. Ascent to Love: The Spiritual Teaching of St. John of the Cross. Starrucca, Pa.: Dimension Books, 2000.
- Bush, Sargent. "Introduction." The Journal of Madam Knight, Journeys in New Worlds, Early American Women's Narratives. Edited by William L. Andrews, 1990: 69–83.
- Busoni, Rafaello. The Man Who Was Don Quixote: The Story of Miguel Cervantes. New York: Prentice Hall, 1982.

- Cabeza de Vaca, Álvar Núñez. Narrative of Cabeza de Vaca. Edited and translated by Rolena Adorno and Patrick C. Pautz. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2003.
- . The Journey and Ordeal of Cabeza de Vaca: His Account of the Disastrous First European Exploration of the American Southwest. Translated by Cyclone Covey. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2004.
- Cagno, Gabriella di, et al. Michelangelo. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2000.
- Calder, Martin. Encounters with the Other: A Journey to the Limits of Language through Words by Rousseau, Defoe, Prevost and Graffigny. New York: Rodopi, 2003.
- Calderón de la Barca, Pedro. Six Plays. Translated by Edwin Honig. New York: Iasta, 1995.
- Caldicott, Edric E., and Derval Conroy, eds. Racine: The Power and the Pleasure. Dublin: University College Dublin Press, 2001.
- Cameron, Ann. The Kidnapped Prince: The Life of Olaudah Equiano. New York: Random House, 2000.
- Cameron, Keith. Agrippa d'Aubigné. Boston: Twayne, 1977.
- . Louise Labé: Renaissance Poet and Feminist. Oxford, England: Berg Publishers, 1991.
- Camões, Luíz Vaz de. "Dear Gentle Soul," in World Poetry: An Anthology of Verse from Antiquity to Our Time. Translated by Roy Campbell and edited by Katharine Washburn and John S. Major. New York: Quality Paperback Book Club, 1998; 568.
- . The Lusiads of Luíz de Camões. Translated by Leonard Bacon. New York: Hispanic Society of America, 1950.
- . The Lusiads. Translated by Sir Richard Fanshawe. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1963.
- Campanella, Tommaso. The City of the Sun: A Poetical Dialogue. Translated by Daniel John Donno. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- . The Defense of Galileo. Edited and translated by Grant McColley. New York: Arno Press, 1975.
- Cantemir, Dimitrie. Dimitrie Cantemir. Historian of South East European and Oriental Civilizations. Extracts from The History of The Ottoman Empire. Edited by Alexandru Dutu and Paul Cer-novodeanu. Bucharest: Association internationale d'études du sud-est européen, 1973.
- Carlyle, Thomas. The Life of Friedrich Schiller. Edited by Jeffrey Sammons. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1992.
- Carman, Glen Edgar. Cortes, Gomara, and the Rhetoric of Empire. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1993.
- Carrió de la Vandra, Alonso. El Lazarillo: A Guide for Inexperienced Travelers between Buenos Aires and Lima, 1773. Translated by Walter D. Kline. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1965.
- Carrithers, David Wallace, Michael A. Mosher, and Paul A. Rahe, eds. Montesquieu's Science of Politics. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000.
- Carron, Jean-Claude. François Rabelais: Critical Assessments. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1995.
- Carver, Jonathan. A Treatise on the Culture of the Tobacco Plant. London: Printed by the author, 1779.
- . The Journals of Jonathan Carver and Related Documents, 1766–1770. Edited by John Parker. St. Paul: Minnesota Historical Society Press, 1976.
- . Travels through the Interior Parts of North America in the Years 1766, 1767, and 1768. London: Printed by J. Walter, 1778.
- Cashier, Edward J. William Bartram and the American Revolution on the Southern Frontier. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.
- Casiglia, Christopher. Bound and Determined: Captivity, Culture-Crossing, and White Womanhood from Mary Rowlandson to Patty Hearst. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Caso, Adolph. Alfieri's Ode to America's Independence. Boston: Branden Press, 1976.
- Castanien, Donald Gardner. El Inca, Garcilaso de la Vega. Boston: Twayne, 1970.
- Castellanos, Juan de. The Narrative of the Expedition of Sir Francis Drake to the Indies and the Taking by Him of Carthage. Translated by Walter Owen. Buenos Aires: n.p., 1952.
- Castiglione, Baldessare. The Book of the Courtier. Translated by Leonard Eckstein Opdycke. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2003.

- Castillo, Bernal Díaz del. Conquest of New Spain. Translated by J. M. Cohen. New York: Viking Press, 1963.
- . The Discovery and Conquest of Mexico: 1517–1521. Translated by A. P. Maudslay and edited by Genaro García. New York: DaCapo Press, 2004.
- Castor, Grahame. Pléiade Poetics: A Study in Sixteenth-Century Thought and Terminology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1964.
- Catherine the Great. Documents of Catherine the Great; The Correspondence with Voltaire and the Instruction of 1767 in the English Text of 1768. Edited by W. F. Reddaway. New York: Russell and Russell, 1971.
- . Memoirs of Catherine the Great. Edited and translated by Lowell Bair. New York: Bantam, 1957.
- . Two Comedies by Catherine the Great. Edited and translated by Lurana Donnell O'Malley. Amsterdam: Harwood Academic Publishers, 1998.
- Cause-Steindl, Mariangela, and Thomas Mauch, trans. and eds. The Elegy of Lady Fiammetta. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- Cawley, A. C., ed. Everyman and Medieval Miracle Plays. London: J.M. Dent, 1974.
- . Everyman and Medieval Miracle Plays. New York: Everyman's Library, 1965.
- Çelebi, Evliya. Evliya Çelebi in Albania and Adjacent Regions: Kosovo, Montenegro, Ohrid. Edited and translated by Robert Dankoff and Robert Elsie. Boston: Brill, 2000.
- . Evliya Çelebi in Diyarbekir: The Relevant Section of the Seyahatname. Edited and translated by Martin van Bruinessen and Hendrik Boeschoten. Leiden, N.Y.: Brill, 1988.
- Cervantes Saavedra, Miguel de. Don Quixote. Translated by Tobias Smollett. London: Modern Library, 2004.
- . Don Quixote: The Ingenious Hidalgo de la Mancha. Translated by John Rutherford. New York: Penguin Books, 2003.
- . Exemplary Stories. Edited by Lesley Lipson. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- . The Portable Cervantes. Translated by Samuel Putnam. New York: Viking Press, 1976.
- Cerwin, Herbert. Bernal Díaz, Historian of the Conquest. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1963.
- Chadwick, Owen. From Bossuet to Newman. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Chaucer, Geoffrey. The Complete Poetry and Prose of Geoffrey Chaucer. Edited by John H. Fisher. Boston: Heinle and Heinle, 1990.
- . Chaucer's Dream Poetry. Edited by Helen Phillips and Nick Havely. Longman Annotated Text Series. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Pearson Education, 1997.
- . The Canterbury Tales. Translated by Nevill Coghill. New York: Penguin Books, 2003.
- Chi Sun Rhee, ed. The Love of Choon Hyang. Chapel Hill, N.C.: Professional Press, 2000.
- Chih-P'ing Chou. Yuan Hung-tao and the Kung-an School. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Chikamatsu Monzaemon. Five Late Plays. Translated by C. Andrew Gerstle. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.
- . Four Major Plays of Chikamatsu. Translated by Donald Keene. New York: Columbia University Press, 1961.
- Child, Francis James. English and Scottish Popular Ballads. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 1965.
- Chin In-sook, trans. A Classical Novel: Ch'un-hyang. Seoul, Korea: Korean International Center, 1970.
- Chocolate, Deborah M. Newton. Talk, Talk: An Ashanti Legend. Mahwah, N.J.: Troll Associates, 1993.
- Christian Science Monitor. The Last American Puritan: The Life of Increase Mather, 1639–1723. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1990.
- Chweh, Crystal R. Readings on Cyrano de Bergerac. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2001.
- Clardy, Jesse. The Philosophical Ideas of Alexander Radishchev. New York: Astra Books, 1964.
- Clark, David Lee. Charles Brockden Brown: Pioneer Voice of America. New York: AMS Press, 1966.
- Clark, Margaret Goff. Their Eyes on the Stars: Four Black Writers. New York: Garland Publishing, 1973.
- Clarke, Samuel, and Roger Ariew, eds. Correspondence. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 2000.
- Clements, Robert J. Critical Theory and Practice of the Pléiade. New York: Octagon Books, 1970.
- Cleugh, James. The Divine Aretino. New York: Stein and Day, 1966.

- Cloutier, David. Hafiz of Shiraz. Translated by Muriel Rukeyser. Greensburg, Pa.: Unicorn Press, 1988.
- Coers, Donald Vernon. A Review of the Scholarship on Ebenezer Cook and a Critical Assessment of His Works. College Station: Texas A&M University, University Microfilms, 1974.
- Cohen, Edward H. Ebenezer Cooke: The Sot-Weed Canon. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1975.
- Coldewey, John C., ed. Early English Drama: An Anthology. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.
- Colilli, Paul. Poliziano's Science of Tropes. New York: Peter Lang, 1989.
- Collis, Maurice. Cortes and Montezuma. New York: New Directions Publishing, 1999.
- Colton, Robert E. Juvenal and Boileau: A Study of Literary Influence. Port Jervis, N.Y.: Lubrecht and Cramer, 1987.
- . Studies of Classical Influence on Boileau and la Fontaine. Hildesheim, Germany: Georg Olms, 1996.
- Columbus, Christopher. Across the Ocean Sea: A Journal of Columbus's Voyage. Edited by George Sanderlin. New York: Harper and Row, 1966.
- . The Four Voyages. Translated by J. M. Cohen. New York: Penguin Classics, 1992.
- Comenius, Johann Amos. Selections. Translated by Iris Urwin. Introduction by Jean Piaget. Paris: UNESCO, 1957.
- . The Great Didactic of John Amos Comenius. Translated by M. W. Keatinge. London: A. and C. Black, 1921.
- Compayre, Gabriel. Jean Jacques Rousseau and Education from Nature. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2002.
- Conley, John, et al., ed. The Mirror of Everyman's Salvation. Amsterdam: Rodopi Editions, 1985.
- Connelly, Elizabeth R. John Winthrop: Politician and Statesman. Langhorne, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2000.
- Conroy, Peter V. Montesquieu Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1992.
- Cook, Ebenezer. Early Maryland Poetry: The Works of Ebenezer Cook. Edited by Bernard C. Steiner. Baltimore, Md.: Printed by John Murphy Company, 1900.
- Coote, Stephen. Samuel Pepys. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Copernicus, Nicolaus. Complete Works, 4 vols. Edited by Pawel Czartoryski. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 1972–1992.
- . On the Revolutions: Nicholas Copernicus' Complete Works. Translated by Edward Rosen and edited by Jerzy Dobrzycki. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992.
- . Three Copernican Treatises. Translated by Edward Rosen. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2004.
- Corneille, Pierre. "Of the Three Unities." The Continental Model: Selected French Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century. Edited by Scott Elledge and Donald Schier. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1960.
- Cornwell, Neil, ed. The Routledge Companion to Russian Literature. New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Corrigan, Robert, ed. Classical Tragedy. New York: Applause Books, 1991.
- Cortés, Hernán. Letters from Mexico. Translated by Anthony Pagden. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Corthell, Ronald. Ideology and Desire in Renaissance Poetry: The Subject of Donne. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1997.
- Corum, Robert T. Reading Boileau: An Integrative Study of the Early Satires, vol. 15. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1997.
- Cottingham, John. Rationalism. Bristol, England: Thoemmes Press, 1998.
- Cottingham, John, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Descartes. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Cottrell, Robert D. The Grammar of Silence: A Reading of Marguerite de Navarre's Poetry. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1986.
- Courlander, Harold, and Ousmane Sako. The Heart of the Ngoni, Heroes of the African Kingdom of Segou. New York: Crown, 1982.
- Courlander, Harold. A Treasury of African Folklore. New York: Marlowe and Company, 2002.
- Coward, David, trans. The Figaro Trilogy. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

- Craven, William G. Giovanni Pico della Mirandola: Symbol of His Age: Modern Interpretations. Geneva: Librairie Droz, 1981.
- Crèvecoeur, Hector St. John de. Letters from an American Farmer. Edited by Susan Manning. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- . More Letters from an American Farmer: An Edition of the Essays in English Left Unpublished by Crèvecoeur. Edited by Dennis D. Moore. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995.
- Crompton, Samuel Willard. Desiderius Erasmus. Langhorne, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2004.
- Crone, Anna Lisa. Daring of Derzhavin: The Moral and Aesthetic Independence of the Poet in Russia. Columbus, Ohio: Slavica Publishers, 2001.
- Cronk, Nicholas. The Classical Sublime and the Language of Literature. Charlottesville, Va.: Rookwood, 2002.
- Crowder, Richard. No Featherbed to Heaven: A Biography of Michael Wigglesworth, 1631–1705. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1961.
- Crowe, Ivan. Copernicus. Gloucestershire, England: Tempus Publishing, 2004.
- Crumey, Andrew. D'Alembert's Principle. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- Cruz, Sor Juana Inés de la. Sor Juana's Love Poems. Translated by Joan Larkin and Jaime Manrique. New York: Painted Leaf Press, 1997.
- Cunningham, Charles E. Timothy Dwight. New York: Macmillan, 1942.
- Cunninghame, Graham, R. B. A Vanished Arcadia: Being Some Account of the Jesuits in Paraguay. New York: Haskell House, 1968 [1901].
- Darnton, Robert. The Business of Enlightenment: A Publishing History of the Encyclopedia, 1775–1800. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1979.
- Davidson, Cathy N. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Davidson, Hugh M. Blaise Pascal. Boston: Twayne, 1983.
- Davie, Mark. Half-Serious Rhymes: The Narrative Poetry of Luigi Pulci. Dublin: Irish Academic Press, 1997.
- Davis, James Herbert, Jr. Fénelon. Boston: Twayne, 1979.
- Davis, Jessica Milner. Farce. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction, 2003.
- Dean, John W. Memoir of the Revised. Michael Wigglesworth, Author of the Day of Doom. Murrieta, Calif.: New Library Press, 2003.
- Defoe, Daniel. A General History of Pyrates. Edited by Manuel Schonhorn. New York: Dover, 1999.
- . Memoirs of an English Officer and Two Other Short Novels. London: Victor Gollancz, 1970.
- . The Shortest Way with the Dissenters and Other Pamphlets. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1927.
- . The Travel and Historical Writings of Daniel Defoe. Edited by W. R. Owens and P. N. Furbank. London: Pickering and Chatto, 2002.
- DeGrazia, Sebastian. Machiavelli in Hell. New York: Vintage Books, 1989.
- DeGroot, Jack. Intertextuality through Obscurity: The Poetry of Federico Garcia Lorca and Luis de Gongora. New Orleans: University Press of the South, 2003.
- DeJean, Joan. Tender Geographies: Women and the Origins of the Novel in France. New York: Columbia University Press, 1991.
- Della Casa, Giovanni. Galateo. Translated by Konrad Eisenbichler and Kenneth R. Bartlett. Toronto: Centre for Reformation and Renaissance Studies, 1986.
- . Giovanni della Casa's Poem Book. Edited by John Van Sickle. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1999.
- DeLoss Love, William. Samson Occom and the Christian Indians of New England. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1999.
- Derzhavin, Gavriil Romanovich. Poetic Works. Translated by Alexander Levitsky and Martha T. Kitchen. Providence, R.I.: Brown University, 2001.
- Descartes, René. Discourse on Method and Meditations on First Philosophy, 4th ed. Translated by Donald Cress. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 1999.
- . Discourse on Method and The Meditations. Translated by F. E. Sutcliffe. New York: Penguin Books, 1998.

- . Philosophical Essays and Correspondence. Edited by Roger Ariew. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 2000.
- . The Philosophical Writings of Descartes, vol. 1. Edited by John Cottingham, et al. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985.
- . Treatise of Man. Translated by Thomas Steele Hall. New York: Prometheus Books, 2003.
- Descartes, René, and Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz. Rationalists: Five Basic Works on Rationalism. New York: Doubleday, 1989.
- DeSousa, Geraldo U. Shakespeare's Cross-Cultural Encounters. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- Dickinson, John. Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania to the Inhabitants of the British Colonies. Murrieta, Calif.: Classic Textbooks, 2003.
- . The Political Writings of John Dickinson. Edited by Paul Leicester Ford. New York: DaCapo Press, 1970.
- Diderot, Denis. A Diderot Pictorial Encyclopedia of Trades and Industry. Edited by Charles C. Gillispie. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 1994.
- . Denis Diderot's The Encyclopedia; Selections. Edited and translated by Stephen J. Gendzier. New York: Harper and Row, 1967.
- . Jacques the Fatalist and His Master. Translated by David Coward. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- . Rameau's Nephew and d'Alembert's Dream. Translated by Leonard Tancock. New York: Penguin Classics, 1976.
- . Selected Philosophical Writings. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1953.
- . Thoughts on the Interpretation of Nature and Other Philosophical Works. Translated by Lorna Sandler and David Adams. Manchester, England: Clinamen Press, 2000.
- Dominian, Helen G. Apostle of Brazil: The Biography of Padre José de Anchieta. New York: Exposition Press, 1958.
- Donne, John. John Donne's Sermons on the Psalms and Gospels: With a Selection of Prayers and Meditations. Edited by Evelyn M. Simpson. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- . The Complete English Poems. New York: Penguin, 1971.
- . The Sermons of John Donne. Edited by George R. Potter and Evelyn Simpson. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984.
- Downer, Lesley. On the Narrow Road: Journey into a Lost Japan. New York: Summit Books, 1989.
- Drake, Dana, and Jose A. Madrigal. Studies in the Spanish Golden Age: Cervantes and Lope de Vega. Miami: Ediciones Universal, 2001.
- Dryden, John. "Absalom and Achitophel," in Selected Poetry and Prose of John Dryden. Edited by Earl Miner. Los Angeles: Random House, 1969.
- . "An Essay of Dramatic Poesy," in Critical Theory Since Plato. Edited by Hazard Adams. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1992.
- Dudbridge, Glen. The Hsi-yu Chi: A Study of Antecedents to the Sixteenth-Century Chinese Novel. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970.
- Dunbar, William. William Dunbar: Selected Poems. Edited by Harriet H. Wood. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Dusen, Wilson Van. The Presence of Other Worlds. West Chester, Pa.: Swedenborg Foundation, 2004.
- Duval, John, trans. Cuckolds, Clerics, and Countrymen: Medieval French Fabliaux. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1982.
- Dwight, Timothy. America; or, A Poem on the Settlement of the British Colonies. New Haven, Conn.: T.&S. Green, 1780.
- . Greenfield Hill. New York: AMS Press, 1970.
- . The Conquest of Canaan; A Poem in Eleven Books. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1970.
- Earle, T. F. The Muse Reborn, The Poetry of António Ferreira. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Eaves, T. C. Duncan, and Ben D. Kimpel. Samuel Richardson: A Biography. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1971.
- Ebin, Lois A. John Lydgate. Boston: Twayne, 1985.
- Eckermann, Johann. Conversations of Goethe. Translated by John Oxenford. New York: DaCapo Press, 1998.
- Edmonson, Munro S., trans. The Ancient Future of the Itza: The Book of Chilam Balam of Tizimin. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1982.
- . Heaven Born Merida and Its Destiny, The Book of Chilam Balam of Chumayel. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1986.

- Edwards, David L. John Donne: Man of Flesh and Spirit. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 2002.
- Edwards, Jonathan. A Jonathan Edwards Reader. Edited by Harry S. Stout and Kenneth P. Minkema. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.
- . The Sermons of Jonathan Edwards: A Reader. Edited by Wilson H. Kimnach, Kenneth P. Minkema, and Douglas A. Sweeney. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Eichner, Hans. Friedrich Schlegel. New York: Twayne, 1970.
- Eliot, John. John Eliot's Indian Dialogues. Edited by Henry W. Bowden and James P. Ronda. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1980.
- . The Bay Psalm Book, a facsimile reprint of the first edition of 1640. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1956.
- . The Eliot Tracts. Edited by Michael P. Clark. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2003.
- Eliot, T. S. Elizabethan Dramatists. London: Faber, 1963.
- Empson, William. Some Versions of Pastoral. London: Chatto and Windus, 1935.
- Equiano, Olaudah. The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African. New York: Random House, 2004.
- Erasmus, Desiderius. Adages of Erasmus. Translated by Margaret Mann Phillips. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1964.
- . Erasmus on Women. Edited by Erika Rummel. Ontario: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- . In Praise of Folly. Translated by Clarence Miller. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1979.
- . Selections from Erasmus. IndyPublish.com, 2004.
- . The Praise of Folly and Other Writings. Edited by Robert M. Adams. New York: W.W. Norton, 1989.
- Erdmann, Axel. Lydgate's Siege of Thebes I. London: Boydell and Brewer, 1996.
- Ewan, Joseph. William Bartram: Botanical and Zoological Drawings, 1756–1788. Reproduced from the Fothergill Album in the British Museum (Natural History). Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1958.
- Falco, Maria J., ed. Feminist Interpretations of Niccolò Machiavelli. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.
- Falvo, Joseph D. The Economy of Human Relations: Castiglione's Libro del Cortegiano. New York: Peter Lang, 1992.
- Faulkner, John Alfred. Erasmus: The Scholar. Miami, Fla.: International Law and Taxation, 2003.
- Fein, David A. François Villon Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1997.
- Fellows, Otis. Diderot. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
- Fénelon, François de. Meditations on the Heart of God. Edited by Hal M. Helms. Orleans, Mass.: Paraclete Press, 1997.
- . Telemachus. Edited by Patrick Riley. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Fenollosa, Ernest, and Ezra Pound. 'Noh' or Accomplishment: A Study of the Classical Stage of Japan. Gretna, La.: Pelican Publishing, 1999.
- Fernandez de Lizardi, Jose. The Itching Parrot. Translated by Eugene Pressley and Katherine Anne Porter. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1942.
- . The Mangy Parrot. Translated by David Frye. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 2004.
- Ferreira, António. The Comedy of Bristo, or, The Pimp (Comédia do Fanchono ou de Bristo). Translated by John R. C. Martyn. Ottawa, Canada: Dovehouse Editions, 1990.
- . The Tragedy of Ines de Castra. Translated by John R. C. Martyn. Coimbra, Portugal: Universidade de Coimbra, 1987.
- Ficino, Marsilio. Three Books on Life. Edited by Carol V. Kaske and John R. Clark. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1989.
- Field, P. J. C. The Life and Times of Sir Thomas Malory. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell and Brewer, 1999.
- Finucci, Valeria. Renaissance Transactions: Ariosto and Tasso. Raleigh, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1999.
- Fish, Cheryl J. Black and White Women's Travel Narratives: Antebellum Explorations. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2004.
- Fish, Stanley Eugene. How Milton Works. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- Fisher, John H. John Gower: Moral Philosopher and Friend of Chaucer. New York: New York University Press, 1964.

- Fitzpatrick, Ann. Forgotten Voyager: The Story of Amerigo Vespucci. Minneapolis, Minn.: Lerner Publishing Group, 1991.
- Florescano, Enrique, and Lysa Hochroth, trans. The Myth of Quetzalcoatl. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.
- Flower, Milton E. John Dickinson: Conservative Revolutionary. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1983.
- Flynn, Gerard. Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. New York: Twayne, 1971.
- Foakes, R. A. Hamlet versus Lear: Cultural Politics and Shakespeare's Art. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Foster, David William. Luis de Góngora. New York: Twayne, 1973.
- Fox, John. The Lyric Poetry of Charles d'Orléans. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1969.
- Fox, Robert, ed. Thomas Harriot: An Elizabethan Man of Science. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2000.
- Frame, Donald M. François Rabelais: A Study. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977.
- Francis, R. A. Prévost, Manon Lescaut. London: Grant and Cutler, 1993.
- Franco, Jean. An Introduction to Spanish-American Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Franklin, Benjamin. A Benjamin Franklin Reader. Edited by Walter Isaacson. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2003.
- . Autobiography and Other Writings. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- . Wit and Wisdom from Poor Richard's Almanack. Edited by Steve Martin. Introduction by Dave Barry. New York: Random House, 2000.
- Freneau, Philip Morin. Poems, 1786 and Miscellaneous Works (1778) of Philip Freneau. Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars Facsimiles & Reprints, 1975.
- . The Last Poems of Philip Freneau. Temecula, Calif.: Reprint Services Corporation, 1993.
- Friedlander, Eli. J. J. Rousseau: An Afterlife of Words. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2004.
- Froissart, Jean. Chronicles. Translated by John Joliffe. New York: Penguin Books, 2001.
- . Jean Froissart: An Anthology of Narrative and Lyric Poetry. Edited by K. M. Figg and R. B. Palmer. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Frye, Prosser H. Romance and Tragedy. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1980.
- Fubini, Riccardo. Humanism and Secularization: From Petrarch to Valla. Translated by Martha King. Raleigh, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2003.
- Fumaroli, Marc, and Jean Marie Todd, trans. The Poet and the King: Jean de la Fontaine and His Century. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 2002.
- Galilei, Galileo. Achievements of Galileo. Edited and translated by James D. Brophy and Henry Paolucci. Toronto: Griffon House, 2003.
- . Dialogue Concerning the Two Chief Systems of the World. Translated by Stillman Drake. New York: Modern Library, 2001.
- . Discoveries and Opinions of Galileo. Translated by Drake Stillman. New York: Doubleday, 1989.
- Gallyon, Margaret. Margery Kempe of Lynne and Medieval England. Norwich: Canterbury Press, 1995.
- Galoppe, Raul. Tirso de Molina: His Originality Then and Now. Edited by Henry Sullivan. Toronto: Dovehouse Editions, 1996.
- Gama, José Basilio da. The Uruguay: A Historical Romance of South America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- Ganss, George E. Ignatius of Loyola: Spiritual Exercises and Selected Works. Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist Press, 1991.
- Gascoine, John. Science in the Service of Empire: Joseph Banks, the British State, and the Uses of Science in the Age of Revolution. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Gates, Henry Louis. The Trials of Phillis Wheatley: America's First Black Poet and Encounters with the Founding Fathers. New York: Basic Books, 2003.
- Gatta, John. Gracious Laughter: The Meditative Wit of Edward Taylor. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1989.
- Gatti, Hilary. The Renaissance Drama of Knowledge: Giordano Bruno in England. New York: Routledge, 1989.

- Gaukroger, Stephen. Francis Bacon and the Transformation of Early-Modern Philosophy. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Gaustad, Edwin S. Roger Williams: Prophet of Liberty. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Gay, Peter. The Enlightenment: The Science of Freedom. New York: W.W. Norton, 1996.
- Genesis: Captain John Smith and the Founding of Virginia. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
- George, Monteiro. The Presence of Camões: Influences on the Literature of England, America and Southern Africa. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press: 1996.
- Gerould, Gordon Hall. The Ballad of Tradition. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1932.
- Gerstle, Andrew C. "Heroic Honor: Chikamatsu and the Samurai Ideal," Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies (December 1977): 307–382.
- . Circles of Fantasy: Convention in the Plays of Chikamatsu. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1986.
- Gerstle, Andrew C., Kiyoshi Inobe, and William Malm. Theater as Music: The Bunraku Play "Mt. Imo and Mt. Se." Ann Arbor: University of Michigan, 1990.
- Gillmor, Frances. Flute of the Smoking Mirror: A Portrait of Nezahualcoyotl, Poet-King of the Aztecs. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1983.
- Gilman, Donald, ed. Everyman and Company. New York: AMS Press, 1989.
- Gilroy, Amanda, ed. Romantic Geographies: Discourses of Travel, 1775–1844. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Gingerich, Owen. The Book Nobody Read: Chasing the Revolutions of Nicolaus Copernicus. New York: Walker, 2004.
- Godman, Peter. From Poliziano to Machiavelli. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1998.
- Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von. Erotic Poems. Edited by Hans R. Vaget and translated by David Luke. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- . Faust. Edited by Cyrus Hamlin and translated by Walter W. Arndt. New York: W.W. Norton, 2000.
- . Italian Journey. Translated by Elizabeth Mayer. New York: Penguin, 1992.
- . The Sorrows of Young Werther and Selected Writings. Translated by Catherine Hutter. New York: New American Library, 1987.
- . The Works of Johann Wolfgang Von Goethe, vol. 1. IndyPublish.com, 2004.
- Goldoni, Carlo. Carlo Goldoni's Villeggiatura Trilogy. Translated by Robert Cornthwaite. Lyme, N.H.: Smith and Kraus, 1995.
- . The Comedies of Carlo Goldoni. Westport, Conn.: Hyperion Press, 1978.
- . The Servant of Two Masters. Adapted by Dorothy Louise. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2003.
- Gollub, Matthew. Cool Melons—Turn to Frogs! The Life and Poems of Issa. New York: Lee and Low Books, 1998.
- Góngora y Argote, Luis de. Las Soledades. Translated by Philip Polack. London: Bristol Classical Press, 1997.
- . Selected Shorter Poems. London: Anvil Press Poetry, 1995.
- . The Fable of Polythemus and Galatea. Translated by Miroslav John Hanak. New York: Peter Lang, 1988.
- . The Sonnets of Luis de Gongora. Translated by R. P. Calcrafft. Durham: University of North Carolina Press, 1980.
- Goodkin, Richard E. Birth Marks: The Tragedy of Primogeniture in Pierre Corneille, Thomas Corneille, and Jean Racine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000.
- Goodman, Edward J. The Explorers of South America. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.
- Gordon, Helen Heightsman. Voice of the Vanquished: The Story of the Slave Marina and Hernan Cortes. New York: New York University Editions, 1995.
- Gossen, Gary H. Telling Maya Tales. New York: Routledge, 1999.
- Graffigny, Madame Françoise de. Letters from a Peruvian Woman. Translated by David Kornacker. New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1993.
- Grafton, Anthony. Leon Battista Alberti: Master Builder of the Italian Renaissance. New York: Hill and Wang, 2000.
- Grauer, Ben. How Bernal Díaz's "True History" Was Reborn. New York: B. Grauer, 1955.

- Greenblatt, Miriam. Lorenzo de' Medici and Renaissance Italy. Tarrytown, N.Y.: Marshall Cavendish, 2002.
- Greenblatt, Stephen. Hamlet in Purgatory. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2001.
- . Renaissance Self-Fashioning: From More to Shakespeare. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.
- Greene, E. J. H. Marivaux. Toronto: Toronto University Press, 1965.
- Greer, Allan, ed. The Jesuit Relations: Natives and Missionaries in Seventeenth-Century North America. Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's, 2000.
- Grendel, Frederic. Beaumarchais: The Man Who Was Figaro. New York: HarperCollins, 1977.
- Grendler, Paul, et al., eds. Renaissance Encyclopedia for Students. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 2003.
- Griffin, Nigel, trans. Short Account of the Destruction of the Indies. New York: Penguin, 1999.
- Griffin, Robert. Ludovico Ariosto. New York: Twayne, 1974.
- Griffiths, C. E. J., and R. Hastings, eds. The Cultural Heritage of the Italian Renaissance. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993.
- Grosholz, Emily. Cartesian Method and the Problem of Reduction. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Gudzy, N. K. "Archpriest Avvakum and His Works," in History of Early Russian Literature. Translated by Susan Wilbur Jones. New York: Octagon Books, 1970; 378–396.
- Guicciardini, Francesco. Sweetness of Power: Machiavelli's Discourses and Guicciardini's Considerations. Translated by James B. Atkinson and David Sices. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 2002.
- . The History of Italy. Edited by Sidney Alexander. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Gullan-Whur, Margaret. Within Reason: A Life of Spinoza. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- Gustafson, Thomas. Representative Words: Politics, Literature, and the American Language, 1776–1865. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Gwara, Joseph, and E. Michael Gerli. Studies on the Spanish Sentimental Romance (1440–1550). London: Tamesis Books, 1997.
- Haac, Oscar A. Marivaux. New York: Twayne, 1973.
- Háfiz. Drunk on the Wine of the Beloved: Poems of Hafiz. Translated by Thomas Rain Crowe. Halifax, Nova Scotia: Shambhala, 2001.
- . Gift: The Poems by Hafiz, the Great Sufi Master. Translated by Daniel Ladinsky. New York: Penguin, 1999.
- . Hafiz of Shiraz: Thirty Poems. Translated by John Heath-Stubbs. Kincardine, Scotland: Handzel Books, 2003.
- . New Nightingale, New Rose. Translated by Richard le Gallienne. Oregon House, Calif.: Bardic Press, 2003.
- Haig, Stirling. Madame de Lafayette. New York: Twayne, 1970.
- Hainsworth, Peter. Petrarch the Poet. New York: Routledge, 1988.
- Hale, Edward Everett. Life of Christopher Columbus from His Own Letters and Journals. IndyPublish.com, 2002.
- Halford, Aubrey S. The Kabuki Handbook. Rutland, Vt.: C.E. Tuttle, 1956.
- Halliday, F. E. Chaucer and His World. London: House of Stratus, 2001.
- Hamburger, Henri. The Function of the Predicate in the Fables of Krylov. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1981.
- Hammon, Jupiter. America's First Negro Poet: The Complete Works. Edited by Stanley Austin Ransom. New York: Associated Faculty Press, 1983.
- Hammond, Jeffrey A. Edward Taylor: Fifty Years of Scholarship and Criticism. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell and Brewer, 1993.
- Hanke, Lewis. All Mankind Is One: A Study. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1994.
- Hankins, Thomas L. Jean d'Alembert: Science and the Enlightenment. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1970.
- Hanning, Robert W. Castiglione: The Ideal and the Real in Renaissance Culture. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1983.
- Happe, Peter. Four Morality Plays. New York: Viking Press, 1988.

- Hariot, Thomas. A Briefe and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia. Edited by Paul Hulton. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 1972.
- . The Greate Invention of Algebra: Thomas Hariot's Treatise on Equations. Edited by Jacqueline Stedall. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Harrison, Keith, trans. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Harrison, Robert L. Gallic Salt: Eighteen Fabliaux Translated from the Old French. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974.
- Hart, Pierre R. G. R. Derzhavin: A Poet's Progress. Columbus, Ohio: Slavica Publishers, 1979.
- Hartel, Anne. Michel de Montaigne: Accidental Philosopher. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Hartley, David. Patriotism in the Work of Joachim du Bellay: Study of the Relationship between the Poet and France. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993.
- Hartpole-Lecky, William E. History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2001.
- Harty, Kevin J. Chester Mystery Cycle: A Casebook. London: Taylor and Francis, 1992.
- Hawcroft, Michael. Word as Action: Racine, Rhetoric, and Theatrical Language. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Headley, John. Tommaso Campanella and the Transformation of the World. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Heck, Thomas F. Commedia Dell' Arte: A Guide to the Primary and Secondary Literature. Lincoln, Neb.: iUniverse, Inc., 2000.
- Heine, Stephen. "Tragedy and Salvation in the Floating World: Chikamatsu's Double Suicide Drama as Millenarian Discourse," Journal of Asian Studies (May 1944): 367–394.
- Helvetius, Claude-Adrien. Claude-Adrien Helvetius: Philosophical Works. Bristol, England: Thoemmes Press, 2000.
- Henderson, T. F. Scottish Vernacular Literature: A Succinct History. Edinburgh, Scotland: Scotpress, 1988.
- Henryson, Robert. Selected Poems of Robert Henryson and William Dunbar. Edited by Douglas Gray. New York: Penguin, 1998.
- Herder, Johann Gottfried. Philosophical Writings. Edited and translated by Michael N. Forster. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Herrera, Robert A. Silent Music: The Life, Work, and Thought of St. John of the Cross. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 2004.
- Hesse, Everett Wesley. Calderón de la Barca. New York: Twayne, 1967.
- Hewett-Smith, Kathleen M. William Langland's Piers Plowman: A Book of Essays. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Hilliard, Kevin. Philosophy, Letters, and the Fine Arts in Klopstock's Thought. London: Institute of Germanic Studies, 1987.
- Hodgson, Richard G. Falsehood Disguised: Unmasking the Truth in La Rochefoucauld. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1995.
- Hoffmann, George. Montaigne's Career. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Holbach, Paul Henri Thiery. System of Nature, vol. 1. Translated by H. D. Robinson and edited by Denis Diderot. Manchester, England: Clinamen Press, 2000.
- Hollander, John, ed. Sonnets: From Dante to the Present. New York: Knopf, 2001.
- Hollander, Robert. Boccaccio's Dante and the Shaping Force of Satire. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1997.
- Holme, Timothy. A Servant of Many Masters: The Life and Times of Carlo Goldoni. London: Jupiter Books, 1976.
- Homer. The Odyssey. Translated by Rodney Merrill. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2002.
- Honan, Park. Shakespeare: A Life. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Honour, Hugh. Neo-Classicism. New York: Penguin Books, 1996.
- Hook, Judith. Lorenzo de' Medici: A Historical Biography. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1984.
- Hoornaert, R. Saint Teresa in Writings. London: Trend and Co., 1931.

- Horowitz, Louise K. Love and Language: A Study of the Classical French Moralists Writers. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1977.
- Hsia, C. T. "Love and Compassion in 'Dream of the Red Chamber,'" Criticism 5 (Summer 1963): 261–271.
- Hugo, Victor. Oration on Voltaire. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2003.
- Huizinga, Johan. Erasmus and the Age of Reformation. London: Phoenix Press, 2002.
- Hume, David. Essays: Moral, Political, and Literary. Edited by Eugene F. Miller. Indianapolis, Ind.: Liberty Fund, 1991.
- Hus, Jan. The Church. Translated by David S. Schaff. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1974.
- . The Letters of Jan Hus. Translated by Matthew Spinka. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 1972.
- Ibn Khaldūn, Abu Zayd 'Abd al-Rahman ibn Muhammad. An Arab Philosophy of History: Selections from the Prolegomena of Ibn Khaldun of Tunis (1332–1406). Translated by Charles Philip Issawi. Princeton, N.J.: Darwin Press, 1987.
- . The Muqaddimah: An Introduction to History. Translated by Franz Rosenthal. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1969.
- Idigoras, J. Ignacio Tellechea. Ignatius of Loyola: The Pilgrim Saint. Translated by Cornelius Michael Buckley. Chicago: Loyola Press, 1994.
- Irwin, David. Neoclassicism. Boston: Phaidon Press, 1997.
- Irwin, Robert. Night and Horses and the Desert: An Anthology of Classical Arabic Literature. New York, Anchor Books, 1999.
- Jacob, Margaret C. Living the Enlightenment: Freemasonry and Politics in Eighteenth-Century Europe. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Jamieson, Ruth. Marivaux, A Study in Sensibility. New York: King's Crown Press, 1941.
- Janaway, Christopher. Schopenhauer: A Very Short Introduction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Jardine, Lisa, and Alan Stewart. Hostage to Fortune: The Troubled Life of Francis Bacon, 1561–1626. New York: Hill and Wang, 1999.
- Jefferson, Thomas. Light and Liberty: Reflections on the Pursuit of Happiness. Edited by Eric Petersen. New York: Random House, 2004.
- . State of the Union Addresses of Thomas Jefferson. IndyPublish.com, 2004.
- . The Life and Selected Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Edited by Adrienne Koch and William Peden. New York: Random House, 2004.
- Jensen, Katharine Ann. Writing Love: Letters, Women, and the Novel in France, 1605–1776. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1995.
- Jippensha Ikku. Shank's Mare or Hizakurige: Japan's Great Comic Novel. Translated by Thomas Satchell. Rutland, Vt.: Charles E. Tuttle, 1990.
- John of the Cross, Saint. The Collected Works of Saint John of the Cross. Translated by Kieran Kavanaugh and Otilio Rodriguez. Washington, D.C.: ICS Publications, 1991.
- . The Poems of Saint John of the Cross. Translated by Roy Campbell. London: Harvill Press, 2000.
- Johnston, William. The Mysticism of the Cloud of Unknowing. New York: Fordham University Press, 2000.
- Jones, K. R. W. Pierre de Ronsard. New York: Twayne, 1970.
- Jonson, Ben. The Alchemist and Other Plays. Edited by Gordon Campbell. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- . The Complete Poems. Edited by George Parfitt. New York: Penguin, 1988.
- . Volpone. Edited by Robert Watson. New York: W.W. Norton, 2003.
- Jordan, Constance. Pulci's Morgante: Poetry and History in Fifteenth Century Florence. Washington, D.C.: Folger Books, 1986.
- Julian of Norwich. A Lesson of Love: The Revelations of Julian of Norwich, unabridged. Lincoln, Neb.: iUniverse, 2003.
- . The Revelations of Divine Love of Julian of Norwich. Translated by James Walsh. St. Meinrad, Ind.: Abbey Press, 1961.
- Kant, Immanuel. A Critique of Judgment. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2004.

- . A Critique of Pure Reason. Edited and translated by Paul Guyer and Allen Wood. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- . Groundwork for the Metaphysics of Morals. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002.
- . Kant—Metaphysical Foundations of Natural Science. Edited by Michael Friedman. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- . Observations on the Feeling of the Beautiful and Sublime. Translated by John T. Goldthwait. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.
- . On Education. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2003.
- Kaye, Harvey J. Thomas Paine: Firebrand of the Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Keane, John. Tom Paine: A Political Life. New York: Grove/Atlantic, 2003.
- Keating, Clark L. Joachim du Bellay. New York: Twayne, 1971.
- Keenan, Hugh T., ed. Typology and Medieval English Literature. New York: AMS Press, 1992.
- Keene, Donald. Seeds in the Heart: Japanese Literature from Earliest Times to the Late Sixteenth Century. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.
- Keene, Donald, trans. Major Plays of Chikamatsu. New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.
- Keller, Hans-Erich. Romance Epic. Kalamazoo: Western Michigan University, 1987.
- Kellogg, Frederick. A History of Romanian Historical Writing. Bakersfield, Calif.: Charles Schlacks, 1990.
- Kelly, Ann Cline. Jonathan Swift and Popular Culture: Myth, Media, and the Man. New York: Palgrave, 2002.
- Kempe, Margery. The Book of Margery Kempe. Edited and translated by Lynn Staley. New York: W.W. Norton, 2001.
- Kempis, Thomas à. The Imitation of Christ in Four Books: A Translation from the Latin. Translated by Joseph N. Tylenda. New York: Vintage Books, 1998.
- Kenny, Anthony, ed. Wyclif in His Times. New York: Clarendon Press, 1986.
- Kent, F. W. Lorenzo de' Medici and the Art of Magnificence. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2004.
- Kenton, Edna, ed. The Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents: Travels and Explorations of the Jesuit Missionaries in North America (1610–1791). Introduction by Reuben Gold Thwaites. Toronto: McLelland & Stewart, 1998.
- Khatib, Lisan al-Din Ibn al-. The Jaysh al-tawshih of Lisan al-Din Ibn al-Khatib. Edited by Alan Jones. Cambridge, England: Trustees of the “E.J.W. Gibb Memorial,” 1997.
- Kindrick, Robert L. Robert Henryson. Boston: Twayne, 1979.
- Kinney, Arthur F. John Skelton, Priest as Poet: Seasons of Discovery. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.
- Kirkham, Victoria. Fabulous Vernacular: Boccaccio's Filocolo and the Art of Medieval Fiction. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2001.
- Kitto, H. D. F. Greek Tragedy: A Literary Study. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Kleist, Heinrich von. Heinrich von Kleist: Three Major Plays. Translated by Carl R. Mueller. Lyme, N.H.: Smith and Kraus, 2001.
- . The Marquise of O—and Other Stories. Translated by Martin Greenberg. New York: Ungar, 1973.
- Knapp, Bettina L. Jean Racine: Mythos and Renewal in Modern Theater. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1971.
- Knapp, Bettina Liebowitz. Voltaire Revisited. New York: Macmillan Library Reference, 2000.
- Knapp, Jeffrey. Shakespeare's Tribe: Church, Nation, and Theater in Renaissance England. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.
- Kneib, Martha. Christopher Columbus: Master Italian Navigator in the Court of Spain. New York: Rosen, 2003.
- Knight, Sarah, trans. Momus. Edited by Virginia Brown. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Knight, Sarah Kemble. The Journal of Madame Knight. Boston: D.R. Godine, 1972.
- Knoerle, Jeanne. The Dream of the Red Chamber: A Critical Study. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1972.
- Knox, Edward C. Jean de la Bruyère. New York: Twayne, 1974.

- Knutson, Harold C. The Triumph of Wit: Moliere and Restoration Comedy. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1968.
- Kobayashi Issa. Spring of My Life. Translated by Sam Hamill. Boston: Shambhala, 1997.
- . The Year of My Life. Translated by Nobuyuki Yuasa. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972.
- Kochanowski, Jan. Poems of Jan Kochanowski. Edited by George R. Noyes, et al. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1928.
- . Treny: The Laments of Kochanowski. Translated by Adam Czeriawski and edited by Piotr Wilczek. Oxford: Legenda, 2001.
- Koepke, Wulf. Johann Gottfried Herder: Language, History and the Enlightenment. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1990.
- Kohl, Karin M. Rhetoric, the Bible, and the Origins of Free Verse: The Early Hymns of Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock. New York: W. de Gruyter, 1990.
- Kolb, Robert. Martin Luther as Prophet, Teacher, and Hero: Images of the Reformer, 1520–1620. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Baker Books, 1999.
- Kolve, V. A. The Play Called Corpus Christi. Palo Alto, Calif: Stanford University Press, 1966.
- Koppisch, Michael S. Rivalry and the Disruption of Order in Moliere's Theater. Cranbury, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2004.
- Kownacki, Mary Lou. Between Two Should: Conversations with Ryokan. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 2004.
- Kraul, Edward Garcia, and Judith Beatty. The Weeping Woman: Encounters with La Llorona. Santa Fe, N.M.: Word Process, 1988.
- Kristeller, Paul Oskar. Renaissance Thought and Its Sources. Edited by Michael Mooney. New York: Columbia University Press, 1979.
- Krylov, Ivan. Fifteen Fables of Krylov. Translated by Guy Daniels. New York: Macmillan, 1965.
- . Krylov's Fables. Westport, Conn.: Hyperion Press, 1977.
- . Russian Satiric Comedy: Six Plays. Edited and translated by Laurence Senelick. New York: Performing Arts Journal Publications, 1983.
- Kuehn, Manfred. Kant: A Biography. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Kuhn, Thomas S. The Copernican Revolution: Planetary Astronomy in the Development of Western Thought. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1957.
- Kumar, Krishna. Utopianism. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991.
- Kuriyama, Constance Brown. Christopher Marlowe: A Renaissance Life. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Kynell, Kurt von S. Mind of Leibniz: A Study in Genius. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.
- Labé, Louise. Louise Labé: Sonnets. Translated by Graham D. Martin. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1972.
- . Louise Labe's Complete Works. Edited and translated by Edith R. Farrell. Troy, N.Y.: Whitson Publishing, 1986.
- Laclous, Pierre Choderlos de. Les Liaisons Dangereuses. Translated by Douglas Parmée. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Lacy, Norris J. Reading Fabliaux. Birmingham, Ala.: Summa Publications, 1999.
- Lafayette, Madame de. Madame de Lafayette: The Princesse de Clèves. Translated by Terence Cave. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- . The Secret History of Henrietta, Princess of England. Translated by J. M. Shelmerdine. New York: Howard Fertig, 1993.
- La Fontaine, Jean de. Complete Tales in Verse. Translated by Guido Waldman. London: Routledge: 2001.
- . La Fontaine: Selected Fables. Translated by James Michie. New York: Viking Press, 1979.
- Lang, David Marshall. The First Russian Radical: Alexander Radishchev, 1749–1802. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1977.
- Lange, Lynda, ed. Feminist Interpretations of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Preface by Nancy Tuana. University Park: Pennsylvania University Press, 2002.
- Lange, Victor. The Classical Age of German Literature, 1740–1815. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1982.
- Langland, William. Piers Plowman. Edited and translated by A. V. C. Schmidt. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

- Lansperger, Johannes. Epistle in the Person of Christ to the Faithfull Soule, Written First by . . . Lanspergivs, and after Translated into English by One of No Small Fame. Microfilm. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1955.
- La Rochefoucauld, François, duc de. Moral Maxims. Edited by Irwin Primer. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2002.
- . The Maxims of La Rouchefoucauld. Translated by Louis Kronenberger. New York: Random House, 1959.
- Larungu, Rute. Myths and Legends from Ghana for African-American Cultures. Akron, Ohio: Telcraft Books, 1992.
- Le Courreys, Blecki, and Karin A. Wulf, eds. Milcah Martha Moore's Book: A Commonplace Book from Revolutionary America. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.
- Lee, Meredith. Displacing Authority: Goethe's Poetic Reception of Klopstock. Heidelberg, Germany: Universitätsverlag C. Winter, 1999.
- Lefevre, Wolfgang. Between Leibniz, Newton, and Kant: Philosophy and Science in the Eighteenth Century. Hingham, Mass.: Kluwer Academic Publishers, 2001.
- Leitch, Alexander, ed. Companion. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- Leitch, Vincent B., ed. The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism. New York: W.W. Norton, 2001.
- Leiter, Samuel L., ed. The Kabuki Reader: History and Performance. Armonk, N.Y.: M.E. Sharpe, 2002.
- Lemaitre, Jules. Jean Racine. Murrieta, Calif.: Classic Books, 2001.
- Leonardo da Vinci. Leonardo on Art and the Artist. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2002.
- . The Notebooks of Leonardo da Vinci. Indianapolis: Publish.com, 2003.
- . The Wisdom of Leonardo da Vinci. Translated by Wade Baskins. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2004.
- Leon-Portilla, Miguel, and Earl Shorris, et al. In the Language of Kings: An Anthology of Mesoamerican Literature—Pre-Columbian to the Present. New York: W.W. Norton, 2001.
- Leon-Portilla, Miguel. Aztec Thought and Culture: A Study of the Ancient Nahuatl Mind. Translated by Jack Emory Davis. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1990.
- . Fifteen Poets of the Aztec World. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.
- Leschemelle, Pierre. Montaigne: The Fool of the Farce. Translated by William J. Beck. New York: Peter Lang, 1995.
- Lesker, G. A. Three Late Medieval Morality Plays. New York: W.W. Norton, 1984.
- Lessing, Gotthold. Laocoon: An Essay on the Limits of Painting and Poetry. Translated by Edward A. McCormick. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990.
- . Lessing's Theological Writings: Selections in Translation. Translated by Henry Chadwick. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1994.
- . Nathan the Wise, Minna von Barnhelm, and Other Plays and Writings. Edited by Peter Demetz. New York: Continuum, 1991.
- Lestringant, Frank. "The Philosopher's Breviary: Jean de Léry in the Enlightenment," in New World Encounters. Edited by Stephen Greenblatt. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Lever, Maurice. Sade: A Biography. Translated by Arthur Goldhammer. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1993.
- Levi, Anthony. Richelieu and the Making of France. New York: Carroll and Graf, 2000.
- Lewalski, Barbara. The Life of John Milton: A Critical Biography. Oxford: Blackwell, 2002.
- Lewis, C. S. The Allegory of Love: A Study in Medieval Tradition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Lewis, Geoffrey L., trans. The Book of the Dede Korkut. New York: Penguin, 1998.
- Lewis, Matthew Gregory. The Monk: A Romance. Edited by Christopher Maclachlan. New York: Penguin, 1999.
- Lincoln, Victoria. Teresa: A Woman, A Biography of Teresa of Avila. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1984.
- Lincoln, W. Bruce. Sunlight at Midnight: St. Petersburg and the Rise of Modern Russia. New York: Basic Books, 2002.
- Little, Katharine Day. François de Fenelon: Study of a Personality. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1951.

- Liu Ts'un-jen. Wu Ch'eng-en, His Life and Career. Leiden: Brill, 1967.
- Lodge, David. The Modes of Modern Writing: Metaphor, Metonymy, and the Typology of Modern Literature. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1977.
- Loewenstein, Joseph. Ben Jonson and Possessive Authorship. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Lohse, Bernhard. Martin Luther: An Introduction to His Life and Work. Translated by Robert Schultz. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1986.
- . Martin Luther's Theology: Its Historical and Systematic Development. Translated by Roy A. Harrisville. Minneapolis, Minn.: Augsburg Fortress, 1999.
- Loloi, Parvin. Hafiz, Master of Persian Poetry: A Critical Bibliography. London: I.B. Tauris, 2004.
- Lomonosov, Mikhail. Mikhail Vasil'evich Lomonosov on the Corpuscular Theory. Translated by Henry M. Leicester. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1970.
- Lope de Vega Carpio. Desire's Experience Transformed: A Representative Anthology of Lope de Vega's Lyric Poetry. Translated by Carl W. Cobb. Rock Hill, S.C.: Spanish Literature Publications, 1991.
- . La Dorotea. Translated by Edwin Honig and Alan S. Trueblood. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- . Lady Nitwit/La Dama Boda. Translated by William I. Oliver. Melbourne: Bilingual Press, 1997.
- . Love's Dialectic: Mimesis and Allegory in the Romances of Lope de Vega. University, Miss.: Romance Monographs, 2000.
- . Madness in Valencia and Peribanez. Translated by David Johnston. Bath, England: Absolute Classics, 1995.
- . The Best Boy in Spain. Translated by David M. Gitlitz. Melbourne: Bilingual Press, 1999.
- . Three Major Plays: Fente Ovejuna, The Knight from Olmedo, Punishment without Revenge. Translated by Gwynne Edwards. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- López de Gómara, Francisco. Conquest of the West India. Delmas, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1940.
- . Cortés: The Life of the Conqueror of Mexico by His Secretary, Francisco López de Gómara. Edited by Lesley B. Simpson. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977.
- Lough, John. Essays on the Encyclopedie of Diderot and D'Alembert. London: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Ludwin, Dawn M. Blaise Pascal's Quest for the Ineffable. New York: Peter Lang, 2001.
- Lumiansky, R. M., and D. Mills, eds. The Chester Mystery Cycle, vol. 1. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell and Brewer, 1974.
- Lund, Roger, ed. Critical Essays on Daniel Defoe. New York: G.K. Hall, 1997.
- Lupton, Julia Reinhard. Afterlives of the Saints: Hagiography, Typology, and Renaissance Literature. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1996.
- Luther, Martin. Bondage of the Will. Greenville, S.C.: Emerald House Group, 2004.
- . Luther: Letters of Spiritual Counsel. Library of Christian Classics Series, vol. 18. Edited by Theodore G. Tappert. Vancouver: Regent College Publishing, 2003.
- . Works, 56 vols. Edited by Jaroslav Jan Pelikan, et al. St. Louis: Concordia Publishing House, 1955–86.
- Lutz, Nora Jean. Cotton Mather: Author, Clergyman and Scholar. Minneapolis, Minn.: Sagebrush Education Resources, 2000.
- Lyons, John D., and Mary B. McKinley, eds. Critical Tales: New Studies of the Heptameron and Early Modern Culture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993.
- Maag, Karin. Melanchthon in Europe. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Baker Books, 1999.
- Machiavelli, Niccolò. The Prince. Translated by Luigi Ricci. New York: Penguin Group, 1980.
- . Art of War. Edited by Christopher Lynch. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- . Discourses on Livy. Translated by Julia C. Bondanella and Peter Bondanella. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

- . Florentine History. Translated by W. K. Marriott. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2004.
- Madariaga, Isabel de. Catherine the Great: A Short History. New Haven, Conn. and London: Yale University Press, 2002.
- Maddox, Donald, and Sara Sturm-Maddox. Froissart across the Genres. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1998.
- Mahony, Robert. Jonathan Swift: The Irish Identity. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.
- . Maiden Voyages and Infant Colonies: Two Women's Travel Narratives of the 1790s. Herndon, Va.: Casell Academic, 1999.
- Makemson, Maud Worcester, trans. The Book of the Jaguar Priest: A Translation of the Book of Chilam Balam of Tizimin. New York: Henry Schuman, 1951.
- Makoto Ueda, trans. Dew on the Grass: The Life and Poetry of Kobayashi Issa. The Netherlands: Brill Academic Publishers, 2004.
- Makoto Ueda. Basho and His Interpreters. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1995.
- . Matsuo Bashō. New York: Kodansha International, 1983.
- Malory, Thomas. Le Morte D'Arthur: Complete, Unabridged, Illustrated Edition. Edited by John Matthews. London: Cassell, 2003.
- . Le Morte D'Arthur: The Winchester Manuscript. Edited by Helen Cooper. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Manchester, William. A World Lit Only by Fire. Boston: Back Bay Books, 1993.
- March, Ausiàs. Ausiàs March: A Key Anthology. Edited by Robert Archer. Oxford: Anglo-Catalan Society Occasional Publications, 1992.
- . Ausiàs March: Selected Poems. Edited by Arthur Terry. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1976.
- Mariscal, George. Contradictory Subjects: Quevedo, Cervantes, and Seventeenth Century Spanish Culture. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991.
- Marivaux, Pierre Carlet de Chamblain de. Le Paysan Parvenu: or, The Fortunate Peasant. New York: Garland, 1979.
- . Pharsamond. New York: Garland, 1974.
- . Plays. London: Methuen, 1988.
- . Seven Comedies by Marivaux. Edited by Oscar Mandel and translated by Oscar and Adrienne S. Mandel. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1968.
- Marlowe, Christopher. Complete Plays and Poems. Rutland, Vt.: Charles E. Tuttle, 2002.
- . Ovid's Elegies and Lucan's First Book, in Christopher Marlowe: The Complete Poems and Translations. Edited by Stephen Orgel. Middlesex, England: Penguin, 1971.
- Marlowe, Stephen. The Death and Life of Miguel de Cervantes. New York: Arcade Books, 1997.
- Marot, Clément. Le Ton Beau de Marot: In Praise of the Music of Language. Edited by Douglas R. Hofstadter. New York: Basic Books, 1997.
- Martin, Peter. A Life of James Boswell. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2000.
- Martin, Wendy. An American Triptych: Anne Bradstreet, Emily Dickinson, Adrienne Rich. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Martin, Wendy, ed. Colonial American Travel Narratives. New York: Penguin, 1994.
- Maruli, Marko. Judita. English and Croatian. Edited and translated by Henry R. Cooper, Jr. New York: Columbia University Press, 1991.
- Mather, Cotton. Selections from Cotton Mather. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1926.
- . A Family Well-Ordered. Edited by Don Kistler. Morgan, Pa.: Soli Deo Gloria Ministries, 2001.
- . The Christian Philosopher. Edited by Winton U. Solberg. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 2000.
- Mather, Increase. An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences. Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1977.
- . Relation of the Troubles Which Have Happened in New England by Reason of the Indians There. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.
- . Remarkable Providences. Introduction by George Offor. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.

- Matsuo Bashō. A Haiku Journey: Bashō's "Narrow Road to a Far Province." Translated by Dorothy Britton. New York: Kodansha America, 2002.
- . Narrow Road to the Interior, and Other Writings. Translated by Sam Humill. Boston: Shambhala Publications, 2000.
- . The Complete Basho Poems. Edited by Keith Harrison. Northfield, Minn.: Black Willow Press, 2002.
- . The Narrow Road to Oku. Translated by Donald Keene. New York: Kodansha America, 1997.
- Maus, Katharine, ed. Four Revenge Tragedies. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- McAvoy, Liz Herbert. Authority and the Female Body in the Writings of Julian of Norwich and Margery Kempe. London: Boydell and Brewer, 2004.
- McCaskie, T. C. State and Society in Pre-Colonial Asante. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- McCaw, R. John. The Transforming Text: A Study of Luis de Gongora's Soledades. Potomac, Md.: Scripta Humanistica, 2000.
- McConnell, Alan. A Russian Philosopher: Alexander Radishchev, 1749–1802. Westport, Conn.: Hyperion Press, 1981.
- McEntire, Sandra J., ed. Margery Kempe: A Book of Essays. New York: Garland, 1992.
- McKendrick, Melveena. Playing the King: Lope de Vega and the Limits of Conformity. Suffolk, U.K.: Tamesis Books, 2002.
- McLeese, Don. Thomas Paine. Vero Beach, Fla.: Rourke, 2004.
- McLeod, Enid. Charles of Orleans: Prince and Poet. New York: Viking Press, 1970.
- McNerney, Kathleen. The Influence of Ausiàs March on Early Golden Age Castilian Poetry. Amsterdam: Rodopi B.V., 1982.
- McWilliam, G. H., trans. The Decameron. New York: Penguin, 2003.
- Medici, Lorenzo de'. Lorenzo de' Medici: Selected Poems and Prose. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992.
- . Political Philosophy of the Great de' Medici as Revealed by Their Correspondence. Edited by Cosimo Giovanni. Albuquerque, N.M.: Institute for Economic and Political World Strategic Studies, 1985.
- Medwick, Cathleen. Teresa of Avila: The Progress of a Soul. New York: Knopf, 2000.
- Mee, Charles L. Erasmus: The Eye of the Hurricane. New York: Coward, McCann and Geoghegan, 1973.
- Melanchthon, Phillip. Annotations on the First Epistle to the Corinthians. Edited and translated by John Patrick Donnelly. Milwaukee, Wis.: Marquette University Press, 1995.
- . Commentary on Romans by Philip Melanchthon. Translated by Fred Kramer. St. Louis: Concordia Publishing House, 1992.
- Melnick, Arthur. Themes in Kant's Metaphysics and Ethics. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 2004.
- Menard, Valerie. Alvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca. Hockessin, Del.: Mitchell Lane Publishers, 2002.
- Menshutkin, Boris N. Russia's Lomonosov: Chemist, Courtier, Physicist, Poet. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1952.
- Merchant, Paul. The Epic. London: Methuen, 1971.
- Merwin, W. S. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2002.
- Metastasio, Pietro. Temistocle: Opera Seria in Three Acts. Edited by Ernest Warburton. New York: Garland, 1988.
- . Three Melodramas. Translated by Joseph G. Fucilla. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1981.
- Meyer, Michael C., and William H. Beezley, eds. The Oxford History of Mexico. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Michelangelo Buonarroti. The Complete Poems and Selected Letters of Michelangelo. Translated by Creighton E. Gilbert and edited by Robert N. Linscott. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1990.
- . The Drawings of Michelangelo. Introduction by Irving Stone. Master Draughtsman Series. Los Angeles: Borden Publishing, 1999.
- . The Poetry of Michelangelo: An Annotated Translation. Translated by James M. Saslow. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1993.

- Michels, Georg. At War with the Church: Religious Dissent in Seventeenth-Century Russia. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1999.
- Mickel, Leslie. Ben Jonson's Antimasques: A History of Growth and Decline. Brookfield, Vt.: Ashgate, 1999.
- Miller, Perry. Errand into the Wilderness. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1956.
- . Jonathan Edwards. New York: Meridian Books, 1959.
- Mills, David. Recycling the Cycle: The City of Chester and Its Whitsun Plays, vol. 4. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1998.
- Milton, John. Areopagitica and Other Prose Works. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2004.
- . The Poetical Works of John Milton. IndyPublish.com, 2003.
- . The Riverside Milton. Edited by Roy Flannagan. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1998.
- Miner, Earl, ed. Literary Uses of Typology: From the Late Middle Ages to the Present. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1977.
- Mody, Jehangir R. P. Vondel and Milton. Norwood, Pa.: Norwood Editions, 1977.
- Moffit, John F., and Sebastián Santiago. O Brave New People: The European Adventure of the American Indian. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico, 1998.
- Molière. Doctor in Spite of Himself. Translated by S. H. Landes and edited by William-Alan Landes. Studio City, Calif.: Players Press, 2003.
- . Misanthrope. Translated by Charles H. Wall. Studio City, Calif.: Players Press, 2003.
- . Tartuffe. Translated by Ranjit Bolf. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2003.
- . The Blunderer. Holicong, Pa.: Wildside Press, 2003.
- . The Imaginary Invalid (Le Malade Imaginaire). IndyPublish.com, 2004.
- Molina, Tirso de. Damned for Despair. Translated by Lawrence Boswell. Hygiene, Colo.: Eridanos Press, 1992.
- . Don Juan of Seville. Translated by Lynne Alvarez. New York: Playwright's Press, 1989.
- . Don Juan: The Beguiler of Seville and The Stone Guest. Translated by Max Oppenheimer. Lawrence, Kans.: Coronado Press, 1976.
- . The Rape of Tamar. Translated by Paul Whitworth. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1999.
- Montaigne, Michel de. Apology for Raymond Sebond. Translated by Marjorie Glicksman Grene and Roger Ariew. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 2003.
- . Autobiography of Michel de Montaigne. Edited by Marvin Lowenthal. Boston: David R. Godine, 1999.
- . The Complete Essays of Montaigne. Translated by Donald M. Frame. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1965.
- . The Complete Essays. Translated by M. A. Screech. New York: Penguin, 1993.
- Montejo, Victor. El Q'Anil, Man of Lightning: A Legend of Jacaltenango. Translated by Wallace Kaufman and Susan G. Rascon. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 2001.
- Montesquieu, Charles-Louis de Secondat, baron de. Considerations on the Causes of the Greatness of the Romans and Their Decline. Translated by David Lowenthal. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 1999.
- . Persian Letters. Translated by C. J. Betts. New York: Penguin, 1977.
- . The Spirit of Laws. Edited by Anne M. Cohler. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Montmorency, J. E. G. de. Thomas à Kempis: His Age and Book. New York: Kennikat Press, 1970.
- Moore, Mary B. Desiring Voices: Women Sonneteers and Petrarchism. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.
- Moorman, Charles. The Pearl-Poet. New York: Twayne, 1968.
- More, Thomas. Saint Thomas More: Selected Writings. Edited by John F. Thornton and Susan B. Varenne. Vancouver, Wash.: Vintage Books, 2003.
- . Utopia. London: Everyman's Library, 1992.
- . Utopia. Translated by Paul Turner. New York: Penguin, 1965.
- Morgan, Edmund S. Benjamin Franklin. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002.
- . The Puritan Dilemma: The Story of John Winthrop. Lebanon, Ind.: Pearson, 1998.

- Morgan, Gerald. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight and the Idea of Righteousness. Dublin, Ireland: Irish Academic Press, 1992.
- Morgan, Jeanne. Perrault's Morals for Moderns. New York: Peter Lang, 1985.
- Morison, Samuel Eliot. Admiral of the Ocean Sea: A Life of Christopher Columbus. New York: MJF Books, 1942.
- Morley, Carolyn Anne. Transformation, Miracles, and Mischief: The Mountain Priest Plays of Kyogen. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University East Asia Program, 1993.
- Morley, Sylvanus G., and Delia Goetz, trans. The Popol Vuh: The Sacred Book of the Mayas. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1991.
- Mossiker, Frances. Madame de Sévigné. New York: Columbia University Press, 1983.
- Motokiyo Zeami. On the Art of the No Drama: Major Treatises by Zeami. Translated by J. Thomas Rimer, Yamazaki Masakazu, and Wallace Chappell. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- . Zeami and the No Theatre in the World. Edited by Samuel L. Leiter, et al. New York: Martin E. Segal Theatre Center, 1998.
- Motolinía, Toribio de. History of the Indians of New Spain, vol. 4. Translated by Elizabeth A. Foster. Oxford, England: Greenwood Publishing, 1970.
- Mourgues, Odette de. Two French Moralists: La Rochefoucauld & La Bruyère. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978.
- Mullan, Elder Father, S.J., trans. The Spiritual Exercises of Saint Ignatius of Loyola. New York: P. J. Kennedy and Sons, 1914.
- Mullett, Michael. Martin Luther. London: Taylor and Francis, 2004.
- Munford, Robert. The Plays of Robert Munford. Tucson, Ariz.: American Eagle Publications, 1992.
- Murdock, Kenneth B. Increase Mather, the Foremost American Puritan. Temecula, Calif.: Reprint Services Corp., 1991.
- Murphy, Anne. Thomas More. Liguori, Mo.: Liguori Publications, 1997.
- Murphy, Daniel. Comenius: A Critical Reassessment of His Life and Work. Dublin, Ireland: Irish Academic Press, 1995.
- Murphy, James J., and Izora Scott. Controversies over the Imitation of Cicero in the Renaissance: With Translations of Letters between Pietro Bembo and Gianfrancesco Pico. Mahwah, N.J.: Erlbaum, 1995.
- Murray, Judith Sargent. Selected Writings of Judith Sargent Murray. Edited by Sharon M. Harris. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- . The Gleaner: A Miscellany. Edited by Nina Baym. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1993.
- Musa, Mark, trans. Selections from the Canzoniere and Other Works. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Musgrove, Margaret W. Ashanti to Zulu: African Traditions. New York: Puffin, 1992.
- Mussell, Kay, ed. Where's Love Gone: Transformations in the Romance Genre. Los Angeles: Delta Productions, 1997.
- Nadler, Steven. Spinoza: A Life. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Nauert, Charles G., Jr. Humanism and the Culture of Renaissance Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Navarre, Marguerite de. The Coach and the Triumph of the Lamb. Translated by Hilda Dale. Bristol, U.K.: Intellect, 2003.
- . The Heptameron. Translated by P. A. Chilton. New York: Viking Penguin, 1984.
- Nebel, Henry M., Jr., trans. Selected Aesthetic Works of Sumarokov and Karamzin. Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1981.
- Nerimanoglu, Kamil Veli. The Poetics of "The Book of Dede Korkut". Ankara, Turkey: Atatürk Culture Center Publications, 1999.
- Newman, John Kevin. The Classical Epic Tradition. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1986.
- Nezahualcoyotl. Cantares Mexicanos: Songs of the Aztecs. Translated by John Bierhorst. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1985.
- . Chants of Nezahualcoyotl and Obsidian Glyph. Translated by Prospero Saiz. Madison, Wis.: Ghost Pony Press, 1996.
- Nguyen Trai. A Thousand Years of Vietnam Poetry. Edited and translated by Ngoc Bich Nguyen. New York: Knopf, 1974.

- . Nguyen Trai, One of the Greatest Figures of Vietnamese History and Literature. Hanoi: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1980.
- Nicholl, Charles. Leonardo da Vinci: Flights of the Mind. New York: Viking, 2004.
- Nikitin, Afanasij. "Afanasy Nikitin's Journey across Three Seas," in Medieval Russia's Epics, Chronicles, and Tales, rev. ed. Edited and translated by Serge A. Zenkovsky. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1974; 333–353.
- Novak, Maximilian E. Daniel Defoe: Master of Fictions: His Life and Ideas. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Novalis. Henry von Ofterdingen. Translated by Palmer Hilty. Prospect Heights, Ill.: Waveland Press, 1990.
- . Novalis: Hymns to the Night. Translated by Dick Higgins. New York: McPherson, 1998.
- O'Brian, Patrick. Joseph Banks: A Life. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- O'Brien, William Arctander. Novalis: Signs of Revolution. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1994.
- O'Connell, Marvin R., et al. Blaise Pascal: Reasons of the Heart. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 1997.
- O'Hagan, Timothy. Rousseau. London: Routledge, 2003.
- O'Malley, Charles Donald. Andreas Vesalius: 1514–1564. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1964.
- O'Neale, Sondra A. Jupiter Hammon and the Biblical Beginnings of African-American Literature. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1993.
- Occom, Samson. "An Account of the Montauk Indians, on Long Island," Massachusetts Historical Collections (ser. 1) 10 (1809): 105–111.
- . Samson Occom, Mohegan: Collected Writings by the Founder of Native American Literature. Edited by Joanne Brooks. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Oppenheimer, Paul. The Birth of the Modern Mind: Self, Consciousness, and the Invention of the Sonnet. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Ostlund, DeLys. The Re-Creation of History in the Fernando and Isabel Plays of Lope de Vega. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.
- Paine, Thomas. American Crisis. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2004.
- . Age of Reason. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2004.
- . Common Sense. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2004.
- . Rights of Man. Introduction by David Taffel. New York: Barnes and Noble, 2004.
- . Thomas Paine: Collected Writings. New York: Library of America, 1995.
- Palmer, John. The Comedy of Manners. New York: Russell and Russell, 1962.
- Palmeri, Frank, ed. Critical Essays on Jonathan Swift. New York: G.K. Hall, 1993.
- Palsson, Hermann Palsson, ed. Seven Viking Romances. New York: Penguin, 1986.
- Papazia, Mary Arshagouni, and Ronald Corthell, eds. John Donne and the Protestant Reformation: New Perspectives. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 2003.
- Parini, Giuseppe. The Day: Midday, Evening, and Night. Translated by Herbert Morris Bower. Westport, Conn.: Hyperion Press, 1978.
- Parker, Patricia L. Susanna Rowson. Boston: Twayne, 1986.
- Parkinson, G. H. R. The Renaissance and Seventeenth-Century Rationalism. The Routledge History of Philosophy Series, vol. 4. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Pascal, Blaise. Contradictions, Oppositions and Denials in the Life of the Mind. Albuquerque, N.M.: American Classical College Press, 1987.
- . Mind on Fire: A Faith for the Skeptical and Indifferent. Edited by James M. Houston. Vancouver: Regent College Publishing, 2003.
- . Pensées. Translated by W. F. Trotter. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2003.
- . Provincial Letters. Eugene, Ore.: Wipf and Stock Publishers, 1997.
- . The Gospel of the Gospels. London: Allmandi, Umberto and Company, 2000.
- Pasternack, Lawrence R. Immanuel Kant: Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals in Focus. London: Taylor and Francis, 2002.
- Pavolova, Galina Evgen'evna. Mikhail Vasilievich Lomonosov: His Life and Work. Translated by Arthur Aksenov. Moscow: Mir, 1984.

- Pearl Poet. The Complete Works of the Pearl Poet. Translated by Casey Finch. Edited by Malcolm Andrew and C. Peterson. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Peers, E. Allison. Handbook to the Life and Times of St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross. Westminster, Md.: Newman Press, 1954.
- Pepys, Samuel. Particular Friends: The Correspondence of Samuel Pepys and John Evelyn. Edited by Guy de la Bedoyere. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell and Brewer, 1997.
- . The Diary of Samuel Pepys (Abridged). Edited by Richard Le Gallienne. New York: Random House, 2003.
- Percy, Thomas. Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, 3 vols. London: Routledge, 1996.
- Perrault, Charles. Cinderella, Puss in Boots, and Other Favorite Tales as told by Charles Perrault. Translated by A. E. Johnson. New York: Abrams, 2000.
- Petrarch. My Secret Book. Translated by J. G. Nichols. London: Hesperus Press, 2002.
- . Selections from the Canzoniere and Other Works. Translated by Mark Musa. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Petrie, Jennifer. Petrarch. Dublin: Irish Academic Press, 1983.
- Peyer, Bernd. The Tutor'd Mind: Indian Missionary-Writers in Antebellum America. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1997.
- Pflueger, Lynda. Thomas Jefferson: Creating a Nation. Berkeley Heights, N.J.: Enslow Publishers, 2004.
- Philbrick, Thomas. St. John de Crèvecoeur. Farmington Hills, Mich.: Gale Group, 1970.
- Philipps, Mark. Francesco Guicciardini: The Historian's Craft. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1977.
- Pico della Mirandola, Count Giovanni. Pico Della Mirandola: On The Dignity of Man, On Being and the One, Heptaplus. Translated by Charles Glenn Wallis. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1940.
- Pirrota, Nina, and Elena Povoledo. Music and Theatre from Poliziano to Moteverdi. Translated by Karen Eales. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1981.
- Pizan, Christine de. Selected Writings of Christine de Pizan. Edited by Renate Blumenfeld-Kosinski. New York: W.W. Norton, 1997.
- . The Book of the City of Ladies. Translated by Earl Jeffreys Richards. New York: Persea Books, 1982.
- Plattard, Jean. Life of François Rabelais. Translated by L. D. Roache. London: Taylor and Francis, 1968.
- Poesse, Walter. Juan Ruiz De Alarcón. New York: Twayne, 1972.
- Poliziano, Angelo Ambrogini. A Translation of the Orpheus of Angelo Politian and the Aminta of Torquato Tasso. Edited by Louis E. Lord. Westport, Conn.: Hyperion Press, 1979.
- . Silvae. Translated by Charles Fantazzi. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2004.
- . The Stanze of Angelo Poliziano. Translated by David Quint. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993.
- Pollard, Alfred W., ed. English Miracle Plays, Moralities and Interludes: Specimens of the Pre-Elizabethan Drama. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Polsky, Zachary. The Comic Machine, the Narrative Machine, and the Political Machine in the Works of Moliere. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.
- Pompa, Leon. Vico: A Study of the "New Science." Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Poole, Stafford, trans. In Defense of the Indians. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1992.
- Pope, Alexander. Alexander Pope. Edited by Douglas Brooks-Davis. London: Everyman Poetry Library, 1997.
- . Essay on Man and Other Poems. London: Dover, 1994.
- . The Complete Poems of Alexander Pope. New York: Penguin, 1999.
- Porter, Roy. The Enlightenment. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2001.
- Pourafzal, Haleh, and Roger Montgomery. The Spiritual Wisdom of Hafez: Teachings of the Philosopher of Love. Rochester, Vt.: Inner Traditions International, 1998.
- Prado, Diego de. New Light on the Discovery of Australia: As Revealed by the Journal of Captain Don Diego de Prado y Tovar. Translated by George F. Barwick. London: Hakluyt Society, 1930. Reprinted Millwood, N.Y.: Kraus, 1967.

- Preuss, Mary H. Gods of the Popol Vuh: Xmukane', K'ucumatz, Tojil, and Jurakan. Culver City, Calif.: Labyrinthos, 1988.
- Prévost, Antoine-François. Manon Lescaut. Translated by Steven Larkin. New York: Penguin Classics, 1992.
- Prokopovitch, Feofan. "Sermon on the Interment of the Most Illustrious, Most Sovereign Peter the Great," in The Literature of Eighteenth-Century Russia, vol. 1. Edited by Harold Segel. New York: Dutton, 1967; 141–148.
- . The Spiritual Regulation of Peter the Great. Edited and translated by Alexander V. Muller. Seattle and London: University of Washington Press, 1972.
- Pulci, Luigi. Morgante: The Epic Adventures of Orlando and His Giant Friend Morgante. Translated by Joseph Tusiani. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2000.
- Putter, Ad. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight and the French Arthurian Romance. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Quennell, Peter. Alexander Pope: The Education of a Genius. New York: Stein and Day, 1970.
- Quevedo, Francisco de. Lazarillo de Tormes and the Swindler: Two Spanish Picaresque Novels. Edited by Michael Alpert. New York: Penguin, 2003.
- . Six Masters of the Spanish Sonnet. Translated by Willis Barnstone. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1997.
- Qvortrup, Mads. The Political Philosophy of Jean-Jacques Rousseau: The Impossibility of Reason. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 2004.
- Rabb, Theodore. Renaissance Lives: Portraits of an Age. New York: Basic Books, 2001.
- Rabelais, François. Complete Works of François Rabelais. Translated by Donald M. Frame. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.
- . Five Books of the Lives, Heroic Deeds and Sayings of Gargantua and His Son Pantagruel. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2004.
- . Gargantua and Pantagruel. Herts, England: Wordsworth Editions, 2001.
- Racevskis, Karlis. Voltaire and the French Academy. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, Department of Romance Languages, 1975.
- Racine, Jean. Bajazet. Translated by Alan Hollinghurst. New York: Random House, 1992.
- . Bérénice. St. Paul, Minn.: Consortium Book Sales and Distribution, 1991.
- . Racine: Mithridate. Edited by Gustave Rudler. London: Bristol Classic Press, 1979.
- . Three Plays of Racine: Andromache, Britannicus, Phaedra. Translated by George Dillon. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.
- Radishchev, Alexander Nikoláevich. A Journey from St. Petersburg to Moscow. Translated by Leo Wiener and edited by R. P. Thaler. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1958.
- Raeff, Marc, ed. Catherine the Great: A Profile. New York: Hill and Wang, 1972.
- Raffini, Christine. Marsilio Ficino, Pietro Bembo, Baldassare Castiglione: Philosophical, Aesthetic, and Political Approaches in Renaissance Platonism. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.
- Raitt, Janet. Madame de Lafayette and "La Princesse de Clèves". London: George G. Harrap, 1971.
- Ramazani, Rouhollah K. Future of Liberal Democracy: Thomas Jefferson and the Contemporary World. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Ramen, Fred. Hernan Cortes: The Conquest of Mexico and the Aztec Empire. New York: Rosen, 2003.
- Ratray, Robert. Akan-Ashanti Folk Tales. New York: AMS Press, 1983.
- Ray, Kurt. Amerigo Vespucci: Italian Explorer of the Americas. New York: Rosen, 2003.
- Reeve, Henry. Petrarch. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2002.
- Regosin, Richard L. The Poetry of Inspiration: Agrippa d'Aubigne's Les tragiques. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1970.
- Reidt, Heinz. Carlo Goldoni. Translated by Ursule Molinaro. New York: Ungar, 1980.
- Reisert, Joseph R. Jean-Jacques Rousseau: A Friend of Virtue. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Remesal, Antonio de. Bartolome De Las Casas, 1474–1566. Translated by Felix Jay. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 2002.
- Rescher, Nicholas. On Leibniz. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 2003.

- Reston, James. Galileo: A Life. New York: Harper-Collins, 1994.
- Reynolds, Ernest Edwin. Bossuet. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1963.
- Rhodes, James Francis. Poetry Does Theology: Chaucer, Grosseteste, and the Pearl-Poet. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 2001.
- Richard, Earl Jeffreys, ed. Christine de Pizan and Medieval French Lyric. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2000.
- Richards, Kenneth, and Laura Richards. The Commedia dell'Arte: A Documentary History. Cambridge, Mass.: Blackwell for the Shakespeare Head Press, 1990.
- Richardson, Samuel. Selected Letters. Edited by John Carroll. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1964.
- . Clarissa, or the History of a Young Lady. New York: Penguin Books, 1985.
- . The Clarissa Project. Edited by Florian Stuber. New York: AMS Press, 1990.
- Riebeeck, Jan van. Journal, 3 vols. Cape Town: Van Riebeeck Society, 1952–58.
- Rietbergen, P. J. A. N. Europe: A Cultural History. New York: Routledge, 1999.
- Robinson, James H. Petrarch: The First Modern Scholar and Man of Letters. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2003.
- Rodriguez, Alfred. Plus Ultra: Life and Times of Alvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca. Lincoln, Neb.: iUniverse, 2001.
- Rogers, Pat. The Alexander Pope Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Publishing Group, 2004.
- Ronsard, Pierre de. Pierre de Ronsard: Selected Poems. Translated by Malcom Quainton and Elizabeth Vinestock. New York: Penguin Books, 2002.
- . Poems of Pierre de Ronsard. Edited and translated by Nicholas Kilmer. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1979.
- . Songs and Sonnets of Pierre de Ronsard. New York: Hyperion Books, 1985.
- Rosbottom, Ron. Choderlos de Laclos. Boston: Twayne, 1978.
- Rose, Martial, ed. The Wakefield Mystery Plays: The Complete Cycle of Thirty-Two Plays. New York: W.W. Norton, 1994.
- Rosenmeier, Rosamund. Anne Bradstreet Revisited. Boston: Twayne, 1981.
- Rosslyn, Felicity. Alexander Pope: A Literary Life. London: Macmillan, 1990.
- Rosslyn, Wendy. Anna Bunina (1774–1829) and the Origins of Women's Poetry in Russia. Studies in Slavic Language and Literature, vol. 10. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1997.
- Rostand, Edmond. Cyrano de Bergerac. Translated by Christopher Fry. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Rousseau, Jean-Jacques. Confessions. Translated by Patrick Coleman and edited by Angela Scholar. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- . Emile, or Treatise on Education. Translated by William H. Payne. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 2003.
- . The Collected Writings of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Edited by Roger D. Masters and Christopher Kelly. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1989.
- . The Social Contract and the First and Second Discourses. Edited by Gita May and Susan Dunn. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002.
- Rowlandson, Mary. Sovereignty and Goodness of God, Together With the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed: Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson. New York: Bedford/St. Martin's, 1997.
- Rowson, Susanna. Charlotte Temple. Introduction by Jane Smiley. New York: Random House, 2004.
- . Mary: Or the Test of Honour. Temecula, Calif.: Reprint Services Corp., 1999.
- . Miscellaneous Poems. Murrieta, Calif.: Classic Books, 2004.
- . Slaves in Algiers: A Struggle for Freedom. Edited by Jennifer Margulis and Karen M. Poremski. Acton, Mass.: Copley, 2000.
- . Victoria, 1786: The Inquisitor: Or, Invisible Rambler. Temecula, Calif.: Reprint Services Corp., 1999.
- Roys, Ralph L., trans. The Book of Chilam Balam of Chumayel. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1967.

- Rubin, David Lee. A Pact with Silence: Art and Thought in The Fables of Jean de La Fontaine. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1991.
- Russell, Terence M., and Ann-Marie Thornton, eds. Gardens and Landscapes in the Encyclopedie of Diderot and d'Alembert: The Letterpress Articles and Selected Engravings. Aldershot, Hampshire, U.K.: Ashgate Publishing, 1999.
- Rutt, Richard, and Kim Chong-un, trans. Virtuous Women: Three Classic Korean Novels. Korea: Kwang Myong, 1974.
- Ruusbroec, Jan van. John Ruusbroec: The Spiritual Espousals and Other Works. Translated by James A. Wiseman. Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist Press, 1986.
- Ryokan. Between the Floating Mist—Poems of Ryokan. Translated by Dennis Maloney and Hide Oshiro. Buffalo, N.Y.: Springhouse Editions, 1992.
- . Great Fool: Zen Master Ryokan—Poems, Letters, and Other Writings. Translated by Ryuichi Abe and Peter Haskell. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1996.
- . The Zen Poems of Ryokan. Translated by Nobuyuki Yuasa. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Sachs, Hans. Nine Carnival Plays. Translated by Randall Listerman. Ottawa: Dovehouse Editions, 1990.
- Sade, Marquis de. 120 Days of Sodom and Other Writings. Translated by Austryn Wainhouse and Richard Seaver. New York: Grove Press, 1987.
- Sadler, John Edward. J. A. Comenius and the Concept of Universal Education. London: Allen and Unwin, 1966.
- Saffar, Ruth El., ed. Critical Essays on Cervantes. Boston: G.K. Hall, 1986.
- Safranski, Rudiger. Schopenhauer and the Wild Years of Philosophy. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1990.
- Salvucci, Claudio R., ed. Women in New France: Extracts from the Jesuit Relations. Bristol, Pa.: Arx Publishing, 2004.
- Santosuosso, Antonio. Bibliography of Giovanni Della Casa: Books, Readers, and Critics. Florence: L.S. Olschki, 1979.
- Sargent, Daniel. Thomas More. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.
- Satterthwaite, Alfred W. Spenser, Ronsard, and Du Bellay: A Renaissance Comparison. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1972.
- Scala, Flamminio. Scenarios of the Commedia dell'Arte: Flamminio Scala's Teatro delle favole rappresentive. Translated by Henry F. Salerno. New York: New York University Press, 1967.
- Schaeffer, Neil. The Marquis de Sade: A Life. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1999.
- Schama, Simon. The Embarrassment of Riches: An Interpretation of Dutch Culture in the Golden Age. New York: Vintage, 1997.
- Schiller, Friedrich von. Essays. Edited by Walter Hinderer and Daniel Dahlstrom. New York: Continuum, 1993.
- . Schiller's Five Plays: The Robbers, Passion and Politics, Don Carlos, Mary Stuart, and Joan of Arc. Translated by Robert McDonald. New York: Consortium Books, 1998.
- Schirmer, Walter F. John Lydgate: A Study in the Culture of the Seventeenth Century. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1979.
- Schlegel, Friedrich. Philosophical Fragments. Translated by Peter Firchow. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991.
- Schonle, Andreas. Authenticity and Fiction in the Russian Literary Journey, 1790–1840. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2000.
- Schopenhauer, Arthur. The Art of Controversy. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2004.
- . The Wisdom of Life. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover Publications, 2004.
- . The World as Will and Representation. Translated by E. F. J. Payne. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 1966.
- Schrecker, Paul, and Anne Martin Schrecker, trans. Monadology and Other Philosophical Essays. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill, 1965.
- Schuldiner, Michael. Studies in Puritan American Spirituality: Essays on Anne Bradstreet, Edward Taylor, Nathaniel Hawthorne and Chatharine Maria Sedgwick, vol. 7. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2001.
- Schuman, Michael A. Mayan and Aztec Mythology. Berkeley Heights, N.J.: Enslow Publishers, 2001.

- Scott, Virginia. Molière, A Theatrical Life. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Screech, M. A. A. Clément Marot: A Renaissance Poet Discovers the Gospel. The Netherlands: Brill Academic Publishers, 1993.
- Scudéry, Madeleine de. Selected Letters, Orations, and Rhetorical Dialogues. Edited by Jane Donawerth. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.
- . The Story of Sapho. Translated by Karen Newman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Segal, Naomi. The Unintended Reader: Feminism and Manon Lescaut. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Sévigné, Madame de. Madame de Sévigné: Selected Letters. Translated by Leonard Tancock. New York: Penguin Books, 1982.
- Sexton, James D., ed. and trans. Mayan Folktales: Folklore from Lake Atitlán, Guatemala. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1999.
- Sexton, James D., and Ignacio Bizarro Ujpan. Heart of Heaven, Heart of Earth and Other Mayan Folktales. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1999.
- Shakespeare, William. Complete Works. Edited by Richard Proudfoot, et al. New York: Arden, 2001.
- . The Complete Works. Edited by Stanley Wells and Gary Taylor. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- . The Portable Shakespeare. New York: Penguin Classics, 2004.
- . The Tragedies. New York: Modern Library, 1994.
- Shapiro, Norman R., ed. Lyrics of the French Renaissance: Marot, Du Bellay, Ronsard. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002.
- Sharma, Ram Chandra. Themes and Conventions in the Comedy of Manners. Folcroft, Pa.: Folcroft Library Editions, 1977.
- Sharpe, Lesley. Friedrich Schiller: Drama, Thought, and Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Sharratt, Michael. Galileo: Decisive Innovator. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Shea, William R. Designing Experiments and Games of Chance: The Unconventional Science of Blaise Pascal. Sagamore Beach, Mass.: Watson Publishing, 2003.
- Shearer, Susan, S., ed. Petrarch: On Religious Leisure. New York: Italica Press, 2002.
- Shen Fu. Six Records of a Floating Life. Translated by Leonard Pratt and Chiang Su-hui. New York: Penguin, 1983.
- Shepherd, Gregory J. An Exposition of Jose De Acosta's "Historia Y Moral de Las Indias," 1590. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 2002.
- Shepherd, Stephen, ed. Middle English Romances. New York: W.W. Norton, 1995.
- Shio Sakanishi. Japanese Folk Plays: The Ink-smearred Lady and Other Kyogen. Tokyo: C.E. Tuttle, 1960.
- Shirley, John William. Thomas Harriot: A Biography. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1983.
- Showalter, Elaine. Madame de Graffigny and Rousseau: Between the Two Discours. Oxford: Voltaire Foundation, 1978.
- . The Evolution of the French Novel, 1641–1782. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1972.
- Shuzaburo Hironaga. Bunraku Handbook: A Comprehensive Guide to Japan's Unique Puppet Theater, with Synopses of All Popular Plays. Tokyo: Maison des Arts, 1976.
- Sichel, Edith. Michel de Montaigne. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2003.
- Sidney, Sir Philip. Selected Prose and Poetry. Edited by Robert Kimbrough. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994.
- . Sidney's Defence of Poesy and Selected Renaissance Literary Criticism. Edited and with introduction by Gavin Alexander. New York: Penguin Classics, 2004.
- . The Major Works. Edited by Katherine Duncan-Jones. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Silverman, Kenneth. The Life and Times of Cotton Mather. New York: Harper and Row, 1984.
- . Timothy Dwight. New York: Twayne, 1969.

- Sime, James. Life of Johann Wolfgang Goethe. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2003.
- Simon, Irene. Neo-Classical Criticism 1600–1800. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1971.
- Sisman, Adam. Boswell's Presumptuous Task: The Making of the Life of Dr. Johnson. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2000.
- Skelton, John. John Skelton, The Complete English Poems. Edited by John Scattergood. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1983.
- . Magnyfyence. Edited by Robert Lee Ramsay. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Skemp, Sheila L. Judith Sargent Murray: A Brief Biography with Documents. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- Skinner, Quentin. Machiavelli: A Very Short Introduction. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Smethurst, Mae J., and Christina Laffin, eds. Noh Ominameshi: A Flower Viewed from Many Directions. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.
- Smith, John. Captain John Smith: A Select Edition of His Writings. Edited by Karen Ordahl Kupperman. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Sobel, Dava. Galileo's Daughter: A Historical Memoir of Science, Faith, and Love. New York: Walker, 1999.
- Sola-Sole, Josep M. Tirso's Don Juan: The Metamorphosis of a Theme. Edited by Georges E. Gingras. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1989.
- Sommer, Doris. Foundational Fictions: The National Romances of Latin America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Sophocles. The Complete Greek Tragedies. Edited by David Grene and Richmond Lattimore. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.
- Sorell, Tom. Descartes: A Very Short Introduction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Sox, David. John Woolman: Quintessential Quaker, 1720–1772. Richmond, Ind.: Friends United Press, 1999.
- Spencer, Theodore. Death and Elizabethan Tragedy. St. Clair Shores, Mich.: Scholarly Press, 1985.
- Spiegel, Harriet. Marie de France: Fables. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1987.
- Spilhaus, Margaret Whiting. Company's Men. Cape Town: J. Malherbe, 1973.
- Spinka, Matthew. John Amos Comenius: That Incomparable Moravian. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1943.
- . John Hus: A Biography. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1968.
- Spinoza, Benedictus. Correspondence of Spinoza. Translated by A. Wolf. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2003.
- . Ethics: Treatise on the Emendation of the Intellect and Selected Letters. Translated by Samuel Shirley. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing, 1998.
- . The Collected Works of Spinoza. Translated by Edwin Curley. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1985.
- St. Cyres, Viscount. François de Fenelon. New York: Kennikat, 1970.
- Staden, Hans. The Adventures of Hans Staden. Washington, D.C.: Alhambra, 1998.
- . The Captivity of Hans Staden of Hesse, in A.D. 1547–1555: Among the Wild Tribes of Eastern Brazil. Translated by A. Tootal and edited by R. F. Burton. New York: Burt Franklin, 1964.
- Stendhal, Maurice. Lives of Haydn, Mozart and Metastasio. Translated by Richard N. Coe. New York: Grossman, 1972.
- Stepanov, Nikolay. Ivan Krylov. New York: Twayne, 1973.
- Stephenson, Barbara. Power and Patronage of Marguerite de Navarre. Aldershot, Hampshire, England: Ashgate, 2004.
- Stevens, John. Three Zen Masters: Ikkyu, Hakuin, Ryokan. New York: Kodansha America, 1993.
- Stewart, Alan. Philip Sidney: A Double Life. New York: Thomas Dunne Books/St. Martin's Press, 2001.
- Stoljar, Margaret Mahony, trans. Novalis: Philosophical Writings. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997.
- Stone, P. W. K., trans. Les Liaisons Dangereuses. New York: Penguin Classics, 1961.

- Stump, Joseph. The Life of Melanchthon. Murrieta, Calif.: New Library Press, 2003.
- Subtelny, Orest. Domination of Eastern Europe: Native Nobilities and Foreign Absolutism, 1500–1715. Kingston and Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1986.
- Sumarokov, Alexander Petrovich. Selected Tragedies of A. P. Sumarokov. Translated by Richard and Raymond Fortune. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1970.
- Sümer, Faruk, Ahmet E. Uysal, and Warren S. Walker, eds. and trans. The Book of Dede Korkut: A Turkish Epic. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1991.
- Summers, Claude J., and Ted-Larry Pebworth. Ben Jonson Revised. New York: Twayne, 1999.
- Swainson, W. P. Emanuel Swedenborg: The Swedish Seer. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.
- Swedenborg, Emanuel. Apocalypse Explained, vol. 3. Translated by John Whitehead. West Chester, Pa.: Swedenborg Foundation, 1995.
- . Essential Readings. Edited by Michael Stanley. Berkeley, Calif.: North Atlantic Books, 2003.
- Sweetser, Marie-Odile. La Fontaine. Boston: Twayne, 1987.
- Swift, Jonathan. The Basic Writings of Jonathan Swift. Edited by Claude Rawson. New York: Modern Library, 2002.
- . The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift. Edited by Harold Williams. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1963.
- . The Writings of Jonathan Swift. Edited by Robert A. Greenberg and William B. Piper. New York: W.W. Norton, 1973.
- Symonds, John A. Life of Michelangelo Buonarroti. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Takeda Izumo. Chushingura: The Treasury of Loyal Retainers. A Puppet Play by Takeda Izumo, Miyoshi Shoraku and Namiki Senryu. Translated by Donald Keene. New York: Columbia University Press, 1971.
- Takeda, Sharon Sadako. Miracles and Mischief: Noh and Kyogen Theater in Japan. Los Angeles: Los Angeles County Museum of Art, Agency for Cultural Affairs, 2002.
- Talbot, George, ed. Lord Charlemont's History of Italian Poetry from Dante to Metastasio. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 2000.
- Tallentyre, S. G. Life of Voltaire. Miami, Fla.: International Law and Taxation, 2004.
- Tang Hsien-tsu. The Peony Pavilion by Tang Xianzu (Tang Hsien-Tzu). Translated by Cyril Birch. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1980.
- Tasso, Torquato. Jerusalem Delivered. Edited by Anthony M. Esolen. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000.
- . King Torrismondo by Torquato Tasso. Translated by Maria Pastore Passaro. New York: Fordham University Press, 1997.
- Tavernor, Robert. On Alberti and the Art of Building. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Taylor, Edward. The Poems of Edward Taylor. Edited by Donald E. Stanford. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
- Taylor, Ivan E. Samuel Pepys. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
- Tedlock, Dennis. "What the Popol Vuh Tells Us about Itself," in The Book, Spiritual Instrument. Edited by Jerome Rothenberg and David Guss. New York: Granary Books, 1996.
- . Popol Vuh: The Definitive Edition of the Maya Book of Dawn of Life and the Glories of Gods and Kings. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.
- Tedlock, Dennis, trans. Popol Vuh: The Mayan Book of the Dawn of Life. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.
- . Rabinal Achi: A Mayan Drama of War and Sacrifice. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Tench, Watkin. 1788: Comprising "A Narrative of the Expedition to Botany Bay" and "A Complete Account of the Settlement at Port Jackson." Melbourne, Australia: Text Publishing, 1996.
- . Letters from Revolutionary France. Edited by Gavin Edwards. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 2001.
- Teresa of Avila, Saint. The Life of Saint Teresa of Avila by Herself. Translated by J. M. Cohen. London: Penguin, 1987.
- . The Complete Works of Saint Teresa of Jesus, 3 vols. London: Sheed and Ward, 1944–46.
- . The Letters of St. Teresa of Jesús, 2 vols. Edited and translated by E. Allison Peers. London: Burns, Oates and Washbourne, 1951.
- . The Complete Poetry of St. Teresa de Avila: A Bilingual Edition. Translated by Eric W. Vogt. New Orleans: University Press of the South, 1996.

- Tetel, Marcel. Montaigne. Boston: Twayne, 1990.
- Thaddeus, Victor. Voltaire, Genius of Mockery. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2003.
- Thelander, Dorothy R. Laclos and the Epistolary Novel. Geneva: Librairie Droz, 1963.
- Thomas, Calvin. The Life and Works of Friedrich Schiller. McLean, Va.: Indypublish.com, 2004.
- Thompson, Carol. The Asante Kingdom. New York: Franklin Watts, 1999.
- Thompson, Ewa M., ed. The Search for Self-Definition in Russian Literature. Amsterdam: J. Benjamins, 1991.
- Thorlby, Anthony, ed. The Penguin Companion to Literature 2, European. Middlesex, England: Penguin Books, 1969; 154–155.
- Thysell, Carol. The Pleasure of Discernment: Marguerite de Navarre as Theologian. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Till Eulenspiegel*. Introduction by Paul Oppenheimer. London: Routledge, 2001.
- Tiller, Terence, trans. Confessio Amantis [The Lover's Shrift]. Baltimore, Md.: Penguin, 1963.
- Tobin, Ronald W. Jean Racine Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1999.
- Tomalin, Claire. Samuel Pepys: The Unequalled Self. New York: Vintage, 2003.
- Tomei, Christine D., ed. Russian Women Writers, vols. 1 and 2. New York: Garland, 1999.
- Toshimasa Yasukata. Lessing's Philosophy of Religion and the German Enlightenment. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Toyochiro Nogami. Zeami and His Theories on Noh. Tokyo: Hinoki, 1973.
- Tsao Hsueh-Chin. The Dream of the Red Chamber. Translated by Chi-Chen Wang. New York: Twayne, 1958.
- . The Dream of the Red Chamber. Translated by Florence and Isabel McHugh. New York: Pantheon Books, 1958.
- Tuchman, Barbara W. A Distant Mirror. New York: Ballantine Books, 1987.
- Tucker, Georges Hugo. The Poet's Odyssey: Joachim Du Bellay and Les Antiquitez de Rome. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Turner, Frederick. Natural Classicism: Essays on Literature and Science. New York: Paragon House, 1985.
- Underhill, Evelyn, ed. The Cloud of Unknowing: The Classic of Medieval Mysticism. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2003.
- Vance, John, ed. Boswell's Life of Johnson: New Questions, New Answers. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1985.
- Van Cleve, John. Sebastian Brant's The Ship of Fools in Critical Perspective, 1800–1991. New York: Camden House, 1993.
- Van Horne, John. El Bernardo of Bernardo de Balbuena: A Study of the Poem. Urbana: University of Illinois, 1927.
- Van Laun, Henri, trans. Characters. London: Oxford University Press, 1963.
- Vantuono, William, ed. The Pearl Poem in Middle and Modern English. New York: University Press of America, 1987.
- Varner, John Grier. El Inca: The Life and Times of Garcilaso de la Vega. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1968.
- Vega, Garcilaso de la. Poems. Translated by Elias L. Rivers. London: Grant and Cutler, 1981.
- . Royal Commentaries of the Incas and General History of Peru. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1966.
- Verdeyen, Paul. Ruusbroec and His Mysticism. Translated by André Lefevere. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1994.
- Vespucchi, Amerigo. Letters of Amerigo Vespucci and Other Documents Illustrative of His Career. Edited by Clements R. Markham. New York: Burt Franklin, 1994.
- Vico, Giambattista. The New Science of Giambattista Vico, 2nd ed. Translated by Thomas Bergin and Max Harold Fisch. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1983.
- Villon, François. Book of François Villon: The Little Testament and Ballads. Translated by Algernon C. Swinburne. New York: Branden, 1997.
- . Poems of François Villon. Translated by Peter Dale. London: Anvil Press Poetry, 2001.
- Viroli, Maurizio. Niccoli's Smile: A Biography of Machiavelli. Translated by Anthony Shugaar. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2000.

- Vivies, Jean, ed. English Travel Narratives in the Eighteenth Century. Translated by Claire Davison. Brookfield, Vt.: Ashgate, 2002.
- Vogeley, Nancy J. Lizardi and the Birth of the Novel in Spanish America. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2001.
- Volkov, Solomon. Conversations with Joseph Brodsky: A Poet's Journey through the Twentieth Century. New York: Free Press, 2002.
- Voltaire. Complete Romances of Voltaire. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 2003.
- . Candide. Holicong, Pa.: Wildside Press, 2003.
- . Voltaire and His Letters. Translated by S. G. Tallentyre. Miami, Fla.: International Law and Taxation, 2004.
- . Voltaire: Candide, Zadig, and Selected Stories. Translated by Donald M. Frame. New York: New American Library, 1961.
- . Voltaire: Treatise on Tolerance. Edited by Simon Harvey. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- . Voltaire's Correspondence: An Epistolary Novel, vol. 5. Edited by Deidre Dawson and Gita May. New York: Peter Lang, 1994.
- Vondel, Joost van den. Lucifer: Joost Van den Vondel. Translated by Noel Clark. Bath, England: Absolute Classics, 1990.
- Vroon, Ronald, and John E. Malmstad, eds. "Fet and the Poetic Tradition: Anapestic Tetrameter in the Work of Polonsky, Golenishchev-Kutuzov, and Lokhvitskaya," in Russian Modernism. To Honor Vladimir Fedorovich Markov. Moscow: Nauka, 1993; 173–188.
- Waddington, Raymond B. Aretino's Satyr: Sexuality, Satire, and Self-Projection in Sixteenth-Century Literature and Art. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.
- Wagner, Irmgard. Goethe. Boston: Twayne, 1999.
- Waldseemüller, Martin. Cosmographiae Introductio of Martin Waldseemüller in Facsimile. Translated by Joseph Fischer and Franz von Wieser. Manchester, N.H.: Ayer Co., 1977.
- Walker, Greg, et al. John Skelton and the Politics of the 1520s. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Walker, Hiram. Molière. Boston: Twayne, 1990.
- Wallace, W. Life of Arthur Schopenhauer. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2003.
- Walsh, Thomas. Readings on Candide. Farmington Hills, Mich.: Gale Group, 2000.
- Walters, D. Gareth. Francisco de Quevedo: Love Poet. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1986.
- Ward, Adolphus William. Geoffrey Chaucer. La Vergne, Tenn.: International Law and Taxation Publishers, 2003.
- Warner, Marina. From the Beast to the Blonde: On Fairy Tales and Their Tellers. New York: Noonday Press, 1996.
- Warner, William Beatty. Reading Clarissa: The Struggles of Interpretation. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1979.
- Watkins, Renee N., trans. The Family in Renaissance Florence. Long Grove, Ill.: Waveland Press, 1994.
- Watling, Thomas. Thomas Watling: Dumfries' Convict Artist. Dumfries, Scotland: Dumfries Museum, 1988.
- Wegelin, Oscar. Jupiter Hammon. Miami, Fla.: Mnemosyne Publishing, 1969.
- Weiger, John G. The Substance of Cervantes. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.
- Weiner, Leo, ed. Anthology of Russian Literature: From the Tenth Century to the Close of the Eighteenth Century. Honolulu: University Press of the Pacific, 2001.
- Weiskel, Portia Williams, and Harold Bloom. Molière. Langhorne, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2003.
- Welsh, David. Jan Kochanowski. New York: Twayne, 1974.
- Werner, Stephen. Blueprint: A Study of Diderot and the "Encyclopedie" Plates. Birmingham, Ala.: Summa Publications, 1993.
- Wertheimer, Molly Meijer, ed. Listening to Their Voices: The Rhetorical Activities of Historical

- Women. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.
- West, Richard. Daniel Defoe: The Life and Strange, Surprising Adventures. New York: Carroll and Graf, 1998.
- Westbrook, Perry D. William Bradford. Boston: Twayne, 1978.
- Westrem, Scott D. Broader Horizons: A Study of Johannes Witte de Hese's Itinerarius and Medieval Travel Narratives. Cambridge, Mass.: Medieval Academy of America, 2001.
- Whatley, Janet, trans. History of a Voyage to the Land of Brazil. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.
- Wheatley, Phillis. Phillis Wheatley: Complete Writings. Edited by Vincent Carretta. New York: Penguin Classics, 2001.
- . The Collected Works of Phillis Wheatley. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- White, Michael. Leonardo: The First Scientist. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 2000.
- . The Pope and the Heretic: The True Story of Giordano Bruno, the Man Who Dared to Defy the Roman Inquisition. New York: HarperCollins, 2003.
- Whitman, Jon. Allegory: The Dynamics of an Ancient and Medieval Technique. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1987.
- Wickham, Glynne. The Medieval Theatre. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Wigglesworth, Michael. The Day of Doom or a Description of the Great and Last Judgment. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.
- . The Diary of Michael Wigglesworth, 1653–1657: The Conscience of a Puritan. Edited by Edmund S. Morgan. Magnolia, Mass.: Smith Peter, 1990.
- . The Poems of Michael Wigglesworth. Edited by Ronald A. Bosco. Lanham, Mass.: University Press of America, 1989.
- Willard, Charity Cannon. Christine de Pizan: Her Life and Works. New York: Persea Books, 1984.
- Williams, Annwyl. Clément Marot: Figure, Text and Intertext. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1990.
- Williams, H. Noel. The Pearl of Princesses: The Life of Marguerite D'Angouleme, Queen of Navarre. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2004.
- Williams, John. The Life of Goethe: A Critical Biography. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell Publishers, 2001.
- Williams, Roger. A Key into the Language of America. Bedford, Mass.: Applewood Books, 1997.
- . The Complete Writings of Roger Williams. New York: Russell and Russell, 1963.
- Wilson, Arthur M. Diderot. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972.
- Winslow, Ola Elizabeth. John Eliot, "Apostle to the Indians". Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1968.
- Winthrop, John. Journal of John Winthrop: 1630–1649. Edited by Richard S. Dunn, et al. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap/Harvard University Press, 1996.
- . Short Story of the Rise, Reign and Ruin of the Antinomians, Familists and Libertines That Infected the Churches of New England (1644). Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 2003.
- Wong, Timothy C. Wu Ching-Tzu. Boston: G.K. Hall, 1978.
- Woolhouse, R. S., and Richard Francks, eds. Philosophical Texts. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Woolman, John. Journal of John Woolman and Plea for the Poor. Eugene, Ore.: Wipf and Stock, 1998.
- . Walking Humbly with God: Selected Writings of John Woolman. Nashville, Tenn.: Upper Room Books, 2000.
- Wordsworth, William. Sonnet Series and Itinerary Poems, 1820–1845. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2004.
- Wu Ch'eng-en. Monkey: Selections from Hsi Yu Chi. Translated by Arthur Waley. New York: Grove, 1984.
- . The Journey to the West, 4 vols. Translated by Anthony C. Yu. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977.

Wu Ching-tzu. The Scholars. Translated by Gladys Yang and Yang Hsien-Yi. La Vergne, Tenn.: University Press of the Pacific, 2001.

Wu Shi-Chang. On the Red Chamber Dream. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1961.

Wyclif, John. Select English Writings. Edited by Herbert E. Winn. New York: AMS Press, 1976.

Yarbro-Bejarano, Yvonne M. Feminism and the Honor Plays of Lope de Vega. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1994.

Yuan Hung-tao, and Hongdao Yuan. Pilgrim of the Clouds: Poems and Essays from Ming China. Translated by Jonathan Chaves. New York: Weatherhill, 1992.

Zagarri, Rosemarie. A Woman's Dilemma: Mercy Otis Warren and the American Revolution. Wheeling, Ill.: Harlan Davidson, 1995.

Zerner, Henri. Renaissance Art in France: The Invention of Classicism. Paris: Flammarion, 2004.

INDEX

Boldface page references refer to main entries.

A

- Aardema, Verna 10
 Abdallah, Sayyid 1
 Abenaljatib. See Ibn al-Khatib
 Abraham and Isaac 66
 The Abridgement of the Public Laws of Virginia (Beverly) 22
Accademia dei Ricovrati 264
 Academia de los Ociosos 8
 Academia Imitatoria 8
 Académie française 1–2, 25, 64, 145, 149, 174, 221, 240, 264, 298
 Academy of Arcadia 184
 Academy of Dijon 250
 Academy of Idlers 8
 Academy of Imitators 8
 Academy of Sciences (France) 4
 Academy of Sciences (Russia) 160
 Academy of the Transformed 214
An Account of Corsica (Boswell) 28
 “An Account of the Montauk Indians on Long Island” (Occom) 209
 “Account of the Vine of North America” (Bartram) 17
 “A Córdoba” (“To Córdoba”; Góngora y Argote) 105
 Acosta, José de 2–3
Across the Bridge, Juana (Lope de Vega). See Por la puente Juana
Adages (Erasmus) 88
 Adams, Abigail 303
 Adams, John 122, 293, 303
 Addison, Joseph 278
An Address to the Negroes in the State of New-York (Hammon) 111
 Admiral’s Men 176
Adoration of the Magi (Leonardo da Vinci) 155
The Adulateur, A Tragedy (Warren) 303
The Advancement of Learning (Bacon) 14
Adventures in the unknown interior of America (Cabeza de Vaca) 35
The Adventures of Hans Staden (Staden) 276–277
Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (Twain) 50
The Aeneid (Virgil) 86, 87, 263, 282
Aeneis (Douglas, trans.) 263
 Aeschylus 289
 Aesop 10, 91, 142, 149
Aethopian Historie (Heliodorus) 270
Afectos vencen finezas (Affections Conquer Finenesses; Peralta) 220
The Affected Young Ladies (Molière) 58
Affections Conquer Finenesses (Peralta). See Afectos vencen finezas
 African-American literature 87, 111–112, 304–305
 African literature 10–11, 16
 “African Slavery in America” (Paine) 212
Against the Jews and Their Lies (Luther) 166
Aglaia (periodical) 77
 Alba, Duchess of 285
 Alba, Duke of 161
 Alberti, Leon Battista 3–4
 Albrecht (prince of Königsberg) 140
 Albret, Henri d’ (king of Navarre) 172–173
 Albret, Jeanne d’ (queen of Navarre) 173
The Alchemist (Jonson) 127
Alcuin: A Dialogue (Brown) 31
Alejandra (Aregensola) 8
 Alembert, Jean Le Rond d’ 2, 4–5
 Académie française and 2
Encyclopedia and 76, 82, 85, 194, 243, 251
 Enlightenment and 85, 242, 243
 Alembert’s principle 4
 Alençon, duc d’ 172
Alexander in the Indies (Metastasio) 185
Alexander the Great (Racine). See Alexandre le Grand
Alexandre le Grand (Alexander the Great; Racine) 240
 Alfieri, Vittorio 5
 Alfonso X (king of Spain) 285
 Algonquian Bible 81–82
 Algonquin tribe 124
Alien Talk (Dmitriev) 77–78
 allegory 5–6, 23, 59, 66, 150, 173, 210, 242, 263
All for Love (Dryden) 202
 Allison, Robert J. 87
 Alliterative Revival 218
All Men Are Brothers (Shi Naian and Luo Guanzhong). See Shuihuzhuan
Almirante (ship) 230–231
 Alvarez, Lynne 288
 America (Dwight) 79
 “America Independent” (Freneau) 97
American Crisis (Paine) 212–213
 American Philosophical Society 121
 American Revolution
 figures in 79, 95–96, 133, 198, 212–214, 284
 works on 5, 65, 74–75, 97, 303
 American writers 28–30, 31–32, 60–61, 65, 74–75, 79, 80–82, 87, 94–97, 111–112, 121–123, 178–180, 195, 198–199, 199–200, 212–214, 253–254, 273, 283–284, 303–304, 304–307
Ameto (Boccaccio) 217
Aminta (Tasso) 217, 282
Amphitriões (Camões) 38
Amphitryon (Kleist, trans.) 137
Amphitryon (Molière) 202
 Anacreon 72, 160
Anacreontic Songs (Derzhavin) 72
 Anchieta, José de 6–7
 anchorites 128
 ancients v. moderns debate 279
And My Little Things (Dmitriev) 77
 Andrada e Silva, José Bonifácio de 7
 Andrea del Verrocchio 154–155
Andria (Machiavelli) 169
Andromaque (Racine) 202, 240, 289
 “Anecdote of an American Crow” (Bartram) 17
The Angel of Bethesda (Mather) 178
 Anne de Bretagne 177
 Anniversaries (Donne) 78
Annotations on Corinthians (Melancthon) 183
Annals of the Emperor Charles V (López de Gómara) 164
The Antidote (Catherine the Great) 46
Antiquitez de Rome (The Antiquities of Rome; Bellay) 20, 226
The Antiquities of Rome (Bellay). See Antiquitez de Rome
 Antoinette de Louppes 192
Antony and Cleopatra (Shakespeare) 267
Aonid (periodical) 77
Apocalypse Explained (Swedenborg) 878
Apologia (Pico della Mirandola) 224
An Apologie for Poetry (Sidney) 270
Apologues (Dmitriev) 77

- "Apology for Raymond Sebond" (Montaigne) 193
The Apprentice's Vade Mecum (Young Man's Pocket Companion); Richardson) 245
 Apuleius 270
 Aquinas, St. Thomas 39, 286
The Aragon Collection (Poliziano) 227
 Aragonese School 8
 "Arbitrary Government Described" (Winthrop) 307
 Arbuthnot, John 278
 Arcadia (Sidney) 217, 270
 Archer, Robert 172
Areopagitica (Milton) 188
 Arentino, Pietro 7–8
 Argensola, Bartolomé Leonardo de 8–9
 Argensola, Gabriel 8
 Argensola, Luperco Leonardo de 8–9
 Ariosto, Ludovico 9–10, 283
 influences of/on 15, 21, 48, 161, 282, 283
 literary criticism on 6, 244, 247
 Aristarchus of Samos 62
 Aristophanes 92
 Aristotle 33, 39, 292
 influence of 4, 25, 61, 62, 63, 115, 128, 157, 172, 185, 202, 282, 286
 Armitage, Angus 62
 Arnauld, Antonie 216
 Arouet, François-Marie. See Voltaire
Artamene, ou le grande Cyrus (Artamene or the Great Cyrus; Scudéry) 264 Artaserse (Metastasio) 185 art critics 4, 157
Arte de grammatica da lingoa . . . do Brasil (Anchieta) 6
Arte nuevo de hacer comedias en este tiempo (New Art of Writing Plays at This Time; Lope de Vega) 162
 Arthurian legend 97, 170–172, 270, 271
 Arthur Mervyn (Brown) 31
Artis analyticae praxis ad aequationes algebraicas resolvendas (Hariot) 112
The Art of Controversy (Schopenhauer) 262
The Art of Literature (Schopenhauer) 262
The Art of Poetry (Boileau-Despréaux) 25
The Art of War (Machiavelli) 169
 'asabbiyah 118
Ascanio in Alba (Parini) 214
Ascent of Mount Carmel (St. John of the Cross) 126
 Ascham, Roger 115
 Asgharzadeh, Alireza 26
 Ashanti tales 10–11
 Ashikaga Yoshimitsu 205
The Ash Wednesday Supper (Bruno) 32
Astrophel and Stella (Sidney) 270
 Asturias, Miguel Angel 230
As You Like It (Shakespeare) 60, 217, 266, 268
Athalie (Racine) 240–241
Athenaeum (periodical) 261
 Atkinson, Alan 281
Atilio Regolo (Metastasio) 185
 Aubigné, Agrippa d' 11
 Augsburg Confession 183
 Augustine, Saint 6, 115, 222, 286, 290
 Australia, settlement of 230–231, 284, 304
 Australian literature 304 autobiography 5, 11, 12, 95–96, 119, 121, 135, 194, 251, 252–253, 262, 285
The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin (Franklin) 95–96
Autobiography of Michel de Montaigne (Montaigne) 194
Aventures du baron de Fœneste (d'Aubigné) 11
 Averroës 39
 Avicenna 61
 Avvakum 12
 Axayacatl of Tenochtitlán 12–13, 196
 Axelard, Jacob 97
 Ayamonte, marques de 106
 Aztec Empire 64, 159
 Aztec literature 12–13, 36, 159, 195–196, 201–202, 202–204, 235
- ## B
- Bacon, Francis 14–15, 56, 59, 73, 293
 Bacon, Nathaniel 61
 Baif, Jean-Antoine 225
Bajazet (Racine) 240
 Balboa, Vasco Nuñez de 303
 Balbuena, Bernardo de 15–16
 ballads, English 84
 Bamana Segu, Epic of 16, 275
 Bambara people 275
 Banks, Joseph 16–17
 Barbé-Marbois, François, marquis de 122
The Barber of Seville (Beaumarchais) 19
The Barber of Seville (Rossini) 19
 Barbour, John 262
Barlaam and Josaphat 90
 Bartels, Emily C. 176
 Barth, John 61
 Bartram, John 17
 Bartram, William 17
The Bashful Man in the Palace (Tirso de Molina) 287
 Bashō 17–19, 111
 Basile, Giovanni Battista 221
 Bastidion, Eketerina 72
The Baths of Algiers (Cervantes) 48
The Battle of the Books (Swift) 279
Battle of the Teutoburger Wald (Kleist) 137
 Battle of Valmy 102
Battles of Coxinga (Chikamatsu) 52
 Baudelaire, Charles-Pierre 19
The Bay Psalm Book 82
 Beatrice of Nazareth 255
Beatus ille (Horace) 8
 Beaufort, Jane 262
 Beaumarchais, Pierre-Augustin Caron de 19
 "A Beautiful Young Nymph Going to Bed" (Swift) 279
 Beccaria, Giambattista 46
 Becket, Thomas à 51
 Beekman, Isaac 72–74
 Beethoven, Ludwig von 56, 260
 Beguines 255
 Béjart, Armande 190
 Béjart, Madeleine 189–190
 Bellay, Jean du 20, 274
 Bellay, Joachim du 20, 225–226, 274
 Belleau, Rémy 225
 Bembo, Pietro 8, 20–21, 71, 244
 Ben al-Hatib. See Ibn al-Khatib
 Benoît de Saint-Maure 51, 107
 Benucci, Alessandra 9
Beowulf 86
Bérénice (Racine) 240
 Bergerac, Cyrano de 21
 Bergin, Thomas 24
 "El Bernardo" (Balbuena) 15
 Bernard of Clarivaux 286
The Best Boy in Spain (Lope de Vega) 163 bestiary 91
 Beverly, Anna 198
 Beverly, Robert 22
 Beverly, William 198
Biathanatos (Donne) 78
 Bible
 influence of 177–178, 218, 305
 interpretation of 290
 King James, precursors of 311
 Martin Luther on 166
 translations of 81–82, 89, 243, 270–271, 311
 works on 222, 233, 311
Bickerstaff Papers (Swift) 278
 Bierhorst, John 201–202
 Bill of Rights, U.S., influences on 188
 "Binh Ngo Sach" (Book on defeating the Wu; Nguyen Trai) 204 biographies 28, 117, 222
 blason 177
 Blind Harry 262
The Blockheads (Warren) 303
 Bloom, Harold 267–268
The Bloudy Tenent (Williams) 306
 Blumenfeld-Kosinski, Renate 225
The Blunderer (Molière) 191
 Boccaccio, Giovanni 22–24
 friends and colleagues of 22, 50, 222
 influence of 20, 48, 71, 173, 263
 literary criticism by/on 23–24, 56, 115, 182, 217, 222, 223, 244
 works by 51, 167
 Boiardo, Matteo Maria 9, 48, 247
 Boileau-Despréaux, Nicolas 2, 24–25, 174, 190, 277
 Bolingbroke, Lord 228
 Bolívar, Simón 210
Bondage of the Will (Luther) 166
 Bonner, Anthony 297
The Book of Chilam Balam of Chumayel. See Chilam Balam of Chumayel, Book of The Book of Chilam Balam of Tizimin. See Chilam Balam of Tizimin, Book of
The Book of Dede Korkut 26
The Book of Examples (Ibn Khaldūn). See Kitab al-'Ibar
Book of Feats of Arms and Chivalry (Christine de Pisan) 224
Book of Her Life (Teresa of Avila) 285
The Book of Margery Kempe (Kempe) 135
A Book of Showings (Julian of Norwich). See Revelations of Divine Love
The Book of the Chilam Balam of Mani. See Chilam Balam of Mani, Book of Book of the City of Ladies (Christine de Pisan) 224–225
The Book of the Courtier. See The Courtier (Castiglione)
 Book of the Dead 289
The Book of the Duchess (Chaucer) 50–51
Book of the First Navigation and Discovery of the Indies (Columbus) 57
Book of the Foundations (Teresa of Avila) 285
Book of the Jaguar Priest 180
Book of the Three Virtues (Christine de Pisan) 224
The Book of Travels (Celebi) 46–47
 Book on defeating the Wu (Nguyen Trai). See "Binh Ngo Sach"
The Books of Chilam Balam. See Chilam Balam, Books of Borgia, Cesare 155, 168
 Borgia, Lucrezia 20
 Borgia family 168
 Boscán, Juan 274

- Bossuet, Jacques-Bénigne 26–27
 Boswell, Alexander 27
 Boswell, Euphemia 27
 Boswell, James 27–28
 Botticelli, Sandro 182, 226
 HMS Bounty (ship) 16
 Bourbon, l'abbé. See Brasseur, Charles-Étienne
 Bourges, Clemence de 145
 "The Bowge of Court" (Skelton) 272
 Bradford, William 28–29
 Bradley, Thomas 61
 Bradstreet, Anne Dudley 29–30
 Bradstreet, Simon 29
 Bramante, Donato 186
 Brandt, Sebastian 30
 Brasseur, Charles-Étienne 230, 239
 Brazilian literature 6–7, 100–101
 Brébeuf, Jean de, Saint 124
 Brecht, Bertolt 132
 Bredero, Gerbrand 30–31
 Breton, André Le 76
Breve noticia de la provincia de la Campaña de Jesús en Chile 1593–1736 (Olivares) 210
 "The Bride" (Derzhavin) 72
A Brief and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia (Hariot) 112
Brief Report of the Destruction of the Indians (Las Casas) 151–152
 Bristo (Ferreira) 94
 British empiricism 73
Britannicus (Racine) 240
The Broken Jug (Kleist) 137
 Brophy, Elizabeth 245
 Brown, Charles Brockden 31–32
 Brown, Norman O. 279
 Brown, William 277
 Brumby, H. David 31
 Brunelleschi, Filippo 4
 Brunham, John 135
 Bruni, Leonardo 115
 Bruno, Giordano 32–33, 62
Brutus (Voltaire) 298
 Buck, Pearl S. 269
 Buddhism 43, 152, 262. See also Zen Buddhism
 Budé, Guillaume 115
 Bulgakov, Mikhail 190
Bulin Waishi (Ju-lin wai-shih, The Scholars, Unofficial History of the Literati, Wu Jingzi) 41, 310
 Bunina, Anna 33
 Bunraku 33–34, 52–54, 131, 281
 Bunyan, John 212
 Burger, Gottfried August 274
 Burke, Peter 296
El burlador de Sevilla (The Seducer of Seville; Don Juan and the Stone Guest; Tirso de Molina) 287–288, 289
 Burns, Robert 263
 Bustamante Carlos Inca, Calixto 43
 Butler, Samuel 60
 Byng, Sir John 300
 Byron, Lord 233, 283, 288
- C
- The Cabal of the Horse Pegasus* (Bruno) 32
 Cabeza de Vaca, Álvaro Núñez 35–36
 "Cacamatzin Icuic" ("Song by Cacamatzin"; Cacamatzin) 36
 Cacamatzin of Texcoco 36
 Caesar, Julius 298
 Calcar, Jan Stephan van 294
 calculus, invention of 153
 Calderón de la Barca, Pedro 36–37, 288, 289 calligraphers 136
 Callot, Jacques 107
 Calvert, Benedict Leonard 61
 Calvin, John 37–38, 177, 244, 284–285
 Camões, Luíz Vaz de 38–39, 39, 94, 274
Campaign in Frankreich —1792 (The Campaign in France in 1792; Goethe) 102
 Campanella, Tommaso 39, 293
 Canavaggio, Jean 48
The Candidates (Munford) 198
Candide (Voltaire) 85, 154, 202, 243, 298, 299–300
Cantares mexicanas (Mexican Songs; Bierhorst, trans.) 201–202
 Cantemir, Antioch 232
 Cantemir, Dimitrie 40, 232
The Canterbury Tales (Chaucer) 51–52, 91, 150, 167, 262
Canto a Caliope (Cervantes) 105
 "Cant spiritual" ("Spiritual Song"; March) 172
canzonette 185
Canzoniere (Lyric Poems, Rhymes; Petrarch) 222–223, 274
 Cao Xuequin (Ts'ao Hsüeh-ch'in) 40–43
 Cao Yin 40
capa y espada. See cloak-and-sword plays
Capitana (ship) 230–231
Captain Singleton (Defoe) 70 captivity narratives 252–253, 276–277
The Captivity of Hans Staden of Hesse (Staden) 277
Les Caractères de Théophraste (The Characters of Theophrastes; La Bruyère) 145–146
Caramurú (Sea Dragon; Santa Ritta Durão) 100–101
 Carew, Thomas 78
 Carlyle, Thomas 17
 carpe diem 248, 263
 Carriro de la Vandra, Alonso 43–44
 Carroll, Evan 308
Cartas de relación (Cortés) 64
cartharsis 289
 Carver, John 29
 Carver, Jonathan 44
Cases of Conscience Concerning Evil Spirits (Mather) 179–180
 Castel, Etienne de 224
 Castellanos, Juan de 45
 Castelvetro, Ludovico 292
 Castiglione, Baldessare 21, 45–46, 71, 244, 282
The Castle of Perseverance 67
 Catalan literature 172
 Catherine II (empress of Russia). See Catherine the Great
 Catherine the Great 46, 71, 72, 77, 105, 160, 242
 Cato 178
Catone in Utica (Metastasio) 185
 Catullus 71, 177, 223
Cause, Principle, and the One (Bruno) 32
 Cawley, A. C. 90
 Caxton, Thomas 171
 Çelebi, Evliya 46–47
Cénie (Graffigny) 107
 "The Century of Louis the Great" (Perrault) 2
 Cepeda y Alhumada, Teresa de 284
 Cervantes Saavedra, Miguel de 47–50
 influences of/on 8, 49–50, 125, 161, 174–175
 literary criticism by/on 48–50, 105, 125, 244, 247, 280
 Chagall, Mark 149
 Chambers Cyclopedia 76
 Champion, Anne-Toinette 76
 Chaplin, Charlie 60, 92
 Chapman, George 177
The Characters of Theophrastes (La Bruyère). See Les Caractères de Théophraste
 Charlemagne 9, 282
 Charles I (king of England) 27, 188, 219
 Charles I (king of Spain) 64. See also Charles V (Holy Roman Emperor)
 Charles II (king of England) 218–219
 Charles III (king of Spain) 210, 296
 Charles IV (Holy Roman Emperor) 294
 Charles IX (king of France) 248
 Charles V (Holy Roman Emperor) 64, 164, 238, 294. See also Charles I (king of England)
 Charles VI (Holy Roman Emperor) 184, 210, 224
 Charles XII (king of Sweden) 298
Charlotte: A Tale of Truth (Rowson) 253
Charlotte Temple (Rowson) 253
 Chassigne, Françoise de la 192
 Chateaubriand, François-Auguste-René de 17, 44
 Châtelet, Madame du 298
 Chaucer, Geoffrey 50–52
 contemporaries of 106, 150, 218
 influences of/on 91, 97, 113, 167, 223, 262, 263, 271
 literary criticism by/on 51–52, 106, 150, 167
 Chaves, Jonathan 312
 Cheke, John 115
 Cheng, Vincent 64
 Chen Yun (Ch'en Yün) 268–269
 Chester cycle 66
 Chesterton, G. K. 52
The Chest of Gold (Ariosto) 9
 Chiang Su-Hui 269
 Chibcha tribe 124
 Chi-Chen Wang 41
Chichi No Shuen Nikki (Diary of My Father's Last Days; Kobayashi Issa) 139
 Chikamatsu Hanji 34
 Chikamatsu Monzaemon 34, 52–54, 131–132
 Chilam Balam, Books of 25–26, 54–55
Chilam Balam of Chumayel, Book of 25–26
Chilam Balam of Mani, Book of 54–55
Chilam Balam of Tizimin, Book of 54
 Chilean literature 210
 Chinese literature 40–43, 125–126, 158–159, 164–165, 268–269, 269–270, 281–282, 307–310, 310, 312
 Chinsa 152
 chivalry 45, 171, 270, 271, 284
 Chong Hasang 130
 Chongio (king of Korea) 130
 Chong Zhen (Ch'ung-chen; emperor of China) 141 chonin 126
Choon Huang Jun 55
 Chrétien de Troyes 171, 271
The Christian Faith (Ruisbroec) 255
The Christian Philosopher (Mather) 178, 179
 Christina (queen of Sweden) 72
 Christine de Pisan. See Pisan, Christine de
 "A Christmas Cradle" (Lope de Vega) 163
Chronicle of the Battle of Ichinotami 132
Chronicle of the Romanians, Moldavians, and Vlachs (Cantemir) 40 Chronicles (Froissart) 97
chuan-chi. See zhanji
ch'uan-ch'i. See chuanqi
chuanqi (tales of wonder) 136

- Chung-cheng hsiao-tzu lien-huan chien* (The Repeated Admonition of an Upright Devoted Son; Luo Guanzhong) 164–165
Chun Hyang (film) 55
 Ch'usa. See Kim Jung Hee
ch'usachi'e 136
Chushingura (The 47 Ronin; Takeda, Miyoshi, and Namiki) 131, 281
 Ch'ü Yu. See Qu Yu
 Cicero, Marcus Tullius 20, 56, 62, 97, 115, 221, 294
Le Cid (Corneille) 2, 63–64, 202
 “Cinderella” (Perrault) 221
Cinna (Corneille) 64
Cioso (Ferreira) 94
Circulo (Ibn al-Khatib) 117
The City of the Sun (Campanella) 39, 293
Clarissa (Richardson) 207, 245–246 classicism 55–56, 56, 115, 226, 244, 277. See also neoclassicism
 Claudius 50
Cleanness. See Purity (Pearl poet)
Clélie (Scudéry) 264
 Clement VII (pope) 7
 Clifford, James 280
 cloak-and-sword plays (capa y espada) 162
The Cloud of Unknowing 56–57, 129
The Coach, or the Debate on Love (Marguerite de Navarre). See La Coche, ou le Debat sur l'Amour
La Coche, ou le Debat sur l'Amour (The Coach, or the Debate on Love; Marguerite de Navarre) 173
Coffee Mill (Krylov) 142
Cognitive Space and Patterns of Deceit in La Fontaine's Contes (Grisé) 148
 Coleridge, Samuel Taylor 17, 44, 84, 296
Collection of Best Secular and Folk Songs (Dmitriev) 77
A Collection of Plays and Poems, by the Late Colonel Robert Munford (Munford) 198
 Colombo, Cristoforo. See Columbus, Christopher Colón, Cristóbal. See Columbus, Christopher
Colonel Jack (Defoe) 70
 Colonna, Vittoria 187
 “Columbia, Columbia, to Glory Arise” (Dwight) 79
 Columbus, Christopher 57–58, 152, 295, 302
comedia 161–162
Comédie-Française 190, 191, 240
The Comedy of Bristo (Ferreira) 94
The Comedy of Errors (Shakespeare) 266 comedy of manners 58–59, 254
Comedy of the Florentine Nuns (Boccaccio) 23
 Comenius, Johann Amos 59–60
Comento de'miei sonetti (Comment on My Sonnets; Medici) 182 commedia dell'arte 60, 127
commedia erudita 60
Commentary on Lucius Anneae Seneca's Two Books on Clemency (Calvin) 37
Commentary on Romans by Philipp Melanchthon (Melanchthon) 183
Comment on My Sonnets (Medici). See Comento de'miei sonetti
Common Sense (Paine) 212–214
Companion to Education (periodical) 105
A Complete Account of the Settlement at Port Jackson (Tench) 284
Complete Poems (Olmedo). See Poésias completas
The Complete Works of Louise Labé of Lyon (Labé) 144–145
 Comus (Milton) 188
Concerning the System of the Mohammedan Religion (Cantemir) 40
 Concolorcorvo 43
Concord (Kochanowski) 140
 Condé, duc de 145
 Condé, prince de 190
El condenado por desconfiado (The Doubted Damned; Tirso de Molina) 287
 Condillac 76
 Condorcet, Antoine-Nicolas de 83
Confesionario (Regulations for the Confessors of Spaniards; Las Casas) 152
Confessio Amantis (Lover's Confession; Gower) 106–107
Confessions (Augustine) 222
Confessions (Rousseau) 251
Confessions of Amant (Gower) 51
 Confucius and Confucianism 43, 141, 152, 264
 Congreve, William 59
 Conjuração Mineira 100
conocimientos de los Tiempos (Koenig and Peralta) 220
The Conquest of Canaan (Dwight) 79
The Conquest of New Granada (Jiménez de Quesada) 124–125
Conquest of the West Indies (López de Gómara) 164
Considerations on the Causes of the Greatness of the Romans and Their Decline (Montesquieu) 194
Considerations on the Discourses of Machiavelli (Guicciardini) 108
The Consolations of Philosophy (Boethius) 51
 Constantia. See Murray, Judith Sargent conte moral 120
 “Contemplations” (Bradstreet) 30
Contes de ma Mere l'Oye (Tales of Mother Goose; Perrault) 221
Contes et nouvelles en vers (Tales and Novels in Verse; La Fontaine) 148
 Conti, prince de 190
Contradictions, Oppositions and Denials in the Life of the Mind (Pascal) 217
Conventions 217
Conversation for the Freemasons (Lessing) 158
The Conversion of St. Paul 67 conversion plays 67
 Cook, Ebenezer 60–61
 Cook, James 16
 Cooke, E. See Cook, Ebenezer
 Cooper, Anthony Ashley. See Shaftsbury, Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Cop, Nicolas 37
 Copernican Theory 62, 99
Copernicus (Armitage) 62
 Copernicus, Nicolaus 32, 33, 61–63, 99, 160, 166, 244
 Copland, William 287
Corbaccio (Old Crow; Boccaccio) 23
 Corneille, Pierre 63–64
 friends and colleagues of 25, 241
 influences of/on 174, 220, 254
 literary criticism on 2, 56, 202, 292, 299
 Corneille, Thomas 64
La corona trágica (The Tragic Queen; Lope de Vega) 162
 Cortés, Hernán 36, 64–65, 74, 159, 164, 203–204, 235
 Cortés, Martín 164
Cortigiana (The Courtesan; Aretino) 8
Cosmographiae Introductio (Waldseemüller) 295
 Costa, Cláudio Manuel de 100
 Coster, Simon 31
 Cotton, John 178, 179
 Cotton, Maria 179
 Coudenberg, Vrank van 254
 Coulanges, Marie de 265
 Council of Trent 282
 Counter-Reformation 71, 282, 284–285
The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia (Sidney) 270
The Countess of Tende (Lafayette) 147
The Country Wife (Wycherley) 59
The Courtesan (Aretino). See Cortigiana
The Courtier (Castiglione) 45–46, 71 courtly love 210, 270, 271
 Covey, C. 35
 Cracraft, James 232 creation myths, Mayan 180, 229
Creation of Adam and Eve 66
Creations (Nikolev) 205
 Crèvecoeur, J. Hector St. John de 65
 Crèvecoeur, Michel-Guillaume-Jean de. See Crèvecoeur, J. Hector St. John de Crèvecoeur, J. Hector St. John de critics. See Art critics; literary criticism
A Critique of Judgment (Kant) 134
A Critique of Practical Reason (Kant) 133
A Critique of Pure Reason (Kant) 132–134
 Croatian literature 177–178
 “Crónica de Chac-Xulub-Chen” 54
Crónica de la conquista de la Nueva España (López de Gómara) 164
Crónica de los muy nombrados Omiche y Haradin Barbarrojas (López de Gómara) 164
A Crow and a Fox (Krylov) 142
 Cruz, Sor Juana Inés de la 65–66
 Cuauhtlatalzén 196
 Cutter, John 82 cycle plays 66–68
Cyclopedía 76
Cyrano de Bergerac (Rostand) 21
 Czech literature 59, 116
 D
La dama boba (The Lady Nit-Wit; Lope de Vega) 162
Damned for Despair (Tirso de Molina) 288
Damon (Lessing) 157
Dangerous Liaisons (Laclós). See Les Liaisons dangereuses
 “The Dangerous Neighbor” (Pushkin). See “Opasnyi sosod”
 Daniel, Arnaut 172
 Dante Alighieri
 influence of 22–23, 50, 172, 223, 226 literary criticism on/by 6, 22, 56, 87, 182, 222, 223, 225
 works by 20, 182
 Daoism (Taoism) 43
Daphnis and Chloe (Longus) 247
Dark Night of the Soul (St. John of the Cross) 126
 Daurat, Jean 225
David (Michelangelo) 186
 Davidson, Cathy N. 31
David's Psalms (Rej) 243
 Davies, Rosalind 15
The Day (Parini) 214–215
The Day of Doom (Wigglesworth) 305
The Death of Agrippina (de Bergerac) 21
 “The Death of Cuauhtemoc” 54
Death of Oleg Drevlianskii (Ozerov) 211
Death's Duel (Donne) 78
The Debate Between Folly and Love (Labé) 144
De beata virgine dei matre Maria (Anchieta) 6

- Decades* (Livy) 222
The Decameron (Boccaccio) 23–24, 48
De Casibus Virorum Illustrium (Boccaccio) 167
De Ecclesia (The Church; Hus) 116
De Ente et Uno (On Being and Unity; Pico della Mirandola) 224
The Defence of Poetics (Sidney) 270
Defense (Montesquieu) 194
The Defense and Illustration of the French Language (Bellay). See La Deffence et Illustration de la Langue Françoyse
The Defense of Galileo (Campanella) 39
La Deffence et Illustration de la Langue Françoyse (The Defense and Illustration of the French Language; Bellay) 20, 225–226
 Defoe, Daniel 69–70, 87
De Humanis Corporis Fabrica Libri Septem (Seven Books on the Construction of the Human Body; Vesalius) 294
De-Ka-Nah-Wi-Da 70–71
 “De Laudibus Britanniae” (“In Praise of Britain”; Skelton) 272
 “The Delights of Roaming Afar” (Shen Fu) 269
 Della Casa, Giovanni 71
Della famiglia (Alberti) 3–4
De natura novi orbis (Acosta) 2
 Dengaku 143, 313
De procuranda indorum salute (Acosta) 3
De Revolutionibus Orbium Coelestium (On the Revolutions of the Heavenly Spheres; Copernicus) 62
 Derzhavin, Gavriil Romanovich 71–72
 Descartes, René 33, 56, 72–74, 215, 275–276, 296
 Deschamps, Eustace 50, 297
 “Description of a City Shower” (Swift) 279
 “Description of an American Species of Certhia, or Creeper” (Bartram) 17
Description of Moldavia (Cantemir) 40
A Description of New England (Smith) 273
Design for Good Government (Jung Yak Yong). See Kyongse yp’yo
 Destito, Teresa 296
 “The Destruction of the First People” (Sethol) 181
 Devonshire, duchess of 253–254
Devotions (Donne) 78
Dialogh: d’amore (Philosophy of Love; Hebreo) 101
Diálogo de los muertos: La causa académica (Dialogue of the Dead: The Academic Case; Peralta) 220
Dialogue Concerning the Two Chief Systems of the World (Galileo Galilei) 99–100 Dialogue of the Dead: The Academic Case (Peralta). See Diálogo de los muertos: La causa académica
Dialogue on Nobility (Parini) 214
Dialogues (Tasso) 282
Diana enamorada (Montemayor) 217
Diana’s Hunt (Boccaccio) 23
 “Diary of a Week” (Radishchev) 242
The Diary of Michael Wigglesworth, 1653–1657 (Wigglesworth) 306
Diary of My Father’s Last Days (Kobayashi Issa). See Chichi No Shuen Nikki Diaz del Castillo, Bernal 65, 74, 164
 Diaz de Vivar, Rodrigo 63
 Dickinson, Emily 39
 Dickinson, John 74–75
Dictionary of Music (Rousseau) 251
Dictionary of Proper Sino-Korean Pronunciation (Se-jong). See Dongguk jeong-un
 Diderot, Denis 75–77
Encyclopédia and 82, 85, 194, 243, 250
 Enlightenment and 85, 242, 243, 258
 friends and colleagues of 4, 46, 250, 251
 influences of/on 157, 194
 literary criticism by/on 76–77, 107
Dido, Queen of Carthage (Marlowe) 176
Dido Forsaken (Metastasio) 185
Die Leiden des jungen Werther (The Sorrows of Young Werther; Goethe) 102–103, 207, 245
Different Works (de Bergerac) 21
Dimitrii the Impostor (Sumarokov) 277
 Din, Lisan al-. See Ibn al-Khatib
 Dionysius 56
Discourse of Irish Affairs (Sidney) 270
Discourse on Metaphysics (Leibniz) 153
Discourse on Method (Descartes) 73
Discourse on Ordering the Popular Government (Gucciardini) 108
Discourse on the Arts and Sciences (Rousseau) 250
Discourse on Two New Sciences (Galileo Galilei) 100
Discourses on the First Decade of Titus Livy (Machiavelli) 169
Dismissal of the Grecian Envoys (Kochanowski) 140
A Dissertation on Greater Exactitude in Navigation (Lomonosov) 160
The Divan or the Wise Man’s Parley with the World (Cantemir) 40
 “A Divine and Supernatural Light” (Edwards) 80
The Divine Comedy (Dante) 6, 23, 87
 “The Divine Right of Infant-Baptism” (Mather) 180
Diwan (Hāfiz) 109
 Dmitriev, Ivan Ivanovich 77–78, 105
Dmitrii Donskoi (Ozerov) 211
Dr. Faustus (Marlowe) 176, 289
Doctor in Spite of Himself (Molière) 191
The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (Milton) 188
 Dogood, Silence 94
 Dollimore, Jonathan 197
 Domenico, Giovan. See Campanella, Tommaso
Don Juan (Molière) 190
Don Carlos (Schiller) 260
Don Catrin de Fachenda (Fernández de Lizardi) 93
Dongguk jeong-un (Dictionary of Proper Sino-Korean Pronunciation; Se-jong) 264
Don Gil of the Green Stockings (Tirso de Molina) 287
Don Giovanni (Mozart) 288
 Don Juan 287–288
Don Juan and the Stone Guest (Tirso de Molina). See El burlador de Sevilla
 Donne, John 30, 50, 78–79
 Donno, Daniel 24
Don Quixote (Cervantes) 47–50, 125, 174–175, 244, 247
 Doody, Margaret 279
 Dorat, Jean 20
 Doré, Gustave 149
La Dorotea (Lope de Vega) 162
Double Suicide at Amijima (Chikamatsu) 52
The Doubted Damned (Tirso de Molina). See El condenado por desconfiado
 Douglas, Gavin 262, 263
 Douglass, Frederick 87
Le Doyen de la Killierne (The Master of Killarney; Prévost) 231
La Dragontea (Lope de Vega) 162
 Drake, Sir Francis 162
Drapier’s Letters (Swift) 278–279
 Drayton, Michael 177
Dream in the Form of a Complaint (Orléans) 211
Dream of Red Mansions. See The Dream of the Red Chamber
The Dream of the Red Chamber (Cao Xueqin) 41–43
Dreams (Quevedo). See Sueños
 “Drunkard” (Izmailov) 120
 Drury, Anne 78
 Dryden, John 202, 292
 “Du beau tétin” (Marot) 177
 “Du laid tétin” (Marot) 177
 Dumas, Alexander (Fils) 52
 Dunbar, William 262, 263
The Dunciad (Pope) 228
 Du Parc, Thérèse 240
 Dutch Academy 31
 Dutch literature 30–31, 87–89, 115, 173–174, 246–247, 254–255, 275–276, 300–301
 Dwight, Timothy 79
Dying Speeches & Counsels of such Indians as dyed in the Lord (Eliot) 82
 E
 Eagleton, Terry 245
Eastward Ho! (Jonson) 127
Ecclesiastical Ordinances (Calvin) 37–38 eclogues 217
Eclogues (Boccaccio) 23
Eclogues (Virgil) 48, 217, 270
L’École des Femmes (Molière) 58
 Ecuadorian writers 259–260
Edgar Huntly (Brown) 31
 Edgerton, Sir Thomas 78
The Education of the Human Race (Lessing) 158
Edward II (Marlowe) 176
 Edward III (king of England) 50
 Edwards, Jonathan 79, 80–81
 Edwards, Timothy 80
 Egyptian Book of the Dead. See Book of the Dead
Eight Comedies and Eight New Interludes (Cervantes) 48
 Einstein, Albert 276
Elegias de varones ilustres de Indias (Elegies of Illustrious Men of the Indies; Castellanos) 45
Elegies (Labé) 144
Elegies of Illustrious Men of the Indies (Castellanos). See Elegias de varones ilustres de Indias
Elegy of the Lady Fiammetta (Boccaccio) 23
Eléments de la Philosophie de Newton (Voltaire, trans.) 298
 Eliot, John 81–82
 Eliot, T. S. 79, 176
 Elizabeth I (queen of England) 260, 266, 267, 270, 274
 Elliott, Emory B., Jr. 97, 139, 178
Eloise to Abelard (Pope) 228
El perro del hortelano (The Gardener’s Dog; Lope de Vega) 162
 Emerson, Ralph Waldo 17
Émile (Rousseau) 250–251, 251
Emilia Galotti (Lessing) 157
 empiricism 132, 133, 141
The Enchiridion (Erasmus) 88
Encyclopedia (Diderot, ed.) 4–5, 76, 77, 82–84, 85, 194, 243, 250, 251
Endeavour (ship) 16

