

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

---

SECOND EDITION

7
Hol-Jub

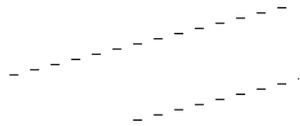

THOMSON
—*—™
GALE

---

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco • Cleveland • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London • Munich

in association with
THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Second Edition

Project Editors

Thomas Carson, Joann Cerrito

Editorial

Erin Bealmear, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus

Permissions

Edna Hedblad, Shalice Shah-Caldwell

Imaging and Multimedia

Randy Bassett, Dean Dauphinais, Robert Duncan, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, Lezlie Light, Dan Newell, David G. Oblender, Christine O'Bryan, Luke Rademacher, Pamela Reed

Product Design

Michelle DiMercurio

Manufacturing

Rhonda Williams

Indexing

Victoria Agee, Victoria Baker, Francine Cronshaw, Lynne Maday, Do Mi Stauber, Amy Suchowski

© 2003 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale. Gale is an imprint of The Gale Group, Inc., a division of Thomson Learning, Inc.

Gale and Design™ and Thomson Learning™ are trademarks used herein under license.

For more information, contact
The Gale Group, Inc.
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535
Or you can visit our Internet site at <http://www.gale.com>

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, The Gale Group, Inc. does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. The Gale Group, Inc. accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia.—2nd ed.
p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 0-7876-4004-2

1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Catholic University of America.

BX841 .N44 2002
282'.03—dc21
2002000924

ISBN: 0-7876-4004-2 (set)
0-7876-4005-0 (v. 1)
0-7876-4006-9 (v. 2)
0-7876-4007-7 (v. 3)
0-7876-4008-5 (v. 4)

0-7876-4009-3 (v. 5)
0-7876-4010-7 (v. 6)
0-7876-4011-5 (v. 7)
0-7876-4012-3 (v. 8)
0-7876-4013-1 (v. 9)

0-7876-4014-x (v. 10)
0-7876-4015-8 (v. 11)
0-7876-4016-6 (v. 12)
0-7876-4017-4 (v. 13)
0-7876-4018-2 (v. 14)
0-7876-4019-0 (v. 15)

Printed in the United States of America
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

For The Catholic University of America Press

EDITORIAL STAFF

Executive Editor

Berard L. Marthaler, O.F.M.Conv., S.T.D., Ph.D.

Associate Editor

Gregory F. LaNave, Ph.D.

Assistant Editors

Jonathan Y. Tan, Ph.D.

Richard E. McCarron, Ph.D.

Editorial Assistant

Denis J. Obermeyer

Director of The Catholic University of America Press

David J. McGonagle, Ph.D.

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

John Borelli, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Drew Christiansen, S.J., Ph.D., Senior Fellow, Woodstock Theological Center,
Washington, D.C.

Anne M. Clifford, C.S.J., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Raymond F. Collins, M.A., S.T.D.,
Professor of New Testament, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Cyprian Davis, O.S.B., S.T.L., Ph.D.,
Professor of Church History, Saint Meinrad
School of Theology, Saint Meinrad, Indiana

Dennis M. Doyle, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of Dayton, Dayton, Ohio

Angelyn Dries, O.S.F., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Cardinal
Stritch University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Arthur Espelage, O.F.M., J.C.D., Executive Coordinator, Canon Law Society of America, Washington, D.C.

Eugene J. Fisher, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States
Conference of Catholic Bishops,
Washington, D.C.

Edward J. Furton, Ph.D., Editor-in-Chief,
The National Catholic Bioethics Quarterly,
Brighton, Massachusetts

James F. Garneau, Ph.D., Academic Dean,
The Pontifical College Josephinum,
Columbus, Ohio

J. A. Wayne Hellmann, O.F.M.Conv., Dr.
Theol., Professor of Theological Studies, St.
Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri

Joseph T. Kelley, Ph.D., D.Min., Director of the Center for Augustinian Study, Merrimack College, North Andover,
Massachusetts

Judith M. Kubicki, C.S.S.F., Ph.D.,
Assistant Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, New York

William P. Loewe, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religion and Religious Education, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Rose M. McDermott, S.S.J., J.C.D., Associate Professor of Canon Law, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

R. Bruce Miller, M.S.L.S., Head,
Theology/Philosophy, Canon Law Libraries,
The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Francis J. Moloney, S.D.B., S.T.L., S.S.L., D.Phil., Professor of Biblical Studies, The Catholic University of America,
Washington, D.C.

Katherine I. Rabenstein, B.S.F.S., Senior Credentialing Specialist, American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Joel Rippinger, O.S.B., M.A., S.T.L., Subprior, Marmion Abbey, Aurora, Illinois

Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

Very Reverend David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D.
President
The Catholic University of America

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his store-room of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research. Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Inter-faith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, “to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace.” The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church’s teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophers contribute to a comprehensive survey of philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler’s Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church’s organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus “New Zealand” precedes “Newman, John Henry,” and “Old Testament Literature” precedes “Oldcastle, Sir John.” Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while “Henry VIII, King of England” precedes “Henry IV, King of France.”

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: “Theology, Articles on,” “Liturgy, Articles on,” “Jesus Christ, Articles on,” etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows: Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad. 3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.

Books

Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1–2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1–2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate)
Gal	Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Jl	Joel
Jn	John
1–3 Jn	1, 2, and 3 John
Jon	Jonah
Jos	Joshua

Jude	Jude
1–2 Kgs	1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1–2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Nm	Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms
1–2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs
Sir	Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1–2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1–2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1–2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah

Versions

Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version

ABBREVIATIONS

ERV	English Revised Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible	NT	New Testament
JB	Jerusalem Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	RSV	Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	RV	Revised Version
NAB	New American Bible	RVm	Revised Version, margin
NEB	New English Bible	Syr	Syriac
NIV	New International Version	Vulg	Vulgate

H

HOLAIND, RENÉ

Educator, author; b. Moulins, France, July 27, 1836; d. Woodstock, Md., April 20, 1906. He entered the Jesuit novitiate at Avignon, France, in 1851 and taught at Avignon and Dôle, France, before immigrating to the U.S. in 1861. After theological studies at Boston College, Mass., and Spring Hill College, Mobile, Ala., he taught for 13 years at Jesuit schools in Alabama and Louisiana and for five years was a parish priest at Selma, Ala. He was professor of ethics at Woodstock College, Woodstock, Md., from 1885 until 1898. After a brief time as a chaplain with the U.S. Army, he taught ethics and jurisprudence at Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., until he retired to Woodstock in 1905. Holaind's interests included music, architecture, and the classics of ancient and modern literature. He published a defense of the right of private property, Ownership and Natural Right (1887), and a textbook on jurisprudence, Natural Law and Legal Practice (1889). During the Catholic controversy in the 1890s over the role of public and parochial schools, he opposed the party led by Abp. John Ireland (see FARI-BAULT PLAN). His strong defense of parochial schools, The Parent First (1891), was probably written at the suggestion of Ireland's opponent, Abp. Michael A. Corrigan of New York. Holaind's critics, condemning his pamphlet as reactionary and attuned to the situation in Europe rather than to American conditions, generally sided with Thomas J. BOUQUILLON of The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., who defended the rights of the state in education.

Bibliography: P. J. DOOLEY, Woodstock and Its Makers (Woodstock, Md. 1927). J. T. ELLIS, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1952) 1:653–707.

[J. J. HENNESEY]

HOLBACH, PAUL HEINRICH DIETRICH

Also known as Paul Thiry, Baron d'Holbach, French encyclopedist; b. Heidesheim in the Palatinate, 1723; d.

Paris, Jan. 21, 1789. Holbach, educated at the University of Leyden, where he pursued his early interests in science, contributed approximately 400 articles to the Encyclopédie. Most of these pertained to science and were merely translations from German texts. Between 1760 and 1770 Holbach published French translations of the writings of several English deists, including passages written by himself but attributed to them. He produced numerous volumes dedicated to the destruction of religion, many attributed on their title page to deceased Frenchmen of note: e.g., Christianisme dévoilé (1761), to N. A. Boulanger; and Essai sur les préjugés (1769), to C. C. Dumarsais. His most widely read work, Système de la nature, ou des Lois du monde physique et du monde moral (1770), published as the work of J. B. Mirabaud, is a systematic explanation of the universe in terms of ATHEISM, MATERIALISM, determinism, and utilitarianism.

See Also: ENCYCLOPEDISTS; DEISM.

Bibliography: C. CAPONE BRAGA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1103–06. V. W. TOPAZIO, D'Holbach's Moral Philosophy (Geneva 1956).

[R. Z. LAUER]

HOLDEN, HENRY

Theologian and controversialist; b. Chagley, Lancashire, England, 1596; d. Paris, March 1662. In 1618 he entered the seminary at Douai under the assumed name of Johnson and he remained there until 1623. Later, as a priest, he studied at the Sorbonne, was awarded the degree of doctor of theology by that institution, and was given a position on the faculty. About the same time, he received an appointment as a vicar-general of the archbishop of Paris. For a while he was superior of the seminary of St. Gregory in Paris, but he was not a success as a financial administrator and in 1655 had to be replaced. In 1659 he was appointed superior of a famous community at Paris known as the "Blue Nuns," whose rule had originally been Franciscan but had been changed to that of the Immaculate Conception of Our Lady.

In the controversy that developed in the 17th century between the regular and secular clergy over the timeliness of having a bishop present in England, Holden was an active supporter of the secular argument. He wrote prominently on the subject, and in 1631 he went to Rome as a representative of the secular position. As a professor at the Sorbonne he could not escape being influenced by Gallican ideas concerning the authority of the pope, but his orthodoxy in relation to the religious controversies of his day, as well as his learning, is attested to by his position and his works, such as Divinae fidei analysis, seu de fidei Christianae resolutione, libri duo . . . (Paris 1652), and his letters concerning the condemned writings of Thomas WHITE, alias Blacklo.

Bibliography: H. TOOTELL, Dodd's Church History of England, ed. M. A. TIERNEY, 5 v. (London 1839–43). J. GILLOW and R. TRAPPES-LOMAX, eds., The Diary of the 'Blue Nuns' or Order of the Immaculate Conception of Our Lady, at Paris. 1658–1810 (London 1910). C. BUTLER, Historical Memoirs Respecting the English, Irish and Scottish Catholics from the Reformation to the Present Time, 4 v. (London 1819–21). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 3:332–339. P. FERET, La Faculté de Théologie de Paris . . . époque moderne, 7 v. (Paris 1900–10) 3:220, 224. J. G. ALGER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 9:1013–14. A. GATARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951– ) 7.1:31–32.

[V. PONKO, JR.]

HOLIDAY, RICHARD, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. in Yorkshire, England; d. May 27, 1590, hanged, drawn, and quartered at Durham. He went to Rheims to study at the English College on Sept. 6, 1584, but was not ordained a priest until 1589. He was arrested and condemned for his priesthood with Bl. Edmund DUKE, Richard HILL, and John HOGG almost immediately upon arrival in England. They were beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HOLINESS

Sanctity, the state or character a thing has by being set apart and specially dedicated to God and His service.

St. Thomas Aquinas made sanctity equivalent to the virtue of religion (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 32.8; see RELIGION, VIRTUE OF), sanctity being the referral by man of his spiritual capabilities to God by the practice of virtue, and religion being the devotion to divine worship by acts of liturgical sacrifice, offerings, prayer, and vows. Among Christian writers the terms holiness and sanctity are sometimes used equivalently with Christian perfection, which consists properly in the development of the virtue of charity (see PERFECTION, SPIRITUAL) and with saintliness or the practice of heroic virtue (see VIRTUE, HEROIC).

St. Thomas used etymological considerations to show that two notions are involved in the idea of sanctity: cleanness (from the Greek equivalent ἄγτος, or the sanguine tinctus suggested by Isidore), and firmness (if the term is seen as derived from sancire). Although the etymological argument here is of dubious value, it cannot be doubted that sanctity embraces both notions. Since sanctity is attributed to what is dedicated to the divine cult, only that can be fitly dedicated to God which is free of all sordidness, and its application to the service of God, the unchangeable First Principle and Last End of all things, should, from the nature of its term, be characterized by immutability and firmness.

Although the term holy may be applied to objects such as churches and to the vessels and vestments used in divine worship, it is properly the characteristic of man.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 81.8. B. H. MERKELBACH, summa theologiae moralis, 3 v. (8th ed. Paris 1949) 2:645–648. D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis (Freiburg-Barcelona 1955) 2:323–327.

[J. D. FEARON]

HOLINESS (IN THE BIBLE)

Holiness is the English word for qōdeš, derived from the Hebrew root qdš, common to all Semitic languages and having essentially the same meaning. The concept of holiness is not established etymologically from the root; it comes from the sense in which its derivatives are used. Hence it signifies “separateness” from the nonholy or profane. What is “clean” or “pure” is also related to “holy” in a ritual sense, i.e., free from defilement by the profane and in a potentially holy state. The profoundest sense of holiness is that proper to God, absolute holiness consisting in His “otherness” or His uncreated transcendence and majesty, a meaning related to His GLORY. Dependent on this is holiness in the cultic and moral senses. In the cultic sense, it is a quality of an object that is withdrawn from the profane and consecrated to God; in the moral sense, it can be ascribed, to God, to angels, or to men.

Holiness in the Old Testament Unlike those religions that attach the term “holy” to cultic objects and seldom to the deity, the OT authors often use it of God.

Sanctity of God. “Holy” in an absolute sense is used exclusively of God’s “otherness” or uncreated and inaccessible majesty in relation to which all else is unholy: “Who shall be able to stand before the Lord, this holy God?” (1 Sm 6.20). The canticles of Moses and of Anna depict God’s holiness as something unattainable and beyond all creatures: “Who is like to you among the gods, O Lord? Who is like to you, magnificent in holiness? O terrible in renown, worker of wonders” (Ex 15.11); “There is none holy as the Lord is; for there is no other besides thee, and there is none strong like our God” (1 Sm 2.2; see also Is 6.3). God’s name is holy, as He Himself is holy: “Let them praise your great and awesome name; holy is he” [Ps 98(99).3; see also Lv 11.44; 19.2; 20.26; Is 40.25; etc.]. In comparison to Him none is holy, neither angels nor men: “If in his holy ones God places no confidence, and if the heavens are not clean in his sight, how much less so is the abominable, the corrupt: man, who drinks in iniquity like water!” (Jb 15.15–16). God’s holiness can be considered as His infinite omnipotence manifesting itself exteriorly in glory: “Deliver us by your wonders, and bring glory to your name, O Lord” (Dn 3.43).

The moral aspect of God’s holiness, which He allows man to share, is totally opposed to man’s sinfulness. This aspect did not evolve only with the Prophets, even though they strongly stressed it. It preceded them and was applied to God in Gn 6.3, 5–7, as well as in the story of Sodom and Gomorra (Gn 18.16–19.29), which was later used by the Prophets (Is 1.9; Jer 49.18; Am 4.11). In His appearance to Moses, God revealed His holiness as opposed to Moses’ sinfulness (Ex 3.5–6); when He made His covenant, He demanded holiness of His “kingdom of priests, a holy nation” (Ex 19.3–7). The Prophets stressed both the moral aspect of God’s holiness, and His holiness in the absolute sense. God’s holiness demands that man be free from sin and share in God’s justice (Is 6.3–7). His holiness is the very reason for the people’s holiness (Lv 19.2). God by His holiness is above sin in spite of the infidelities and sins of His own people (Am 2.7). Because of His sanctity Yahweh abhors sin: “For you, O God, delight not in wickedness; . . . You hate evildoers” (Ps 5.5). The justice of the Holy One of Israel is coupled with redemptive mercy and love: “Fear not, O worm Jacob, O maggot Israel; I will help you, says the Lord; your redeemer is the Holy One of Israel” (Is 41.14; 43.3, 14; Hos 11.9).

Holiness of Men. Man’s holiness finds its reason and norm in that of God: “Be holy, for I, the Lord, your God, am holy” (Lv 19.2; cf. 11.44; 20.26). Yahweh demands holiness of His people, since they are bound to Him by the Covenant. They are to live according to His word, avoiding any contact with pagan idols (Is 52.1). Israel must be holy because Yahweh has made them “a people peculiarly his own” (Dt 7.6).

To safeguard and develop moral holiness, cultic holiness was prescribed. It was the duty of the priest to foster external and material holiness; he was to distinguish the sacred from the profane (Lv 10.10). The priests especially had to be holy. Whoever and whatever was consecrated to God was separate and holy: the NAZIRITES by their vows (Nm 6.1–21); places, like the heavens, God’s abode; the Meeting Tent (Ex 28.43), especially the Holy of Holies (Ex 26.33); certain times, such as the Sabbath (Gn 2.3) and feasts (Ex 12.16; Lv 23.4; etc.).

Holiness in the New Testament. In the NT the ritual or cultic aspect of holiness disappears; what is left is type and figure (Heb 8.5). The emphasis is on the personal, moral aspect of holiness; material objects still have their role, especially in the Sacraments, but on a spiritual level. The NT does use, however, the doctrine and vocabulary of the OT. God is the Holy Father (Jn 17.11); His Name (Lk 1.49), His Law (Rom 7.12), and His Covenant (Lk 1.73) are holy. Holy too are His angels (Mk 8.38), His Prophets (Lk 1.70; Mk 6.20); holy is His new temple, the people of God, and the New Jerusalem (1 Cor 3.17; Rv 21.2). His elect are to be holy (1 Pt 1.15–16). The holiness of His Name ought to be manifested in the coming of His Kingdom (Mt 6.9). Pentecost and the manifestation of the “Holy” Spirit brings the specific holiness of the NT.

Holiness of Christ. Christ’s holiness is based on His divine sonship and the presence of the Spirit of God in Him; He is conceived by the Holy Spirit and will be called the Holy One, the Son of God (Lk 1.35; Mt 1.18). At His Baptism the beloved Son is anointed by the Holy Spirit (Acts 10.38; Lk 3.22). Jesus drives out unholy or unclean spirits from men while they proclaim Him “the Holy One of God” (Lk 5.33–35); Christ manifests Himself through His works, miracles, and signs of His holiness.

As the “holy servant” of God (Acts 4.27, 30), who suffered death even though He was the author of life, He is uniquely consecrated and holy. For this reason God has exalted Him (Phil 2.9); “in keeping with the holiness of his spirit,” by His Resurrection, He is revealed as God’s Son (Rom 1.4). He is not of this world (Jn 17.11). Seated at the right hand of the Father, He is the Holy One, like Yahweh (Rv 3.7). The holiness of Christ is then far beyond that of the holy persons of the OT, and the same as that of His Father. Its manifest effects are the same—spiritual power and miraculous events. He loves His own and communicates to them the glory He received from the Father by sacrificing Himself for them: “They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. Sanctify them in the truth. . . . And for them I sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified in truth. . . . Father, I will that where I am they also whom thou hast given me may be with me; in order that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me, because thou hast loved me before the creation of the world” (Jn 17.16–19, 24).

The Holy Spirit. The term “holy” is used of God primarily because it is His specific function to make the Christian “holy” as He made Christ holy in His conception and His baptism. As the unique possession of the Christian community (Acts 2.4; 4.31), He sanctifies the faithful (Rom 15.16; 2 Thes 2.13); He makes them one in His Spirit’s holiness and unity (Eph 3.16; 4.3–4). His presence is permanent, making Christians “temples of the Holy Spirit,” “temples of God” (1 Cor 6.11, 19–20; 3.16–17); “For whoever are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God” (Rom 8.14); “And because you are sons, God has sent the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying ‘Abba, Father’” (Gal 4.7).

Holiness of Christians. Christians are the new people of God, the worshipping community of the new covenant, the new creation, newly born of water and the Holy Spirit, with a new heart, no longer encumbered with detailed external ritual but worshipping in spirit and truth. They are a “chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a purchased people” (1 Pt 2.9). No longer limited by nationality, the holy people are united through the ministry of Christ (Rom 15.7–12), sanctified in Him (1 Cor 1.2), and in fact, “saints” by vocation (1 Rom 1.7; 15.25). To be holy means to be separated from the world of sin, darkness, and the devil by faith in the Lord Jesus (Acts 26.18), to be “God’s chosen ones, holy and beloved” (Col 3.12), and to inherit the riches of His glory (Eph 1.18).

Upon reception into the new community, personal holiness comes with the forgiveness of sins (1 Cor 6.11) and reconciliation with the Holy One (Rom 5.5–11; 2 Cor 5.18) by means of faith (Rom 3.21–31) and Baptism (Eph 5.25–27). Thus the Christian partakes of Christ’s own holy life, His Passion, Death, and Resurrection: “Do you not know that all who have been baptized into Christ Jesus, have been baptized into his death? . . . just as Christ has risen from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also may walk in newness of life” (Rom 6.3–4). It follows that the Christian must die to sin and live to God in Christ Jesus (Rom 6.11).

Through the Holy Spirit, who is given, the Christian participates in true divine holiness. As a member of the “holy people” and the royal priesthood, a membership making him a temple of God and the Holy Spirit, he renders God true cult in offering himself with Christ a “holy sacrifice”: “I exhort you . . . to present your bodies as a sacrifice, living, holy, pleasing to God—your spiritual service” (Rom 12.1; cf. 15.16; Phil 2.17).

The NT, with its special emphasis on personal purity, has a more spiritual and moral character than OT holiness. In the SERMON on the Mount Jesus proclaims: “Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God” (Mt 5.8). A pure heart is demanded of Christians (1 Tm 1.5; 2 Tm 2.4). Sanctification is the purification in which Christian life consists: “Having therefore these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of the flesh and of the spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God” (2 Cor 7.1).

The vocabulary of holiness indicates the religious quality of the NT concept: ἁγιασμός; is not only the process of becoming holy, but also the state of being holy (Rom 6.19, 22; 1 Thes 4.7; Heb 12.14); ἁγιότης is the state of holiness proper to God that man shares by moral purity [2 Cor 1.12 (variant reading); Heb 12.10]; ἁγιοσύνη is rather the dynamic quality of holiness than a mere state (proper to St. Paul: Rom 1.4; 2 Cor 7.1; 1 Thes 3.13).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1012–18. J. MUILENBURG, The Interpreters’ Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville, Tenn. 1962) 2:616–625. J. HASTINGS and J. A. SELBIA, eds. Dictionary of the Bible (New York 1963) 387–388. X. LÉONDUFOR et al., Vocabulaire de théologie biblique (Paris 1962) 981–987.

[J. LACHOWSKI]

HOLINESS (PAPAL TITLE)

Although only God is holy in the full sense (cf. Mt 19.17), those whom God sanctifies or through whom He mediates Christ’s salvation are derivatively called holy. Thus the HOLINESS OF THE CHURCH refers as much to its function of mediating holiness as to its condition of being holy. As the title holy see, though at first used of sees founded by the Apostles, was later restricted to Rome as the see of Peter, so too the title “His Holiness” has become restricted in Catholic practice to the pope. The use of this title has no bearing on the personal sanctity of the pope.

[B. FORSHAW]

HOLINESS, LAW OF

The body of legislation comprising ch. 17 to 26 of the Book of LEVITICUS was named the Law of Holiness

(Heiligkeitsgesetz) by A. Klostermann in 1877. Though it is rooted in Israelite priestly circles and manifests many traits of the Priestercodex (see PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL), the Law of Holiness has its own distinctive features setting it off from the rest of the Book of Leviticus. The division, the characteristic, and the laws of the Holiness Code are considered in this article.

Division. Like the Covenant (Ex 20.22–23.19) and Deuteronomic (Dt 12–26) Codes, the Code of Holiness has an initial section on sacrifice (Lv 17) and an exhortatory conclusion (26). Regulations regarding moral (18–20) and ritual (21) sanctity, especially as related to sacrifice (22) and festival observance (23), are followed by additional rubrical and moral considerations (24) and by a treatment of the holy years and their social ramifications (25).

Characteristic of the Law of Holiness. The code's most singular characteristic is its stress on holiness. In its original sense of separation or detachment, holiness is proper first to Yahweh, the One utterly transcendent or "wholly other," set apart from the world of men [see HOLINESS (IN THE BIBLE)]. His sacred character is to be respected (22.32) and imitated (20.7, 26; 21.6) by His chosen people. In the exodus from Egypt, Yahweh has separated (sanctified) the Israelites and He always remains the cause of whatever holiness they possess (20.8; 21.15; 22.33). Their election requires that they be completely divorced from the profane or unseemly by the preservation of ritual cleanness and moral rectitude. In this way Israel is to mirror the "otherness" of the Lord.

Laws. Many of the laws in the Holiness Code are of ancient vintage, existing originally in separate form or in small collections as decisions of priests who were attached to one or more sanctuaries. These were preserved and eventually edited by members of the Jerusalem clergy at a date best identified with the final years of the monarchy.

Because of the variety of its laws, the contents of the code do not lend themselves to summarization. The laws in ch. 17, motivated by respect for blood and the desire to eliminate or forestall idolatrous practice, require that all animal slaughter, properly sacrificial or not, be done in the temple area.

The moral laws and sanctions of ch. 18–20 protect the sacredness of the lifegiving act by forbidding sexual commerce within determined degrees of consanguinity and affinity, as well as other forms of promiscuity. The miscellaneous laws in ch. 19 concern worship, justice, chastity, and charity. The mainly ritual content of ch. 21–22 prohibits uncleanness among the priests, lists the norms by which their wives are chosen, excludes from priestly functions those with physical defects, restricts participation in the sacrificial meal, and specifies unacceptable animal offerings.

In its original pre-Exilic form, the liturgical calendar of ch. 23 lists only the three great pilgrimage feasts: the Feast of the PASSOVER, which was held in connection with the Feast of the Unleavened Bread; the Feast of Weeks; and the Feast of BOOTHS (Tabernacles). The later additions, which perhaps contain some ancient elements, concern: the SABBATH, The Feast of the First Sheaf, the Feast of the New Year, the Day of ATONEMENT (Yom Kippur), and a different ritual for the Feast of Booths.

Ritual and moral directives are found in ch. 24: care of the sanctuary light and showbread, blasphemy and its punishment, and the law of retaliation. The Holy Years are treated in ch. 25 (the SABBATH YEAR occurred every 7th year during which the land lay fallow). The JUBILEE YEAR, which occurred every 50th year, was marked by the repossession of ancestral property, remission of debts, and liberation of slaves, in addition to the regular Sabbatical observance.

The curses and blessings concluding the Code in ch. 26 are strikingly similar to those that terminate the Law of Deuteronomy (Dt 28).

Bibliography: S. R. DRIVER, An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (11th ed. rev. and enl. New York 1905; Meridian Book, 1956) 47–59. W. KORNFELD, Studien zum Heiligkeitsgesetz (Vienna 1952).

[R. J. FALEY]

HOLINESS, UNIVERSAL CALL TO

A prominent element in the current resurgence of theological concern for the laity in the Church is the theme of genuine sanctity as meant for everyone. The egalitarian atmosphere of the day was a natural preparation for the emphasis of VATICAN COUNCIL II on the biblical idea of complete holiness to be found in all vocations of life. The doctrine of the universal call is not new in the Church. Early patristic literature commonly assumes that all biblical themes (except radical poverty and dedicated virginity) are meant for all classes of people. However, with the rise of the religious orders many people began to identify the highest reaches of holiness with those persons who renounced property and family for a single-minded pursuit of the kingdom. This popular identification never became part of Catholic teaching, but at the same time the universal call to holiness was not prominent in the ordinary proclamation of the Church in everyday parish life. Yet it was implied in the canonization of lay saints and it was explicit in the liturgical texts. For example, the original Latin text for the feast of St. Teresa of Avila prays that we, all of us, “always be nourished by the food of her heavenly teaching and enkindled by it with the desire for true sanctity,” and on the feast of St. John of the Cross the liturgy prays that we may “imitate him always.” Likewise the declaration of these saints as universal doctors indicates the universal applicability of their teaching. Nonetheless, the popular preaching in typical parishes hardly emphasized the Church’s genuine mind.

Teaching of Vatican Council II. The Council devoted the whole of Chapter 5 in Lumen gentium to the universal call to holiness; this same teaching is also found repeatedly and with a rich diversity of expression in other documents. All the disciples are to be holy and give the witness of a holy life (Lumen gentium 10, 32, 39). The faithful of every condition are called to that perfect holiness by which the Father is perfect (ibid. 11). They have the obligation, not simply an invitation, to strive for the perfection of their own state in life (ibid. 42; Unitatis redintegratio 4), and they are therefore to grow to the mature measure of the fullness of Christ himself (Sacrosanctum Concilium 2). The Council presents Jesus as the author and consummator of the universal call in his teaching that everyone is to be perfect (Mt 5.48) and in the greatest of all commandments addressed to all men, a total love for God with entire heart, soul and mind (Lk 10.27). All the faithful are to practice the spirit of evangelical poverty and therefore to achieve a detachment from this world and its riches (Lumen gentium 42). They are to come to the aid of the poor not only from their superfluities but also from their needed resources, a radical doctrine indeed (Gaudium et spes 69, 88). The Decree on the Laity states that they are consecrated as holy people both to offer spiritual sacrifices in everything and also to witness to Christ throughout the world (Apostolicam actuositatem 3). They too are to progress in holiness through a generous dedication to spreading the kingdom, through meditation on the word of God and through the other spiritual aids available in the Church (ibid. 4; Dei Verbum 25). They are likewise to carry the cross and live the spirit of the beatitudes (Apostolicam actuositatem 4).

This universal call is implied in another conciliar theme, namely, that the Church herself is filled with holiness because she has Christ. He fills the whole body of the Church with the riches of his glory, and so she receives her “full growth in God” (Col 2.19). Because in Jesus resides the fullness of divinity, each of us is to attain our fulfillment in him, not just a partial perfection (Col 2.9). The Ephesians are to be filled with “the utter fullness of God” (Eph 3.19; Lumen gentium 7). Even here on earth the members of the Church are to experience divine mysteries, “the things that are above.” (Ps 34.8; 1 Pt 1.8; 2.3; Lumen gentium 6; Sacrosanctum Concilium 10).

Conciliar teaching also points to a striking, specific theme: each vocation is to be the locus of profound intimacy with God, for the Council assumes mystical prayer to be found in all classes in the Church as a normal development of the grace life. The modern layperson must be concerned with developing the life of contemplation (Gaudium et spes 56, 59); the new creation and genuine holiness are to be found in the laity (Ad gentes 21). The first and most important obligation of lay people is to live a profoundly Christian life (ibid. 36). They as well as all others in the Church pray continually (Sacrosanctum Concilium 12), burn with love during the liturgical celebrations, and taste fully the paschal mysteries (ibid. 10). Active religious no less than the cloistered are assumed to be “thoroughly enriched with mystical treasures” (Ad gentes 18), while all priests are to “abound in contemplation” (Lumen gentium 41). Though all priests and laity can and must seek perfection, yet the former are bound to acquire that perfection under the new title of their configuration to Christ in the Sacrament of Ordination and in their sacred ministry (Presbyterorum ordinis 12). Seminarians are to learn to live in intimate familiarity with the indwelling Trinity (Optatam totius 8) and the entirety of seminary life is to be penetrated with prayerful silence as a preparation for the kind of life priests themselves are to live (ibid. 11). The Council again speaks of mystical experience for all in the Church when it describes all the faithful as growing in understanding divine realities through their contemplation and study and experience of them (Dei Verbum 8). No ecumenical council of the past approaches this last one in the frequency of mention and the strength of what it says about contemplation and mysticism in the Church’s life.

Nature of This Holiness. The universal call does not bear simply on a moral rectitude. According to Scripture it is a transformation, a deification, a revolution, an exchange, a losing of one’s old self to find a new self. It is a being filled with a divine knowledge, love, joy, peace that surpasses understanding (Phil 4.4,7; 1 Pt 1.8). It is a new creation which eye has not seen nor ear heard, nor the heart imagined (1 Cor 2.9). It is an “utter and blissful perfection” to which men come freely (Gaudium et spes 17). It is one and the same holiness in all persons, even though there are differing degrees of it and vocational paths which lead to it (Lumen gentium 41).

By definition holiness is not mediocrity. To speak of the universal call to holiness is to speak of a universal call to saintliness. It is a call to what traditionally has been described as heroic virtue. That man or woman is holy who lives the theological virtues (faith, hope, love) and the moral virtues (humility, fortitude, chastity, justice, patience and the others) to an eminent degree not attainable by human resources alone. The canonized saints are exemplars of this heroic goodness. Their lives are replete with illustrations of the joyous fullness with which men are to live. When the Church canonizes men and women and when she celebrates them in the liturgy and calls for the imitation of their goodness, she is reiterating the universal call to holiness. What this universal call means in the concrete can also be seen in the mystic's description of the transformation that occurs in the person who has grown to the highest development of prayerful contemplation. St. John of the Cross describes traits of this growth: one loves God in everything; his excessive impulses disappear; his emotions are peaceful and he loses useless desires; he enjoys an undisturbable peace and a habitual joy in the divine presence; his actions are "bathed in love" and are done with an amazing strength; his union with God is as the union of a candle flame with the sun.

Implications. Both Scripture and Vatican Council II make it clear that there is only one way to complete holiness, a way to which all men and women are invited. It is a way that has active and passive elements, ascetical and mystical developments. However, both Scripture and Vatican II (as well as the Council of Trent) do teach that there are different vocational paths leading to the one holiness and that those paths differ in effectiveness. Virginitly consecrated to Christ more easily enables one to give the Lord undivided attention, to pursue the radical demands of the kingdom (1 Cor 7.32–35; Lk 18.29–30; Op-tatam totius 10). The Church does not say that a given religious is superior in holiness to a given married person, but she does say that the radical surrender of all that the world yearns for is a privileged, superior way of life because it bestows an immense freedom from impediments to achieving the "one thing necessary."

The holiness to which all are called is ecclesial and objective, not simply individual and subjective. The universal call includes the objective call and obligation to enter and remain in the Catholic Church which Christ has made necessary for salvation (Lumen gentium 14). It is true that the Holy Spirit does operate with his sanctifying power outside the boundaries of the Church (ibid. 15) and that he can lead to holiness those in good faith. Yet in objective fact one may not try to separate adherence to Christ from adherence to his Church: "he who hears you, hears me; he who rejects you, rejects me" (Lk 10:16).

The diverse spiritualities in the Church (religious—and its kinds—married, priestly, charismatic, etc.) include all elements of evangelical holiness; they are characterized by differing emphases and life styles, but all lead to the one holiness.

Bibliography: Paul VI, Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., July 17, 1975, 1; Oct. 16, 1975, 10. K. TRUHLAR, J. SPLETT and K. HEMMERLE, Encyclopedia of Theology 635–641. T. DUBAY, Authenticity (Denville, N.J. 1977).

[T. DUBAY]

HOLINESS CHURCHES

The holiness spirit in Protestantism stems from the teaching of John WESLEY, who believed there were two stages in the process of justification: freedom from sin and sanctification or the second blessing. With the decline of strictly Wesleyan principles among American METHODISTS, groups of perfectionists were organized to preserve and foster the idea of holiness as an essential part of the Methodist tradition. About 30 denominations in the U.S. qualify as Holiness bodies, even though the term does not appear in their official names.

One of the earliest Holiness groups was founded in 1860 as the Free Methodist Church of North America. The largest Holiness body in America is the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, established in 1908 by a merger of the PENTECOSTAL, Nazarene, and Holiness Churches. In 1919 the word "Pentecostal" was dropped from the name to disclaim any connection with the more radical forms of the movement. Moreover, none of six affiliated colleges and one seminary retained "Holiness" in its title although the basic emphasis on perfectionism did not change. A typically conservative group is the PILGRIM HOLINESS CHURCH, organized in 1897 to restore primitive Wesleyan doctrine on "apostolic practices, methods, power and success."

The pattern of Holiness theology is fundamentalist, which entails acceptance of Christ's divinity, the virgin birth, substitutionary atonement through Christ's death, and final resurrection from the dead. More specifically, Holiness Churches may be characterized by five main features, which, taken collectively, identify this form of modern Protestantism. 1. Besides justification, which is a sense of security that past sins are forgiven, there is a "second blessing" in which the faithful Christian feels himself close to God. 2. There is an emotional experience produced in the heart by a direct action of the Holy Spirit. Although instantaneous, the "second blessing" may require years of preparation. It may be lost and regained and may be increased in efficacy, but there is no mistaking the presence of the Spirit when He comes. More extreme sects identify the Spirit's coming with the infusion of extraordinary gifts, such as speaking with tongues or sudden healing. The milder Holiness churches recognize the Spirit by an exalted feeling, inner impression, bodily emotion, and a deepened sense of awareness of God's loving kindness. 3. As a group, Holiness bodies depreciate the teachings and practices of the larger denominations for having abandoned the true faith and for compromising with modernism. Their theology is literally biblical. 4. The favorite method of preaching is the popular revival, always for making converts; and often REVIVALISM is the essence of a Holiness denomination. 5. Most Holiness churches profess, without always stressing, the early Second Coming of Christ, which is to inaugurate a millennium of earthly peace and happiness before the last day.

The Holiness movement in the U.S. is a fluctuating phenomenon. After the Civil War and until the early 20th century, perfectionist churches came into existence in the westward drive of the Methodist circuit riders. Since then the emphasis has changed. Instead of perfectionism, it is now pentecostalism that holds sway. In the same basic tradition, the latest development shows a reaction against the cold formalism and bureaucracy of established churches, in favor of a more spontaneous (if extreme) religious experience.

Bibliography: J. B. CHAPMAN, The Nazarene Primer (Kansas City, Mo. 1955). C. T. CORBETT, Our Pioneer Nazarenes (Kansas City, Mo. 1958). J. L. PETERS, Christian Perfection and American Methodism (Nashville 1956). T. L. SMITH, Called unto Holiness (Kansas City, Mo. 1962); Revivalism and Social Reform in Mid-Nineteenth-Century America (Nashville 1957).

[J. A. HARDON]

HOLINESS OF GOD

Biblical Basis. In the Old Testament God identifies himself as “the Holy One” (Is 40:25; Jer 50:29). As holy God transcends the world contaminated by sin, and yet the places where he reveals himself become holy places, and thus the place where God appeared to Moses in the burning bush is designated “holy ground” (Ex 3:5). To experience God, as did Isaiah, is to experience above all his holiness and one’s own sinfulness, for the eternal angelic hymn that resounds eternally is “Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God of host.” (Is 6:3, Rev 4:8). The innermost sanctuary where the Holy God abides, hidden by a curtain that separates him from humankind contaminated by sin and so not holy, is designated the Holy of Holies. As holy God cannot sin (1 Sm 2:2; Jb 4:17; 25:5). Rather he has an absolute hatred for sin (Ps 5:5; 44/45:8). He takes vengeance on crime (Ez 28:22; 38:22); He makes his righteousness appear among the enemies of Israel (Jgs 4:15; 7:22; Ps 82/83.10–12). Positively, the Old Testament reveals God’s holiness as the reason and norm for man’s holiness (Lv 11:44; 19:2; 20:26), and God demands it of men (Jos 24:19; Dt 7:6; Is 63:18; Jer 2:3). God makes a covenant with his people precisely to make them like himself, holy. “You shall be holy to me; for I the Lord am holy, and have separated you from the peoples, that you should be mine” (Lv 20:26). God “will vindicate his holiness” by cleansing his people of their sin and by placing within them his very own Spirit” (Ez 36:22–36). In contrast to the god of Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy, whose transcendence protects him from being contaminated by the world of evil and material change, God in the Old Testament reveals that he comes in contact with humankind so as to make it holy. This is most dramatically seen within the Incarnation. The holy Son of God assumes (touches) sinful human flesh so as to purge it of sin and so make it holy. From all eternity the Father chose us in Christ “to be holy and blameless before him,” that is, to be holy sons as his Son is holy (Eph 1:3–5). The first gift of salvation, won through the cross, is the Holy Spirit by whom all who believe and are baptized are conformed into the likeness of Christ and so made holy children of the Father (Rom 8:14–17, Gal 4:4–7). Christians are holy because they are consecrated to God and so participate in divine holiness (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1; 2 Pt 2:21; 1 Jn 3:1–3). Their very own bodies are the new temples of God where the Holy Spirit abides (1 Cor 3:16–17; 6:19). Thus they are newly called to be holy because God is holy (1 Pt 1:15–16; 2:9; Rev 4:8; 15:4).

Christian Tradition. The holiness of God is defined both positively and negatively. Negatively, it specifies that God in himself is devoid of all evil both in thought and action. Sin and evil are completely absent from God and it is completely impossible for him to turn away from his own perfect goodness. Nor can anything deprive God of his holiness for nothing can deprive him of his infinite perfection. God hates what is evil and sinful for such are completely contrary and opposed to his holiness. Positively, God’s holiness entails his complete perfection, especially that of his goodness and love. God is goodness itself and the very nature of God is to love the goodness that he is as well as the good that resides in what he creates and recreates through grace. Because God’s very nature is to be eternally all-perfect and unchangeable in his goodness and love, he is substantially or ontologically holy. The human response to such holiness does not reside primarily in knowing it, but in prostrating oneself in awe, reverence, praise, and holy fear before the all-holy God. As all-holy, God is the exemplar of holiness and only he can make holy (Mt 5:48). “He who called you is holy, be holy yourselves in all your conduct; since it is written, ‘You shall be holy for I am holy’” (1 Pt 1:15–16; Lv 11:44–45).

The Christian tradition has also consistently interpreted the angelic hymn in Isaiah 6:3 and Revelation 4:8

as referring to the three divine persons of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit (Athanasius, The Incarnation of the Word of God and Against the Arians, 10; Augustine, Letter 55.29). This tradition finds its expression within the Sanctus at Mass. God, as an eternal trinity of co-equal persons, is thrice holy and therefore perfect in holiness.

See Also: HOLINESS; HOLINESS (IN THE BIBLE); INEFFABILITY OF GOD; JUSTICE OF GOD; SACRED AND PROFANE; GOD, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: D. P. WRIGHT, "Holiness (OT)," The Anchor Bible Dictionary, v.3, ed. D. N. FREEDMAN (New York 1992) 237–49. R. HODGSON, JR., "Holiness (NT)," The Anchor Bible Dictionary, v.3, 249–54. R. OTTO, The Idea of the Holy (Oxford 1950). D. NICHOLL, Holiness (London 1996). P. SHELDRAKE, Images of Holiness: Explorations in Contemporary Spirituality (London 1987).

[T. G. WEINANDY]

HOLINESS OF THE CHURCH

Among the marks of the Church the oldest ascribed to it is holiness. In the Apostles Creed, whose origin is rooted in the 1st or 2nd century after Christ, is found: "I believe in the Holy Ghost, the holy catholic church, the communion of saints . . . ." Actually, Scripture gives the basis for this designation, for in the New Testament the Greek word for Church—ἐκκλησία—signifies the assembly of God. It refers to the calling out or selecting by God of His holy ones (Rom 1.7; Eph 1.4). These are to be erected by God into a holy living temple, His Church (Eph 2.19–21; see CHURCH, ARTICLES ON).

Cause of Church's Holiness. Only God is essentially holy (see HOLINESS OF GOD). Creatures can only reflect or share His inimitable holiness. The Church is holy precisely because it is the bride of Christ, called into existence by God in order to manifest the divine holiness in an increasing manner in time through the gradual incorporation of all creation within its holy unity. This fundamental statement indicates the four-fold special relationship to God that makes the Church holy. First, in and through Christ the Church has received from the Father the holy mission to sanctify all men (Mt 28.16–20; Mk 16.15–16). Second, in and through the redeeming actions of Christ, God has given the Church its essential structure—hierarchy of persons, doctrine, sacramental rites—and the sanctifying efficacy of its essential activity. Third, the all-holy God dwells within individual members (see INDWELLING, DIVINE) and in the Church as a whole (Jn 14.16, 23–24, 26; Mt 28.20; 1 Cor 3.16–17; 6.19–20; Eph 2.19–22). Fourth, the Church is a virgin bride (2 Cor 11.2), worthy of her lord, and living in perfect fidelity (Lumen gentium 6, 9). Although individuals fail, the Church itself never fails in the integrity of its faith, hope, and love. Through the gifts in her members she is a spouse adorned for her husband (Rv 21.2; Perfectae caritatis 1).

Temporal Realization of the Church's Holiness.

In the present age the Church can be said to be holy in two senses. First, the Church is the aggregate of things and persons constituted by God in Christ as the great visible sign through which the divine holiness is imparted to men. God has so wedded Himself to the essential structure and activity of the Church that through them He continuously sanctifies the world. Thus, the Church is holy because it is the means of holiness. It "is spotless in the Sacraments, by which it gives birth to and nourishes its children; in the faith which it has always preserved inviolate; in its sacred laws imposed on all; in the evangelical counsels which it recommends; in those heavenly gifts and extraordinary graces through which, with inexhaustible fecundity, it generates hosts of martyrs, virgins, and confessors" (Pius XII Mystici Corporis, par. 65). Thus, the great ecclesial activities are continuously impregnated with the holiness-making power of God. Members become holy by allowing God to sanctify them through these activities.

Second, the Church is holy in that its members actually possess a participation in the divine holiness. "You . . . are a chosen race . . . a holy nation, a purchased people; that you may proclaim the perfections of him who has called you out of darkness into his marvellous light" (1 Pt 2.9). God wills that there be holiness in varying degrees in the members of the Church. He willed that Jesus Christ, as head of the Church, be substantially holy (see HYPOSTATIC UNION); He willed that Mary, Blessed Virgin, be the full and totally human realization of the holiness possible in the Church; and He wills that in every age in varying degrees saints shall concretely manifest aspects of that one holiness coming from God in Christ. Though this holiness is essentially internal by GRACE, it is willed by God to be manifested externally; and in every age the great saints supremely manifest this holiness, thus constituting in their persons the apologetic mark of holiness by which the true Church can be recognized. Moreover, not only is the Church holy in its members but also all true holiness that is in the world—even the holiness of those who know not the Church—is ordained to the Church so that outside the Church (or apart from the Church) there is no holiness and no SALVATION (see SALVATION, NECESSITY OF THE CHURCH FOR).

Paradoxically the Church is holy and yet needing to be purified and renewed (Lumen gentium 8; Unitatis redintegratio 6). Failure of the members to live fervently dims the radiance of the Church's image in the world (ibid. 4) and so her sanctity, while real, is imperfect on earth (Lumen gentium 48). It is a growing holiness, for the Holy Spirit purifies and renews her ceaselessly (ibid. 3, 5; Sacrosanctum Concilium 2; Gaudium et spes 21). Yet at the same time the Church is the “spotless spouse of the spotless Lamb” and “indefectibly holy” (Lumen gentium 6, 39).