- English literature 14–15, 16–17, 22, 27–29, 50–52, 56–57, 60–61, 69–70, 78–79, 84, 90, 106–107, 112, 115, 135–136, 138–139, 149–151, 166–167, 170–172, 175–177, 188–189, 202, 218–220, 227–229, 245–246, 252–254, 266–268, 270–271, 271–272, 272–273, 274, 278–280, 283–284, 304, 305–306, 306–307, 310–311
- Enlightenment 84–86
 characteristics of 82
 Christianity in 138
 critics of 249–250
 figures in 2, 4, 75–76, 82, 85, 102, 151, 153–154, 158, 194–195, 232, 233, 258, 259, 277, 297–300, 300
 influence of 93
 prominent works in 82–84, 85 rationalism and 85, 101, 160, 242–243, 249–250 reaction against 102
 Renaissance and 244
 romanticism and 132
 in Russia 46
 and U.S. Declaration of Independence 122–123
- Enomoto Kikaku 110
- epic(s) 86–87
- Epicone, or the Silent Woman* (Jonson) 127
- Epic of Bamana Segu. See Bamana Segu, Epic of
- Epic of Gilgamesh* 289
- Epic of Komam Q Anil*. See Komam Q Anil, Epic of
- Epic of Sundiata* 16
- Epigrams (Kochanowski) 140
- The Epistle of Discretion in the Stirrings of the Soul* 56
- The Epistle of Prayer* 56
- The Epistle of Privy Counsel* 56
- "Epistle on the Art of Poetry" (Sumarokov) 277
- "Epistle on the Russian Language" (Sumarokov) 277
- epistolary novels. See novels, epistolary
- Equiano, Olaudah 87, 289
- Erasmus, Desiderius 30, 47, 87–89, 115, 183, 237, 238, 244, 272, 282
- Espinel 161
- "Essai sur les coniques" (Pascal) 215
- An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences* (Mather) 179
- Essay of Dramatic Poesy* (Dryden) 292
- Essay on Criticism* (Pope) 202, 228
- Essay on Man* (Pope) 228
- Essay on Merit and Virtue* (Shaftsbury) 76
- An Essay on Projects* (Defoe) 69
- Essay on Taste* (Montesquieu) 194
- Essay on the Manners and the Spirit of Nations* (Voltaire) 298
- Essay on the Origin of Languages* (Rousseau) 251
- Essays* (Bacon) 14
- Essays* (Montaigne) 115, 192–194
- Este, Alfonso d' 9, 282
- Este, Luigi d' 282
- Esther* (Racine) 240–241
- Étaples, Jacques Lefevre d' 115
- Etherege, Sir George 59
- Ethics* (Spinoza) 276
- Eugene, or Fatal Consequences of a Poor Upbringing* (Izmailov) 120
- Eugénie* (Beaumarchais) 19
- Eupilino, Ripano. See Parini, Giuseppe
- Euripides 241, 292
- Evelyn, John 219
- "Evening" (Parini) 215
- "Evening Meditations on the Majesty of God" (Lomonosov) 160
- An Evening Thought, Salvation by Christ, with Penitential Cries* (Hammon) 111
- Everyman* 67, 90
- Every Man in His Humor* (Jonson) 127
- Every Man out of His Humor* (Jonson) 127
- An Examination of the Nature of Monarchy* (Cantemir) 40
- Exemplar of Korean Medicine* (Huh Joon). See Tongui pogam
- Exemplary Novels* (Cervantes) 48
- Exile* (Vondel) 301
- Expériences Nouvelles* (Pascal) 215
- Exposition of the Faith, of the Ten Commandments and of the Lord's Prayer* (Hus) 116
- The Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast* (Bruno) 32
- Eyquem, Raymon 192
- F
- fable 5, 120, 180–182
 writers of 77, 92, 106, 142–143, 149, 157, 211, 263
- Fable of Polyphemus and Galatea* (Góngora y Argote). See Fábula de Polifemo y Galatea
- Fable of Pyramus and Thisbe* (Góngora y Argote). See Fábula de Piramo y Tisbe
- Fables* (Dmitriev) 77
- Fables* (Krylov) 142
- Fables and Dialogues of the Dead* (Fénelon) 92
- Fables choisies, mises en vers* (Selected Fables, Put into Verse; La Fontaine) 149
- fabliaux 91–92
- Fábula de Piramo y Tisbe* (Fable of Pyramus and Thisbe; Góngora y Argote) 106
- Fábula de Polifemo y Galatea* (Fable of Polyphemus and Galatea; Góngora y Argote) 106
- The Faerie Queene* (Spenser) 6, 9, 247
- Fairy Tales* (Dmitriev) 77
- Fall of Lucifer 66
- The Fall of Princes* (Lydgate, trans.) 167
- Familiar Letters* (Richardson) 245
- The Family in Renaissance Florence* (Alberti) 4
- The Family Schroffenstien* (Kleist) 137
- A Family Well-Ordered* (Mather) 179
- Famous Women* (Boccaccio) 23
- farce 60, 92
 writers of 31, 48, 173, 174, 198–199
- The Farce of Simon without Sweetness* (Bredero) 31
- The Farce of the Cow* (Bredero) 31
- The Farce of the Miller* (Bredero) 31
- Farmer's Letters* (Dickinson) 75
- Farrell, Edith 144
- Fashionable Wife* (Dmitriev) 77
- Fate of Illustrious Men* (Boccaccio) 23
- Father of a Family* (Diderot). See Père de famille
- Faulkner, William 50
- Faust* (Goethe) 102–103
- Fénelon, François de Salignac de la Mothe 92–93, 175
- Ferdinand (king of Aragon) 57
- Ferguson, Elizabeth Graeme 195
- Fernández de Lizardi, José Joaquín 93
- Fernandez de Quirós, Pedro 230–231
- Ferreira, António 93–94
- Ficino, Marcilio 224, 226
- Fielding, Henry 157, 207, 245, 247, 280
- The Fifth Book* (Rabelais) 238
- Figure in the Carpet* (periodical) 309
- Filis* (Aregensola) 8
- La Fille d'Aristide* (Griffigny) 107
- Filocolo* (Boccaccio) 23
- Filodemo* (Camões) 38
- Filostrato* (Boccaccio) 23
- Finegal* (Ozerov) 211
- Fineman, Joel 267
- The First Principles of Metallurgy* (Lomonosov) 160
- The "Five Authors" 63
- Five Cantos* (Ariosto) 9
- Flannery, Tim 284
- Flaubert, Gustave 238
- Flemish literature 301
- Fleurette, Catherine 189
- Florentine Histories* (Guicciardini) 108
- Flores de poetas ilustres* (Flowers of Illustrious Poets; 1603) 106
- Florida del Inca* (The Florida of the Incas; Garcilaso de la Vega) 101
- The Florida of the Incas* (Garcilaso de la Vega). See Florida del Inca
- Flowers of Illustrious Poets* (1603). See Flores de poetas ilustres
- flower songs. See xochicuicatl
- "The Flying of Dunbar and Kennedie" (Dunbar) 263
- folk epics 86
- The Folly of Affection* (Molière). See Les Précieuses Ridicules
- "Fortune is Often Met in the Path of Reason" (Montaigne) 193
- The Founding of Lima or Conquest of Peru* (Peralta). See Lima fundada o conquista del Peru
- Fouquet, Nicolas 148
- Four Dreams of Linchuan* (Tang) 282
- Fourier, Charles 293
- Four-Seven Debate 152
- The Four Temptations* (Ruusbroec) 255
- The Fourth Book* (Rabelais) 238
- The 47 Ronin* (Takeda, Miyoshi, and Namiki). See Chushingura
- A Fox and Grapes* (Krylov) 142–143
- "The Fox and the Grapes" (La Fontaine) 149
- Fragonard, Jean-Honoré 149
- Frame, Donald 193, 299
- Francis I (king of France) 172, 177
- Francis of Assisi, Saint 127, 286
- Franklin, Benjamin 94–96
 contemporaries of 160
 friends and colleagues of 17, 75, 139, 212
 influences of/on 87, 121, 306
- Franklin, James 94
- Frears, Stephen 146
- Frederick II (Holy Roman Emperor) 273
- Frederick the Great (king of Prussia) 298, 299
- Frederick William II (king of Prussia) 133
- The Freeman's Journal* (periodical) 97
- free speech, origins of 85–86
- The Freethinker* (Lessing) 157
- Frega, Donnalee 246
- French literature
 neoclassicism in 202
 sonnets in 274
 works 82–84, 91, 92
 writers 4–5, 11, 19, 20, 21, 24–25, 26–27, 63–64, 72–74, 75–77, 92–93, 97–98, 107, 144–149, 151, 156–157, 172–173, 174–175, 177, 189–195, 215–217, 221, 225–226, 231–232, 237–239, 239–241, 248–249, 249–252, 258, 263–264, 265–266, 296–300

- French Revolution 2, 5, 46, 85, 103, 133, 194, 250, 251, 252, 258–259
- Freneau, Philip Morin 96–97
- Friedman, Edward H. 162
- Frobisher, Sir Martin 270
- Froissart, Jean 50, 97–98, 210
- Fuenteovejuna* (Lope de Vega) 162
- Fūshi Kaden* (Zeami) 313–314
- G
- Galatea* (Cervantes) 48
- Galateo* (Della Casa) 71
- Galen 39, 61, 115, 237, 294
- Galilei, Galileo 33, 62, 73, 99–100, 112, 216, 244
- Galileo. See Galilei, Galileo
- Gama, José Basilio da 100–101
- A Game of Chess* (Kochanowski) 140
- The Game of Love and Chance* (Marivaux) 175
- Garcilaso de la Vega 48, 101
- The Gardener's Dog* (Lope de Vega). See El perro del hortelano
- The Gardens of Toledo* (Tirso de Molina) 287
- Gargantua* (Rabelais) 238
- The Gates of Language Unlocked* (Comenius) 59
- Gay, John 278, 280
- Genealogies of the Pagan Gods* (Boccaccio) 23
- The General History of Peru* (Garcilaso de la Vega) 101
- General History of the Indies* (Las Casas) 152
- General History of the Kingdom of Chile* (Rosales). See Historia general del Reino de Chile
- General History of the Order of Mercy* (Tirso de Molina) 288
- The General History of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles* (Smith) 273
- General Natural History and Theory of the Heavens* (Kant) 133
- Gent, E. C. See Cook, Ebenezer
- Genuine Consistency* (Nikolev) 205
- Geoffrey of Monmouth 171, 271
- George III (king of Great Britain) 75, 123
- German literature
- classical period of 56
 - sonnets and 274
 - works 286–287
 - writers 101–104, 113–114, 132–134, 137–138, 153–154, 157–158, 165–166, 183, 206–207, 257–258, 260–261, 261, 286, 302–303
- German romanticism. See romanticism
- Gerould, Gordon Hall 84
- Gerusalemme Liberata* (Tasso) 6
- “Getting a Jump on Dragon Ball” (Wyatt) 309
- Geziod 105
- ghazal* 109
- Gijsbrecht van Aemstel* (Vondel) 301
- Gill, Roderick 163
- Gilmore, Michael T. 31
- Girardin, marquis de 251
- The Girl with the Jug* (Lope de Vega). See La moza de cántaro
- Glass, Andrew 10
- The Gleaner* (Murray) 199
- Gli Asolani* (Bembo) 20
- Gluck, Christoph W. von 185
- “God” (Derzhavin) 72
- God's Controversy with New England* (Wigglesworth) 305
- Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von 56, 62–63, 101–104, 207
- friends and colleagues of 102, 260–261
 - influences of/on 103, 114, 133, 138, 207, 245, 262, 276
 - literary criticism by/on 103, 138, 274
 - works by 283
- Golden Ass* (Apuleius) 270
- Golden Lotus* (Xiao Xiaosheng). See Jin Ping Mei
- “Goldfinch-Astronomer” (Izmailov) 120
- Goldoni, Carlo 104, 254
- Goldsmith, Oliver 59
- Golenishchev-Kutozov, Pavel Ivanovich 104–105
- Gonçalves de Magalhães, José 101
- Gonçalves Dias, Antônio 101
- Góngora y Argote, Luis de 8, 105–106, 235–236, 274, 285
- Gonzaga, Tomás Antônio 100
- “The Good Shepherd” (Lope de Vega) 163
- The Gospel of the Gospels* (Pascal) 217
- Gossen, Gary H. 181
- Gower, John 50, 51, 106–107, 167
- Grabo, Norman S. 65, 283
- Graffigny, Madame Françoise de 107, 207
- Graham, R. B. Cunninghame 199
- Grammar* (Lomonosov) 160
- “La grandeza mejicana” (Balbuena) 15
- Gravina, Vincenzo 184
- Gray, Elizabeth 110
- Gray, Thomas 105, 304
- Great Awakening 81, 111, 209
- The Great Didactic* (Comenius) 59
- The Great Invention of Algebra* (Hariot) 112
- The Greater Morgante* (Pulci) 9
- Great Fire of London (1666) 219
- Great Instauration* (Bacon) 14–15
- Greece, classical
- farce in 92
 - humanism and 115
 - influence of 2, 88, 102–103, 160, 186, 225, 248–249, 270, 297, 301. See also classicism; neoclassicism
 - rediscovery of 87, 237, 244
 - works on 261, 279
- Greenblatt, Stephen 197
- Greenfield Hill* (Dwight) 79
- Gregory the Great 286
- Grenville, Richard 112
- Griane* (Bredero) 31
- Griffin, Robert 9
- Griffits, Hannah 195
- Grimarest, Jean Leonor 191
- Grisé, Catherine 148
- Groote, Gerard 286
- Groszolz, Emily 73
- Groundwork for the Metaphysics of Morals* (Kant) 134
- The Group* (Warren) 303
- Guardo, Juana de 161–162
- Gudzy, N. K. 12
- Guicciardini, Francesco 108
- Guichon, Marie 221
- Guillaume de Lorris 97, 224
- Guillaume de Machaut 51, 97
- Guillet, Pernette du 145
- The Guilty Mother* (Beaumarchais) 19
- Gukovskii, G. A. 46
- Gulliver's Travels* (Swift) 202, 280, 290
- Gustafson, Thomas 122, 212, 213, 214
- Gustavus Vassa. See Equiano, Olaudah
- Gutenberg, Johannes 244
- Guy of Blois 97
- Guyon, Madame 92
- H
- Haac, Oscar 175
- Hadewijch of Antwerp 255
- Hafez. See Hafiz
- Hafiz 109–110
- haiku 18, 110–111, 139–140, 256
- Hakluyt, Richard 112
- Hamlet* (Shakespeare) 27, 267, 277
- Hamlet* (Sumarokov) 277
- Hammerken, Thomas. See Thomas à Kempis
- Hammon, Jupiter 111–112
- Hammond, J. R. 70
- Hampton, Christopher 146
- Handel, George F. 185
- Hanning, Robert 45–46
- Hans Staden: The True History of His Captivity* (Staden) 276–277
- Hardenberg, Friedrich Leopold von. See Novalis
- Hargeul 264
- Harrington, John 9
- Hariot, Thomas 112
- Harlequin 60
- Harley, Robert 69
- The Harmony of the Three (Synoptic) Gospels* (Calvin) 38
- Harrington, James 121, 293
- Harriot, Thomas. See Hariot, Thomas
- Harris, Jocelyn 246
- Hatzfeld, Helmut 285
- Haydn, Franz Joseph 56, 104
- Heart of Heaven, Hearth of Earth, and Other Mayan Folktales* 181
- Hebreo, Leo 101
- Hegel, Wilhelm Friedrich 133, 262
- Heliodorus 270
- Helvetius 121
- La Henriade* (Voltaire) 298
- Henrietta Maria (queen of England) 27
- Henri III (king of France) 298
- Henry, Patrick 198
- Henry IV (king of England) 50
- Henry IV (king of France) 11
- Henry IV* (Shakespeare) 267–268
- Henry of Ofterdingen* (Novalis) 207
- Henryson, Robert 112–113, 262, 263
- Henry the Navigator 57
- Henry V* (Shakespeare) 267–268
- Henry VI* (Shakespeare) 267–268
- Henry VIII (king of England) 78, 88, 115, 272, 274
- Heptaméron des Nouvelles (Heptameron of Stories; Marguerite de Navarre)* 173
- Heptaplus* (Pico della Mirandola) 224
- Herder, Johann Gottfried 102–103, 113–114, 252, 276
- Héricart, Marie 148
- hermeneutics 290
- La hermosa de Angélica* (Lope de Vega) 161, 162
- Hernandez Cruz, Victor 140
- The Heroic Frenzies* (Bruno) 32
- Het Pascha (The Passover; Vondel)* 300–301
- “Heuhueh Cuicatl” (Axayacatl) 12–13
- Hiawatha* 70–71
- Hieroglyphic History* (Cantemir) 40
- Hinckaert, Jan 254–255
- Hinduism 262
- Hippocrates 39, 61, 237
- Hippolytus* (Euripides) 241
- Hippolytus, Cardinal 9
- Histoire de Charles XII* (Voltaire) 298

- Histoire d'un voyage fait en la terre de Brésil* (History of a Voyage to the Land of Brazil; Léry) 156–157
- Histoire memorable de la ville de Sancerre* (A Memorable History of the City of Sancerre; Léry) 157
- L'Histoire universelle* (d'Aubigné) 11
- Historia de España vindicada* (Peralta) 220
- La historia de las Indias y conquista de México* (López de Gómara) 164
- Historia de la vida del buscón* (The Scavenger; Quevedo) 236
- Historia de los indios de Nueva España* (History of the Indians of New Spain; Motolinía) 198
- Historia general del Reino de Chile* (General History of the Kingdom of Chile; Rosales) 249
- Historia militar, civil y sagrada de lo acaecido en la conquista y pacificación del Reino de Chile* (Olivares) 210
- Historia natural y moral de las Indias* (Acosta) 2–3
- Historia verdadera de la conquista de la Nueva España* (The True History of the Conquest of New Spain; Díaz del Castillo) 74
- The History and Present State of Virginia* (Beverly) 22
- History of a Voyage to the Land of Brazil* (Léry). See Histoire d'un voyage fait en la terre de Brésil
- The History of Greek and Roman Poetry* (Schlegel) 261
- The History of Italy* (Guicciardini) 108
- The History of Mr. Cleveland* (Prévost). See L'Histoire de Monsieur Cleveland
- The History of New England 1630–1649* (Winthrop) 307
- The History of Richard III* (More) 197
- The History of Sir Charles Grandison* (Richardson) 207, 245
- The History of the Growth and Decay of the Ottoman Empire* (Cantemir) 40
- The History of the Holy Widow Judith* (Marulic') 177–178
- History of the Indians of New Spain* (Motolinía). See Historia de los indios de Nueva España
- The History of the Ingenious Gentleman Don Quixote of La Mancha*. See Don Quixote (Cervantes)
- History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution* (Warren) 303
- Hitler, Adolf 169
- Hoby, Thomas 45
- Ho Chun. See Huh Joon
- Hoil, Don Juan Josef 25
- Homer
- epic genre and 86
 - influence of 160, 175, 193, 228, 282
 - literary criticism on 277
 - works by/on 92, 226, 228, 289
- Hongjong (king of Korea) 136
- Hooker, Thomas 81
- Horace
- influence of 8, 20, 25, 71, 72, 97, 148, 161, 193, 222, 228, 248
 - translations of 160
- Horace* (Corneille) 64
- Hôtel de Bourgogne (Théâtre de l'Hôtel de Bourgogne) 240
- Houdetot, Sophie d' 250–251
- The House of Fame* (Chaucer) 51, 263
- Howarth, William 19
- Hozumi Ikan 53
- Hsuan-Tsang (Triptaka) 308
- Hubert, Judd 190
- Hudibras* (Butler) 60
- Hugo, Victor 238
- Hu hai ji* (Hu-hai chi; Poems from the Lakes and Seas; Kong Shangren) 141
- Huh Joon 114
- humanism 114–116
- characteristics of 47, 56, 61, 87, 115, 291
 - figures associated with 20–21, 30, 87–88, 177, 222, 223–224, 226, 233, 237, 249
 - history of 22, 87, 183, 196
 - Renaissance and 22, 114–115, 211, 244
 - works on 20
- Hume, David 133, 251
- Humphry Clinker* (Smollett) 207
- Hundred Years War 97, 210, 222, 255, 271
- Hunmin jeongeum* 264
- Huron tribe 124
- Hus, Jan 116
- Huss, John. See Hus, Jan
- "Huswifery" (Taylor) 283
- Hutcheson, Francis 122–123
- Hutchinson, Thomas 303
- Huygens, Christian 153
- Hymns* (Ronsard) 248
- Hymns to the Night* (Novalis) 207
- Hyperaspistes* (Erasmus) 89
- The Hypochondriac* (Molière). See Le Malade imaginaire

I

- Ibn al-Khatib 117, 118
- Ibn Khaldūn 117–119, 118
- Ibn Zamraq 117
- Ibrahim, or the Illustrious Basha* (Scudéry). See Ibrahim, ou le basse illustre
- Ibrahim, ou le basse illustre* (Ibrahim, or the Illustrious Basha; Scudéry) 264
- Ibsen, Henrik 292
- Icuic Nezahualpilli yc Tlamato Huexotzinco* (Song of Nezahualpilli during the War with Huexotzinco; Nezahualpilli) 203
- I diloghi* (Aretino) 7
- Idylls* (Theocritus) 217
- Ignatius his Conclave* (Donne) 78
- Ignatius of Loyola, Saint 119–120, 124, 284–285
- Iacomilus, Martinus. See Waldseemüller, Martin
- Iliad* (Homer) 86, 175, 226, 228
- Illustre Théâtre troupe 189–190
- Images of Divine Things* (Edwards) 80
- The Imaginary Invalid* (Molière). See Le Malade imaginaire
- The Imitation of Christ* (Thomas à Kempis) 64, 286
- "Improvvised on the Road" (Yuan Hungdao) 312
- Inada, Miles 308
- El Inca. See Garcilaso de la Vega
- Index of Prohibited Books 62, 71, 77
- The Industrious Bee* (Sumarokov) 277
- Inés de Castro* (Ferreira) 94
- The Infinite Universe and Worlds* (Bruno) 32
- Al-Inkishafi* (Abdallah) 1
- in medias res* 86
- "In Praise of Britain" (Skelton). See "De Laudibus Britanniae"
- In Praise of Folly* (Erasmus) 88–89
- Inquisition 32–33, 71, 99, 162, 282, 299
- Institutio Christianae Religionis* (Institutes of the Christian Religion; Calvin) 37
- Institut National (France) 2

- "Instructions for My Wife, the Vice-Governor's First Lady" (Izmailov) 120
- Intercenales* (Alberti) 4
- The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, Or Gustavus Vassa* (Equiano) 87
- The Interior Castle* (Teresa of Avila) 285
- Introduction to Cosmology, With Certain Necessary Principles of Geometry and Astronomy* (Waldseemüller) 302
- "Introduction to Volate" (Metastasio) 185
- Iphigénie* (Racine) 240
- Irène* (Voltaire) 299
- Iroquois literature 70–71
- Iroquois tribe 124
- Irwin, Robert 118
- Isabel de Urbina 161
- Isabella* (Aregensola) 8
- Isabella (queen of Spain) 57
- Ischia, bishop of 296
- Islam, influence of 275
- Isocrates 188
- Italian Journey* (Goethe) 104
- Italian literature
- genres 60
 - humanism in 115
 - three crowns of 22, 223
 - writers 3–4, 5, 7–8, 8–9, 9–10, 20–21, 32–33, 39, 45–46, 57–58, 71, 104, 108, 154–156, 168–170, 182, 184–188, 199, 214–215, 221–225, 226–227, 232–233, 282–283, 295, 296
- The Itching Parrot* (Fernández de Lizardi). See El periquillo sarniento
- It Is an Ill Wind That Blows No Good* (Ruiz de Alarcón). See No hay mal que por bien no venga
- Ixilxochitl of Texcoco 36
- Izmailov, Aleksandr 120
- Izumi school 143

J

- Jacques le fataliste et son maître* (Jacques the Fatalist and his master; Diderot) 77
- Jakaltek Mayan literature 141
- James I (king of England) 14, 78, 127, 128
- James I (king of Scotland) 262
- James II (king of England) 69
- James IV (king of Scotland) 263
- Jansenists 215–216, 239–240
- Japanese literature
- Bunraku. See Bunraku
 - haiku. See haiku
 - Kabuki. See Kabuki
 - Kyogen 126, 143
 - Noh (Nō). See Noh
 - writers 17–19, 52–54, 126, 139–140, 256, 281, 313–314
- Jara, Faama Da 16
- Jara, Monzon 16
- Jara, Ngolo 16
- Jatib, al-. See Ibn al-Khatib
- Jean de Meun 51, 210, 224, 271–272
- Jefferson, Thomas 95, 121–123, 122–123, 133, 306
- Jerusalem Conquered* (Tasso) 282
- Jerusalem Delivered* (Tasso) 247
- Jerusalem Revisited* (Tasso) 282–283
- Jesuit Relations* (periodical) 123–124
- The Jew of Malta* (Marlowe) 176
- The Jews* (Lessing) 157
- Jiandang xinhua* (New tales written while cutting the wick; Qu You) 136–137
- Jian Leng 309

- Jiménez de Quesada, Gonzalo 124–125
Jin Ping Mei (Chin P'ing Mei; The Plum in the Golden Vase; Golden Lotus; Xiao Xiaosheng) 41, 125–126, 269
 Jippensha Ikku 126
 Joan of Arc 224
 Jodelle, Etienne 225
 Jogues, Isaac 124
 John of Gaunt 50–51
 John of the Cross, Saint 126–127, 285
 Johnson, Samuel 27–28, 28, 202, 228
Jonathan Edwards (Miller) 81
 Jonson, Ben 56, 58, 78, 127–128, 177, 244
jōruri 34
Joseph Andrews (Fielding) 207
Jou pu tuan (The Carnal Prayer Mat; Li Yu) 159
Journal and Major Essays (Woolman) 307
Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides (Boswell) 28
The Journal of Madame Knight (Knight) 139
Journal of the First Voyage (Columbus) 57
Journal of the Plague Year (Defoe) 69–70
Journals (Riebeeck) 246–247
Journey Across Three Seas (Nikitin) 204–205
A Journey from St. Petersburg to Moscow (Radishchev) 242, 290
The Journeys of Celia Fiennes (Fiennes) 289
The Journey to the West (Wu Chengen) 41, 308–310
A Journey to the Western Isles (Johnson) 28
 Joyce, James 296
 “The Joys of the Wedding Chamber” (Shen Fu) 268
 Juana (queen of Spain) 295
 Juan de Yepes. See John of the Cross, Saint Julian of Norwich 56, 128–129, 135
Julie, or the New Heloise (Rousseau) 245, 250–251
 Jung Mong Joo (Chǒng Mong-ju) 129
 Jung Yak Yong (Chong Yagyong) 129–130
 Junto Club 94
Justice of the Monarch's Will (Prokopovitch) 232
Justin (Metastasio) 185
Justine (Sade) 259
 Juvenal 160
- K
- Kabuki 34, 52–53, 131–132, 281
Kagekiyo Victorious (Chikamatsu) 52
Kakyo (The Mirror of the Flower; Zeami) 314
 Kangxi (Kang-hsi; emperor of China) 40–41
 El Kanil. See Komam Q' Anil, Epic of
 Kannami Kiyotsugu 205, 313
 Kant, Immanuel 102–103, 132–134, 137, 154, 260, 262, 278
 Kantemir, Antiokh 40
 Kantemiroglu. See Cantemir, Dimitrie
 Kanze. See Kannami Kiyotsugu
 Kaozhengxue (Kao-cheng hsueh; “empirical studies”) 141
 Karamzin, Nikolai 72, 77, 105, 120, 204, 242
Karamzinians 233
 Karl August (duke of Saxe-Weimar) 102
Kate of Heilbronn (Kleist) 137
 Kaye, Harvey J. 212, 214
 Keene, Donald 54, 281
 Kempe, John 135
 Kempe, Margery 129, 135–136
 Kerouac, Jack 19
Key Into the Languages of America (Williams) 306
A Key to Annihilating Ignorance (Lee Yul Kok). See Kyongmong Yogyol
 Kilmer, Nicholas 248
 Kim Jung Hee (Kim Chung-hui) 136
 Kim Shi-sup (Kim Sisup) 136–137
The Kingdom of Lovers (Ruusbroec) 255
The Kingis Quair (or Quhair; James I of Scotland) 262
King Lear (Shakespeare) 267
 King Philip's War 82, 252
 King Se-jong 114
King Torrismondo (Tasso) 282
 Ki no Tsurayuki 289
 Kinsakin, Matsuo. See Bashō
Kitab al-'Ibar (The Book of Examples; Ibn Khaldūn) 118–119
 Kleist, Heinrich von 137–138
 Kleist, Ulrike 137
 Klinger, F. M. 113
 Klopstock, Friedrich Gottlieb 138
 Knight, Sarah Kemble 138–139
The Knight from Olmedo (Lope de Vega) 162, 289
 “The Knight's Tale” (Chaucer) 167, 262
 Knoerle, Jeanne 43
 Kobayashi Issa 111, 139–140
 “Kobayashi Issa” (Hernandez Cruz) 140
 Kobayashi Yatarō. See Kobayashi Issa
 Kochanowski, Jan 140–141
 Koenig, Eva 157
 Koenig, Juan Ramón 220
 Kokusen 256
Komam Q' Anil, Epic of 141
 Komensk_, Jan Ámos. See Comenius, Johann Amos Kong Shangren (Kung Shang-jen) 141–142
 Konigsberg, Ira 245
 Kopernik, Mikotaj. See Copernicus, Nicolaus
 Korean literature 55, 114, 129–130, 136–137, 152–153, 264–265
Kosan Kagok (Nine Songs of Kosan; Lee Yul Kok) 153
 Krapp, Katherine 183
 Krylov, Ivan 142–143
Kubla Khan (Coleridge) 17
 Kühn, Sophie von 206
 Kulubaly, Mamani Biton 16
 Kumar, Krishna 293
Kumo Sinhwa (New Stories from Golden Turtle Mountain; Kim Shi-sup) 136
 Kundera, Milan 50
 Kung-an School 312
 kunju opera 282
 Kutuzov, Mikhail 105
 Kwanami Kiyotsugu 143
 Kyd, Thomas 289
 Kyogen 126, 143
 kyōka 126
Kyongmong Yogyol (A Key to Annihilating Ignorance; Lee Yul Kok) 152
Kyongse yp'yo (Design for Good Government; Jung Yak Yong) 130
- L
- Labé, Louise 144–145
 La Boétie, Étienne de 192
 La Bruyère, Jean de 145–146
The Labyrinth of the World and the Paradise of the Heart (Comenius) 59
 Lacos, Pierre Choderlos de 146–147, 207
The Lady Nit-Wit (Lope de Vega). See La dama boba
The Lady of May (Sidney) 270
Lady of the Camellias (Dumas Fils) 52
 “The Lady's Dressing Room” (Swift) 279
 Lafayette, Madame de (comtesse de Lafayette) 147–148, 148, 151, 175, 265, 266
 La Fontaine, Jean de 2, 142, 147, 148–149, 160, 174, 190, 277
La Fontaine: Selected Fables (Michie) 149
L'Allegro (Milton) 188
 “Lament for the Makars” (Dunbar) 262, 263 laments 217
Laments (Kochanowski) 140
 Langland, William 6, 50, 149–151, 218
 Languet, Hubert 270
Laocoon (Lessing) 157
 Laozo (Lao-tsu) 152
 La Rochefoucauld, François, duc de 56, 147, 148, 151
 Las Casas, Bartolomé de 151–152
 “The Last Flight of the Quetzal Prince” 54
The Last Judgment 66
The Last Supper (Leonardo da Vinci) 155
El lazarillo de ciegos caminantes (Carrijo de la Vandra) 43–44 lazzi 60
 The learned band 232
 Lee, Richard Henry 122
 Lee Yul Kok (Yi Yulgok) 152–153
The Legacy (Villon) 297
The Legend of Chun Hyang (film) 55
The Legend of Good Women (Chaucer) 51
 Leibniz, Friedrich 153
 Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm 137, 153–154, 299
 Leigh, R. A. 251
 Leite, Maria 94
 Lejeune, Paul 124
 Le Loi (king of Vietnam) 204
 Lemay, J. A. Leo 273
 “Lembranas e Apontamentos do Governo Provisorio de São Paulo” (Andrada e Silva) 7
Lena (Ariosto) 9
 Lentino, Giacomo David 273
 Leonardo da Vinci 4, 154–156, 168, 182, 186, 244
 Leon-Portilla, Miguel 54
 Leo X (pope) 7, 20
 Léry, Jean de 156–157
 Lessing, Gotthold 157–158, 276
 Le Thai Tong (emperor of Vietnam) 204
letrilla 105
Lettera . . . quattri . . . viaggi (Vespucci) 295
Letter on French Music (Rousseau) 251
Letter on the Blind (Diderot). See Lettre sur les aveugles
Letter on the Deaf and Dumb (Diderot). See Lettre sur les sourds et muets
 “Letter on the Rules of Russian Poetry” (Lomonosov) 160
Letters (Metastasio) 185
 Letters, Science, and Arts Lovers Free Society 120
Letters and commands from the time of military service (Nguyen Trai). See Quang Trung Tu Menh Tap
Letters Concerning the English Nation (Voltaire) 298
Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania (Dickinson) 75
Letters from an American Farmer (Crèvecoeur) 65
Letters from an Exile at Botany Bay to His Aunt in Dumfries (Watling) 304
Letters from a Peruvian Woman (Graffigny) 107
Letters of Report (Cortés) 64
Letters on Familiar Affairs and Letters of Riper Years (Petrarch) 222
Letters Written in France to a Friend in London (Tench) 284
Letters Written on the Mountain (Rousseau) 251
Letter to Christophe de Beaumont (Rousseau) 251

- Letter to d'Alembert* (Rousseau) 251
 "Letter to Soderini" (Vespucci) 295
Lettres d'une Péruvienne (Graffigny) 107
Lettres Persanes (Persian Letters; Montesquieu) 194
Lettres Provinciales (Pascal) 216
Lettre sur les aveugles (Letter on the Blind; Diderot) 76
Lettre sur les sourds et muets (Letter on the Deaf and Dumb; Diderot) 76
 Levasseur, Thérèse 250, 251
 Levin, Harry 176
 Levy, André 310
 Lewis, J. 92
 Lewis, Matthew 247
L'Histoire de Monsieur Cleveland (The History of Mr. Cleveland; Prévost) 231
Les Liaisons dangereuses (Dangerous Liaisons; Laclós) 146 librettists 184–185
Life (Alfieri). See Vita
Life (Avvakum). See Zhitie
The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (Sterne) 207
Life in Angiers (Cervantes) 48
Life Is a Dream (Calderón de la Barca) 36–37
The Life of Archpriest Avvakum by Himself (Avvakum) 12
The Life of Dante (Boccaccio) 23
Life of Johnson (Boswell) 27–28
The Life of Marianne (Marivaux) 175
Life of Monsieur de Molière (Bulgakov) 190
The Life of Pico 196
La Ligue (Voltaire) 298
Lima fundada o conquista del Peru (The Founding of Lima or Conquest of Peru; Peralta) 220
 Lincoln, Abraham 123
 "Lines, occasioned by the Death of an Infant" (Murray) 199
The Lion King (musical) 34
The Lisbon Earthquake (Voltaire) 298–299 literary criticism 128, 157, 158, 160, 214, 227, 228, 264, 313
The Little Book of Clarification (Ruusbroec) 255
Little Commentary (Copernicus) 62
 "Little Dove" (Dmitriev) 77
The Little Moor (Bredero) 31
 "Little Red Riding Hood" (Perrault) 221
 Liu Wuchi 43
The Living Flame of Love (St. John of the Cross) 126–127
 Livy 8, 169, 222
 Li Yu (Li Yü) 158–159
 La Llorona 159
 Lloyd, Henry 111
Loci Communes (Melanchthon) 183
 Lock, William 61
 Locke, John 4, 73, 83, 121, 122, 133, 251
 Lomonosov, Mikhail 71–72, 159–161, 232, 277
London Packet (ship) 212
 Longfellow, Henry W. 163
 Longus 247
 Lope de Vega Carpio, Félix 161–164
 contemporaries of 36, 235–236
 influences of/on 8, 287
 literary criticism on 48, 244
 works by 106, 285, 289
 López de Gómara, Francisco 164
 "Lord Rendal" 84
Lord Empire (film) 308
 Louis XI (king of France) 296
 Louis XII (king of France) 172, 189, 265
 Louis XIII (king of France) 1, 63
 Louis XIV (king of France) court and associates of 25, 27, 92, 147, 148, 149, 240, 241 literary interests of 2, 190–191, 264 neoclassicism and 202 reign of 151, 239, 265
 works on 221, 240, 298–299
 Louis XV (king of France) 258
 Louis XVI (king of France) 213
Lover's Confession (Gower). See Confessio Amantis
The Love-Suicides at Sonezaki (Chikamatsu) 52
Love Vision (Boccaccio) 23
 Lowe, Nicholas 61
 Lowell, Amy 19
Lucelle (Bredero) 31
 Lucian 4, 50, 97, 220, 237, 280
Lucifer (Vondel) 301
 Lucretius 193
 Luis de Escatrón. See Argensola, Bartolomé
 Leonardo de
 Luján, Micaela de 161
 Lully, Jean Baptiste 190
 Luo Guanzhong (Lo Kuan-chung) 125, 164–165, 269
Os Lusíadas (The Lusíads; Camões) 38–39
 Luther, Martin 165–166
 contemporaries of 88–89, 183
 Counter-Reformation and 282, 284–285
 influence of 257, 260
 literary criticism on 38
 Reformation and 47, 89, 244 and science 62
Lycidas (Milton) 188, 217
 Lyngate, John 166–167
 Lyons, Israel 16
Lyric Poems (Petrarch). See Canzoniere
- M
- The Mabinogion* 171
Macbeth (Shakespeare) 267, 289
 Machaut, Guillaume de 297
 Machiavelli, Niccolò 108, 155, 168, 168–170, 244
 Macuilxochitzin. See Moquihuitzín
 "Macuilxochitzin Icuic" ("Song of Macuilxocitl"; Moquihuitzín) 196
 Maddox, Donald 98
Magnalia Christi Americana (Mather) 179
 Il Magnifico. See Medici, Lorenzo de'
Magnyfyccence (Skelton) 272
Mahabharata 86
 Mahony, Robert 280
Maistre Pierre Pathelin 92
 Makars 262
Le Malade imaginaire (The Hypochondriac, The Imaginary Invalid; Molière) 191
 Malcolm X 87
 Malebranche, Nicolas de 153
 Malherbe, François de 148
 La Malinche 159
 Mallarmé, Stéphane 19
 Malone, Edmond 28
 Malory, Thomas 170–172, 271
Mandragola (Machiavelli) 169
Mankind 67
 Man of Lightning. See Komam Q' Anil, Epic of The Man of Mode (Etherege) 59
Manon Lescaut (Prévost) 232
 Manrique, Jerónimo (bishop of Avila) 161
A Map of Virginia and The Proceedings of the English Colony in Virginia (Smith) 273
 Mapuche tribes 249
 March, Ausiàs 172
Il Marescalco (The Marescalco; Aretino) 8
 Marguerite de Navarre 172–173
Les Marguerites de la Marguerite des Princesses (The Pearls of the Pearl of Princesses; Marguerite de Navarre) 173
 Maria Theresa (archduchess of Austria) 184
 Marie de France 91, 142, 171, 271
 Marieke van Nimwegen 173–174
 Mariken van Nieumeghen. See Marieke van Nimwegen
Mariken van Nieumeghen (film) 174
Marília de Dirceu (Gonzaga) 100
 Marina, Doña 159
 Marivaux, Pierre Carlet de Chamblain de 60, 174–175
 Marlowe, Christopher 103, 175–177, 244, 289
 Marot, Clément 115, 148, 177
 Marot, Jean 177
 Marqués de Pombal 100
 Marquette, Jacques 124
The Marriage of Figaro (Beaumarchais) 19
The Marriage of Figaro (Mozart) 19
 Martial, influence of 160
 Marulic', Marko 177–178
 Marx, Karl 133
 Marx Brothers 60, 92
Mary: Or a Test of Honour (Rowson) 253
The Maryland Muse (Cook) 61
Mary Magdalene 67
 Mary of Burgundy 115
 Mary Queen of Scots 260
Mary Stuart (Schiller) 260
The Masque of Beauty (Jonson) 127–128
The Masque of Blackness (Jonson) 127–128
The Masque of Queens (Jonson) 127–128
Massachusetts Magazine (Murray) 199
Massachusetts Spy (Warren) 303
The Massacre at Paris (Marlowe) 176
 Massenet, Jules 232
The Master of Killarney (Prévost). See Le Doyen de la Killarine
Materials for the Philosophy of the History of Mankind (Herder) 114
 Mather, Cotton 94, 178–179, 179
 Mather, Increase 178, 179–180
 Mather, Richard 82, 178, 179
Matsukaze (Zeami) 313
 Matsuo, Bashō. See Bashō
 Matsuo Munefusa. See Bashō
 Maximilian (Holy Roman Emperor) 30, 115
The Maxims of Rochefoucauld (La Rochefoucauld). See Reflexions ou sentences et maxims morales
 Mayan literature 25–26, 141, 180–182, 184, 229–230, 239
 Mayflower Compact 29
 May Fourth Movement 159
Meat out of the Eater (Wigglesworth) 305
Medea (Euripides) 292
 Medici, Cosimo de' 56
 Medici, Giuliano de' 182, 226
 Medici, Giulio de' 7
 Medici, Lorenzo de' 182–183, 186, 226, 227, 233, 244
 Medici, Lorenzo di Pier Francesco de' 295
 Medici family 168–169, 182, 186, 244, 295 medieval literature 6, 48, 60, 90, 91–92, 247, 274
Meditations on First Philosophy (Descartes) 73
The Medium (Murray) 200
 Meerbeke, Margareta van 255
Meistergesang tradition 257

- Melanchthon, Philipp 183
Meliador (Froissart) 97
Mélite (Cornille) 63
melodramma 185
 Melville, Herman 39
Memoires (Perrault) 221
Memoires et aventures d'un homme de qualité qui s'est retiré de monde (Memoirs of a Man of Quality Retired from the World; Prévost) 231
Memoirs (Beaumarchais) 19
Memoirs of a Cavalier (Defoe) 69
Memoirs of a Man of Quality Retired from the World (Prévost). See Memoires et aventures d'un homme de qualité qui s'est retiré de monde
Memoirs on the Court of France 1688–1689 (Lafayette) 147
A Memorable History of the City of Sancerre (Léry). See Histoire memorable de la ville de Sancerre
Memorable Providences, Relating to Witchcrafts and Possessions (Mather) 179
 Ménage 265
 Menander 58
 Menéndez y Pelayo 15
The Men of the Marshes (Shi Naian and Luo Guanzhong). See Shuihuzhuan
 Mercier, Louis-Sébastien 293
Mercurie Galant (periodical) 147
The Merry Wives of Windsor (Shakespeare) 267–268
 Merwin, W. S. 187, 272
A merye jest of a man that was called Howleglas (Copland, trans.) 287
 Mesoamerican mythology 183–184. See also Aztec literature; Mayan literature; Toltec culture
Messiah (Klopstock) 138
 Metacomet (King Philip) 252
Metamorphoses (Ovid) 6, 107, 198
Metaphysics of Ethics (Kant) 133
 Metastasio, Pietro 184–185
Metrical Letters (Petrarch) 222
 Mexican literature 93
Mexican Songs (Bierhorst, trans.). See Cantares mexicanas
The Mexican Thinker (periodical) 93
 Michelangelo Buonarroti 56, 115, 182, 185–188, 226, 244
 Michie, James 149
 “Midday” (Parini) 214
 Middle Ages 23, 33, 87, 243–244. See also medieval literature
 Middle Scots Poets 262–263
 Milan, duke of 210
Milcah Martha Moore’s Book (Moore, ed.) 195
 Miller, Perry 81, 180
 “The Miller’s Tale” (Chaucer) 91
 Milton, John 188–189
 influences of/on 39, 121, 212, 283, 290, 301, 304
 literary criticism on 205, 217, 277
 Minas Conspiracy 100
Minna von Barnhelm (Lessing) 157
 Mirabeau, Honoré Gabriel Riqueti, comte de 251 miracle plays 66–68
Le Miroir de l’âme pécheresse (Mirror of the Sinful Soul; Marguerite de Navarre) 173
The Mirror of Eternal Blessedness (Ruusbroec) 255
Mirror of Man (Gower). See Speculum Meditantis
The Mirror of the Flower (Zeami). See Kakyo
Mirror of the Sinful Soul (Marguerite de Navarre). See Miroir de l’âme pécheresse
- The Misanthrope* (Molière) 190
Miscellanies, Moral and Instructive (Moore) 195
Miscellany (Poliziano) 227
Mischief-Makers (Krylov) 142
The Miser (Molière) 190
The Misogynist (Lessing) 157 missionaries, to Native Americans 2–3, 6, 81–82, 123–124, 151–152, 198, 209, 210, 230, 231, 249, 285
Miss Quixote and Her Cousin (Fernández de Lizardi) 93
Miss Sara Sampson (Lessing) 157
Mithridate (Racine) 240
 Miyoshi Shoraku 281
 mock wills 297
 “A Modest Proposal” (Swift) 279–280
 Mohammad, Shams ud-Dīn. See Hāfiz
 Mohammed (prophet) 47
 Molière 2, 64, 137, 189–192
 friends and colleagues of 21, 240, 241
 influences of/on 21, 60, 157, 288
 literary criticism on 58, 63, 175, 191, 202, 277
Molière, A Theatrical Life (Scott) 190
Molière and the Comedy of Intellect (Hubert) 190
 Mollel, Tololwa 10
Moll Flanders (Defoe) 69, 70
 Momus (Alberti) 3
Monadology (Leibniz) 153–154
Monkey (Inada and Carroll) [anime] 308
Monkey (Saiyuki; television show) 308
Monkey Magic (Saiyuki; television show) 308
 Monmouth, duke of 69
 Montagu, Sir Edward 218
 Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley 289
 Montaigne, Michel de 192–194
 friends and colleagues of 147
 influences of/on 14, 238
 literary criticism by/on 48, 115, 192–194, 244
 Montauk tribe 209
 Montcorbier, François de. See Villon, François
 Montdory (French actor) 63
 Montemayor, Jorge de 217
 Montesquieu, Charles-Louis de Secondat, baron de la Brède et de 194–195
 Encyclopédia and 76, 83
 Enlightenment and 4, 85, 242
 influence of 46, 121
 literary criticism on 75–76, 207
 Montezuma II (Aztec emperor) 13, 36, 64
 Montreuil, Renée-Pélagie de 258
 Moore, Charles 195
 Moore, Milcah Martha 195
 Moquihuitzin 195–196, 201
Moral, Pastoral, and Amorous Letters (Simocatta) 61 moral fable 120
 morality plays 66–68, 90
Moral Letters (Rousseau) 250–251
The Morall Fabillis of Esope the Phrygian (Henryson) 113 Moral Maxims (La Rochefoucauld). See Reflexions ou sentences et maxims morales
 More, Anne 78
 More, John 196
 More, Sir Thomas 78, 115, 196–197, 293
 contemporaries of 88, 89, 238
 influences of/on 238, 244
 “Morgante” (Pulci) 238
 Morison, Samuel Eliot 283
 “Morning” (Parini) 214
 “Morning Meditations on the Majesty of God” (Lomonosov) 160
La Mort de César (Voltaire) 298
Morte Arthur (anon.) 171
Le Morte D’Arthur (Malory) 170–172
 Morton, Archbishop 196
Moscow Journal (periodical) 77
 Motier, Jean-François 147
 Motokiyo Kanze. See Zeami Motokiyo
 Motolinia, Toribio de 198
La moza de cántaro (The Girl with the Jug; Lope de Vega) 162
 Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus 19, 56, 104, 185, 214, 288
 Muhammad, Abu `Abdallah. See Ibn al-Khatib
 Muhammad, Abu Zayd `Abd al-Rahman ibn Muhammad. See Ibn Khaldūn
Mundas novas (The New World; Vespucci) 295, 302
 Munford, Robert 198–199
 Munford, William 198
 Munjong (king of Korea) 265
Muqaddimah (The Prolegomena; Ibn Khaldūn) 117–118
 Muratori, Ludovico Antonio 199
 Muratorian Canon 199
 Murray, Judith Sargent 199–200
 Musa, Mark 223
muwashshah 118
My Secret Book (Petrarch) 223 mystery plays 66–68
 myth of Quetzalcoatl. See Quetzalcoatl, myth of mythology, Mesoamerican. See Mesoamerican mythology
- N
- Nahuatl poetry 201–202, 202–204
 Namiki Senryu 281
Naniwa Miyage (Hozumi) 53
 Napoleon I (Napoleon Bonaparte) 19, 102, 146, 214, 259, 261
The Narrative of Cabeza de Vaca (Cabeza de Vaca) 35
A Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (Rowlandson) 252
A Narrative of the Expedition to Botany Bay (Tench) 284
 “The Narrow Road to the Deep North” (Bashō) 18–19
 Narváez, Pánfilo de 35
 Nash, Ralph 283
 Nasier, Alcofribas. See Rabelais
Nathan the Wise (Lessing) 157–158
National Gazette (periodical) 197
 National Theater (Germany) 51
 National Theater (Japan) 132
 Native Americans
 Aztec literature 12–13, 36, 159, 195–196, 201–202, 202–204, 235
 education and 82
 Iroquois oral literature 70–71
 Mayan literature 25–26, 141, 180–182, 184, 229–230, 239
 Mesoamerican mythology 183–184 missionaries to 2–3, 6, 81–82, 123–124, 151–152, 198, 209, 210, 230, 231, 249, 285
 Nahuatl poetry 201–202, 202–204
 Toltec culture 180, 181, 235
 works on 22, 35, 156, 198, 249, 252–253, 276–277, 306
Natural and Moral History of the East and West Indies (Acosta) 3

- Naufragios y relación de la jornada que hizo a la Florida con el adelantado Pánfilo de Narváez* (Cabeza de Vaca) 35
- The Necromancer* (Ariosto) 9
- Nelson, Lord Horatio 17
- neoclassicism 202, 228
- Neo-Confucianism 129, 152–153
- Neoplatonism 101, 186
- The Neveu de Rameau (Rameau's Nephew; Diderot)* 77
- New Art of Writing Plays at This Time* (Lope de Vega). See Arte nuevo de hacer comedias en este tiempo
- The New Atlantis* (Bacon) 15, 293
- The New England Courant* (periodical) 94
- New England Trials* (Smith) 273
- New Life* (Dante) 23
- The New Lucian of Quito* (Santa Cruz y Espejo). See El nuevo luciano de Quito
- New Science* (Vico) 296
- New Stories from Golden Turtle Mountain* (Kim Shi-sup). See Kumo Sinhwa
- Newton, Sir Isaac 4, 83, 85, 133, 153, 216, 278, 298
- New Tool* (Bacon). See Novum Organum
- The New Universal Geography* (Carver) 44
- The New World* (Vespucci). See Mundas novas
- Nezahualcoyotl 184, 201, 202–203, 203
- Nezahualpilli 36, 201, 203–204
- Nguyen Thi Lo 204
- Nguyen Trai 204
- Nibelungenlied* 86
- Nietzsche, Friedrich 262
- “Night” (Parini) 215
- Night & Horses & The Desert* (Irwin) 118
- “Night in the Medici Chapel” (Michelangelo) 187
- Nijō Yoshimoto 313
- Nikitin, Afanasij 204–205
- Nikolev, Nikolai Petrovich 205
- Nine Songs of Kosan* (Lee Yul Kok). See Kosan Kugok
- Ninety-five Theses* (Luther) 165–166
- ninyo joruri*. See Bunraku
- Nirokuan Chikua 139
- Noah (Vondel) 301
- noble savages 250
- Nogarola, Isotta 115
- Noh (Nō) 131, 205–206, 239, 313–314
- No hay mal que por bien no venga* (It Is an Ill Wind That Blows No Good; Ruiz de Alarcón) 254
- Nomura school 143
- Northern Group 136
- Notes on the State of Virginia* (Jefferson) 122, 123
- La Nouvelle Héloïse* (Rousseau) 251
- Novalis 206–207, 261
- Nova Methodus Pro Maximis et Minimis* (“New Method for the Greatest and the Least”; Leibniz) 153
- novels
- development of
 - in China 41, 125, 165, 269, 308
 - in England 69–70
 - in France 147
 - in Latin-America 43–44
 - epistolary 107, 207–208, 245, 251
 - Korean 55
 - realism in 70
- The Novices of Saïs* (Novalis) 207
- Novum Organum* (New Tool; Bacon) 14–15
- N-Town cycle 66
- El nuevo luciano de Quito* (The New Lucian of Quito; Santa Cruz y Espejo) 259
- The Nun* (Diderot) 77
- “The Nun’s Priest’s Tale” (Chaucer) 91
- The Nymphs of Fiesole* (Boccaccio) 23
- O
- Obras poéticas* (Poetical Works; Olmedo) 210
- Observations on the Feeling of the Beautiful and Sublime* (Kant) 134
- Occom, Samson 209
- Oceana* (Harrington) 293
- Ocillo, Isabel Chimpu 101
- La oda a la toma de Larache* (Ode on the Taking of Larache; Góngora y Argote) 106
- “Ode on the Death of Bibikov” (Derzhavin) 72
- Ode on the Taking of Larache* (Góngora y Argote). See La oda a la toma de Larache
- Odes* (Parini) 214
- Odes* (Ronsard) 248
- Odes Translated and Composed Near Chitalagui Mountain* (Derzhavin) 72
- Ode to America’s Independence* (Alfieri) 5
- “Ode to Felitsa” (Derzhavin) 72
- “Ode to Joy” (Schiller) 260
- Ode to the City of Nuremberg* (Sachs) 257
- Édipe* (Voltaire) 298
- Odyssey* (Homer) 86, 92, 282, 289
- Oedipus in Athens* (Ozerov) 211
- Oedipus Rex* (Sophocles) 292
- “Of Anger” (Montaigne) 193
- “Of Cannibals” (Montaigne) 193
- “Of Conscience” (Montaigne) 193
- “Of Constancy” (Montaigne) 193
- “Of Drunkenness” (Montaigne) 193
- “Of Idleness” (Montaigne) 193
- “Of Insects” (Edwards) 80
- Of Plymouth Plantation* (Bradford) 29
- “Of Repentance” (Montaigne) 193
- “Of the Inconsistency of Our Action” (Montaigne) 193
- Of Tyranny* (Alfieri) 5
- Ojeda, Alonso de 295
- Okuni 131
- Okura school 143
- Old Crow* (Boccaccio). See Corbaccio
- The Old Maid* (Lessing) 157
- “The Old Pond” (Bashō) 18
- Olivares, duke of (Gaspar de Guzmán, count- duke of Olivares) 105
- Olivares, Miguel de 210
- L’Olive* (The Olive; Bellay) 20, 226, 274
- Olmedo, José Joaquín 210
- “O Navis” (Lope de Vega) 163
- “On Being and Unity” (Pico della Mirandola). See De Ente et Uno
- “On Being Brought from Africa to America” (Wheatley) 304–305
- O’Neale, Sondra A. 111
- On Education* (Kant) 134
- 120 Days of Sodom* (Sade) 258
- On German Architecture* (Goethe) 102
- On German Character and Art* (Herder). See Von deutscher Art und Kunst
- On God* (Spinoza) 276
- On Heaven and Its Wonders and Hell* (Swedenborg) 278
- “On His Blindness” (Milton) 188
- On His Own Ignorance and That of Many Others* (Petrarch) 115, 222
- On Illustrious Men* (Petrarch) 222
- The Only Way* (Las Casas) 151
- On Noble Customs and Liberal Studies of Adolescents* (Vergerio) 115
- On Painting* (Alberti) 4
- On Religious Leisure* (Petrarch) 222
- On Secular Authority and How Far One Should Be Obedient to It* (Luther) 166
- On the Aesthetic Education of Man* (Schiller) 260
- On the Art of Building* (Alberti) 4
- On the Creation of the World* (Tasso) 282
- “On the Death of General Wooster” (Wheatley) 305
- On the Language and Wisdom of India* (periodical) 261
- On the Life of Solitude* (Petrarch) 222
- On the Naïve and Sentimental in Literature* (Schiller) 260
- “On the Painting of the Sistine Chapel” (Michelangelo) 187
- On the Relation Between Man’s Animal and Spiritual Nature* (Schiller) 260
- On the Revolutions of the Heavenly Spheres* (Copernicus). See De Revolutionibus Orbium Coelestium
- On the Use of Church Books in the Russian Language* (Lomonosov) 160
- “Opasnyi sosed” (“The Dangerous Neighbor”; Pushkin) 233
- Oragu Haru* (The Year of My Life; Kobayashi Issa) 139
- oral literature 10–11, 26, 54–55, 70–71, 159, 180–182, 289
- Oration on Aerial Phenomena, proceeding from the Force of Electricity* (Lomonosov) 160
- Oration on the Dignity of Man* (Pico della Mirandola) 224
- Orazia* (The horatii; Aretino) 8
- Oreste* (Voltaire) 298
- Oresteia* (Aeschylus) 289
- Orfeo* (Poliziano) 227
- Orlando Furioso* (Ariosto) 6, 9–10, 282, 283
- Orlando Innamorato* (Boiardo) 9
- Orléans, Charles, duc d’ 210–211, 297
- Orléans, duchess of 148
- Orléans, Louis d’ 210
- Ormond* (Brown) 31
- Orpheus and Euridice* (Henryson) 113
- Orton, Nick 308
- Osiander, Andreas 32
- Osorio, Elena 161
- Ossian 211
- Othello* (Shakespeare) 267
- The Other World* (de Bergerac) 21
- Ottoman literature 46–47
- Oudry, Jean-Baptiste 149
- O Uruguai* (Gama) 100
- Outlaws of the Marsh* (Shi Naian and Luo Guanzhong). See Shuihuzhuan
- Ovid
- influence of 20, 50, 106, 107, 148, 178, 223, 226, 263, 286
 - literary criticism on 6, 277
 - translations of 177, 198
- Owen, Robert 293
- Ozerov, Vladislav Aleksandrovich 211
- P
- A Pact with Silence* (Rubin) 149
- Paine, Thomas 212–214
- The Painter of His Own Dishonour* (Calderón de la Barca) 289
- Pak Che-ga 136
- Palais-Royal Theater 190
- The Palace of Honour* (Douglas) 263
- Palmyra* (Nikolev) 205
- Pamela* (Richardson) 207, 245

- Pamela II* (Richardson) 245
Panchatantra 10, 142
Panegyric to the Duke of Lerma (Góngora y Argote) 106
pansori 55
Pantagruel (Rabelais) 237–238
 “Pantophile” 76
 “Papillon du Parnasse” (“Poetic Butterfly”; La Fontaine) 148 parable, v. allegory 5
Paradise Lost (Milton) 188–189, 290
Paradise Regained (Milton) 188
Parallèle des Anciens et des Modernes (Perrault) 221
Las paredes oyen (The Walls Have Ears; Ruiz de Alarcón) 254
 Parini, Giuseppe 214–215
The Parliament of Fowls (Chaucer) 51
 Parrington, Vernon 178
 Partridge, John 278
 Pascal, Blaise 56, 215–217
 Pascal, Étienne 215
 Pascal, Michael Henry 87
 Pascal’s Wager 216
Passion and Triumph of Christ (Peralta). See Passión y triunfo de Cristo
 “The Passionate Shepherd to His Love” (Marlowe) 176
 “Passion for Poem-Making” (Izmailov) 120
Passión y triunfo de Cristo (Passion and Triumph of Christ; Peralta) 220
The Passover (Vondel). See Het Pascha pastoralists 161, 176, 217–218, 228, 266, 270, 272, 282
Pastorals (Pope) 227–228
Patience (Pearl poet) 218, 271
The Patriots (Munford) 198
 Paul I (czar of Russia) 205
 Paul III (pope) 20, 62, 71, 119
 Pavel I (czar of Russia) 105
The Paysan Parvenu: or, The Fortunate Peasant (Marivaux) 175
Peach Blossom Fan (Kong Shangren). See Taohuashan
Pearl 50, 150, 218, 271
Pearl poet 218
The Pearls of the Pearl of Princesses (Marguerite de Navarre). See Les Marguerites de la Marguerite des Princesses
The Peasant Who Gets Ahead in the World (Marivaux) 175
The Pedant Outwitted (de Bergerac) 21
 Pedro II (emperor of Brazil) 7
 Penn, William 212
The Pennsylvania Gazette (periodical) 95
Pennsylvania Magazine (periodical) 212
Pensées (Thoughts; Pascal) 216
Il Penseroso (Milton) 188
Penthesilea (Kleist) 137
The Peony Pavilion (Tang) 282
 Pepys, Samuel 218–220
 Peralta Barnuevo, Pedro de 220
 Percy, Thomas 84
Père de famille (Father of a Family; Diderot) 76–77
 Pergolesi, Giovanni B. 185
El periquillo sarniento (The Itching Parrot; Fernández de Lizardi) 93
 Perrault, Charles 148, 221
Persian Letters (Montesquieu). See Lettres Persanes
 Persian literature 109
 Peruvian literature 101, 220
 Peter I. See Peter the Great
 Peter III (czar of Russia) 46
 Peter the Great (czar of Russia) 40, 154, 232, 233, 298–299
 Petite Academie de Incriptions et Belles-Lettres 221
 Petrarch (Francesco Petrarco) 221–223
 friends and colleagues of 20, 22, 50, 97, 222
 influences of/on 9, 11, 20, 23, 48, 71, 94, 144, 161, 162, 187, 222, 226, 248, 270
 literary criticism on 22, 56, 115, 222–223, 244
 works by 273, 274
 Petrovich, Avvakum. See Avvakum
 Phaedrus 142, 149
Pharmacopedia (Bartram) 17
Pharsamon (Marivaux) 174–175
Phèdre (Racine) 240, 241
 Philip, Governor 284
 Philip, King. See Metacomet
 Philip II (king of Spain) 38, 47, 164, 260, 294
 Philip IV (king of Spain) 105
 “Philip Sparrow” (Skelton) 272
 Phillipa (queen of England) 97
 philosophes 85, 242–243, 249–250
The Philosophical Dictionary (Voltaire) 298, 299
Philosophical Fragments (Schlegel) 261
Philosophy of Love (Hebreo). See Dialogh: d’amore
 Philostratus 128
Philotas (Lessing) 157
Phoenix (Nikolev) 205
 The Phoenix 162
 Piccinni, Niccolò 104
 Pico della Mirandola, Count Giovanni 223–224, 226, 233
 Pidoux, Françoise 148
 Pierrepont, Sarah 80
Piers Plowman (Langland) 6
Pietà (Michelangelo) 186
 “The Pilgrimage to India” (Wu Chengen) 308 Pilgrims 28–29
 Pilpay 149
 Pimentel, Maria 94
 Pindar 105, 248
 Pisan, Christine de 145, 210, 224–225
 Pisan, Thomas de 224
Les Plaideurs (Racine) 240
 Plato 6, 115, 293
 influence of 39, 56, 244, 262, 282
 Plautus 9, 38, 58, 60, 92, 157
The Play of the Sacrament 67
 “The Pleasures of Leisure” (Shen Fu) 268
Pleasures of the Enchanted Isle (Molière) 190
Pleasure with Profit (Tirso de Molina) 287
 Pléiade 225–226
The Plum in the Golden Vase (Xiao Xiaosheng). See Jin Ping Mei
 Plutarch 46, 62, 115
Pocket Songbook (Dmitriev) 77
Poemas Lusitanos (Ferreira) 94
Poème de Fontenoy (Voltaire) 298
Poème sur la loi naturelle (Voltaire) 298
Poems, Dramatic and Miscellaneous (Warren) 303 Poems from the Lakes and Seas (Kong Shangren). See Hu hai ji Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (Wheatley) 304
 “Poesias Avulsas” (Andrada e Silva) 7
Poésias completas (Complete Poems; Olmedo) 210
Poetical Works (Olmedo). See Obras poéticas
 “Poetic Butterfly” (La Fontaine). See “Papillon du Parnasse”
Poetics (Aristotle) 128, 185, 282, 288, 292
 Poet’s Corner 50
 Polish literature 140–141, 243
 Polish Renaissance 243
Political Discourses (Della Casa) 71
 Poliziano, Angelo Ambrogini 187, 226–227, 233
 Pollard, Alfred W. 67
 Polo, Marco 303
Polyeucte (Corneille) 64
Poor Richard’s Almanac 95
 Pope, Alexander 227–229
 contemporaries of 278, 283, 299
 influences of/on 280, 304
 literary criticism on 202, 215, 277, 280
Popol Vuh 180, 184, 229–230
 Poquelin, Jean-Baptiste. See Molière
Por la puente Juana (Across the Bridge, Juana; Lope de Vega) 162 Portrait of a Ruffled Collar (Santa Cruz y Espejo). See Retrato de golilla
 Portuguese literature 38–39, 93–94, 274
 Potemin, Grigoriĭ 72
 P’oun. See Jung Mong Ioo
 Powell, Mary 188
 Practical Learning philosophy. See Shirhak
 Prado, Diego de 230–231
 Prado y Tovar, de. See Prado, Diego de
Praise to the Science of Killing Time (Krylov) 142
 Pratt, Leonard 269
The Prayer Against the Turks (Marulic’) 178
 Praying Indians 82
Les Précieuses Ridicules (The Folly of Affection; Molière) 58, 190
Preparatory Meditations (Taylor) 283
 Prévost, Antoine-François (Abbé Prévost) 231–232
Primeiras letras (Anchieta) 6
 “Primer sueño” (Cruz) 66
 “Primer sueño” (Quevedo) 66
Primicias de la cultura de Quito (periodical) 259
The Prince (Machiavelli) 168–170
Prince Friedrich of Homburg (Kleist) 137
La Princesse de Navarre (Voltaire) 298
The Princess of Cleves (Lafayette) 147
The Princess of Montpensier (Lafayette) 147
Principal Navigations (Hakluyt) 112
Principia (Swedenborg) 278
Principles of Literature (Parini) 214
Printemps (Aubigné) 11
 Prokopovitch, Eleazar. See Prokopovitch, Feofan
 Prokopovitch, Feofan 232, 277
The Prolegomena (Muqaddimah; Ibn Khaldūn) 117–118
Proof of the Spirit and of Power (Lessing) 158
 Propertius 71
 “The Prophecy and Advice of the Priest Xupan Nauat” 54
 “The Prophecy of Oxlahun-Ti-Ku-for Katun 13 Ahau” 54
 “The Prophetic Words of the Great Prophets, the Principal Gods of the Underworld, and the Great Priests” 54
Prose della Volgar Lingua (Prose in the Vernacular; Bembo) 20
Prose in the Vernacular (Bembo). See Prose della Volgar Lingua
Prose Lancelot 171
 Protestant Reformation. See Reformation
Provincial Letters (Pascal) 217
Prudence in Women (Tirso de Molina) 287
La prueba de las promesas (The Test of Promises; Ruiz de Alarcón) 254

- Pseudo-martyr* (Donne) 78
 Ptolemy 33, 62, 302, 303
 Puccini, Giacomo 232
 Pugachev Revolt 46, 72
 Pulci, Bernardo 233
 Pulci, Luca 233
 Pulci, Luigi 9, 232–233
Punishment without Revenge (Lope de Vega) 162
 Puppet theater, Japanese. See Bunraku
 Puritans 28–30, 69, 81–82, 178–180, 283, 305, 306
The Puritans (Miller, ed.) 180
Purity (Cleanness; Pearl poet) 218, 271
 Pushkin, Alexander 160, 233
 Pushkin, Sergei 233
 Pushkin, V[iv]asilii L'vovich 233–234
 “Puss in Boots” (Perrault) 221
- Q
- El Q' Anil. See Komam Q' Anil, Epic of Qianlung (Ch'ien-lung, Qian Long; emperor of China) 41, 159
 Quakers 75, 195, 307
Quang Trung Tu Minh Tap (Letters and commands from the time of military service; Nguyen Trai) 204
 Quarrel of the Ancients and Moderns 2
Quartet (Krylov) 142
 Quennell, Peter 228
 Quetzalcoatl, myth of 181, 235
 Quevedo, Francisco de 66, 105–106, 235–236, 285
 Quiché Mayan literature 229–230
 Quietism 92
 Quintana, Ricardo 279
 Quintilian 115
Quoc Am Thi Tap (Volume of poems in the national tongue; Nguyen Trai) 204
 Qu You (Ch'ü Yu) 136–137
- R
- Rabelais, François 115, 148, 237–239, 244, 280
Rabinal Achi 239
 Rabutin, Celse Bénigne de, baron de Chantal 265
 Rabutin-Chantal, Marie de. See Sévigné, Madame de
Raccolta aragonese (Medici and Poliziano, eds.) 182
 Racine, Jean 2, 64, 239–241, 289
 friends and colleagues of 24–25, 190
 influence of 174
 literary criticism on 56, 63, 202, 241, 299
 Radcliffe, Ann 247
 Radewyn, Florentius 286
 Radishchev, Aleksander Nikolayevich 242, 290
Ragionamenti (Aretino) 7
 Raleigh, Sir Walter 30, 112
Rambler essays 28, 202
Rameau's Nephew (Diderot). See The Neveu de Rameau
 Randolph, Peyton 198
Random Ventures in Idleness (Li Yu). See Xian-qing ou-ji
The Rape of Tamar (Tirso de Molina) 287
The Rape of the Lock (Pope) 202, 215, 228
 rationalism 242–243
 Enlightenment and 85, 101, 160, 242–243, 249–250
 reaction against 101
A Real Account of the Life of a Respectable Person (Rej) 243
Real Commentaries (Garcilaso de la Vega) 101 realism 70, 175, 264, 292
 Recinos, Adrian 230
 “The Reeve’s Tale” (Chaucer) 91
Reflections of moral sentences and maxims (La Rochefoucauld). See Réflexions ou sentences et maxims morales
Reflections of the Causes of Heat and Cold (Lomonosov) 160
Reflections on the Romans (Montesquieu) 194
 “Reflections on Titles” (Paine) 213
Réflexions ou sentences et maxims morales (Reflections of moral sentences and maxims; La Rochefoucauld) 151
 Reformation 47, 71, 88–89, 197, 244, 282
The Regrets (Bellay) 20
Regulations for the Confessors of Spaniards (Las Casas). See Confesionario
The Rehabilitations of Horace (Lessing) 157
 Reichlin 183
 Rej, Mikkolaj 243
Relación (Relation; Prado) 230–231
Relation (Prado). See Relación
A Relation of the Mission of Paraguay (Muratori) 199
La Religieuse (Diderot) 77
The Religion of Christ (Lessing) 158
 Rembrandt 301
Remedies for Fortune Fair and Foul (Petrarch) 222
 Renaissance 243–245
 characteristics of 45, 56, 71, 244
 Enlightenment and 244
 figures in 3, 9, 57, 87, 119, 154–156, 168, 177–178, 182, 185–188, 223–224, 226, 233, 237–239, 244, 249 and humanism 22, 114–115, 211, 244 ideals in 45, 61, 101, 155, 244 literature in 6, 45, 66, 94, 217, 225–226, 227, 273, 274, 289, 293 women in 145
 Renaissance men 45, 61, 155, 244
 “The Renewal of the Covenant the Great Duty” (Mather) 180 renga 313
The Repeated Admonition of an Upright Devoted Son (Luo Guanzhong). See Chung-cheng hsiao-tzu lien-huan chien
Representative Words (Gustafson) 212
The Republic (Plato) 6, 244, 293
 Restoration drama 58–59, 219
The Retinue of Love (Orléans) 210
Retrato de gollilla (Portrait of a Ruffled Collar; Santa Cruz y Espejo) 259 Revelations of Divine Love (A Book of Showings; Julian of Norwich) 56, 128–129 revenge tragedies 289
The Review (periodical) 69
 Reynard the Fox 91
 Rheticus, Georg Joachim 62
Rhetoric (Lomonosov) 160
Rhetorics (Cicero) 221
 Rhode Island, founding of 306
The Rhyme of the Ancient Mariner (Coleridge) 17
Rhymes (Boccaccio). See Rime
Rhymes (Petrarch). See Canzoniere
 Richard II (king of England) 50, 97
 Richard of St. Victor 56
 Richardson, Samuel 245–246
 influences of/on 31, 146, 157, 175, 207
 literary criticism on 207, 245–246, 247
 translations of 231
 Richelieu, Cardinal Amand-Jean du Plessis 1–2, 63, 64
Ricordi (Guicciardini) 108
 Riebeeck, Jan van 246–247
Rights of Man (Paine) 213
Rimas (Aregensola and Aregensola) 9
Rimas (Camões) 38
Rime (Rhymes; Boccaccio) 23
 Rinaldo (Tasso) 282
The Rise of the Novel (Watt) 70, 246
 “The Rising Glory of America” (Freneau) 97
 Risorgimento 199
The Robbers (Schiller) 260
 “Robene and Makyne” (Henryson) 263
 Robert Guiscard (Kleist) 137
 “Robin Hood and Allen-a-Dale” 84
Roberts Crusoe (Defoe) 69
Rodderick and Alphonsus (Bredero) 31
La Rodoguna (Peralta) 220
 romance 52, 97, 217, 247, 247–248, 270
Romance of the Late Tang and the Five Dynasties (Luo Guanzhong) 165
The Romance of the Rose (Lorris and de Meun) 50, 224, 271
Romance of the Sui and Tang Dynasties (Luo Guanzhong) 165
The Romance of the Three Kingdoms (Luo Guanzhong). See San-gouzhij yan-yi
Romances of los señores de la Nueva España (The Romances of the Sages of New Spain) 201, 202
Roman de Thebes 167
Roman de Troie (Benoit de Sainte-Maure) 107
 La Romanina 185
 romantic epic 247 romanticism
 critics of 138
 Enlightenment and 132
 figures in 102, 113
 German 101, 206–207, 261 impact of 247
 influences on 84, 138 origins of 113, 250, 252 roots of 260
 Rome, classical farce in 92
 humanism and 115
 influence of 2, 88, 102–103, 160, 186, 223, 226, 248–249, 270, 297, 301. See also classicism; neoclassicism
 rediscovery of 87, 237, 244
 works on 169, 261, 279
Rome sauvée (Voltaire) 298
ronin 52
 Ronsard, Pierre de 20, 223, 225–226, 244, 248–249, 274
 Rosales, Diego de 210, 249
 Rosand, David 45–46
 Rosenthal, Franz 118
 Rose Theatre 176
 Rossini, Gioacchino Antonio 19
 Rostand, Edmond 21
 Rousseau, Jean-Jacques 249–252
 contemporaries of 28, 76, 251, 283
 Encyclopedia and 76, 82–83
 Enlightenment and 4, 85, 242
 influences of/on 31, 114, 133, 137, 146, 194, 245, 251–252
 literary criticism on 75–76, 77, 82, 207, 251–252
 translations of 160
 Rowlandson, Joseph 252–253
 Rowlandson, Mary 87, 252–253
 Rowson, Susanna 253–254
Roxana (Defoe) 69–70

- Royal Society of London 16, 153, 219
 Rubens, Peter Paul 301
 Rubín, David 149
 Ruiz de Alarcón, Juan 254
 Russell, Jonathan 303
 Russian Academy 205
 Russian Imperial Theater 277
Russian Literature Lover's Interlocutor (periodical) 105
Russian Theater (periodical) 205
 Russian writers 12, 33, 46, 71–72, 77–78, 104–105, 120, 142–143, 159–161, 205, 211, 232, 233–234, 242, 277
 Ruusbroec, Jan van 254–255
 Ryokan (Yamamoto Eido) 256
- S
- Sachs, Hans 257–258
 Sade, Donatien-Alphonse-François de. See Sade, marquis de
 Sade, marquis de 146, 258–259
Sad Nights and Happy Days (Fernández de Lizardi) 93
 Sagi school 143
 St. Bartholomew's Day massacre 11
 St. Michel, Elizabeth 218 saints' plays 67
 Saiyuki (Monkey, Monkey Magic; television show) 308
 Salem witchcraft trials 179–180 salons 263, 265
 Salutati, Coluccio 115
 Salviani, Diane 11
Samson Agonistes (Milton) 188
San Diego Union Tribune (periodical) 239
San-gouzi yan-yi (San-kuo chih 'ung-su yen-i; Romance of the Three Kingdoms; Luo Guanzhong) 125, 165
 Sansverino, Roberto 233
 Santa Cruz y Espejo, Francisco Javier Eugenio de 259–260
 Santa Ritta Durão, José de 100
 Sappho 105, 144
 Sarugaku 143
 Satires (Ariosto) 9
The Satyr (Kochanowski) 140
Sa vie à ses enfants (Aubigné) 11
 Scala, Alessandra 115
 Scala, Flaminio 60
The Scavenger (Quevedo). See Historia de la vida del buscón
 Schiller, Friedrich von 44, 56, 102, 138, 207, 260–261
Schir William Wallace (Blind Harry) 262
 Schlegel, August Wilhelm 261
 Schlegel, Friedrich 261
 Schmidt, A.V.C. 150
 Schoeck, Richard J. 196
The Scholars (Wu Jingzi). See Bulin Waishi
The School for Scandal (Sheridan) 59
The School for Wives (Molière) 58, 190
 Schopenhauer, Arthur 262
 scientific method 242
 Scientific Revolution 61, 215
 Scott, Tom 113
 Scott, Virginia 190, 191
 Scott, Sir Walter 9, 84, 171
 Scottish Chaucerians 262–263
 Scottish poets of 15th century 262–263
 Scriblerus Club 278
 Scrooby Separatists 28
- Scudéry, Georges 263
 Scudéry, Madeleine de 25, 148, 263–264
Sea Dragon (Santa Ritta Durão). See Caramurá
 Sebastian (king of Portugal) 38
Secret Book (Petrarch). See Secretum
The Secret History of Henrietta of England (Lafayette) 147
Secretum (Secret Book; Petrarch) 222
The Seducer of Seville (Tirso de Molina). See El burlador de Sevilla
 Segel, Harold 232
 Segrais, Jean Renaud de 147
 Segu cycle. See Bamana Segu, Epic of Se Jo (king of Korea) 136
 Se-jong 264–265
Selected Fables, Put into Verse (La Fontaine). See Fables choisies, mises en vers
The Self-Enamored Poet (Nikolev) 205
Semiramis (Metastasio) 185
Sémiramis (Voltaire) 298
 Seneca, influence of 8, 115, 160, 185, 222, 286, 289
Sentimental Journey (Sterne) 242
 “Sermon on the Interment of the Most Illustrious, Most Sovereign Peter the Great” (Prokopovitch) 232
Sermos of Job (Calvin) 38
 Servetus, Michael 37–38
 Sessa, duke of 162
 Sethol, Salvador López 181
The Seven Enclosures (Ruusbroec) 255
Seventh Diary (Kobayashi Issa). See Shichiban-Nikki
 Sévigné, Henri, marquis de 265
 Sévigné, Madame de (marquise de Sévigné) 147, 148, 265–266
 Sexton, James D. 181
 Sforza, Duke Lodovico 155
 Shaftsbury, Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of 76
 Shakespeare, Hamnet 266
 Shakespeare, Judith 266
 Shakespeare, William 266–268 adaptations of 277
 influences of/on 27, 45, 60, 102–103, 157, 177, 299
 life of 48, 50, 127, 266
 literary criticism on 48, 54, 128, 190, 217, 244, 266–268, 288
 works by 202, 274, 289
Shamela (Fielding) 245
Shank's Mare (Jippensha). See Tokai dochu hizakurige
Shank's Pony along the Tokaido (Jippensha). See Tokai dochu hizakurige
 Shaw, George Bernard 288
 Shelmerdine, J. M. 148
 Shen Fu 268–269
 Sheridan, Richard Brinsley 59
She Stoops to Conquer (Goldsmith) 59
Shichiban-Nikki (Seventh Diary; Kobayashi Issa) 139
Shi-er Lou (Shih-erh lou; Twelve Towers; Li Yu) 158
 Shi Naian (Shih Nai-an) 125, 165, 269–270
The Ship of Fools (Brandt) 30
 Shirhak (Practical Learning philosophy) 129–130
 Shorris, Earl 54
A Short Conversation between Three Persons: Pan, Voit, and Pleban (Rej) 243
The Shortest Way with Dissenters (Defoe) 69
Short Story of the Rise, Reign and Ruin of the Antinomians, Familists and Libertines that Infected the Churches of New England (Winthrop) 307
- Shuihuzhuan* (Shui-hu-zhuan, Shui-hu chuan, Outlaws of the Marsh, Wild Boar Forest, Water Margin, The Men of the Marshes, Marshes of Mount Liang, All Men Are Brothers; Shi Naian and Luo Guanzhong) 125, 165, 269
 Sidney, Mary 271
 Sidney, Sir Philip 30, 171, 217, 244, 270–271
 “Le Siècle de Louis le Grand” (Perrault) 221
Le Siècle de Louis XIV (Voltaire) 298
The Siege of Thebes (Lydgate, trans.) 167
 “Siglo de oro en las selvas de Eriphile” (Balbuena) 15 “Sign Language: The Semiotics of Love in Lope’s El Perro del Hortelano” (Friedman) 162 sijo 129
Silent Operas (Li Yu). See Wu-sheng xi
 Silverman, Kenneth 178, 179
 Simocatta, Theophylactus 61
 “Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God” (Edwards) 81
Sir Charles Grandison (Richardson) 246
Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (Pearl poet) 6, 50, 150, 171, 218, 271–272
Siroe (Metastasio) 185
 Sis, Bartolo 239
 Sistine Chapel 186
Six Records of a Floating Life (Shen Fu) 268–269
 Skelton, John 272–273
 Skelton, Martha Wayles 121
Slaves in Algiers (Rowson) 254
 “Sleeping at Sermons, is a Great and Dangerous Evil” (Mather) 180
 “Sleeping Beauty” (Perrault) 221 smallpox, victims of 265, 307
 Smith, John 22, 273
 Smith, William Jay 187
 Smollett, Tobias 207
 social comedy 58
The Social Contract (Rousseau) 250–251, 251–252
 Society of Lovers of the Russian Word 72
 Society of Patriots of Chile 259
The Soga Heir (Chikamatsu) 52
Las Soledades (Solitudes; Góngora y Argote) 106
Solitudes (Góngora y Argote). See Las Soledades
Some Verses by Ripano Eupilino (Parini) 214
 Sondheim, Steven 132
Soneti lussuriosi (Aretino) 7
 “Song: to Celia” (Jonson) 128
 “Song by Cacamatzin” (Cacamatzin). See “Cacamatzin Icuic”
 “Song of Axayacatl, Lord of Mexico” (Axayacatl) 13
 “Song of Macuilxocitl” (Moquihuitzin). See “Macuilxochitzin Icuic” Song of Nezahualpilli during the War with Huexotzinco (Nezahualpilli). See Icuic Nezahualpilli yc Tlamato Huexotzinco
The Song of Roland 9, 233, 247
 “Song of the Elders” (Axayacatl) 12–13
Songs (Kochanowski) 140
Songs of Flying Dragons (Se-jong). See Yongbi eocheon ga
Songs of Liongo (Abdallah) 1
Song Taizong longhu fengyun hui (The Wind-Cloud Meeting of the Sung Founder; Luo Guanzhong) 164–165
 Son-Jara, Epic of 275 sonnets 273–274
Sonnets to Helene (Ronsard) 248–249
Sonsan of Kaarta, Epic of 275
 “Sons of Ben” 128

Son tradition 136
 Sophocles 157, 277, 292
 Sor Juana. See Cruz, Sor Juana Inés de la
 “The Sorrows of Misfortune” (Shen Fu) 268
The Sorrows of Young Werther (Goethe). See Die Leiden des jungen Werther
 Soto, Fernando de 101
The Sot-Weed Factor (Barth) 61
The Sot-weed Factor (Cook) 60–61
Sotweed Redivivus (Cook) 61
 Souhami, Jessica 10
The Soul’s Awakening (Abdallah) 1
Sovereignty and Goodness of God, Together With the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed (Rowlandson) 252–253
 Spanish-American writers 15–16, 43–44, 45, 65–66, 93, 101, 210, 220, 249, 259–260
The Spanish Brabanter (Bredero) 31
 Spanish literature
 Golden Age of 36–37, 48, 161, 254, 287 humanism in 115
 sonnets in 274
 writers 2–3, 35–36, 36–37, 47–50, 64–65, 74, 105–106, 117, 119–120, 126–127, 151–152, 161–164, 164, 198, 230–231, 235–236, 254, 284–285, 287–288
The Spanish Tragedy (Kyd) 289
The Sparkling Stone (Ruusbroec) 255
Spectator (periodical) 142
Speculum Mediantis (Mirror of Man; Gower) 106
 “Speech Made by a Scapegrace in a Gathering of Fools” (Krylov) 142 Spence, Joseph 227
 Spenser, Edmund
 influences of/on 9, 30, 45, 171, 177, 271, 283
 literary criticism on 6, 244, 247, 274
 Spinoza, Benedictus (Baruch) de 33, 275–276
The Spirit of Laws (Montesquieu) 85, 194
The Spiritual Canticle (St. John of the Cross) 126–127
The Spiritual Espousals (Ruusbroec) 255
Spiritual Exercises (Ignatius of Loyola) 119–120
The Spiritual Regulation of Peter the Great (Prokopovitch) 232
Spiritual Relations (Teresa of Avila) 285
Spiritual Songs (Novalis) 207
The Spiritual Tabernacle (Ruusbroec) 255
 Squanto 29
 Staden, Hans 276–277
 Stalin, Joseph 169
 Stamp Act (1765) 75, 95
 Stanford, Donald E. 283
 “Stanzas of the Soul” (St. John of the Cross) 126
Stanze (Poliziano) 226–227
The Starry Messenger (Galileo Galilei) 99
Statecraft Drawn from the Very Words of the Holy Scriptures (Bossuet) 27
States and Empires of the Sun and Moon (de Bergerac) 21
 Statius 50
 Steele, Richard 278
 Sterne, Laurence 207, 242
 Stevenson, Robert Louis 219–220
 Stewart, Allen 271
 Stoddard, Esther 80
 Stoddard, Solomon 80
 “The story of Hsuan-Tsang and the origin of the Mission to India” (Wu Chengen) 308
The Story of Sapho (Scudéry) 264
The Story of Thebes (Racine). See La Thèbaïde
 “Story of the Owl” (Ujpan) 181

The Story of the Stone. See The Dream of the Red Chamber
 Straparola, Giovanni Francesco 221
 Strauss, Richard 287
The Students (Ariosto) 9
Sturm and Drang (Klinger) 113
 Sturm and Drang movement 102, 113–114
 Suarez, Michael 245
 Subtelny, Orest 40
Sueños (Dreams; Quevedo) 236
 Sufism 109–110, 117
 Sugimori Nobumori. See Chikamatsu Monzaemon
Sukeroku, Flower of Edo (Tsuchi Jihei) 131–132
 Sumarokov, Alexander 71–72, 160, 205, 232, 277
A Summary View of the Rights of British America (Jefferson) 122
 “The Summoner’s Tale” (Chaucer) 91
 Sun Jo (king of Korea) 114
Supernatural Mail (periodical) 142
Supposes (Ariosto) 9
 Surrey, Henry Howard, Earl of 274
Susanna (Kochanowski) 140
 Sutra 308
Suyte des Marguerites (More Pearls; Marguerite de Navarre) 173
 Swedberg, Jesper 277
 Swedborg, Emanuel. See Swedenborg, Emanuel
 Swedenborg, Emanuel 277–278
 Swedish writers 277–278
Sweetness of Power (Guicciardini) 108
 Swift, Jonathan 6, 40, 202, 278–280, 278–280, 290
 “Sydney Cove in 1794” (Watling) 304
Sylvae (Trees; Poliziano) 227
Sylva Sylvarum (Bacon) 15

T

Tabishui (Travel Gleanings; Kobayashi Issa) 139
 Tacitus 46
 T’aejong 264
Takasago (Zeami) 313
 Takeda Izumo 281
 Takemoto Gidayu 34, 53
 Takemotoza theater 53
Takhmisa (Abdallah) 1
A Tale of a Tub (Swift) 6, 279
The Tale of Genji 125
Tales and Novels in Verse (La Fontaine). See Contes et nouvelles en vers
Tamburlaine (Marlowe) 176
The Taming of the Shrew (Shakespeare) 266
 Tamurlane. See Timur Lang
 Tang Xianzu (T’ang Hsien-tsu) 281–282, 310, 312
 Tanjong (king of Korea) 136
 tanka 110, 256
Taohuashan (T’ao-hua shan; Peach Blossom Fan; Kong Shangren) 141–142
Ta’rif (Ibn Khaldūn) 119
The Tartar (Beaumarchais) 19
Tartuffe (Molière) 190, 202
 Tasan. See Jung Mong Joo
Tasso (Goethe) 283
 Tasso, Torquato 6, 21, 48, 161, 217, 247, 282–283
Tatler (periodical) 278
 Taylor, Edward 283–284
 Taymor, Julie 34
 Tedlock, Dennis 229, 239
Telemachus (Fénelon) 92, 175
Telemachus, a Parody (Marivaux) 175
 Téllez, Gabriel. See Tirso de Molina
Telling Maya Tales (Gossen, ed.) 181
Temistocle (Metastasio) 185
The Tempest (Shakespeare) 267
 Temple, Sir William 278
The Temple of Fame (Pope) 228
Ten Centuries of Spanish Poetry (Turnbull) 163
 Tench, Watkin 284
 Tencin, Madame de 4
 Tennyson, Alfred, Lord 171
The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America (Bradstreet) 29–30
 Terence 9, 60
 Teresa of Avila, Saint 126, 284–286
Teseida (Boccaccio) 23
The Testament (Villon) 297
The Testament of Crescend (Henryson) 113, 263
The Testament of John (Lessing) 158
The Test of Promises (Ruiz de Alarcón). See La prueba de las promesas
 Tetel, Marcel 193
 Tezozomoc 196
 Thaler, R. P. 242
 “That Our Desire Is Increased by Difficulty” (Montaigne) 193
 “That the Taste of Good and Evil Depends in Large Part on the Opinion We Have of Them” (Montaigne) 193
La Thèbaïde (The Story of Thebes; Racine) 240
The Carnal Prayer Mat (Li Yu). See Jou pu tuan
The Church (Hus). See De Ecclesia
The Journey to the West (Wu Chengen). See Xiyouji
The Little Thunderclap (Kong Shangren). See Xiaohu lei
 Theocritus 217
Théodicée (Leibniz) 154
A Theologico-Political Treatise (Spinoza) 275
 “Things Experienced” (Yuan Hungdao) 312
 Thirty Years War 59, 260
 Thomas à Kempis 64, 286
 Thomas Paine (Kaye) 212
Thoughts (Pascal). See Pensées
 “Thoughts of a Fashionable Philosopher” (Krylov) 142
The Thousand and One Nights 51
 “The Three Ravens” 84
 Thwaites, Reuben Gold 124
 Tibullus 193
Tiers livre (“The Third Book”; Rabelais) 237, 238
 Tiller, Terence 107
 Tillett, Lowell 205
Till Eulenspiegel 286–287
Till Eulenspiegel’s Merry Pranks (Strauss) 287
 Timur Lang (Tamurlane) 109, 119
 Tirso de Molina 287–288, 289
 Titio. See Brandt, Sebastian
 Tlacaélel 12, 195–196
 “To Córdoba” (Góngora y Argote). See “A Córdoba” Tōdō Yoshikiyo 18
 Tōdō Yoshitada 18
 T’oegye 152
 “To His Mistress Going to Bed” (Donne) 78
Tokai dochu hizakurige (Shank’s Pony along the Tokaido, Shank’s Mare; Jippensha) 126
 Tolstoy, Leo 252
 Toltec culture 180, 181, 235
 “Tomorrow” (Lope de Vega) 163
Tongui pogam (Exemplar of Korean Medicine; Huh Joon) 114
 Toribio de Benavente. See Motolinia, Toribio de Torquemada, Juan 203
Tosa Diary (Ki no Tsurayuki) 289

- “To the Memory of Brave Americans” (Freneau) 97
 “To the University of Cambridge, in New England” (Wheatley) 304–305 Tour thro’ the Whole Island of Great Britain (Defoe) 70 tragedy 288–289. See also melodrama
The Tragedy of Inés de Castro (Ferreira) 94
The Tragic Queen (La corona trágica; Lope de Vega) 162
Les Tragiques (d’Aubigné) 11
Travel Gleanings (Kobayashi Issa). See Tabishui
The Traveller Returned (Murray) 200 travel narratives 17, 18–19, 43–44, 46–47, 57–58, 156, 204–205, 242, 273, 284, 289–290, 295
Travels Through North and South Carolina . . . and the Country of the Chactaws (Bartram) 17
Travels through the Interior Parts of North America in the Years 1766, 1767, 1768 (Carver) 44
The Treatise (Lessing) 157
The Treatise of Discerning of Spirits 56
Treatise of the Culture of the Tobacco Plant (Carver) 44
A Treatise on Tolerance (Voltaire) 299
Treatises of Civil Government (Locke) 122
Trees (Poliziano). See Sylvae
Treny: The Laments of Kochanowski (Kochanowski) 140
The Trials of Persiles and Segismunda (Cervantes) 48
Trifles (Rej) 243
Le Triomphe de l’Aigneau (The Triumph of the Lamb; Marguerite de Navarre) 173
 Triptaka. See Hsuan-Tsang
The Triumph of Love and Death (Peralta). See Triunfo de amor y muerte
Triumphs (Petarch) 222
Triunfo de amor y muerte (The Triumph of Love and Death; Peralta) 220
Troilus and Criseyde (Chaucer) 51, 106, 113, 263
The True-Born Englishman (Defoe) 69
The True History of the Conquest of New Spain (Díaz del Castillo). See Historia verdadera de la conquista de la Nueva España
A True Relation of Such Occurrences and Accidents of Note as Happened in Virginia (Smith) 273
Truth Can’t Be Trusted or the Liar (Ruiz de Alarcón) 254
The Truth of the Sacred Scriptures (Wycliffe) 311
The Truth Suspect (Ruiz de Alarcón). See La verdad sospechosa
 Tsuchi Jihei 131–132
 Tully 178
 Turgot, Anne-Robert-Jacques 83
Turkish Embassy Letters (Montagu) 289
 Turley, Hans 70
 Turnbull, Elizabeth 163
 Turner, Elizabeth 227
 Twain, Mark 50
Twelfth Night (Shakespeare) 266
The Twelve Beguines (Rusbroec) 255
Twelve Towers (Li Yu). See Shi-er Lou
The Two Friends (Beaumarchais) 19
 Tyard, Pontus de 225
 typology 290–291
- U
- Uemura Bunrakuken 34
 Ujapan, Ignacio Bizarro 181
 unities 292–293
The Universal Monarchy (Montesquieu) 194
- Unofficial History of the Literati* (Wu Jingzi). See Bulin Waishi
 Urban VIII (pope) 100
 Usk, Thomas 50
Utopia (More) 197, 238, 244, 293
Utopianism (Kumar) 293 utopias 293
- V
- Vacca, Nicola 185
 Vaez de Torres, Luis 230
 Valdez, Luis 239
 Van Dyck, Sir Anthony 301
Various Songs (Brandt) 30
 Vassa, Gustavus. See Equiano, Olaudah
La vega del Parnaso (Lope de Vega) 162
 Velázquez, Diego 64
Verdadera historia (Díaz del Catillo) 164
La verdad sospechosa (The Truth Suspect; Ruiz de Alarcón) 254
 Verdeyen, Paul 255
 Vergerio, Pier Paolo 115
 Vergne, Marie-Madeleine Pioche de la. See Lafayette, Madame de
 Verne, Jules 290
 Vesalius, Andreas 62, 294
 Vespucci, Amerigo 226, 289, 293, 295, 302
 Vespucci, Mario 226
 Vespucci, Simonetta 226–227
 Vico, Giambattista 296
 Victoria (Rowson) 253
La victoria de Junin (The Victory of Junin; Olmedo) 210
La vida es sueño (Calderón de la Barca) 36–37
Vie privée de Voltaire et de Mme du Châtelet (Graffigny) 107 Vietnamese literature 204
villancicos 66
 Villey, Pierre 193
 Villon, François 211, 296–297, 297
 Villon, Guillaume de 296
 Virgil
 influence of 23, 48, 50, 71, 148, 178, 217, 221, 227–228, 270, 282
 literary criticism on 86, 87, 277
 translations of 177, 263
Virtue Triumphant (Murray) 200
 Virues, Cristobal de 161
 Visconti, Valentina 210
The Vision of Piers Plowman (Langland) 149–150
Vita (Life; Alfieri) 5
 Vivaldi, Antonio 104
Vladimir (Prokopovitch) 232
 Vogel, Henriette 137
Voice of One Crying (Gower). See Vox Clamantis
 Volk 114
Volkgeist 252
Volpone, or the Fox (Jonson) 127
 Voltaire 297–300
 contemporaries of 28, 46, 107, 251, 283
 Encyclopedia and 76, 82, 85
 Enlightenment and 4, 85, 102, 242, 243, 258
 influences of/on 39, 40, 121, 154, 241
 life of 2, 251
 literary criticism by/on 75–76, 77, 82, 104, 175, 202, 228, 299–300
 Voltaire (Frame) 299
Volume of poems in the national tongue (Nguyen Trai). See Quoc Am Thi Tap
 Vondel, Joost van den 31, 300–301
- W
- Waingrow, Marshall 28
 Wakefield cycle 66
 Wakefield Master 66
 Waldman, Bryna 10
 Waldseemüller, Martin 295, 302–303
 Waley, Arthur 309
 Walker, Hallam 191
Wallenstein (Schiller) 260
The Walls Have Ears (Ruiz de Alarcón). See Las paredes oyen
 Walpole, Horace 247
 Wandang. See Kim Jung Hee
 Wang Fanggung 136
 Warens, Madame de 250
 Warner, Maria 225
 Warren, James 303
 Warren, Mercy Otis 303–304
 Wars of Religion (1562–1598) 11
 Washington, George 213, 303
 Washington, Martha 303
 “The Waterfall” (Derzhavin) 72
Water Margin (Shi Naian and Luo Guanzhong). See Shuihuzhuan
 Watling, Thomas 304
 Watt, Ian 70, 246
 Watzenrode, Lucas 61
The Way of Perfection (Teresa of Avila) 285
The Way of the World (Congreve) 59
The Way to Wealth (Franklin) 95
A Weighty Consideration (Erasmus) 89
 Weimar court theater 260
 Welde, Thomas 82
 Welker, Glen 70
 Wensclas (duke of Brabant) 97
 Wheatley, Phillis 304–305
 Wheelock, Eleazar 209
 “Whither Dede Korkut?” (Asgharzadeh) 26
The Whole Booke of Psalmes Faithfully Translated into English Metre (Eliot) 82
Wieland; or, The Transformation (Brown) 31
Wife of Bath’s Tale (Chaucer) 51–52
 Wigglesworth, Michael 305–306
Wild Boar Forest (Shi Naian and Luo Guanzhong). See Shuihuzhuan
 Wilde, Martha 245
 Wilde, Oscar 59
 “The Wild Honeysuckle” (Freneau) 97
Wilhelm Meister’s Apprenticeship (Goethe) 103
Wilhelm Tell (Schiller) 260
 Williams, Roger 306, 307
 Wilson, John 82
The Wind-Cloud Meeting of the Sung Founder (Luo Guanzhong). See Song Taizong longhu jengyun hui
Windsor Forest (Pope) 228
A Winter Piece (Hammon) 111
The Winter’s Tale (Shakespeare) 267
 Winthrop, John 306, 306–307
The Wisdom of Life (Schopenhauer) 262
Wittembergischer Nighthingale (Sachs). See Wittembergisch Nachtigall
Wittembergisch Nachtigall (Wittembergischer Nighthingale; Sachs) 257
 Wolsey, Cardinal 272

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WORLD WRITERS
19TH AND 20TH CENTURIES

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WORLD WRITERS 19TH AND 20TH CENTURIES

Dr. Marie Josephine Diamond

GENERAL EDITOR
Department of Comparative English
Rutgers University

Dr. Maria DiBattista

ADVISER
Department of English
Princeton University

Dr. Julian Wolfreys

ADVISER
Department of English
University of Florida

Facts On File, Inc.

Encyclopedia of World Writers, 19th and 20th Centuries

Copyright © 2005 by BOOK BUILDERS LLC

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or utilized in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage or retrieval systems, without permission in writing from the publisher. For information contact:

Facts On File, Inc.
132 West 31st Street
New York NY 10001

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of world writers, beginnings to the twentieth century / Thierry Boucquey, general editor ; Gary Johnson, advisor ; Nina Chordas advisor ; [written and developed by Book Builders LLC].
p. cm.

General editor for v. 3: Marie Josephine Diamond; advisors, Maria DiBattista and Julian Wolfreys.

Vol. 3 previously published as: Encyclopedia of 19th- and 20th-century world writers / Marie Josephine Diamond, general editor.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-8160-6143-2 (set : alk. paper) — ISBN 0-8160-5190-9 (v. 1 : alk. paper) — ISBN 0-8160-5191-7 (v. 2 : alk. paper) — ISBN 0-8160-4675-1 (v. 3 : alk. paper) 1. Authors—Biography—Dictionaries. 2. Literature—Bio-bibliography—Dictionaries. I. Boucquey, Thierry. II. Diamond, Marie Josephine. III. Book Builders LLC. IV. Encyclopedia of 19th- and 20th-century world writers.

PN451.E55 2005
809'.003--dc22

2004020551

Facts On File books are available at special discounts when purchased in bulk quantities for businesses, associations, institutions, or sales promotions. Please call our Special Sales Department in New York at (212) 967-8800 or (800) 322-8755.

You can find Facts On File on the World Wide Web at <http://www.factsonfile.com>

Text design by Rachel L. Berlin
Cover illustration by Smart Graphics

Printed in the United States of America

VB FOF 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

CONTENTS

Preface	vii
Introduction	ix
Authors' Timeline	xvii
Writers Covered, by Geographical Area	xxv
Entries A to Z	1
Selected Bibliography	464
Index	483
Cumulative Index	513

PREFACE

The Encyclopedia of World Writers, 19th and 20th Centuries is an engaging survey of the changing map of world literature during the past 200 years, covering the world outside Great Britain, Ireland, and the United States. (British writers are covered in the Encyclopedia of British Writers, 19th and 20th Centuries, Facts On File, 2003.) Our survey begins at the turn of the 19th century, a time of great change in Europe, catalyzed by the French Revolution of 1789 and the expansion of colonialism.

Literature in the 19th century, especially the dissemination of the novel, reflects the profound social, economic, and political changes that were taking place throughout Europe. By the end of the century, when colonialism had changed the map of the world through occupation and trade, Western literary movements and forms had deeply affected the ancient and traditional literatures of Asia and the Middle East and the post-Conquest literatures of South America and had marginalized the oral traditions of African and indigenous peoples.

The entries of the 19th century include the well-known European figures who have dominated the Western canon; lesser-known European writers who, for many reasons, have been rediscovered; and Asian, Latin American, and African writers or storytellers celebrated in their own cultures but often unfamiliar to the American reader. Entries include descriptions of major European literary movements, such as ROMANTICISM, REALISM, and SYMBOLISM, and their deployment and transformation, especially toward the end of the century, in the very different cultural contexts of Asia, the Middle East, and Latin America. These entries also show both the continuation and transformation of traditional genres and the growing importance of the novel in the context of modernization.

The entries of the 20th century include avant-garde writers, modernists, social realists, and writers responding to the traumas of world wars. They reflect the growing international importance and recognition of writers from Asia, the Middle East, Africa, and the Caribbean and of women writers who have made their voices heard in the wake of POSTCOLONIALISM and FEMINISM. They also include writers from nations that have asserted their independence since the collapse of the Soviet Union and writers responding in various ways to economic and cultural globalization and the revolution in electronic communications. Finally, in entries such as those on the ABORIGINAL MOVEMENT of Australia and the DALIT LITERATURE of India, they include writers from cultures in the process of reemergence or redefinition.

Directed to young scholars in high school and colleges, the entries encourage students to investigate further writers who, for the most part, have lived lives of passionate engagement with their craft and with the compelling, often disturbing historical events of their time. They include biographical information, descriptions of major works, cross-referencing, and suggestions for further reading and research. Most of the works mentioned have been translated into English. Where practical, titles are also provided in the original language. (Given the vast number of languages and alphabets involved, this is not always feasible or useful.) Definitions of traditions and movements from a wide variety of literatures make it possible for the American student to situate writers within the context of their literary cultures. A general bibliography suggests wider vistas for exploration.

This encyclopedia opens up worlds. It reveals how literature has been and continues to be not only a source of aesthetic pleasure and self-knowledge but also a means of responding to tyranny and injustice, to the alienation or suppression of identity, and to the loss of marginalized or indigenous cultures. For many writers in the last century, literature has been more than a quest for pleasure, success, or escape from the everyday. It has often been a matter of life and death.

We hope that for young researchers coming of age in the 21st century, a time of dramatic change on an international scale, the encyclopedia will be many things: an introduction to literary traditions from a wide diversity of cultures, an introduction to aesthetic experience and exploration in the global context, and an introduction to the extraordinary writers who have lived through and responded in their works to the social and political challenges of the past two centuries.

INTRODUCTION

World literature is as diverse as it is vast. From the turn of the 19th century to the present, different cultures and national literatures have followed unique and specific forms of development and change. However, it is possible to discern some major trends and patterns to suggest a way for American readers in particular to orient themselves among the more than 500 writers, literatures, and literary movements presented here.

The mapping of the world has undergone many transformations since the beginning of the 19th century, and it continues to be revised at an accelerated rate. This volume begins with literatures at the turn of the 19th century, a time of great change. The French Revolution of 1789 marked a watershed in Europe. Subsequently, many countries of the world were affected by both the ideals of the European Enlightenment and the expansion of colonialism.

In the modern age, beginning with the colonization of the Americas, countries of Western Europe—Spain, Portugal, France, the Netherlands, and England—have been the dominant colonial nations. They have exported their languages and cultures throughout the Americas, Africa, Asia, and the Pacific through conquest and occupation or, as in the case of China and Japan in the latter half of the 19th century, through trade wars and the imposition of trade agreements. During the last 200 years, there have been very few, if any, nations that have not been affected in one way or another by the cultures and values of Western Europe and, especially since World War II (1939–45), of the United States. With the breakdown of European colonialism after 1945, the liberation from Western influences has been a rallying cry for contemporary literary movements in many parts of the world. The map of the world in the 21st century has already begun to present a different, as yet undefined, literary landscape.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

In Europe, the values of the Enlightenment—freedom, scientific progress, the importance of the individual—expressed the needs of the rising middle class and the growing capitalist economy. These ideas challenged the principles of inherited power and the rule of an aristocratic and ecclesiastical elite traditionally dependent on ownership and exploitation of the land. They found political expression in the French Revolution of 1789. The Revolution was greeted as a new dawn by writers, musicians, and artists throughout Europe and by oppressed peoples, including many women. However, as the Revolution turned into the Terror and was followed by the dictatorial reign of Napoleon—who extended French dominion through much of Europe, including an incursion into Russia, and ventured into Egypt—many writers and artists lost faith in the future of the revolutionary ideal.

COLONIAL ENCOUNTERS

Colonialism flourished in the 19th century through a combination of new ideas and political projects. The confidence of Europeans in the superiority of their civilization reached its height as scientific discoveries produced new technologies and industrialization promised ever-expanding markets. It seemed an obvious good to impose European values on the rest of the world. Yet at the same time science was undermining religious faith, and people became aware of what was lost when cities and factories obliterated the old ways of life. Slaves, women, and the colonized discovered that people's rights as promised by the French Revolution did not apply to them. Although Haiti (San Domingo) won its independence from France in 1802, slavery continued in the French Caribbean until 1848, and France and England continued to fight for domination over India, Africa, and the Caribbean. Nevertheless, Enlightenment ideals continued to both support and challenge the colonial enterprise of trade and conquest.

Latin America

Financed by kings and queens vying for power and national prestige, European colonialism from the 16th century on had justified itself in the name of Christianity and civilization. Encountering people with predominantly oral cultures and animist beliefs, the first colonists of what now constitutes Latin America imposed their religion and assimilated or suppressed local cultural forms and languages, which they considered to be inferior. In the 19th century, colonialism in Latin America produced a unique pattern of cultural development. By that time, most countries were controlled by powerful elites who fought for their independence from Spain and Portugal. The longing for freedom was expressed in literature. Fernandez de Lizardi (1776–1827), Mexico's first novelist, for example, satirized corrupt colonial officials and contributed to the movement for independence. Andrés Bello (1781–1865) of Venezuela argued that Latin America would be independent only when it had freed itself from forms of government modeled on those of Europe. On the other hand, Domingo F. Sarmiento (1811–88) of Argentina wished to eradicate traces of both native and Spanish cultures and replace them with northern European economic and cultural models. By the end of the century, most of Latin America underwent rapid modernization with varying consequences and produced varied, often cosmopolitan literatures.

Africa

When Europe colonized Africa, it encountered hundreds of different languages and diverse traditions. The north and northwest had long been influenced by Islamic and Arabic written culture, and East Africa, open to trade with Indonesia and India, had a rich multicultural history. Most of this vast continent had a rich oral tradition that included epics, legends, proverbs, genealogies, and praise poetry. When colonial schools were set up to produce local administrators and impose Western cultures, African languages were marginalized, but oral genres, many of which were then written down, continued to modify and contest imported European literary forms and ideas.

South Asia

European confrontations with ancient civilizations and literatures in Asia are complex in a different way. The establishment of the East India Company by the English, which took place in 1600, was the beginning of the colonization of India and the imposition of British cultural institutions. Until 1835, when English became the common language of instruction, Sanskrit, Arabic, and Persian were the dominant official languages. The British gave their preference to the Sanskrit tradition, with its Indo-European associations, and to Hindu culture, whose caste system approximated their own class system. Sanskrit epics, such as the Ramayana and the Maharabata, as well as Hindu spiritual texts, were translated by and also influenced many 19th-century European writers. However, the dozens of languages and cultures of the Indian subcontinent and Sri Lanka withstood assimilation and continued their own traditional forms of epic, drama, and lyrical and devotional poetry.

The introduction of English instruction coincided with the widespread dissemination of printing, and English literature and European literary forms were introduced to the subcontinent and a new reading public. With English as the official language, works in languages such as Urdu, Tamil, Bengali, Telegu, and Kannada were translated into English, giving South Asians easier access to each other's literatures. India had a strong epic and mythical narrative tradition. The European novel gave new direction to Indian writing. Rabindranath TAGORE, the great Bengali nationalist, was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature in 1913.

East Asia

Beginning with the Opium War (1840–42), China was exposed to Western influences when it was forcefully brought into the orbit of European financial interests. Western and Japanese incursions—including the sacking of Beijing in 1860, the Sino-Japanese War (1894–95), and the Boxer Rebellion (1900–01)—contributed to a critique of Chinese conservatism, Confucianism, and the power of the scholarly literati. In 1911, a thousand years of imperial rule came to an end with the establishment of the republic. May 4, 1919, became famous for a new realist literary movement (see REALISM) that broke with the past and turned toward the West for inspiration. The language of the common people, as opposed to the scholarly language of the imperial bureaucrats, was increasingly used as the language of literature, and under the influence of countless translations from European writers, particularly French, English, and Russian, the novel became popular. Such writers as HU SHI and LU XUN turned away from traditional forms and looked to Western novels for inspiration and renewal.

Japan is famous for its distinctive forms of poetry, such as the complex linked forms of the renga, which developed into the haiku, and its indigenous forms of drama, such as the No and Kabuki. It also has a long narrative tradition and its own forms of the novel, the most famous of which is probably the classic Tale of Genji (ca. A.D. 1000) by Lady Murasaki. Japan did not open up to the West until it was forced to by the United States and Commodore Perry's warships in 1853. This event had a profound effect on Japanese literature. Japanese translations of European and Russian novels appeared and influenced new expressions of the Japanese novel, as in the works of NATSUME Sōseki. [Chinese, Japanese, Korean, and Vietnamese personal names are rendered in traditional East Asian order, with surnames followed by given names.]

The Middle East

Middle Eastern literature—Arabic, Persian, and Turkish—was dominated from its pre-Islamic beginnings by poetry, written by both men and women. With the spread of Islam, the Qur'an established a literary and aesthetic mood for Muslim writers. In the 19th century, Europeans began to look to the Middle East for literary inspiration: French and English translations of The Thousand and One Nights, a collection of stories from Persia with Indian influences, had a profound effect on the Western imagination.

At the same time, the growing imperial powers of Europe undermined the declining Ottoman Empire, which finally collapsed after World War I, and introduced to the Middle East Western liberal values such as equal rights and freedom of trade and travel, as well as new genres such as the novel. Modern and secular ideas were contentious from the beginning: European aesthetics and progressive ideas threatened traditional and national literary forms and were associated with political domination.

Australasia

An aboriginal culture had existed in Australia for at least 50,000 years before the arrival of the Europeans. It included songs, myths, and stories, which were orally transmitted. White settlement of Australia began in 1788 with the establishment of penal colonies by the British. Nineteenth-century Australian literature, produced both by convicts and free settlers, followed English models while exploring new experiences of life in the bush and outback. At the same time, aboriginal culture was threatened with extinction. It was not until 1901, when Australia won its independence, that a strong national literature emerged.

The first British missionary arrived in New Zealand in 1801, and the colony was formalized in 1841. The Treaty of Waitangi (1840) established an uneasy peace between the indigenous Maoris and the colonizers, but the oral language and culture of the aboriginal people inevitably declined. British models dominated 19th-century New Zealand literature.

EUROPEAN ROMANTICISM AND ITS DISCONTENTS

The literary movement that best expresses the aspirations, contradictions, and disappointments of the turn of the 19th century is romanticism. Romanticism began in Germany with writers such as GOETHE, SCHILLER, and HÖLDERLIN. It was influenced by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, the critic of the inequities of civilization, in his fiction and essays and by Immanuel Kant's ideas about the beautiful and sublime. His Critique of Judgment (1790) had a profound effect on romantic aesthetics. The German mystical and idealistic tradition competed with the more rational and scientific ideals of French thinkers and influenced writers throughout Europe. Germaine de STAËL, the Swiss/French intellectual and writer who introduced German literature and philosophy into France at the beginning of the 19th century, held that a nation's literature is reflective of its forms of government and its historical moment. Literature thus provides insight into national identity.

Because classical ideals were embedded in oppressive cultural institutions, romantic writers often turned to the myths and oral traditions of the Middle Ages, perpetuated in the folktales of the people, for inspiration and a redefinition of nationhood. Oral traditions seemed to offer a social cohesion missing in a society that was fragmented by revolution and strife. Folktales by German writers such as Benedikte NAUBERT and the brothers GRIMM were very popular. At the same time, the romantic love of freedom inspired subjugated nations, such as Greece, which was long dominated by the Turks, to struggle for liberation and revive their ancient cultural heritage. In both Germany and France, the theater of such dramatists as Schiller and HUGO threw off classical constraints and advocated passion and rebellion in the name of social justice.

Inspired by Enlightenment ideals of freedom, most romantic writers were critical of imperialism and slavery, but they were also fascinated by the exotic, especially the culture of the Orient. Even before the French Revolution, romantic writers, such as Goethe, were interested in the spiritual literature of India. After the Revolution, the development of romanticism coincided with a new phase of colonial expansion in the Middle East and North Africa. The Orient, often geographically vague and exoticized, came to represent the possibility of passion and escape from an increasingly utilitarian and secular world dominated by the pursuit of money and power. It provided not only luxury goods and cheap labor but also, in varying forms, a vision of sensuous fulfillment and respite from the pursuit of profits. Parallel to romantic exoticism was the romantic interest in nature as a source of inspiration. Many elements of the romantic movement were to reappear at the end of the century in countries outside Europe, including China and Latin America, as evidenced by the works of the Brazilian Antonio GONÇALVES DIAS, who wrote about NATIVIST issues, that is, the relation between indigenous peoples and the land.

A major theme of romantic writers, for example BALZAC and STENDHAL, is the struggle for survival of the sensibilities of the artist in a new world of industrialization, material values, and the brutal struggle for success. The defeat of romantic ideals, which sought refuge in an idealized imagination, is often embodied in the novel. The fate of the romantic hero who refuses the material values of the new bourgeois world is often suicide or madness.

THE NOVEL

Just as colonialism was facilitated in the 19th century by rapid advances in technology, engineering, and industrialization, improvements in printing techniques permitted cheaper and easier publication of books. At the same time, the growth of the urban population and extension of education and literacy provided a growing readership. The serialized novel, one of the great innovations of 19th-century European literature, established this literary form, variously defined by movements such as realism and NATURALISM, as the dominant genre. It became the place for discussion of every important social issue. Filled with energy and movement, novels by Stendhal, Balzac, Flaubert, and Zola place an individual within the social maelstrom and follow his or her development or destruction. The effects of modern Western values are more tragically explored in the Russian novels of DOSTOYEVSKY and TOLSTOY, both affected by and resistant to Westernization, who evolve an alternative to modernity through their different syntheses of their own culture and interpretations of Christianity.

The novel was one of the major exports of Western culture to other parts of the world. Its effects were felt, especially toward the end of the 19th century, in China, Japan, India, and the Middle East.

DECADENCE

By the late 19th century, the long advance of European modernity was accelerated by developments in technology and capital-driven imperialism. By 1914, the reach of Western civilization throughout the world was unprecedented. Although 19th-century colonialism had reached its heights in terms of appropriated land and affected cultures, the system at home was under pressure, and its crisis is evident in European literature. The great Scandinavian dramatists IBSEN and STRINDBERG explored the dilemmas of capitalist entrepreneurs and the tensions of bourgeois marriage. Symbolist poets (see SYMBOLISM) tried to lose themselves in an alternate linguistic world distilled of the dross of the everyday. The decadents (see DECADENCE) luxuriated in their disaffection with the bourgeoisie and espoused the artificiality of the aesthetic and technology. Misogyny and masculine symbols of power were glorified in the theories of FUTURISM.

Misogyny and racism flourished at the end of the 19th century in Europe, bringing to a crisis a process implicit in 19th-century social practice and ideology. Colonialism, of course, depended on racist beliefs in the superiority of white European civilization. The bourgeois family similarly supported a dichotomy between the pure domestic wife and mother and an inferior woman—working class or prostitute—identified with the fulfillment of base needs. There was no legitimate place in this schema for the woman writer.

If the expansion of education brought more literacy to Europeans and missionaries exported literacy to far reaches of the world, the institutions of literature were still owned and controlled by the male upper and middle classes. Literature was not considered an appropriate calling for a woman. It was common for women writers in the late 18th and early 19th centuries to disguise their identities in order to be published. Benedikte Naubert was successful in Germany when she published anonymously and was neglected when her female identity was revealed. George SAND took the name of a man. Still, women writers made a major mark on 19th-century literature, even though their contributions were not always recognized or acknowledged. With the crisis of the bourgeois family structure at the end of the century, there was a flurry of defiant women writers, such as COLETTE, who disregarded conventions and claimed their freedom.

However, the outbreak of World War I in 1914 severely challenged the hopes of the bourgeoisie for progress and enlightenment, and the Russian Revolution of 1917 signified the cataclysmic beginnings of a new era.

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Twentieth-century literature began in disillusion. Capitalism and the bourgeois family were in crisis, and an optimistic faith in progress through rationality and science was tested by the horrors of war. The avant-garde movements of DADA and SURREALISM, which emerged in the wake of the World War I, rejected bourgeois civilization as repressive and exploitative and gave value to the world of the unconscious and dreams, as explored by Sigmund FREUD. The war years and the 1920s also saw the emergence of MODERNISM.

The modernist movement in Europe, while celebrating the autonomous sphere of the aesthetic, had an acute sense that “the center does not hold.” It sought carefully wrought and experimental forms with which to respond to what many writers saw as the chaos and cultural decline of the modern age. In their skepticism about civilization, modernists such as W. B. Yeats turned toward myth and the unconscious.

Although European modernism and the playful and iconoclastic surrealism may have expressed a crisis of Western civilization, both seemed out of touch with the social and economic lives of ordinary people, especially after the collapse of the stock market in 1929, a catastrophe felt throughout the world. The avant-garde movements that lamented the alienation of modern urban life were countered by a very different attitude to the future.

TOTALITARIANISM AND THE SECOND WORLD WAR

Revolutionary writers rejected the past and looked toward the liberation of the peasants and working classes with renewed hope. The 1920s in Russia, for example, saw a flowering of creativity among experimental poets and filmmakers. However, this euphoria was not to last. The lyrical poets Vladimir MAYAKOVSKY and Sergey YESENIN for example, frustrated by political imperatives, committed suicide. The 1930s saw the growth of fascism in Germany and Spain and the hardening of oppression in communist Russia. Both fascism and the communist SOCIALIST REALISM, the official aesthetic, condemned experimentation and modernist literature and art as decadent.

The totalitarian regimes of Japanese militarism, fascism and communism targeted writers whom they considered decadent or enemies of the people. Writing against the grain of oppressive political authority became, in the 20th century, a dangerous activity. The Korean writer YUN TONGJU, who spoke for Korean independence, was arrested by the Japanese in 1943 and died in prison. Jewish intellectuals and dissident writers were exterminated by the German fascists. Books that were considered dangerous were burned. For protesting against fascism, Thomas MANN and Hermann HESSE lost their German citizenship. Many others lost their lives, including Federico GARCÍA LORCA, one of Spain’s most highly revered poets. Rafael ALBERTI, the Spanish surrealist poet, had to go into exile in Argentina after the victory of fascist general Francisco Franco.

Writers who lived during and after World War II had to confront the reality that modern civilization and technology had produced destruction and cruelty on an unprecedented scale. The Holocaust, in which millions of Jews and other civilians were exterminated; the mass destruction of cities; and the nuclear devastation visited on Hiroshima and Nagasaki seemed to defy the very possibilities of language. The critic Theodor Adorno (1903–69) suggested that after the Holocaust, lyric poetry might be impossible. However, the horrors of the Holocaust produced extraordinary poems and testimonials in the work of such writers as Primo LEVI, Nelly SACHS, and Elie WIESEL. With the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948, a new literature in Hebrew came into being. Fascist oppression also inspired an existential literature of engagement exemplified by the writings of Jean-Paul SARTRE, Simone de BEAUVOIR, and Albert CAMUS. The unspeakable suffering of the war, along with the stark reality of the cold war between the United States and the Soviet Union, created the climate for the THEATRE OF THE ABSURD of the 1950s.

The Soviet empire that emerged from World War II suppressed the national literatures of the countries under its sway and, particularly during the Stalinist era, imprisoned and killed its dissident writers. Among many others, Varlam SHALAMOV, Andrei AMALRIK, and Aleksandr SOLZHENITSYN were imprisoned; Osip MANDELSTAM died during imprisonment; and Isaak BABEL was summarily executed. Similarly in China, during the Cultural Revolution, such writers as DING LING and Hu Feng (1903–85), who resisted the restrictions of socialist realism, were imprisoned.

Throughout these periods of repression, writers have been remarkably resilient. Some, like the exiled novelist Vladimir NABOKOV, reinvented themselves in exile. Surviving imprisonment, illness, and forced exile, Solzhenitsyn returned to acclaim in Russia after the fall of the Soviet Union. Paris, after the war, became a particular magnet for exiled writers from Russia, Central Europe, Latin America, and Greece. At the same time, writers who remained in the Soviet Union used their creative resources to develop a genre of dissident literature, samizdat, which was often distributed underground at great risk and depended on humor, irony, obliqueness, and allegory. Literary movements affirming freedom and national identity emerged—as in Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia—surreptitiously to challenge both socialist realism and Soviet domination.

THE AFTERMATH OF COLONIALISM

One of the more inspiring effects of the postwar years was the end of colonialism and the emergence of cultures, albeit changed, that colonialism had tried to destroy or assimilate. The NÉGRITUDE movement, for example, united French-speaking African and Caribbean writers in an effort to forge a new self-expression from the colonial language they had learned in French schools and universities and the language they spoke at home. This produced the extraordinary writings of Léopold SENGHOR, Birago DIOP, and Aimé CÉSAIRE, among others, and revitalized a sense of African identity. Similarly, the independence of India in 1947 had a profound effect on definitions of Indian identity and catalyzed a resurgence of regional writers.

Even within Europe, up until World War II, marginalized cultures such as Breton, Provençal, Welsh, Irish, and Scottish Gaelic were disappearing because, within a centralized educational system, only the dominant, official language was encouraged. Increasingly, these cultures have resisted such internal colonization, and their languages are now included in the curriculum of some schools. This trend has continued under the aegis of the institution of the European Common Market. In Canada, the revival of the Québécois identity and the emergence of major authors writing in French, as a response to the dominant Anglophone culture, have been other remarkable examples, in a different context, of renewed cultural self-determination.

Postcolonialism has produced a strong immigrant and diasporic literature. For economic and political reasons, South Asians, Indonesians, Africans, Turks, and Caribbeans have established themselves in the West and have produced a new definition of what constitutes, for example, English, French, German, or Dutch literature.

WOMEN WRITERS

Feminist movements in America and Europe since the 1970s have had an equally transformative effect on world literature. They have revealed the difficulties of women writers in the past who, for the most part, had no legal or civil rights and were not supposed to participate in public life or have their work published. They have also brought to light works that had once been influential (when published anonymously or with male pseudonyms) but were later excluded from the literary canon. They have questioned the conventional notions of what is considered literary—the priority given to poetry, drama, and the realistic novel—and have given value to “inferior” forms of expression, such as letters, memoirs, and diaries, often pejoratively described as “women’s literature.” Above all, the women’s movement has inspired women writers throughout the world. Even in cultures that have hardened against the engagement of women in public life, as in some nations of North Africa and the Middle East, women writers such as Assia DJEBAR from Algeria and Nawal SADAWI from Egypt have changed the political and literary map. Confronting very different social and economic conditions, women in Latin America, Africa, and South Asia are engaging in the complex issues of liberation, modernization, and their roles in traditional patriarchal, religious communities.

Many women writers have been recipients of the Nobel Prize. Swedish novelist Selma LAGERLÖF, became the first woman to receive the Nobel Prize in 1909. Chilean poet Gabriela MISTRAL became the first Latin American woman to receive the prize in 1945.

LITERATURE AFTER THE COLLAPSE OF THE SOVIET UNION

In the last 15 years, the borders of the map of literature have become almost unrecognizable. The fall of the Soviet Union has meant the reconfiguration of social and national identities in Eastern and Central Europe. This has brought about the revival of national traditions and the creation of new ones. Economic disorder and political unrest, especially due to the war in the former Yugoslavia and neighboring states, have also created a new wave of national consciousness as well as increased immigration of writers to Western Europe and the United States.

EFFECTS OF GLOBALIZATION

Despite revivals of national identities, the technological revolution of the Internet and the globalization of markets pose the threat of cultural homogenization. Although it is now possible for diverse cultures to interact on an unprecedented scale, during the last two centuries, languages of aboriginal peoples have been disappearing at an alarming rate, and new forms of globalization have brought fear of domination by a Western culture identified as secular and materialistic. Fundamentalist religious authorities, in particular, have instituted the persecution of writers whom they consider to be disrespectful of religious beliefs and customs.

The persecution of writers and artists by political or religious groups for blasphemy or obscenity is nothing new in the history of world literature. During the last 200 years, some of the iconic texts of Western culture, such as Flaubert’s Madame Bovary, Baudelaire’s Les Fleurs du mal, and Joyce’s Ulysses, were put on trial. The Catholic Church has long placed many writers, admired by readers and literary critics alike, on its “Index” of what should not be read. In the face of fundamentalist Islamic interdictions, the very lives of writers considered to be blasphemous are at risk. A death threat by religious decree was imposed on Salman Rushdie for his Satanic Verses.

Nevertheless, under the most difficult circumstances, writers have shown extraordinary capacity for transformation. The 21st century promises to be just as challenging. At a recent discussion among world writers in the small Welsh village of Hay-on-Wye, the Irish writer and playwright Sebastian Barry suggested that writers write to create equilibrium. It remains to be seen, given the intensification of political and economical instability, what new balancing acts will be performed on the high wire of world literature.

—M. Josephine Diamond
New York City, August 2002

AUTHORS' TIMELINE

Dates	Author	Dates	Author
1749–1842	Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von	1798–1837	Leopardi, Giacomo
1756–1819	Naubert, Benedikte	1798–1855	Mickiewicz, Adam Bernard
1759–1805	Schiller, Friedrich	1799–1837	Pushkin, Aleksandr
1764–1842	Fischer, Caroline Auguste	1799–1850	Balzac, Honoré de
1765–1820	Nguyen Du	1802–1885	Hugo, Victor
1766–1826	Karamzin, Nikolai	1804–1876	Sand, George
1766–1877	Staël, Germaine de	1805–1875	Andersen, Hans Christian
1767–1830	Constant de Rebecque, Benjamin	1807–1893	Pavlova, Karolina
1768–1848	Chateaubriand, François- René de	1808–1842	Espronceda y Delgado, José de
1770–1843	Hölderlin, Friedrich	1808–1852	Gogol, Nikolay
1776–1820	Ho Xuan Huong	1808–1855	Nerval, Gérard de
1776–1822	Hoffmann, E. T. A.	1808–1889	Barbey d'Aurevilly, Jules- Amédée
1777–1828	Duras, Claire de	1810–1857	Musset, Alfred de
1778–1827	Foscolo, Ugo	1811–1872	Gautier, Théophile
1783–1842	Stendhal	1812–1870	Herzen, Aleksandr
1785–1859	Arnim, Bettina von	1812–1891	Goncharov, Ivan
1785–1863	Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm	1813–1837	Büchner, Georg
1785–1873	Manzoni, Alessandro	1814–1841	Lermontov, Mikhail
1786–1859	Desbordes-Valmore, Marceline	1818–1883	Turgenev, Ivan
1790–1869	Lamartine, Alphonse de	1819–1898	Fontane, Theodor
1797–1856	Heine, Heinrich	1821–1867	Baudelaire, Charles
1797–1863	Vigny, Alfred-Victor de	1821–1880	Flaubert, Gustave
1797–1869	Ghālib, Mirzā Asadullāh Khān	1821–1881	Fyodor Dostoyevsky
		1822–1896	Goncourt, Edmond
		1823–1864	Gonçalves Dias, Antônio

Dates	Author	Dates	Author
1828–1889	Chernyshevsky, Nikolai	1862–1922	Mori Ōgai
1828–1906	Ibsen, Henrik	1862–1946	Hauptmann, Gerhardt
1828–1910	Tolstoy, Leo	1862–1949	Maeterlinck, Maurice
1829–1877	Alencar, José Martiniano de	1863–1933	Cavafy, Constantine P.
1830–1870	Goncourt, Jules	1863–1938	D'Annunzio, Gabriele
1832–1910	Bjørnson, Bjørnstjerne	1864–1925	Rosas, Oscar
1836–1870	Bécquer, Gustavo Alfonso	1864–1936	Unamuno y Jugo, Miguel de
1837–1885	Castro, Rosalía	1867–1900	Nobre, António
1838–1889	Villiers de L'Isle-Adam, Auguste de	1867–1902	Masaoka Shiki
1838–1894	Cattopadhyay, Bankim- Chandra	1867–1916	Dario, Rubén
1839–1908	Machado de Assis, Joachim Maria	1867–1916	Natsume Soseki
1840–1902	Zola, Émile	1867–1922	Lawson, Henry
1840–1922	Verga, Giovanni	1867–1928	Blasco Ibáñez, Vicente
1842–1891	Quental, Antero Tarquínio de	1867–1936	Pirandello, Luigi
1842–1898	Mallarmé, Stéphane	1868–1933	George, Stefan
1843–1920	Pérez Galdós, Benito	1868–1936	Gorky, Maxim
1844–1900	Nietzsche, Friedrich	1868–1955	Claudé, Paul
1845–1900	Queiroz, José Maria Eça de	1869–1945	Lasker-Schüler, Else
1846–1870	Lautreamont, Comte de (Isidore-Lucien Ducasse)	1869–1948	Gandhi, Mohandas K.
1846–1916	Sienkiewicz, Henryk	1869–1951	Gide, André
1848–1907	Huysmans, Joris-Karl	1869–1952	Hamsun, Knut
1849–1912	Strindberg, August	1870–1953	Bunin, Ivan
1850–1893	Maupassant, Guy de	1871–1905	Fin de siècle
1851–1896	Verlaine, Paul	1871–1922	Proust, Marcel
1851–1921	Pardo Bazán, Emilia	1871–1945	Valéry, Paul
1852–1915	Peretz, Isaac Leib	1871–1950	Mann, Heinrich
1853–1900	Solovyov, Vladimir Sergeyevich	1872–1896	Higuchi Ichiyō
1854–1891	Rimbaud, Arthur	1872–1956	Baroja y Nessi, Pío
1856–1939	Freud, Sigmund	1873–1907	Jarry, Alfred
1857–1909	Liu E	1873–1924	Bryusov, Valery Yakovlevich
1858–1940	Lagerlöf, Selma	1873–1954	Colette
1859–1916	Akhmatova, Anna	1874–1929	Hofmannstahl, Hugo von
1859–1916	Aleichem, Shalom	1874–1947	Machado y Ruiz, Manuel
1860–1900	naturalism	1875–1926	Rilke, Rainer Maria
1860–1904	Chekhov, Anton	1875–1939	Machado, Antonio
1860–1943	Roberts, Charles	1875–1955	Mann, Thomas
1861–1913	Johnson, Pauline	1876–1938	Chatterji, Sarat Chandra
1861–1928	Svevo, Italo	1876–1944	Marinetti, Filippo
1861–1941	Tagore, Rabindranath	1877–1938	Iqbāl, Muhammad
		1877–1962	Hesse, Hermann
		1878–1942	Yosano Akiko
		1878–1957	Döblin, Alfred
		1879–1944	Han Yongun

Dates	Author	Dates	Author
1879–1949	Naidu, Sarojini	1891–1970	Sachs, Nellie
1880–1918	Apollinaire, Guillaume	1891–1974	Lagerkvist, Pär
1880–1934	Bely, Andrei	1892–1923	Södergran, Edith
1880–1936	Premchand, Munshi	1892–1927	Akutagawa Ryūnosuke
1880–1942	Musil, Robert von	1892–1938	Storni, Alfonsina
1880–1967	Arghezi, Tudor	1892–1938	Vallejo, César
1881–1936	Lu Xun (Lu Hsün)	1892–1941	Tsvetaeva, Marina
1881–1958	Jiménez, Juan Ramón	1892–1975	Andrić, Ivo
1882–1944	Giraudoux, Jean	1893–1930	Mayakovsky, Vladimir
1882–1949	Undset, Sigrid	1893–1980	Collymore, Frank A.
1883–1923	Hašek, Jaroslav	1893–1984	Gullén, Jorge
1883–1924	Kafka, Franz	1894–1941	Babel, Isaac
1883–1955	Ortega y Gasset, José	1894–1953	Tuwim, Julian
1883–1956	Takamura Kotaro	1894–1961	Céline, Louis-Ferdinand
1883–1957	Kazantzakis, Nikos	1895–1925	Yesenin, Sergey Aleksandrovich
1883–1971	Shiga Naoya	1895–1952	Éluard, Paul
1884–1937	Zamyatin, Yevgeny	1895–1976	Satyanarayana, Visvanatha
1885–1962	Dinesen, Isak	1895–1998	Jünger, Ernst
1886–1921	Gumilev, Nikolai	1896–1948	Artaud, Antonin
1886–1942	Hagiwara Sakutarō	1896–1957	Lampedusa, Giuseppe di
1886–1951	Broch, Hermann	1896–1963	Tzara, Tristan
1886–1956	Benn, Gottfried	1896–1966	Breton, André
1886–1965	Tanizaki Jun'ichirō	1896–1981	Montale, Eugenio
1886–1978	Madariaga, Salvador de	1897–1962	Bataille, Georges
1886–1980	Kokoschka, Oskar	1897–1982	Aragon, Louis
1887–1914	Trakl, Georg	1898–1936	García Lorca, Federico
1887–1966	Arp, Hans	1898–1956	Brecht, Bertolt
1887–1975	Perse, Saint-Jean	1898–1970	Remarque, Erich Maria
1888–1923	Mansfield, Katherine	1899–1950	Langgässer, Elisabeth
1888–1935	Pessoa, Fernando	1899–1966	Lao She
1888–1970	Agnon, Shmuel Yosef	1899–1972	Kawabata Yasunari
1888–1970	Ungaretti, Giuseppe	1899–1977	Nabokov, Vladimir
1889–1957	Mistral, Gabriela	1899–1984	Michaux, Henri
1889–1963	Cocteau, Jean	1899–1986	Borges, Jorge Luis
1889–1965	Alberti, Rafael	1899–1988	Ponge, Francis
1889–1975	Gunnarsson, Gunnar	1900–1944	Saint-Exupéry, Antoine de
1890–1960	Pasternak, Boris	1900–1971	Seferis, George
1890–1979	Rhys, Jean	1900–1987	Freyre, Gilberto de Mello
1891–1938	Mandelstam, Osip	1900–1999	Bing Xin (Ping Hsin)
1891–1940	Bulgakov, Mikhail	1900–1999	Sarraute, Nathalie
1891–1958	Becher, Johannes Robert	1901–1956	Fadeyev, Aleksandr Aleksandrovich
1891–1962	Hu Shih
1891–1967	Ehrenburg, Ilya	1901–1968	Quasimodo, Salvatore

Dates	Author	Dates	Author
1901–1974	Kaschnitz, Marie-Luise	1910–1986	Genet, Jean
1901–1976	Malraux, André	1910–1987	Anouilh, Jean
1901–1986	Seifert, Jaroslav	1910–	Queirós, Raquel de
1901–1988	Ausländer, Rose	1911–1996	Elytis, Odysseus
1901–1990	Leiris, Michel	1911–2001	Curnow, Allen
1902–1963	Hikmet, Nazim	1911–	Frisch, Max
1902–1974	Torres Bodet, Jaime	1911–	Mahfouz, Naguib
1902–1983	Stead, Christina	1911–	Milosz, Czeslaw
1902–1989	Guillén, Nicolás	1911–	Rinser, Luise
1903–1937	Rabéarivelo, Jean-Joseph	1912–1980	White, Patrick
1903–1951	Hayashi Fumiko	1912–1984	Faiz, Faiz Ahmed
1903–1976	Queneau, Raymond	1912–1994	Ionesco, Eugène
1903–1981	Huchel, Peter	1912–2001	Camado, Jorge
1903–1982	Sargeson, Frank	1913–1960	Amos, Albert
1903–1987	Yourcenar, Marguerite	1913–1995	Davies, Robertson
1903–1988	Paton, Alan	1913–	Césaire, Aimé
1903–1989	Simenon, Georges	1913–	Simon, Claude
1904–1936	Ostrovsky, Nikolai	1914–1950	Kanik, Orhan Veli
1904–1969	Gombrowicz, Witold	1914–1984	Cortázar, Julio
1904–1973	Neruda, Pablo	1914–1987	Abbas, K.A.
1904–1980	Carpentier, Alejo	1914–1996	Duras, Marguerite
1904–1986	Ding Ling	1914–1998	Paz, Octavio
1904–1991	Singer, Isaac Bashevis	1914–	Dağlarka, Fazil
1904–	Ba Jin		Hüsnü
1905–1980	Sartre, Jean-Paul	1915–1986	Allfrey, Phyllis
1905–1984	Sholokhov, Mikhail	1915–2000	Wright, Judith
1905–1986	Enchi Fumiko	1915–2001	Hwang Sun-won
1905–1993	Feng Zhi (Feng Chih)	1915–2001	So Chông-ju
1905–1994	Canetti, Elias	1915–1991	Chughtai, Ismat
1905–	Anand, Mulk Raj	1916–1920	Dada
1906–1989	Beckett, Samuel	1916–1978	Pak Mogwol
1906–1989	Diop, Birago	1916–1985	Tian Jian
1906–2001	Narayan, R. K.	1916–1991	Ginzburg, Natalia
1906–2001	Senghor, Léopold Sédar	1916–2000	Hébert, Anne
1907–1972	Eich, Günter	1916–	Cela, Camilo José
1907–1982	Shalamov, Varlam	1917–1945	Yun Tongju
1907–1988	Char, René	1917–1985	Böll, Heinrich
1907–1990	Moravia, Alberto	1918–1985	Morante, Elsa
1908–1950	Pavese, Cesare	1918–1998	Dudintsev, Vladimir
1908–1986	Beauvoir, Simone de	1918–	Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr
1909–1973	Brasch, Charles Orwell	1919–1987	Levi, Primo
1909–1994	Onetti, Juan Carlos	1919–	Abrahams, Peter
1910–1983	Sri Sri	1919–	Bennett, Louise

Dates	Author	Dates	Author
1920–1970	Celan, Paul	1927–	Frame, Janet
1920–1977	Lispector, Clarice	1927–	Grass, Günter
1920–1993	Noonuccal, Oodgeroo	1927–	Jhabvala, Ruth Praver
1920–	Memmi, Albert	1927–	Lamming, George
1920–	Rin Ishigaki	1928–1953	Capécia, Mayotte
1921–1988	Fried, Erich	1928–1996	Miron, Gaston
1921–1990	Dürrenmatt, Friedrich	1928–	Fuentes, Carlos
1921–1996	Habibi, Emile	1928–	Garcia Márquez, Gabriel
1921–	Aichinger, Ilse	1928–	Wiesel, Elie
1921–	Harris, Wilson	1928–	Yu Guanzhong (Yü Kwang-chung)
1921–	Okara, Gabriel
1922–1975	Pasolini, Pier Paolo	1929–1981	Bâ, Mariama
1922–1979	Neto, António Agostinho	1929–1989	Yacine, Kateb
1922–1991	Popa, Vasko	1929–1995	Müller, Heiner
1922–	Burkart, Erika	1929–	Cabrera Infante, Guillermo
1922–	Höllerer, Walter	1929–	Enzensberger, Hans Magnus
1922–	Robbe-Grillet, Alain	1929–	Kundera, Milan
1922–	Saramago, José	1929–	Kunert, Günter
1923–1985	Calvino, Italo	1929–	Maillet, Antonine
1923–1998	Kabbani, Nizar	1929–	Munonye, John
1923–	Bonnefoy, Yves	1929–	Saleh, Tayyib
1923–	Gordimer, Nadine	1929–	Wolf, Christa
1923–	Kemal, Yaşar	1930–1986	Pagis, Dan
1923–	Mala'ika, Nazek al-	1930–	Adonis
1923–	Sembène, Ousmane	1930–	Brathwaite, Edward Kamau
1923–	Szimborska, Wislawa	1930–	Fallaci, Oriana
1924–1993	Abe Kōbō	1930–	Hayashi Kyoko
1924–1997	Donoso, José	1930–	Kunene, Mazisi
1924–2000	Amichai, Yehuda	1930–	Mro'zek, Slawomir
1924–	Skvorecky, Jozef	1930–	Ōba Minako
1925–1970	Mishima Yukio	1930–	Ogot, Grace
1925–1974	Castellanos, Rosario	1930–	Walcott, Derek
1925–1985	La Guma, Alex	1931–1982	p'Bitek, Okot
1925–	Astley, Thea	1931–1989	Bernhard, Thomas
1925–	Gomringer, Eugen	1931–1993	Nwapa, Flora
1925–	Jaccottet, Philippe	1931–	Munro, Alice
1925–	Toer, Pramoedya Ananta	1931–	Sadawi, Nawal
1926–1973	Bachmann, Ingeborg	1931–	Tanikawa Shuntaro
1926–	Dépestre, René	1932–	Appelfeld, Aharon
1926–	Devi, Mahasweta	1932–	Chen Yuan-tsung
1926–	Fo, Dario	1932–	Eco, Umberto
1927–1960	Diop, David	1932–	Naipaul, V.S.
1927–1991	Idris, Yūsuf	1932–	Voinovich, Vladimir

Dates	Author	Dates	Author
1933–	Yevtushenko, Yevgeny	1942–1970	Nortje, Arthur
1934–1984	Johnson, Uwe	1942–	Aidoo, Ama Ata
1934–	Condé, Maryse	1942–	Allende, Isabel
1934–	Fraire, Isabel	1942–	Bitton, Erez
1934–	Malouf, David	1942–	Darwish, Mahmud
1934–	Soyinka, Wole	1942–	Ferré, Rosario
1935–1989	Kiš, Danilo	1942–	Handke, Peter
1935–	Brink, André	1942–	Hasluck, Nicholas
1935–	Keneally, Thomas	1942–	Sammam, Ghada
1935–	Kirsch, Sarah	1943–1990	Arenas, Renaldo
1935–	Kogawa, Joy	1943–	Carey, Peter
1935–	Kurahashi Yumiko	1943–	Mehta, Gita
1935–	Ôe Kenzaburô	1943–	Ondaatje, Michael
1935–	Wittig, Monique	1944–1988	Nichol, b. p.
1936–1980	Amalrik, Andrey	1944–	Emecheta, Buchi
1936–1982	Perec, Georges	1944–	Lim, Shirley Geok-Lin
1936–	Djebar, Assia	1944–	Serote, Mongane Wally
1936–	Havel, Václav	1944–	Yathay Pin
1936–	Nkosi, Lewis	1945–	Farah, Nuruddin
1936–	Ravikovitch, Dahlia	1945–	Laird, Christopher
1936–	Vargas Llosa, Mario	1946–	Al-Jayyusi, Salma al-Khadra
1937–1986	Head, Bessie	1946–	Cliff, Michelle
1937–	Akhmadulina, Izabella	1946–	Laing, B. Kojo
1937–	Arrabal, Fernando	1947–1967	Gruppe 47
1937–	Cixous, Hélène	1947–	Anyidoho, Kofi
1937–	Desai, Anita	1947–	Dharmachoti, Ussiri
1938–1960	Theatre of the Absurd, the	1947–	Dhasal, Namdeo
1938–	Hwang Tonggyu	1947–	Goodison, Lorna
1938–	Karnad, Girish	1947–	Rushdie, Salman
1938–	Ngugi wa Thiong'o	1947–	Tsushima Yuko
1938–	San Juan, Epifanio	1947–	Yáñez, Mirta
1938–	Schwarz-Bart, Simone	1948–	Achebe, Chinua
1939–	Atwood, Margaret	1948–	Espinet, Ramabai
1939–	Braun, Volker	1948–	Ndebele. Njabulo, S.
1939–	Breytenbach, Breyten	1948–	Wicomb, Zoë
1939–	Huang Chunming (Huang Ch'un-ming)	1949–	Bei Dao
1939–	Oz, Amos	1949–	Cronin, Jeremy
1940–1975	Brinkmann, Rolf Dieter	1949–	Hayslip, Le Ly
1940–	Coetzee, J. M.	1949–	Kincaid, Jamaica
1940–	Gao Xingjian	1949–	Murakami Haruki
1940–	Souza, Eunice de	1951–1999	Kauraka, Kauraka
1941–	Maron, Monika	1951–	De Kok, Ingrid
		1951–	Falkner, Gerhard

Dates

Author

1951– 1952– 1952– 1952– 1952– 1953–
1953–
1953–
1953–
1954–
1954–

Ipellie, Alooook
Grünzweig, Dorothea
Mistry, Ronhinton
Pamuk, Orhan
Seth, Vikram
Busia, Abena
Chamoiseau, Patrick
Meeks, Brian
Suleri, Sara
Braschi, Giannina
Gunesekara, Ramesh

Dates

Author

1956– 1956– 1956–
1959–
1959–
1959–
1959–
1960–
1961– 1962–
1962–

Bhatt, Sujata
Ghosh, Amitav
Mo Yan
Chatterjee, Upamanyu
Köhler, Barbara
Menchú, Rigoberta
Yamada Eimi
Malange, Nise
Roy, Arundhati
Flanagan, Richard
Grünbein, Durs

WRITERS COVERED, BY GEOGRAPHICAL AREA

AFRICA

Abrahams, Peter
Achebe, Chinua
Aidoo, Ama Ata
Anyidoho, Kofi
Bá, Mariama
Breytenbach, Breyten
Brink, André
Busia, Abena
Coetzee, J. M.
Cronin, Jeremy
De Kok, Ingrid
Diop, Birago
Diop, David
Emecheta, Buchi
Farah, Nuruddin
Gordimer, Nadine
Head, Bessie
Kunene, Mazisi
La Guma, Alex
Laing, B. Kojo
Malange, Nise
Munonye, John
Ndebele. Njabulo, S.
Neto, António Agostinho
Ngugi wa Thiong'o
Nkosi, Lewis

Nortje, Arthur
Nwapa, Flora
Ogot, Grace
Okara, Gabriel
p'Bitek, Okot
Paton, Alan
Rabéarivelo, Jean-Joseph
Saleh, Tayyib
Sembène, Ousmane
Senghor, Léopold Sédar
Serote, Mongane Wally
Soyinka, Wolo
Wicomb, Zoë
Yacine, Kateb

THE AMERICAS

Canada

Atwood, Margaret
Davies, Robertson
Hébert, Anne
Ipellie, Alootook
Johnson, Pauline
Kogawa, Joy
Maillet, Antonine
Miron, Gaston
Munro, Alice
Nichol, bp

Ondaatje, Michael Roberts, Charles

The Caribbean

Allfrey, Phyllis
Bennett, Louise
Braschi, Giannina
Brathwaite, Edward Kamau
Capécia, Mayotte
Césaire, Aimé
Chamoiseau, Patrick
Cliff, Michelle
Collymore, Frank A.
Condé, Maryse
Dépestre, René
Espinete, Ramabai
Goodison, Lorna
Guillén, Nicolás
Harris, Wilson
Kincaid, Jamaica
Laird, Christopher
Lamming, George
Meeks, Brian
Naipaul, V.S.
Perse, Saint-Jean
Rhys, Jean
Schwarz-Bart, Simone
Walcott, Derek

Latin America

Alencar, José Martiniano de
Allende, Isabel
Amado, Jorge de
Arenas, Reinaldo
Borges, Jorge Luis
Cabrera Infante, Guillermo
Carpentier, Alejo
Castellanos, Rosario
Cortázar, Julio
Darío, Ruben
Donoso, José
Ferré, Rosario
Fraire, Isabel
Freyre, Gilberto de Mello
Fuentes, Carlos

García Márquez, Gabriel
Gonçalves Dias, Antônio
Lispector, Clarice
Machado de Assis, Joaquim Maria
Menchú, Rigoberta
Mistral, Gabriela
Neruda, Pablo
Onetti, Juan Carlos
Paz, Octavio
Queirós, Raquel de
Rosas, Oscar
Storni, Alfonsina
Torres Bodet, Jaime
Vallejo, César
Vargas Llosa, Mario
Yáñez, Mirta

ASIA

China

Ba Jin
Bei Dao
Bing Xin
Chen Yuan-tsung
Ding Ling
Feng Zhi
Gao Xingjian
Hu Shi
Huang Chunming (Huang Ch'un-ming)
Lao She Liu E
Lu Xun
Mo Yan
Tian Jian
Yu Guanzhong

Japan

Abe Kōbō
Akutagawa Ryūnosuke
Enchi Fumiko
Hagiwara Sakutarō
Hayashi Fumikō
Hayashi Kyōko
Higuchi Ichiyō
Ishigaki Rin

Kawabata Yasunari
Kurahashi Yumiko
Masaoka Shiki
Mishima Yukio
Mori Ōgai
Murakami Haruki
Natsume Sōseki
Oba Minako
Ōe Kenzaburō
Shiga Naoya
Takamura Kotarō
Tanikawa Shuntaro
Tanizaki Jun'ichirō
Tsushima Yukō
Yamada Eimi
Yosano Akiko

Korea

Han Yongun
Hwang Sun-won
Hwang Tonggyu
Pak Mogwol
So Chông-ju
Yun Tongju

South Asia

Abbas, K.A.
Anand, Mulk Raj
Bhatt, Sujata
Cattopadhyay, Bankim-Chandra
Chatterjee, Upamanyu
Chatterji, Sarat Chandra
Chughtai, Ismat
Dalit literature
Desai, Anita
Devi, Mahasweta
Dhasal, Namdeo
Faiz, Faiz Ahmed
Gandhi, Mohandas K.
Ghālib, Mirza Asadullah Khan
Ghosh, Amitav
Gunesekara, Ramesh
Iqbal, Muhammad
Jhabvala, Ruth Praver
Karnad, Girish

Mehta, Gita
Mistry, Rohinton
Naidu, Sarojini
Narayan, R. K.
Premchand, Munshi
Roy, Arundhati
Rushdie, Salman
Satyanarayana, Visvanatha
Seth, Vikram
Souza, Eunice de
Sri Sri Suleri, Sara
Tagore, Rabindranath

Southeast Asia and the Pacific

Dhammachoti, Ussiri
Hayslip, Le Ly
Ho Xuan Huong
Kauraka Kauraka
Lim, Shirley Geok-Lin
Nguyen Du
San Juan, Epifanio
Toer, Pramoedya Ananta
Yathay Pin

AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Aboriginal movement
Astley, Thea
Brasch, Charles Orwell
Carey, Peter
Curnow, Allen
Flanagan, Richard
Frame, Janet
Hasluck, Nicholas
Keneally, Thomas
Lawson, Henry
Malouf, David
Mansfield, Katherine
Noonuccal, Oodgeroo
Sargeson, Frank
Stead, Christina
White, Patrick
Wright, Judith

EUROPE

Eastern and Central Europe

Arghezi, Tudor
Canetti, Elias
Gombrowicz, Witold
Hašek, Jaroslav
Havel, Václav
Kiš, Danilo
Kundera, Milan
Mickiewicz, Adam
Milosz, Czesław
Mroźek, Sławomir
Peretz, Isaac Leib
Popa, Vasko
Seifert, Jaroslav
Sienkiewicz, Henryk
Singer, Isaac Bashevis
Škvorecký, Jozef
Socialist realism
Szymborska, Wisława
Tuwim, Julian
Wiesel, Elie

French-Speaking Europe

Anouilh, Jean
Apollinaire, Guillaume
Aragon, Louis
Artaud, Antonin
Balzac, Honoré de
Barbey d'Aurevilly, Jules-Amédée
Bataille, Georges
Baudelaire, Charles
Beauvoir, Simone de
Beckett, Samuel
Bonnetoy, Yves
Breton, André
Camus, Albert
Céline, Louis-Ferdinand
Char, René
Chateaubriand, François-René de
Cixous, Hélène
Claudel, Paul
Cocteau, Jean
Colette

Constant, Benjamin
Desbordes-Valmore, Marceline
Duras, Claire de
Duras, Marguerite
Éluard, Paul
Flaubert, Gustave
Gautier, Théophile
Genet, Jean
Gide, André
Giraudoux, Jean
Goncourt brothers, Edmond and Jules
Hugo, Victor
Huysmans, Joris-Karl Ionesco, Eugène
Jaccottet, Philippe
Jarry, Alfred
Lamartine, Alphonse de
Lautreamont, Comte de (Isidore-Lucien Ducasse)
Leiris, Michel
Maeterlinck, Maurice
Mallarmé, Stéphane
Malraux, André
Maupassant, Guy de
Michaux, Henri
Musset, Alfred de Naturalism
Nerval, Gérard de
Perc, Georges
Ponge, Francis
Proust, Marcel
Queneau, Raymond
Rimbaud, Arthur
Robbe-Grillet, Alain
Saint-Exupéry, Antoine de
Sand, George
Sarraute, Nathalie
Sartre, Jean-Paul
Simenon, Georges
Simon, Claude
Staël, Germaine de Stendhal
Tzara, Tristan
Valéry, Paul
Verlaine, Paul
Vigny, Alfred-Victor de

Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, Auguste de Wittig, Monique
 Yourcenar, Marguerite
 Zola, Émile

German-Speaking Europe, Scandinavia, and the Netherlands

Aichinger, Ilse
 Andersen, Hans Christian
 Arnim, Bettina von
 Arp, Hans
 Ausländer, Rose
 Bachmann, Ingeborg
 Becher, Johannes
 Benn, Gottfried
 Bernhard, Thomas
 Bjørnson, Bjørnstjerne
 Böll, Heinrich
 Braun, Volker
 Brecht, Bertolt
 Brinkmann, Rolf Dieter
 Broch, Hermann
 Büchner, Georg
 Burkart, Erika
 Celan, Paul
 Dinesen, Isak
 Döblin, Alfred
 Dürrenmatt, Friedrich
 Eich, Günter
 Enzensberger, Hans Magnus
 Falkner, Gerhard
 Fischer, Caroline Auguste
 Fontane, Theodor
 Freud, Sigmund
 Fried, Erich
 Frisch, Max
 George, Stefan
 Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von
 Gomringer, Eugen
 Grass, Günter
 Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm
 Grünbein, Durs
 Grünzweig, Dorothea
 Gruppe 47
 Gunnarsson, Gunnar

Hamsun, Knut
 Handke, Peter
 Hauptmann, Gerhardt
 Heine, Heinrich
 Hesse, Hermann
 Hoffmann, E. T. A.
 Hofmannstahl, Hugo von
 Hölderlin, Friedrich
 Höllerer, Walter
 Huchel, Peter
 Ibsen, Henrik
 Johnson, Uwe
 Jünger, Ernst
 Kafka, Franz
 Kaschnitz, Marie-Luise
 Kirsch, Sarah
 Köhler, Barbara
 Kokoschka, Oskar
 Kunert, Günter
 Lagerkvist, Pär
 Lagerlöf, Selma
 Langgässer, Elisabeth
 Lasker-Schüler, Else
 Mann, Heinrich
 Mann, Thomas
 Maron, Monika
 Müller, Heiner
 Musil, Robert
 Nietzsche, Friedrich
 Postmodernism
 Remarque, Erich Maria
 Rilke, Rainer Maria
 Rinser, Luise
 Sachs, Nellie Leonie
 Schiller, Friedrich
 Södergran, Edith Strindberg, August
 Trakl, Georg
 Undset, Sigrid
 Wolf, Christa

Greece, Turkey, and the Balkans

Andrić, Ivo
 Cavafy, Constantine P.
 Dağlarka, Fazil Hüsnü

Elytis, Odysseus
Hikmet, Nazim
Kanik, Orhan Veli
Kazantsakis, Nikos
Seferis, George

Italy

Calvino, Italo
D'Annunzio, Gabriele
Eco, Umberto
Fallaci, Oriana
Fo, Dario
Foscolo, Ugo
Ginzburg, Natalia
Lampedusa, Giuseppe di
Leopardi, Giacomo
Levi, Primo
Manzoni, Alessandro
Marinetti, Filippo
Montale, Eugenio
Morante, Elsa
Moravia, Alberto
Pasolini, Pier Paolo
Pavese, Cesare
Pirandello, Luigi
Quasimodo, Salvatore
Svevo, Italo
Ungaretti, Giuseppe
Verga, Giovanni

Russia

Akhmadulina, Izabella
Akhmatova, Anna
Amalrik, Andrey
Babel, Isaac
Bely, Andrei
Bryusov, Valery Yakovlevich
Bulgakov, Mikhail
Bunin, Ivan
Chekhov, Anton
Chernyshevsky, Nikolay
Dostoyevsky, Fyodor
Dudintsev, Vladimir
Ehrenburg, Ilya
Fadeyev, Aleksandr Aleksandrovich

Gogol, Nikolai
Goncharov, Ivan
Gorky, Maxim
Gumilev, Nikolai
Herzen, Aleksandr
Karamzin, Nikolai
Lermontov, Mikhail
Mandelstam, Osip
Mayakovsky, Vladimir
Nabokov, Vladimir
Ostrovsky, Nikolai
Pasternak, Boris
Pavlova, Karolina
Pushkin, Aleksandr
Shalamov, Varlam
Sholokhov, Mikhail
Solovyov, Vladimir Sergeyevich
Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr
Tolstoy, Leo
Tsvetaeva, Marina
Turgenev, Ivan
Voinovich, Vladimir
Yesenin, Sergey
Yevtushenko, Yevgeny
Zamyatin, Yevgeny

Spain and Portugal

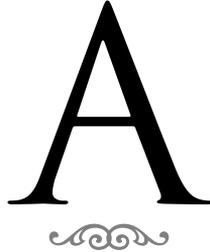

Alberti, Rafael
Arrabal, Fernando
Baroja y Nessi, Pío
Bécquer, Gustavo Alfonso
Blasco Ibáñez, Vicente
Castro, Rosalía
Cela, Camilo José
Espronceda y Delgado, José de
García Lorca, Federico
Generation of 98
Guillén, Jorge
Jiménez, Juan Ramón
Machado y Ruiz, Antonio
Machado y Ruiz, Manuel
Madariaga, Salvador de
Nobre, António
Ortega y Gasset, José
Pardo Bazán, Emilia

Pérez Galdós, Benito
Pessoa, Fernando
Queiroz, José Maria Eça de
Quental, Antero Tarquínio de Saramago, José
Unamuno y Jugo, Miguel de

THE MIDDLE EAST

Adonis
Agnon, Samuel Joseph
Aleichem, Shalom
Amichai, Yehuda
Appelfeld, Aharon
Bitton, Erez
Darwish, Mahmud

Djebar, Assia
Habibi, Emile
Idris, Yūsuf
Al Jayyusi, Salma al-Khadra
Kabbani, Nizar
Kemal, Yaşar
Mahfouz, Naguib
Malaika, Nazik al-
Memmi, Albert
Oz, Amos
Pagis, Dan
Pamuk, Orhan
Ravikovitch, Dahlia
Sadawi, Nawal
Sammam, Ghada

Abbas, K(hawaja) A(hmad) (1914–1987)
novelist, short-story writer, screenwriter

Khawaja Ahmad Abbas was born in Panipat, India, into a privileged, upper-middle-class family. After graduating from the University of Aligarh, Abbas became a journalist and went on to write novels and screenplays. While studying law, Abbas founded a fledgling newspaper called Aligarh Opinion. He was also a major Hindi movie director and screenwriter. Throughout his career, Abbas used films because of their accessibility to the uneducated and poor to promote his views on social castes and class conflicts. Abbas was also one of the founders and a member of the Indian People's Theatre Association (IPTA), which produced two of his plays.

Like many other writers, Abbas was concerned with national politics and wrote from a Marxist, sociopolitical perspective. This attitude was fostered and grew under the influence of Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950) and Mohandas GANDHI (1869–1948). Some of Abbas's most famous English works are Tomorrow Is Ours: A Novel of the India of Today (1943) and Inquilab: A Novel of the Indian Revolution (1955). These novels are good examples of Abbas's treatment of the oppressed as they struggle against social and political systems such as untouchability, fascism, and imperialism.

His screenplay for the classic Hindi movie Awara (Vagabond, 1952) is perhaps one of Indian cinema's most lyrical and compelling compositions on the irrepressible human spirit against the shadow of colonial capitalism.

In 1951, Abbas established his own film production company. His movie Pardesi (Foreigner) was selected for screening at the 1958 Cannes Film Festival in France. In 1968, Abbas was awarded the Padma Shri in recognition of his contribution to Indian literature.

Another Work by K. A. Abbas

The World Is My Village: A Novel with an Index.
Columbia, Mo.: South Asia Books, 1984.

Abe Kimifusa

See ABE KÖBŌ.

Abe Kōbō (Abe Kimifusa) (1924–1993)
novelist, short-story writer, playwright

Abe Kōbō was born in Tokyo to Abe Asakichi and Yorimi. He moved to Manchuria with his family in 1925 but returned to Tokyo to finish high school. In 1943, he entered the medical department of Tokyo Imperial University, graduating in 1948.

2 Abe Kōbō

Abe's first work was reflective of his experiences in Manchuria. In On the Sign at the End of the Road (1948), an opium addict relates his story of flight and imprisonment in Manchuria at the end of World War II. The narration is conveyed through a series of notebooks that the protagonist kept during the war as he mused over the nature of his native country and the loss of his home.

Abe's writing quickly became more surrealist. The novel The Crime of S. Karma (1951) portrays a man who wakes up one morning to find that he has lost his identity. When he arrives at work, he finds that his business card has stolen his identity and, with the help of his fountain pen, wristwatch, and glasses, is making a play for his secretary. Like many of Abe's stories, The Crime of S. Karma combines logic and fantasy. The story won the Akutagawa Prize for new writers.

In the 1950s, Abe joined the Japanese Communist Party (JCP) and wrote for publications associated with the party. However, by the late 1950s, Abe was writing articles critical of the JCP's restrictive policies, which earned his expulsion in 1962.

During this period, Abe also began writing science fiction stories. As a genre, science fiction was new to Japan, but Abe broke open the field with his novel Inter Ice Age 4, serialized in the journal Sekai from 1958 to 1959. In the story, the scientist Katsumi uses a computer to predict the future and discovers that a future race of gilled underwater dwellers has condemned him because he cannot adapt to the changes that are in store for society.

Abe's most acclaimed writing was published in the 1960s: The Woman in the Dunes (1962), The Face of Another (1964), and The Ruined Map (1967). All three novels explore the theme of alienated protagonists who must overcome or accept change. For example, in The Face of Another, the protagonist's face has been disfigured, so he creates a latex mask to hide his scars. However, with the mask, he assumes a new identity, and the mask eventually forms its own identity and threatens to take over the wearer. The Ruined Map follows suit with a detective who searches for a missing husband and, during the process, becomes jealous of the freedom the escaped husband has found. The most well known of the three novels, The Woman in the Dunes, portrays the kidnapping of a man who collects insects as a hobby. Held in a dwelling beneath the sand dunes, he must come to terms with his new life.

In the next decade, Abe founded an experimental theater troupe called the Abe Kōbō Studio. For nine years, he directed plays, adapted a number of his stories and wrote several plays for the troupe. Notably, one of these adaptations—Friends (1967)—has been translated into several languages and performed internationally. It tells the story of a man whose life is invaded by a family who adopts him, moves into his apartment, and basically takes over his life.

Following the closing of the troupe in 1979, Abe wrote only three major novels: Secret Rendezvous (1977), The Ark Sakura (1984) and Kangaroo Notebook (1991). Unlike his earlier stories, these novels were not greeted with acclaim because they are difficult to interpret. For example, in Secret Rendezvous, a man searches for his missing wife in a hospital. During his investigation, he meets a man with a horse's body as well as a cavalcade of other strange characters. The reader is bombarded not only with bizarre visual images but also with a cacophony of sound imagery.

Abe died of heart failure while writing his final novel, The Flying Man, which was published posthumously in 1993.

Other Works by Abe Kōbō

Beyond the Curve. Translated by Juliet Winters Carpenter. New York: Kodansha International, 1991.

The Box Man. Translated by E. Dale Saunders. New York: Knopf, 1974.

Three Plays. Translated by Donald Keene. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.

Works about Abe Kōbō

Currie, William. Metaphors of Alienation: The Fiction of Abe, Beckett and Kafka. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1973.

Yamanouchi, Hisaki. "Abe Kōbō and Ōe Kenzaburō: The Search for Identity in Contemporary Japanese Literature." In Modern Japan: Aspects of History, Literature and Society. Edited by W. G. Beasley. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975.

Aboriginal movement

Aboriginal people have inhabited Australia for between 40,000 and 100,000 years. Prior to English settlement in 1788, Aboriginal people had minimal contact with other peoples. Their culture was very diversified, with more than 200 different languages spoken, but they shared a commonality of territoriality, kinship, family structures, the Dreamtime, spirituality, and ceremonies. The Dreamtime and dream songs of the Aborigines reveal their sense of sacred interrelation with the land and all other living creatures. They also explain the group's spiritual life and history and are the traditional source of their music, painting, and storytelling. Dreamtime connects the past, present, and future in a sacred spiritual reality.

A well-known musical form is the corroboree, a singing of life stories, rich in rhyme, rhythm, repetition, and poetry. This is part of a translation of a corroboree called Moonbone: "Now the moon is changing, having cast away his bone/ Gradually he grows larger, taking on new bone and flesh." Rock paintings and engravings also show the richness of the imagination in Aboriginal culture. Sacred rituals include singing, music, dance, and performance.

After colonization, European settlers appropriated Aboriginal lands and, through conquest and policies of forced assimilation (children were stolen from their parents and placed in European families), almost wiped out Aboriginal culture. However, beginning in 1938, an Aboriginal movement emerged that began to demand civil rights. This movement, influenced by the American Civil Rights movement, became stronger in the 1960s and again in the 1990s when Aborigines won some land rights and an apology from the Australian government for past abuses.

Aboriginal storytelling and poetry is very strongly influenced by traditional oral narratives. The storyteller Pauline McCleod, for example, has revived and created dream songs for a modern Aboriginal audience that had largely forgotten them. The following few lines of a typical modern poem, by Stephen Clayton, express the Aboriginal loss of a connectedness to nature:

*I am born of the land, my soul is the sun
Nature is my mother,
I am Mother Nature's son
The wind is my spirit, running wild, running free
Water is my mirror, reflecting visions in me
I am like a great river that slowly runs dry Polluted and abused, I am the River slowly—I die. . .*

Anthropologists such as Robert Louis Nathan and Kingsley Palmer have revealed Aboriginal culture to the rest of the world, but it was not until the 1960s that the world heard the voice of the Aborigines speaking for themselves about their lives. Monica Clare's Karobran: The Story of an Aboriginal Girl (1978) is the first novel ever written by an Aboriginal woman. It was completed, edited, and published by Jack Horner because Monica Clare died in 1973 before she could finish the book. Karobran means "togetherness." The book is a moving autobiographical novel about Isabelle, an Aboriginal girl who was removed from her family and ill-treated as a domestic servant.

Several other Aboriginal writers followed Monica Clare. Hyllus Maris (1934–) wrote Women of the Sun in the early 1950s, but the book was not published until 1985. It is a collection of stories of the lives of strong Aboriginal women who looked to the ancestors for guidance. Jack Davis (1917–2000), a noted poet and playwright, belonged to the Nyoongarah people of southwest Australia and later became the editor of the Aboriginal Publications Foundation. His first play, Kullark (1982), was popular as a documentary on the history of the Aborigines in western Australia.

4 Abrahams, Peter Henry

He also wrote The Dreamers (1982) and No Sugar (1986), both known for their depth and closeness to the reality of the Aboriginal experience. No Sugar was voted the best stage play of the year by the Australian Writers Guild.

Oodegeroo NOONUCCAL, commonly known as Kath Walker, started writing in the 1950s. Her poems were about the struggles of the Aboriginal people and their demands for land rights and education. Noonuccal combined social issues with literature, thus revealing her depth of experience and a unique skill with the English language. She is one of Australia's greatest poets. Faith Bandler (1920–) wrote Wacvie (1977), in which she retraces her father's history as a forced worker on a sugar plantation in Queensland. Writers such as Noonuccal and Bandler also built political coalitions to lobby for positive changes for the Aborigines.

Holding up the Sky: Aboriginal Women Speak (1999) is a collection of powerful stories by Aboriginal women. They talk about issues concerning displacement from their homelands, forced removal from families, physical abuse, and lost identities. Collections like this one and Writing Us Mob: New Indigenous Voices (2000) are of great value because these are the voices of the Aborigines.

B. Wongar's The Track to Bralgu (1977) is a collection of 12 short stories that portray the barrenness of the once fertile land of the Aborigines and the exploitation by the white world of all the Aborigines' resources.

Several writers of mixed origin emerged to tell the stories of the Aboriginal experience because the government considered them to be Aborigines. One such writer is Sally Morgan (1951–), who wrote My Place (1987), an autobiography tracing the lives of her ancestors of the Nyoongal people of southwest Australia. Morgan captures their struggles to be educated and find jobs to sustain their families. She emphasizes the importance of the family roots that kept her family together. She also talks about the deep Aboriginal spirituality that believes in the spirits of the ancestors protecting future generations.

Today, there are institutions that specifically promote Aboriginal art and literature, such as the Aboriginal Center in Perth, the Aboriginal Publications Foundation, the Australian Institute of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Studies in Canberra, and the Aboriginal Arts Board of the Australian Arts Council.

The Aboriginal literary movement emerged from autobiographies and life experiences. Memoirs written by women are often referred to as "herstories." They reveal a strong sense of the writers' connection with the land and the spirit world. Herstories are self-presentations, an expression of the self as part of others, even across generations. They were also a means of resisting government control. Aboriginal writings are seen by some scholars as political acts in themselves, as the writers fight against the oblivion imposed on Aborigines by the white culture to identify, recognize, and recapture some of the social, spiritual and literary elements of the Aboriginal past.

Works about the Aboriginal Movement

Brock, Peggy, ed. Women, Rites and Sites: Aboriginal Women's Cultural Knowledge. Boston: Allen and Unwin, 1900.

Clayton, Stephen. "I Am-Aborigine." Available online at www.dreamtime.auz.net/StoryAbor.htm.

Nathan, Robert Louis. The Dreamtime. Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook Press, 1975.

Simms, Norman. Silence and Invisibility: A Study of the New Literature from the Pacific. Washington, D.C.: Three Continents Press, 1986.

Abrahams, Peter Henry (Peter Graham) (1919–) novelist, short-story writer, journalist

When Peter Abrahams was five years old, his father, an Ethiopian, died. Abrahams was sent to live with relatives in Johannesburg, South Africa, far from his mixed-race mother. Although he returned three years later, the family's desperate financial situation forced young Abrahams to go to work for a metal worker. This nine-year-old boy was to grow up to become one of South Africa's best-known writers.

When Abrahams was still a young man, an office worker took him under her wing and read Shakespeare to him, awakening a lifelong love of learning. Throughout many years of menial employment, Abrahams held fast to his educational dreams, going to school when he could. At one point, Abrahams even tried to start a school for poor, black and colored South Africans, one where native languages could be spoken.

When Abrahams was 20, he took a job as a stoker on a freighter bound for England. Abrahams wrote regularly, publishing his first books during World War II: a collection of short stories, Dark Testament (1942), and a novel, Song of the City (1945), which begins to examine the costs of urbanization for black South Africans, a theme he took up again more successfully two years later in Mine Boy. His growing professional reputation made it possible for him to return to South Africa in 1952, when he took a job as a reporter for The London Observer.

His work as a journalist, including employment as a scriptwriter for the BBC, provided the opportunity to write creatively. Of Abrahams's eight novels, the two that have most solidified his reputation are Mine Boy (1946) and Wild Conquest (1951). Both novels deal with the great movements of peoples within South Africa during its several centuries of settlement and development. Wild Conquest focuses on the Great Trek of the Boers in the 19th century. These descendants of Dutch settlers spread north from Cape Province in search of a religious and secular paradise. They inevitably encountered indigenous peoples, including the Matabeles, who challenged the Boers' sense of mission. Because the descendants of the Boers were to set the foundation for the next century's apartheid laws, Abrahams's focus on these interactions combines historical perspective with contemporary focus. This type of novelistic approach made him something of a literary spokesperson for the developing anti-apartheid movement in the 1950s and 1960s. Mine

Boy follows a migration of a different sort: the economic movement of people in search of jobs in mines and in urban areas. Such economic migrations led to the dissolution of families and the creation of company and industry-controlled living areas. Although this novel calls for a multiracial coexistence as the only possible future for South Africa, the story ends with the deaths of many characters who embraced this noble goal.

Critical reception of Abrahams's many essays, novels, and autobiographical writings has been mixed, in part because of the contradictory messages of novels such as Mine Boy. However, his fusion of a European narrative style with a focus on African themes and tendencies made Abrahams one of the first voices from South Africa to question the divisiveness of apartheid from the perspective of a person of color.

Other Works by Peter Abrahams

The Black Experience in the 20th Century: An Autobiography and Meditation. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.

A Night of Their Own. New York: Knopf, 1965.

The View from Coyaba. London: Faber and Faber, 1985.

A Wreath for Udomo. London: Faber and Faber, 1956.

Works about Peter Abrahams

Lindfors, Bernth. "Exile and Aesthetic Distance: Geographical Influences on Political Commitment in the Works of Peter Abrahams." International Fiction Review 13 (Summer 1986).

Wade, Michael. Peter Abrahams. London: Evans Bros., 1972.

———. "Peter Abrahams at 70." Southern African Review of Books (June/July 1989). Available online at <http://www.uni-ulm.de/~rturrell/antho4html/Wade.html>.

Achebe, Chinua (1930–) novelist

Albert Chinualumogu Achebe (ah CHAY bay) was born in Ogidi, eastern Nigeria, when Nigeria was a British colony. His father, Isaiah Okafor Achebe, was raised according to the traditions of the Igbo people but converted to Christianity and became a church teacher. His mother, Janet Achebe, told him traditional folktales as he was growing up. Achebe learned to respect the old ways even as his country was adopting new ones.

After studying at University College in Ibadan, Achebe received a B.A. from London University in 1953. He became a producer and eventually a director for the Nigerian Broadcasting Company. In 1961, he married Christie Chinwe Okoli, with whom he had four children. After establishing his reputation as a writer, he left broadcasting in 1966. When civil war broke out the following year—eastern Nigeria, the Igbo homeland, attempted to secede from the Nigerian federation as a new country called Biafra—he traveled abroad to promote the Biafran cause. Beware, Soul Brother (1971) describes his war experiences, including his family's narrow escape when their apartment was hit by a bomb. In 1976, he became professor of English at the University of Nigeria. A serious car accident in 1990 left him paralyzed from the waist down. He is now professor of literature at Bard College in New York's Hudson Valley.

In Home and Exile (1988), Achebe writes that he decided to become a writer after reading Joyce Cary's Mr. Johnson. Critics praised the book's realistic portrayal of Africa, but Achebe thought its Nigerian hero was "an embarrassing nitwit." He decided that "the story we had to tell could not be told for us by anyone else, no matter how gifted and well-intentioned." His novels tell the story of Nigeria "from the inside," from Igbo resistance to British colonization through the coup that established the commander of the Nigerian army, General Ironsi, as head of state in 1966.

Critical Analysis

Achebe's first novel, Things Fall Apart (1958), tells the story of Okonwo, a great man among his people but someone who cannot adapt to the changes brought by colonization. Achebe does not idealize the old ways, but he presents them as worthy of respect. However, as Okonkwo's son Obierika tells him, "he [the white man] has put a knife on the things that held us together, and we have fallen apart." Okonkwo's refusal to adapt leads him to violence and ultimately to destruction. As Achebe explained in a 2000 interview in Atlantic, "With the coming of the British, Igbo land as a whole was incorporated . . . with a whole lot of other people with whom the Igbo people had not had direct contact before. . . . You had to learn a totally new reality, and accommodate yourself to the demands of this new reality, which is the state called Nigeria."

Things Fall Apart established Achebe as "the founding father of modern African literature," according to Harvard philosopher K. Anthony Appiah. Achebe was the first novelist to present colonization from an African point of view. He also introduced what he calls a "new English," using Igbo proverbs and pidgin English to express the African oral tradition in English. As editor of the journal Okike, which he founded in 1971, Achebe continues to promote new African writing.

The most influential of his works, Things Fall Apart has been translated into more than 50 languages. In the Atlantic interview, Achebe explains its appeal: "There are many, many ways in which people are deprived or subjected to all kinds of victimization—it doesn't have to be colonization. Once you allow yourself to identify with the people in a story, then you might begin to see yourself in that story."

At the beginning of Achebe's second novel, No Longer at Ease (1960), Okonkwo's grandson Obi is on trial for accepting bribes. Obi is one of the educated elite to whom the British plan to turn over the government when Nigeria becomes independent. "Like his grandfather, Obi was another victim of cultural conflict," notes Bernth Lindfors. "Obi had been weaned away from traditional values but had not fully assimilated Western ideals; having no firm moral convictions, he was confused by his predicament and fell." Torn between tradition and modern ways, Obi—and his generation—are "no longer at ease."

Arrow of God (1964) is set in the 1920s. Enzeli, chief priest of the patron god of his Igbo village, finds himself caught in a conflict between his people and British colonial administrators, who want to make him village chieftain. Gerald Moore, in Seven African Writers, notes that “As in Achebe’s other novels, it is the strong-willed man of tradition who cannot adapt, and who is crushed by virtues in the war between the new, more worldly order, and the old conservative values of an isolated society.”

The narrator of Achebe’s fourth novel, A Man of the People, is involved in a fictional coup that foreshadows the actual coup that occurred the year the novel was published. Odili, a schoolteacher, at first supports M. A. Nanga, a villager who has become minister of culture, but runs against him when he realizes that Nanga abuses his power. Although set in the fictional Republic of Kangan, the satire has obvious parallels to present-day Nigeria. The novel reflects the conviction Achebe expressed in The Trouble with Nigeria (1983): “Hopeless as it may seem today, Nigeria is not absolutely beyond redemption. Critical, yes, but not entirely hopeless. Nigerians are what they are only because their leaders are not what they should be.”

In 1979, Achebe received the Order of the Federal Republic for his contributions to African literature. “I would be quite satisfied if my novels (especially the ones I set in the past) did no more than teach my readers that their past—with all its imperfections—was not one long night of savagery from which the first Europeans acting on God’s behalf delivered them,” he reflected in Morning Yet on Creation Day (1975). Today, he is recognized as the first African to adapt the conventions of the European novel successfully and is Africa’s most widely translated writer.

Works about Chinua Achebe

Ezenwa-Ohaeto. Chinua Achebe: A Biography. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.

Innes, C. L. Chinua Achebe. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Lindfors, Bernth. Conversations with Chinua Achebe. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

Moore, Gerald. Seven African Writers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1960.

acmeism

Acmeism (a term derived from the Greek word meaning “perfection”) was a Russian poetic movement established in St. Petersburg in 1913. In a sense, acmeism was a reactionary movement that opposed the mystical elements of SYMBOLISM. The poets Nikolai GUMILEV, Sergey Gorodetsky (1884–1967), Anna AKHMATOVA, and Osip MANDELSTAM were the leaders of the movement and regularly contributed to Apollon, the main literary journal of acmeism. According to the acmeists, poetry should contain concrete ideas about culture and human experience rather than abstract and, often, solipsistic notions that are found in symbolist poetry. At the same time, however, the acmeists incorporated the symbolist emphasis on the role of mythical and religious figures in poetry. The mythical figures found in acmeist poetry stressed continuity of history and culture.

The movement lasted until the early 1920s and eventually disintegrated with the advent of SOCIALIST REALISM. The role of the acmeists, however, is enormous in terms of their influence on the later generations of poets and writers. The acmeists attempted to provide verse with significance that extended the bounds of social and political reality. Their revolution was of linguistic kind. The acmeists treated the individual as a being of cosmic significance rather than a dispossessed creature, tethered to a landscape grown ungovernably hostile.

A Work about Acmeism

Doherty, Justin. The Acmeist Movement in Russian Poetry: Culture and the Word. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Adonis (Ali Ahmad Sa’id; Adunis)

(1930–) poet, critic

Adonis is one of the fathers of modernism in Arabic literature and is its leading proponent of avant-garde verse. Songs of Mihyar the Damascene (1960) is his most important book of poems, combining his concern for history and politics with his demand for a new kind of poetic language and a radically experimental poetic form. The Static and the Dynamic in Arabic Culture is one of his many books of cultural theory and literary criticism that earned a key, if controversial, place on the Arabic bookshelf. In it, Adonis describes cycles of change and stagnation in the history of Arabic culture, defining moments of MODERNISM as those times when creative new ways of looking at the world emerge and challenge habitual ways. These breakthroughs, themselves, gradually become habitual and inhibit creativity until the next moment breaks with tradition. In other volumes of theory, such as The Time of Poetry (1972), The Shock of Modernity (1978), and a massive work entitled simply The Book (1995), Adonis continues his philosophical task of clearing away what he sees as stagnant Arabic literary traditions and calling for an embrace of modernism.

Adonis is a proponent of intellectual poetry, opposing the traditional connection of Arabic poetics to musicality and tarab, the state of being entranced by a poem, typically a goal of Arabic poetry. "A Grave for New York" is a long, important political poem that cites Walt Whitman as an influence and also demonstrates the influence on Adonis of SYMBOLISM and surrealism, and a cryptic, almost mystical use of language. So contrary are many of his poetic methods to Arabic expectations that his readership tends to be small, though refined. Adonis's literary criticism, on the other hand, has had considerable weight in the world of Arabic literature, through his books as well as his founding and editorship of two literary magazines, Shi'r (Poetry) with poet Yusuf al-Khal (1957), and Mawaqif (Stances) (1968).

Born in the Syrian mountains and educated in Syria, Adonis moved to Beirut and took Lebanese citizenship. Influenced in his belief in the importance of myth and symbol by Anton Sa'ada, founder of the Syrian Nationalist Socialist Party, Adonis changed his name to that of a figure from ancient Syrian myth. He has taught at the Sorbonne and other European and American universities and is translated most extensively in French. His wife of many years, Khalida Sa'id, is an important literary critic.

Other Works by Adonis

The Blood of Adonis. Translated by Samuel Hazo. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1971.

Introduction to Arabic Poetics. Translated by Catherine Cobham. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1991.

The Pages of Day and Night. Translated by Samuel Hazo. Evanston, Ill.: Marlboro Press/Northwestern University Press, 1994.

Victims of a Map: A Bilingual Anthology of Arabic Poetry by Samih al-Qasim, Adonis, and Mahmud Darwish. Translated by Abdullah al-Udhari. London: Al-Saqi Books, 1984.

Adonis

See ADONIS.

Agnon, Samuel Joseph (Shmuel Yosef Czaczkes) (1888–1970) novelist, short-story writer

Samuel Joseph Agnon was born Shmuel Yosef Czaczkes in the Jewish town of Buczacz, in the Austro-Hungarian Empire (now Poland). Agnon began writing at eight years old in both Hebrew and Yiddish and published his first poems in a newspaper at age 15. Though he did not attend school, he was educated by both his father, a fur trader with rabbinical training, and his mother, who taught him German literature. In 1907, he left home for Palestine (now Israel), where he changed his surname from Czaczkes to Agnon. He remained there his entire life, with the exception of 11 years spent in Germany from 1913 to 1924.

His folk-epic The Bridal Canopy (1931), an allegory on the decline of the Jewish religious life in Poland, is considered a classic in modern Hebrew literature. The plot chronicles the travels and the inner religious turmoil of a Hasidic Jew who seeks a dowry for his daughters in early 19th-century Europe. Agnon's greatest novel, however, is The Day Before Yesterday (1945), which is set in the period of the second aliyah, the wave of Jewish emigration to Palestine between 1907 and 1913. The novel is considered a cornerstone of modern Hebrew literature.

Nearly all of Agnon's symbolic and folkloric writing is set in Palestine. Many of his stories are influenced by the Jewish emigration to Palestine, Jewish assimilation into Western culture, and the contrasts between a traditional Jewish life and a modern Jewish life.

Agnon secured his place as one of the central figures of modern world literature for bringing the conflicts of Jewish culture to life. He won the Nobel Prize for literature in 1965 and is widely considered the greatest writer of modern fiction in Hebrew.

Other Works by Shmuel Yosef Agnon

Days of Awe. New York: Schocken Books, 1995.

Only Yesterday. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2002.

Shira. New York: Syracuse University Press, 1996.

A Simple Story. New York: Syracuse University Press, 1999.

A Work about Shmuel Yosef Agnon

Shaked, Gershon. Shmuel Yosef Agnon: A Revolutionary Traditionalist. Translated by Jeffrey M. Green. New York: New York University Press, 1989.

Aichinger, Ilse (1921–) poet, short-story writer, novelist

Ilse Aichinger was born in Vienna, Austria. Her father, Leopold, was a Jewish doctor, and her mother, Berta Kremer, was a gentile teacher. Aichinger grew up in Vienna and Linz, graduating from high school in 1939. The Nazis prevented her from attending medical school because of her Jewish heritage. During World War II, many of her relatives were killed in concentration camps. Aichinger became fiercely antifascist, a trait that would characterize her postwar writing.

Following the war, Aichinger enrolled in medical school in Vienna. She quit after five semesters to devote herself full time to a writing career. In 1948, she worked as a reader for Fischer Publishing Company and wrote Die Größere Hoffnung (The Greater Hope, 1948), a novel about a Viennese girl who sympathizes with her Jewish friends after the Nazi takeover of Austria. The following year, Aichinger cofounded the Hochschule für Gestaltung (Academy for Arts and Designs) in Ulm, West Germany. She married poet Günter EICH in 1953. The couple occasionally attended the annual meetings of the German writers' association, GRUPPE 47.

Aichinger wrote numerous short stories, radio plays, and poems in the second half of the 20th century. Influenced by the Holocaust, Aichinger's writings often take the perspective of the victims of German-Austrian society. Literary scholar James Alldrige explains that "her appeal is to a humanity deep within each of us, addressed in a language unadorned by flourishes and unadorned by experiments in usage." Aichinger won numerous German and Austrian awards, including the Georg Trakl Prize for Poetry and the Literature Prize of the Bavarian Academy of Fine Arts.

Other Works by Ilse Aichinger

The Bound Man and Other Stories. Translated by Eric Mosbacher. New York: Noonday Press, 1956.

Herod's Children. Translated by Cornelia Schaeffer. New York: Atheneum, 1963.

A Work about Ilse Aichinger

Alldrige, James C. Ilse Aichinger. Chester Springs, Pa.: Dufour Editions, 1969.

Aidoo, Christina Ama Ata (1942–) short-story writer, novelist, poet, dramatist

Ghana gained its independence from Britain in 1957 when Christina Ama Ata Aidoo was 15; thus, in a sense, Aidoo came of age at the same time as her country. Her very name, with its combination of Christian and indigenous elements (she dropped her Christian name in the early 1970s), speaks to Aidoo's lifelong passion for exploring the fusion of elements that makes her people unique. Aidoo's works speak to the synthesis of traditional and Christian beliefs inherent in Ghana. Her family has a tradition of resistance to oppression, including a grandfather who was killed by the British. Aidoo is descended from the Fante, a group that was particularly active in their resistance to the British during the colonial period in Ghana. The Fante are part of a larger group of people, the Akan, whose traditionalist values are explored—and questioned—in many of her texts.

Aidoo won a short-story competition sponsored by a prestigious publisher at an early age. This led her to have confidence in herself as a voice for her people, but especially as a voice for women of color in Ghana and throughout the world. Because very few women in developing countries have easy access to educational opportunities, Aidoo has often written from the perspective of one who has succeeded against the odds. She voices the belief that education can lead to an awareness of a culture's limitations. In short-story collections such as No Sweetness Here (1970), poems such as those collected in An Angry Letter in January and Other Poems (1992), and in novels such as Our Sister Killjoy (1977), Aidoo voices a fierce resistance to gender subjugation—the oppression of women—and class domination. Her essay, “To Be a Woman,” published in 1980, bemoans the traditional Akan degradation of women. As such, Aidoo challenges both the vestiges of the British colonial presence and the ingrained attitudes of Africans.

Aidoo was Ghana's minister of education for a brief time in the early 1980s, until her controversial views led to her removal from office. She now lives primarily in Zimbabwe and the United States, where she has had a series of academic appointments. Aidoo is a regular speaker at African literary gatherings throughout the United States and the world, where she continues to influence those interested in issues of gender, race, and class.

Another Work by Ama Ata Aidoo

Someone Talking to Sometime. Harare, Zimbabwe: College Press, 1985.

A Work about Ama Ata Aidoo

Nasta, Susheila, ed. Motherlands: Black Women's Writing from Africa. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1992.

Akhmadulina, Izabella Akhatovna

(1937–) poet

Izabella Akhmadulina was born in Moscow, Russia. She graduated from high school in 1954 and began her literary career working for a small newspaper Metrostroevels. In 1955, Akhmadulina began her studies at the prestigious Gorky Institute of Literature and published her first poem. During her studies, she was briefly expelled from the university for the apolitical focus of her verse. She was allowed to return only when Pavel Antokolsky, a respected Russian writer (1896–1978), intervened on her behalf. In 1958, she married the poet Yevgeny YEV-TUSHENKO, but they were later divorced.

Akhmadulina is often associated with the “New Wave” of Russian poets that emerged after Stalin's death. The New Wave poets often focused on themes outside the political agenda of SOCIALIST REALISM. Akhmadulina, in particular, addressed the craft of poetry in her verse, often exploring metapoetics as a subject in itself. Akhmadulina considers Marina TSVETAIEVA and Anna AKHMATOVA to be the greatest influences on her own work.

With the publication of her first poetry collection, Strings (1962), Akhmadulina established her position among the major contemporary poets of Russia. Her careful attention to the poetic form and diction made her enormously popular with both the Russian public and critics. During Akhmadulina's prolific career, she has published eight books of verse: Chills (1968), Music Lessons (1969), Poems (1975), Candle (1977), Dreams of Georgia (1977), The Secret: New Poems (1983), The Garden (1987), Poems (1987), and Selected Works (1988). Virtually all of these books were critically acclaimed and celebrated for their lyrical beauty and impressive poetic form. These lines from “Autumn” are an example:

*Not working, not breathing, the beehive sweetens and dies.
The autumn deepens, the soul ripens and grows round . . .*

As Sonia I. Ketchian points out, “Akhmadulina’s poetry has been lauded for forcefulness of expression and masterful execution of form, in its finesse and sentient approach to her subject and its underlying surroundings, the product of Izabella Akhmadulina’s pen bears the unmistakable signature of a woman.”

Akhmadulina was elected a member of the American Academy of Arts and Literature in 1977, but at home she often faced government criticism, and she was not permitted to publish any works in between 1977 and 1983. This government mandate, however, was completely reversed by 1989, when Akhmadulina was awarded the State Prize in Literature—the highest prize for literature in the Soviet Union. The mother of two daughters, Akhmadulina currently resides in Moscow with her husband Boris Messerer, an artist and stage designer. She gives readings throughout Europe and is also known as a translator, especially of works by Georgian poets. Her work is continuously acclaimed both in Russia and abroad.

Works by Izabella Akhmadulina

Fever & Other New Poems. With an introduction by Yevgeny Yevtushenko. Translated by Geoffrey Dutton and Igor Mezhakoff-Koriakin. New York: William Morrow, 1969.

The Garden: New and Selected Poetry and Prose. Translated by F. D. Reeve. New York: Henry Holt, 1990.

A Work about Izabella Akhmadulina

Ketchian, Sonia I. The Poetic Craft of Bella Akhmadulina. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993.

Akhatova, Anna (Anna Andreyevna Gorenko) (1889–1965) poet

Anna Akhatova was born in a small town near Odessa, Russia, into a family of minor nobility. Her father, Andrey Gorenko, was a retired navy engineer, and her mother, Inna Gorenko, was in charge of the family affairs. The Akhatovs moved to Zarskoye Selo, the birthplace of Aleksandr PUSHKIN, when Anna was one year old. Akhatova began writing poetry when she was 11. While in school, Akhatova was an academically average student, more concerned with writing poetry than studying. Her father disapproved of her writing and told her that it brought shame to the family’s name. From then on, Anna Gorenko signed her work as Anna Akhatova. Akhatova was an intense reader, and she particularly loved the poetry of Aleksandr Pushkin.

In 1907, Akhatova began to study law at the university in Kiev. In 1910, she married the poet Nikolai GUMILEV, whom she had known since her school days. These years of intense work and passionate personal relationships produced two collections of lyrical poems, Evening (1912) and Chiotki (1914), notable for their striking images and skillful use of rhyme and meter. In all her work, Akhatova cared more about the craft of poetry and its personal implications than about social issues. Both volumes received favorable reviews from the critics. During this time, Akhatova adhered to ACMEISM, a poetic movement that opposed SYMBOLISM and emphasized clarity of expression and concrete imagery. Along with Gumilev, Akhatova became the leading figure of this movement.

In 1918, Akhatova divorced Gumilev, but his political difficulties (he was executed in 1921 for alleged involvement in an anti-Soviet plot) affected her standing with the authorities, who were already uncomfortable with her poetic preoccupation with love and religion. Between 1923 and 1940, none of her work was published in book form, although a few poems were published in journals. She worked as an assistant librarian at the Agricultural Institute and lived in poverty. In the 1930s, she faced personal tragedy when her son and her second husband were arrested for espionage. They were released only after personal intervention by Stalin. Her lyric cycle Requiem was composed during this period; inspired by her grief over her son's absence, the poems memorialize the suffering of the entire Russian people under Stalin. They were not published in Russia until 1989, but Akhmatova developed an enormous underground following in Russia, as well as a large audience abroad. During World War II, when Germany invaded Russia and laid siege to Leningrad, Akhmatova was enlisted to help boost public morale with radio addresses and readings.

Akhmatova refused to conform to the standards of SOCIALIST REALISM, and for this she was ostracized by many in the Soviet Writers' Union. She criticized the Stalinist regime and paid dearly for her honesty when, in 1946, she was publicly humiliated and expelled from the Writers' Union. In addition, in 1949, her son was sent to Siberia as a political prisoner, remaining there until 1956. Even after Stalin's death in 1953, Akhmatova continued to be criticized by government officials because her work supposedly did not address the needs and reality of the Soviet people. In spite of these adversities, however, Akhmatova became one of Russia's most famous poets. Small volumes of her poems and translations and her critical essays on Pushkin began to be issued in Russia after 1958.

Akhmatova did not break with the rich tradition of Russian poetry but rather enriched it. She also introduced Russian readers to a larger world with her translations of such great poets as Victor HUGO, Rabindranath TAGORE, and Giacomo LEOPARDI. Today, she is one of the most widely read and quoted poets in Russia. In addition to its extraordinary lyrical beauty, Akhmatova's poetry is associated with personal freedom, the expression of emotions, and political liberty.

During her lifetime Akhmatova received a number of awards, particularly from European countries, including the Etna-Taormina literary prize from the Italian government in 1964 and an honorary doctorate from Oxford University in 1965. She established a reputation as a "Russian Sappho" in many countries.

Other Works by Anna Akhmatova

Kunitz, Stanley, ed. Poems of Akhmatova: Izbrannye Stikhi. Translated by Max Hayward. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1997.

Meyer, Ronald, ed. My Half-century: Selected Prose. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1997.

Reeder, Roberta, ed. The Complete Poems of Anna Akhmatova. Translated by Judith Hemschemeyer. Tucson, Ariz.: Zephyr Press, 1998.

Works about Anna Akhmatova

Dalos, Gyorgy. The Guest from the Future: Anna Akhmatova and Isaiah Berlin. Translated by Antony Wood. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1999.

Reeder, Roberta. Anna Akhmatova: Poet and Prophet. New York: Picador, 1995.

Akutagawa Ryūnosuke (1892–1927)

short-story writer, poet, essayist

Akutagawa Ryūnosuke was born in Tokyo to Nihara Toshizō and Fuku. Shortly after his birth, his mother went insane, so Akutagawa was adopted by his uncle, Akutagawa Dōshō. He was an excellent student and took lessons in English and Chinese in addition to doing his regular schoolwork. In 1913, he entered the English department of Tokyo Imperial University. After graduating in 1916, he took up teaching at a naval school in Yokosuka and soon married Tsukamoto Fumiko. Three years later, he resigned to write stories full-time for the Osaka Mainichi Newspaper. In 1921, the newspaper sent him to China as a correspondent; however, health problems prevented him from writing any articles until he had returned home. At the age of 35, he committed suicide by drinking poison.

While still at university, Akutagawa began publishing short stories in a school literary magazine called Shinshichō (New tides) and he published a short story collection called Rashōmon (1915), set in medieval Kyoto. In 1916, the respected novelist NATSUME Sōseki promoted his story “The Nose” for publication. The short story achieved widespread popularity, establishing Akutagawa as a writer. “The Nose” draws on the classical stories of Tales of Times Now Past (ca. 1107) for its main character, a priest who is troubled by a long, dangling nose. Akutagawa’s best-known work, “Hell Screen” (1918), portrays the madness of an artist inspired to depict hell’s burning fires. Toward the end of his short life, Akutagawa’s style shifted sharply from well-plotted historical tales. In works such as “A Fool’s Life” (1927), he wrote stories that were more confessional in style, set in the modern period, and narrated in the first person.

Akutagawa is known as a master craftsman. He commonly drew on traditional stories for his tales, in part to provide a believable setting for his fantastic subject matter. In all, he wrote about 150 stories in a variety of styles and diction with strikingly evocative precision. He achieved international renown as one of the earliest Japanese authors to be translated into European languages.

Other Works by Akutagawa Ryūnosuke

The Essential Akutagawa. Edited by Seiji Lippit. New York: Marsilio, 1999.

Tales Grottesque and Curious. Translated by Glen W. Shaw. Tokyo: Hokuseido, 1948.

A Work about Akutagawa Ryūnosuke

Yu, Beongsheon. Akutagawa: An Introduction. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1972.

Alberti, Rafael (1902–1999) poet

Rafael Alberti was born in Puerto de Santa María near the Mediterranean city of Cadíz, Spain. After moving with his family to Madrid when he was 15, he began to study painting and had his first show in 1922. Soon afterward, he contracted tuberculosis and left Madrid for Sierra de Guadarrama to recover. It was then that he began writing poetry, and within several years, he published his first collection, Landlocked Sailor (1925), a group of folkloric poems that won that year’s National Prize for Literature.

With the publication of other poetry collections, including Passion and Form (1927) and Concerning the Angels (1928), which differ from his earlier work in their more anguished and emotional themes, Alberti’s reputation as a poet grew. He was considered part of the Generation of 1927, a group of surrealist Spanish poets influenced by the language and imagery used by the 17th-century Spanish poet, Luis de Góngora.

Like many other surrealist writers and artists, Alberti became much more political in the 1930s, first joining the Communist Party, then being expelled from it, and finally fighting on behalf of the republic when the Spanish civil war broke out in 1936. Being on the losing side, he was forced to flee Spain in 1939, settling in Argentina, where he wrote poetry, painted, and worked for a publishing house. During his exile, Alberti continued to publish, including two collections, Between the Carnation and the Sword (1941) and On Painting (1945), the latter of which reflects his love of that medium, and an autobiography, The Lost Grove (1942). Far from his native Spain, he experienced loss, as seen in his poignant 1952 poem, “The Coming Back of an Assassinated Poet,” translated by poet Mark Strand, in which the speaker mourns the death of his dear friend GARCÍA LORCA: “You come back to me older and sadder in the drowsy / light of a quiet dream in March.”

In 1961 Alberti moved to Italy, and after the death in 1975 of Franco, dictator of Spain, he finally returned to Spain, where he lived from 1977 until his death. His later poems, in The Eight Names of Picasso (1970), reflect his long friendship with the Spanish artist Pablo Picasso. Alberti is considered one of Spain’s greatest 20th-century poets.

Another Work by Rafael Alberti

The Owl’s Insomnia: Poems Selected and Translated by Mark Strand. New York: Athenaeum, 1973.

A Work about Rafael Alberti

Nantell, Judith. Rafael Alberti’s Poetry of the Thirties: The Poet’s Public Voice. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1986.

Alcayaga, Lucila Godoy

See MISTRAL, GABRIELA.

Aleichem, Shalom (Sholem Rabinowitz)

(1859–1916) novelist, short-story writer, playwright

Shalom Aleichem was born in Pereyaslav in the Poltava area of what is now Ukraine. His father was a religious scholar and wealthy man, but the family fell on hard times when Aleichem was 12. His mother died of cholera soon after. At this time, Jews in western Russia faced the increasing threat of pogroms (organized persecution or massacres). Throughout these difficult times, Aleichem attended a traditional cheder, an elementary Jewish school in which children are taught to read the Torah and other books in Hebrew. His father encouraged him to write and, when his family again achieved stability, he sought additional schooling at the Russian district school.

As a young man, Aleichem joined the army and then worked as a government rabbi for three years. He began his writing career in the 1880s, rejecting his mother tongue, Yiddish (considered, in that place and time, an inappropriate language for literature), to write in Hebrew and Russian. He published his first short stories under his pen name in 1883 at age 20.

When Aleichem turned to writing in Yiddish, “for the fun of it,” he said, he described the impoverishment and oppression of Russian Jews with surprising, yet appropriate, humor. These stories are set in eastern Europe and in New York in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Aleichem’s themes are apparent most notably in Fiddler on the Roof (1964), the popular musical based on his stories in Tevye the Dairyman, (1918). Humor, combined with insight, have led many to compare Aleichem with the American writer and humorist Mark Twain.

A combination of the pogroms of 1905 and World War I convinced Aleichem and his family to abandon their home and relocate in the United States, where he attempted to establish himself as a playwright. He helped found, through his plays, the Yiddish theater in New York City.

Today, Shalom Aleichem is recognized as having been one of the greatest Yiddish writers. His five novels, many plays, and some 300 short stories illustrate universal themes of wisdom, humiliation, pride, and humor that find their voice in the poverty of the Jews of his era. His tales have touched generations of readers around the world. Known as the “bard of the poor,” he said, “Life is a dream for the wise, a game for the fool, a comedy for the rich, a tragedy for the poor” (“Putting Sholom Aleichem on a Belated Pedestal,” The New York Times, January 5, 2002).

Other Works by Shalom Aleichem

Letters to Menakhem. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002.

Nineteen to the Dozen. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2002.

Tevye the Dairyman. New York: Random House, 1988.

A Work about Shalom Aleichem

Samuel, Maurice. The World of Shalom Aleichem. New York: Dramatists Play Series, 1948.

Alencar, José Martiniano de

(1829–1877) novelist

José Martiniano de Alencar was born on May 1 in Mecejana in the state of Ceará in Brazil. He came from a well-to-do family of the northeastern region of Brazil, and he pursued his higher education in Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo. After completing his studies, he moved to Rio de Janeiro in 1850 to begin his career as a lawyer and a journalist. In 1856, he rose to literary fame through his critiques of the sentimental poetry of a famous Brazilian author, Domingos José Gonçalves de Magalhães. That same year, Alencar published his first novel, Five Minutes, which came out as a serial in a daily newspaper.

Alencar also wrote plays, biographies, political analyses, and journalistic works, but he is best known as a novelist. He was one of the earliest novelists in Brazil, and his goal was to create novels that were unique to Brazil's situation as a newly independent nation and that could represent the Brazilian national identity. He wrote historical novels and novels about modern Brazilian life in urban and rural areas, but his most famous works are three novels whose main characters are indigenous Brazilians: O Guarani (The Guarani Indian, 1857), Iracema (1865), and Ubirajara (1874). Alencar's image of Brazil's identity as a new nation was based on the mix of cultures between native Brazilians and Portuguese colonialists. Alencar's representation of miscegenation between Indians and white Portuguese colonialists as the root of the Brazilian race predicts the theories of an important Brazilian author of the 20th century, Gilberto FREYRE, who defined Brazil as a racial democracy. For Alencar, it was this mix that made Brazil's cultural identity unique. He valorizes the noble Indian characters in his romantic novels, and his work is considered part of the INDIANIST movement in Brazilian literature. Because he was the only novelist from that movement (all of the other Indianist writers were poets), and because he was one of the earliest Brazilian novelists, his work is especially important in the history of Brazilian literature.

In addition to being a novelist, Alencar had a long career in public affairs, which influenced his social ideals and his writing. Following his success as a lawyer and a journalist, Alencar was a deputy in the legislature and then minister of justice from 1868 to 1870. He ran for the senate in 1869 and received the highest number of votes. However, Pedro II, the emperor, had the constitutional privilege to select from three finalists, and he chose a different candidate because Alencar had previously criticized him. In spite of this disappointment, Alencar participated in public affairs throughout his life, in addition to his career as a journalist and later as a university professor. He was considered one of the greatest orators of his day. Alencar died on December 12 of tuberculosis.

Other Works by José de Alencar

Iracema: A Novel. Translated by Clifford E. Landers. Los Angeles: Getty Center for Education in the Arts, 2000.

Senhora: Profile of a Woman. Translated by Catarina Feldmann Edinger. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994.

Works about José de Alencar

Haberly, David. Three Sad Races: Racial Identity and National Consciousness in Brazilian Literature. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

Schwarz, Roberto. "The Importing of the Novel to Brazil and its Contradictions in the Work of Alencar." In Misplaced Ideas: Essays on Brazilian Culture. New York: Verso, 1992.

Treece, David. Exiles, Allies, Rebels: Brazil's Indianist Movement, Indigenist Politics, and the Imperial Nation-State. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000.

Alepoudelis, Odysseus

See ELYTIS, ODYSSEUS.

Allende, Isabel (1942–) novelist

Born in Lima, Peru, Allende is the daughter of Chilean diplomat Tomas Allende and Francisca Llona Barros. Her parents divorced when Allende was two, and she, her mother, and two brothers moved in with her mother's parents in Santiago, Chile. It was while living with her grandparents, spending many hours in their library, that Allende developed her passion for the written word. Her grandparents were the inspiration behind the characters Clara del Valle and Esteban Trueba in The House of the Spirits (1982).

Allende began her career working for the United Nations but soon found herself drawn to journalism. She wrote for the women's magazine Paula and also edited Mampato, a children's magazine. During this time she also experimented with writing short stories for children and producing plays. She finally turned to novel writing, which allowed a free range of expression. In 1962, she married Miguel Frias, an engineer, with whom she had two children, Paula and Nicolas. In 1973 her uncle, President Salvador Allende, was assassinated, and she and her family were moved to Venezuela for safety. The assassination had a profound effect on her: "I think I have divided my life [into] before that day and after that day," she told Publisher's Weekly. "In that moment, I realized that everything was possible, that violence was a dimension that was always around you." While in Venezuela, Allende learned that her grandfather was dying in Chile, and, unable to go to him, she wrote him a letter that evolved into her first novel, The House of the Spirits (1982).

Set in an unnamed South American country, the novel traces the experiences of four generations of the del Valle–Trueba family through 75 years of social change and politics in the 20th century. The novel employs MAGIC REALISM (a literary technique that allows fantasy and magic to intrude on otherwise realistic depictions of settings or characters) to tell a story of power relations and passion. It became an international best-seller and inspired a 1994 American film version starring Jeremy Irons and Meryl Streep.

Allende's next novel, Of Love and Shadows (1984), also set in an unnamed South American country (one that clearly resembles Chile in the 1970s), treats topics that are prominent in all Allende's novels: love, politics, violence, death, and strong women. Her third novel, Eva Luna (1989), is a first-person narrative by a heroine who tells stories first to save her own life and then to find love and fortune. Written after her divorce from Frias, the novel mirrors aspects of Allende's life.

In 1988, Allende married American lawyer William Gordon and moved to California. Her new home did not distract her from writing about Latin America, and her next work, The Stories of Eva Luna (1990), is a collection of 23 short stories that contain many of the characters first introduced in the novel Eva Luna. Allende followed this with The Infinite Plan (1991), a novel inspired by the life of her second husband.

Although all of Allende's novels draw deeply on personal experience and historical events, none of her works is more poignant than Paula (1995). Written in a Madrid hospital at the bedside of her dying daughter, this autobiographical work is a "collage of memories," tracing Allende's life, profession, and beliefs. The book ends on the day of Paula's death at Allende's home in California.

Allende found it difficult to contemplate writing again after the wrenching work of Paula; yet, by 1998, she had come back joyously into print with Aphrodite: A Memoir of the Senses, a memoir that celebrates the connections between eroticism and food and includes more than 100 recipes. Her subsequent novels, Daughter of Fortune (1999) and Portrait in Sepia (2001), reflect their creator's journey, telling sweeping stories set both in Chile and in California, involving characters first encountered in The House of the Spirits.

Allende's books, all of which are written in Spanish, have been translated into 27 different languages. She has received numerous literary prizes, including the Panorama Literario Award (Chile) in 1983, Author of the Year and Book of the Year Awards (Germany) in 1984, Colima Award for Best Novel (Mexico) in 1985, Mulheres Best Foreign Novel Award (Portugal) in 1987, Library Journal's Best Book Award (United States) in 1988, Bancarella Literature Award (Italy) in 1993. Allende is the most widely read Latin American author in the world.

A Work about Isabel Allende

Rojas, Sonia Riguelme, and Edna Aguirre Rehbeim, eds. Critical Approaches to Isabel Allende's Novels. New York: Peter Lang, 1991.

Allfrey, Phyllis (1915–1986) novelist, poet, politician, journalist

Phyllis Allfrey was born in Dominica, West Indies, to Francis Byam Berkeley Shand, former crown attorney of Dominica, and Elfreda Nicholls, daughter of Doctor H. A. A. Nicholls (later Sir Henry Alford Nicholls). She was educated by tutors and started writing poems, short plays, and short stories at a young age, publishing her first short story in Tiger Tim's Weekly at age 13.

Many years passed before Allfrey published her first collection of poems, Palm and Oak I (1950), which foregrounds one of Allfrey's self-expressed themes, her ancestry's "tropical and Nordic strains." Having her poem, "While the young sleep," win second prize in the Society of Women Writers and Journalists' 1953 contest, and hearing a literary agent's encouragement prompted Allfrey to finish her first novel, The Orchid House (1953). The novel's antichurch sentiment and its focus on a white family's decreasing powers rather than black empowerment distinguishes it from preceding West Indian literature.

Subsequent political involvement with the Dominica Labour Party, which she cofounded to assist the island's tropical-fruit workers, diverted Allfrey's attention from literary work. After the West Indies Federation (a political organization of Caribbean islands) dissolved in 1962, Allfrey worked as the editor for The Dominica Herald, an opposition newspaper, and the Star, a weekly newspaper that encouraged local writers, while writing poems, short stories, political essays, and editorials. As Elaine Campbell writes in a 1986 essay in Fifty Caribbean Writers, recent republications and critical examinations of Allfrey's works might enable her to "enjoy an overdue appreciation of her role as one of the few West Indian women to participate in the early growth of West Indian literature."

Other Works by Phyllis Allfrey

Contrasts. Bridgetown, Barbados: Advocate Press, 1955.

Palm and Oak II. Roseau, Dominica, West Indies: The Star Printery, 1974.

Works about Phyllis Allfrey

Paravisini-Gerbert, Lizabeth. "Jean Rhys and Phyllis Shand Allfrey: The Story of a Friendship." Jean Rhys Review 9, nos. 1–2 (1998): 1–24.

———. Phyllis Shand Allfrey: A Caribbean Life. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1996.

al-Malaika, Nazik

See MALAIKA, NAZIK AL-.

al-Sa'dawi, Nawal

See SADAWI, NAWAL.

Amado, Jorge (1912–2001) novelist

Born in 1912 in Bahia, the northeastern province of Brazil, Jorge Amado was educated in Salvador and Rio de Janeiro. He began to work as a journalist for a local paper at 15, and he was 19 when his first novel, O País do Carnaval (Land of Carnival, 1931), was published. It has never been translated into English. Jubiabá (1935) is a picaresque novel about the childhood and youth of a black hero, set in the slums of a Brazilian city. Sea of Death (1936) examines the lives of the mulatto families who run small transport boats out of Salvador. Captains of the Sands (1937), the most commercially successful of all his novels, describes the daily existence of a band of homeless children led by a white boy.

By 1936 Amado had joined the Communist Party and had been arrested for his participation in a attempted coup backed by the Kremlin. As a result of his political activities, he spent much of the 1940s in exile in Paris and Prague. When he settled in Brazil again in 1952, he adopted a softer tone in his work, employing rich sensuality and a sometimes outrageous humor, but his novels still focus on the difficulties faced by the poor and by Brazilians of color. Two of the many novels of this later period are Gabriela, cravo e canela (Gabriela, Clove and Cinnamon, 1958) and Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands: A Moral and Amorous Tale (1966). Both of these were adapted for Brazilian TV, and he became in his lifetime the most famous of all Brazilian writers.

Brazilians took pride in Amado's international reputation. He was awarded France's Legion of Honor and Portugal's Camoens Prize and was a perpetual nominee for the Nobel Prize, though he never won. His death in Salvador in August 2001 was an occasion for national mourning.

Other Works by Jorge Amado

Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands: A Moral and Amorous Tale. Translated by Harriet De Onis. New York: Avon, 1998.

Gabriela, Clove and Cinnamon. Translated by William Grossman. New York: Bard Books, 1998.

Showdown. Translated by Gregory Rabassa. New York: Bantam Books, 1989.

The War of the Saints. Translated by Gregory Rabassa. New York: Bantam Books, 1995.

Works about Jorge Amado

Brower, Keith H., Earl E. Fitz, and Enrique Martínez-Vidal, eds. Jorge Amado: New Critical Essays. New York: Routledge, 2001.

Chamberlain, Bobby J. Jorge Amado. Boston: Twayne, 1990.

Amalrik, Andrey (1936–1980) publicist, dramatist

Andrey Amalrik, a playwright who had achieved modest success, caused an enormous scandal for the government of the Soviet Union when his essay, Will the Soviet Union Survive to 1984? (1969) was published in the West. Andrey Amalrik was sentenced to three years of hard labor on charges of “parasitism.” On the day of his release, the Soviet officials added another three years to his sentence. The extended sentence caused an uproar around the world, and Amalrik went on a hunger strike for 117 days. In light of the protests, Amalrik’s sentence was reduced to two years of exile in Siberia.

Will the Soviet Union Survive to 1984? painted a realistic and gloomy picture of Soviet reality. Amalrik recognized that the Soviet government’s policies encouraged in the Soviet people a perverted psychology of mediocrity, in which the main goal was not to stand out from one’s peers. He predicted that the Soviet Union would fall as a result of a great war with China and a massive revolt by different ethnic groups within Russia. Many of his predictions were realized when the Soviet Union finally collapsed in 1991.

On his release from exile, Amalrik emigrated to Western Europe in 1976, settling in Spain, where he died in a car accident in 1980. His other work of great importance, Involuntary Journey to Siberia (1971), describes the hardships that he faced in the Soviet labor camp for political prisoners.

Andrey Amalrik was one of the first Soviet dissidents to be seen on U.S. television when an interview he and his colleagues Vladimir Bukowsky and Pyotr Yakir gave to a United States correspondent was broadcast in July 1970. He is remembered today as one of the dissidents who exposed the dark side of the Soviet system to people around the world.

Other Works by Andrey Amalrik

Nose! Nose? No-Se and Other Plays. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1973.

Notes of a Revolutionary. Translated by Guy Daniels. New York: Knopf, 1982.

Amichai, Yehuda (1924–2000) poet, novelist, short-story writer, playwright

Yehuda Amichai, one of Israel’s most widely esteemed poets in modern Hebrew, was born in Wurzburg, Germany, into a religiously observant family. By the time he and his family emigrated to Palestine (now Israel) in 1935, Amichai was able to read Hebrew fluently. He settled in Jerusalem but left to fight with the Jewish brigade of the British army in World War II. When he returned, he joined the elite Palmach unit to fight with the Israeli defense forces in the 1948 Arab–Israeli war. He also attended Hebrew University, where he studied literature and biblical studies and trained as a teacher.

Amichai is best known for his revolutionary style that helped create modern Israeli poetry. He evoked contemporary images—tanks, airplanes, and fuel—and used an accessible, nontraditional voice—charged with puns, idioms, and colloquialisms—that was new to Hebrew verse in the 1950s.

With his first volume of poetry, Now and in Other Days (1955), Amichai began to establish himself as a leading contemporary Hebrew poet and national treasure. His poems are now recited at weddings and funerals and by schoolchildren. He has published volumes of poetry, novels, a book of short stories, and a number of plays that have been produced in Israel. His poetry has been translated into more than 30 languages, including Chinese and Arabic, and, in 1982, Amichai received the prestigious Israel Prize for poetry.

Other Works by Yehuda Amichai

Amen. New York: Harper & Row, 1977.

Even a Fist Was Once an Open Palm with Fingers. New York: Harper Perennial, 1991.

Songs of Jerusalem and Myself. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

Works about Yehuda Amichai

Abramson, Glenda. The Writing of Yehuda Amichai: A Thematic Approach. Albany: State University of New York Press, July 1989.

Cohen, Joseph. Voices of Israel: Essays on and Interviews with Yehuda Amichai, A.B. Yehoshua, T. Carmi, Aharon Appelfeld, and Amos Oz. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.

Anand, Mulk Raj (1905–) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

Mulk Raj Anand was born in Peshawar, in what is now Pakistan. Educated in Lahore, Pakistan, and in London, Anand's fiction has been influenced by the literary traditions of both countries. Anand first began writing while in England as a book critic for T. S. Eliot's Criterion. After spending a number of years in England, he returned to India in 1945.

Anand used the structural techniques of the Western novel to write about India's social issues. He is often compared to R. K. NARAYAN, but Anand is different because of his choice of subject, which was the poor communities of rural India. His decision to write in English about people who could not read the language is the basis of much criticism against him. Anand claims, however, that he had to write in English because of practical necessity. Punjabi and Hindustani (his mother tongues) publishers would not accept his books because of their "unpopular" themes; English language publishers were far more supportive.

His novels Untouchable (1935) and Coolie (1936) represent the struggles of the poor and underprivileged in British India. Coolie explores the life of an indentured laborer, Munoo, as he must travel across northern India to keep a job. Untouchable approaches the national problem of "untouchability" as it is revealed in a day in the life of an 18-year-old man, Bakha. Symbolically, the characters' growth in these narratives catalogues humanity's struggle against social abuse and represents the underprivileged state of an oppressed nation, such as India under British colonialism.

Untouchable leads to a moment in Bakha's life when class and caste barriers cease to matter. This occurs when Bakha climbs up a tree to listen to GANDHI's speech. Slowly gathering courage to enter the crowd, his fears of touching other people evaporate. As the novel progresses, Bakha finds that he must decide between Christianity and following Gandhi if he is to be free from social injustices. It becomes clear, however, that these choices do not offer Bakha any real escape from the evils of his own life. Either option would only negate the specificity of Bakha's struggles. Through Bakha, Anand tries to show that untouchability is not just a problem of casteism in India but a global problem whenever a powerful force seeks to oppress a weaker one.

Along with Munshi PREMCHAND, Anand was involved in forming DALIT literature, a genre addressed exclusively to the oppressed sections of Indian society. Because he wrote exclusively in English, his unwavering focus on the downtrodden helped bring their social issues into the international literary world for the first time in Indian literary history. In 1971, Anand was awarded India's National Academy of Letters Award for his novel Morning Face (1968).

Other Works by Mulk Raj Anand

The Road. New Delhi: Sterling Publishers, 1974.

Two Leaves and a Bud. New York: Liberty Press, 1954.

Works about Mulk Raj Anand

Cowasjee, Saros. So Many Freedoms: A Study of the Major Fiction of Mulk Raj Anand. Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1977.

Dhawan, R. K. The Novels of Mulk Raj Anand. New York: Prestige Books, 1992.

Andersen, Hans Christian (1805–1875)
fiction writer, poet, dramatist

It is believed that Hans Christian Andersen was born near Odense, Denmark. His father, Hans Andersen, was a poor shoemaker, and there is no record of his mother's name or occupation. Despite poverty and harsh living conditions, Andersen's father devoted much of his time to his son: He made him a wooden theater and other toys and read to him every evening. The time Andersen spent with his paternal grandmother also provided some of his most important childhood experiences, including going with her to Greyfriars Hospital, an asylum for the elderly, where she worked as a gardener. Andersen listened to the traditional stories of Denmark told by the old women in the spinning rooms of the hospital.

Andersen was as apt and studious a student as he was a voracious reader. Although his family could not afford books, Andersen borrowed them from the people in his neighborhood. He was fascinated by theater, reading Shakespeare and Danish dramatists. In 1819, he left Odense for Copenhagen in hopes of becoming an actor. He held various minor acting jobs at the Royal Theater, performing as a ballet dancer and a singer in an opera choir. He was dismissed by the management after three years. His years as an actor were not a complete failure: He attended the theater every night, acquired a knowledge of drama, and was befriended by several important figures of the Danish cultural community. He began writing plays, and his talent was recognized by Jonas Collin, a senior civil servant in the Danish government, who arranged a grammar-school scholarship for Andersen. At age 17, Andersen was placed in a class with 10-year-old students. He studied hard and passed his final exams in 1828.

Andersen began his literary career as a poet. Between 1827 and 1828, he published minor poems in newspapers and periodicals and won public favor. By 1832, he had produced two collections of poems, written lyrics for two operas, and created adaptations of two French plays for the Danish stage. In 1831, he traveled to Germany, where he established contacts with some of the leading figures of the romantic movement (see ROMANTICISM). In 1833, he received a grant from the Danish government that allowed him to travel throughout Europe.

Andersen wrote three novels between 1835 and 1837: The Improvisator (1835), O.T. (1836), and Only a Fiddler (1837). Surprisingly, Andersen's works were better received in Germany and France than they were in Denmark. Although his novels were popular, he achieved his status as a great figure of world literature by writing his famous fairy tales, the first volume of which was published in 1835. Written at the height of the romantic movement, Andersen's fairy tales were praised throughout Europe. He was treated as an equal by Victor HUGO and Alexandre DUMAS. In Germany, the reading public raved over Andersen's latest works, and publishing companies engaged in bidding wars over the rights to them. In 1844, Andersen finally received recognition in Denmark: He was personally invited to be the guest of King Christian VIII. In 1845, he visited England, where his works were enormously popular. He made numerous acquaintances, including a lifelong friendship with Charles Dickens.

During the late 1840s, Andersen wrote some of his best fairy tales, including "The Nightingale," "The Ugly Duckling," "The Snow Queen," and "The Story of a Mother." In his tales, Andersen often celebrated the common people, whom he portrayed as ingenious, diligent, and brave. The fantastic element accentuated emotion and imagination, qualities cherished by romanticism. In conjunction with his work on the fairy tales, Andersen also wrote numerous travel books and plays.

By the time of his death in 1875, Andersen was considered a national monument. He enjoyed personal visits from the king, numerous public awards, and appreciative letters from readers throughout the world. His fairy tales are as popular today as they were during his lifetime, and they have been translated into virtually every major language. As one obituary remarked, Andersen had known how “to strike chords that reverberated in every human breast.”

Another Work by Hans Christian Andersen

Hans Christian Andersen: The Complete Fairy Tales and Stories. Translated by Erik Christian Haugaard. New York: Anchor, 1983.

Works about Hans Christian Andersen

Lederer, Wolfgang. The Kiss of the Snow Queen: Hans Christian Andersen and Man's Redemption by Woman. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

Wullschlager, Jackie. Hans Christian Andersen: The Life of a Storyteller. New York: Knopf, 2001.

Andrézel, Pierre

See DINESEN, ISAK.

Andric, Ivo (1892–1975) novelist, poet, short-story writer

Ivo Andric was born in Doc, near Travnik, Bosnia, to a family of artisans. As a college student, he worked to help achieve unity and independence for the South Slavic peoples by joining Mlada Bosnia (Young Bosnia), a revolutionary nationalist student organization. During World War I, Andric was arrested and spent three years in prison, where he read the works of Søren Kierkegaard and Fyodor DOSTOYEVSKY. After his release, Andric held a number of diplomatic posts for the Yugoslav government. He was the ambassador in Berlin when World War II broke out, narrowly escaping when the city was bombed by German planes.

In the shadow of war, Andric wrote the historical series for which he received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1961. Commonly referred to as the Bosnian Trilogy, The Bridge on the Drina (1945; translated 1959), Bosnian Story (1945; translated 1959), and Woman from Sarajevo (1945; translated 1965) examine life in a country where multiple nationalities and religions meet and often clash. Influenced by both the war and a Kierkegaardian sense of isolation and pessimism, Andric wrote primarily about the misery of man and his struggle to maintain his existence. The Bridge on the Drina, Andric's most famous work, for example, tells the history of Bosnia from 1516, when the bridge was first built, to 1914, when it was partially destroyed in World War I. The bridge is Andric's metaphor for sorrow born out of struggle, particularly that between Christians and Muslims. Although the bridge was originally built to connect the eastern and western sides of the Ottoman Empire, in actuality it both united and divided people along cultural, religious, and generational lines. As the novel shows, it was Andric's hope, like the original purpose of a bridge, that people would someday live in peace.

After World War II, Andric continued to write short stories, essays, and travel memoirs about Bosnia. He wrote continuously until his death in Belgrade on March 13.

Another Work by Ivo Andric

The Day of the Consuls. Translated by Celia Hawkesworth. New York: Defour Editions, 1993.

A Work about Ivo Andric

Vucinich, Wayne, ed. Ivo Andric Revisited: The Bridge Still Stands. Berkeley Calif.: UC Regents, 1996.

Anouilh, Jean (1910–1987) playwright

Jean Anouilh, one of the most popular French dramatists of the post-World War II era, was born on June 23 in Bordeaux, France. Anouilh began writing plays at age 12. He briefly studied law at the Sorbonne while writing comic scenes for the cinema and working as a copywriter. In 1929 he collaborated with Jean Aurenche on his first play, Humulus the Mute, and by age 25 dedicated himself to a career as a writer. His best-known plays are Antigone (1944) and Becket (1959), both of which explore the individual's resistance to state oppression.

Anouilh's works, ranging from serious drama to absurdist farce, are too diverse to be considered a part of any one literary movement, but he was influenced by both SARTRE's existentialism and the plays of Jouvett, COCTEAU, GIRAUDOUX and Molière. He often blended choreography and music into his plots, and used the theater itself as the setting of his plays; yet, beneath the farce and spectacle, the tone was almost always serious and pessimistic.

Anouilh titled the collections of his plays with adjectives that described their dominant tone. The "black" plays, such as Eurydice (1941) and Antigone (1944), are his tragedies and realistic pieces. The "pink" pieces are dominated by fantasy and include Thieves' Carnival (1938; translated 1952) and Time Remembered (1939; translated 1955). The "brilliant" pieces, such as Ring Round the Moon (1947; translated 1950), Colombe (1951; translated 1952), and The Rehearsal (1950; translated 1961), are a blending of both "pink" and "black" plays set among the aristocracy. There are only four "jarring" or "grating" plays, black plays with bitter humor: Ardele (1949; translated 1959), The Waltz of the Toreadors (1952; translated 1956), Ornifle (1955; translated 1970), and Poor Bitos, or The Masked Dinner (1956; translated 1963). His "costumed" or "history" plays, including The Lark (1953; translated 1955), about Joan of Arc, and the Tony Award-winning Becket (1959; translated 1962), were especially popular in the United States.

In 1936, Anouilh began to collaborate on screenplays, directed two films, and wrote ballets. In the 1980s, he directed productions of several plays, both his own works and those of other authors. He died in Switzerland on October 3.

Other Works by Jean Anouilh

The Collected Plays. London: Methuen, 1966.

Ornifle. Translated by Lucienne Hill. New York: Hill and Wang, 1970.

A Work about Jean Anouilh

Falb, Lewis W. Jean Anouilh. New York: F. Unger, 1977.

Antschel, Paul

See CELAN, PAUL.

Anyidoho, Kofi (1947–) poet

Anyidoho was born at Wheta, a small town on the Keta lagoon in the Volta region of Ghana. His mother, Abla Adidi Anyidoho, was a composer and cantor of traditional poetry, as was his uncle, Kodzovi Anyidoho, who was responsible for the poet's early education. The region's rich poetic tradition became an important resource for Anyidoho's work. Anyidoho trained as a teacher at Accra Teacher Training College, where he began to submit poetry for publication. He graduated with honors in 1977 from the University of Ghana with a degree in English and linguistics. He then left for the United States to study at Indiana University for an M.A. in folklore and later received a Ph.D. in comparative literature from the University of Texas at Austin. His experiences in America provided material for A Harvest of Our Dreams with Elegy for the Revolution (1984), a collection of poems written as a series of letters home.

Although America may have served as subject matter for a series of poems, Anyidoho's work always seems to turn home. He uses the oral tradition of the Ewe people in many of his poems. He retranslates English to fit the cadences and rhythms of the Ewe people and uses many of the images and idioms of traditional Ewe poetry in his own verse. He draws on traditional poetic genres such as the funeral dirge and the halo, the song of abuse. He also uses the spiritual imagery of invocation, a calling upon the spirits. Yet, his poetry is aware of the fractures and challenges caused by globalization. "Slums of Our Earth" (1983) includes the lines:

The darkness of the slums is the shadow side of proud structures on Wall Street

Anyidoho is committed to writing in both English and Ewe. He has won many awards: His first collection of poems, Earthchild, with Brain Surgery (1985), won the Valco Fund Literary Award for Poetry in 1976 while still in manuscript, the BBC Poetry Award for “Arts in Africa” in 1981, and the Poet of the Year in Ghana in 1984.

Other Works by Kofi Anyidoho

Ancestral Logic and Caribbean Blues. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 1993.

Elegy for the Revolution. New York: Greenfield Review Press, 1978.

Apollinaire, Guillaume (Wilhelm Apollinaris de Kostrowitski) (1880–1918) poet

Guillaume Apollinaire was a major figure in early 20th-century French avant-garde literary movements. He was one of the innovators of the THEATRE OF THE ABSURD and as a critic, with his publication of The Cubist Painters (1913), established cubism as an artistic movement. He is best known, however, for his poetry.

Most of Apollinaire’s personal history remains unknown. He was most likely born in Rome, the illegitimate son of the Swiss-Italian aristocrat Francesco Flugi d’Aspermont and Angelica de Kostrowitzky, a notoriously rebellious and adventurous Polish girl. He was raised by his mother, a heavy gambler, and they resided at various times in Italy, in Monaco, on the French Riviera, and in Paris.

A highly intelligent child, Apollinaire managed to pursue a solid education at the Collège Saint-Charles in Monaco and later at schools in Cannes and Nice by assuming the identity of a Russian prince. In 1900, he moved to Paris where he took a position working in a bank and became friends with artists such as Pablo Picasso and André Derain, playwright Alfred JARRY, and painter Marie Laurencin, who was also his lover. He traveled to Germany in 1921, which was where he received his introduction to two of his major influences: German romantic poetry and the torments of unrequited love.

Bold, forward-thinking, and often controversial, Apollinaire began his career as a writer by editing a number of reviews and publishing both satirical and semipornographic texts. He quickly gained a reputation as a dangerous foreigner and a thief, and in 1911, he was imprisoned for a week under suspicion of having stolen the Mona Lisa (it was missing, but Apollinaire was not involved). As a poet, Apollinaire began his career with the publication of a collection called Lenchanteur pourrisant (The Rotting Magician, 1909). The poems depict a vision of Merlin the Enchanter who, entombed by love, creates a new world of poetry from the depths of his suffering. The work was illustrated by André Derain.

It was not until the publication of Apollinaire’s second collection, however, that he began to gain true critical notice as a promising young poet.

Critical Analysis

Alcools (Alcohols, 1913) was a breakthrough work in form and content, combining elements of classical verse with modern imagery. The poems were transcriptions of overheard street conversations and were often devoid of punctuation. The poem “Zone,” for instance, which opens the collection, focuses on a period of time in the life of a tormented poet as he wanders through the streets, lamenting the recent loss of his mistress.

The beginnings of the cubist movement had a profound effect on Apollinaire. In The Cubist Painters, a collection of essays, Apollinaire explores cubism as a theoretical concept and as a psychological phenomenon. However, he was not one to hold to any school of thought for long. Shortly after the publication of his work on the cubists, he deserted cubism altogether for orphism, a movement which he created and described, as quoted by William Bohn, as “the art of painting new structures out of elements that have not been borrowed from the visual sphere but have been created entirely by the artist himself, and have been endowed by him with the fullness of reality.”

When World War I broke out in 1915, Apollinaire enlisted in the army. A wound he sustained left him in fragile health. Nonetheless, he kept writing. The Poet Assassinated (1916), written from his hospital bed, is a novella in the form of a tribute to the life of the fictional great poet Croniamantal, from his birth to his life as a poet and ultimately his death at the hands of an angry mob.

Apollinaire's one play, Les mamelles de Tirésias (The Breasts of Tiresias), was staged in 1917. Apollinaire subtitled the work "Drame surréaliste" ("surrealist drama")—thus laying ground for yet another avant-garde movement, surrealism. The play combines the playwright's own sexual obsessions with a satirical exploitation of Greek legend. It also focuses, in a farcical manner, on the low birthrate in France during the late 19th and early 20th centuries. It tells the story of Thérèse, a discontented housewife who decides to give up being a woman. She lets her breasts (red and blue balloons) float out over the audience and becomes Tiresias, named for the Greek seer who, in the legend, was granted the opportunity to experience life as a woman. In 1947, the play was made into an opera by Francis Poulenc.

For several years beginning in 1913, Apollinaire worked on a collection of experimental poems that form visual images on the page. The result, Calligrammes, was published in 1918, shortly before the poet's death.

After a series of well-known and often high-profile affairs, Apollinaire married Jaqueline Kolb in 1918. He succumbed to influenza that same year, dying on November 9 in Paris.

Other Works by Guillaume Apollinaire

Calligrammes: Poems of Peace and War (1913–1916).

Translated by Anne Hyde Greet. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.

Les onze mille vierges (The eleven thousand virgins) and Les Mémoires d'un jeune Don Juan (Memoirs of a young Don Juan). In Flesh Unlimited. Translated by Alexis Lykiard. London: Creation, 2000.

The Poet Assassinated. Translated by Matthew Josephson. Cambridge, Mass.: Exact Change, 2000.

Selected Writings of Guillaume Apollinaire. Translated by Roger Shattuck. New York: Norton, 1971.

A Work about Guillaume Apollinaire

Bohn, William. Apollinaire and the International Avante-Garde. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997.

Appelfeld, Aharon (1932–) novelist, essayist, short-story writer

Aharon Appelfeld was born in Czernowitz, Romania (now Chernivtsi, Ukraine). When he was eight, his mother was killed by the Nazis, and his father was sent to a Nazi work camp. Appelfeld himself was deported to a concentration camp but managed to escape and spent the next three years hiding and wandering in the nearby forests and villages of the Ukraine on his own. In a 1998 interview with the New York Times he said, "I lived with marginal people during the war—prostitutes, horse thieves, witches, fortune tellers. They gave me my real education."

Eventually, Appelfeld became a kitchen boy in the Russian army. He found his way to refugee camps in Yugoslavia and Italy and, in 1948, at age 16, went to the new state of Israel. It was there, at age 28, that he reunited with his father and began to teach at a kibbutz.

Much of Appelfeld's writing explores themes of the Holocaust. Yet, he says, "Mainly, I write Jewish stories, but I don't accept the label Holocaust writer. Of my 20 books, perhaps one-third are on the Holocaust period, one-third on Israel, and one-third on Jewish life in general." In his highly acclaimed novels, such as Badenheim 1939 (1979), Appelfeld rejects literalism and instead uses abstract symbolism—creating dreamlike scenes—and fable to examine the inner workings of his characters. In both Badenheim, and another novel, To the Land of Cattails (1987), he employs an almost hallucinatory sense of the Holocaust that is evident in much of his work.

Appelfeld is one of Israel's preeminent novelists, largely due to his literary style of exploring the Holocaust and his ability to bring the enormous dimensions of the Holocaust to a human scale. His works have received critical and popular acclaim. He has served as professor of Hebrew Literature at Ben-Gurion University and has held visiting professorships at Boston University, Brandeis, and Yale. He has been a visiting scholar at Oxford and Harvard. Among his many awards and honors are the Bialik Prize, the Harold U. Ribelow Prize, and the Israel Prize.

Other Works by Aharon Appelfeld

The Age of Wonders. Boston: Godine, 1990.

Katerina. New York: Norton, 1992.

To the Land of Reeds. New York: Grove Atlantic Monthly Press, 1994.

TZILL: The Story of a Life. New York: Grove Press, 1996.

A Work about Aharon Appelfeld

Cohen, Joseph. Voices of Israel: Essays on and Interviews with Yehuda Amichai, A.B. Yehoshua, T. Carmi, Aharon Appelfeld, and Amos Oz. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.

Aragon, Louis (1897–1982) poet, novelist, essayist

Louis Aragon was born in Paris. He studied medicine at the University of Paris and served as an auxiliary doctor in World War I. During this time, he met the poet André BRETON, who introduced him to surrealism and DADA.

In 1919, Aragon, Breton, and fellow writer and activist Philippe Soupault (1897–1990) founded the literary review Littérature. Aragon wrote his first collection of poems, Feu de joie (1920), to echo the dadaist desire to destroy traditional institutions and values. He also published Anicet; ou, Le Panorama (1921), a novel that parodies Picasso's success through the career of its cynical hero, Bleu; Le Libertinage (1924), a surrealist short-story collection; Le Mouvement perpétuel (Perpetual Movement, 1925), a novel; and Le paysan de Paris (The Paris Peasant, 1926), in which the city's parks and cafés are the setting for a series of intense encounters.

Aragon broke from Breton and Soupault in 1931 and joined the Communist Party. He visited the Soviet Union and returned to France to write "The Red Front," a poem influenced by the Russian poet Vladimir MAYAKOVSKY that calls for revolution in France. In the 1930s and 1940s, Aragon advocated SOCIALIST REALISM in his works.

During World War II, Aragon was taken prisoner but managed to escape to the Unoccupied Zone. When the Nazis occupied France, he became a key figure in the resistance. Le Crève-Coeur (1941) was one of five poetry collections Aragon wrote, detailing the Nazi occupation of France. His poetry took on a nationalistic sentiment, and he helped form a network of writers for the Resistance journals.

After the liberation, Aragon attempted a new form of novel that was almost journalistic in style. He also edited a French literary magazine and served as a member of the French Communist Party. In 1957, he was awarded the Lenin Peace Prize. He began to express a dislike for socialist realism and in 1968 attacked the Soviet Union for its intervention in Czechoslovakia. His later works include criticism and several autobiographical poems and novels. He died in Paris on December 24.

Other Works by Louis Aragon

The Adventures of Telemachus. Translated by Renee Riese Hubert and Judd D. Hubert. Cambridge, Mass.: Exact Change, 1997.

Le Con d'Irène. In Flesh Unlimited. Translated by Alexis Lykiard. London: Creation, 2000.

Paris Peasant. Translated by Simon W. Taylor. Cambridge, Mass.: Exact Change, 1995.

Works about Louis Aragon

Adereth, Max. Elsa Triolet and Louis Aragon: An Introduction to Their Interwoven Lives and Works. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1994.

Becker, Lucille F. Louis Aragon. Boston: Twayne, 1971.

Arenas, Reinaldo (1943–1990) novelist, poet, essayist, short-story writer, playwright

Reinaldo Arenas was born in Holguín, Cuba, to Oneida Fuentes Rodríguez and Antonio Arenas Machín. Because of his family's impoverished condition, Arenas received virtually no formal education and had little access to books, but his active imagination drove him to begin writing at an early age. After joining Fidel Castro's revolutionary army at age 15 and serving for a short time, he completed a degree in agricultural accounting.

Published when he was 21, Arenas's first book, Singing from the Well, (the first of a series of autobiographical novels) brought him some recognition, but because relatively few copies were printed, it remained unknown outside of Cuba. As Arenas began to speak out in his writings against Castro's regime and about his own homosexuality, his books were increasingly censored and suppressed in Cuba. He was, however, able to publish some works overseas, including The Ill-Fated Peregrinations of Fray Servando, which first appeared in a French translation in 1968. A first-person account of the title character's fantastic travels through Europe and the Americas, the novel may represent Arenas's best-known and most widely read book. Here and elsewhere, Arenas writes about homosexuality, as well as the more encompassing issue of the individual's right to self-determination and self-expression. After escaping Cuba and establishing residence in the United States, Arenas went on to publish an extensive amount of fiction, drama, poetry, and criticism. Among the works he wrote in exile are The Color of Summer (1993) and The Assault (1994), both part of his fictional autobiography and published posthumously.

Arenas was and continues to be a controversial but much celebrated author in Latin America and the rest of the world. His confrontation of issues related to sexuality and societal stereotypes and his vivid depiction of life under the Castro regime set him apart as one of the most important Cuban writers of the 20th century. Terminally ill with AIDS, he committed suicide on December 7.

Another Work by Reinaldo Arenas

Before Night Falls. Translated by Dolores M. Koch. New York: Viking, 1993.

A Work about Reinaldo Arenas

Soto, Francisco. Reinaldo Arenas. Boston: Twayne, 1998.

Arghezi, Tudor (Ion N. Theodorescu)

(1880–1967) poet, novelist, nonfiction writer

Tudor Arghezi was born in Bucharest, Romania. He took the pseudonym Arghezi because of its similarity to Argesis, the ancient name of the river Arges, of which he was very fond. As a teenager, Arghezi was rebellious and was often involved in political youth movements. He turned to writing as a focus for his ideas and began to publish in 1896, signing his works as Ion Theo. In his early 20s, Arghezi began to travel abroad, spending four years in the Cernica Monastery and a brief period at a monastery in Paris, where he converted to Catholicism. He ultimately moved to Geneva, where he wrote poetry, much of which was influenced by religion and Arghezi's own thoughts on the nature of life and death.

In 1912, Arghezi returned to Romania, where he published pamphlets and lyrics, many of which aggressively advocated the neutrality of Romania. For this, Arghezi was imprisoned, along with 11 other writers and journalists, and spent from 1918 to 1920 at Vacaresti Penitentiary.

Arghezi's first volume of poetry, Cuvinte Potrivite (Arranged Words), was published in 1927. This work gained him celebrity status among the Romanian people. He continued to publish other volumes, including Flowers of Mould (1931), inspired by his years in prison, Notebook for the Night (1935), and Choirs (1939). The artistic novelty of these collections shocked readers. Arghezi did not conform to any preexisting poetic formulas. Instead, his writing showed a restlessness, and a bold and innovative combination of often crude, forceful language, and a traditional reliance on folklore and mythology. Mainly religious in theme, Arghezi focused on life, love, humanity, death, and the nature of God.

In 1931, the same year in which Arghezi published Flowers of Mould, he turned his attention to writing poetry and prose for children. Cartea cu Jucarii (1931) was the first of several of his works for children that are still used in Romanian schools today. Between 1931 and 1967, Arghezi was at his most prolific, writing, in addition to the children's works, the poetry collections Notebook for the Night and Choirs, and three novels: Mother's Love and Filial Devotion (1934), Cimitrul Buna-Vestire (1936), and Lina (1942), which was actually an extended poem in prose form.

Alongside his work as a writer, Arghezi also managed the Romanian newspaper, Bilet de Papagal. Because of the sarcastic and often satirical political pamphlets it published, Arghezi once again came under police scrutiny. The paper was ultimately confiscated, and he was imprisoned for a year in Bucharest.

After his release from prison, Arghezi was considered to be rehabilitated. Under the Communist regime, he was awarded numerous prizes for his work, was elected as a member of the Romanian Academy, and twice was celebrated as the National Poet of Romania. He began to collaborate with political officials, writing poetry that supported the goals of the regime. He was buried in the garden of his house, which is managed today as a museum in his honor.

Other Works by Tudor Arghezi

Poems: Tudor Arghezi. Translated by Andrei Bantas. Bucharest: Minerva Publishing House, 1983.

Selected Poems of Tudor Arghezi. Translated by Michael Impey and Brian Swann. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1976.

Arnim, Bettina von (Catarina Elisabetha Ludovica Magdalena Brentano, Bettine) (1785–1859) poet, fiction writer

Bettina von Arnim was one of 20 children fathered by the wealthy Italian merchant Peter Anton Brentano. She was the seventh child of her mother, Maximiliane von La Roche. Bettina was born in the German city of Frankfurt am Main. Her early influences included her grandmother Sophie von La Roche and brother Clemens Brentano, both well-known writers. Like her grandmother and mother, Bettina developed a friendship with Johann Wolfgang von GOETHE. In 1811, Bettina married Clemens's friend, Ludwig Achim von Arnim, an editor of folk song collections. Although she published a few songs for her husband's company, Bettina did not work full time as a writer until after Achim's death in 1831.

Bettina's first book, Goethe's Briefwechsel mit einem Kinde (Goethe's Correspondence with a Child, 1835), was based on her correspondence with Goethe and his mother. Arnim edited these letters and poems to provide a fictionalized description of events, dreams, and thoughts. Although controversial for its erotic content, the book was a literary success. Arnim used her correspondence with two friends and a brother to produce three more books exploring the topics of love and friendship.

Arnim's other writings include musical compositions and fairy tales that she wrote with her daughters. As a widow, she was actively involved in the political causes of opposing censorship and governmental abuse. Arnim also used her works to promote social reforms to help the poor and the sick. Her biographers Arthur Helps and Elizabeth Jane Howard explain that Arnim "had a talent for social satire" and was "a penetrating observer" of life in early 19th-century Europe.

Other Works by Bettina von Arnim

Goethe's Correspondence with a Child. Boston: Tichner and Fields, 1859.

The Life of High Countess Gritta von Ratsinourhouse. Gisela von Arnim Grimm, coauthor. Translated by Lisa Ohm. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

A Work about Bettina von Arnim

Helps, Arthur, and Elizabeth Jane Howard. Bettina: A Portrait. London: Chatto and Windus, 1957.

Arp, Hans (Jean Arp) (1887–1966) poet

Hans Arp was born in Strasbourg, Alsace. Now part of France, Alsace belonged to Germany at the time of Arp's birth. His father, Pierre-Guillaume Arp, operated a cigar and cigarette factory. Arp's mother, Josephine, was French, and the family sympathized politically with France. Arp grew up speaking German, French, and the Alsatian dialect. His childhood daydreams translated into an early literary creativity. Arp published his first poem, written in Alsatian, at age 15. Two years later, he published three more poems.

Although a gifted poet, Arp would achieve his greatest fame as a painter and sculptor. He studied art in Strasbourg, Weimar, and Paris. After moving to Switzerland, Arp produced abstract painting and in 1916 helped found the DADA movement in art. In 1921, he married the artist Sophie Taeuber. Five years later, he changed his name from Hans to Jean.

Arp published his first collection of poetry, written in German, in 1920. His poems gained a wider audience in 1948 when a New York firm published his collection On My Way: Poetry and Essays, 1912–1947. Arp's early verse was conventional but amusing and inventive. In the 1940s and 1950s, his poems were written as a series of dreamlike word associations and had more emotional depth. The historian Hermann Boeschstein explains that Arp was a pioneer in "freeing the word from the task of relating to and disclosing the meaning of outer and inner realities. Language as such is advanced to the central position in poetry and forms its theme."

Other Works by Hans Arp

The Isms of Art. 1925. Authorized Reprint Edition. New York: Arno Press, 1968.

Jean, Marcel, ed. Arp on Arp: Poems, Essays, Memories. Translated by Joachim Neugroschel. New York: Viking Press, 1972.

A Work about Hans Arp

Last, Rex W. German Dadaist Literature: Kurt Schwitters, Hugo Ball, Hans Arp. Boston: Twayne, 1973.

Arp, Jean

See ARP, HANS.

Arrabal, Fernando (1937–) playwright, novelist

Fernando Arrabal was born in Melilla, Spanish Morocco. His childhood was extremely traumatic. In the Spanish civil war his father was an officer in the liberal republican army, and his mother was a fascist sympathizer. At the end of the war, she betrayed his father to the authorities, and he was condemned to death. The violent loss of his father, combined with Arrabal's knowledge of his mother's betrayal, permanently scarred him.

When Arrabal was four years old, his family moved to Spain, where he attended school. As a young boy, he would entertain himself by constructing puppet theaters and putting on plays. These experiences play an important role in some of his later works. Arrabal was also fascinated by Charlie Chaplin movies; later in life, he used slapstick and the stylized acting techniques of Chaplin in the context of his Panic Theater movement.

Unable to find attractive career opportunities in Franco's Spain, Arrabal moved to Paris to pursue his career as a playwright. Ironically, around the same time he arrived in Paris, he discovered he had tuberculosis. Nevertheless, he persisted in working arduously at his writing and, in 1958, his efforts paid off when a Paris publisher gave him a lifetime contract.

The Labyrinth (1956), one of Arrabal's early plays, reflects the depressing and daunting quality of his early life. It resembles to some degree the dark fantasies of Franz KAFKA. A nightmarish play, it portrays the horrors of the modern world as a sort of absurd hell. As Arrabal developed as a writer, he persisted in his use of absurdity. In his later plays, however, the effect was more often black humor rather than terror or angst.

In the 1960s, Arrabal emerged as one of the central writers of the THEATRE OF THE ABSURD, a movement pioneered by such writers as Antonin ARTAUD and Samuel BECKETT. The movement had many subcategories of playwrights who shared a common use of absurd elements as a method to revitalize the stolid conventions of traditional Western theater.

Arrabal's particular subcategory was a style of theater he called Panic Theater. The Greek god of surprise and confusion, Pan, for whom the movement was named, brings both pleasure and terror when he appears. It is important to remember that the scope of Panic Theater extends beyond the simple definition of fear that we normally associate with panic.

Critical Analysis

Arrabal's play The Architect and the Emperor of Assyria (1965) is an example of the height of Panic Theater. The play begins when the emperor of Assyria's plane crashes on a desert island and he is the only one who survives. He finds on this island an architect who is not quite human. He is a supernatural creature who is able to control night and day and the seasons. The emperor nevertheless is unimpressed and begins to try to educate the architect in the manners of bourgeois society. The two men fall into a sadomasochistic relationship that involves acting out plays in which they assume opposite roles, such as a pair of fiancés, mother and son, a nun and her confessor, and a doctor and his patient. As the play progresses, the two actors switch roles, behave like each other, and act out scenes by themselves playing two people. It becomes obvious that they are each other's double and part of the same mind.

The use of games and ritualized behavior to structure the action of the play in lieu of a plot is one of Arrabal's major innovations. In addition, the absurd sequence of events creates confusion and incomprehensibility that embodies one of the main aspects of Panic Theater. Arrabal believed that to be accurate to life, art must be confusing and filled with chance or absurdity. The Architect and the Emperor of Assyria can be seen as a psychological drama that, perhaps, takes place within a single mind, a kind of dream projected onto the stage.

In the late 1960s, after being censored and arrested in Spain, Arrabal began to become more political in his drama. He wrote a series of plays that he called Guerrilla Theater, many of which were meant to be performed impromptu on the street. And They Put Handcuffs on the Flowers (1969), the culmination of this period in Arrabal's work, is performed in a theater; however, the actors sit with the audience, and the staging is highly unconventional. Arrabal continues to use many of the methods of Panic Theater, but now his purpose was to convey a public, political message.

Arrabal is primarily a dramatist, but he has also had success in a number of other genres. His novel The Tower Struck by Lightning (1988) is a semiautobiographical work structured entirely around the game of chess, at which Arrabal is an expert. He has made several films, including a film for children, Pacific Fantasy (1981), starring Mickey Rooney. He has also exhibited his dreamlike paintings. Although under the Franco regime his plays were banned in Spain, in 1986 King Juan Carlos of Spain awarded him the Medalla d'Oro de las Bellas Artes. His other awards include France's Prix du Centre National du Livre. Arrabal lives and works in Paris. In a review of the La Mama (New York) production of The Architect and the Emperor of Assyria, Clive Barnes wrote: "Mr. Arrabal, with his perceptions, absurdities, loves and understanding, is a playwright to be honored, treasured and understood. In this play he is saying something about the isolation, the solitariness and the need of 20th-century man that, so far, as I can see, no other playwright has quite gotten on stage before."

Other Works by Fernando Arrabal

Baal Babylon. Translated by Richard Howard. New York: Grove, 1961.

Selected Plays: Guernica; The Labyrinth; The Tricycle; Picnic on the Battlefield; And They Put Handcuffs on the Flowers; The Architect and the Emperor of Assyria; Garden of Delights. New York: Grove Press, 1986.

A Work about Fernando Arrabal

Donahue, Thomas John. The Theater of Fernando Arrabal: A Garden of Earthly Delights. New York: New York University Press, 1980.

Artaud, Antonin (1896–1948) poet, dramatist

Antonin Artaud was born in Marseille, France. In 1920, he moved to Paris to become an actor. His work, both on stage and as a writer, was influential to the development of experimental theater. In particular, he visualized a new form of theater, both for stage and screen, known as the Theater of Cruelty, in which traditional forms of representation would be cast aside in favor of new actions and spectacles and in which language would be all but abandoned in a carefully choreographed new creation. His efforts to produce his visions, however, failed, not so much as a result of a lack of vision but because he spent most of his life destitute, addicted to numerous drugs and hampered by both physical and mental illness. His book The Theatre and Its Double (1938; translated 1958), however, was later used as the basis for much of the ensemble-theater movement as well as for identifying characteristics that would be linked to the THEATRE OF THE ABSURD.

A prime example of this type of work was his play The Cenci (1935), which was produced at the Théâtre Alfred Jarry, a theater cofounded by Artaud himself. An illustration of the Theater of Cruelty, it was performed without a traditionally constructed set and featured minimal spoken dialogue, relying instead on movement, gestures, and incoherent sounds. The goal of this form of art was to force the audience to confront a “primal self” devoid of the trappings of civilization.

A pioneer, Artaud first began to publish his texts, complete with detailed instruction on lighting, violent gestures, and a noisy cacophony of sound in place of music, in 1924, almost 40 years before Andy Warhol introduced the trend of multimedia spectacle. He initially aligned himself with the SURREALISTS, but he was expelled from their group in 1926 because he was unwilling to follow the movement’s mission. Finding himself with few artistic allies, he focused his creative energies on writing essays and poetry, as well as taking small roles in mainstream films, something he felt was degrading to him as an artist.

In 1936 and 1937, Artaud traveled to Mexico (where he studied the rituals of the Tarahumaras Indians), Belgium, and Ireland (where he became increasingly disillusioned with the social restrictions placed on creative artists). He suffered a mental breakdown that involved episodes of violent behavior and hallucinations. On his return from Ireland, Artaud was placed in a psychiatric hospital. Institutionalized from 1937 to 1946, he was subjected to various experimental forms of therapy, including 51 electric shock treatments, coma-inducing insulin therapy, and periods of starvation. As a result, his health declined rapidly.

The final two years of Artaud’s life, after his release from the asylum, were unquestionably his most productive. He sought desperately to give voice to his vision. His final work was To Have Done With The Judgment Of God (1947), a radio script in which Artaud sought revenge against those who had kept him in the asylum. Billed as vicious, obscene, anti-American and anti-Catholic, the script did not air until 30 years after Artaud’s death; it was eventually banned. In the script itself, the United States is presented as a baby factory and war machine. Death rituals are depicted, and excrement is revered as symbolic of life and mortality. Questions about reality are answered with more questions, leading to the final scene in which God takes the stage as a dissected organ on an autopsy table.

Artaud died of cancer, shortly after suffering the disappointment of having his radio broadcast banned, but he left behind a legacy that would influence many generations of artists. As recently as 1982, the punk musical group Bauhaus recorded a song in tribute to the genius of Antonin Artaud.

Another Work by Antonin Artaud

Artaud on Theatre. Edited by Claude Schumacher. London: Methuen Drama, 1991.

Works about Antonin Artaud

Bermel, Albert. Artaud's Theatre of Cruelty. New York: Taplinger, 1977.

Plunka, Gene A., ed. Antonin Artaud and the Modern Theatre. Cranbury, N.J.: Associated University Presses, 1994.

Astley, Thea (1925–) novelist

Thea Astley was born in Brisbane, Australia. Almost all of her novels are set in south Queensland. She studied for 12 years in the University of Queensland, graduated with an arts degree, and has taught in several schools and institutions in Queensland, New South Wales, and Sydney. Astley has won several prizes for her works, including the Miles Franklin Award on three occasions. She has published several novels and a few short stories, and edited an anthology of short stories in 1971. She is married and has one son.

Astley's writings are marked by a unique blend of comedic wit and biting sarcasm. Her novels reflect her constant struggle to come to terms with Queensland society and with Catholicism. Her characters come from a variety of backgrounds, and her settings are usually small towns. Astley believes that the closely knit community of a small town allows her to express the depths of her characters fully. Her novel Reaching Tin River (1980), for example, is set in a rural town whose economic life is centered on the sugar industry.

The most intriguing aspect of Astley's novels is the point of view from which she writes. She often chooses to write from the perspective of the misfits or outsiders of a society. In A Boat Load of Home Folk (1968), Astley relates how the inability of a group of elderly Australians to cope with the strange environment of a tropical island reveals their inadequacies. In another novel, The Slow Natives (1965), she examines relationships between the elders and the young in the Levenson. She exposes the estrangement between generations and laments the way the aged are marginalized and neglected within the community. This novel won both a Miles Franklin Award and a Moomba Festival prize and is considered to be one of Astley's best novels for the way it finds the depths in shallow, constricted lives.

Astley's poetic prose explores the depth of experience and emotions of her flawed characters. She mixes her chastisement and mockery with humor, as in her depiction of Paul Vesper in The Acolyte. This penchant for injecting humor in her narrative makes a deeper impact on her readers. In the view of the Australian writer and critic Brian Matthews, Astley is "one of the most impressive of major Australian novelists currently writing."

Other Works by Thea Astley

A Descant for Gossips. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1986.

Girl With A Monkey. New York: Viking Press, 1987.

Hunting the Wild Pineapple. New York: Penguin USA, 1982.

An Item from the Late News. New York: Viking Press, 1984.

It's Raining in Mango: Pictures from a Family Album. New York: Penguin USA, 1988.

A Kindness Cup. New York: Penguin USA, 1989.

The Well Dressed Explorer. New York: Penguin USA, 1988.

A Work about Thea Astley

Matthews, Brian. "Life in the Eye of the Hurricane: The Novels of Thea Astley." Southern Review 5 (1973): 148–73.

Atwood, Margaret (1939–) novelist, poet

Margaret Atwood was born in Ottawa, Ontario, to Carl Atwood, an entomologist, and Margaret Kilham, a nutritionist. She spent her childhood accompanying her father on his researches in the wilderness of Quebec. Graduating from the University of Toronto with a B.A. in 1961, she received an M.A. from Radcliffe in 1962 and did some graduate work at Harvard University, beginning a thesis on Gothic fiction.

Atwood's first published work, Double Persephone (1961), was a book of poetry exploring the mythological figure Persephone. Her most important collection of verse, The Circle Game (1966) uses Gothic imagery to explore issues of gender; for example, the first poem, "This Is a Photograph of Me," is narrated by a dead woman: "The photograph was taken / the day after I drowned." Atwood's first novel, Edible Woman (1969) is a darkly comic tale of a woman who fears marriage and stops eating.

Her most celebrated novel, The Handmaid's Tale (1985), is set in a horrifying future society, Gilead, where women are condemned to illiteracy and servitude. The novel purports to be the recorded narration of Offred, a servant: "Where the edges are we aren't sure, they vary, according to the attacks and counterattacks; but this is the centre, where nothing moves. The Republic of Gilead, said Aunt Lydia, knows no bounds. Gilead is within you." Critic Sandra Tomc sees the novel as a critique not merely of male oppression but also of United States domination over Canada: "In the nightmare future she imagines, women have succumbed to a totalizing patriarchy. Appropriately, given Atwood's conflation of feminism and nationalism, Canada, in some analogous gesture, has succumbed to its totalizing southern neighbor."

The Robber Bride (1993), focuses on the demonic Zenia's haunting of her three friends, robbing them of their money and men, and has dark Gothic undertones: "Zenia, with her dark hair sleeked down by the rain, wet and shivering, standing on the back step as she had done once before, long ago. Zenia, who had been dead for five years." Alias Grace (1996) continues Atwood's exploration of gender and power, based on the story of Grace Marks, a servant accused of murdering her master in 1843. Her most recent novel, Blind Assassin (2000), contains three interconnected stories, beginning with a woman, Iris Griffin, telling of her sister's death in 1945. It won the Booker Prize. Fellow Canadian writer Alice MUNRO comments: "It's easy to appreciate the grand array of Margaret Atwood's work—the novels, the stories, the poems, in all their power and grace and variety. This work in itself has opened up the gates for a recognition of Canadian writing all over the world."

Other Works by Margaret Atwood

Cat's Eye. New York: Doubleday, 1989.

Power Politics. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

A Work about Margaret Atwood

Cooke, Nathalie. Margaret Atwood: A Biography. Toronto: ECW Press, 1998.

Ausländer, Rose (Rosalie Scherzer)

(1901–1988) poet

Rose Ausländer was born in Czernowitz, Austria-Hungary, a city now situated in Ukraine. Her father Sigmund Scherzer, a former rabbinical student, ensured that the family practiced traditional Jewish customs and rituals. As part of her upbringing, she learned both Hebrew and Yiddish and later attended the University of Czernowitz where she studied literature, EXPRESSIONISM, and philosophy. After her father died in 1920, she emigrated to the United States in 1921 to relieve some of the financial strain on her mother, Etie Scherzer, and was joined by another student from the university, Ignaz Ausländer, whom she married in 1923. The couple divorced after three years, and she moved back to Czernowitz in 1931.

Rose Ausländer started writing poetry in German while in the United States. After returning to Czernowitz, she published her first book-length collection of poetry, Der Regenbogen (The Rainbow, 1939). Although it received positive reviews, the Nazis prevented the book from achieving a wide circulation because Ausländer was Jewish. During World War II, Ausländer and her mother avoided Nazi death camps by hiding in a cellar. Ausländer composed poetry to cope with the traumatic situation. During this time, she met Paul CELAN, a poet who would influence Ausländer's works after 1957.

Following World War II, Ausländer published 12 volumes of poetry while living in West Germany and the United States. Her best poems describe her personal experiences in Czernowitz and the fear and suffering of the Holocaust. As the literary scholar Kathrin Bower writes, "Ausländer's poems evidence a dialogue of remembrance and mourning at once historical and redemptive."

Ausländer thus became a voice for a shattered generation of German Jews.

Another Work by Rose Ausländer

Selected Poems of Rose Ausländer. Translated by Ewald Osers. London: London Magazine Editors, 1977.

A Work about Rose Ausländer

Bower, Kathrin M. Ethics and Remembrance in the Poetry of Nelly Sachs and Rose Ausländer. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2000.

B

Ba Jin (Pa Chin; Li Feigan) (1904–)
novelist

Li Feigan was born on November 25 in Chengdu and received a private education. He studied English at Chengdu Foreign Languages School, participating in antifeudal activity and studying Russian writers and anarchist philosophers. He adopted a pen name from syllables of the Chinese names of Russian anarchists Mikhail Bakunin (1814–76) and Pyotr Kropotkin (1842–1921).

After moving to France in 1927, Ba Jin wrote autobiographical essays and articles on anarchism, as well as his first novel, Destruction (1929), about the life of a young anarchist, Du Daxin. He produced many works, mostly political in nature, with clear-cut moral lessons. His subjects were frequently the Chinese gentry class or intellectuals. In 1931, he published his best-known work, Family, a sentimental melodrama of several generations living in one compound. The novel chronicled a family's rise and fall and charted the fate of feudalism after the May Fourth Movement (1919 student demonstrations against the weak Chinese concessions of the imperialist Versailles Treaty). Family became part of Ba Jin's Torrent trilogy, which included Spring (1938) and Autumn (1940).

The three-year period between 1931 and 1933 brought a novella companion to Destruction called

New Life, as well as two novels about mining life, The Antimony Miners and The Sprouts. In 1935, Ba Jin also completed the Trilogy of Love, which followed the revolutionary activities of a group of intellectuals.

Ba Jin was active in many aspects of literary and political life. He published two manifestos on behalf of and with other Chinese artists and writers, including LU Xun, for freedom of speech and against imperialism. He actively urged a united front against Japanese aggression during the Sino-Japanese War and continued his literary output with the novelettes The Garden of Repose (1944), Ward No. 4 (1946), and Cold Nights (1946). As a Korean War correspondent, he wrote two books about the battlefields, Living Amongst Heroes (1953) and Defenders of Peace (1954).

Ba Jin has earned many awards and distinctions, including France's Legion of Honor. He holds an honorary doctorate from the Chinese University of Hong Kong and is a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Letters. He is one of China's most prominent writers.

Other Works by Ba Jin

Family. Translated by Sidney Shapiro. Boston: Cheng & Tsui, 1992.

“My J'accuse Against This Moribund System: Notes on a Crumbling Landlord Clan of Western Sichuan.” In Helmut Martin and Jeffrey Kinkley, eds., Modern Chinese Writers: Self-Portrayals. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1992.

Random Thoughts. Translated by Geremie Barmé. San Francisco: China Books & Periodicals, 1984.

Selected Works of Ba Jin. Beijing: Foreign Language Press, 1988.

Ward Four: A Novel of Wartime China. Translated by Haili Kong and Howard Goldblatt. San Francisco: China Books & Periodicals, 2001.

Bâ, Mariama (1929–1981) novelist, essayist, activist

Mariama Bâ was born into a prominent family in Dakar, Senegal. At a time when only Europeans maintained political positions in Senegal, Bâ's father became the first Senegalese minister of health. Her maternal grandparents raised her in the Muslim tradition. Against her grandparents' wishes, she graduated from the Teacher's College in 1947 and taught for 12 years. Bâ was married to Obèye Diop, a member of Parliament, with whom she had nine children. After they divorced, she remained single, becoming an advocate for women in Senegal.

Bâ's first novel, So Long a Letter (1979), was an international success that illuminated the complex lives of African women. Although the critics have mostly viewed the novel as a criticism of polygamy, exposing the inequalities between men and women, it addresses multiple women's issues. The story centers on two educated women who had happy, loving marriages until their husbands took second wives. Each woman responds in her own way: One stays and one leaves. The book reveals the limited choices for women and also presents the strong bonds and support systems between women. Writing in letter format, Bâ gives the reader an intimate look at a woman's internal reflections. This novel received the Noma Award for Publishing in Africa in 1980.

Bâ died prior to the publishing of her second novel, Scarlet Song (1981), which tackles the difficulties of interracial marriage. Today, she is considered one of the most important French West African feminists.

Works about Mariama Bâ

Cham, Mbye B. “Contemporary Society and the Female Imagination: A Study of the Novels of Mariama Bâ.” African Literature Today 15 (1987): 89–101.

d'Almeida, Irene Assiba. “The Concept of Choice in Mariama Bâ's Fiction.” In Carole Boyce Davies and Anne Adams Graves, eds., Nagambika: Studies of Women in African Literature. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 1986.

Edson, Laurie. “Mariama Bâ and the Politics of the Family.” Studies in Twentieth Century Literature 17.1 (1993): 13–25.

Babel, Isaac (1894–1941) short-story writer, novelist, dramatist

Isaac Emmanuelovich Babel was born in Odessa, Russia, into a Jewish family. Emmanuel Babel, his father, was a sales representative for an agricultural firm. At the time, Odessa had the largest Jewish population in Russia, and Babel grew up in the city's Jewish ghetto, Moldavanka. He was constantly faced with anti-Semitism from teachers and peers, a fact that played a substantial role in his development as a writer.

Babel's father was a domineering patriarch who forced young Isaac to practice violin for hours every day and sent him, when he was 11, to study business in Kiev, where he stayed until 1914. Although Babel excelled in all areas as a student, literature was his only passion.

Babel began his career as a writer while studying at Kiev, often drawing upon his experience growing up in the Jewish ghetto. His first published story, “Old Shloyme” (1913), explores anti-Semitism directly; in the story, a Jewish family faces a choice between renouncing their religion and losing their home.

In 1914, Babel moved to St. Petersburg to pursue writing professionally. He had difficulty publishing his material until a meeting with Maxim GORKY in 1916. Gorky assisted Babel with the publication of two stories in the prestigious literary journal Letopis.

Babel supported the Bolshevik cause during the Russian Revolution. Like many other Jews in Russia faced with persecution, Babel was intrigued by the Bolshevik promises of freedom and equality for all. Between 1917 and 1919, Babel served in the Red Army. His most famous collection of stories, Red Cavalry (1926), reflects his experiences during the war. The work raises issues of violence, anti-Semitism, and political ideology, as well as the themes of friendship, love, and compassion. The success of Red Cavalry firmly established Babel as one of the leading writers in Russia.

In 1929, Babel left Russia and traveled throughout Europe, visiting France, Italy, Belgium, and Germany. When he returned to Russia, he became skeptical of the Communists. During the same period, he began writing drama, completing his most notable play, Sunset, in 1928. Set in Odessa in 1913, the play explores the social interactions of the Jewish ghetto. In the play, the reader notices a duality that persistently appears throughout Babel's works: He embraces his Jewishness and at the same time intellectually opposes Judaism. The play was criticized by the authorities for its lack of socialist themes.

During the 1930s, Babel was repeatedly criticized by the government. Arrested in 1939, Babel was executed in 1940 after a 20-minute trial for allegedly spying for France and Austria. The charges were false, as the records, released in 1954, confirm.

Babel made an enormous contribution to Russian literature, emerging as one of the first writers to discuss openly and positively the cultural and social position of the Jews in Russia. As Natalie Babel, his wife, later pointed out, "His life centered on writing, and it can be said without exaggeration that he sacrificed everything to his art, including his relationship with his family, his liberty, and finally even his life."

Other Works by Isaac Babel

Babel, Natalie, ed. The Collected Stories of Isaac Babel.

Translated by Peter Constantine. New York: Norton, 2002.

The Complete Works of Isaac Babel. Translated by Peter Constantine. New York: Norton, 2001.

Works about Isaac Babel

Bloom, Harold, ed. Isaac Babel: Modern Critical Views. Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1987.

Ehre, Milton. Isaac Babel. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

Bachmann, Ingeborg (1926–1973) poet, novelist, dramatist

A daughter of a teacher, Ingeborg Bachmann was born in Klagenfurt, Austria. She grew up in a disturbing political atmosphere, as Nazi Germany was gaining control of Austria, and at the age of 12 she watched Nazi troops march into her town. Bachmann studied philosophy at the universities of Innsburg, Graz, and Vienna; she completed a dissertation on Ludwig Wittgenstein under the direction of the famous philosopher Martin Heidegger in 1950.

Bachmann began her career as a professional writer in the early 1950s, writing radio plays. In 1953, Bachmann published her first collection of poetry, The Deferred Time. The collection was critically praised and received the prestigious GRUPPE 47 award. In 1953 she spent a year in the United States as a visiting scholar at Harvard University, and she later moved to Italy, where she wrote a number of political articles for Austrian and German newspapers. In 1959, Bachmann was appointed to the newly created position as chair of poetics at the University of Frankfurt, where she lectured on philosophy and literature.

Her poetry is influenced by many sources, including CLASSICISM, surrealism, and the avant-garde movement. The somber tone of her poetry lyrically and precisely describes the anguish of a personal experience. Bachmann's dark, powerful, and complex imagery is thematically juxtaposed against simple individual emotions such as love, guilt, and failed aspirations. Her use of imagery is exemplified by these lines from “In the Storm of Roses”: “Wherever we turn in the storm of roses,/ the night is lit up by thorns. . . .” Unlike her prose, which is often read as social and feminist fiction, her poetry centers on deeply personal observations.

In 1961, Bachmann published her highly influential autobiographical work, The Thirtieth Year, which was awarded the Berlin Critics Prize and the Georg Büchner Prize in 1964. Her first published novel, Malina (1971), deals with a number of feminist issues. Malina, the protagonist of the novel, has a relationship with Ivan, a younger man of Hungarian descent. The relationship becomes psychologically complex as Malina has recurrent nightmares of her father as a Nazi who kills her in a gas chamber, nightmares that seem to contribute to the deterioration of her relationship with Ivan. Malina also confronts the theme of national memory and national identity in postwar Europe. The issues of ego and alter ego and with the subtle influence of the memory of genocide create a powerful combination. The novel was highly praised and remains an excellent representative work of German POSTMODERNISM.

Just before her death, Bachmann visited Auschwitz in Poland and gave a series of readings. She died under mysterious circumstances in a fire in her apartment. Bachmann was awarded numerous prizes, including the Austrian Medal of Honor, the highest prize in literature an Austrian citizen can receive from the government. Her works continue to be of great social and literary importance.

Other Works by Ingeborg Bachmann

Selected Prose and Drama. New York: Continuum, 1998.

Songs in Flight: The Collected Poems of Ingeborg Bachmann. Translated by Peter Filkins (bilingual edition). New York: Marsilio Publications, 1995.

The Book of Franza and Requiem for Fanny Goldman. Translated by Peter Filkins. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1999.

Three Radio Plays. Translated by Lilian Friedberg. Riverside, Calif.: Ariadne Press, 1999.

A Work about Ingeborg Bachmann

Redwitz, Eckenbert. The Image of the Woman in the Works of Ingeborg Bachmann. New York: Peter Lang, 1993.

Balzac, Honoré de (1799–1850) novelist

Honoré de Balzac, one of the creators of REALISM in literature, was born in Tours, France, to a middle-class family. Originally from Paris, the family had moved to Tours during the French Revolution because of their royalist opinions. In 1814, however, they were able to return to Paris. Balzac, neglected by his mother, spent his early years in boarding schools. After graduating from the Collège de Vendôme he went on to the Sorbonne, where he read the works of the mystical philosophers Jakob Böhme (1575–1624) and Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772) and was particularly interested in Franz Anton Mesmer’s lectures on animal magnetism. These influences are detectable in his early fiction. After graduation, he began to work in a law office. When, in 1819, his family was forced by financial setbacks to move to the small town of Villeparisis, Balzac decided that he would return to Paris alone and embark on a career as a writer.

Balzac rented a shabby room in Paris, a room he later described in the novel Le Peau de chagrin (The Wild Ass’s Skin, 1831), and began what would become a habit of late night writing and excessive consumption of caffeine. In his lifetime, he wrote more than 100 novels, mostly between the hours of midnight and six in the morning, always on blue paper and by candlelight, while drinking large quantities of thick Turkish coffee. By 1822 Balzac, using a variety of pseudonyms, had written several plays and novels, all of which were ignored. Undaunted, he continued to write.

A compulsive spender, Balzac had a difficult time staying ahead of his creditors. He attempted to run a publishing company and also bought a printing house. Both of these endeavors left him with large debts that would stay with him throughout his life. Destitute at 29, he accepted an invitation to stay at the home of Général de Pommereul in Fougères in Brittany, where he worked on his novel Le Dernier chouan, ou la Bretagne en 1800 (1829), a historical work that he eventually published under his own name. Finally, with this work, Balzac began to gain some recognition and popularity, although not enough to release him from debt.

In 1833, Balzac developed the idea of collecting all of his previously written novels under one name and linking them together as a series of works which, when taken as a whole, would encompass all the customs, atmosphere, and habits of French society. This idea eventually led to the collection of more than 2,000 characters appearing in 90 novels and novellas. The works were eventually collected under the title La Comédie humaine, or The Human Comedy, a name Balzac borrowed from Dante's The Divine Comedy.

Critical Analysis

Included in La Comédie humaine were well-known works such as Le Père Goriot (Father Goriot, 1834–35), Les Paysans (The Peasants, 1844), and Illusions perdues (Lost Illusions, 1837–43). The settings for these works include all levels of society in Paris and the provinces. The characters include a mix of old aristocracy and new money, set alongside middle-class tradespeople and professionals, servants, young intellectuals, and criminals. Some of the characters, such as Eugène de Rastignac, the poor provincial man who comes to Paris with big dreams and makes good on them through gambling, affairs, and connections with the nobility, recur throughout the works. Balzac inserted himself in his works as well, alluding to incidents and adventures in which he participated side by side with his characters who grew to exist not only on paper but in his imagination outside of his novels as if they were actual acquaintances. It is said that Balzac once interrupted a conversation in which a friend of his was telling him about his sister's ill health by saying, "That's all very well, but let's get back to reality: to whom are we going to marry Eugénie Grandet?"

During the height of his productivity, Balzac was known to spend anywhere from 14 to 16 hours a day writing. He would eat a large meal each evening, sleep for a few hours, and then wake at midnight to continue writing. There are reports that once he consumed 100 oysters and 12 lamb chops in a single meal. His few free hours were spent having amorous affairs and pursuing the joy of life. One of his affairs was with Eveline Hanska, a wealthy Polish woman who had been among his friends for 15 years. He based several of his female characters on her, such as Mme. Hulot in La Cousine Bette (Cousin Bette, 1846). She was married throughout most of their acquaintance, but after her husband passed away in 1841, Balzac spent increasing amounts of time in her company. Already in poor health, he eventually married her and brought her back to Paris in the spring of 1850, only five months before his death in August, when his excesses got the better of him and he died, reportedly of caffeine poisoning.

Other Works by Honoré de Balzac

The Girl with the Golden Eyes. Translated by Carol Cosman. New York: Carroll and Graf, 1998.

The Unknown Masterpiece; and, Gambara. Translated by Richard Howard. New York: New York Review of Books, 2001.

Works about Honoré de Balzac

Graham, Robb. Balzac: A Biography. New York: Norton, 1994.

Kanes, Martin. Père Goriot: Anatomy of a Troubled World. Boston: Twayne, 1993.

Kanes, Martin, ed. Critical Essays on Honoré de Balzac. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1990.

Barbey d'Aureville, Jules-Amédée (1808–1889) novelist

Jules-Amédée Barbey d'Aureville was born in Saint-Sauveur-le-Vicomte on November 2 into an aristocratic family, was well educated, and was accustomed to privilege. In 1833, he moved to Paris, where he had numerous love affairs and led the unprincipled life of a "dandy," supporting his activities through journalism. In 1841, he converted to strict Catholicism and eventually became, as would be apparent in his novels, a strong Christian moralist.

Barbey d'Aureilly wrote numerous works of criticism and articles, but it was his novels that brought him acclaim. He was influenced by BALZAC and greatly admired BAUDELAIRE. As well as harshly criticizing NATURALISM, his novels and stories are notable for their highly moralistic but sadistic portrayals of the struggles and tragedies associated with life in the provinces of France.

Barbey d'Aureilly is perhaps best known for his work Les Diaboliques (1874; The Diabolic Ones, 1925), a collection of six stories, all having some basis in fact and all carrying a similar satanic motif. This shocking work achieved great success both critically and popularly. He died in Paris, 15 years after its publication, at the age of 81.

Another Work by Jules Barbey d'Aureilly

Dandyism. Translated by Douglas Ainsley. New York: PAJ Publications, 1988.

Works about Jules Barbey d'Aureilly

Chartier, Armand B. Barbey d'Aureilly. Boston: Twayne, 1977.

Eisenberg, Davina L. The Figure of the Dandy in Barbey D'Aureilly's "Le Bonheur Dans Le Crime". New York: Peter Lang, 1996.

Baroja y Nessi, Pío (1872–1956) novelist

Pío Baroja y Nessi was born in San Sebastian, Spain. His father was a mining engineer, and the family moved frequently during his childhood, relocating from town to town, following his father's professional career. Baroja y Nessi studied to be a doctor, and when he graduated from school, he began a medical practice in the town of Cestona in northern Spain. The medical profession did not suit him. His practice was a disaster; after a short time, he gave it up and moved to Madrid, a cosmopolitan city, where he ran a bakery that was owned by his aunt.

It was at this time that he began to publish his novels. He was successful as an author and quickly gave up the management of the bakery to write full time.

Baroja y Nessi was a member of the GENERATION OF 1898. He shared with the other writers of the Generation of '98 a strong sense of Spanish nationalism and a need to reform society. However, Baroja y Nessi was particularly individualistic. As a youth, he had briefly been an anarchist but found even this ideology too constraining. Because of an aversion to any societal structure that limited his freedom, he never married. This individualism was the main theme of his novels.

In his trilogy The Struggle for Life (1903–04), Baroja y Nessi depicts the slums of Madrid and a collection of characters who, by living outside the norms of society, manage to achieve personal freedom. Though the books are distinctly melancholy and terse, written in what critics call Baroja y Nessi's gray style, they are optimistic in that some of the characters do achieve a degree of freedom by opposing society. In later novels, such as The Tree of Knowledge (1911), Baroja y Nessi depicts the same scenario but in a more pessimistic manner. At the end, the protagonist is unable to realize his goal of personal freedom and is crushed by society.

Baroja y Nessi was a formal innovator. He did not believe in the "closed" novel, the standard model of the 19th century, because he felt its carefully planned plot, structure, and resolution of every conflict did not accurately reflect reality. Instead he wrote in a style of apparent aimlessness. For example, he creates scenes in which suspense is carefully built but never resolved. His stark tone and innovative structure had a great effect on many 20th-century writers, most notably Ernest Hemingway.

Baroja y Nessi is one of the greatest Spanish novelists of the early 20th century. His work, along with that of the other members of the Generation of '98, revitalized Spanish literature. His influence on later Spanish writers is widespread, but it can be particularly seen in the works of Camilo José CELA. His innovative style, as well as his theme of the struggle of the individual in modern society, has secured his place among other great writers of world literature.

Another Work by Pío Baroja y Nessi

The Restlessness of Shanti Andia and Other Writings.

Translated by Anthony Corrigan. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1959.

A Work about Pío Baroja y Nessi

Patt, Beatrice P. Pío Baroja y Nessi. Boston: Twayne, 1971.

Bastida, Gustavo Adolfo Dominguez

See BÉQUER, GUSTAVO ADOLFO.

Bataille, Georges (1897–1962) novelist, essayist

Often called the “metaphysician of evil” because of his interests in sex, death, and the obscene, Georges Bataille was born in Billon, Puy-de-Dôme, France. His childhood was difficult because his mother repeatedly attempted suicide, and his father, whom Bataille dearly loved, became both blind and paralyzed as a result of syphilis before he died.

Bataille converted to Catholicism just prior to World War I and served in the army from 1916 to 1917. Troubled by poor health throughout his life as well as by recurring periods of depression, he was discharged from the army as a result of tuberculosis. He joined a seminary, thinking of becoming a priest, and spent time with a Benedictine congregation, but he soon experienced a profound loss of faith. He continued his education at the École des Chartres, writing his thesis in 1922 on 13th-century verse.

Bataille aligned himself early on with surrealism, but he considered himself to be the “enemy from within.” André BRETON officially excommunicated Bataille from the movement. After a period of psychoanalysis, Bataille began to write. He founded several journals and was the first to publish innovative thinkers such as Barthes, Foucault, and Derrida.

Bataille rejected the traditional, believing that all artistic and intellectual pursuits should ultimately focus on the violent annihilation of the rational individual. His work was greatly influenced by both Friedrich NIETZSCHE and Gilles de Rais, a 15th-century serial killer. All of Bataille’s writings deal with violence and sexuality. His best known erotic works are The Story of the Eye (1928), Blue of Noon (1945), and The Abbot C. (1950). Bataille believed pornography was a means of understanding the relation between life and death. The Story of the Eye, which he wrote under the pseudonym Lord Auch, for example, is the story of a young couple who test the boundaries of sexual taboos, escalating to extreme playing out of sexual fantasies. The novel quickly gained and still maintains a cult status decades after Bataille’s death in Paris on July 8.

Other Works by Georges Bataille

Eroticism: Death and Sensuality. Translated by Mary Dalwood. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1991.

The Unfinished System of Nonknowledge. Translated by Michelle Kendall and Stuart Kendall. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001.

Works about Georges Bataille

Champagne, Roland A. Georges Bataille. Boston: Twayne, 1998.

Surya, Michel. Georges Bataille: An Intellectual Biography. Translated by Krzysztof Kijalkowski and Michael Richardson. New York: Verso, 2002.

Baudelaire, Charles (1821–1867) poet, critic

Considered one of the greatest 19th-century French poets, Charles-Pierre Baudelaire was born on April 9. He was the son of Joseph-François Baudelaire and Caroline Archimbaut Dufays. His father had been an ordained priest who left the ministry during the French Revolution to work as a tutor for the duc of Choiseul-Praslin’s children. During this time, he met a number of influential people and amassed a small financial fortune. A modestly talented poet and painter, he taught his son an early appreciation for art.

Considered by many to be a revolutionary even in his own time, Baudelaire was often given to depression and cynicism. His father died when Baudelaire was only six years old. For a short time, he received a great deal of attention from both his mother and his nurse, Mariette, until his mother's remarriage, this time to a man much closer to her own age, Major Jacques Aupick. Aupick was an intelligent and self-disciplined man who served as a military general, an ambassador, and ultimately as a senator. Baudelaire's relationship with his stepfather was not a good one, although he did not reveal his dislike of the man until later in life, at which point he attributed much of his depression and dual personalities to his mother's remarriage.

In 1833, the family moved to Lyons, and Aupick enrolled Baudelaire in a strict military boarding school. The influence of the education and discipline he received there had a great impact on his outlook on life; it also increased his dislike for his stepfather. He continued his education at Louis-le-Grand, a respected French high school in Paris. His growing behavior problems led to his expulsion in 1839. It was at this point that he announced his decision to become a writer. To appease his family, he also agreed to study law at the École de Droit, but his attention was never focused on his studies. He led a bohemian life, going deeply into debt and becoming an increasingly radical thinker. During these years, he also made his first contacts in the literary world and discovered the use of hashish and opium.

In 1841, hoping to encourage him to change his way of life, Baudelaire's parents sent him by boat on a trip to India. Throughout the voyage, he remained depressed and sullen; therefore, when the ship was forced to stop for repairs after a terrible storm, he decided to return to France. Although he did not enjoy the journey, it did have a strong influence on his writing by giving him a unique perspective on the world that few other writers of his time could claim. On his return, he collected a large inheritance that allowed him to immerse himself in art and literature, paying particular attention to the satanic-based and horror literature that was popular at the time. However, in only two years, he had spent almost half of his money. He was placed by his family under a legal guardianship and was forced to live on a controlled income for the duration of his life.

A series of amorous affairs provided much of the impetus for Baudelaire's erotic poetry. The Martinican Jeanne Duval, whom Baudelaire met in 1842, held perhaps the greatest influence. Her exotic black hair provided the erotic imagery for his poem "La Chevelure" ("The Head of Hair"). A dark-haired, dark-skinned beauty, she was referred to quite derogatorily by Baudelaire's mother as the "Black Venus." Marie Daubrun, an actress and his mistress from 1855 to 1860, as well as Apollonie Sabatier, who presided over a salon for artists and writers, were also the objects of Baudelaire's poetic and as well as romantic attentions.

In 1845, Baudelaire's depression caused him to unsuccessfully attempt suicide. Soon after, he published La Fanfarlo (1847), an autobiographical novella that anticipated his experimentation with prose poetry. In 1848, French workers against social injustice minimally involved him in the revolution: He fired a few shots through the barricades and worked on radical political publications.

Baudelaire turned to literary and art criticism, for which he became well respected. His admiration for Delacroix and Constantin Guys influenced his own modern aesthetics. He translated Edgar Allan Poe's works into French, publishing five volumes of these translations from 1856 to 1865. He became greatly influenced by the dark melancholic brooding nature of Poe's works and began to incorporate the ideas into his own writing. He was particularly interested in the transformation of life in the modern city.

Critical Analysis

The first edition of Baudelaire's collected poems, Les Fleurs du mal (Flowers of Evil) was published in 1857. Focusing on erotic, satanic and often lesbian themes, the work was not well received by the public. Scathing reviews of the work published in literary journals had a profoundly negative effect on Baudelaire's writing career, and both he and the publisher were ultimately prosecuted and heavily fined for offending public morality. Six poems from the collection were expressly banned as too radical for public consumption.

Baudelaire became more depressed as a result of this seeming failure and, after the death of his stepfather, he returned in 1859 to live once again with his mother. He wrote 35 new poems for the second edition of Les Fleurs du mal (1861), including one of his best-known poems, "Le Voyage," first published in 1857. He also published a book of essays on the use of drugs, Les Paradis artificiels (Artificial Paradises, 1860). He had often used opium and hashish as a means of inspiring creativity. He began to become convinced, however, of the dangers inherent in this habit.

Baudelaire's life, however, was plagued by tragedies. He was financially unable to assist his publisher, who had been jailed for debt from the first edition of Baudelaire's poems, and he learned that his mistress Jeanne Duval had been living with another man. He also began to experience severe headaches and suffered from nightmares, most probably as a result of syphilis, which caused him to think he was becoming insane. He moved to Brussels in 1863, hoping to find a new publisher, but his health steadily declined until a series of strokes left him partially paralyzed. He returned once again to Paris, where he died in his mother's arms on August 31.

Baudelaire's works, including his critical essays Curiosités esthétiques (Aesthetic Curiosities, 1868) and his collections of prose poems Les Petits poèmes en prose (Little Prose Poems, 1868) and l'Art romantique (Romantic Art, 1869) were major influences on the symbolist and modernist movements (see MODERNISM). Through his use of irony and his depiction of the scenes of modern life, he transformed poetic language, and his criticism founded an aesthetics of modernism.

Another Work by Charles Baudelaire

Baudelaire: Poems. Translated by Laurence Lerner. London: J. M. Dent, 1999.

Works about Charles Baudelaire

Benjamin, Walter. Charles Baudelaire: A Lyric Poet in the Era of High Capitalism. Translated by Harry Zohn. London: New Left Books, 1973.

Hyslop, Lois Boe. Charles Baudelaire Revisited. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1992.

Richardson, Joanna. Baudelaire. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994.

Beauchamp, Katherine Mansfield

See MANSFIELD, KATHERINE.

Beauvoir, Simone de (Simone Lucie-Ernestine-Marie-Bertrand de Beauvoir) (1908–1986) novelist, essayist

Simone de Beauvoir was born in Paris, France, on January 9. A leading feminist and existentialist (see EXISTENTIALISM), her works bear a clear resemblance to those of her lifelong friend, mentor, colleague, and lover Jean Paul SARTRE. Best known for her two-volume work The Second Sex (1949), a work in which de Beauvoir calls for the abolition of the myth of the "eternal feminine," she is considered by many scholars working in the field of cultural studies to be the primary voice for early feminist studies. This work quickly became a classic among feminist theorists and scholars and is considered to be the founding text of gender studies.

De Beauvoir's life history is well known, largely as a result of the publication of numerous autobiographical works such as Memoirs of a Dutiful Daughter (1958), The Prime of Life (1960), Force of Circumstance (1963), and All Said and Done (1972). In these texts, she also documents the life of Sartre, Albert CAMUS, and other influential philosophers, novelists, and intellectuals from the 1930s to the 1970s.

Educated first at private schools and then at the Sorbonne, where she received a degree in philosophy and first became acquainted with Sartre, de Beauvoir pursued a career as a teacher after receiving her degree. She left this occupation to become a full-time writer in 1943, the same year that she published her first novel, She Came to Stay (1943), which explores existential themes by examining the ways in which a relationship between two people is destroyed as a result of a guest, a young girl, who stays for an extended period of time in a young couple's home. Although purportedly fictional, this work was based largely on de Beauvoir's own relationship with Sartre and Olga Kosakiewicz, a former student, who came to stay with them in occupied Paris during the war. Her presence created many difficulties for Sartre and de Beauvoir within their own relationship, but it gave de Beauvoir much inspiration in her work.

Critical Analysis

Although intellectual and existential issues are a concern of all de Beauvoir's works, she is best known for her application of existentialism to an understanding of the oppression of women. In The Second Sex she makes known her firm belief that an individual's choices must be made on the basis of equality between the male and female, not on the basis of any essential differentiation between the sexes. The importance of choice—free will—is also a prevalent theme in many of de Beauvoir's other works. Her Ethics of Ambiguity (1947) is devoted largely to the study of individual choices and the resultant anxieties associated with the ramifications of those choices, an underlying theme of existentialism.

In addition to feminist issues and free will, de Beauvoir was also interested in the theme of aging. She first covers this topic in A Very Easy Death (1964), in which she addresses the issue of her own mother's death. She returns to this theme again in Old Age (1970), a work that details the indifference and lack of respect that the elderly receive from society.

Political activism is another theme in de Beauvoir's writings, particularly those works written after World War II when she and Sartre both worked on a leftist journal. She published two novels, The Blood of Others (1945), exploring the life of members of the wartime resistance to the Nazi occupation, as well as The Mandarins (1954), which describes the struggles faced by middle-class intellectuals as they attempt to enter into the sphere of political activism. Her political views tended increasingly toward the left, and by the 1950s, she was defending communism and criticizing U.S. and Western European capitalism regularly in her works. This attitude becomes even clearer after de Beauvoir visited the United States and, on returning to France, published her observations. Her America Day by Day (1948) is a critique of the social problems caused by capitalism in the United States. While there, she also fell in love with fellow writer Nelson Algren, complicating her existing love affair with Sartre. Elements of The Mandarins reflect this new development in her life.

De Beauvoir's final years were marked by Sartre's death and her attempts to write about the nature of their relationship, the end result of which she eventually published in Adieux: A Farewell to Sartre (1981). It was her desire to remain as honest and true as possible in her examination of their life together. To the critics and to members of Sartre's family, however, it seemed as if she was attacking the late philosopher.

De Beauvoir passed away on April 14. After her death, several additional works were published, including Letters to Sartre (1990), Journal of a Resistance Fighter (1990), and, in 1997, her passionate Letters to Algren. Most important, The Second Sex is still considered a primary text for feminist studies.