Eternal Fulfillment of Church’s Holiness. While time lasts, the holiness of the Church will be imperfectly realized. The Blessed Virgin excepted, all members of the earthly Church resist to some extent the active sanctifying power of God working in the ecclesiastical body. Thus, they are sinners, not because of the Church, but because of their free-willed capacity to resist the sanctifying efficacy of the Church’s activity. However, at the end of time the holiness of the Church will reach completion. The visible elements through which God sanctifies men in the temporal Church—the priesthood, Sacraments, teaching authority—will be replaced by the direct sanctification of God in the BEATIFIC VISION. This ultimate realization of the Church’s holiness—a social holiness that will encompass every fiber of men’s beings and will be reflected even in the renewed material creation (Rom 8.18–21)—is described in imagery in Revelation. The Church triumphant is pictured as the Holy City coming down from God (21.2), as the dwelling place of God with men (21.3), as the new Jerusalem that has no need of a temple because God Himself and His Son constitute the real temple thereof (21.22), as the city from which all evil and evil-doers have been banished (21.8, 27).

See Also: MIRACLE, MORAL (THE CHURCH); MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 14.1:841–860. F. HOFMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:128–129. C. JOURNET, L’Église du Verbe Incarné, 2 v. (Bruges 1954–62) 2:893–934; Théologie de l’Église (Bruges 1958) 235–263. M. SCHMAUS, Katholische Dogmatik (Munich 1953–59) 3.1:630–638. Y. M. J. CONGAR, The Mystery of the Temple, tr. R. F. TREVETT (Westminster, Md. 1962). J. JUNGSMANN, “The Holy Church,” The Church: Readings in Theology (New York 1963) 30–39. F. MALMBERG, Ein Leib - Ein Geist: Vom Mysterium der Kirche, tr. R. E. TORFS (Freiburg 1960). Y. DE MONTCHEUIL, Aspects of the Church, tr. A. J. LAMOTHE (Chicago 1955). O. PROCKSCH, in Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. G. KITTEL, tr. and ed. G. W. BROMILEY (Grand Rapids 1964) 1:105–110. K. RAHNER, Schriften zur Theologie, 5 v. (Einsiedeln 1954–62) 3:111–126. W. J. BURGHARDT, “A Holy Church,” Way 3 (1963) 22–31. B. KLOPPENBURG, Ecclesiology of Vatican II (Chicago 1974); R. LAWLER, D. WUERL, and T. LAWLER, The Teaching of Christ (Huntington, Ind. 1976) 196–200.

[P. F. CHIRICO/T. DUBAY]

HOLLAZ, DAVID

Lutheran theologian and dogmatician; b. Wulkow, near Stargard, Pomerania, 1648?; d. Jakobshagen, Pomerania, April 17, 1713. Hollaz (Hollatz or Hollatius) studied at Erfurt and Wittenberg and held the following ecclesiastical positions: preacher at Putzerlin near Stargard (1670), preacher at Stargard (1681), assistant rector at Stargard (1683), rector at Colberg (1684), and pastor at Jakobshagen (1692–1713). His principal work is his Examen theologicum acroamaticum (Rostock and Leipzig 1717), which is considered the last of the great textbooks of the period of Lutheran orthodoxy, despite its considerable modification by growing Pietistic (see PIETISM) influences. It is the last of the strict Lutheran attempts at systematizing dogma. Although Hollaz does not mention Pietism as such, it is obvious from his ardent refutation of mysticism that he was aware of its development. The work owes its reputation not to originality but to the clearness of its definitions and the excellence of its arrangements, and to its prevailing devotional spirit. In addition to a collection of sermons, his published works include Scrutinium veritatis in mysticorum dogmata (Wittenberg 1711) and Ein gottgeheiligt dreifaches Kleeblatt, or Leidender Jesus (1713).

Bibliography: J. C. ERDMANN, Lebensbeschreibungen und literarische Nachrichten von den wittenbergischen Theologen (Wittenberg 1804). F. A. G. THOLUCK, Der Geist der lutherischen Theologen Wittenbergs (Hamburg 1852). E. WOLF, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3: 433–434.

[C. J. BERSCHNEIDER]

HOLLIS, (MAURICE) CHRISTOPHER

Writer, editor, politician; b. Axbridge, England, March 2, 1903; d. Mells, Somerset, England, May 6, 1977. His father, Anglican bishop of Taunton, England, had been headmaster of Wells Theological College; his mother was a writer of Anglican histories and stories which continue to command an audience. Hollis went to Eton on scholarship and, while there, won further scholarships to Oxford. As a student at the university (Balliol College), he fell under the influence of Bernard Shaw, and, especially, of Belloc and Chesterton. During his last year at Oxford, at 22, he became a Catholic. He next took part in an extended debating tour as a member of the Oxford Union in company with Douglas Woodruff and Malcolm McDonald, visiting the United States, New Zealand, and Australia. For the ten years following, 1925–35, he was an instructor at Stonyhurst, a Jesuit college in Lancashire.

His first book, The American Heresy (1930), about assorted American political figures, belongs to this period, as do his Thomas More (1934), St. Ignatius (1931), and The Monstrous Regiment (1930) on Queen Elizabeth and her times. His next two books marked the economic phase of his miscellaneous interests. On the Breakdown of Money (1937) and The Two Nations (1935) were effects of the influence on his mind of McNair Wilson, then a correspondent of the Times. These led to his "American period," 1935–39, when he was lecturing in economics at the University of Notre Dame. These years also saw the appearance of a series of letters on foreign issues of the day: Foreigners Aren't Fools; Foreigners Aren't Knaves; and We Aren't So Dumb. The war brought him back to England. After a term as instructor at Downside Abbey School, he entered the Royal Air Force. By a rather unusual arrangement, he worked as an intelligence officer by night, and supervised the Catholic publishing house, Burns & Oates by day. Somehow, at the same time, he wrote his most successful work, Death of a Gentleman (1945).

At war's end, Hollis joined with Douglas Jerrold, who had brought Hollis into Burns & Oates, in forming a company, Hollis and Carter, for the publication of books on education. This also was the political phase of his life; he became the Conservative member of parliament for Devizes, held the seat for ten years, and then gave it up, undefeated. As an MP he had played a part in the abolition of capital punishment for murder. In his last years he joined the Liberal Party. From 1936 until his death, he was a director of the London Tablet and up to a few weeks before his death, he contributed numerous signed articles and reviews to that publication. Meanwhile he was a regular contributor to the obituary columns of the London Times. For years, under Malcolm Muggeridge, he was on the board of Punch, writing a parliamentary sketch.

His literary output, mostly Catholic in character, was very extensive. Among his better known works are Erasmus (Milwaukee 1933); Lenin (Milwaukee 1938); G.K. Chesterton (London 1950); Evelyn Waugh (London and New York 1954); The Achievements of Vatican II (New York 1967); Newman and the Modern World (New York 1968); and The Mind of Chesterton (Coral Gables, Fla. 1970).

Bibliography: Tablet (London), May 14, 1977, 466–467; Times (London), May 9, 1977, 16.

[P. F. MULHERN]

HOLLWECK, JOSEF

Canonist; b. Pfaffenhofen (Bavaria), Jan. 16, 1854; d. Eichstätt, March 10, 1926. He was ordained in 1879, and from 1892 until his death he was professor of Canon Law at the episcopal lyceum in Eichstätt. On occasion he also gave courses in homiletics, patrology, cataphetics, and Church history. In 1906 he became dean of the cathedral chapter of Eichstätt. He was particularly active as a consultant in the codification of Canon Law. Although the author of a number of historical works, he is noted especially for his works on Canon Law, which include Die kirchlichen Strajgesetze (Mainz 1899), Das kirchliche Bücherverbot (Mainz 1897), Das Testament des Geistlichen (Mainz 1901), and Lehrbuch des kath. Kirchenrechts (Mainz 1900; ed. P. Hergenröther in 1905).

Bibliography: M. RACKL, Jahrbücher der Bischof philosophischtheologisch Hochschule (Eichstätt 1926) 6–9. A. BRIDE, Catholicisme 5:822–823. J. LEDERER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:456.

[E. LEWIS]

HOLOCAUST

The OT sacrifice in which the offering, preferably an unblemished male animal, was wholly burnt on the altar in worship of Yahweh. Due to the notion in postexilic theology that this sacrifice had propitiatory value, laws concerning holocausts dominated cultic legislation of the Pentateuchal priestly writers. The Hebrew term for holocaust, ‘ôlâ (literally, "that which goes up," i.e., in smoke), is regularly translated in the Septuagint (LXX) by the noun ὄλοκαύτωμα (literally "complete burning"); from the related verbal adjective ὄλοκαυστος (completely burnt) the English word holocaust is derived. This sacrifice is referred to also as kālîl, "total" sacrifice (Dt 33.10) and ‘ôlâ kālîl, "total burnt-offering" [1 Sm 7.9; Ps 50(51).21]. The prescriptions of the Priestly Code concerning the material and ceremonies of the holocaust are given in Lv 1.3–17, while the duties of the officiating priest are treated in Lv 6.8–13. Acceptable victims for the holocaust had to be unblemished males from the herd or flock (Lv 1.3), although, as a concession, pigeons or doves could be offered by the poor (Lv 5.7; 12.8; 14.22). After the laying on of hands, the victim was slaughtered, cut up, and laid on the altar, and the blood was poured around the altar; the whole victim (except the hide) was then burned up "as a sweet-smelling oblation to the Lord" (Lv 1.13, 17). The Levitical liturgy made extensive use of holocausts, prescribing its offering every morning and evening in the Temple of Jerusalem (Nm 28.3), with additional holocausts on days of the Sabbath (Nm 28.9–10), the Feast of Booths (Lv 23.36), and New Year's Day (Nm 29.2), as well as on special occasions, such as purification after childbirth (Lv 12.6–8), cure of leprosy (Lv 14.10–13), and consecration of the high priest (Lv 8.18). Holocaust is an act principally of homage expressed through total sacrifice to God. An expiatory value beyond that of other sacrifices was later attributed to the holocaust (Lv 1.4). The only NT references to holocaust are citations from the LXX (Mk 12.33; Heb 10.6, 8).

Jews captured during the Warsaw ghetto uprising are lead by Waffen SS. for deportation. (National Archives/USHMM Photo Archives)

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 415–417. G. B. GRAY, Sacrifice in the O.T. (Oxford 1925). W. O. E. OESTERLEY, Sacrifices in Ancient Israel (London 1937).

[J. B. FREUND]

HOLOCAUST (SHOAH)

The Holocaust (Shoah, Hebrew for “catastrophe”) refers to the carefully planned genocide of the Jewish people by the Nazis, the “Final Solution,” from 1933–45. It is the most extreme form of racism the world had known until then. The Holocaust differs from other mass murders and forms of brutality in the motivation of the perpetrators (the destruction of a human group for no other reason than that it was considered subhuman in Nazi racist ideology) and the means used (a long process of extreme dehumanization, culminating in gas chambers and death camps). Only with the total defeat of Germany at the end of World War II (May 1945) did the slaughter come to an end. By that time nearly 6,000,000 Jews were dead, among them more than one million children, and Europe’s ancient Jewish communities had vanished forever. The Nuremberg War Crimes Trial, conducted by the Allies after the war, were an attempt to punish the criminals.

The Holocaust can be divided into two periods: from Hitler’s rise to power (Jan. 30, 1933) to the outbreak of World War II in Europe (Sept. 1, 1939), during which time the foundations were laid for the eventual destruction of the Jews; and the wartime period.

Using “legal” means, the German government passed a body of legislation that defined a Jew (anyone with three Jewish grandparents), and progressively excluded Jews from civic life. They were deprived of citizenship and all constitutional rights, becoming pariahs. Emigration was still possible in those years, but was made difficult by the severe restrictions imposed by the Nazis and by the reluctance of the free world to take in large numbers of Jews. Adolf Eichmann was the Nazi official in charge of emigration (he was brought to trial by the Israeli government in 1961 and executed).

With the outbreak of war escape became almost impossible. The German government then developed an intricate machinery of destruction, which was constantly “refined” by modern technology. The shooting of hundreds of thousands of Jews at the Russian front by the Mobile Killing Units (Einsatzgruppen) soon proved too slow and inefficient, and was replaced in 1942 by gas chambers and death camps. The largest of these was Auschwitz-Birkenau. A network of concentration, labor, and death camps covered Nazi-occupied Europe. The destruction was greatest in eastern Europe: in Poland alone 3,000,000 Jews perished.

The Holocaust became one of the dominant events of Jewish consciousness. The savagery and extent of the genocide prompted some Jewish and non-Jewish thinkers alike, led by concentration camp survivor Elie Wiesel, to ask whether it is possible to do theology after the Holocaust. Christian reflection on the Holocaust in the second half of the 20th century focused on two points: the theological meaning of the event and Christian responsibility for its occurrence.

Church Statements. In 1975 the Commission for Religious Relations with Jews, established by Pope Paul VI, published a series of “guidelines and suggestions” for implementing Vatican II’s Declaration on Non-Christian Religions, Nostra aetate. According to the Commission, “the memory of the persecution and massacre of Jews which took place in Europe just before and during the Second World War” provided the historical context for the section dealing with Judaism (n. 4) in that document. In 1985 the same Commission issued “Notes on the correct way to present the Jews and Judaism in preaching and catechesis in the Roman Catholic Church.” After stating that “the permanence of Israel (while so many ancient peoples have disappeared without trace) is a historic fact and a sign to be interpreted within God’s design,” the Commission directs that catechesis should “help in understanding the meaning for the Jews of the extermination during the years 1939–1945” (n. 25).

In June 1979, Pope John Paul II visited Auschwitz (Oswiecim), the site where millions of Polish Jews perished. He recalled that visit in several public declarations. In an address to the United Nations Assembly, Oct. 2, 1985, he contrasted the U.N. Declaration on Human Rights with the contempt for fundamental rights evident in Auschwitz and similar “extermination” camps scattered over the continent of Europe. “This declaration,” he said, “was paid for by millions of our brothers and sisters at the cost of their suffering and sacrifice, brought by the brutalization that darkened and made insensitive the human consciences of their oppressors and of those who carried out a real genocide.” On his visit to Rome’s main synagogue in April, 1986, again recalling his visit to Auschwitz, he expressed “abhorrence for the genocide decreed against the Jewish people during the last war, which led to the holocaust of millions of innocent victims.” Speaking of the “terrible reality of the extermination—the unconditional extermination—of your people, and extermination carried out with premeditation” to Jewish leaders in Warsaw in June of 1987, the pope stated: “I think that today the people of Israel, perhaps more than ever before, finds itself at the center of the attention of the nations of the world, above all because of this terrible experience, through which you have become a loud warning voice for all humanity. More than any else, it is precisely you who have become this saving warning. I think that in this sense you continue your particular vocation, showing yourselves to be still the heirs of that election to which God is faithful. This is your mission in the contemporary world before the peoples, the nations, all of humanity, the Church. And in this Church all peoples and nations feel united to you in this mission. . . . In your name, the pope, too, lifts up his voice in this warning.”

An anti-Semitic campaign poster from Germany in 1933 for the Nazis reads: “Do you wish to be free? (From Jewish Domination) Then vote the Nationalist Block!” (©CORBIS)

Park Bench in Berlin, reads “Nicht für Juden (Not for Jews),” 1945. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

Receiving the first ambassador to the Vatican of the newly reunited Germany, the Polish pope raised with him “the tragedy of the Jews. For Christians the heavy burden of guilt for the murder of the Jewish people must be an enduring call to repentance; thereby we can overcome every form of anti-Semitism and establish a new relationship with our kindred nation of the Ancient Covenant.” “Guilt,” he reminded Christians, “should not oppress and lead to self-agonizing thoughts, but must always be the point of departure for conversion.”

The pope’s call for universal Christian repentance for the role of Christian teaching in preparing the way for the Shoah, and for the involvement of so many Christians in actually perpetrating it, led in the mid-1990s to a series of statements on the Church and the Shoah by bishop conferences throughout Europe as well as the U.S. These culminated in the 1998 document of the Holy See’s Commission, We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah. The document concluded by expressing the Church’s “deep sorrow for the failures of her sons and daughters in every age” and identified this as “an act of repentance (teshuvah), since, as members of the Church we are linked with the sins as well as the merits of her children.”

During the Jubilee Year, the pope led a Liturgy of Repentance in which he articulated the Church’s sorrow over seven major categories of pervasive Christian sin over the centuries. One was devoted entirely to contrition for sins against the Jews, including, as a statement of the International Theological Commission issued days before the liturgy explained, guilt for the sins of omission and commission by Catholics on all levels of the Church’s life during the Holocaust. In March of that year the pope made the first extensive visit by a pope to Israel. He visited Yad VaShem, Israel’s memorial to the six million victims of the Holocaust, prayed there and met with a group of survivors which included people from his own home town in Poland. Finally, he went to the Western (or Wailing) Wall, the last remnant of the Jerusalem Temple.

Main entrance to the Auschwitz camp of Auschwitz-Birken, the largest concentration and extermination camp in operation during World War II. The sign overhead translates to "Work will make you free," Auschwitz, Poland. (©Michael St. Maur Sheil/CORBIS)

There, like millions of humble Jews before him, he prayed and placed a prayer of petition to the God of Israel in a crack between the gigantic stones of the wall. The prayer reiterated the pope's prayer for forgiveness from the liturgy of repentance at the Vatican.

A 2001 statement by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Catholic Teaching on the Shoah: Implementing "We Remember," interpreted the Vatican document for American Catholics. The document makes clear the distinction and connectedness between the traditional Christian teaching of contempt and the modern, racial anti-Semitism of pagan Nazi ideology: "Christian anti-Judaism did lay the groundwork for racial, genocidal anti-Semitism by stigmatizing not only Judaism but Jews themselves for opprobrium and contempt. So the Nazi theories tragically found fertile soil in which to plant the horror of an unprecedented attempt at genocide. One way to put the "connectedness" between the Christian teaching of anti-Judaism (leading to anti-Jewishness) and Nazi anti-Semitism is that the former is a "necessary cause" to consider in explaining the development and success of the latter in the 20th century, but not a "sufficient cause." To account for the Holocaust, one must acknowledge the historical role of Christian anti-Judaism. But Christian anti-Judaism alone cannot account for the Holocaust. Semi-scientific racial theories and specific historical, ideological, economic, and social realities within Germany must also be taken into account to begin grappling with why Nazism succeeded in mobilizing virtually the entire intellectual and technological apparatus of a modern industrial state to its warped purpose of eliminating from human history God's People, the Jews."

Bibliography: Encyclopedia Judaica, v. 8, "Holocaust" (a lengthy article dealing with many major aspects of the Holocaust). N. LEVIN, The Holocaust (New York 1974). D. WYMAN, The Abandonment of the Jews (New York 1984). Non-Jews who tried to save Jews: C. RITTNER and S. MYERS, The Courage to Care (New York

Edith Stein, a Carmelite nun who was killed at Auschwitz after she refused to renounce her Jewish heritage. She was canonized by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 11, 1998. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

1986). Y. SUHL, They Fought Back (New York 1967). E. WIESEL, Night (New York 1958). E. FLANNERY, The Anguish of the Jews, (rev. ed. Mahwah, N.J. 1985). E. FISHER and L. KLENICKI, eds., Spiritual Pilgrimage: Pope John Paul II on Jews and Judaism 1979–1995 (New York 1995). J. M. SANCHEZ, Pius XII and the Holocaust: Understanding the Controversy (Washington, D.C. 2001). Yad Vashem located on the outskirts of Jerusalem, contains extensive archives and a museum, as does the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

[E. FLEISCHNER/E. FISHER/EDS.]

HOLTZMANN, HEINRICH JULIUS

The leading NT scholar of the liberal school of his time in Germany; b. Karlsruhe, June 17, 1832; d. Baden-Baden, Oct. 4, 1910. Holtzmann taught at Heidelberg from 1858 to 1874 and at Strassburg from 1874 to 1904. He was an influential scholar and teacher of unusual versatility and productivity. The most important of his numerous works are Kanon und Tradition (Ludwigsburg 1859); Die synoptischen Evangelien (Leipzig 1863); Die Pastoralbriefe (Leipzig 1880); Lehrbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das NT (Freiburg 1885; 3d ed. 1892); and Lehrbuch der neutest. Theologie (Freiburg and Tübingen 1896–97; 2d ed. 1911), his masterpiece. In the series Hand-Commentar zum NT, which he founded and which he edited together with R. A. Lipsius, P. W. Schmiedel, and H. von Soden, he himself wrote Die synopt. Evangelien (Freiburg 1889; 3d ed. 1901), Die Apostelgeschichte (Freiburg 1891; 3d ed. 1901), and Die johanneischen Schriften (Freiburg 1891; 3d ed., ed. W. Bauer 1908). He was also the editor of volumes 12 to 19 of the Theol. Jahresbericht (1892–99).

Bibliography: W. BAUER, Heinrich Julius Holtzmann (Gießen 1932). W. G. KÜMMEL, Das Neue Testament: Geschichte der Erforschung seiner Probleme (Freiburg 1958) 185–191, 239–242. J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK, eds., Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie, 24 v. (3d ed. Leipzig 1896–1913) 23:655–660. A. FAUX, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928– ) 4:112–116.

[J. SCHMID]

HOLTZMANN, WALTHER

Medievalist, historian of the papacy; b. Eberbach-Neckar, Germany, Dec. 31, 1891; d. Bonn, Germany, Nov. 25, 1963. From 1922 to 1924 he was an assistant to Paul KEHR, who greatly influenced him. In 1924–25 Holtzmann was active in the newly revived Prussian Historical Institute in Rome, and then qualified for university lecturing at Berlin in 1926. He was ordinary professor of medieval history at Halle from 1931 to 1936 and at Bonn from 1936 to 1955. From 1953 to 1961 he was director of the German Historical Institute in Rome, which he had revived. Holtzmann's scholarly publications consist of a number of critical editions of sources and a series of research papers, for the most part connected with his source editions, e.g., several reports on discoveries in English archives connected with his research monographs on English history in the Middle Ages, and his important works on the papacy of the high Middle Ages, written to a large extent as byproduct of the continuation of the Regesta Pontificum Romanorum: Italia pontificia begun by Kehr.

Bibliography: W. HOLTZMANN, Papsturkunden in England, 3 v. (Abhandlungen der Akademie NS 25, 3d ser. 14–15, 33; Berlin-Göttingen 1930–52); "Papst-, Kaiser- und Normannenurkunden aus Unteritalien," Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken (Rome 1897– ) 35 (1955) 46–85; 36 (1956) 1–85; 42–43 (1963) 56–103; Beiträge zur Reichs- und Papstgeschichte des hohen Mittelalters: Ausgewählte Aufsätze (Bonn 1957) 235–238, bibliog. of Holtzmann's works; ed., Kanonistische Ergänzungen zur Italia pontificia (Tübingen 1959); Samnium, Apulia, Lucania (Berlin 1962) v.9 of P. F. KEHR, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum. Italia Pontificia, 8 v. (Berlin 1906–35). P. E. HÜBINGER "Nachruf auf W. H.," Mitteilungsblatt der Arbeitsgemeinschaft für Forschung des Landes Nordrhein-Westfalen 18 (1964) 13–21, life of Holtzmann and bibliog. of his last works.

[K. H. SCHWARTE]

HOLWECK, FREDERICK G.