Other Works by Simone de Beauvoir

All Men Are Mortal. Translated by Euan Cameron. London: Virago, 1995.

When Things of the Spirit Come First: Five Early Tales. Translated by Patrick O'Brian. New York: Pantheon Books, 1982.

Works about Simone de Beauvoir

Bauer, Nancy. Simone de Beauvoir, Philosophy and Feminism. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.

Pilardi, Jo-Ann. Simone de Beauvoir Writing the Self: Philosophy Becomes Autobiography. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1999.

Scholz, Sally. On de Beauvoir. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth/Thomson Learning, 2000.

Simons, Margaret A. Beauvoir and "The Second Sex": Feminism, Race and the Origins of Existentialism. Boston: Lanham, Rowman and Littlefield Publishers, 1999.

Becher, Johannes Robert (1891–1958)

poet, novelist

Johannes Robert Becher was born into an upper-middle-class Catholic family in Munich, Germany. His father was a high-ranking Bavarian judge. Although Becher studied philosophy and medicine, he favored poetry as the creative outlet for his political views. His early poems were radical and rooted in EXPRESSIONISM. He published his first collection of verse in 1914. During World War I, Becher refused to join the German military and became a pacifist. He joined the left-wing Spartacus League in 1918 and the German Communist Party in 1919.

Becher emerged as a leader among German communists and radical writers in the 1920s. The literary historian Adolf D. Klarmann noted that, at this time, Becher wrote revolutionary poetry that “literally bursts and scatters the traditional shackles of sentence, logic, and grammatical structure.” Becher served as a deputy to the Reichstag (German legislature) in 1925 and became head of the League of Proletarian–Revolutionary Writers in 1928. His book of poetry Der Leichnam auf dem Thron (The Corpse on the Throne, 1925) and his novel Levisite oder der einzig gerechte Krieg (The Only Just War, 1926) led to accusations of treason against the German government. The rise of the Nazis to power in 1933 made Germany too dangerous for left-wing writers like Becher. He fled the country and eventually settled in Moscow.

After the defeat of Nazi Germany in 1945, Becher moved to Communist East Berlin. He soon became president of the East German Academy of Arts. He won several awards for his works, including the Lenin Peace Prize in 1952. Becher’s poem “Auferstanden aus Ruinen” (“Risen from the Ruins”, 1949) was used as the text for his country’s national anthem. In 1954, Becher was appointed cultural minister of East Germany. His support for modernist authors, such as Bertolt BRECHT, created tension with his government, which officially favored SOCIALIST REALISM. Becher’s efforts to promote cooperation with noncommunist German intellectuals earned him a reprimand from his party. He had already lost much of his political power when he died in 1958.

Another Work by Johannes Robert Becher

Farewell. Translated by Joan Becker. Berlin: Seven Seas Publishers, 1970.

A Work about Johannes Robert Becher

Haase, Horst. Johannes R. Becher, Leben and Werk. West Berlin: Das Europäische buch, 1981.

Beckett, Samuel (1906–1989) playwright, novelist, poet

Samuel Beckett was born on April 13 in Dublin, Ireland. He was educated at Earlsfort House in Dublin and later in Enniskillen at Portora Royal School, the alma mater of writer Oscar Wilde. Although Beckett came from an Anglo-Irish Protestant family, he wrote most of his work in French. He received a degree from Trinity College in Dublin in Romance languages. During this time, he also began to enjoy the vibrant theater scene that was emerging in a postindependence Ireland. He was particularly influenced by the plays of J. M. Synge, the arrival of American silent movies, and the vaudeville antics of performers such as Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton, which he would later incorporate in his plays.

After graduation, Beckett spent two years, from 1928 to 1930, as an exchange lecturer in Paris. While there, he met and became lifelong friends with writer James Joyce. He acted as one of Joyce’s assistants while the author was working on Finnegan's Wake and, at the same time, began his own career as a writer. He published his first poem, "Whoroscope," which concerns time and the ideas of the philosopher René Descartes, in 1930. That same year, he returned to lecture at Trinity College and began to work on a series of stories about the life of a Dublin intellectual that later formed the collection More Pricks Than Kicks (1934). After only four terms at Trinity, Beckett left to pursue a career as a freelance writer, traveling throughout Europe and finally settling in Paris, which was to be his primary home for the rest of his life. He also began work on his first novel, Dream of Fair to Middling Women (1932), which was highly autobiographical.

Beckett was seriously injured one night when, as he was walking home, he was stabbed. It was during his hospitalization and recuperation that he cemented his friendship with Joyce, who became his caretaker. He also began a long-term association with Suzanne Deschevaux-Dusmesnil, whom he married in 1961. In 1941, when Paris was invaded, Deschevaux-Dusmesnil joined the resistance with Beckett and they narrowly escaped the arrival of the Gestapo at their apartment. Fleeing to a small town in the south of France, Beckett worked on a farm in exchange for living quarters and continued his writing. After the defeat of the Germans in 1945, he returned to Paris and, at this point, made the decision to write all of his works in French.

Critical Analysis

Taken as a whole, Beckett's works attempt to reduce basic existential problems to a minimalist structure where only the most essential elements are considered. His concerns are commonplace in that they reflect the shared worries of society as a whole, but they are never simple. He ponders such large-scale issues as the nature of life itself, the question of time and its relevance, the concept of eternity, and the sense of isolation, alienation, and loneliness of the individual self.

Beckett's early works are composed of a series of internal monologues: Molloy (1951; translated 1955), Malone Meurt (1951; translated as Malone Dies, 1956), and L'Innomable (1953; translated as The Unnameable, 1958). These pieces reflect one of the many paradoxes Beckett explores: the dilemma associated with the fact that the self can never truly know itself. The act of self-observation leads to a split in which the self becomes two individual entities: the observer and the observed. The self is only able to perceive itself through narration, a monologue. This same theme is returned to later in his essentially two-character play, Fin de partie (Endgame, 1958).

Best known as a playwright, Beckett's major dramatic works, all considered pioneering plays in the emerging tradition of the THEATRE OF THE ABSURD, are En attendant Godot (Waiting for Godot, 1952), Endgame, Krapp's Last Tape (1959), Happy Days (1961), Play (1964), Not I (1973), That Time (1976), and Footfalls (1976). Beckett also wrote a series of radio and television dramas, as well as adaptations of his stage works for film.

Beckett is best known for the play Waiting for Godot, an absurdist piece that was first performed on January 5, 1953, in Paris. Two derelict-looking characters, Vladimir and Estragon, sit by the side of a road throughout the two acts, waiting for the mysterious Godot, who never appears (is he to be identified with God? Critics do not agree), and aimlessly discuss possible action. Each of the two acts ends with the same words, except that the roles are reversed. This is the end of Act II:

VLADIMIR: Well, shall we go?

ESTRAGON: Yes, let's go.

They do not move.

The play won worldwide acclaim and was followed by a series of critical successes of plays and novels, some of which he had written much earlier in his life.

Beckett's novels and short stories, such as Murphy (1938; translated 1957); Watt (1953), which was his last novel initially written in English; and Texts for Nothing (1955; translated 1967), also examine the self trapped and isolated in its quest for understanding of identity. The situations are often grotesque, and the overall tone is one of anguish and suffering, lightened by gallows humor.

In 1969, Beckett was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature. He continued to write and to be involved in literary and dramatic projects, publishing his last major work Stirrings Still in 1986. Emphysema forced his hospitalization, and, bedridden, he wrote his last poem, “What Is the Word.” Shortly after, his declining health kept him from writing and forced him into a nursing home, where he remained until his death on December 22. Death, however, was not the end of Beckett’s publishing career. His first play, the previously unpublished Eleutheria (1947), which depicts the author’s search for freedom through the character of a young man, was rediscovered and published in English translation in 1995, six years after his death. Beckett had not allowed the play to be printed during his lifetime because he considered it to be a failure. Its publication was the result of a long dispute between Beckett’s American publisher and close friend, Barney Rosset, and his family and his French publisher. Critically, this work is of great importance because it shows the beginnings of the ideas that would define Beckett’s works and predates, as well as predicts, the beginnings of the Theater of the Absurd movement.

Other Works by Samuel Beckett

Gontarski, S. E., ed. The Theatrical Notebooks of Samuel Beckett, Volume 4: The Shorter Plays. New York: Grove Press, 1999.

Nohow On: Company, Ill Seen Ill Said, Worstward Ho: Three Novels. Introduction by S. E. Gontarski. New York: Grove Press, 1996.

Works about Samuel Beckett

Bair, Dierdre. Samuel Beckett: A Biography. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1978.

Cronin, Anthony. Samuel Beckett: The Last Modernist. London: HarperCollins, 1996.

Gordon, Lois. The World of Samuel Beckett. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996.

Knowlson, James. Damned to Fame: The Life of Samuel Beckett. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.

Bécquer, Gustavo Adolfo (Gustavo Adolfo Dominguez Bastida)

(1836–1870) poet, prose writer

Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer was born in Seville, Spain. The son of José Dominguez Bécquer, a somewhat successful painter, Bécquer was orphaned at the age of 11. Apprenticed to be a painter, as was his brother, he eventually gave up the art when his uncle informed him that he had no talent and would be better off as a writer. His brother continued to paint and, although Bécquer turned to writing, he remained deeply interested in visual art throughout his life. One of his major literary innovations was the way he used striking visual descriptions.

For most of his adulthood, Bécquer lived hand-to-mouth in Madrid, publishing his poems and short stories in small journals and magazines. Toward the end of his life, he was given a government position as a censor, which helped improve his quality of living. By this time, he had contracted tuberculosis.

Most of Bécquer’s work was never published in book form during his life, only in periodicals. After his death, his friends collected his published and unpublished manuscripts and put out a two-volume book simply titled Works (1871). It was only then that, for the first time, Bécquer received critical acclaim.

Bécquer’s works can be divided into three major components. The poems or Rimas (Rhymes, 1860–61), the short stories or Leyendas (Legends, 1864), and a series of autobiographical literary essays, Cartas desde mi Celda (Letters from My Cell), which he wrote while convalescing at the monastery of Veruela in 1864.

Bécquer called his poems Rhymes to indicate his break with earlier traditions of Spanish verse and to show his poems’ relationship to folk ballads. His simple but very visual language gives the impression that he is expressing true emotions and getting to the essence of things. He has been compared to the GERMAN ROMANTIC poet HEINE, although the two writers were probably not familiar with each other’s work.

His Legends are rich with magical imagery and descriptions of nature and the supernatural. Frequently they take the form of fables and have morals at the end. In his Legends, Bécquer is exploring a typical romantic tendency to bring folklore and popular stories into the realm of high art.

Finally, Letters From My Cell is a collection of essays in which Bécquer explores his moral, artistic, and spiritual beliefs. Written as he was approaching death, they serve as a kind of psychic autobiography.

Bécquer, underappreciated during his life, went on to become one of the most influential Spanish poets of the 19th century. He was the central figure of Spanish ROMANTICISM. The great Latin American poet Ruben DARIO openly acknowledged Bécquer's powerful effect on him. Bécquer died at age 34 from tuberculosis, never knowing the lasting influence his work would have.

See also COSTUMBRISMO.

Another Work by Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer

Legends and Letters. Translated by Robert M. Fe-dorcheck. Cranbury, N.J.: Bucknell University Press, 1995.

A Work about Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer

Bynum, Brant B. The Romantic Imagination in the Works of Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, Department of Romance Languages, 1993.

Bei Dao (Zhao Zhenkai) (1949–) poet, novelist

Bei Dao was born in Beijing, China, and received a good education until the Cultural Revolution, when the Communist Chinese government sent intellectuals to the countryside to be “reeducated” with revolutionary ideas. Bei Dao was assigned to labor in a construction company outside of Beijing and wrote poetry in his spare time.

He adopted the pen name Bei Dao, which means “north island,” and began to write poetry and short stories. In 1979, he published the short novel Waves, in China's first underground literary journal, Today, which he cofounded in 1978. The novel was characterized as modern because it interweaves five separate narrative voices to create a subjective point of view.

Bei Dao is best known for his political poems, such as “The Answer” and “Declaration,” in which he addresses the oppressiveness of the government regime, using thinly veiled, nihilistic language. Bei Dao's poetry was also criticized for its Western roots, impenetrable and sparse language, and confusing metaphors. One critic dubbed it “misty” in the 1980s, when Communist Party leadership and traditional voices in the literary community took modernism to task. Today was shut down in 1980; during a 1983 campaign to wipe out literary “pollution” by modernist and avant-garde writers, Bei Dao and the Today poets were among the first denounced. Many poets were suspended from their official jobs, and their poetry banned from publication.

The Communist Party just as quickly revised its thinking on modernism, however, and Bei Dao and his colleagues were rerecognized by the party in 1985. Bei Dao even participated in the Beijing Writers Association, and some of his poems were published in state-sponsored magazines that year, including “The Answer.”

Bei Dao continued to write against the mainstream, both in a literary and a political sense. When the prodemocracy movement gained momentum in 1989, he was a leader and activist. Quotations from his poems were chanted and posted at Tiananmen Square. Shortly afterward, he went into exile in Sweden.

Bei Dao currently lives in Davis, California. His works are widely translated, many in English, including The August Sleepwalker (1990), Old Snow (1991), and Forms of Distance (1995).

A Work about Bei Dao

Gleichmann, Gabi. “An Interview with Bei Dao.” Translated and edited by Michelle Yeh. In Modern Chinese Literature 9 (1996): 387–93.

Bely, Andrey (Boris Nikolayevich Bugaev) (1880–1934) novelist, poet

The only child of Nikolai Vasilevich Bugaev, a Moscow University mathematician, and Aleksandra Dmitrivna Egorova, a musician, Andrey Bely was born in Moscow, Russia. Bely's parents had different attitudes about the relative importance of natural sciences and the arts, and he was constantly caught in their conflict. Aiming to please his father, Bely successfully pursued a degree in natural sciences at Moscow University and graduated in 1903.

Bely began to write poetry as a university student. The main support for his initial efforts came from Mikhail Solovyov, the Bugaevs' neighbor and a younger brother of the famous Russian philosopher Vladimir Solovyov. Solovyov provided financial support for Bely's first published collection of poems, Second Symphony, in 1902 and suggested the pseudonym Andrey Bely. After the death of his father in 1903, Bely decided to abandon science and devote himself to writing.

Between 1903 and 1910, Bely wrote for Vesy, a major journal of the symbolist movement. In his articles, Bely desperately attempted to define and synthesize some kind of philosophy of SYMBOLISM. Bely wrote more than 200 articles, reviews, and essays during this period, as well as another two volumes of Symphonies.

In 1905, Bely left Russia and traveled to Munich and Paris, where he was befriended by Jean Jaurès, the famous socialist leader. When he returned to Russia, Bely established a relationship with Asya Turgeneva, who was to be his lover for many years, and in 1910, they went abroad together. They were drawn to Rudolf Steiner's mystical philosophy, anthroposophy. From 1914 to 1916, when Bely was recalled by the Russian government for military duty, the couple were with Steiner in Switzerland.

Although Bely firmly established himself as a poet, he is mostly known for his prose. In Petersburg (1913), Bely explores the social and political turmoil of the Russian Revolution of 1905. The novel centers on a plot to deliver a bomb to a high government official. It is a commentary on family, the role of the individual, and spiritualism.

In the Joycean autobiographical novel Kotik Letayev (1922), Bely incorporates the story of his own childhood, exploring emotional conflicts between parents and the delicate psyche of a child. Bely's intricate prose brilliantly captures intensity of time, translating the sensory experiences into intriguing and powerful works of fiction.

Bely broke with both Steiner and Turgeneva in 1921 and lived in Moscow from 1923 until his death, producing three more novels and three volumes of memoirs.

Most critics today agree on the literary genius and immense impact of Bely's work. Vladimir Nabokov (quoted in Malmstad and Maguire's introduction to their translation of Petersburg) ranked Petersburg with James Joyce's Ulysses, Franz KAFKA's The Castle, and Marcel PROUST's In Search of Lost Time, as one of the great books of the 20th century.

Other Works by Andrey Bely

Kotik Letayev. Translated by Gerald J. Janacek. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1999.
Petersburg. Translated by Robert A. Maguire and John E. Malmstad. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1978.

Works about Andrey Bely

Janacek, Gerald. Andrey Bely: A Critical Review. Lexington: Kentucky University Press, 1978.
 Keys, Roger. The Reluctant Modernist: Andrey Belyi and the Development of Russian Fiction. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996.

Benn, Gottfried (Kurt Wolff) (1886–1956) poet, novelist, playwright

Gottfried Benn was born in the German village of Mansfield. His father was a Lutheran minister and his mother was a French-speaking native of Switzerland. Benn attended the Gymnasium at Frankfurt an der Oder. He studied theology and philosophy at the University of Marbach and in 1905 was accepted at Kaiser Wilhelm Akademie, a prominent military medical school. He earned his doctorate in 1912 and married actress Edith Brosin two years later.

Benn had a private practice in Berlin specializing in skin diseases and served in the German army's medical corps in both world wars. He performed numerous autopsies in his career and frequently wrote about morgues in his early poetry. Benn's scientific background instilled a skepticism and self-criticism that often appeared in his literary work.

Benn published five books of poetry between 1910 and 1925. He also wrote a series of works called the "Rönne novellas," which earned critical praise for demonstrating the concept of "absolute prose." In this unique style, Benn replaced a descriptive, psychologically oriented narrative with a blend of associative and visionary elements. In the 1930s, Benn briefly embraced the Nazis before becoming disillusioned with their barbarism. His popularity increased after World War II with the publication of Statische Gedichte (Static Poems, 1948), a volume of apolitical modernist poems. In 1951, Benn received the Georg Bücher Prize, one of Germany's most prestigious literary awards. At the age of 67, he finally earned enough money from his writing career to quit his medical practice.

Benn's influences included Friedrich NIETZSCHE and his friend Else LASKER-SCHÜLER, the expressionist poet. Benn's poetry is melancholy and elegiac, conveying cultural despair. His writings were both praised and denounced for challenging established German literary traditions. Critics are also divided on his significance: Edgar Lohner described Benn as "one of the foremost modern European lyric poets," while Michael Hamburger concluded that "Benn was too restricted in tone to be described as a major writer" in Gottfried Benn: The Unreconstructed Expressionist by J. M. Ritchie. As an embodiment of the contradictions of literary modernism, Benn will likely remain a debated German literary figure.

Another Work by Gottfried Benn

Prose, Essays, Poems. Edited by Volkmar Sander. New York: Continuum, 1987.

A Work about Gottfried Benn

Ritchie, J. M. Gottfried Benn: The Unreconstructed Expressionist. London: Oswald Wolff, 1972.

Bennett, Louise (Louise Bennett-Coverley, Miss Lou, Mrs. Eric Coverley) (1919–) poet, folklorist

Louise Bennett was born in Kingston, Jamaica, to Augustus Cornelius Bennett, a bakery owner, and Kerene Robinson, a dressmaker. English poetry influenced the writing she did as a schoolgirl; she wrote poems in standard English until she overheard a country woman on a Kingston tramcar and wrote the first of many poems in Jamaican dialect. Bennett published her first collection of poems, (Jamaica) Dialect Verses (1942), in her early twenties.

Bennett primarily writes in Jamaican dialect about Jamaican people's "now" experiences. One speaker usually uses literary techniques—such as allusions to Jamaican folksongs, the Bible, and English literature—and oral performance techniques—such as rhetorical lists—to address an audience. In a 1968 interview with Dennis Scott, Bennett said that people thought of her "as a performing artist primarily" but added, "I did start to write before I started to perform," and "I felt I wanted to put on paper some of the wonderful things that people say in dialect." Jamaica Labrish (1966), her most substantial collection of poems, shows Bennett as performer, poet, and social commentator.

Bennett's work as a journalist, actress, folk singer, radio- and television-show host, and drama and folklore lecturer helped generate a large audience for her poetry. But her poetry did not start to receive critical acceptance until the late 1960s. Many distinguished awards followed, and in "Proverb as Metaphor in the Poetry of Louise Bennett" (1984), Carolyn Cooper called Bennett "the quintessential Jamaican example of the sensitive and competent Caribbean artist consciously incorporating features of traditional oral art into written literature."

Other Works by Louise Bennett

Anancy and Miss Lou. Kingston: Sangster's Book Stores, 1966.

Collected Poems. Kingston: Sangster's Book Stores, 1982.

Jamaican Humour in Dialect. Kingston: Jamaica Press Association, 1943.

Laugh with Louise. Kingston: City Printery, 1961.

Miss Lula Sez. Kingston: Gleaner, 1949.

Works about Louise Bennett

Cooper, Carolyn. "Noh Lickle Twang: An Introduction to the Poetry of Louise Bennett." World Literature Written in English vol. 17 (April 1978).

———. Noises in the Blood: Orality, Gender and the "Vulgar" Body of Jamaican Popular Culture. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1995.

Erwin, Lee. "Two Jamaican Women Writers and the Uses of Creole." In A. L. McLeod, ed., Commonwealth and American Women's Discourse: Essays in Criticism. New Delhi: Sterling, 1996.

Bernhard, Thomas (1931–1989) playwright, novelist

Thomas Bernhard was born in Heerlen, Netherlands, to Hertha Bernhard. He moved with his mother to Austria at age four; Thomas never met his father, an Austrian carpenter. Hertha's father, Johannes Freumbichler, a novelist, was one of Thomas's earliest influences. Bernhard grew up in poverty and did poorly in school, eventually dropping out at age 15. He studied voice at this time and hoped to start a career in music; however, pneumonia and tuberculosis nearly killed him a few years later. His grandfather and mother died while he struggled to recover from his own health problems. These experiences with death and illness created a pessimism that characterized Bernhard's literary work.

Bernhard studied music and drama in Vienna and Salzburg as a young adult. He published three books of poetry in the late 1950s but received little acclaim until he published his first novel, Frost (1963). His first drama Ein Fest Für Boris (A Party for Boris, 1968) premiered on stage in 1970. A tasteless farce about demented invalids who abuse each other, the play reflects Bernhard's vision of humanity's wretchedness. In the following two decades, Bernhard solidified his reputation as a novelist with works such as Korrektur (Correction, 1975), a novel about a man's increasing obsession with the manuscripts written by a brilliant mathematician friend who committed suicide. Bernhard also gained fame as a playwright for dramas such as Die Macht der Gewohnheit (The Force of Habit, 1976), a commentary about the empty rituals of high culture. He won numerous literary awards, including the Georg Büchner Prize (1970).

Bernhard was obsessed with insanity, death, and the wretchedness of the human condition. He sharply criticized the moral failures of Austria's history. His works stirred controversy in their attack on the complacency of German theater and their criticism of modern life. Despite his dark themes, Bernhard was illuminating in his use of language and, as literary scholar J. J. Long comments, "a writer of considerable diversity, who was profoundly concerned with both the problems and potential of storytelling."

Other Works by Thomas Bernhard

Gargoyles. Translated by Richard and Clara Winston. New York: Knopf, 1970.

The Force of Habit: A Comedy. Translated by Neville and Stephen Plaice. London: Heinemann, 1976.

A Work about Thomas Bernhard

Long, J. J. The Novels of Thomas Bernhard: Form and Its Function. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2001.

Bernstein, Ingrid

See KIRSCH, SARAH.

Bhatt, Sujata (1956–) poet, translator

Sujata Bhatt was born in Ahmedabad, India, and grew up in Pune in a large household with her extended family. Her paternal grandfather was a poet, and two of her uncles were famous Gujarati poets. Hearing their stories and listening to their poetry as a child, Bhatt was inspired to write. As a child, she was very proud that she could compose poetry in English, which her family could not do. Her father, a virologist, moved to America in 1968 with the family and wanted Bhatt to become a scientist, too. In school, she obediently took classes in science but slowly gained interest in philosophy, creative writing, and English literature.

Though Bhatt left India at an early age, her childhood years in Gujarat are constantly referred to in almost all her poetry. Written in English, her poetry unabashedly translates sounds of Gujarati words in play with English ones, creating a language-based tension and highlighting the contradictions inherent in translating concepts or ideas from one language to another. Works such as Brunizem (1988), however, display her agility in synthesizing the East with the West, a tribute to the positive rewards of a multicultural existence.

In an interview with PN Review, Bhatt said that she writes poetry to “break [the] historical silence” surrounding female sexuality, but she also brings out the sensual aspects of seemingly ordinary objects. Stinking Rose (1995) is a journey through the myth and history of garlic—its medicinal, herbal, and erotic uses in different cultures through the ages. Her studies in the sciences and her interest in visual arts add dimension to her imagery in matters of light, form, and texture. A Color for Solitude (2002) is said to be inspired by the self-portraits of the German painter Paula Modersohn-Becker (1876–1907) during her relationship with poets such as Rainer Maria RILKE.

Bhatt was briefly a professor of writing at the University of British Columbia, Canada, but left when she moved to Germany. She now works as a freelance writer and also translates other Gujarati poetry into English. Her collection Brunizem won the Commonwealth Poetry Prize (Asia), and in 1991, she won the Cholmondeley Award for Poetry (U.K.).

Other Works by Sujata Bhatt

Augatora. Manchester, U.K.: Carcanet Press, 2000.

Monkey Shadows. Manchester, U.K.: Carcanet Press, 1988.

A Work about Sujata Bhatt

Pandey, M. S. “The Trishanku Motif in the Poetry of Sujata Bhatt and Uma Parameswaran.” The Literature of the Indian Diaspora: Essays in Criticism.

Edited by A. L. McLeod. New Delhi: Sterling Publishers Private Ltd., 2000.

Bing Xin (Ping Hsin; Xie Wanying; Hsieh Wan-ying) (1900–1999) short-story writer, poet

Bing Xin, the daughter of a naval officer, was born on October 5 in Fuzhou, the capital of China’s Fujian province. She was raised in Chefoo in Shandong province and moved to Beijing in 1914 where she attended a Congregational missionary school. She then attended Yanjing University in Beijing. In 1919, during the May Fourth Movement against foreign imperialism, Bing Xin changed her major from medicine to literature, believing that writing fiction would have a positive social impact on Chinese society.

In 1923, she published Superman, a collection of short stories, and two poetry collections, The Stars and Waters of Spring. After these works received critical acclaim, Bing Xin traveled to Massachusetts, where she attended Wellesley College and began to write columns for children that were collected in Letters to My Little Readers (1926), which was published in China and was immensely popular. She received her master’s degree in 1926 and returned to Yanjing to teach literature. In 1929, she married Wu Wenzao, a sociologist, with whom she had three children. The family moved at the onset of the Sino-Japanese War to Kunming in 1937 and then to Chongqing in 1941.

Bing Xin’s short stories are widely known for their sentimental depictions of motherly love and family life. Some modernist critics have written that her work is old-fashioned and too traditional.

Nonetheless, most of her stories, such as “Loneliness” (1922), are well observed and address the dilemmas of life and love faced by younger Chinese women. In other stories, such as “Our Mistress’ Parlor” (1933), a sarcastic indictment of a shallow Shanghaiese woman, Bing Xin depicts different types of women.

In the 1950s and 1960s, Bing Xin focused on writing children’s literature and translating the Indian poet Rabindranath TAGORE. Like all artists, she was sent to Hubei for manual labor reeducation during the Cultural Revolution but was reinstated to the party in 1980. She continued to write articles and stories and to serve the party in a number of official positions until her death. Although she was often criticized for being overly traditional, her acutely observed stories of young womanhood earned her a reputation as one of China’s foremost women writers.

Other Works by Bing Xin

“Autobiographical Notes” and selected poems. In Special Section on Bing Xin, Renditions 16, no. 32 (Fall 1989).

Bingxin Shi Quan Pian = Bing Xin’s Complete Poems. Hangzhou: Zhejiang Wen Yi Chu Ban She, 1994.

A Work about Bing Xin

Cayley, John. “Birds and Stars: Tagore’s Influence on Bing Xin’s Early Poetry.” Renditions 16, no. 32 (Fall 1989).

Bitton, Erez (Erez Biton) (1942–) poet

Erez Bitton was born in Algeria. As a child, playing in an abandoned orchard, he discovered an old grenade. The explosion blinded him and cost him partial use of an arm. Ironically, it was this childhood accident that brought him to an institution for the blind where he received an education not previously available to him.

Bitton’s poetry often deals with people who are classified as “other” by a dominant culture, as can be seen in the poem “Summary of a Conversation.” As a Mizrahi, a Jew who emigrated to Israel from other parts of the Middle East, Bitton had first-hand knowledge of what it meant to be “other.”

While the critical establishment views his work as an authentic expression of Middle Eastern Jewry, his poetry defies categorization. He is one of the first poets to weave Middle Eastern themes that explore the question of what actually constitutes an authentic or genuine expression of Middle Eastern Jewry. Bitton even challenges the very notions of such categorization. In “Summary of a Conversation,” Bitton asserts that the resolution to the dilemma faced by those classified as “other” is found within the self.

Bitton lives in Tel Aviv, Israel, where he edits Aperion, a literary journal dedicated to Mediterranean and Middle Eastern culture. He also performs dramatic recitals of his work to musical accompaniment as an expression the condition of the Mizrahi experience.

A Work about Erez Bitton

Alcalay, Ammiel. Keys to the Garden, New Israeli Writing. New York: City Light Books, 1996.

Bjørnson, Bjørnstjerne (1832–1910)

writer, editor

Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson was born in Kvikne, Norway, to Peder Bjørnson, a Lutheran minister, and Elise Nordraak, a daughter of an affluent merchant. Bjørnson was at first educated by his father and at various country schools. In 1849, to prepare for the university entrance exams, he moved to Oslo where he was planning to study religion, following in his father’s footsteps. Bjørnson entered the university in 1852 but soon abandoned his study for the bustling cultural life of Oslo.

He began his literary career as a theater and literary critic for several daily newspapers in Oslo. He later became an editor of the daily Norsk Folkeblad. In 1857, Bjørnson took over the management of the Norske Theater in Bergen from Henrik IBSEN. He returned to Oslo in 1859 and continued to work for newspapers. Bjørnson’s liberal editorials, however, finally led to his resignation. In collaboration with Henrik Ibsen, Bjørnson organized the Norwegian Society for Theater, Music, and Language to promote more liberal notions about drama and theater in general.

Bjørnson began writing fiction in the late 1850s, and published several short stories. His short stories were often set in an idyllic, rural environment and idealized the lives of simple peasants. The conflict in the stories is often created when something new or unexpected disrupts the existing order. In “The Railway and the Churchyard” (1858), Knut Aakre, a chairman of the parish and a member of an old and influential family, protects the interests of the village. His neighbor, Lars Hogstad, decides to build a savings bank, which initially brings prosperity to the village. Lars soon realizes that a railroad is necessary to preserve the savings bank. This railroad must go through the old churchyard, and Knut firmly opposes the idea. When the railroad is finally built, a disaster happens: Lars’s house is set on fire by sparks from the train. Knut is the first one to help his neighbor. The opposition between the old and the new is the source of tension in the story, but the reader finally sees the synthesis of the two opposing points.

Bjørnson also created a number of historical dramas that were quite popular; however, the political and social issues introduced in these works, along with his staunch atheism, produced charges of high treason. Bjørnson then went abroad, spending several years in Italy, the United States, and Finland. He also completed several novels that centered on social themes such as education, inheritance, dogmatism, and the state of peasantry in Norway. Bjørnson also opposed industrialization and joined Emile ZOLA in protest against the bigotry involved in the Dreyfus affair in France.

Despite declining health which left him paralyzed on one side, Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson continued working until his death in Paris in 1910. His work contributed to the formation of modern drama in Norway; his social and political articles eventually prompted change and caused an upheaval in artistic circles; his short stories and novels promoted understanding of the traditional Norwegian culture. Bjørnson’s stories and novels are still popular in Norway and are considered to be among the classics of Scandinavian literature.

Other Works by Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson

Captain Mansana, and Other Stories. Translated by Rasmus B. Anderson. North Stratford, N.H.: Ayer Co. Publishing, 1980.

Heigen, Einar, ed. Land of the Free: Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson’s America Letters, 1880–1881. Translated by Eva Lund Haugen. Northfield, Minn.: Norwegian American Historical Association, 2001.

The Bridal March, and Other Stories. Translated by Rasmus B. Anderson. North Stratford, N.H.: Ayer Co. Publishing, 1969.

Three Plays. New York: Howard Fertig, 1989.

A Work about Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson

Cohen, Georg. Henrik Ibsen: A Critical Study. With a 42-Page Essay on Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson. New York: Classic Books, 1964.

Blasco Ibáñez, Vicente (1867–1928)

novelist

Born in Valencia, Spain, Blasco Ibáñez first began writing about life in that Mediterranean seaport. His is the “regional” novel, and his works depict life in his “patria chica,” or place of birth. Blasco Ibáñez writes in the naturalist style: He believes that our behavior is controlled by instinct, emotion, and environment and that we have no free will. His best novel, La barraca (1898), takes place in the lovely farmlike regions of Valencia. It presents the animosity held by the half-Moorish peasants toward a stranger in their land.

Around 1902, after writing several novels situated in Valencia, Blasco Ibáñez attempted to describe other areas of Spain, but these works lack the power of his earlier works. His writing became more propaganda than literary expression as he attacked the church, the government, and the military. He carries the reader across Spain, visiting the religious capital, Toledo; Bilbao, an industrial city, and Andalusia in southern Spain, where he describes the hardships suffered by the peasants. His novel, Sangre y arena (Blood and Sand, 1906) has been called the most complete portrayal of bullfighting ever presented in fiction. Far from an idealistic account, it is a description of all the blood and gore of the fight and depicts the spectators as monsters.

In 1910, in trouble for his unpopular political opinions and his radical journal, El Pueblo, Blasco Ibáñez went to South America, where he hoped to devote a novel to each country. After he wrote Los argonautas (1914) about Argentina, the outbreak of World War I caused him to return to Europe. He fought for the Allies, earning the French Légion d'Honneur. His later novels deal with the war, for example, Los cuatro jinetes del Apocalipsis (The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, 1916).

Some critics say Blasco Ibáñez has received more recognition than he deserves. His popularity is partly due to his forceful style. His novels are not delicate. It is the powerful descriptions of his hometown, Valencia, in his earlier novels that most attract his readers.

A Work about Blasco Ibáñez

Day, A. Grove, and Edgar C. Knowlton, Jr. Vicente Blasco Ibáñez. Boston: Twayne, 1972.

Blixen, Baroness Karen Christence

See DINESEN, ISAK.

Böll, Heinrich (1917–1985) novelist, short-story writer

Heinrich Theodor Böll was born in Cologne to Victor and Marie Hermanns Böll. His father was a carpenter, and his mother was from a farming and brewing family. Böll attended a Catholic elementary school and later graduated from the Kaiser Wilhelm-Gymnasium in Cologne. He studied German and philology for a semester at the University of Cologne before the German army drafted him in 1939. Böll was wounded four times, fighting in World War II. He married Annemarie Cech in 1942.

The postwar years were lean for Böll and his family. He worked in a carpentry shop and as a temporary employee for the city of Cologne. It was not long, however, before he published several short stories. One of these works received the prize from the German authors' association GRUPPE 47. The success of Böll's novel on generational reckoning, Billard um halb zehn (Billiards at Half-Past Nine, 1959), helped Gruppe 47 become a stronger voice in German literature. His novel criticizing the government and the church, Ansichten eines Clowns, (The Clown, 1965), marked the start of a new German literary phase in which blunt political reasoning took precedence over formal artistic expression.

Böll's writing career lasted four decades and produced a host of popular and critically acclaimed novels. In a poll taken in the 1970s, West Germans selected him as the fourth-most-influential person in their country. He received the Nobel Prize in literature in 1972, in part for his novel Gruppenbild mit Dame (Group Portrait with Lady, 1971), about an "author" researching the war experiences of a woman whom he gradually comes to love.

Several themes emerge from Böll's writings. He portrays war as senseless and absurd, refuting the notion of heroism. Böll's opposition of postwar materialism is another common theme. He often challenged authority and criticized the abuses of the Catholic Church. Böll strongly promoted human rights and was considered by many to be the conscience of West Germany. In the words of literary scholar Heinrich Vormweg, "Heinrich Böll created a literary oeuvre which reflects the true history of the Federal Republic as no other has done."

Other Works by Heinrich Böll

Adam, Where Art Thou? Translated by Mervyn Savill. New York: Criterion Books, 1955.

The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum. Translated by Leila Vennewitz. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1975.

The Train Was on Time. Translated by Richard Graves. New York: Criterion Books, 1956.

Works about Heinrich Böll

Heinrich Böll, on His Death: Selected Obituaries and the Last Interview. Bonn: Inter Nationes, 1985.

Schwarz, Wilhelm. Heinrich Böll: Teller of Tales. New York: Ungar, 1968.

Bonnefoy, Yves (1923–) poet, critic

Yves Bonnefoy was born in Tours, France, on June 24 to a working-class family. His father was a railroad worker, and his mother was a teacher. He received his degree in mathematics and philosophy from the University of Descartes in Tours and then studied mathematics, history, and philosophy at both the University of Poitiers and the Sorbonne.

In 1953, Bonnefoy published his first collection, Of the Movement and the Immobility of Douve (1953; translated 1968). These poems were chiefly concerned with human beings' struggle to establish a firm connection among themselves and with the world. Six other collections of poetry followed, including Ce qui fut sans lumière (What Was Without Light, 1987); Début et fin de la neige (Beginning and End of Snow, 1991); and La vie errante (The Wandering Life, 1993) about Helen of Troy, the image of beauty threatened by violence.

In addition to poetry, Bonnefoy has written numerous historical and critical texts, such as The Art and the Place of Poetry (1989), and is concerned with the connection between poetry and the visual arts.

Bonnefoy has taught at several universities, both in France and abroad, and has been involved in the translation from English to French of 10 Shakespearean plays as well as an edition of the poetry of Yeats. He is also the editor of Mythologies (1991), a two-volume scholarly work: One volume explores and reproduces African, American, and Ancient European myths and the histories of religious traditions; the second volume explores the same themes from Greek and Egyptian traditions, as written by French authors. Bonnefoy has received several awards for his poetry, including the Montaigne prize in 1978 and Grand National Prize for Poetry in 1993.

Other Works by Yves Bonnefoy

In the Shadow's Light. Translated by John Naughton. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Naughton, John, and Anthony Rudolf, eds. New and Selected Poems. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

Yesterday's Wilderness Kingdom. Translated by Anthony Rudolf. London: MPT Books, 2000.

A Work about Yves Bonnefoy

Naughton, John. The Poetics of Yves Bonnefoy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.

Borges, Jorge Luis (1899–1986) poet, short-story writer, essayist

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, Borges was the son of Jorge Guillermo Borges and Leonor Acevedo de Borges. The Borgeses were a prominent Argentinean family descended from Juan de Garay, the founder of Buenos Aires.

Borges's father, a lawyer and professor of psychology, had Borges tutored at home until the age of 10 by a British governess. The family also had a large library with many works in English, and Borges read, at a very early age authors such as Stevenson, Wells, Kipling, and Poe. These writers influenced him dramatically, tempering his bookishness with a love of adventure stories and fantasy. His first publication was a translation into Spanish of Oscar Wilde's fairy tale The Happy Prince, which Borges wrote when he was nine.

At the beginning of World War I, Borges's family moved to Switzerland, where he attended high school and became fluent in French, German, and Latin in addition to English and his native Spanish. After graduating from high school, Borges traveled to Spain where he thrust himself into the avant-garde literary discussions in the cafés and befriended a Spanish poet, Cansinos-Assens, a minor but extremely learned poet. Borges's experience during these years sparked his interest in literary experimentation and solidified his desire to become a writer.

Borges returned to Argentina in his mid-20s, and during the next 20 years, he steadily published volumes of poetry, essays, and short stories. His “fictions,” as he called them, exhibit his extraordinary literary originality. At their best, his stories are a kind of philosophic science fiction. They have a broad popular appeal and have also received the highest literary respect. Borges was one of the first authors in the 20th century to take popular genres, like the science-fiction tale or the hardboiled detective story, and use them to investigate metaphysical ideas that were traditionally explored only in poetry, philosophy, and “serious” prose fiction. This can be seen in the story from Fictions (1962), “The Garden of Forking Paths”—a detective story that is also an intricate exploration of the limits of language.

Many of Borges’s stories have little or no plot. They explore instead the different possibilities of an idea. For example, in “The Library of Babel,” also from Fictions, the narrator explains to the reader how the Library in which he lives works. The Library is infinite and there is no way out. On the shelves are books filled with random letters. Most of the books are filled with nonsense. However, because there is an infinite number of books, sometimes by chance the letters form words or even whole books that make sense. In fact, simply by the laws of mathematics, every possible book in the world must exist in the Library. The trouble is trying to find the important books among the millions of meaningless ones. Borges, who himself spent many years working as a librarian, thus presents his audience with a symbolic tale about the human condition, his message being that if we had enough time, it would be possible to know everything about the world and ourselves, but time is exactly what is limited.

Death and the Compass, another tale from Fictions, is the best example of the “other kind” of Borges short story. It is, in essence, a mystery with an intricate and perfectly constructed plot. However, the hero, Lonnot, is a kind of anti-Sherlock Holmes, a master of logical deduction. In Borges’s world, Lonnot uses this very quality, as he is led to his doom, to solve his own murder. The story can be read as a parable concerning the dangers to the human soul in our highly rational and scientific culture.

In his later life, Borges received many honorary degrees from such universities as Oxford and Harvard, where he also taught. He was the first Latin-American prose writer to become an internationally recognized literary figure. He has had a strong influence on many of the greatest Latin American authors of the 20th century, for example Gabriel GARCÍA MÁRQUEZ, Carlos FUENTES, and Julio CORTÁZAR, who follow Borges in the art of irony and prose filled with verbal invention and intellectual game playing, rather than the psychological and social drama of REALISM.

Other Works by Jorge Luis Borges

Coleman, Alexander, ed. Selected Poems. New York: Penguin, 2000.

Collected Fictions. Translated by Andrew Hurley. New York: Penguin, 1999.

Dreamtigers. Translated by Mildred Boyer and Harold Moreland. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985.

Irby, James, and Donald Yeats, eds. Labyrinths: Selected Stories and Other Writings. New York: Norton, 1988.

Works about Jorge Luis Borges

Barnstone, Willis, ed. Borges at Eighty: Conversations. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982.

Bell-Villada, Gene H. Borges and His Fiction. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1999.

Brasch, Charles (1909–1973) poet, critic, translator

Charles Brasch was born in Otago, New Zealand, the only son of Jewish parents. His father was an established businessman, but from an early age Brasch, to his father’s disappointment, aspired to be a poet and writer. Unlike some of his peers, Brasch had little confidence in his innate lyrical gift, and he spent most of his life learning and perfecting the technical aspects of writing poetry. He studied history at Oxford University and worked in the Foreign Office in London before returning to New Zealand permanently in 1945.

In 1947 the journal Landfall began publication, with Brasch as its founding editor. For 20 years, Brasch nurtured the talent of young New Zealand writers through his intense editorial scrutiny as well as through contributions from his personal wealth. In addition, each issue of the journal contained an editorial essay by Brasch. Landfall is still an important part of New Zealand literary life.

The poems in his first published collection, The Land and the People, and Other Poems (1939), betray his preference for accuracy of sense over rhythm; metrically they are a little awkward. Brasch's later poetry finally achieves an impeccable balance between expression in terms of words and cadence. This, however, is the result of a lifetime of hard work.

Brasch's poems deal prominently with his life and travels. Nature and its interaction with human beings constitute an important theme in Brasch's poetry. In the title sequence "The Land and the People," Brasch recounts the past through the reenactment in four poems of the first arrival of people on the islands of New Zealand. The initial arrival is compared to the "original sin," a destruction of nature's paradise. In another poem, "Letter from Thurlby Domain," Brasch sees the ruins of a house as a payment of a debt by human beings to the natural environment they had tried to alter.

Four more collections appeared during his lifetime, including The Estate and Other Poems (1957), whose lengthy title poem was written in memory of a friend who died in an accident, and Ambulando (1964), in which he began to focus more on his own experience rather than on philosophical subjects and the issue of national identity. As he states in "Cry Mercy":

*Getting older, I grow more personal,
Like more, dislike more
And more intensely than ever . . .*

His final collection, Home Ground (1974) was published after his death, as was an unfinished autobiography, Indirections: A Memoir (1980). Brasch's extensive and valuable collection of books and paintings was bequeathed to the Hocken Library in Dunedin, New Zealand.

Other Works by Charles Brasch

Roddick, Alan, ed. Collected Poems: Charles Brasch. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Watson, J. L., ed. The Universal Dance: A Selection from the Critical Prose Writings of Charles Brasch. Otago, New Zealand: University of Otago Press, 1991.

Works about Charles Brasch

Bertram, James. Charles Brasch. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Daalder, Joost. "Disputed Ground' in the Poetry of Charles Brasch." Landfall 26 (September 1972).

De Beer, Mary, et al. "Charles Brasch 1909–73: Tributes and Memories from his Friends." Islands 2 (Spring 1973).

Braschi, Giannina (1954–) poet, novelist, professor

Giannina Braschi was born in San Juan, Puerto Rico, and lived in Madrid, Rome, Paris, and London before settling in New York in the late 1970s. Braschi earned a Ph.D. from the State University of New York. In 1994, her selected works in Spanish were published in English as Empire of Dreams, a collection that explores gender and linguistic boundaries. Yo-Yo Boing! (1998), a work written in Spanish and English, juxtaposes themes of identity, ethnicity, and globalization with artistic innovations. A Publisher's Weekly reviewer wrote, "Braschi's melange of prose and poetry, English and Spanish, is admirable for its energy, its experimental format." Yo-Yo Boing! was nominated for the Pulitzer Prize and the American Library Association's Notable Book Award.

Another Work by Giannina Braschi

“Three Prose Poems.” Translated by Tess O’Dwyer. The Literary Review: An International Journal of Contemporary Writing 36, no. 2 (Winter 1993): 147–49.

Works about Giannina Braschi

“Giannina Braschi.” The Literary Review 36, no.2 (Winter 1993): 14.

“Yo-Yo Boing!” Publishers Weekly 245, no. 35 (August 1998): 49.

Brathwaite, Edward Kamau (Lawson Edward Brathwaite) (1930–) poet, critic, short-story writer, teacher, historian

Born in Bridgetown, Barbados, Brathwaite was educated at Harrison College in Barbados. He won a Barbados scholarship in 1949 to Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he read history. After graduating in 1953, Brathwaite stayed on one more year to earn a Certificate in Education.

In 1955, Brathwaite left England for Ghana and worked as an education officer for seven years. There he founded a children’s theater and wrote plays, later published as Four Plays for Primary Schools (1964) and Odale’s Choice (1967). He also published multiple poems in Cambridge University journals and West Indies periodicals, such as Bim and Kyk-Over-Al. In “Timehri” (1970), Brathwaite remarked on his Ghanaian experiences: “Slowly, ever so slowly, I came to a sense of identification of myself with these people, my living diviners. I came to connect my history with theirs, the bridge of my mind was linking Atlantic and ancestor, homeland and heartland.” The historical and geographical themes expressed in these statements reappear in many of Brathwaite’s works.

Returning to the Caribbean in 1962, Brathwaite worked as a tutor for the University of the West Indies in St. Lucia. One year later he became a lecturer in history at Mona, Jamaica. He completed his first book of poetry, Rights of Passage, during his first year there, and it was published in 1967 as the first volume of a trilogy. The Rights of Passage, Brath-waite states on the record sleeve, is “based on my own experience of that old triple journey: in my case, from the Caribbean to Europe, to West Africa and back home again. . . . It is a rite and the possession of the Negro peoples of the New World.” Masks (1968) and Islands (1969) soon followed. In the deluge of reviews and commentaries generated by the publication of Islands, the trilogy was named one of the most ambitious aesthetic and ethical poetic projects from the Antilles. A Sunday Times review of Islands positioned Brathwaite as “one of the finest living poets of the Western Hemisphere.”

Published as The Arrivants: A New World Trilogy in 1973, all three volumes examine African roots to recover West Indian identity. The trilogy explores many themes examined in later works—community, tribal concerns, spiritual growth, and history. Later works, many in dialect, incorporated musical elements of popular culture, such as folk music, jazz, and religious hymns, as well as speech rhythms. Some claimed Brathwaite inadequately recorded intended rhythms in his verse but admit he reads his verse brilliantly.

In subsequent years, Brathwaite successfully published scholarly as well as creative writing. Interested in the relationship of jazz to Caribbean writing, he published Jazz and the West Indian Novel in Bim in 1967. Other notable scholarly works include The Folk Culture of Jamaican Slaves (1969) and The Development of Creole Society in Jamaica 1770–1820 (1971). Brathwaite’s work positioned him as one of the Antilles’ most consistent and important English-speaking critics.

Multiple collections of poetry followed, but they received less critical attention than The Arrivants. Dissatisfied, some critics said Other Exiles (1975) merely collected poems not included in The Arrivants. Brathwaite’s use of violent demonic imagery to explore Rastafarian subculture and urban slum experiences in Black and Blues (1976) earned him a prize at the Cuban Casa de las Américas poetry competition. Critics also quickly recognized Brathwaite’s poetic talent in Mother Poem (1977). As Brathwaite writes in the preface, “This poem is about porous limestone, my mother, Barbados.”

Like Mother Poem, Sun Poem (1982) is autobiographical: Brathwaite universalizes his cyclical masculine experiences. One year after publishing Sun Poem, Brathwaite was appointed professor of social and cultural history at the University of the West Indies. Lecturing and reading his poetry allowed him to travel widely in Europe, Africa, North America, and the Far East.

More recent works, including The Zea Mexican Diary (1993), Trench Town Rock (1994), and Dream-Stories (1994), employ what Brathwaite calls the Scyorax writing style. They alter font, type size, and margins, “allowing [Brathwaite] to write in light and to make sounds visible as if [he is] in video,” as stated in an interview with Kwame Dawes in Talk Yuh Talk: Interviews with Anglophone Caribbean Poets (2001). Although Brathwaite’s poetry has been translated into Spanish, French, German, and the Sranantongo language of Suriname, he recently admitted, “My big regret is that Caribbean criticism has almost totally disregarded my work since The Arrivants as long ago now as 1973.”

A comparative-literature professor at New York University, Brathwaite divides his time between New York and Barbados. To quote editor and interviewer Kwame Dawes, Brathwaite’s “critical work is virtually foundational to an examination of a Caribbean aesthetic; his experimentation with music, popular culture, and various forms of poetic expression has proved influential for a significant number of writers. Brathwaite’s work is challenging because its meaning resides as much in the sounds of his words as in their semantic construction.”

Other Works by Edward Kamau Brathwaite

Ancestors: A Reinvention of Mother Poem, Sun Poem, and X/Self. New York: New Directions, 2001.

Third World Poems. London: Longman, 1983.

Words Need Love Too. Philipsburg, St. Martin: House of Nehesi, 2000.

Works about Edward Kamau Brathwaite

Brown, Stewart, ed. The Art of Kamau Brathwaite. Bridgend, Mid Glamorgan, Wales: Seren, 1995.

Reiss, Timothy J. For the Geography of a Soul: Emerging Perspectives on Kamau Brathwaite. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 2001.

Savory, Elaine. “The Word Becomes Nam: Self and Community in the Poetry of Kamau Brathwaite, and its Relation to Caribbean Culture and Post-modern Theory.” In Writing the Nation: Self and Country in the Postcolonial Imagination. Edited by John C. Hawley. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1996: 23–43.

Brathwaite, Lawson Edward

See BRATHWAITE, EDWARD KAMAU.

Braun, Volker (1939–) poet, playwright

Volker Braun was born in Dresden, Germany, less than four months before the start of World War II. His father, a soldier in the German army, was killed in the last year of the war. After completing his schooling, Braun worked as a printer’s assistant, a machine engineer, and a construction worker. In 1960, he joined the Communist Party in East Germany and enrolled at the University of Leipzig, where he studied philosophy for four years. After college, Braun worked as a writer and producer for the Berlin Ensemble, the City Theater of Leipzig, and the Deutsches Theater in Berlin.

Braun wrote several works of poetry and prose but achieved his greatest fame as a playwright. His influences include Bertolt BRECHT and Friedrich SCHILLER. Braun frequently portrayed the individual’s struggle for identity in the face of contrary societal expectations. As an idealist, Braun sought to promote a greater acceptance of socialism with his early plays. He opposed reunification in 1989, hoping for the continuance of an East Germany committed to social justice and the environment. Braun’s awards include the Heinrich Heine Prize, the Heinrich Mann Prize, and Germany’s National Prize.

Another Work by Volker Braun

Das Wirklichgewallte. Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 2000.

A Work about Volker Braun

Bothe Kathrin. Die Imaginierte Natur des Sozialismus: eine Biographie des Schreibens und der Texte Volker Brauns (1959–1974). Würzburg: Königshausen & Neumann, 1997.

Brecht, Bertolt (1898–1956) dramatist, playwright

Bertold Brecht was born in Augsburg, Germany. His father was an administrator of a paper company. Brecht began writing while he was very young and published a few poems at the age of 16. In school, he developed a reputation as a hooligan and a troublemaker. Despite the constant disciplinary problems, he graduated from school and entered the University of Munich in 1917 to study medicine. His studies were interrupted by the outbreak of World War I, and Brecht enlisted in the German army as a medical orderly. After the war, Brecht briefly resumed his studies but eventually abandoned them to pursue a writing career.

In 1919, Brecht joined the Independent Social Democratic Party and began his lifelong association with communism. Starting in 1920, he began to work as a dramatist and playwright at various theaters throughout Germany. Although his early plays were not directly engaged with politics, Brecht often mocked the conventions of bourgeois sensibility and lifestyle. His political engagement, his indictment of capitalism, and his epic style established Brecht as one of the most radical playwrights in Germany.

After Brecht officially joined the Communist Party of Germany in 1929, his works assumed an even more radical stance and directly addressed important political issues. Brecht's affiliation with the Communist Party made him an unpopular figure with government censors and other officials. Many of Brecht's works were banned in Germany even in the years before Hitler came to power.

The political atmosphere in Germany became dangerous for Brecht during the 1930s because of the rise of the Nazis, who were opposed to communism. His works were banned throughout the country, and he was forced into exile. Brecht lived in Denmark, Finland, Russia, and finally the United States. While living in the United States, Brecht tried to write screenplays for the movies, but he had difficulty getting his work accepted. He also found the atmosphere in Hollywood intellectually stifling. In 1947, Brecht was investigated by the anti-Communist congressional Committee on Un-American Activities. Although the committee did not establish any definitive charges against Brecht, his reputation was damaged and he could no longer produce any work in the United States.

In 1948, Brecht returned to Germany, settling in Communist East Germany. Brecht founded his own Marxist theater in East Berlin, where many of his plays were produced. Brecht also experimented with many theatrical conventions, such as lighting, sound, and set. Brecht's reputation spread beyond the borders of Germany, and he became an internationally renowned dramatist. In 1955, he was awarded the Stalin Peace Prize, the highest recognition in the Soviet Union, for his contribution to drama.

Critical Analysis

Brecht's drama reflects his view that theater should provide a forum for social and political change, rather than serve a purely aesthetic function geared toward entertainment. Brecht formulated a new style of acting based on the "alienation effect." He wanted his audience to become objective spectators by disassociating themselves from the characters of the play. Moreover, Brecht argued that actors should disassociate themselves from the characters they portray. Instead of creating an illusion of reality, Brecht wanted his audience to understand that the play is not a reality but a forum for social debate. Brecht believed his style of production would make the political lesson more apparent to the masses.

Mother Courage and Her Children (1941), one of Brecht's most famous historical plays, set during the Thirty Years' War, presents a series of conflicts that occurred between Catholics and Protestants in central Europe between 1618 and 1648. Mother Courage is a woman who depends on the continuation of the war for her economic survival. She is nicknamed Mother Courage for courageously protecting her merchandise under enemy fire. She has three children who die in the war, one by one. Yet, she continues her career as a war profiteer. Staged in East Berlin, the play attracted instant critical attention for its controversial portrayal of war and its dehumanizing effects on people.

The Caucasian Chalk Circle (1948), an adaptation of a medieval Chinese play based on the parable of the chalk circle, centers on a land dispute in a small commune in the Soviet Union after World War II. The main action revolves around the conflict of two women over a child. It is similar to the biblical tale of King Solomon who must resolve a dispute between two women, both of whom claim to be the mother of a child. The play was warmly greeted by audiences and received international recognition.

Among Brecht's most famous plays was The Threepenny Opera (1928). This adaptation of John Gay's Beggar's Opera presents a universe of beggars, thieves, and prostitutes, a world bereft of honor or trust. Kurt Weill's inventive score adds to the experience of this brittle world, an allegory of Germany's Weimar Republic, the period before Hitler took power. The popular song "Mack the Knife" is from this play.

The Good Woman of Setzuan (1940) tells the tale of three gods who are in search of a truly good person. Their choice is Shen Te, a prostitute. They give her money to start a new life, but she finds that a truly good person cannot survive, so she creates a nasty alter ego, her "cousin" Shu Tai.

Galileo (1939) deals with the historical figure of the famous astronomer, Galileo, who discovers that Earth is not the center of the universe. He holds his findings for eight years but finally reveals them to the pope. The pope subjects Galileo to the Inquisition, and Galileo recants his theory. The play dealt with many political and social issues. The freedom of the individual is juxtaposed against oppressive society, which is dominated by the religious leaders who are not interested in scientific truth because it threatens to overturn their supremacy.

Brecht is also among the finest poets of the 20th century, a talent overshadowed somewhat by his success as a playwright. Brecht published more than 1,500 poems that span more than 30 years, including both world wars. Brecht's poetry combines lyricism with an epic and Marxist view of society and history. In the poem "1940," for example the speaker says that his young son asks him why he should learn mathematics, French, or history, and the speaker wonders why indeed when "two pieces of bread are more than one's about all you'll end up with" and language is unnecessary to convey hunger—a groan will do—and history does not teach us how to survive. Still he tells his son, with false optimism, to study.

Bertolt Brecht is considered to be among the most influential writers of the 20th century. His theoretical works changed the face of the modern theater, and his emphasis on social responsibility of the individual inspired many playwrights to write works of social significance.

Other Works by Bertolt Brecht

Baal. Translated by Peter Tagel. New York: Arcade, 1998.

Brecht on Theater: The Development of an Aesthetic. Translated by John Willett. New York: Hill and Wang, 1994.

Drums in the Night. New York: Methuen Drama, 1988.

Works about Bertolt Brecht

Esslin, Martin. Brecht, a Choice of Evils: A Critical Study of the Man, His Works, and His Opinions. New York: Methuen Drama, 1984.

Munsterer, Hans. The Young Brecht. New York: Paul and Co., 1992.

Brentano, Catarina Elisabetha Ludovica Magdalena

See ARNIM, BETTINA VON.

Breton, André (1896–1966) poet, novelist, essayist

André Breton was born in Tichenbray, France. He studied medicine in Paris and was assigned to a military hospital, where he worked primarily in the psychiatric wards during World War I.

Breton studied the works of Sigmund FREUD, and Freud's notion of free association greatly influenced Breton's experiments with automatic writing. Aided by French poet Philippe Soupault, he began to work with this concept. He was searching for a higher form of reality that, he assumed, was present at the point where dreams and reality converged. Together, he and Soupault founded the journal Littérature, in which they published the works of such writers as Louis ARAGON. Breton also used the journal as a vehicle to express his own views, which he went on to publish in a series of three surrealist manifestos in 1924, 1930, and 1942.

The first of Breton's surrealist manifestos is considered to be the founding text of the surrealist movement. Breton assumed a position of leadership within the movement as a result of this text, and he was joined by numerous talented poets and visual artists, all of whom shared the beliefs he had set forth in his text, causing the movement to gain momentum and eventually to spread beyond Europe.

Critical Analysis

In the middle of this creative tempest, Breton published what is considered critically to be his finest work, Nadja (1928), which is based, in part, on firsthand experiences. Breton met and spent time with an unknown girl who was living her life in the same manner that Breton had advocated: She made no distinction between factual reality and fictional reality. Her behavior, however, was not socially acceptable, and she was ultimately placed in an asylum.

Surrealism as a movement was eclipsed after World War II by EXISTENTIALISM and was vehemently attacked by such new voices as SARTRE and CAMUS. Breton was subjected to political derision for having denounced the 1936 Moscow trials, thus making himself an enemy of the Communist Party as well as forcing him into conflict with several of his former friends and colleagues, such as Aragon and Paul ÉLUARD, who rejected surrealism and fervently promoted communism.

Breton continued to proclaim his theme of the need for artists to focus on individual freedom, to develop an anarchist regime in the arts that functions as the exact antithesis of Stalinism and SOCIALIST REALISM and their attempts to harness creativity under totalitarian rule. In particular, he viewed socialist realism, as enforced by Stalin, to be the negation of freedom and was angered and disheartened to see that it could be supported by someone he had respected as much as Aragon. He denounced the idea of artists falling victim to a blind allegiance to repressive ideology. His essay "The Tower of Light" (1952) is solid evidence of Breton's continuing detachment from materialism and his increasing move toward utopian philosophy. He expresses the idea that revolution, to effect change on society, must first promote change in the mind of the individual.

Breton believed that very little had actually been learned as a result of World War I. In a 1942 address to French students at Yale University, Breton expressed these concerns. He also expressed his hope that the outcome of World War II would be different. This vision was shattered, however, by the emergence of the cold war and the added potential of nuclear weaponry to annihilate the human race. In response, Breton's essay "The Lamp in the Clock" (1948) called for a radical reconsideration of exactly what was at stake: the continued survival of humanity.

Breton also expressed his views through poetry. These works, collected as Selected Poems (1948; translated 1969), reflect the influence of other poets such as Paul VALÉRY and Arthur RIMBAUD. Breton continued, throughout his life, to focus on the importance of revelation and the links that can be made through the arts between that which is concrete reality and that which exists solely in the realm of the imagination.

Other Works by André Breton

Break of Day. Translated by Mark Polizzotti and Mary Ann Caws. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

Poems of André Breton: A Bilingual Anthology. Translated by Jean-Pierre Cauvin and Mary Ann Caws. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1982.

Works about André Breton

Caws, Mary Ann. André Breton. Boston: Twayne, 1996.

Polizzotti, Mark. Revolution of the Mind: The Life of André Breton. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1995.

Breytenbach, Breyten (1939–) poet, novelist, short-story writer, essayist

One of the most controversial figures in South African literary history, Breytenbach was born to an affluent Afrikaner family in the Cape Province. His ancestors settled in South Africa in the early 1700s.

Breytenbach has written wistfully about the poignant beauty of Cape Province. In several of his works, he has written about childhood memories and about the ancestral memory of his people. For example, his great-grandmother, his father, and his mother figure prominently in the retrospective novel Dog Heart: A Travel Memoir (1998). His eventual rejection of the Afrikaner tradition echoes all the more loudly because of the depth of his family's connections to the Dutch-settler heritage Afrikaners treasure.

He was seen, even at a young age, to possess great literary and immense talents. His early writings, all written in Afrikaans, such as those in his collection Catastrophes (1964), explore his sense of himself as distant from his own people and their traditions. While he was in college in Cape Town in the early 1960s, he was troubled by the encroaching control of the many apartheid laws and chose to go to Europe, where he met and married an Asian woman named Yolande Lien, who figures prominently in his poetry. Breytenbach was trying to return to South Africa in 1965 to accept a literary award when he was told that his marriage was a serious breach of South Africa's law against interracial marriage. His general distaste for apartheid had become personal, and Breytenbach became a founder and organizer of a group called Okhela, meaning to "set fire to." The goal of this group was to persuade white South Africans that the apartheid regime could only be brought down from within.

Issues of personal identity, especially regarding the relationship between art and life intrigued Breytenbach even before the frankly autobiographical writings that would develop from his experiences in the 1970s and 1980s. In poetry written during the 1960s, Breytenbach used only lowercase letters, referred to himself in his own poems, and used profanity. All of his writings stress the fictional nature of "real" life.

Since 1961, he has made his home primarily in Paris. Breytenbach entered South Africa illegally in 1975, using the name Christian Jean-Marc Galaska, and was arrested as a terrorist. His trial was an international event, although most of the proceedings occurred within the limitations and secrecy imposed by the Nationalist government. He was sentenced to nine years in prison, and he served seven. His imprisonment became the subject of some of his major works: a loosely structured collection of fragmentary narratives entitled Mouiroir: Mirror Notes to a Novel (1984) and the autobiographical novel The True Confessions of an Albino Terrorist (1984). Another novel, A Season in Paradise (1980), and several collections of poetry, notably Judas Eye (1988), also investigate Breytenbach's time in South African prisons, although they are not all specifically concerned only with his prison experiences. Pressure from the international community, especially by the then-president of France, François Mitterrand, led to Breytenbach's early release from prison, with the provision that he leave South Africa.

Breytenbach has returned to South Africa since the institution of democratic elections, and he has recently championed the cause of the Afrikaner in South Africa as a political minority. In this way, one can see a consistency in Breytenbach's political ideology: The oppression of dissident groups, whether that of a minority holding a minority in check or that of a willful majority, should not be allowed to pass unremarked.

Critical Analysis

Breytenbach occupies a unique position in the African literary tradition. Like André BRINK and NADINE GORDIMER he has often written of political oppression and his distaste for the apartheid regime in South Africa. Breytenbach and Brink are also the most well-known writers who publish in Afrikaans, the language of the Dutch settlers, and those most often, and sometimes unfairly, vilified for all of apartheid's wrongs. Like another countryman, J. M. COETZEE, Breytenbach often plays with language at multiple levels. Their willingness to experiment with language, reveling in the multiplicity of possibilities for confusion and misunderstanding, is referred to as "postmodernism": a celebration of fragmentary, rather than unified, meaning, the purpose of which is meant to make readers think about not only what they read but also what they believe. This "playfulness" has often been criticized and stands as one end of the spectrum of opinion on Breytenbach. Ultimately, Breytenbach stands alone, like so many of the protagonists of his novels. Isolation, introspection, scathing self-analysis, and a refusal to use fictions as a crutch for existence mark both his poetry and his prose. For example, in Dog Heart: A Memoir (1999), he writes that he needs to see the child he once was to determine how he has become the man he is: "Why, after all these years, do I feel the urge to go and look for the other one, the child I must have been?"

J. M. Coetzee has commented on Dog Heart in his collection, Stranger Shores: Literary Essays 1986–1999 (2001). He sees Breytenbach's text as typical of those narratives which mine his, and South Africa's, past: "Like Breytenbach's other memoirs, Dog Heart is loose, almost miscellaneous, in its structure. Part journal, part essay on autobiography, part book of the dead, part what one might call speculative history, it also contains searching meditations on the elusiveness of memory and passages of virtuoso writing . . . breathtaking in the immediacy of their evocation of Africa."

Even in what are recognizably novels, Breytenbach melds the real with the fantastic. For example, Memory of Snow and Dust (1989) concerns itself with fables of identity and the uncertainty that lies underneath our solid sense of who we are. The plot involves an Ethiopian journalist who meets and impregnates a mixed-race South African woman while they are in Switzerland for an arts festival, a "neutral" cultural and political space carved out by both custom and art. The journalist agrees to act as a spy for an antiapartheid group and goes to South Africa under an assumed name. But the identity under which he is traveling is accused of murder, and the would-be spy and absentee father cannot clear himself without revealing his own identity and betraying his political comrades. Fictions such as Memory of Snow and Dust call into question the seemingly simple injunction that the lives and works of artists are cleanly and clearly separate.

Breytenbach's contributions and importance to world literature are linked to the combination in his works of the personal, political, and cultural in ways that force readers to acknowledge the naturalness of the connections.

Other Works by Breyten Breytenbach

In Africa Even the Flies are Happy: Selected Poems, 1964–1977. London: Calder, 1978.

Return to Paradise: An African Journal. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1993.

A Work about Breyten Breytenbach

Jolly, Rosemary. Colonization, Violence, and Narration in White South African Writing: André Brink, Breyten Breytenbach, and J. M. Coetzee. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1996.

Brink, André (1935–) novelist, essayist, playwright

André Brink, a white South African, writes in Afrikaans, a national South African language derived from Dutch. His first two novels, A Dry White Season (1969) and Looking on Darkness (1973), were banned because of their political implications, which prompted Brink to write in English as well.

Brink is part of the Sestiger group (also known as the Sixtyers), a loose network of Afrikaans writers who began their careers in the 1960s and whose works combine Afrikaans literature with European literary trends and an antiapartheid political consciousness. The Sestigers depicted sexual and moral matters and examined the political system in a way that rapidly antagonized the traditional Afrikaner reader. The group opposed the rising authoritarianism of South Africa and provided a voice against racism in the language of the dominant National Party. Brink's works are the most politically committed of the group's collective writings, which led to many of his works being banned until the end of apartheid in the early 1990s.

Much of Brink's work deals with the structures that informed apartheid, such as slavery, interracial relationships, and abuse of police power. In Cape of Storms (1992), he uses allegory and myth, which he calls "African magical realism," to depict a historical relationship and the social transition of South Africa. Some critics saw this book as a confused search for identity. His later book, On the Contrary (1993), seemed to have an easier time finding its voice within history, perhaps because of Brink's narrative technique, which is based in the oral tradition of African culture. The narrator, Estienne Barbier, speaks to an imaginary woman—an escaped slave whose name might be Rosette and who might or might not exist. The doubt and lack of permanence inherent in the narrator's tale determines the reader's perception of Barbier's life. Her stories, as Brink tells them, seem to determine the content and style of human lives.

Another of Brink's texts, The Rights of Desire (2001), deals with racial conflicts. The protagonist, Ruben Olivier, a 65-year-old librarian, is cared for by his black housekeeper, Magrieta, and Antje of Bengal, the ghost of a 17th-century slave who was executed for murdering her master and his wife. Olivier's children force him to take in a lodger, who appears to bring Olivier out of the books and into life. Olivier, thus, represents an Africa that needs to be brought out of the past and into the present.

Brink is a professor of Afrikaans and Dutch literature. In April of 2000, he received two literary awards: the Hertzog Prize for Afrikaans Literature and the National Book Journalist of the Year award. Brink had previously won the Hertzog Prize in 1994, but turned it down because, he said, "at the time the Akademie appeared to be wholly 'untransformed' and unrepentant about it [apartheid]. To accept the prize seemed like allowing myself to be co-opted into an establishment (the cultural wing of the apartheid regime) with which I could not accept to be identified" (Monday Paper). He has now accepted the award because the academy can no longer represent the "old Afrikaner establishment because that establishment no longer exists" (Monday Paper).

Other Works by André Brink

A Chain of Voices. New York: Morrow. 1982.

A Dry White Season. New York: Morrow. 1980.

Writing in a State of Siege. New York: Summit Books. 1983.

Works about André Brink

"André Brink Wins Literary Double." Monday Paper (University of Cape Town) 19:12, May 8–15, 2000.

Jolly, Rosemary Jane. Colonization, Violence, and Narration in White South African Writing: André Brink, Breyten Breytenbach, and J. M. Coetzee. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1996.

Brinkmann, Rolf Dieter (1940–1975)

poet, short-story writer

Rolf Dieter Brinkmann was born in Vechta, Germany. After completing high school, he worked in a variety of temporary jobs. He began writing at a young age and published his first collection of poems in 1962. He studied at the Teachers' College in Cologne for two years before dropping out. In the late 1960s, Brinkmann edited and translated three anthologies of American post-beat-generation poets. He studied at the Villa Massimo in Rome from 1972 to 1973 with a scholarship from the German government and in 1974 was a visiting lecturer at the University of Texas. The following year, he was killed in London by a hit-and-run driver.

American beat and underground poetry were Brinkmann's heaviest literary influences. The leading German-language pop poet of his day, he helped introduce American pop culture to his country. Brinkmann hoped to free German society from inhibitions and constraints. His poems exhibit a thematic and stylistic break from German tradition. Brinkmann used everyday speech geared to the senses to describe the transitory occurrences of daily life. Scholar Peter Demetz explains that Brinkmann "wanted to quicken the demise of old forms and metaphysical attitudes by a new kind of imagism 'catching momentary impressions' in 'snapshots,' precise, firm, and 'translucent'; he advocated 'no more big emotions,' but 'small momentary excitations.'"

Largely ignored in his lifetime, Brinkmann attained fame after his death. His last collection of poems Westwärts 1 & 2 (Westward 1 & 2, 1975), published posthumously, won the Petrarca Lyric Prize and became a best-seller. In the 1980s, critics recognized Brinkmann as a precursor of postmodernism and an articulator of his generation's consciousness.

Another Work by Rolf Dieter Brinkmann

Keiner weiß mehr. Berlin: Kiepeheuer & Witsch, 1968.

A Work about Rolf Dieter Brinkmann

Schafer, Jorgen. Pop-literatur: Rolf Dieter Brinkmann und das Verhältnis zur Popularkultur in der Literatur der Sechziger Jahre. Stuttgart: M & D Verlag für Wissenschaft und Forschung, 1998.

Broch, Hermann (1886–1951) novelist, dramatist

Herman Broch was born to Jewish parents in Vienna, Austria. His father Josef Broch, a flannel merchant, and his mother Johanna Schnabel were both wealthy. In 1904, Broch graduated from the kaiserlich-königlich Staats-Realschule (Imperial and Royal State Secondary School). Acceding to his father's wishes, Broch studied to be a textile engineer at the Spinning and Weaving School in Alsace. He also studied philosophy and mathematics for a semester at the University of Vienna. In 1909, he converted to Catholicism to marry Franziska von Rothermann, a sugar heiress. He became director of his father's Teesdorf textile factory that same year.

As part of the Vienna intellectual scene, Broch became concerned with the disintegration of values. Influenced by Friedrich NIETZSCHE and Immanuel KANT, Broch published his first articles on philosophy in 1913. In 1925, he resumed his study of mathematics and philosophy at Vienna University. Three years later, he left the Teesdorf factory to write full time. His first major work was the trilogy Die Schlafwandler (The Sleepwalkers, 1930–32). He wrote several novels, dramas, and essays in the 1930s, but his works did not fare well financially, due to opposition from the anti-Semitic government. Broch was arrested by Nazis in 1938, but influential friends arranged for his emigration to the United States. In America, Broch wrote his best-known novel, Der Tod des Vergil (The Death of Virgil, 1945), a lyrical prose recounting of the last hours of the famous poet's life.

Broch's powerful works address the issues of mass psychology, moral decay, ethics, and death. Although an industrialist, he had socialist tendencies and worked to help laborers, needy children, and refugees. He wrote didactic fiction, hoping to improve the condition of humanity and society. In the words of German literary scholar Theodore Ziolkowski, Broch "was conscious of a mission in life, to which he devoted himself with absolute consistency and an almost messianic zeal" (Herman Broch, 1964).

Other Works by Herman Broch

The Guiltless. Translated by Charles Wharton Stark.

New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1974.

The Unknown Quantity. Translated by Willa and

Edwin Muir. Marlboro, Vt.: Marlboro Press, 1988.

Works about Herman Broch

Lützelzer, Paul Michael. Hermann Broch: A Biography.

Translated by Janice Fureness. London: Quarter, 1987.

Ziolkowski, Theodore. Herman Broch. New York: Columbia University Press, 1964.

Bruman, Simone

See SCHWARZ-BART, SIMONE.

Bryusov, Valery (1873–1924) poet, novelist, critic

Valery Yakovlevich Bryusov was born in Moscow, Russia, to an affluent middle-class family. He was educated at Moscow University and could speak and write fluently in several European languages, including French, English, and German. He was a fundamental figure in the establishment of the Russian symbolist movement (see SYMBOLISM), outlining the movement's aesthetic goals in his book The Russian Symbolists (1894). Despite being a prolific poet and novelist, Bryusov today is mostly remembered for his role as the editor of the symbolist publication Vesy between 1904 and 1909.

Bryusov's verse has often been described as sophisticated and graceful, yet marked by frequent use of cryptic language that praises sensuous delights and bodily pleasures. Stephanos (1906) is perhaps the best known of his poetry collections. In addition to composing his own poetry, Bryusov produced a number of magnificent translations of American, French, and Armenian poets into Russian.

Bryusov wrote two novels, The Fiery Angel (1908), a mystical novel that depicts a cult of practitioners of black magic in 16th-century Germany, and Altar of Victory (1911–12), an obscure post-symbolist novel.

In 1908, after a bitter disagreement with other symbolist writers, Bryusov disassociated himself from the movement. He devoted himself to teaching and to writing a number of respected scholarly works. After the communist revolution, Bryusov indirectly joined the Bolshevik cause and worked for the Soviet literary establishment as a director of several artistic and educational institutions, mainly as a bureaucratic administrator.

Today, Valery Bryusov is mostly remembered for his initial guidance of the symbolist movement and as a literary scholar. His own works are mainly forgotten and only studied in the context of the symbolist movement. His corpus of literary criticism and translations is still respected and used in Russian academic institutions.

Other Works by Valery Bryusov

Diary of Valery Bryusov, 1893–1905. Translated by Joan Delaney Grossman. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.

The Republic of the Southern Cross and Other Stories. Translated by Stephen Graham. New York: Hyperion Press, 1977.

A Work about Valery Bryusov

Grossman, Joan Delaney. Valery Bryusov and the Riddle of Russian Decadence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.

Büchner, Georg (1813–1837) dramatist

Georg Büchner was born in the Hessian village of Goddelau. At the age of three, he moved to Darmstadt with his father, Ernst Karl Büchner, a physician, and his mother, Caroline Louis Reuß Büchner. In 1831, Büchner graduated from the Darmstädter Großherzogliches Gymnasium, one of the finest schools in Hesse, and then studied medicine and natural sciences at the University of Strasbourg. In 1833, he continued his studies at the University of Gießen. Sympathetic with the social misery of the peasant class, he founded a student group committed to radical democratic reform. Büchner anonymously published a pamphlet, Der Hessische Landbote (The Hessian Courier, 1834), which called for a peasant revolt to end the oppressive rule of the elite class. To avoid arrest, Büchner had to flee to Darmstadt in 1834 and to Strasbourg in 1835.

While at Darmstadt, Büchner wrote the complex historical drama, Dantons Tod (Danton's Death, 1835). Considered a masterpiece of German literature, this work displays many levels of meaning in its study of the French Revolution and the purpose of history. He later translated two of Victor HUGO's works. Büchner's last work, Woyzeck (1877), is a drama about an army barber who murders his unfaithful lover. Noted for its originality, the play was a precursor to both expressionism and naturalism in German theater. In 1836, Büchner took a position as a lecturer in comparative anatomy at the University of Zurich. He soon became ill and died in February 1837 from typhoid.

Aside from Dantons Tod, all of Büchner's works were published posthumously. His melancholy writing addressed the conflict between the ideals of human freedom and the circumstances of history. Büchner captured the contradictions of his age and in the 20th century became an important influence in the development of German modernism. In his book Georg Büchner: The Shattered Whole, scholar John Reddick explains that Büchner's genius stems in part from "the sheer subtlety and complexity of his poetic vision" and "his compulsion to explore questions rather than present answers." The Georg Büchner Prize for literature created by the city of Darmstadt in 1923 is one of the most coveted German literary awards.

Another Work by Georg Büchner

Leonce and Lena. Translated by Hedwig Rappolt. New York: Time and Space Limited, 1983.

A Work about Georg Büchner

Reddick, John, Georg Büchner: The Shattered Whole. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994.

Bulgakov, Mikhail (1891–1940) novelist, short-story writer, dramatist

Mikhail Afanasievich Bulgakov was born in Kiev, Ukraine, to Afanasy Bulgakov, a professor of history of religion and a censor, and Varvara Pokrovskaya, a teacher. He was the youngest of six children. When Bulgakov was 16 years old, his father died unexpectedly. Bulgakov studied medicine at the Imperial University of St. Vladimir in Kiev, married Tatiana Lappa in 1913, and received his degree in 1916.

Russia was in the middle of World War I when he volunteered to work as a doctor at the front line for the Russian Red Cross. Along with his wife, a trained nurse, Bulgakov worked in the army for several months. Between 1916 and 1919, he intermittently worked as a doctor in villages and towns throughout Russia. After the Bolshevik revolution in 1917, Russia was engulfed by civil war. Bulgakov served as an army doctor in the forces opposing the revolutionary regime and witnessed firsthand the horrors of war. Discharged in 1919, he settled in the city of Vladikavkaz.

Between 1919 and 1920, Bulgakov gave up his medical career to work as a journalist and dramatist. He wrote feuilletons (short literary articles or sketches that appear in the entertainment section of a newspaper), gave lectures on literature, and produced his first plays. Despite these efforts, Bulgakov and his wife lived in poverty. They survived by cutting and selling Bulgakov's golden chain, given to him by his father, piece by piece. During the summer of 1921, Bulgakov attempted to emigrate from Russia, now controlled by the Communist regime, but health and money problems prevented him from leaving the country. He moved to Moscow, where he lived for the rest of his life.

In 1924, Bulgakov published the first part of White Guard, a novel largely based on the experiences during his service in the army at the time of the Russian civil war. Set in Kiev, the novel describes the war's effect on a middle-class family. White Guard was not published in its entirety in the Soviet Union until the 1960s, but the complete text, edited by Bulgakov, was published in Paris in 1929. He also published his first collection of short stories, Diaboliad, during the same period. Between 1925 and 1927, Bulgakov also published individual short stories based on his experiences as a doctor before and during the war. These stories were later compiled as Notes of a Young Doctor.

In 1925, Bulgakov published a novella, Heart of a Dog. Bulgakov tells a tale of a stray dog that gains human intelligence when a Moscow professor transplants human glands into the animal's body. The work's elements of surrealism were offensive to Communist orthodoxy of the time and brought Bulgakov under close government scrutiny.

From 1927 until his death in 1940, Bulgakov was in constant conflict with government censors. According to the official Big Soviet Encyclopedia, Bulgakov was considered as a "slanderer of Soviet reality" because of his satirical treatment of the Soviet regime and government officials. Bulgakov continued to work in various theaters in spite of the censorship, but by 1929 his plays Days of the Turbins, Zoya's Apartment, and The Crimson Island were officially banned. In despair, Bulgakov burned all of his manuscripts. Ill and poverty stricken, he wrote a letter to Joseph Stalin, the leader of the Soviet Union, requesting permission to leave the country, stating, "there is no hope for any of my works" in Russia. His petition was denied; instead, he was granted a minor position in a Moscow theater.

Between 1928 and 1940, Mikhail Bulgakov wrote his most famous and complex novel The Master and Margarita. Now considered a major masterpiece of Russian literature, the novel remained unpublished until 1966, more than 25 years after its completion.

After an extended illness that resulted in kidney failure, Bulgakov died in 1940 at the age of 49. Shortly before his death, Bulgakov suffered a nervous breakdown. He eventually lost his sight and his ability to speak and communicated with his wife through gestures. Bulgakov completed The Master and Margarita on his deathbed. He did not achieve his current reputation as one of the most influential Russian writers until after his death.

Critical Analysis

As Bulgakov admitted in his diaries, The Master and Margarita was mostly influenced by Nikolai GOGOL, an earlier master of Russian mysticism. Besides being a devastating political satire, the novel is an allegory of good and evil. The work's main character, Satan, appears in the guise of a foreigner and self-proclaimed black magician named Woland. Along with a talking black cat and a "translator" wearing a jockey's cap and cracked pince-nez, Woland wreaks havoc throughout literary Moscow. The parallel narrative in the work centers on Master, a writer driven to insanity by criticism and political persecution, and his unpublished book about Pontius Pilate. Irreducible to a single theme, Master and Margarita comments on authorship, religion, spirituality, politics, and the role of an individual in a socially repressive society.

During the early 1950s, the monument of Nikolai Gogol's grave was renovated by the government. Bulgakov's widow purchased the original headstone and placed it on the grave of her husband. Bulgakov had referred to Gogol as a teacher, writing in one of his letters, "Teacher, cover me with your heavy mantle." The request came true after Bulgakov's death.

Other Works by Mikhail Bulgakov

Black Snow. Translated by Michael Glenny. New York: Harvill Press, 1999.

The White Guard. Translated by Michael Glenny. Chicago: Academy Chicago Publishers, 1995.

Works about Mikhail Bulgakov

Curtis, J. A. E. Mikhail Bulgakov: A Life in Letters and Diaries. New York: Overlook Press, 1992.

Proffer, Ellendea. A Pictorial Biography of Mikhail Bulgakov. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1984.

Bunin, Ivan (1870–1953) poet, novelist, short-story writer, translator

Ivan Alexeyevich Bunin was born in Voronezh, Russia, to poor provincial aristocrats Alexei and Ludmila Bunin. The family situation of the Bunins was in constant jeopardy because of the father's heavy drinking and gambling. In 1881, Bunin was accepted into a small grammar school where he received a classical education suitable for entry into the civil service. Bunin's brother, Julian, joined the socialist cause, for which he was sent into exile by government authorities. Bunin briefly joined his brother's revolutionary clique, but he was ultimately disenchanted with politics and left revolutionary circles to concentrate on his writing.

Bunin first published his poems in 1887 and released his first volume of poetry in 1891. To earn money, Bunin worked as a translator. In 1899, he completed translations of the English poet George Gordon, Lord Byron and the American poet Henry Wadsworth Longfellow that were so successful that Bunin was awarded prestigious Pushkin Prize in 1903. Inspired by his friendships with Anton CHEKHOV and Maxim GORKY, Bunin turned to prose. Bunin's fiction, influenced by Ivan TURGENEV and Leo TOLSTOY, often addresses the dynamics of family and the social position of an individual in rapidly changing Russia. The revolution of 1905 had a dramatic effect on Bunin: He saw the growing power of the Bolsheviks as a threat to Russian social and cultural traditions.

Despite Bunin's aversion to radical reform, his prose often exposes social injustices. In the internationally acclaimed novel The Village (1910), Bunin reveals the horrors of peasant life in Russia. In Dry Valley (1911), Bunin analyzes the degeneration of family order and economic stability among the aristocratic gentry in provincial Russia. Bunin's themes, however, are not limited to a social agenda. In his collection of short stories, The Gentleman from San Francisco (1915), Bunin's thematic focus explores moral decay, death, and pride. Bunin's fiction is marked by a delicate understanding of human nature, as well as by a keen awareness of the social environment.

As a result of the Bolshevik revolution, Bunin left Russia for France in 1919. In France, he continued his prolific output of prose. The Well Days (1930), Bunin's autobiographical novel, was hailed as a masterpiece by a number of critics. In 1933, Bunin was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature.

Bunin lived the rest of his life in Paris, where he died in 1953. His contribution to Russian literature is immeasurable. His elegant prose, combined with lively poetic diction, is remarkable for its literary value, as well as for its social commentary and insight.

Other Works by Ivan Bunin

Edited and translated by Thomas Gaiton Marullo.

Cursed Days: A Diary of Revolution. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1998.

The Life of Arseniev: Youth. Translated by Gleb Struv and Hamish Miles. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1994.

Sunstroke: Selected Stories of Ivan Bunin. Translated by Graham Hettlinger. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2002.

Works about Ivan Bunin

Marullo, Thomas Gaiton. If You See the Buddha: Studies in the Fiction of Ivan Bunin. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1998.

Woodward, James B. Ivan Bunin: A Study of His Fiction. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980.

Burkart, Erika (Erika Halter)

(1922–) poet, novelist

Erika Burkart was born in Aarau, Switzerland. Her father was a writer, hunter, and adventurer. Burkart became a schoolteacher and taught at a primary school from 1942 to 1952. At age 30, however, she gave up teaching to write full time and lived in isolation to better connect with nature—the inspiration for her writing.

Burkart's early volumes of poetry include Der dunkel Vogel (The Dark Bird, 1953) and Die gerettete Erde (The Saved Earth, 1960). These collections convey her belief in the divinity of nature and her empathy with the natural world. Burkart's reputation increased after she won the Annette von Droste-Hülshoff Prize in 1957. Her poems in the 1960s express her anxiety about the threats to nature. Her first novel Moräne (1970) vividly describes the Swiss countryside and, with its attention to the beauties of nature, reflects the influence of the French writer Marcel PROUST. Burkart's works in the 1980s and 1990s show her continued affinity and concern for the landscape. She is widely admired for her commitment to ecology and her efforts to heal the rift between humanity and nature.

Another Work by Erika Burkart

Der Weg zu den Schaffen. Zurich: Artemis, 1979.

A Work about Erika Burkart

Rudin-Lange, Doris. Erika Burkart, Leben und Werk. Zurich: Juris Druck and Verlag, 1979.

Busia, Abena (1953–) poet, essayist, scholar

Abena Busia was born in Ghana, daughter to the former prime minister. As a youth her family was forced into exile following a coup d'état. Her personal history is marked by the experience of exile, as she traveled the world encountering other people of African descent in the Americas and Europe. Her focus became the points of cultural connection within the African Diaspora (the scattering of African peoples throughout the world through slavery). She received her Ph.D. from Oxford writing her dissertation on images of Africa in the colonial imagination.

Her collection of poems, Testimonies of Exile (1990), speaks to multiple experiences of exile. Her poetry expresses the complexity of her cultural experience: She dresses in traditional Ghanaian attire and speaks with a British accent that reveals the history of colonization yet never betrays the pulsating rhythms and culture of her native Africa.

As a professor she has taught at Yale, UCLA, and University of Ghana and is currently an associate professor at Rutgers University. Much of her recent work focuses on black feminism, exploring the issues of identity, race, and politics. She is currently the codirector of Women Writing Africa, a Ford Foundation literary project of the Feminist Press that publishes African women's written and oral narratives.

Another Work by Abena Busia

"What Is Your Nation? Reconnecting Africa and Her Diaspora through Paule Marshall's Praisesong for the Widow." In Cheryl Wall, ed., Changing Our Own Words: Essays on Criticism, Theory, and Writing by Black Women. London: Rutgers University Press, 1989.

Cabrera Infante, Guillermo (G. Cain)
(1929–2005) novelist, essayist

Cabrera Infante was born in Gibara, Cuba. His father was a journalist and typographer. Both of his parents were leaders in the then-underground Cuban Communist Party. When Cabrera Infante was 14 years old, his parents were arrested for holding secret political meetings in their home and spent three months in jail. This infringement on their freedom gave Cabrera Infante a strong dislike for authority. Even after the Cuban revolution, when he was given a number of prestigious literary appointments, he was still unable to abide government censorship and control.

Because his father had lost his job, after Cabrera Infante's parents were released from jail, the family was forced to move to Havana. The urban culture and nightlife of Havana affected Cabrera Infante enormously, and the city at night became the setting for his most famous novel, Three Trapped Tigers (1971).

When he was 18, he read El Señor Presidente by Guatemalan novelist Miguel Angel Asturias (1899–1974). Cabrera Infante decided that if Asturias was considered a writer, he could be one too, and he began to write short stories and sketches. During the next few years, he published his writing in and founded several small magazines. At age 23, he was jailed for what the government called “publishing profanities in English.” When he was forbidden to publish anything using his name, he assumed the pseudonym G. Cain and continued to write and publish until the Cuban revolution.

It was not until Cabrera Infante was sent to Brussels as a cultural attaché at the Cuban embassy that he completed and published Three Trapped Tigers (1970), which gained him international attention. In this book, Cabrera Infante uses humor and wordplay to challenge every type of authority, even the authority of language itself. The book is written using a great deal of Cuban slang, undermining the authority of standard literary Spanish. Cabrera Infante's idiomatic language captures the flavor of nightlife in prerevolutionary Havana one evening in 1958. On first reading, the book appears to be a series of unrelated episodes that are unified only by their setting. However, on careful examination, it becomes obvious that the book is carefully structured so that each episode corresponds to a biblical story, beginning with a creation story and moving on to stories that correspond to the fall from the Garden of Eden, the events related to the Tower of Babel, and the apocalypse. This structuring is both profound, giving depth to the frivolous scenes of nightlife, and irreverent, proposing a highly unorthodox commentary on the Bible and society.

Infante's Inferno (1984), his second novel, centers on a single character. The book follows a young boy growing up in Havana and is semiautobiographical. It focuses on the loves and erotic adventures of the narrator, who claims to be a modern-day Don Juan. The book begins when the boy is 12 years old and follows him, as he matures, through a series of frivolous relationships. Finally, as an adult, he finds an exalted and ideal form of love. Like Cabrera Infante's other works, this book is filled with game playing, literary allusion, and humor. However, it also established that he is one of the great erotic writers of Latin America.

Cabrera Infante has been a major proponent of interpreting books based on the text alone, without relying on historical context. He believes that once a fact is placed into a work of fiction, it is no longer connected to the reality that may have inspired its author to create it. This idea, combined with his playful literary style, has made him one of the major proponents of "art for art's sake" in 20th-century Latin American literature.

Other Works by Guillermo Cabrera Infante

Guilty of Dancing the Chachacha. Translated by the author. New York: Welcome Rain Publishers, 2001.

Holy Smoke. New York: Harper & Row, 1985.

View Of Dawn in the Tropics. Translated by Suzanne Jill Levine. New York: Harper & Row, 1978.

Works about Guillermo Cabrera Infante

Hall, Kenneth E. "Cabrera Infante as Biographer" in Biography 19:4 (Fall 1996): 394–403. Hawaii: University of Hawaii Press, 1996.

Souza, Raymond D. Guillermo Cabrera Infante: Two Islands, Many Worlds. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1996.

Caeiro, Alberto

See PESSOA, FERNANDO.

Cain, G.

See CABRERA INFANTE, GUILLERMO.

Calvino, Italo (1923–1985) novelist, short-story writer, journalist

Born in Santiago de las Vegas, Cuba, Italo Calvino is the son of Mario Calvino and Eva (Mameli) Calvino, both tropical agronomists. Calvino grew up on the family farm in San Remo, where his father grew tropical fruit for experimentation and acted as a curator for a botanical garden. Early on, Calvino was enchanted by Rudyard Kipling's stories. He enrolled in the University of Turin with plans to study agronomy, but his plans changed in the early 1940s when he joined the Italian resistance in World War II to fight against the Nazis and fascists.

After the war, Calvino resumed studies at the University of Turin in 1945, this time focusing his attention on literature. He wrote his thesis on novelist Joseph Conrad. In 1945, Calvino combined writing with his wartime efforts by contributing to leftist newspapers such as Il Politecnico. He produced his first novel, The Path to the Nest of Spiders (1947), two years later. The book, which won him the Premio Riccione award, is based on his time as a partisan fighter, yet it retains an innocence that is part of much of his early narratives. "The problems of our time appear in any story I write," Calvino told the New York Times Book Review in 1983.

The Path to the Nest of Spiders lacks the grimness of much of Italian neorealism, both in fiction and in films, partly because of an exuberant, picaresque flavor for which Calvino is indebted to his boyhood reading of Robert Louis Stevenson's Kidnapped and Treasure Island.

Other notable works followed, including the collection, Short Stories (1958) and a three-volume edition of Italian Folktales (1956). In his introduction to the latter, Calvino states, "Folktales are real. These folk stories are the catalog of the potential destinies of men and women, especially for that stage in life when destiny is formed, i.e., youth." Calvino's stories and novels use elements of fantasy and fable, displaying the influence of Italian folktales and other traditional narratives. In one of his best-known novels, Invisible Cities (1972), for example, an imaginary Marco Polo describes the cities of his empire to Kublai Khan.

One of his most popular novels with readers in the United States was If on a Winter's Night a Traveler (1979). In this work, the protagonist is the reader. Calvino's characters are highly self-conscious, and his novels are self-referential. Irish author Silas Flannery, one of the characters in If On a Winter's Night a Traveler, states, "I have had the idea of writing a novel composed only of beginnings of novels. The protagonist could be the reader who is continually interrupted."

At his death in 1985, Italo Calvino was the best-known and most-translated contemporary Italian writer. He has accumulated numerous honors and accolades through the span of his career, earning the Italian equivalent of the Pulitzer Prize in literature in 1972.

Other Works by Italo Calvino

Mr. Palomar. Translated by William Weaver. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1985.

Under the Jaguar Sun. Translated by William Weaver. Harvest Books, 1990.

Works about Italo Calvino

McLaughlin, Martin. Italo Calvino. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.

Weiss, Beno. Understanding Italo Calvino. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.

Campos, Alvaro de

See PESSOA, FERNANDO.

Camus, Albert (1913–1960) novelist, essayist, playwright

Albert Camus was born in Mondovi, Algeria, on November 7. Perhaps because he was born to a poverty-stricken family, his education was taken seriously. He attended the university in Algiers, where he became interested in both sports and the theater. He was forced to end his education early, however, by an acute bout with tuberculosis, a disease that continued to plague him throughout his life. The experience of poverty and the fear of death take on major significance in Camus's series of Algerian essays, collected in L'Envers et l'endroit (The Wrong Side and the Right Side, 1937), Noces (Nuptials, 1938), and Été (Summer, 1954).

Recovered from his illness, Camus went to work in the early 1950s as a journalist for the anticolonialist newspaper Alger-Républicain, for which he wrote daily articles on the impoverished lives of Arabs in the Kabyles region. He later collected these works in Actuelles III (1958). His journalistic background proved invaluable when he went to France during World War II. While working for the combat resistance network, he began to edit a clandestine journal. The subject of his editorials showed a strong desire to integrate political activism with strict morality.

During the war years, Camus also began to explore what came to be known as his doctrine of the absurd. It was his view that all things in life become meaningless as a result of the fact that the human mind has no rational capacity to understand the experience of death. His novel L'Étranger (1942; translated as The Stranger, 1946), for example, explores the concept of alienation. The Myth of Sisyphus (1942; translated 1955) and two plays published in 1944, Cross Purpose (1944; translated 1948) and Caligula (1941; translated 1948), all explore the idea of nihilism.

Although considered an absurdist, Camus had difficulty with the idea that the absurd entailed a lack of morality. His own life and his experiences in occupied France during the war would not allow him to abandon all concepts of moral responsibility. This idea became the focus of Letters to a German Friend (1945). Camus began to rebel against the absurd, seeking ways to create a greater strength of humanity guided by morality. His novel The Plague (1947; translated 1948), for example, details the struggle of those who fight against the bubonic plague, an allegory for the struggle against the evils of war. Instead of focusing on whether or not the battle against evil can be successful, he chooses instead to glorify dignity, as exemplary of humanity's strength in the face of devastation.

Camus also became embroiled in a bitter controversy with fellow philosopher Jean Paul SARTRE as a result of the publication of his controversial essay L'Homme Révolté (1951; translated as The Rebel, 1954). In this essay, Camus criticized the absolutism of the Christian belief in eternal life in heaven and of the Marxist belief in political utopia. He argued instead that the more moral concept was that of Mediterranean humanism, a doctrine that placed value on nature and temperance in behavior over blind belief and the descent into violence as an acceptable solution to problems. Camus further explores the concept of modern amorality in his novel La Chute (The Fall, 1956).

As a playwright, Camus published two political dramas, State of Siege (1948; translated 1958) and The Just Assassins (1950; translated 1958), as well as adaptations of Faulkner's Requiem for a Nun (1956) and DOSTOYEVSKY's The Possessed (1959).

In 1957, Camus was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature. He had become the leading voice for morality and for writing as a means to achieve social change in his generation. He was at the height of his popularity when he died in an automobile accident near Sens, France, on January 4.

Other Works by Albert Camus

Between Hell and Reason: Essays from the Resistance Newspaper "Combat," 1944–47. Translated by Alexandre de Gramont. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1991.

The First Man. Translated by David Hapgood. New York: Knopf, 1995.

Works about Albert Camus

Bronner, Stephen Eric. Camus: Portrait of a Moralist. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.

Camber, Richard. On Camus. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth/Thompson Learning, 2002.

Canetti, Elias (1905–1994) novelist, essayist, playwright

Elias Canetti was born in Ruse, Bulgaria, to a wealthy Jewish merchant family. After the sudden death of his father, he moved with his mother to Vienna, where he learned German, the language he would ultimately choose for his writing.

Canetti produced his first play Junius Brutus while studying in Zurich between 1916 and 1921. However, it was during a visit to Berlin in 1928 when, influenced by the ideas of Bertold BRECHT, George Grosz, and Isaac BABEL, Canetti developed the idea for a series of works that would explore human madness. This later became the basis of his novel Die Blendung (1935; The Tower of Babel, translated 1947 and 1964). The tale of a madman who only feels at home with his books and shuns human contact in any form, the novel was banned by the Nazis as subversive but was well received internationally after World War II.

In 1927, another event influenced Canetti's writing: A crowd of angry protestors burned down the Palace of Justice in Vienna, and Canetti was caught up in the mob. Later, he turned this incident into the basis for his best-known book, Crowds and Power (1960), a fictional study of death, disordered society, and mass movements. Drawing not only on his own experience but also on history, folklore, and mythology, this work received critical acclaim that culminated in Canetti's receipt of the Nobel Prize for literature in 1981.

In his later years, Canetti returned to his focus on death. He wrote three largely autobiographical works, including Die Gerettete Zunge (1978; The Rescued Tongue, translated 1980) about his father's death. He lived modestly in Hampstead, England, avoiding critical attention as much as possible to the point of writing his own diary in a code so that intrusive readers would not be able to understand it after his death.

Other Works by Elias Canetti

Crowds and Power. Translated by Carol Stewart. New York: Continuum Pub Group, 1982.

The Play of the Eyes. Translated by Ralph Manheim. New York: Farrar Straus & Giroux, 1986.

The Wedding. Translated by Gitta Honegger. New York: PAJ Publications, 1986.

A Work about Elias Canetti

Falk, Thomas H. Elias Canetti. Boston: Twayne, 1993.

Capécia, Mayotte (1928–1953) novelist

Mayotte Capécia was born in Carbet, Martinique, but spent most of her adult years in France. Barely able to read when she arrived in Paris in 1946, Capécia published her first novelette, Je suis Martiniquaise (I Am a Martinican Woman) in 1948. According to Mayotte Capécia ou l'Alienation selon Fanon (1999), Capécia drew on a lover's manuscript and used several ghostwriters and editors to construct her novelettes.

Je suis martiniquaise and La Nègresse blanche (The White Negress, 1950), her second novelette, explore themes of miscegenation, racial identity, and exile. They also examine people in Martinique and Guadeloupe during the German occupation of France in World War II. Frantz FANON criticized both works for exemplifying the hatred of blacks and used them as examples of Caribbean alienation. Others have also criticized the novels for positioning whites as superior.

Counterattacks in defense of Capécia's work have since surfaced, acclaiming their exploration of race relations in the West Indies. In a 1998 review in World Literature Today, Robert P. Smith Jr., asserts, "in spite of their date, Capécia's novelettes remain contemporary in today's complex world of illusion and reality."

Another Work by Mayotte Capécia

I Am a Martinican Woman & The White Negress.

Translated by Beatrice Stith Clark. Pueblo, Colo.: Passeggiata Press, 1997.

Works about Mayotte Capécia

Hurley, E. Anthony. "Intersections of Female Identity or Writing the Woman in Two Novels by Mayotte Capécia and Marie-Magdeleine Carbet." The French Review, 70, no. 4 (1997): 575–86.

Sparrow, Jennifer. "Capécia, Conde and the Antillean Woman's Identity Quest." Journal of the Association of Caribbean Women Writers and Scholars, 1 (1998): 179–87.

Stith Clark, Beatrice. "Who was Mayotte Capécia? An Update." CLA Journal, 39, no. 4 (1996): 454–57.

Carey, Peter (1943–) novelist

Peter Carey was born in Bacchus Marsh, Victoria, Australia. He studied chemistry at Monash University but failed his first-year examinations and dropped out of college. Carey then found work as an apprentice writer in an advertising agency in Melbourne, and this became the turning point in his life. At the agency, Carey met writers and playwrights, especially Barry Oakley, who would forever influence him. Oakley introduced Carey to the works of writers such as James Joyce, William Faulkner, and Samuel BECKETT, which had a powerful influence on Carey's writings. Carey next worked in advertising agencies in London and Sydney before settling down in New York in the late 1980s.

Carey's novels are often described as a mix of seriousness and surrealism. His preference for the macabre and the unusual is exemplified by the assortment of strange and tormented characters in his stories, such as the minister in the grip of a gambling compulsion in Oscar and Lucinda (1988). The absurdity of the characters' internal world is complicated by their actual situations in the external world in which they live. Through the clever twisting of his tales, Carey is able to communicate the phantasmagoric but realistic situations of ordinary human experiences. His stories are sardonic commentaries on the bittersweet and inextricably welded relationship between the individual and the society. The often seedy and shadowy nature of Carey's actors makes it hard for some readers to empathize with their tragic and unfortunate experiences. This controversial nature of Carey's novels makes them compelling and thought-provoking to read.

Carey sees himself as an Australian writer, and his works are predominantly set in Australia, either in the countryside or on the streets of big cities. His characters, however, have a variety of backgrounds and origins. They range from the average man on the street to infamous outlaws. Though most of Carey's characters are fictional figures, he has also used historical materials to reconstruct the life and exploits of certain historical figures, such as Ned Kelly in The True History of the Kelly Gang (2000). Ned Kelly was a celebrated outlaw who eluded the police for many years before he was captured and hanged in 1880. An unlikely hero, Kelly is a powerful legendary figure who is admired and respected for his filial piety and loyalty. Many of Carey's protagonists share a similar characteristic—they are social failures and misfits. By narrating their stories, Carey attempts to show that these characters, through their unconventional behavior and personality, challenge a society that does not endorse difference; it is society's inflexible institutions that make the characters victims within their own societies.

Critical Analysis

Carey is an accessible writer whose works appeal to a mass audience. Carey wrote several short stories before the publication of his first novel (Bliss, 1981). These stories won Carey a large following of fans in Australia, especially among the younger generation. One of these stories is "Crabs," a powerful depiction of the sense of alienation. "Crabs" tells the tale of a young man who transforms himself into a tow truck after he realizes that he and his girlfriend are marooned at the drive-in theater. The young man finally realizes in the end that although he has successfully escaped, he is all alone in the world as is everyone else who is still at the drive-in theater.

Carey's later short stories also examine the theme of estrangement. In "The Fat Man in History," for instance, a fat man finds himself caught in a world that favors slim and muscular bodies. In a postrevolutionary era, where humanity is reduced to forms and shapes of its bodies, the protagonist declares obesity to be subversive and challenges the status quo. Through his misfit central characters, Carey is able to poke fun at the mindless fashion trends of contemporary society where men and women are reduced to mere objects. "The Fat Man in History" was published in a collection of short stories of the same title in 1980.

Bliss, which won the Miles Franklin Award in 1982, is a nightmarish and surrealistic tale of a man who dies three times but is resurrected each time to face new challenges. This novel combines light comedy with cynical jabs at the contemporary situation. The story has a political message, as it laments the role of American companies and popular culture in influencing and changing Australia.

Carey's second novel, Illywhacker (1985), which is set in Australia's bushwhacking country, conveys a bleak view of Australian society. The narrator, the 139-year-old Herbert Badgery, represents the first generation of Australia's inhabitants whose desire to make good and succeed in society is not fulfilled. Badgery's failure to market the plow he has invented is an allegory of Australia's own failure to extract itself from its economic crisis. The poignancy of Badgery's experiences is worsened by his observation that, two generations later, his descendants, now pet-shop owners, find themselves imprisoned within metaphorical cage similar to those in which the pets are kept constrained.

The most influential of all Carey's books are those that examine the history of Australia's social outcasts, such as the convicts, the poor, and the gang members. Jack Maggs (1997), which won the 1998 Commonwealth Writers Prize, is the tale of a young man who inherits money from a convict. It critiques the oppressive influence of English literary writing on Australian literature and represents an attempt to break free of the English conventions of writing.

Carey gains more recognition with every publication. The True History of the Kelly Gang won the 2001 Commonwealth Writers' Prize and 2001 Booker Prize and was shortlisted for the Miles Franklin Award. Anthony J. Hassall, after describing a harrowing death by drowning in the final scene of Oscar and Lucinda, remarks, "All of Carey's stories offer such fierce and dangerous pleasures, and despite the terrors they also enact and arouse, they create a wild, apocalyptic beauty.” He sums up Carey as “a tribal teller of tales, whose stories strive to articulate an indigenous Australian mythology needed to replace the cultural narratives of successive colonial masters.”

Other Works by Peter Carey

Collected Stories. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1994.

The Big Bazoohley. Illustrated by Abira Ali. New York: Henry Holt, 1995.

The Tax Inspector. New York: Vintage, 1993.

The Unusual Life of Tristan Smith: A Novel. New York: Vintage, 1996.

30 Days in Sydney: A Wildly Distorted Account. London: Bloomsbury USA, 2001.

Works about Peter Carey

Hassall, Anthony J. Dancing on Hot MacAdam: Peter Carey's Fiction. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1998.

Huggan, Graham. Peter Carey. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Woodcock, Bruce. Peter Carey. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1997.

Carpentier, Alejo (1904–1980) novelist

Alejo Carpentier was born in Havana to European parents. His father, a French architect, and his Russian mother, a medical student, had been living in Cuba for only two years when Carpentier was born. Carpentier's first language was French, and the family returned to Paris while he was still young, so he received both his elementary and secondary education in French schools. Nevertheless, Carpentier felt very strongly attached to his Cuban roots. All of his literature was inspired by what he felt to be the inner spirit of the indigenous Cuban culture.

Carpentier was obsessed with music and was particularly influenced and inspired by the experimental techniques of Igor Stravinsky. Stravinsky's ballet The Rite of Spring, which employs tribal rhythms, awakened Carpentier to the creative resources that Afro-Cuban music and culture offered for use as raw material by avant-garde literature. Carpentier went on to become a distinguished musicologist, and his interest in music guided his literary development throughout his career.

When he returned to Cuba in his early 20s, he did not have much time to write fiction because of his political activities. He joined the resistance against Cuban dictator Machado and, in 1927, was arrested. He spent seven months in jail, which ironically gave him time to begin his first novel, Ecue-Yamba-O! (1933), which means “God be praised” in the language of the native Cuban religion of Lucumi. This realistic historical novel depicts the struggles of Africans in the new world; however, the book also includes many scenes of mythic and religious rituals that prefigure MAGIC REALISM, one of Carpentier's key contributions to world literature.

Carpentier was released from jail but was not allowed to leave Cuba. Using forged papers, he escaped and returned to France, where he became involved in surrealism and contributed frequently to André BRETON's journal Révolution Surréaliste. However, he later rejected the shocking absurdity of surrealism for a literary style that was closer to myth.

Carpentier's historical novel, The Kingdom of This World (1949), takes place in early 19th-century Haiti under the rule of the Emperor Henri Christophe, a Haitian man who became ruler of the island after the French were overthrown. It is based on research that Carpentier did when he visited Haiti in 1943. While The Kingdom of This World still follows many of the conventions of traditional historical novels, in this book Carpentier first displays his particular style of magic realism, using historical facts as a backdrop for a narrative filled with myth and magic.

In his collection of short stories War of Time (1958), Carpentier used the same musical and mythological style to tell four vaguely autobiographical tales in which he explores the theme of how individuals interact with the larger forces of history around them. These stories examine how everyday reality can take on mythic force. For example, in “The Pursuit,” which takes place in a Havana concert hall during a Beethoven symphony, a young man listens to the music and waits to be assassinated for betraying the Cuban Communist Party to Machado’s forces. The story, which has the plot of an espionage tale, is told in a kind of symbolic montage that is itself a sort of symphony.

After the Cuban revolution, Carpentier became an active member of Castro’s government and continued to write lyrical novels that, most important, saw individuals as capable of determining their own fate through acts of everyday magic.

Other Works by Alejo Carpentier

Explosion in a Cathedral. Translated by John Sturrock; introduction by Timothy Brennan. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001.

The Lost Steps. Translated by Harriet de Onis; introduction by Timothy Brennan. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001.

A Work about Alejo Carpentier

Gonzalez Echevarria, Roberto. Alejo Carpentier: The Pilgrim at Home. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1977.

Castellanos, Rosario (1925–1974)

diplomat, novelist, poet, short-story writer, playwright, critic

Born in Mexico City, Rosario Castellanos grew up in the town of Comitán, Chiapas, Mexico, close to the Guatemalan border. She was educated at the University of Mexico, where she eventually taught literature, although her work as a novelist and poet was the major source of her income. Her familiarity with the lives of the Indians of Chiapas and Guatemala caused her to focus on their plight in many of her works.

Castellanos began her writing career as a poet, publishing her first book of poems, Trajectory of Dust, in 1948. She continued to write many volumes of poetry, including Poetry Is Not You (1972), which focused on human frailty, the limitations of love, and the problems generated by social injustice. Her first novel, The Nine Guardians, first appeared in 1958 and was translated into English in 1970. The story tells of a seven-year-old girl who fights the prevailing exploitation of the indigenous (native) people, as well as social and gender prejudice prevalent in the 1930s in Chiapas. The Nine Guardians won the 1958 Chiapas Prize.

Castellanos’s involvement in the arts and her efforts on behalf of the Mexican feminist movement and indigenous Mexican women led her to be a cultural promoter at the Institute of Science and Arts in Tuxtla Gutiérrez, Chiapas. Her play, The Eternal Feminine, published posthumously in 1975, was first performed in Mexico in 1976 and is considered among the most original and important feminist works of literature in Latin America today.

Castellanos’s 1960 collection of short stories, City of Kings, which focuses on the deceitful treatment of the Chiapa people by white landowners, won the Xavier Vaillaurrutia prize, and her novel, Labors of Darkness (1962), earned the 1962 Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz prize, the 1967 Carlos Trouyat Prize in Letters, and the 1972 Elías Sourasky Prize in Letters. When she accidentally died of electrocution while serving as Mexico’s ambassador to Israel, Rosario Castellanos was regarded as Mexico’s major 20th-century female novelist, a title she continues to hold.

Another Work by Rosario Castellanos

A Rosario Castellanos Reader. Translated by Maureen Ahern et al. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988.

A Work about Rosario Castellanos

Bonifaz Caballero, Oscar. Remembering Rosario: A Personal Glimpse into the Life and Works of Rosario Castellanos. Translated by Myralyn F. Allgood. Potomac, Md.: Scripta Humanistica, 1990.

Castro, Rosalía de (1837–1885) poet, novelist

Rosalía de Castro was born in Santiago de Compostela, a region in the northwest of Spain where Galician, similar to Portuguese, was the dominant dialect. She was illegitimate, the child of Teresa de Castro y Abadía, a Galician from a well-off family, and José Martínez Viojo, a seminarian who eventually rose to become the chaplain of Iria. Castro was raised in the countryside with a peasant family and then “reclaimed” by her mother when she was 13. Thus, her early years gave her the opportunity to learn the folklore and songs of Galicia, while her adolescence introduced her to a more traditional education typical for women of her time: learning how to play music, draw, and speak a foreign language.

At the age of 21, Castro married another Galician, Manuel Murguía, a dwarf who had favorably reviewed her first book of poems, The Flower (1857). After returning with her husband to her native Santiago in 1859, she bore six children and lived to bury three of them. Her life was difficult, characterized by illness, poverty, and the frustrations associated with being a woman writer in a male-dominated society.

Although her early work is written in the more widely read Castilian, the Spanish language, Castro later chose to write in her beloved Galician, the musical language in which Spanish medieval poetry was written. However, by the 19th century, Galicia was a poor region that provided many of the servants employed by wealthy Castilians, so her work was not appreciated or read by the majority of people. Critics now believe that writing in Galician most likely limited Castro’s audience and postponed her current recognition as one of Spain’s major 19th-century poets.

Rosalía de Castro was the author of four novels. The first, Daughter of the Sea, was published in 1859, and the last, The First Madman, was published in 1881, both touching on the pain experienced by children. During this period she published two volumes of poetry written in Galician, Galician Songs (1863) and New Leaves (1880), with themes of nature, solitude, and the plight of women and the poor. Her final volume of poems, On the Shores of the Saar (1884), expressing the disillusionment of adulthood, was written in Spanish and appeared shortly before she died of cancer.

Although Castro’s novels contributed to her fame, her poetry established her talent and success. As noted by Salvador de Madariaga, quoted in The Defiant Muse: Hispanic Feminist Poets from the Middle Ages to the Present, Castro’s poetry can be considered “the best written in Spain in the nineteenth century.”

Another Work by Rosalía de Castro

Poems. Translated by Anna-Marie Aldaz and Barbara N. Gantt. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991.

Works about Rosalía de Castro

Dever, Aileen. Radical Insufficiency of Human Life: The Poetry of R. de Castro and J. A. Silva. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Company, 2000.

Stevens, Shelley. Rosalía de Castro and the Galician Revival. London: Tamesis Books Ltd., 1986.

Cattopadhyay, Bankim-Chandra

(Bankim Chandra Chatterji) (1838–1894)
novelist

Bankim-Chandra Cattopadhyay was born in Kantalpara, West Bengal, India. His father worked as a tax collector for the government. Cattopadhyay was the first Indian to graduate from Calcutta University (in 1858) at a time when only British people were enrolled. He worked for the government for 30 years while also writing literature. He founded the literary magazine Bangadarsan (Mirror of Bengal) in 1872 and was always very involved in supporting Bengali journalism.

Cattopadhyay started to write poetry but soon turned to the novel. His attempt at the novel was written in Bengali and submitted for a writing contest; it did not win and has never been published. Cattopadhyay’s first published novel, Rajmohan’s Wife (1864), was written in English and is considered to be a reworking of his earlier unpublished novelette. He published numerous romance novels, which display his ability to rewrite historical moments within romantic and melodramatic contexts. His development of the novel in India had an immense impact, as he rejected the conventional Sanskritized literary movement, which supplanted Perso-Arabic words with Sanskrit ones and developed a more Westernized approach to Indian themes. Western ideas, such as romance and sensibility, were seen to be more important than the Indian sense of duty. This shift comes out most strongly in his depiction of women who are often compelled to transgress convention in the pursuit of love. Their love is tragic, however, because it can never be fully realized. In Durgesnandini (1865), for instance, the volatile politics between Pathans and Mughals in 16th-century Bengal is offset by a Pathan princess's refusal to accept racial boundaries in her love. Famous for such historical novels, Cattopadhyay is today viewed as the "father of the Indian novel."

Cattopadhyay is also seen as a national poet. The patriotic poem "Vande Materam" ("I Worship Mother") from his novel Ānandamāth (The Abbey of Bliss, 1882) was adopted throughout India as its unofficial national anthem in the early decades of the 20th century. It was adopted into a song by another famous Bengali poet Rabindranath TAGORE. The novel is a powerful story based on the 1773 resistance against Muslim and British conquerors of India by a group of Hindu hermits.

Cattopadhyay's work has been translated into every major Indian language. In 1884, his novel Bishabriksa, was translated into English for publication outside India. In 1892, the British government awarded Cattopadhyay the title of Ray Bahadur (Brave leader) in honor of his worldwide literary achievements.

Another Work by Bankim C. Cattopadhyay
Krishnakanta's Will. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1962.

Cavafy, Constantine P. (1863–1933) poet
Constantine P. Cavafy was born in Alexandria, Egypt, on April 29. He died in Alexandria on the same date. The son of a wealthy English businessman, he moved with his mother to England after his father's death in 1870. He stayed there for seven years, until the family business folded, causing Cavafy and his family to return to Alexandria in poverty. During his time in England, Cavafy became fluent in English and developed a love of English literature that would ultimately influence his decision to become a poet.

Cavafy's first job in 1885 was as a journalist. During this time, he began to publish a few poems on conventional romantic themes. Eventually, he gained steady employment and continued to write poetry. Between 1891 and 1904, he distributed his poetry exclusively to friends. His collected works did not emerge until two years after his death and did not become well known among English audiences until 1952.

After his death, Cavafy's reputation grew, and his poetry, often referred to as disturbing yet beautiful, began to influence other Greek poets. His poetry is known primarily for its themes of love and longing, as well as for its open expression of homosexuality. Often filled with a sense of nostalgia and regret at the decay of culture and the failure of human aspirations, his works are unsentimental.

Cavafy spent most of his life alone. He developed two short-lived relationships, both with men, which shaped the sense of longing in his poems. He also had a long-term acquaintance with the English novelist E. M. Forster. Cavafy died of cancer in Alexandria. It was reported that his final action was to draw a circle on a sheet of paper and enclose within it a period.

Another Work by Constantine P. Cavafy

Before Time Could Change Them: The Complete Poems of Constantine P. Cavafy. Translated by Theoharis Constantine Theoharis. New York: Harcourt Brace, 2001.

A Work about Constantine P. Cavafy

Keeley, Edmund. Cavafy's Alexandria. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1995.

Cela, Camilo José (1916–2002) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

Camilo José Cela was born in Iria Flavia, Spain, the eldest of seven children in a conservative upper-middle-class home. When he was 20, the Spanish civil war erupted and he was caught in the siege of Madrid. The horrors he saw at that time became the source for much of the imagery he uses in his later novels. He joined Franco's army and, after the fascists' victory, was given a number of important literary and political positions. His work, however, can be seen as an ironic subversion of some of the regime's principles.

Cela's first novel, The Family of Pascual Duarte (1942), has been compared to Albert CAMUS's novel The Stranger. The Family of Pascual Duarte tells the story of a peasant, Pascual Duarte, who is waiting in jail to be executed. Pascual relates, in a distant and emotionally flat tone, a series of horrible acts that he has committed. Cela uses this contrast to explore existential feelings of disconnection. The novel shows the influence of Pío BAROJA Y NESSI in its terse style and complicated structure, and it has inspired many imitators in modern Spanish prose. It is also one of the precursors of OBJECTIVISMO.

Cela went on to write a number of innovative novels that experimented with structure. San Camilo 1936 (1969), written entirely in the second person, is a long monologue that depicts life in Madrid just before the outbreak of war.

In 1989, Cela won the Nobel Prize in literature. His novels and essays walk a fine line between representing traditional literary and political modes and ironically undermining them. His address to the Nobel Committee expresses his respect both for tradition and for the need to push against its limits: "Let us never forget that confusing procedure with the rule of Law, just as observing the letter rather than the spirit of the Law, always leads to injustice which is both the source and consequence of disorder."

Another Work by Camilo José Cela

The Hive. Translated by J. M. Cohen in consultation with Arturo Barea. New York: Noonday Press, 1990.

A Work about Camilo José Cela

Kirsner, Robert. The Novels and Travels of Camilo José Cela. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1964.

Celan, Paul (Paul Antschel) (1920–1970) poet, essayist, translator

Paul Celan was born Paul Antschel, the only child of German-speaking Jewish parents, in Cernauti, Romania. Young Celan attended German-speaking school and Hebrew school in his childhood. He shared a passion for German poetry with his mother, Fritzi Antschel, especially the ROMANTICISM of Novalis. Celan went to Paris in 1938 to study medicine and then to the University of Czernowitz to learn romance philology. He was particularly attracted by the poetry of Georg TRAKL and Rainer Maria RILKE. During World War II, Celan's parents were killed by the Nazis in a concentration camp. Celan was able to survive by working in a forced labor camp until it was liberated by Russian troops in 1943.

In 1944, Celan moved to Bucharest, Romania, where he worked as a translator and editor for a publishing company. In 1947, he emigrated to Vienna, and the following year, he permanently settled in Paris, where he taught German language and literature at the École Normale Supérieure. Celan began writing poetry in the late 1940s to relate his experiences of the Holocaust. He was published in several magazines and newspapers throughout West Germany.

Celan gained critical recognition and acclaim in 1952 with the publication of Poppy and Memories, a collection that thematically focused on the Holocaust and the Jewish experience under the Nazi regime. The imagery in the collection is nightmarish and surreal, marked by the underlying violence of the place and time, as can be seen in "Death Fugue," the most famous poem in the collection: "Black milk of morning we drink at you at dusk-time . . . /We scoop out a grave in the sky where it is roomy to lie."

During the 1960s, Celan extensively translated French poetry into German. In 1960, he was awarded the prestigious Georg Büchner Prize for his poetry. Celan's mental health deteriorated rapidly during these years; apparently, he could not reconcile his Jewish origins and the Holocaust experience with his love for the German language. Although he visited Israel and frequently introduced Jewish themes in his work, the memory of his suffering and the medium of his poetic expression (German) proved to be utterly irreconcilable. He entered a psychiatric hospital in 1965. After being accused of plagiarism, seemingly without grounds, Celan suffered a complete nervous breakdown. He killed himself at the age of 49.

Paul Celan made a tremendous contribution to the German language and the expression of the Jewish experience during and after the Holocaust. The fragmented syntax and minimalism often found in his verse represents the violence and the shattered world of the Holocaust survivor. He is widely read and studied throughout the world.

Other Works by Paul Celan

Glottal Stop: 101 Poems. Translated by Nikolai Popov. Boston: University of New England Press, 2000.

Selected Poems and Prose of Paul Celan. Translated by John Felsteiner. New York: Norton, 2000.

A Work about Paul Celan

Felsteiner, John. Paul Celan: Poet, Survivor, Jew. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2001.

Céline, Louis-Ferdinand (1894–1961) novelist

Louis-Ferdinand Céline was born Louis Ferdinand Destouches on May 27 in Courbevoie to a working-class family. He grew up in Paris, where his mother ran a lace shop. In 1912, he enlisted in the army and served in World War I, where he was severely wounded and left with permanent disabilities. He returned to France to study medicine, going on to become a doctor.

Céline became famous as a writer with the publication of his first novel, Journey to the End of the Night (1932; translated 1943). Praised by right-wing extremists, the work was largely based on Céline's own adventures: in the trenches during World War I, running a trading post in Africa, working in a factory in the United States, and returning to Paris to practice medicine. His second novel, Death on the Installment Plan (1936; translated 1938), which continues the protagonist's story from Journey to the End of the Night, was also a critical success. Céline's popularity stemmed largely from the contemporary nature of his writing and its relevance to the understanding of current events and world situations.

In the late 1930s, Céline traveled to the Soviet Union, where he wrote the first of several notorious anti-Semitic, pacifist pamphlets, declaring his disenchantment with war. He began to focus his writing in an attempt to prevent his country from entering World War II. After the war, Céline was accused of having Nazi sympathies. He fled to Germany, where he remained in exile until 1951.

In all of Céline's works, his characters' lives are filled with failure, anxiety, and nihilism. He had difficulty communicating during his life and sank progressively into depression, madness, and rage. His novels display this through their depictions of giants, paraplegics, and gnomes, as well as graphic visions of dismemberment and murder.

Céline died on July 1 of a ruptured aneurysm. Though his works remain controversial, his attacks against war have influenced such writers as Henry Miller and Kurt Vonnegut, Jr. His influence on world literature stems largely from his willingness to write about controversial subjects and his innovative style (his use of first-person narrative and slang).

Another Work by Louis-Ferdinand Céline

Ballets Without Music, Without Dancers, Without Anything. Translated by Thomas and Carol Christensen. Los Angeles: Green Integer, 1999.

A Work about Louis-Ferdinand Céline

Hewitt, Nicholas. The Life of Céline: A Critical Biography. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 1999.

Césaire, Aimé (1913–) poet, teacher, playwright, politician

Aimé Césaire was born into a family of seven children in Basse-Pointe, Martinique. Césaire's father worked as an accountant for the colonial internal-revenue service, and his mother was a seamstress. After earning a scholarship in 1924, Césaire left his local elementary school to attend the Lycée Schoelcher in Fort-de-France, the capital of Martinique. There Césaire met classmate Léon Damas, who later contributed to NÉGRITUDE, and instructor Octave Manoni, whose theories of colonization Césaire later critiqued.

The top student at Lycée Schoelcher in 1931, Césaire earned a scholarship to Paris's prestigious Lycée Louis-le-Grand. There Césaire read widely, including the works of Marx, Freud, and the precursors of surrealism, Lautréamont and Rimbaud. With Léopold Sédar Senghor, head of the African students, and Damas, Césaire published L'Étudiant Noir (The Black Student) in 1934 "for all black students, regardless of origin." Now considered the cofounder of négritude with Senghor, Damas claimed that Césaire first used the word négritude in a L'Étudiant Noir editorial. The small student newspaper appeared five or six times during the next two years until funding difficulties and French authorities stopped publication.

After taking and passing entrance exams to L'École Normale Supérieure in 1935, Césaire went to Yugoslavia with classmate Peter Guberina. A visit to Martinska, or St. Martin's Island, contributed to notes which became Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (Return to My Native Land), published in 1939, near the time Césaire became a teacher of classical and modern literature at the Lycée Schoelcher. Themes of black West Indian identity run through this and subsequent works, including Tropiques, a quarterly journal founded in 1941 with his wife Suzanne and other Martinican intellectuals. Reading Cahier d'un retour au pays natal prompted André Breton to publish "Un grand poète noir" in a 1943 New York-based French-English review. This essay served as the preface to subsequent editions of the original text.

Césaire lived in Haiti and lectured on French poetry after the Provisional French government, which took over in 1943, sent him there as a cultural ambassador. Working in Haiti gave Césaire enough material to write a celebratory historical study on Haiti and his first play written for the stage, La Tragédie du roi Christophe (The Tragedy of King Christophe, 1963). The play draws on the life of Henri Christophe, one of Haiti's earliest leaders, and employs Shakespearean style and tone.

In 1945 Césaire became Mayor of Fort-de-France on a Communist ticket and the following year was the deputy for Martinique in the French National Assembly. In response to criticism of his critiques of French government, Césaire published Discours sur le colonialisme (Discourse on Colonialism, 1950). The pamphlet critiques racist tendencies in French government and "universal" values based on white civilization, and it calls for political change.

Césaire continued combining literary endeavors with political activism. The surrealistic style of his poetry prompted praise from Jean-Paul Sartre and criticism from Communist Party members, who called it "decadent." Frustrated with attitudes and actions of the French Communist Party, which Césaire accused of "empire building" in the Third World in a Lettre à Maurice Thorez (Letter to Maurice Thorez), Césaire founded the Martinican Progressive Party in 1958.

Plays published during the 1960s caused some to consider Césaire one of the leading black dramatists of French expression. Une saison au Congo (A Season in the Congo, 1966) focuses on the demise of Congolese premier Patrice Lumumba and was not as well received by critics or audiences as Césaire's first play, La Tragédie du roi Christophe. Césaire's radical adaptation of Shakespeare's The Tempest as Une tempête (A Tempest, 1969) focuses on the relationship between the colonizer and the colonized and uses modern language and three acts instead of five. Une tempête initially generated much negative commentary by Western critics but was well received by international audiences when performed.

The younger generation of Martinican writers, including Bernabé, Chamoiseau, and Confiant, disagree with Césaire's allegiance to writing black literature in French. As Ernest Moutoussamy remarks in Aimé Césaire, Député à l'Assemblée Nationale, 1945–1993 (1993), "His poetic discourse is that of a prophet, his political discourse is that of a realist and as such makes room for compromise."

Other Works by Aimé Césaire

Aimé Césaire: The Collected Poetry. Translated by Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.

Lyric and Dramatic Poetry, 1946–82. Translated by Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1990.

Works about Aimé Césaire

Davis, Gregson. Aimé Césaire. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Hale, Thomas, ed. Critical Perspectives on Aimé Césaire. Washington, D.C.: Three Continents Press, 1992.

San Juan, E. Aimé Césaire: Surrealism and Revolution. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Press, 2000.

Chamoiseau, Patrick (1953–) nonfiction and fiction writer

Patrick Chamoiseau was born in Fort-de-France, Martinique. Educated as a lawyer in Martinique and France, Chamoiseau worked as a full-time probation officer for 15 years. In an interview with James Ferguson, Chamoiseau said, "It sounds terrible, but understanding these people's experiences has helped me hugely as a writer, as it has allowed me to look into aspects of life that you wouldn't normally encounter." By writing evenings, weekends, and holidays, Chamoiseau managed to publish prolifically—novels, memoirs, literary criticism, and a collection of short stories.

Chamoiseau sees himself as a "word scratcher"—novelist or writer—who communicates traditions of créolité. To Chamoiseau, "Créolité tries to restore to the modern-day writer that status of storyteller by breaking down the barrier between the written and spoken French and Creole. If a writer can use Creole, then he's much more in touch with the thoughts and expressions of ordinary people."

Chamoiseau's own multivocal novels explore sociolinguistic realities by juxtaposing French and Creole, producing what Pierre Pinalie calls "Fréole," a nonspoken, partially invented, and playful language. In his first published novel, Chronique des sept misères (Chronicle of the Seven Sorrows, 1986), he examines the lives and stories of Martinican workers. His second novel, Solibo Magnifique (Solibo Magnificent, 1988), a murder suspense story, allegorizes the Creole oral culture. Themes of slavery, class, and colonialism run through Chamoiseau's fictional works.

Inspired by Edouard Glissant's Discours Antillais, Chamoiseau collaborated with Raphaël Confiant and Jean Bernabé on "Éloge de la Créolité." Published in 1989, the first sentence reads, "Neither Europeans, nor Africans, nor Asians, we proclaim ourselves Creoles." The literary manifesto sparked the French-Antillean Créolité movement by challenging many ideas proposed by another Martinican writer, Aimé CÉSAlRE, including the NÉGRITUDE literary movement.

"Éloge de la Créolité" generated much controversy, but it was the novel Texaco, published in French in 1992, that more staunchly positioned Chamoiseau as an exceptionally talented, internationally significant writer. In Texaco, the character Marie-Sophie Laborieux tells the history of the village of Texaco to save it from an urban planner's intended alterations. Texaco won France's prestigious Prix Goncourt the year it was published, prompting the translation of a number of Chamoiseau's works into multiple languages.

Apart from novels, Chamoiseau has published two autobiographical narratives on his childhood in Fort-de-France: Antan d'enfance (Childhood, 1993) and Chemin-d'école (School Days, 1994). Antan d'enfance explores Chamoiseau's magical experience of childhood and foregrounds his mother, who raised five children amidst poverty. The sequel Chemin-d'école introduces readers to Chamoiseau's Francophile and Africanist teachers, as well as the imaginative Big Bellybutton, who tells fantastical stories. Like Chamoiseau's other works, Chemin-d'école received accolades: "Imaginative and moving," said the Washington Post.

In the 1999 afterword to the English translation of the Chronicle of the Seven Sorrows, Linda Coverdale asserted, "Chamoiseau is a free-range writer who tries to keep his language 'open' so that readers will feel its humble, questing flexibility, a kind of remarkable mongrelism that proves perfect for the task at hand: presenting a deftly self-conscious form of Creoleness in this chronicle of 'mouth-memory' telling stories to a word scratcher."

Other Works by Patrick Chamoiseau

Creole Folktales. New York: New Press, 1994.

Seven Dreams of Elmira: A Tale of Martinique. Nashville, Tenn.: St. Albans, 2001.

Strange Words. London: Granta Books, 1998.

Works about Patrick Chamoiseau

Milne, Lorna. "From Creolite to Diversalite: The Post-colonial Subject in Patrick Chamoiseau's Texaco." In Paul Gifford and Johnnie Gratton, eds., Subject Matters: Subject and Self in French Literature from Descartes to the Present. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Rodopi, 2000.

———. "Sex, Gender and the Right to Write: Patrick Chamoiseau and the Erotics of Colonialism." Paragraph: The Journal of the Modern Critical Theory Group 24, no. 3 (2001): 59–75.

Shelly, Sharon L. "Addressing Linguistic and Cultural Diversity with Patrick Chamoiseau's Chemin-d'école." French Review: Journal of the American Association of Teachers of French 75, no. 1 (October 2001): 112–26.

Char, René (1907–1988) poet

One of the early surrealists, René Char was born in Provence and educated at the University in Aix. A controversial figure, he had a great many admirers and an equal number of detractors. As a writer, Char was a key figure in the surrealist movement, from which he later branched off to pursue his own unique direction. His poetry was marked by its extreme economy of language. As a political figure, he was very active in the French Resistance movement.

Char was most deeply affected and inspired by his experience as the leader of a resistance group in Provence during World War II. He understood the tragic nature of war and the difficult attempts of humanity to achieve freedom. These themes are reflected in his works, such as the poems in his collection Hypnos Waking (1956). Unlike the majority of his contemporaries, however, Char does not focus on the disillusionment and despair inherent in war. Instead, he is more concerned with humanity's capacity to hope and to love. What bothered him most was immobility, the lack of change that allowed for the acceptance of the status quo.

Char's major contribution to world literature stems from his use of the written word as a means of bringing about positive solutions to social change. In his introduction to Hypnos Waking, Jackson Matthews say that Char "has faced the difficult conditions of human freedom, and understood the role of the imagination in the life of man."

Other Works by René Char

Leaves of Hypnos. Translated by Cid Corman. New York: Grossman, 1973.

Poems of René Char. Translated and annotated by Mary Ann Caws and Jonathan Griffin. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1976.

Works about René Char

Caws, Mary Ann. René Char. Boston: Twayne, 1977.

Matthews, Jackson. "Introduction." In René Char, Hypnos Waking: Poems and Prose. New York: Random House, 1956.

Piore, Nancy Kline. Lightning: The Poetry of René Char. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1981.

Chateaubriand, François-René, vicomte de (1768–1848) novelist, nonfiction writer

François-René de Chateaubriand and Jean-Anthelme Brillat-Savarin once met at a restaurant to celebrate the publication of Chateaubriand's The Genius of Christianity. The chef surprised the diners by already having prepared a new recipe and named it in honor of the author, thus giving birth to the famous Chateaubriand steak.

Chateaubriand was born to nobility, and he grew up in the castle of Combourg, his family's isolated estate in Brittany. His world was devastated by the French Revolution, which forced him into exile. An avid adventurer with a great interest in American Indians, Chateaubriand visited the United States in 1791 to do research for a book on the massacre of the Natchez and to search for the Northwest Passage. However, his journey took him only as far as Niagara Falls, at which point he returned briefly to France before becoming an émigré and living in England until 1800. While there, Chateaubriand decided to pursue a career as a writer and published his first book, Essai historique, politique, et moral sur les révolutions anciennes et modernes (Historical, Political, and Moral Essays on the Ancient and Modern Revolutions, 1797). The publication of his book The Genius of Christianity (1802; translated 1856), with its frank and honest treatment of its subject matter, brought Chateaubriand's name to the forefront of French literature. In spite of his upper-class background, Chateaubriand worked diligently during the French Revolution to eradicate religious barriers, which he viewed as directly responsible for the severe restrictions levied against the poor and the uneducated. The Genius of Christianity was his attempt to restore a lost religion to his people. His The Martyrs (1809; translated 1812) celebrates Christianity's triumph over paganism.

In addition, two tragic love stories, the unfinished Atala (1801) and René (1802), stand as prime examples of the ways in which Chateaubriand utilized the melancholy and exotic descriptions of nature and the language of nostalgia that came to characterize the ROMANTIC movement in French literature. Other works that fall under this style of writing include Les Aventures du dernier des Abencérages (The Adventures of the Last of the Abencérages, 1826), a romance novel set in Spain.

In addition to his writing career, Chateaubriand was also politically active. He was appointed by Napoleon in 1803 as secretary of the legation to Rome and promoted, in 1804, as minister to Valaise. However, on hearing of the execution of the duc d'Enghien, he became outraged and resigned from his position. He channeled his anger into becoming a bitter anti-Bonapartist, going on to support the Bourbons. He served as ambassador to London in 1822 and as the minister of foreign affairs from 1823 to 1824.

Chateaubriand abandoned political activity in 1830 to devote the final years of his life to composing his own personal history, which he collected as Memoirs from Beyond the Tomb (1849). Although he was often accused of plagiarism and exaggeration by scholars, particularly in his purportedly factual travel narratives, his richly detailed and evocative language greatly enhanced and influenced the romantic movement. In response to this criticism, Chateaubriand once said, "The original writer is not he who refrains from imitating others, but he who can be imitated by none."

Another Work by François-René vicomte de Chateaubriand

Travels in America. Translated by Richard Switzer, Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1969.

Works about François-René vicomte de Chateaubriand

Painter, George Duncan. Chateaubriand: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1978.

Smethurst, Colin. Chateaubriand, Atala and René. London: Grant and Cutler, 1995.

Chatterjee, Upamanyu (1959–) novelist

Upamanyu Chatterjee was born in India. He comes from a family of civil servants, and after completing a degree in English Literature, he joined the Indian Administrative Services (IAS) in 1983. This professional move, however, signifies not only the beginning of Chatterjee's career in writing but also the source behind much of the content of his novels.

While in high school, Chatterjee wrote a play adopted from a Hitchcock story called Dilemma. It was never published but won the school drama competition despite its open caricaturing of school rules and regulations. Since then, he has written three novels, all of which have received similar critical and political approval in spite of a style that parodies the state legal systems, in which he also holds a job, and its effect on human behavior.

The novel English, August: An Indian Story (1988) and its sequel The Mammaries of the Welfare State (2000) are based on a civil servant's experiences working in small-town politics. The adventures of the protagonist, Augustya, take him from a position of naïveté to cynicism after initiation into the politics of the real world. The sequel continues with the life of Augustya, further exposing the parasitic nature of civil servants and the political system of which they are a part. In addition, mammaries is a common "Hinglish" (Hindi-English) mispronunciation of the word memories. Thus, Chatterjee begins with a joke by teasing the reader from the moment one encounters the title of his book.

Chatterjee's novels are told in a relentlessly satirical style that is intended to broaden the concept of comedy. He wishes to go beyond satire, parody, and burlesque. His intent is to provide comic relief from the hypocrisies that are inherent in society by revealing the idiosyncrasies produced when idealism meets with reality.

Another Work by Upamanyu Chatterjee

The Last Burden. New York: Penguin, 1997.

Chatterji, Bankim Chandra

See CATTOPADHYAY, B(ANKIM)-C(HANDRA).

Chatterji, Sarat Chandra (Sarat Chandra Chattopadhyay) (1876–1938) novelist

Sarat Chandra Chatterji was born in Bengal, India. He was born into a very poor family and did not have the opportunity to pursue a higher education. As a young adult, he spent a number of years wandering all over India dressed as a beggar. Despite these trying early years, Chatterji did eventually reclaim his family responsibilities and started to work as a clerk. During his posting in Burma, he began writing and was eventually able to achieve enough financial stability to return to India.

Chatterji's writing was influenced by Bengali renaissance literature by Bankim-Chandra CATTOPADHYAY and Rabindranath TAGORE. Their focus on the beauty of human life and nature can be found in Chatterji's works. In addition, he was an early proponent of women's rights, and many of his works offer unflinching criticism of the gender inequalities of his time. His novel Palli Samaj (Village Society, 1915–16) caused a sensation because of its open acknowledgment of a woman's desire for a man after the death of her husband. His "feminist" novels, however, eventually conformed to social norms despite the revolutionary thoughts expressed in his prose work. Chatterji continued his criticism, however, in such essays as "Narir Mulya" (1922–23) that denounce society's maltreatment of women, especially in middle-class Bengal.

Chatterji also wrote numerous political novels. He wrote Pather Dabi (The Right Way, 1926) while he was president of the Congress Committee of Howrah District in West Bengal, India. Based on the rebel forces in Burma and Singapore, this novel prescribed violence as the only path for a free India and upheld anti-British sentiments. Much controversy surrounded this work, especially because Chatterji then held a post in the Congress Party, which was then still subject to British authority.

Chatterji's romance novels were a sensational success all over India. Much of his national popularity had to do with the fact that his stories were so often adapted for commercial Hindi (not just Bengali) movies. His first novel Devadas (1917) inroduces a new type of character in Chandramukhi, a “noble” prostitute. This is a story about the suppression of love and desire by those whom society rejects. Her story also reveals social patriarchy’s hypocritical views on female chastity. In Srikanta (1917–33), Chatterji’s most famous work, the union of a singer-dancer and her lover serves to criticize the institution of marriage by examining its social and ethical definition. Srikanta is a partly autobiographical collection of episodes in four volumes.

Even today, Chatterji’s Bengali novels are the most often translated works into almost all mainstream Indian languages.

Another Work by Sarat Chandra Chatterji

Devdas and Other Stories. Translated by V. S. Naravane. Ottawa: Laurier Press Ltd., 2000.

A Work about Sarat Chandra Chatterji

Naravane, Vishwanath S. Sarat Chandra Chatterji: An Introduction to His Life and Work. New Delhi: Macmillan Company of India, 1976.

Chattopadhyay, Sarat Chandra

See CHATTERJI, SARAT CHANDRA.

Chekhov, Anton (1860–1904) short-story writer, dramatist

Anton Pavlovich Chekhov was born in Taganrok, a small provincial town in Russia. His father, Pavel Yegorovich, owned a small grocery where Anton worked after school. Taganrok was on an important commercial route, and Chekhov had an opportunity to meet a variety of people from all walks of life—an invaluable experience for a developing writer. In school, Chekhov particularly excelled in German and scripture. When Chekhov was 16, his father, facing bankruptcy and imprisonment, escaped to Moscow. Eventually, his wife and the younger children joined him, leaving Chekhov behind in Taganrok, where he worked as a tutor and sent most of his money to help his family.

In 1879, Chekhov rejoined his family in Moscow. In that same year, he entered Moscow University to study medicine. While there, Chekhov began to write to help support the family. His first story appeared in 1880 in a comic magazine called Fragments. While working for Fragments, Chekhov developed a keen ability to capture the speech patterns of characters from all levels of society. Chekhov’s characters ranged from thieves to wealthy landowners and every type in between. Chekhov also honed his narrative technique during the five years he worked for Fragments. In the typical Chekhov story, the narrative begins in the present, and the characters’ motives are seldom explicitly explained. Everyday life is not simply background in Chekhov’s fiction; it forms the dynamic center of the narrative.

Chekhov graduated in 1884 and began to practice medicine. He also continued to write. In 1886, New Time, one of the most prestigious and popular newspapers in Russia, began to publish his work. Chekhov developed a warm relationship with the editor of New Time, Alexey Suvorin, who encouraged Chekhov and often helped him financially.

In 1887, Chekhov received the prestigious Pushkin Prize for At Dusk, a collection of short stories, and completed his first play, Ivanov, the story of a young man, very like Chekhov himself, who commits suicide. Chekhov’s second play, The Wood Demon, was a failure and caused him to stop writing for a period. His first great success in the theater came with The Seagull (1896), a tragic tale of love gone awry.

The popularity of his works was such that Chekhov finally achieved financial independence and was able to buy a country estate in Melikhovo and spend money on philanthropic pursuits, such as a free medical clinic he ran between 1892 and 1893 during a devastating outbreak of cholera. Instead of fully concentrating on his writing career, Chekhov extended his medical practice and treated as many as 1,500 patients a year.

In 1897, Chekhov was diagnosed with tuberculosis, and his health deteriorated rapidly. On doctor's orders, Chekhov moved to the small tourist town of Yalta on the Black Sea where the salt air was supposed to help his lungs recover. He found Yalta to be dull and depressing; however, it was there that he created some of his most famous works, including the The Cherry Orchard. In Yalta, Chekhov was often visited by his famous friends, such as the writer Maxim GORKY, the poet Ivan BUNIN, and the composer Sergey Rakhmaninov, which helped alleviate his loneliness and sense of isolation. Despite his doctors' warnings, Chekhov continued to work throughout his long illness. He died on July 14, 1904, at a German health resort.

Critical Analysis

In most of Chekhov's work, one notices a complete absence of an authorial view. A contemporary critic, Aleksandar Chudakov said that other "Critics called into question his narrative patterns in the short stories, the absence of extended introductions, of definite conclusions, of the elaborately detailed pre-histories for his characters, or clear-cut motives for their actions." Chekhov's short-story technique was thus innovative not only in terms of subject matter but also style. Eventually, most critics came to recognize the genius of Chekhov's prose, although belatedly, and he was ranked among the giants of Russian literature during his lifetime.

Chekhov's ground-breaking dramatic techniques were not very well received in 1896, and The Seagull, one of his most famous plays, was essentially a failure the first time it was performed. When it was later performed by the Moscow Art Theater, however, the play was a critical and popular success because this troupe used realistic acting techniques and an ensemble cast, which were perfectly suited to Chekhov's drama. The Moscow Art Theater eventually staged all of Chekhov's plays. Unlike his fiction, Chekhov's major dramatic work focused on the politics and psychology of bourgeois life. One often finds the same feeling of hopelessness and claustrophobia in the conflicts of the middle-class families in Chekhov's plays as one does in the works of French naturalist writer Emile ZOLA.

The Seagull focuses on such diverse themes as family life, suicide, love, and the mother-son relationship in the context of middle-class dynamics. The action of the play revolves around Arkadina, a famous actress with an established household in the country, whose son, Konstantin, kills a seagull one day. The plot is complicated by the presence of Trigorin, a novelist who is writing a story about Arkadina's household.

Chekhov's last play, The Cherry Orchard, was a tremendous success when it was first staged in 1904. The play delineates the tragic downfall of the Ranevskaya family. Madame Ranevskaya, driven by financial despair, reluctantly decides to cut down the cherry orchard on her family estate. In Cherry Orchard, Chekhov explores the results of social change on the Russian aristocracy and on the freed serfs. A major theme of the play is independence and the meaning of freedom as it applies to each of the characters.

Chekhov's legacy as a writer and dramatist extended beyond the borders of Russia. His innovative narrative techniques, which contributed to the development of MODERNISM, influenced later generations of writers. His plays, still widely popular today, are produced all over the world. Chekhov taught future generations of writers to present life without authorial commentary—in all its complexity, and in all of its absurdity—and to avoid omniscient explanations and pat answers to life's dilemmas.

Other Works by Anton Chekhov

Five Plays: Ivanov, The Seagull, Uncle Vanya, Three Sisters, and Cherry Orchard. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Forty Stories. New York: Vintage Press, 1991.

Works about Anton Chekhov

Gottlieb, Vera, and Paul Allain, eds. The Cambridge Companion to Chekhov. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Rayfield, Donal. Anton Chekhov: A Life. Chicago: Northwestern University Press, 2000.

Chen Yuan-tsung (1932–) novelist

Chen Yuan-tsung was born in Shanghai, China, was raised in a wealthy household, and received a Western-style education at a missionary school. During the Sino-Japanese War, she lived in Chongqing but returned to Shanghai, where she lived in 1949, the year of the Communist takeover. Chen stayed in China because of her idealistic belief in the revolutionary cause.

In 1950, at age 18, she acquired her first job at the Film Bureau of Beijing, but this did not last long. The Communist Party leadership began to “send down” young people from cities to the countryside to participate in the so-called agrarian revolution. In 1951, Chen left Beijing for Gansu province in northwestern China to join this revolution and manually work the land. She became a young revolutionary, known as a cadre. She worked at land reform and endured extreme hardships, such as starvation, during Mao Zedong’s failed industrial and agrarian initiative known as the Great Leap Forward. She wrote and read as much as possible during this time but suffered during the Cultural Revolution when the oppressive regime persecuted writers, artists, and intellectuals as counter-revolutionaries.

Chen immigrated to the United States in 1972 with her husband, Jack Chen, an artist and writer, and their son and later taught at Cornell. She determined to publish her story from writings she had hidden during her cadre years, which was the tale of millions of young people who came of age in Communist China. She fictionalized her life in her only work—the 1980 novel, The Dragon’s Village. The novel follows Guan Ling-ling, a young woman from a wealthy family who becomes swept up in the revolutionary fervor of pre-Communist China and joins the Red Guards. She encounters both corrupt officials and cadres, but she finds kindness among comrades and endures the same hardships that Chen herself did. Chen lives with her husband in El Cerrito, California.

Works about Chen Yuan-tsung

Grunfeld, A. Tom. “The Dragon’s Village: An Autobiographical Novel of Revolutionary China.” In Focus (Spring 1993).

Stone, Judy. “A Talk with the Author/An Author’s Ordeal.” New York Times Book Review, May 4, 1980.

Chernyshevsky, Nikolay (1828–1889)

essayist, fiction writer

Nikolay Gavrilovich Chernyshevsky was born in Saratov, Russia. At first educated by his father, a priest of the Russian Orthodox Church, Chernyshevsky was admitted into a seminary, an institution that prepared students for careers in the clergy. While in the seminary, he demonstrated great ability as a scholar, and his parents decided to send him to a university in St. Petersburg, where he enrolled in the department of philology.

Socially awkward and financially destitute, Chernyshevsky isolated himself from his fellow students. He was an avid reader and dreamed of becoming a great social reformer and philosopher. Between 1855 and 1862, Chernyshevsky worked for a political publication, The Contemporary, where he published translations, criticism, and political articles. He was greatly influenced by European socialist thinkers, such as Hegel. Chernyshevsky advocated agrarian reform, emancipation of the serfs, and establishment of communal agrarian communities, which he viewed as a transition to socialism. His politically radical thinking and attacks on government policies, particularly on the institution of serfdom, resulted in almost 20 years of exile to Siberia, where he was sent in 1864. He continued to attack government policies relentlessly and became a member of several underground radical organizations that wanted to reform Russia by any means necessary, including violence against representatives of the government.

Although Chernyshevsky is remembered as a forerunner of the Russian revolutionary movement, he is also noted for his novel, What Is To Be Done? (1863). This polemical novel explores the social inequalities of Russian society. The plot concerns a group of young, idealized intellectuals who go to the countryside to ease the lives of peasants through scientific means. The novel condemns moderates for their seeming inability to engage in social transformation and calls for a swift, radical movement. The novel was generally praised by the radical reformers but was condemned by government officials.

Chernyshevsky left a radical legacy for Russian socialism. His works influenced a number of historical figures, including Vladimir Lenin, who participated in the Russian Revolution. Chernyshevsky is considered to be one of the greatest social philosophers of Russia.

Other Works by Nikolay Chernyshevsky

Prologue: A Novel for the 1860's. Translated by Michael J. Katz. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1995.

Selected Philosophical Essays. Moscow: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1953; reissued 2002.

A Work about Nikolay Chernyshevsky

Paperno, Irina. Chernyshevsky and the Age of Realism. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1988.

Chughtai (Chughtai), Ismat (1915–1991) poet, dramatist, novelist, short-story writer, scriptwriter

Ismat Chughtai was born in Aligarh, India. Though she was one of 10 children, Chughtai spent most of her time alone, climbing trees, running after chickens in her backyard and watching the world go by. From an early age, Chughtai collected mental pictures of everyday life whose simplicity underlies the complex emotional portraits of her characters.

Her father worked at court and played a seminal role in allowing Chughtai to pursue a freedom in thought and deed that was denied to most women of her time. In her autobiographical essay, “My Autobiography,” she calls herself “Ismat the rebel,” perhaps the best description of both her personality and her work. Her unflinching, interrogative look at social rules helped to pave the way for much of the Indian fiction that was written by women in the second half of the 20th century.

Chughtai constantly used the freedoms allowed to her brothers as the model for her own rights. When her parents decided that she would get married when she turned 13, she threatened to renounce Islam. Her father sent her to school, which she entered in fourth grade and received a double promotion immediately. She then left her home to continue her education in Lucknow and finally gained financial independence by becoming a headmistress of a school for girls.

All of Chughtai’s work is written in Urdu. The quality and success of her poems changed the previously held conception that only men could write good Urdu poetry. After Munshi PREMCHAND, who is considered the father of the Urdu short story (“Afsara”), Chughtai is one of the most popular and prodigious writers of Urdu fiction. She wrote about the lives of the middle class, national politics, and gender at a time when such topics were not explored in popular fiction, especially by women writers. Her works confuse the private realm of a person’s mind with the moral codes of the social world. The story The Quilt (1942) uses the context of a loveless marriage to question assumptions surrounding female sexuality. The quilt becomes a metaphor for all that is hidden behind the words society uses to construct meaning.

Chughtai’s legacy is not limited to the book world. Her husband, a film producer, took her stories to directors and producers who adopted her work for cinema. Chughtai won several National Awards for her Hindi films. She wrote for 11 films and is one of the few female scriptwriters ever to have written for Hindi cinema.

Another Work by Ismat Chughtai

The Quilt and Other Stories. Translated by Tahira Naqvi. New York: Sheep Meadow Press, 1994.

Cixous, Hélène (1937–) poet, nonfiction writer

A feminist and theorist, Hélène Cixous was born in the French colony of Oran, Algeria, and grew up in a German-Jewish household. She received a degree in English from the Lycée Bugeaud in Algiers in 1959 and a doctorate in 1968. After graduation, Cixous held teaching posts at several French universities, including the University of Bordeaux, the Sorbonne, and Nanterre, before finally establishing herself at the University of Paris VIII–Vincennes. At the Sorbonne, Cixous participated in the 1968 student uprisings. Later, at Vincennes, she instituted several courses in experimental literature, particularly the significance to women of the relationship between psychoanalysis and language. She also established a center for women's studies at the University at Vincennes and cofounded the structuralist journal Poétique.

Cixous was greatly influenced by the progressive ideologies of such intellectuals as Heinrich von Kleist, Franz KAFKA, Arthur RIMBAUD, Clarice LISPECTOR, Jacques Derrida, Jaques Lacan, Sigmund FREUD, and Heidegger. In the 1970s, Cixous, along with other theorists, such as Kristeva, Barthes, and Derrida, began to explore the complex relationships that exist between sexuality and writing. From this study, she produced several influential feminist texts, including "Sortie" (1975) and "The Laugh of the Medusa" (1975).

Critical Analysis

The essay "Sortie" is of particular importance in that she uses it to establish a basic understanding of the hierarchy of opposites, such as in culture/nature; head/heart; colonizer/colonized; and speaking/writing. She then proceeds to link these opposites to the differences that exist between the male and the female genders in a discussion that calls for the abolition of such dichotomies as a means of empowering women.

"The Laugh of the Medusa" discusses feminine repression as a direct result of male-dominated cultural discourse. Cixous depicts this repression through the image of a dark, unexplored room that stands, metaphorically, for the largely unexplored area of female language and sexuality. It is Cixous's belief that women do not explore these areas of the self out of a deep-rooted fear that has been placed in them by a language deeply rooted in male dominance. She goes on to theorize that women can shed light on this darkened existence simply by questioning their fears. Through this questioning, they will come to find that there is nothing about which to be frightened and that all of their preconceived fears were created by male images and standards that must be viewed as obstacles that can and must be overcome. Cixous also insists that the only way in which women can overcome the obstacles placed before them is to learn to speak with their bodies, using the body as a medium from which they can regain their inner voice. In the absence of a true feminine discourse, as language itself is historically the realm of the masculine, the language of the body takes on significance in its power to change and to reclaim.

In both "The Laugh of the Medusa" and "Coming to Writing" (1977), Cixous tackles many difficult ideas. She explains the idea of feminine discourse, a concept that eludes definition, by arguing convincingly that any attempt to define the term using the language of masculinity would destroy its inherent beauty; therefore, it must be left undefined. She relies heavily on Freudian concepts mingled with certain feminist ideas, such as a rereading of the Medusa myth as an analogy for female empowerment, rediscovered from Greek mythology. She also fervently expresses the idea that the only escape from masculine discourse is to understand and use the link between language and sexuality. Freedom of language results directly from freedom of sexuality. This freedom leads to what Cixous refers to as jouissance, a term that relates to a fulfillment of desire that fuses the erotic, the mystical, and the political in a way that goes beyond mere physical satisfaction. It is through this fulfillment, which can be found specifically in writing, that feminine discourse is discovered.

Since her emergence as a strong voice on the literary scene in the 1970s, Cixous has developed even greater complexity in her style and has become somewhat more mysterious in her thinking; however, her radical feminist ideology has softened somewhat as she seeks to explore the idea of collective identities. Cixous continues to lecture at the University of Paris VIII–Vincennes, where she is active in women’s studies. Her major contribution to world literature lies in her advancement of feminist ideas.

Other Works by Hélène Cixous

Cixous and Jacques Derrida. Veils. Translated by Geoffrey Bennington with drawings by Ernest Pignon-Ernest. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2001.

The Third Body. Translated by Keith Cohen. Evanston, Ill.: Hydra Books/Northwestern University Press, 1999.

A Work about Hélène Cixous

Penrod, Lynn. Hélène Cixous. Boston: Twayne, 1996.

classicism

Classicism as a term is generally accepted as indicative of clarity in style, adhering to principles of elegance and symmetry, and created by attention and adherence to traditional forms. It has often been used synonymously with generic terms such as excellence or artistic quality. The term has its basis in the study, reverence for, and imitation of Greek and Roman literature, art, and architecture. Because the principles of classicism are deeply rooted in the history, rites, rituals, and practices of specific ancient cultures, the term also came to apply to specific cultural, literary, artistic, and academic canons.

The first full-scale revival of classicism occurred during the Renaissance when intensified interest in Greek and Roman culture, especially the literary works of Plato and Cicero, influenced a renewal of classical standards in literature. In the 18th and 19th centuries, following the archaeological discovery of the remains of Pompeii and Herculaneum, there was again a revival of interest first in the culture of Rome and later in the ideas of ancient Greece. This period, generally referred to as neoclassicism, was actually the start of the larger romantic movement (see ROMANTICISM). The revival was closely linked to the American and French Revolutions and draws parallels between ancient and modern forms of government.

In Central Europe, during the early part of the 20th century, there was again a spirit of revolution that coincided with a revival of interest in Greek literature. The classical models were somewhat reinvented. This was particularly apparent in the renewed interest in Greek literature and in a tendency among many Greek writers to look to the past—to history, myth, and folklore—as a means of understanding the present situation.

The Greek poet and Nobel laureate George SEFERIS was particularly interested in awareness of the past and the ways in which history can be used to understand the present. His collection of poems, Mythistorema (1935; translated 1960) applied the Odyssean myths to modern situations and circumstances. Homer’s Odyssey became the symbolic basis for many of his works.

Other poets and novelists, such as Tudor ARGHEZI and Nikos KAZANTSAKIS, based elements of their works on principles of classicism and turned their attention to myth as an allegory for modern times. Although his writing was modern in its sense of restlessness and was bold and innovative in its use of often crude, forceful language, Arghezi leaned toward the traditional elements of classicism in his tendency to rely on folklore and mythology. Kazantsakis’s epic poem Odyssey: A Modern Sequel (1938) picks up Ulysses’ tale where Homer leaves off and brings it to a more solid conclusion.

Although classicism cannot be said to have ever been abandoned completely during any period of literary history, its resurgence is cyclical and responsive to historical circumstances. As a result of the early 20th-century interest in revolution and change, similar to the spirit of Greek and Roman times as well as that of the Renaissance, classicism experienced a literary resurgence throughout 20th-century Central Europe.

Works about Classicism

Buxton, John. The Grecian Taste: Literature in the Age of Neo-Classicism 1740–1820. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1978.

Knox, Bernard. Backing into the Future: The Classical Tradition and its Renewal. New York: Norton, 1994.

Claudel, Paul (1868–1955) poet, playwright, essayist

A prominent figure in the early 20th-century French Catholic renaissance, Paul Claudel was born in Villeneuve-sur-Fère-en-Tardenois, in Aisne, France. He came from a family of farmers, Catholic priests, and landed gentry. A profound religious experience at the age of 18 changed not only his view of the world but also impacted his future as a writer. On Christmas day, during services at Notre Dame cathedral, he heard a distinct voice above him proclaim, “There is a God.” He became a fervent Catholic and turned to the Bible as his source of inspiration.

As a poet, Claudel’s most influential work is his Five Great Odes (1910). Claudel uses this poem in five parts to relate poetic inspiration as a gift from God, describing the mystery and wonder of the universe.

As a journalist and literary critic, Claudel also based his beliefs and impressions in his strong religious faith. He regularly attacked musician Richard Wagner, stating that, while he admired Wagner’s music, he disliked what it expressed in Wagner’s Der Ring des Nibelungen. He also wrote on the subject of French literature, particularly admiring BAUDELAIRE and RIMBAUD.

Claudel debuted as a playwright with Tête d’or (1889), a drama largely influenced by his own religious experiences. This work was followed by the trilogy of plays, L’otage (The Hostage, 1911), Le Pain dur (Crusts, 1918), and Le Père humilié (The Humiliation of the Father, 1920), which trace the degeneration the nobility. Another dramatic work, Break at Noon (1906), dealt with the theme of adultery and was based on an experience in Claudel’s own life in which, for a four-year period in the early 1900s, he had engaged in a passionate affair with a married Polish woman. This episode caused him to contemplate the complexities inherent in the theme of forbidden love. One of Claudel’s best-known dramas is The Satin Slipper (1924), about the epic adventures of Rodrigue and the woman he loves.

On May 1, 1950, as a result of his contributions to literature in the form of religion, Claudel was honored by the pope. He died five years later in Paris on February 23.

Another Work by Paul Claudel

Claudel on the Theatre. Translated by Christine Trollope. Coral Gables, Fla.: University of Miami Press, 1972.

Works about Paul Claudel

Caranfa, Angelo. Claudel: Beauty and Grace. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 1989.

Knapp, Bettina L. Paul Claudel. New York: Ungar, 1982.

Cliff, Michelle (1946–) novelist, poet, short-story writer, teacher, critic, editor

Michelle Cliff was born in Kingston, Jamaica. As a young child, she moved to New York City with her family. After attending public schools and graduating from Wagner College in 1969 with a B.A. in European History, she worked for the New York publisher W. W. Norton from 1970 to 1971. Then she studied at the Warburg Institute in London, earning a master of philosophy degree in 1974. She returned to W. W. Norton as a copy editor and then as a manuscript and production editor. She resigned in 1979 to focus on writing, and in 1980, she published her first book, the prose poem Claiming an Identity They Taught Me to Despise.

Themes of race, gender, and power run through Cliff’s internationally known poetry, novels, essays, articles, lectures, and workshops. In “Clare Savage as a Crossroads Character” (1990), Cliff acknowledges the autobiographical strands present in her prose poem and earliest novels, Abeng (1984) and No Telephone to Heaven (1987). Abeng, the African word for “conch shell,” alludes to Caribbean, United States, and world history. The novel narrates how two runaway slaves, Nanny and Cuffee, lead raids to liberate other slaves. Both Abeng and its sequel, No Telephone to Heaven, were critically acclaimed for their dexterous linguistic shifts from Jamaican creole to standard English.

Critics name Free Enterprise (1993) her strongest novel. In it, female protagonists Annie Christmas and Ellen Pleasant work with freedom fighters to liberate slaves. To quote Booklist, “In tall tales and legends, cherished memories, and regrettable misunderstandings, Free Enterprise explores the multiple meanings of freedom and enterprise and of a society that enshrines selected meanings of both.”

In Writing in Limbo Simon Gikandi claims, “The uniqueness of Cliff’s aesthetics lies in her realization that the fragmentation, silence and repression that mark the life of the Caribbean subject under colonialism must be confronted not only as a problem to be overcome but also as a condition of possibility—as a license to dissimulate and to affirm difference—in which an identity is created out of the chaotic colonial and postcolonial history.”

Other Works by Michelle Cliff

Bodies of Water. New York: Dutton, 1990.

The Land of Look Behind: Prose and Poetry. Ithaca, N.Y.: Firebrand Books, 1985.

The Store of a Million Items: Stories. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1998.

Works about Michelle Cliff

Berrian, Brenda F. “Claiming an Identity: Caribbean Women Writers in English.” Journal of Black Studies 25 (December 1994): 200–16.

Edmonson, Belinda. “Race, Privilege, and the Politics of (Re)Writing History: An Analysis of the Novels of Michelle Cliff.” Callaloo 16, no. 1 (1993): 180–91.

Gikandi, Simon. Writing in Limbo: Modernism and Caribbean Literature. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1992.

Schwartz, Meryl F. “An Interview with Michelle Cliff.” Contemporary Literature 34, no. 4 (Winter 1993): 595–619.

Cocteau, Jean (1889–1963) poet, novelist, dramatist

Jean Cocteau was born in Maisons-Lafitte, France. His father, a lawyer and amateur painter, committed suicide when Cocteau was nine. This experience left him with an intense awareness of human frailty and an almost uncanny ability to identify with the world of the dead, as is seen in his earlier poetry such as L’Ange Heurtebise (1925).

A mediocre student who failed several attempts to pass the secondary-school graduation examination, poetry was Cocteau’s first artistic outlet. He published his first volume of poems, Aladdin’s Lamp, at the age of 19. Influenced by surrealism, psychoanalysis, cubism, and Catholicism, coupled with a frequent use of opium, Cocteau promoted the avant-garde in his works. He counted among his closest friends prominent artists such as Pablo Picasso, composer Erik Satie, and Russian stage director Sergey Diaghilev.

Cocteau met Pablo Picasso and Sergey Diaghilev in 1915. They challenged Cocteau to write a ballet, which is the collaborative work Parade (1917), produced by Diaghilev, with scenic design by Picasso and music by Erik Satie. Cocteau went on to firmly establish himself as a writer with the prose fantasy Le Potomak (1919) about a creature trapped in an aquarium.

Another close and influential friend was the poet and novelist Raymond Radiguet, whose death from typhoid fever caused Cocteau to experiment with opium. Under influence of the drug, he began to write psychological novels such as Thomas the Impostor (1923) and his masterpiece, Les Enfants terribles (The Incurable Children, 1929) about a group of children trapped in their own scary world.

In 1929, Cocteau was hospitalized for opium addiction, the experience of which he recounts in Opium (1930). On his release, he began to work on a series of films that often depicted mirrors as doors to alternate realities. He also befriended the young actor Jean Marais in 1937 and thereafter designed and wrote roles especially for him, producing such works as Orphée (Orpheus), 1950), a one-act tragedy about death's connection to inspiration, and Le Testament d'Orphée (The Testament of Orpheus), 1961), whose theme was death.

Branded a decadent during World War II, Cocteau continued to lead an active literary life. Always seeking to shock, he had a facelift and began to wear leather trousers and matador's capes in his declining years. He died on October 11, 1963.

Another Work by Jean Cocteau

Tempest of Stars: Selected Poems. Translated by Jeremy Reed. Chester Springs, Pa.: Dufour Editions, 1992.

Works about Jean Cocteau

Knapp, Bettina L. Jean Cocteau. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

Saul, Julie, ed. Jean Cocteau: The Mirror and the Mask: A Photo-Biography. Introduction by Francis Steegmuller. Boston: David Godine, 1992.

Coetzee, J(ohn) M. (1940–) novelist and essayist

John M. Coetzee was born to a middle-class family in South Africa. His parents were of African and German heritage, but he writes only in English. Like the narrator of his 1997 memoir, Boyhood, he spoke both Afrikaans and English fluently as a boy but was an outsider in both communities.

J. M. Coetzee studied undergraduate English in Cape Town but found old, canonized British literature dull. He turned to mathematics for comfort and worked for IBM as a computer systems designer in England in the early 1960s. He returned to literature, however, and came to the United States to study at the University of Texas at Austin, where he received his doctorate in literature in 1969. Coetzee's graduating thesis studied the work of Irish playwright Samuel BECKETT, a major influence on his own writing. Also while at the university, he started historical research into the life of explorer and ancestor Jacobus Coetzee, the results of which became his first novel, Dusklands (1974).

Critical Analysis

Dusklands simultaneously tells the stories of two main characters, an American bureaucrat in 1970s war-torn Vietnam and an Afrikaner explorer moving into 18th-century South Africa. The book compares America's involvement in Vietnam with the Dutch colonization of South Africa. Coetzee, in essence, explores the imperialist mentality of believing one's own culture superior to others.

In his next novel, In the Heart of the Country (1976), Coetzee uses a woman's point of view to tell the story of Magda, who cannot recover from the tragedy of her father's death and her own rape. The book ends with Magda in a state of hysterical loneliness. In his 1980 book, Waiting for the Barbarians, Coetzee turns the colonial experience into allegory, telling the story of an imaginary country being overrun by barbarians.

Coetzee received worldwide recognition with The Life and Times of Michael K., which won England's Booker Prize in 1983. The story introduces another important subject matter of Coetzee's works: the relationship between parents and their children. The narrator, Michael K., escapes from the civil strife and violence of apartheid Cape Town to his mother's farm. He is a simple-minded gardener who lives with his dying mother until their farm is destroyed in the ongoing civil war. Michael and his mother are innocent victims of their political surroundings, but Michael has a simple attitude: He says, "one can live."

Coetzee wrote three more works of fiction in the late 1980s and early 1990s before taking home the Booker Prize again for his 1999 Disgrace. In two of these, Foe (1986) and The Master of Petersburg (1994), he responds to and rewrites great works of European literature. Foe is the story of an unnamed woman who tells the story of Robinson Crusoe to author Daniel Defoe. This woman, like the colonized people of South Africa, loses her voice in the great machine of colonial history and is unrecognized and forgotten.

Russian author Fyodor DOSTOYEVSKY is the hero of The Master of Petersburg, a fictional account of Dostoyevsky tracing the steps of his recently dead stepson, Pavel, around the city of St. Petersburg. The novel is Coetzee's most postmodern work in that it explores the act of writing and the power of language. The character of Dostoyevsky does not use writing's power to help the Russian revolutionaries, however, but to understand and come closer to his dead stepson.

Coetzee's novel Disgrace is similar to The Life and Times of Michael K, in that its main character, David Lurie, like Michael K., suffers greatly to achieve a small amount of clarity and redemption. David Lurie loses his job as a professor, becomes a caretaker for dying animals, is refused by prostitutes, and considers castrating himself.

Disgrace is Coetzee's first book to deal with postapartheid South Africa directly. Political change does little to improve the lives of the individuals in the novel. Andrew O'Hehir writes that in Coetzee's novels "political and historical forces blow through the lives of individuals like nasty weather systems" (www.salon.com). Again and again, Coetzee presents characters who are tossed about violently but who, in every novel, pick up and move on.

The major influences on his work are Franz KAFKA and Samuel BECKETT. Like Kafka and Beckett's characters, the people in Coetzee's books have a troubled existence in which suffering seems to be the defining characteristic of life.

Coetzee's books have been translated into more than 20 languages. Coetzee has held visiting professorships across the United States, including Harvard, the University of Chicago, and Johns Hopkins University. Besides fiction, he has written many books of essays, including White Writing: On the Culture of Letters in South Africa (1988) and The Lives of Animals (1999).

J. M. Coetzee's work eloquently deals with South Africa's political history; the nature of writing, language, and power; and how human relationships are divided by the gap between the powered and the powerless. Coetzee won the Nobel Prize in 2003.

Other Works by J. M. Coetzee

Giving Offence: Essays on Censorship. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

A Land Apart: A Contemporary South African Reader. New York: Viking, 1987.

Works about J. M. Coetzee

Atwell, David. J. M. Coetzee: South Africa and the Politics of Writing. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

O'Hehir, Andrew. "'Disgrace' by J. M. Coetzee." Salon Books 5, November 1999. www.salon.com/books/review/1999/11/05/coetzee

Viola, Andre. "An Interview with J. M. Coetzee." Commonwealth Essays and Studies 14, no. 2 (Spring 1992): 6–7.

Colette (Sidonie–Gabrielle Colette)

(1873–1954) novelist

Considered one of the leading French novelists of the 20th century, Colette was born in the village of Saint-Saveur-en-Puisaye, Burgundy. She was the daughter of a retired army captain, Jules-Joseph Colette, who had lost a leg in the Italian campaign, and the highly unconventional Adèle Eugénie Sidonie Landoy, known as "Sidonie" or "Sido." Her mother's down-to-earth personality, devotion to animals, reading, and gardening greatly influenced Colette.

Colette's career as a novelist began when she was in her early 20s and continued into her mid-70s, during which time she wrote more than 50 books, numerous short stories, and articles for major newspapers and magazines. Always in some way autobiographical in nature, her works blur the boundaries between reality and fiction in an attempt to explore love and female sexuality in a masculine world.

Colette was first encouraged to write by her first husband, writer and music critic Henri Gauthier-Villars. According to some sources, he locked her in her room and would not let her leave until she had completed a requisite number of pages. Regardless of how she started, however, Colette published four of what came to be known as her Claudine novels in rapid succession between 1900 and 1903, using her husband's pen name Willy. The novels, all recounting the often prurient adventures of a teenage girl, became so successful that they inspired other products, including a musical adaptation, costumes, soap, cigars, and perfume.

Becoming disillusioned by her husband's repeated adultery, Colette separated from him in 1905 and was divorced in 1906. She went to work as a music-hall performer, doing such memorable things as baring her breasts and simulating sex on stage, an act that resulted in a riot at the Moulin Rouge.

During this period, Colette found a protector, a woman known as "Missy," the niece of Napoleon III, and who was instrumental in establishing Colette's image as a writer, an actress, and a lesbian. "Missy" committed suicide in 1944. Colette was later known, at various points in her life, to have become friends and, most likely, lovers with noted American lesbian Natalie Clifford Barney and Italian author Gabriele D'ANNUNZIO. Such an independent and gregarious lifestyle eventually filtered into Colette's writing. She remained devoted to her independence, however, and published La Vagabonde (1910), a story about an actress who decides to reject the man she loves to protect her ability to live her life as she pleases.

In 1912, Colette married newspaper editor Henri de Jouvenel des Ursins. She wrote theater articles and short stories for his paper and bore him one child, Colette de Jouvenel. Colette had not wanted children and, consequently, neglected her daughter. She also began a questionable relationship with her stepson, Bertrand de Jouvenel, which resulted in much gossip. She depicts this affair in her novel Chéri (1920), as told from the point of view of a sexually naive young man.

Critical Analysis

Colette's works are generally divided into four phases. Her early works are the Claudine novels, followed by a time when she wrote predominantly about life in the theater, followed by works about the politics of love, and ultimately followed by her more mature works depicting reminiscences of youth and family. Her fame began to expand in the 1920s, and by 1927 she was often referred to as France's leading female writer. Her mature works, written during this time, depict a peaceful world and the delicate nature of the mother-daughter bond. La Maison de Claudine (My Mother's House, 1922), La Naissance du jour (A Lesson in Love, 1928) and Sido (1929) all celebrate her carefree rural childhood and her mother's strength and vitality. This period marks a distinction from the darker world depicted in her earlier works. Her use of the character/narrator "Colette" in works such as L'Étoile vespérale (1946) and Le Fanal bleu (1949) further blurred her distinctions between fiction and reality.

Colette received many awards throughout her lifetime. She was the first woman to be granted admission to the prestigious Goncourt Academy, and in 1953, she was elected a grand officer of the Legion of Honour. A crippling form of arthritis haunted the last 20 years of her life; however, she still managed to publish Gigi (1945) at the age of 72. The novel was later made into a film in 1948 and into a musical in 1958, directed by Vincente Minnelli.

Colette died on August 3 in Paris. Because of her popularity, she was granted a state funeral that was attended by thousands of her admirers but was denied Catholic rites because she had been divorced.

Another Work by Colette

Break of Day. New York: Ballantine Books, 1983.

A Work about Colette

Thurman, Judith. Secrets of the Flesh: A Life of Colette. New York: Knopf, 1999.

Collymore, Frank (Colly) (1893–1980)
poet, short-story writer, teacher, lexicographer, editor

Frank Collymore was born in St. Michael, Barbados, to Joseph Appleton Collymore, a government customs officer, and Rebecca Wilhelmina, née Clark. Collymore attended Combermere School, a grammar school for boys, from 1903 to 1910 and taught at the same school from 1910 until 1963. George LAMMING, the West Indian novelist, poet, and critic, was one of his many students.

Collymore did not publish his first book of poetry, Thirty Poems, until 1944. Poems in this and other collections both humorously and seriously examine a variety of topics—landscape, love, war, conformity, and history. After the productive poetry years of the 1940s when he published three books containing 103 poems, Collymore shifted his attention to writing short stories. Eighteen of his short stories appeared in Bim, a magazine started by the Young Men’s Progressive Club of Barbados. Many of these stories have a dark, even morbid edge, and the mind appears as a recurring theme. In his story Shadows, published in Bim in December 1942, for example, the narrator asks:

“The mind. What do you and I know of the mind, and of the vast forces which lie around us, in us and yet not wholly of us, secret, prowling, mysterious, fraught with such power as is beyond our knowledge, watching and waiting to encompass us, to overthrow what we call the seat of the reason—the mind whose powers and weaknesses we can never hope to comprehend?”

Working with the editing and publishing of Bim from 1942 to 1975 enabled Collymore to influence the production and consumption of West Indian literature significantly, as explained by Lamming in a special introduction to the June 1955 issue:

“There are not many West Indian writers today who did not use Bim as a kind of platform, the surest, if not the only avenue, by which they might reach a literate and sensitive reading public, and almost all of the West Indians who are now writers in a more professional sense and whose work has compelled the attention of readers and writers in other countries, were introduced, so to speak, by Bim.”

Collymore also used other avenues to introduce readers to West Indian writers; he introduced a 19-year-old Derek WALCOTT as a true poet in Savacou (1949). In a 1986 essay in Fifty Caribbean Writers, Edward Baugh asserts, “Collymore earned his reputation as a doyen and godfather of West Indian Literature.” In a 1971 essay in West Indian Poetry 1900–1970, Baugh goes on to say that Collymore’s poetry marked “something of an advance in West Indian poetry,” his influences having been “more twentieth-century than those of his coevals [contemporaries].”

Other Works by Frank Collymore

The Man Who Loved Attending Funerals and Other Stories. Edited by Harold Barratt and Reinhard Sander. Portsmouth, N.H.: Heinemann, 1993.

Rhymed Ruminations of the Fauna of Barbados. Bridgetown, Barbados: Advocate, 1968.

Selected Poems. Bridgetown, Barbados: Coles Printery, 1971.

Works about Frank Collymore

Baugh, Edward. “Frank Collymore: A Biographical Portrait.” Savacou: A Journal of the Caribbean Artists Movement 7–8 (1973): 139–48.

Sander, Reinhard W., Esmond D. Ramesar, and Edward Baugh. An Index to Bim 1942–1972. St. Augustine, Trinidad: University of West Indies Extra-Mural Studies Unit, 1973.

Condé, Maryse (1934–) novelist, playwright, essayist, critic, professor

Maryse Condé was born in Pointe-à-Pitre, Guadeloupe. A bright student with a penchant for reading, Condé attended school in Guadeloupe before continuing her education in France. Studying black stereotypes in Caribbean literature, she earned a doctorate in comparative literature in 1975 from the Université de Paris III (Sorbonne Nouvelle).

Condé taught French in multiple countries, including Guinea, Accra, and Sénégal, from 1960 to 1968. After working as a program producer for the French Services of the BBC from 1968 to 1970, she became an editor at the Paris publishing house Présence Africaine and, in 1973, began to teach Francophone literature at Paris VII (Jussieu), X (Nanterre), and III (Sorbonne Nouvelle).

While teaching, Condé also wrote. She published numerous novels after the release of her first, Hérémakhonon (Welcome Home) in 1976. In Hérémakhonon, Veronica, a young Guadeloupien woman who was educated in Paris, goes to West Africa to examine her history. Although multiple similarities exist between Veronica's and Condé's life experiences, Condé denies that Veronica is an autobiographical character. Like the first novel, Une Saison à Rihata (A Season in Rihata, 1981) follows a Guadeloupien female protagonist to a fictional West African country repressed by postcolonial regimes. Both novels use multiple points of view to reconstruct history.

Ségou (Segu, 1984, 1985), Condé's third novel and written in two volumes, positioned her as a premier contemporary Caribbean writer. Set in the African kingdom of Segou between 1797 and 1860, the novel follows four sons of a royal family to Brazil and the Caribbean while addressing religion, slavery, corruption, incest, and rape. Some criticized the novel as soap-operaesque, but in The New York Times Book Review, May 31, 1987, Charles Larson called Ségou "the most significant historical novel about black Africa published in many a year." It weaves relatively unknown fragments of African history with compelling personal narratives.

Between Hérémakhonon and Ségou, Condé published numerous theoretical essays on Antillean culture and literature, but afterward she focused on creative writing. The focus of her fiction also shifted from Africa to the African diaspora after Ségou. Moi, Tituba, sorcière noire de Salem (I, Tituba, Black Witch of Salem, 1986) uses first-person narrative to tell the story of an obscure historical figure, Tituba—a black slave from Barbados arrested for witchcraft in the United States during the 17th century. Subsequent works, such as La Vie scélérate (The Tree of Life, 1987) and Les Derniers Rois Mages (The Last Magi, 1992) continue to explore themes of exile, psychological dislocation, race, class, gender, and history. An indication of Condé's widespread acclaim, her novels have been translated into English, German, Dutch, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, and Japanese.

In 1990, Condé took a position at the University of California, Berkeley. Since then, she has worked at the University of Virginia, the University of Maryland, and Harvard. Condé, at the University of Columbia since 1995, has chaired the Center for French and francophone studies. Her multifaceted writing techniques and narrative strategies, as well as her work's political and cultural themes, make her one of the most important Caribbean francophone writers.

Other Works by Maryse Condé

Crossing the Mangrove. Translated by Richard Philcox. New York: Anchor Books, 1995.

Land of Many Colors & Nanna-ya. Translated by Nicole Ball. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

Tales from the Heart: True Stories from My Childhood. Translated by Richard Philcox. New York: Soho, 2001.

Works about Maryse Condé

Apter, Emily S. "Crossover Texts/Creole Tongues: A Conversation with Maryse Condé." Public Culture 13, no. 1 (Winter 2001): 89–96.

Arowolo, Bukoye. "The Black Caribbean Woman's Search for Identity in Maryse Condé's Novels." In Feminism and Black Women's Creative Writing: Theory, Practice, and Criticism. Edited by Aduke Adebayo. Ibadan, Nigeria: AMD, 1996.

Suk, Jeannie. Postcolonial Paradoxes in French Caribbean Writing: Césaire, Glissant, Condé. Oxford: Clarendon, 2001.

Constant de Rebecque, Benjamin(1767–1830) nonfiction writer, novelist

Henri-Benjamin Constant de Rebecque was born on October 25 in Lausanne, Switzerland. His mother died from complications in childbirth one week after Constant was born. Tutored as a young child, he read daily for eight to 10 hours. He was sent at a young age to the University of Erlangen in Bavaria, where he learned German, one of three languages in which he was proficient by the time he was 18. He later transferred to the University of Edinburgh where he studied under distinguished proponents of freedom, including Adam Smith, Adam Ferguson, and Dugald Stewart. He subsequently moved to Paris to study with the intellectual Jean-Baptiste-Antoine Suard. While there, he became close friends with the great Lafayette, among other influential thinkers.

In 1794, he met Germaine de STAËL, whose influence piqued his interest in politics. He began to publish political pamphlets and was appointed a member of the Tribunal under Napoleon. But Constant was critical of Napoleon's policies, especially his project to make himself consul for life (and later emperor), and when in 1802 Napoleon banished de Staël, Constant accompanied her in her exile from France.

Constant's works of political theory include De l'esprit de conquête et de l'usurpation (On the Spirit of Conquest and Usurpation, 1814) and Principes de politique (Political Principles, 1816). One of his principles was the importance of protecting individual liberty against both government and the encroachments of the majority. He also wrote a five-volume treatise, De la religion (On Religion, 1824–31). Unlike many French thinkers of his time, he believed that religion was a positive force in society and a necessary balance to the power of government.

In 1816, a short novel Constant had written 10 years previously, Adolphe, was published. With great economy of style, the work tells the story of a young man's involvement with an older woman and his painful efforts to disentangle himself from the affair. It is presumed that the story has autobiographical elements, though whether the unfortunate Eleanore is based on Madame de Staël or on one of the other women in Constant's life has not been established. Ironically, Constant is better remembered for Adolphe, a work to which he attached no great value but which is seen as an important forerunner of the psychological novel than for his immense work on religion, which occupied decades of his life.

Constant produced dozens of works that defied laws limiting freedom of speech and freedom of the press. He campaigned against the African slave trade and fought for civil liberties alongside Lafayette. Constant's health began to decline rapidly in 1830, and he died on December 8. At his funeral service, people lined the streets to wave the tricolor flags of the Liberal Party in his honor.

Other Works by Benjamin Constant

Adolphe. Translated by Margaret Mauldon. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Political Writings. Translated by Biancamaria Fontana. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

Works about Benjamin Constant

Holmes, Stephen. Benjamin Constant and the Making of Modern Liberalism. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1984.

Todorov, Tszvetan. A Passion for Democracy: Benjamin Constant. New York: Algora, 1998.

Wood, Dennis. Benjamin Constant: A Biography. New York: Routledge, 1993.

Cortázar, Julio (1914–1984) novelist, short-story writer, translator

Julio Cortázar was born in Brussels, Belgium, to Argentinean parents. He moved to Argentina with his family after World War I when he was four years old, having learned by then to speak French as well as Spanish. Not long after returning to Argentina, his father abandoned his family, leaving Cortázar to be raised by his mother. As a student, Cortázar was interested in literature, attending the Teacher's College in Buenos Aires from which he received a degree in literature in 1935. His earliest jobs were as a secondary school teacher in various towns in Argentina.

In 1945, Cortázar left teaching to become a translator of both English and French writers for various publishing houses in Argentina, but by 1951 he was so much against the Perón regime in Argentina that he turned down the opportunity to have a chair at the University of Buenos Aires and instead went to live in France, where he remained until his death. While in France, he also worked as a translator for UNESCO, dividing each year so that he would translate for six months and write fiction and play jazz trumpet the remaining six months. He lived part of the time in Paris and the rest at his home in the Provençal village of Saignon in the south of France. Cortázar was committed to the revolutionary political movements in Latin America, as witnessed by his visit to Cuba in 1961, his support of the United Chilean Front, and his visit to Nicaragua in 1983.

By his own admission, Cortázar was influenced by SYMBOLIST and surrealist writers such as Comte de LAUTREAMONT, Arthur RIMBAUD, Stéphane MALARMÉ, Alfred JARRY, Jean COCTEAU, and Jorge Luis BORGES. He was also influenced by Edgar Allen Poe, John Keats, and Virginia Woolf. Both his fiction and interviews with him reveal his belief that reality is actually a collage of the rational and the irrational, the linear and the nonlinear, fantasy and what we generally tend to consider "real," all existing on different planes at the same time. In his humorous and satirical book Cronopios and Famas (1962), for example, Cortázar divides the world between cronopios, imaginary creatures who represent the magical in life, and famas, those who represent conventional reality. In addition, his novel The Winners (1960) is composed of various disparate characters who, after winning a lottery, find themselves together on a holiday cruise, their prize. This external voyage becomes a metaphor for the internal, metaphysical confrontation that each character has with himself or herself.

Of all that Cortázar has written, however, he is best known for being the author of the short story "Blow-Up" (which inspired Michelangelo Antonioni's famous film of the same name) and of the novel Hopscotch, which first appeared in 1963. A novel that works on a number of levels, Hopscotch consists of a series of numbered chapters that can be read "in normal fashion" or in an entirely different sequence, which Cortázar provides, informing the reader, "In its own way, this book consists of many books, but two books above all." Like a labyrinth or the actual game of hopscotch, the reader who follows the nonlinear "sequence" jumps around while trying to keep his or her balance as the characters search for heaven or hell or the center of the labyrinth. Considered to be one of the major novels written by a Latin American in the 20th-century, Hopscotch has been called an "antinovel" in its methods of breaking with traditional form and content while maintaining a comical sense of the absurd.

Julio Cortázar is now considered one of the most important 20th-century Latin American writers, known for his experimentalism and MAGIC REALISM. His short stories and novels, written with wit and a startling sense of fantasy, portray complex characters faced with metaphysical anguish.

Other Works by Julio Cortázar

62: A Model Kit. Translated by Gregory Rabassa. New York: New Directions, 2000.

Blow Up and Other Stories. Translated by Paul Blackburn. New York: Pantheon, 1985.

Final Exam. Translated by Alfred J. MacAdam. New York: New Directions, 2000.

Works about Julio Cortázar

Moran, Dominic. Questions of the Liminal in the Fiction of Julio Cortázar. Oxford: European Humanities Research Centre, 2001.

Standish, Peter. Understanding Julio Cortázar. Columbia, S.C.: University of South Carolina Press, 2001.

Stavans, Ilan. Julio Cortázar: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1996.

Costumbrismo

Costumbrismo was a main feature of Spanish romanticism. It was, in the most general of terms, the practice of creating literary sketches that captured realistic details about local life and customs. The word costumbrismo comes from the Spanish costumbres, which means “customs.”

Although this practice was a feature in all of Europe’s romantic traditions, such as French ROMANTICISM and German Romanticism, it was so pronounced and so central to the Spanish romantics that it deserves notice.

Romanticism in Spain in the late 18th and early 19th centuries was a reaction to the previous century’s domination by the aesthetic ideas of the Enlightenment. The Enlightenment proposed that there were universal standards for beauty and harmony and that the arts should always follow neo-classical models. Spanish Costumbrismo is a reaction against this sort of subtle cultural imperialism. By concentrating on the aesthetic value of the extremely local and idiosyncratic elements of Spanish culture, the writers of the Spanish romantic movement, for example Gustavo Alfonso BÉCQUER, were rebelling against the tyranny of the ideal in favor of their own experiences.

Other romantic writers used Costumbrismo for other purposes. For example, the author Mariano José de Larra (1809–37) used Costumbrismo as a mode to satirize peculiar Spanish customs and point out the absurdity and barbarity of his contemporaries.

Costumbrismo used slang and local dialects to such a degree that a literary portrait written in Seville was unlikely to be understood by a citizen of Barcelona.

In Enlightenment thought, the individual is always subservient to a norm that may be discovered empirically. The consequence of this line of thinking is that the individual artist is discouraged from expressing idiosyncratic points of view in favor of attempting to express values and ideas that are universally applicable to all humanity. Costumbrismo challenges these ideas by focusing on art’s relationship to the specific and immediate environment in which it is made. As a result many works of Costumbrismo are not portable to other times and are not easily translated or understood. On the other hand, Costumbrismo has a nuance and a level of vivid, sensuous detail that is often lacking in the didactic works of Enlightenment literature, which are mostly philosophical treatises.

Costumbrismo reintroduced the more personal dramas of everyday life into Spanish literature. In addition, the roots of the 19th-century novel and even of MODERNISM may be seen in Costumbrismo.

A Work about Costumbrismo

Tully, Carol Lisa. Creating a National Identity: A Comparative Study of German and Spanish Romanticism. Stuttgart, Germany: H. D. Heinz, 1997.

Coverley, Mrs. Eric

See BENNETT, LOUISE.

Crayencour, Marguerite de

See YOURCENAR, MARGUERITE.

Cronin, Jeremy (1949–) poet and essayist

Jeremy Cronin was born in Durban, South Africa, and studied at the University of Cape Town and the Sorbonne. He was arrested under the 1976 Terrorism Act for participating in underground work for the banned African National Congress in 1976 and spent seven years in a maximum-security prison, three of those years among inmates on death row. While he served his sentence, his wife unexpectedly died. He was released in 1983, the same year that his first collection of poems, Inside, was released.

Inside was translated into many languages and won the 1984 Ingrid Jonker Prize. The collection chronicles the relationship between the public life of political struggle and the private life and feelings that accompany this struggle.

Cronin spent three years in exile from South Africa, returning in 1990. His poetry has appeared in many magazines and anthologies, and his collection Even The Dead received much critical acclaim after its publication in 1997. The collection is a marked departure from his earlier work and attempts to defy the “amnesia” that prevents people from remembering South Africa’s past. Cronin says of his eponymous poem, “Even The Dead,” “I am not sure what poetry is. I am not sure what the aesthetic is. Perhaps the aesthetic should be defined in opposition to the anesthetic. . . . Art is the struggle to stay awake” (De Kock). Cronin’s pieces determinedly fight the urge to forget the past—he uses the past to forge the trail to the future. His most recent work, Inside and Out (1999) a compilation of poems from his previously published volumes, revisits these themes.

Cronin has served as deputy general secretary of the South African Communist Party and lives in Johannesburg. His reinvention of poetic form and style shows the changing landscape of South Africa both physically and politically.

Works Edited by Jeremy Cronin

The Ideologies of Politics. With Anthony de Crespigny. New York: Oxford University Press, 1975.

Thirty Years of the Freedom Charter. With Raymond Suttner. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1987.

Works about Jeremy Cronin

De Kock, Leon. “A Different Cronin.” Electronic Mail and Guardian Review of Books. August 1997.

Gardner, Susan. Four South African Poets: Robert Berold, Jeremy Cronin, Douglas Reid Skinner, and Stephen Watson—Interviews. Grahamstown, South Africa: National English Literary Museum, 1986.

Curnow, Allen (1911–2001) poet, dramatist, editor

Allen Curnow was born in Timaru, New Zealand. Although his mother was born in England, on his father’s side he was a fifth-generation New Zealander. After studying at Christchurch BHS and the universities of Canterbury and Auckland, Curnow made the decision not to be ordained as an Anglican clergyman, as his father was. Instead, he began his career as a journalist and, between 1951 and 1976, taught English at Auckland University. Curnow edited the first collections of New Zealand poetry, A Book of New Zealand Verse: 1923–45 (1945, 1951) and The Penguin Book of New Zealand Verse (1960).

A MODERNIST poet, Curnow was a friend of the British-American poet W. H. Auden, for whom he named his son Wystan (Auden’s first name). For a short period of time, while overseas in 1949, he stayed with the Welsh poet, Dylan Thomas, with whom he became friends. Curnow’s early poetry focuses on social and physical aspects of New Zealand, its landscape, and its place in the larger world, but by the time World War II broke out, Curnow was more concerned with personal as well as universal themes, as reflected in At Dead Low Water and Sonnets (1949).

Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Curnow was considered one of New Zealand’s most important poets. His reputation only increased with the 1972 publication of Trees, Effigies, Moving Objects, a highly acclaimed sequence of 18 poems. The style of his writing was becoming more open and contemporary as he began to focus on the wild landscape of Lone Kauri Road and Karekare Beach on Auckland’s west coast, where he had been spending vacations.

During his long career, Curnow was awarded the New Zealand Book Award for Poetry six times, the Commonwealth Poetry Prize (1988), the Queen’s Gold Medal for Poetry (1989), a Cholmondeley Award (1992), the A. W. Reed Lifetime Achievement Award of the Montana New Zealand Books Awards (2000), and the 2001 Montana New Zealand Award for his last book of poems, The Bells of Saint Babel’s.

Works about Allen Curnow

Stead, C. K. Kin of Place: Essays on New Zealand Writers. Auckland: Auckland University Press, 2002.

Wieland, James. Enspiring Mind: A Comparative Study of Derek Walcott, Christopher Okigbo, A. D.

Hope, Allen Curnow, A. M. Klein and Nissim Ezekiel. Pueblo, Colo.: Passeggiata Press, 1988.

Czaczkes, Shmuel Yosef

See AGNON, SAMUEL JOSEF.

D

Dada (1916–1920)

Dada or dadaism, taken from the French word for hobby-horse, was a nihilistic movement in the arts that spread primarily throughout France, Switzerland, and Germany, and the United States between 1916 and 1920. It was founded on principles of anarchy, intentional irrationality, cynicism, and the rejection of social organization.

The origin of the name, like the movement itself, lacks any formal logic. The most widely accepted theory is that, at a meeting in 1916 at the Café Voltaire in Zurich, a group of young artists and war resisters inserted a letter opener into a French–German dictionary. The letter opener pointed to the word dada.

The basis of the movement was more substantive than the origin of its name. It was founded as a protest against bourgeois values and as a direct result of mounting sentiments of despair about World War I. One of the chief ambitions of the movement was to discover authentic reality by abolishing traditional culture and values. Comprised of painters, writers, dancers, and musicians, the dadaists were often involved in several art forms simultaneously and sought to break down the boundaries that kept individual art forms distinct. The dadaists did not only want to create art; they wanted to promote revolutionary changes.

They were not interested in public admiration but sought to provoke the public into action. To the dadaists, a violently negative reaction was better than a passive acceptance.

Although as a movement dadaism concerned all forms of the arts, including visual and performance modes, in France it was predominately literary in emphasis, taking the lead from one of its founders, the poet Tristan TZARA. The most noted French publication was the journal Littérature, which was published from 1919 to 1924 and contained works by André BRETON, Louis ARAGON, Philippe Soupault (1897–?), and Paul ÉLUARD.

The dada movement began to decline in 1922 as many of its proponents began to develop an interest in surrealism.

Works about Dada

Erickson, John D. Dada: Performance, Poetry and Art. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Matthews, J. H. Theatre in Dada and Surrealism. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1974.

Dağlarca, Fazıl Hüsnü (1914–) poet

Fazıl Hüsnü Dağlarca was born in Istanbul, Turkey, shortly after the start of World War I. He was the fifth child of an army officer, completed his higher education at a military college, and received his own commission as second lieutenant in 1935.

Although Dağlarca received a military education and was an army officer from 1935 to 1950, he showed an aptitude for writing at an early age, publishing his first poems while he was still in middle school. His first complete book of poetry was published in 1935, but he had been publishing poetry in various literary magazines since 1933. He first gained public attention in 1933 for his poem Slowing Life, but it was his book Child of God (1940) that actually provided the basis of the questions about the universe and God that the bulk of his poetry would attempt to answer. The book's major theme is humanity's amazement at the universe, expressed through the psychological viewpoint of a child who constantly asks questions and searches for answers, while at the same time both admiring and fearing the world itself. God and the nature of God are recurring themes in much of Dağlarca's work.

Dağlarca's military career also provided useful ideas on which he would ultimately focus his poetry. Toward the end of his time as an officer, Dağlarca began to use his writing in an attempt to answer diverse questions on the relationship of humanity to nature in poems such as The Stone Age (1945) and Mother Earth. Other areas of interest included humanity's relationship to one's own history (in The War of Independence [1951], The Conquest of Istanbul [1953], and The Epic of Gallipoli [1963]) and people's struggles with other people (in The Agony of the West [1951], Song of Algeria [1961] and Our Vietnam War [1966]). Dağlarca's poetry is highly patriotic and firmly entrenched in the ideals of Turkish nationalism.

Dağlarca is one of the Turkey's most prolific and most frequently translated poets. Throughout his career, Dağlarca successfully has tried virtually every form of poetry, including lyric, epic, and inspirational verse; he has also written satire and social criticism. His early poems, in particular, were focused on inspiration and are exemplified by visions of a soul at peace, ready to embrace God. Because Dağlarca watched and lived during a time of conflict, love of God and of the universe were ultimately replaced in his works by a deeper concern for the tragedy of humanity as a whole and a love for all of mankind. His epic poems fall under this category, celebrating the heroic spirit of his nation. Dağlarca's Epic of the Three Martyrs (1949) exemplifies and glorifies the Turkish people's struggles.

Dağlarca's style, particularly in his inspirational works, is influenced by a form of Turkish folk poetry known as divan, which has its basis in mysticism and elements of both Islam and Sufism. Folk poets concentrated primarily on native forms and vernacular in much the same manner as the oral literary tradition of the early minstrels. In conjunction with this, early in the 20th century, a nationalist movement sought to create a "Turkish" literature free of borrowed words. This combination of military precision, nationalist sentiment, and mystical allusion is a driving force behind Dağlarca's popularity.

After resigning from the military in 1950, Dağlarca began to concentrate solely on literature and its impact on Turkish culture. Particularly since the Turkish Revolution of 1960, he became increasingly disillusioned by humankind and the failure of intellectuals to contribute adequately to social change. Starting with the publication of Mother Earth (1950), his works focus on civic responsibility. Along with a friend, he opened a bookstore in Istanbul that he managed until 1970. On the storefront window glass, he displayed a variety of poems dedicated to current events and social change. Printed in large letters, these poems attracted much attention. When one of his poems of social protest, Horoz (1965), prompted legal action against him, Dağlarca responded to his persecutors in yet another poem, Savci'ya (1965), which is translated as To the Public Prosecutor, thus proving that the literary form can be as viable a weapon as military force.

Another Work by Fazıl Hüsni Dağlarca

Seçme Siirler. Selected Poems. Translated by Talât Sait Halman. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1969.

dalit literature

The term dalit literally means “oppressed” and is used to refer to the “untouchable,” casteless sects of India. Dalit literature, therefore, is not only about but also written by the educated of this social group. Unlike literature that is defined by its affiliation to a particular style or structure, such as MODERNISM or DADA, dalit fiction and its literary movement is based on the common ground of social oppression. This movement puts all importance on the lived experience of the writer. Only those who have undergone the trials of being socially ostracized can be said to write dalit literature of any political or moral relevance. Predictably, such a framework allowed newfound opportunities among women to voice their rebellion against gender oppression.

Dalit writers belong to a historical, social, and political background that spreads throughout India from Gujarat, Tamil Nadu, Maharashtra, and Andhra Pradesh to Punjab. It could be said that dalit literature achieved a firm foundation in the mid-20th century, but its framework was established in the early 19th century. Today, dalit writers have their own literary foundations and publish numerous journals. They also have a number of political organizations. The most prominent of these is the Dalit Panthers (begun in the 1970s), which has borrowed much of its ideology from America’s Black Panthers.

The form or style of dalit literature covers a wide range of literary genres. In content, however, there are similarities between authors and their works. The overall message is about community not individuality, revolt not passivity, progress not backwardness. The shared political position of these authors is against the hegemony of upper- and middle-class Hindu beliefs and for the power of the human being against oppressive social rules. Because of this, cultural concepts such as religion and identity are called into question. The language of these texts is very faithful to local, spoken dialects, and high-flown language is not seen to have adequate political power.

Many national leaders have based their reform on the social cause of the lower castes. For the dalits, the most famous of these leaders was Dr. Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar (1891–1956). The emancipation of the dalits was due in large part to Ambedkar’s foundation of educational institutions in the 1960s. These schools were havens where dalit professors and educated, middle-class, dalit students could come together intellectually. Some famous dalit writers are Mulk Raj ANAND and Namdeo DHASAL.

Dalit literature has, since its inception, been translated into several Indian and European languages without compromising on the quality of rebellion that first characterized it. Such literature defies the idea that practice and theory remain separate. The strength of the term dalit, originally used to ostracize a section of Indian society, enabled a successful literary movement that has overthrown social prejudice and won worldwide acclaim.

Works about Dalit Literature

- Anand, Mulk Raj. Anthology of Dalit Literature. Columbia, Mo.: South Asia Books, 1992.
- Moon, Vasant. Growing up Untouchable in India: A Dalit Autobiography. Translated by Gail Omvedt. New Delhi: Vistaar, 2002.

D’Annunzio, Gabriele (1863–1938) poet, novelist, dramatist

Renowned as a writer and a military hero who strongly supported fascism, Gabriele D’Annunzio was born in Pescara, a town in central Italy. The son of a wealthy landowner, he received his education in Prato at Liceo Cicognini, one of the best schools in Italy during that period.

D’Annunzio published his first collection of poems while he was still in his teens. Primo Vere (First Spring, 1879) was inspired by the works of the aristocratic, elitist, classical scholar Giosue Carducci, who sought a humanistic approach to literary studies.

In 1881, D’Annunzio enrolled at the University of Rome. Life in the capital city exposed him to a variety of cultural, artistic, and literary stimulation. He contributed articles to several newspapers and became a member of several literary groups. He also married Maria Hardouin di Galese. The daughter of a duke, she expected a specific standard of living, and D'Annunzio produced large quantities of hack writing to maintain her. The works he produced during this time, however, also included some notable pieces strongly influenced by Guy de MAUPASSANT and the French DECADENCE movement. In particular, the short stories Canto novo (1882), Terra Vergine (1882), and L'Intermezzo di rime (1883) express a sensual awareness of life.

D'Annunzio's first novel, The Child of Pleasure (1889), was a parody of decadence. He followed this highly successful work with The Victim (1891), a novel about sexual depravity. The same year as this work came out, his marriage ended. He moved to Naples and began a series of affairs, the most influential of which was his long-term liaison with the actress Eleonora Duse. He was so deeply inspired by her that he began to produce dramatic works specifically for her, including La Gioconda (1899) and Francesca da Rimini (1901).

Beginning in 1897, D'Annunzio served a three-year term in parliament, but he was not reelected at the end of his term. Having just purchased an expensive villa in anticipation of maintaining his position, he was able to live off of his savings for only a short period before being forced to flee to France to avoid his debts. He returned to writing during this period, staying away from his native Italy until the start of World War I.

Ever the nationalist, D'Annunzio was prompted by the war to return to Italy. He also began his military career. He wrote powerful speeches and articles, urging his fellow countrymen to support the Allied cause. He began a series of correspondences with Mussolini that provided the leader with much insight into potential military tactics. At one point, however, during 1919, D'Annunzio began to lose faith in Italy and its lack of determination. He took his troops and occupied the town of Fiume, ruling as its dictator for 18 months and professing a desire to declare war against Italy. Ultimately, however, he was forced to retreat.

After losing one eye in a flying accident, D'Annunzio retired to once again work on his writing. He was given the title of Prince of Monte Nevoso in 1924 and was elected president of the Italian Royal Academy in 1937. On March 1, 1938, he suffered a stroke and died the same day. Mussolini, in honor of his contributions to the cause, ordered that he be given a state funeral.

A Work about Gabriele D'Annunzio

Woodhouse, John. Gabriele D'Annunzio, Defiant Archangel. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Darío, Rubén (Félix Rubén García Sarmiento) (1867–1916) poet, short-story writer

Rubén Darío was born in Metapa, Nicaragua (now called Ciudad Darío). While still an infant, his parents divorced, and he was adopted by his godfather, Colonel Félix Ramírez. Though he showed writing talent and ability as a teenager, he was denied a scholarship to study in Europe because his youthful writing was too liberal in its religious views. Instead, after he finished school, he traveled to El Salvador, where he met the poet Francisco Gavidia.

Gavidia introduced Darío to French literature. Darío was particularly interested in Victor HUGO and briefly imitated his style. Unable to go to France, he absorbed French culture through its novels and poems. This immersion, first in Hugo and then in the writers of the French symbolist movement (see SYMBOLISM), particularly the poet VERLAINE, was a key factor in Darío's development and led to his founding of the movement of Latin American MODERNISM.

Before Darío, Latin American literature was completely dominated by antiquated modes of writing inherited from Europe. In addition, the subject matter was almost exclusively limited to descriptions of local life and scenery. By introducing modernist ideas such as making art for art's sake and developing a unique poetic voice, Darío succeeded in creating a literature of international scope.

In 1888, while living in Chile, Darío published Blue, a book of short stories and poems that investigate again and again the role of an artist in an industrial society where all value is based on monetary worth. In the poem “Queen Mab’s Veil,” Darío uses strong metaphors and symbolic imagery to depict how the artist’s inner life can be filled with beauty, even when his or her outer reality is cold and unfeeling. The title of the poem alludes to a speech from Shakespeare’s play Romeo and Juliet in which Mercutio speaks about the magical quality of dreams.

In Songs of Life and Hope (1905), a book of poems, Darío reached another stage in his poetic development. While his earlier books freely use nostalgic images that traditionally represented beauty in poetry, for example, the nightingale, Songs of Life and Hope reshapes those images and questions what they mean in a Latin American social and political context. His long poem To Roosevelt, written to United States president Theodore Roosevelt, is a meditation on the United States. In it Darío both admires the United States as a model of modern democracy and worries about the possible threat of U.S. imperialism.

In the final years of his life, the poet would write increasingly about politics, his fear of death, and the uncertainty of the fate of humanity. These are the themes that occupy his haunting and beautiful poem “Fatalities,” the final poem in Songs of Life and Hope.

Darío was the central figure in Latin American MODERNISM and was a forerunner of the cosmopolitan tendencies of such later Latin American authors as Jorge Luis BORGES, Julio CORTÁZAR, and Octavio PAZ. He introduced idiomatic language, original metaphors, and formal innovations to the Latin American literary scene. Finally, his body of work stands as a testament to a highly learned and expressive mind, struggling with the great themes of history, spirituality, and art.

Another Work by Darío

Selected Poems. Translated by Lysander Kemp. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1965.

A Work about Darío

Ellis, Keith. Critical Approaches to Rubén Darío. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1974.

Darwish, Mahmud (Mahmoud)

(1942–) poet

Foremost Palestinian poet Darwish emerged as one of the “Resistance Poets,” Palestinians who, in the aftermath of the 1967 Israeli occupation, wrote poetry of struggle. The poem “Identity Card” (1964), an impassioned cry from an Arab quarryman who is determined to keep his dignity despite Israeli occupation, typifies Darwish’s early voice. In the 1970s, Darwish’s poetry became the definitive expression of the pain of Palestinian exile. He has evolved beyond being keeper of Palestine’s spiritual flame, and editor Munir Akash calls him the “poet of human grief.” Darwish’s broad vision embraces the literary heritage not only of Arabs but also of Jews and the many other peoples who inhabit the land of his birth. His creative scope encompasses ancient Near Eastern, Native American, and European mythology. A giant in his significance for modern Arabic literature, Darwish remains such a literary icon for Palestinians that when he writes personal poetry, such as the volume of love poems, Bed of a Stranger (1999), some Arab critics respond as if he were turning his back on the plight of his people.

Darwish was born in Barweh, a Palestinian town that was attacked by Israel in its 1948 campaign. Darwish grew up, in Salma K. Jayyusi’s words, “as a refugee in his own country.” He became active in the Israeli Communist Party and, in 1964, published his first book of poetry, Leaves of Olive. In 1971, he resettled in Beirut, where he lived until 1982, when Palestinians were driven out of Lebanon. His memoir, Memory for Forgetfulness, is about being trapped in the 1982 Israeli siege of Beirut. In 1996, Darwish was allowed to return to the land of his birth.

Darwish's awards include the Lenin Prize (1983) and France's Knighthood of Arts and Belles Lettres (1997). He served on the Palestinian National Council, founded the prestigious literary magazine al-Karmel, has written 30 books, and is translated into 35 languages. In 1999, Israeli authorities finally permitted five Darwish poems to be included in schoolbooks.

Other Works by Mahmud Darwish

Adam of Two Edens. Edited by Munir Akash and Daniel Moore. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2000.

Psalms. Translated by Ben Bennani. Boulder, Colo.: Passeggiata Press, 1995.

Victims of a Map: A Bilingual Anthology of Arabic Poetry by Samih al-Qasim, Adonis, and Mahmud Darwish. Translated by Abdullah al-Udhari. London: Al-Saqi Books, 1984.

Davies, Robertson (1913–1995) novelist, playwright, essayist

Robertson William Davies was born in Thamesville, Ontario, Canada, to a newspaper owner. He attended Oxford, receiving a degree in literature in 1938. From a young age, he was drawn to the theater, playing small roles outside London; in 1940, he acted at the Old Vic Repertory Company in London and married Brenda Matthews, who was the stage manager for the company. He returned to Canada with his wife soon after to work as a journalist. He was the editor of the Peterborough Examiner for 15 years and its publisher from 1955 to 1965.

Davies's love of theater was evident from the many plays he wrote, and he said that he considered his plays comedies rather than tragedies that criticized Canada's provincial attitudes. He won the 1948 Dominion Drama Festival Award for best Canadian play for Eros at Breakfast, which made use of allegory (using symbols rather than direct representation) and was more theatrical than realistic. In a similar style, King Phoenix is a fantasy based on the mythical King Cole, while General

Confession is a historical comedy of ideas with the main characters serving as Jungian (derived from Carl Jung) archetypes of self, persona, shadow, and anima. These three plays, with their elaborate costumes and settings and magic transformations, reveal Davies's inclination for spectacle and extravagance.

Although Davies wrote plays, essays, and criticism, it is for his many novels that he is best known and admired. His first trilogy, the Salterton trilogy—Tempest-Tost (1951), Leaven of Malice (1954), and A Mixture of Frailties (1958)—is an ongoing social comedy set in a small Ontario university town. The novel that begins the Deptford trilogy, Fifth Business (1970), is considered by most critics to be his finest work with its blend of myths, magic, freaks, evil, and theatrical elements. A snowball with a stone concealed in it opens the novel, which then proceeds through the life of a magician whose life is linked through that stone to that of the protagonist, Boy Staunton. The other Deptford novels are The Manticore (1972) and World of Wonders (1975).

Davies's work often plays with traditional themes and tropes from the Western literary canon. He often works with classical themes set in a modern context, making frequent allusions to works like Milton's Paradise Lost. The influence of Shakespeare and Milton is immediately evident. (In fact, Davies's B.Lit. thesis at Oxford was on Shakespearean Theatre.) Davies's work also reflects his interest in Freudian and subsequently Jungian psychology, especially The Manticore.

During the course of his career, Davies won a number of major awards for his work, including the Lorne Pierce Medal, the Stephen Leacock Medal for Humour, and the Governor General's Award for The Manticore. Davies was the first Canadian to become an Honorary Member of the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters. He was a Companion of the Order of Canada.

Reviewer S. A. Rowland writes in Contemporary Novelists that Davies "delights in paradox and is himself an example: Among the most innovative of contemporary novelists, he stresses our deep roots in old cultures and ‘magical’ beliefs.”

Other Works by Robertson Davies

The Cunning Man: A Novel. New York: Viking, 1995.

The Lyre of Orpheus. New York: Viking Penguin, 1988.

The Mirror of Nature. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1983.

The Rebel Angels. New York: Viking Press, 1982.

The Well-tempered Critic: One Man's View of Theatre and Letters in Canada. Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1981.

Works about Robertson Davies

Grant, Judith Skelton. Robertson Davies: Man of Myth. New York: Viking, 1994.

Peterman, Michael. Robertson Davies. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

decadence

Decadence is a literary and artistic movement that began in Europe during the final decades of the 19th century. Although France produced the most notable of all decadent authors, Joris-Karl HUYSMANS, whose À Rebours (Against Nature, 1884) epitomizes the movement, decadence was not confined to France. It spread to Belgium with writers such as Rodenbach, to Germany, with the early works of Thomas MANN and the writings of Stefan GEORGE, and Austria, with Hugo von HOFMANNSTHAL. It was also evidenced in Britain and Ireland in the works of Oscar Wilde, particularly his novel The Picture of Dorian Gray (1890). Huysmans's influence on Wilde seems apparent in that Wilde refers to A Rebours, calling it the The Yellow Book that corrupts Dorian Gray. Other notable members of the French decadent movement include Charles BAUDELAIRE and Stéphane MALLARMÉ and Arthur RIMBAUD.

Characteristic of the decadence movement as a whole, and symptomatic of the obsessions of FIN-DE-SIÈCLE Europe, elements such as decapitation, vampirism, and images of women as evil predators and temptresses were common throughout decadence texts. The themes in these writings are, therefore, inherently diverse and include tales of the supernatural and occult, science fiction, romance, and “faits divers” or “slice of life” sensational crimes.

Seeking to speak out against scientific progress and democracy, decadent authors created their own paradise, often drug induced, and reveled in the poetics of necrophilia. Self-centered and ego-maniacal almost to the point of self-annihilation, they tended to be members of the aristocracy who were antidemocratic in politics, misanthropic, and misogynistic (hating or fearful of women). They were often members of the occult, and their lifestyles tended to be as flamboyant as their writings were insolent. Many members of the decadent movement ultimately died from their excesses.

A Work about Decadence

McGuinness, Patrick, ed. Symbolism, Decadence and the Fin de Siècle: French and European Perspectives. Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 2000.

De Kok, Ingrid (1951–) poet

Ingrid De Kok was raised in South Africa, whose geography influenced her later work. She says, “Growing up in a hard, flat, dry place, a demanding physical environment has probably influenced the way I see a great number of things as well as the way I respond to landscape. I’m interested in geography and space insofar as it relates to the notion of home” (Rich). This image of home appears in much of her poetry. Her work has appeared in many anthologies and numerous journals in South Africa, England, the United States, and Canada.

De Kok’s poetry blends the languages of Afrikaans and English to create images of the South African landscape. In a move that she calls unconscious, she weaves into her poetry the political subjects of loss and apartheid alongside the very personal lives of the people; for example, in her poem, “Mending,” from her collection Familiar Ground (1988), the narrator says, “The woman plies her ancient art, / Her needle sutures as it darts, / scoring, scripting, scarring, stitching, / the invisible mending of the heart.” By blending the traditional sewing metaphor with images of scarring and scoring, De Kok shows not only a garment or body being mended but also a nation.

Her notion of the community in her poetry is influenced by authors such as Seamus HEANEY and Jeremy CRONIN, while her interest in form is more influenced by traditional English and American writers such as Emily Dickinson, John Donne, and Robert Frost. De Kok’s work has been described as having “fearlessness, guts to transgress, an unflinching ear for the alternation of consonants on the tongue, a turn of thinking and the ability to capture in the most delicate and individual terms a devastating phenomenon.”

A Work about Ingrid De Kok

Krog, Antjie. “Defenceless in the Face of De Kok’s Poetry.” Electronic Mail and Guardian. Johannesburg, South Africa. January 19, 1998.

Dépestre, René (1926–) poet, novelist, essayist, journalist, professor, editor

René Dépestre was born and educated in Jacmel, Haiti, before attending the Lycée Pétion in Port-au-Prince. There he worked with the revolutionary magazine La Ruche. At 19, Dépestre published his first revolutionary volume of verse, Étincelles (Sparks, 1945). He became a leading voice for young Haitian radicals by, for example, criticizing the Haitian government’s exploitative acts in La Ruche. After a Haitian student revolution sparked by La Ruche’s prohibition in 1946, Dépestre was exiled to France. He published Traduit du grand large (Translated from the High Sea, 1952), a volume of poetry, before returning to Haiti in 1958. Dissatisfied with Haitian dictator François Duvalier, Dépestre moved to Cuba in 1959 and worked as an editor and professor. After Cuba expelled him in 1978, Dépestre returned to France. He worked for UNESCO during the 1980s and became a French citizen in 1991.

Although Dépestre has lived much of his adult life outside Haiti, he is one of Haiti’s most celebrated contemporary poets. His poetry voices Haitian and Caribbean values and explores the relationships between and among identity and ethnicity, slavery, and exploitation. His articles and essays grapple with similar issues, as seen in Bonjour et adieu à la négritude (Hello and Goodbye to Negritude, 1980), a collection of essays that marks Dépestre’s ideological shift from embracing authentic identity to embracing more-open concepts of cultural and personal identities.

Alléluia pour une femme-jardin (Hallelujah for a Garden-Woman, 1973) marks an erotic shift in Dépestre’s writing. There, for example, Dépestre employs erotic and allegorical representations of women. In Éros dans un train chinois (Eros in a Chinese Train, 1993), Dépestre develops a new, imaginative, erotic aesthetic called erotic-magical realism that would ideally re-create Haiti. Dépestre’s work not only focuses on revolution, but his innovative aesthetics also redefine how to write about revolution.

Other Works by René Dépestre

The Festival of the Greasy Pole. Translated by Carrol F. Coates. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1990.

A Rainbow for the Christian West. Translated by Jack Hirschman. Fairfax, Calif.: Red Hill Press, 1972.

Vegetations of Splendor. Translated by Jack Hirschman. Chicago: Vanguard, 1981.

Works about René Dépestre

Dayan, Joan. “France Reads Haiti: An Interview with René Dépestre.” Yale French Studies 83 (1994): 136–53.

Ferdinand, Joseph. “The New Political Statement in Haitian Fiction.” In Voices from Under: Black Narrative in Latin American and the Caribbean. Edited by William Luis. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1984.

Desai, Anita (Mazumdar, Anita)(1937–) novelist

Anita Desai was born in Mussoorie, a tiny hill station on the outskirts of Delhi, India, to a German mother and an Indian father. Though her novels are in English, Desai is fluent in several languages. It has been noted that she spoke German at home, Hindi with friends, and English at school. In addition to being a professor of writing at Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), Desai is also involved in education in India and is a member of the Advisory Board of English in New Delhi. She is currently a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature in London.

Desai's novels are preoccupied with the theme of alienation. Her novel In Custody (1985) is set during the fraught political tensions between India and Pakistan during the Partition War and traces the daily lives of middle-class women at home. What unfolds is a female narrative of political struggle that occurs outside of and simultaneous to the one fought in the public space dominated by men. One of the main characters, Nur, is a budding poet whose talent is silenced and hidden by her husband. Her story is one example of the novel's concern with the effects historical events have on family relations and how women are denied public recognition.

Although Desai's earlier novels are based on the question of women's roles in Indian and Pakistani societies, Desai's later novel, Baumgartner's Bombay (1988), goes beyond the problem of gender. It is the story of a businessman's search across continents to escape Western anti-Semitism, only to discover traces of it even in India. This novel is more global in perspective in its exploration of the aftereffects of World War II in an Indian context.

Desai has also written numerous children's books, of which The Village by the Sea (1982) won the Guardian Prize for Children's Fiction in 1983. Her first novel, Fire on the Mountain, (1977) won the Indian National Academy of Letters Award. In 1988, she was awarded the Padma Shri by the president of India for her outstanding contribution to Indian literature.

Other Works by Anita Desai*Clear Light of Day*. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 2000.Journey to Ithaca. New York: Knopf, 1995.Works about Anita DesaiBande, Usha. The Novels of Anita Desai. Prestige Books, 1992.Buruma, Ian, ed. India: A Mosaic. New York: New York Review of Books, 2000.Desbordes-Valmore, Marceline(1786–1859) poet

Marceline Desbordes-Valmore was born in Douai, France, to a lower-middle-class family whose lives had been ruined by the French Revolution. She left with her mother for the Antilles in 1801 only to find the conditions there horrible. Faced with riots and an epidemic of yellow fever, her mother died only a few days after their arrival. Desbordes-Valmore returned to Douai in 1802 to embark on a career as a professional singer and actress.

Desbordes-Valmore's life was fraught with tragedy. In 1809, she fell in love with a writer who left her shortly after she gave birth to their child. The child lived only five years. In 1817, she married the actor Prosper Valmore, with whom she had three children, Hippolyte, Ondine, and Inès. The family lived a precarious existence, fleeing the dangers of revolution throughout Europe. Her daughter Inès died in 1846; Ondine's daughter died in 1852, followed by Ondine herself in 1853; and in 1858 Desbordes-Valmore lost her best friend, the musician Pauline Duchambge.

Desbordes-Valmore's poetry was the one reliable source of satisfaction in her life. In it, her griefs found memorable expression and perhaps catharsis. In "Les Séparés ("Apart"), for example, the poet addresses an absent lover with a constant refrain: "Do not write!":

Do not write. Let us learn to die, as best we may.

*Did I love you? Ask God. Ask yourself. Do you know?
To hear that you love me, when you are far away,
Is like hearing from heaven and never to go.
Do not write!*

Between 1819 and 1843, she published several collections of poetry and received recognition from critics such as Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve (1804–69) and Victor HUGO as one of the leading poets of her time. She also wrote a number of works for children. Her poetry is characterized by sincerity, spontaneity, grace, and melancholy.

Another Work by Marceline Desbordes-Valmore

Simpson, Louis, ed. and trans. Selections in Modern Poets of France: A Bilingual Anthology. Ashland, Ore.: Story Line Press, 1997.

Works about Marceline Desbordes-Valmore

Boutine, Aimee. Maternal Echoes: the Poetry of Marceline Desbordes-Valmore and Alphonse de Lamartine. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2001.

Johnson, Barbara. The Feminist Difference: Literature, Psychoanalysis, Race, and Gender. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2000.

Sainte-Beuve, Charles Augustin. Memoirs of Madame Desbordes-Valmore, with a selection from her poems. Translated by Harriet W. Preston. New York: AMS Press, 1980.

Devi, Mahasweta (1926–) novelist, short-story writer, dramatist, journalist

Mahasweta Devi was born into a literary family in Dacca, Bangladesh (previously known as East Bengal). As a young child, she migrated to West Bengal (India) with her parents. The local politics of West Bengal and the Bengali language are to this day the source and inspiration for Devi's literature. Her early involvement with the local political theater group "Ganantaya" formed her ambition to spread social and political awareness through her writing. Since then, she has used her prodigious talent to champion the cause of suppressed Indian tribal societies. Most of her work is written in Bengali and has been translated into several Indian languages and into English. In a 1998 interview, she said that her goal is to "fight for the tribals, downtrodden, underprivileged, and write creatively if and when I find the time."

Devi's feminist tone comments on the traditional view of women in Indian society. Female characters in her works are borrowed from an older literary tradition but are transformed to reveal a profound political self-awareness. In the short story "Dopadi," Devi evokes the central female character from the classical epic Mahabharata, Draupadi, to tell a story of a fugitive tribal woman, also of the same name, who outwits the local police. Another short story, "Breast-Giver" (1993), is a symbolic comparison between a woman's physical illness and the social illnesses extant in postindependent India.

Mahasweta Devi gave up her position as a professor in English literature at a Calcutta university in 1984. This decision allowed her to begin a new life devoted to social work and writing. In 1997, she was a recipient of the Magsaysay Award (Asia's equivalent to the Nobel Prize) for a lifetime spent in creating literature that extends beyond the literary and intellectual to the social.

Another Work by Mahasweta Devi

Imaginary Maps: Three Stories by Mahasweta Devi. Translated by Gayatri Spivak. New York: Routledge, 1994.

Works about Mahasweta Devi

"Mahasweta Devi." Available online at <http://www.emory.edu/ENGLISH/Bahri/Devi.html>. Spivak, Gayatri. In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics. New York: Routledge, 1987.

Dhammachoti, Ussiri (Atsiri Thamma-choat) (1947–) novelist

Ussiri Dhammachoti was born in the Hua Hin district, Prachuap Khiri Khan, Thailand. His father was a fisherman who owned several fishing trawlers. Dhammachoti received his primary and secondary education at Sathukan School. When he failed to pass the entrance exams for Chulalongkorn University, he applied to work for the National Statistical Office and was assigned to draw maps for the national population census. In 1970, he reapplied and was admitted to Chulalongkorn University. He graduated with a bachelor's degree in communications arts in 1974 and started a magazine, which lasted less than a year. He worked for various newspapers, including the Siam Rath, for many years before finally quitting his post as publisher in 1998. He is now a freelance writer and writes only in Thai.

Dhammachoti's writings are deeply influenced by his life experiences. His mother's death greatly affected Dhammachoti, whose initial interest in literature was motivated by his mother's love for old Thai literature and poetry. His travels to the northern provinces of Thailand during the years he worked for the National Statistical Office opened the opportunity for him to collect ideas that formed the basis of his works. Dhammachoti's works deal with a variety of themes, such as the impact of the modern world on traditional societies located in the hilly outskirts of Thailand. These themes are often represented in his TV plays, such as Khun Det and Mae Nak Phra Khanong. His fascination with the local folklore and cultural and religious practices can be observed in his short stories. Dhammachoti also possesses a nostalgic empathy for the people who live in the remote regions of the country. His goal to better their lives is intermixed with his desire to preserve some aspects of their way of life. He sees richness in the traditional history of many of the tribes, like the Miao and Hmong, that should be preserved.

Dhammachoti's stories, such as "Samnuk Khong Pho Thao" ("The Old Man's Conscience," 1972), reflect his compassion for and understanding of not only the poor and downtrodden in Thai society but also the various ethnic groups that live at the borders of the Thai nation. His characters consist of a variety of personality types, ranging from the elite group to the marginalized peoples who lived in the northern region of Thailand. Their differences in background, philosophy, and status, however, do not hinder their attempts to gain a mutual understanding of each other's cultures and tradition.

When Dhammachoti was still an undergraduate, he won the Phlubphla Mali Literary Award from the Literary Circle of Chulalongkorn University for his short story "Samnuk Khong Pho Thao" in 1972. His collection of short stories Kuntong . . . Chao Cha Khlab Ma Mua Fa Sang (Kuntong . . . You Will Return at Dawn) was published in 1978 and won the Southeast Asian Writer Award in 1981. On November 3, 2000, Dhammachoti was awarded the honor of National Artist in Literature.

Another Work by Ussiri Dhammachoti

Of Time and Tide: A Thai Novel. Bangkok: Thai Modern Classic Series, 1985.

Dhasal, Namdeo (Namdev) (1947–)
poet, novelist

Namdeo Dhasal was born in a small village outside Pune, India. He is a DALIT, which means "casteless" or "untouchable," and grew up very poor. Dhasal had almost no formal education but educated himself on the literature of other dalit writers who also wrote about the conditions of the oppressed. Because of this focus, at no time can the voice of the poet be distinguished from that of the political rebel. Dhasal's poetry directly addresses the sources of human unhappiness such as poverty, prostitution, and underworld politics of Bombay. His famed knowledge of the city caught the attention of Trinidadian author V. S. NAIPAUL, who used Dhasal as his guide to Bombay and made him an important figure in his book India: A Million Mutinies Now (1990).

The city of Bombay is the subject of Dhasal's first collection of poems called Golpitha (1973). When the famous Indian playwright Vinay Tendulkar offered to write the introduction to Dhasal's collection, Dhasal insisted that he first come on a walking tour of Golpitha, a red-light district, before writing anything. Dhasal's portraits of the inhabitants in Golpitha vividly capture "life gone wrong" in a world of poverty, filth, and violence. Paradox, however, is a defining feature of Dhasal's style and the harsh realism of his poetry is coupled with images that are both alluring and hopeful. In an untitled poem from Khel (Play, 1983), for example, "Butterflies of hibiscus" dance under the sun that throws love over a "wounded dog" turning in circles.

Since Golpitha, Dhasal has written two novels and several collections of poetry. Dhasal writes in Marathi and a hybrid of Hindi and Urdu. His work, written in the language of the streets, has been called a translator's nightmare. In spite of this, Dhasal's poetry has been translated into numerous European languages, and he has traveled widely to read his poetry.

Dhasal was one of the founders of the Dalit Panthers in 1972. In 1990, he joined mainstream politics and became a member of the Indian Republican Party. He received the Padma Shri from the president of India for his outstanding contribution to Indian literature and was chosen to represent India at the first International Literary Festival in Berlin in 2001.

Another Work by Namdeo Dhasal

"The Poems of Namdeo Dhasal," in An Anthology of Dalit Literature. Edited by Mulk Raj Anand and Eleanor Zelliot. Columbia, Mo.: South Asia Books, 1992.

Dinesen, Isak (Karen Christence Dinesen, Baroness Karen Blixen, Osceola, Pierre Andrézel) (1885–1962) short-story writer, novelist

Isak Dinesen was born in Rungsted, Denmark, to wealth and privilege. Her father, Wilhelm Dine-sen, was an army officer and a writer. Her mother, Ingeborg Westenholz Dinesen, was from a prominent business family. Dinesen studied painting at the Royal Academy of Fine Arts in Copenhagen from 1903 to 1906. In 1907, she published several short stories in a Danish monthly, but these works attracted little attention. In 1914, Dinesen married Swedish nobleman Baron Bror Blixen-Finecke and settled on a coffee plantation in Kenya. They later divorced, and Dinesen moved back to Denmark after the plantation went bankrupt in 1931.

Dinesen's writing career thrived after she returned to Rungsted. Critics in Great Britain and the United States praised her first major work, Seven Gothic Tales (1934), for its sophistication and imaginative use of fantasy. Dinesen's description of her experiences in Africa, Den africanske farm (Out of Africa, 1937), was later made into a movie. During World War II, she wrote Sorg-Acre (Sorrow Acre, 1942), a story set in a rural Denmark that many consider to be her masterpiece.

Dinesen's influences included her father, the Bible, Danish romantic writers, the Arabian Nights, and the Icelandic sagas. Many of her works, including Sorrow Acre, reflect Dinesen's belief that an individual's fate is in the hands of God. She wrote about the topics of love and dreams in her many imaginative tales of fantasy. However, irony destroys romanticism in many of Dinesen's stories, which critic Curtis Cate describes as "sophisticated," "psychologically subtle," and "philosophically speculative."

Another Work by Isak Dinesen

Last Tales. New York: Vintage Books, 1991.

Works about Isak Dinesen

Cate, Curtis. "Isaac Dinesen: The Scheherazade of Our Times." In Olga A. Pelensky, ed., Isak Dinesen: Critical Views. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1993.

Thurman, Judith. Isak Dinesen: The Life of a Storyteller. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1982.

Ding Ling (Jiang Bingzhi) (1904–1986)
novelist, short-story and nonfiction writer

Jiang Bingzhi was born on October 12 in Hunan Province's Linli County in China. After her father's death, she lived with her uncle in Changde. She was introduced to ideas of revolution and democracy at a young age because Changde was a focal point for the 1911 republican revolution to overthrow the Qing dynasty. At 17, she attended a Communist school in Shanghai and later Shanghai University. In 1923, she left for Beijing, where China's "new culture" was developing. She could not afford to attend lectures at Beijing University, so she read Western and Eastern writers. She also learned to paint, and in 1925, she married Hu Yepin, a revolutionary writer.

In 1927, Ding Ling published to great acclaim her first short story, "Meng Ke," based on her own experience at an unsuccessful film audition. Its publication was quickly followed by "Miss Sophie's Diary," a story about a girl with tuberculosis and her fruitless desire to find love. The next year, she published her first short-story collection, In the Dark.

In 1930, Ding Ling and her husband joined the proletarian literary movement in Shanghai, where they joined the newly formed League of Left-wing Writers headed by Lu Xun. Hu Yepin was executed by the Nationalists for his involvement in the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) underground, an event that plunged Ding Ling into the revolution. Ding Ling herself was later kidnapped by the Guomindang (GMD) Nationalist Party.

Amidst her political activity, Ding Ling was also busy writing. She edited The Dipper, the league's literary magazine, and published Flood, a major revolutionary work of social realist (see SOCIALIST REALISM) fiction about peasants exploited by local despots during a disaster. In 1933, she also published the first part of the novel Mother, about a spirited heroine during the 1911 revolution, a character based loosely on her own mother.

After her release from Nationalist prison in 1936, Mao Zedong welcomed her with two poems he wrote in her honor at the Yan'an Communist base. She began to work on the Liberation Daily's literary supplement. When the Sino-Japanese War broke out in 1937, Ding Ling performed field and propaganda work and wrote stories from the front. An outspoken woman yet a loyal servant of both literature and communism, she voiced opinions on inequities within the supposedly egalitarian party, especially in regard to women, at the Yan'an Forum on Literature and Art in 1942.

During the next decade, Ding Ling continued her literary endeavors, writing, among other pieces, a novel about land reform, The Sun Shines over the Sanggan River (1949), which won the Stalin Prize for literature. She also traveled extensively abroad, lecturing on literature and producing essays, literary criticism, and speeches. She frequently wrote about women, both in her stories and in essays, advocating feminist thought, women's sexual freedom, and the rights to seek divorce and not to marry. Her writing was frequently considered scandalous, but it also explored the new dimensions of Chinese womanhood under China's rapidly changing sociopolitical landscape.

In 1955, Ding Ling came under fire from the party leadership. She was accused of heading an antiparty clique and was criticized for the sexual content of her stories. During the brief open period of the Hundred Flowers Campaign in 1956, her plea to make literature independent earned her the label of rightist, as well as party expulsion in 1957. She was "sent down" to do physical labor in a reclamation area in the Great Northern Wilderness in Heilongjiang Province.

When the Cultural Revolution began in 1966, Ding Ling did not escape persecution. She was imprisoned from 1970 to 1975 in Beijing and then removed to a commune in Shanxi. After the revolution, she was officially restored in a 1979 verdict and again became a respected member of the establishment.

As part of the "scar" literature by writers who survived the Cultural Revolution, Ding Ling published essays and stories about her experiences and those of her friends. In 1981, she and her second husband, Chen Ming, moved to a convalescent home in Fukien. Although she was in poor health, she started the literary magazine China in 1985. She died on March 4.

Another Work by Ding Ling

I Myself Am a Woman: Selected Writings of Ding Ling. Barlow, Tani E., and Gary J. Bjorge, eds. Boston: Beacon Press, 1990.

A Work about Ding Ling

Feuerwerker, Yi-tsi Mei. Ding Ling's Fiction: Ideology and Narrative in Modern Chinese Literature. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1982.

Diop, Birago (1906–1989) poet, folklorist

Birago Diop was born into an influential family in Dakar, Senegal. His father died prematurely leaving him to be raised by his mother's family. He attended high school in the old capital before going to France to earn his degree as a veterinarian at the University of Toulouse. In Paris, Diop met many of the founders of NÉGRITUDE, an intellectual and artistic movement that was begun in Paris by black students from the French colonies. The movement celebrated a global African identity, while taking a political stance against colonialism and assimilation. Diop met his compatriot Léopold Sédar SENGHOR, a founder of Négritude, who influenced him to write about African cultural values. Diop used his own cultural background as a resource, recounting the stories he was told as a child. In addition, his experience as a veterinarian allowed him to travel throughout remote areas of French West Africa, giving him access to the rural life and values of traditional Africa.

He is most famous for his work Tales of Amadou Koumba (1966), an award-winning collection of folk tales that he translated from Wolof, the most prevalent indigenous language in Senegal. He is noted for maintaining its rhythm, imagery, and subtleties in his transcription of these stories and for giving the French world access to these ethnic treasures.

In his poetry, Diop concentrated on the mystical elements in African culture. He released a poetry anthology called Lures and Glimmers (1960) that captures the spiritual belief system of many African religions. In 1960, Senghor, the president of Senegal at the time, appointed Diop ambassador to Tunisia. Today, Birago Diop is considered a central contributor of traditional ethnic resources to the Négritude movement.

Works about Birago Diop

Gibbs, James. "The Animal Trickster as Political Satirist and Social Dissident." In Edris Makward et al. The Growth of African Literature. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 1998.

Tollerson, Marie. Mythology and Cosmology in the Narratives of Bernard Dadie and Birago Diop. Washington, D.C.: Three Continents Press, 1984.

Diop, David (1927–1960) poet

David Diop was born in Bordeaux, France, to a Senegalese father on tour of duty and a Cameroonian mother. In his teens, he was deeply impressed by the poetry of Aimé CÉSAIRE, the co-founder of NÉGRITUDE, an intellectual movement started by black students in Paris. These students were writers from the French colonies who celebrated the essence of being African while also criticizing colonialism and assimilation.

As a youth, Diop battled tuberculosis, spending months in hospitals. These solitary moments gave rise to many of his most tender poems. While attending high school, he met Léopold SENGHOR, another founder of the Négritude movement, who later published some of Diop's poems. Diop traveled between Africa and Europe, and many of his poems express a longing for a return to his ancestral land of Africa. In "Africa," for example, he creates nostalgic images of Africa before colonialism, but this was an Africa with which he was not familiar. His only memories were of the aftermath of slavery and assimilation. When Senegal was close to gaining its independence in the late 1950s, Diop moved back to take part in the rebuilding of the country. His revolutionary poems and teachings were his tools of change. Ellen Kennedy, a Négritude historian, quotes Diop as writing that his poems were meant “to burst the eardrums of those who do not wish to hear.”

Unfortunately, Diop’s life came to a tragic end in a plane crash that also destroyed much of his last, unpublished work. Only 22 of his poems still exist; yet these clearly established him as a powerful contributor to the Négritude movement and to world literature.

Another Work by David Diop

Hammer Blows and Other Writings. Translated and edited by Simon Mpondo and Frank Jones. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1973.

Djebar, Assia (Fatima Zohra Imalayen) (1936–) novelist, playwright, filmmaker, short-story writer

An Algerian writing in French, Djebar has produced compelling novels that express Arab women’s voices in the postcolonial world. She launched her writing career with the acclaimed novel, La Soif (1957; published in English as The Mischief, 1958). She and her ex-husband, Walid Garn, wrote a play, Rouge l’aube (1969) (Red Dawn), about the Algerian war of independence. During the 1960s, Djebar taught history at the University of Algiers. In the 1970s, she embarked on a filmmaking career, in part to reach Algerian women who could not read her work in French, but she returned to fiction writing in the 1980s.

Her intense, lyrical, often sensual prose articulates the voices of Arab women, as individuals and as members of a community with a specific political history. In Far from Medina (trans. 1994; originally published as Loin de Médine: filles d’Ismael, 1991), she tells of the participation of Muslim women in the first days of Islam. Her rich, intricate historical novel, L’amour, la fantasia (1985; Fantasia: An Algerian Cavalcade, 1993), tells the history of Algeria from the French colonial onslaught in 1830 to the war of independence, ending in 1961.

In this book, Djebar alternates between formal French accounts and oral histories that are based on her field interviews in Arabic with Algerian women who participated in the independence struggle but whose voices are not included in any official history. Djebar conceived the story as part of a quartet that includes its prequel novel, Ombre Sultane (1987; A Sister to Scheherazade, 1993). “If Algerian Woman in all her complexity and historical reality is the protagonist of Assia Djebar’s most ambitious and original work of fiction,” writes her translator Dorothy S. Blair in the introduction to Fantasia, “this is also an attempt to wrest her own identity as an Algerian woman from the warring strands of her Arabo-Berber origins and her Franco-European education.”

Djebar went to primary school in Algeria, attended college in France, and lives in Paris and Baton Rouge, Louisiana, where she directs the Center for French and Francophone Studies at Louisiana State University. She won the Venice Biennale Critics Prize for her film La Nouba des femmes du Mont Chenoua (1979), Prix Maurice Maeterlinck (1995), Neustadt Prize for Contributions to World Literature (1996), and the Yourcenar Prize (1997).

Other Works by Assia Djebar

Algerian White. Translated by Marjolijn De Jager and David Kelley. New York: Seven Stories Press, 2001.

So Vast the Prison. Translated by Betsy Wing. New York: Seven Stories Press, 1999.

Women of Algiers in Their Apartment. Translated by Marjolijn De Jager. Charlottesville, Va.: University Press of Virginia, 1992.

Works about Assia Djebar

Merini, Rafika. Two Major Francophone Women Writers: Assia Djébar and Leila Sebbar: A Thematic Study of Their Works. New York: Peter Lang, 1999.

Mortimer, Mildred P. Journeys Through the French African Novel. Westport, Conn.: Heinemann, 1990.

———, ed. Maghrebian Mosaic: A Literature in Transition. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2001.

Döblin, Alfred (Linke Poot, Hans Fiedeler) (1878–1957) short-story writer, novelist, playwright

Alfred Döblin was born in Stettin, Germany. His father, a tailor, left the family when Alfred was 10, and his mother was from a lower-middle-class Jewish family. Döblin had difficulty in school and did not pass the Arbitur (school-leaving exam) until age 22. Döblin studied medicine from 1900 to 1905 in Berlin and Freiburg and, in 1911, opened a practice as a family doctor and neurologist. In 1912, he married Erna Reiss and served as an army medical officer during World War I.

Döblin began to write in 1900 and by the early 1910s earned critical acclaim for his expressionist (see EXPRESSIONISM) short stories that appeared in the journal Der Sturm. His first novel Die drei Sprünge des Wang-lun (The Three Leaps of Wang-lun, 1915) describes a tragic rebellion in China. Following the war, Döblin wrote theater reviews and plays in addition to his novels. Döblin's novel, Berlin Alexanderplatz (1929), was a popular and critical success, inspiring a radio play and a film. The story uses an omniscient anonymous narrative voice, montage, and parody—techniques inspired by James Joyce (1882–1941)—to describe the exploits of an ex-convict in the Berlin underworld.

In 1928, Döblin was elected to the Prussian Academy of the Arts. He and his friend Bertolt BRECHT were members of a leftist discussion group called Group 1925. After the Nazis gained power in 1933, Döblin lived in France and the United States. In 1941, he converted to the Roman Catholic faith, and in 1945, he returned to West Germany. Although Döblin achieved some critical acclaim for his substantive explorations of human relationships and relationships with God, most of his works were not popular. His novels were complicated, unconventional, and, according to the scholar David Dollenmayer, reflective of Döblin's “deep sense of unease about himself and his place in society, and about modern man and society in general.”

Other Works by Alfred Döblin

Destiny's Journey. Translated by Edna McCown. New York: Paragon House, 1992.

Tales of a Long Night: A Novel. Translated by Robert and Rita Kimber. New York: Fromm International Publishing Corporation, 1984.

A Work about Alfred Döblin

Dollenmayer, David. The Berlin Novels of Alfred Döblin. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.

Donoso, José (1924–1997) novelist, short-story writer, poet

José Donoso was born to Dr. José Donoso and Alicia Yáñez in a suburb of Santiago, Chile. Educated by private teachers as a young child, he later attended the prestigious Grange School. Donoso was inspired to write at an early age by uncles who were authors, as well as by the novels of such writers as Jules VERNE and Alexandre DUMAS. After dropping out of school and working for some time on a sheep farm, he completed his education at Princeton University, where he published his first short stories, in English.

It was not until Donoso's first novel, Coronation, was released in 1957 that his work began to receive serious critical attention. The least experimental of his novels, it relates the transformation of the conservative, middle-class Andrés, as he is drawn out of his orderly, sterile existence and into the realm of obsession and desire. In Coronation, the most important themes of Donoso's fiction are already present: insanity, the complex nature of identity, and the conflict between the demands of instincts and the expectations of society. These same themes are central to The Obscene Bird of Night (1970), which represents Donoso's best-known and perhaps most mature work. This book tells the story of the decline of an aristocratic family, as seen through the eyes of Humberto Peñaloza, the private teacher of the family's last offspring. The plot is not presented in any kind of logical sequence, as the disorder of Peñaloza's narrative is intended to reflect the narrator's psychic instability and to question traditional notions of time, space, and reality.

Donoso is a difficult writer to categorize in Latin American and Chilean literature. Although the unorthodox structure of his novels connect them to the phenomenon known as the Boom (a movement in Latin-American fiction involving such authors as Gabriel GARCÍA MÁRQUEZ and Carlos FUENTES, who employed experimental narrative techniques in their novels and stories), the domestic settings of his works tie them to the realist tradition.

Donoso has received such recognition for his fiction as the Chilean National Prize for Literature and the William Faulkner Foundation Prize. His stories and novels have been translated into many languages and adapted for film and theater. His work has exercised a critical influence on Spanish-language fiction and represents one of the most varied and compelling attempts to come to terms with the complex history and sociology of Latin America.

Another Work by José Donoso

A House in the Country. Translated by David Pritchard. New York: Knopf, 1984.

A Work about José Donoso

Magnarelli, Sharon. Understanding José Donoso. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Dostoyevsky, Fyodor Mikhaylovich

(1821–1881) novelist, short-story writer

Fyodor Mikhaylovich Dostoyevsky was born in Moscow, Russia, to Mikhay Dostoyevsky, an army surgeon, and Maria Nechaeva, a daughter of a prominent Moscow merchant. Dostoyevsky had a traumatic childhood. His father was an alcoholic and constantly terrorized the family. When Dostoyevsky was only nine years old, his best friend was raped and murdered, a tragic incident he remembered throughout his life. In 1834 Dostoyevsky entered a prestigious private school in Moscow, where he concentrated on literary studies. He made very few friends and spent most of his time reading. He particularly admired the works of Aleksandr PUSHKIN and Nikolai KARAMZIN.

At the insistence of his father, Dostoyevsky enrolled in a school for military engineers in St. Petersburg in 1837. That same year, Dostoyevsky's studies were briefly interrupted by the death of his mother. In 1839, his father died; it was rumored that he had been murdered by his own serfs. Both events had a deep impact on Dostoyevsky and later reemerged in his novels.

On completion of his studies in 1845, Dostoyevsky briefly entered the civil service as an engineer but resigned after only a few months to pursue writing. The publication of Poor Folk in 1846 immediately gained critical attention, launching his literary career.

Fascinated with French social philosophy, Dostoyevsky began to attend meetings of a radical, utopian group. This group included several prominent figures, mostly artists and intellectuals who were interested in the reformation of Russian society. In 1849, 39 members, including Dostoyevsky, were arrested by the police. After months of interrogation and torture (three members of the group were confined to an insane asylum after their release), Dostoyevsky and other members of the group were sentenced to death. Minutes before the execution, however, Dostoyevsky was pardoned and his sentence reduced to five years of hard labor in Siberia.

The period of exile was perhaps the most crucial experience in Dostoyevsky's life. Spiritually and mentally distraught, Dostoyevsky passionately embraced the doctrines of the Russian Orthodox Church. Deeply affected by his experience as a prisoner, Dostoyevsky became politically reactionary and a staunch supporter of the czar.

As a result, Dostoyevsky was allowed to return to St. Petersburg in 1857, but his exile had taken its toll. He developed epilepsy, and his physical health was very fragile. Along with his brother Mikhail, Dostoyevsky began to edit Times, a literary journal that serialized a number of Dostoyevsky's early novels. Among works published during the early 1860s was The House of the Dead (1862), a fictional account of prison life based on Dostoyevsky's experiences in Siberia, and The Insulted and Injured (1861), a novel that analyzes the shortcomings of naïve utopianism.

Dostoyevsky married Maria Isaev in 1857, but she died in the early 1860s, as did his brother. In 1862, Dostoyevsky left Russia to tour Europe, where he was introduced to gambling, especially roulette, which became an irresistible passion. Gambling compounded his financial troubles, and he returned to Russia in 1864 virtually penniless. Dostoyevsky examined the psychological implications of gambling in his fascinating novel The Gambler (1866).

In 1866, Dostoyevsky began working on Crime and Punishment, which—harried by debt and desperately in need of money—he completed in a month with the help of a stenographer, Anna Snitkina. Dostoyevsky and Snitkina were married in 1867. With his epilepsy and obsessions, Dostoyevsky was not the easiest of companions, but the intimacy and love between Dostoyevsky and his wife sustained them for the rest of their lives. The couple traveled extensively throughout Europe but once again had to return to Russia in 1871 because of financial troubles caused by Dostoyevsky's gambling.

Critical Analysis

Dostoyevsky's fiction is notable for its deep and intense understanding of human psychology. In Notes from the Underground (1864), Dostoyevsky began his literary experiments with the human psyche through a detailed account of neurotic dementia. In the novel, a minor government official describes his hatred of the society he sees from his “underground” viewpoint. The novel also explores the spiritual conflict between the individual and society. It is also a reaction against the optimistic rationalism of CHERNYSHEVSKY'S What Is to Be Done?

In Crime and Punishment, Dostoyevsky portrays the spiritual and philosophical struggle of Raskolnikov, a young student who murders a pawnbroker. The novel explores the themes of spiritual suffering, psychosis, and redemption, set against the dark, nauseating background of the slums of St. Petersburg. Dostoyevsky examines the terms of formation of philosophical concepts and their subsequent effect on the individual. Many critics consider Crime and Punishment to be the most seminal psychological drama in literary history.

The Idiot (1868) is an indictment of the materialism of the governing classes of Russia. In this striking, realistic portrayal of 19th-century Russian society, Dostoyevsky juxtaposes the ethical idealism of a young man against the crass materialism of the drawing rooms of the middle class. The novel amplifies the growing spiritual unrest of Russian society that attempts to emulate the material values of Western Europe. Dostoyevsky denounces the society in which moral idealism is labeled as mental incompetence. The Idiot marks the growing philosophical crises of the realist literature of 19th-century Russia. Yet, though he saw so clearly the flaws in the society that surrounded him, Dostoyevsky denounced political violence and extremism as a way to reform society.

In The Possessed (1871), Dostoyevsky comments upon the responsibility of an individual in social matters. The story is about Stavrogin, a charismatic intellectual and atheist, who attracts a group of fanatics who wreak havoc on a small provincial town. It was based on the life of a revolutionary named Sergey Nechayev but may have reminded readers of several radical movements that were current at the time. The Possessed was ambivalently received in Russia: With its unflattering picture of political activism, it was hailed as a masterpiece by conservatives, while revolutionary circles denounced it as reactionary.

The Brothers Karamazov (1880) was Dostoyevsky's last and arguably finest novel. As a pioneering work in psychological realism, the novel engages a number of powerful themes: love, hate, patricide, and the search for God, to name a few. The Brothers Karamzov follows the destiny of Fyodor Karamazov and his three sons. The most famous chapter of the novel, “The Legend of the Grand Inquisitor,” dramatizes the inner struggle between heart and mind in the context of religion. The profound psychological and social implications of the plot assured the everlasting significance of the novel, which was hailed as a great masterpiece virtually from its first publication.

Fyodor Dostoyevsky received unprecedented critical acclaim during the last years of his life. He finally achieved financial solvency and turned his attention to family life. After his death, his widow and children were given a government pension by the czar. Dostoyevsky’s funeral was attended by thousands of people. He was hailed as a literary genius, the father of Russian REALISM, and a master of psychological realism. The contribution of Fyodor Dostoyevsky to world literature is almost immeasurable, as his works transformed entire generations of writers and created new dimensions in the world of fiction.

Other Works by Fyodor Dostoyevsky

The Best Short Stories of Dostoyevsky. Translated by David Magarshack. New York: Modern Library, 1992.

Winter Notes on Summer Impressions. Translated by Kyril Fitzlyon. London: Quartet Books, 1986.

Works about Fyodor Dostoyevsky

Amoia, Alba della Fazia. Feodor Dostoyevsky. New York: Continuum Press, 1993.

Frank, Joseph. Dostoyevsky: The Seeds of Revolt, 1821–1849. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1976.

———. Dostoyevsky: The Years of Ordeal, 1850–1859. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.

———. Dostoyevsky: The Years of Liberation, 1860–1865. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1986.

———. Dostoyevsky: The Miraculous Years, 1865–1871. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1996.

———. Dostoyevsky: The Mantle of the Prophet, 1871–1881. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2002.

Leatherborrow, William J. Feodor Dostoyevsky: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1990.

Du, Nguyen

See NGUYEN DU.

Ducasse, Isadore-Lucien

See LAUTRÉAMONT, COMTE DE.

Dudintsev, Vladimir Dmitrievich

(1918–1998) novelist

Vladimir Dudintsev was born in Kupyansk, Ukraine. After his graduation from the Moscow Law Institute, Dudintsev briefly served in the Soviet army at the outbreak of World War II. Although he wrote a number of short works during the Stalinist era, most of them, as Dudintsev later admitted, were lackluster and mediocre. His real publishing debut came in 1956 with the publication of the novel Not by Bread Alone.

Not by Bread Alone tells the story of Lopatkin, a brilliant inventor who was hindered by government red tape. In the West, the novel was hailed for its candid portrayal of negative aspects of the Soviet Union. The work was harshly criticized at a notorious 1957 meeting of the Soviet Writers’ Union. (That meeting became the topic of a poem by Yevgeny YEVTUSHENKO, “Again a Meeting”: “Again a meeting, noisy, dying / half colloquium / half co-lying . . .” —translation by Albert C. Todd.) For a long period of time, he was shunned by most of the “official” Soviet writers. Dudintsev found ready support for his work among the political dissidents, but he encountered enormous difficulties publishing in the Soviet Union. His second work, A New Year’s Fairy Tale (1957), was a science-fiction novel set in a Soviet Union of the future.

Dudintsev published his final novel, White Clothes, in 1987 at the height of the perestroika movement. White Clothes once again criticized government corruption and endless circles of bureaucracy. He also blamed a number of careless, greedy government officials for the environmental disasters in Russia. The novel was widely read and hailed as a work of great social significance.

When Dudintsev died in 1998, he was considered one of the best writers of the Soviet era. He often took great personal risks to expose the social problems of the Soviet Union, and his well-crafted prose is much admired.

Another Work by Vladimir Dudintsev

A New Year's Fairy Tale. In Robert Magidoff, ed., Russian Science Fiction: An Anthology. Translated by Doris Johnson. New York: New York University Press, 1964.

Dupin, Amandine-Aurore-Lucile

See SAND, GEORGE.

Duras, Claire de (ca. 1777–1828) novelist

Claire de Duras was born to a French noble family. Her father, a count, was a member of the liberal French aristocracy. A supporter of radical ideas, he was executed for failing to support the execution of Louis XVI. After her father's death, de Duras fled with her mother to the United States where they spent some time in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, with family. She also took a journey to Martinique to receive an inheritance. In both America and Martinique, she saw the realities of slavery. They then traveled to Switzerland and to London, where de Duras met her future husband, Amédée-Bretagne-Malo de Durfort, the duke of Durfort and the future duke of Duras. They were married in 1797.

In 1808, de Duras moved to France with her husband where, as a result of changes brought about by the Restoration, he became an active member of the court in 1814. While her husband was busy with his duties, de Duras held gatherings of thinkers, poets, and intellectuals who discussed their thoughts and ideas about the unjustness of life. It was during these meetings that de Duras began to relate the story of a Senegalese girl, rescued from slavery by a French aristocratic family, whose life of privilege does not protect her from the alienation of racism. The story became popular in the group, and de Duras was encouraged to write it down. This became her first novel, Ourika (1823).

Initially published anonymously, Ourika grew to become a national obsession. The work opposed the prevailing attitude that slavery was a natural thing and denounced it as an evil institution. The work was also unique in that the narrator was a black woman, which was almost unheard of in French literature at this time. As John Fowles says in the introduction to his translation, it is “the first serious attempt by a white novelist to enter a black mind.”

In 1822, de Duras became sick and depressed. She withdrew to her country house, where she wrote two more novels on the subjects of sex and class: Olivier (1822) and the epistolary novel Edouard (1825), both of which feature gentle heroes with feminine characteristics. She was never interested in writing for money or fame; instead, she hoped that her works would promote change. Only after her death did her works and their frank depiction of social concerns begin to gain recognition.

Another Work by Claire de Duras

Ourika: An English Translation. Translated by John Fowles. New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1995.

Works about Claire de Duras

Crichfield, Grant. Three Novels of Madame de Duras. The Hague: Mouton, 1975.

Kadish, Doris Y., and Françoise Massardier-Kenney, eds. Translating Slavery: Gender and Race in French

Women's Writing, 1783–1823. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1994.

Duras, Marguerite (1914–1996) novelist, playwright, screenwriter

Born Marguerite Donnadiou in Gia Dinh, Indochina, the area which is now Vietnam, she took her pseudonym, Duras, from the name of a French village near where her father had once owned land. Her father died when Duras was only four years old, and her mother, a teacher, struggled to support her three children on her own. Duras spent most of her childhood in Indochina and, when she was still a teenager, had an affair with a wealthy Chinese man. She returns to this period of life repeatedly in her novels.

When Duras was 17, she moved to France to study law and political science at the Sorbonne. After graduating in 1935, she went to work as a secretary at the Ministry of Colonies. In 1939, she married Robert Antelme. With the arrival of World War II, she became a member of the French Resistance. Antelme became a Resistance leader and was captured and imprisoned. He survived Buchenwald, Gandersheim, and Dachau. After his release, Duras, who had been planning to leave him before his capture, nursed him back to health, living with him in a ménage à trois with Dionys Mascolo. She joined the Communist Party in that period but in 1950, after the Prague Uprising, was expelled for revisionism.

Duras published her first novel, Les Impudents (1942), in a style greatly influenced by American author Ernest Hemingway. She gained the most recognition, however, during the 1950s with her novels Un barrage contre le Pacifique (The Sea Wall, 1950) about an impoverished family living in Indochina, and the psychological romance novel Le Marin de Gibraltar (The Sailor from Gibraltar, 1952). Her novel Le Square (1955) earned her both respect as an author and association with what was known as the NEW NOVEL group. However, in her next novel, Moderato Cantabile (1958), Duras shifts her writing style from traditional topics and themes to what would become her prevailing themes of death, memory, sexual desire, and love.

Toward the end of the 1950s, Duras turned her attention to writing screenplays. The film for which she is best known internationally is Hiroshima, Mon Amour (1959). Directed by Alain Resnais, the film focuses on the theme of complications arising from the love between two people who have experienced the trauma of war. It tells of the brief love affair between Emmanuelle Riva, a married French actress, and Eija Okada, a Japanese architect, during which Riva tells Okada of her forbidden love affair with a German soldier and her subsequent mental breakdown. Innovative in its use of flashbacks and montages, the film received mixed reviews. It earned an Academy Award nomination for best screenplay but failed miserably in the box offices in Japan.

Duras's work became increasingly experimental in the 1960s, especially after the 1968 student revolts. She became interested in the power of language, memories, and alienation. Feminist critics tie her shift in style directly to the concept of feminine writing with its increasing sparseness and suggestiveness. Love, for Duras's characters, becomes an escape that is often linked with alcohol and madness.

In the 1970s, Duras continued to focus on writing screenplays, including the film Camion (1982) with French actor Gérard Depardieu. She returned to the novel format in the 1980s with the semiautobiographical The Lover (1984), for which she won France's most cherished literary honor, the Prix Goncourt. The novel, made into a film by the same name in 1992, focuses on the sexual initiation of a young girl in Indochina. Duras's works were often associated with events in her life. Her collection of short stories La Doleur (1985) was based on her relationship with Antelme and Mascolo.

In 1980, Duras met Yann Andréa Steiner. The two lived together until Duras's death. Duras's creativity during this period was often shadowed by her increasing abuse of alcohol. In Practicalities (1987), she wrote about her relationship with Steiner, her alcoholism, and her 15-year addiction to aspirin. Steiner finally encouraged her to enter a hospital for treatment in 1982, but when Duras returned home, she began to suffer from hallucinations and a fear that her house had been invaded by strangers. Steiner stayed with her until her death.

Other Works by Marguerite Duras

No More. Translated by Richard Howard. New York: Seven Stories Press, 1998.

The North China Lover. Translated by Leigh Hafrey. New York: The New Press, 1992.

The Ravishing of Lol Stein. Translated by Richard Seaver. New York: Pantheon Books, 1986.

Writing. Translated by Mark Polizzotti. Cambridge, Mass.: Brookline Books, 1998.

Works about Marguerite Duras

Adler, Laure. Marguerite Duras: A Life. Translated by Anne-Marie Glasheen. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.

Schuster, Marilyn R. Marguerite Duras Revisited. Boston: Twayne, 1993.

Dürrenmatt, Friedrich (1921–1990)

dramatist, novelist

Friedrich Dürrenmatt was born in Konolfingen, Switzerland, to Reinhold and Hulda Zimmermann Dürrenmatt. His father was the pastor of the Konolfingen church. Dürrenmatt attended secondary school in Großhochstetten and spent his spare time painting, a lifelong interest. After his family moved to Bern in 1935, he attended Freies Gymnasium, a Christian secondary school, and then Humboldtianum, a private school. After graduating in 1941, he studied philosophy, literature, and natural sciences at the University of Zurich and the University of Bern. He served for a year in the Swiss military during World War II and married actress Lotti Geißler in 1946.

Dürrenmatt's first drama, Es steht geschrieben (It Is Written, 1947) succeeded with critics but not audiences. He attracted more popular success with his play Romulus der Große (Romulus the Great, 1949). Dürrenmatt wrote three detective novels and his first work of essays, Theaterprobleme (1955), in the 1950s. His most popular plays, Der Besuch der alten Dame (The Visit, 1956, translated 1958) and Die Physiker (The Physicists, 1962), examine the themes of power, responsibility, and guilt. Dürrenmatt later served on the board of directors of the Zurich Schauspielhaus and continued writing plays until 1988.

Dürrenmatt adapted the satire of Jonathan Swift (1667–1745) and the dramatic technique of Bertolt BRECHT to his works. He is best known for comic-grotesque satires that explore religious and philosophical issues. He was a pessimist who, according to biographer Roger Crockett, “did not believe that humanity had a promising future on this planet, and he created scenario after scenario to demonstrate this conclusion.” Dürrenmatt's numerous awards include the Georg Büchner Prize and the New York Theater Critics' Prize. Even after his death in 1990, The Visit and the The Physicists were among the most performed plays in Germany.

Other Works by Friedrich Dürrenmatt

The Assignment. Translated by Joel Agee. New York: Random House, 1988.

The Execution of Justice. Translated by John E. Woods. New York: Random House, 1989.

A Work about Friedrich Dürrenmatt

Crockett, Roger A. Understanding Friedrich Dürrenmatt. Columbia, S.C.: University of South Carolina Press, 1998.

E

Eco, Umberto (1932–) novelist, literary critic

Born in Alessandria, Italy, Umberto Eco is the son of Giralio Eco, an office worker for an iron-bath-tub manufacturer, and Giovanna (Bisio) Eco. He grew up amid World War II, dodging bombs in the countryside as a young teen but also embracing American literature and popular music.

Eco received a doctorate of philosophy from the University of Turin in 1954 at age 22. His thesis on St. Thomas Aquinas and his later work, The Development of Medieval Aesthetics (1959), helped stir his passion for the medieval world. His research was invaluable when he wrote his signature work, the novel The Name of the Rose (1980).

After his 1954 graduation, Eco worked in Milan preparing cultural programs for RAI, a new state television network. This exposure to television gave him insights into the world of mass media, a subject about which he wrote extensively later in his career. From 1956 to 1964, Eco held a lecturing post at the University of Turin and from 1964 to 1965 at the University of Milan.

In the late 1950s, Eco began to contribute to such Italian daily newspapers and magazines as L'Espresso, but it was the publication of his first novel, The Name of the Rose, that won Eco worldwide critical acclaim. The novel uses semiotics (the study of signs, codes, and clues) to tell the story of a murder mystery set in a medieval monastery. Eco founded a journal on semiotics in 1971 and has written several books on the subject. In The Name of the Rose, he employs semiotic techniques such as using the 10-part Sefirot or Cabbalic system as an underlying structure. The novel became popular with a cross-section of readers from lovers of best-sellers to scholars and set records for world sales of an Italian book. In 1986, the novel was made into a major motion picture starring Sean Connery and also received the Strega and Viareggio Prizes, as well as the Medici Prize in France. Eco told Contemporary Authors in 1979, "I think that the duty of a scholar is not only to do scientific research but also to communicate with people through various media about most important issues of social life from the point of view of his own discipline."

Eco is also well known for Foucault's Pendulum (1988), a novel set in Milan, Paris, and Brazil. It tells the story of a search for a plan of the universe that involves the medieval religious order the Knights Templar and their plans for world domination. The story comes to this conclusion: "There is no map. There is no plan: the secret, he has come to see, is that there is no secret; the answer is that there is no answer."

Umberto Eco is a significant Italian literary figure. Much more than a best-selling novelist, Eco has made his name, say scholars Norma Bouchard and Veronica Pravadelli, as “a theorist of avant-gardist aesthetics, a scholar of popular culture, a leading semiotician and philosopher of language, [and] a highly respected journalist.”

Another Work by Umberto Eco

The Island of the Day Before. Translated by William Weaver. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1995.

Works about Umberto Eco

Bondanella, Peter. Umberto Eco and the Open Text: Semiotics, Fiction, Popular Culture. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Bouchard, Norma, and Veronica Pravadelli, eds. Umberto Eco's Alternative. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.

Ehrenburg, Ilya Grigoryevich

(1891–1967) novelist, short-story writer, poet, travel writer, essayist

Ilya Grigoryevich Ehrenburg was born in Kiev, Ukraine, into the family of a middle-class Jewish brewer. Facing rapidly growing anti-Semitism in Ukraine, the Ehrenburgs moved to Moscow, Russia, in 1896. Ehrenburg briefly attending the First Moscow gymnasium (high school) but was expelled for participating in revolutionary activities. In 1908, Ehrenburg decided to leave Russia to avoid a trial for his political activities that could, despite his youth, have resulted in a lengthy prison term. Living in Paris, Ehrenburg participated in the artistic circles of French society.

Ehrenburg started his prolific career with a publication of a poetry collection in 1910. During World War I, he briefly served as a war correspondent. Between 1921 and 1924, he lived in Germany and Belgium. His first novel, The Extraordinary Adventures of Julia Jurenito and His Disciples (1921) was a political satire that ridiculed both the capitalist and Communist political systems. In 1928, Ehrenburg published The Stormy Life and Lazar Roitschwantz, a novel that depicts wanderings through Europe of a Jewish tailor who barely escapes the anti-Semitism of Russia. Both novels combined sensitivity for the nuances of the plot with biting social commentary.

From 1925 to 1945, Ehrenburg lived in Paris, working for Soviet newspapers and returning to Russia on occasion. In the 1930s, his writings became markedly less radical as he accepted the official doctrines of the Communist Party. In Out of Chaos (1934), for instance, he ardently defends the aesthetic goals of SOCIALIST REALISM. In his novel The Fall of Paris (1941), he criticizes the capitalist system of France and delineates the social degeneration of French society.

Ehrenburg was honored on several occasions in the Soviet Union. In 1942 and 1948, he was awarded the Stalin Prize and, in 1952, the International Lenin Peace Prize. He also served as a deputy of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR from 1950 and as a vice president of the World Peace Council until his death in 1967. Ehrenburg spent his last days campaigning to publish the works of writers who were suppressed under Stalin's regime. Ehrenburg's fiction, although deeply politicized, reveals a high level of narrative control and a deep understanding of human nature. Despite his positions in the Soviet regime, Ehrenburg was highly respected by Western intellectuals and artists.

A Work about Ilya Ehrenburg

Goldberg, Anatol. Ilya Ehrenburg, Revolutionary, Novelist, Poet, War Correspondent, Propagandist: The Extraordinary Epic of a Russian Survivor. New York: Viking Press, 1984.

Eich, Günter (Erich Günter) (1907–1972)

dramatist, poet

Günter Eich was born in Lebus an der Oder to Otto and Helen Heine Eich. Otto, an accountant, moved the family to Berlin in 1918. Eich finished his secondary education in Leipzig in 1925. He studied Chinese, law, and economics at universities in Leipzig, Berlin, and Paris. Eich published his first poems in an anthology in 1927 and his first volume of poems in 1930. In the 1930s, he worked as a freelance writer and was a pioneer in the writing of German radio plays. In 1940, he married Else Anna Burk, a singer who died a few years later. Eich served in the German air force during World War II. The Americans captured him in 1945 and released him the following year. Starting in 1947, Eich regularly attended the annual meetings of the German literary association, GRUPPE 47. He married the poet Ilse AICHINGER in 1953.

While in a POW camp, Eich wrote “Inventur,” a poem that is considered the epitome of the Kahlschlag (Clean Sweep) movement. Popular in the 1950s, Kahlschlag symbolized the break with past ideologies. German writers embracing this movement sought to address material facts, such as hunger and disease, while cutting corrupt ideals, ideas, and language out of their writing.

Eich’s lyric poetry was inspired by Chinese poets such as Li Bai. Favoring the audible over the visual, he attained his greatest notoriety for his radio plays. Eich’s best-known play is Träume (Dreams, 1953). It contains some of his best poetry and addresses his favorite themes: dreams, death, and the divide between reality and unreality. According to the literary scholar Egbert Krispyn, Eich displayed an “uncompromising creative honesty” in his work, which won several awards, including the Munich Grant Prize for Literature and the Friedrich Schiller Memorial Prize of Mannheim.

Another Work by Günter Eich

Pigeons and Moles: Selected Writings of Günter Eich.

Translated by Michael Hamburger. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1990.

Works about Günter Eich

Cuomo, Glenn R. Career at the Cost of Compromise:

Günter Eich’s Life and Work in the Years 1933–1945.

Atlanta: Rodopi, 1989.

Krispyn, Egbert. Günter Eich. Boston: Twayne, 1971.

El Saadawi, Nawal

See SADAWI, NAWAL.

Éluard, Paul (Eugène-Émile-Paul Grindel) (1895–1952) poet

Paul Éluard was born Paul Grindel in Saint-Denis on the outskirts of Paris. When he was 18, he was confined to a sanatorium in Switzerland to recover from a bout of tuberculosis. During this time, he discovered his love for poetry and published his first collection of poems.

Éluard was deeply affected by the tragedy of World War I. He became a pacifist militant and wrote Poèmes pour la paix (1918), which details both the need for conflict and the desire to temper it with peace. He also met Tristan TZARA, André BRETON, and Louis ARAGON, who encouraged him in 1920 to become an active participant in the DADA movement. He later joined the surrealists, becoming one of its major influences. But, simultaneously, he remained true to his own visions of literary integrity, questioning the validity of certain ideas such as automatic writing, a belief that the spiritual realm could convey itself through the writing implement, without the judgment of the writer.

Alongside his opposition to violence and war, Éluard’s personal life, in particular his marriage to Maria Benz, became one of the focal points of his writing. She was the inspiration for the passionate celebration of love in his collections Capitale de la douleur (1926), L’Amour, la poésie (1929), and La Vérité immédiate (1932). These works are notable in that they mark a departure from his focus on passive militarism.

Éluard was barred from the Communist Party as a result of a conflict with Aragon. He joined the Resistance, continuing his creative work with collections such as La victoire de Guernica (1938) and Poésie et vérité (1942). The latter collection contains his most often studied poem “Liberté.” Shortly after the liberation and the traumatic death of his wife in 1946, Éluard began to focus his writing on the hope that one day humanity would leave behind its murderous tendencies. He became an impassioned humanist, as evidenced in his works. He died in Charenton-le-Pont.

Other Works by Paul Éluard

Last Love Poems of Paul Éluard. Translated by Marilyn Kallet. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980.

Selected Poems. Translated by Gilbert Bowen. New York: River Run Press, 1987.

A Work about Paul Éluard

Nugent, Robert. Paul Éluard. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1974.

Elytis, Odysseus (Odysseus Alepoudelis)

(1911–1996) poet

Odysseus Elytis was born in Iraklion on the island of Crete. The son of a wealthy manufacturer, he shunned the privileged life and devoted himself entirely to seeking truth in his works.

Elytis's first poetry dates back to 1929 and celebrates his childhood visits to the Aegean Sea. He established his reputation as a poet in the 1930s, a decade haunted by the threat of war, by focusing on the intrinsic beauty of humanity and nature. In Orientalisms (1940), Elytis's first and largest collection, he combines elements of the surrealist movement with free association and pagan nature worship. During World War II, Elytis served on the front lines in Albania, fighting against Italian and German forces. This struggle particularly affected him, as did the subsequent horrors of the Nazi occupation of Greece. It was the barbaric nature of war that led him to continue writing poetry that glorified the beauty of his homeland and sought to maintain its integrity against the threat of human destruction. His long poem Heroic and Elegaic Song of the Lost Second Lieutenant of Albania (1945) gave voice to Elytis's experiences and feelings. The novel celebrates life and the invisible forces that bind humankind to the natural world while, simultaneously, confronting the very basic conflict of good versus evil.

Elytis is most remembered, however, for Axion Esti (1959), a three-part celebration of Greek folklore and history. Translated as Worth It Be, this epic poem draws on elements of the Byzantine mass in conjunction with the history of Greece and the biblical creation story. It was later set to music by Theodorakis, who also composed the film score for Zorba the Greek. Theodorakis described the poem as a "Bible for the Greek people," which, in a sense, it was, as it later became an anthem for Greek youth.

Elytis spent much of his life in seclusion, focusing only on his poetry. He considered himself to be neither a patriotic poet nor a nature poet. He felt that his duty as a poet was to transform the images offered him by nature to a level where they could exist as reminders to all humanity of the possibility of perfection and beauty in this world. In 1979, he was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature and became a cultural ambassador for the Greek people. He began to travel to give lectures; however, three years later, he confessed to being so busy traveling that he had no time to write. Returning to semiseclusion, he resumed writing, publishing his final collection West of Sorrow (1995).

Elytis was so important to the Greek people that radio and television programs were interrupted to announce his death in 1996. Elytis's own definition of death perhaps explains his significance as a writer: "Death is where words no longer have the power to generate, right from the start, the things that they name." For Elytis, poetry was not simply an art; it was also a social responsibility.

Other Works by Odysseus Elytis

The Collected Poems of Odysseus Elytis. Translated by Jeffrey Carson and Nikos Sarris. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997.

Odysseus Elytis: Analogies of Light. Edited by Ivar Ivask. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1981.

What I Love: Selected Poems of Odysseas Elytis. Translated by Olga Broumas. Port Townsend, Wash.: Copper Canyon Press, 1986.

Emecheta, Buchi (1944–) novelist

Buchi Emecheta was born of Ibuza parents in Nigeria. Orphaned at an early age, she spent her childhood in a missionary school. In 1960, at age 16, she married Sylvester Onwordi, to whom she had been engaged since she was 11. In 1962, the couple moved to London; the marriage lasted six years and produced five children.

Many of Emecheta's earliest novels draw on her experiences in Africa and England. Emecheta's early writing style is based on oral tradition. She speaks from her own experiences and vividly describes the people and places encountered by her characters on their journey to self-awareness. Her first novel, In the Ditch (1972), tells the story of her life as a struggling immigrant and single mother in London through the character of Adah, a young woman who leaves her husband to find out who she is. In a strange land, she is seen as an outsider. With children in tow, Adah negotiates the welfare system, the job market, and what it means to be deemed a social "problem."

In Emecheta's second novel, Second Class Citizen (1974), she continues to chronicle Adah's life, but this time she steps back to see how she arrived in "the ditch." This story concentrates on the inequalities within her culture that manifest themselves as discrimination against women. Adah encounters strict tribal customs that deny education to women. As she bends under the workload of supporting her family and caring for her children, she witnesses the privileges of her student husband. "Second Class Citizen" reveals how gender roles are maintained through culture.

Emecheta's autobiography, Head Above Water (1986), tells of her struggle to confront the poor social conditions of blacks in London while simultaneously emerging as a writer.

Emecheta has come under fire from some critics for her refusal to support the pastoral ideas of Africa and Europe. Her raw views often expose the dark side of tribal relations, colonialism, and male/female relations.

She was raised at a time in Nigeria when traditional structures were being challenged by a society that was shifting from rural to urban living. It was also a time when immigration to colonial centers, such as London, presented another test of maintaining or adapting one's identity. Emecheta's novels reflect both the chaos and the opportunities of this unrest and uprooting. Emecheta does not write about an idyllic Africa of the past but instead about contemporary Africa with painstaking accuracy.

She centers the majority of her stories on gender relations and the conflicts between modernity and tradition. These topics often serve as metaphors for the relationship between Africa and the Diaspora (the scattering of people of African descent through slavery) and for the relationship between colonizer and the colonized; for example, in The Family (1989), she chronicles the life of an impoverished Jamaican girl who negotiates familial abuse, which is one of slavery's legacies. Emecheta's brave approach to writing about the unspoken has set her apart from other African writers. She has won several literary prizes including her selection in 1983 as one of the Best Young British Writers Award. Emecheta is a strong post-colonial writer who witnesses with a feminist lens; as a result, she has diversified traditional Western feminism by adding a voice that speaks to the specific issues of women from developing countries.

Other Works by Buchi Emecheta

The Bride Price. New York: George Braziller, 1980.

In the Ditch. Westport, Conn.: Heinemann, 1994.

The Joys of Motherhood. New York: George Braziller, 1980.

The New Tribe. Westport, Conn.: Heinemann, 2001.

Second Class Citizen. New York: George Braziller, 1983.

The Slave Girl. New York: George Braziller, 1980.

Works about Buchi Emecheta

Fishburn, Katherine. Reading Buchi Emecheta: Cross-Cultural Conversations. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Publishing Group, 1995.

Uraizee, Joya F. This Is No Place for a Woman: Nadine Gordimer, Nayantara Sahgal, Buchi Emecheta, and the Politics of Gender. Lawrenceville, N.J.: Africa World Press, 2000.

Enchi Fumiko (Fumi Ueda) (1905–1986)
playwright, novelist

Enchi Fumiko was born in Tokyo to Ueda Kazutoshi and Tsuruko. Kazutoshi was a well-known linguistics professor who helped put together a major Japanese-language dictionary in 1902. As a young child, Enchi was reclusive and sickly, spending more time in her father's extensive library than at play with other children. Enchi attended Japan Women's University but did not earn a degree. In 1930, she married the journalist Enchi Yoshimatsu and had a child, Motoko, two years later. In 1935, she joined a group of novelists known as Nichireki to learn more about writing. In the 1930s and 1940s, she suffered from breast cancer, uterine cancer, and tuberculosis. At the end of World War II, Enchi's home in Tokyo was destroyed during an air raid.

When Enchi was at university, she developed plays for a Tokyo theater founded by a leader in the modern drama-theater (shingeki) movement, Kaoru Osanai (1881–1928). However, by the mid-1930s, she could not find publishers for her plays, so she switched to writing novels. At first, the literary world was receptive to her work; however, for most of the 1940s, she had difficulty finding publishers. Her first major success was The Starving Years (1953), about a woman trapped in marriage to a womanizing, chauvinistic man. The novel, however, that won her international acclaim was Masks (1958), based on the story of Lady Rokujiō from The Tale of Genji.

Enchi is known for combining elements from classical Japanese works from the Heian (794–1185) and Edo (1600–1867) periods into modern settings. Many of her stories center on women navigating patriarchal Japan. She has won numerous literary awards, including the Tanizaki Prize in 1969, the Japanese Literature Grand Prize in 1972, and the Order of Culture in 1985.

Other Works by Enchi Fumiko

A Tale of False Fortunes. Translated by Roger K. Thomas. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2000.

The Waiting Years. Translated by John Bester. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1971.

A Work about Enchi Fumiko

Vernon, Victoria V. Daughters of the Moon: Wish, Will and Social Constraint in Fiction by Modern Japanese Women. Berkeley: Institute of East Asian Studies, University of California Press, 1988.

Enzensberger, Hans Magnus (1929–)
poet, novelist, essayist

Hans Magnus Enzensberger was born in Kaufbeuren, Germany, to middle-class parents and grew up in Nuremberg. As a teenager during World War II, Enzensberger served in the Volkssturm (Home Guard). After the war, he worked as an interpreter for the occupying British and American armies, tended bar, and traded on the black market. Enzensberger studied philosophy, literature, and languages at several universities, including the Sorbonne in Paris. After completing his dissertation, he spent two years in radio work and traveled extensively.

Enzensberger's first book of poetry, Verteidigung der Wölfe (Defense of the Wolves, 1957), sharply criticized West Germany's government and culture, establishing his reputation as one of Germany's most controversial poets. His important influences include Bertolt BRECHT. He was a member of the literary association GRUPPE 47 and won the Georg Büchner Prize in 1963. In 1965, Enzensberger founded Kursbuch (Coursebook), a progressive magazine that provided a forum for political and literary debates. He used his essays, poems, and novels to voice his social criticisms and to call for revolutionary change. Literary scholar Peter Demetz describes Enzensberger, in Postwar German Literature (1970), as "a highly gifted intellectual" who "wants his reader to think."

Other Works by Hans Magnus Enzensberger

Politics and Crime. New York: Seabury Press, 1974.
The Sinking of the Titanic: A Poem. Translated by the author. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1980.

A Work about Hans Magnus Enzensberger

Fischer, Gerhard, ed. Debating Enzensberger: Great Migration and Civil War. Tübingen, Germany: Stauffenburg, 1996.

Esenin, Sergey

See YESENIN, SERGEY.

Espinet, Ramabai (1948–) poet, researcher, professor, activist, social commentator

Born in Trinidad, Ramabai Espinet grew up in a largely creolized, Christian-Indian community in San Fernando. She started reading the works of the English romantics, along with those of Alfred, Lord Tennyson and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, at an early age. By her late teens, when she moved to Toronto, Espinet had read most of William Butler Yeats's and Derek WALCOTT's works. These poets, as well as the calypso music from her childhood, have significantly influenced her writing.

Poets Barbara Jones and Gabriela MISTRAL, who both wrote about women's issues, shaped Espinet's perception of women's poetics, and Espinet subsequently became active in the women's movement in the Caribbean and Canada. In 1990, she published Creation Fire, a Caribbean poetry anthology containing a wide range of female Caribbean poets' works in English, French, Dutch, and Spanish.

Themes of identity, gender, and spirituality run through Espinet's own imagistic poetry, which has been published in CAFRA News, Trinidad and Tobago Review, Woman Speak, Fireweed, and Toronto South Asian Review. Nuclear Seasons, published in 1991, contains her collected poems. In an interview with Kwame Dawes in Talk Yuh Talk: Interviews with Anglophone Caribbean Poets, (2001)

Espinet said, "In Nuclear Seasons the narrative line, for the most part, comes second to the metaphor. But I find myself writing a series of poems more directly now."

Apart from poetry, Espinet has published children's fiction: The Princess of Spadina: a Tale of Toronto (1992) and Ninja's Carnival (1993). Her essays and short fiction have appeared in journals and anthologies. The Swinging Bridge (2003), Espinet's first novel, examines an Indo-Caribbean woman's experiences in Trinidad and Canada.

After dividing her time between Canada and the Caribbean since the 1970s, Espinet now lives in Toronto, where she teaches English and Caribbean studies. She weaves one of her unique projects, "the invention or the renewal of lost myths, especially Caribbean feminist myth," through her varied but connected academic, literary, and activist pursuits.

Other Works by Ramabai Espinet

"Indian Cuisine." The Massachusetts Review 35, no. 3–4 (Fall 1994): 563.
 "The Invisible Woman in West Indian Fiction." World Literature Written in English. 29, no. 2 (Autumn 1989): 116–26.

Works about Ramabai Espinet

Birbalsingh, Frank. Indo-Caribbean Resistance. Toronto: TSAR, 1993.
 Mehta, Brinda J. "Indo-Trinidadian Fiction: Female Identity and Creative Cooking." Alif: A Journal of Comparative Poetics 19 (1999): 151–84.
 Puri, Shalini. "Race, Rape, and Representation: Indo-Caribbean Women and Cultural Nationalism." Cultural Critique (Spring 1997): 119–63.

Espronceda y Delgado, José de (José Ignacio Javier Oriol Encarnación de Espronceda) (1808–1842) poet

Born in western Spain, Espronceda was the son of a soldier. He had three brothers, all of whom died shortly after birth. During the first several years of his life, Espronceda and his family were constantly on the move due to the Napoleonic Wars. Espronceda witnessed many of the atrocities of war; his poems are moving, painful, bitter, and tender, reflecting his life experience.

At age 15, Espronceda formed and became president of Los Numantinos, a secret patriotic organization. Shortly thereafter, he was arrested and sentenced to prison. The intervention of his father, then a colonel, resulted in his release just weeks later.

In 1826, he traveled to the Portuguese capital of Lisbon, then a center for Spanish liberals. Espronceda tried to enlist in the National Guard but was exiled instead because one of his published poems proved to be too liberal. During this exile, he wrote his only novel, Sancho Saldaña o el castellano de Cuéllar (Sancho Saldaña or the Spaniard of Cuéllar, 1834). He returned to Madrid, where he founded several liberal/democratic newspapers and wrote one of the most popular Spanish poems of all time, "The Pirate's Song" (1835), which celebrates its antisocial narrator's love of liberty. Other poems of the 1930s that raise questions of social justice include "Under Sentence of Death," "The Executioner," and "The Beggar." In 1840, he published "To Jarifa in an Orgy," a sympathetic address to a prostitute by a disillusioned idealist. After traveling as a delegate to the Spanish embassy, Espronceda took ill and died at age 34.

His two major works were written in his last two years. The Student from Salamanca is a narrative poem about a Don Juan-like character. The Godforsaken World, which includes the celebrated "Canto a Teresa," addressed to Teresa Mancha, Espronceda's mistress of 10 years, remained unfinished at his death. José de Espronceda's poetry is the epitome of Spanish ROMANTICISM. It is lyrical, patriotic, and youthful. It portrays doubt, sorrow, pleasure, death, pessimism, and disillusion.

Another Work by José de Espronceda y Delgado

The Student of Salamanca/El estudiante de Salamanca.

Translated by C. K. Davies, with introduction and notes by Richard A. Cardwell. Warminster, U.K.: Aris & Phillips, 1998.

Works about José de Espronceda y Delgado

Ilie, Paul. "Espronceda and the Romantic Grotesque."

Studies in Romanticism II (1972): 94–112.

Landeira, Ricardo. José de Espronceda. Boulder: University of Colorado, 1984.

Pallady, Stephen. Irony in the Poetry of José de Espronceda. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1991.

existentialism

Existentialism is a philosophical, artistic, and literary movement that emphasizes individual existence and freedom of choice. Although difficult to define precisely because it encompassed a wide array of diverse elements, certain themes are consistent in works by writers associated with the movement, most particularly the theme of individual existence. Although existentialism is linked explicitly to the 19th and 20th centuries, elements of existentialism can also be found in Socrates' works and in the Bible.

The literary form of the novel became one of the most prominent modes of expression for the movement in the 19th century. Russian novelist Fyodor Dostoyevsky was considered the most prominent existentialist literary figure as exemplified in his novel, Notes from the Underground (1864), which focuses on the alienated antihero who must fight against the optimism inherent in rationalist humanism. Logic is eventually shown to be self-destructive. Only Christian love, which cannot be understood through reason and logic, can save humanity. This and other existentialist works found a base in strong Christian theology, as can be seen in the works of German Protestant theologians Paul Tillich and Rudolf Karl Bultmann, French Roman Catholic theologian Gabriel Marcel, the Russian Orthodox philosopher Nikolay Aleksandrovich Berdyayev, and the German Jewish philosopher Martin Buber (existential theists). However, the movement itself encompassed equally strong proponents of atheism, agnosticism, and paganism (existential atheists), all sharing the common theme of individual choice.

Examined historically, existentialism was first anticipated by the 17th-century French philosopher Blaise Pascal, who rejected the rigorous rationalism of his contemporary René Descartes. Pascal contends, in his Pensées (1670), that any attempt to explain systematically and rationally concepts as broad as God and humanity must be rooted in arrogance. Like the existentialists, he viewed human existence as a series of paradoxes, the ultimate of which was the human self, a combination of mind and body that inherently contradicts itself.

The 19th-century Danish philosopher, Søren Kierkegaard, was the first writer to refer to himself actually as an existentialist. Regarded as the founder of modern existentialism, he insisted in his works that the highest good for the individual is to find his or her own true path in life. Writing in response to and in negation of G. W. F. Hegel, who claimed to have discovered a way to understand and explain humanity and history rationally and absolutely, Kierkegaard focused on the ambiguity and absurdity of life. He also stressed the importance of committing completely to the choices that are made, often forsaking established societal norms, in the ultimate quest for personal validity. He advocated faith and the Christian way of life as the only means of avoiding despair. Kierkegaard also examined the concept of fear or dread as crucial to greater understanding.

Other existentialist writers and artists went on to echo Kierkegaard's ideas, focusing on the belief that the individual must be allowed to pursue his or her own path, free from the constraints of imposed moral standards. Existentialists argue that there is no objective or rational basis for moral decisions. The German existential philosopher Friedrich NIETZSCHE, for example, theorized that individual choice has a basis in subjectivity and that it is the individual's responsibility to choose the actions that constitute a moral decision. Nietzsche criticized traditional moral assumptions, citing free will as existing in direct opposition to moral conformity. Unlike Kierkegaard, whose ideas led to radically individualistic Christianity, Nietzsche rejected Judeo-Christian ideals, proclaiming the "death of God" and espousing the pagan ideal.

French existentialism grew and flourished independently from German existentialism. Jean Wahl (1888–1974) is considered to be the founder of the French existentialist movement, which was later expanded and brought to greater attention under Jean Paul SARTRE. Sartre adopted the term existentialism for his own philosophy and became the leader of the movement in France. It was through his works that, after World War II, existentialism began to gain recognition and followers on an international scale. Sartre's philosophy is atheistic and decidedly pessimistic. He asserts that, although human beings desire a rational basis for their existence, no such foundation exists. Therefore, human life seems contingent and futile. His negativity notwithstanding, he also insisted that existentialism is tied directly to humanism with its emphasis on freedom, choice, and responsibility. Other French writers were profoundly influenced by Sartre and Nietzsche. The works of André MALRAUX and Albert CAMUS are generally associated with existentialist ideas because of their focus on the absurdity of life and the apparent indifference of the universe to human suffering. The French THEATRE OF THE ABSURD also reflects existentialist ideals, as seen in the plays of Samuel BECKETT and Eugène IONESCO.

Works about Existentialism

- Giles, James, ed. French Existentialism: Consciousness, Ethics and Relations with Others. Atlanta, Ga.: Rodopi, 1999.
- Gordon, Haim, ed. The Dictionary of Existentialism. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.
- Guignon, Charles, and Derk Pereboom, eds. Existentialism: Basic Writings. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett Publishing Company, 2001.
- MacDonald, Paul S., ed. The Existentialist Reader: An Anthology of Key Texts. New York: Routledge, 2001.

expressionism

Expressionism refers to a literary and artistic movement that emerged in Germany in the late 19th century and reached its pinnacle in the late 1920s. Expressionists generally believed that an individual's thoughts and experiences cannot be rendered in objective terms because such representation would distort and sterilize subjective, emotional experience. Under this premise, expressionists rejected REALISM and aimed to depict the world artistically through personal vision. To achieve this, expressionists portray their subjects as experience or emotion rather than through realistic detail. In general, expressionists tended either to simplify or to distort their subjects to expose extreme and fragmented states of human consciousness. Expressionist works are often set in a nightmarish atmosphere to emphasize the dramatic gap between subjective and objective reality.

Expressionism has a more precise meaning in art criticism than it does in literary criticism. In art, the term refers to a school of German and Scandinavian painters of the early 20th century who claimed that human condition cannot be mimetically represented through exact depiction of reality. In the visual arts, one of the most famous examples of a work that depicts expressionistic ideals is Edvard Munch's painting The Cry (1893).

Expressionism also found a fertile ground in film: Fritz Lang's expressionist film Metropolis (1927), for example, presents a dystopian vision of the future in which the workers are oppressed and held under control by the machines and the elite that controls the machines. Metropolis established itself as the foundational classic of world cinema.

In literature, expressionism also originated in Germany. Most literary scholars identify the emergence of expressionism with the works of dramatists Frank Nedeckind, Carl Stranheim, and August STRINDBERG. Expressionism also took root in the poetry of Franz Werfel and the fiction of Franz KAFKA. Eventually, literary critics began to refer to every work of literature of the period in which reality is purposefully distorted as expressionist.