Author, editor; b. Baden, Germany, Dec. 29, 1856; d. St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 15, 1927. After studying at Freiburg and Karlsruhe, Germany, he arrived in the U.S. when he was 20 years old. He entered St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, Wis., and was ordained on June 27, 1880. Thereafter, he worked in parishes in the Archdiocese of St. Louis. In 1924, after many years of research, he published the Biographical Dictionary of the Saints. The following year he published the Calendarium liturgicum festorum Dei et Dei Matris, an enlarged edition of his Fasti Mariani (1892). A frequent contributor to periodicals and newspapers, he was editor (1905–25) of the Pastoral-Blatt, a review sponsored by the German clergy in St. Louis, and contributing editor (1918–23) of the St. Louis Catholic Historical Review. Honored with a doctorate in theology from the University of Freiburg, Germany, Holweck was elevated to the rank of domestic prelate in 1923. On Jan. 6, 1926, Abp. John J. Glennon appointed him vicar-general of St. Louis.

Bibliography: J. ROTHENSTEINER, History of the Archdiocese of St. Louis (St. Louis 1928).

[J. J. LEIBRECHT]

HOLY ALLIANCE

A declaration, in the form of a treaty, signed Sept. 26, 1815, by the Orthodox Czar of Russia, the Protestant King of Prussia, and the Catholic Emperor of Austria after the final victory of the Allies over NAPOLEON I. Considered one of the most extraordinary documents in Europe's diplomatic history, it proclaimed the resolution to abide by the Biblical precept that all men are brothers. The sovereigns declared that they would on all occasions lend each other aid and assistance and would act toward their subjects and armies as fathers of families. The Holy Alliance went on to promise that governments and subjects alike would consider themselves as members of the same Christian nation and would admit no other sovereign but "God, our Divine Saviour, Jesus Christ, the Almighty's Word, the Word of life." Inspiration for this compact was once generally credited to Baroness Julie von Krüdener, a pietistic Protestant lady with great influence over ALEXANDER I; but it is now recognized that the Czar had been nurturing for some time the idea of breaking away from the Machiavellian conception of international relations, based upon egotistical interests and power politics. Francis I, Emperor of Austria, and Frederick William III, King of Prussia, to whom the treaty was first proposed, were bewildered by its high-flown mystic tone, but signed it because they did not dare to displease their friend and ally. Afterward the treaty was countersigned by most European rulers. The Prince Regent of England, however, declined to sign an agreement that could not be submitted for approval to Parliament, where the foreign secretary, Viscount Castlereagh, had called it "a piece of sublime mysticism and nonsense." Pope Pius VII refused to sign because the manifesto considered meaningless any distinction between Catholics, Protestants, and Orthodox. The Holy Alliance had no practical consequence, but the name became widely, if erroneously, used to designate the coalition of Great Powers established by the treaties of Paris (Nov. 25, 1815) in order to preserve peace upon the bases of the Congress of Vienna and the Paris agreement. Revolutionaries and liberals everywhere gave it the sinister connotation of a conspiracy of reactionary powers against freedom-loving peoples. The rise of international organizations in the 20th century led to new historical appraisals, which regarded the Alliance as a first attempt toward a world order governed by principles of Christian justice.

Bibliography: M. BOURQUIN, Histoire de la Sainte Alliance (Geneva 1954), the best work. J. H. PIRENNE, La Sainte-Alliance, 2 v. (Neuchâtel 1946–49), tries unconvincingly to prove that Alexander I used the Holy Alliance to frustrate British hegemony.

[G. DE BERTIER DE SAUVIGNY]

HOLY CHILD JESUS, SOCIETY OF THE

(SHCJ; Official Catholic Directory #4060); a congregation of women religious bound by simple perpetual vows and devoted to a variety of educational works. The Society of the Holy Child Jesus was founded in Derby, England in 1846 by an American convert, Cornelia Connelly. The motherhouse is in Rome, and the society is comprised of European, American, and African provinces.

Mother Connelly responded to an appeal from Bp. (later Cardinal) Nicholas Wiseman of Oscott, England, to assist in the Catholic revival there by improving Catholic education, especially for girls. She soon developed an educational tradition that utilized the resources of Christian humanism, drew upon the educational theory of the time, and exhibited remarkable flexibility in meeting the needs of the individual and the demands of the age. Mother Connelly adapted the rule of St. Ignatius to her congregation, finding inspiration also in the spiritual teachings of St. Francis de Sales, St. Gertrude, St. Teresa, and St. Francis of Assisi.

Her most effective spiritual instruction lay in the example of her own fidelity to the will of God throughout lifelong suffering, occasioned by the apostasy of her husband (who had become a priest), his alienation of their three children from her and from the Church, and his attempts to interfere in the government of her society. His activities contributed largely to the delay in papal approbation of her rule until 1893, after her death. Despite these obstacles, Mother Connelly was able to expand her apostolate in England and to extend it to the United States in 1862 and to France in 1870. It was in 1923 that the motherhouse of the Society was transferred from England to Rome. The former English Province has become the European Province.

From the time of its American foundation at Towanda, PA, in 1862, and in the Philadelphia area, the society across the United States has opened both private and parochial schools, and now has ministries in parish, hospital, college, and legal settings. In 1967, the American Province established a parish and school ministry in Santiago, Chile, and is present in several similar locations in other countries. The Provincial Offices are located in Drexel Hill, PA.

Beginning in 1930 in Nigeria and in 1947 in Ghana, sisters from the European and American Provinces have founded an ever-growing number of schools, including teacher-training colleges. An African sisterhood, the Handmaids of the Holy Child Jesus, had been established by the society in 1937 and given independent status in 1960. During the 1980s, the former African vicariate became the African Province of the SHCJ.

Following upon Vatican II, and in response to its directives, a special general chapter of the SHCJ was held in 1968. A period of experimentation was begun with a study of the original charism of Cornelia Connelly, and led eventually to revision of the SHCJ Constitutions. Many sisters returned to their Baptismal names, religious habits were modified, superiors, and their councillors became known as leaders and leadership teams. At this time, two censors, who had been appointed by the Congregation of Rites to examine Cornelia Connelly's writings, completed their report. It was in 1992 that she was declared Venerable by Pope John Paul II.

[M. C. MCCARTHY/H. G. MAYER]

HOLY CROSS, ABBEY OF

Former Cistercian monastery on the river Suir, near Thurles, County Tipperary, Ireland. It was founded c. 1180 by Domnall Mór O'Brien, king of Thomond, to house a relic of the true cross, said to have been sent by Pope Paschal II to an earlier O'Brien king. Domnall's son, Donnchad Cairbrech O'Brien, was a great benefactor of the growing monastery; King John of England confirmed the previous grants and added to the abbey's privileges. Much of the church was rebuilt in the 15th century. William O'Dwyer was the last abbot, but even after the suppression by King HENRY VIII the site was held in veneration because of the precious relic. Hugh O'NEILL, earl of Tyrone, visited Holy Cross in 1600, as did Hugh Roe O'DONNELL in 1601. Queen Elizabeth I conferred the abbey and its lands on the Butler family of Ormond, under whose powerful protection some monks were able to maintain a precarious connection with the buildings into the 17th century. The Butlers acquired the relic; but when the earl abandoned the Catholic faith, he transferred the relic to a Catholic friend. In 1801, after many vicissitudes, the relic passed to the bishop of Cork, who deposited it in the local Ursuline convent, where it remains. The abbey is now in ruins.

Bibliography: M. HARTRY, Triumphalia chronologica monasterii Sanctae Crucis in Hibernia, ed. and tr. D. MURPHY (Dublin 1891). A. THOMPSON et al., "The Cistercian Order in Ireland," Archaeological Journal 88 (1931). Journal of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland (Dublin 1849— ), refs. in various v. from 1–67. E. CURTIS, ed., Calendar of Ormond Deeds, 6 v. (Dublin 1932–43).

[J. RYAN]

HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF

Founded in France in 1837, its members include priests and brothers dedicated to parochial education, social justice, spiritual renewal, and foreign mission work. The congregation has a generalate in Rome, six provinces in the U. S., three in Canada, two in Bangladesh and one in India.

Origin and Development. The Congregation of Holy Cross was founded March 1, 1837, at Le Mans, Sarthe, France, by Basil Anthony MOREAU, who united into one religious institute the Congregation of the Brothers of St. Joseph—founded in 1820 at Ruillé-sur-Loir, Diocese of Le Mans, by Canon Jacques-François Dujarié—and the Auxiliary Priests of Le Mans—which Moreau himself had founded in 1835. The Brothers of St. Joseph had been established to provide primary education for children in rural villages where the French Revolution had practically destroyed the previously existing system for the education of the children of the common people. To counteract the evil influences of the Revolution in the more strictly religious and spiritual order, the Auxiliary Priests had taken as their specific aim assistance of the parish clergy in different dioceses, particularly by preaching parish missions and retreats.

In 1835, Dujarié's ill health led Bp. Jean-Baptiste Bouvier of Le Mans to entrust to Moreau the direction of the Brothers of St. Joseph. After first attempting to govern the two communities separately, Moreau united them into one institute. The Brothers of St. Joseph had some time earlier begun to adopt perpetual religious vows, whereas the Auxiliary Priests were still diocesan priests living in community while engaging in joint apostolic activities under the direction of their superior. However, on Aug. 15, 1840, Moreau pronounced his perpetual vows in the presence of Bouvier and was followed by several of his first collaborators, among whom was Edward F. Sorin, CSC, first superior of the congregation in the U. S. and first president of the University of Notre Dame, Ind.

Moreau Seminary, dedicated May 13, 1957, Congregation of the Holy Cross, Indiana.

The congregation composed of priests and brothers was granted a papal decree of praise on June 18, 1855, and definitive approval was decreed on May 13, 1857. It had been Moreau's original intention to include in the organization a congregation of religious women that he had founded as the Marianite Sisters of Holy Cross. However, the sisters were eventually excluded from the approval granted by Rome, and Moreau was instructed to govern them as a separate and autonomous community. They later developed three distinct congregations, in France, the U. S., and Canada. From the beginning the apostolate of the Brothers of Holy Cross, formerly the Brothers of St. Joseph, was confined to education, especially on the primary level, in France. The Priests of Holy Cross, on the other hand, devoted themselves to both teaching and the works of the sacred ministry.

Early in its history, the Congregation of Holy Cross extended its activities outside France, establishing houses in Algeria (1840), the U. S. (1842), Canada (1847), Italy (1850), and India (1853), in addition to scattered temporary foundations in Poland and the French Caribbean possessions. In 2001 foundations existed in Bangladesh, Brazil, Canada, Chile, France, Ghana, Haiti, India, Ireland, Italy, Kenya, Mexico, Peru, Tanzania, and the U.

S., organized into thirteen provinces and seven religious religious districts.

Special Characteristics. According to its pontifical-ly approved constitutions, the Congregation of Holy Cross is a clerical institute of pontifical right, composed of two societies that, while canonically united, remain nevertheless distinct and, within the limits determined by the constitutions, autonomous. The distinction of the two societies within the congregation is established on the provincial and local levels, where each society has its own government and administration. Union between the two societies is maintained by the same general administration, under a priest as superior general, and a general council composed of an equal number of priests and brothers; by the observance of the same constitutions and the use of the same manual of prayers and religious practices; and by the canonical visitation of all the houses of the congregation by the superior general or his delegate.

In the priests' society there are two canonical classes of religious, namely, priests or clerics and brothers. The brothers' society has only one class of religious, engaged either in teaching or in other activities. All the perpetually professed members of the congregation enjoy full active and passive voice in the government of the congregation, irrespective of occupation. The members of each society have a special name: Priests of Holy Cross (earlier called Salvatorists) and Brothers of Holy Cross (formerly known as Josephites). Under the general name of Religious of Holy Cross, all belong to the same religious institute known as the Congregation of Holy Cross or Congregatio a Sancta Cruce (CSC). The name of the congregation does not come from the Holy Cross, but from the suburb of Le Mans, called Sainte-Croix (Holy Cross), where Moreau established the first motherhouse of the congregation.

Local houses, provinces, and religious districts are, in principle, autonomous according to the prescriptions contained in the constitutions, i.e., they are composed of members of the two societies of the congregation, and are governed by superiors chosen from among the religious of that society which has jurisdiction. It pertains to the provincial superiors to establish coordination between the activities proper to each society or common to both, and to determine what assistance shall be provided by each society in its respective provinces.

Because of this common direction and pooling of efforts, the members of one society may be employed in the houses or activities of the other society. The priests of the congregation often serve as chaplains in the houses of the brothers, according to ordinances drawn up by the respective provincial superiors regulating the residence, duties, and rights of these chaplains.

Purpose and Constitutions. The congregation has as its general goal the glory of God and the perfection of its individual members through the practice of the simple vows of poverty, chastity and obedience. The nature of the vows is, in general, identical with the traditional significance of the vows in similar congregations.

The special goals of the congregation, as specified in the constitutions, are: to follow Christ, to serve all people, believers and unbelievers alike, and to spread the Gospel and to work for the development of a more just and humane society.

In the first years of the congregation, each society of priests, brothers, and sisters had its own particular constitutions. At the time of papal approval in 1857 there existed only one summary text of constitutions for both priests and brothers. Each society nevertheless retained its own particular capitular rules, which were more detailed than the constitutions and served as a commentary on them. Some years later, the capitular rules were likewise unified into one volume for both societies. The text of both the constitutions and the capitular rules underwent successive modifications over the years. Finally, the general chapter of 1950 undertook a complete revision of the rules and constitutions, synthesizing them into one text henceforth known as the Constitutions of the Congregation of Holy Cross.

The constitutions were revised by the general chapter of 1968 to bring them into accord with the Second Vatican Council's call for the renewal of religious life. They were again separated into constitutions, which can be amended only with the approval of the Holy See, and statutes, which can be amended by an absolute majority of the general chapter. The governance of the congregation was decentralized so that the superior general was henceforth elected to a six-year term renewable once. His role became to "guide and govern," and many of his powers were given to the provincial superiors and their councils. After 1968, only a general chapter, not the superior general, could establish and suppress provinces.

The 1974 general chapter established an annual meeting of provincial superiors with the general administration as the Council of the Congregation. The general chapter of 1980 proposed that the office of superior general should not be restricted to priests, but should be open to any member of the congregation professed for at least ten years. This proposal was repeated by the general chapters of 1986, 1992 and 1998, but was not approved by the Holy See. The general chapter of 1986 rewrote the constitutions in an exhortative rather than a canonical style.

Activities. The congregation developed extensively in the U. S. where, in 2001, it had its greatest number of members and apostolic works. Three provinces of priests have headquarters located respectively at Notre Dame, Indiana, Bridgeport, Connecticut, and Austin, Texas; three provinces of brothers have administrative centers at Notre Dame, Indiana, New Rochelle, New York, and Austin, Texas. The Notre Dame province of priests is affiliated with the University of Notre Dame and the University of Portland in Oregon. It also owns Ave Maria Press, which publishes spiritual books and religious educational materials, and is engaged in multiple other phases of educational, parochial, social justice, and spiritual renewal in the U. S. The Bridgeport province is affiliated with King's College in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, and Stonehill College, in North Easton, Massachusetts, in addition to parish and spiritual renewal ministry. The province is also responsible for Holy Cross Family Ministries, founded as the Family Rosary Crusade by Rev. Patrick J. Peyton. The Austin province is engaged in parochial work in Louisiana, Texas, and Mexico.

The Notre Dame brothers' province conducts high schools in two dioceses and Holy Cross College at Notre Dame, Indiana, and directs schools for exceptional and needy boys in the U. S. The brothers' provinces of New Rochelle (four dioceses) and Austin (four dioceses) engage in the same general type of apostolic work; St. Edward's University, Austin, is affiliated with the brothers of that province.

In Canada, the chief houses of the priests' province is the Oratory of St. Joseph in Montreal, made famous by Brother André Besette, CSC, as an international center of devotion and pilgrimage in honor of St. Joseph. The Collège Notre-Dame, Montreal, is under the direction of the Canadian brothers' province. There are also other educational, parochial and missionary activities in other localities throughout the Provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. The Canadian priests' province directs the Fides publishing house, one of the largest religious publishers in Canada. The English Canadian priests' province is engaged in education, sponsoring schools in Welland and St. Catherine's in Ontario, and in parish work in Nova Scotia, Ontario and Alberta.

Just as in the U. S. and Canada, the congregation carries out a twofold apostolate of education and parish ministry elsewhere in the world. In Bangladesh, the priests' province conducts Notre Dame College in Dhaka and staffs parishes throughout the country. The brothers' province conducts high schools in Dhaka and Chittagong. In India, the priests' province is engaged in education and parish ministry in the North East Territory, while the brothers conduct several schools in southern India.

There is one novitiate in Cascade, Colorado, used by all the provinces in North America. Other novitiates are located in India, Bangladesh, Ghana, Haiti Peru, and Uganda. Houses of studies are maintained in Montreal, Notre Dame, and San Antonio in North America, and in Nairobi, Kenya, Santiago, Chile, Port-au-Prince, Haiti, Dhaka, Bangladesh, and Bangalore, India.

The priests' Notre Dame province in the U. S. is responsible for the district of Chile and, together with the New Rochelle brothers' province, for Uganda, Kenya, and Tanzania. The Canadian priests' Montreal province is responsible for districts in Haiti and Brazil. The Bridgeport priests' province is responsible for the district of Peru. The Canadian brothers' province is responsible for the brothers' district in India. The brothers' province of Austin operates two colleges in Brazil.

Since its foundation, the congregation has furnished to the Church several members who were raised to episcopal rank, including Cardinal John Francis O'Hara, Archbishop of Philadelphia (1951–60). In April 2001 its members numbered 1,686 (986 priests, deacons, and seminarians and 700 brothers), including two archbishops and eight bishops, in 221 houses. Thirty percent of the members in 2001 were serving outside of North America and Europe.

Bibliography: CSC, Official Catholic Directory #0600 brothers, #0610 priests. E. and T. CATTÀ, Basil Anthony Moreau, tr. E. L. HESTON, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1956), lists sources and bibliography. T. CATTÀ, Father Dujarié, tr. E. L. HESTON (Milwaukee 1960), with bibliography. A. J. HOPE, Notre Dame: One Hundred Years (Notre Dame, IN 1943). P. ARMSTRONG, A More Perfect Legacy (Notre Dame, IN 1995). R. CLANCY, The Congregation of Holy Cross in East Bengal, 1853–1953 (Washington 1953). M. R. O'CONNELL, Edward Sorin (Notre Dame, IN 2001). Sainte-Croix au Canada (St. Laurent, QC: 1947). D. SYIEMLEH, They Dared to Hope (Bangalore, India 1998).

[E. L. HESTON/J. CONNELLY]

HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF SISTERS OF THE

(CSC, Official Catholic Directory #1920, 1930); in 1841 Basil Anthony MOREAU founded at Le Mans, France, the MARIANITES OF THE HOLY CROSS, a female counterpart to his community of priests and brothers (see HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF). Out of the missions of the sisters in the United States and Canada, the Congregation of Sisters of the Holy Cross emerged.

In 1843 four Marianite Sisters of the Holy Cross left France for the United States to join Father Edward SORIN, whom Moreau had sent to Indiana two years earlier. There, the sisters cared for the domestic service at the college (later University of Notre Dame) that Sorin had founded at South Bend. In addition, they opened their first school at Bertrand, Michigan, six miles north of Notre Dame. Their first pupils included Potawatomi Indians, deaf mutes, orphans, and neighboring children.

Additional sisters, trained by Mother Mary of Seven Dolors Gascoin, arrived from France and soon American girls also joined the community. One of the latter group, Eliza Gillespie, was sent to France for her novitiate. Upon her return to the United States, Mother Angela GILLESPIE greatly improved the congregation's educational program. In 1855 the community moved the convent, novitiate, and school to St. Mary's, Notre Dame, Indiana. Between 1855 and 1882, 45 schools were opened in the United States, and a curriculum of studies was organized and adapted to parochial and private schools.

With the outbreak of the Civil War the sisters responded to the government's call for nurses and were the first to serve on the hospital ship, Red Rover, plying the Mississippi, where fighting was heaviest. At the sacrifice of schools, which had to be closed temporarily in Washington, D.C., 80 members of the Holy Cross community staffed eight military hospitals in Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and the District of Columbia. This experience in hospital work later expanded into a large network of training schools and hospitals in the United States and clinics in foreign missions.

During the 1860s, communications with the motherhouse in France became increasingly difficult; accordingly, the government of the sisters was transferred from Moreau and the French motherhouse to Sorin and the province of Indiana. The sisters in France obtained papal approbation in 1869; those in the United States continued to live according to the rule given to them by Moreau. In 1882, with the permission of Bp. Joseph Dwenger of Fort Wayne, Indiana, they canonically elected Mother M. Augusta Anderson as superior general. Papal approbation of the U.S. Sisters of the Holy Cross was obtained in 1889.

Through the years, the community has exercised leadership in developing higher education for women. In the earliest curricula of what later became St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana, modern languages, artists-in-residence, and liberal and fine arts were integral. Following the establishment (1887) of the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., one of its early rectors, Bp. Thomas Shahan, organized and conducted summer schools at St. Mary's. In 1874 St. Catherine's, a Holy Cross school in Baltimore, held what was probably the first teacher-training institute for women under Catholic auspices. The establishment in 1944 of the Graduate School of Sacred Theology at St. Mary's, where lay and religious women can earn advanced degrees in sacred doctrine, was the work of Sister M. Madeleva Wolff, with the cooperation of eminent theologians.

When the Holy See assigned the missions in Bengal, India (1852), to the priests of Holy Cross, the sisters likewise became missionaries there. The American congregation has continued this work. In 1934 Rose Bernard Gehring, CSC, responding to episcopal and papal requests, organized a native sisterhood in Pakistan named the Associates of Mary, Queen of the Apostles. In 1947 the sisters opened a mission area in São Paulo, Brazil, where they conduct secondary schools and village mission stations. Graduates of St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, work as lay missionaries with the sisters in both Pakistan and Brazil.

[M. R. DAILY/EDS.]

HOLY CROSS, SISTERS OF MERCY OF THE

(SCSC, Official Catholic Directory #2630); Theodosius FLORENTINI, OFM Cap., founded a congregation in Switzerland in 1844 to give to the poor, the neglected, and the delinquent care and guidance based on Christian principles. The first three sisters undertook the teaching apostolate, and from this group there developed the Teaching Sisters of the Holy Cross of Menzingen, Switzerland. Another congregation developed under the direction of Sister Maria Theresia Scherer who went to Chur, Switzerland, in 1852 to direct a hospital and to open a novitiate. When Florentini established the generalate at Ingenbohl in 1856, Scherer became the first superior general of the Sisters of Mercy of the Holy Cross.

The congregation's first foreign mission, established in Bihar, India, in 1894, has extended its activities to Bengal and Madhya Pradesh. The sisters have assisted in founding two diocesan congregations and have also opened their own novitiate in India. The second mission field, Manchuria, had to be abandoned in 1950, but the missionaries returned to the Orient four years later to work in Taiwan. The community came to the United States in 1912 at the invitation of Bp. Vincent Wehrle of North Dakota, where the sisters opened a hospital in Dickinson. In 1923 Mother Aniceta Regli chose Merrill, Wisconsin, as the U.S. provincialate. In the United States, the sisters are engaged in academic education, hospitals, nursing, pastoral ministries, social outreach, parish ministries, retirement homes, campus ministry, and adult education.

[C. SCHNITZER]

HOLY FAMILY, CONGREGATION OF SISTERS OF THE

(SSF, Official Catholic Directory #1950), an African-American congregation of sisters who work among the poor and underprivileged. The congregation was founded at New Orleans, Louisiana, Nov. 21, 1842, by Henriette De Lisle and Juliette Gaudin, two freeborn black women, under the direction of Étienne Rousselon, vicar-general of the diocese, and with the assistance of Marie Jeanne Aliquot, a French immigrant who remained an auxiliary of the society until her death in 1863. A papal institute, its members take simple vows, engage in works of the apostolate, and follow the Rule of St. Augustine.

Prompted by the wretched condition of old, abandoned slaves and semi-orphaned young children, the sisters began their work by caring for the abandoned and by teaching catechism to prepare children for the reception of the Sacraments. The needs were so great, however, that permanent institutions had to be provided. Within the first year of the congregation's existence, the sisters opened a home for the aged and a school, St. Mary's. Other institutions followed: in 1867, St. John Berchman's orphanage for girls; in 1882, St. Mary's boarding academy for girls, a secondary school; and in 1893, Lafon Home for orphan boys. Each of these was a first foundation for Black Catholics in the South. In subsequent years the scope of the sisters' work grew and now includes nursing, teaching, social work, vestment making, and the supplying of altar breads. The apostolic work of the society embraces the poor wherever they are found, but particularly in southern United States and in Central America. The sisters engage in a diversity of ministries, including education, daycare centers, parish administration, pastoral services, nursing, and care for the sick, aged and disabled. The motherhouse is in New Orleans, Louisiana.

[M. B. ADAMS/EDS.]

HOLY FAMILY, SISTERS OF THE

(SHF, Official Catholic Directory #1960), a pontifical congregation founded in 1872 by Elizabeth Armer (Mother M. Dolores) under the direction of Archbishop Joseph S. Alemany of San Francisco, California, to provide religious instruction for children unable to attend Catholic schools. The institute was awarded the papal decree of praise and approval in 1931, and final approbation in 1945. Steady growth prompted the transfer of the novitiate in 1949 to Mission San José, California. The Sisters are engaged in the ministries of education, catechetics, daycare centers, parish ministries, retreats, counseling, home visitations and care of the developmentally disabled. The generalate is located in Mission San José, California.

Bibliography: D. J. KAVANAGH, The Holy Family Sisters of San Francisco . . . 1872–1922 (San Francisco 1922). M. TERESITA, "Mother Dolores," Review for Religious 15 (September 1956) 238–46.

[M. T. BIHN/EDS.]

HOLY FAMILY, SONS OF THE

A congregation of priests and brothers whose official title is Congregatio Filiorum Sacrae Familiae (SF, Official Catholic Directory #0640). It was founded in 1864 by Father José Manyanet (d. 1901) in Tremp, Lerida, Spain, and was granted final approval by the Holy See in 1901. The purpose of the congregation is to promote devotion to the Holy Family and to foster Christian family life. This apostolate is accomplished through the education of youth and the organization of a family movement consisting of instruction in the faith and in the management of the ideal Catholic home. The early development of the congregation was slow and uncertain; political upheavals and persecutions, especially during the Spanish Civil War, brought the society close to extinction. Not until the reconstruction in Spain in the 1940s did the Sons of the Holy Family begin to prosper. Since then they have spread outside Spain and have founded new schools and institutions. By the 1960s they were well established as a teaching society in Spain, Italy, and Argentina.

The Sons of the Holy Family came as missionaries to the United States in 1920 and worked in the Diocese of Santa Fe, New Mexico, among the Spanish-speaking people of the Southwest. The generalate is located in Barcelona, Spain. The United States headquarters is located in Silver Spring, Maryland.

[L. HOFFMAN/EDS.]

HOLY FAMILY MISSIONARIES

Also known as the Congregation of Missionaries of the Holy Family (MSF, Official Catholic Directory #0630); a missionary society of papal right with simple vows, founded in 1895 at Grave, Netherlands, for the special purpose of fostering priestly vocations among the poor or those advanced in years. When the founder, Jean Baptiste BERTHIER (1840–1908), a La Salette missionary, submitted his proposal to Rome, Leo XIII gave his approval on Nov. 14, 1894. French anticlericalism, however, impelled Berthier to go to Holland, where, after obtaining the approbation of the bishop of s'Hertogenbosch, the congregation was established on Sept. 27, 1895, and 12 applicants were received in the dilapidated barracks of the former garrison of Grave. The first three members were ordained in 1905; at Berthier's death, Oct. 16, 1908, there were 25 priests, representing five nationalities.

In 1911 the first five missionaries were sent to Brazil, the same year Rome bestowed the decree of praise on the congregation which had spread to four countries. The war years brought severe losses to the society; 40 members were killed in World War I and more than 150 in World War II. Under the Nazi regime the society's schools were confiscated, requisitioned, or destroyed, and 50 of its Polish members were killed. The generalate is located in Rome. Its first foundation in the United States was made in 1924. Its United States provincialate is in San Antonio, Texas.

Bibliography: P. J. RAMERS, Bonus Miles Christi Jesus: Johann Baptist Berthier (Betzdorf 1931). F. NOLTE, Historische Skizzen der Kongregation der Missionare von der Heiligen Familie, 5 v. (Betzdorf 1931, Grave 1949-54).

[J. WAHLEN/EDS.]

HOLY FAMILY OF NAZARETH, SISTERS OF THE

The Congregation of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth (CSFN, Official Catholic Directory #1970) is an international apostolic congregation dedicated to the moral and spiritual renewal of family life that was founded in Rome in 1875 by Blessed Mary of Jesus the Good Shepherd, Frances Siedliska. Responding to the needs of the vast immigrant population in the United States, she arrived in Chicago with 11 sisters in 1885 to launch the first American province. By the time of her death in 1902, Blessed Frances Siedliska had established 29 foundations throughout Europe and the United States. The congregation has four provinces in the United States. Three provinces were formed in 1918: Sacred Heart Province (headquartered in Des Plaines, Ill.), Immaculate Conception Province (headquartered in Philadelphia) and Saint Joseph Province (headquartered in Pittsburgh, Pa.). The fourth province, the Blessed Frances Siedliska Province, headquartered in Grand Prairie, Texas, was established in 1993. The elected superior general governs the international congregation from the Generalate in Rome. Internationally, the congregation operates in Italy, France, Germany, England, Spain, Switzerland, Poland, Belarus, Lithuania, Russia, Ukraine, Israel, Australia, and the Philippines. Pope John Paul II beatified Blessed Frances Siedliska on April 23, 1989. On March 5, 2000, Pope John Paul II also beatified 11 sisters of the congregation, the Martyrs of Nowogródek, who were summarily executed by Nazi soldiers on Aug. 1, 1943.

Mother Frances Siedliska, foundress of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth.

Bibliography: M. DECHANTAL, Out of Nazareth: A Centenary of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth in Service of the Church (New York 1974).

[L. V. MIKOLAJEK]

HOLY FAMILY OF VILLEFRANCHE SISTERS OF THE

A religious congregation with papal approbation whose motherhouse is in Villefranche, near Rodez, France. The institute was founded in 1816 by St. Émile de RODAT, with the assistance of Abbé Anton Marty, for the education of girls, the care of the sick, and other works of mercy. In addition to the French convents, the sisters have houses and missions in various countries in Europe and Latin America, where they teach in primary and secondary schools, run hospitals and clinics, and engage in nursing.

[A. J. ENNIS/EDS.]

HOLY GHOST FATHERS

(CSSP, Official Catholic Directory #0650); a congregation of priests and lay brothers; they are known also as Spiritans but the official title is the Congregation of the Holy Ghost and of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. Since 1855 the members have bound themselves by simple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. The purpose of the congregation, to bring "the Gospel everywhere, to undertake the most humble and laborious works for which it is difficult to find laborers," is fulfilled through teaching, social outreach, mission and evangelization.

Foundation. On the feast of Pentecost, May 27, 1703, Claude Francis Poullart des Places, formerly a lawyer, then a seminarian, founded in Paris a group that became known as the Seminary and the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. His intention was to provide the Church with priests at a time when adequate seminary training was the exception rather than the rule. Two years later he selected the best of his fellow students and shared with them the direction of the Seminary. In 1707 he accepted the first two as members of the new congregation. Although the founder died in 1709 at the age of 30, less than two years after his ordination, and his first two associates also died less than a year later, the organization survived.

Development. In 1734 the congregation obtained its first official approval by the Church and was legally recognized by the French government, a privilege granted to only a few societies of priests. The society became famous for its learning and integrity of doctrine; none of its members in France ever gave adherence to the Jansenists or took the schismatic constitutional oath of the clergy. It began to interest itself in missionary work, at first supplying candidates to the Paris Foreign Mission Society, but soon after also sending them directly to the missions and assuming charge of mission territories. In 1732 its priests made their first recorded entry into the New World missions in the person of Rev. François Frison de la Mothe of the Seminary of Quebec, Canada. Three years later they began to labor among the French settlers and Indians of Acadia, to whom they ministered during the years preceding the deportation of all Acadians from Nova Scotia and adjacent lands. Jean Louis Le Loutre, Father of the Acadians, and Pierre Maillard, Apostle of the Micmac Indians, did notable work among these people.

Both the Seminary and the Congregation of the Holy Ghost almost perished in the persecution resulting from the French Revolution of 1789. Although they were restored in 1805 in accord with the demand of Pius VII, recurrent persecution left them barely able to survive until the year 1848 when (Ven.) François LIBERMANN became superior general and infused both with new life. A Jewish convert, Libermann had established the Congregation of the Holy Heart of Mary in 1841 to bring the faith to Africa. The next year he sent the first group of his priests to work in the vicariate of the two Guineas, which stretched along 5,000 miles of Africa's West coast, and without limits to the interior. It had been entrusted by the Holy See to Bp. Edward Barron, former vicar-general of Philadelphia, PA (1842), but the death of nearly all missionaries soon after caused his withdrawal. Libermann then accepted full responsibility for the entire mission (1845). In the extreme north of the Guineas and in the islands of Mauritius and Reunion, Libermann's priests met missionaries sent by the Holy Ghost Fathers. In 1848, encouraged by the Holy See, the two congregations decided to merge. Giving preference to the older of the two, which alone was officially approved by Church and State, the Holy See suppressed Libermann's society, and its members entered the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. Elected its 11th superior general, Libermann so effectively reorganized the congregation that he is regarded as its second founder.

The congregation spread throughout Europe and the Americas, establishing educational and social works as well as seminaries for the training of priests to staff its missions in Africa, South America, the West Indies, and the islands of the Indian Ocean. As the vicariate of the two Guineas is called the "Mother of All Churches in West Africa," so the prefecture of Zanguebar is considered the "Mother of All Churches in East Africa." Founded in 1860, this mission stretched along 2,000 miles of coast and also without limits to the interior. Although charged with many works not specifically dedicated to Africa, the Spiritans have sent more missionaries to Africa than any other organization. Their most famous missionaries include Abp. Alexandre LE ROY of Gabon, Abp. Prosper Augouard of the Congo, Bp. Joseph Shanahan of Nigeria, Rev. Charles Duparquet of Angola, and Rev. Antoine Horner of East Africa.

U.S. Foundations. In 1783 when the Holy See was negotiating with Benjamin Franklin over the ecclesiastical organization of the states, there was question of entrusting the training of its clergy to the Holy Ghost Fathers. Nothing, however, came of this. It was only in 1794 or 1795 that the first Spiritan, John Moranvillé, landed in Norfolk, Va., a refugee from persecution in Guiana. A few years later he became pastor of St. Patrick's Church in Baltimore, Md. He is credited with being the founder of the first free school in Baltimore, and, together with Bp. John David of Bardstown, the creator of Catholic religious chant in the U.S. Although two other Spiritans joined him a few years later, their stay did not result in a permanent foundation. When the last of them died in 1839, he was not replaced.

The permanent establishment of the Holy Ghost Fathers in the U.S. dates from 1873. The previous year Otto von Bismarck had ordered them expelled from Germany under the pretext of their alleged "affiliation with the Jesuits." When their original plan to open a college in the Diocese of Covington, Ky., had to be abandoned, they accepted Abp. John B. Purcell's invitation to the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, Ohio. Soon after, however, they were forced to leave Ohio because the archbishop imposed conditions that made community life impossible. Under the leadership of Rev. Joseph Strub they then established themselves in Pennsylvania and Arkansas. Following the waves of European immigration, they opened parishes for French, German, Polish, Portuguese, and Spanish-speaking Catholics in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Michigan, Arkansas, and California. In addition, they founded missions for Blacks in the South. The Spiritans' most important educational institutions are Duquesne University, begun in 1878 by Strub.

Bibliography: H. J. KOREN, The Spiritans: A History of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost (Duquesne Studies, Spiritan Series 1; Pittsburgh 1958); Knights or Knaves? A History of the Spiritan Missionaries in Acadia and North America 1732–1839 (Duquesne Studies, Spiritan Series 4; Pittsburgh 1962). C. F. POUILLART DES PLACES, Spiritual Writings, ed. H. J. KOREN (Duquesne Studies, Spiritan Series 3; Pittsburgh 1959).

[H. J. KOREN/EDS.]

HOLY GRAIL, THE

The name of a legendary sacred vessel, variously identified with the chalice of the Eucharist or the dish of the paschal lamb, and the theme of a famous medieval cycle of romance. In the romances the conception of the Grail varies considerably; its nature is often but vaguely indicated, and in the case of Chrétien de Troyes's Perceval poem, it is left wholly unexplained. The meaning of the word has also been variously explained. The generally accepted meaning is that given by the Cistercian chronicler Helinandus (d. c. 1230), who c. 717 mentions a hermit's vision concerning the vessel used by Our Lord at the Last Supper, and about which the hermit wrote a Latin book called "Gradale." "Now in French," so Helinandus informs us, "Gradalis or Gradale means a dish [scutella], wide and somewhat deep, in which costly viands are wont to be served to the rich successively [gradatim], one morsel after another. In popular speech it is also called "Graalz," because it is pleasing [grata] and acceptable to him eating therein" (PL 212:814).

The medieval Latin word gradale became in Old French graal, greal, or greel, whence English grail. Some scholars derive the word from cratalis (crater, a mixing bowl). It certainly means a dish; the derivation from gradatim or from grata, suggested by Helinandus, is fanciful. The explanation of San greal as sang real (kingly blood) was not current until the later Middle Ages. Other etymologies that have been advanced may be passed over as obsolete.

When the literary tradition concerning the Grail is examined, it is noticeable at the outset that the Grail legend is closely connected with that of Perceval as well as that of King Arthur. Yet all these legends were originally independent. The Perceval story may have a mythical origin, or it may be regarded as the tale of one who, though a simpleton (OF nicelot), nevertheless finally achieves great things. In all extant versions, the Perceval legend is a part of the Arthurian legend, and in almost all it is connected with the Grail. Reconstruction of the original Grail legend, accordingly, can be accomplished only by an analytical comparison of all extant versions—a task that has given rise to some of the most difficult problems in literary history.

The great body of the Grail romances developed between 1180 and 1240, and after the 13th century nothing essentially new was added. Most of these romances are in French, but there are versions in German, English, Norwegian, Italian, and Portuguese. These are of very unequal value as sources; some are mere translations or adaptations of French romances. All may be conveniently divided into two classes: those concerned chiefly with the quest of the Grail and with the adventures and personality of the hero of this quest; and those mainly concerned with the history of the sacred vessel itself. These two classes have been styled respectively the Quest and the Early History versions.

QUEST VERSIONS

Of the first class are the Perceval, or Conte del Graal, of Chrétien de Troyes and his continuators, a vast poetic compilation of some 60,000 verses, composed between 1180 and 1240, and the Middle High German epic poem Parzival of Wolfram von Eschenbach, written between 1205 and 1215, and based, according to Wolfram's statement, on the French poem of a certain "Kyot [Guiot] der Provenzâl," which, however, is not extant, if it ever existed. To these may be added the Welsh Peredur contained in the collection of tales called the Mabinogion (extant in MSS of the 13th century, though the material is certainly older), and the English poem Sir Perceval, of the 14th century. In these latter versions only the adventures of Perceval are related, no mention being made of the Grail.

Of the Early History versions, the oldest extant is the metrical Joseph, or Roman de l'estoire dou Graal, composed between 1170 and 1212 by Robert de Boron. The MS containing this text follows it with the first 502 verses of an unfinished Merlin, and many scholars think that Robert had composed a trilogy of Grail romances, the third being a version of the Quest by Perceval. There is a complete version comprising these three parts (and perhaps derived from Robert's metrical trilogy) in the so-called Didot MS (Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, n.a.f. 4166) and in a MS in the Biblioteca Estense in Modena.

Sir Percival and the Holy Grail, manuscript painting. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

The most detailed history of the Grail is found in the Grand Saint Graal, also called L'Estoire del Saint Graal, a bulky French prose romance of the first half of the 13th century, where it says that Christ Himself presented to a pious hermit the book containing this history. This version is followed by a Merlin and a Queste del Saint Graal: it is well known to English readers because it was adapted almost in its entirety in Malory's Morte d'Arthur. The others are the so-called Didot Perceval, mentioned above, and the lengthy and rather prolix Perlesvaus.

The poem of Chrétien, regarded by many as the oldest known Grail romance, tells of Perceval's visit to the Grail castle, where he sees a graal, together with a bleeding lance and a silver plate, borne in by a damsel. The graal is a precious vessel set with jewels, and so resplendent as to eclipse the lights of the hall. Mindful of the teaching of his first instructor in knighthood who warned him against excessive speaking, Perceval does not ask the significance of what he sees, and thereby incurs guilt and later reproach.

Undoubtedly Chrétien meant to relate the hero's second visit to the castle when Perceval would have put the question and received the desired information. But the poet did not live to finish his story, and whether the explanation of the graal offered by his continuators is what Chrétien had in mind is doubtful. As it is, we are not informed by Chrétien what the graal signifies; in his version it has no explicit or even clearly implied religious character. In the Early History versions, however, it is invested with the greatest sanctity: it is the dish from which Christ ate the paschal lamb with his disciples and which passed into the possession of Joseph of Arimathea, to be used by him to gather the Precious Blood from Christ's body on the cross. It becomes identified also with the chalice of the Eucharist. The lance is identified as the one with which Longinus pierced Our Lord's side, and the silver plate becomes the paten covering the chalice. The quest in these versions assumes a most sacred character; the atmosphere of chivalric adventure in Chrétien's poem yields to a militant asceticism that insists not only on the purity of the quester, but also, in some versions (Queste, Perlesvaus), on his virginity. In the Queste and the Grand Saint Graal, moreover, the hero is not Perceval but the maiden knight, Galaad. Other knights of the Round Table who participate in the quest achieve at best only a partial success.

EARLY HISTORY VERSIONS

In the Early History versions the Grail is intimately connected with the story of Joseph of Arimathea. When he is cast into prison Christ appears to him and gives him the sacred vessel through which he is miraculously sustained for 42 years, until liberated by Vespasian. The Grail is then brought to the West, to Britain, either by Joseph and Josephes, his son (Grand Saint Graal), or by Alain, one of his kin (Robert de Boron). Galaad (or Perceval) achieves the quest; after the death of its keeper the Grail vanishes. According to the version of the Perlesvaus, Perceval is removed, no one knows whither, by a ship with white sails marked by a red cross. In the Guiot-Wolfram version we meet with a conception of the Grail wholly different from that of the French romances. Wolfram conceives of it as a precious stone, lapis exillis, of special purity, possessing miraculous powers conferred upon it by a consecrated Host that a dove brings down from heaven and lays upon it each Good Friday, thus endowing it with the power to feed the whole brotherhood of the Grail. It is guarded in the splendid castle of Munsalvaesche (mons salvationis or silvaticus?) by a special order of knights, the Templeisen, chosen by the Host and nourished by its miraculous power.

The relationship of the Grail versions to each other, especially that of Chrétien to those of Robert de Boron and the Queste, is a matter of dispute, and their relative chronology is uncertain. But in all these versions the legend appears in an advanced state of development. Its preceding phases, however, are not attested by extant texts and can, therefore, only be the subject of conjecture.

OBSCURE ORIGINS

The origin of the legend is involved in obscurity, and scholars hold various views. An Oriental, a Celtic, and a purely Christian origin have been claimed. But the Oriental parallels, like the sun table of the Ethiopians, the Persian cup of Jamshīd, and the Hindu paradise, Crīdavana, are not very convincing, and Wolfram's statement that Guiot's source was an Arabic manuscript of Toledo is open to grave doubt. The theory of a Celtic origin seems better founded. There are undoubtedly Celtic elements in the legend as we have it; the Perceval story is probably, and the Arthurian legend certainly, of Celtic origin, and both these legends are intimately connected with the quest story. Talismans, such as magic lances and food-giving vessels, figure prominently in early Celtic narratives of mythological origin. Some scholars hold that the Peredur (in the Mabinogion) version, with its simple story of vengeance by means of talismans and its lack of religious significance, would yield the version nearest to the original form of the Perceval legend. Back of the quest story would be some pre-Christian tale of a hero seeking to avenge the injury done to a kinsman. The religious element would then be secondary and would have come into the legend when the old vengeance tale was fused with the legend of Joseph of Arimathea, essentially a legend of the conversion of Britain.

Argument for Christian Origin. Those who maintain the theory of a purely Christian origin regard the religious element in the story as fundamental and trace the leading motifs to Christian ideas and conceptions. The apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, which was in vogue in the 12th century, particularly in Britain, tells how Joseph in prison was miraculously fed by Christ Himself. Additional traits were furnished by the Vindicta Salvatoris, the legendary account of the destruction of Jerusalem. Furthermore, Joseph was confused with the Jewish historian, Flavius JOSEPHUS, whose liberation by Titus is narrated by Suetonius. The food-producing properties of the vessel can be explained, without resorting to Celtic parallels, by the association of the Grail with the Eucharist, which gives spiritual nourishment to the faithful and in many saints' lives is said to have been their sole physical nourishment as well. According to this theory, the purely Christian legend that thus had arisen became the generally accepted version of the evangelization of Britain, and then developed on British soil, in Wales; this accounts for its undeniably Celtic stamp. In the 13th century, the Abbey of GLASTONBURY combined the story of Joseph of Arimathea with its own older version of the evangelization of Britain, and so became a powerful instrument in the propagation of the legend of Joseph's evangelization of England, which was accepted as historical fact for at least two centuries.

The fully developed Grail legend was later on still further connected with other legends, as in Wolfram's poem with that of Lohengrin, the swan knight, and also with that of PRESTER JOHN, the fabled Christian monarch of the East. Here also the story of Klinschor, the magician, was added. After the Renaissance the Grail legend, together with most medieval legends, fell into oblivion, from which it was rescued when the Romantic Movement began at the beginning of the 19th century. The most famous modern versions are Tennyson's "Holy Grail" in the Idylls of the King (1869), and Wagner's music drama, the festival play Parsifal, produced for the first time at Bayreuth in 1882.

Attitude of the Church. It would seem that a legend so distinctively Christian would find favor with the Church, but it did not. Excepting Helinandus, clerical writers do not mention the Grail (although the apocryphal Joseph of Arimathea and other legends were widely adopted), and the Church completely ignored it, for the legend contained elements the Church could not approve. Its sources are in survivals of pagan heathendom and in apocryphal, not canonical, scripture, and the claims of sanctity made for the Grail were refuted by their very extravagance. Moreover, the legend claimed for the Church in Britain an origin well-nigh as illustrious as that of the Church of Rome, and independent of Rome. It was thus calculated to encourage and to foster any separatist tendencies that might exist in Britain. The whole tradition concerning the Grail is of late origin and on many points at variance with historical truth.