Consequently, it has become difficult to demarcate the literary expressionists precisely. Although some critics limit the use of the term to the German literary movement of the 20th century, some critics apply the term more liberally to any work that manifests expressionist characteristics.

The German expressionist movement had an intriguing influence on psychology as well, particularly in the works of the Austrian psychoanalytic theorist Sigmund FREUD. Expressionism tended to explore the dark corners of the human mind, often illuminating anxieties, fears, and secret fantasies. Many critics have attributed this interest to the historical conditions following World War I and the subsequent disillusionment with humanity. Expressionism, thus, also artistically revealed the repressed fears and anxieties of the human psyche.

The expressionist movement was brutally suppressed by the Nazi government. The Nazis viewed the expressionists as a degenerate and subversive group and organized an exhibition of confiscated works of expressionists to demonstrate their "decadence" and "absurdity"; ironically, the exhibition backfired, and thousands of people flooded in to appreciate the works of the famous expressionist artists.

German expressionism influenced a number of writers and artists around the world, including James Joyce and T. S. Eliot. Many modern and POSTMODERN writers, including Tennessee Williams, the Beat writers, and Joseph Heller, were all influenced by the expressionism, which questioned accepted ideas about "objective" reality and brought to literature and art a new psychological dimension—one that is often dark, disturbing, and thought-provoking.

Works about Expressionism

Barron, Stephanie, and Wolf-Dieter Dube, ed. German Expressionism: Art and Society. New York: Rizzoli, 1997.

Polcari, Stephen. Abstract Expressionism and the Modern Experience. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

F

Fabian

See LAGERKVIST, PÅR.

Fadeyev, Aleksandr Aleksandrovich

(1901–1956) novelist, short-story writer

Aleksandr Aleksandrovich Fadeyev was born in Krimy, Russia. His father was a village teacher, and his mother a nurse. Fadeyev's family moved to Sarovka, in the far eastern region of Russia, in 1908. Fadeyev attended a small village school where he learned the basic skills, and went on to the Commercial Academy of Vladivostok. After becoming involved in the Communist cause in 1918, he left school without graduating. He joined the partisans to defend the Vladivostok region against invading Japanese forces and eventually joined the Red Army, where he was quickly promoted. Fadeyev started his writing career as a journalist for Soviet South, a small newspaper in the Russian city of Rostov. He also established a literary journal called Lava.

The Communist regime assigned Fadeyev as the representative of the Writers' Association. In this capacity, Fadeyev traveled throughout Europe, including Spain during its civil war. When World War II broke out, he worked as a frontline reporter for the two major newspapers in Russia, Pravda and Izvestiya. After the war, he served as the general secretary of the Union of Soviet Writers from 1946 to 1954, editor of several literary journals, and member of the party's Central Committee. He was awarded two Orders of Lenin for his work with the Communist Party.

Fadeyev's fiction often glorifies the struggle of the Soviet Union, specifically of its workers and soldiers, during the Russian civil war and World War II. The Birth of the Amgunsky Regiment (1934) describes the war efforts of Communist partisans in Far East during the early 1920s. His most seminal work was The Young Guard (1945), which deals with the resistance efforts of the young Communist workers of Krasnodon during the Nazi occupation.

During the last years of his life, Fadeyev suffered from a number of physical and psychological disorders that were a result of alcoholism. He committed suicide in 1956, leaving a note that revealed his disillusionment with the party and with Stalin. Fadeyev's vivid description of the war experience contributed to the discourse of the Soviet national identity. The heroes of his novels, although highly politicized, display heroism and patriotism in their commitment to defend their homeland.

Another Work by Aleksandr Fadeyev

The Nineteen. New York: Hyperion Press, 1973.

Faiz, Faiz Ahmed (1912–1984) poet

Faiz Ahmed Faiz was born in Sialkot, modern Pakistan. His father was a successful lawyer. Faiz studied extensively in the humanities and earned his master's degrees in English and Arabic literatures from Punjab University. Next to Muhammad IQBĀL, he is perhaps Pakistan's best-known poet. He is regarded as the cofounder of the progressive movement in Urdu literature and wrote exclusively in Urdu, a language similar to Arabic.

Faiz was editor of The Pakistan Times, a leftist English daily, and of Imraz, an Urdu daily. In the 1930s, he was introduced to marxism and became increasingly involved in politics. Through the course of his life, Faiz spent several terms in jail for alleged sabotage against the government. His poetry, however, is a unique intermingling of romantic, sublime, and political themes. He uses traditional images of Urdu love poetry in ghazal form, a conventional prose form of the Mughal courts, to address contemporary politics. The customary representation of the bulbul (nightingale), the gul (rose), and the baghban (gardener) in Faiz's ghazals were reconfigured to represent the poet, the poet's ideals, and the political system, respectively. At a time when the tensions between Hindus and Muslims in India were rising, Faiz was able to address the state of Muslims in India in this manner.

Faiz's politically motivated works, such as Zindan Namah (Prison narrative, 1956) and Naqsh-e Faryadi (Image of complaint, 1941), are written in protest against the government, but Faiz never excludes the power of human love in these verses. This can also be seen in the collection of poems, Zindan Naman, which Faiz wrote while in prison. It contains a poem called "Come, Africa" that unites the beating of the heart of the poet with Africa's, evoking a life force that will free the poet and his nation from political and religious intolerance.

Despite being viewed as a militant and subversive by the government of Pakistan, Faiz won the Soviet Lenin Peace Prize in 1962 for his commitment to people's struggles through his poetry.

Other Work by Faiz Ahmed Faiz

The True Subject: Selected Poems of Faiz Ahmed Faiz.

Translated by Naomi Lazard. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1988.

Zakir, Mohammed, and Menai, M. N., trans. Poems of Faiz Ahmad Faiz: A Poet of the Third World. South Asia. Print House, 1998.

Falkner, Gerhard (1951–) poet, dramatist, essayist

Gerhard Falkner was born in Schwabuch, Germany. He prepared for a career as a book dealer before moving to London and the United States. Falkner published his first volume of poetry, so beginnen am körper die tage (so begin the days along your body), at the age of 30. After publishing two more poetry collections and a work of prose in the 1980s, he expanded his focus in the following decade to include works for the stage. Falkner wrote the libretto for the opera, A Lady Dies (2000), which is based on the death of Princess Diana.

Falkner's influences include critic T. W. Adorno, poet Oskar Pastior, and the DADA movement. Falkner takes a critical view of society in his poems, which reflect a synthesis of several post-war trends in German poetry. His verse is sensual, intellectually full, and written with a disorienting dissection of syntax. In his review of Voice and Void by Neil H. Donohue, critic Jerry Glenn describes Falkner as "one of the most talented and explosive poetic voices to have emerged from Germany in recent decades." Although not widely recognized by scholars and critics, Falkner's influence is already evident in the work of younger German poets such as Durs GRÜNBEIN.

Another Work by Gerhard Falkner

Seventeen Selected Poems. Translated by Mark Anderson. Berlin: Qwert, 1994.

A Work about Gerhard Falkner

Donahue, Neil. Voice and Void: The Poetry of Gerhard Falkner. Heidelberg, Germany: Universitätsverlag G. Winter, 1998.

Fallaci, Oriana (1930–) novelist, journalist

An accomplished journalist who has had the opportunity to interview some of the most remarkable political figures of the 20th century, Oriana Fallaci was born in Florence, Italy, on June 29. The daughter of a cabinetmaker and liberal political activist, her childhood coincided with Mussolini's rise to power. Growing up under a fascist regime, she became interested in power and the ways in which it can be both used and abused.

By the time Fallaci was 10 years old, Italy was deeply involved in World War II. One of her greatest influences throughout her life came from this period and the political views of her very liberal father, who opposed Mussolini. Fallaci joined her father as a member of the underground resistance movements that were dedicated to fighting the Nazis, who were allied with Italy. During this period, her father was captured, sent to jail, and tortured. Fallaci continued to fight in his absence, receiving, at age 14, an honorable discharge from the Italian army. The war ended when she was 15, but the effects of having been so directly involved with the struggle remained ingrained in her mind and formed the background for her future work as an author and journalist.

Fallaci began writing at age 16. She received a degree from the University of Florence and went on to become an award-winning writer for several newspapers. Her first journalistic assignment was to a crime column at a daily paper, but she rapidly progressed and soon was interviewing such political figures as U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, CIA director William Colby, and Iranian leader Ayatollah Khomeini. She has also interviewed actors and scientists and conducted intensive research on the U.S. space program.

Aside from her accomplishments as a journalist, Fallaci is also an accomplished novelist. Her works of fiction also address the subject of power, particularly in terms of resistance. Letter to a Child Never Born (1976), for example, tackles the subject of an unwed pregnant woman who is faced with the difficult choice between having an illegal abortion or keeping the child and facing the social stigma. In this case, the power struggle comes in the form of cultural perceptions and the control they exert on the individual's decision-making processes.

Fallaci maintained a long-term relationship with political activist and Greek resistance leader Alexandros Panagoulis. His death in 1976 prompted her novel A Man (1980). Although fictional, this work expresses the challenges of confrontation and resistance to political power structures. Similarly, her novel Inshallah (1992) tackles these themes by restructuring the setting to illuminate the same challenges with regard to the civil war in Lebanon.

Fallaci continues to write. Her works are important for their contemporary social and political implications and the glimpse they provide at social conditions.

Other Works by Oriana Fallaci

Interview with History. New York: Liveright, 1976.

The Egoists: Sixteen Surprising Interviews. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1963.

Works about Oriana Fallaci

Arico, Santo L. Oriana Fallaci: The Woman and the Myth. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1998.

Gatt-Rutter, John. Oriana Fallaci: The Rhetoric of Freedom. Washington, D.C.: Berg, 1996.

Farah, Nuruddin (1945–) novelist, playwright, essayist

When Nuruddin Farah was born, his section of what is now called Somalia, located on the eastern coast of Africa, was a colony of Italy. In 1960, the nation of Somalia was formed by the merger of this Italian colony with what had been known as British Somaliland. He is descended from nomadic peoples who wandered far to feed their herds. His father was a merchant, and his mother was a poet who spoke several languages. Today, Farah has married an exile's nomadic life to a narrative style that wanders far from any conception of "traditional" REALISM. His travels throughout the world mirror his experiments in language use: His novels tend to use fantastic, improbable elements, what some critics refer to as MAGICAL REALISM.

Young Farah grew up speaking Somali, Arabic, and Amharic. English is his fourth language. From his mother, he gained a love of the sounds of words, of the power of language, and of the need to use the tapestry of cultures that language represents as a political tool. In many countries like Somalia that have a history of colonialism, the language one uses has political implications. Because English (and Italian and French) are reminders of a time when racism and oppression were the order of the day in such countries, many writers have chosen to avoid what they saw as the "language of the conqueror." Unlike the Kenyan writer, NGUGI WA THIONG'O, however, Farah chooses to write in English for pragmatic reasons. As Charles Larson has observed in The Ordeal of the African Writer (2001), relatively few Africans in any country are able to read literary works in any language. Farah is not, however, unaware of the political implications of this choice. His novels often deal with political themes, including language usage.

For example, Farah's third novel, A Naked Needle (1976), so infuriated Somali dictator Mohamed Siyad Barre that Farah has lived in exile for more than 20 years. Among other issues, A Naked Needle deals with the corruption of those who have ruled the country since independence.

Farah has continued to speak for his country and his people, most notably in his trilogy, Sweet and Sour Milk (1979), Sardines (1981), and Close Sesame (1983), known collectively as Variations on the Theme of an African Dictatorship. This trilogy is the fullest and most complex treatment that Farah has yet attempted on his most important theme: the oppression of Somalia's various groups by a succession of despots.

Farah is Somalia's first novelist and its most renowned international literary figure. In addition to his focus on racial inequality and the problems of POSTCOLONIALISM, he has also focused extensively on gender inequities and the problems women face in the Third World. In 1998, he received the Neustadt Prize for literature, one of the most prestigious literary awards in the world. The Neustadt Prize is awarded by the University of Oklahoma and its international quarterly journal World Literature Today. It carries a $50,000 award and is often seen as a precursor for consideration for the Nobel Prize.

Other Works by Nuruddin Farah

From a Crooked Rib. London: Heinemann, 1976.

Maps. New York: Pantheon, 1986.

A Work about Nuruddin Farah

Alden, Patricio, and Louis Tremaine. Nuruddin Farah.

New York: Twayne, 1999.

feminism

The term feminism, with regard to literature, has a number of distinct associations. Largely grouped under the interdisciplinary field of gender studies, and arising out of increasing understanding of women's issues, different branches of the discipline focus on divergent ideas. The oldest identifiable form of literary feminism grew out of 18th-century liberal philosophy such as that found in Mary Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Women (1792), which emphasized female autonomy and self-fulfillment. In the 20th century, liberal feminism worked to achieve economic and social equality for women. More a revisionist than a revolutionary movement, feminism's literary aim was to reform existing structures by getting people to learn and read about women's issues, not to break down those structures to create new ones.

The movement eventually broadened to encompass radical feminism, which accused liberal feminism of not having high enough goals. Arising out of the Civil Rights movement and the surge of Leftist activism in the late 1960s, radical feminism's goal of addressing the women's oppression was revolutionary. As the 1970s progressed, the movement gained a more cultural perspective, the one most widely adopted by feminist writers.

Cultural feminism celebrates women's culture and community. Its goal is to seek out those qualities that are traditionally associated with women, such as compassion, subjectivity, intuition, and closeness to nature, and to claim them as desirable, positive, and even superior traits. Proponents of cultural feminism, including the writers Elizabeth Gould Davis and Ashley Montagu, also believe that these qualities are not innate but are learned.

In France, the feminist social movement began in April 1944 when French women obtained the right to vote. It was advanced greatly by the 1949 publication of Simone de BEAUVOIR'S The Second Sex, in which she states "One is not born, but rather becomes, a woman. No biological, psychological or economic fate determines the figure that the human female presents in society; it is civilization as a whole that determines this creature."

Simone de Beauvoir was not alone in her support of the emerging feminist trend in France. Other writers soon began to follow her example. Hélène CIXOUS and her "écriture féminine," developed in her essay "The Laugh of the Medusa" (1975), established a new form of women's writing whereby women could learn to "write from the body" to break free of the bonds of male-dominated rhetoric. Theories of the body became particularly important for feminist thinkers, as a woman's body was traditionally the source of such male-defined constructs as physical weakness, immorality, and unseemliness. One of the main goals of feminism as a literary movement was to redefine the body and society's view of it.

In reference to the concept of the body, many feminist critics turn to the work of writer Julia Kristeva. Although she does not consider herself a feminist writer, her theories linking the mind to the body and linking biology to representation have been pivotal to the movement. Kristeva emphasizes the maternal function of a woman's body and its significance to the development of language and culture. As a result of this function, Kristeva purports, ideals of feminism as espoused by de Beauvoir should be rejected because they negate the importance of motherhood. She also insists that early feminism, which sought total equality, is remiss in its attempts to ignore the inherent differences between genders. She further argues that a unique feminine language, as proposed by Cixous, is impossible. However, in rejecting existing feminisms, Kristeva paves the way for another form of feminism, one grounded in the exploration of multiple identities, arguing that there are as many sexualities as there are individuals.

In the 1990s, the trend toward gender studies, encompassing not only feminism but also lesbian criticism and queer theory, has shifted the focus once again to a more inclusive philosophy.

Some Works by Feminist Writers

- Gilbert, Sandra M., and Susan Gubar. The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2000.
- Kristeva, Julia. The Kristeva Reader. Edited by Tori Moi. New York: Columbia University Press, 1986.
- Millet, Kate. Sexual Politics. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 2000.
- Moers, Ellen. Literary Women. Indianapolis, Ind.: Doubleday, 1976.
- Moi, Tori. Sexual/Textual Politics: Feminist Literary Theory. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Woolf, Virginia. A Room of One's Own. Fort Washington, Pa.: Harvest Books, 1990.

Works about Feminism

- Richardson, Angélique, and Chris Willis, eds. The New Woman in Fiction and in Fact: Fin de Siècle Feminisms. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Warhol, Robyn R., and Diane Price, eds. Feminisms: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism. Piscataway, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1977.

Feng Zhi (Feng Chih; Feng Chengzhi)
(1905–1993) poet

Feng Zhi was born in China's Hebei Province on September 17. At age 12, he was sent to Beijing to study. He entered Beijing University in 1921 and produced a high volume of poems. In 1924, his first work appeared in Hidden Grass, a journal he published with friends in Shanghai. From 1925 to 1932, he edited another journal, The Sunken Bell. He graduated from Beijing University two years later and published his first collection, Songs of Yesterday. He then moved to Harbin to teach secondary school but returned to Beijing a year later to rejoin the literary community.

Feng Zhi's second collection, The Northern Journey and Other Poems (1929), is one of the most famous examples of modern Chinese lyric poetry. Written in melodic, romantic vernacular, it is a lengthy narrative poem about Feng Zhi's social education and his encounters with decadent and morally destitute warlords, prostitutes, and foreign invaders.

The next year, Feng Zhi traveled to Germany to study philosophy and literature in Heidelberg and Berlin. He earned a Ph.D. and translated German poets such as Rainer Maria RILKE. When he returned to China in 1936, he taught at Tongji University until 1939, when he joined the faculty at South-West United University in Kunming.

In 1941, Feng Zhi published Sonnets (1942), a collection of 27 sonnets that earned him fame as the Chinese practitioner of the poetic form. The sonnets are mostly contemplative reflections on life and nature, and because of their tone and internal direction, Feng Zhi is sometimes referred to as a metaphysical poet.

After the 1949 communist revolution, Feng Zhi wrote mostly patriotic poems (in Collected Poems, 1955) and focused on scholarship. He joined the Communist Party in 1956 and became director of the Foreign Literature Institute at the Academy of Social Sciences, where he continued his translations and studies of German literature.

Feng Zhi was considered one of modern China's great poets and also was honored with several German literary prizes, such as the Medal of Brothers Green from the German Democratic Republic and the Prize for the Arts by the Center for International Exchanges. He died on February 22.

A Work about Feng Zhi

Cheung, Dominic. Feng Chih. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

Ferré, Rosario (1942–) novelist, short-story writer, poet, critic

Rosario Ferré was born in Ponce, Puerto Rico, to Luis Ferré, politician and eventual governor of the island, and Lorenza Ramírez Ferré. Although Ferré received a conventional, aristocratic education, her childhood nanny, a vivid storyteller, introduced her early on to the worlds of fantasy, legend, and myth. Later in life, she studied under the Peruvian novelist Mario VARGAS LLOSA and the Uruguayan critic Ángel RAMA, both of whom encouraged her to write.

Ferré's early work, including The Youngest Doll (1976), a series of short stories set in Puerto Rico, established her as one of the first Puerto Rican feminist writers. In it, one finds the criticism of feminine stereotypes and an implicit call for the end of the repression of women, both of which themes have come to characterize much of her work. Her writing also deals with the cultural and historical heritage of Puerto Rico. To explore such themes, she incorporates elements of local myth and legend as well as realistic depictions of characters and settings. The title story of one of her best-known books, Sweet Diamond Dust (1986), relates the rise and fall of the aristocratic De la Valle family. The alternation of colloquial and formal language and the incorporation of different narrative perspectives in this work are typical of her fiction.

For Ferré writing has been and continues to be a manner of breaking through the societal constraints placed on her as a woman and as an individual. In this sense, she has followed in the tradition of such feminine writers as Simone de BEAUVOIR and Virginia WOOLF. Her questioning of restrictive gender and class divisions in Puerto Rico and the West in general, as well as her sensitive and profound character portrayals, have made her an important figure in contemporary Hispanic and world literature.

Another Work by Rosario Ferré

Ferré, Rosario. The House on the Lagoon. New York: Plume, 1996.

A Work about Rosario Ferré

Hintz, Suzanne S. Rosario Ferré, A Search for Identity. New York: Peter Lang, 1995.

Fiedeler, Hans

See DÖBLIN, ALFRED.

fin de siècle

French for “end of the century,” fin de siècle first came about as a literary movement in 1871 when German troops withdrew from Paris after the Franco-Prussian War. French anarchists were able to establish the Commune of Paris briefly, which, although it did not last for an extended period of time, was instrumental in creating an atmosphere in French culture in which radical ideas in literature, theater, and the visual arts began to thrive. Paris, at this time, became one of the centers of avant-garde culture. DECADENCE, drug abuse, degradation, and surrealism are commonly associated with the era, as were the fascination with prostitution by male writers, the development of lesbianism as an artistic trend, and an increased focus on sexuality, both heterosexual and homosexual.

Among the most influential writers of this period was Victor HUGO, whose works, including Les Misérables (1862), were published in the middle of the century and greatly influenced the next generation of artists. In particular, his portrayal of bohemians and student revolutionaries was consistent with fin de siècle dark idealism. Other writers, such as Guy de MAUPASSANT (whose works dealt chiefly with the Franco-Prussian war and fashionable life in Paris) and the prominent SYMBOLIST poets Stephan MALLARMÉ and Charles BAUDELAIRE and their often dark and unconventional ideas flourished at the turn of the century as well.

The tone of the fin de siècle movement was dark without the expected, accompanying melancholy. It was a time of political scandal, the most notable of which was the Dreyfus affair in which Captain Alfred Dreyfus was falsely accused and convicted of spying for the Germans during the war. He was sentenced to serve time on Devil's Island, French Guiana. Angered by this, and feeling that the charges were largely a result of anti-Semitism, the writer Emile ZOLA wrote a letter that openly criticized Dreyfus's conviction and subsequent imprisonment. Titled J'Accuse (January 13, 1898), Zola's letter passionately defended Dreyfus. As a result, the case was reopened and the conviction ultimately overturned. The situation, however, was typical of the prevailing mood of the time, and art was used to effect for social change and rebellion.

Another fin de siècle scandal involved the poet Arthur RIMBAUD. He had already caused quite an artistic commotion with his dark, introspective A Season in Hell (1873; translated 1932), in which he described his own intense and often tortured existence. He had further scandalized Parisian society when he left his wife for a man, poet Paul VERLAINE. This affair was an integral part of A Season in Hell and also typical of the tumultuousness of the age.

The social, literary, and artistic changes that were occurring at this time affected the theater as well. Actresses began to interpret the works of writers such as COLETTE, whose simulated sexual performance on stage caused a riot at the Moulin Rouge. Women, in particular, began to display their sensuality openly. Bored aristocrats, such as lovers Natalie Barney and poet René Vivien, often gave private yet elaborate shows in their own homes. The concept of lesbian chic emerged and flourished in these venues.

As a movement, the fin de siècle officially came to an end in 1905. It had achieved such momentum that it ultimately reached a breaking point; however, many of the influences that came out of the movement and other avant-garde and experimental art forms continued into the next century, shaping future trends in literature, culture, and the arts, not just in France but also internationally.

Works about the Fin de Siècle

Chadwick, Kay, and Timothy Unwin, eds. New Perspectives on the Fin-de-Siècle in Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century France. Lewiston, N.Y.: E. Mellen Press, 2000.

McGuinness, Patrick, ed. Symbolism, Decadence and the Fin de Siècle: French and European Perspectives. Exeter, England: University of Exeter Press, 2000.

Fischer, Caroline Auguste (Karoline Auguste Fernandine Fischer)

(1764–1842) novelist, short-story writer

Little is known about Caroline Auguste Fischer's childhood and youth. Her father, Karl Heinrich Ernst Venturini, was a court violinist at the Duchy of Brunswick. Her mother, Charlotte Juliane Wilhelmine Köchy Venturini, was the daughter of a local tailor. Fischer married Christoph Johann Rudolph Christiani in the early 1790s and moved to Copenhagen. The couple separated in 1798, and Fischer moved back to Germany the following year. In 1803, she had a child with the writer Christian August Fischer (1771–1829). The couple married in 1808 but separated after only seven months.

Fischer used Christian's literary contacts to publish her first novel, Gustavs Verirrungen (Gustav's Aberrations, 1801). She quickly followed up with two more novels, Vierzehn Tage in Paris (A Fortnight in Paris, 1801) and Die Honigmonathe (The Honeymoons, 1802). These works sold well and made her a popular author. After Fischer's second marriage ended, she tried to support herself by running a girls' school in Heidelberg and a library in Würzburg, but these ventures failed. Fischer had only limited success with her later novels and short stories before she quit writing in 1820.

She spent her last years in and out of mental institutions and died penniless in 1842.

Fischer often wrote about the incompatibility between pursuing happiness and pursuing virtue. Her stories often portray women forced to choose between creativity and a stifling home life. Fischer's powerful works expose the destructiveness that stereotypes and gender roles had on women in the 1800s. Largely forgotten until the late 20th century, Fischer is now viewed as a significant precursor to modern women's literature in Germany.

Works about Caroline Auguste Fischer

Purver, Judith. "Passion, Possession, Patriarchy: Images of Men in the Novels and Short Stories of Caroline Auguste Fischer." Neophilologus 79 (1995).

———. "Caroline Auguste Fischer: An Introduction." In Margaret C. Ives, ed., Women Writers of the Age of Goethe IV. Lancaster, U.K.: Lancaster University Press, 1991.

Flanagan, Richard (1962–) novelist, filmmaker

Richard Flanagan was born in Australia to an Irish Catholic family. He grew up in a mining town on the west coast in the state of Tasmania and left school at 16 to be a bush laborer. In his life since that time, he has been a construction worker at a hydroelectric plant, a Rhodes scholar, and a river guide. He began his writing career by concentrating on history, but his ambition from an early age was to be a fiction writer.

Flanagan considers his major literary influences to be Henry LAWSON, CAMUS, DOSTOYEVSKY, KAFKA, Faulkner, South American novelists, and, most recently, Toni Morrison. Supported by a grant from Ars Tasmania, he wrote his first novel, Death of a River Guide (1994); it was an unexpected success. As Flanagan states in an interview with Giles Hugo, he is interested in writing about Tasmania not as a nostalgic regional novelist but to find new forms for the richness and complexities of Tasmania's past and present. He draws on oral traditions from his own Irish culture, aboriginal myths, the landscape, and migrant experience, particularly since World War II. Married to a Slovenian, he is particularly interested in how immigrants from Central Europe have redefined themselves, through many trials, as Tasmanians.

Flanagan's first film, "Sound of One Hand Clapping," is situated in a community of mostly Central European migrant workers. He uses music as an integral role in the film, not as background but as a component of character and action. "Sound of One Hand Clapping" was shown at both the Berlin and Cannes film festivals.

Flanagan's most recent novel, Gould's Book of Fish (2002), supported by a grant from the Australia Council, is a best-seller and a critical success in Australia and internationally. It has won the Commonwealth Writers Prize for 2002, establishing Richard Flanagan as one of the most imaginative and innovative of contemporary novelists.

Flaubert, Gustave (1821–1880) novelist

Gustave Flaubert was born in Rouen, France. His father was the chief of surgery at the hospital in Rouen, and his mother, who went on to become the most important and influential person in his life, was the daughter of a physician. Flaubert was never satisfied with his bourgeois background and often rebelled against it; these rebellions ultimately led to his expulsion from school and to his finishing his education privately in Paris.

Flaubert's school years, aside from aiding in the development of his rebellious personality, also introduced him to his love of writing. As a teenager, he fell in love with a married woman, Elisa Schlésinger. The relationship was destined to end in disappointment, but his idealized love for Elisa provided the inspiration and subject matter for much of his writing.

While studying law in Paris in the early 1840s, Flaubert suffered from what was diagnosed at the time as a nervous attack, probably a form of epilepsy. He subsequently failed his law exams and decided to devote himself full time to writing.

In 1846, he was introduced to another writer, Louise Colet. This was the start of a relationship that lasted many years. Although they spent very little time together, they corresponded regularly, and she became his mistress. He broke off the relationship in 1855 when she attempted to visit him at his country retreat. Her novel, Lui (1859), gives a vengeful account of their relationship.

Although he was living outside of Paris at the time, Flaubert maintained close contact with family and friends in the city and was a witness to the Revolution of 1848. Afterward, he took up an acquaintance with the writer Maxime du Camp. Together, the pair traveled for three years, visiting North Africa, Greece, Syria, Turkey, Egypt, and Italy. On his return to France, Flaubert began work on what would become his greatest achievement, Madame Bovary, a novel that took five years to complete.

Critical Analysis

Madame Bovary is a shocking tale of adultery, based on the unhappy affair of the title character, Emma Bovary. The novel was first published in the Revue de Paris in 1856 and appeared as a two-volume book in 1857. Like many of his contemporaries' works, Flaubert's novel was attacked for its vivid depiction of what was considered morally offensive behavior. Flaubert was prosecuted for the work on charges of immorality and on the grounds that it was offensive to religion. He came before the same judge who later found Charles BAUDELAIRE guilty on a similar charge. Flaubert, however, was not convicted.

Madame Bovary is more than a simple tale of adultery. The protagonist, Emma Bovary, is a dreamer who, as a child, read the works of Sir Walter Scott and the romantics and, as an adult, longs for a life of romance and adventure. She is stuck, instead, in an unhappy marriage to Charles Bovary, a physician, who fails to recognize how miserable his wife is. Seeking escape from her boredom, she turns to extramarital affairs as a source of happiness and adventure. Her pursuit of another life ultimately causes her to fall deeply into debt and leads to her decision to commit suicide. The character was important to Flaubert, who felt her choices exemplified the problem of women who lived in a society trapped in materialism.

As a result of his success with Madame Bovary, Flaubert enjoyed much fame as a writer during the 1860s in the court of Napoleon III. He counted among his close friends Emile ZOLA, George SAND, Hippolyte Taine, and Ivan TURGENEV. All of these writers shared with him similar aesthetic ideals and a dedication to the realistic and nonjudgmental representation of life through literature.

His later works included Salammô (1862), about the siege of Carthage, and L'Éducation sentimentale (1869), a novel of forbidden romance between a young man and an older married woman set against the backdrop of the 1848 revolution. With his concern for precise form and for detailed observation of human nature, Flaubert began to be associated with a new school of naturalistic writers. He took the approach that it was the goal of the novelist to remain neutral, explaining and teaching but never judging. Many younger writers, such as Guy de MAUPASSANT and Anton CHEKOV adopted this outlook.

Although Flaubert was highly respected as a writer, his personal life was shadowed by financial difficulties. After the death of his father, he took up residence with his mother and young niece, who was forced to declare bankruptcy. Flaubert spent much of his fortune assisting her and her family. During his final years, Flaubert lived as a virtual hermit, working on a collection of three stories, Trois contes, and on the long novel Bouvard et Pécuchet. Before completing the novel, he died from a cerebral hemorrhage.

Other Works by Gustave Flaubert

Early Writings. Translated by Robert Griffin. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1991.

Flaubert–Sand: The Correspondance. Translated by Francis Steegmuller and Barbara Bray. New York: Knopf, 1993.

The First Sentimental Education. Translated by Douglas Garman. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972.

The Temptation of St. Anthony. Garden City, N.Y.: Hayleyon House, 1950.

Works about Gustave Flaubert

Berg, William J., and Laurey K. Martin. Gustave Flaubert. Boston: Twayne, 1997.

Sartre, Jean-Paul. The Family Idiot: Gustave Flaubert, 1821–1857. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Wall, Geoffrey. Gustave Flaubert: A Life. London: Faber and Faber, 2001.

Fo, Dario (1926–) playwright

Dario Fo was born in San Giano, Italy, to Pina (Rota) Fo, an author, and Felice Fo, who divided his time between acting in an amateur theater company and work as a railway station master. As a child, Fo spent vacations with his grandparents on a farm and traveled around the countryside with his grandfather, selling produce from a wagon. His grandfather told imaginative stories infused with local news to attract customers. This was Fo's introduction to the narrative tradition. In his youth, he sat for hours in taverns, listening to glassblowers and fishermen spin tall tales filled with political satire, planting the seeds of his own satirical work.

Fo moved to Milan in 1940 to study art at the Brera Art Academy. During this time, he began to write stories and sketches that were influenced by traveling storytellers. "Nothing gets down as deeply into the mind and intelligence as satire," Fo said in a statement cited by James Fisher. "The end of satire is the first alarm bell signaling the end of real democracy."

Much of Fo's satire focuses on political-religious issues. His one-man show Comical Mystery (1969), for example, was a mockery of Catholic hierarchy. The play, considered a cornerstone of his collective work, is his own version of the Gospels with commentary on church corruption.

Sketches in his play include one about a man without legs who shuns a healing from Christ and another depicting a wedding feast at Cana told from the perspective of a drunkard. The show was presented on television in 1977. According to Tony Mitchell in Dario Fo: People's Court Jester, the Vatican described the program as the "most blasphemous show in the history of television."

In 1970, Fo performed I'd Die Tonight If I Didn't Think It Had Been Worth It (1970), a play comparing Palestinian freedom fighters and Italian partisans. He followed this the same year with Accidental Death of an Anarchist (1970), a play about an anarchist who dies while in police custody. The play closed at the Cinema Rossini when police pressured the theater owners.

More than 40 of Fo's plays have been translated into dozens of languages. Fo himself has also performed on radio and film and once hosted a controversial Italian television program in 1962. In 1997, he won the Nobel Prize in literature for his theatrical contributions, which emphasized international topics ranging from AIDS to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Another Work by Dario Fo

We Won't Pay! We Won't Pay! and Other Plays. Translated by Ron Jenkins. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2001.

Works about Dario Fo

Fisher, James. "Images of the Fool in Italian Theatre from Pirandello to Fo." Available online at <http://persweb.wabash.edu/facstaff/fisherj/new/ItalianTheatre.html>

Mitchell, Tony. Dario Fo: People's Court Jester. London: Methuen, 1999.

Fontane, Theodor (Henri Théodor

Fontane) (1819–1898) novelist, balladeer
Theodor Fontane was born in Neurippen, Prussia. His parents, Louis Henri and Emilie Labry Fontane, descended from French Huguenots who moved to Prussia in the 1600s. Fontane's education consisted of private tutors and public schools in Swinemünde and Neurippen. As a youth, he joined literary clubs and wrote poems and historical tales. Pursuing the profession of his father, Fontane served as an apprentice to an apothecary from 1836 to 1844. After serving in the Prussian military, Fontane operated his own pharmacy in Berlin until 1849. In 1850, he married Emilie Rouanet-Kummer.

During his lifetime, Fontane achieved his greatest recognition as a balladeer. He published his first two books of ballads in 1850. In 1852, he started to work as a newspaper correspondent. He traveled extensively in the 1860s and 1870s and wrote five travel books based on his experiences, also wrote theater reviews and briefly served as secretary of the Berlin Academy of Arts in 1876 before he started to write novels. His first novel Vor dem Sturm: Roman aus dem Winter 1812 auf 1813 (Before the Storm: A Novel of the Winter of 1812–1813, 1878) is considered one of the finest historical novels in German literature for its artistic portrayal of the Prussian aristocracy, bourgeoisie, and peasantry during the Napoleonic Wars. He wrote three more historical novels before turning his attention to Berlin society.

Fontane's greatest literary influence was Scottish writer Sir Walter Scott. An accomplished writer of dialogue, Fontane helped pioneer the modernist trend of emphasizing conversation rather than plot. His ironic observations are critical of the prejudices and conventions of society, but his works still exhibit spontaneity, charm, and wit. His novels engage the themes of money, morality, guilt, retribution, and class hierarchy. His biographer Helen Chambers concludes that Fontane made a "unique and refined contribution to world fiction."

Other Works by Theodor Fontane

Effi Briest. Translated by Hugh Rorrison and Helen Chambers. London: Penguin, 2000.

Journeys to England in Victoria's Early Days. Translated by Dorothy Harrison. London: Massie, 1939.

A Work about Theodor Fontane

Chambers, Helen. The Changing Image of Theodor Fontane. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House Inc., 1997.

Foscolo, Ugo (Niccolò Foscolo)
(1778–1827) playwright, novelist, poet, essayist

Ugo Foscolo was born on the island of Zante in Greece to Andrea Foscolo, a ship's physician, and Diamantina Spathis. He was brought up speaking both Italian and Greek. Young Ugo changed residences at least twice when his father was named a ship's physician in the Levant and then again when he was made hospital director in Spalato.

Stability was not a big part of Foscolo's life. When his father died in 1788, Foscolo was forced to live with relatives in Zante. When his family was reunited in 1792 in Venice, Foscolo was enrolled in the San Capriano school in Murano, where he mastered Greek and Latin.

In about 1794, Foscolo began to experiment with poetry and to visit Venetian salons. Isabella Teotochi, also Greek, ran a salon that attracted great intellectuals. Teotochi eventually became Foscolo's lover, benefactor, and muse. Her decision to annul her marriage and secretly wed another seemed to be the catalyst for Foscolo's 1802 novel Last Letters of Jacopo Ortis, a novel in letters modeled after the works of Samuel Richardson and Jean-Jacques Rousseau that depicts the doomed love of Ortis for Teresa.

One of Foscolo's most famous collections of poems is On Sepulchres (1807), which speaks about the struggle of civilization and displays the ROMANTIC fascination with ruins: "Even the last ruins, the Pierian sisters gladden / The desert wastes with their singing, and harmony."

Foscolo was one of the major voices of his generation. From his precocious youth to the end of his life, he held tight to romantic ideals.

A Work about Ugo Foscolo

Radcliff-Umstead, Douglas. Ugo Foscolo. Boston: Twayne, 1970.

Fraire, Isabel (1934–) poet, translator

Isabel Fraire was born in Mexico City and raised in New York. A student of philosophy at the Autonomous National University of Mexico, by the early 1960s, she was writing poetry, literary criticism, reviews, and translations, and she became a member of the editorial council of the prestigious review, Revista Mexicana de Literatura (Mexican Review of Literature). Although her earliest poems appeared in 1959 in 15 Poems of Isabel Fraire, her first published book of poems is generally considered to be Only This Light, which appeared in 1969.

Fraire's translations from English to Spanish of such American poets as Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, Wallace Stevens, E. E. Cummings, William Carlos Williams, and W. S. Auden have been collected in Seis poetas de lengua inglesa (Six Poets Writing in English, 1976) and have appeared in many Latin American journals and anthologies. In 1978, she was awarded the Xavier Villaurrutia Prize for her third collection of poetry, Poems in the Lap of Death (1977). Of her work, Mexican poet and critic Octavio PAZ has said, "Her poetry is a continual flight of images that disappear, reappear, and return to disappear" (quoted at www.columbia.edu/~gmo9/poetry/fraire/fraire-bio.html).

Other Works by Isabel Fraire

Isabel Fraire: Poems. Translated by Thomas Hoeksema. Athens, Ohio: Mundus Artium Press, 1975.

Poems in the Lap of Death. Translated by Thomas Hoeksema. Pittsburgh, Pa.: Latin American Literary Review Press, 1981.

Frame, Janet (1924–) novelist

Janet Frame was born in Dunedin, South Island, New Zealand, and grew up in Oamuru, South Island. The daughter of a railway-worker father and an encouraging mother who wrote poetry and fiction, she studied to be a teacher at Dunedin Teachers' College and the University of Otago. Her early life was a happy one, despite poverty, her brother's epilepsy, and the drowning of two of her sisters. Before she was able to work as a teacher, however, she was incorrectly diagnosed as being schizophrenic and hospitalized in mental wards for almost 10 years. During this time, she wrote her first collection of short stories, The Lagoon (1951), which saved her from being lobotomized when the book won a literary award shortly before the surgery was scheduled. Finally able to leave the hospital, Frame then lived in a friend's garden shed, where she completed her first novel, Owls Do Cry (1957), which established her as an important novelist. As Prudence Hockley notes in her review in 500 Great Books by Women (1994), "The special quality of this novel lies in its poetic, hallucinatory, perceptive voice, imbued with the surreal vision of childhood and madness."

Afraid that she might be forced back to a mental hospital, Frame then left New Zealand in 1956, living in England and Spain until she finally returned to New Zealand in 1963. She is the author of numerous novels, including Faces in the Water (1982), a first-person narrative told in the voice of Estina, a woman incarcerated in a mental institution, and a three-volume autobiography, To the Island (1982), An Angel at My Table (1984), and The Envoy from Mirror City (1985). Her style of writing is considered unique, moving between realism and a more nonlinear exploration of the nature of reality. Although her earlier novels focus on the inner world of children, outcasts, and the insane, her later novels are considered poetic and POSTMODERN, with a freshness of language and voice that makes them unique. She has been awarded every major New Zealand literary prize and is considered New Zealand's best-known contemporary novelist.

Other Works by Janet Frame

The Adaptable Man: A Novel. New York: George Braziller, 1965, 2000.

The Edge of the Alphabet. New York: George Braziller, 1992.

Works about Janet Frame

King, Michael. Wrestling with the Angel: A Life of Janet Frame. Washington, D.C.: Counterpoint Press, 2000.

Panny, Judith Dell. I Have What I Gave: The Fiction of Janet Frame. New York: George Braziller, 1993.

Freud, Sigmund (1856–1939) philosopher, psychologist

Sigmund Freud was born in Freiberg, today in the Czech Republic, to Jewish parents, Jacob Freud, a small-time textile merchant, and Amalia Freud. Although the family was Jewish, Jacob Freud was not at all religious, and Sigmund Freud grew up an avowed atheist. When he was four years old, the family moved to Vienna, Austria, where Freud lived for most of his life. He was a brilliant student, always at the head of his class; however, the options for Jewish boys in Austria were limited by the government to medicine and law. As Freud was interested in science, he entered the University of Vienna medical school in 1873. After three years, he became deeply involved in research, which delayed his M.D. until 1881. Independent research was not financially feasible, however, so Freud established a private medical practice, specializing in neurology. He became interested in the use of hypnosis to treat hysteria and other mental illnesses, and with the help of a grant, he went to France in 1885 to study under Jean-Martin Charcot, a famous neurologist, known all over Europe for his studies of hysteria and various uses of hypnosis. On his return to Vienna in 1886, Freud married and opened a practice specializing in disorders of the nervous system and the brain. He tried to use hypnosis to treat his patients but quickly abandoned it, finding that he could produce better results by placing patients in a relaxing environment and allowing them to speak freely. He then analyzed whatever they said to identify the traumatic effects in the past that caused their current suffering. The way his own self-analysis contributed to the growth of his ideas during this period may be seen in letters and drafts of papers sent to a colleague, Wilhelm Fliess.

After several years of practice, Freud published The Interpretation of Dreams (1900), the first major statement of his theories, in which he introduced the public to the notion of the unconscious mind. He explains in the book that dreams, as products of the unconscious mind, can reveal past psychological traumas that, repressed from conscious awareness, underlie certain kinds of neurotic disorders. In addition, he attempts to establish a provisional matrix for interpreting and analyzing dreams in terms of their psychological significance.

In his second book, The Psychopathology of Everyday Life (1901), Freud expands the idea of the unconscious mind by introducing the concept of the dynamic unconscious. In this work, Freud theorizes that everyday forgetfulness and accidental slips of the tongue (today commonly called Freudian slips) reveal many meaningful things about the person's unconscious psychological state. The ideas outlined in these two works were not taken seriously by most readers, which is not a surprise considering that, at the time, most psychological disorders were treated as physical illnesses, if treated at all.

Freud's major clinical discoveries, including his five major case histories, were published in Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality (1905). In this work, he elaborates his theories about infantile sexuality, the meanings of the id, the ego, and the superego, and the Oedipus complex (the inevitable but tabooed incestuous attraction in families, and the associated fear of castration and intrafamilial jealousy).

In 1902, Freud was appointed full professor at the University of Vienna and developed a large following. In 1906, he formed the Vienna Psychoanalytic Society, but some political infighting resulted in division among members of the group (Carl Jung, for instance, split from the group with bitter feelings). Freud continued to work on his theories and, in 1909, presented them internationally at a conference at Clark University in Massachusetts. Freud's name became a household word after the conference. In his later period, in Beyond the Pleasure Principle (1920) and The Ego and the Id (1923), he modified his structural model of the psychic apparatus. In Inhibitions, Symptoms and Anxiety (1926), he applied psychoanalysis to larger social problems.

In 1923, Freud was diagnosed with cancer of the jaw as a result of years of cigar smoking. In 1938, the Nazi party burned Freud's books. They also confiscated his passport, but the leading intellectuals around the world voiced their protest, and he was allowed to leave Austria. Freud died in England in 1939.

Freud made an enormous contribution to the field of psychology: He established our basic ideas about sexuality and the unconscious and also influenced, to some extent, the way we read literary works by establishing premises for psychoanalytic criticism. His own case studies are often interpreted for their literary merit.

Other Works by Sigmund Freud

Civilization and Its Discontents. Translated by Peter Gay. New York: W. W. Norton, 1989.

The Future of an Illusion. Translated by Peter Gay. New York: W. W. Norton, 1989.

Works about Sigmund Freud

Bernheimer, Charles, and Claire Kahane, eds. In Dora's Case: Freud-Hysteria—Feminism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1985.

Erwin, Edward. The Freud Encyclopedia: Theory, Therapy, and Culture. New York: Garland Press, 2002.

Mitchell, Stephen. Freud and Beyond: A History of Modern Psychoanalytical Thought. New York: Basic Books, 1996.

Freyre, Gilberto de Mello (1900–1987)

nonfiction writer, sociologist

Born on March 15 in the city of Recife in the state of Pernambuco in the northeast of Brazil, Gilberto de Mello Freyre is one of the country's leading intellectual figures. After completing his B.A. in Brazil, he continued his studies in the United States where he earned an M.A. at Columbia, studying under anthropologist Franz Boas. After further studies in Portugal, he returned to Brazil and immersed himself in life in his region of origin, becoming good friends with other northeastern writers such as José Lins do Rego.

Freyre is known for his sociological and anthropological texts about Brazilian life. His argument that the specific nature of Portuguese colonization led to a mixed-race society in its colonies is where the concept of Brazil's status as a racial democracy originates. Freyre's most important texts are The Mansions and the Shanties: The Making of Modern Brazil (1936) and The Masters and the Slaves: A Study in the Development of Brazilian Civilization (1933). His works have left an indelible mark on Brazilian intellectual and popular history.

Another Work by Gilberto Freyre

The Gilberto Freyre Reader. Translated by Barbara Shelby. New York: Knopf, 1974.

Fried, Erich (1921–1988) poet, short-story writer

Erich Fried was born in Vienna, Austria, to Hugo and Nellie Stein Fried. In the mid-1920s, his father's shipping company went bankrupt, and the family survived on the money his mother earned selling porcelain figures. After the Nazis sent his father to a concentration camp in 1938, Fried fled to London where he settled permanently. During World War II, he helped his mother and other Jews escape from Nazi-controlled Europe. Fried held many jobs after the war, including dairy chemist, librarian, and worker in a glass factory. He was a commentator for the British Broadcasting System from 1952 to 1968.

Fried published his first collection of poems in 1944. From the 1950s through the 1980s, he published more than 25 volumes of verse and established his reputation as a lyric poet. Fried also translated the works of Dylan Thomas (1914–53), T. S. Eliot (1888–1965), and William Shakespeare (1564–1616) into German. He published the novel Ein Soldat und ein Mädchen (A Soldier and a Girl, 1960) and wrote Kafkaesque short stories (see Franz Kafka). His awards include the Schiller Prize (1965) and the Bremen Literature Prize (1983).

Fried used terse language laced with aphorisms and epigrams to address contemporary issues and events, such as the Vietnam War. National background had little influence on his opinions. Stuart Hood, who translated many of his works into English, stated in an interview, "Fried did not have a problem with nationality. He did not want to be British, German, or Jewish." Fried's positions were thus often paradoxical: He was a German language writer who criticized the policies of West Germany, a Jew who opposed Israel's fight against the Palestinians, and a leftist who was critical of Marxist practice.

Another Work by Erich Fried

Children and Fools. Translated by Martin Chalmers. London: Serpent's Tail, 1992.

A Work about Erich Fried

Lawie, Steven W. Erich Fried: A Writer Without a Country. New York: Peter Lang, 1996.

Frisch, Max (1911–1991) playwright, novelist

Max Frisch was born in Zurich, Switzerland, to Franz and Lina Wildermuth Frisch. He wrote several unpublished plays as a teenager and studied German literature at the University of Zurich from 1930 to 1933. He then supported himself as a freelance journalist and wrote his first novel, Jürg Reinhart (1934). In 1936, Frisch decided to pursue his father's profession and enrolled in the Eidgenössische Technische Hochschule in Zurich to study architecture. He received his degree and opened an architectural firm in 1941. Frisch served intermittently in the Swiss army during World War II and married Gertrud Anna Constance in 1942.

Frisch established his reputation as a dramatist soon after the war with a series of plays that captured the mood of the time. Staying neutral during the cold war, Frisch remained in contact with the literary worlds on both sides of the iron curtain. East German writer Bertolt BRECHT became one of his most important influences. Frisch traveled extensively throughout his life and gained a reputation as a notable diarist. His novels and plays made him one of the most respected German language writers. The novel I'm Not Stiller (1954) deals with the issue of individual freedom and displays the experimental narrative prose that made him famous. His novel Homo Faber (1957) is a commentary on the uncontrollable nature of technology. Frisch's later works, such as Montauk (1975), reflect a concern with aging and death. He won numerous American, Swiss, and German literary awards, including the Georg Büchner Prize.

Frisch was an original writer with integrity and a concern for truth and relevance. He continually used new contexts to address his common themes: male-female relationships, reality and imagination, social responsibility, and the quest for self-fulfillment. Frisch also had a piercing insight into contemporary life. German literary scholar Wulf Koepke wrote that Frisch's works "exemplify the struggle for survival of the human individual in the face of a society blindly intent on its own extinction."

Another Work by Max Frisch

Sketchbook 1946–1949. Translated by Geoffrey Skelton. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977.

A Work about Max Frisch

Koepke, Wulf. Understanding Max Frisch. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.

Fuentes, Carlos (1928–) novelist, short-story writer, dramatist, essayist

Carlos Fuentes was born in Panama City, Panama, where his father, Rafael Fuentes Boettiger, was the Mexican ambassador. Being the son of a career diplomat, Fuentes spent his childhood moving from city to city, following his father's assignments. He lived in Washington, D.C., where he became acutely aware of his Mexican nationality, in part because of being ostracized and harassed by his schoolmates.

Fuentes received an excellent and international education and is fluent in Spanish, English, and French. At first, it seemed that he would follow his father into the world of diplomacy. He returned to Mexico City to attend law school, but after graduating, he began to dedicate more and more of his time to literary pursuits. His early exposure to the inner workings of the Mexican government and his studies of economics and law gave his later literature a keen political sense and an ability to depict and criticize aspects of the Mexican upper classes.

Though Fuentes began to write as early as the 1940s, it was not until the late 1950s that he became well known. His second novel, The Death of Artemio Cruz (1962), received a shocked and confused reaction from its first critics, followed by an almost immediate wave of praise for its groundbreaking style and depth. The book's stream-of-consciousness style evokes the last thoughts of a powerful capitalist, Artemio Cruz, on his deathbed. The book is written in first-person, second-person, and third-person sections that represent the different points of view that Cruz has on his own life.

The use of the fragmented and musical language associated with stream-of-consciousness writing as well as the use of multiple points of view indicate a clear influence by James JOYCE, Virginia WOOLF, and particularly William Faulkner. The book also is clearly structured on Orson Welles's film Citizen Kane, which Fuentes saw in New York at an early age.

Another of Fuentes's novels, Terra Nostra (1975), pushes the envelope of a novel's experimental possibilities even further. It is, essentially, a meditation on Spanish and Latin-American history that uses fiction as its medium. It has no cohesive plot of which to speak and ranges from ancient Rome to the imagined end of the world. The main characters are barely human; they are, in fact, allegorical representations of the primal forces that drive human history.

Fuentes has also written a large number of essays. La Nueva Novela Hispanoamericana (The New Hispanic-American Novel, 1969), a study of the “new” Latin American novel of the 1960s, is a profound account of what distinguishes the novels of the cultural boom that occurred in Latin America at that time. It delves into the significance of the new style of MAGIC REALISM and thoughtfully examines the strengths and tendencies of what was, at the time, a newly emerging force in world literature.

Along with Octavio PAZ, Fuentes stands as one of the foremost Mexican authors of the 20th century. His erudition and refined intelligence, combined with the gifts of an epic storyteller, earned him in 1987 the Cervantes Prize, the most prestigious award given to a Spanish language author.

Other Works by Carlos Fuentes

The Crystal Frontier: A Novel in Nine Stories. Translated by Alfred MacAdam. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1997.

The Hydra Head. Translated by Margaret Sayers Peden. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1978.

A Work about Carlos Fuentes

Williams, Raymond Leslie. The Writings of Carlos Fuentes. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1996.

futurism

Having its origins in literature and poetry, the futurist movement began in Europe on February 20, 1909, when the front page of the French newspaper Le Figaro published the Founding and Manifesto of Futurism by artist and lawyer Emilio Filippo Tommaso Marinetti. Marinetti’s manifesto glorified technology, particularly the speed and power of the newly developed automobile, while at the same time promoting violence and aggression and calling for the destruction of traditional culture. This wide-scale obliteration of the past, according to Marinetti, was to also include the physical demolition of cultural institutions that were linked to traditional society, such as museums and libraries. Marinetti referred to these institutions as “those cemeteries of wasted efforts, those calvaries of crucified dreams, those catalogues of broken impulses!” He also encouraged his followers to “Let the good incendiaries come with their carbonized fingers! . . . Here they are! Here they are! . . . Set the library stacks on fire! Turn the canals in their course to flood the museum vaults!” (The Futurist Cookbook) At the time of the publication, Marinetti was the only member of the movement, but he soon gained a large literary and artistic following.

The name futurism was coined by Marinetti as a celebration of the change and growth of the future. Futurism stood in contrast to the sentimentality inherent in ROMANTICISM. Futurists openly and intentionally defied tradition and constantly questioned the accepted concepts of art and even the standard definitions of what constitutes art. They embraced technology, particularly anything relating to speed or power, and glorified the energy and violent nature of 20th-century urban life. The power of machinery and a fascination with speed were focal points of the movement, as was the renunciation of the “static” art of previous generations. Futurist literary theory, for example, focused on the ability of language to express. A futurist poet, for example, might frame words so that they would project from the page like gunfire.

Although it began as an Italian movement, futurism quickly spread throughout the world during the early part of the 20th century to places such as Hungary, Poland, the Ukraine, Holland, Portugal, and America. In Poland, Czechoslovakia, and other Eastern bloc countries, futurism was adopted quickly as a movement of protest against established cultural values and political hierarchy.

Futurism not only promoted destruction of cultural institutions; it also glorified war. It favored fascism and aimed to destroy artistic tradition. The motivation behind futurism was largely political. Marinetti and many other futurists were heavily involved in demonstrations urging Italy to enter World War I.

Futurism was also characterized by the numerous manifestos written and published simply for the purpose of explaining the movement itself.

These documents took the form of pamphlets and illustrated books of poetry. The rules of futurism as it applied to the arts were defined in these manifestos long before they were actually seen in the arts themselves. The tone of Marinetti's initial manifesto and many others that followed was intentionally inflammatory and, like the movement itself, designed to inspire anger, arouse controversy, and attract attention.

One of the reasons that Italian futurism is not better known today is its relationship to fascism. After World War II, futurism was viewed in a negative light because of this association; however, although Marinetti was a friend of the young fascist Benito Mussolini and both were ardent supporters of fascism, Futurism was never, as it has sometimes been claimed, "the official art of fascism." Mussolini was politically active in promoting the futurists, especially during the years 1918 to 1920. He ultimately turned against them, using his political clout to silence them. Many futurists then became disillusioned by the political situation and drifted away from political activism.

Futurism officially ended in 1944 with the fall of Italy and Marinetti's death; however, the legacy of futurism to modern art, including literature, is enormous. Futurism was the first attempt to focus art on technology and machines. Remnants of futurism can be found throughout 20th-century avant-garde art, particularly with regard to many aspects of modern science fiction.

Works about Futurism

Marinetti, F. T. The Futurist Cookbook. Translated by Suzanne Brill, edited and introduction by Lesley Chamberlain. San Francisco: Bedford Arts, 1989.

Tisdall, Caroline, and Angela Bozolla. Futurism. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1978.

Gabo

See GARCÍA MÁRQUEZ, GABRIEL.

Gandhi, Mohandas K(aramchand)

(1869–1948) writer, political leader

Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi was born in Kathiawar, Gujarat, India. He was the youngest son of Karamchand Gandhi, a politician, and Putlibai Gandhi. His mother was an extremely devout Hindu, and Gandhi often said his own beliefs on pacifism were based on his mother's religious teachings. In 1883, at age 13, Gandhi was wedded to Kasturba. Five years later, he was sent to England to study law and, in 1891, was called to the bar but decided to return to India.

After a brief period at work as a lawyer for the Bombay High Court in 1893, Gandhi went to South Africa to work for a Muslim law firm and spent the next 20 years fighting against the maltreatment of South African Indians, a fight that led to the formation in 1894 of the Natal Indian Congress. He later wrote about his experiences in South Africa in Satyagraha in South Africa (1924). In this work, Gandhi describes the idea behind Satyagraha (Truth Force), which later became the Satyagraha movement. This movement was a form of “peaceful resistance” against British colonial rule and was the most powerful political tool in India's struggle for independence.

By the time he was 45, Gandhi had become an international figure. His wide-ranging influence and prodigious social work gave him the title of “Bapu” (Father) in India and “Mahatma” (Great Soul) all over the world. His teachings on the importance of combining spiritual healing with political struggle have been adopted by international leaders such as America's Martin Luther King and Malcolm X. These ideas are passionately and candidly expressed in his autobiography, An Autobiography or The Story of My Experiments with Truth (1929). His experiments with truth, he explains, are a lifelong commitment to achieve purity in mind and action. For Gandhi, however, purity also had political power. His political career was dedicated to encouraging Indians to be nonviolent in their struggle against the violent and oppressive power of the British.

Gandhi's most important contribution to Indian history was his leadership in helping India and Pakistan gain independence from British colonial rule in 1947. His political legacy often overshadows his literary talent, but he wrote prodigiously in both English and Gujarati (his mother tongue). Gandhi wrote numerous essays on topics ranging from vegetarianism to anticasteism to passive disobedience to spiritual healing to religious tolerance. His most important work, Hind Swaraj or Indian Home Rule (1909), is a compilation of essays on his philosophies and political goals. He was also an editor and contributor to several journals, including an English weekly called Young India and a Gujarati monthly called Navajivan (New Life).

Gandhi spent his later years in and out of prison. In 1948, on his way to evening prayers, he was assassinated by a Hindu fanatic. This event seems, even today, an ironic and tragic end to a life spent spreading the cause for peace and nonviolence.

Other Works by Mohandas K. Gandhi

All Men Are Brothers. New York: Columbia University Press, 1969.

Mahatma Gandhi: Selected Political Writing. Edited by Dennis Dalton. Indianapolis: Hackett Pub. Co., 1996.

A Work about Mohandas K. Gandhi

Wolpert, Stanley. Gandhi's Passion: The Life and Legacy of Mahatma Gandhi. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Gao Xingjian (Kao Tsing-jen) (1940–) novelist, playwright

Gao Xingjian was born on January 4 in Ganzhou in China's Jiangxi Province. Although he was not formally educated, both his parents were interested and educated in the arts, and his mother taught him to read and write. When he entered Nanjing High School in 1951, he wrote prolifically. He graduated with a degree in French from Beijing Foreign Studies University in 1962 and took a job translating books.

Like most Chinese youth of the period, Gao Xingjian became a Red Guard under Mao Zedong's Communist rule and entered cadre schools in Henan and Anhui in 1969. Although China was in the middle of Mao's Cultural Revolution, Gao Xingjian continued to write, largely for psychological relief from the politically oppressive environment, although he later burned all his work from that period.

After the Cultural Revolution, Gao Xingjian was able to publish essays and short stories. In 1975, he was asked to head the French section for the magazine China Reconstructs, which helped him build important contacts in the French and Western literary worlds. He made further connections while handling external liaison affairs for the Chinese Writers Association in 1977.

During this time, Gao Xingjian also focused on his own literary endeavors, becoming a playwright for the Beijing People's Art Theater. Absolute Signal, his first play, about a thief and his girlfriend, takes place in a train car. It was performed in 1982 and combined traditional dramatic methods with methods used by modern Western playwrights. His 1983 absurdist play Bus Stop is based on Samuel BECKETT's Waiting for Godot and is about a bus that never comes and the hapless passengers who eventually wait years for it. Also interpreted as a critique of the Communist leadership, the play placed Gao Xingjian squarely in the middle of China's debate over MODERNISM. He also authored a piece of critical theory, "A Rough Study of Techniques in Modern Fiction Writing," (1981) which further raised controversy about his sympathy with modern and Western influences. In 1986, Gao Xingjian's plays were banned by the Chinese government from being performed after uproar over the staging of his avant-garde play, The Other Shore, essentially a conversation between ambiguous actors struggling to use a rope to cross from one side of water to another. The dialogue is vague and fluid, a characteristic critics found pointless and subversive.

The next year, Gao Xingjian was diagnosed with terminal lung cancer. The diagnosis turned out to be incorrect, but the brush with mortality and his fear of further persecution by the government drove him to seek spiritual renewal by journeying into the wild, mountainous forests of the Sichuan province. After his wilderness travels, he journeyed to Europe on the invitation of a German organization and became a Chinese exile. He moved to France, of which he is now a citizen. He has been the recipient of France's prestigious Chevalier d'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres award and has frequently worked on government commissions. He recorded his Sichuan-mountain experiences in his novel, Soul Mountain (1990), which fictionalizes his journey through the wilderness and his quest for truth and spiritual rebirth. The novel is also known for its innovative voice: The narrator's voice alternately assumes the use of different pronouns—I, you, he, and she—to create multiple perspectives.

Gao Xingjian is also an accomplished painter. While he has been the recipient of much critical attention and acclaim in the West for his literary work, he has earned his living with his misty and evocative brush paintings that often grace the covers of his volumes.

In 2001, Gao Xingjian became the first Chinese writer to win the Nobel Prize in literature. He accepted the prize as a Chinese writer in exile, and the Chinese government denounced the Swedish Academy for its choice of a writer unknown in China. In awarding the prize, the academy praised Gao Xingjian's "oeuvre of universal validity, bitter insights, and linguistic ingenuity."

Another Work by Gao Xingjian

The Other Shore: Plays by Gao Xingjian. Translated by Gilbert Fong. Hong Kong: The Chinese University Press, 1999.

A Work about Gao Xingjian

Tam, Kwok-kan. Soul of Chaos: Critical Perspectives on Gao Xingjian. Hong Kong: The Chinese University Press, 2001.

García Lorca, Federico (1898–1936) poet, playwright

Federico García Lorca was born in Fuente Vaqueros, Spain, to a well-to-do family. He was given an excellent education and the opportunity to pursue his artistic interests, which included painting, music, and, most of all, poetry. He spent his childhood in the Andalusian city of Granada, which instilled in him a love of that region's folk traditions. This folk influence would later be seen in his plays and poetry and a series of folksongs he collected and anthologized.

In 1919, he moved to Madrid and, within a short time, earned a reputation as one of the most talented young poets in Spain. His reputation spread throughout the Spanish-speaking world, and such Latin American poets as Pablo NERUDA were inspired and influenced by him.

García Lorca's international reputation had been established, and his career was progressing in Spain. However, personal conflicts and politics within the Spanish literary world caused him to travel to the United States for a year, where he attended Columbia University.

He found New York to be a nightmare, if an exciting one, and he wrote the surrealistic and expressionistic work Poet in New York (1940), which was not published until after his death. A castigation of the inhumanity of the modern world, Poet in New York remains one of García Lorca's most popular poems in the English-speaking world. It uses surrealist techniques, but unlike the French surrealism of André BRETON, it is filled with emotion and passion.

When García Lorca returned to Spain, he became increasingly involved in theater and wrote a series of plays that reveal the folkloric influences of his youth, creating a theater of strong emotions and symbolism. He also directed a traveling theater company called La Barraca, which performed Spanish theater classics in rural areas that had little exposure to culture. This project was one of many liberal political activities in which García Lorca was engaged during the period of the Spanish republic and before the Spanish civil war.

It was also at this time that García Lorca became particularly interested in the emerging women's rights movement. His reputation and fame grew exponentially during this period.

In 1936, while on a trip to Granada to visit his family, García Lorca was trapped by the outbreak of the Spanish civil war and went into hiding. He was captured within a few weeks and executed without trial. The presumed reason was his homosexuality, a crime at the time. However, his liberal agenda was undoubtedly a strong factor as well.

Critical Analysis

García Lorca was obsessed with expressing the intense, vital energy of life, which he did by using subconscious images and strong musical language. In his works, he constantly examined the struggle of opposing forces and the power of dialectical opposites such as good and evil or freedom and repression. These themes interact with his politics to create three major trends in his work: examinations of individuals oppressed by the need to conform to social norms, minorities oppressed by uncaring majorities, and life oppressed by death itself.

In the play The House of Bernarda Alba (1936), García Lorca recounts the power relationship between a controlling mother, Bernarda Alba, and her daughter Adela. Bernarda Alba's attempts to separate Adela from her lover end tragically, as do all García Lorca's plays, with her daughter's suicide. Bernarda Alba is a larger-than-life figure who ends up destroying everything she seeks to preserve. The play has distinctive feminist overtones and, along with IBSÉN'S Hedda Gabler, is one of the great early works of feminist literature.

Blood Wedding (1933) recounts the struggle between Leonardo and the citizens of the village in which he lives who react to his nonconformity with murderous rage. The villagers are not given proper names but called only Mother, Father, and so on, indicating that they are not real people but symbols of the rigid conventions of an unjust social morality. Like The House of Bernarda Alba, Blood Wedding ends with the tragic death of its most noble character.

In García Lorca's collection of poems Gypsy Ballads (1928), he explores the problematic cultural identity of the gypsies in Spain. These poems critique Spanish society for its unfair marginalization of the gypsies. Gypsy Ballads also celebrates the beauty and poetry of gypsy culture, pointing out that many things that are quintes-entially Spanish, in fact, originated with the gypsies.

Dirge for Ignacio Sánchez Mejías (1937) brings García Lorca's celebration of the power of life into a confrontation with its opposite, the power of death. Ignacio Sánchez Mejías was a friend of García Lorca's who was tragically killed in a bullfight. In the dirge, García Lorca celebrates the matador's vitality and emphasizes the beauty of living on the tightrope between life and death.

García Lorca is one of the most influential poets of the 20th century. NERUDA, PAZ, and many other 20th-century Spanish-speaking poets owe García Lorca a tremendous debt as the central figure of a type of surrealism that is uniquely expressive of emotions. His tragic death at the hands of fascists also stands as an important historical symbol for the need for freedom of expression. He may be seen as a forerunner of the Civil Rights and women's movements of the latter 20th century, but more important, he was a writer of exquisite poems and plays that truly reveal the preciousness of human life on the edge of death.

Other Works by García Lorca

A Season in Granada: Uncollected Poems & Prose.

Edited and translated by Christopher Maurer. London: Anvil Press Poetry, 1998.

Four Major Plays. Translated by John Edmunds; introduction by Nicholas Round; notes by Ann MacLaren. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

A Work about García Lorca

Wellington, Beth. Reflections on Lorca's Private Mythology: Once Five Years Pass and the Rural Plays. New York: Peter Lang, 1993.

García Márquez, Gabriel (Gabo)

(1928–) novelist, short-story writer, screenplay writer, journalist

Gabriel García Márquez was born in Aracataca, Colombia, a small town near a banana plantation called Macondo. His father, Gabriel Eligio García, was a telegraph operator who had courted his mother in secret by telegraph when she would write home from school. García Márquez lived in Aracataca until the age of eight. During that time, his closest connections were to his maternal grandparents, who had initially tried to prevent their daughter from marrying Gabriel Eligio García because of his conservative political affiliations.

García Márquez's grandmother was a highly superstitious woman and also a brilliant storyteller. She would tell García Márquez the most incredible, exaggerated, and impossible things with the deadpan manner of someone explaining that Earth has a north and a south pole. As a child, García Márquez believed everything she told him and, on some level, never stopped believing. This early experience of blending the real with the fantastic later led García Márquez to develop his unique style of MAGIC REALISM.

His grandfather, who had been a colonel in the Colombian civil war, was a local official. He would spend a great deal of time with his young grandson and often took him to the circus. García Márquez has stated that his grandfather was the most important person in his life and his best friend. The colonel died when García Márquez was eight years old, but García Márquez drew more inspiration for his books from these eight years than from any other period of his life.

García Márquez was sent to boarding school and won a scholarship to go to college in Bogotá, the capital of Colombia. After studying law, he worked as a journalist, traveling throughout South America, Europe, and the United States, eventually settling in Mexico City in 1961.

In Mexico City, he wrote film scripts, including a western in collaboration with Carlos FUENTES titled Tiempo de Morir (A Time to Die), to support himself and his wife Mercedes, whom he had married in 1958.

García Márquez had written an unsuccessful first novel called Leaf Storm (1955) about life in Macondo, a fictionalized version of García Márquez's birthplace. The novel spans the period from the turn of the century to the 1930s. Though it contains many of the themes in García Márquez's later works, the novel is poorly structured and remains flat.

No One Writes to the Colonel (1961), however, is in many ways García Márquez's first masterpiece. It is a novella that depicts an elderly colonel who waits for a government pension that never arrives. The colonel, lovingly based on García Márquez's grandfather, is a magnificent literary character filled with humor and vitality. It is in this work that García Márquez's control of language and his stylistic innovations caught up with his psychological perception. The combination created a new sort of literature, which was fantastic in its details and yet deeply true in its emotions.

Critical Analysis

The imaginary town of Macondo is the setting of most of García Márquez's novels and stories. In this way, Macondo is a literary device like the Yoknapatawpha County of William Faulkner. Both places are imaginary worlds, closely based on the setting of the author's childhood, that by being written about repeatedly become literary microcosms, self-contained realities. García Márquez has often spoken of his sense of kinship with Faulkner. He has even said that Faulkner, who grew up in Mississippi near the Gulf of Mexico, is a fellow Caribbean writer.

It was in 1965 that García Márquez began to write his single greatest work One Hundred Years of Solitude (1967). He was driving to the beach with his family when suddenly all of the themes that he had been developing since he was a boy solidified into a clear structure. He returned home immediately and began to write.

One Hundred Years of Solitude revisits all of the themes of García Márquez's earlier work as episodes within the epic story of six generations of the Buendía family, the founding family of the town of Macondo.

The book is subtly structured in four sections of five unnumbered chapters each. Each section corresponds to an abstract historical category.

The first section explores the mythic and utopian prehistory of the town. Mythical narratives from both the biblical and classical traditions are woven with local superstitions and García Márquez's own inventions. Macondo, though it is a place that seems full of promise, has been founded by José Arcadio Buendía because of a murder he has committed and is trying to forget. This evokes the story of Cain and Abel and shows that Macondo is a place created by an act of transgression.

The second section of the book moves into what could be called historical time. The events in this section closely parallel the history of the actual Columbian civil war in which García Márquez's grandfather fought. However, García Márquez continues to write in his magical style. This combination of historical fact and fantasy has an extraordinarily dramatic effect and is, above all, what makes One Hundred Years of Solitude the quintessential example of magic realism.

The third section is an account of how, after the Columbian civil war, a U.S. company comes to Macondo to exploit its banana industry. Though this section can also be said to take place in historical, as opposed to mythic, time, it is different from the previous section. History in the third section has been corrupted by language, particularly the propaganda and media manipulation the banana company uses to exploit the citizens of Macondo. By the time the company is finished, Macondo has been reduced to a wasteland, barely holding on to what is left of its previous vitality.

In the fourth section, the book returns to mythic time, not the utopian time of the beginning but the apocalyptic time of the true end of the world. The final Buendía, the great-great-grandson of the first José Arcadio, lives in Macondo disconnected from history. He does not even know his origins or that he is a Buendía by blood. He spends his time trying to decipher a magical manuscript that holds the secret of his origins and his fate.

García Márquez went on to write multiple novels of the highest literary merit, including Love in the Time of Cholera (1988) and Chronicle of a Death Foretold (1981). In 1982, he was awarded the world's highest literary award, the Nobel Prize. In his acceptance speech, he spoke of his hopes for a positive political future for Latin America. He emphasized that magic realism is merely an accurate depiction of the miraculous occurrences that take place in Latin American life, occurrences of superhuman wonder and terror.

Other Works by Gabriel García Márquez

Collected Novellas. Translated from the Spanish by Gregory Rabassa and J. S. Bernstein. New York: HarperPerennial, 1991.

The General in His Labyrinth. Translated from the Spanish by Edith Grossman. New York: Knopf, 1990.

A Work about Gabriel García Márquez

Miller, Yvette E., and Charles Rossman. Gabriel García Márquez. Pittsburgh, Pa.: Department of Hispanic Languages and Literatures, University of Pittsburgh, 1985.

Gautier, Théophile (1811–1872) poet, novelist

Théophile Gautier was born in Tarbes on August 31. He moved as a young child to Paris with his family, where he studied to become a painter. In June 1829, however, Gautier met with the great novelist Victor HUGO, which prompted him to change his aspirations and become a writer. Five months later, his first collection, Poetries (1836), was published on the same day that the barricades were erected in Paris.

For financial reasons, Gautier took a position as a journalist in 1836, working as an art critic while continuing to write fiction. His novel Made-moiselle de Maupin (1835) caused quite a scandal when it first appeared on account of its description of sexual ambiguity. It is also credited for founding the concept of art for art's sake, a phrase Gautier uses in his prologue to the book. The next year, he wrote La Mort amoureuse (translated into English as Clarimonde), about a priest who becomes obsessed with a beautiful vampiress. Gautier also continued to write poetry, publishing the collection The Comedy of Death (1838), which shows influences of Shakespeare, GOETHE, and Dante.

In 1839, Gautier decided to try to write for the theater. He created numerous tales of fantasy, but the one for which he is most remembered is his libretto for the ballet Giselle, which opened in Paris on June 28, 1841, to overwhelming popular and critical acclaim. Giselle continues to be performed frequently in the 21st century.

Gautier was a proponent of the idea of art for art's sake, which is evident in the fact that he originally wanted to be a painter. His love of the visual has transferred to his written works as well.

Others Works by Théophile Gautier

Gautier on Dance. Translated by Ivor Guest. London: Dance, 1986.

Gentle Enchanter: Thirty-Four Poems. Translated by Brian Hill. London: R. Hart Davis, 1960.

A Work about Théophile Gautier

Tennant, Philip E. Théophile Gautier. London: Athlone Press, 1975.

Generation of 1898

A group of writers who shared a common concern for Spain's national identity and who worked to revitalize the social, political, and aesthetic structures of their country. The Spanish-American War of 1898 brought an end to the period of Spanish imperialism in the New World. Spain, which had been a world power for hundreds of years, had to face the new reality of being a small provincial nation. The Generation of 1898 urged their fellow compatriots to turn away from the trappings of empire and to search for the "true" Spain of their medieval and Arabic heritage.

ORTEGA Y GASSET, the Spanish philosopher and critic, attributes a span of 15 years to the generation as a movement and further divides it into two groups. The first group includes the forerunners Miguel de UNAMUNO and Ángel Ganivet y García (1865–98); the second group includes the secondary members of the movement such as Pío BAROJA.

Perhaps the difficulty of conclusively saying who is and is not a member of this movement comes from the fact that one of the main characteristics that members of the Generation of 1898 shared is a strong sense of individuality and non-conformism. The central figures, however, would unquestionably include Baroja, Unamuno, Ganivet, Antonio MACHADO, and the Latin American poet Rubén DARÍO, who spent a great deal of time traveling in Europe. Other members include Azorín (José Martínez Ruiz, 1873–1967), who was the first to identify the Generation of '98 as a group; Ramón María del Valle-Inclán (1866–1936); Juan Ramón Jiménez (1881–1958), who won the Nobel Prize in literature in 1956; and Ramón Pérez de Ayala (1880–1962).

These authors, in addition to individualism, shared strong national feelings mixed with literary and formal experimentation. Out of their rejection of the decadent features of Spanish culture, they embraced MODERNISM in hope that it would cleanse the dead tissue from Spanish art. In politics, they shared a sense of apathy and a mistrust of government control over the individual. In society, they rejected refined manners and taboos. They called for bringing Spanish culture down to earth and embracing Arab and flamenco influences. They wanted a return to the culture of the people rather than the aristocrats. Finally, in art, they introduced new structures and difficult but vital modes of expression.

The writers of the Generation of 1898 opened up the structures of literature and showed the exciting possibilities of experimentation. They influenced 20th-century authors as diverse as GARCÍA LORCA and Ernest Hemingway.

A Work about the Generation of 1898

Shaw, Donald Leslie. The Generation of 1898 in Spain. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1975.

Genet, Jean (1910–1986) novelist, playwright

A convicted felon who went on to become one of the leaders in the avant-garde theater movement, Jean Genet was born in Paris as the illegitimate son of a woman who abandoned him shortly after birth. Raised in state institutions, he embarked on a life of crime, turning to theft at age 10. He spent time at the Mettray Reformatory, escaping from there at age 19 to join the foreign legion, a position he soon abandoned. From there, Genet wandered throughout Europe spending time in several prisons on charges of vagrancy, theft, homosexuality, and smuggling.

In 1939, Genet began to write about his experiences. His subsequent novels detailed and glorified the underworld, homosexuality, male prostitutes, convicts, and other social outcasts. He wrote his first novel, Our Lady of the Flowers (1943; translated 1963), a fictional creation based on the events in his life while he was in prison.

In 1948, Genet was once again convicted of burglary. This, his 10th offense, resulted in an automatic sentence of life imprisonment. By this time, however, his works had gained the attention of fellow writers Jean Paul SARTRE, André GIDE, and Jean COCTEAU. On hearing of Genet's sentence, they petitioned the president of the republic for Genet's release. His parole was granted, after which his life changed dramatically.

Encouraged by the show of support from such prominent writers, Genet determined to dedicate his life to writing and to abandon crime permanently. He continued to glorify the underworld in which he had lived in his works, but he also began to focus on the beauty and sadness of homosexual love.

In the 1940s, Genet turned his attention to the theater, writing several plays that, at the time, were considered too controversial to be performed in France. His first play, The Maids (1947; translated 1954), made a significant impact on the rising trend toward the THEATRE OF THE ABSURD. It was based on a true story of two sisters, both maids for the same woman, who murder their mistress. This play was followed by Deathwatch (1949; translated 1954), which takes the prison setting so commonly seen in his novels and uses it as a backdrop from which to explore despair and loneliness.

Genet began to abandon traditional ideas of what should constitute acceptable character, plot, and motivation within a theatrical piece. He began to focus on conflicts within society—between illusion and reality, good and evil, and other cultural oppositions—with a fervor that can almost be described as religious. His plays are ritualistic in structure, aimed at arousing the audience's innermost feelings and then offering them the opportunity to undergo a transformation or to reach a catharsis alongside the characters on the stage. Filled with an energy largely created by violence and cruelty, his plays, while shocking, were never vulgar and were diverse in both setting and subject. The Balcony (1956; translated 1957), for instance, was set in a brothel; The Blacks (1959) in a fantastical court; and The Screens (1961; translated 1962) in the middle of the French–Algerian war. All three works, however, focused on the inherent paradoxes of an imperfect life.

Genet's autobiography, The Thief's Journal (1949; translated 1964), is a record of his remarkable life and the misery and degradation he suffered at the hands of a bourgeois society. He gave up writing in the 1960s to devote himself to lecturing and supporting the emerging radical activist fervor of the decade. He continued to support radical causes until his death on April 15.

Other Works by Jean Genet

Funeral Rites. Translated by Bernard Frechtman. New York: Grove Press, 1969.

Prisoner of Love. Translated by Barbara Bray. Hanover, Mass.: University Press of New England, 1992.

Rembrant. Translated by Randolph Hough. New York: Hanuman Books, 1988.

Works about Jean Genet

Knapp, Bettina. Jean Genet. Boston: Twayne, 1968.

Sartre, Jean-Paul. Saint Genet: Actor and Martyr. New York: Pantheon Books, 1983.

White, Edmund. Genet: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1993.

George, Stefan (1868–1933) poet

Stefan George was born in the German village of Rüdeshelm to Stephan and Eva George. His father was a prosperous wine merchant. George attended secondary school in Darmstadt and graduated in 1888. He studied modern languages at the University of Berlin for three semesters. Deciding early in life to be a poet, George never engaged in another profession or trade. He rarely remained in one place, frequently traveling to the countries of central and western Europe. While in Paris, he found formative influences in Stéphane MALLARMÉ and other French symbolist poets.

George published his first volume of poetry in 1890. In 1892, he founded the journal Blätter für die Kunst (Journal of the Arts). George formed many close friendships among the literati, including the Austrian writer Hugo von HOFMANNSTHAL. He soon attracted a group of disciples known as the George Circle. After the turn of the century, George increasingly saw himself as an educator to lead the reform of a decadent culture. A brief friendship with a 15-year-old boy, Maximin, further focused George's attention on the beauty and the renewing potential of an elite group of youth. By the 1910s, George's poetry had moved into a prophetic phase. His volume Der neue Riech (The Kingdom Come, 1928) revealed his vision for a new Germany. The Nazis sought to use George as a symbol of their state, but he refused their honors and awards. He moved to Switzerland, where he died in December 1933.

George became famous for writing beautiful lyrical poems on such themes as landscape, friendship, and art. He sometimes used terse and forceful language but still produced balladesque works. Early in his career, George wrote of the artist's isolation from nature, but he later sought to teach that man was divine and capable of perfection. He left a lasting influence on German lyrical poetry and expressionist writers. His biographers, Michael and Erika Metzger, explain that George's works "bear witness to the unremitting striving of a man of unique poetic and intellectual powers to find a higher meaning in his existence and ours."

Another Work by Stefan George

The Works of Stefan George. Translated by Olga Marx and Ernst Morwitz. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1974.

A Work about Stefan George

Metzger, Michael M., and Erika A Metzger. Stefan George. Boston: Twayne, 1972.

Ghālib, Mirzā (1797–1869) poet

Mirzā Asadullāh Khān Ghālib was born in Agra, India. His grandfather immigrated to India from Asia Minor and belonged to a long line of soldiers. Ghālib's father was also a soldier and was killed in battle when Ghālib was five years old. After his father's death, he grew up with his mother's family, who were wealthy landowners. Ghālib was given a private education in languages and sciences and, at age 13, was married and moved to Delhi, where he spent the rest of his life.

Much of Ghālib's finest poetry is in Persian, though he also wrote in Urdu. Ghālib started writing poetry at a very young age and was already moving among literary circles by the time of his marriage. When he was young, he used the name Asad and later adopted the name Ghālib. He was always hesitant about his choice to become a poet, and he was the first male in his family who did not want to be a soldier. In one of his letters, he describes this decision by comparing his poetic words with the weapons of war. He states that his poetry will be "his ship upon the illusory sea of verse . . . and the broken arrows of my ancestors become my pens." Characteristically witty, Ghālib's allusions are often obscured by the strict rhyme and rhythm constraints of the ghazal. (A ghazal is defined as a short poem consisting of up to a dozen couplets in the same meter, with a specific rhyme scheme.) Often, however, this necessity only further liberated Ghālib's deliberate play with words and sounds.

Ghālib was never rich, but in middle age, he was invited to join the court of Bahādur Shāh Zafar, the last of the Moghul emperors. Under Bahādur Shāh Zafar's patronage, he began to make a comfortable living from his poetry. The British takeover of India from the Moghuls after the Sepoy Mutiny in 1857 (also known as the First War of Indian Independence) had a tremendous impact on Ghālib's life and work: He lost his position as court poet and instead began writing copious letters to his friends, who were now spread across the subcontinent. Although they were written for private reading, they were collected and published, the first volume of them in the year before he died. Written in Urdu in a colloquial style, these letters are his subjective responses to current events and allow modern readers a glimpse into his time, while taking Urdu literature into a new direction by showing that profound literature could exist outside of the formal ghazal and its emphasis on idealism, romance, and universalism.

Another Work by Mirzā Ghālib

Ghazals of Ghālib. Translated by Aijaz Ahmad. New York: Columbia University Press, 1971.

A Work about Mirzā Ghālib

Russell, Ralph. Ghālib. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1969.

Ghosh, Amitav (1956–) novelist

Amitav Ghosh was born in Calcutta, India, but grew up in Bangladesh (formerly East Pakistan). As a child, and while on fieldwork research, Ghosh spent much of his time living in many countries, including Sri Lanka, Iran, England, Egypt, and the United States. Despite his diverse interests (he has studied and taught philosophy, literature, and social anthropology), Ghosh has said that his creative work best captures his ideas. As a child, during summer holidays in Calcutta, Ghosh would spend hours reading books from his uncle's library in his grandfather's house. Because of this initiation into reading and literature, he has acknowledged the lasting influence of Rabindranath TAGORE and the Bengali literary tradition in his own writing. Today, Ghosh is a writer, a journalist, and a teacher at Columbia University.

After graduation in India, Ghosh went to Oxford University to study social anthropology, where he received a masters, and a doctorate in philosophy in 1982. On his return to India, he began to work for the Indian Express newspaper in New Delhi while working on his first novel, The Circle of Reason (1986). This and his next novel, Shadow Lines (1988), are about the seamlessness of geographical boundaries, and much of the plot of Shadow Lines hinges on the question of national identity. The main character suffers from a sudden identity crisis after he is thrown into a situation where he must decide which country (India or Bangladesh) is his, which culture defines him, and which place he can ultimately call his own. This novel won Ghosh India's prestigious Sahitya Akademi Award in 1990.

Many of Ghosh's novels have been the result of years spent in different countries while conducting field research for his college degrees. In an Antique Land (1993), for instance, comes out of his research in 1980 while living in a small village in Egypt. The Glass Palace (2000), tells the story of an orphaned Indian boy, developed alongside the story of the royal family's exile in India after the British invasion of the kingdom of Mandalay (Burma) in 1885.

Ghosh refused the Commonwealth Writers Prize for this novel in 2001 in protest against being classified as a "commonwealth" writer. Accepting the award, he said in his letter to the Commonwealth Foundation, would have placed "contemporary writing not within the realities of the present day . . . but rather within a disputed aspect of the past." His works reflect the elements of universal humanity. The cross-cultural references he makes to different nations and cultures render insignificant physical or political boundaries.

Another Work by Amitav Ghosh

The Calcutta Chromosome: A Novel of Fevers, Delirium, and Discovery. New York: HarperCollins, 1998.

Works about Amitav Ghosh

Bhatt, Indira, and Indira Nityanandan, eds. The Fiction of Amitav Ghosh. New Delhi: Creative Books, 2001.

Dhawan, R. K. The Novels of Amitav Ghosh. New York: Prestige Books, 1999.

Gide, André (1869–1951) novelist

André Gide was born in Paris on November 22. His father, a law professor at the University of Paris, died when André was 11. Gide was subsequently raised by his wealthy mother on her family's estate near Rouen. Overly protective of her son and concerned over what she believed to be his delicate health, she withdrew him from school and hired private tutors. He was brought up in a strict Protestant tradition, memorizing passages from the Bible at an early age, and undergoing periods of religious fervor. He also developed an abiding affection for his cousin, Madeleine Rondeux, whom he married in 1895. The two stayed married 42 years in what is, according to some accounts, the longest unconsummated marriage in recorded history.

In 1889, after completing his studies and passing his required exams, Gide, never needing to worry about supporting himself financially, decided to devote his life to writing and traveling. He published his first work, The Notebooks of André Walter (1891), in the style that was to become his signature: the intimate confessional. He also began to attend gatherings of intellectuals at the Paris apartment of symbolist poet Stéphane MALLARMÉ. This was followed by a trip to North Africa in 1893 with a young painter, Paul Albert Laurens. The effect of this journey proved critical to both Gide's life and his works.

Liberated from the confinement of the society in which he was born and raised, he began to examine certain truths about himself, including his homosexuality. When he returned to Paris, however, he quickly began to deny many of these revelations. He took a second trip to North Africa, during which he met Oscar Wilde, an intellectual experience that would forever shape his life and his work. The result of these sexual and intellectual awakenings was the novel The Fruits of the Earth (1897).

Although Gide had begun to make discoveries about himself, he was unable to reconcile the reality of his life with his strict moral religious upbringing. On returning to Paris once again, he married his cousin Madeleine Rondeux. The marriage was largely a pretense and fraught with difficulties, as is revealed in his novels The Immoralist (1902) and Strait Is the Gate (1909). Both works examine the tension between social responsibility and the desire to remain true to the self.

During World War I, Gide worked with the Red Cross in Paris, where he met and fell in love with Marc Allegret. When Madeleine learned of this, she destroyed all the letters Gide had ever sent to her, an act that greatly hurt Gide. In response, he published Corydon (1924), a defense of homosexuality, and If I Die (1924), his autobiography. These two works shocked and scandalized his closest friends and resulted in Gide's alienation from his previously close social groups. Gide, however, felt personally vindicated by his decision to admit openly his homosexuality and sold his estates to move with Allegret to French Equatorial Africa.

In the 1930s, Gide began to look favorably on principles of marxism and by 1932 had embraced communism largely because of Lenin's decriminalization of homosexuality. However, a visit to the Soviet Union in 1934 left him disillusioned.

A firm antifascist, he spent most of World War II living in North Africa. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature in 1947 and, at the time of his death in 1951, he was one of only two authors whose entire collection of works appeared on the Index Liborum Prohibitorum, a listing of books forbidden to be read by Roman Catholics.

André Gide's life was complicated by many facets, and his writing, which reflects the circumstances of his life, is based on an intense scrutiny of himself and the world around him.

Other Works by André Gide

Amyntas. Translated by Richard Howard. New York: Ecco Press, 1988.

The Counterfeiters. New York: Random House, 1973.

Works about André Gide

Fryer, Jonathan. André and Oscar: Gide, Wilde and the Gay Art of Living. London: Constable, 1997.

Sheridan, Alan. André Gide: A Life in the Present. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1998.

Ginzburg, Natalia (Alessandra Tornimparti) (1916–1991) novelist, essayist, nonfiction writer

Natalia Ginzburg, well known for her autobiographical novels detailing her unconventional family and its fight against fascism, was born Natalia Levi in Palermo to a middle-class family. Her religious background was mixed, being Jewish on her father's side and Catholic on her mother's side, and she was raised as an atheist. Because of this, she spent her childhood removed from other children, isolated for her differences. In 1919, she moved to Turin, where her father had accepted a position as a professor at the University of Turin. There, she was immersed in the culture of the time, particularly the activities centered around antifascism. Intellectuals, all opponents of Benito Mussolini, would gather regularly at her family's home to discuss opposition.

Ginzburg graduated from the University of Turin in 1935. Three years later, she married editor and political activist Leone Ginzburg. The couple had two children and spent much of their life together in seclusion in the region of Abruzzi, where they were involved in numerous antifascist activities. Eventually, they were forced into hiding, alternately in Rome and in Florence, until Leone Ginzburg was arrested in 1944. Imprisoned at the Regina Coeli prison, he died after being subjected to extreme torture.

Ginzburg had begun her career as a writer of short stories. Many of these were published in the Florintine magazine Solaria. Her first major work to appear in the magazine was "Un'assenza" (1933), a tale about an unhappy marriage. It was printed when she was only 17 years old. Her first short novel, however, was not written until almost a decade later. She published The Road to the City (1942) under the pseudonym of Alessandra Tornimparti while she and her husband were still in hiding.

In 1944, after the death of her husband and the Allied liberation, Ginzburg returned to Rome where she gained employment with the publishing house of Giulio Einaudi. While working as an editorial consultant, she continued to produce novels of her own, including The Dry Heart (1947), another tale of unhappy marriage, and A Light for Fools (1952), the story of a family's struggles to survive in an era of fascism.

Ginzburg remarried in 1950, this time to Gabriele Baldini, an English literature professor from the University of Rome. While married to him, she produced her humorous and well-known autobiographical work, Family Sayings (1963). After his death in 1969, she continued to write, producing essays, biographies, and translations, as well as fiction. She was elected to the Italian Parliament in 1983 and later published more works including The City and the House (1984) and True Justice (1990). Ginzburg died of cancer on October 7, leaving behind works that show in vivid detail the social implications of fascism and the history and culture of her world.

A Work about Natalia Ginzburg

Jeannet, Angela M., and Giuliana Sanguinetti Katz, eds. Natalia Ginzburg: A Voice of the Twentieth Century. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000.

Giraudoux, Jean (1882–1944) playwright
Hippolyte-Jean Giraudoux was born in France in the village of Bellac. He was educated at the École Normale Supérieure. As a child and young man, he traveled extensively to Germany, Italy, the Balkans, Canada, and finally to the United States, where he spent a year as an instructor at Harvard. He returned to France to serve in World War I; he was wounded twice and became the only writer ever to be awarded the Wartime Legion of Honor.

Giraudoux began his literary career as a novelist, with Suzanne et le Pacifique (1921), and he wrote several other works of fiction. He also wrote literary studies such as Racine (1930) and political works, including Full Powers (1939). But he gained recognition for his stage plays, 15 in all, most of which were initially staged in France by actor-director Louis Jouvet.

Like the great 17th-century French dramatist Racine, whom he deeply admired, Giraudoux often chose classical themes. He titled one of his plays Amphitryon 38 (1929; translated 1938) in acknowledgement of the 37 versions of the story (about a man whose wife gives birth to twins, of whom one has been fathered not by Amphitryon but by the sky god Zeus) that preceded his own. Judith (1931) revisits the biblical story of Judith's outwitting of Holofernes. But unlike Racine, who grandly presents his characters as consumed by fatal passions, Giraudoux treats his characters informally and ironically. He believed that he was living in an age when grandness could not be appreciated, and he adjusted his art accordingly.

Giraudoux's last play, The Madwoman of Chailot (1946; translated 1949), was completed in 1943 but produced and published posthumously. Written during the German occupation of France, it tells an inspirational story of a group of greedy prospectors whose search for oil threatens to destroy a small town and of the "madwoman" who thwarts their plans.

Giraudoux's work is rich in allegory and fantasy and has strong political and psychological undertones. His playful anachronisms and his wit helped release the inhibitions that REALISM had placed on French theater.

Other Works by Jean Giraudoux

Choice of the Elect. Translated by Henry Bosworth Russell. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 2002.

The Five Temptations of La Fontaine. Translated by Richard Howard. New York: Turtle Point Press, 2002.

Lying Woman: A Novel. Translated by Richard Howard. New York: Winter House, 1972.

Plays. Translated by Roger Gellert. London: Methuen, 1967.

Three Plays. Translated by Phyllis La Farge with Peter H. Judd. New York: Hill and Wang, 1964.

Tiger at the Gates [La Guerre de Troie n'aura pas lieu]. Translated by Christopher Fry. London: Methuen, 1983.

Works about Jean Giraudoux

Body, Jacques. Jean Giraudoux: The Legend and the Secret. Translated by James Norwood. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1991.

Korzeniowska, Victoria B. The Heroine as Social Redeemer in the Plays of Jean Giraudoux. New York: Peter Long, 1991.

Nagel, Susan. The Influence of the Novels of Jean Giraudoux on the Hispanic Vanguard Novels of the 1920s–1930s. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 1991.

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von

(1749–1842) poet, novelist, playwright, essayist

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe was born in Frankfurt, Germany, to Johann Caspar Goethe, an attorney, and Katherine Elizabeth Goethe, a daughter of Frankfurt's mayor. Goethe's early interest in literature was wholeheartedly encouraged by his mother, an extremely well-educated woman. His childhood was marked by academic brilliance, as well as constant conflict with authority figures in school. Emotionally, Goethe's adolescence was shaped by several unsuccessful love affairs, which greatly contributed to his development as a writer.

At age 16, Goethe enrolled in Leipzig University to study law. During an interruption of his education due to illness, he studied drawing. He transferred to the University of Strasbourg where, in 1771, he obtained a degree in law. Between 1771 and 1774, he practiced law in Frankfurt and Wetzlar, until he was hired by Duke Karl August of Weimar. During his career as an administrator at the Weimar court, Goethe acted as the duke's councilman, a member of the war commission, and director of roads and services, and he directed the financial affairs of the court. A true member of the Enlightenment—the 18th-century movement of confidence in the capacities of human reason—Goethe dedicated his spare time to scientific research, mostly in anatomy. Between 1791 and 1817, Goethe acted as the director of court theaters. He also became an expert on mining, and under his influence and directorship, Jena University enjoyed the status as one of the most prominent and prestigious academic institutions in Europe, particularly in history and philosophy.

Critical Analysis

Goethe's first major work, The Sorrows of Young Werther, appeared in 1774. The novel delineates Werther's hopeless love for Lotte Buff, the wife of his close friend. Driven to self-alienation and psychological breakdown, no longer able to live without his beloved, Werther commits suicide. Werther expresses his misery in terms that resonated widely, especially with young readers: "My creative powers have been reduced to a senseless indolence. I cannot be idle, yet I cannot seem to do anything either. When we are robbed of ourselves, we are robbed of everything." Goethe explained his motivation for writing the novel in terms of his heightened spiritual and emotional awareness: "I tried to release myself from all alien emotions, to look kindly upon what was going on around me and let all living things, beginning with man himself, affect me as deeply as possible, each in its own way." The emotions and local color are placed in the foreground of his work. The Sorrows of Young Werther is considered to among the most influential texts of German ROMANTICISM.

In Goethe's second major novel, Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship (1795–96), Goethe continues to explore themes of love and alienation. However, the novel presents a more optimistic outlook on life. Like Werther, Wilhelm suffers a tragic blow after an unsuccessful courtship. Unlike Werther, however, Wilhelm begins to seek out actively other values in life. He dedicates himself to work and becomes a playwright and an actor. In the end, Wilhelm is spiritually satisfied with his newfound outlet for passion. The novel remains thematically consistent with the Romantic school; however, critics have noted the emergence of the conservative side of Goethe's thinking. Unlike many of his contemporaries, Goethe was not impressed by the uprising and violence of the French Revolution. He supported liberty and progress but also maintained that the aristocracy had an important role in society. Many younger readers began to criticize Goethe for what they saw as subservience to the upper classes.

The first part of Goethe's dramatic masterpiece, Faust, appeared in 1808. This drama became his passion and he worked on it for more than 30 years. Based on the play by the English Renaissance dramatist Christopher Marlowe, it tells a chilling story of a man who sells his soul for knowledge. Faust makes a contract with Mephistopheles to die as soon as his thirst for knowledge is satisfied. Faust is driven to despair when Margaret, an innocent woman, is condemned to death for giving birth to Faust's illegitimate child. He finally realizes that his lust for knowledge has led to tragic mistakes.

The second part of Faust appeared in 1838. Faust marries the beautiful Helen of Troy and creates a happy community of scholars. The bliss of his good deeds brings satisfaction in old age, and Mephistopheles is about to demand satisfaction. But Faust's changed attitudes and good heart are rewarded, as angels descend from the sky in the final scene of the play and take Faust to heaven. The play brought Goethe international success and had a profound influence on modern drama.

During his illustrious career, Goethe produced, in addition, a number of important poetical works. He also provided literary guidance to his close friend Friedrich SCHILLER and produced several of his plays. After his death, he was buried next to Schiller in Weimar.

Although it is difficult to measure the influence of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, he is certainly among the giants of world literature. His novels, poems, and plays are still widely read and studied. He is a dominant figure of German Romanticism.

Other Works by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe

Italian Journey. Translated by Elizabeth Mayer. New York: Penguin, 1992.

The Sorrows of Young Werther and Selected Writings. Translated by Catherine Hutter. New York: New American Library, 1987.

Theory of Colors. Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1970.
Vaget, Hans R., ed. Erotic Poems. Translated by David Luke. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Works about Johann Wolfgang von Goethe

Eckermann, Johann. Conversations of Goethe. Translated by John Oxenford. New York: Da Capo Press, 1998.

Wagner, Irmgard. Goethe. Boston: Twayne, 1999.

Williams, John. The Life of Goethe: A Critical Biography. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell Publishers, 2001.

Gogol, Nikolay (1808–1852) novelist, short-story writer, dramatist

Nikolay Vasilyevich Gogol was born in Sorochinez, Ukraine, into a family of minor aristocrats. He was a mediocre student in school and avoided other people. After graduation, he moved to St. Petersburg in search of a position in the civil service. More interested in writing than in a government career, Gogol worked as a minor official for only a brief period of time, quitting his job for a higher-paying position as a history professor at the St. Petersburg University.

In 1831, Gogol published his first collection of short stories, Evenings on a Farm Near Dikanka. Based on Ukrainian folk tales, the stories combine elements of the supernatural, humor, and romance. Gogol's first collection was greeted with acclaim from both critics and readers. Fired from his university position for incompetence, Gogol continued his literary work. In Mirgorod (1835), he produced more short stories that were based on Ukrainian folklore and history. It was with this collection that Gogol established himself as the father of Russian REALISM. In his famous story "The Overcoat," he explores the psychology of a clerk who must make enormous sacrifices to buy a new overcoat. It was the first work of Russian literature to bring sympathetic attention to the plight of a social misfit, who would previously have been seen only as a comic character.

In 1836, Gogol presented his first comic play, The Inspector General, to an enormous audience that included the czar of Russia. In the play, the officials of a small town expect an important visit from a governor. They mistake Hlestakov, a petty government official en route to his father's estate, for the inspector general. The play, with its hilarious satire on provincial officials, was a huge success in St. Petersburg, but certain censors in the government viewed it as politically dangerous. Afraid of losing his freedom, Gogol left Russia for Europe to continue his work away from government oversight.

Gogol traveled throughout Europe, staying for extended periods in Germany, Switzerland, France, and Italy. While in Paris, he lost one of his closest friends to a cholera epidemic. This tragic event prompted Gogol's return to Russia in 1839. Contrary to his expectations, Russia celebrated his return, and a version of The Inspector General was produced in Moscow to mark the occasion. Facing serious health problems, Gogol returned to Europe, became a complete recluse, and turned to studying the sacred texts of the Russian Orthodox Church. His newly found religious sentiments, which some contemporaries described as zeal, eventually surfaced in his work.

Critical Analysis

In 1842, Gogol published the first volume of his masterpiece, Dead Souls. Even before publication, it attracted negative attention from the censors, and it came into print only after the personal intervention of the czar. The novel centers on a small-time provincial bureaucrat named Chichikov and satirizes both middle-class greed and the institution of serfdom in Russia. Gogol's critique of serfdom, which essentially consigned peasants to a form of slavery, skillfully portrays the moral decay of Russian society. In hope of advancing his social position and his opportunities for a profitable marriage, Chichikov falsifies his economic status by purchasing "dead souls"—the names of dead serfs. In the second volume, Gogol apparently attempted to incorporate strong elements of spirituality and religion; however, spiritually and psychologically troubled, he destroyed the manuscript. In 1848, he departed on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, but the journey proved quite unsuccessful in terms of providing the religious consolation Gogol was seeking.

In many respects, Gogol's life translated into his works of fiction. Characters are often mentally distraught, almost to the point of grotesquerie, centering their lives on seemingly insignificant, worldly goals. By the same token, Gogol's critique of Russian society extends far beyond social issues and often illuminates the individual's struggle for spiritual fulfillment.

The last years of Gogol's life were marked by deep physical and psychological suffering. As many experts concur today, Gogol suffered from acute forms of depression and anxiety. Gogol spent the last three days of his life praying. He died in 1852, reportedly from a stroke.

In Russia, Gogol is viewed as one of the major figures of the literary canon. His prose shows a deep understanding and sensitivity, not only to the social order but also to individual psychological dimensions.

Other Works by Nikolay Gogol

Arabesques. Translated by Alexander Tulloch. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1982.

The Collected Tales of Nikolai Gogol. Translated by Richard Pevear and Larissa Volokhonsky. New York: Pantheon, 1998.

Gogol: Three Plays. Translated by Stephen Mulrine. London: Methuen, 2000.

Works about Nikolay Gogol

Fanger, Donald. Creation of Nikolai Gogol. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1982.

Nabokov, Vladimir. Nikolai Gogol. New York: W. W. Norton, 1961.

Stilman, Leon. Gogol. New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.

Gombrowicz, Witold (1904–1969)

novelist, playwright

Witold Gombrowicz was born on his family's estate in Małoszyce and then moved to Warsaw, Poland. As a boy, he was introverted and sickly. He felt alienated by the nationalist sentiment of the time and ultimately rejected orthodox culture in favor of the company of peasants, such as maids and stablehands.

Attempting to follow a career that would be accepted by his family, Gombrowicz studied law at the University of Warsaw but began, in secret, to write short stories, which were later published in the collection Memoirs of a Time of Immaturity (1933). Although his writing was attacked by critics for its rejection of contemporary viewpoints, it was moderately successful with readers who shared his discontent. Gombrowicz eventually gave up law and began writing full time. In 1938, he published his first play, Yvonne, the Princess of Burgundy, and followed it with his first novel, Ferdynand (1938), which is a satirical comment on the absurdities of Polish society in the 1930s with elements of mystery and eroticism.

Gombrowicz was commissioned in 1939 to write a series of articles about Argentina. Two days after he arrived in Buenos Aires, World War II began and Poland was invaded. He stayed in Buenos Aires, working for several small newspapers. There, he published his second play The Marriage (1947) and the novel Trans-Atlantic (1953).

During a brief respite from censorship in 1956, several of his works were reprinted in Poland, but Gombrowicz did not return to his homeland. His third novel, Pornografia (1960), an account of a relationship between two teenagers in rural Poland as viewed by fascinated old men, was followed in 1963 by his receipt of a Ford Foundation Fellowship, which allowed him to leave Argentina. He settled in Berlin, where he wrote his fourth novel, Cosmos (1964), an absurdist mystery that has been compared to Franz KAFKA's The Castle, as well as his final play, Operetta (1966), before dying of heart failure in Vence, France.

Gombrowicz's popularity was largely posthumous. His books had been banned, once again, in Poland in the 1960s. After his death, the ban was partially lifted, but Gombrowicz specified in his will that his works were not to be published in Poland unless they were reprinted in their entirety. As a result, an underground movement was formed to smuggle foreign editions of his work into Poland. His plays were performed in Polish theaters, but their texts could not be bought in official stores. This contributed to a rise in Gombrowicz's popularity. It was not until 1988, after the collapse of Communist Party rule, that the first full edition of his books was published in Poland.

Other Works by Witold Gombrowicz

Cosmos and Pornografia: Two Novels. Translated by Eric Mosbacher and Alastair Hamilton. New York: Grove Press, 1994.

Diary. Translated by Lillian Vallee. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1988.

Ferdynand. Translated by Danuta Borhardt, with a foreword by Susan Sontag. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2000.

Works about Witold Gombrowicz

Milosz, Czeslaw. Who Is Gombrowicz? New York: Penguin, 1986.

Thompson, Ewa M. Witold Gombrowicz. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

Gomringer, Eugen (1925–) poet

Born in Cachuela Esperanza, Bolivia, Eugen Gomringer was raised in Switzerland by his grandparents. He studied art history and economics at colleges in Bern and Rome and later worked as a graphic designer. In 1952, Gomringer cofounded the magazine Spirale. From 1954 to 1958, he worked as a secretary for Max Bill, the director of the Academy of Art in Ulm, Germany. Since the 1960s, Gomringer has worked as a business manager for the Schweizer Werkbund in Zurich, an artistic adviser for the Rosenthal concern, and as a professor of aesthetic theory at the Art Academy in Düsseldorf.

Gomringer published his first poems in Spirale in 1953. His verse helped initiate the concrete movement in poetry. These poems create a concrete reality by using words as building blocks to form three-dimensional semantic, phonetic, and visual explorations. Conventional syntax, description, and metaphor are ignored. The poet Jerome Rothenberg explained that concrete poetry is "a question of making the words cohere in a given space, the poem's force or strength related to the weight & value of the words within it, the way they pull & act on each other." Gomringer's "schweigen" ("Silence") is his most famous concrete poem. The word schweigen is printed 14 times to form a rectangle, with the empty space in the middle representing silence.

In addition to poetry collections, Gomringer wrote theoretical tracts explaining his style and calling for a simple, universal language devoid of irrationality. His influence was strong in the 1950s and 1960s, inspiring a range of linguistic experiments. The concrete poetry movement waned in 1972, however, as critics found it too simplistic. Gomringer then gave up poetry to write about art and artists.

Another Work by Eugen Gomringer

The Book of Hours and Constellations. Translated by Jerome Rothenberg. New York: Something Else Press, 1968.

Gonçalves Dias, Antônio (1823–1864)poet, dramatist

Born in 1823, Antônio Gonçalves Dias was the most important romantic poet to write in the Brazilian literary tradition. He was educated in Portugal at the University of Coimbra but felt strong ties to Brazil. He celebrates Brazil in his poetry collections, such as Primeiros cantos (1846) and Ultimos cantos (1851), focusing on themes of nature. Specifically, Dias wrote extensively about nativist issues. His glorification of indigenous peoples places him among the many writers of the Indianist movement (see INDIANISM) of the 19th century in Brazil, along with the novelist José de ALENCAR. Gonçalves Dias's work Song of Exile (1843), with its nostalgic first line, "My land has palm trees, where the nightingale sings," is Brazil's best known poem. He is often thought of as Brazil's national poet, although he published only three collections of poetry. He was killed in a shipwreck while returning to Brazil from Portugal.

Works about Antônio Gonçalves Dias

Haberly, David. Three Sad Races: Racial Identity and National Consciousness in Brazilian Literature. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

Treece, David. Exiles, Allies and Rebels: Brazil's Indianist Movement, Indigenist Politics, and the Imperial Nation-State. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000.

Goncharov, Ivan (1812–1891) novelist

Ivan Aleksandrovich Goncharov was born in Simbirsk, Russia. His father, a wealthy grain merchant, died when Goncharov was only seven. Young Ivan was raised by his godfather, Nikolay Tregubov. An average student, Goncharov studied business at the University of Moscow. After he graduated in 1834, he worked in the civil service for nearly 30 years.

In 1847, Goncharov published his first novel, An Ordinary Story, which focuses on the conflict between Russian nobility and the newly emergent merchant class. The novel examines the moral implications of income and how it affected social position of the two classes.

Between 1852 and 1855, Goncharov traveled around the world as a personal secretary for Admiral Putyatin. He published his account of the journey as Frigate Pallada (1858). His observations about the nations he visited, which included England, parts of Africa, and Japan, are often unflattering, and he expresses his sense of Russian superiority and his distrust of social reform.

In 1859 Goncharov published his most famous novel, Oblomov, a masterpiece of Russian REALISM. In the novel, Goncharov satirizes the character of Oblomov, a young aristocrat who is indecisive and apathetic. Goncharov presents the aristocracy as an obsolete class that no longer contributes to the welfare of the state. The novel was so successful that it introduced a new word into the Russian language: oblomovshina, meaning "indecision and inertia."

Goncharov's talent was readily acknowledged in Russia by such personages as Fyodor DOSTOYEVSKY. Goncharov, however, was a quarrelsome figure. He accused Ivan TURGENEV and Gustave FLAUBERT of plagiarizing his ideas for their own novels. Goncharov never married. He published his last novel, The Precipice, in 1869. The work tells of a sentimental love affair between three men and a mysterious woman. Critical response to the novel was devastating, and Goncharov never published another. He spent the rest of his life virtually alone, writing short stories and essays.

Goncharov died in St. Petersburg in 1891. Through his works, Goncharov depicted the emergent class conflict between aristocracy and the rising middle class. He is mostly remembered for his contribution to realism and his mastery of social satire.

Another Work by Ivan Goncharov

An Ordinary Story: Including the Stage Adaptation of the Novel. Translated by Marjorie L. Hoover. New York: Ardis Publishers, 1994.

Works about Ivan Goncharov

Diment, Galya. The Autobiographical Novel of Co-Consciousness: Goncharov, Woolf, and Joyce. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1994.

Diment, Galya, ed. Goncharov's Oblomov: A Critical Companion. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1998.

Ehre, Milton. Oblomov and His Creator: The Life and Art of Ivan Goncharov. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1974.

Goncourt, Edmond (1822–1896) and Jules (1830–1870) novelists

The Goncourt brothers, Edmond and Jules, are most notable for their long history of collaboration as a team of novelists writing in the tradition of naturalism. Edmond was born in Nancy, France, and Jules in Paris eight years later. Close as children, they retained their special bond throughout their lives.

In 1849, “les deux Goncourts,” as they would come to be known, began to travel throughout France as artists, painting watercolor sketches and ultimately keeping detailed notes of their travels in a journal. This journal, published as Journal des Goncourts (nine volumes, 1887–96; translation of selections by Lewis Galantière, 1937), which they began together in 1851, contains 40 years of detailed accounts of French social and literary life.

The brothers also became successful as art critics and art historians. After a failed attempt at writing for the theater, they began to collaborate on a series of novels, including Sœur Philomène (1861), Renée Mauperin (1864; translated 1887), Germinie Lacerteux (1864), and Mme. Gervaisais (1869), all of which became well known as representations of the naturalist school. Their elaborate and often convoluted style as well as their selection of subjects based on their sensational value anticipated naturalist ideas.

After Jules died, Edmond continued to write, publishing three more novels, among them La Fille Élisa (1877; translated 1959), a tragic story of a girl who becomes a prostitute. As a condition of his will, Edmond provided funding for the establishment of the Goncourt Academy to award and encourage excellence in fiction. The Goncourt Prize for literature is awarded annually to an outstanding French author.

Other Works by Edmond and Jules Goncourt

Pages from the Goncourt Journal. Translated by Robert Baldick. New York: Penguin USA, 1984.

Paris and the Arts, 1851–1896; from the Goncourt Journal. Translated by George J. Becker and Edith Philips. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1971.

Paris Under Siege, 1870–1871; from the Goncourt Journal. Translated by George J. Becker. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1969.

Works about Edmond and Jules Goncourt

Brookner, Anita. The Genius of the Future: Diderot, Stendhal, Baudelaire, Zola, the Brothers Goncourt, Huysmans: Essays in French Art Criticism. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1988.

Heil, Elissa. The Conflicting Discourses of the Drawing-Room: Anthony Trollope and Edmond and Jules de Goncourt. New York: Peter Lang, 1997.

Goodison, Lorna (1947–) poet, short-story writer, professor, painter, illustrator

Lorna Goodison was born in Kingston, Jamaica, to Vivian Goodison, a Jamaica Telephone Company technician, and Dorice Goodison, a dressmaker. She was educated at St. Hugh's High School for girls and read the major English writers at an early age. V. S. NAIPAUL'S Miguel Street, which she read as a teenager, sparked Goodison's appetite for Caribbean literature. In an interview with Kwame Dawes, Goodison said she started writing to read her own writing because so many of the characters she had been reading about differed from those of her experiences.

Goodison wrote while attending the Jamaica School of Art and the Art Students League of New York during her early 20s, but she did not begin to write seriously until the 1970s. Many of her poems juxtapose standard English and Jamaican dialect, and a variety of musical traditions, including rhythm and blues and reggae, influence her writing style. “For Don Drummond,” a notable poem in Goodison’s first collection, Tamarind Season: Poems (1980), reproduces the sound of Drummond’s voice and trombone to mourn the influential Jamaican musician’s death.

The poetry collections I Am Becoming My Mother (1986) and Heartease (1988) explore women’s experiences, and To Us, All Flowers Are Roses: Poems (1995) focuses on common Jamaican experiences. The poet Andrew Salkey commented in the journal World Literature Today, “The evocative power of Lorna Goodison’s poetry derives its urgency and appeal from the heart-and-mind concerns she has for language, history, racial identity, and gender.”

Other Works by Lorna Goodison

Guinea Woman: New and Selected Poems. Manchester, U.K.: Carcanet, 2000.

Travelling Mercies. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 2001.

Works about Lorna Goodison

Dawes, Kwame, ed. Talk Yuh Talk: Interviews with Anglophone Caribbean Poets. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2001.

Kuwabong, D. “The Mother as Archetype of Self: A Poetics of Matrilineage in the Poetry of Claire Harris and Lorna Goodison.” Ariel 30, no. 1 (1999): 105–29.

Gordimer, Nadine (1923–) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

Nadine Gordimer published her first short story when she was 13. Since that first publication in 1937, she has published eight collections of short stories and more than a dozen novels. She has also written extensively on political, literary, and cultural issues. She is one of Africa’s, and the world’s, premier literary talents.

Gordimer was born in a small mining town in South Africa outside of Johannesburg. Her father, Isidore, a Jew, was a jeweler from Lithuania, and her mother, Nan Myers, helped him to become a shopkeeper in the conservative suburban town where Nadine was raised. Her first novel, The Lying Days (1953), evaluates the growth and development of a young woman as she confronts the conformity of a comfortable, middle-class existence.

While still a young girl, Gordimer had an experience that was to forever change her life. As she related the incident to Bill Moyers in a 1992 videotaped interview entitled “On Being a Liberal White South African,” Gordimer’s mother had removed the 11-year-old Gordimer from school “on the pretext of a heart ailment.” She was to have little contact with other children until she was 16. Her enforced isolation led to a life filled with reading, writing, and observing. One of the novels she read during this period was Upton Sinclair’s The Jungle, which recounts the horrible living conditions of workers in Chicago’s meat-packing plants in the early 20th century. In the Bill Moyers interview, Gordimer said that the reading of this book changed her life because she saw, clearly, that literature could change the world, that it could open people’s eyes to inequity and foster change.

Critical Analysis

Many of Gordimer’s stories and novels examine the status and responsibilities of white, liberal intellectuals in both South Africa and abroad. Novels such as The Late Bourgeois World (1966), A Guest of Honor (1970), and Burger’s Daughter (1979) examine the difference between engaging with the world and withdrawing from it. For example, the plot of Burger’s Daughter concerns the reflections of a young woman whose father had led a life of active political resistance to the inequities of South African culture. His daughter struggles with his legacy and her own wavering commitment to confrontation. The novel raises an issue that is very important in Gordimer’s work: Can white South Africans be a part of the world that will come when majority rule becomes a reality? Will “liberalism” alone create a space for whites in the new South Africa? Rosa Burger, the daughter of the title, seems to find her only real fulfillment outside of South Africa and outside of politics. The story that unfolds on her return to South Africa, however, shows that an embrace of the political is necessary, even if the end result is tragic.

Gordimer has been quoted by critic Stephen Clingman, in The Novels of Nadine Gordimer (1986), as saying, "If you want to read the facts of the retreat from Moscow in 1812, you may read a history book; if you want to know what war is like and how people of a certain time and background dealt with it as their personal situation, you must read War and Peace." In this and other statements, Gordimer has insisted that the novelist's job is to convey human truth as regards historical events. As Clingman explains, she makes a case for the value of literature in a world of facts and incidents: "This . . . is the primary material that a novel offers: not so much an historical world, but a certain consciousness of that world." Gordimer's novels attempt to present complete worlds in which characters are faced with conflicts of class, race, and gender, all of which exist within the dynamics of personal relationships. In other words, she presents the consciousness of a culture by dealing with both the larger political and "smaller" interpersonal relationships that make up her characters' lives. She has, throughout her career, incorporated the historical reality of the South African situation into her work. She has also written many essays that examine the relationship between writers and their worlds, such as those collected in The Essential Gesture: Writing, Politics, and Places (1988). Her essays examine many of the ideological implications of what it means to be a writer living in a politically charged environment.

Her first published novel, The Lying Days (1953), focuses on the small Jewish world of the Aaron family and its relationship to the various Afrikaners around it. The young woman at the center of the tale, Helen Shaw, views the different cultures (Afrikaner, or Dutch settler, Jewish, and others) with which she interacts as exotic and distinct. The story of this early work also deals with those Jews who sold goods to the black mineworkers in the area outside of Johannesburg.

Her next novel, A World of Strangers (1958), was more pointedly political. It deals with the developing anti-apartheid forces of the African National Congress (ANC) in their resistance to the apartheid policies of the increasingly severe Nationalist government. Johannesburg in the mid-1950s was a hotbed of political activity, and writers, such as Lewis NKOSI and others, were agitating in magazines, such as Drum, about active resistance to apartheid. Gordimer's novel details the connection between writing and political engagement, and this early work's insistence on that connection—between the personal and the political—is at the heart of most of her work.

But Gordimer's works are not only political treatises. Her writing is lyrical, and she uses detail to great effect. For example, in A Sport of Nature (1987), which tells the story of a white woman who becomes completely immersed in black revolutionary politics, she describes a woman walking through an embassy: "through ceremonial purplish corridors she walked, past buried bars outlined like burning eyelids with neon, reception rooms named for African political heroes holding a silent assembly of stacked gilt chairs. . . ." The images this description evoke are of a "silent," or ineffective, government built on the foundations of "gilt," or pomp.

Her ability to combine rich description, sharply observed dialogue, knowledge of human nature, and political situations has made Gordimer one of the most respected novelists in the English-speaking world. In her own country, she has been consistently controversial in her ongoing literary analysis of the failure of the politics of liberalism, as South Africa has attempted to deal with its multiracial reality. Her international reputation has led to many awards, including Britain's prestigious Booker Prize (for her novel The Conservationist) in 1974, and the Nobel Prize in 1991.

Other Works by Nadine Gordimer

July's People. New York: Viking, 1981.

Jump and Other Stories. New York: Penguin USA, 1992.

Living in Hope and History: Notes from Our Century.
New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2000.

My Son's Story. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1990.

The Pick Up. New York: Penguin, 2002.

Writing and Being. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Works about Nadine Gordimer

Clingman, Stephen. The Novels of Nadine Gordimer: History from the Inside. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1992 (1986).

Cooke, John. The Novels of Nadine Gordimer: Private Lives/Public Landscapes. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1985.

Kamanga, Brighton J. Uledi. Nadine Gordimer's Fiction and the Irony of Apartheid. Lawrenceville, N.J.: Africa World Press, 2002.

Newman, Judie, ed. Nadine Gordimer's Berger's Daughter: A Casebook (Casebooks in Criticism). New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Smith, Rowland, ed. Critical Essays on Nadine Gordimer. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1990.

Gorenko, Anna Andreyevna

See AKHMATOVA, ANNA.

Gorky, Maxim (Aleksei Maksimovich Peshkov) (1868–1936) novelist, playwright, short-story writer

Maxim Gorky was born in Nizhnii Novgorod, Russia, to an extremely poor family. His father, a boatyard carpenter, died of cholera when Gorky was only three years old. Gorky's mother died of tuberculosis in 1879. At eight, Gorky began a series of menial jobs in terrible conditions, working as an icon painter, a baker, a watchman, a clerk, and a cabin boy on a Volga steamer—where luckily a kind cook taught him to read. Reading soon took up all his spare time. The pseudonym Gorky (Russian for “bitter”), with which he signed his first published short story, “Makar Chudra,” in 1892, seems to reflect the pain of his childhood.

The death of his grandmother had a devastating effect on Gorky, and at 21, he attempted suicide. When he recovered from the gunshot wound, he took up wandering, in a period of two years walking all the way to the southern Caucasus and back again to his native city, associating with tramps, prostitutes, and thieves, who became the subjects of his fiction.

At 24, Gorky settled into a job as a reporter for a provincial newspaper and began to publish his stories, which became extremely popular. He was arrested a number of times in this period for his involvement in radical politics. His politics surface in his work as SOCIALIST REALISM.

Gorky admired and was influenced by Leo TOLSTOY and Anton CHEKHOV, although whereas Tolstoy and Chekhov focused their works on the upper and middle classes, Gorky concentrated almost exclusively on depicting the social injustices faced by the millions of Russia's workers and peasants. Chekhov also admired Gorky and introduced him to colleagues at the Moscow Art Theater, who persuaded Gorky to write a play for them. Two plays, The Smug Citizen and The Lower Depths, were produced by the Moscow Art Theater in 1902. Both were very successful with the public, and both brought Gorky negative attention from the czarist authorities. An outcry against inhumanity, The Lower Depths is based on outcasts Gorky had met on his travels.

In 1905, Gorky was imprisoned for his involvement in the events of Bloody Sunday (a peaceful demonstration of workers asking the czar for democratic reforms, which ended with dozens dead from gunfire from government troops). He wrote one of his most famous plays, Children of the Sun—a satirical look at the ineffective middle classes—while imprisoned. After his release, Gorky traveled to the United States and tried to raise support for the Marxist cause. He lived in exile in Italy until 1913, when he was granted an amnesty by the government. While in Italy, Gorky was visited by Lenin and other radical revolutionaries.

Gorky's My Childhood (1913–14) is considered one of the best autobiographical works of Russian literature. In it, Gorky juxtaposes his grandfather's brutality against his grandmother's tender love, skillfully creating individual portraits and demonstrating his great descriptive power. My Childhood was followed by two other autobiographical volumes, In the World (1915–16) and My Universities (1923).

After the Russian Revolution, Gorky often found himself at odds with the hard-line Bolsheviks. Gorky maintained an oscillating position on the Bolshevik policy: He was a spokesman for the Soviet view of art and literature and also worked to preserve Russia's cultural heritage. In 1922, he went back to Italy to live for several years but returned to Russia in 1928 in response to the appeals of his public. There is a question as to whether his death eight years later was from the tuberculosis that had plagued him since his youth or whether Stalin may have been behind it. His funeral in Red Square was a state event.

Gorky achieved tremendous respect and recognition during his lifetime. He not only described social injustice but also acted against it. He did not simply contribute to socialist realism but also left a literary legacy to support it.

Other Works by Maxim Gorky

The Lower Depths and Other Plays. Translated by Alexander Bakshy. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1973.

Untimely Thoughts: Essays on Revolution, Culture and the Bolsheviks, 1917–1918. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.

Yarmolinsky, Avram, and Baroness Moura Budberg, eds. The Collected Short Stories of Maxim Gorky. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel Press, 1988.

Works about Maxim Gorky

Levin, Dan. Stormy Petrel: The Life and Work of Maxim Gorky. New York: Schocken Books, 1986.

Yedlin, Tova. Maxim Gorky: A Political Biography. New York: Praeger, 1999.

Graham, Peter

See ABRAHAMS, PETER HENRY.

Grass, Günter (1927–) novelist, poet, playwright

Günter Grass was born in Danzig, Germany (now Gdansk, Poland). His father, a descendent of German Protestants, owned a grocery store, and his mother was of Slavic origin. Grass entered Conradinum High School in 1937 but was never able to finish his education because of the outbreak of World War II. When the Nazis came to power, Grass joined the Hitler Youth Movement. At 16, he was drafted into the German army as a tank gunner. After being wounded, he was interned by the U.S. forces stationed in Bavaria. The reeducation program provided by the U.S. Army had a profound influence on Grass: He was taken on a tour of a Nazi concentration camp at Dachau, near Munich, where he witnessed the horrors of the Holocaust that had been inflicted by the Nazi regime. This experience would be reflected later in Grass's fiction.

After his release, Grass worked as a stonemason, a farmworker, and a potash miner. In 1948, he enrolled in the Düsseldorf Academy of the Arts to study sculpture. He worked as a sculptor for several years, but his interests shifted, and he began to write poetry. In 1955, he officially entered the literary world by winning the third prize in poetry competition sponsored by a German radio station. The prize included the right to attend the meetings of GRUPPE 47, Germany's most important literary circle at the time. Grass then lived in Spain and Paris, where he developed a friendship with Paul CELAN. He published a volume of poems in 1956, followed by several plays and another book of verse, and he had an exhibition of his art works. His work was well known to a small group of connoisseurs.

With Die Blechtrommel (The Tin Drum, 1959), the first book of what has come to be known as the Danzig trilogy, Grass was suddenly famous. The novel instantly made Grass into one of the most prominent figures of the German and international literary scenes. The second book of the trilogy, Katz und Maus (Cat and Mouse), appeared in 1961, and the third, Hundejahre (Dog Years), in 1963. All the novels in the trilogy achieved critical and popular success. Between 1960 and 1965, Grass received the prestigious Berlin Critics' Prize and the Georg Büchner Prize and was elected into the German Academy of the Arts. In the 10 years following its publication, The Tin Drum was translated into more than 15 languages. The book caused offense, too: It was publicly burned in Düsseldorf by an organization of religious youth. Grass faced more than 40 civil lawsuits—all eventually unsuccessful—against the Danzig trilogy. The charges ranged from blasphemy to obscenity. The books, however, remained major best-sellers in Germany and around the world.

In the mid-1960s, Grass spent less time writing as he used his acclaim and recognition to campaign for the Social Democratic Party of Germany. The party supported moderate reform, normalization of relations with East Germany, and easing of tensions with the Communist states. Ortlich Betaubt (Local Anesthetic) was published in 1969, but Grass did not produce another major novel until 1977, when Das Butt (The Flounder) appeared. It aroused more excitement than any of Grass's works since The Tin Drum. Grass's international fame was increased by the appearance of Volker Schlöndorff's film of The Tin Drum, which won the Academy Award for Best Foreign Picture in 1979, but, like the novel, it offended some people: The film was banned in Oklahoma, in a decision that was subsequently overturned by a higher court.

Die Rättin (The Rat, 1986) is perhaps even more ambitious than The Flounder, but Grass continues to be politically involved. In the late 1980s, he was among the few Germans in the political sphere to oppose the reunification of East and West Germany, claiming irreconcilable political, social, and economic differences. Grass also loudly campaigned against the neo-Nazi groups in Germany and actively supported the defense of Salman RUSHDIE when Rushdie's book The Satanic Verses made him the subject of a death threat.

Critical Analysis

The Tin Drum presents an irreverent and colorful account of 20th-century German history through the eyes of a mental patient, Oskar Matzerath. A midget, Oskar refuses to grow as a protest against the cruelties of German people, and he communicates with other characters through his drum.

Cat and Mouse, a much shorter work, relates the story of Joachim Mahlke through the voice of Pilenz, a 32-year-old social worker. The story takes place between 1939 and 1944 and essentially recounts the relationship between the life of a self-conscious teenager (the mouse of the title is Mahlke's enormous Adam's apple) and the fearful historical events unfolding around him. Guilt, with its attendant psychological implications, is the predominant theme running throughout the novel.

Dog Years, a novel with similar thematic concerns, examines the crimes of the Nazis and their acceptance by the German society after the World War II. The story is presented in terms of an ambiguous friendship between Amsel, a son of prosperous Jewish merchant who becomes a Protestant to escape persecution, and Walter Matern, the son of a Catholic miller. In the trilogy, Grass forced his readers to confront the truth about the Nazi past. By using blasphemous Christian imagery, grotesque sexuality, and ribald scatological humor, he made it impossible to subsume the unspeakable in a featureless tragic view.

Die Plebejer Proben den Aufstand (The Plebeians Rehearse the Uprising, 1966) is Grass's fifth play. It is set in Berlin in 1953 in Bertolt BRECHT's theater. Brecht is directing a rehearsal of his adaptation of Shakespeare's Coriolanus; outside, workers are protesting unfair government labor practices. When the workers appeal to Brecht to help their cause, he lets them down by failing to respond: He chooses to perfect the artistic representation of revolution rather than involve himself in real life. The play is both an homage to and a critique of the artist Grass acknowledges as his master.

The Flounder is written on an epic scale, encompassing 4,000 years of European history, with an elaborate narrative technique that has room for poems, recipes, historical documents, autobiographical accounts of Grass's political campaigns and a version of the GRIMM brothers' "Tale of the Fisherman and His Wife."

The Rat is another massive work, this time looking toward the future, examining what hope there is for a world threatened by nuclear disaster and ecological devastation. There are two narrators: a rat who has already witnessed and survived, with her family, the nuclear winter that has obliterated humanity; and a human “I” who still hopes, against the evidence, that people can escape the final catastrophe. The characters, of whom there are many, include some familiar to Grass’s readers, among them Oskar Matzerath, 30 years older, and the talking flounder of The Flounder.

Günter Grass has received innumerable awards for his contribution to world literature from governments and organizations in Germany, the United States, the United Kingdom, Italy, France, and Russia, including the Nobel Prize in literature in 1999. He is recognized today as perhaps the most important German writer of the second half of the 20th century. His works have been translated into more than 20 languages and still enjoy international status as best-sellers. Grass continues his productive career as a writer and a public figure. As the American novelist John Irving said in a 1982 review of Headbirths, or the Germans Are Dying Out, “You can’t be called well-read today if you haven’t read him. Günter Grass is simply the most original and versatile writer alive.”

Other Works by Günter Grass

The Call of the Toad. Translated by Ralph Manheim. New York: Harvest Books, 1993.

The Flounder. Translated by Ralph Manheim. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1989.

Four Plays. Translated by Ralph Manheim and A. Leslie Wilson. New York: Harvest Books, 1968.

My Century. Translated by Michael Henry Heim. New York: Harvest Books, 2000.

Novemberland: Selected Poems 1956–1993. Translated by Michael Hamburger. New York: Harvest Books, 1996.

On Writing and Politics 1967–1983. Translated by Ralph Manheim. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1985.

Too Far Afield. Translated by Krishna Winston. New York: Harcourt Brace, 2000.

Works about Günter Grass

Irving, John. “Günter Grass: King of the Toy Merchants.” In Patrick O’Neill, ed., Critical Essays on Günter Grass. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987.

O’Neill, Patrick. Günter Grass Revisited. Boston: Twayne, 1999.

Preece, Julian. The Life and Work of Günter Grass: Literature, History, Politics. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 2001.

Grimm, Jacob (1785–1863) and Wilhelm (1786–1859) collectors of folklore and writers of folktales

Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm were born in Hanau, Germany, to Philipp Wilhelm Grimm, an administrative court official and lawyer, and Dorothea Grimm. After the untimely death of their father in 1796, the Grimm brothers lived with their aunt in Kassel, their mother’s hometown, and entered secondary school. Jacob and Wilhelm shared many interests, including reading and listening to German folktales. They entered the University of Marburg within a year of each other to study law. There, the Grimm brothers became interested in folklore, linguistics, and the history of medieval Germany.

Influenced by the sweeping force of German ROMANTICISM, the Grimm brothers began to compile a collection of folktales, many of which existed only as oral accounts passed from generation to generation. They listened carefully to the stories and transcribed them in their journals. They sometimes altered the plots and changed the language of the tales, transforming them into cautionary tales for a new bourgeois readership. In 1812, the Grimm brothers published their first collection of stories, known simply as Children’s and Household Tales. This collection of 86 stories and went virtually unnoticed by the critics. The second volume, published in 1814, added 70 stories to the original 86 and was far more successful. This two-volume work went through several editions during the Grimms’ lifetime. The final version of the work contained more than 200 stories and became one of the best-known works in German and world literature. Unfortunately, writing did not provide a steady income for the brothers, so both worked as librarians in Kassel until 1830.

Today, the brothers Grimm are primarily remembered for their versions of classic fairy tales, such as “Cinderella,” the story of a downtrodden young girl who marries a prince; “The Frog Prince,” the story of a girl whose kiss turns a frog into a prince; “Snow White,” the tale of a girl who eats a poisoned apple and is saved by a prince; and “Rapunzel,” the tale of a girl who is rescued from a tower by a prince. Their tales not only capture the innocent magic of folklore, but they also reflect the realistic political and social concerns of German society in the period in which the brothers were writing. In fact, their tales were actually intended for adults. The brothers were in favor of a unified, democratically ruled Germany and were on the side of the emerging middle class against oppressive princes who ruled a loosely knit confederation of states. By capturing the folklore of the German people, the brothers hoped to create a sense of a common past and pride in a German heritage. As they began to realize that many of their readers were children, they changed some of the stories to emphasize many of the domestic values of the emerging middle class; for example, the Grimms changed the original version of “Rapunzel” to eliminate any suggestion of premarital sex.

In 1819, the Grimm brothers were awarded honorary doctorates from the University of Marburg for their influential work in German folklore. In 1830, they resigned from the library and accepted positions as professors at the University of Göttingen. They lost their positions in 1841, however, when they joined a protest against King Ernst August II, who had revoked the constitution and dissolved parliament on his ascension to the throne of Hannover. Fortunately, their scholarly reputations were such that they immediately received offers from other universities in Germany. The two brothers finally settled at the University of Berlin, where they worked as professors and librarians.

The works of Wilhelm and Jacob Grimm are still widely read today by children and adults alike.

Their contribution to German literature as writers and scholars is simply immeasurable; not only did they collect folklore that might otherwise have been lost, but they also made lasting contributions to studies of the German language and linguistics in general. Even more impressive, however, is the successful collaborative effort that existed for three decades. Their tales are known all over the world and have been translated into more than 20 languages. The Grimm brothers influenced entire generations of writers as well as modern poetry in Germany, England, France, and Russia.

Another Work by Wilhelm and Jacob Grimm

The Complete Fairy Tales of the Brothers Grimm.
Translated by Jack Zipes. New York: Bantam, 1992.

Works about Wilhelm and Jacob Grimm

Hettinga, Donald. The Brothers Grimm: Two Lives, One Legacy. London: Clarion Books, 2001.
Zipes, Jack. The Brothers Grimm: From Enchanted Forests to the Modern World. New York: Routledge, 1988.

Grünbein, Durs (1962–) poet, essayist

Durs Grünbein was born in Dresden and lived in East Germany prior to reunification. In the 1990s, he became a professional poet and traveled throughout the world. He also worked as an essayist and translator. Grünbein is considered one of the most innovative and intellectual of contemporary German poets. The collection of poems Schädelbasislektion: Gedichte (Basal Skull Lesson: Poems, 1991) is one of his best-known works. He has received many literary awards, including the Marburger Literature Prize (1992) and the prestigious Georg Büchner prize (1995). Grünbein’s verse reveals an influence from the German poets Gottfried BERN and Gerhard FALKNER.

Science is the prevailing theme in Grünbein’s poems and essays. His specific topics include human biology, laboratories, formaldehyde, X-rays, and radioactive decay. Many of his poems portray the exposure of human organs through sonar imaging or autopsies. Although Grünbein views modern science as the dominant power of the present era, he presents it as a threat that diminishes the worth of human beings and reveals the meaninglessness of life. German literary scholar Ruth J. Owen observed that Grünbein portrays the poet as a scientist and successfully challenges “the assumption that science could be an area of human knowledge cordoned off from the poem.”

Another Work by Durs Grünbein

Falten und Fallen: Gedichte. Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp Verlag, 1994.

A Work about Durs Grünbein

Winkler, Ron. Dichtung Zwischen Grossstadt und Grosshirm: Annäherungen an das lyrische werk Durs Grünbeins. Hamburg: Kovac, 2000.

Grünzweig, Dorothea (1952–) poet

Dorothea Grünzweig was born in Stuttgart, Germany. She attended colleges in Tübingen, Germany, and Bangor, Wales, where she majored in German studies and English studies. After a research stay at Oxford, she was a lecturer for the University of Dundee in Scotland. Grünzweig later taught at a German boarding school and a German school in Helsinki, Finland. She also wrote reviews and translated Finnish and English literature.

Grünzweig’s first collection of poetry, Mittsommerschnitt (Midsummer Cut, 1997), won the poetry prize of the Neidersachsen/Wolfenbüttel foundation. The next year she contributed poems to Das verlorene Alphabet (The Lost Alphabet, 1998) anthology. In 2000, Grünzweig gained international exposure after her poems appeared in the English language journals The Massachusetts Review and Arc. Her other honors include Finland’s P.E.N. Club prize (1999) and the Heinrich Heine stipend (2000).

Grünzweig, who divides her time between Germany and Helsinki, frequently writes poems that have a geographical frame of reference. Inspired by her own experience, she often covers the concepts of original homeland and adopted country. The poems “Spell,” “Beginning,” and “Insel Seili” (“The Island of Seili”) address her other recurring themes of language and speechlessness, and the freezing cold. Her poetry is syntactically complex but creates clear pictures to help illuminate the meaning of her words.

Another Work by Dorothea Grünzweig

Vom Eisgebreit: Gedichte. Göttingen: Wallstein, 2000.

Gruppe 47 (Group 47) (1947–1967)

Following World War II the German writers Hans Werner Richter (1908–93) and Alfred Andersch (1914–80) edited a left-wing journal Der Ruf (The Call). In 1947, the American military government banned the magazine and upset many German literati. In September, these writers joined Richter and Anderson at Bannwaldsee, Bavaria, to discuss plans for another journal. This became the first meeting of Gruppe 47, a loose association of authors whose regular attendees came to include Wolfgang Weyrauch (1904–80), Ilse AICHINGER, Heinrich BÖLL, Günter EICH, and Günter GRASS. Gruppe 47 met in the autumn of each year through 1967 to discuss and read new literary works. Its only official function was to award the Gruppe 47 Prize, one of Germany’s most coveted literary awards at the time.

The German literary scholar Siegfried Mandel described Gruppe 47 as a paradox: “It is one man, Hans Werner Richter, and at the same time an expanding and contracting constellation identifiable by several constant stars.” The group avoided an inflexible ideology. Although right-wing writers did not join the group, it had no official social or political program and usually did not initiate new trends. Gruppe 47 was instead more like a barometer of changing literary tastes and social conditions. In general, its members were critical of the values of the West German “economic miracle” and of East German socialism. The 1968 meeting scheduled for Prague was cancelled after Soviet troops invaded Czechoslovakia. Although Richter hosted an informal meeting in 1972, Gruppe 47 never again held a full conference after 1967.

A Work about Gruppe 47

Mandel, Siegfried. Group 47: The Reflected Intellect. Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1973.

Guan Moye

See MO YAN.

Guillén, Jorge (1893–1984) poet

Jorge Guillén was born in Valladolid in the Spanish province of Castile. His poetry reflects the austerity of the region, known for its harsh winters and gray landscape. He was a teacher of Spanish his entire life, on the faculty of such institutions as the Sorbonne, Oxford University, Wellesley College, and Harvard University.

Guillén is generally considered the most intellectual and classic of modern Spanish poets. His poems are terse and lyrical; his work is sober, and he employs more nouns than adjectives. He has been compared to the French poet Paul VALÉRY, whose works he translated. Guillén tries to describe objects through their “poetic presence” rather than through metaphor, making his work difficult for many to comprehend.

In 1976, the Spanish government honored Guillén with the Cervantes Prize, the highest literary honor of the Spanish-speaking world.

Other Works by Jorge Guillén

Affirmation: A Bilingual Anthology 1919–1966. Translated by Julian Palley. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1971.

Guillén on Guillén: The Poetry and the Poet. Translated by Reginald Gibbons. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1979.

Horses in the Air and Other Poems. Translated by Cola Franzen. San Francisco, Calif.: City Lights Books, 1999.

Our Air/Nuestro Aire: Canticle/Cántico. Translated by Carl W. Cobb. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1997.

Guillén, Nicolás (1902–1989) poet, novelist, editor

Nicolás Guillén was born and educated in Camagüey, Cuba, and later studied law at the University of Havana. In 1919, the magazine Camagüey Gráfico published Guillén’s first poems. After meeting the American writer Langston Hughes (1902–67) in January 1930, Guillén published “en negro de verdad” (in an authentic African voice) for the first time when his eight Motivos de son (Sound motifs) poems appeared in the Diario de la Marina newspaper in April. Later, Guillén dedicated his powerful poem “Sabás” to Hughes.

The publication of Sóngoro cosongo (1931) marks what Amílcar Cabral calls the Revitalization Phase. In the prologue, Guillén names his “born again” poetry “versos mulatos,” filled with “color cubano.” West Indies, Ltd. (1934) marks Guillén’s shift into the “Radicalization Phase,” or fighting phase, during which he wrote Cantos para soldados y sones para turistas (Songs for soldiers and sounds for tourists, 1937). In 1938, Guillén joined the National Committee of the Cuban Communist Party and worked on its journal, Hoy, until authorities closed it in 1950. He received the International Lenin Peace Prize in 1954 and the Cuban National Prize for Literature in 1983.

Although Guillén used literature for political ends, he argued that writers should also make “art” when striving to express revolutionary ideas. In Un poeta en la historia (n.d.), Alfred Melon, a Universidad de Sorbonne–Nouvelle literature professor, describes Guillén as “one of the major contemporary poets of the world.” His work has been translated into more than 30 languages, and it couples experimental aesthetics, such as a conversational tone and free verse, with distinctively Afro-Caribbean experiences.

Other Works by Nicolás Guillén

The Great Zoo and Other Poems. Translated by Robert Marquez. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1981.

New Love Poetry: In Some Springtime Place: Elegy. Edited and translated by Keith Ellis. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1994.

The Daily Daily. Translated by Vera M. Kutzinski. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.

Works about Nicolás Guillén

Smart, Ian Isadore. Nicolás Guillén, Popular Poet of the Caribbean. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1990.

White, Clement A. Decoding the Word: Nicolás Guillén as Maker and Debunker of Myth. Miami, Fla.: Ediciones Universal, 1993.

Gumilev, Nikolay (1886–1921) poet

Nikolay Stepanovich Gumilev was born in Ekaterinburg, Russia, to Stephan Gumilev, a navy doctor, and Anna Lvova, a sister of a navy admiral. The family soon moved to Tsarskoe Selo, where Gumilev would later meet his future wife, Anna AKHMATOVA. Gumilev grew up playing with his brothers in the countryside. He was sent away to a boarding school in 1900: Academically, he performed very poorly—instead of studying, Gumilev avidly read adventure stories and books about travels to exotic lands. In 1902, Gumilev published his first poem in a small provincial newspaper. He felt triumphant, despite the fact that the publication misspelled his name. After Gumilev graduated, he traveled to Paris where he met several Symbolist poets, and where he also published Romantic Poems, his first collection of lyric poetry.

In 1909, Gumilev founded a literary journal, Apollon, which eventually published some of the best poetry of the period and was the main organ of the ACMEIST movement. In 1910, he and Anna Akhmatova were married. The marriage was stormy from the start; soon afterward, Gumilev left for an extended journey to Africa. By the time he returned, Akhmatova had published many of the poems that went into her first collection, and her fame had begun to exceed her husband's.

Gumilev resumed his position as one of the leaders of the acmeists. Gumilev supported and wrote lyrical poetry that relied on concrete images and opposed the mysticism of SYMBOLISM. In many ways, acmeist poetry, including Gumilev's, was conservative because it relied on rhyme, meter, and traditional poetic devices. Gumilev strove to uphold and advance the literary tradition of Russia, rather than replace it.

In 1913, Gumilev returned to Africa. He explored exotic places, visited local mystics and healers, and was even attacked by a crocodile. The trip to Africa provided Gumilev with vivid images and exotic metaphors that appear throughout his poetry. At the outbreak of World War I, Gumilev returned to Russia and joined the army; he was decorated twice for bravery in combat. After the war, Gumilev returned to St. Petersburg and divorced Akhmatova in 1918. The association of the acmeists was dissolved. Akhmatova's and Gumilev's son, Lev Gumilev, was raised mainly by Gumilev's mother.

Gumilev was recruited by Maxim GORKY to help with a project in world literature, working with an editor to select important works from other literatures, to write introductory essays for them, and to translate them for publication in Russian. But he was in trouble politically: After the Russian Revolution of 1917, Gumilev had supported the provisional government against the Bolsheviks. When in 1921 the sailors at the Kronstadt naval base, who had helped sweep the Bolsheviks to power, protested against the loss of political freedoms under the Bolshevik government, Gumilev supported their uprising, which was brutally put down. A short time afterward, he was arrested and executed, despite Lenin's intervention. His grave was never found.

Although Gumilev produced a number of notable collections throughout his career, his last work, The Pillar of Fire (1921), is considered by most to be his best. The Pillar of Fire is marked by exotic and foreign elements. The poems in the collection are explorations of personal experiences of the poet during his travels, as well as the emotional dramas of his personal life. “The Streetcar Gone Astray” imagines a derailed streetcar careering past the landmarks of Russian history and Gumilev’s life. This is an example of its imagery (in Carl Proffer’s translation):

*A sign . . . letters poured from blood Announce—“Vegetables.” I know this is where,
Instead of cabbages, instead of rutabagas,
Corpses’ heads are being sold.*

Gumilev left a profound and long-lasting influence on Russian poetry. His images were as unique as they were strange and refreshing. Gumilev’s personal life, filled with tragedy, despair, and, at the same time, love and adventure, in many ways reflected the passion of his verse.

Other Works by Nikolay Gumilev

Lapeza, David, ed. Nikolai Gumilev on Russian Poetry. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1977.

Selections in Proffer, Carl R., and Elledea Proffer, eds. The Silver Age of Russian Culture (anthology). Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1975.

Selected Works of Nikolai Gumilev. Translated by Burton Raffel and Alla Burago. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1972.

The Pillar of Fire: And Selected Poems. Translated by Richard McKane. Chester, Pa.: Dufour Editions, 1999.