Bibliography: Texts. CHRÉTIEN DE TROYES, Der Percevalroman del Graal, ed. A. HILKA (1932), v.5 of Sämtliche Werke, ed. W. FOERSTER, 5 v. (Halle 1884–1932); Le Roman de Perceval, ed. W. J. ROACH (Paris 1956; 2d ed. 1959); The Story of the Grail, tr. R. W. LINKER (Chapel Hill 1952). Perceval. Continuations of the Old French Perceval, ed. W. J. ROACH (Philadelphia 1949–); The Didot Perceval according to Manuscripts of Modena and Paris, ed. W. J. ROACH (Philadelphia 1941); The Romance of Perceval in Prose: A Translation of the E Manuscript of the Didot Perceval, tr. D. SKEELS (Seattle 1961). R. DE BORON, Le Roman de l'estoire dou Grand, ed. W. A. NITZE (Paris 1927). Perlesvaus. Le Haut livre du graal, ed. W. A. NITZE and T. A. JENKINS, 2 v. (Chicago 1932–37); The High History of the Grail, tr. S. EVANS (New York 1903). King Arthur. L'Estoire del Saint Graal and les aventures ou la queste del Saint Graal, v.1 and 6 of The Vulgate Version of the Arthurian Romances, ed. H. O. SOMMER, 8 v. (Washington 1908–16). La Queste du Saint-Graal, ed. A. PAUPHILET (Melun 1949). W. VON ESCHENBACH, "Parzival," in v.1 of Wolfram von Eschenbach, ed. K. LACHMANN (7th ed. Berlin 1952); Parzival, tr. H. M. MUSTARD and C. E. PASSAGE, (pa. New York 1961). T. MALORY, "The Tale of Sankgreal," Works, ed. E. VINAVER, 3 v. (Oxford 1947) v.2. "Peredur," in The Mabinogion, tr. T. and G. JONES (New York 1949) 183–227. General Studies. R. S. LOOMIS, The Grail: From Celtic Myth to Christian Symbol (New York 1963), the best recent study. J. MARX, La Légende arthurienne et le Graal (Paris 1951), useful review and critical studies of the Grail texts with outlines of all the principal texts in an appendix. H. H. NEWSTEAD, Bran the Blessed in Arthurian Romance (New York 1939), the Welsh prototype of the Grail King in the various versions. Colloques internationaux du Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique 3: Les Romans du Graal aux XIIIe? et XIIIe siècles (Paris 1956), discusses various aspects and problems of the legend. R. S. LOOMIS, ed., Arthurian Literature in the Middle Ages (Oxford 1959) general discussion of the various Grail texts.

[H. C. GARDINER; J. MISRAHI]

HOLY HEART OF MARY, SERVANTS OF THE (SSCM, Official Catholic Directory #3520), a religious community of women that began in the middle of the 19th century when François Delaplace, a Holy Ghost Father, sought to gather abandoned children from the streets of Paris. In 1860 Jeanne Marie Moysan undertook to share his apostolate by directing an orphanage. After two years' preparation, she and others who followed her made private vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. From this initial group the congregation gradually developed. The orphanage was only the first step in Delaplace's life work, namely, the founding and directing of a religious congregation that became engaged in various apostolic works in France and elsewhere. The community received final approval from the Holy See in 1932.

In 1889, at the invitation of the VIATORIANs, the sisters came to the United States to serve at St. Viator College, Bourbonnais, Illinois. Charged with the infirmary and supervision of meal preparation, laundry, and linen rooms, the sisters thus participated in the work of the Viatorian Fathers until their college closed in 1938. Members of the congregation are engaged in teaching in elementary and secondary schools, in nursing and nursing education, in parish ministries, and in social work. The general motherhouse is in Montreal, Quebec, Canada. The United States provincialate is in Kankakee, Illinois.

[M. A. DOHENY/EDS.]

HOLY HOUR

An hour of mental or vocal prayer spent in veneration of the sufferings of Jesus, particularly those He endured in Gethsemane, and in worship of the love whereby He was led to institute the Eucharist. If the hour is spent in a church, or a public or semipublic oratory, a plenary indulgence may be gained under the usual conditions. The Holy Hour can be made alone or in company with others. Public Holy Hour is commonly accompanied by exposition of the Blessed Sacrament to add solemnity to the devotion. As a private devotion the preferred hour is from 11 P.M. until midnight on Thursdays, or from 2 P.M. on Thursday until midnight of Friday, but it is a commendable practice at any time.

St. Margaret Mary ALACOQUE has written the story of its origin. In 1674, very probably on the first Friday of July, she wrote “. . . while the Blessed Sacrament was exposed, I felt drawn within myself by an extraordinary recollection of all my senses and powers. Jesus Christ presented Himself to me all resplendent with glory. . . . Every week between Thursday and Friday, [He said] I will grant you to share in that mortal sadness which I chose to feel in the Garden of Olives. . . . You shall keep me company in the prayer I then offered to my Father. . . .” Each week thereafter Margaret kept the Holy Hour.

In France the devotion was propagated by a Jesuit priest, Robert Debrosse, who in 1829 formed an association that became the Archconfraternity of the Holy Hour with its center at the Visitation Convent at Paray-le-Monial. In the U.S. a public Holy Hour often terminates a day of recollection or a retreat. Many parishes have one scheduled weekly.

Enriched with indulgences, the exercise is singularly effective for spiritual growth. Sin is presented from God's point of view and in its relation to the agony of Christ; the example of His heroic obedience is considered; the main message of the Sacred Heart is made evident: “Behold this Heart which has so loved men.”

Bibliography: F. M. CATHERINET, Ce qu'il faut savoir pour bien comprendre et bien faire l'Heure Sainte (Paray-le-Monial 1932). K. RAHNER, Heilige Stunde und Passionsandacht (3d ed. Freiburg im Br. 1960).

[F. COSTA]

HOLY INFANT JESUS, SISTERS OF THE

Also known as Ladies Of St. Maur. The Sisters of the Holy Infant Jesus (Soeurs du Saint Enfant Jésus de Saint-Maur, HIJ), a congregation with papal approbation (1866), begun near Rouen, France, c. 1662 by (Blessed) Nicolas Barré, OMinim, for the education of poor girls. The sisters, who profess simple perpetual vows, are governed by a superior general who resides in Paris. The motherhouse is located on a street formerly called Saint-Maur; hence the title Ladies of St. Maur. Although engaged primarily as teachers in primary, secondary, and technical schools, they are active also in parish and social work, and child care institutions. The sisters are active in Europe and Asia.

[J. LE GRAND/EDS.]

HOLY LANCE

The spear that pierced Christ's side at His crucifixion. According to legend, the spear (hasta, ἔγχος) with which a Roman soldier pierced the side of Christ (Jn 19.34) was discovered by St. HELENA, at the time of the finding of the holy CROSS, in the early 4th century.

The presence of such a relic in Jerusalem is attested by numerous writers since the 6th century. When JERUSALEM was captured by the Persians in 614, the lance and other relics remained there, but the lance's point was broken off and given to the Patriarch Nicetas, who brought it to Constantinople, Oct. 28, 614. At some unknown date between 670 and 723 the lance was taken from Jerusalem to Constantinople. Both the shaft of the lance and its point remained at Constantinople after the pillage of the city in the Fourth Crusade, 1204 (see LATIN EMPIRE OF CONSTANTINOPLE). In 1241 a relic of the holy lance was sold by the Latin Emperor Baldwin II to LOUIS IX, King of France. Just what this relic was is uncertain. It remained in the Sainte-Chapelle at Paris until the French Revolution, when it was destroyed. The Constantinople lance was at Constantinople until 1492, when Sultan Bayazid II presented it to Pope INNOCENT VIII. It was then brought to Rome, where it still remains.

The holy lance now in the Weltliches Schatzkammer in Vienna is known as the lance of St. Maurice or Constantine's lance. Archeological evidence makes it certain, however, that this lance does not antedate the 8th or 9th century. Its history is attested by documentary evidence since the 10th century. It was used as a symbol of the imperial power, bestowed upon the Holy Roman Emperors at the time of their coronation. Another holy lance, that of Kraków, is apparently a facsimile of the Vienna lance and was presented by the German emperors to the Polish monarchs in the early 11th century.

Another holy lance was discovered at Antioch during the First Crusade by a Provençal peasant, Peter Bartholomew. The Antioch lance was in the possession of RAYMOND IV of Toulouse, until 1101, when it was lost during a battle in Asia Minor. From the early 13th century the Armenians have had a holy lance at Etchmiadzin. Its origin is unknown. It may be significant that this lance appeared in Armenia not long after the Antioch lance was lost, but it is impossible to prove that the two lances are identical.

See Also: RELICS.

Bibliography: BENEDICT XIV, De servorum Dei beatificatione et beatorum canonizatione, v.1–7 of Opera omnia, 17 v. (new ed. Prato 1839–47) 4:619–620, 625–626, 647–648, 695–697. F. D. DE MÉLY, Exuviae sacrae constantinopolitanae . . . La sainte Lance . . . (Paris 1904). S. RUNCIMAN, “The Holy Lance Found at Antioch,” Analecta Bollandiana 68 (1950) 197–209. P. E. SCHRAMM, Herrschaftszeichen und Staatssymbolik, 3 v. (Schriften der Monumenta Germaniae historica 13; Stuttgart 1954–56) v.2. A. BÜHLER, “Die heilige Lanze,” Das Münster 16 (1963) 85–116.

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

HOLY NAME, DEVOTION TO THE

The early Christians had a special reverence for the name of Jesus. The Holy Name appears in the earliest manuscripts and monuments under the abbreviated form, IH, which are the first two letters, iota and eta, of the Greek ΙΗΣΟΥΣ. In the 2nd century the final sigma was added, thus making it IHΣ or IHS. This custom became universal by the 6th century. The same abbreviation is found inscribed on many liturgical vestments today.

The Fathers. There is also a high esteem for the Holy Name in the writings of the early Christian Fathers. Following the example of St. PAUL in his Epistle to the Romans, they often concluded their letters and homilies with a doxology in which mention is made of the name of Jesus. Perhaps the earliest example is the Epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians. The Shepherd of Hermas, dating from the 2nd century, extols the great power of the Savior's Holy Name: “The Name of the Son of God is great and all-powerful: He it is Who sustains the entire world.” St. Justin, in his Dialogue with Trypho, declares that while certain people blaspheme the name Jesus, the whole world, Greek and barbarian, offers prayer and thanksgiving to God the Creator in the name of the crucified Jesus. St. PETER CHRYSOLOGUS, who was much respected in a later period of Christianity, attributes miraculous powers to the Holy Name.

The Middle Ages. During the Middle Ages there was a steady growth in the devotion to the sacred humanity of Christ, and one of the chief aspects of this form of piety was the reverence for the name of the Savior. St. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury from 1093 to 1109, wrote a Prayer to the name of Jesus, which became very popular. It is found in many manuscripts, and was included in numerous “books of hours” printed in the 15th and 16th centuries. St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, one of the greatest figures of the 12th century, devoted his Fifteenth Sermon on the Canticle of Canticles to the Holy Name. Commenting on the text: “your name is balm, poured forth,” the saint selects three qualities of balm (it illumines, nourishes, and heals) and applies them to the Holy Name. Portions of this sermon form the second lessons of the present Office in honor of the Holy Name. The famous hymn, Jesu dulcis memoria, written by an unknown monk toward the end of the 12th century was inspired by St. Bernard and testifies to the effect his preaching had in spreading the devotion. St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI, St. Bonaventure, and the Order of Friars Minor contributed greatly in the extending of the cult. In 1268, St. Louis the King, who was a Franciscan tertiary, sought and obtained from CLEMENT IV an indulgence for anyone reciting the prayer: “Blessed forever be the sweet name of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, and that of the most glorious Virgin Mary, His Mother, Amen.” The Second Council of Lyons, convened by GREGORY X in 1274, prescribed in canon 25 that the faithful should incline the head at the mention of the Holy Name, as a mark of reverence. Shortly after the council closed, the same pope addressed a letter to John of Vercelli, Master General of the Dominican Order, urging him to help spread the devotion to the Holy Name. The Dominican general acted at once, and informed all his provincials of the pope's wish and instructed them to take steps in fostering the devotion of the faithful by the preaching and teaching of the Friars. In the words of A. Cabassut, "This authoritative intervention only confirmed a devotion practiced in the order from its beginning."

In the 14th century three principal figures emerge as champions of the devotion. Richard Rolle of Hampole, an English hermit who received his theological training at Oxford and Paris, considered devotion to the Holy Name to be the base of the spiritual life, and the cornerstone of all Christian virtue. The results of his efforts were seen in the piety of the English monasteries. Bl. Henry Suso, the great Dominican mystic, drew the attention of the religious in Germany to the power and greatness of the name of Jesus. While these two men concentrated on the piety in the cloister, Bl. John Columbini of Siena preached the devotion to the masses in Italy. He noted with sadness that "the name of Jesus is dying." He urged his followers to correct this. "May your apostolate be directed to the praise of Jesus Christ, and may His Name never be distant from your hearts and mouths, even when you find yourselves occupied with exterior business."

SS. Bernardine and John Capistran. St. BERNARDINE of Siena, a Franciscan of the 15th century, added new momentum to the devotion. He was perhaps the most celebrated orator in Italy during his lifetime. In 1422, during a course of sermons at Venice, he launched a campaign whose aim was to revivify in the hearts of the faithful a love for, and a devotion to, the name of Jesus. At the conclusion of the sermons, the saint displayed before the throng a tablet bearing the Savior's name in letters of gold. The people responded with enthusiasm to St. Bernardine's theme and method. In their processions the faithful began to carry aloft the tablet bearing the inscription of the Holy Name. This form of adoration, however, met with disapproval in certain quarters and was considered to be nothing short of idolatry. Toward the end of the century, for example, the Dominican, Savonarola, fulminated against those who, treated such tablets as some sort of charm. Because of charges such as this, St. Bernardine, in his own lifetime, was summoned to the Papal Court in 1427 to render an explanation of his doctrine. MARTIN V listened to the saint expose his ideas concerning the cult of the Holy Name, and manifested wholehearted approval at once by requesting him to deliver some sermons in the Eternal City. In order to remove the occasion of any further misunderstanding, the pope ordered that in future processions the tablets bearing the inscription of the Savior's name should also carry an image of the crucifix. Hence today we sometimes see the symbol of the Holy Name and the crucifix together. Papal endorsement added to St. Bernardine's personal prestige and authority, and consequently to the growing devotion to the Holy Name.

St. JOHN CAPISTRAN, a friend and follower of St. Bernardine of Siena, stressed the devotion in many sermons delivered in Italy, France, and Germany. In 1455 the pope asked St. John to help in the preaching of a crusade against the oncoming Turks. The saint complied at once. One day while celebrating Mass, St. John received the assurance that victory for the Christians was inevitable, and that it would come through the power of the Holy Name and the crucifix. As a result, St. John concentrated all the more on this theme in his preaching. The promised victory became a reality on July 14, 1456.

The work of men such as St. Bernardine and St. John had an unmistakable effect on Christian piety during the 15th century. Many Christians had the name of Jesus inscribed over the doorways of their houses. Letters and official documents frequently began with an invocation to the Holy Name. St. JOAN OF ARC, for example, headed all her letters in this way, and her standard also bore the names of Jesus and Mary. Her dying words were "Jesus, Jesus, Jesus." Fifteenth century Missals contain a votive Mass to the "most sweet name of Jesus." The official liturgy, however, contained no special feast in honor of the Holy Name. Bernardine of Busti, a noted Franciscan preacher, asked Sixtus IV, and later Innocent VIII, to institute a special feast. He composed an Office and sent it along with his request. Although Bernardine's efforts went unrewarded in his lifetime, Clement VII, in 1530, allowed the Order of Friars Minor to celebrate a feast in honor of the Holy Name each year on January 14. In 1721, Germany's Emperor Charles VI prevailed on INNOCENT XIII to extend the celebration of the feast to the universal Church. The time was set at first for the second Sunday after Epiphany. PIUS X moved it to the Sunday between January 1 and Epiphany Sunday, or to January 2, when no Sunday intervenes.

Bibliography: A. CABASSUT, "La Dévotion au Nom de Jésus dans l'Église d'Occident," La Vie spirituelle 86 (Paris 1952) 46-69.

[M. KELLEY/EDS.]

HOLY NAME, ICONOGRAPHY OF

In early Greek manuscripts of the New Testament the name of Jesus was written in the abbreviated form IC (IHCOYC). The abbreviation was considered not only a practical device but also a way of conveying the sacred character. In the Latin manuscripts of the 4th century, the Greek letters were retained for the name of Jesus: IHS. St. Bernardino of Siena (1380-1444) was responsible for the devotion to the Holy Name, under the trigram IHS, made popular through his preaching and approved in 1432 by Eugene IV. In 1424 it was painted on the façade of S. Croce, Florence. The trigram on a flaming disc is represented in art as an attribute of St. Bernardino. Joan of Arc had it embroidered on her standard; later it was adopted by the Jesuit order as an abbreviation for Iesus Hominum Salvator. In the 17th century, the ceiling fresco "The Triumph of the Name of Jesus," showing the Holy Name adored by saints and angels, was painted in the Gesù Church, Rome, by G. B. Gaulli (Bacciaccio).

Child's stone sarcophagus, 4th century, decorated with two angels supporting a laurel wreath containing a Chi-Rho monogram of the name of Christ.

The Chi-Rho monogram is formed of the first two letters in the Greek name of Christ (XPICTOC). There are many variations of this design, which is often represented with the addition of the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, alpha (A) and omega (Ω). The monogram was of exceptional importance in early Christian art.

Bibliography: C. H. TURNER, "The nomina sacra in Early Latin Christian MSS," in Miscellanea Francesco Ehrle, 5 v. (Studi et Testi 37–41; 1924) 4:62–74. É. MÂLE, L'Art religieux de la fin du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle et du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (2d ed. Paris 1951). D. FORSTNER, Die Welt der Symbole (Innsbruck 1961)

48–58. P. R. BIASIOTTO, History of the Development of Devotion to the Holy Name (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1943).

[J. U. MORRIS]

HOLY NAMES OF JESUS AND MARY, SISTERS OF THE

A religious congregation (SNJM, Official Catholic Directory #1990) canonically established at Longueuil, Quebec, Canada (1844), by Bp. Ignatius Bourget of Montreal for the Christian education of children and young girls. The institute was legally incorporated by the Canadian Parliament on March 17, 1845. The decree of praise was issued by Pope Pius IX, Feb. 27, 1863; temporary approval of the constitutions followed on Sept. 4, 1877, and definite approval on June 26, 1901.

The need for recruits for his diocese led Bourget to Marseilles, France, in 1841, where Bp. Charles Eugène de Mazenod offered him the services of his newly established OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE. Peter Telmon, OMI, was assigned to the parish of Beloeil, Canada. Two years later Telmon made an unsuccessful appeal for religious teachers to the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary of Marseilles. The idea then developed of establishing a new community. To Eulalie Durocher (1811–49), a young woman of Beloeil, was confided the task of adapting the rule of the Marseilles community to conditions in Canada. Melodie Dufresne and Henriette Cere joined her and for several months they lived as novices under the direction of Francis Allard, OMI. When Bourget decided they were ready for admission to religious profession and for the canonical erection of the institute, the double ceremony took place on Dec. 8, 1844. The bishop then organized the first government of the Sisters of the Holy Names by appointing Mother Marie Rose Durocher superior, novice mistress, and procurator; Sister M. Agnes Dufresne, assistant; and Sister M. Madeleine Cere, general directress of manual work.

The community soon attracted other young women and the work was expanded by the opening of schools in Beloeil (1846) and in St. Lin and St. Timothy (1848). When Mother Marie Rose died on Oct. 6, 1849, she was succeeded as superior general by Mother Veronica Davignon (1849–57). Her contribution was the consolidation of the work and the preparation of the sisters for the expansion that was to come under her successor, Mother Theresa Martin, who was superior general for a decade (1857–67).

Responding to the urgent appeal of a missionary in the U.S., Abp. Francis Norbert Blanchet of Oregon City, Mother Theresa selected 12 from among the 72 members of her community and sent them (1859) to the Pacific Coast. Others joined them in Oregon in 1863 and 1864. In 1865, in response to an invitation from Bp. John J. Conroy of Albany, N.Y., a convent and an academy were established there. About the same time, Bp. Augustine Verot of St. Augustine, Fla., applied to the motherhouse for sisters. Under Mother Mary Stanislaus (1867–77), fourth superior general, missions were founded in Florida and California, and in Manitoba, Canada. A school that was opened in Oakland, Calif. (1868), at the invitation of Abp. Joseph S. Alemany of San Francisco, became the center from which elementary and secondary schools were established throughout California.

During the 20th century foundations multiplied: elementary and secondary schools, normal schools and colleges. In 1931 a mission was established in Basutoland, South Africa. A school was established (1931) in Kagoshima, Japan, but extreme nationalistic feeling made it necessary to recall the sisters in 1940. A native Japanese community maintains the school at Kagoshima. Three sisters from the California Province went to Arequipa, Peru, on Dec. 27, 1961. The generalate in Longueuil, Quebec, Canada directs the work of the community.

There are four provinces in the U.S.: Oregon (estb. 1859), California (estb. 1868), New York (estb. 1865) and Washington (estb. 1962).

Bibliography: J. B. CODE, Great American Foundresses (New York 1929). E. T. DEHEY, Religious Orders of Women in the U. S. (Hammond, Ind. 1930). P. J. B. DUCHAUSSOIS, Rose of Canada (Montreal 1934). M. F. DUNN, Gleanings of Fifty Years (Portland, Ore. 1909). J. M. MELANCON, Life of Mother Marie Rose (Montreal 1930).

[L. M. LYONS/EDS.]

HOLY OILS

Three holy oils are used in the Church's worship today: chrism, a blessed mixture of olive oil and balm; oil of catechumens, blessed olive oil; and oil of the sick, also blessed olive oil. This article treats the following subjects: use of oil in the Bible, use of oil in the rites of Baptism and Confirmation, use of oil of the sick, and other uses of holy oils.

Use of Oil in the Bible. In biblical times, oil was a condiment (Nm 11.8), a fuel for lamps (Mt 25.1–9), and a healing agent for wounds (Lk 10.34; cf. also Is 1.6). Perhaps the most frequently mentioned use of oil in the Bible is that of anointing. Kings (e.g., 1 Sm 10.1; 16.1, 13), priests (e.g., Ex 29.7), and prophets (e.g., 1 Kgs 19.16) were anointed. According to the Council of Trent, Christ instituted the Sacrament of Anointing of the Sick that was promulgated by the Apostle James (Jas 5.14; cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 1716). It was a mark of honor to anoint the head of a guest with oil (e.g., Lk 7.46). Anointing was a preparation for burial (Mk 16.1; Lk 23.56). Anointing with oil served also as a cosmetic to beautify and to prevent dessication of the skin (e.g., Ru 3.3; Jdt 10.3). Not only people were anointed; objects were as well. Jacob poured oil over the stone at Bethel as a kind of consecration (Gn 28.18); the tabernacle and its furniture were consecrated by anointing with oil (Ex 30.26–28); the shield of a warrior might be anointed (Is 21.5). Oil was also used in sacrifice (e.g., Ex 29.40; Nm 28.5). Finally, oil is used in certain figurative expressions to signify such things as abundance (Jl 2.24), soft words (e.g., Prv 5.3), joy (e.g., Is 61.3), brotherly unity (Ps 132.1–2), and the influence of the Holy Spirit (1 Jn 2.20, 27). Subsequently, the biblical use of oil influenced to a greater or lesser degree the Christian use of it. (See ANOINTING.)

Use of Oil in Baptism and Confirmation. The Apostolic Tradition (c. third century) speaks of an "oil of exorcism," with which the candidate was anointed before Baptism, and of an "oil of thanksgiving," with which he was anointed afterward (B. Botte, ed., La tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte: Essai de reconstitution [Liturgiegeschichtliche Quellen und Forschung, 1963] 21–22). Similarly, Tertullian (d. 230; De Bapt. 7), Cyprian (d. 258; Epist. 70.2), Cyril of Jerusalem (d. 386; Catech. 21.3), and Basil (d. 379; On the Spirit 27.66), among others, speak of anointing after Baptism. In the fourth-century Euchologion of Serapion (15–16) there are formulas for blessing the oils used in connection with Baptism; and there is a parallel passage in the Apostolic Constitutions (fourth century 7.42). In some cases, these anointings covered the whole body (cf. Pseudo-Dionysius, De eccl. hier. 2.3). Frequently the anointings conferred immediately after Baptism in the ancient Church were the Sacrament of Confirmation, which is the complement of Baptism. The oil employed in these early anointings was olive oil, the oil in common use. Possibly it was mixed with balm in some cases. Balm seems to have been used everywhere for chrism at least from the sixth century.

Oil of the Sick. There are few, if any, references to oil destined for the sick in the first two centuries of the Christian era. The reason is uncertain. The Apostolic Tradition contains a formula for blessing oil destined for the sick, but the document implies that the oil will be either tasted or applied to the body (5; Botte, 18). There are similar passages in the Apostolic Constitutions (8.29) and in the Euchologion of Serapion (5, 17). The Persian Aphraates (fourth century) speaks of an anointing of the sick with olive oil (Demonstrationes 23.3). However it is not always clear from these and other early testimonies whether such anointings of the sick are the Sacrament of Anointing of the Sick or only sacramentals [See ANOINTING OF THE SICK, I (THEOLOGY OF)]. An early reference (416) to the Anointing of the Sick is unquestionably the letter of Innocent I (401–417) to Decentius (Denzinger: 216).

Other Uses of Holy Oils. From the sixth century on, anointing gradually became an integral part of the coronation ceremony of Christian kings. It probably was suggested by the ancient Hebrew practice. In the Roman rite, a newly consecrated bishop was anointed upon the head with chrism. Amalarius of Metz (770?–850?) mentions an episcopal anointing in his Liber officialis (ed. J. Hanssens, 234). Historically, the hands of a newly ordained priest were anointed with the oil of catechumens. An early reference to this rite is found in the eighth-century Missale Francorum (ed. Mohlberg, 33). It seems that the anointing of bishop and priest was inspired by the kingly anointing. In the Eastern Churches, episcopal and sacerdotal anointings are almost unknown.

Bibliography: L. L. MITCHELL, Baptismal anointing (London 1966). G. AUSTIN, Anointing with the Spirit: The Rite of Confirma- tion: The Use of Oil and Chrism (New York 1985). G. AUSTIN, “Anointing with the Oil of Catechumens,” in Commentaries on the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (Chicago 1988) 15–24. D. BOROBIO, “An Enquiry into Healing Anointing in the Early Church,” in Concilium (1991/2) 37–49. M. DUDLEY, G. ROWELL, eds. The Oil of Gladness: Anointing in the Christian Tradition (Collegeville, Minn. 1993).

[E. J. GRATSCH/EDS.]

HOLY ORDERS

Order signifies a relation of many things in reference to one common beginning or end, and so arranged as to be mutually related. In ecclesiastical language, by a certain excellence the spiritual or sacred power that is conferred in the Church has been called “order” (Latin ordo, Greek τάξις or τάγμα). The Catechism of the Catholic Church explains that holy orders is the sacrament of apostolic ministry, i.e., “the sacrament through which the mission entrusted by Christ to his apostles continues to be exercised in the Church until the end of time” (CCC 1536). The term also signifies the sacred ordination or “to ordain,” i.e., the external rite or ceremonial whereby a degree of power is imparted, called in Greek the extension or IMPOSITION OF HANDS (χειροτονία, χειροθεσία). There are three degrees of holy orders: episcopate, presbyterate and diaconate.

Institution by Christ

The Council of Trent clearly reaffirmed (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum 1766) the previous teaching of the Church that Holy Orders or sacred ordination by which sacred power is conferred as instituted by Christ is a true Sacrament of the New Covenant. The priesthood and the sacrifice of the Old Law especially prefigured the New Dispensation, as the Prophets had foretold. It has always been Catholic teaching, based upon the testimony of Scripture, apostolic tradition, and the unanimous agreement of the Fathers, that to the new sacrifice that Christ inaugurated He associated a new priesthood empowered to continue His own priesthood until the consummation of the world (Council of Trent; Denzinger 1740, 1764). That the Apostles were conscious of and exercised this power and that they ordained bishops, priests, and deacons by the sacramental rite of the imposition of hands and the invocation of the Holy Spirit, is shown in the Acts and the Epistles (e.g., Acts 6.6; 13.3; 1 Tm 4.14; 5.22; 2 Tm 1.6). The witness of tradition from the earliest documents offers explicit acknowledgment of a divinely constituted hierarchy of bishops, priests, and deacons, and by the 4th century there is found express mention of the grace of order as clearly distinct from the sacred power conferred.

Categories of Orders

Sacred Scripture mentions priests and deacons; the historical minor orders of subdeacon, acolyte, exorcist, lector, and porter, were known since the early Church. In the sacerdotal order the bishop, as successor of the Apostles, is superior to the priest and is the principal hierarch with powers not at all possessed or not ordinarily enjoyed by other orders.

Origin. Bishop. It is of faith that the episcopacy is divinely instituted, and immediately by Christ, according to the far more common theological teaching. The institution of the episcopacy as such, as an order distinct from the simple priesthood, cannot be established with certainty from the Scriptures alone without the witness of tradition. The Scriptural terminology is quite fluid and the later fixed usage regarding bishop, priest, deacon does not appear in the New Testament writings. The names πρεσβύτερος and ἐπίσκοπος (as well as hegoumenos, praesidentes) were often used synonymously. Some interpret them to mean simple priests only; others, bishops only; and others, simple priests and sometimes bishops. All, however, are under the direction of the Apostles.

From Scripture it is clear that Christ established a priesthood and in this sense certainly an episcopacy. There are indications that in the Scriptures some are singled out for powers and functions that are proper and exclusive to those specifically called bishops in later times. This is the more ancient and common teaching of theologians. It is an open theological question whether or not the episcopacy as distinguished from the priesthood is sacramental, the older opinion judging negatively, the later and now more common, affirmatively. Leo XIII wrote: "But the episcopacy undoubtedly by the institution of Christ pertains most truly to the Sacrament of Orders and constitutes the sacerdotium in the highest degree, which surely by the teaching of the holy Fathers and our liturgical customs is called the 'summum sacerdotium, sacri ministerii summa'" (Apostolicae curae; Denzinger 3317). This doctrine was taught also by Vatican Council II in practically the same words (Const. on the Church 20–21).

It would seem that those to whom the terms bishop and successor of the Apostles subsequently were exclusively applied were individuals in the Apostolic Church whom the Apostles associated with themselves or delegated to carry on the office of Apostle-successors, e.g., Timothy and Titus (and according to some, James of Jerusalem inasmuch as he was not James of Alphaeus, one of the Twelve). The presbyters-bishops were dependent upon these Apostle-successors, as originally upon the Apostles themselves. In the tradition of the primitive Church the appellations of the incumbents of these successors evolved, although the hierarchical structure remained the same. Until the late 2d century, when the designation was clearly fixed, the term ἐπίσκοπος designated the presbyter, the presbyter-president of the college of presbyters, the bishop. See BISHOP (IN THE BIBLE); BISHOP (IN THE CHURCH); BISHOP (SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY OF).

Priest. Since the Scriptural usage of the terms was not fixed, and since certainly not all termed ἐπίσκοποι were bishops, or all called πρεσβύτεροι priests, the meaning cannot be derived from the words themselves but rather from the contexts or from what was signified in the particular instances. Probably the one sacerdotium was being referred to, at one time in its fullness and at another in a lesser degree, i.e., in a higher or lower order.

Precision of terminology begins only in the 2d century, and then only in the letters of Ignatius of Antioch (Ad Philadelphenses 4; J. Quasten, Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima 335). By the end of the 3d century the name presbyter was specifically applied only to the second grade of the hierarchy, and thereafter the distinction was commonly employed. Only much later, after the 5th century, did the term "sacerdos" (which had applied to bishops, priests, and deacons) come to be restricted to the presbyters. See PRIESTHOOD IN CHRISTIAN TRADITION.

Deacon. The existence of the diaconate (διακονία, ministry) as a distinct hierarchical and sacramental order is found in Scripture (Phil 1.1; 1 Tm 3.8–13; Acts 6.1–6) and is confirmed by the witness of tradition [Justin, 1 Apol. 65; Ignatius of Antioch, Ad Philadelphenses 4 (Quasten 17, 335)], its full characteristics being clearly discussed by the 4th century. DEACONS are clearly distinguished from the laity and from the priests (simple or episcopal) to whom they are subordinate and ministering. Deacons have from the beginning been ordained by the imposition of the hand of the bishop with the invocation of the Holy Spirit.

It is more commonly held that the Apostles ordained the original seven deacons. Theologians today hold it to be certain that the diaconate is of divine institution and a sacramental order (Council of Trent; Denzinger 1765, 1776). The "serving at table" would include their assistance at the celebration of the Eucharist and its distribution, which was usually joined with the agape of the early Christians. Moreover, they preached and administered Baptism (Acts 6.8–15; 7.1–60; 8.5–13, 38).

Subdeacon. The origins of the historical subdiaconate are obscure and testimony concerning it, silent. The existence of the SUBDEACON in the 3d century is affirmed in the Apostolic Tradition and in the practice of the Roman and African churches. Only gradually did it grow in importance through the assumption of more sacred functions and of the law of celibacy, and through its increasing connection with and necessity for higher orders. By the close of the 12th century it was patently ranked in the West among the major orders. In the East the subdiaconate was certainly an institution by the 4th century, as mentioned in the Councils of Antioch (341) and Laodicea (c. 343–381), but it has never to this day been reckoned among the sacred or major orders. In the Latin Church, the order of subdiaconate was abolished by Pope Paul VI in his motu proprio, Ministeria quaedam (Aug. 15, 1972).

Acolyte. An historical order that was found only in the Western Church. In fact, it was hardly even noted in the Gallican-rite churches of the West (Gaul, Spain, Milan). Early evidence of it in Rome and in Africa is found in SS. Jerome, Augustine, and Cyprian, and Popes Siricius and Zosimus. The later influence of the Gallican upon the Roman liturgy lessened the position and functions of this office. However, with the lapse of the lectorship and office of exorcist from about the 6th to the 9th centuries, the ACOLYTE remained to assist at the altar and at priestly ministrations. By the 8th century the order had become the requisite step to the subdiaconate. In 1972, it was abolished by Pope Paul VI in his motu proprio, Ministeria quaedam, who created the ministry of acolyte in its place and opened it to the laity.

Lector. This is the most ancient order below the diaconate of which there is record; it is mentioned early in the 3d century by Tertullian, the Apostolic Tradition, and in about the middle of the next century by the Didascalia Apostolorum. The LECTOR was used very early in the Roman, Carthaginian, and Syriac churches. From about the 4th to the 10th centuries it lost a large portion of its prominence and functions. This was due to the practice of conferring ordinations that bypassed (per saltum) the lectorship and to the admission to this order of youngsters with the result that the function of singing was restricted to them and the other functions of the office assumed by older and higher clerics. In the Latin Church, Pope Paul VI abolished the minor order of lector in his motu proprio Ministeria quaedam, and replaced it with the ministry of reader, which is opened to laypeople.

Exorcist. Sepulchral inscriptions of the 3d and 4th centuries attest to the existence of the exorcist (see EXORCISM). The position of this order subsequently declined with the promotion of young men to the other clerical grades and due to instances in which adults were ordained by bypassing (per saltum) the order of exorcist. Likewise, with the lapse of the catechumenate during which period the exorcist had exercised his order, and with the assumption of these baptismal exorcisms by the acolytes and priests, the role of the exorcist was lessened. Its long presence in the Roman usage came with the influence of the Gallican practice. Pope Paul VI suppressed the minor order of the exorcist in 1972.

Porter. The order of PORTER seems not to have received much attention in the early Church because of its slight importance. At best it is mentioned only in passing in the early testimonies. Although Pelagius I referred to it in the 6th century as the beginning of the clerical state, it appears to have fallen into desuetude by the end of the 4th century, and its functions were exercised even by laymen. The survival of the porter in Gallican usage brought about its revival in the Roman practice around the 10th century. It survived in the Roman Rite until its abolition in 1972 by Pope Paul VI.

Tonsure. Clerical TONSURE was never considered an order but only a special rite of introduction into the ranks of the clergy. It appeared to have developed from the early Christian practice, with Semitic roots, of cutting the hair to symbolize humility. In relation to the clerical state it was also a sign of holiness. The rite, already indicated in the 6th century, was in stable use by the 8th century, as noted in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries. From being a private ceremony in the beginning, it gradually assumed a public and official character. Initially it was connected with the ceremony of first ordination, but in the West certainly by the 12th century it had become a separate and distinct ceremony. The tonsured person was thus set apart from the laity, whether or not he thereafter received clerical orders. In the East tonsure was a less prominent rite and it seems probable that, as today, it was always joined to the reception of the lectorship or cantorship. In the Latin Church, Pope Paul VI abolished the tonsure in his 1972 motu proprio, Ministeria quaedam.

Deaconess. From the period of the public ministry of Our Lord and of the Apostles pious women had offered their service to the ministers of the Church in the form of works of charity and temporal aid. The office of DEACONESS in the Church developed in time, probably growing out of the system of organized widowhood in the early Church (about the 2d century). The institution of the deaconess arose in the East (about the 3d century) before appearing as such in the West (about the 5th century). With the rise of monastic houses for women and with the gradual discontinuance of the ceremony of Baptism by immersion in which the deaconess assisted the women candidates, the office of the deaconess correspondingly lapsed in the 7th century. Between the 10th and 12th centuries it disappeared in the West, although it survived somewhat longer in parts of the East.

Historical Division into Major and Minor Orders. In the Latin Church, historically the major orders comprised priesthood, diaconate, and subdiaconate; the minor orders were those of porter, lector, exorcist, and acolyte (Council of Trent; Denzinger 1765). First tonsure is not commonly listed among the orders, nor is the episcopacy, which was not considered an order adequately distinct from the priesthood; some, however, taking "order" in the wider sense, enumerate one or both. Before the 12th century the present distinction of major and minor orders was not clearly fixed. That the Latin Church, in particular the Roman Church, developed the minor orders early can be discerned from ancient documents. These orders may be distinguished from other offices and dignities by reason of their stable character and conferral by a sacred rite. The full list of orders below the diaconate was given by Pope Cornelius around 251 as existing in the Roman Church. By the end of the 12th century the subdiaconate had taken on such prominence that it was already classed among the major or sacred orders. The 1972 motu proprio of Pope Paul VI, Ministeria quaedam, abolished all the minor orders and the subdiaconate, thereby removing the distinction between minor and major orders.

In the Eastern Church the subdiaconate has always been held as a minor order, except for some few rites, notably the Armenians, who since the 11th century have followed the Latins. This is probably because the subdeacon does not minister at the altar nor come to it for the sacrifice nor touch the sacred vessels on the altar. The earliest mention of orders below the diaconate is to the lectorship and the subdiaconate; these two alone have been commonly maintained in the Eastern Church. More generally the office of cantor has been attached to the lectorship, although some would hold it to be an order. Others maintain that the lectorship or subdiaconate contains the order of porter, exorcist, and acolyte.

One or Many Sacraments. It is Catholic teaching that there are only seven Sacraments, no more or less, and that Holy Orders is one of them. Thus, regardless of the number of orders existing and accepted, they all together constitute but one Sacrament. The priesthood (with the episcopacy) and the diaconate at least are clearly sacramental as of divine institution, notwithstanding theological opinion respecting the other orders. The problem thus lies in the manner in which these orders are Sacraments and yet form but the one specific Sacrament of Holy Orders. Several solutions have been proposed.

The most common solution follows the view of St. Thomas (Summa Theologiae, Suppl. 37.1 ad 2) that considers this Sacrament in the manner of a potential or potestative whole, whereby the essence, power, and character of the Sacrament reside perfectly and fully in the priesthood and less completely in the diaconate (and, according to some, in the other orders). To consider this Sacrament as a universal whole would result in several specifically different Sacraments; to consider it as an integral whole would require the presence of all the orders at once.

Sacramental Rite

The conferral of the Sacrament of Holy Orders is through a sacred sign. Whether the entire sign or only its signification has been instituted by Christ depends upon whether the theory of the generic or specific institution of this Sacrament is supported. The opinion that Christ established only the signification of this Sacrament and left it to the Church to determine the material element that under a form or formula of words would convey this signification, or that He instituted an indeterminate material element or merely an imposition of hands and left the rest to the determination of the Church, is held by some. The more common opinion holds for a specific institution.

Matter and Form. In the churches of the Christian East, the orders have always been conferred by the imposition of hands and this was the one essential rite in the Latin Church before the 10th century. It seems to have been generally taught in the late Middle Ages and for a long time thereafter that the essential rite was the handing over of the instruments, although this does not disprove the continued existence of the rite of imposition of hands. The Decree for the Armenians of the Council of Florence cites the handing over of the instruments as the matter of the Sacrament in each order (Denzinger 1326), but the doctrinal value of this decree is disputed and some assert that it is not definitive but merely expository in that it states the common theology of the day in this question. It is more probable that the imposition was always the matter of this Sacrament and even by divine institution.

In his apostolic constitution Sacramentum Ordinis of Nov. 30, 1947, Pius XII declared that thenceforth the episcopacy, priesthood, and diaconate would be conferred in each instance by the one and only essential and valid rite, namely, the designated imposition of hands and the designated form, the consecratory Preface [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 40 (1948) 5–7].

Minister. It has always been Catholic teaching that the bishop is the ordinary minister of the Sacrament of Holy Orders by divine institution (Council of Trent; Denz 1768, 1777, CIC 1983, c. 1012). Scripture indicates only bishops as the ministers of sacred orders (Acts 6.6; 13.3; 1 Tm 4.14; 5.22; 2 Tm 1.6). This has been the traditional practice in the Church, as ancient liturgical and canonical writings testify.

Priest as Extraordinary Minister. The question has been long discussed whether a simple priest can be also an extraordinary minister of Holy Orders or whether the bishop is the exclusive minister by divine right. Contrary to the opinion of the canonists, the older theologians held that a simple priest could not by commission of the pope become the extraordinary minister of the major orders. They followed more or less this conclusion as stated by both St. Thomas and Duns Scotus, although for different reasons. It became commonly agreed that a properly commissioned priest could confer minor orders (this commission was often given by the pope) and even the subdiaconate (a practice in the Greek Church but not in the Latin).

With the coming to light of three papal bulls (Boniface IX, Sacrae religionis, Feb. 1, 1400; Martin V, Gerentes ad vos, Nov. 16, 1427; Innocent VIII, Exposcit, April 9, 1489), an increasing number of theologians to the present day have been maintaining, with varying degrees of theological probability and of certitude, that a simple priest can be commissioned by the pope to confer the diaconate and even the priesthood. The cited papal bulls seem to have granted to certain abbots (not in episcopal orders) the power to ordain their subjects to the diaconate. Dispute obtains regarding the force and meaning of these documents in view of the longstanding tradition in the Church and the widespread theological teaching regarding the bishop as the exclusive minister of the diaconate and the priesthood. The common teaching today rejects the opinion that a simple priest may act as extraordinary minister of these orders, although the opinion that he may must be considered as at least probable.

Worthiness and the Question of Reordination. For the valid administration of Holy Orders neither the presence of grace nor the state of grace is required in the minister (Council of Trent; Denzinger 1612, 1710), since the power of God and the merits of Christ and not the dispositions and merits of the minister confer this sacramental validity. But the sanctity and dignity of the Sacrament demands for its lawful and worthy administration that the minister be in the state of grace, free of ecclesiastical penalties, and observant of the requirements of law regarding the conferral of ordination.

The firm and explicit teaching of the Church regarding the relationship or dependence of the validity of a Sacrament upon the dispositions or condition of the minister and its common practice regarding REORDINATION was long in coming. The doubts and the subsequent controversies began with St. Cyprian in the 3d century in regard to the validity of Baptism administered by heretics. The dispute was extended during the Donatist heresy and schism to the validity of ordinations performed by those who were publicly unworthy. In subsequent centuries unworthiness tended to center especially around those involved in concubinage or simony, or subjected to excommunication. Theologians disputed the question and many prelates, even some popes, practiced reordination in such cases. The definitive settlement of the controversy began with the efforts of Paschal II (Council of Guastalla, 1106; Denzinger 705) and of Innocent III (in the profession of faith required of the Waldensians in 1208; Denzinger 793) whereby the principle of the validity of the Sacraments independently of the dispositions of the minister was upheld. Thus the ancient practice and teaching of the Church was restored and became widely and permanently effective.

Intention. The Council of Trent, in harmony with previous papal statements, made it clear that in effecting and conferring the Sacraments the minister must have an intention at least of doing what the Church does (sess. 7, c.11; Denzinger 1624). Thus in conferring the Sacrament of Holy Orders the minister is a voluntary and vitally responsible agent of Christ in this action. He must have a deliberate intention formed at least in some general and implicit fashion, and this must truly bear upon the conferral by his action of what, by the institution of Christ, is a sacramental administration of Holy Orders. He thus intends to do at least what the Church does (which is a sacramental conferral). This is implicitly the very same intention of doing what Christ's Church herself does. Besides a defective matter or form, an intention which is defective also invalidates the Sacrament. Thus there must be on the part of the minister a serious will not merely to perform an external application of the matter and form but also to confer a rite that as a matter of fact is considered by the Church as sacred. The intention need not be actual but it must be at least virtual in order to bear upon the sacramental action at hand. A minister, otherwise qualified and applying valid matter and form, who has at least the above minimum qualities of intention, will validly confer Holy Orders. (See ANGLICAN ORDERS; APOSTOLICAE CURAE.)

Recipient. Just as for the minister, there are certain requirements that must be met by the ordinand. Some of these requirements pertain to validity, others to liceity.

Valid Reception. Only a baptized male with at least a habitual intention of receiving this Sacrament is a capable subject of valid ordination (CIC 1983, c. 1024). Only males can validly receive sacred ordination by divine law, and any prudent doubt, as in the case of the hermaphrodite or pseudohermaphrodite, must bar the candidate from ordination. Moreover, the Church has always understood and insisted upon as essential the reception of Baptism before allowing the reception of Holy Orders.