Works about Nikolay Gumilev

Eshelman, Ralph. Nikolaj Gumilev and Neoclassical Modernism: The Metaphysics of Style. New York: Peter Lang, 1993.

Sampson, Earl. Nikolai Gumilev. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

Gunesekera, Romesh (1954–) poet, novelist, short-story writer

Romesh Gunesekera was born in Sri Lanka and moved to the Philippines with his family in the 1960s. When he was 17, he went to England, which became his adopted home, but the spirit of travel has not left him, and he continues to visit both Asia and Europe as a writer-in-residence. Gunesekera’s poetry is especially popular in Europe, where it has been translated into almost every major European language. His poems are widely anthologized and are a recurring favorite on BBC radio.

Constantly traveling from a young age, Gunesekera’s fiction privileges the role of exile. During his years in the Philippines, for example, he was exposed to writers of the 1960s U.S. Beat Generation, such as Jack Kerouac and Allen Ginsberg, whom he would not have met otherwise.

Gunesekera started writing when he was 14, beginning with short stories and poetry. Poetry, in fact, is a medium he continues to write in and explore, even when he is working on a novel. His first novel Reef (1994), set in the Sri Lanka of the 1950s and 1960s, is an exploration into the memories of the protagonist who leaves Sri Lanka for England to stay with his master, a marine biologist. Their story of relationships, cooking, and domesticity is set against the rise of rebel terrorism between the Sinhalese and the Tamils in Sri Lanka during this time. The other essential character is the reef itself: Its precarious existence serves as a metaphor for the fragile political condition of the nation.

In addition to his novels, a collection of short fiction, and poetry, Gunesekera also writes children’s poems. His novel Sandglass (1998) won the BBC Asia Award for Achievement in Writing and Literature, and in 1997 he won the Premio Mondello Five Continents Award, Italy’s highest literary prize.

Another Work by Romesh Gunesekera

Monkfish Moon. New York: New Press, 1992.

Gunnarsson, Gunnar (1889–1975) novelist, dramatist, poet, playwright

A son of a farmer, Gunnar Gunnarsson was born in Fljotsdalur, Iceland. The death of his mother when he was nine years old was a deeply traumatic experience that he remembered for the rest of his life. Gunnarsson grew up in Vopnafjörður, where his family moved while he was still a boy. Until the age of 18, he was educated at various country schools. In 1907, he moved to Denmark, where he studied at Askov Folk High School for two years.

Gunnarsson started his career as a writer at the age of 17, and by 1910 he was devoting all his time to writing. Many of Gunnarsson's early works were written in Danish because Denmark provided a wider audience for his poetry and fiction; however, his works were always set in his native Iceland. During his career as a writer, Gunnarsson published more than 40 novels, as well as short stories, articles, and translations. Although he is very well known in the Scandinavian countries, only a small margin of his works were ever translated into English. Unfortunately, currently no work of Gunnar Gunnarsson is in print in the United States.

Gunnar Gunnarsson's works depict the courage of the common people of Iceland. His first important work, Guest the One-Eyed, a four-volume family saga about three generations of an Icelandic family, was published in 1912 and instantly became a best-seller throughout Scandinavia. Recalling the biblical Cain and Abel story, the work describes the parallel lives of a virtuous son, torn between his art and familial obligations to the farm, and an evil son. The work received critical praise in virtually every publication that reviewed it.

World War I deeply affected Gunnarsson's sensibility, and for many years after the war, his fiction reflected a deep, oppositional tension. Seven Days Darkness (1920), for example, is about war and the conflicts that it creates within a person, particularly the conflict between national identity and the self.

Between 1920 and 1940, Gunnarsson dedicated his writing to history and culture of the Nordic countries. He gave lectures throughout Scandinavia and Germany and wrote numerous articles on social and cultural problems of unification of the Nordic countries. In many respects, Gunnarsson recognized certain common cultural attributes throughout Scandinavia, but he also insisted on the singularity of particular regions. In 1939, he returned to Iceland, and from then on he only wrote in Icelandic.

Many critics consider Church on the Mountain (1923–1928), a five-volume semiautobiographical novel, to be Gunnarsson's masterpiece. The work describes the various twists in the life of an Icelandic farming family. It truly demonstrates Gunnarsson's skill as a storyteller, as well as his rich use of poetic language to portray everyday life. The work has only been partially translated into English, appearing in 1938 as two volumes, Ships in the Sky and The Night and the Dream.

Gunnar Gunnarsson remains one of the most popular and respected writers not only in Iceland but throughout Europe. He was given honorary degrees by the University of Iceland and the University of Heidelberg. Gunnarsson was instrumental in the formation of Icelandic national identity and was a giant cultural figure in his beloved country.

Other Works by Gunnar Gunnarsson

"A Legend." In Sven Hakon Rossel et al., eds., Christmas in Scandinavia. Translated by David W. Colbert. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996.

The Black Cliffs. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1967.

The Good Shepherd. New York: The Bobbs-Merrill Company, 1940.

Günter, Erich

See EICH, GÜNTER.

H

Habibi, Emile (Imil Habibi) (1921–1996)

novelist, short-story writer, political essayist

Acclaimed experimental novelist Habibi writes about Palestinians who, like him, live within Israel after its 1948 statehood and are marginalized and displaced in the land of their birth. The Secret Life of Sa'eed, the Ill-Fated Pessoptimist (1974; translated by Salma K. Jayyusi and Trevor LeGassick, 1982), about a Palestinian who becomes an overzealous informant for the Israeli government, is considered his greatest novel, engaging Habibi's typical black humor and cynical wit. The novel's hapless antihero, Sa'eed, faces bewildering choices between Zionist exploitation and Arab stupidities in an Arabic text studded with puns and witty wordplay. The protagonist's name means "happy;" of course, he is profoundly not happy. Among Habibi's novels are Sudasiyat al-ayyam al-sitta (Sextet on the Six Days, 1968), about the 1967 Six Day War; Luka' ibn Luka' (1980; the title is a nonsensical name combined with its patronymic, which is difficult to translate); and Ikhtayyi (Such a Pity, 1986), which remembers Palestinian community life before it came into conflict with Israel in 1948.

Habibi helped found the Israeli Communist Party and was elected to three Knesset terms on its platform. His decision to accept the 1992 Israeli Prize for Literature from the Israeli prime minister surprised some among both Arabs and Israeli Jews because his principled opposition to Israel's policies seemed to preclude his acceptance of such an award. A humanist with a broad vision that transcended the sad specifics of his condition as a Palestinian living in Israel, Habibi donated the award money to a Palestinian clinic.

Another Work by Emile Habibi

The Secret Life of Sa'eed, the Ill-Fated Pessoptimist, a Palestinian Who Became a Citizen of Israel. Translated by Salma K. Jayyusi and Trevor LeGassick. Brooklyn N.Y.: Interlink Publishing Group, 1982.

A Work about Emile Habibi

Boullata, Issa J., and Roger Allen. The Arabic Novel Since 1950: Critical Essays, Interviews, and Bibliography. Cambridge, Mass.: Dar Mahjar Publications, 1992.

Hagiwara Sakutarō (1886–1942) poet

Hagiwara Sakutarō was born in Maebashi, Gumma Prefecture, in Japan. While a student at Maebashi Middle School, he began to show interest in poetry and in 1908 entered the German literature course at the Sixth High School; however, due to illness, he withdrew. In addition to academics, Hagiwara studied the mandolin and guitar, hoping at one time that he might become a professional musician.

Hagiwara's literary career did not take root until 1913, when he published tanka in the magazine Zamboa. He experimented with colloquial language, onomatopoeia, and free verse and, in 1917, published his first collection, Howling at the Moon, which is regarded as the model for modern lyric poetry. In 1922, he published The Blue Cat, a collection of poems that was more reflective and less imagistic than Howling. His last collection, The Iceland (1934), received mixed reviews. In writing the Iceland poems, Hagiwara abandoned the modern, colloquial style of his earlier collections and wrote in classical Japanese. After The Iceland, he retired from writing poetry, turning to poetic criticism and studies on Japanese culture.

Hagiwara is known as the father of modern Japanese poetry. He established a new style of poetry that incorporated free verse, colloquial language, and onomatopoeia. His poems are often dark, containing elements of morbid fantasy and FIN-DE-SIÈCLE decadence. He is often contrasted to poet TAKAMURA Kotarō.

Other Works by Hagiwara Sakutarō

Face at the Bottom of the World and Other Poems.

Translated by Graeme Wilson. Paintings by York Wilson. Rutland, Vt.: C. E. Tuttle Co., 1969.

Principles of Poetry. Translated by Chester C.I. Wang and Isamu P. Fukuchi. Ithaca, N.Y.: East Asia Program, Cornell University, 1998.

Rats' Nests: The Poetry of Hagiwara Sakutarō. Stanwood, Wash.: UNESCO Publishing, 1999.

Ten Japanese Poets. Translated by Hiroaki Sato. Hanover, N.H.: Granite Publications, 1973.

Works about Hagiwara Sakutarō

Gaffke, Carol. Poetry Criticism: Vol. 18. Detroit: Gale Research, 1997.

Keene, Donald. Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature of the Modern Era: Poetry, Drama, Criticism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.

Halter, Erika

See BURKART, ERIKA.

Hamsun, Knut (pseudonym of Knut Pederson) (1859–1952) novelist, poet, playwright

Knut Hamsun was born in Lom, Norway, to Peder Petersen, a tailor, and Tora Petersen. The family moved to Hamarøy, a small town 100 miles north of the Arctic Circle, where they took charge of the farm of Hans Olsen, Peder's brother-in-law, who was afflicted with a paralytic illness. Olsen accused the Petersens of owing him money, and as a child, Hamsun was forced to work for his uncle, keeping accounts in the post office, chopping wood, and running the small library in the village. Hamsun read the few books available at the library but had no formal schooling. His father taught him to read and write, and Hamsun occasionally attended a traveling school for a few weeks a year. Hamsun ran away to Lom in 1873 but returned the following year, working small jobs around the village. Hamsun's works reflect the bitterness and hardships of his childhood.

Somehow, Hamsun managed to produce his first novel and have it published in 1877 when he was 18. The same year, Hamsun was hired as a schoolteacher in the small town of Vesterålen. The following year, he published his second novel to no great acclaim. Driven by literary aspirations, he moved to Oslo, where he lived in poverty and worked as a highway construction worker. Destitution forced Hamsun to move to the United States, where he resided between 1882 and 1888, working as a farmhand in North Dakota and as a streetcar attendant in Chicago. These experiences greatly contributed to the formation of Hamsun's literary style.

Hamsun's experiences in the United States inspired him to compose a satirical piece, Fra det Moderne Amerikas Aandsliv (Cultural Life in Modern America, 1889), which described numerous religions and religious outlooks that Hamsun discovered during his stay. His first breakthrough work, however, appeared in 1890: Sult (Hunger), which depicts the life of a starving writer in Oslo, became a literary sensation. This sudden success resulted in Hamsun giving a series of lectures in which he criticized such literary figures as Henrik IBSEN and Leo TOLSTOY for their sentimentality. His next novel, Mysterier (Mysteries) followed in 1892. Pan (1894) was written in Paris, where Hamsun lived from 1893 to 1895.

In 1911, Hamsun relocated to a small farm in Norway. For much of the rest of his life, he divided his time between writing and farming and virtually isolated himself from the outside world. Markens Grøde (The Growth of the Soil, 1917) tells a story of Isak, a simple man who commits his life to the natural rhythms of rural life and combines the mythological and historical aspects of the Norwegian culture. The novel was well received, not only in Norway but also in Germany, where Hamsun's work developed a huge following. In 1920, Hamsun was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature.

During World War I, Hamsun, unlike most Norwegians, supported the German cause, and before and during World War II, he was a vocal supporter of the Nazi party. During the Nazi occupation of Norway, Hamsun wrote a series of pro-Nazi articles and met with Adolf Hitler and Joseph Goebbels, the Nazi propaganda minister, on whom Hamsun bestowed his Nobel Prize medal as a sign of admiration.

After World War II, Hamsun was arrested by the Norwegian government for his collaboration with the Nazi regime. After spending some time in a psychiatric hospital, he was placed on trial in 1947. He did not rescind his opinions and showed support for Hitler's military policies throughout the trial. Hamsun was heavily fined by the court and censured by the public; sales of his work fell after the trial. Yet, when Hamsun attempted to explain his political views in På Gjengrodde Stier (On Overgrown Paths, 1949), the work sold out in Norway almost instantly.

Critical Analysis

Despite the controversy about Knut Hamsun's political affiliations, his work has been rediscovered in recent years. Most critics concur that his best work was written before the turn of the century, though The Growth of the Soil has its advocates. Hunger retains its capacity to shock with its intense depiction of the psychological degeneration of the young writer, whose thoughts become more and more incomprehensible as time passes. This passage is an example of Hamsun's close focus:

If one only had something to eat, just a little, on such a clear day! The mood of the gay morning overwhelmed me, I became unusually serene, and started to hum for pure joy and for no particular reason. In front of a butcher's shop there was a woman with a basket on her arm, debating about some sausage for dinner; as I went past, she looked up at me. She had only a single tooth in the lower jaw. In the nervous and excitable state I was on, her face made an instant and revolting impression on me—the long yellow tooth looked like a finger sticking out of her jaw, and as she turned toward me, her eyes were full of sausage. I lost my appetite instantly, and felt nauseated.

Hamsun's narrative innovations in this novel, such as the way he shifts between first and third person, have been much imitated, and his anxious, alienated artist prefigures many 20th-century literary heroes.

By the time he wrote Pan (1894), Hamsun had become an admirer of Friedrich NIETZSCHE's work, especially Nietzsche's notions about the superman. Written in the form of a hunter's diary, it tells the story of Lieutenant Thomas Glahn's doomed obsession with a mysterious woman. Its stress on the need to escape from urban civilization into the wilderness of nature strongly demonstrates the influence of Nietzsche in its emphasis on the individual.

Undeniably, Hamsun served an important role in presenting the Norwegian culture and struggles to the world in his writings. The focus of Hamsun's work always rested on the relationship between individuals and their respective environments. In terms of style, Hamsun's work was simply exceptional and groundbreaking in its irreverence for the established epistemology of the novel, for the all too readily accepted conventions of fiction. Isaac Bashevis SINGER has observed that Hamsun "is the father of the modern school of literature in his every aspect—his subjectiveness, his fragmentariness, his use of flashbacks, his lyricism. The whole modern school of fiction in the twentieth century stems from Hamsun."

Other Works by Knut Hamsun

Dreamers. Translated by Tom Geddes. New York: New Directions, 1996.

Mysteries. Translated by Sverre Lyngstadt. New York: Penguin, 2001.

Victoria. Translated by Oliver Stallybrass. New York: Green Integer, 2001.

Works about Knut Hamsun

Ferguson, Robert. Enigma: The Life of Knut Hamsun. New York: Noonday Press, 1988.

Naess, Harold. Knut Hamsun. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Singer, Isaac Bashevis. Introduction to Knut Hamsun, Hunger. New York: Farrar, Straus, 1967.

Han Yongun (Han Yu-chon; Manhae) (1879–1944) poet

Han Yongun was born in Hongsong, Chungchong province, Korea, on August 29. A voracious reader, he taught himself the Chinese classics as a youth. Like many young people of the period, he entered into an arranged marriage at age 13. Later, he entered Komajawa College, where he studied Buddhist philosophy.

In 1904, he became a monk at Paektamsa temple. He hoped to rebuild Buddhism radically in Korea with modern reforms such as a choice for celibacy, establishing a solid economic base, and taking Buddhism to the masses. As president of the Buddhist Studies Association in 1913 and in 1918, he established the Buddhist monthly, Mind. His poem of the same name is considered by some to be the first modern poem, written in free verse, and highly metaphysical.

Han Yongun was an active leader of the 1919 Korean Independence Movement, which culminated in a demonstration against Japanese colonial rule on March 1, 1919. His works were frequently patriotic, invoking Buddhist themes to reiterate Korean culture and to inspire resistance against Japanese rule. Examples of such poems are "Submission" and the title poem from his most famous work, a collection of 88 poems titled The Silence of Love (1926). In these free-verse Buddhist poems addressing a nim, or love, the object of love is ambiguous. Critics believe that the nim is alternately a woman ("And You"), the Korean people ("To My Readers"), or a Buddhist object of nature ("Preface"). Although the nim itself may remain nameless, themes of patriotism, devotion, and a pantheistic love are evident. One of the most famous poems from the collection, "Ferryboat and Traveler," examines the relationship between joining and parting in love.

Han Yongun wrote in the Chinese style, in sijo, or the traditional Korean verse, and in free verse. The poems from The Silence of Love are known for their innovative free verse. Another literary innovation was using poetry as a vehicle for social and political change, a marked departure from the lyrical and apolitical Korean literary tradition.

Han Yongun died of neuralgia on June 29 at age 65, just one year before Korea gained liberation from Japanese rule.

Another Work by Han Yongun

Love's Silence and Other Poems. New York: Ronsdale Press, 1999.

A Work about Han Yongun

Yu, Beongcheon. Han Yong-un and Yi Kwang-su: Two Pioneers of Modern Korean Literature. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1992.

Handke, Peter (1942–) playwright, novelist, critic

Peter Handke was born in Altenmarkt, Austria, to Maria Handke, an impoverished farmer, and was raised by his stepfather, Bruno Handke, a soldier in the German army and later a carpenter. Handke attended a standard Austrian elementary school. Between 1954 and 1959, he lived and studied at a Roman Catholic seminary, intending to become a priest. The admission to the seminary of a poor country boy, gained through a rigid examination, was a source of pride for Handke and his parents. Handke, however, was extremely unhappy at the seminary and later expounded on the state-sponsored lies taught by the priests.

Between 1961 and 1965, Handke studied law at the Karl-Franzens University in Graz. When Handke's first novel was accepted for publication by a prestigious publishing company, he immediately quit the law, leaving the school before the final exam. Handke began his writing career as a literary critic and writer for the Austrian radio. In 1966, shortly after the publication of his first major work, Die Hornissen (The Hornets), the 23-year-old Handke publicly criticized contemporary German literature and GRUPPE 47, the group of leading German writers, at a literary seminar held at Princeton University. He claimed that Group 47 established a codified set of aesthetics that rigidly defined what literature should be. Handke has remained a controversial figure in literature for much of his career. In 1969, he started Verlag der Autoren, a publishing house that supported radical writers and filmmakers.

Critical Analysis

Handke established himself as a renovator of the German theater with the production of Publikumsbeschimpfung (1966; translated as Offending the Audience, 1971). The play completely departs from traditional theatrical conventions, such as plot, theme, and character. The four actors literally set about offending the audience by lecturing the spectators about their expectations, naïveté, and conventional role. The play caused a sensation, but many critics saw Handke's gesture as pretentious and concluded that his drama would never gain a wide appeal in Germany.

The Hornets has not been translated into English. Instead of using the traditional units of demarcations, the novel is structured into 67 free-standing, episodic parts that seemingly have no connection, narrative or otherwise, among them. At the center of the convoluted narrative is the blind narrator, Gregor Benedikt, who attempts to reconstruct the events leading to his blindness. Instead of using visual images, Handke relies on imitation of words and sounds to recreate Gregor's environment. While deconstructing the traditional conventions of the novel, The Hornets comments on the structure of the traditional novel. Although the novel brought critical recognition to Handke, it baffled and surprised most of its readers.

Der Hausierer (The Peddler, 1967) further challenges the traditional methodology of the novel. The novel is divided into chapters, which are further subdivided into theoretical and narrative sections. The theoretical sections present the theory behind the detective novel. The narrative parts elusively delineate a fragmented murder mystery but do not present a motivation for the murder, nor is the crime solved in the end. Indeed, the only clues to reading the narrative are provided in the theoretical parts of the work. The Peddler was called unreadable by many critics and never achieved wide success with the general reading public.

A prolific writer, Peter Handke has produced more than 20 plays, several screenplays, and several works of fiction. He has also directed and acted in films. He currently lives in Chaville, France, after having lived in Berlin, Paris, and the United States, as well as in Austria. He has received numerous prizes for his writing, including the Corinthian Culture Prize in 1983, the Franz Kafka Prize in 1979, and the Great Austrian State Prize in 1988.

By the 1980s, Handke had achieved recognition as a leading contemporary author in Austria. Many of his plays were translated into French and English. In the mid-1990s, however, his name once again became controversial when he wrote a series of articles supporting Serbia in the Balkan Wars and condemning the NATO bombings. Despite the controversial political stance, Handke's work is still praised and read throughout the world. Peter Handke has established himself as one of the leading figures of POSTMODERNISM.

Other Works by Peter Handke

On a Dark Night I Left My Silent House. Translated by Krishna Winston. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2000.

Once Again for Thucydides. Translated by Tess Lewis. New York: New Directions, 1998.

A Sorrow Beyond Dreams: A Life Story. Translated by Ralph Manheim. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1975.

Works about Peter Handke

Demeritt, Linda C. New Subjectivity and Prose Forms of Alienation: Peter Handke and Botho Strauss. New York: Peter Lang, 1987.

Firda, Richard. Peter Handke. Boston: Twayne, 1993.

Konzett, Matthias. The Rhetoric of National Dissent: In Thomas Bernhard, Peter Handke, and Elfriede Jelinek. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2000.

Harris, Wilson (Kona Woruk) (1921–) novelist, critic, poet

Wilson Theodore Harris was born to a middle-class family in New Amsterdam, a colony of British Guiana that is now the independent country of Guyana. He studied English literary classics and classical literature while attending Queen's College in Georgetown, the capital of Guyana, from 1934 to 1939. Harris also studied and practiced land surveying, which informed his fiction; the surveyor is one of Harris's recurring fictional characters. He also uses the land as an innovative fictional tool.

While working as a land surveyor, Harris began to publish poems, stories, critical essays, and reviews in the literary journal Kyk-over-al. He published two small books of poems, Fetish (1951) and Eternity to Season (1954), before leaving Guyana for Britain in 1959 to become a full-time writer. His first novel, Palace of the Peacock (1969), one of his best known, is an exploration of intercultural and interracial relationships, as well as of history and mythology in Guyana.

Harris continues to explore these intercultural, interracial, and transhistorical themes in Guyana in subsequent novels: The Far Journey of Oudin (1961), The Whole Armour (1962), The Secret Ladder (1963), and Heartland (1964). Commenting on Harris's poetry and novels in New World Guyana Independence Issue, Louis James asserts, "For Harris, time and space are exploded, and as in atomic physics, matter is transformed into energy and vice versa, a person may turn into a place, a place into an aspiration."

Harris's own comments in Explorations (1981), a collection of critical writings, explain what motivates the symbols, mythological allusions, non-linearity, imagistic juxtaposition, and multiple speakers that reappear in his novels. He states that, "Within the art of fiction we are attempting to explore . . . it is a 'vacancy' in nature within which agents appear who are translated one by the other and who . . . reappear through each other, inhabit each other, reflect a burden of necessity, push each other to plunge into the unknown, into the translatable, transmutable legacies of history." In other words, Harris's literary devices require the reader to participate actively with him in exploring culture and history.

In his next novels, Harris focuses on memory and the mind, still using the setting of Guyana, and explores the land's symbolic potential. Some of these novels include The Eye of the Scarecrow (1965) and The Waiting Room (1967), both of which were written in the form of a diary or journal. Tumatumari (1968) and Ascent to Omai (1970) explore the female and male consciousness, respectively.

In Harris's later novels, he begins to use different settings, such as London, Mexico, Edinburgh, and India. Themes of resurrection, metaphors of painting, and characters reoccur in these novels: Companions of the Day and Night (1975), Da Silva da Silva's Cultivated Wilderness (1977), Genesis of the Clowns (1977), The Tree of the Sun (1978), and The Angel at the Gate (1982). Da Silva da Silva's Cultivated Wilderness exemplifies the autobiographical traces found in his other works, such as the Genesis of Clowns; like Harris, Da Silva is a South American artist of mixed racial background who lives in London.

While writing, Harris worked as a lecturer and writer-in-residence at different universities, including the University of the West Indies, the University of Texas at Austin and Yale University in the United States, and New Castle University in Australia. His critical works include Fossil and Psyche (1974), The Womb of Space: The Cross-Cultural Imagination (1983), and The Radical Imagination (1992). In Wilson Harris and the Caribbean Novel (1975), Michael Gilkes asserts, "The work of Wilson Harris deserves serious attention for this reason above all: it suggests the possibility of a response to the West Indian cultural and historical reality which is neither a revolt against, nor a passive acceptance of, a divisive situation."

Other Works by Wilson Harris

- Bundy, A. J. M., ed. Selected Essays of Wilson Harris: The Unfinished Genesis of the Imagination. New York: Routledge, 1999.
- Resurrection at Sorrow Hill*. London: Faber & Faber, 1993.
- The Four Banks of the River of Space*. Boston: Faber, 1990.

Works about Wilson Harris

- Cribb, Timothy J. "Toward the Reading of Wilson Harris." Review of Contemporary Fiction 17, no. 2 (Summer 1997): 59–62.
- Johnson, Kerry L. "Translations of Gender, Pain, and Space: Wilson Harris's The Carnival Trilogy, Meddelanden fran Strindbergssallskapet" 44, no. 1 (Spring 1998): 123–43.
- Kutzinski, Vera M. "New Personalities: Race, Sexuality, and Gender in Wilson Harris's Recent Fiction." Review of Contemporary Fiction 17, no. 2 (Summer 1997): 72–76.

Hašek, Jaroslav (1883–1923) novelist

Jaroslav Hašek was born in Prague in 1883 to a middle-class family. His childhood was uneventful, but his later years were fraught with alcoholism and mental instability. He is best known for his satiric masterpiece The Good Soldier Schweik (1921). He also created the Party of Peaceful Progress Within the Limits of Law, a political party, the financial proceeds from which he spent at the local pub.

At the start of his literary career, Hašek was widely published in political journals. In 1907, he became the editor of Komuna, a noted anarchist magazine. He married, but his wife later left him when he became involved in stealing dogs and forging pedigrees. After attempting suicide, Hašek spent a brief period in a mental institution. In 1915, he began to work as a cabaret performer but was called to serve in the Austrian army during World War I. All of these experiences were used to create the character of Schweik, a drunkard and a liar who ultimately outwits the army. Other exploits from Hašek's own life that found their place in his work include his imprisonment in camps in Ukraine and the Urals during the war, his work as a propagandist with the Czech Legion, and his ultimate return to Prague and nationalist politics.

Critically acclaimed as one of the world's greatest satires, The Good Soldier Schweik was first rejected by the literary establishment because the character of Schweik was considered too low class. An incompetent soldier, Schweik is arrested for making snide remarks about the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand and, in another escapade, is thrown out of an insane asylum when the doctors suspect him of merely feigning madness. The general public, however, responded favorably to his antics. Four volumes of Schweik's adventures were completed, the last published posthumously and finished by Hašek's friend Karel Vanek.

Another Work by Jaroslav Hašek

- The Bachura Scandal and Other Stories and Sketches*. Translated by Alan Menhennet. Chester Springs, Pa.: Dufour Editions, 1992.

A Work about Jaroslav Hašek

Parrott, Cecil. The Bad Bohemian: The Life of Jaroslav Hašek, Creator of The Good Soldier Svejk. London: Bodley Head, 1978.

———. Jaroslav Hašek: A Study of Svejk and the Short Stories. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982.

Hasluck, Nicholas (1942–) novelist, poet

Nicholas Hasluck, born in Canberra, Australia, was the son of Sir Paul and Dame Alexandra Hasluck, both established writers. His father served on numerous missions to the United Nations and was governor-general of Australia between 1969 and 1974. His parents' achievements in writing and their involvement in public life have influenced Hasluck's own writing career. After studying law at the universities of Western Australia and Oxford in 1963 and 1966, respectively, Hasluck worked briefly as an editorial assistant in London before returning to Australia in 1967 to become a barrister.

Hasluck's literary works reflect his concerns with political and social issues within Australian society. In his 1982 novel, The Hand That Feeds You, a cynical commentary on contemporary Australian society, Hasluck observes that the push for development and progress meets reluctance because people prefer easy options, such as reliance on the welfare system. His literature presents a world of espionage and subversion. The characters of his novels, such as Dyson Garrick, are compelling figures whose goals are usually hampered by external factors that lead them to choose between their dreams and their lives. His poetry, however, is diffuse and slightly satirical. In the poem "Anchor" (1976), the "anchor" refers to turning points or moments suspended in time at which a person's life arrives and departs from a new juncture, departing from the old path. This poem illuminates Hasluck's awareness of the transient nature of life and the importance of events in determining changes in one's life.

The newspaper The West Australian refers to Hasluck as "A writer who obviously thinks the truth and the relationship between art and life are important matters . . . one of those rare writers who can meditate on these issues and at the same time write highly entertaining stories." Hasluck's novel Our Man K (1999) shows most aptly his desire to achieve a balance between reality and fiction. Drawing on historical materials, Hasluck recreates Egon Kisch (1855–1948), a Czech reporter who went to Australia in the 1930s to address an antiwar congress, as his central character. Kisch was a key figure during the war years, and his controversial character and his satirical writings form the basis for Hasluck's fictional novel. Hasluck's The Bel-larmine Jug, a detective thriller set in Holland, won the Age Book of the Year Award in 1984. The Country Without Music, a fiction that examines the earlier history of Australia when it was still a penal colony, was the joint winner of the 1990 Western Australia Premier's Award for Fiction.

Other Works by Nicholas Hasluck

Anchor and Other Poems. Fremantle, Australia: Fremantle Arts Center Press, 1976.

The Blue Guitar. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1980.

A Grain of Truth. Melbourne, Australia: Penguin, 1987.

The Hat on the Letter O. (Revised Edition) Fremantle, Australia: Fremantle Arts Center Press, 1990.

Quarantine. Melbourne and Sydney: Macmillan Press, 1978.

Truant State. Victoria: Penguin, 1987.

Hauptmann, Gerhart (1862–1946)

playwright, novelist

Gerhart Hauptmann was born in Obersalzbrunn, Germany, a fashionable resort town, to Robert and Marie Hauptmann, owners of a small hotel. Hauptmann entered a gymnasium in Breslau but had to leave because of conduct problems and poor academic performance. Hauptmann was artistically inclined from an early age and initially rejected formal education. Disturbed by the attitudes of young Hauptmann, his family sent him to live with his uncle, a pious estate owner. Hauptmann spent several years living and working alongside the peasants on his uncle's estate, learning their simple way of life and their deep religious devotion. Hauptmann eventually changed his attitude toward formal education but remained adamant in his goal of becoming an artist. He attended an art academy in Breslau, initially intending to become a sculptor. Hauptmann's artistic goals changed, however, and he briefly studied history at the University of Jena between 1882 and 1883.

Hauptmann studied art in Rome but was forced to return to Germany because of ill health in 1884. While in Rome, Hauptmann decided to become a writer. In 1885, Hauptmann married Marie Thienemann, an attractive heiress. Thienemann's wealth provided the financial support for Hauptmann's artistic goals. After settling in Berlin, Hauptmann immersed himself in the literary and intellectual currents of the day.

Gerhardt Hauptmann's early influences were derived from the works of German ROMANTICISM. In Berlin, however, Hauptmann came into a contact with progressive intellectuals who rejected romanticism and fervently advocated REALISM. Indeed, Hauptmann's early plays reflect the profound influence of Henrik IBSEN, the master of dramatic realism. Consequently, Hauptmann's themes are often related to the social and political conditions of German society.

Critical Analysis

In 1889, Hauptmann's debut play, Vor Sonnenaufgang (Before Dawn) attracted attention from many and shocked its audiences with its candid realism. The play depicts the relationship between Alfred Loth, a young socialist who studies the working conditions in the Silesian coal mines, and Helene Kraus, a sister-in-law of his former college comrade who takes control of the mines. Helene's family is corrupted by the power and money that the coal mines bring. Alfred Loth leaves Helene after an intense emotional struggle that results in her suicide. Hauptmann highlights the intense opposition and conflict created by corruption and exploitation of workers.

Die Weber (The Weavers, 1892) dramatizes a revolt of the Silesian weavers that occurred in 1844. The audience was amazed to find no leading hero in the cast of more than 70 characters. Hauptmann wrote the play without a leading character to dramatize the struggle of ordinary people. Viewed as politically dangerous, The Weavers was at first banned by the authorities. When the play was finally performed, it established Hauptmann's reputation as one of the world's leading dramatists.

Another play, The Beaver Coat (1893), is a broad comedy in Berlin dialect about a woman who cleverly tricks pompous bureaucrats; it was a great hit with the public. But Hauptmann began to withdraw from realism and to focus on the destiny of individual characters rather than tackling social problems with Hanneles Himmelfahrt (The Assumption of Hannele, 1894), about a peasant girl's visionary dream life, and Die versunkene Glocke (The Sunken Bell, 1897), a mystical verse drama. In many respects, this shift is associated with turmoil in Hauptmann's personal life. He developed a romantic relationship with a 14-year-old girl, Margaret Marschalk. In 1904, Hauptmann divorced his wife and married Marschalk after she became pregnant. The deep spiritual and psychological conflict of this relationship is reflected in such tragedies as Fuhrman Henschell (Drayman Henschell, 1898), which shows the psychological deterioration brought about in its central hero by domestic conflict.

Although mainly remembered as a dramatist, Hauptmann was also a prolific novelist. Der Narr in Christo, Emanuel Quint (The Fool in Christ, Emanuel Quint, 1910), Hauptmann's most famous novel, reflects in the story of a Silesian carpenter Hauptmann's fascination with the figure of Christ. Indescribable in terms of a single thematic focus, the novel combines elements of mysticism, fantasy, symbolism, and folklore to create a complex world of religious and spiritual ambiguity.

Gerhardt Hauptmann was recognized for his contributions to world literature when he was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1912. He remained in Germany throughout the Nazi period, his adherence to the principles of social justice and socialism remaining strong in the face of the Nazi harassment and threats. Despite constant recommendations by Hauptmann's peers, the Nazi regime adamantly denied him the Schiller Prize, the most prestigious prize for literature in Germany. By the time he died, his Silesian homeland had been annexed by the Russian army.

Other Works by Gerhart Hauptmann

Lineman Thiel and Other Tales. Translated by Stanley Radcliffe. Chester Springs, Pa.: Dufour Editions, 1989.

Plays: Before Daybreak, The Weavers, The Beaver Coat. Edited by Reinhold Grimm and Caroline Molina y Vedia. New York: Continuum, 1994.

Three Plays: The Weavers, Hannele, The Beaver Coat. Translated by Horst Frenz and Miles Waggoner. New York: Ungar, 1977.

Works about Gerhart Hauptmann

Maurer, Warren G. Understanding Gerhart Hauptmann. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1992.

Osborne, John. Gerhart Hauptmann and the Naturalist Drama. London: Routledge, 1998.

Havel, Václav (1936–) nonfiction, playwright

Best known internationally as the former president of the Czech Republic, Václav Havel was born in Prague. The son of intellectuals who were closely tied to political uprisings, Havel was prohibited by the Communist government from finishing school after his compulsory education. Havel, therefore, apprenticed as a lab technician and continued taking night classes.

After serving two years in the military, Havel took a job as a stagehand at the ABC Theater and later at The Balustrade, where he became resident playwright and where his first plays, including his well-known The Garden Party (1963) were produced. The Garden Party was a satire of modern bureaucratic routines.

Havel enrolled at the Academy of Dramatic Arts and graduated in 1967. He also joined the editorial board of Tvárín, a literary magazine that conflicted with the conservative Writers' Association. The magazine disappeared in 1969, the same year Havel's passport was confiscated because of his supposed subversive writings.

In many of his plays, Havel used satire to comment on social and political issues. In The Memorandum (1965), for example, the creation of an improved language results in a breakdown of human relationships. The Increased Difficulty of Concentration (1968), moreover, attacks sociological terminology. After the Soviet invasion in 1968, Havel wrote a series of one-act plays, Audience (1978), Private View (1978), and Protest (1978), in which the main character is a playwright in trouble with the authorities.

Throughout the 1970s, a period of political unrest, Havel helped start the human-rights organization Charter 77 and the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Prosecuted. His plays were banned, but the manuscripts circulated privately and were printed in Western Europe, bringing attention to the Czechoslovakian struggle. As a result, Havel was subjected to police harassment and numerous arrests.

After the fall of communism, Havel was president of Czechoslovakia from 1989 to 2003. His contribution to politics having grown directly from his active participation in politically motivated literature. His lifelong dedication to human rights and democratic reforms are reflected in his plays, which serve as inspiration to others that the power of one person can change history.

Another Work by Václav Havel

The Garden Party and Other Plays. New York: Grove Press, 1993.

Works about Václav Havel

Kriseova, Eda. Václav Havel: The Authorized Biography. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.

McRae, Robert. Resistance and Revolution. Ottawa: Carleton University Press, 1997.

Hayashi Fumiko (Miyata Fumiko)

(1903–1951) novelist, poet, children's story writer, reporter

Hayashi Fumiko was born to Hayashi Assatarō Miyata and Kiku in Shimonoseki, Yamaguchi Prefecture, in Japan. Her schooling was sporadic until she entered Onomichi Girls High School in Hiroshima Prefecture. However, because her family could not pay her school fees, Hayashi worked nights at a canvas-sail factory to pay for her own education. After graduating, Hayashi had a number of unsuccessful relationships with men until she settled down with Rokutoshi Tezuka in 1926. She was obsessive about her writing, often sacrificing her health for her work. She died of a heart attack.

While Hayashi was attending high school, she contributed poems to local newspapers. Her aspirations to become a professional writer took her to Tokyo, Japan's literary center, in 1924, and she began to publish children's stories. However, she achieved greater success as a poet, producing her first collection, I Saw a Blue Horse, in 1929. A year later, she published one of her best received works, the fictional diary Vagabond's Song, which was based on her early life. During the war, Hayashi became a war correspondent and witnessed the fall of Nanking. The war became a source of inspiration, and afterward she entered her most productive period, writing numerous short stories, essays, and novels about people struggling against the adversity of war. Her final novel, Drifting Clouds (1951), follows in this vein, portraying a young woman trying to navigate the changing social structure of postwar Japan.

Hayashi gained special fame for the quantity of literature she produced and for her ability to capture subtle emotions in her writing. Her stories typically portray the lives of the underdogs struggling in prewar and postwar Japan.

Other Works by Hayashi Fumiko

"Narcissus." Translated by Kyoko Selden. In Noriko Lippit and Kyoko Selden, eds., Stories by Contemporary Japanese Women Writers. Ardsley, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1982.

"Tokyo." Translated by Ivan Morris. In Donald Keene, ed., Modern Japanese Literature. New York: Grove Press, 1956.

Works about Hayashi Fumiko

Ericson, Joan E. Be a Woman: Hayashi Fumiko and Modern Japanese Women's Literature. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1997.

Tanaka, Yukiko, ed. To Love and to Write: Selections by Japanese Women Writers 1913–1938. Seattle: Seal Press, 1987.

Hayashi Kyōko (Miyazaki Kyōko)

(1930–) novelist, essayist

Hayashi Kyōko was born in Nagasaki but spent her first 14 years in Japanese-occupied Shanghai. In 1945, a few months before Japan's defeat, Hayashi moved to Nagasaki, where she attended high school and worked in a munitions factory. When the atomic bomb was dropped on Nagasaki, Hayashi fell victim to severe radiation sickness. After several months, she had recovered enough to re-enter high school, graduating in 1947. She then studied nursing but shortly abandoned it and moved to Tokyo. There, she met and married a journalist in 1951 and gave birth to a son.

Hayashi began her writing career in 1962 when she was hired by the magazine Bungei Shuto (Literary Capital). Her first story, "Ritual of Death," based on her experiences on August 9, 1945, appeared in the magazine in 1975. Three years later, she published a short-story collection, Cut Glass and Blown Glass, which depicts atomic bomb experiences. In her next collection, Michelle's Lipstick (1980), the stories are narrated by a girl in Shanghai. Developing her concerns about the long-term effects of war, Hayashi published her third collection, Home in Three Worlds, in 1984.

As a hibakusha (a survivor of the atomic bombing), Hayashi lives with fears about the effect of radiation on her son, her health, and the human race. Her writing usually focuses on the atomic bombing and her experiences in Shanghai and reflects a personal belief that the past exists in the present. She has won the Gunzō New Writer's Prize, the Akutagawa Award, the Kawabata Yasunari Literary Award, and the Woman Writer's Award.

Other Works by Hayashi Kyōko

"The Empty Can." Translated by Margaret Mitsutani.

In The Crazy Iris and Other Stories of the Atomic Aftermath. Edited by Kenzaburō Ōe. New York: Grove Press, 1985.

"Yellow Sand." Translated by Kyoko Iriye Selden. In Stories by Contemporary Japanese Women Writers. Edited by Noriko Mizuta Lippit and Kyoko Selden. New York: M. E. Sharpe, 1982.

Works about Hayashi Kyōko

Bhowmik, Davinder L. "Temporal Discontinuity in the Atomic Bomb Fiction of Hayashi Kyōko." In Oe and Beyond: Fiction in Contemporary Japan. Edited by Stephen Snyder and Philip Gabriel. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.

Treat, John Whittier. "Hayashi Kyōko and the Gender of Ground Zero." In The Woman's Hand: Gender and Theory in Japanese Women's Writing. Edited by Paul Schalow and Janet Walker. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1996.

Hayslip, Le Ly (1949–) novelist

Le Ly Hayslip was born in Ky La, a village near Da Nang, Vietnam. She was the seventh child in a peasant farm family, grew up during the Vietnam War, and received only a third-grade education. When she turned 14, she was accused of sympathizing with the revolutionaries by the South Vietnamese government and of being a government spy by the Vietcong. Originally sentenced to death by the Vietcong revolutionaries, her life was spared and Hayslip fled to Saigon, where she met her first husband, Ed Munro, an American civilian working in Vietnam. They married when she turned 21 and escaped to the United States in 1970.

Hayslip's first memoir, When Heaven and Earth Changed Places, is a heartrending account of her life beginning with her turbulent childhood and ending with her return to Vietnam after an absence of 16 years. The book, published in 1989 and well received, explores the ironic balance between the bittersweet anguish of Hayslip's past and her renewed hope and forgiveness for her homeland. Hayslip published her second memoir, Child of War, Woman of Peace, in 1993. Her eldest son, James, was her coauthor. The memoir relates the author's life after she moved to the United States.

Hayslip's literary success lies in her ability to blend both Eastern and Western values. Her poignant story became the setting for the award-winning film Heaven and Earth (1993), directed by Oliver Stone. Stone was so moved by Hayslip's account that he funded the building of a clinic in Hayslip's home village in Da Nang.

Hayslip, who now lives in California, continues to encourage both Vietnamese and Americans to overcome the stigma of the Vietnam War by engaging in projects to build schools and medical facilities in impoverished parts of Vietnam. Her East Meets West Foundation, formed in 1988, continues to give humanitarian relief to individuals and groups to help them rebuild their lives.

Head, Bessie (1937–1986) novelist

Bessie Head was born in Pietermaritzburg, South Africa. She was the illegitimate daughter of a wealthy white Scottish woman and a South African stablehand. Head was born in the mental institution where her mother died. She was taken from her mother at birth and raised in a foster home in the colored community of Cape Province. When she turned 13, she began six years of study at St. Monica's Home, an Anglican missionary school for colored girls.

Head received a teaching certificate in 1955 and taught in an elementary school for two years. She then worked for a succession of newspapers in Cape Town, Johannesburg, and Port Elizabeth. Though married in 1960, she soon divorced in 1964. Her involvement in the Pan Africanist Congress, a political party that emerged around the same time as the African National Congress, led to her brief arrest and constant surveillance by the government. She left South Africa for Botswana in 1964 and remained in exile until her death. Although Head always felt a sense of nostalgia for South Africa, she never wanted to return to her homeland, dreading the prospect of fighting apartheid.

Head's writings are epitomized by tumultuous emotions, unsettling trauma, and hope, as seen through the optimism and resilience of her characters. Her works deal with issues of alienation, racial discrimination, poverty and interpersonal relationships. Her ability to convey a variety of perspectives through her characters is a testimony to her creativity and talent. Head's most renowned novel is Question of Power, published in 1973. The story revolves around an expatriate named Elizabeth who lives in Botswana. Elizabeth's various imagined encounters with a lover land her in a mental hospital, and her hellish experiences are metaphorical allegories of racism and gender discrimination. Bessie Head's greatest contribution to world literature lies in her ability not only to examine the problems related to the issue of gender discrimination in South Africa but also to offer solutions to the problems.

Other Works by Bessie Head

The Collectors of Treasures. London: Heinemann, 1992.

Daymond, M. J., ed. The Cardinals: With Meditations and Short Stories. London: Heinemann, 1996.

Maru. London: Heinemann, 1996.

Tales of Tenderness and Power. London: Heinemann, 1989.

When Rain Clouds Gather. London: Heinemann, 1996.

A Woman Alone: Autobiographical Writings. London: Heinemann, 1991.

Works about Bessie Head

Abrahams, C., ed. The Tragic Life: Bessie Head and Literature in Southern Africa. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 1990.

Eilersen, Gillian. Bessie Head: Thunder Behind Her Ears: Her Life and Writing. Cape Town: David Philip, 1995.

Garrett, James. "Writing Community: Bessie Head and the Politics of Narrative." Research in African Literature 30:2 (Summer 1999).

Hébert, Anne (1916–2000) poet, novelist

Anne Hébert was born in Quebec. Her earliest influences include her father, a civil servant, and her cousin, the poet Hector de Saint-Denys Garneau. Though Hébert moved to Paris in the 1950s, she made several trips back to Canada. She died of cancer in the city of Montreal.

Hébert's work began to receive critical attention in the 1940s and 1950s with the publication of her first book of poetry in 1942, Les Songes en Equilibre; her next book of poems appeared in 1953, titled Le Tombeau des rois. Her first novel, Kamouraska, about a 19th-century murder, appeared in 1970 and was translated into English in 1974. Another of Hébert's novels, Héloïse (1980), concerns a vampire in Paris. Les Fous de Bassan (1982, translated as In the Shadow of the Wind) tells the story of a double rape and murder from multiple points of view. Hébert won the Governor General's Literary Award twice, for Poèmes in 1960 and for the novel Les Enfants du Sabbat (The Children of the Sabbath) in 1975, and received many other awards. She is one of the best-known and most translated Québécois writers.

Another Work by Anne Hébert

Anne Hébert: Selected Poems. Translated by A. Poulin, Jr. Brockport, N.Y.: BOA Editions, 1987.

A Work about Anne Hébert

Knight, Kelton, W. Anne Hébert: In Search of the First Garden. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.

Heine, Heinrich (1797–1856) poet

Heinrich Heine was born in Düsseldorf, Germany, to a Jewish family. Heine's father was a merchant who provided prospects for other Jews in Düsseldorf during the French occupation. After the failure of his father's business, Heine went to live with his uncle Solomon in Hamburg to train for a career in commerce. Heine disliked commerce and decided to study law, which he did at the universities of Bonn, Berlin, and Göttingen, finally taking a degree in 1825. To enter civil service, which was closed to Jews at that time in Germany, Heine converted to Protestantism; however, he never practiced law or held a government post of any sort.

Heine's own writing was deeply influenced by the philosophy of G. W. F. Hegel, who was a professor at the University of Berlin. Heine was fascinated with the early ideas of socialism and with the improvement of workers' conditions and frequently corresponded with Friedrich Engels and Karl Marx, both admirers of Heine's work. In 1831, he embarked for Paris as a journalist.

Heine found the bustling, artistic world of Paris a startling contrast to the repressive atmosphere in Germany. In Paris, Heine reported on French cultural life, wrote travel books, and reviewed German works on politics and philosophy. His affinity for socialism and vocal criticism of German politics quickly brought him to the attention of censors. In 1835, the Federal German Diet attempted to enforce strictly a ban on all of his works throughout Germany. Heine was surrounded by government spies, and his stay in Paris eventually became a permanent exile.

Heine's poems range from bitter political satires to love lyrics. The Book of Songs (1827), one of the early lyrical collections, established Heine's success in Germany. The collection reveals a heavy influence of traditional folk poetry but also a stylistic shift from the lyrical traditions of the romantic movement to a dimension of social criticism. Germany: A Winter's Tale (1844) presents a satire in verse that attacks reactionary aspects of German society. At the end of the long narrative poem, the Goddess of Hamburg reveals a gloomy vision of Germany's future to the narrator, who is half submerged in a chamber pot.

The death of Heine's uncle in 1844 left him with a small pension; the French government also subsidized him. The same year, Heine was overcome by a terrible disease that left him paralyzed and partially blind. Heine continued to work and, in 1851, produced one of his finest collections of verses, Romanzero. The collection was different from anything he had done before. In Romanzero, Heine attempted to reconcile and combine the elements of Christianity and paganism. Thematically, Heine attempted to avoid the political controversy that his previous collections caused in Germany.

Heinrich Heine remained a controversial figure long after his death. A proposal to erect a statue commemorating his works caused riots in Germany. The works have been closely identified with German national identity, and he had an enormous influence on later poets, such as Rainer Maria RILKE. The Nazis allowed publication of Heine's works; they did not reveal the identity of the author, however, because of his Jewish background. Although Heine contributed to German romanticism, his later works clearly show a deviation from the traditional themes and motifs of this movement. Today, Heinrich Heine is included in the canon of German literature as an influential poet crucial to the development of national literature, as well as an important social thinker.

Other Works by Heinrich Heine

The Harz Journey. Translated by Charles Leland. New York: Marsilio Publishers, 1995.

The Romantic School and Other Essays. New York: Continuum, 1985.

Songs of Love and Grief. Translated by Arndt Walter. Chicago: Northwestern University Press, 1995.

Works about Heinrich Heine

Hermund, Joest. Heinrich Heine's Contested Identities: Politics, Religion, and Nationalism in Nineteenth Century Germany. New York: Peter Lang, 1999.

Kossoff, Philip. Valiant Heart: A Biography of Heinrich Heine. London: Cornwall Books, 1983.

Herzen, Aleksandr Ivanovich

(1812–1870) philosopher, essayist

Aleksandr Herzen was born in Moscow, Russia, as an illegitimate child of Luisa Gaag, a German immigrant, and Ivan Yakovlev, a retired army officer and minor aristocrat. His father paid for Herzen to receive an excellent education from private tutors, and Herzen became fluent in several European languages. He was particularly interested in the history of the French Revolution and the poetry of Aleksandr PUSHKIN. In 1829, he began to attend the Moscow University in preparation for a job in civil service.

In 1834, Herzen was implicated in an antigovernment conspiracy. Placed under arrest and, after months of interrogations, exiled to Perm, Herzen did not return to Moscow until 1840. During his years in exile, Herzen began his prolific career as a writer, but most of the works written during this period could not be published in Russia because of their politically incendiary, liberal content. Influenced by the French socialist philosophers, particularly Claude Saint-Simon (1760–1825), Herzen often criticized the institution of serfdom and dominant autocracy in Russian government. Unable to continue his work in Russia, Herzen moved to Paris in 1847, never to return.

That year, Herzen published a novel, Who Is to Blame? (1847), about a young liberal who becomes disillusioned with Russia and its political institutions. After his relocation abroad, Herzen abandoned fiction writing in favor of social and political works. During his brief stay in France, Herzen supported the French revolution of 1848. After the failure of the revolution, Herzen wrote From the Other Shore (1850), an analysis and critique of the European revolutionary movements of the time.

In 1852 Herzen moved to London, where he founded the Free Russian Press, which published a series of journals. Herzen was finally able to express freely his political opinions. Between 1857 and 1862, Herzen published a liberal journal, Kolokol (The Bell), which was banned in Russia but smuggled in. For a time, the journal acquired tremendous popularity and wide readership in Russia. It may have been influential in Czar Aleksandr II's 1860 liberation of the serfs. Herzen supported the traditional, communal institutions of Russia, which he considered as precursor for a free, socialist society—contrary to the government's agenda. However, by the 1860s, Herzen's views seemed conservative to many Russian political factions, and The Bell's influence waned. Herzen turned to writing his autobiography, My Past and Thoughts (1852–55), in which he included an account of Russia under serfdom and the attendant social-resistance movements of the period.

British playwright Tom Stoppard has made Herzen the subject of a trilogy, The Coast of Utopia. In a 2002 article in the Observer, Stoppard says:

Herzen had no time for the kind of mono-theory that bound history, progress and individual autonomy to some overarching abstraction like Marx's material dialecticism. What he did have time for . . . was the individual over the collective, the actual over the theoretical. What he detested above all was the conceit that future bliss justified present sacrifice and bloodshed.

Works by Aleksandr Herzen

From the Other Shore. Translated by Moura Budberg. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

My Past and Thoughts: The Memoirs of Alexander Herzen. Translated by Constance Garnett. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.

Who Is to Blame? A Novel in Two Parts. Translated by Michael R. Katz. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1984.

Works about Aleksandr Herzen

Acton, Edward. Alexander Herzen and the Role of the Intellectual Revolutionary. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1979.

Partridge, Monica. Alexander Herzen. Paris: Unesco, 1984.

Hesse, Hermann (1877–1962) novelist, poet
Hermann Hesse was born in Calw, Germany, to Johannes and Marie Hesse, Pietist missionaries and religious publishers. Hesse's parents traveled to India on several occasions to conduct missionary work. The travels to India provided a profound formative experience for young Hesse, one that deeply influenced his writings. At first, Hesse was educated by his parents and was expected to follow their path. In 1891, he entered a Protestant seminary at Maulbronn to prepare for life as a missionary and preacher. Hesse, however, found himself spiritually and psychologically unfit for a religious career, and he left the seminary without taking a degree.

Hesse became a professional writer in 1904 when he published Peter Camenzind, a novel about a man who—like Saint Francis of Assisi—leaves a big city to devote his life to meditation. The novel was a great success, and Hesse was subsequently able to dedicate his time to writing. After a visit to India in 1911, Hesse began to study Eastern religions. Siddhartha (1922), a novel about young Guatama Buddha who rebels against the repressive traditions of his Brahmin father and ultimately finds enlightenment, reflects Hesse's interests in Eastern philosophy. Siddhartha remains the most widely read work of Herman Hesse.

In 1912, Hesse moved to Switzerland, where he remained throughout World War I. He openly attacked the attitudes of militarism and nationalism that beleaguered Europe and promoted the rights of prisoners of war. Because of Hesse's antiwar attitudes, he was regarded as a traitor by many in Germany. Demian (1919), a novel published by Hesse under the pseudonym of Emil Sinclair, reflected Hesse's personal crises during the years of World War I. In the novel, Demian, a young man, is torn between the world of sensuality and pleasures and the orderly, restrained world of middle-class existence. The novel also revealed Hesse's interest in psychoanalysis and the works of Carl Jung, a pupil of Sigmund FREUD. The work was well received, particularly by veterans of World War I.

Der Steppenwolf (1927) tells a story of Harry Haller, a man undergoing a midlife crisis, who recognizes another personality within himself called Hermine. Hermine introduces Haller to a sensuous life of drinking, sex, and drugs. The novel's psychological complexity and the problematic treatment of spiritual persona appealed to many readers. Der Steppenwolf became a seminal text for the American Beat poets, and the famous American rock band Steppenwolf is named after the novel.

During the Nazi regime, Hesse's works were still published in Germany and were privately defended by Joseph Goebbels, the Nazi propaganda minister; however, after Hesse refused to remove the brutal scenes of anti-Semitism and violence against the Jews from the reprint of Narcissus and Goldmund (1930) in 1941, he was blacklisted by the Nazis. Hesse also assisted political refugees during World War II. He wrote The Glass Bead Game (1943), a novel about a futuristic, imaginary community in which wisdom is communicated through a series of complex games, in response to the Nazi regime in Germany.

Hermann Hesse was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature in 1946. He wrote more than 50 poems and essays between 1945 and 1962 for several Swiss newspapers. His works remain popular throughout the world. During the 1970s, Hesse was a cult figure for many young readers because of his focus on Eastern religions and his criticism of middle-class attitudes and values. He influenced many contemporary writers. He is one of the most popular writers of the German-speaking world.

Other Works by Hermann Hesse

Gertrude. Translated by Hilda Rosner. New York: Noonday, 1998.

Poems. Translated by James Wright. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1970.

Soul of the Age, Selected Letters of Hermann Hesse. New York: Noonday, 1992.

A Work about Hermann Hesse

Mileck, Joseph. Hermann Hesse: Life and Art. Riverside: University of California Press, 1981.

Higuchi Ichiyō (Higuchi Natsuko)

(1872–1896) short-story writer

Higuchi Ichiyō was born in Tokyo to Higuchi Noriyoshi and Taki. When Higuchi was very young, she was sent to private school, where she learned the Chinese classics and developed her writing skills; in addition, her father taught her Japanese classical poetry at home. When her father died, however, the family fell on hard times. They moved to the Yoshiwara pleasure district and opened a shop that eventually failed. Higuchi died of tuberculosis at age 24.

During her time in school, Higuchi developed a passion for writing. In 1892, the novelist and magazine publisher Tōsui Nakarai launched Higuchi's career by helping her publish articles in well-regarded literary magazines. She quickly earned the esteem of established writers and critics. Higuchi began to publish short stories in a variety of literary journals; however, she produced her greatest writing after she had moved her family to the Yoshiwara district in 1893. Her most enduring works—"Child's Play," "Troubled Waters," and "Separate Ways" (1895)—bring to life the characters and lifestyles of the district in the late 19th century.

Higuchi is the only woman whose works have been consistently included among the great works of the Meiji period (1868–1912). She is particularly known for her short stories that depict life in the Yoshiwara district and for her revival of the written style of Ihara Saikaku (1642–1693).

Other Works by Higuchi Ichiyō

"Muddy Bay." Translated by Hisako Tanaka. Monumenta Nipponica 14 (1958): 173–204.

"The Thirteenth Night" and "Child's Play." In In the Shade of Spring Leaves: The Life and Writings of Higuchi Ichiyō, a Woman of Letters in Meiji Japan. Translated by Robert Lyons Danly. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1981.

Works about Higuchi Ichiyō

Copeland, Rebecca L. Lost Leaves: Women Writers of Meiji Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2000.

Danly, Robert Lyons. In the Shade of Spring Leaves: The Life and Writings of Higuchi Ichiyō, a Woman of Letters in Meiji Japan. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1981.

Hikmet, Nazim (1902–1963) poet, playwright, novelist, memoirist

Nazim Hikmet was born in Salonica, Greece, where his father was serving in the foreign service. His mother was an artist, his grandfather a poet. Introduced to poetry at an early age, Hikmet published his first poems at age 17. In 1922, attracted to the ideas of social justice promised by the Russian Revolution, he went to Moscow. There he met Vladimir MAYAKOVSKI, the FUTURIST poet who became one of his greatest influences.

Hikmet's life from this point on was fraught with political conflict as a result of the leftist political views that were contained in his writings. In 1924, after the Turkish War of Independence, he returned to Istanbul but was soon arrested and sentenced to 15 years of hard labor for working with a "leftist" magazine. He managed to escape in 1926 by fleeing, once again, to Russia. He continued to write in exile and attempted to return home in 1928, hoping for political amnesty. Instead, he was immediately arrested and sentenced to six years in prison; in 1933, he was released. During this period, Hikmet established himself as a major poet and playwright, publishing, among other works, The Epic of Sheik Bedrettin (1936). It was this poem, based on a rebellion by Turkish peasants against the Ottoman Empire in the 15th century, that led to another arrest; this time Hikmet was sentenced to 61 years in prison.

Hikmet continued to write in prison, sending out manuscripts secretly in letters to family and friends. Most of his poetry was inspired by universal humanism, compassion, and a love for the country that had exiled him. Among these works was his epic masterpiece, Human Landscapes (1941–45). In 1950, he was awarded the World Peace Prize and granted his freedom. This freedom was illusory, however: Two attempts were made on his life as he tried to flee the country. He escaped to Russia aboard a Romanian freighter and remained as a political refugee until his death from a heart attack in 1963.

Other Works by Nazim Hikmet

The Epic of Sheik Bedreddin and Other Poems. Translated by Randy Blasing and Mutlu Konuk. New York: Persea Books, 1977.

Poems of Nazim Hikmet. Translated by Randy Blasing and Mutlu Konuk. New York: Persea, 1994.

A Work about Nazim Hikmet

Goksu, Saime, and Edward Timms. Romantic Communist. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.

Hiraoka Kimitake

See MISHIMA YUKIO.

Ho Xuan Huong (1776–1820) poet

Ho Xuan Huong was born in Quynh Doi village, Nghe An province, Vietnam. Her father, Ho Phi Dien, was a member of the Hanoi scholar–gentry class. Her first husband was the prefect of the Vin Tuong district and encouraged her to write poetry. Ho had a good understanding of Chinese and Vietnamese writing that allowed her to write well in both classical Chinese and popular nom genres. Scholars of Vietnamese literature believed that Ho was a woman ahead of her time. With verve, Ho attacked the hypocrisy of Confucian Vietnamese society by showing her contempt for social conventions. She was seen not only as a feminist but also as a courageous defender of women's rights in early conservative Vietnam. Her simple yet forceful language appealed to a wide audience.

Sexuality is a dominant theme in Ho's poems. Her casual and playful exploration of sensual pleasures attracted and infuriated the conservative members of Vietnamese society. Ho was simultaneously seen as a wanton female and a heroine who stood steadfast to her own beliefs and values. Her poem "Jackfruit" is a compelling tale about the panic of an unmarried girl who discovers she is pregnant. In "Sharing a Husband," Ho describes the suffering of girls who are resigned to a subsidiary status in their husbands' homes. Ho's subversive attacks on the social hierarchy ironically won her the respect of those in power. She was respected for her fearlessness in criticizing the injustice of Vietnamese society, an action that few men, even those in power, would dare to undertake. Ho triumphed as a heroic female poet in a society that was overwhelmingly dominated by men.

Other Works by Ho Xuan Huong

"On Being a Concubine." In Jacquelyn Chagnon and Don Luce, eds., Quiet Courage: Poems from Viet Nam. Washington, D.C.: Indochina Mobile Education Project, 1974.

"The Man-and-Woman Mountain." In Jacquelyn Chagnon and Don Luce, eds., Quiet Courage: Poems from Viet Nam. Washington, D.C.: Indochina Mobile Education Project, 1974.

"Poking Fun at a Bronze." In Jacquelyn Chagnon and Don Luce, eds., Quiet Courage: Poems from Viet Nam. Washington, D.C.: Indochina Mobile Education Project, 1974.

Hoffmann, E. T. A. (pen name of Ernst Theodor Hoffmann) (1776–1822)

novelist, fairy-tale writer

Ernst Theodor Amadeus Hoffmann was born in Königsberg, Prussia (today Kaliningrad, Russia), to Christoph Ludwig and Lovisa Hoffmann. Ludwig left Lovisa while Ernst was still an infant. Responsibility for raising young Hoffmann fell on the shoulders of his maternal uncle, Otto Wilhelm Doerffer, a jurist. Young Hoffmann shared two passions: music and literature. Hoffmann was particularly influenced by the novels of Johann Wolfgang von GOETHE and the plays of Friedrich SCHILLER and William Shakespeare. In music, Hoffmann adored the operas of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (Hoffmann added the letter A to his first name in honor of Mozart).

Hoffmann studied law at Königsberg's university but seemingly without inspiration. On graduation, Hoffmann moved to Glogów in Silesia to study law under the guidance of his uncle Johann Ludwig Doerffer, an established provincial judiciary. Between 1798 and 1800, Hoffmann served as an intern in the high court of Berlin. Hoffmann was quite successful in his law career, and he was promoted to supervise the jurisdiction of Posen in South Prussia. In 1816, Hoffmann attained a high position in the Supreme Court at Berlin.

Hoffmann began his artistic career as a composer rather than as a writer. He worked as a musical director, composer, and theatrical critic until 1814 when he finally recognized that he would never be a great composer. Many of Hoffmann's stories, however, reflect his passion for music. In "Don Juan" (1813), for instance, a hotel guest undergoes a supernatural transformation while watching a performance of Mozart's opera Don Giovanni. In "Councilor Krespel" (1816), a young girl dies when she is forced to produce the perfect voice.

Hoffmann's themes often deal with the magical, grotesque, or supernatural experience. His fiction is considered to be among early works of horror and fantasy. Furthermore, it was difficult for Hoffmann to reconcile his two seemingly conflicting roles as bureaucrat and artist, and this internal conflict is often reflected in his works. "The Golden Pot" (1816) presents the conflict between the world of the artist and the mundane, spiritually destructive world of the bourgeoisie. In another tale, "Das Fräulein von Scuderi" (1819), Hoffmann depicts a respectable goldsmith who becomes a heartless criminal at night.

In time, Hoffmann was seen as the heart of late German romanticism. Quite ironically, many of Hoffmann's literary masterpieces were transformed into musical masterpieces. The best known of these is the "Nutcracker and the Mouse King" (1816). The famous German composer Offenbach composed an opera based on the life and tales of Hoffmann, The Tales of Hoffmann, which is still widely popular.

Of his longer works, The Devil's Elixir (1816), the most popular, depicts the travels and adventures of an 18th-century Capuchin monk, Brother Medardus. This strange tale combines Gothic and grotesque elements and portrays several shocking situations, such as rape and scandalous murder-intrigues of the pope's court. The work was praised for its intricate plot and psychological complexity.

E. T. A. Hoffmann was perhaps one of the most influential writers in the world. Many of the psychological theories of Carl Jung and Sigmund FREUD are based on Hoffmann's work, specifically Freud's theory of the uncanny. Furthermore, Hoffmann was one of the most influential figures for Russian romanticism, inspiring numerous writers and composers to the present day. In the United States, Hoffmann became the main inspiration for the dark, nightmarish fiction of Edgar Allan Poe. Despite his failure as a composer, Hoffmann's work as a writer inspired some of the world's greatest and most remembered musical masterpieces. His work has been translated into more than 20 languages.

Other Works by E. T. A. Hoffmann

The Life and Opinions of the Tomcat Murr. Translated by Anthea Bell. New York: Penguin, 1999.

The Tales of Hoffmann. Translated by R. J. Hollingdale. New York: Penguin, 1990.

A Work about E. T. A. Hoffmann

McGlathery, James. E. T. A. Hoffmann. Boston: Twayne, 1997.

Hofmannsthal, Hugo von (Loris, Loris Melikow, Theophil Morren) (1874–1929) poet, dramatist, essayist

Hugo von Hofmannsthal was born in Vienna, Austria, to Hugo August Peter Hofmann, the director of a large investment bank, and Anna

Maria Josefa Fohleutner, a brewing heiress. Hofmannsthal studied with private tutors and attended the Akademisches Gymnasium, one of Vienna's most prominent schools. There, he published poetry and wrote his first play at age 16. Hofmannsthal studied law and French at Vienna University and earned a doctorate in romance literature in 1899. Two years later, he married Gerty Schlesinger, the daughter of the general secretary of the Anglo-Austrian Bank.

Hofmannsthal's early poems and essays made him a literary sensation in Vienna. In the early 1890s, Hofmannsthal became part of a prominent circle of young writers known as Young Vienna. For a short time, he had close ties with the poet Stefan GEORGE. Hofmannsthal wrote his best poems in the mid-1890s. His early works, such as Der Tor und der Tod (Death and the Fool, 1893), were characterized by Viennese aestheticism and FIN-DE-SIÈCLE melancholy.

After the turn of the century, Hofmannsthal abandoned aestheticism and turned from poetry to plays and essays. The composer Richard Strauss (1864–1949) used Hofmannsthal's play Elektra (1904) for the libretto, or text, of an opera. Hofmannsthal later wrote five more librettos for Strauss. After World War I, Hofmannsthal's increasing anxiety over the decline of Western civilization can be seen in his play Der Turm (The Tower, 1925), in which Hofmannsthal addresses the question of whether a decaying society can be renewed through revolutionary violence.

Although Hofmannsthal's later critics saw him as an elitist defender of outdated conservative values, his works still command popular and critical attention. German literary scholar Claude Hall described Hofmannsthal as "a great theatrical showman who aimed at reproducing the macrocosm of the world and his dreams in the microcosm of the stage."

Other Works by Hugo von Hofmannsthal

The Lyrical Poems of Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Translated by Charles Wharton Stark. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1918.

Selected Plays and Libretti. Michael Hamburger, ed. New York: Pantheon Books, 1963.

Works about Hugo von Hofmannsthal

Coghlan, Brian. Hofmannsthal's Festival Dramas. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1964.

Vilain, Robert. The Poetry of Hugo von Hofmannsthal and French Symbolism. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Hölderlin, Friedrich (1770–1843) poet, novelist

Friedrich Hölderlin was born in Lauffen am Neckar, Germany. His father, an administrator at a local monastery, died when Hölderlin was two years old. His mother, Johanna Christina Hölderlin, married the mayor of Nürtingen, Johann Christoph Gok, a few years later. In childhood, Hölderlin read intensely, including the classics and was fluent in Greek and Latin by the age of 12. At 14, he began to write poems. In 1788, under the guidance of his stepfather, Hölderlin entered the University of Tübingen to pursue studies in theology. He graduated with a master's degree.

During Hölderlin's studies at the university, his interests in theology began to fade away. He became a close friend of Friedrich Wilhelm Hegel (1770–1831), an important philosopher whose theories became the foundation for revolutionary thinking. Hölderlin also became involved in liberalism and passionately admired the ideals of the French Revolution. In 1793, Hölderlin met Friedrich von SCHILLER, one of the most important literary figures of German ROMANTICISM, who agreed to publish several of Hölderlin's poems.

In 1793, Hölderlin began work as a private tutor. Employed by Jacob Gontard, a wealthy Frankfurt banker, he fell in love with Gontard's wife, Susette. Although the love affair was platonic, it had a deep impact on the psyche of the young poet. In many of his famous poems, Susette appears as the mysterious "Diotima." Hölderlin eventually left Frankfurt in 1798, but the two continued to meet secretly and to corresponded frequently with each other.

Hölderlin briefly worked in France as a private tutor. During this period, his mental health was becoming unstable. In 1802, Hölderlin returned to Germany in the advanced stages of schizophrenia. After learning about Susette's death in 1805, Hölderlin suffered a complete psychological breakdown and spent the last 36 years of his life in an unstable state of mind. He died in poverty and virtual obscurity.

Critical Analysis

Combining the elements of classicism and ROMANTICISM, Hölderlin did not exclusively belong to either of the two dominant literary movements of his day. He tended to use classical verse form and syntax in his poetry, following the teachings of Friedrich Klopstock (1724–1803), who attempted to perfect the German language by modeling it to a classical form. From the Romantics, Hölderlin borrowed a rich but convoluted tradition of mystical nature, pantheism, and Christianity. He referred to notions of the cosmos and history to assign some poetic meaning to a world that was collapsing before his eyes. By following and enriching the German philosophical tradition, he greatly contributed to the formation of German idealism, a term usually used to define liberal, philosophical trends during and after the French Revolution.

Hölderlin's most famous novel, Hyperion (1797–99), focuses on the young Greek of ancient mythology who takes up arms to fight the Turkish oppression in his homeland. The novel virtually has no plot; Hyperion's beauty rises from its lyrical, dithyrambic (highly emotional) language combined with a deep knowledge of Greek antiquity. The romance of the novel is developed in the form of letters between Hyperion and his beloved. Hyperion has often been celebrated as a masterpiece of German literature. It certainly impressed Friedrich Schiller when the young Hölderlin presented the manuscript of the novel to the famous poet, who encouraged Hölderlin to continue his work.

The vast majority of Hölderlin's work deals with heroic themes or subjects. In his poetry, he preferred to maintain classical verse measures. He dedicated an ode to French emperor Napoleon Bonaparte (titled "Bonaparte" (1798), in which he compares Bonaparte to a poet:

*Poets are holy vessels
In which the wine of life,
The spirit of heroes is preserved.
But this young man's spirit,
The quick—would it not burst,
Any vessel that tried to contain it?*

Hölderlin's verse, especially in its attention to the preservation of classical Greek measures, seems, at the same time, both heroic and rugged. The lyricism is achieved through carefully selected images and irregular lines. Hölderlin's verse became popular, especially among students of philosophy for its liberal inclinations and romantic celebration of life.

In a series of poems to his beloved Diotima, Hölderlin reveals a delicate control of the classical image. In "Diotima" (1797), Hölderlin reveals the full potential of his poetic mind: "Beautiful thing, you live as do delicate blossoms in winter / In a world that's grown old hidden your blossom, alone." The Diotima poems are considered among the greatest lyrical poems in the German language. Hölderlin dedicated the last years of his life to translating Sophocles' works into German. His translations are still considered superb.

Friedrich Hölderlin did not achieve the recognition that his works enjoy today until the early part of the 20th century. Hölderlin was the favorite poet of Friedrich NIETZSCHE, and Martin Heidegger referred to Hölderlin as "a poet's poet." Today, Hölderlin is considered second only to GOETHE. In many respects, Hölderlin is still being rediscovered for the beauty of his poetic form and the magnificent control of his poetic lines.

Other Works by Friedrich Hölderlin

Hymns and Fragments. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.

Selected Poems and Fragments. New York: Penguin, 1998.

Works about Friedrich Hölderlin

Fioretos, Aris. The Solid Letter: Readings of Friedrich Hölderlin. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 2000.

Unger, Richard. Friedrich Hölderlin. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Höllerer, Walter (1922–) poet, critic

Walter Höllerer was born in the Bavarian town of Sulzbach-Rosenberg. During World War II, he served in the German military on the Mediterranean front. After the war, he studied at universities in Erlangen, Göttingen, and Heidelberg, earning a doctorate in 1949 in comparative literature. Höllerer then began a long career as a professor of German and comparative literature at Frankfurt University, the Technical University of Berlin, and the University of Illinois. He co-founded and edited the journals Akzente (Accents) and Sprache im technischen Zeitalter (Language in the Technological Age). In 1977 he founded the Archives for Contemporary German Literature in Sulzbach-Rosenberg.

Höllerer's first collection Der andere Gast (The Other Guest), (1952) contains many poems written in classical meters. Four years later, he edited Transit (1956), a significant anthology of German poetry. Höllerer published three more volumes of verse in the 1960s. During the following decade, he wrote the novel Die Elephantenuhr (The Elephant Clock), (1973), a complicated work that reflects his perception of chaos in the contemporary world. His comedy Alle Vögel alle (All the Birds), (1978) is a composition that was influenced by his conception of semiology.

In addition to his writing and editing, Höllerer attained recognition in his versatile career as a scholar, critic, and literary theorist. He was also a prominent member of the German writers' association GRUPPE 47. Although his early poetry contained traditional forms, Höllerer later became more progressive, writing experimental lyrical poems. His view of literature emphasized its role in communicating art, science, and everyday life. Because he has spent much time and energy promoting the careers of young authors, Höllerer's influence in German literature will likely remain strong well into the 21st century.

Another Work by Walter Höllerer

Gedichte 1942–1982. Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1982.

A Work about Walter Höllerer

Frisch, Max. Dramaturgisches: ein Briefwechsel mit Walter Höllerer. Berlin: Literarisches Colloquium, 1976.

Hsieh Wan-ying

See BING XIN.

Hu Shih (Hu Hongxin) (1891–1962) poet, scholar, critic

Born on December 17 in Shanghai, Hu Shih was educated first by private tutors and then in Shanghai schools. He entered China College in 1906, where he published essays and poems in a school paper, Emulation, which he later edited. Hu Shih traveled to the United States to study agriculture at Cornell University in 1910 but soon switched to literature and philosophy. He completed his Ph.D. in philosophy at Columbia University under the department head, John Dewey.

Greatly influenced by his studies of imagist poetry, American literature, and his experiences in the United States, Hu Shih wrote an article considered by many to have brought about the era of modern Chinese literature. "Suggestions for a Reform of Literature" was published in 1919 in the popular journal New Youth and made him one of the leading intellectuals of the anti-imperialist May Fourth Movement. In his article, Hu Shih encouraged writing that addressed substantive and timely issues and that was innovative and fresh and used accessible language, particularly baihua, the Chinese vernacular.

Hu Shih himself was one of the first to attempt baihua poetry in a 1920 volume titled Experiments. Although the literary quality of the poems is considered only fair, the style was, nonetheless, a pioneering work in modern poetry. Hu Shih incorporated innovations such as writing without traditional meters, transcribing Western names into verse, and writing in a pragmatic and impersonal style.

As one of the leading literary intellectuals in the 1920s and 1930s, Hu Shih criticized official corruption and vice in the ranks of leadership. He also expressed grave concern over the condition of workers, especially the particularly disadvantaged—women, rural poor, and factory laborers. He was known as a radical for being a Confucian realist who combined classical Confucian and Daoist thought with modern pragmatism, individualism, and secular humanism. He also supported opening China to Western ideas and influence while maintaining China's classical traditions and thought.

At the time, Hu Shih was considered China's foremost man of letters, as well as a cultural icon. As a result, he enjoyed prestige and acclaim. After serving as ambassador to the United States from 1938 until 1942, he presided over the prestigious Beijing University from 1946 until 1949 when he moved to the United States to direct the Gest Oriental Library at Princeton.

Hu Shih continued his focus on scholarship, studying the 18th-century Chinese classic by Cao Xueqin, Dream of the Red Chamber, praising its autobiographical angle. His studies prompted the onset of his own persecution in China because officials felt that his scholarship that addressed the novel's literary form undermined its political importance as an exposé of feudal society and the traditional family system. Party conservatives also viewed him as overly Westernized. As he was politically moderate, Hu Shih was also reviled for his increasing distance from revolutionary thought.

Hu Shih, however, remained undeterred. Throughout his career, he produced reference and scholarly works, including An Outline of the History of Chinese Philosophy in 1919. He also translated a wide selection of writers from the Americans Bret Harte and John Dewey to the French writer Alphonse Daudet. Hu Shih moved to Taiwan in 1958 to serve as the president of the country's highest cultural institution, the Academia Sinica. He remained in Taiwan until his death.

Another Work by Hu Shih

A Hu Shi Reader. New Haven, Conn.: Yale Far Eastern Publications, 1991.

Works about Hu Shih

Goldman, Merle. Modern Chinese Literature in the May Fourth Era. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1977.

Grieder, Jerome B. Hu Shih and the Chinese Renaissance: Liberalism in the Chinese Revolution, 1917–1937. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1970.

Huang Chunming (Huang Ch'un-ming) (1939–) short-story writer, satirist

Huang Chunming was born in Yilan, a small coastal town in Taiwan on February 13. He ran away from home after his mother's death and wandered from place to place, performing odd jobs. This pattern continued with his schooling as he drifted from college to college until he graduated from Pingtung Normal College and as he worked at various jobs, as schoolteacher, freelance musicologist, radio program editor, television producer, and documentary filmmaker. As a writer, he has created a small but distinctive body of work that is known for its national and popular appeal.

In the late 1960s, Huang Chunming's main theme is the agrarian fight against the disintegrating effects of modernization on their communities. Because he traveled frequently through the countryside, he was in tune with the particular trials of agrarian workers. Although concerned with the fate of individuals who were faced with a rapidly changing and increasingly modern society, he was not a traditionalist; he simply objected to the often dehumanizing aspects of progress. One of his most famous stories, “His Son’s Big Doll” (1968), illustrates how commercialization undermines individual dignity—a father accepts a job as a walking costumed advertisement and dreads being discovered by his young son. Other stories, such as “The Drowning of an Old Cat” (1967), directly address official corruption.

Huang Chunming’s literary style is simple, similar to folk writing, and although it largely portrays realistic images of rural life, it is modern. His views—universal and anti-imperialistic—and his progressive politics render him a modern teller of folk stories.

A self-described vagabond and free spirit, Huang Chunming presently spends most of his time as a scholar and practitioner of folk culture. He researches and compiles Taiwanese folk songs and documents Taiwanese festivals on film, in addition to writing stories that celebrate the common people and folk life.

Another Work by Huang Chunming

The Drowning of an Old Cat and Other Stories. Translated by Howard Goldblatt. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1980.

Works about Huang Chunming

“Father’s Writings Have Been Republished: Or, The Sexuality of Women Students in a Taipei Bookstore.” In Helmut Martin and Jeffrey Kinkley, eds., Modern Chinese Writers: Self-Portrayals. Armonk, N.Y.: M.E. Sharpe, 1992.

Goldblatt, Howard. “The Rural Stories of Huang Chunming.” In Jeannette L. Faurot, ed., Chinese Fiction from Taiwan: Critical Perspectives. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1980.

Huchel, Peter (1903–1981) poet

Peter Huchel was born in Berlin to Friedrich Huchel, a civil servant, and Marie (Zimmermann) Huchel. He grew up in Mark Brandenburg and studied literature at Humboldt University, the University of Freiburg, and the University of Vienna. Huchel supported himself as a writer and translator before serving in the German army during World War II. From 1945 to 1948, he edited, produced, and directed for East German radio and in 1948 edited Sinn und Form (Meaning and Form), making it one of the most respected liberal European literary journals. He was fired in 1962, however, for not following the government’s SOCIALIST-REALISM principles in his editorial policy. Huchel later moved to West Germany and married Nora Rosenthal in 1953.

Huchel published his early poems in journals in the 1920s. In 1932, he won the literary prize of the leftist journal Die Kolonne (The Column). After World War II, he published many of his early poems in Gedichte (Poems, 1948). His later collections included Chausseen Chausseen (Highways Highways, 1963) and Die Neunte Stunde (The Ninth Hour, 1979). Huchel won numerous literary awards, including the National Prize in 1951.

His influences included the poets Oskar Loerke and Wilhelm Lehmann. Many of his poems about nature describe the magic and mystery of the landscape near his hometown of Mark Brandenburg, and critics have praised the effective use of rhyme, meter, assonance, and alliteration in his early verse. After falling out of favor with the East German government, Huchel became withdrawn and isolated. His later writing used less rhyme and meter, and his poems were elegiac, melancholy, and pessimistic. Despite the opposition he faced, Huchel retained his principles and integrity. Literary scholar Ian Hilton wrote that “Huchel swam against the tide to remain stubbornly independent—and survived, albeit with difficulty.”

Another Work by Peter Huchel

Selected Poems. Translated by Michael Hamburger. Manchester, U.K.: Carcanet Press, 1974.

A Work about Peter Huchel

Hilton, Ian. Peter Huchel: Plough a Lonely Furrow. Dundee, Scotland: Lochee Publications, 1986.

Hugo, Victor (1802–1885) novelist, poet, dramatist

Now best known internationally for his novels on which the acclaimed Broadway musicals Les Misérables and Notre Dame de Paris were based, Victor Hugo was born in Besançon on February 22. His father, an army general, taught him a great admiration of Napoleon, as a young child; however, as a result of his parent's separation, he moved to Paris to live with his mother and her lover, Hugo's father's former commanding officer. The lover was executed in 1812 for plotting against Napoleon, an event that set up a conflicting ideology within the impressionable young Hugo.

As a youth, Hugo's views tended toward the conservative, but he grew to become deeply involved in republican politics, the essence of which provided the theme for many of his works. From 1815 to 1818, while attending the lycée Louis-le-Grand in Paris, he began to write poems and tragic verses. He also translated the works of Virgil and, in 1819, with the help of his brothers, founded the literary review Conservateur Littéraire. Inspired by François René de CHATEAUBRIAND, Hugo began to publish poetry, gaining both recognition and a pension from Louis XVIII. His debut novel Han d'Islande (1823) appeared shortly thereafter.

Hugo married Adèle Foucher in 1822. Their wedding was eventful because Hugo's brother, distraught over losing a longtime rivalry for her affections, went insane on the day of the ceremony and spent the remainder of his life institutionalized. This event had a profound effect on the psychological motivations for several of Hugo's characters.

Critical Analysis

Hugo came into contact with a number of liberal writers in the 1820s, and his own political views began to shift from criticizing Napoleon to glorifying him. He also became involved in the literary debate between French CLASSICISM and ROMANTICISM. Although he was not directly involved in political movements at this time, Hugo nevertheless expressed his admiration for romanticism and its values in his works. The preface to his drama, Cromwell (1827), placed him at the forefront of the romanticists. His play Hernani (1830), about two lovers who poison each other, caused a riot between classicists and romanticists.

Hugo gained lasting fame with Notre-Dame de Paris (1831; translated 1833), the story, set in 15th-century Paris, of a deformed and hunchbacked bell-ringer, Quasimodo, who falls deeply in love with a beautiful gypsy girl, Esmeralda. His love, however, is a tragic one: Esmeralda is in love with another man, Captain Phoebus, and an evil priest, Claude Frollo, seeks after her. When Frollo discovers that Esmeralda loves Phoebus, he murders his rival, and Esmeralda is accused of the crime. Quasimodo provides sanctuary for his distraught love in the cathedral, but Frollo finds her. When she rejects him, he leaves her to be executed. Grief-stricken, Quasimodo throws the priest from the cathedral tower and vanishes. Later, it is discovered that there are not one but two skeletons in Esmeralda's tomb, locked in an eternal embrace, a beautiful gypsy and the hunchback who loved her. The story was well received and has since become a prominent cultural myth.

Following the success of Notre-Dame de Paris, Hugo published several volumes of lyric poetry, all of which were also successful. He was considered by many to be the greatest poet of the day. These poems were inspired by an actress, Juliette Drouet, with whom Hugo had an affair that lasted until her death in 1882. His principal poetic works include Les Orientales (1829), Feuilles d'automne (Autumn's Leaves, 1831), Chants du crépuscule (Twilight Songs, 1835), and Voix intérieures (Inner Voices, 1837). The poems in these collections are rich in language and intensely sexual, but they also carry a trace of Hugo's growing bitterness toward life.

Becoming disillusioned with the political and cultural values of France, Hugo finally took a stand and became involved in republican politics. In 1841 he was elected to the prestigious Académie Française, an achievement largely overshadowed a few short years later by the death of his beloved daughter Léopoldine. So distraught was Hugo over her loss that it was a full decade before he began to publish again. Instead, he devoted his time and energy to politics and the promotion of social justice.

In 1851, Napoleon III claimed complete power in France. Fearing for his life as a result of his openly republican beliefs, Hugo fled with Juliette Drouet first to Brussels and then to the Channel Islands. This exile, which was to last 20 years, provided him with the opportunity to produce some of his best-known works including, most notably, Les Misérables (1862; translated 1862). An epic tale of social injustice told from the perspective of Jean Valjean, imprisoned and labeled a criminal for life because he stole a loaf of bread, the novel spectacularly depicts the conditions of post-Napoleonic France.

The political upheaval in France after Napoleon III fell from power and the proclamation of the Third Republic allowed Hugo to return to France in 1870. Labeled a national hero, he was elected as member of the National Assembly and then as a senator of the Third Republic. The last two decades of Hugo's life, however, were marked by tragedy that included the deaths of his sons, his wife, and his mistress. He continued to write poetry and remained active in politics until his health began to fail 1878. Hugo died in Paris on May 22. His funeral was a national event attended by 2 million people. Hugo is buried in the Panthéon.

Other Works by Victor Hugo

The Distance, The Shadows: Selected Poems. Translated by Harry Guest. London: Anvil Press Poetry in association with Wildwood House, 1981.

History of a Crime. Translated by Huntington Smith. New York: T. Y. Crowell and Co., 1888.

The Last Day of a Condemned Man. Translated by Geoff Woollen. London: Hesperus Press, 2003.

La Légende des Siècles. Mamaroneck, N.Y.: Gerard Hamon, 1965.

Oeuvres Poétiques, Vol. 2 Avec: Les Châtiments et Les Contemplations. New York: French and European Publications, 1987.

Things Seen. Translated by David Kimber. London: Oxford University Press, 1964.

Works about Victor Hugo

Frey, John Andrew. A Victor Hugo Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.

Porter, Laurence M. Victor Hugo. Boston: Twayne, 1999.

Huysmans, Joris-Karl (Charles-Marie-Georges Huysmans) (1848–1907) poet, novelist, essayist

Joris-Karl Huysmans, a writer and art critic first associated with the NATURALIST movement who became prominent in the French decadent movement (see DECADENCE), was born in Paris on February 5. His father died when Huysmans was eight years old, a traumatic experience that would influence his later works, many of which, such as À Rebours (Against Nature, 1884), Là-bas (Down There, 1891), and La Cathédrale (The Cathedral, 1898), trace the author's conversion to Catholicism through Satanism.

Huysmans's first work, Le Drageoir aux épices (A Dish of Spices, 1874), was comprised of a series of prose poems that were stylistically similar to those of Charles BAUDELAIRE. He published it at his own expense, taking on the pseudonym of Joris-Karl Huysmans. The work captured the attention of writer Emile ZOLA and was followed by Huysmans's publication of several naturalistic novels, including Marthe, histoire d'une fille (Martha, the story of a girl, 1876), Les Soeurs Vatar (The Vatar Sisters, 1879), and En ménage (1881). He also served in the Franco-Prussian War and wrote Sac au dos (1880) about his experiences.

In 1877, Huysmans began to turn away from naturalism. À Rebours explores decadence. This misogynistic work, while important in its own right, was also influential in the decadent movement. Oscar Wilde refers to it as the "poisonous yellow book” that causes the downfall of his famous protagonist Dorian Gray. The dark comedy tells of a wealthy aristocrat, Des Esseintes, who experiments with exotic, often erotic, pleasures to the point at which he cannot face the real world for fear that it will be mediocre in comparison. He attempts to overcome nature by turning it into an object of art.

Huysmans’s later novels, including Là-bas, are highly autobiographical and trace the spiritual search of a man named Durtal, who experiments with satanism and attends a Black Mass. The work went on to become prominent for its depiction of satanic rites and for its mention of several well-known occultists of the FIN DE SIECLE in Paris.

In the early 1890s, Huysmans experienced a crisis of faith and returned to the Catholic Church. His novels En route (1895) and La Cathédrale trace his spiritual journey. Taken as a whole, his works are both erotic and spiritual in nature and rich and intoxicating in language. Huysmans remained a staunch Roman Catholic until his death from cancer on May 12.

Another Work by Joris-Karl Huysmans

The Road from Decadence: From Brothel to Cloister: Selected Letters of J. K. Huysmans. Translated by Barbara Beaumont. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1989.

A Work about Joris-Karl Huysmans

Ridge, George Ross. Joris-Karl Huysmans. Boston: Twayne, 1968.

Hwang Sun-won (1915–2001) poet, fiction writer

Hwang Sun-won was born on March 26 in Taedong, a county in modern-day North Korea. He published his first poem in 1931 while he was still in high school; by the end of the 1930s, he was regularly publishing poems and short stories. Graduating from Waseda University in Japan with a B.A. in English in 1939, he published his first short-story collection, The Swamp, in 1940. The volume is largely comprised of nostalgic stories of country folk that focus on childhood or the loss of innocence. Hwang Sun-won wrote in the dialect of his home province of Pyonganam and in a sparse and minimalist style that would become his trademark.

Hwang Sun-won is known for his reverence for life and humanity and for maintenance of an optimistic outlook even when writing critically. Although he began his career with the sentimental stories of rural Korea, the content of his work changed as Korea moved through history. In 1945, Korea was liberated from Japanese colonial rule and the postliberation period provided the backdrop for his first novel, Living with the Stars (1945). The next year, Hwang Sun-won and his family moved to Seoul, where he taught high school.

Affected by the outbreak of civil war in 1950, Hwang Sun-won wrote pieces, such as the novel Trees on a Cliff (1960), that reflect upon the tragic consequences of war for humanity. After the war divided Korea into north and south, he wrote The Descendants of Cain (1959), a novel featuring characters on a farm and highlighting the class disparity between landowners and tenant farmers. Although a traditional love story, it primarily criticizes the Communist North Korean regime’s land-reform policies. Eventually, Hwang Sun-won turned his attention to the dehumanizing urban areas, where an increasing number of Koreans had settled.

Hwang Sun-won taught at Kyung Hee University from 1955 to 1993. He has received many prizes and awards for his work, including the Freedom Literary Award in 1955 and the Republic of Korea Literary Award in 1983. His son, HWANG TONGGYU, carries on his literary legacy as a respected poet.

Other Works by Hwang Sun-won

The Book of Masks. Translated by Martin Holman. London: Readers International, 1976.

The Stars. Translated by Edward W. Poitras. Singapore City: Heinemann Asia, 1980.

A Work about Hwang Sun-won

Epstein, Stephen J. "Elusive Narrators in Hwang Sun-won." In Korean Studies, 19 (1995).

Hwang Tonggyu (Hwang Tong-gyu)

(1938–) poet

Hwang Tonggyu was born on April 9 in Seoul to one of Korea's most famous writers, HWANG SUN-WON. He studied English literature at Seoul National University, graduating in 1961, and continued his graduate studies at Dongguk University. He completed further scholarship abroad, first at Scotland's Edinburgh University (1966–67) and then at the University of Iowa (1970–71).

Hwang Tonggyu's extensive training abroad affected his writing style. He blends the lyricism of traditional Korean poetry with Western modernism. As a result, his works are both contemplative and critical. He published his first volume of poems, One Fine Day, in 1961, followed by Sad Songs in 1965, moving from the abstract to concrete examinations of daily life. By the time he released Snow That Falls on the Three Southern Provinces in 1975, he had shifted from writing about daily life to Korea's social and political climate in quiet protest poems, such as "Song Under Martial Law." This shift evolved into a growing search for self that often manifested itself in dark and harrowing verse, such as "Lips." These poems in turn, evolved into a deep examination of metaphysics and death ("Flight").

Hwang Tonggyu continues to write, and his works are widely translated into many languages, especially English, German, and French. As a specialist in English-language poetry, he also translates Western works such as Robert Lowell and T.S. Eliot. He currently teaches English and American poetry at Seoul National University. In 1987, he served as an exchange professor at New York University. He lives in Seoul with his wife and two children.

Other Works by Hwang Tonggyu

Strong Winds at Mishi Pass. Groveport, Ohio: White Pines Press, 2001.

Wind Burial: Selected Poems of Hwang Tonggyu. Laurenberg, N.C.: St. Andrew's Press, 1990.

Ibsen, Henrik (1828–1906) dramatist, playwright, poet

Henrik Ibsen was born in Skien, Norway, into a wealthy merchant family. While Ibsen was very young, his father suffered financial losses, and the family verged on poverty, no longer able to afford Ibsen's solid education. Young Ibsen developed a deep distrust for society and engaged in drunkenness and gambling. He also fathered an illegitimate child at the age of 18. To evade the social repercussions of his relationship with a servant girl, he was forced to support the child financially.

In 1850, Ibsen moved to Oslo to prepare for entrance into the university, but he failed to pass the entrance examinations. Becoming involved in radical politics, he joined a revolutionary group, but after the group was broken up by the government, Ibsen disengaged himself from politics for the rest of his life. During these years in Oslo, Ibsen began to write articles for various journals. He also wrote poetry and a play, neither of which was successful.

In 1851, Ibsen was appointed "stage poet" for a small provincial theater in Bergen. Ibsen wrote several early plays based on the history and folklore of Norway. Although these works were by no means Ibsen's greatest efforts, the theater management soon recognized Ibsen's talent as a playwright. In 1852, the theater sent Ibsen on a study tour to Denmark and Germany.

Returning to Norway in 1857, Ibsen was appointed director of the newly formed Norwegian Theater in Oslo. After several unsuccessful productions, the theater went bankrupt. Ibsen was reappointed to the Oslo Theater, where he attempted to establish his reputation as a playwright with a series of historical dramas. They were poorly received, and Ibsen was often publicly humiliated by their criticism.

The Norwegian government provided Ibsen with a grant to study in Italy and Germany. He left in 1863 and lived abroad until 1891. Ibsen's reputation as a playwright was established in the late 1860s with production of several successful pieces, including Brand (1866), in which a minister takes his calling too seriously, and Peer Gynt (1867), in which a man lacking in character finds redemption in the love of a woman. In 1866, Ibsen was granted an annual pension from the Norwegian government. When Ibsen returned to Norway in 1891, he was known as one of the world's greatest dramatists.

Critical Analysis

Henrik Ibsen's drama often focused on the realistic psychological complexities of the individual, and his work was much more focused on character than on plot. One of the central conflicts in Ibsen's drama is between characters who seek to realize themselves emotionally and spiritually and the barriers that have been created by outdated conventions of bourgeois society. Ibsen was often seen as a progressive, liberal thinker by younger generations outside Norway; in Norway, however, Ibsen was generally viewed as a conservative playwright, writing against the tide of increasing pressures of modern times. The themes of Ibsen's work are still debated by contemporary audiences and scholars.

Peer Gynt (1867) tells the story of a young man raised on the traditional fairy tales of Norway. Peer leads an irresponsible life, drinking, lying, and ruining young women's reputations. The epic play describes Peer's fantastical journey through the world. Peer becomes a slave dealer and a prophet and finally finds himself alone, wandering through the desert. When Peer returns home, he finds himself spiritually ruined because of the immoral life that he led in the past. In the end, Peer is saved by the love of Salvg, one of the women he abandoned. The play is a combination of psychological realism and folklore. This popular play was set to music by the famous Norwegian composer Edvard Grieg (1843–1907).

Ibsen's most famous work of realism, A Doll's House (1879), presents a tragic conflict in a middle-class family. Nora, the mother of three children, is treated like a doll by her husband. Faced with a familial conflict, Nora suddenly matures, realizing that she needs to leave her family to fulfill herself spiritually. The play created much controversy throughout Europe: Ibsen's representation of a woman who leaves her family in pursuit of spiritual fulfillment was seen as disturbing and unconventional. The realistic portrayal of the middle-class household also hurt bourgeois sentimentality. Despite the criticism, the play caused quite a sensation, and it toured Europe and America. The play remains Ibsen's most widely read and produced work.

Hedda Gabler (1890), the story of a woman who cannot resolve a conflict between her inner self and what society demands of her, was roundly condemned by many when it was first produced. A contemporary critic, Hjalmer Boyeson, called her "a complete perversion of womanhood." But Hedda is a character of tremendous complexity who continues to intrigue audiences.

Ibsen's most controversial play, however, was Ghosts (1881), which tells the story of the wife of a terrible drunk who sacrifices herself to the undesirable marriage because of social conventions. Their son is unknowingly engaged in a love affair with his half-sister, an illegitimate child of the father and a servant woman. The mother sends her son away, hoping that he will change. The son returns years later, the very picture of his father. He begins to suffer from syphilis, which he inherited from his father. The mother is faced with the difficult choice of administering poison to her son at his request or watching him go through complete psychological and physical degeneration. The subject of venereal disease was not seen as appropriate for theater. The play was bitterly criticized by the conservative segments of the public. Ghosts attacks the accepted social conventions of marriage and presents them as destructive to individual happiness.

Although Henrik Ibsen's talent was recognized during his lifetime, today his works enjoy the unanimous acclaim of the critics. Some of Ibsen's topics are still seen as controversial by many audiences. Ibsen is probably among the most influential playwrights in the development of modern drama. He anticipates the modern themes of alienation and the smothering pressure to conform that society exerts on individuals.

Other Works by Henrik Ibsen

Brand. Translated by Robert David McDonald. New York: Theater Communications Group, 1997.

Four Great Plays: Ghosts, An Enemy of the People, The Wild Duck, A Doll's House. Translated by R. Sharp. New York: Bantam, 1981.

Hedda Gabler and Other Plays. Translated by Una Ellis-Fermor. New York: Penguin, 1988.

Works about Henrik Ibsen

Clurman, Harold. Ibsen. New York: Da Capo Press, 1989.

Rose, Henry. Henrik Ibsen: Poet, Mystic, and Moralist. New York: Haskell, 1972.

Idris, Yūsuf (1927–1991) novelist

Yūsuf Idris was born in a small Egyptian village in the district of Sharqīyyah. His father was a middle-class farmer, and Idris's family moved frequently in the 1930s. He was brought up in his grandmother's house, where he was the only child in the household. When Idris was five years old, he attended primary school in a nearby village. He was the youngest student in the school, and his inability to relate to the other students or to his grandmother led Idris to seek consolation in reading folktales and popular stories. His interest in storytelling increased when he was sent to live with his elderly uncle, who had a rich supply of stories.

The outbreak of World War II forced Idris to move to different schools to avoid the violence. When the war ended, he studied medicine at Cairo University, becoming increasingly involved in the students' nationalist movement, which had its center in the department of medicine. Idris's political activities led to his arrest and exposed him to the political turmoil following the war.

In the 1940s, he became friends with the Chekhovian writer Muhammad Yusri Ahmad, who recognized and encouraged Idris's gift for storytelling. In 1950, Idris published his first short story. During the next 10 years, he wrote prolifically. In his first collection of short stories, Arkhas layali (The Cheapest Nights, 1954), Idris focuses mainly on people from impoverished and oppressed backgrounds, and he examines different character types from various occupations, social classes, and age groups. Idris did not write with the intention to shock readers with the oppressive circumstances of his characters' existence but rather to illuminate the subtle optimism and endurance that his characters possessed. For example, in "The Cheapest Nights," the title story of his collection, the main protagonist, besieged with increasing problems that exacerbate his poverty, eventually discovers that his only means of finding salvation is to try and create peace from his situation.

Idris's works resonate with vivid depictions, bold ideas, and intelligible presentation. His creative imagination, which he developed as a child, is artistically mixed with his sharp observation and understanding of the human situation. Idris's writings are celebrated because he presents familiar characters and situations from new perspectives. His writing style is powerful and provocative, and his novels and short stories explode with energy. Idris's political views and his determination to revolt against injustice remained strong, and his views often found expression in the stories he wrote.

Other Works by Yūsuf Idris

In the Eye of the Beholder: Tales of Egyptian Life. Edited by Roger Allen. Minneapolis: Bibliotheca Islamica, 1978.

Rings of Burnished Brass. Translated by Catherine Cobham. Cairo: American University in Cairo Press, 1992.

The Piper Dies and Other Stories. Translated by Dalya Cohen-Mor. Potomac, Md.: Sheba Press, 1992.

Three Egyptian Short Stories. Translated by Saad al-Gabalawy. Timonium, Md.: York Press, 1991.

Works about Yūsuf Idris

Allen, Roger M. A., ed. Critical Perspectives on Yūsuf Idris. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner, 1994.

Cobham, Catherine. "Sex and Society in Yūsuf Idris: 'Qa al-Madina.'" Journal of Arabic Literature 6 (1975).

Cohen-Mor, Dalya. Yūsuf Idris: Changing Visions. Potomac, Md.: Sheba Press, 1992.

Kurpershoek, P. M. The Short Stories of Yūsuf Idris: A Modern Egyptian Author. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1981.

Ihenfeld, Christa

See WOLF, CHRISTA.

Imalayan, Fatima Zohra

See DJEBAR, ASSIA.

Indianism

Indianism, or the valorization of the native peoples of the Americas, was a popular sentiment in Latin American literature. Although Indianism can be seen as far back as the 17th century in the poetry of Diogo Garção Tinoco of Brazil and even earlier in the writings of Bartolomé de Las Casas, a defender of the Indians in the Americas who wrote extensively during the early 1500s, the movement reached its height in the 19th century. One reason for this may be that the newly independent countries of Latin America were searching for a way to distinguish their literary history from that of Europe. In doing so, many authors looked to the continent's indigenous past as a source. In Brazil, Antônio Gonçalves DIAS (1823–64) was the first great Indianist writer of this period. He wrote romantic literature often with Indianist themes, such as his first major work, First Cantos, and his later novel Memories of Agapito Goiaba. He also wrote a dictionary of the Tupi language, that of the native people of Brazil. Additionally, another major Brazilian author of the period, novelist José Martiniano de ALENCAR wrote historical novels with Indian main characters that celebrated the native peoples as the defining origin of the Brazilian nation. Alencar's three major Indianist novels are The Guarani Warrior (1857), Iracema (1865), and The Ubirajara. Iracema is the only work available in English; and it is a love story of an Indian princess and a Portuguese officer. Dominican author Manuel de Jesús Galván (1834–1910) also used the historical novel as a vehicle for Indianist writing. His novel, Enriquillo, written between 1879 and 1882, is a fine example of this genre.

Works about Indianism

Haberly, David. Three Sad Races: Racial Identity and National Consciousness in Brazilian Literature. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986.

Tapia, John Reyna. The Indian in the Spanish-American Novel. Durango, Colo.: University Press of America, 1981.

Treece, David. Exiles, Allies, Rebels: Brazil's Indianist Movement, Indigenist Politics, and the Imperial Nation-State. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000.

Ionesco, Eugène (1912–1994) playwright

Considered by critics as the founding father of the French THEATRE OF THE ABSURD, Eugène Ionesco was born in Slatina, Romania, on November 26. His beginnings as a writer came when he received a grant to study in Paris, where he wrote his thesis on "Sin and Death in French Poetry since Baudelaire" in 1938. He remained in France, where he began to concentrate on writing for the theater.

Ionesco was a staunch anti-Communist and a fervent believer in human rights. His plays dramatize the theme of the individual's struggle against conformity. Although more openly humorous and less despairing, his works are often compared to those of Samuel BECKETT. His best-known and often-produced play, La Cantatrice chauve (1949; The Bald Soprano, 1965), takes its initiative from the empty clichés that Ionesco found while trying to learn English from a language textbook. He used the nonsensical sentences to illustrate the emptiness of a life that is stifled by the formalities of language and custom.

Ionesco referred to his works as "antiplays" that fuse tragedy and comedy. The Lesson (1951; translated 1958) tells of a teacher who dominates and ultimately kills his student through his oppressive mastery of language. The Chairs (1952; translated 1958) relates the tale of an old couple who attempt to pass on their life experience to a gathering of invited guests. With the exception of a deaf mute, the guests never arrive. The couple, however, believing that the audience is assembled, say their piece and then kill themselves, reflecting the lack of attention given to the playwright's message by a non-thinking audience.

Ionesco's breakthrough work in the English-speaking theater was Rhinoceros (1959; translated 1960), a play that depicts totalitarianism as a disease that ultimately turns human beings into savage rhinoceroses. Ionesco's protagonist, Bérenger, an ordinary man who holds onto his humanity, reappears in several of Ionesco's other works.

Aside from writing plays, Ionesco also wrote about the theater in his Notes and Counternotes (1962; translated 1964). He published his memoirs in Present Past, Past Present (1968; translated 1971), and wrote one novel, The Hermit (1973). He was elected to the prestigious Academie française in 1970 and died at the age of 84.

Another Work by Eugène Ionesco

A Hell of a Mess. Translated by Helen Gary Bishop. New York: Grove, 1975.

A Work about Eugène Ionesco

Hayman, Ronald. Eugène Ionesco. New York: Ungar, 1976.

Ipellie, Alootook (1951–) poet

Born in Nunavut in northern Canada, Alootook Ipellie is one of the foremost Inuit writers and artists today. He began his career as an announcer for CBC radio, moving to Ottawa, Ontario, in 1973. Since that time, he has written poetry and essays, contributed to Inuit newspapers and magazines such as Nunavut and Nunatsiaq News, and edited the Inuktitut, a quarterly magazine published by the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada that features articles on traditional ways of life and current issues of interest to Inuit readers and is published in English and Inuktitut.

Published in 1993, Ipellie's major work, Arctic Dreams and Nightmares, is a collection of 20 short stories that celebrate the Inuit way of life. The book also includes Ipellie's drawings—he is a celebrated artist and illustrator as well as a writer—and an introductory essay.

A Work by Alootook Ipellie

"The Igloos Are Calm in the Camp." Canadian Literature Issue 167 (Winter 2000), 43.

Works about Alootook Ipellie

Kennedy, Michael P. J. "Alootook Ipellie: The Voice of an Inuk Artist." Studies in Canadian Literature 21, no. 2 (1996): 155–64.

———. "Review of Arctic Dreams and Nightmares by Alootook Ipellie." Canadian Journal of Native Studies 14, no. 1 (1994): 181–83.

Iqbāl, Muhammad (1877–1938) poet, essayist

Muhammad Iqbāl was born in Sialkot, India (now modern Pakistan), into a middle-class orthodox Muslim family. Iqbāl was an exceptional student and won numerous scholarships that allowed him to complete his advanced education in England and Germany. In 1905, Iqbāl left for England, intending to become a lawyer. He quit his position as a lecturer at Government College, Lahore, and after three years obtained a master's degree in philosophy from Cambridge University and a doctoral degree from the University of Munich. He returned to India in 1908 and started to teach philosophy again but quit after only two years, saying that the government did not allow enough freedom of expression to Muslims.

Iqbāl began writing poetry for personal satisfaction. His peers saw his talent and convinced him to submit his poems to a journal for young writers called Makhzan, which was published by a close friend of his. The admiration of the older poets for his poetry encouraged Iqbāl to contribute to every single issue.

Critical Analysis

Though never actively involved in political events, Iqbāl's works are a testimony to his deep concern for Muslims around the world. Troubled by the mounting tension between Indian Muslims and Hindus in prepartition India, much of his poetry was written based on his own desire to find a solution to end India's religious conflicts. He often attended large political gatherings in Lahore, where people united with the common goal of leading India to freedom from British colonial rule. Later, prior to his death, Iqbāl's poetry played a pivotal role in the years leading to Pakistan's freedom from Britain and India.

The influence of religion at home and his studies in Persian mysticism and philosophy, however, are as important as religious politics in the formation of Iqbāl's unique poetic voice, which is at once extremely mystical, bombastic, and patriotic. It gracefully navigates between religious zealotry and the sublime in nature and humanity. In Iqbāl's poetry, the idea of love, or Ishq in Urdu, is deeply connected to the principles of self and personality. These concepts illustrate Iqbāl's views on the close relationship between poetry and pan-Islamism.

Iqbāl believed that the affirmation of an individual's intellect, desires, and ambitions would lead directly to the progress of the international Islamic community. In his opinion, the slower progress of the East, compared to Western civilization, resulted from blindly believing in systems of thought that had refused to recognize the power of the self in the individual. To remedy this, Iqbāl's poetry sought to teach that the act of loving the self would give birth to individual personality. An individual, therefore, is not a passive follower of fate or faith but the chief protagonist in his or her own life.

As with all his poetry, however, the theme of unity is essential. This reflects Iqbāl's involvement with the modernist school of Islam, which sought to create a bridge between the older traditions of Islam and the new one being shaped under current cultural influences. In Rumuz-i-Bekhudi (Mysteries of Selflessness, 1914–18), the poet calls life a "wave of consciousness," which can "thread between the past and now, / And the far future." For Iqbāl this thread is always the message of God as prescribed in the Qur'an.

Iqbāl's vision of Islam was multifaceted in that he sought to bring science, philosophy, psychology, and politics under one rubric. His poems embody many different Western and non-Western philosophical, political, and religious concepts. The central point, however, is the need to believe in personal action and its role in aiding the betterment and progress of the world's Muslim community. Although Iqbāl's use of the concept of freedom evokes the Renaissance belief in a universal humanity, he wrote primarily for a Muslim audience.

The connection of the terms progress and the individual can be traced to Iqbāl's admiration of Western philosophies where the emphasis is on the self, its role in the freedom of expression, and its potential as a source of power against oppression. In one of his Urdu poems from Bang-i-Dira (The Sound of the Caravan Bell, 1925) he highlights the importance of capitalizing on the gift of human intellect. Only nature is passive and that is only because it does not have intellect. In this collection, the bell serves to symbolically awaken readers to the accomplishments of Islam. Islam, therefore, is projected as the timeless answer to personal freedom and religious salvation.

The element of revival was already begun in Iqbāl's first prose work Asrar-i-Khudi (Secrets of the Self, 1911–12). This Persian masterpiece was unlike anything Iqbāl had written before because of its profound psychological and philosophical message. In this work, Iqbāl proposes that the awakening of the soul and the self must happen before Islam itself can undergo any changes. Its publication bewildered his contemporaries because it was radically different from his earlier, nationalist poetry.

Though less political in its approach, Asrar-i-Khudi does not detract from Iqbāl's prescription that change and advancement will bring harmony to the world. This theme is continued in a later work, Rumuz-i-Bekhudi, where individual selflessness is shown to be an expression of one's social duty. This idea is best captured in the lines "A common aim shared by the multitude / Is unity which, when it is mature, / Forms the Community; the many live / Only by virtue of the single bond."

During Iqbāl's adulthood, Muslims were facing religious crises across the globe. The precarious, double-edged positioning of Muslims in India reinforced Iqbāl's collaboration with the international Muslim Nationalism Movement, which worked under the slogan: "Freedom and Unity, Pan-Arabism and Pan-Islamism." Many critics, in fact, have claimed that Iqbāl's decision (in the 1910s) to write almost exclusively in Persian was a gesture to join with the wider Islamic community for whom Persian was the true language of Islam.

Stylistically, GHĀLIB and Iqbāl have a lot in common and are regarded as Urdu literature's greatest poets. Both wrote ghazals, which are metrical poems similar to the Western sonnet. While Ghālib's ghazals are extremely metaphysical and obscure in tone, Iqbāl writes almost like an orator. When he started writing in Urdu again in 1935, Iqbāl began to address the cause of Indian Muslims with new vigor. Even the element of lyricism is absent in his poems, and his tone more didactic than ever before.

The fiery spirit behind his later work marked the final stage in Iqbāl's contribution to bridging the gap between the Middle Ages and the modern in Urdu poetry. The new emphasis given to freedom, personal achievement, individual action, and self-development transformed the traditional Islamic belief in the negation of earthly life. Iqbāl, however, was not a reactionary and did not completely eschew previous Islamic ideas or the poetic conventions of older Urdu poetry: He highlighted existent ones and was able to show that the future for the Islamic world could be changed because the past supported it. As Muhammad Sadiq points, "Iqbāl gave [Islamic Internationalism] a new edge. . . . He does not think ahead of his day, therefore, he thinks in terms of it . . . to meet the challenge of the present." Iqbāl's value as a poet, therefore, lies in his ability to use his heritage to help his contemporary world envision its future.

In 1922, despite his open criticism of British rule, Iqbāl accepted the offer of knighthood by the queen of England. The highly mystical and philosophical undertones in his poetry explain why a poet who favors one religion and expounds one political path is still read by people of all religions and all political beliefs. In 1930, Iqbāl became president of the Muslim League. He was one of the first Muslim leaders to propose the possibility of an independent Muslim country called Pakistan. This idea was Iqbāl's solution for ending religious dissent in India, and it became a reality in 1947, after his death.

Other Works by Muhammad Iqbāl

Complaint and Answer: Iqbāl's Dialogue with Allah.

Translated by Khuswant Singh. Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1981.

Tulip in the Desert: A Selection of the Poetry of Muhammad Iqbāl. Translated by Mustansir Mir. London: Hurst & Co., 2000.

A Work about Muhammad Iqbāl

Malik, Hafeez, ed. Iqbāl, Poet-Philosopher of Pakistan. New York: Columbia University Press, 1971.

Ishigaki Rin (1920–) poet, short-story writer

Ishigaki Rin was born in Tokyo. When she was four, her mother died, which led to an unstable home life. During this early period, she contributed poems to girls' magazines. After graduation from Akasaka Higher Elementary School, she began to work at Nihon Kyōgyō Bank in 1934, where she remained until 1975.

While working at the bank, Ishigaki began to publish poems in union periodicals. In 1944, together with a number of other women writers, she launched the poetry magazine Dansō, under the guidance of poet Fukuda Masao. During this period, she also tried her hand at short-story writing. In the postwar period, she composed poetry in the style of REALISM, leading to her first poetry collection Watashi no Mae ni Aru Nabe to Okama to Moeru Hi to (The pots, pans and burning fire before me) (1959). In a poem of the same name, she wrote about cooking as an expression of love for the people around her. Her second poetry collection, Hyōsatsu nado (Nameplates, etc.) (1968), focused on the pain of life as one of its themes; for example, in the poem “Cliff,” she wrote about the women who committed suicide in Saipan at the end of World War II by leaping from a cliff into the sea. The collection won the H-shi Award, named after modern poet Hirazawa Teijirō. She has also won the Toshiko Tamura Prize for a general collection, Ishigaki Rin Shishū (Ishigaki Rin’s poetry anthology) (1971), and the Globe Award for the poetry collection Ryakureki (An abbreviated history) (1979). Other publications include Yūmoa no Sakoku (The national isolation of humor)

(1973), a collection of essays and early short stories, and the poetry collection Yasashii Kotoba (Sweet words) (1984).

Ishigaki’s poetry is renowned for its frankness and sympathy for humankind while exercising humorous social criticism. She is also unique in her frank portrayal of Japan’s defeat in World War II.

Another Work by Ishigaki Rin

Anthology of Modern Japanese Poets. Edited and translated by Alexander Beshar, Hiroaki Sato, and Yoi-chi Midorikawa. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Jaccottet, Philippe (1925–) poet, novelist

Philippe Jaccottet was born in Moudon, Switzerland, was educated in Lausanne, and developed an early enthusiasm for poetry, beginning his career by publishing French translations of Homer, Góngora, HÖLDERLIN, LEOPARDI, and UNGARETTI.

Jaccottet met his literary mentor, Gustave Roud, in 1941 and, after a trip to Italy where he met Ungaretti, settled in Paris. He made friendships in the literary community with such writers as Francis PONGE, Yves BONNEFOY, André du Bouchet (1924–) and Jacques Dupin (1927–). Their influence caused him to be wary of EXISTENTIALISM and surrealism, and he took refuge in his own works in the more coherent and traditional style of CLASSICISM.

Jaccottet's first published poetry collection was Requiem (1947), but his first significant collection was Frightens and Other Poetries (1953), whose poems deal with the passage of time, the anguish of death, and the loss of love. His first prose work, A Walk Under the Trees (1957), established his fascination with landscapes.

Several other prose works followed these early successes. The Ignoramus (1958) and Elements of a Dream (1961) explore the tenuous nature of human existence. With Airs (1967), he returned to poetry, focusing on lighter themes. A passage from his latest work, Cahier de verdure (Notebook of Green, 1990), gives a sense of the intensity with which he endows encounters with the natural world:

This time it was a cherry tree. Not a cherry tree in full bloom, referring to some kind of clear approach, but a cherry tree loaded with fruits, caught sight of one evening in June, on the other side of a huge cornfield. It was once more as if someone had appeared there and were talking to you without really talking to you, without even pointing at you: someone or, rather, somebody, and a “beautiful thing” indeed . . .

Jaccottet has also written several works of criticism, as well as poetry and prose dealing with significant events in his life. He continues to write and work as a translator.

Other Works by Philippe Jaccottet

Selected Poems. Translated by Derek Mahon. Winston-Salem, N.C.: Wake Forest University Press, 1988.

Under Clouded Skies; and, Beauregard. Translated by David Constantine and Mark Treharne. Newcastle upon Tyne: Bloodaxe Books, 1994.

A Work about Philippe Jaccottet

Cady, Andrea. Measuring the Visible: The Verse and Prose of Philippe Jaccottet. Atlanta, Ga.: Rodopi, 1992.

Jarry, Alfred (1873–1907) playwright, poet, novelist

Best known for his play Ubu roi (King Ubu, 1896), Alfred Jarry was an eccentric whose fantastic works are considered to be forerunners of the THEATRE OF THE ABSURD. Born in Laval, Mayenne, he inherited much of his eccentricity and a trace of insanity from his mother. By age 15, he had already collaborated with several classmates to write Ubu roi as a means of ridiculing a disliked mathematics professor. Originally performed with marionettes, the play was later produced in Paris where its anarchist themes and coarse language incited a riot.

Jarry created his own absurdist logic, which he called Pataphysics, a science governing the laws of exceptions and reaching beyond metaphysics to encompass that which cannot be defined. He attributed his logic to a science-fiction type character known as Dr. Faustoll. He even invented a Pataphysical calendar, which begins on September 8, 1873, Jarry's birthdate.

Inspired by H. G. Wells's novel The Time Machine, Jarry turned to science fiction and wrote the essay "How to Build a Time Machine" (1900). His final novel, Le Surmâle (The Supermale, 1902), was a comic fantasy of a superman who ate superfood and performed feats of erotic endurance before dying in the embrace of a machine.

Jarry's life eventually began to mirror his art. From Père Ubu, his protagonist in Ubu roi, he picked up eccentric and destructive habits. Referring to himself frequently in the third person, he drank excessively, hallucinated frequently, and shouted orders and obscenities at friends and acquaintances.

By the time Jarry was 34, he had become a familiar figure in Paris, where he walked the streets and carried a green umbrella, a symbol of middle-class power in Ubu roi. He also wore cycling clothes and brandished two pistols, which he often used to threaten fellow pedestrians.

Jarry's way of life ultimately took its toll. He died on All Saint's Day from alcoholism and tuberculosis, leaving behind a legacy to modern science fiction, as well as two sequels to Ubu roi, one of which, Ubu echainé (Ubu Bound, 1900) was not performed until 1937. Ubu cocu (Ubu Cuckolded, 1944) was published posthumously.

Another Work by Alfred Jarry

Adventures in Pataphysics. Translated by Paul Edwards. London: Atlas, 2001.

A Work about Alfred Jarry

Lennon, Nigey. Alfred Jarry: The Man with the Axe. Los Angeles: Panjandrum Books, 1984.

Al-Jayyusi, Salma al-Khadra (1946–) anthologist, literary critic, poet

Salma al-Khadra Al-Jayyusi was born in East Jordan to a Palestinian father and a Lebanese mother. She spent most of her childhood in Acre and Jerusalem. After graduating from the American University of Beirut with a B.A. in Arabic and English literature, she went to London for her Ph.D. Jayyusi has traveled widely and lived in many places around the globe. She has taught at various universities in the Middle East and the United States and founded the Project of Translation from Arabic Literature in 1980. This project stemmed from Al-Jayyusi's discovery that Arabic literature was not widely known around the world, and in cases where translations could be found, they were poorly done.

Al-Jayyusi is best known for her literary critique of Arabian literature and poetry. Having traveled widely during her life, she is able to interpolate in her poems the richness of her experiences within other cultures. Despite her ability to immerse herself in other traditions, Al-Jayyusi is committed to presenting the essence of Arabic literary tradition to the literary world. Her first collection of poems, Return from the Dreamy Fountain, was first published in 1960. Even though it was well received by readers, Al-Jayyusi decided to focus her next efforts on collecting rarely known Arabic works and bringing them to the attention of the world. In 1977, she published a two-volume critical literary history of Arabic poetry, Trends and Movements in Modern Arabic Poetry. She hopes that by continuing to introduce books such as the above to the world, readers can gain a better understanding of the richness of Arabic literature.

Other Works Edited by Salma al-Khadra Al-Jayyusi

Anthology of Modern Palestinian Literature. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.

The Legacy of Muslim Spain. Leiden; New York: E. J. Brill, 1992.

Jhabvala, Ruth Praver (1927–)

novelist, short-story writer, scriptwriter

Born in Cologne to Polish parents, Ruth Praver Jhabvala possesses a triple or quadruple heritage—European (Jewish), British, Indian, and now American; she has made her home on three continents and absorbed several cultures. She was educated in England at Hendon County School and at the University of London's Queen Mary College, where she obtained an M.A. In 1951, she married Cyrus Jhabvala, a Parsi architect, and she lived with him in New Delhi from 1951 to 1975. (The Jhabvalas have three daughters.) In 1975 she emigrated to the United States, but she visits England frequently and spends winters in India.

In addition to a dozen novels and a half-dozen volumes of short stories, Ruth Praver Jhabvala has written many film scripts. In 1962, she met Ismail Merchant and James Ivory; theirs has proved a long-lasting team, responsible for such films as Shakespeare Wallah (1965), A Room with a View (1986), Howard's End (1992), and The Remains of the Day (1993). For A Room with a View, Jhabvala won an Academy Award. Two of her own novels, The Householder and Heat and Dust, have also been filmed.

Critical Analysis

Jhabvala's literary career spans 40 years and exhibits several phases. Often compared with Jane AUSTEN and E. M. FORSTER because she writes comedies of manners, her influences include Charles DICKENS, George ELIOT, Thomas HARDY, Tolstoy, Turgenev, and Proust. Her early novels are more narrowly focused than her later ones and often center on joint or extended Indian families and their problems. East/West conflict is another major theme and the chief reason for comparing her with Forster.

Esmond in India (1957) tells of a philandering British civil servant who has an Indian wife and a British mistress, befriends a number of middle-class Indian women, and exhibits a love/hate relationship with the subcontinent. The Householder (1960) focuses on the marriage of Prem and Indu; Prem discovers he must defeat his mother-in-law and rise above himself to fulfill his marriage. Heat and Dust (1975), which won the BOOKER PRIZE, is one of this author's most complex, sophisticated works, interweaving two love stories 50 years apart—that of Olivia, who runs off with an Indian prince, and that of her granddaughter. The novel raises the question "What is identity?" and probes the relations between history and reality, history and fiction, and fiction and reality. A New Dominion (1971) is experimental, employing omniscient narration (like Jhabvala's earlier fiction) but supplementing this by shifting from one character's viewpoint to another's. This novel and Heat and Dust are both reminiscent of Forster's A Passage to India.

Later novels are more complex in narration, more detached, and darker in mood. They exhibit film techniques learned from scriptwriting. The first Jhabvala novel to be written in the United States, In Search of Love and Beauty (1983), is a quest novel exploring all three of its author's heritages—German, British, and Indian—against an American background. The later novels also handle another favorite Jhabvala theme: the fraudulent guru or swami who cheats his devotees. In Three Continents, American female twins turn over their lives and fortunes to sham gurus with disastrous results.

Jhabvala's fiction has received mixed reviews. A craftswoman whose every word counts, she is prized as such in the Western world; Indians, however, are often nettled by her outsider's "inside" view of them and the subcontinent, and they chafe at her detachment—which is really self-defense, as she makes clear in the introduction to Out of India. She admits that, while immersed in India, she was never of it. After reviewing differing oriental and occidental evaluations of Jhabvala, Ralph Crane observes simply, "She is a writer whose work will stand the test of time."

Another Work by Ruth Praver Jhabvala

East into Upper East: Plain Tales from New York and New Delhi. Washington, D.C.: Counterpoint Press, 2000.

Works about Ruth Praver Jhabvala

Crane, Ralph J. Ruth Praver Jhabvala. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Sucher, Laurie. The Fiction of Ruth Praver Jhabvala: The Politics of Passion. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.

Jiang Bingzhi

See DING LING.

Jiménez, Juan Ramón (1881–1958) poet

Juan Ramón Jiménez was born in southern Spain but spent most of his life in Madrid. He devoted his life to poetry, publishing his first volume at age 20. In about 1916, when he fell in love and married, he stopped writing in fixed meters and switched to free verse. He wanted to remove everything but the pure poetic essence from his verse. His constant inspiration came from his wife.

Jiménez was a member of the GENERATION OF 1898, a literary and cultural movement in the first two decades of the 20th century. Each author of the movement had his own idea of how to write "well," but all agreed that the improvisation, pomp, and regionalism of earlier Spanish literature must be replaced by a more modern, simpler literature that seeks its inspiration abroad. Jiménez's poetry is an example of the move toward this simplicity. Much of his work, such as Arias tristes (Sad Arias, 1903) and Melancolía (Melancholy, 1912), is very sad.

Although known for his voluminous output of poetry, Jiménez is also the author of the beautiful story of a little donkey called Platero y yo. It was first published in 1917 and has been translated into English. Jiménez was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1956.

Other Works by Juan Ramón Jiménez

Florit, Eugenio, ed. Selected Writings of Juan Ramón Jiménez. Translated by H. R. Hays. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1999.

Light and Shadows: Selected Poems and Prose. Translated by James Wright and Robert Bly. Buffalo, N.Y.: White Pine Press, 1987.

The Complete Perfectionist. Translated by Christopher Maurer. New York: Doubleday, 1997.

Works about Juan Ramón Jiménez

Kluback, William. Encounters with Juan Ramón Jiménez. New York: Peter Lang, 1995.

Wilcox, John. Self and Image in Juan Ramón Jiménez. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Johnson, Pauline (Tekahionwake)

(1861–1913) poet

Pauline Johnson was born on the Six Nations Reserve near Brantford, Ontario, Canada. Her mother was a nonnative who came to Canada from Ohio, and her Mohawk father was a chief of the Six Nations Reserve. Johnson had two older brothers and a sister. She was influenced at early age by such canonical writers as John Milton (1608–74) and Sir Walter Scott (1771–1832) but was also exposed to native stories by her father and grandfather. This combination of influences had a great impact on her development as a writer.

When Johnson's father died, the family moved to Brantford, Ontario, where Johnson began to write poems and short stories. She published these stories in local newspapers to make money. In addition, Johnson became famous for her poetry recitals, her gift for performing poetry, a legacy of the storytelling she learned from her father and grandfather. She toured Canada and the United States and also traveled abroad, performing her work and often sharing the bill with famous musicians or comedians.

Johnson's popular books of poetry include The White Wampum (1895), Canadian Born (1903), and Flint and Feather (1912). In all her work, Johnson celebrates her native heritage: "My aim, my joy, my pride is to sing the glories of my own people." In 1911, Johnson published Legends of Vancouver, a collection of stories and legends of the Squamish people as told to her by her friend Squamish chief Joe Capilano. Johnson died at the age of 52 of breast cancer. The monument to her grave can be found in Vancouver's Stanley Park.

Another Work by Pauline Johnson

Ruoff, LaVonne Brown, ed. The Moccasin Maker. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1998.

A Work about Pauline Johnson

Strong-Boag, Veronica Jane, and Carole Gerson. Paddling Her Own Canoe: The Times and Texts of E. Pauline Johnson (Tekahionwake). Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000.

Johnson, Uwe (1934–1984) novelist, critic

Uwe Johnson was born in Cammin, Poland, to Erich Johnson, an administrative official of the Nazi Party, and Erna Johnson. Johnson attended an elite elementary school that provided intensive training in the Nazi ideology for its students. After the end of World War II, the Johnsons moved to Rechnitz, Germany, to avoid the advancing Soviet army. Johnson's father was arrested in 1946 by Soviet officials for participation in the Nazi regime. The family never saw him again.

Between 1952 and 1954, Johnson studied German language and literature at University of Rostock, East Germany. Johnson joined the junior ranks of the Free German Youth, an East German Communist organization for high school and college students. Johnson was expelled from the university when he refused, despite strong pressure from the Communist officials, to make false claims during a public speech at a Free German Youth meeting about the Young Congregation, a movement of Christian youth. Later, Johnson was allowed to continue his studies at Karl Marx University of Leipzig, where he finished his bachelor's degree in 1956. He was not allowed to pursue doctoral studies.

Johnson began his literary career translating English works into German. He also worked for various publishing houses in East Germany, appraising the merit of proposed projects. Johnson constantly struggled to find employment and had several altercations with the Communist regime of East Germany, which prevented any possibility of a teaching career. Completely disenchanting, Johnson moved to West Berlin in 1959.

Uwe Johnson's work definitely has political dimensions; however, it is not easy to assess what these exactly are. His work has been criticized by the government and some writers of West Germany as procommunist and has been similarly derogated in East Germany as anticommunist: It seems that Johnson opposed the regimes of both countries. He saw the government of East Germany as socially oppressive, dictatorial, and dominated by Stalinism. At the same time, Johnson was disgusted with the government of West Germany, which he frequently characterized as fascist. Indeed, the national government of West Germany was dominated by ex-Nazis and was in many ways as repressive as the government of East Germany. Johnson lived in West Berlin because it was not under the direct jurisdiction of the national government in Germany.

Critical Analysis

Johnson's first novel, Mutmassungen über Jakob (Speculations about Jacob, 1959), was an instant success when it appeared in West Germany. The plot of the novel centers on Rohlfs, a member of the East German Security Force, who enters the life of the Cresspahl family. Heinrich Cresspahl's daughter, Gesine, left for West Germany and works for NATO. Throughout the novel, Rohlfs attempts to influence the family to recruit Gesine as a spy for East Germany. By no means a one-sided perspective, the novel discusses the personal and political challenges brought about by the division of Germany. The novel also gained popularity in East Germany and was not censored by government officials.

Das dritte Buch über Achim (The Third Book about Achim, 1961) tells the story of Karsch, a West German journalist who travels to East Germany to visit his ex-lover Karin, a successful actress. While in East Germany, Karsch meets Achim, Karin's boyfriend, a professional biker and a star in East Germany. Karsch faces a difficult decision when a publishing company approaches him to write Achim's life story in a way that would glorify socialist life in East Germany. Once again, the book does not provide a clear political message and seems to present an objective reflection of a divided Germany. The work was hailed as an achievement in contemporary German literature and especially was praised by Günter GRASS, another controversial and famous German writer.

Uwe Johnson lived for a time in the United States and finally settled in the United Kingdom. He found the environments of both Germanys stifling and not conducive to his work. He continued to write novels and received numerous awards, including the Fontane Prize in 1960, the Wilhelm Raabe Prize in 1975, the Georg Büchner Prize in 1971, and the Thomas Mann Prize in 1978. Johnson was a member of the Academy of Arts in West Berlin and of the German Academy for Language and Literature. After the reunification of Germany in 1990, interest in Johnson's work dramatically increased. Gary Baker remarks, Uwe Johnson is significant not only for his unique literary style and linguistic creativity but also for the thematic issues addressed in his works. He was the first German author to treat, in fiction, the division of Germany after the war. He explored its psychological, political, and cultural manifestations in a network of characters and places unmatched in complexity and authenticity.

Other Works by Uwe Johnson

Anniversaries: From the Life of Gesine Cresspahl.

Translated by Leila Vennewitz and Walter Arndt. New York: Harcourt Brace, 2000.

A Trip to Klagenfurt: In the Footsteps of Ingeborg Bachmann. Translated by Damion Searls. New York: Hydra Books, 2002.

A Work about Uwe Johnson

Baker, Gary. Understanding Uwe Johnson. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

Jünger, Ernst (1895–1998) novelist, essayist

Ernst Jünger was born in Heidelberg, Germany, and grew up in Hannover. The son of a pharmacist, he ran away from home in 1913 to look for more exciting possibilities in life. Joining the French Foreign Legion and serving in North Africa, he joined the German army at the outbreak of World War I and served as an officer on the Western front. Between 1919 and 1923, Jünger continued his military career and served as an officer in the Weimar Republic army. After retirement, he studied entomology at Leipzig, Germany, and Naples, Italy. He eventually became a famous entomologist (several insects were named after him).

During the 1920s, Jünger joined the pro-Nazi movement and contributed to several right-wing publications. His first book, The Storm of Steel (1920), argued that Germany's suffering during World War I was a prelude to a rebirth of a powerful nation and great victory ahead. In Adventurous Heart (1929) and The Workers (1933), Jünger examined the social and emotional structure of the worker. In these works, Jünger rejects humanism and claims that struggle for power among world nations is imminent. Although Jünger supported the right-wing movement, he rejected offers of friendship from Adolf Hitler during the 1920s, refused to serve as the head of the Nazi Writers' Union in 1933, and vocally opposed anti-Semitism. For these reasons, the Nazi government prohibited further publication of his work in 1938.

During World War II, Jünger served as a captain in the German army. Stationed in Paris, he associated with several artists, including the famous painter Pablo Picasso. After the death of his son at the Italian front, he became completely disenchanted with war.

After the war, Jünger published a number of works in which he supported European unity and promoted the rights of the individual. In The Glass Bees (1957), for example, he paints a world in which machines threaten the rights of individuals. In his books, Jünger often dispassionately painted historical and social developments that resulted in violation of human rights; hence, he was sometimes accused of indifference and elitism. Despite criticism, he achieved a reputation as a great German writer.

He was awarded numerous prizes, including the Great Order of Merit (1959), the Immermann Prize (1964), and the Goethe Prize (1982), as well as an honorary degree from the University of Bilbao, among others. By the time of his death at the age of 103, Jünger had published more than 20 books. His works have been translated into more than a dozen languages.

Other Works by Ernst Jünger

Aladdin's Problem. Translated by Joachim Neugroschel. New York: Marsilio, 1992.

A Dangerous Encounter. Translated by Hilary Barr. New York: Marsilio, 1993.

A Work about Ernst Jünger

Nevin, Thomas. Ernst Jünger and Germany: Into the Abyss, 1914–1945. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1997.

K

Kabbani, Nizar (Qabbani) (1923–1998)

poet, essayist

Born in Damascus, Syria, to a respected middle-class Muslim family, Kabbani published his first volume of poetry in 1944. He immediately gained fame for his bad-boy erotic daring and his “hip” language that expressed Arabic youth culture. Kabbani’s poetry often incites rebellion against what he saw as repressive political and social morés. In 1954, the Syrian parliament considered demoting him from his diplomatic post for the disrespect to religion some found in his poem, “Bread, Hashish, and the Moon,” but the motion failed.

At the height of his literary career, from the 1950s to the 1970s, Kabbani, often writing in a female voice, expressed the joys of love and eros for a generation of men and especially women. He saw himself as a champion of women’s liberation and sexual freedom.

In the 1980s, Kabbani wrote three volumes of poetry, titled “Trilogy of the Children of the Rocks” (1988), celebrating the teenage rebels of the Palestinian intifadah. His poetry conveys deep Arab pride as well as sharp criticism of many aspects of Arab life and culture, such as the sexual double standard for men and women. His most scathing poetic attacks, such as “Scribblings in the Margins of the Notebook of Defeat,” are aimed at repressive Arab governments that curtail the human rights of the Arab peoples. He also wrote strident poems against Israeli and American policies toward Arabs, such as the poem “I Am a Terrorist” in which he says that Arab men are labeled terrorists by the Western media for defending their homes and their people’s dignity.

Kabbani graduated from the University of Damascus with a law degree in 1945 and joined Syria’s diplomatic corps. He was posted in Egypt, Turkey, Britain, Lebanon, Spain, and China before he resigned in 1966 and moved to Beirut, where he established his own publishing company.

From a brief early marriage in Syria, he had two children, one of whom died in a car accident as a young man; Kabbani eulogized him in poetry. Kabbani married again, this time to an Iraqi schoolteacher, Balqis al-Rawi. His poem, “Choose,” was widely considered by the Arabic reading public to be Kabbani’s marriage proposal to Balqis. The handsome poet—he was nicknamed “the blond rebel”—and the beautiful woman who was his muse captivated public attention. They had two children. Kabbani wrote some of his finest poetry of love and sensuality in the 1970s. The poem “I Bear Witness That There Is No Woman But You,” for example, provocatively turns the Muslim testimony of faith in one God into a testimony of a man's love for one woman. When Balqis was killed at her office in a Beirut bombing in 1981, he publicly mourned her in several anguished poems.

After her death, Kabbani left the Arab world for Europe, living in Geneva, Paris, and London, where he settled down to a life of exile. In 1997, a street was named after him in his old neighborhood in Damascus. When he died, his body was flown back to Damascus for burial, as he had requested in his will.

Kabbani wrote more than 50 books of poetry as well as several volumes of essays and one drama, a political satire. During his lifetime, his readings drew crowds in the tens of thousands. Many Kabbani poems were adopted as song lyrics by some of the most popular figures in Arabic music so that his words continue to be heard through song. In today's pop music scene, Iraqi icon Kazem al-Saher has acquired rights to sing many of Kabbani's poems. Kabbani's work has been translated into Spanish, French, Italian, Persian, and English. In 1994, he was awarded the Oweiss Prize for Cultural Productivity in the United Arab Emirates.

Other Works by Nizar Kabbani

Arabian Love Poems: Full Arabic and English Texts.

Translated by Bassam K. Frangieh and Clementina Brown. Boulder, Colo.: Lynn Rienner, 1999.

On Entering the Sea: The Erotic and Other Poetry of Nizar Qabbani. Translated by Lena Jayyusi et al. New York: Interlink, 1996.

Kafka, Franz (1883–1924) novelist, short-story writer

Franz Kafka was born in Prague, Czech Republic, to Hermann Kafka, a dry-goods merchant, and Julie Kafka. Kafka's family spoke German and belonged to a small but old community of German-speaking Jews in Prague. Hermann Kafka was a domineering, almost tyrannical figure in the Kafka household. He took out his anger and frustration on young Franz, who recalled the terrifying experiences later in his life. Indeed, many biographers and critics of Kafka note that Kafka's work often deals with a conflict between father and son or with people pleading innocence in front of authority figures. Kafka's childhood was marked by the constant domestic conflicts and by the social atmosphere of Prague that branded Jews as second-class citizens and outcasts. Kafka's attitude toward his Jewish heritage was ambiguous and is an obliquely expressed conflict in his works.

Kafka was educated in German elementary schools. In 1901, he enrolled in Ferdinand-Karls University to study law, graduating with a doctorate in 1906. Kafka's career as a writer began about 1904 when he was working as a legal clerk. At work, Kafka composed mundane reports on industrial health hazards and the legal implications of industrial injuries; at night, however, Kafka composed elaborate, sometimes fantastic tales. Between 1907 and 1923, Kafka worked in the insurance business and achieved remarkable success; indeed, he was so valued by his employers that they arranged a deferment from the draft during World War I.

In 1917 Kafka was diagnosed with tuberculosis. He continued to work but suffered a serious setback when he contracted influenza in 1919. Kafka also met constant disappointment from publishers who rejected his work. After several turbulent but unsuccessful relationships with women, in 1922 Kafka finally married Dora Diamant, a young woman from a respected Orthodox Jewish family in Prague. The couple moved to Berlin, where Kafka, by then confined to bed, worked on his journals and wrote numerous letters to his friends and family. By 1924, Kafka was moved to a sanatorium just outside of Vienna. He died of tuberculosis in obscurity and poverty.

Kafka asked his friend and fellow writer Max Brod to destroy all manuscripts after his death. Fortunately, Brod disobeyed the last wish of his friend. Thus, with the exception of few short stories, most of Kafka's major work was published posthumously.

Critical Analysis

"The Metamorphosis" (1915) is probably Kafka's best-known and most critically acclaimed short story. In the story, Gregor Samsa, a traveling salesman, awakes one day to discover himself transformed into a giant grotesque insect. No longer able to communicate with his parents or the outside world, Gregor physically degenerates day by day; mentally, however, he does not seem to change. Gregor is finally killed by his father. “The Metamorphosis” presents a range of themes found in the works of MODERNISM, such as alienation of the individual, failure of communication, and attachment to a landscape that has grown ungovernably hostile. At the time of its publication, however, most readers did not know how to interpret the strange allegorical plot of the story. Today, the story is often cited as central to the modernist movement, and it reflects the ideas that the movement embodied.

Kafka’s novel The Trial (1925) depicts the suffering and psychological torment of Josef K., who is arrested one morning without reason. Throughout his “trial,” Josef never discovers the crime of which he is accused. He is dragged through a seemingly endless investigation in a court system that reveals nothing. Josef does not confront an identifiable authority figure, but he is constantly burdened by laws he cannot comprehend. At the end of the novel, Josef becomes a martyr to the law when he is stabbed to death. Truth is no longer relevant in the faceless system of law that delivers arbitrary judgment and punishment. Kafka addressed a similar theme in the short story “The Penal Colony” (1919); here, truth becomes an instrument of punishment, as the victims of truth are killed by a machine that inscribes the nature of their crimes on their bodies.

The protagonist of Kafka’s novel, The Castle (1926), is simply identified as K. K arrives in a small village, claiming to be a land surveyor and bears the official authority of the government. K seeks to meet Klamm, the ruler of the mysterious castle that supposedly has sovereignty over the village. K develops a strange relationship with Arthur and Jeremiah, Klamm’s assistants, who refuse to arrange a meeting with their supervisor. K finally befriends and uses Frieda, a former mistress of the castle, who leaves K after discovering his true intents. The Castle focuses on several important themes, including bureaucracy, love, guilt, and law. All these themes are strangely interconnected in the landscape where the individual is incapable of retaining a stable identity. Although Kafka never finished The Castle, it remains as one of his most important works.

Franz Kafka received no recognition for his incredible talent during his lifetime. Today, however, Kafka is considered one of the leading figures of modernism and of world literature in general. He left a body of works of great complexity and literary genius, and one that continues to enrich readers and critics today. Kafka was rediscovered in the 1950s and is among the most admired of modern writers. Perhaps more than any other writer, Kafka captures the nightmare reality and absurdity of modern existence and the strange, alienated feel of a world without reason.

Other Works by Franz Kafka

Amerika. Translated by Willia Muir. New York: Schocken Books, 1996.

The Complete Stories. New York: Schocken Books, 1995.

Franz Kafka: The Diaries, 1921–1923. New York: Schocken Books, 1989.

Works about Franz Kafka

Adler, Jeremy. Franz Kafka. New York: Overlook Press, 2002.

Brod, Max. Franz Kafka: A Biography. New York: Da Capo Press, 1995.

Kanik, Orhan Veli (1914–1950) poet

Orhan Veli Kanik was born in Istanbul, Turkey. The son of a conductor for the Presidential Symphony Orchestra, he received a diverse and liberal education but withdrew from the University of Istanbul before completing his degree. His talent as a writer was nurtured at a young age, and he was fortunate to have among his mentors the leading poet, literary critic, and historian Ahmet Hamdi Tapinar.

Tapinar encouraged Kanik to write, leading him to publish his poetry in the school paper Sesimiz (Our Voice) while Kanik was in his early teens. Kanik served with the armed forces during World War II and obtained a job as a translator after the war, but he left this position to lead a bohemian life, more in tune with his poetry and his philosophy.

Kanik was born into a family of writers and artists. His younger brother, Adnan, was also a writer until he was sent to prison in 1949 for a political offense. Orhan, however, was able to avoid conflicts with the authorities and to publish Leaf, a literary journal. The journal ran for 28 issues and ceased publication with a special memorial edition on Kanik's death.

Kanik was never a prolific writer, but he had a great influence on the development of Turkish poetry. His own work was more influenced by Japanese haiku than by traditional Turkish or Western forms. Kanik believed that a strict adherence to traditional forms had made much of Turkish poetry sterile. He sought to reinvent tradition with a sense of vibrancy that would resonate with the needs of common humanity. He broke free of conventional modes, discarding rhyme and meter, and focused instead on an almost nihilistic viewpoint that, simultaneously, managed to incorporate a reaffirmation of the joy of life. He wrote entirely in free verse, tackling the issues relevant to everyday life in plain language that was devoid of metaphors and clichés.

Although Nazim HIKMET had earlier brought the use of free verse to Turkish poetry, it was Kanik who established its relevance by introducing ideas of the French modernist movement to his poetry. Alongside fellow poets Oktay Rifat and Melih Cevdet Anday, he started the artistic movement POETIC REALISM, which focuses on the emergence of the common man as hero. By stripping away the traditional adornments of poetry, the poet is free to use everyday life as subject matter.

Kanik died from a cerebral hemorrhage after collapsing in Istanbul on November 14. Many believed that his death was a result of his love of alcohol, citing a famous line from one of his poems,

“I wish I were a fish in a bottle of booze.” Kanik's death came as a shock to the people of Turkey. After a well-attended funeral ceremony, he was buried on a hill where he could rest forever, “Listening to Istanbul.”

Another Work by Orhan Veli Kanik

I, Orhan Veli: Poems by Orhan Veli. Translated by Murat Nemet-Nejat. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Hanging Loose Press, 1989.

Kao Tsing-jen

See GAO XINGJIAN.

Karamzin, Nikolai Mikhailovich

(1766–1826) historian, short-story writer, novelist

The birthplace of Nikolai Karamzin is uncertain, but most research suggests a small village along the Volga River in Russia. Karamzin's mother died when he was very young, and he was raised by his father, Mikhail Karamzin, a retired army captain and minor aristocrat. A village priest taught him to read and write. When Karamzin was 13, his father sent him to study in Moscow. He was a brilliant student, and attended university lectures when he was just 16. Although he was eager to study at the university, Karamzin's father insisted that he pursue an army career. Karamzin enlisted as an officer in the Preobrozhensky regiment in St. Petersburg in 1783.

In St. Petersburg, Karamzin spent his time in literary circles and eventually became a translator. He published his first translation at the age of 17 and was paid with two volumes of the English novelist Henry Fielding's works. He left the army in 1784 after the death of his father. In 1789, he left Russia and traveled across Europe, visiting Germany, Switzerland, France, and England. On his return to Russia in 1790, Karamzin established a literary journal, Moscow Journal, in which he published his Letters of the Russian Traveler (1792), a collection that was based on his travels in Europe, and “Poor Liza” (1792), a short novel about a peasant girl. Several other stories that Karamzin wrote at this time brought French sentimentalism to Russia and were widely imitated.

Karamzin was not particularly interested in politics, but when he established a new journal in 1801, Vestnik Evropy (The Messenger of Europe), it became the leading political journal in Russia. It was the most widely read publication in Russia during the early 1800s. The journal’s popularity brought financial success, which freed Karamzin to begin his enormous historiographic work, History of the Russian State (1819–29). This 12-volume work, which covered Russian history up to 1613, was the most complete history of Russia of the time. The Russian emperor, Aleksandr I, appointed Karamzin official historiographer in 1803 with a pension of 2,000 rubles a year, a considerable sum.

Between 1810 and 1811, Karamzin worked on Memoir on Ancient and Modern Russia (1811). In this work, Karamzin related his political beliefs, as well as his personal conversations with Aleksandr I. He believed that autocracy was the appropriate form of government for Russia, making a careful distinction between autocracy and despotism, based on the importance of the law.

Karamzin left a long-lasting legacy when he died in 1826. He had become one of the closest friends of the emperor and remained a defender of the monarchy. More important, Karamzin’s work influenced such important writers as Aleksandr PUSHKIN and Mikhail LERMONTOV. He also established a historiographic tradition that did not previously exist in Russia, and his account of Russian history was an important part of the Russian self-image into the 20th century.

Works about Nikolai Karamzin

Black, Joseph Lawrence. Nicholas Karamzin and Russian Society in the Nineteenth Century: A Study in Russian Political and Historical Thought. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1976.

Hammarberg, Gitta. From the Idyll to the Novel: Karamzin’s Sentimentalist Prose. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Lewis, S. Mark. Modes of Historical Discourse in J. G. Herder and N. M. Karamzin. New York: Peter Lange, 1995.

Karnad, Girish (1938–) playwright

Girish Ranghunath Karnad was born in Maharashtra, India, but has lived most of his life in the southern state of Karnataka. Most of Karnad’s work is written in Kannada, the language spoken in Karnataka, but he has translated all his major plays into English. He is a playwright, story writer, poet, and director of films.

After completing his college studies in math and statistics in 1958 at Karnataka University, Karnad went to Oxford University to earn a master’s degree in philosophy, politics, and economics. It is here that Karnad first started to explore his artistic talents and began writing poetry.

When Karnad returned to India, he started to work at Oxford University Press in 1963. After the success of his second play Tughlaq (1964), he decided to quit the press and has since devoted his life to writing drama. At one point (1974–75), he was the director of the Film Institute of Pune, India.

Karnad has written 10 plays, all of which are extremely politically driven but read like folktales. His very first play Yayati (1961), written while studying at Oxford, is taken from a story in the great Hindu epic The Mahabharata. It recounts the events that follow a son’s attempt to rescue his father from a curse, thus throwing the entire family into a moral dilemma. There is a strong sense of the past in Karnad’s work, and he borrows extensively from Indian mythology and history. His play Tughlaq, for instance, shows the transformation of the old Mughal emperor (Mohammad bin Tughlaq) from a sensitive ruler into an unjust oppressor. His folktale Cheluvi (1992), which was also made into a movie, is about a girl who turns into a tree, thus becoming a symbolic vehicle of nature’s outcry against humanity’s inconsiderate actions.

Karnad’s plays have always carried social messages. At a time when most of his peers were switching to the more-lucrative film industry, Karnad steadfastly stuck to writing about social reform for the theater. In 1994, he won the Sahitya Akademi Award for his social drama, Taledanda (1990), and the Jnanpith Award in 1999 for his contribution to modern Indian drama.

Another Work by Girish Karnad

Three Plays: Naga-Mandala; Hayavadana; Tughlaq. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

A Work about Girish Karnad

Dodiya, Jaydipsinh. The Plays of Girish Karnad: Critical Perspectives. New Delhi: Prestige Books, 1999.

Kaschnitz, Marie Luise (pseudonym of Freifrau Marie Luise von Kaschnitz-Weinberg) (1901–1974) poet, short-story writer

Marie Luise Kaschnitz was born in Karlsruhe, Germany. Her parents were Max Freiherr von Holzinger-Berstett, a general and nobleman, and Elsa von Seldenek. Kaschnitz grew up in Berlin and Potsdam. She trained to be a book dealer and later worked at a publishing house in Munich. In 1925, she married Guido von Kaschnitz-Weinberg, an archaeology professor. They traveled extensively and lived for several years in Rome.

Although best known as a poet, Kaschnitz's first work was a novel, Liebe beginnt (Love Begins, 1933). After World War II, she emerged as a lyric poet with her first collection Gedichte (Poems, 1947). Starting in the 1950s, she also published short-story collections and radio plays based on biblical legends. After Kaschnitz's husband died, she wrote Wohin denn ich (Where Do I Go Now? 1963), a moving collection of poems inspired by her loss.

A central theme in Kaschnitz's writings is the search for self. She often describes the plight of the individual in an impersonal, alien world. Influenced by her Christian faith and World War II, she frequently dealt with the issues of guilt and death. She used traditional forms but also experimented, developing her own unique style. Kaschnitz received the guest chair for poetry at the University of Frankfurt and won numerous awards, including the prestigious Georg Büchner Prize.

Other Works by Marie Luise Kaschnitz

Circe's Mountain: Stories by Marie Luise Kaschnitz.

Translated by Lisel Mueller. Minneapolis: Milkweed Editions, 1990.

Selected Later Poems of Marie Luise Kaschnitz. Translated by Lisel Mueller. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1980.

A Work about Marie Luise Kaschnitz

Pulver, Elsbeth. Marie Luise Kaschnitz. Munich: C. H. Beck, 1984.

Kauraka Kauraka (1951–1999) poet

Kauraka Kauraka was born in the village of Avatiu, Rarotonga, the Cook Islands. Kauraka's poetry reflects the interesting cultural roots of his heritage. His mother was a descendant of the Manihiki, and his father was part Manihiki, Mangaian, and Chinese. Kauraka went to New Zealand for his high school and college education and later went to Japan as a professional singer and musician for the Betela Dance Troupe. Kauraka graduated from the University of the South Pacific in Fiji in 1980 and became the language curriculum adviser to the Education Department in Rarotonga. He received his M.A. degree from the Anthropology Department in the University of Hawaii at Manoa in 1987. He became a full-time writer retelling, translating, and writing stories of the Pacific Islands. Kauraka founded Sunblossom Press in the Cook Islands and devoted his life to writing about the richness of Polynesian cultural tradition.

Kauraka's poetry reflects the ancient beliefs and traditions of his rich heritage. The images and metaphors in his poems are essentially Polynesian in nature. His talent for music shows distinctly in his poetry, which has a sing-song quality. Nature imagery (such as gardenias and coconut trees) and animal symbols (such as snakes, dolphins, and birds) constitute important elements of his poems.

In “Return to Havaiki” (1985), Kauraka uses the images of the ngoio (black noddy tern) and “great sky mushrooms” to reflect the natural richness of his Polynesian home, Manihiki.

Kauraka’s experiences while traveling also give his poetry a unique blend of cross-cultural elements that reveal his desire to share cultural complexities, especially those of Polynesia. He often questions the abandoning of traditional culture to embrace unquestionably the cultural practices of modern Western society. In “Darkness within the Light” (1985), Kauraka beseeches the New Zealander of indigenous descent not to forsake his traditional roots. In another poem, “Children of Manuhiki, Arise” (1985), he laments the powerful influence of modernity on the younger generation of Polynesians who no longer heeds the oral traditions of their ancestors.

Kauraka’s poems also bespeak the need to use the past to understand the future. All of these characteristics can be seen in the poems in Kauraka’s collection, Dreams of a Rainbow (1987), which he wrote when he was still a graduate student in Hawaii. His respect for the traditional past was most aptly described in “Po, The Great” and “Three Warriors.” In “Po, The Great,” he celebrates the power of Po, the parent of all mythical gods of the Pacific Islands; in “Three Warriors,” he personifies the three virtues of Polynesian heroes.

Kauraka’s most important contribution lies in his ability to create a dialogue between different groups of people. Through poetry, he establishes a platform on which the older and more traditional generation interacts with the younger, modern one. His poetry leads to a better understanding of world culture and interaction between not only two different cultures but also two generations within a culture.

Other Works by Kauraka Kauraka

Manakonako = reflections. Auckland: Mana Publications, 1991.

Manihikian traditional narratives = Na fakahiti o Manihikian. New Zealand: Te Ropu Kahurangi, 1988.

Taku Akatauirā = My dawning star: poems. Suva, Fiji: Mana Publications, 1999.

A Work about Kauraka Kauraka

Simpson, Michael, and John Untfreckner. Dreams of the Rainbow: Poems by Kauraka Kauraka. Honolulu: University of Hawaii at Manoa, East–West Center, 1986.

Kawabata Yasunari (1899–1972) novelist and short-story writer

Kawabata Yasunari was born to Kawabata Eikichi and Gen in Osaka. When he was young, his father, mother, grandmother and sister died, leaving him in the care of his nearly blind and terminally ill grandfather. In 1915, having also lost his grandfather, Kawabata moved to a middle-school dormitory, and then, having determined to become a writer, he studied Japanese literature at Tokyo Imperial University. In the 1930s, Kawabata became actively involved in the literary community, supporting young writers, working for magazines, and becoming a member of the censorious Literary Discussion Group, organized by the government as Japan entered World War II. Kawabata went into semiretirement in the late 1960s. In 1972, he was found dead, an apparent suicide, in his seaside apartment.

In 1921, Kawabata published his first story, “A View of the Yasukuni Festival,” which garnered the attention of influential writer Kan Kikuchi (1888–1948). Even with his support, however, Kawabata’s early stories were largely unsuccessful, perhaps due to their experimental style. In 1926, however, he published a novella written with more traditional literary idioms. The success of The Izu Dancer, about a walking tour of the Izu Peninsula near Tokyo, established Kawabata as a writer. A distinctive feature of his novels is the theme of unrequited longing. In Snow Country (1947), the protagonist Shimamura engages in an unfulfilling love affair with a geisha while secretly longing for a woman involved with another man. In 1950, Kawabata published one of his best works, Sound of the Mountain (1950), which won the literary prize of the Japanese Academy. The story, which catalogs the rambling thoughts of an aging patriarch, is distinctive for its stream-of-consciousness narrative.

Kawabata was a member of the literary movement called Shinkankakuha (Neo-Perceptionists). The movement attempted to find methods of bringing individual senses to life, chiefly through stream-of-consciousness narrative. Typically, his stories lack a traditional plot structure but excel in lyrical quality. His unique narrative style garnered attention internationally, and in 1968 Kawabata was the first Japanese writer to receive a Nobel Prize in literature.

Other Works by Kawabata Yasunari

Beauty and Sadness. Translated by Howard Hibbett. New York: Knopf, 1975.

The House of the Sleeping Beauties and Other Stories. Translated by Edward Seidensticker. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1969.

A Work about Kawabata Yasunari

Gessel, Van C. Three Modern Novelists: Sōseki, Tanizaki, Kawabata. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1993.

Kazantzakis, Nikos (1883–1957) poet, philosopher, novelist

Nikos Kazantzakis was born in Iráklion, Crete, and is considered one of the most important 20th-century Greek philosophers. He graduated from Athens Law School in 1906 and fought as a volunteer for the Greek army during the Balkan wars. After the wars ended, he traveled to Spain, Egypt, China, Japan, and Russia, publishing travelogues of his journeys.

Kazantzakis is much better known as a philosopher than as a writer. His work was influenced by the writings of NIETZSCHE, elements of marxism, and the basic philosophical beliefs of Christianity and Buddhism. He attempted to combine and harmonize these different ideas in his book Askitiki (1927), which is considered the basis of his own philosophy. His epic poem Odyssey: A Modern Sequel (1938) is also among his well-known earlier works. It picks up Ulysses' tale where Homer left off and brings it to a more solid conclusion.

It was in the later years of his life, however, that Kazantzakis became famous for his novels, including Zorba the Greek (1946) and The Last Temptation of Christ (1955). Both of these works have since been made into films. The controversial nature of The Last Temptation of Christ, in which Jesus must face the greatest temptation of all, led to the Roman Catholic Church's banning of the book and to Kazantzakis's excommunication from the Greek Orthodox Church in 1955. The film version, produced in 1988, also caused much protest from conservative Christian organizations.

In 1956, Kazantzakis was awarded the International Peace Award. He died one year later in Germany, the same year that the first of his novels to be made into a film, He Who Must Die (1957) was presented at the Cannes Film Festival.

Other Works by Nikos Kazantzakis

At the Palaces of Knossos: A Novel. Translated by Themis and Theodora Vasils. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1988.

Buddha. Translated By Kimon Friar and Athena Dalis-Damis. San Diego, Calif.: Avant Books, 1983.

Works about Nikos Kazantzakis

Bien, Peter. Nikos Kazantzakis, Novelist. Bristol: Bristol Classical Press, 1989.

Dombrowski, Daniel. Kazantzakis and God. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997.

Kemal, Yaşar (1923–) novelist, poet

Yaşar Kemal was born in Hemite, a hamlet in the province of Adana in southern Turkey. When Kemal was five, his father was murdered while praying in the mosque. Kemal found solace in his love of music and poetry. When he turned nine, he attended a school in the neighboring village. He completed his primary education in Kadırlı where his family resettled, becoming the first villager from Hemite to complete his primary education.

Kemal wrote his first story in 1947 and worked as a public letter writer for the next three years. In 1950, he moved to Istanbul, where he found a job as a reporter for the daily newspaper Cumhuriyet (Republic). Kemal's unique style of writing won him not only national but also international recognition. He was a fervent activist for human rights in Turkey, and his works and activities enhanced his fame as a spellbinding storyteller.

Kemal's enchantment with the Anatolian tradition of folk minstrels features prominently in his writings such as Salman the Solitary (translated 1998), in which the traveling bard assumes the narrator's role. Kemal's love of music and creativity allow him to enhance his talent as an animated and powerful storyteller. He writes with energy and devotion, drawing on the rich tradition of his Turkish heritage and the literary tradition of Anatolia. His works, though heavily imbued by his strong leftist political views, still preserve a certain idyllic quality, which bespeaks of optimism and romanticism.

In an interesting way, Kemal represents the romantic bard of the Anatolian past who writes and sings of social injustice. He has found balance between his appropriation of the genre of traditional literature and his concern with modern issues. His best-known novel is the epic Memed, My Hawk (1955), which won the Varlik Prize 1996 for Best Novel. Kemal has been short-listed for the Nobel Prize in literature many times, and his collection of articles won the annual Journalists' Association Prize.

Other Works by Yaşar Kemal

Anatolian Tales. Translated from the Turkish by Thilda Kemal. New York: Mead, 1969.

Iron Earth, Copper Sky. Translated from the Turkish by Thilda Kemal. London: Collins and Harvill Press, 1974.

Seagull. Translated from the Turkish by Thilda Kemal. New York: Pantheon Books, 1981.

A Work about Yaşar Kemal

Bosquet, Alain. Yaşar Kemal on His Life and Art: Yaşar Kemal with Alain Bosquet. Translated from the French by Eugene Hibert and Barry Tharaud. Albany, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1990.

Keneally, Thomas (1935–) novelist, playwright

Thomas Keneally was born at Kempsey on the north coast of New South Wales, Australia. His father was a postman. He attended a Christian Brothers' school for his primary and high school education, and, at 17, he began to study for the Catholic priesthood. He abandoned this vocation in 1960 before his official ordination. Keneally taught for two years at the University of New England at Armidale before becoming a full-time writer. He was one of the few Australians who could rely on his writing to support himself and his family. Keneally has received three Commonwealth Literary Fund Awards, and his books have won two Miles Franklin Awards. He was awarded the Order of Australia in 1983 for his contributions to Australian literature. Keneally now lives in New York and Sydney.

Keneally's writing appeals to both Australian and international audiences because it deals with human issues that transcend all geographical and social boundaries. Using a mixture of humor and tragic irony, Keneally is able to capture the constant struggle of society to come to terms with its actions, its relationships with others, and its uncertainty. Keneally's past clearly influences his works. His first novel, The Place at Whitton (1964), is a mystery tale set in a Catholic seminary, while Blood Red, Sister Rose (1974) involves a female heroine character who resembles Joan of Arc. These two novels highlight the importance influence of the Catholic vocation as a phase in his past.

One of the major subjects represented in Keneally's works is his concern with history and its lessons. Using historical materials, he is able to examine historical events and their impact through the perspectives of his central characters in novels such as Schindler's Ark (1982) and Bring Larks and Heroes (1967). Schindler's Ark tells the true story of Oskar Schindler, a German industrialist who saved thousands of Jews from death during the Holocaust. This book was adapted and made into a movie, Schindler's List, in 1993. Bring Larks and Heroes narrates the story of Australians who fought in Vietnam during World War II.

Keneally's earlier novels tend to have a predominantly Australian setting. Books such as The Fear (1965) and The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith (1972) are set in Australia. In The Fear, Keneally examines the experiences of a young boy growing up during World War II. The fears of war reaching Australian shores loom heavy in the imaginative mind of the boy as he begins to conjure imaginary visions of war atrocities and prisoner-of-war camps. The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith, however, is a study of a history of interracial relations between the Aborigines and the Europeans. His later novels, beginning with Blood Red, Sister Rose, are set in locations including France, England, Yugoslavia, and the United States.

Keneally's novels cover a wide range of genres from fables to macabre murders and mysteries. His versatility can be observed in his writings from concise and didactic parables to ornately elaborate narratives. In all Keneally's novels, he is concerned with the connection between the past and the present. His motivation to write stems from his curiosity regarding the irony that human beings often find themselves in conflict with the conventions and values of the systems of authority that they help create. For instance, Schindler in Schindler's Ark tries to do the humane thing by assisting many Jews to escape even though the fear of being discovered by the fanatical Nazi government hovers constantly over his head.

Keneally's heroes and heroines act with integrity and honor despite their individual flaws. They are tragic figures trapped between the demands of unsympathetic institutions of authority and their own personal desires. In their attempts to do the right thing, they often flounder either in the seas of their guilt or under the destructive claws of the authority. Examples of these can be found in two of Keneally's characters, Ramsey and Maitland. Ramsey, in The Survivor (1969), finds himself caught in a vicious abyss of guilt and remorse for 40 years after he deserted his close friend and companion during an Antarctic expedition. Maitland, a priest-teacher in Three Cheers for the Paraclete (1968), finds himself the subject of a series of religious hymns poking fun at the absurdity of religious rules. The tragic nature of the characters' experiences is partially alleviated by Keneally's injections of humor into the harsh reality of their experiences. The message that Keneally clearly sends across to his readers is the recognition that in spite of their poignant experiences, these heroic characters are active shapers of their own worlds. This is perhaps a main reason that Keneally's novels are so appealing to readers all over the world: Readers are able to empathize with Keneally's protagonists. The human condition is a complex web, and people are victims as well as active participants in their destinies.

Keneally also writes in other genres such as drama, children's stories, nonfiction, and film scripts. His plays include Halloran's Little Boat (1968), which is an adaptation of his book Bring Larks and Heroes, and Bullie's House (1981), which examines early interactions between Australian Aborigines and the European settlers. In Bullie's House, the Aborigines show the white settlers their precious totems hoping that the latter would in return share their knowledge and technology, which the whites never quite do on equal terms. Keneally's greatest contribution lies in his ability to capture in essence and intensity the dramatic clash of two cultures, which constitutes an important theme in world literature.

Other Works by Thomas Keneally

The Great Shame: and the Triumph of the Irish in the English-speaking World. New York: Nan A. Talese, 1999.

The Playmaker. London: Sceptre, 1988.

A Season in Purgatory. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977.

Three Cheers for the Paraclete. New York: Viking, 1969.

Towards Asmara. London: Hodder and Staughton, 1989.

Victim of the Aurora. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1978.

Works about Thomas Keneally

Beston, John. "Novelist's Vital Professionalism," Hemisphere 17, no. 10 (1973): 23–26.

Breitinger, Eckhard. "Thomas Keneally's Historical Novels," Commonwealth News (Aarhus) 10 (1976): 16–20.

Kincaid, Jamaica (Elaine Potter Richardson) (1949–) novelist, short-story writer

Jamaica Kincaid was born in St. John's, Antigua, and named Elaine Potter Richardson by her mother, Annie Richardson. Shortly after Kincaid's birth, Annie married David Drew, a carpenter and cabinetmaker, after whom Kincaid models her fictional fathers, not her biological father, Roderick Potter. Annie Richardson taught her daughter how to read and sent her to the Moravian school. Shortly after her 17th birthday, Kincaid traveled to the United States to work and study.

Elaine Potter Richardson officially changed her name to Jamaica Kincaid in 1973, partially to heighten her anonymity as a writer. In 1976, she started to work as a staff writer for The New Yorker, after George W. Trow, the New Yorker's "Talk of the Town" editor, introduced Kincaid to the magazine's editor, William Shawn. Before long, Kincaid began to write the "Talk of the Town" column and by 1992 was using the metaphor of gardening to write about the effects of colonialism.

Critics have praised Kincaid's lyrical originality, her characterization, and the modernist narrative techniques in her depiction of Caribbean life, including colonialism, separation, and mother-child relationships. Kincaid voiced a lack of interest in First World approval, assuming a self-exiled literary position (in a 1990 interview with Donna Perry).

Ironically enough, critical attention and acclaim from First World critics—especially for her short-story collection, At the Bottom of the River (1983), and her novels, Annie John (1985) and Lucy (1990)—steadily increased. To quote R. B. Hughes in Empire and Domestic Space in the Fiction of Jamaica Kincaid, "Kincaid's novels illustrate alternative, conceptual, emancipatory spaces within idealised colonial territory. Her doing so depends upon her ' . . . displacing the discursive structures of the (colonial) master subject,' and depends too ' . . . on a sense of possibilities and self-representation beyond the territory defined by the dominant [culture].'"

Other Works by Jamaica Kincaid

Annie, Gwen, Lilly, Pam and Tulip. New York: Whitney Museum of Modern Art, 1986.

Autobiography of My Mother. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1995.

A Small Place. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1988.

Works about Jamaica Kincaid

Covi, Giovanna. Jamaica Kincaid and the Resistance to Canons. In Carole Boyce Davies and Elaine Savory Fido, eds., Out of the Kumbula: Caribbean Women and Literature. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 1990: 345–354.

Paravisini-Gebert, Lizabeth. Jamaica Kincaid: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, Press, 1999.

Kirsch, Sarah (Ingrid Bernstein)

(1935–) poet, short-story writer

Sarah Kirsch was born in Limlingerode, a village in the Harz Mountains. Her father worked in telecommunications for the East German government. Kirsch became a socialist at a young age. She earned a diploma in biology from the University of Halle and attended the Johannes R. Becher Institute for Literature in Leipzig from 1963 to 1965. Participating in the East German effort to build solidarity between workers and writers, Kirsch worked in factories and collective farms during the 1960s. She married the writer Rainer Kirsch in 1958.

Kirsch's first publication was a radio play for children that she cowrote with her husband in 1963. They also collaborated on her first poetry collection, Gesprach mit dem Saurier (Conversation with a Dinosaur, 1965), a volume of children's poems with a political edge. Her poems in Landaufenthalt (A Stay in the Country, 1967) combine descriptions of nature with political commentary. In the late 1960s, Kirsch defended the value of lyric poetry in the socialist state. Although her stand drew government criticism, the debate started a "lyric boom" among poets. In 1976, she protested when East Germany revoked the citizenship of the singer Wolf Biermann. As a result, she lost her membership in the Communist Party and moved to West Berlin.

Kirsch is known for her unique style that combines musicality and facility of language. She used intense nature images to describe human experiences and to bridge the gap between love poetry and the poetry of social production. She was especially concerned about the role of women in modern society in both private and public realms. Kirsch's influences include Bettina von ARNIM and the Russian poet Anna AKHMATOVA. Despite her political difficulties, Kirsch won numerous awards for her poetry and short-story collections in the 1970s and 1980s, including the Friedrich Hölderlin Prize.

Another Work by Sarah Kirsch

The Panther Woman: Five Tales from the Cassette Recorder. Translated by Marion Faber. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1989.

A Work about Sarah Kirsch

Hopwood, Mererid, and David Basker, eds. Sarah Kirsch. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1997.

Kiš, Danilo (1935–1989) novelist, poet

Danilo Kiš was born in Subotica, on the border of Yugoslavia and Hungary. His father, a Hungarian Jew, died in Auschwitz. Most of his family was killed during World War II except his mother, a Christian from Montenegro. Raised in Hungary and Montenegro, Kiš studied literature at the University of Belgrade and eventually worked as a teacher in France.

Kiš's work was greatly influenced by the loss of his family. His novels Garden, Ashes (1965) and Hourglass (1972) are monuments to his father's life and death. A Tomb for Boris Davidovic (1976) is a collection of stories about victims of Communist terror set in a politically oppressed Eastern Europe. In the title story of this collection, Boris repeatedly flees from prison and changes his name, only to be recaptured. The frequency of this pattern is both comic and tragic. This and the rest of the stories in the volume are short biographical sketches of a victim as hero, fighting against history and a pervasive sense of doom. The characters range from idealistic to opportunistic, from sadistic to compassionate, and the stories themselves from the absurd to the horrific.

Another of Kiš's works, based largely on personal narrative, is Early Sorrows (1969), a collection of stories about the often tragic childhood experiences of a Jewish boy in a small Serbian town near the Hungarian border during World War II. Kiš illustrates the dramatic change in the boy's life from peaceful serenity to horror and brutality after soldiers enter his village.

Kiš's work gained large international audiences primarily because noted writer Susan Sontag introduced Kiš to English-speaking readers. He has also been compared with Jorge Luis BORGES, to whom he explicitly admitted a debt, once indicating that the history of the short story can be divided into two distinct eras: before Borges and after Borges.

Other Works by Danilo Kiš

The Encyclopedia of the Dead. Translated by Michael Henry Heim. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1989.

Hourglass. Translated by Ralph Manheim. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1997.

A Work about Danilo Kiš

Birnbaum, M. D., and R. Trager-Verchovsky, eds. History, Another Text. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1988.

Klausner, Amos

See OZ, AMOS.

Kogawa, Joy (1935–) poet, novelist

Joy Kogawa was born in Vancouver. As a second-generation Japanese-Canadian, or nisei, her work, including poetry, fiction, children's literature, and nonfiction, often reflects the perspectives of Japanese-Canadians. Kogawa and her family were evacuated to Slocan, British Columbia, and later to Coaldale, Alberta, during World War II. Kogawa received her education at the University of Alberta and taught elementary school in Coaldale. She also studied at the University of Toronto and at both the Anglican Women's Training College and the University of Saskatchewan. She married in 1957, had two children, and divorced in 1968.

Joy Kogawa has published several collections of poetry, essays, children's literature, and novels. Among her more notable works are the novels Obasan (1981), which focuses on the lives of Japanese-Canadians during World War II, and The Rain Ascends (1995), about a Protestant clergyman who abuses children. Kogawa has been active in lobbying the Canadian federal government to acknowledge and redress its decision to intern 20,000 Japanese Canadians during World War II.

Another Work by Joy Kogawa

Itsuka. Toronto: Viking, 1992.

Köhler, Barbara (1959–) poet, essayist

Barbara Köhler was born in Burgstädt, Germany. After passing the Arbitur (school-leaving exam), she studied literature at the Johannes R. Becher Institute in Leipzig. Her first collection of verse, Deutsches Roulette (German Roulette, 1991), established her as one of Germany's most innovative young poets. She followed up with a second collection, Blue Box (1995), and published internationally in journals such as Poetry magazine. She has also written for several newspapers. Köhler's several literary awards include the Leonce and Lena Prize (1991), the Else Lasker-Schuler Prize (1994), and the Clemens–Brentano Prize (1996).

Köhler's verse displays a restless yet precise passion, as seen in the poem "Self-portrait" (1991), and also combines traditional and contemporary forms. Her poems "Gedicht" ("Poem," 1991), "Ingeborg Bachmann Stirbt in Rom" ("Ingeborg Bachmann Dies in Rome," 1991), and "IV" (1991) reveal Köhler's common themes of yearning, mourning, and the memories of unhappy women, respectively. Köhler's writing shows an understanding of poetry's potential in bringing out the richness and fullness of language.

A Work about Barbara Köhler

Paul, Georgina, and Helmut Schmitz, eds. Entgegenkommen: Dialogues with Barbara Köhler. Atlanta: Rodopi, 2000.

Kokoschka, Oskar (1886–1980) painter, poet, playwright

Oskar Kokoschka was born in Pochlarn, Austria, to Gustav Kokoschka, a goldsmith, and Romana Loidl, a great storyteller who inspired his love for nature. Kokoschka graduated from state school, but he dreamed of becoming an artist and entered the Vienna School of Arts and Crafts, where he studied from 1905 to 1909. The revolutionary nature of his art was deemed scandalous by some instructors and administrators, and he was expelled after painting a particularly controversial painting.

Kokoschka's work often openly expressed sexual themes and other controversial motifs; indeed, the imagery in Kokoschka's poetry often resembled the strange and unusual images found in his graphic works. In 1908, Kokoschka published his first book of poetry, The Dreaming Youth. Along with the poems, the book contained reproductions of paintings that he specifically completed for the book. Kokoschka's early work was heavily influenced by SYMBOLISM; however, he is often credited with the foundation of EXPRESSIONISM.

The aim of the movement was to represent the subjective psychological experience through literature and other forms of art. Murder, the Women's Hope (1916), a short play completed by Kokoschka in 1907, became the basis for expressionist drama. In the play, first performed in 1909, the nameless Man confronts his impulsive sexual drives and attempts to free himself from the physical dependence associated with bodily functions. In a kind of crude sexual fantasy, the Man strangles the nameless Woman and then slaughters her female companions. The clearly demarcated antagonism between the male and female, violence, and sexual submission were persistent themes of Kokoschka's work. Orpheus and Eurydice (1923) pursues similar themes and comments on the turbulent relationship between Kokoschka and Alma Mahler, the widow of the famous composer Gustav Mahler (1860–1911). In many instances, however, his work was simply too overwhelming for the sensibility of the general public, and it never gained a wide appeal.

Kokoschka's painting became renowned for its surreal, dreamlike images, and it gained some popularity. He held an appointment as an art instructor between 1911 and the outbreak of World War I in Vienna and Berlin. Kokoschka served in the cavalry of the Austrian army during World War I and was wounded several times. After retiring from the army, Kokoschka continued working extensively on his paintings.

During the 1930s, Kokoschka's works were openly attacked by pro-Nazi newspapers in Austria and Germany. Kokoschka left Austria for Czechoslovakia in 1931 and then emigrated to England after the fall of Czechoslovakia to the Nazis. In Nazi Germany, Kokoschka's work was banned and was ridiculed by the authorities as an example of "degenerate art." During this time of turmoil, Kokoschka mostly wrote essays on art and expressionist aesthetics.

After the end of World War II, Kokoschka returned to Austria and worked as an art instructor and theater designer. His gained international popularity by the 1950s, and his works were exhibited throughout the world. In 1971, Kokoschka published My Life, an autobiography in which he also presents his views on art and culture and provides engaging accounts of his personal relationships with famous artists of the expressionist movement.

Oskar Kokoschka is mainly remembered today for his paintings; however, his work in literature laid the ground for the seminal expressionist movement. His striking, often disturbing works challenge our epistemological notions about art and aesthetics. Today, Kokoschka's visual art and literary works are considered to be among the masterpieces of the 20th century.

Other Works by Oskar Kokoschka

Oskar Kokoschka Drawings, 1906–1965. Miami: University of Miami Press, 1970.

Plays and Poems. Translated by Michael Mitchell. New York: Ariadne Press, 2001.

Works about Oskar Kokoschka

Calvocaressi, Richard, and Katharina Schultz. Oskar Kokoschka, 1886–1980. New York: Solomon R. Guggenheim Foundation, 1986.

Whitford, Frank. Oskar Kokoschka: A Life. New York: Atheneum, 1986.

Kostrowitsky, Wilhelm Apollinaris de

See APOLLINAIRE, GUILLAUME.

Kumagai Yumiko

See KURAHASHI YUMIKO.

Kundera, Milan (1929–) novelist

Milan Kundera was born on April 1 in Brno, Moravia. The son of a concert pianist and musi-cologist, Kundera studied music and was a jazz musician in his youth. He soon turned to writing, publishing his first volume of poetry, Clovek Zahrada Sirá (Man: A Broad Garden) in 1953. This work, as well as two later poetry collections—Poslední Máj (The Last May, 1955) and Monology (Monologues, 1957)—were condemned by Czechoslovakian officials because of their ironic tone and erotic imagery. Kundera has repeatedly denied any political motivation behind his works.

Kundera was a Communist Party member twice, from 1948 to 1950 and from 1956 to 1968. Both times, he was expelled from the party for his supposedly unorthodox or anticommunist opinions. During this time, he also studied and taught in the Film Faculty of Prague's Academy of Music and Dramatic Arts. His political entanglements and disagreements with the Communist Party, however, ultimately led to the threat of a loss of his employment. Kundera was involved in the liberalization of Czechoslovakia in 1967 to 1968. After the Soviet occupation, he was attacked by the authorities for his liberal beliefs and ousted once again. In 1969, he was fired from his job, and his works were banned from legal publication in Czechoslovakia.

Kundera is best known internationally for his novel The Unbearable Lightness of Being (1984), which was made into a film of the same name in 1988 by American film director Philip Kauffman. The novel tells the story of four relationships. It primarily focuses on the character of Thomas, a man torn between loving his wife and sustaining his erotic adventures and extramarital affairs. At the beginning of the novel, Kundera asks, "What then shall we choose? Weight or lightness?" The lives of these characters are shaped not only by the choices they make but also by the desires and demands of society and history; thus, Kundera looks at the ways in which history and choice shape life and identity.

Kundera is a prolific writer. In his early career, several volumes of short stories, as well as a successful one-act play, The Owners of the Keys (1962), were followed by the publication of his first novel,

The Joke (1967; translated 1982). This comedic work takes an ironic look at the private lives of various people in Czechoslovakia during the years of Stalinism. It has been translated into numerous languages and has achieved international acclaim. This was followed by a second novel, Life Is Elsewhere (1969; translated 1974), about a hopeless romantic who embraces the 1948 Communist takeover. This novel was banned immediately from Czech publication. Kundera's subsequent novels, including The Farewell Party (1976), The Book of Laughter and Forgetting (1979; translated 1980), and The Unbearable Lightness of Being were banned in Czechoslovakia but were published in France and other countries. The Book of Laughter and Forgetting was among his most successful novels, perhaps because it pointed to one of the harsher truths of Kundera's homeland: humankind's propensity to deny or erase historical truths.

In a collection of essays titled The Art of the Novel (1988), Kundera writes that a novel must be "autonomous," that it should be created independently of any political belief system. In 1975, in response to the suppression of his work, Kundera was allowed to emigrate to France. He took a teaching post at the University of Rennes, where he remained on the faculty until 1978. In 1979, the Czech government revoked his citizenship. Kundera continues to write works that are humorous yet skeptical and pessimistic in their depictions of humanity, whether under Communist rule or elsewhere.

Other Works by Milan Kundera

Identity. Translated by Linda Asher. New York: Harper Flamingo, 1998.

Slowness. Translated by Linda Asher. Boston: Faber and Faber, 1996.

Testaments Betrayed. Translated by Linda Asher. Boston: Faber and Faber, 1996.

Works about Milan Kundera

Misurella, Fred. Understanding Milan Kundera: Public Events, Private Affairs. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Petro, Peter, ed. Critical Essays on Milan Kundera. New York: G. K. Hall, 1999.

Kunene, Mazisi (1930–) poet

Mazisi Kunene was born in Durban, South Africa. He began writing poetry as a boy and by the age of 10 was already submitting poems to local newspapers and magazines. Kunene taught for four years in Natal, where he obtained his master's degree. In 1959, he went to London to further his studies in the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London. In London, he founded the Anti-Apartheid Movement and became the director of education for the South African United Front. Kunene spent 34 years in exile in England and the United States for his leadership in the anti-apartheid movement. He finally returned to South Africa in 1993 and became a professor in the Department of Zulu Language and Literature in the University of Natal, where he still works today. In the same year, he was appointed Africa's poet laureate in the United Nation's Education, Science and Cultural Organization.

Kunene's poetry shows how the concerns and themes of his Zulu heritage can be used to enhance an understanding of South African history and society. His poems, such as "Encounter with the Ancestors" (1982), draw on the rich images and symbols of Zulu myths. They reveal ideas such as the virtues and wisdom of ancestors, which have been transmitted from generation to generation in Zulu oral tradition. His poetry expresses the relevance of these motifs in South African society today.

Kunene's intimate involvement in the political movement against apartheid is also an essential element of his works, which, perhaps, explains why his first volume of poems, Zulu Poems (1970), was banned for many years in South Africa. One of his two epic poems, Emperor Shaka the Great, celebrates the heroism and strength of Shaka Zulu, the founder of the Zulu nation. Kunene's favorable depiction of Shaka as a hero challenges the Eurocentric portrayal of the man as a tyrannical despot. His other epic poem Anthem of the Decades was published in 1981. Both poems were first published in the Zulu language and later translated into English.

In recognition of Kunene's contributions to African literature, the Mazisi Kunene Library was jointly established by Create Africa South and the Kunene family. Its aims are to fund study in the Zulu language, to publish and distribute Kunene and other writers' works in the Zulu language, and to provide research facilities for scholars interested in South African history and society. Kunene's writing stands apart from other African voices that speak of alienation and anger. His works, especially the two epic poems, showcase the glory and richness of the African traditions and challenge Western readers to accept and appreciate the importance of African cultures. His use of Zulu language and style also provides a medium through which African cultural symbols and thought are effectively transmitted without appropriating English or other European diction.

Another Work by Mazisi Kunene

The Ancestors and the Sacred Mountain. London: Heinemann, 1982.

Works about Mazisi Kunene

Barnett, Ursula. A Vision of Order: A Study of Black South African Literature in English (1914–1980). Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press/London: Sinclair Browne, 1983.

Goodwin, K. L. Understanding Poetry: A Study of Ten Poets. London: Heinemann, 1982.

Haynes, John. "Kunene's Shaka and the Idea of a Poet as Teacher." Ariel 18, no. 1 (1987): 39–50.

Maduka, Chidi. "Poetry, Humanism and Apartheid: A Study of Mazisi Kunene's Zulu Poems," Griot 4, nos. 1–2 (1985): 57–72.

Kunert, Günter (1929–) poet, short-story writer

Günter Kunert was born in Berlin four years before the Nazi rise to power. Because his mother was Jewish, he faced discrimination and was prevented from completing grammar school. After the war, he attended Berlin Kunsthochschule, an art institute. While a teenager, he switched his focus from art to literature and published his first poems and prose in the Ulenpiegel (Joker) magazine. An idealistic socialist at an early age, Kunert joined the Socialist Unity Party in East Germany in 1949. Three years later, he married Marianne Todten, whose critical assistance greatly benefited his writing career.

Kunert's first collection of poetry, Wegschilder und Mauerinschriften (Road Signs and Wall Writings, 1950), made a significant literary impact. In 1952, the German poet Bertolt BRECHT, one of Kunert's influences, praised him as a gifted young poet. During the following three decades, Kunert published more than 20 works of poetry, prose, and essays as well as one novel. In the mid-1960s, he became critical of East Germany's socialist government. In the 1970s, he joined Sarah KIRSCH and Christa WOLF in protesting the revoking of the singer Wolf Biermann's citizenship. Kunert was then harassed and lost his party membership. He moved to West Germany in 1979.

Kunert is considered a master of the epigram, the parable, the satire, and the use of aphoristic form to express a principle in a short work. His writing was serious, ironic, and grotesque. He took a firm stand against misuse of the language. Kunert frequently dealt with contemporary concerns—such as greed, poverty, and injustice—and was committed to remembering the victims of past persecutions. Although his writing became increasingly pessimistic after the mid-1960s, Kunert is known for the integrity of his work. His many awards include the Johannes R. Becher Prize.

Another Work by Günter Kunert

Windy Times: Poems and Prose. Translated by Agnes Stein. New York: Red Dust, 1983.

Kurahashi Yumiko (Kumagai Yumiko)

(1935–) novelist, short-story writer

Kurahashi Yumiko was born in Kōchi, Shikoku Prefecture, to dentist Kurahashi Toshirō and his wife, Misae. Kurahashi entered Kyoto Women's College in 1953 and, in 1955, enrolled in Japanese Women's Junior College of Hygiene in Tokyo to become a dental hygienist at her father's practice. However, she surprised her family when, upon graduation, she enrolled as an undergraduate in the French Department of Meiji University. Upon completing the program, she started graduate school but returned home when her father died in 1962. Two years later, she married photographer Kumagai Tomihiro and later attended the University of Iowa's creative-writing program under a Fulbright Fellowship in 1966.

Kurahashi's writing garnered notice while she was still an undergraduate. Her short story "Party" (1960) won both the Meiji University Chancellor's Award in 1960 and the Women's Literary Award in 1961. She quickly followed with her first novel, Blue Journey (1961), a story about a woman's search for the man to whom she is engaged. In 1969, Kurahashi published The Adventures of Sumiyakist Q, which portrays the attempts of a man to convert people secretly to an imaginary ideology called Sumiyakism. Shortly after her return from studying in the United States, Kurahashi initiated a series of novels centered on the life of a woman named Keiko with the publication of A Floating Bridge of Dreams (1969). In this ongoing series, Kurahashi creates a parallel fictional world that continues through several generations of Keiko's family.

Kurahashi is known both for writing complex stories that are presented with striking clarity and for her inclusion of controversial subjects, such as incest and partner swapping, in her stories. In addition to her prizes for "Party," she won the Tamura Toshiko Award in 1963 and the Izumi Kyōka Memorial Prize in 1987.

Other Works by Kurahashi Yumiko

"The Monastery." Translated by Carolyn Haynes. In Van C. Gessel and Tomone Matsumoto, eds., The Shōwa Anthology: Modern Japanese Short Stories. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1985.

The Woman with the Flying Head and Other Stories of Kurahashi Yumiko. Translated by Atsuko Sakaki. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1998.

A Work about Kurahashi Yumiko

Sakaki, Atsuko. "(Re)canonizing Kurahashi Yumiko: Toward Alternative Perspectives for 'Modern'

'Japanese' 'Literature.'" In Stephen Snyder and Philip Gabriel, eds., Ōe and Beyond: Fiction in Contemporary Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.

L

La Guma, Alex (1925–1985) novelist, short-story writer

One of South Africa's premier chroniclers of life under apartheid in South Africa, Justin Alexander La Guma was born into a trade-unionist household. This early involvement with socialist politics combined with his status as a Cape Town "coloured" (a person of mixed race ancestry according to apartheid laws established in 1948) conspired to make of La Guma a writer concerned with issues of class and race in all his writings.

His parents made him aware of his mixed-race heritage by stressing the various cultures that were his heritage. His maternal grandmother had come to South Africa from Indonesia; his maternal grandfather came from Scotland. His father was originally from what is now known as the Malagasy Republic. When La Guma was only 13 years old, he tried to get to Spain to fight against the fascists in the Spanish civil war, but he was turned down. Two years later, in 1940, he tried to enlist as a soldier to fight against Nazi Germany, but he was refused because of his slight build and unhealthy appearance. At 17, he went to work doing manual labor in a box factory where he developed a life-long awareness of the real concerns of working people.

In 1955, La Guma worked for a left-wing newspaper in Cape Town as a journalist until the apartheid government banned his work; he wrote political columns, reported on the absurdities of apartheid laws, and even penned a regular political cartoon. After the murders of unarmed blacks in 1960 by white policemen, an event since referred to as the Sharpeville Massacre, all antigovernment groups were banned, and La Guma himself was jailed for more than six months. He was later sentenced, in 1962, to five years under house arrest. The punishment meant that he could not leave his home, meet with any of his friends, or in any way communicate with those whose ideology he shared. In his novel, The Stone Country (1967), La Guma fictionalizes this experience, and several stays in prison in 1960 and 1961 when South Africa was under a state of emergency and many people were detained without being formally charged.

La Guma was banned from employment as a journalist during the early 1960s, and he turned to writing fiction as a result. The publication, in 1962, of a collection of short stories entitled A Walk in the Night and Other Stories marked the advent of something truly different in the South African literary tradition. In the lead story in the collection, the novella from which the collection takes its name, La Guma allows his characters to speak in a sanitized version of the Cape Town dialect that the real underclass spoke. Another story in the collection, “Tattoo Marks and Nails,” focuses on a prison cell and is a precursor to The Stone Country. Although he was not the first South African writer to focus on working people and their problems, La Guma’s concentration on the realistic representation of the poorest and most vulnerable of his culture’s people marked him as a uniquely South African voice. For example, although Peter ABRAHAMS can very easily be seen as a literary pioneer for his focus on the poorest of South Africa’s noncitizens in Mine Boy (1946) and other texts, La Guma allows the streets to speak for themselves. In many ways, he signals a resistance to the forms of the European literary tradition that had, to that date, influenced the vast majority of South African works written in English.

La Guma is an important figure in the literary tradition of South Africa because he points up something about the way people in the United States understand places like South Africa. Important critics such as Lewis NKOSI and J. M. COETZEE observed long ago that those of us who read about foreign cultures often view foreign texts as “sociological” documents; for example, a 1974 essay by Coetzee examines the reduction of the literary text to an example of an exotic culture. These astute critics also have observed that—worse—“weak” literature all too often is celebrated because its politics are right. But La Guma’s works have both a deceptive, realist style and true literary merit. He is rightly read as much for the quality of his writing as for his content. As Cecil Abrahams states “He [La Guma] sees his task as similar to that of the African storyteller, namely that of recording events as told to him and fashioning the tale in such a manner that there is both a moral and an entertaining purpose involved.”

Other Works by Alex La Guma

In the Fog of the Season’s End. London: Heinemann, 1972.

Time of the Butcherbird. London: Heinemann, 1979.

Works about Alex La Guma

Abrahams, Cecil. Alex La Guma. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Coetzee, J. M. “Man’s Fate in the Novels of Alex La Guma.” Studies in Black Literature 5.1 (Spring 1974).

Labrunie, Gerard

See NERVAL, GERARD DE.

Lagerkvist, Pär (Fabian) (1891–1974)

poet, dramatist, novelist, short-story writer

Pär Lagerkvist was born in Växjö, Sweden, to Anders Johan, a railway linesman, and Johanna (Blad) Lagerquist. Although he embraced Darwinism and political radicalism at a young age, Lagerkvist was influenced throughout his life by his parents’ pietistic Christian faith. He attended the University of Uppsala in 1911 and 1912. In addition to writing, he briefly worked as a theater critic for a Stockholm newspaper in the late 1910s. He married Karen Dagmar Johanne Soerensen in 1918 and, after they divorced, married Elaine Luella Hallberg in 1925.

Lagerkvist first emerged on the literary scene as a poet. The second of his nine collections, Ångest (Anguish, 1916), described the despair and pain of World War I. The volume challenged the Swedish romantic tradition in verse and is considered the beginning of poetic modernism. Lagerkvist continued his search for aesthetic revolt and renewal in his dramas. He wrote 13 plays, including Himlens Hemlighet (The Secret of Heaven, 1919), which addressed the search for meaning in life. In the 1930s, Lagerkvist’s dramas, plays, and short stories dealt with the issues of evil and fascism. After 1940, he focused on writing novels. Dvärgen (The Dwarf, 1944), considered by many to be his best work, explores the evil and creativity of humans.

Lagerkvist wrote more than 40 major works and has been translated into 34 languages. He was elected to the Swedish Academy of Literature in 1940 and won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1951. His influences include the dramatist August STRINDBERG, and naivism, cubism, and fauvism in French painting. His literary career lasted a half-century and encompassed all major genres but still displayed a remarkable internal consistency. Lagerkvist wrote about faith, skepticism, death, and evil, and explored the mysteries of existence. The scholar Robert Donald Spector observed that in Lagerkvist's works "his major theme is a quest for a god who will replace the deity of his youth."

Another Work by Pär Lagerkvist

Guest of Reality. Translated by Robin Fulton. New York: Quartet, 1989.

A Work about Pär Lagerkvist

Spector, Robert Donald. Pär Lagerkvist. Boston: Twayne, 1973.

Lagerlöf, Selma (1858–1940) novelist

Selma Lagerlöf was born in Marbacka, Sweden. She was educated at home by her father, a retired army officer, and her grandmother. Lagerlöf's grandmother told her traditional tales of Sweden, which played an important role in the formation of her artistic imagination. In 1882, Lagerlöf went to the Royal Women's Superior Training Academy in Stockholm to prepare for a career as a teacher. After graduation, she taught in a school for girls for 10 years.

While teaching, Lagerlöf began writing her first novel. She sent early chapters to a literary contest in a local magazine and was awarded a publishing contract for the entire novel. Financially supported by her lifelong friend, the Baroness Sophie Aldesparre, Lagerlöf completed her first novel, The Story of Gösta Berling (1891). Gösta, a young adventurous hero, suffers a series of ordeals before he marries the dashing heroine, Countess Elizabeth, and finds peace in his life. The story was significant in the Swedish romantic revival of the late 1890s.

Lagerlöf's work appealed to people of all ranks. Her work was founded on the rich traditions and deep cultural history of the Swedish people. With financial assistance from the Swedish Academy and a pension from Sweden's King Oscar, Lagerlöf resigned from teaching to concentrate on her writing. A journey to Egypt and Palestine between 1899 and 1900 inspired the publication of her first major and critically acclaimed work, Jerusalem. The collection of stories describes the destructive effects of a conservative, religious revival on a small Swedish community. The Ingmar family takes a journey to Jerusalem, and one of the family members is sold into slavery by another. Still another Ingmar renounces his engagement to the love of his life so he can marry a rich woman. The collection placed Lagerlöf on a prominent level in the literary world of Sweden.

In 1906, Lagerlöf published her best-known work, The Wonderful Adventures of Nils. The work was commissioned by the Swedish board of education to teach geography in the primary school. It tells the story of a naughty but courageous young boy, Nils, who is magically reduced to the size of a gnome. He travels throughout Sweden on the back of a gander who escapes the farm to join the flock of wild geese. From them, Nils learns courage, companionship, and commitment. Although this story is a fairy tale, it also provides, as it was meant to do, useful information about Swedish geography and life in Sweden. The story is loved and admired throughout the world.

In 1909, Selma Lagerlöf became the first female writer to win the Nobel Prize for literature. When the Soviets invaded Finland in 1939, Lagerlöf donated the Nobel medal to raise money for the Finnish army. A truly amazing and courageous person, she helped a great number of German writers and artists to escape Nazi persecution by arranging to smuggle them into Sweden. This remarkable woman is not only a national writer of Sweden but also its national hero. She used her artistic talent to depict the cultural history and customs of her country. Selma Lagerlöf's work is still widely read throughout the world today, with the sad exception of the United States.

Other Works by Selma Lagerlöf

Girl from the Marsh Croft, and Other Stories. Translated by Greta Andersen. Iowa City: Penfield Press, 1996.

Invisible Links. Translated by Greta Andersen. Iowa City: Penfield Press, 1995.

Memories of Marbacka. Translated by Greta Andersen. Iowa City: Penfield Press, 1996.

A Work about Selma Lagerlöf

Edstrom, Vivi Bloom. Selma Lagerlöf. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Laing, B. Kojo (1946–) novelist, poet

B. Kojo Laing was born in Kumasi in the Ashanti region of Ghana. He was the eldest son of six children and was baptized Bernard Ebenezer, but he later dropped his Christian name in favor of his African identity. Laing's father was the first African rector of the Anglican Theological College in Kumasi. Although Laing's family belonged to the educated middle class, they were by no means rich. Laing had to sell snacks on the street in Accra when he was a child. His disgust with this experience influenced his perception of the city and is distinctly expressed in his writings. Laing spent the first five years of his early education in Accra and was later sent to Scotland in 1957, where he had both his primary and secondary education. In 1968, he graduated from Glasgow University with a master's degree, then returned to Ghana to join the civil service. Laing left the service in 1979 to work as an administrative secretary of the Institute of African Studies for five years and then headed Saint Anthony's School in Accra in 1984, where he still works today.

Laing emerged as an important poet in the 1970s but did not become very widely known until 1986 when he published his first novel, Search Sweet Country (1975). His search for spiritual meaning is most intensely expressed in this novel, which is an analogy of his own experience as a civil servant in the Ashanti region. In the novel, Laing explores the complexities of human relationships and the different responses of people from different backgrounds to the reign of a corrupt military government. The bittersweet flavor of Laing's writing reveals his continuous attempt, through language, to bridge the differences between physical reality and spiritual ideals.

Laing's love of nature is also clearly reflected in his writing. One of his favorite pastimes is hunting, which provides him with a source of imagery. In Woman of the Aeroplanes (1988), for example, Laing uses images that symbolize the natural, surreal, and human worlds. An example of Laing's use of nature imagery in the novel is his humorous personification of the lake, which becomes extremely jealous of the ducks that swim in its waters and refuses to ripple.

Laing was also deeply influenced by his life experiences, such as his father's religious devotion and early death and his own journeys and failed relationships. His poem "Funeral in Accra" commemorated his father's death and marked his rite of passage from youth to adulthood. This poem was published in 1968 together with two other poems, "African Storm" and "Jaw." These poems contain the metaphors of his psychological struggle between alienation and dislocation.

Laing's main contribution to world literature is his ability to create a hybrid of languages and images from both the traditional African and modern Western worlds. His works, such as Godhorse (1989), appropriate the common symbol of technology, such as the car, and by simplifying its locomotive movements, compare it with daily human actions, such as walking or transplanting crops in the fields. By carefully and cleverly blending mixed symbols and language, Laing reveals the complexity of interdependent relationships within society.

Another Work by B. Kojo Laing

Major Gentl and the Achimota Wars. London: Heinemann, 1992.

Laird, Christopher (1945–) poet, writer, editor, producer, director

Born in Trinidad, Christopher Laird is the author of poetry that has appeared in The New Voices, the Caribbean Writer, and Kairi. As editor of Kairi, he has striven to increase the visibility of writers from and about Trinidad and Tobago. Laird has also done a number of extensive interviews with cultural personalities, including novelist George LAMMING, carnival artist Peter Minshall, and actor and dramatist Slade Hopkinson.

Laird's poetry has been anthologized in Voiceprint: An Anthology of Oral and Related Poetry from the Caribbean (1989). In "Hosay," a seven-part poem published in Voiceprint, the speaker draws attention to himself with speech and musical rhythms, but then concludes the poem saying,

*I am silent now.
I done talk.
Until a mounting fire stretches me taut
to move the air again.*

As video producer, director, writer, and editor, Laird examines the Caribbean culture. One of Laird's projects, the Caribbean Eye videos, explores regional Caribbean philosophies, celebrations, and styles of music and drama. Caribbean Carnivals (1991), Dramatic Actions (1991), and Women in Action (1991) are three of the 13 half-hour, made-for-television Caribbean Eye videos from Trinidad's Banyan Studios.

Released in 1992, Laird codirected And the Dish Ran Away with the Spoon with Tony Hall. Produced as part of the BBC/TVE Developing World Series, the video uses poetry, interviews, music, and clips from television shows to highlight effects of American television broadcasts on local Caribbean cultures. It won best documentary and best video at Images Caraïbes, the Caribbean Film & Video festival, and also best documentary at the Prized Pieces competition of the National Black Programmers Consortium of the United States. Laird's varied projects significantly facilitate the exploration and appreciation of Caribbean culture.

Other Works by Christopher Laird

Brown, Stewart, Mervyn Morris, and Gordon Rohlehr, eds. Selections in Voiceprint: An Anthology of Oral and Related Poetry from the Caribbean. Harlow, U.K.: Longman, 1989.

"Faith, Beauty and Blood." Caribbean Writer 5 (1991): 49–50.

"Jamestown Beach, Accra." Caribbean Writer 3 (1989): 44–45.

Lamartine, Alphonse de (1790–1869)

poet, novelist

Alphonse Marie Louis de Lamartine was born to a family of minor nobility in Mâcon on October 10. He received a traditional education and, after spending a brief period of time in the army, traveled to Italy where he discovered much of the aesthetics of love and nature that would prevail in his works and that tie him closely to French ROMANTICISM.

His first published work, Méditations Poétiques (1820), met with immediate success. Within the 24 poems that compose this collection, Lamartine expressed his feelings about religion, love, and nature. Subsequent works, such as Harmonies (1830), developed his theme of lyricism and his musical tones. He also expressed his religious views in such works as Jocelyn (1836), a novel in verse, and La Chute d'un Ange (An Angel's Fall), 1838), an epic poem that describes an evil tyranny.

Politically, Lamartine tried to remain distant from party conflicts; however, his idealist philosophy tended toward democracy and the campaign for social justice. His Histoire des Girondins (History of the Girondists), 1847), a work that promoted and glorified the aims of a political group of moderate Republicans known as the Girondists during the French Revolution met with immense popular success. After competing unsuccessfully against Napoleon III for the presidency, Lamartine left politics to devote his life to writing.

Another Work by Alphonse de Lamartine

Poetical Meditations/Méditations Poétiques. Translated by Gervase Hittle. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993.

Works about Alphonse de Lamartine

Boutin, Aimee. Maternal Echoes: The Poetry of Marcelline Desbordes-Valmore and Alphonse de Lamartine. Cranbury, N.J.: University of Delaware Press, 2001.

Fortescue, William. Alphonse de Lamartine: A Political Biography. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1983.

Lombard, Charles M. Lamartine. Boston: Twayne, 1973.

Lamming, George (William) (1927–) novelist, poet, critic, teacher, lecturer, broadcaster, trade-union activist

George Lamming was born and raised in Carrington's Village, a former sugar estate on the outskirts of Barbados's capital, Bridgetown. Although Lamming's mother married after his birth, Lamming said, "it was my mother who fathered me." Lamming attended Combermere High School on a scholarship. There, teacher and writer Frank COLLYMORE encouraged his writing. When Lamming's courses ended in 1946, Collymore helped Lamming obtain a teaching position at El Colegio de Venezuela, a boarding school for boys of South American origin, in Port of Spain, Trinidad. That year Lamming also started publishing poetry in Bim, a literary magazine edited by Collymore. From 1947, the BBC's "Caribbean Voices" series broadcast Lamming's poems and occasional short prose pieces. Themes Lamming explored during this period—frustration with West Indian cultural life and artists' preference for imported culture—reappear in later works as well.

In 1950, Lamming sailed to England with other West Indian immigrants, including the novelist Samuel Selvon, and briefly worked in a factory and hosted a book program for the BBC West Indian Service while writing. Lamming dedicated his first novel, In the Castle of My Skin (1953), to his mother and Frank Collymore. This fictional account of the West Indian experience quickly garnered critical acclaim in the United States and England. In the preface, U.S. novelist Richard Wright describes Lamming's prose as "quietly melodious," and in an essay entitled "George Lamming's In the Castle of My Skin" (1954), the novelist NGUGI WA THIONG'O calls the work "one of the great political novels in modern 'colonial' literature."

Lamming's subsequent works explore West Indian history, culture, and politics. After completing The Emigrants (1954), a novel that follows a group of young men of Lamming's generation from the West Indies to London, Lamming returned to the Caribbean to gather material for his third novel, Of Age and Innocence (1958), set on the fictitious island of San Cristobal. This novel examines relationships formed during colonial history, as does Lamming's fourth novel, Season of Adventure (1960). In a 1989 interview archived online by Banyan Limited, Lamming said that Season of Adventure was "probably the first" and "only" novel "which is in a sense devoted to the elevation of the steelband not only as a moment of great culture and triumph, but also showing the way in which cultural activity can be so decisive in political life." Published the same year as Season of Adventure, The Pleasures of Exile (1960), a collection of essays, examines West Indian colonialism.

Two more novels published in the early 1970s, Water with Berries (1971) and Natives of My Person (1972), use allegory to examine guilt produced by colonialism and carried by English and Caribbean characters. Some critics consider the latter work as Lamming's major work, while others criticize its ideological representation of characters. In 1974, Lamming edited Cannon Shot and Glass Beads: Modern Black Writing, an anthology examining black responses to white racism.

In later years, Lamming devoted his attention to lecturing and essays, regularly contributing to the journal Casa de las Américas, published in Havana. Since entering academia as a writer-in-residence and lecturer at the University of the West Indies in 1967, Lamming has been a visiting professor at the University of Texas at Austin and the University of Pennsylvania, a teacher at the University of Miami's summer Institute for Caribbean Creative Writing, and a lecturer in Denmark, Tanzania, Kenya, and Australia. Regarded as one of the most perceptive commentators on the West Indies, Lamming is also considered one of the most important Caribbean West Indian novelists.

Other Works by George Lamming

Coming, Coming Home: Conversations II: Monographs. Philipsburg, St. Martin: House of Nehesi, 2000.

"Concepts of the Caribbean." In Frank Birbalsingh, ed., Frontiers of Caribbean Literatures in English. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996.

Drayton, Richard, and Andaiye, eds. Conversations: George Lamming Essays, Addresses and Interviews, 1956–1990. London: Karia Press, 1992.

Works about George Lamming

Hulme, Peter. "Reading from Elsewhere: George Lamming and the Paradox of Exile." In Peter Hulme and William H. Sherman, eds., The Tempest and Its Travels. Philadelphia, Pa.: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000.

Phillips, Caryl. "George Lamming." Wasafiri: Journal of Caribbean, African, Asian and Associated Literatures and Film 26 (Autumn 1997).

Silva, A. J. Simoes da. The Luxury of Nationalist Despair: George Lamming's Fiction as Decolonizing Project. Atlanta, Ga.: Rodopi, 2000.

Lampedusa, Giuseppe Tomasi di

(1896–1957) novelist

Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa was born in Palermo, Italy, to Prince Giulio di Lampedusa and his wife, Beatrice. He grew up in a palace and had a great fondness for his upbringing, which he was able to capture in his writing. He had an extremely close, nearly suffocating relationship with his mother through much of his life. From age 16 to 18, he attended the Liceo-Ginnasio Garibaldi school, where he proved to be an excellent scholar in philosophy, history, and Italian. He went on to study law at the University of Rome.

From 1916 to 1918, Lampedusa fought in the Italian Alps in World War I and was wounded and captured. After the war, he traveled extensively in Italy as well as to London, Paris, and other European cities. In the 1920s, he immersed himself in a self-directed course of study in European history and literature. His favorite writers included William Shakespeare, John Keats, and Charles BAUDELAIRE.

In 1954, Lampedusa began a course of lectures on literature, one of which was published as the book, Lessons on Stendahl (1977). He then turned to novel writing and began The Leopard, a book about the Italian aristocracy, which was published posthumously in 1958. As a diversion from this book, Lampedusa began his autobiography. It was a chance to write about his beloved family palace, which had nearly been destroyed in an air attack during World War II.

Lampedusa had an active and varied life that contributed to the richness of his work. He left his mark in the worlds of education, literature, and history. David Gilmour, his biographer, writes, "his work will survive because he wrote about the central problems of the human experience."

A Work about Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa

Gilmour, David. The Last Leopard: A Life of Giuseppe di Lampedusa. New York: Pantheon, 1988.

Langgässer, Elisabeth (1899–1950) poet, novelist, short-story writer

Elisabeth Langgässer was born in Alzey, Germany, to Eduard and Eugenie Dienst Langgässer. Her father, an architect, was a Jew, but she was raised as a Catholic. After Eduard's death in 1909, the family moved to Darmstadt, where Langgässer attended the Viktoria-Schule. After passing the school-leaving exam in 1918, she taught at a primary school in Griesheim. In 1935, she married the theologian Wilhelm Hoffmann.

Langgässer wrote book and theater reviews before publishing her first poetry collection, Der Wenderkreis des Lammes (The Tropic of the Lamb, 1924). Her first novel, Proserpina (1933), won the Literary Prize of the Association of Women's Citizens. In 1936, the Nazis forbade her from further publication because she was of Jewish descent; she defied the ban with a short-story collection in 1938. After World War II, she gained wider popularity and critical acceptance. Her novel Das Unauslöschliche Siegel (The Indelible Seal, 1946) earned praise from writers Thomas MANN and Hermann BROCH.

The influence of Franz KAFKA and James Joyce is evident in Langgässer's works. Many considered her a religious writer, but she often included nonreligious aspects such as war and economic hardship in her writing. Langgässer's poems explore the conceptions of soul and psyche and investigate the evil side of human nature. Not afraid of paradoxes, she also dealt with the irrationality, beauty, and brutality of human passions. The literary scholar Hermann Boeschstein writes that Langgässer "is able to do what has often been termed the prerequisite to the revitalization of modern religious literature; she repeats the old truths in an exciting new way."

Another Work by Elisabeth Langgässer

The Quest. New York: Knopf, 1953.

A Work about Elisabeth Langgässer

Gelbin, Cathy S. An Indelible Seal: Race, Hybridity and Identity in Elisabeth Langgässer's Writings. Essen: Die Blaue Eule, 2001.

Lao She (Shu Qingchun) (1899–1966)

novelist

Shu Qingchun was born Shu She-yü on February 3 in Beijing. When foreign allied forces attacked Beijing in the 1900 Boxer Rebellion, his father was killed. His mother did laundry so that Shu Qingchun could be privately tutored. He graduated from Beijing Normal in 1918 and became headmaster of a primary school, managing it so efficiently that he was appointed a government post in 1920. He returned to teaching and did social work with various Beijing organizations while studying English at Yenching University. In 1924, he taught Chinese at the Oriental School of London University and assisted in translating a 16th-century Chinese novel.

Inspired by the writing of Charles Dickens, Shu began to write (under the pseudonym Lao She), completing his first novel, The Philosophy of Lao Zhang (1926), while in London. The book was published as a serial in Shanghai to critical and popular acclaim because of its patriotism and realistic portrayal of a civil servant, two students, and a contemptible schoolmaster.

In 1930, Lao She returned to China and taught Chinese at Qilu and Shandong Universities, where he continued to write prolifically. His most popular work was the social critique Lo-t'o Hsiang-tzu (Rickshaw Boy, 1936), a novel about making a living in Beijing. In 1940, he completed the trilogy about Japanese-occupied Beijing, Four Generations Under One Roof.

As one of the country's foremost patriotic writers, Lao She was active in the anti-Japanese movement during the Sino-Japanese War. He was elected director of general affairs of the All-China Resist-the-Enemy Federation of Writers and Artists. In 1946, he traveled to the United States as a visiting lecturer and wrote his last novel, The Drum Singers, published in the United States in 1952. He returned to celebrate China's new Communist regime in 1949 and wrote plays, all of which became classics of socialist literature, including Dragon Beard Ditch (1950), Teahouse (1956), All the Family Are Blessed (1959), and Beneath the Red Banner (1964).

Although he served high posts in the Chinese Writers Association, Lao She was no exception to the suppression of writers during the Cultural Revolution. Unable to contend with the disgrace of public denunciations and criticisms, he committed suicide on August 24. He was posthumously "rehabilitated" by the Communist Party in 1979, and his complete works were published.

Other Works by Lao She

Blades of Grass: The Stories of Lao She. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.

Cat Country: A Satirical Novel of China in the 1930s.

Translated by William A. Lyell. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1970.

Heavensent. Translated by Xiong Deni. San Francisco: China Books and Periodicals, 1986.

Teahouse: A Play in Three Acts. Translated by John Howard-Gibbon. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press, 1980.

Works about Lao She

Vohra, Ranbir. Lao She and the Chinese Revolution. Cambridge, Mass.: East Asian Research Center, Harvard University, 1974.

Wang, David Der-Wei. Fictional Realism in Twentieth-Century China: Mao Dun, Lao She, Shen Congwen. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.

Lasker-Schüler, Else (1869–1945) poet, novelist

Else Lasker-Schüler was born in Elberfeld, Germany, to Aron Schüler, a banker, and Jeanette Schüler. The youngest of six children, Else was deeply devoted to her mother, who encouraged Else's early interest in poetry. Paul, Lasker-Schüler's older brother, also helped develop her strong passion for poetry. As a Jewish family, the Schülers had difficulty in the social environment of Germany. Because of constant teasing by the Catholic and Lutheran children, Else had to quit elementary school and was tutored at home by her parents.

In 1890, Lasker-Schüler suffered the painful loss of her mother. Four years later, she married Jonathan Lasker. Lasker-Schüler separated from her husband in 1899 after refusing to acknowledge him as the father of their son Paul. Along with her son, she moved to Berlin in 1899 where she immediately became immersed in the artistic and cultural life of the city. Lasker-Schüler frequented various literary cafés throughout Berlin where she composed poetry, made sketches, and conversed with other artists. For the next 10 years, although she associated with various literary groups, such as the expressionists (see EXPRESSIONISM), her work does not appear to have been influenced by them.

In 1913, Lasker-Schüler traveled to Russia with the goal of securing the release of her longtime friend Johannes Holzmann, who had been arrested for revolutionary activities and leadership in anarchist circles. Her mission was unsuccessful, but it provided plenty of material for her writings. During World War I, Lasker-Schüler lost many friends, such as the Austrian poet Georg TRAKL. As a result of these experiences, she became deeply committed to pacifism.

In 1932 Lasker-Schüler received the Kleist prize, one of the highest literary honors in Germany. The atmosphere in German society, however, was becoming dangerous for her with the rise of the National Socialists (Nazi) Party. One of the newspapers controlled by the Nazis commented on Lasker-Schüler's award: "The pure Hebrew poetry of Else Lasker-Schüler has nothing to do with us Germans." Fearing for her life, Lasker-Schüler promptly left Germany for Switzerland. Arriving without luggage, she spent six nights sleeping on a bench in a Zurich park but survived by giving poetry readings and selling her drawings and sketches, as well as on generous gifts from her friends and readers. She spent several years living in Switzerland and Jerusalem, where she died in 1945.

Lasker-Schüler's early poetry was first published about 1899. Through the years, her poetry became more and more complex, often treating concrete ideas with abstract images. Her first collection of poetry, Styx (1902), reveals some qualities of the Expressionist school that are characterized by decorative and emotional imagery, as seen in "Coolness" (1902): "In the white blaze / Of bright roses / I want to bleed to death." As Ruth Schwertfeger notes, "Preoccupation with spiritual reality dominates Lasker-Schüler's thinking."

Lasker-Schüler clearly considered herself a Jewish poet: In the poem "My People," published in The Seventh Day (1905), she openly identifies herself with the Jewish people: "I have traveled the diaspora / From my blood's fermentation / Constantly over in me again.” Lasker-Schüler’s fascination with her Jewish roots also led to her constant longing for Jerusalem, which she visited five times during her life.

Lasker-Schüler’s banishment from Germany was a painful experience and one to which she returns over and over in her poetry. In “Banished” (1934) she longs for Germany, which she always considered her homeland: “Where is the breath my life exhaled? / Exiled dreamer I glide between pale hours / Companion to wild game. I used to love you.” Lasker-Schüler considered herself a German to the end of her life.

Else Lasker-Schüler’s poetry did not become widely popular until the end of the World War II. Today, she is considered to be among the best poets of Germany. In 1953, at a poetry reading dedicated to the memory of Else Lasker-Schüler, the poet Gottfried Benn referred to her as “the greatest lyric poet Germany ever had.” Lasker-Schüler’s work is not well known outside of German-speaking countries because, as many critics and scholars claim, the complexity of her verse renders it virtually untranslatable. Recent translations, however, have been more successful, and her works are now available in more than 12 languages.

Other Works by Else Lasker-Schüler

Selected Poems. Translated by Jeanette Demeestere-Litman. New York: Green Integer, 2000.

Star in my Forehead. Translated by Janine Canan. New York: Consortium, 1999.

A Work about Else Lasker-Schüler

Yudkin, Leon I. Else Lasker-Schueler: A Study in German Jewish Literature. Washington, D.C.: B’nai B’rith Book Service, 1991.

Lautréamont, comte de (Isadore-Lucien Ducasse) (1846–1870) poet

Isadore Ducasse, who adopted the pen name and title of comte de Lautréamont, was born in Uruguay on April 4, 1846, to French parents. His father was a consular officer; his mother died when he was 18 months old. When he was 10 years old, his father left him with relatives in France, where he attended school and earned a reputation as a sullen, introverted student who disliked math and Latin. Lautréamont, however, became interested in literature and, as an independent thinker, developed ideas and attitudes that would eventually earn him a permanent place in French literary history.

After leaving school at age 19, Lautréamont traveled abroad, made some literary contacts, and then returned to Paris to begin his first major work, Les Chants de Maldoror (1869). The title of this work has been subject to various interpretations, ranging from “dawn of evil” to “evil from the beginning.” It is a macabre prose poem in which the main character celebrates evil with religious fervor. Themes within the work include rebellion against God, the image of Christ as a rapist, and a bitter protagonist whose decomposing and disfigured body is a haven for animals who have taken up residence in it while he still lives.

For the publication of Maldoror, he assumed the pseudonym Lautréamont, a name that is taken perhaps from Eugène Sue’s novel Lautréamont, whose protagonist is similar in attitude to the main character in Maldoror. Part of the work was first printed privately in 1868, most likely with financial assistance from Lautréamont’s father. The entire work was printed in 1869, but the publishers, fearing prosecution because of the blasphemous nature of the piece, opted not to make the text available for purchase.

Lautréamont tried in vain to convince the publishers to make his work available. He also began another collection, this time celebrating hope and faith, but he died before completing it.

Nine years after his death, Lautréamont’s works were finally published. They met with little notice, however, until members of the surrealist movement in the 1920s began to focus on Lautréamont as a thematic forerunner of their own ideals.

Another Work by Comte de Lautréamont

Maldoror; and Poems. Translated by Paul Knight. Hardmonsworth, U.K.: Penguin, 1978.

A Work about Comte de Lautréamont

Bachelard, Gaston. Lautréamont. Translated by Robert S. Dupree. Dallas, Tex.: Dallas Institute of Humanities and Culture, 1986.

Lawson, Henry (Larsen, Henry Hertzberg; Henry Archibald)

(1867–1922) short-story writer, poet

Henry Lawson was born on the goldfields of Grenfell, New South Wales, Australia. He was the eldest son of a Norwegian sailor, Peter Lawson, and his wife, Louisa. His mother was actively involved in publishing and was a famous leader of the women's rights movement in Australia. Lawson's early life was difficult: His family was poor, and an ear infection caused him to lose his hearing by the time he turned 14. His parents eventually separated, and his mother moved to Sydney. Lawson later moved to Sydney as well and became deeply influenced by his mother's radical friends.

Lawson's writings reflect his bitter life experiences. His inability to communicate because of the deafness led him to develop a keen habit of observing people. Lawson's works are about watching people and observing their actions. He used his powers of observation and his past experiences to enhance his writing. The major themes of Lawson's poems revolve around the Australian bush. Growing up in the bushland, Lawson knew the hardships of bush life and drew inspiration from the lessons learned coping and living with nature and the land, as can be seen in most of his short stories, including "The Drover's Wife," published in his collection While the Billy Boils (1896). Lawson found an affinity with the bush that he could not feel from human company. The celebratory tone of such poems as "The Roaring Days" (1889) and "Andy's Gone with Cattle" (1888) contrasts with the estrangement that the poet clearly felt in observing people.

Lawson's writings also reflect his deep concern for political and social issues. Some of his major poems of political and social protest include "The Watch on the Kerb" (1888) and "The Men Who Made Australia" (1901), which highlight the alienation and despair that are shared among most of Australia's struggling population. These same themes can be seen in his short stories "In the Storm That Is to Come" (1904) and "The Union Buries Its Dead" (1896).

Lawson's isolation increased as he failed to find happiness in marriage. He resorted to heavy drinking and spent most of his later life in a state of delirium and mental instability. His writing declined as his health collapsed. He began to write autobiographical works as he sought to hang on to his sanity. At his death, he was the first Australian writer to be granted a state funeral. Lawson's contribution to Australian and world literature lies in his accurate but starkly depressing portrayal of the difficult lives of the Australian lower classes, especially the much neglected regions of the Australian countryside and bush areas.

Other Works by Henry Lawson

The Bush Undertaker and Other Stories. Sydney:

Angus and Robertson, 1994.

Henry Lawson: Short Stories. Edited by John Barnes.

New York: Penguin, 1986.

Works about Henry Lawson

Phillips, A. A. Henry Lawson. Boston: Twayne, 1970.

Wright, Judith. Henry Lawson. Melbourne, Australia:

Oxford University Press, 1967.

Léger, Alexis Saint-Léger

See PERSE, SAINT-JOHN.

Leiris, Michel (1901–1990) novelist, nonfiction writer

Noted for his work as anthropologist and writer, Michel Leiris was born in Paris to an upper-class family. He became a serious student of chemistry but was soon drawn to the Bohemian world of Parisian cafés and cabarets where he first encountered and then became enamored with the growing surrealist, and DADA movements.

Leiris was first introduced to surrealism by his close friend André Masson. He focused for a time on writing poetry in the surrealist fashion but by the 1920s abandoned the movement. With Georges BATAILLE and others, Leiris formed the Collège de Sociologie. Leiris had an abiding interest in the cultures of Central America, Africa, and the Caribbean, and the college formed a launching point for his extensive fieldwork in Ethiopia and the Sudan. Many of his writings come from his experiences there, including L'Afrique fantôme (1933), a travel account of his voyages.

Leiris's other writings include a four-volume autobiography, La Règle du jeu, the first volume of which was originally published in English as Manhood. The entire work was eventually translated and titled Rules of the Game. He also wrote a detailed biography of Francis Bacon and conducted several anthropological studies.

Leiris lived out his life in Paris with his wife, the owner of Galerie Louise Leiris, a prominent art institution of the postwar era. It is because of her interest in the arts that Leiris also wrote extensively on the modern artists of the period, such as Miró, Giacometti, Bacon, Lam, and Duchamp.

Other Works by Michel Leiris

Aurora: A Novel. Translated by Anna Warby. London: Atlas, 1990.

Broken Branches. Translated by Lydia Davis. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1989.

Nights as Day, Days as Night. Translated by Richard Sieburth. New York: Rizzoli, 1988.

Rules of the Game. Translated by Lydia Davis. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997.

A Work about Michel Leiris

Hand, Sean. Michel Leiris: Writing the Self. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Leopardi, Giacomo (1798–1837) poet, essayist, philosopher

Giacomo Leopardi was born in Recanti, now Marche, Italy, to Count Monaldo Leopardi and Marchesa Adelaide Antici. His upbringing was so sequestered that he was 20 years old before he left his home unaccompanied. Leopardi was a precocious youth and at 12 had surpassed the educational level of his tutors. He was a bibliophile and a polyglot who learned seven languages, including, Greek, Latin, and German. As a young man, he made translations and wrote commentary on the classics and at age 15 produced his first book, History of Astronomy. Although he grappled with blindness and a hunchback, his passion for writing saw him through his maladies.

Leopardi's crowning masterpiece was the book of poetry I Canti (1831). His poems were very personal statements of his life, loves, and loneliness. In his poem "To Italy," he states, "If but the gods be willing / Endure as long as your renown endures." In his poem "The Solitary Life," he strikes a more despairing note: "On earth, unhappy people find no friend / Or refuge left for them except cold steel."

Giacomo Leopardi is considered the greatest literary figure of 19th-century Italy for his poetry, essays, and translations. According to Leopardi's biographer J. H. Whitfield, no Italian poet aside from Dante has attracted such a circle of devoted admirers as Leopardi. Whitfield summarizes Leopardi's contribution to Italian literature: "[he] sees the poet as potentially a philosopher, and the philosopher as potentially a poet; and though it has been fashionable, especially in Italian criticism, to set the two as opposites, the marriage of the terms is most nearly achieved in the case of Leopardi."

Other Works by Giacomo Leopardi

The Canti: With a Selection of His Prose. Manchester, U.K.: Carcanet, 1998.

Leopardi: Selected Poems. Translated by Eamon Grennan. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1997.

Works about Giacomo Leopardi

Nisbet, Delia Fabbroni-Gianotti. Heinrich Heine and Giacomo Leopardi: The Rhetoric of Midrash. New York: Peter Lang, 2000.

Press, Lynne, and Pamela Williams. Women and Feminine Images in Giacomo Leopardi. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1999.

Whitfield, J. H. Giacomo Leopardi. Oxford: Blackwell, 1954.

Lermontov, Mikhail (1814–1841) poet, novelist

Mikhail Yuryevich Lermontov was born in Moscow, Russia, to Yuri Lermontov, a retired army captain, and Maria Lermontov, a descendent of an aristocratic family. After the death of his mother in 1817, Lermontov was sent to his affluent grandmother, Elizabetha Stolypin. He received an excellent education from private tutors, and in 1827, he enrolled in a prestigious academy in Moscow that was sponsored by the royal family. Young Lermontov, surrounded by the most prominent intellectuals and writers in Russia, began to compose poetry in 1828. In 1830, he traveled with his grandmother to the family estate outside Moscow, where, in idyllic surroundings, he read intensively and wrote poetry.

Lermontov was heavily influenced by ROMANTICISM. George Gordon, Lord Byron (1788–1824) and Aleksandr PUSHKIN were his favorite poets. After a few unsuccessful years at the Moscow University, Lermontov joined the army as a junior officer in 1832. After the death of Aleksandr Pushkin in a duel in 1835, Lermontov wrote a commemorative poem, “On the Death of the Poet,” in which he suggested that the government had been involved in the scandal that led to the duel and may even have paid Pushkin’s opponent. The poem was widely popular but was considered incendiary by the authorities. Lermontov was demoted and exiled to the Caucasus, an isolated, mountainous region of Russia. The material for most of Lermontov’s prose came from his experiences in the Caucasus. Lermontov composed a heroic poem, “The Song of the Merchant Kalashnikov” (1837), about a man whose heroism consists in following his inner principles rather than the pressures of society. Lermontov returned to St. Petersburg in 1838, after his grandmother made numerous petitions on his behalf. In 1840, Lermontov was sent back to the Caucasus, as a punishment for dueling.

Lermontov enlisted in a regiment that was responsible for putting down a violent rebellion by Chechen forces. After receiving an award for bravery in combat, he was allowed to return to St. Petersburg in 1841. While in St. Petersburg, he published a collection of poems and completed Demon (1828–41), a long narrative poem about a love affair between a fallen angel and a mortal. The poem reveals Lermontov’s aversion to religion and his love for rugged, primitive landscape.

Shortly before his death, Lermontov completed one of the greatest novels in Russian literature, A Hero of Our Time (1840). Based on Lermontov’s experiences in the Caucasus, this classic work of psychological realism examines the psyche and emotions of the disenchanting aristocrat Pichorin.

Nearly all of Lermontov’s works were critically acclaimed and widely popular during his lifetime, but his personal relationships were often turbulent and dramatic. He made many enemies during his short life, largely because of his cynical and, at times, cruel disposition. Like his hero Aleksandr Pushkin, Lermontov was shot and killed in a duel.

Lermontov’s reputation as a poet is only second to Pushkin’s in Russia. His stirring poetry is remarkable for its lyricism and for its skillful and ingenious use of metaphor. Lermontov made a dramatic contribution to the poetic tradition of Russia, revealing new ways in which the Russian language could be extended, molded, and shaped into a dramatic lyrical form. He is not very well known outside Russia because his poetry is extremely difficult to translate; today, however, he is recognized as one of the most influential and seminal figures of the Russian literary landscape.

Other Works by Mikhail Lermontov

A Hero of Our Time. Translated by Vladimir Nabokov. New York: Knopf, 1992.

Major Poetical Works. Translated by Anatoly Liberman. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1984.

Works about Mikhail Lermontov

Garrard, John. Mikhail Lermontov. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Golstein, Vladimir B. Heroes of Their Times: Lermontov's Representation of the Heroic Self. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1992.

Levi, Primo (1919–1987) novelist, nonfiction writer

Best known for his autobiographical If This Is a Man (1947), an account of survival in a Nazi concentration camp, Primo Levi was born in 1919 to a middle-class Jewish family in Turin. Growing up under Benito Mussolini and his fascist, anti-Semitic regime, Levi learned little about his heritage as a child. He was able to enter the University of Turin to study chemistry just before laws were enacted in 1938 to prohibit Jews from academic study. He graduated in 1941 at the top of his class, one year after Italy allied with Germany during World War II.

During the war, Levi began to write articles for Giustizia e Liberata, a resistance magazine. He was captured in December 1943 while attempting to make contact with a partisan group in northern Italy. He was first interred at a transitional camp in Fossoli but was soon deported to the major concentration camp at Auschwitz. Traveling to the camp in a convoy of 650 prisoners, he was one of only 24 survivors. Forced to work in one of the laboratories, he was spared the gas chambers but not the memory of those around him who did not survive.

After the camp was liberated by the Soviets in 1945, Levi returned to Turin where he secured work as a chemist. He returned to his family's old manor home and began to write. If This Is a Man was written in the form of a memoir documenting his internment at Auschwitz. Although the subject matter was gruesome and intense, part of Levi's appeal was his ability to abstract himself from his surroundings and take on the role of an objective, scientific observer. The work was not without compassion, but neither did it seek to capitalize on the tragedy of life in a concentration camp. The book was an instant success, selling more than a half-million copies in Italy before being translated into eight languages as well as being adapted for radio broadcast and theatrical production. A sequel to the book, The Truce (1963), detailed Levi's eight months spent wandering the remains of a war-torn Europe immediately after his liberation. The focus of the work is the difficulty a survivor faces when he or she is allowed to return, after great trauma, to a normal life.

By 1961, Levi had become the general manager of a paint factory, which enabled him to save enough money to retire in 1977 and devote himself full time to his writing. All of his works are in some way autobiographical. The Periodic Table (1975) uses the elements as a background; each element represents an event that is then recorded in memoir form as a meditation on the past. In all, the work is comprised of 21 separate entries, ranging from his encounter with an official from Auschwitz to a homage to his Jewish heritage. If Not Now, When (1989) focuses on the emerging sense of Jewish pride, coupled with an historical account of Russian action against the Nazis.

Levi's final work, The Drowned and the Saved (1986), is a collection of essays relating the ever-present memory of the Holocaust to the fact that anti-Semitism still exists even though the war is over. It was published one year prior to Levi's death, an apparent suicide. He struggled for much of the last 40 years of his life to reconcile the fact that he had survived life in a concentration camp.

Levi's greatest contribution to world literature is the legacy he left behind. His works give great insight into the life of a Jew and a survivor.

Another Work by Primo Levi

The Voice of Memory: Interviews, 1961–1987. Translated by Robert Gordon. New York: New Press, 2001.

A Work about Primo Levi

Kremer, Roberta S., ed. Memory and Mastery: Primo Levi as Writer and Witness. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001.

Li Feigan

See BA JIN.

Lim, Shirley Geok-Lin (1944–) novelist, poet

Shirley Geok-Lin Lim was born in historic Malacca, a small town on the west coast of Malaysia. Lim's childhood was marked by feelings of abandonment, deprivation, and suffering, caused by her mother's abandoning her and her five brothers when they were still young. As the only girl in the family, Lim often felt neglected and marginalized; she nevertheless completed her high school education in a Catholic convent and went on to the University of Malaya. She taught for two years before going to the United States to obtain graduate degrees at Brandeis University in Massachusetts. Lim taught briefly at Westchester College before moving to Santa Barbara in 1990. She is currently professor of English and Women's Studies at the University of California and professor of English and head of the English Department at the University of Hong Kong.

Lim is an animated writer who is able to draw on her rich cultural origins and experience to elevate her poetry and prose. Her writings bespeak the emotional longing she holds for her homeland, even as they dramatize her grappling with issues of ethnicity, gender, and identity as an Asian American living in the United States. In her poem, "Bukit China" (Malay name for "Chinese Hill") (1994), for example, Lim examines the theme of displacement and loss as experienced by her Chinese forefathers who crossed the South China Sea in the distant past to seek fortune in the reputedly rich "Southern Ocean" in Southeast Asia. Issues of ethnicity and identity are most poignantly expressed in her collection Life's Mysteries: The Best of Shirley Lim (1995). In one poem in the collection, "A Pot of Rice," Su Yu reaffirms her own identity as she cooks a pot of rice in her New York apartment to offer to her dead father. In another poem, "Transportation in Westchester," the subject of interracial relationships takes on a new shape when the Asian-American protagonist realizes her own prejudice through her interactions with African Americans.

Lim has received many awards, honors, and prizes for her critical and literary contributions. Her first book, Crossing the Peninsula and Other Poems (1980), won the Commonwealth Poetry Prize in 1980; a work she edited, The Forbidden Stitch: An Asian-American Women's Anthology (1989), was the recipient of the 1990 American Book Award.

Other Works by Shirley Geok-Lin Lim

Among the White Moon Faces: An Asian-American Memoir of Homelands. New York: The Feminist Press, 1996.

Another Country and Other Stories. Singapore: Times Books International, 1982.

Joss and Gold. New York: The Feminist Press, 2001.

What the Fortune-Teller Didn't Say. Albuquerque, N. Mex.: West End Press, 1998.

Writing Southeast Asia in English: Against the Grain, Focus on Asian English Language Literature. London: Skoob Books Publications, 1994.

Lispector, Clarice (1920–1977) novelist

Clarice Lispector was born in Ukraine on December 10 but moved to Recife, Brazil, when she was only two months old and remained there for the rest of her life. Although it is likely that her parents, Ukrainian Jews, spoke Yiddish at home, she often denied it because she so strongly identified herself as Brazilian. The family later moved to Rio de Janeiro where she eventually completed her college studies. At the age of 23, she married her former classmate, Maury Gurgel Valente, who had become a diplomat. As a result of his career, they traveled widely, allowing her the opportunity for many new experiences, which certainly contributed to her career as a writer.

One year after her marriage, Lispector published her first novel, Near to the Wild Heart. The book was very well received, and she wrote several novels throughout her lifetime, including among the best-known, Family Ties and The Passion of G.H. In addition she wrote short stories. Her final book, a short novel, The Hour of the Star, recounts the life story of a poor Brazilian girl and considers the issues of otherness and understanding.

Lispector's work has been more popularized outside of Brazil than that of many other female Brazilian authors who remain mostly unknown in the United States. This is largely because of H el ene CIXOUS, a French writer who is currently a university professor in the United States. She has written several books of criticism and even a novel inspired by Clarice Lispector's work. Lispector's novels tend to concern family relationships, moral uncertainty, and social isolation that so many 20th-century novelists have focused on. Lispector died in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on December 9, one day short of her 57th birthday, having made extraordinary contributions to Brazilian literature.

Other Works by Clarice Lispector

Family Ties. Arlington: The University of Texas Press, 1972.

The Hour of the Star. New York: New Directions, 1977.

The Passion of G.H. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1989.

Works about Clarice Lispector

Cixous, H el ene. Reading with Clarice Lispector. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1990.

Peixoto, Marta. Passionate Fictions: Gender, Narrative, and Violence in Clarice Lispector. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1994.

Liu E (Liu Tieh Yun) (1857–1909) poet, novelist

Liu E was born the son of a scholar official in Liuhe in the Jiangsu Province. He was a good student with diverse interests and was very open to new ideas. He worked variously as a doctor, a merchant, and a government administrator, in addition to writing. He had friends in high places but was also adaptive to Western influences during the late Qing (Ch'ing) dynasty when China was especially guarded against them. This would ultimately damage his career and reputation.

Liu E wrote and published poetry and fiction throughout his life but is known primarily for writing one of the first Chinese novels in a vernacular language, The Travels of Lao Can (Ts'an). As a serial that began publication in 1903, and as a complete book in 1907, it is considered to be one of the first modern novels because of its accessible vernacular language and its satiric and pointed critique of official corruption. The novel opens with the title character Lao Can's allegorical dream that equates China with a leaking, sinking ship. Lao Can offers potential solutions in his dream, including the use of new technical instruments and other Western innovations. After the dream ends, the novel then follows Lao Can, an itinerant and eccentric doctor, on his travels through the country. Inspired by his dream to effect change, Lao Can encounters cruel officials who are insensible to the plight of the Chinese people and closed to the possibility of improvements.

Liu E suffered at the hands of official corruption himself, and the parallels to Lao Can are many; in fact, many of the officials in the novel bear names very similar to Liu E's own colleagues. When Liu E suggested building a railway in the city of Zhili, he was attacked by conservative officials. Eventually, in 1908, he was banished to Xinjiang, China's western barren lands, for associating with foreign merchants during the Boxer Rebellion. He died in exile.

A Work about Liu E

Holoch, Donald. "The Travels of Laocan: Allegorical Narrative." In M. Dolezelova-Velingerova, ed., The Chinese Novel at the Turn of the Century. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1980.

Lorca, Federico Garc a

See GARC A LORCA, FEDERICO.

Lu Xun (Lu Hsün; Zhou Shuren)

(1881–1936) short-story writer, essayist

Zhou Shuren, who adopted the pen name Lu Xun, was born September 25 into a family of declining social status in Shaoxing, Zhejiang province. His grandfather directed his schooling, which was less rigid than a traditional education. By age 11, he was an avid reader of popular literature and nonfiction but lacked interest in classical Confucian texts.

In 1893, when Zhou Shuren's grandfather was charged for taking bribes in the examination system and imprisoned, he went to live with his mother's family. He was deeply affected by the shift from a wealthy lifestyle to a poor one, later writing that it illuminated his understanding of the world.

In 1902, Zhou Shuren moved to Japan. Eager to better the conditions of China's people, he studied medicine at Sendai Medical College but maintained interests in literature and philosophy and read Western publications. He was especially influenced by Russian writers such as GOGOL and CHEKHOV. However, when he watched a newsreel from the Russo-Japanese War of 1904–05 of a captured Chinese spy being tortured, he changed his course of study; the inhumanity in the footage affected Lu Xun deeply. Subsequently, he participated in democratic and nationalistic activities and focused on writing as a means to effect social change, believing that literature would uplift the collective Chinese "spirit."

While still in Tokyo, Lu Xun edited the journal New Life and published essays in the Communist journal Henan on Western philosophy, sometimes collaborating with his brother, the writer Zhou Zuoren. In 1909, he returned to China and taught middle-school biology in Hangzhou and Shaoxing. After the Nationalist Revolution in 1911, Lu Xun accepted a position with the education ministry, where he studied and compiled Buddhist sutras. He began to publish poems and fiction in the popular journal New Youth in 1918, including "The Diary of a Madman," a short story about a man who suffers from paranoid delusions of the widespread practice of cannibalism. It is considered the first Chinese modernist short story because of its subjective, first-person narrative. He also submitted "random essays" and "random thoughts," which were published as such in the magazine. He accepted a lectureship at National Beijing University in Chinese literature in 1919 but soon returned home to take care of personal matters. There, he was moved to write stories about the debilitating effects of the old Chinese way of life on conditions in his hometown.

By 1921, back in Beijing and teaching at Beijing Normal University, he became established as a fiction writer and one of the leading writers of the May Fourth Movement, with more than 50 stories published in New Youth. He also wrote his first collections of stories, The Outcry (1923) and Hesitation (1926). The stories in these collections were inspired by the folk tales and myths of Lu Xun's childhood, but they were often dark and brooding. Perhaps his most famous work is the novella The True Story of Ah Q (1922), about a lonely laborer from a poor village. Despite failing at all his endeavors, Ah Q blindly interprets each failure as a victory and is eventually unfairly executed because of his foolishness. The story demonstrates Lu Xun's contempt for the similar myopia of Chinese society toward its sociopolitical and economic plight.

Lu Xun left Beijing in 1926 for Guangdong and Macau and often engaged in debates with the new breed of communist writers who advocated SOCIALIST-REALISM in literature. He grew disillusioned with the Nationalist Party and became a Communist in 1929. He was active as a founder of the League of Left-Wing Writers in 1930 but never joined the Communist Party itself. He turned to translating Soviet theory and attacking Nationalists, antileftists, and Western writers. He became one of the leading socialist intellectuals, teaching at various universities, including Xiamen and Zhongshan, and editing numerous journals, including Wilderness, Tattler, and Torrent. Even when he contracted pulmonary tuberculosis in 1933, he continued to contribute articles on a near-daily basis to the newspaper Shen Pao. He died on October 19 in Shanghai. At his funeral, he was eulogized as the "national soul," and the Communist Party canonized him posthumously. Today, he is revered as one of China's greatest writers whose contributions to modernism and communist literature are held up as the highest literary ideals.

Other Works by Lu Xun

Call to Arms (Chinese/English Edition). Beijing: Foreign Language Press, 2000.

Diary of a Madman and Other Stories. Translated by William Lyell. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1990.

Lu Xun: Selected Poems. Translated by W. J. F. Jenner. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press, 1982.

Selected Stories of Lu Xun (Chinese/English Edition). Beijing: Foreign Language Press, 2000.

Works about Lu Xun

Lee, Leo Ou-fan. Voices from the Iron House: A Study of Lu Xun. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.

Lyell, William A. Lu Hsun's Vision of Reality. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.

Machado de Assis, Joaquim Maria

(1839–1908) short-story writer

Machado de Assis was born in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on June 21. The son of a mulatto father and a white mother, Machado de Assis's racial background has often been remarked upon. He lost his mother when he was very young and became extremely attached to his stepmother, who encouraged his education and put him through public school. After his father died in 1851, she accepted a job in a local college, and Machado de Assis was forced to leave school and work, but it is likely that he continued attending some classes intermittently at her place of employment. Machado de Assis published his first poem, "Ela," in a journal at age 16, thus beginning a long and prolific literary career. He became one of the most important Brazilian literary figures of the second half of the 19th century.

Machado de Assis published 200 short stories in newspapers and magazines and chose 68 to be published in anthologies. Many critics consider him to be the master of the Brazilian short story, and his influence on other writers has been widespread. In his short stories, he takes up many themes from Brazilian life and also addresses various areas of the human psyche; for example, in "The Fortune-teller," published in a collection titled Various Stories, from 1897, he writes about the question of destiny. The story tells about three friends: a couple and their single male friend. The wife and the male friend are having an affair, and they are afraid the husband may have found out. Each goes separately to see a fortune-teller about their destiny, with surprising results. In an earlier story, "The Mirror," from an 1882 collection, he writes about the interior and exterior life of one man. The story is told in the first person; the main character recounts the process of his realization that all humans are actually two people. The person we are inside is not the person we dress in the mirror. His narrative is psychologically compelling, again with a startling finish. Although Machado de Assis rarely touches on the issue of race in his stories (something for which Gilberto FREYRE criticized him, stating that his style was too Europeanized), he does treat the question of slavery in some of his short stories. Brazil was the last country in the Northern Hemisphere to abolish slavery in 1888, so this was a public question that marked the author's lifetime. In an 1899 collection of short stories, Machado de Assis published the story "Father against Mother" that examines the struggle between a poor man and a mulatto slave woman. He and his wife will be forced to give up their baby because of lack of finances if he cannot raise money. He is a slave catcher by profession. At the last moment, he sees a mulatto slave woman whose reward price is very high. However, she is pregnant and begs him not to take her back. In the conclusion, he is forced to make a difficult choice in this ethical dilemma.

Machado de Assis was friendly with many great literary figures of his day. He enjoyed meeting with these friends and discussing intellectual issues. From this, came the idea of founding the Brazilian Academy of Letters. He and his circle of peers founded the academy in 1897. At the initial meeting, they elected him as the academy's first president, a position he held until his death. Because of his great importance to Brazilian literature, the Brazilian Academy of Letters is also called the House of Machado de Assis.

Other Works by Joaquin Maria Machado de Assis

The Devil's Church and Other Stories. Arlington: University of Texas Press, 1977.

The Posthumous Memoirs of Brás Cubas. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

A Work about Joaquin Maria Machado de Assis

Schwarz, Roberto. Misplaced Ideas: Essays on Brazilian Culture. New York: Verso, 1992.

Machado y Ruiz, Antonio (1875–1939) poet

Born in Seville, Spain, the son of liberal intellectuals, Antonio Machado y Ruiz became a French teacher and lived in the province of Castile, where he found the somewhat stark landscape more in keeping with his seriousness than that of Andalusia, the more verdant province of his birth. His poems portray the sober, dramatic Castilian landscape, and it is its nature that guides him. Machado, like Juan Ramón JIMÉNEZ, was a member of the GENERATION OF 1898, a group of writers who sought a moral and cultural rebirth for Spain. They analyzed the problems of the social framework of Spain and prescribed cures. A fondness for simplicity and landscape characterizes Machado's work. With his brother, the poet Manuel Machado (1874–1947), he also wrote plays.

Machado attended the Institución Libre de Enseñanza, considered the best learning institution of its kind in Spain at that time. The education he received there had a profound influence on his work. There, he developed his love of nature and adopted tolerance, respect, patriotism, and austerity as his way of life.

In 1888, he and his brother began to attend theater, befriending actors and even doing a little acting. In 1893 his father died. The subsequent death of his grandfather left the family in a precarious financial situation and interrupted Machado's education. He then tried unsuccessfully to work in a bank and, in 1898, moved with his brother to Seville, where he began to write poetry.

The principal influences on his poetry were Juan Ramón Jiménez, Gustavo Adolfo BÉCQUER, and Rosalía de CASTRO. In his first book of poems, Soledades (1903), the poet searches for himself in time, in love, and in death. An important theme in all his work is time, something that he perceives as alive and personal. He often searches for love and lost youth.

Machado was forced to leave Spain in 1936 because of his political beliefs. He crossed the Pyrenees on foot and died a month later in France.

Other Works by Antonio Machado y Ruiz

Barnstone, Willis S., ed. and trans. Six Masters of the Spanish Sonnet: Francisco de Quevedo, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, Antonio Machado, Federico García Lorca, Jorge Luis Borges, and Miguel Hernández. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1993.

The Landscape of Soria. Translated by Dennis Maloney. Fredonia, N.Y.: White Pine Press, 1985.

Trueblood, Alan S., ed. Antonio Machado: Selected Poems. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1988.

Works about Antonio Machado y Ruiz

Cobb, Carl. Antonio Machado. Boston: Twayne, 1971.

Johnston, Philip G. The Power of Paradox in the Work of Spanish Poet Antonio Machado. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2002.

Machado y Ruiz, Manuel (1874–1947)

poet, playwright, critic

Manuel Machado y Ruiz was born in Seville, Spain. His family were prominent and wealthy members of the city's middle class. His grandfather was a university professor and an expert in Spanish music and folklore. The Arabic inflections of Seville and his grandfather's studies of folk traditions led Machado y Ruiz to emphasize Arab imagery in his poetry.

Though he published few poems, he was one of the central figures of Spanish MODERNISM. His poetry resembles the work of Rubén DARÍO, the key figure of Latin American Modernism, but with more emphasis on the cultivation of aesthetic pleasure and less on inner anguish.

Machado y Ruiz was a member of the GENERATION OF 1898 and, like other members of that movement, he was concerned with revitalizing Spain's national identity. He believed this would be achieved by celebrating Spain's inner Arab spirit, which had been repressed by hundreds of years of Catholic rule.

His use of symbolism shows a clear influence of the poet VERLAINE, whose works he read when he was a young man studying in Paris. By combining modern trends from Europe and Spanish folk traditions, Machado y Ruiz was a forerunner to the poet GARCÍA LORCA.

Machado y Ruiz also modernized a number of plays by the Spanish dramatist Lope de Vega in collaboration with his brother Antonio MACHADO Y RUIZ. Machado y Ruiz had a sophisticated literary sensibility, and his literary style influenced lyric poetry in Spain and the world into the 20th century.

A Work about Manuel Machado y Ruiz

Brotherston, Gordon. Manuel Machado: A Reevaluation. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 1968.

Madariaga, Salvador de (1886–1978)

historian, essayist

Born in La Coruña, Spain, to a Spanish colonel, Madariaga held many jobs during his lifetime. He studied engineering in Paris and returned to his homeland to work for the Spanish railways. Then he went to London, was an editor for the Times, and wrote articles about World War I that were later published as La Guerra Desde Londres (The War from London, 1917).

In 1922, he was named head of the disarmament section of the League of Nations. He taught at Oxford (1928–31) and then was Spanish ambassador to the United States and France. He resigned in 1936 but did not participate in the Spanish civil war (1936–39). In disagreement with the Spanish dictator, Generalísimo Francisco Franco, he never returned to Spain while Franco was in power. During World War II, he worked for the BBC, broadcasting in Spanish, French, and German to Europe. He visited Spain in 1976 and was received into the Academia Española 40 years after his election into it, the ceremony having been postponed until after Franco's death.

Madariaga wrote in Spanish, French, and English. His works include historical works (biographies of Hernán Cortés, Columbus, and Simón Bolívar) and literary criticism (Guía del lector del Quijote, 1926). In Englishmen, Frenchmen, Spaniards (1928), he comments on national characteristics. His book España (1930) is an important historical interpretation of Spain and exemplifies Madariaga's ambition to familiarize the rest of the world with Spain.

Other Works by Salvador de Madariaga

Anarchy or Hierarchy. New York: Macmillan, 1978.

Don Quixote: An Introductory Essay in Psychology. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1980.

Latin America between the Eagle and the Bear. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1976.

A Work about Salvador de Madariaga

Preston, Paul. Salvador de Madariaga and the Quest for Liberty in Spain. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1987.

Maeterlinck, Maurice (1862–1949) poet, playwright, novelist, essayist

Count Maurice-Polydore-Marie-Bernard Maeterlinck was born in Ghent, Belgium, to an affluent family. Educated at a Jesuit college, he originally studied to be a lawyer but practiced law only for a brief time before turning his interests and talents to writing.

During a trip to Paris, Maeterlinck came in contact with several members of the literary community, such as Villiers de l'Isle Adam, who became one of Maeterlinck's greatest literary influences. Maeterlinck eventually moved to Paris to pursue his writing career.

Although his later works were mostly dramatic in nature, his earliest published efforts were poetic, his first published work being the collection of poems Ardent talons (1889). He published his first play, La Princesse Maleine, in 1899, and it was well received, particularly by Octave Mirbeau, the literary critic of Le Figaro, whose praise of the work transformed Maeterlinck into an almost overnight success.

Maeterlinck's works are characterized by symbolist (see SYMBOLISM) themes, including a concern with the metaphysical, mysticism, and an awareness of death. This is particularly evident in The Intruder (1890) and The Blind (1890). Even his ostensibly love-themed works such as Pelléas et Mélisande (1892), Alladine et Palomides (1894), and Aglavaine et Sélysette (1896) share this same bleak undertone, as do the works in which he developed his mystical ideas: The Treasure of the Humble (1896), Wisdom and Destiny (1898), and The Buried Temple (1902). Even some of Maeterlinck's later works, such as Joyzelle (1903) and Marie Magdeleine (1909), focus prevalently on death, but by World War I, he began to dwell on an almost fantasylike optimism. This optimism can be found in his play The Burgomaster of Stilemonde (1918). His Oiseau bleu (The Blue Bird, 1908), intended for children, also struck a positive note. His best-known play, however, is Monna Vanna (1902), set in an exotic 15th-century Pisa, which deals with a moral dilemma of a beautiful wife.

In 1911, Maeterlinck was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature. In his later years, he turned his attention to writing philosophical essays and, in 1932, was awarded the title of count in Belgium.

Another Work by Maurice Maeterlinck

The Life of the Bee. Translated by Alfred Sutro. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1970.

A Work about Maurice Maeterlinck

Knapp, Bettina. Maurice Maeterlinck. Boston: Twayne, 1975.

magic realism

Magic realism is a style of fiction writing that combines elements of fantasy and reality without any clear delineation between the two. Though elements of fantasy in literature can be found throughout history, it is the particular relationship between the fantastic and the real that characterizes magic realism's unique flavor. Though it had some precedent in European literature, particularly in the work of Franz KAFKA, magic realism was primarily developed in post-World War II Latin America.

The Latin-American literary ancestor of magic realism was Jorge Luis BORGES, who used fantasy in his short stories as a means of exploring philosophical mysteries. In the 1960s, the generation after Borges—Gabriel GARCÍA MÁRQUEZ, Carlos FUENTES, Mario VARGAS LLOSA, and Alejo CARPENTIER, all important contributors to the development of the magical-realist style—came to the world's attention. It was clear there was a Latin-American renaissance in progress and that magic realism would make an important contribution to world literature.

Critical Analysis

Magic realism demonstrates the presence of a hidden layer of reality behind the appearance of the natural world and human society. This effect is achieved both by presenting the incredible in a straightforward manner and by describing the commonplace as mysterious. Both Gabriel García Márquez and Alejo Carpentier have said that magic realism is an effect that is based not in fantasy but in Latin-American reality.

A humorous example of this can be found in García Márquez's novel One Hundred Years of Solitude (1967), in which a child is born with the tail of a pig. García Márquez chose this particular "stigma" specifically because of its unreality. The episode reinforces the carefully balanced themes of what is real versus the absurd and fantastic. After the book was published, people from all over Latin America came forward, admitting to having been born with a pig's tail. Having read One Hundred Years of Solitude, they realized that it was only natural and that they were no longer embarrassed to admit it. The outrageousness of the incident and the readers' reactions to it force readers to consider the absurdity in everyday life and society.

Many of the Latin-American magic-realist writers spent time in Europe, particularly France, and were exposed to surrealism and its use of the absurd. Though the influence of surrealism on magic realism is unquestionable, it is magic realism's relationship to truth that sets it apart. The surrealists used fantasy and absurdity to attack conventional ideas of reality; the magic realists created substitute ideas of reality in hope of coming closer to psychological and metaphysical truths.

In this way, the fantastic elements of magic realism take on the stature of myths. Myths, although not able to be proved by science or history, have a kind of accuracy about the nature and needs of humanity and the world. Because of their connection to some inner aspect of human consciousness, myths have a power beyond that of mere fantasy. Magic realism attempts to use this mythic force.

Another distinguishing feature of magic-realist novels is their relationship to history. Carlos Fuentes and Mario Vargas Llosa, as well as García Márquez and Carpentier, combine specific details of Latin-American history with fantastical elements in their works.

In Terra Nostra (1975), Fuentes uses magic realism as a means to recount and analyze the history of Spain and Latin America. The book is unquestionably about the history of the Hispanic world, but the use of the fantastic allows Fuentes to give the events a sense of universality.

Vargas Llosa, however, embellishes history with fantasy for the purpose of making an ideological critique in a dramatic and nondidactic way. To a lesser degree, this is also García Márquez's strategy in One Hundred Years of Solitude, in which he combines the actual events of Columbian history with a mythical story of the imaginary town Macondo to critique Latin-American politics and U.S. imperialism. Perhaps it is this perfect synthesis of the two powers of magic realism that makes One Hundred Years of Solitude the generally acknowledged masterpiece of the genre.

Isabel ALLENDE, though not one of the inventors of magic realism, adopted a style similar to García Márquez's. In her novel The House of the Spirits (1982), Allende uses magic realism to convey a feminist perspective on Latin-American history and culture. Some readers have even seen in Allende's novels a feminist critique of magic realism itself.

American writer Toni Morrison has also been called a magic realist. Her work, particularly her novel Beloved (1987), employs the characteristic use of the fantastic to reveal metaphysical truth and confront the historical injustice of slavery.

Magic realism, when it is most successful, goes beyond itself to penetrate into unrecognized truths. It engages history in a way that REALISM cannot. Realism, our sense of what is subjective and what is objective in reality, is, in a certain sense, determined by history. The extraordinary success of magic realism demonstrated, both in Latin America and throughout the world, that traditional realism, dominant into the 20th century, is no longer necessarily the best mode for expressing the drama of contemporary life.

Works about Magic Realism

Angulo, María-Elena. Magic Realism: Social Context and Discourse. New York: Garland, 1995.

Mellen, Joan. Magic Realism. Detroit: Gale Group, 2000.

Mahfouz, Naguib (1911–) novelist

Naguib Mahfouz was born in the al-Jamaliyyah district of Cairo, Egypt, the youngest child of a civil servant. When Mahfouz was six years old, his father moved the family to a more prosperous suburb. Mahfouz read extensively as a child. His father's wealth allowed him to acquire many translated books that were not part of his school curriculum. When the 1919 revolution in Egypt took place, Mahfouz was only eight years old. The revolution had broken out because the British colonial government prevented an Egyptian nationalist from traveling to the Versailles Conference to demand Egypt's independence. Despite Mahfouz's young age, he was greatly affected by the event, and he idolized the heroes of the revolution for their bravery and courage.

After completing his secondary education, Mahfouz studied philosophy at the University of Cairo. He was invited after his graduation to continue his studies in the master's program. By the 1930s, Mahfouz was writing articles about the intellectual ideas and issues of the time, such as the pursuit of science in conjunction with socialist ideology to foster a better future for Egypt and the replacement of the absolutist monarchic government with a social-democratic one. He eventually turned away from his university career and entered the civil service, where he remained until his retirement in 1971. His work gave him time to pursue his writing, which was his first love. Throughout his writing career, Mahfouz continued to read avidly the works of many European and Russian writers such as Albert CAMUS, Feyodor DOSTOYEVSKY, Leo TOLSTOY, and Marcel PROUST.

Mahfouz's writings were clearly affected by the turmoil caused by the political changes in Egypt. A supporter of the political revolution of the 1960s, Mahfouz found many kindred spirits in revolutionary movement of this time but was deeply disturbed by the methods activists employed to achieve their goals. He attempted to represent the spirit of the revolution and its ideals through his works. His stories bespeak the uncertainty of the 1960s, which peaked with the outbreak of the war between Egypt and Israel in 1967. The war signaled the final failure of the ideas and structures of the Egyptian government and also prompted many writers, including Mahfouz, to engage in more reflective writings.

In 1988, Mahfouz became the first Arab author to win the Nobel Prize in literature. The award recognized Mahfouz's contribution to developing the novel in the Arab literary world, but it also put Mahfouz and his family under intense scrutiny by the news media. His worsening health led him to seek medical care in London, and when he returned, he narrowly escaped an attempt on his life by a group of Islamic fundamentalists in 1994. Although he suffered a stab wound in the attack, he remained a faithful advocate of free expression.

Critical Analysis

The early stage of Mahfouz's writing was marked by his deep concern with philosophical issues such as class struggle, identity, poverty, and colonial oppression. These themes are represented in his works of the 1940s and 1950s, such as Kifah Tiba (Struggle at Thebes, 1944), Al-Qahirah al-jadidah (Modern Cairo, 1946), and the Cairo trilogy Al-Thulathiyya: Bayn al-Qasrayn (Palace Walk, 1956), Qasr al-Shawq (Palace of Desire, 1957), and Al-Sukkariyya (Sugar Street, 1957). In Kifah Tiba, he examines the significance of the country's early history during the time of its struggle for independence. By reflecting on the character and rash actions of the youthful pharaoh, Mahfouz was able to compare his pharaoh protagonist with the young King Farouk of Egypt. In Al-Qahirah al-jadidah, on the other hand, Mahfouz analyzes the lives of various characters whose continuous quest for better lives brings them into conflict with the dominant British colonial class. Themes such as the exploitation of the lower classes by the colonial rulers are further elaborated and portrayed in another of Mahfouz's novels, Zuqaq al-Midaqq (Midaq Alley, 1947).

In his early work, Mahfouz masterfully portrays the varied view of many different characters. In the Cairo trilogy, a monumental work of 1,500 pages, he traces the major events of Egyptian history through his narrative about the 'Abd al-Jawwad family. He explicates a complex web of relationships set against the background of Egypt's bitter struggle against British colonialism. The novel examines complicated and fragile human relationships against the backdrop of major political events such as the political revolution of 1919. It also explores important themes, such as generational differences, tradition versus modernity, and sexual equality. Mahfouz's protagonists continued to find their own identities as they faced and reacted to the changes of the times. In a certain way, Mahfouz's life was a reflection of this haplessness of humanity to change.

In the second phase of Mahfouz's literary career, he became more outspoken, especially when expressing his political views. This stage was clearly influenced by his reaction to the political events from the 1960s to the 1980s. Between 1961 and 1967, he published six novels, in which he began to enhance his narration to convey the complexities and urgency of colonial oppression and the disillusionment that accompanied this period of chaos and disorder. He also began to write from the point of view of the protagonists of his stories. In tersely realistic style, he expressed his characters' emotional estrangement from their peers and their community. As a result, his explicitness brought a new dimension to Mahfouz's stories. He was able to showcase his talent in creating a variety of human characters with varied and complex personalities and points of view. In Miramar (1967), for example, Mahfouz conjures a setting in which characters from different occupational backgrounds and age groups come together. The story focuses on the character of Zahra, a lovely peasant girl who exudes innocence, simplicity, and optimism. Zahra personifies the optimism of Egypt in the postwar period, which is marred by the harsh reality of corruption and vice that leads to the suicide of one main character and the continuous impoverishment of the others.

Mahfouz's works reflect his personality and his experiences in Egypt where he spent most of his life. His concern with the human condition and other philosophical issues clearly influenced his writings. The major themes in his works include the constant human need for acceptance and solace, the vicious cycle of social oppression from which the poor could never escape, and the irreconcilable differences between the ideologies of the upper and lower classes. Even though Mahfouz wrote of the struggle and suffering of the poor, his stories are mostly narratives of the urban middle class, especially the lives and problems of intellectuals. In addition, Mahfouz's middle-class background and his long-term residence in cities gave him the experience and knowledge with which to create familiar settings.

Other Works by Naguib Mahfouz

Arabian Nights and Days. Translated by Denys Johnson-Davies. New York: Doubleday, 1995.

The Beggar. Translated by Kristin Walker Henry and Nariman Khales Naili al Warrah. Cairo: American University in Cairo Press, 1986.

Children of the Alley. Translated by Peter Theroux. New York: Doubleday, 1996.

The Thief and the Dogs. Translated by Trevor Le Gassick and Mustafa Badawi. Cairo: American University in Cairo Press, 1984.

The Time and the Place. Translated by Denys Johnson-Davies. New York: Doubleday, 1991.

Works about Naguib Mahfouz

- Gordon, Haim. Naguib Mahfouz's Egypt: Existential Themes in his Writings. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1990.
- Le Gassick, Trevor, ed. Critical Perspectives on Naguib Mahfouz. Washington, D.C.: Three Continents Press, 1991.
- Peled, Mattityahu. Religion My Own: The Literary Works of Naguib Mahfouz. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Books, 1983.
- Somekh, Sasson. The Changing Rhythm: A Study of Naguib Mahfouz's Novels. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1973.

Maillet, Antonine (1929–) poet, playwright, novelist

Antonine Maillet was born in the Acadian community of Bouctouche, New Brunswick. Her work often draws on her Acadian upbringing and employs a particular Acadian dialect. In 1950, she received a B.A. from the University of Moncton and, nine years later, completed an M.A. She continued her studies at Laval, earning a Ph.D. in literature in 1970. She taught literature and folklore, first at Laval and then at Montreal. She also worked for Radio-Canada in Moncton as a scriptwriter and host. She is currently the chancellor of the University of Moncton.

While in school, Maillet worked on her writing, producing her first play, Poire-acre, in 1958. That same year, her first novel, Pointe-aux-Coques was published. Since that time, she has published close to 50 novels, plays, and poems and has become one of the most important living French-Canadian writers. Her novel The Tale of Don L'Original (1972) won the Governor General's Award for Fiction. In 1979, Maillet became the only Canadian author to win France's most prestigious literary award, the Prix Goncourt, for her novel Pélagie-la-Charette (1979), a historical novel about the British army's destruction of Acadian settlements in 1755.

Another Work by Antonine Maillet

The Devil is Loose! New York: Walker & Co., 1987.

Works about Antonine Maillet

- Aresu, Bernard. "Pélagie la Charette and Antonine Maillet's Epic Voices." In Makoto Ueda, ed., Explorations: Essays in Comparative Literature. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1986.
- Briere, Eloise A. "Antonine Maillet and the Construction of Acadian Identity." Postcolonial Subjects: Francophone Women Writers. Edited by Mary Jean Green et al. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1996, 3–21.

Mala'ika, Nazik al- (1923–) poet, critic

Al-Mala'ika was born in Baghdad to a literary family; her mother was a nationalist poet in the independence movement against British rule. She earned a B.A. in Arabic at the Teacher's Training College, Baghdad (1944), and an M.A. in comparative literature from the University of Wisconsin (1956). With her husband, she helped found the University of Basra in Iraq. Al-Mala'ika taught at the University of Kuwait from 1970 to 1982 and thereafter lived in Iraq until living conditions, affected by the Gulf War (1991), deteriorated so much that she could not maintain her health, so she moved to Cairo.

Al-Mala'ika's literary criticism and poetry helped to break the hold of traditional forms on modern Arabic poetry. Her first collection, Ashiqat al-lail ("Lover of night," 1947) offered poetry of highly sensitive emotion, idealism, despair, and disillusion, themes typically associated with Arabic literary romanticism of the 1930s and 1940s. In the introduction to her second collection, Shazaya wa ramad ("Shards and ashes," 1949) she suggests a break with the centuries-old rhyme patterns of Arabic poetry and proposes that the "poetic foot" be cut loose from the two-hemistich verse form that has anchored Arabic poetry since its beginnings. Her belief is that this form and the poetic conventions associated with it have come to inhibit rather than spur creativity. Shazaya wa ramad and subsequent poetry collections depart from traditional forms. "Cholera" was her first poem to demonstrate what is considered, in Arabic literature, to be “free verse.” Her 1962 book of literary criticism Qadaya al-shi'r al-mu'asir, (the title means “Issues in Contemporary Arabic Poetry”), in which she refines and elaborates the proposal for modern verse begun in the introduction to Shazaya wa ramad, is a milestone text and is hotly debated. Al-Mala'ika continued to write poetry into the 1970s, departing from the dark, romantic tendencies of her early work to a more philosophical stance. Religious and spiritual themes enter her later poetry; her recent work is often marginalized, as very few modern Arab poets and critics take religious inspiration seriously.

Only a small amount of her work is available in English, in anthologies such as Kamal Boullata's Women of the Fertile Crescent (1981).

Another Work by Nazik al-Mala'ika

Jayyusi, Salma, ed. Selections in Modern Arabic Poetry. New York: Columbia University Press, 1987.

A Work about Nazik al-Mala'ika

Jayyusi, Salma. Trends and Movements in Modern Arabic Poetry. Boston: Brill, 1977.

Malange, Nise (1960–) poet, screenwriter
Nise Malange was born in Cape Town, South Africa. She went to the United States, where she obtained a degree from the University of Iowa. Malange specialized in scriptwriting and film and video production while she was in Zimbabwe. She is currently the director of the Culture and Working Life Project at the University of Natal in Durban. She is also the national vice president of the Congress of South African Writers. In addition, Malange works as a consultant within the labor movement and writes to forward the cause of women's rights in South Africa. Malange writes poetry and plays and has presented papers on African arts and cultures at international conferences. She won the prestigious Norwegian Award for Poetry in 1987.

Malange's poems are inspired by her personal experiences as a disenfranchised black woman in South Africa. Her turbulent youth, spent during the years of apartheid, has had a distinct impact on her writing. Issues such as domestic violence, disenfranchisement, and education for girls are common themes in her works. Her play Pondo Women Cleaners (1987) addresses the pain and suffering of a marginal group of disenfranchised women. Malange believes that literature can be used for the mobilization of the masses, and her poetry examines the oppression and struggle of women in a male-dominated society. Through her poetry, Malange also reaches out to her readers, imploring them to derive strength from their common experiences. She believes that literature has the power to influence and help them to improve their lives.

Malange represents one of the prominent members of a new generation of African poets known as the “oral poets.” Her desire to inspire ordinary people to voice their opinions against social evils such as oppression and class differences is most effectively carried out in her active participation in community work and workshops that she helps organize.

Other Works by Nise Malange

“Ditsela! Ditsela,” Pathways 1 (May 1997).

“Nightshift Cleaner, Nightshift Mother,” Illuminations: An International Magazine of Contemporary Writing 8 (Summer 1989).

Mallarmé, Stéphane (1842–1898) poet

A Symbolist (see SYMBOLISM) poet whose works are often considered by critics to be the best example of “pure poetry,” Stéphane Mallarmé was born in Paris into a family of French civil servants. As a student, he distinguished himself in the study of languages. After graduation, he visited England, was married in London, and then returned to France, where he accepted the first in a series of teaching posts. He taught English in several provincial schools in Tournon, Besançon, Avignon, and Paris until his retirement in 1893.

Mallarmé made many close contacts within the artistic community. Chief among these was his sustained friendship with Manet, which began in 1873 and continued until the artist's death in 1883. He wrote two articles on Manet, which are considered to be incisive symbolist analyses of impressionism.

In the 1880s, Mallarmé became the center of a group of French writers who lived and worked in Paris. This group, which included André GIDE and Paul VALÉRY, met to share ideas on poetry and art. Mallarmé's ideas often contradicted each other. According to Mallarmé, nothing lies beyond reality; however, within this state of nothingness, there exists that which is the essence of perfection. This takes the shape of what he refers to as the "perfect form." He believed it was the poet's task to find these essences within the void of nothingness and to clarify them with the language of poetry.

Mallarmé's ideas were not always well received. Readers and critics alike found him to be unnecessarily complicated and often obtuse. He would challenge his readers to use their minds when they read his works by, among other things, looking up common words in the dictionary to find archaic meanings for them. He would then employ these words in their long-lost form within his poems.

Critical Analysis

Mallarmé began to write poetry in his early teens. His first poems were published in magazines in the 1860s, and his first important poem, "L'Azur," was published when he was only 24. He was profoundly influenced by the works of Charles BAUDELAIRE, particularly by Baudelaire's advocacy of the obscure and his emphasis on the element of mystery within a poetic work. Mallarmé, however, went beyond this concept, stressing the inherent magical quality and the sacredness of poetry. He spent long periods of time obsessing over the minute details of each of his poems, reveling in the importance of even the smallest and seemingly most insignificant details of language and imagery. His poetry was allusive and often hard for readers to grasp. His language was compressed in such a way that a finished poem often seemed more an interpretation than a poem that could be easily defined, which demanded an awareness of the process of poetic creation.

Language and art held a close association in many of Mallarmé's works. His association with the visual arts is readily evident in his poetry collection, The Afternoon of a Faun (1876), his best-known work. It was illustrated by Manet and inspired both Debussy's 1894 musical composition of the same name and the subsequent ballet by Nijinsky. The poems in the collection were written while Mallarmé was working at Tournon, a town he found both ugly and unpleasant. In contrast to the author's own surroundings, the poem presents the rambling erotic thoughts of a faun as it whiles away the hours of a drowsy summer afternoon in a place of great beauty.

Perhaps Mallarmé's greatest achievement came in his contribution to those writers who came after him. This influence was not restricted to French poetry but spread internationally among a diverse group of writers. Wallace Stevens credits Mallarmé as a source of great inspiration, as does T. S. Eliot. His influence is readily apparent in James Joyce's Finnegans Wake.

The condensed figures and unorthodox syntax of Mallarmé's poetry set it apart from much of the rest of the works of his time. He framed each of his poems around one central symbol, idea, or metaphor. All of the additional imagery simply served to help illustrate and develop the main idea. His use of free verse was influential on the FIN DE SIÈCLE movement in France, the 1890s Decadent movement (see decadence), and 20th-century MODERNIST poetry.

Mallarmé's other works include Hérodiade (1896) and A Funeral Toast, the latter of which was written as a memorial to the French author Théophile GAUTIER, whose works Mallarmé greatly admired. He also wrote an experimental poem Un Coup de dés Jamais n'abolira le hasard (1897), which was published posthumously. In his later years, he became close friends with Whistler and devoted himself to creating what he referred to as his "grand oeuvre" or "great work." Unfortunately, Mallarmé died in Paris on September 9 before he could complete this impossible masterpiece.

Other Works by Stéphane Mallarmé

Collected Poems. Translated by Henry Weinfield. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994.

Mallarmé in Prose. Translated by Jill Anderson. New York: New Directions, 2001.

Works about Stéphane Mallarmé

Lloyd, Rosemary. Mallarmé: The Poet and His Circle. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1999.

Stafford, Hélène. Mallarmé and the Poetics of Everyday Life: A Study of the Concept of the Ordinary in His Verse and Prose. Atlanta, Ga.: Rodopi, 2000.

Malouf, David (1934–) poet, novelist, playwright

David Malouf was born in Brisbane, Australia, to a Lebanese father and an English mother. He attended the Brisbane Grammar school and later received an honors degree in language and literature at the University of Queensland, where he taught English until 1962. His expertise and skill in the use of the English language inspired him to write poems. He published his first poem, “Interiors,” in Four Poets in 1962.

Malouf is considered both a primitive and a romantic for his uses of nature. His themes include nature, the use of language as a transforming device across cultures, identity, isolation, unity, and belonging. He uses imagery, metaphor, symbolism, and analogy to express these themes.

In “Twelve Night Pieces” from Poems 1975–76 (1976), he writes, “From wetness of earth and earth rot morning / Glory climbs to the sun . . .” to reveal the morning glory as a symbol of human connection with nature. In “The Bicycle” from The Bicycle and Other Poems (1970), he uses the analogy of the mechanical bicycle and the natural human experience of traveling through life: “Now time yawns and its messengers appear/ like huge stick insects, wingless, spoked with stars. . . .”

Malouf’s novels carry the theme of identity for which the hero longs through union with another. In Malouf’s first novel, Johnno (1975), Johnno and Dante long for their fathers’ love. In Conversations at Curlow Creek (1996), Michael Adair wants to be united with his brother and his love, Virgilia. An Imaginary Life (1978), Remembering Babylon (1993), Child’s Play (1982), and Flyaway Peter (1982), the novels for which Malouf won the Australian Literature Society’s Gold medal, all talk about the predicament of isolation.

Malouf is celebrated as a poet, essayist, novelist, and playwright. He won the Australian Literature Society gold medal for the verse collection Neighbours in a Thicket (1974). He also won the Townsville Foundation for Australian Literary Studies Award and the Grace Leven Poetry Prize. The novel Remembering Babylon was nominated for the 1993 Booker Prize. Malouf speaks about his passion for writing in his autobiography, 12, Edmonstone Street (1985).

Other Works by David Malouf

Dream Stuff: Stories. New York: Pantheon, 2000.

Selected Poems, 1959–1989. London: Chatto and Windus, 1994.

A Work about David Malouf

Indyk, Ivor. David Malouf. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Malraux, André (1901–1976) novelist, nonfiction writer

André Georges Malraux was born in Paris, France, on November 3, into a wealthy family. His parents separated when he was a child and he was brought up by his mother. His father was a stockbroker who committed suicide in 1930. As a youth, Malraux studied a wide variety of subjects, such as archaeology, art history, and anthropology. However, what interested him the most was oriental languages, histories, and cultures, which he studied at the École des Langues Orientales.

At the age of 21, Malraux married Clara Goldsmidt, also a writer, and together they traveled to Cambodia and spent time in Indochina, attempting to rediscover the Khmer statuary. He was arrested, however, for taking bas-reliefs from a temple. His three-year sentence was rescinded, and he returned briefly to France. It was during this period that he became highly critical of French colonial authorities governing Indochina. As a result, Malraux began the first of many political endeavors that, alongside and often directly linked to his literary achievements, eventually distinguished his remarkable life. He helped to first organize the Young Annam League, an anticolonial organization in Saigon in 1925. He also founded and edited the politically active and outspoken anticolonial Saigon newspaper Indochina in Chains.

On returning to France, Malraux published his first novel, The Temptation of the West (1926). The work, set in the early stages of the Chinese revolution and revolving around letters exchanged between a young European and an Asian intellectual, focuses on the parallels between Eastern and Western culture. He followed this work with two novels, The Conquerors (1928), which dealt with a revolutionary strike in Canton, and The Royal Way (1930), a successful adventure story set in the jungles of Indochina.

Malraux supported himself by working as an art editor in Paris for Gallimard Publishers. He was able to take several archaeological expeditions to Afghanistan and Iran, which led to his discovery of the lost city that may have been home to the Queen of Sheba. He continued to write, with death and revolution two of his major themes. Man's Fate (1933), one of his best-known novels, earned for him the prestigious Goncourt Prize, as well as much deserved recognition as an author. The novel depicts a communist uprising in Shanghai and focuses on the dignity of human solidarity in both life and death.

In the 1930s, Malraux became known politically for his support of antifascist and leftist organizations. He fought for the Republicans during the Spanish civil war and wrote about these experiences in his novel L'Espoir (Days of Hope, 1937). The book, published prior to the end of the war, stops with the March 1937 battle at Guadalajara. In 1938, L'Espoir was revised as a screenplay under the title Sierrade Teruel; however, the film was not released in France until after the conclusion of World War II.

The 1940s marked a shift in Malraux's life. He divorced his wife and broke away from communism, as he did not agree with the Nazi-Soviet pact. He began to concentrate on writing nonfiction and was openly opposed to Stalin's ideas. He served with a French tank unit during World War II and, though twice captured by the Gestapo, managed to escape both times.

After the war, Malraux became a vocal supporter of Charles de Gaulle. He wrote a number of books on art and aesthetics and married a concert pianist. When De Gaulle came into power, Malraux was appointed minister of cultural affairs, and his first act in office was to order the cleaning of the Louvre. This act was highly controversial in that many people saw it not as an improvement but as an act of vandalism. Malraux eventually retired from the forefront of politics to write his memoirs, including the autobiographical The Fallen Oaks (1971). He wrote regularly until his death on November 23.

Another Work by André Malraux

The Walnut Trees of Altenburg. Translated by A. W. Fielding. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.

A Work about André Malraux

Cate, Curtis. André Malraux: A Biography. New York: Fromm International, 1998.

Mandelstam, Osip Yemilyevich

(1891–1938) poet

Osip Mandelstam was born in Warsaw, Poland, but grew up in St. Petersburg, Russia. His father was a successful leather merchant, and his mother a piano teacher. Although the Mandelstams were Jewish, the family was not very religious. Mandelstam received an excellent education at home from various tutors and later from the Tenishev Academy. He traveled extensively throughout Europe between 1907 and 1910 and studied French literature at the University of Heidelberg. Between 1911 and 1917, Mandelstam studied philosophy at the University of St. Petersburg. He published his first poem in 1910 in the journal Apollon. With the advent of revolution, Mandelstam abandoned his studies to concentrate on poetry.

Influenced by his close relationship with Anna AKHMATOVA and Nikolay GUMILEV, Mandelstam readily joined the Acmeists (see ACHEMISM) and established his reputation as a poet with his collection Kamen (Stone, 1913). Like Akhmatova, Mandelstam often mixed classical images with those of contemporary Russian culture. Mandelstam's poetry also exalted the architectural and literary achievements of classical Greece and Rome. In his next two collections, Tristiya (1922) and Poems 1921–25 (1928), he reaffirmed his position as one of the best poets in Russia. Although both collections contained images and themes previously found in Stones, Mandelstam, influenced by political upheaval in Russia, expanded his poetic perspective to more universal themes of life, death, and exile.

In 1918, Mandelstam began to work for the education ministry of the new communist regime, but his support for the regime soured and stopped completely after the 1921 execution of his friend Gumilev. In the 1920s, he supported himself by writing children's books and translating works by English and French writers. He married Nadezhda Kazin in 1922 and in 1928 published three books: a poetry collection, entitled simply Poems, and two collections of critical essays. After a trip to Armenia in 1930, Mandelstam published his last major collection of poetry, Journey to Armenia, in 1933. An epigram about Stalin he wrote in 1934—"And every killing is a treat / For the broad-chested Ossete"—resulted in Mandelstam's being arrested and exiled to Voronezh. Nadezhda accompanied him and helped transcribe the agonized poems he composed there. In 1938, he was arrested again for "counterrevolutionary" activities. This time he was sentenced to five years of hard labor. Mandelstam died that year in the Gulag Archipelago and was buried in a common grave.

International acclaim for Mandelstam's work did not come until the 1970s, when his works were published in Russia and the West. Mandelstam's poems of exile were not published until 1990 in The Voronezh Notebooks. Their lyrical approach to almost unimaginable pain is astonishing, as in the poem "Black Candle" (1934):

*It is your fate, for your narrow shoulders to turn red under the lashes,
red under the lashes, to burn in the frost . . .
And as for me, I burn after you like a black candle,
burn like a black candle and dare not pray.*

The magnificence of Mandelstam's verse is still being rediscovered today. He is now considered to be one of the best Russian poets of the 20th century. The critic Simon Karlinsky, for example, remarked in a review of Bruce McClelland's translation of Tristiya in the New York Times Book Review: "In Mandelstam, Russian poetry at last has a poet of stature comparable to Pushkin's—a claim that even the most fanatical admirers of Blok, Mayakovsky or Pasternak would not dream of making."

Other Works by Osip Mandelstam

50 Poems/Osip Mandelstam. Translated by Bernard Meares, with an introduction by Joseph Brodsky. New York: Persea Books, 2000.

The Noise of Time: The Prose of Osip Mandelstam. Translated by Clarence Brown. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1986.

Osip Mandelstam's Stone. Translated and introduced by Robert Tracy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981.

Tristia. Translated by Bruce McClelland. Barrytown, N.Y.: Station Hill Press, 1987.

The Voronezh Notebooks: Poems 1935–1937. Translated by Richard McKane and Elizabeth Mc-Kane. Chester Springs, Pa.: Dufour Editions, 1998.

Works about Osip Mandelstam

Cavanagh, Clare. Osip Mandelstam and the Modernist Creation of Tradition. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1995.

Harris, Jane Garry. Osip Mandelstam. Boston: Twayne, 1988.

Mandelstam, Nadezhda. Hope Against Hope. Translated by Max Hayward. New York: Modern Library, 1999.

———. Mozart and Salieri: An Essay on Osip Mandelstam and the Poetic Process. New York: Vintage, 1994.

Manhae

See HAN YONGUN.

Mann, Heinrich (1871–1950) novelist, playwright, essayist

Luiz Heinrich Mann was born in Lübeck, Germany. His father, Thomas Johann Heinrich Mann, was a successful grain merchant. His mother, Julia da Silva-Bruhns Mann, was of Brazilian descent. As a teenager, Mann became an apprentice to a bookseller and worked for a publishing house. After an inheritance made him financially independent, he started his literary career in 1891. He lived in Italy, Munich, Berlin, and France before moving to the United States in 1940 to escape the Nazis. He married the actress Maria Kanová in 1914 and, after their divorce, married Nelly Kroeger in 1939.

Mann, a prolific essayist, was one of the few German writers to oppose his country's participation in World War I. He attained literary fame with his novel Der Untertan (The Patriot, 1918), a satirical critique of Germany under Kaiser Wilhelm. His novel Professor Unrat (1905) was translated as The Blue Angel and made into a popular movie in 1928. In the 1930s, Mann wrote two successful historical novels on King Henry of Navarre. In 1949, he won the National Prize of East Germany and died a year later after accepting the presidency of that country's Academy of Arts.

Mann's influences included Friedrich NIETZSCHE and 19th-century French writers such as Gustave FLAUBERT. He and his brother Thomas MANN criticized, supported, and influenced each other's writing careers. Mann employed caricature and sarcasm in his works to convey his social and political criticisms. A socialist, he used his novels and plays to oppose authoritarianism, militarism, and fascism. Less successful than his brother, Mann was sometimes an uneven and impatient writer who lacked precision and polish. Nonetheless, as the scholar Rolf Linn points out, Mann's work represents "an almost complete intellectual and political history of Germany in the first half of the twentieth century" and "through it the best thought of nineteenth century France entered German thinking."

Another Work by Heinrich Mann

Henry, King of France. Translated by Eric Sutton. New York: Knopf, 1939.

A Work about Heinrich Mann

Linn, Rolf N. Heinrich Mann. Boston: Twayne, 1967.

Mann, Thomas (1875–1955) novelist, critic, essayist

Thomas Mann was born in Lübeck, Germany. His father was a wealthy, prominent citizen who was twice elected as mayor of Lübeck. His mother, Julia da Silva-Bruhns, was born in Brazil of mixed German and Portuguese ancestry. After the death of Mann's father in 1891, his family relocated to Munich. Mann was an avid reader during childhood and particularly admired realistic literature. Mann attended the University of Munich; on graduation, he worked for the German Fire Insurance Company.

While at university, Mann immersed himself in the writings of Arthur SCHOPENHAUER and Friedrich NIETZSCHE, two very influential German philosophers and cultural critics. Mann also became obsessed with the musical works of Richard Wagner, a composer whose operas and orchestral works were inspired by German myth and legend. Mann's early literary influences, were Leo TOLSTOY and Fyodor DOSTOYEVSKY, whose psychological realism Mann particularly admired.

In 1929, Mann won the Nobel Prize in literature. When Adolf Hitler came to power in Germany, Mann, along with his family, moved to Switzerland, where Mann worked as an editor for various literary journals. In 1938, Mann moved to the United States, working as a visiting professor at Princeton University. While at Princeton, Mann completed several critical works, including a study of Dostoevsky. Mann eventually moved to California but left the United States in 1952, bitterly disappointed by the persecution of communists and communist sympathizers by the U.S. government.

Critical Analysis

Mann's first major work, Buddenbrooks (1900), shows the influence of Richard Wagner in its use of leitmotif, using a word or an image over and over again in the work as a thematically unifying element. The novel follows several generations of the Buddenbrook family, a wealthy and powerful German family that disintegrates and degenerates with each successive generation. The novel especially focuses on the last Buddenbrook, the decadent artist Hanno. The work demonstrates Mann's affinity for the epic quality of the novel, which he inherited from early Tolstoy works. Buddenbrooks was well received throughout Germany and established Mann as a prominent writer.

In 1912, Mann completed a much shorter but also less conventional work, Death in Venice. The story recounts a strange relationship between Tadzio, a 14-year-old boy, and Gustav von Aschenbach, a mature German writer. Aschenbach becomes obsessed with the boy, who falls ill during an epidemic. Aschenbach decides to brave the epidemic and nurse the boy but contracts the disease himself and dies. Throughout the story the narrator asks this question:

[D]o you believe, my dear boy, that the man whose pass to the spiritual passes through the senses can ever achieve wisdom and true manly dignity?

Aschenbach, who has never before allowed himself to experience passion, literally dies for it and of it. The ambiguities in the relationship between Aschenbach and the boy, as well as the story's multi-layered symbolism, have made Death in Venice a frequent subject of debate among scholars and critics.

During World War I, Mann adamantly supported the policies of the kaiser, the leader of Germany, and vehemently attacked liberalism. After the end of World War I, however, Mann's political opinions changed, and he vocally supported parliamentary democracy and the newly formed Weimar Republic.

The Magic Mountain (1924), Mann's second great work, reflects the political conflict found in the writer's contemporary world. In the novel, Hans Castorp visits his cousin at a fashionable tuberculosis sanatorium and decides to stay there even though he is not ill. The stay spans more than seven years, during which time Castorp talks with the other patients in the sanatorium and learns valuable lessons about the meaning of life and death. Castorp is caught in a conflict between two opposing political forces represented by two characters: a young Italian liberal humanist, Settembrini, and Naptha, a radical reactionary figure who supports faith beyond reason. The differences between the two men culminate in a duel: Settembrini fires into the air, and Naptha, overwhelmed by rage, kills himself. The duel between the two opposing forces symbolically reflects the conflict in Mann's own society. The work also reflects Mann's concern about fascism and the growing popularity of the Nazis in his native Germany. The novel received tremendous critical acclaim and became a best-seller in Germany.

Joseph and His Brothers appeared as a trilogy written between 1933 and 1943. Set in the biblical world, the story emerges as a religious and political allegory of conflict between individual liberty and political oppression. The story describes the progress of Joseph who matures into a wise political leader ready to lead his people to freedom. The novel was written during the height of the Nazi regime and reflects Mann's personal hatred for fascism and oppression.

Mann's last great novel, Doctor Faustus (1947), delineates the life of a famous composer, Adrian Leverkühn. The work is set against the grim background of crumbling German culture and society between the First and the Second World Wars. Mann's exploration of the roots of fascism in Germany was well received around the world but was resented by some in Germany itself.

When Thomas Mann returned to Europe in 1953, he refused to live in Germany—the government of which had deprived him of his citizenship in 1936—and settled in Switzerland. In 1949, Mann was awarded the Goethe Prize, the highest literary honor in Germany. Mann's exploration of the relationship of the extraordinary person to the society has never been surpassed.

Other Works by Thomas Mann

Confessions of Felix Krull: The Confidence Man. New York: Vintage Press, 1992.

Death in Venice and Other Stories. Translated by David Luke. New York: Bantam Books, 1988.

Works about Thomas Mann

Heilbut, Anthony. Thomas Mann: Eros and Literature. Riverside: University of California Press, 1997.

Robertson, Ritchie. The Cambridge Companion to Thomas Mann. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Mansfield, Katherine (Kathleen Mansfield Beauchamp) (1888–1923) short-story writer, poet

Katherine Mansfield was born Kathleen Mansfield Beauchamp in Wellington, New Zealand, to an affluent, middle-class family, but in 1909 she left for London to pursue a career as a writer. There, she met and married George Bowdon, a music teacher, but left him a few days after the wedding. Her first complete volume of short stories was published in 1911, under the title In a German Pension. These stories were based on Mansfield's stay at a Bavarian health resort, where she lived for a time after she left her husband and where she suffered a miscarriage.

Shortly after her return to London, she met John Middleton Murry, a critic, poet, and editor, whom she married in 1918. In that same year, she was diagnosed with tuberculosis. In London, she met a number of artists and writers, including D. H. Lawrence, who modeled one of his characters in his novel Women in Love after Mansfield, and Virginia Woolf. The painter Dorothy Brett described Mansfield as having “a sort of ironic ruthlessness toward the small minds and less agile brains. . . . Katherine had a tongue like a knife, she could cut the very heart of one with it.” (She was much more subtle and ambiguous in her writing.) In fiction writing, Virginia Woolf treated Mansfield as such a serious rival that, after her death, Woolf said there was “no point in writing. Katherine won't read it.”

When her brother Leslie was killed during World War I, Mansfield began to write stories about her family and growing up. Some of her best stories, such as “The Garden Party,” are set in New Zealand at the turn of the century.

“The Garden Party,” published in 1922, deals with social class, death, and the artist's sensibility. The Sheridan family is hosting an elaborate garden party when a delivery man brings the news that a worker who lived in one of the little cottages near the Sheridan house has been killed in an accident. Mrs. Sheridan, once assured that the man did not actually die in her garden, insists that the party go on, telling her daughter, Laura, “People like that don't expect sacrifices from us.” Later, Mrs. Sheridan sends Laura to the Scott house with the leftovers from the party, and at the “pokey little hole . . .” she accidentally enters the room where the body is laid out. Gazing at the dead man, she thinks, “He was given up to his dream. What did garden parties . . . matter to him?” The story exemplifies Mansfield’s delicate, poetic style, her tendency to focus on a life-changing moment, and her habit of ending on a note of ambiguity.

In “The Fly” (1923), a businessman is reminded by a visitor of the death of his son six years earlier in World War I. Unable to summon up the grief he wants to feel, he picks up a photograph of his son. At this moment, he notices a fly that has fallen into the inkpot. He rescues the fly and watches as it begins the tedious process of cleaning itself off. Just as it is “ready for life again,” the man drops more ink on it. He repeats the process, amazed at the fly’s courage and resilience, until the final blot of ink kills the fly, at which point the man is seized by “a grinding feeling of wretchedness.” He calls for fresh blotting paper but cannot remember what he had been thinking about before he began to torment the fly. Although the man cannot remember, the reader knows that the fly stands for all those who are helpless victims of a cruel fate.

Although Poems (1923) and The Letters of Katherine Mansfield (1928) were published posthumously, Mansfield is primarily remembered for her seven books of short stories, and she has exerted a lasting influence on modern short-story writers. She crafted her stories very carefully, writing and rewriting. Her writing is always subtle and often ironic and witty. As she defied conventions in her life, so her stories question conventional ideas about social class, family life, and marriage.

Katherine Mansfield died of tuberculosis in 1923 near Fontainebleau, France. The first significant writer to emerge from New Zealand, she is claimed by nationalist critics in both New Zealand and Britain but is best thought of as a product of colonialism. Her biographer Antony Alpers says of her New Zealand stories:

They were really insights into the social isolation that used to be common in New Zealand . . . and they were written in a cultural isolation that was total for their author: no one who read them in London could have known what they in fact achieved. . . . The stories were something that only a New Zealander could have written at that time. They succeeded in relating character to environment in a land of “no tradition.”

Other Works by Katherine Mansfield

Bliss and Other Stories. London: Wordsworth, 1996.
Something Childish. North Pomfret, Vt.: Trafalgar Square, 2000.

Works about Katherine Mansfield

Alpers, Antony. The Life of Katherine Mansfield. New York: Viking Press, 1980.
Kobler, J. F. Katherine Mansfield: A Study of the Short Fiction. Boston: Twayne, 1990.
Tomalin, Claire. Katherine Mansfield: A Secret Life. New York: Knopf, 1988.

Manzoni, Alessandro (1785–1873) poet, novelist