Essential to valid reception also is an internal intention or will of receiving this Sacrament, since no adult receives a Sacrament unwillingly. There must be a voluntary, positive act of the will and not a passive attitude to the reception. For the reception of a Sacrament a habitual intention suffices, although a virtual or actual intention is recommended as more fruitful. The recipient is in the condition of one receiving a gift and a benefit, and thus it suffices that the reception be voluntary, which is ensured by a habitual intention. However, for the reception of Holy Orders the habitual intention must be explicit to receive what de facto the Church and the minister intend to confer and thus to be received, namely, the Sacrament and its effect. The reason is that the intention must include an advertence to the clerical state and its obligations, since these are not practically contained implicitly in the habitual intention to live a Christian life. Only when such an explicit intention is present can the ordination of one asleep or unconscious, drunk, or insane be considered valid. Baptized infants are validly ordained, but may choose the clerical or lay state upon completion of their 16th year.

It is commonly taught that a candidate who deceitfully (ficte) receives Orders, i.e., inwardly dissenting or refusing, is invalidly ordained. However, a cleric who receives Orders under the influence of grave fear or deceit receives them validly; he is to be reduced to the lay state unless he has subsequently ratified the ordination upon the removal of the obstacle. The lawful intention required of a clerical vocation is considered below.

Lawful Reception. For the lawful reception of Holy Orders, i.e., that the candidate be considered qualified, other conditions are required by the Church and are comprised under the qualities of divine vocation, suitability, and freedom from canonical impediments.

Admission to Holy Orders is subject to the judgment and authority of the Church, to whom the Sacraments have been entrusted. The norms or requirements forming the basis of judgment are signs of the presence of a divine interior vocation, which they presuppose, guarantee, or recognize. Vocation to the clerical state, then, consists of the divine interior act of selection of and preparation of the candidate with suitable endowments of nature and grace for the worthy exercise of priestly duties. Together with this must be the call and acceptance of the Church through the bishop upon judgment of the suitability or worthiness of the candidate who gives evidence of an interior vocation. The principal signs of this clerical vocation are a right intention, probity of life, and suitability.

Besides the intention, which is necessary for the valid reception of the Sacrament, the candidate must have the right intention essential to a clerical vocation. It is his response to God's special grace and the primary sign of a divine vocation, namely, a free, firm, and constant supernatural motivation to procure the glory of God and the salvation of souls with the determination to go on for the priesthood.

The bishop should confer Sacred Orders only if he is morally certain of the canonical fitness of each candidate, i.e., of the presence of the qualities of mind and body, of nature and grace and proven virtue required and suited for bearing the burdens and fulfilling the tasks of the priesthood. The candidate must be sound physically and psychologically and possess the intellectual ability and knowledge set forth in the pertinent regulations of the Church and other competent authorities. The lawful reception of Orders demands outstanding and habitual goodness of life, especially perfect chastity. Solid possession of this latter virtue is an indispensable condition of a clerical vocation and its presence must be positively evident, profoundly appreciated, and zealously cherished and not merely assumed by reason of any absence of deviation.

The 1983 Code of Canon Law also prescribes minimum age requirements: "The presbyterate is not to be conferred except on those who have completed the 25th year of age and possess sufficient maturity; an interval of at least six months to be observed between the diaconate and the presbyterate. Those destined to the presbyterate are to be admitted to the order of deacon only after completing the twenty-third year of age" (CIC 1983, c.1031 §1). The interstices are to be observed, i.e., the fitting intervals laid down by law between the reception of one order and another, in order to provide a period of trial and preparation as well as the exercise of one order before promotion to the next.

The lawful reception of Holy Orders requires that the candidate have already received the Sacrament of Confirmation (CIC 1983, c.1024). Those who are bound to the divine ministry by ordination ought to be strong in the faith themselves and leaders of others in its witness and defense. Holy Orders fittingly complements the perfections of grace and the gifts of the Holy Spirit already received in the other Sacraments. Each order is to be received in its proper sequence and no intermediate order omitted per saltum.

A candidate for Holy Orders must be free of all canonical irregularities and impediments. Both are ecclesiastical disqualifications prohibiting primarily and directly the reception of orders and secondarily and indirectly their exercise. They do not invalidate but rather render unlawful the reception or exercise of orders, and are considered to bind gravely. An irregularity is of its nature perpetual, whether based upon a defect or a delict, and is removable only by dispensation. An impediment is temporary, the basis being considered to be lack of faith or of freedom or of good repute. The impediment may cease by dispensation, the lapse of time, or the removal of the cause. The purpose behind all these disqualifications is to safeguard the dignity of the clerical state and office, reverence and becomingness in the sacred ministry, and to avoid offense to the laity by reason of unfit ministers of the altar.

Canonical Procedures. Candidates for promotion to orders must possess testimonial letters giving proof of Baptism and Confirmation or of the last order received, of the prescribed studies completed, of good moral character, and of the absence of a canonical impediment.

Differing from the aforesaid are DIMISSORIAL LETTERS by which one bishop or superior releases his subject and sends him to another bishop with the faculty of receiving orders from him.

The names of candidates for individual sacred orders (with the exception of perpetually professed religious) should be announced publicly in their respective parish churches, unless the ordinary dispenses or makes other arrangements.

Fruitful Reception. As a Sacrament of the living, Holy Orders should be received in the state of grace. To receive in the state of sin an order that certainly has the dignity of a Sacrament would itself be a grave sin. In order to provide for better dispositions for the reception of orders, all candidates for any order are to make a spiritual retreat for at least five days in a place or manner determined by the ordinary (CIC 1983, c. 1039).

Effects

It is of faith that Sacraments confer grace; it is also a defined dogma that Holy Orders confers, in addition, an indelible character.

Sacramental Grace. “From the testimony of Scripture, apostolic tradition and the unanimous agreement of the Fathers it is clear that grace is conferred by sacred ordination” [Trent, sess. 23, ch. (Denz 1766); c.4 (Denz 1774)]. This grace is noted by the Apostle Paul in 1 Tm 4.14 and 2 Tm 1.6–7. It is not only sanctifying grace, which is common to all the Sacraments, but also sacramental grace, the particular effect of grace of this Sacrament of Holy Orders. This sacramental effect, whether it be, theologically speaking, in the nature of a right to the actual graces corresponding to the purpose of the Sacrament or a modality of habitual grace directing to the same goal, is specified by the end of the Sacrament. The Council of Florence (Decree for the Armenians) speaks of an “increase of grace so that one may be a suitable minister,” and Pius XII of “the grace proper to this particular function and state of life” (Mediator Dei 42). To be a suitable minister implies all the virtues and supernatural helps attendant upon the proper and worthy exercise of liturgical functions, especially the Sacrifice of the Mass, and the duties respecting the sanctification, instruction, and direction of the faithful. In particular the form for the ordination of a deacon prays that the Holy Spirit might strengthen the candidate “with the sevenfold gift of grace to carry out faithfully the work of the ministry”; the form for the priesthood asks the Father Almighty to “renew within him the spirit of holiness so that he may hold the office of second rank which he has received from Thee, O God, and by the example of his life give a pattern of upright conduct”; the form for episcopal consecration beseeches, “give to thy priest the fullness of thy ministry, and sanctify with the dew of the heavenly anointing him who is adorned with the vesture of the highest dignity.” The various virtues and leadership in holiness that the documents of tradition describe regarding the recipients of sacred ordination seem to be reduced to various aspects of charity, enlightenment, and service on the part of the bishop, priest, and deacon, respectively.

Character. The other and permanent effect of the Sacrament of Holy Orders is the spiritual and indelible character imprinted on the soul of the recipient of ordination, with the result that no valid order may be repeated or lost (Council of Trent; Denz 1767, 1774). Besides the nature and function common to the characters of Baptism and Confirmation, the character of Holy Orders has its proper and specific role, “shaping sacred ministers to the likeness of Christ the Priest, and enabling them to perform the lawful acts of religion by which men are sanctified and God duly glorified according to the divine ordinance” (Pius XII, Mediator Dei 42). It confers the power over the real body of Christ to consecrate, offer, and administer His Body and Blood, and the power over His Mystical Body to prepare the faithful, by the Sacraments and the preaching of the word, to be fit and worthy for the Sacrament of the Eucharist. This character is imprinted in each sacramental order, depending on the theological view held as to the sacramentality of the various orders. It is an active power whereby the recipient, according to his order, can accomplish in the name and person of Christ the sacramental rites destined for Christian worship and for the sanctification of the faithful, and by which also he is constituted a leader of the Christian community in liturgical functions. Theologians dispute whether this character is one, with many powers being, as it were, successively released or conferred, or many, either adequately or inadequately distinct among themselves, perfectly or imperfectly.

Bibliography: De ordinatione episcopi, presbyterorum et diaconorum (Vatican City 1990). A. STANTANTONI, L'ordinazione episcopale: storia e teologia dei riti dell'ordinazione nelle antiche

Regalia from the Holy Roman Empire. (©Ali Meyer/CORBIS)

liturgie dell'Occidente (Rome 1976). P.F. BRADSHAW, Ordination Rites of the Ancient Churches of East and West (New York 1990). J. PUGLISI, The Process of Admission to Ordained Ministry: A Comparative Study, 3 vols. (Collegeville, Minn. 1996–). A. LAMERI, La traditio instrumentorum e delle insegne nei riti di ordinazione: studio storico-liturgico (Rome 1998). J. S. H. GIBAUT, The Cursus Honorum: A Study of the Origins and Evolution of Sequential Ordination (New York 2000).

[N. HALLIGAN/EDS.]

HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE

The term “Holy Roman Empire” has been used to distinguish the Medieval German Empire from the Ancient Roman Empire and the Greek Roman (Byzantine) Empire in the East. The line of emperors in the Western provinces of the Roman Empire came to an end with the death of Romulus Augustulus in A.D. 476. An Eastern line of Roman emperors continued to rule in Greek Constantinople, and these emperors carried on the traditions of ancient Rome until the city was conquered by the Ottoman Turks in 1453. They called themselves “Roman,” and they were Christian. Like the ancient Romans, they never called their empire “Holy.” There was a long interregnum in the West from the death of Romulus Augustulus until Pope Leo III crowned Charles the Great (CHARLE-MAGNE) emperor in Rome on Dec. 25, 800. Charles was the king of a Germanic tribe, the FRANKS. Although his new title may have been Roman, his lordship, customs, and concepts of kingship were thoroughly Germanic. In Roman terms he was emperor in name only. The best example of the new empire’s Germanic roots is its inheritance laws. Following Germanic customary law, Charles and his successors conceived of their realm as their private, not public, property. When they died, they divided it among their male heirs. They could not imagine that an empire or a kingdom should be an inalienable, unified territory. This practice led to political instability and civil war and, in a short time, a fragmented empire.

After Charlemagne revived the title of emperor in the West, the title “Holy Roman Empire” evolved slowly. Charles had styled himself simply “emperor.” In 982 Emperor OTTO II began to use the title “emperor Augustus of the Romans.” The expansion of the title had political consequences. To validate their assumption of the title “Emperor of the Romans,” the Ottonian emperors tried to extend their authority into Italy. They also created even more elevated titles for themselves. Otto III (983–1002) adopted Byzantine practices of calling himself “servant of Jesus Christ” and “servant of the apostles.” This last title imitated the pope’s “servant of the servants of God.” Sacral kingship was a widespread notion in the early Middle Ages. Kings and emperors received the unction of consecrated oil at their coronations. It gave them a special liturgical and canonical status. No emperor could receive major clerical orders, but he occupied a position above other laymen. The emperor was the Advocate and Defender of the Roman church (advocatus et defensor romanae ecclesiae) and was also responsible for establishing the City of God on earth and ruling it as the Son of the Church (filius ecclesiae). The emperor was consequently the lord of Christendom, universal and omniscient, the terrestrial agent of the divine Emperor, God, to whom every faithful Christian (fidelis) owed obedience and faith (fides). It is not surprising then that the term “Holy Empire” was used in the letters of Emperor FREDERICK BARBAROSSA (ca. 1157) to describe the territory over which he ruled. If he were the divinely appointed ruler over all Christians, his realm could be justifiably described as holy. Finally, the entire title “Holy Roman Empire” was used for the first time in 1254. Ironically this title was not adopted until after the empire had begun its long decline in the later Middle Ages. When the eighteenth-century French philosopher Voltaire declared that the Holy Roman Empire was “neither holy, nor Roman, nor an empire” his epigram had more than a grain of historical truth.

Sacred imagery characterized the rhetoric of the Germanic empire and permeated the language of its documents. The chancellery of Frederick Barbarossa added “holy” to the title of his empire to signify that the empire was divinely ordained and worthy of sharing power and authority with the Roman Catholic Church in the Christian world. The emperor was God’s representative on earth. Frederick also asserted that he was the “Lord of the world” (Dominus mundi) and held a higher office than all other kings. From the early Middle Ages, the Church had been called the “Holy Roman Church.” Its title indicated that it represented in the divine order. Kingdoms were not normally labeled “holy.” The use of the term “Holy Empire” is an important signpost for understanding the most significant conflict between Church and State in the Middle Ages.

During the high Middle Ages the Germanic empire and the Roman Catholic Church both claimed universal authority over Christendom. Each represented a model of rulership that mirrored the heavenly monarchy. Each represented the unity of Christendom. In the period from 900 to 1250, the “Holy Empire” vied with the “Holy Roman Church” to be the embodiment of Christian universal authority. In the beginning the empire and the Church were not equals. From the time of the first Christian emperor, Constantine, until the middle of the eleventh century, the emperors exercised considerable authority and power over bishops and their clergy. The Germanic emperors who succeeded Charlemagne and other secular princes appointed bishops, abbots, and clergy to ecclesiastical offices. They employed bishops as officials in the imperial courts. Occasionally they even deposed popes and selected their successors. The eleventh century, however, marked a fundamental change in the relationship between the Church and the Empire. Reformers within and outside the Church began to realize that secular lay princes should not exercise authority in ecclesiastical affairs. Pope NICHOLAS II (1058–1061) promulgated a decree that forbade the emperor from participating in the election of the pope in 1059, and Pope GREGORY VII (1073–1085) issued several decrees that forbade the emperor and lay princes from investing bishops with the symbols of their offices. Gregory made Libertas ecclesiae, Freedom of the Church, a principle of canon law and a maxim of ecclesiastical rhetoric. Gregory VII attacked the emperor’s sacral, almost clerical, status and his position as the head of Christendom. By forbidding the emperor’s investiture of bishops Gregory undermined imperial control of bishops. A long series of events marked the bitter conflict between the Roman church and the Germanic empire. Gregory excommunicated and then deposed Emperor Henry IV (1056–1106) in an unprecedented action. Henry retaliated by supporting an anti-pope, Clement III (1080–1100) militarily. Emperor Henry V (1106–1125) finally acknowledged the autonomy of the Church in the Concordat of WORMS (September 1122), but that treaty with the papacy did not establish a completely independent Church. The empire was, however, considerably weakened. The emperor gave up his right to bestow the ring and episcopal staff (crozier) that were the symbols of spiritual authority in the Concordat. This was a significant step in recognizing the Church as a separate institution that was completely independent of imperial and lay control. The Concordat was binding only within the empire. It was a compromise that did not ultimately solve the problem of how the Church and the Empire would co-exist in Christendom.

During the twelfth century the popes attempted to establish Libertas ecclesiae, which they interpreted as complete freedom from lay interference and control, as a fundamental principle of ecclesiastical government. The emperors, especially Frederick Barbarossa, refused to accept a Church that claimed superiority over them. Consequently, with the emperor’s support there were many papal schisms within the Latin church. The emperors opposed papal claims of authority by supporting pro-imperial factions within the Church who elected anti-popes. These anti-popes recognized imperial prerogatives. The emperors’ ecclesiastical policies put enormous strain on the stability of the Church. The twelfth-century emperors supported ten anti-popes. These “popes” reigned for a total of 41 years. Pope Alexander III’s (1059–1081) agreement with the Emperor Frederick I Barbarossa in 1177 brought this long line of “imperial anti-popes” to an end and began a short period of reconciliation between the pope and the empire.

Pope Innocent III’s (1198–1216) policies posed a new challenge to the relationship of the Sacerdotium (Church) and Regnum (State) that had been established in the twelfth century. Innocent had a high and exalted view of papal power. He claimed that the pope “has his authority because he does not exercise the office of man, but of the true God on earth.” He also compared imperial power to the moon and papal power to the sun. The dignity of the empire came from the light that it received from the sun. Innocent clearly wished to place the office of the pope above the emperor’s. The most difficult task Innocent faced in his first years as pope was the struggle between Otto of Brunswick and Philip of Hohenstaufen for the office of the emperor after the death of the Emperor Henry VI (1190–1197). The German princes had divided their votes between these two candidates for the imperial throne. Innocent had moved quickly to assert his authority to choose between them. This was an unprecedented exercise of papal jurisdiction over an imperial election. He established the right of the pope to choose one of the candidates as emperor in a decretal letter, Venerabilem, which quickly became part of canon law of the Church.

Innocent promulgated a number of decrees that in which he claimed papal authority over a number of secular matters. Papal claims of secular authority and power over the Papal States in Central Italy led to further conflicts with the Emperor FREDERICK II (1212–1250) during the thirteenth century. Innocent's successors, popes Gregory IX (1227–1241) and Innocent IV (1243–1254), carried on Innocent's campaign to establish the papacy as the highest tribunal of Christendom. Gregory and Innocent excommunicated Frederick II when he threatened papal authority and lordship in Italy. Finally Innocent IV convened a general council in the city of Lyon (1245). He summoned Frederick II to stand trial and charged Frederick with a variety of crimes. When the emperor refused to submit to the Council, Innocent excommunicated him and called upon the king of France to launch a crusade against him. Frederick died a few years later.

This last sorry spectacle was the final battle in the war to establish a single, universal authority in Christendom. The Holy Roman Church triumphed over the Holy Roman Empire. After the death of Frederick II and after the long interregnum that followed, the Holy Roman Empire was little more than one medieval kingdom among many. The interregnum was ended in 1273 by the election of Rudolph I of Hapsburg, and under his successors the Medieval Roman Empire grew even more limited in power and territory. The kings of the national monarchies adopted many imperial prerogatives formerly reserved for emperors. In the later Middle Ages some of these kings attempted to exercise lordship over the Church that had similarities to the authority claimed by the Germanic emperors before the Investiture Controversy. From 1438 the Holy Roman Empire came to be the virtual possession of the house of Hapsburg and so lingered on as a mere relic of its medieval greatness, until its final dissolution in 1806.

Bibliography: J. B. BRYCE, The Holy Roman Empire (New York 1919). J. W. THOMPSON, Feudal Germany (Chicago 1928). G. BARRACLOUGH, The Origins of Modern Germany (2d ed. Oxford 1957; pa. New York 1963). K. HAMPE, Deutsche Kaisergeschichte in der Zeit der Salier und Staufer, ed. F. BAETHGEN (10th ed. Heidelberg 1949). F. KEMPF, Papstum und Kaisertum bei Innocenz III.: Die geistigen und rechtlichen Grundlagen seiner Thronstrategie (Miscellanea Historiae Pontificiae 58; Rome 1954). W. GOEZ, Translatio imperii (Tübingen 1958). G. TELLENBACH, Church, State and Christian Society at the Time of the Investiture Contest, tr. R. F. BENNETT (Oxford 1959). T. E. MOMMSEN and K. F. MORRISON, trs., Imperial Lives and Letters of the Eleventh Century (New York 1962). B. TIERNEY, The Crisis of Church and State, 1050–1300 (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey 1964, reprint Toronto 1994). R. MCKITTERICK, The Frankish Kingdoms under the Carolingians, 751–987 (London-New York 1983). T. REUTER, Germany in the Early Middle Ages 800–1056 (Longman History of Germany; London-New York 1991). H. FUHRMANN, Germany in the High Middle Ages c. 1050–1200, trans. T. REUTER (Cambridge Medieval Textbooks; Cambridge 1986). A. HAVERKAMP, Medieval Germany

1056–1273, trans. H. BRAUN and R. MORTIMER (2nd ed. Oxford 1988). D. ABULAFIA, Frederick II: A Medieval Emperor (London 1992). K. PENNINGTON, The Prince and the Law: Sovereignty and Rights in the Western Legal Tradition (Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1993).

[K. PENNINGTON]

HOLY ROOD, ABBEY OF

Former royal monastery of the canons regular, adjoining Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh, Scotland. It was founded by DAVID I of Scotland c. 1128. Liberally endowed for the CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE, it had close associations with the Scottish crown, being frequently used by the Stewarts as a royal residence. There James II was born in 1430 and married Mary of Gueldres in 1449, and there, too, James III and James IV were married in 1469 and 1503 respectively. Sacked and burned by the English in 1544 and 1547, and desecrated by the Reformers in 1559, the abbey fell into ruin, and while its chapel became the reformed parish church of the Canon-gate, the abbey lands were appropriated and created into a temporal lordship. Restored as a chapel royal by Charles I in 1633, and again by James II, the church was once more sacked in 1688, and later attempts to repair it were abandoned when its roof collapsed in 1768. It is now a ruin.

Bibliography: R. PITCAIRN, ed. Chronicon coenobii Sanctae Crucis Edinburgensis (Edinburgh 1828). C. INNES, ed. Liber cartarum Sanctae Crucis (Edinburgh 1840). J. HARRISON, The History of the Monastery of the Holy Rood (London 1919). D. E. EASSON, Medieval Religious Houses: Scotland (London 1957) 75.

[L. MACFARLANE]

HOLY SEE

A term designating Rome as the bishopric of the pope. The word is derived from the Latin sedes, which denotes the seat or residence of the bishop: this is because the bishop's office is symbolized by the chair in which he presides over his people. The word see is accordingly applied to all bishoprics, although it was first used of the Churches founded by Apostles. They would be known further as apostolic or holy sees, in as much as it was the function of the Apostles to mediate Christ's holiness to their flocks. As the titles pope and apostolic see came to be used especially of the bishop of Rome and his see, so too the title holy see was restricted to Rome. In canonical and diplomatic language it now refers to Rome as the bishopric of the pope and to his Curia, the Roman Congregations, tribunals, and offices.

[B. FORSHAW]

HOLY SPIRIT, BAPTISM IN

Impetus to a greater appreciation of the role of the Holy Spirit in the Christian life has come through the CHARISMATIC RENEWAL. While better classified as a renewal in the Holy Spirit than a devotion to him, the movement stresses the experiential nature of faith and finds support in those Scripture passages that speak of the gift of the Holy Spirit.

Baptism in the Holy Spirit. Stress is laid on an initial experience popularly called the "baptism in the Holy Spirit," accompanied by the expectation of some charismatic manifestation, such as praying in tongues or prophecy. Precedents for this relationship between the Holy Spirit as Gift and the gifts of the Holy Spirit are seen especially in Acts. How the charisms and the Sacraments of Christian initiation are related is a matter of current theological discussion. In practice, the "baptism in the Holy Spirit" (also sometimes referred to as "infilling" or "release" of the Holy Spirit) is experienced as a new departure in the Christian life effected usually through prayer and the laying on of hands by other Christians. The central and unique characteristic of the charismatic movement is the relation perceived between this renewal in the Holy Spirit and the charisms. With the encouragement of Paul (1 Cor 14.1), the gifts are actively sought. Those listed in 1 Cor 12–14 are held to be available today, such as tongues, prophecy, healing, the word of knowledge, the word of wisdom (see CHARISMATIC PRAYER). Yielding to these gifts is seen as a way of cooperating with the renewing work of the Spirit.

Theological Explanations. Among the theological explanations of this relationship, there are those who would explain it as an unfolding of the sacramental grace particularly of Baptism and Confirmation. Note is taken of the fact that the reception of the Spirit in Acts is always accompanied by a charismatic manifestation. Others seek an understanding of the relationship in a more general theology of grace, for which the praying community as such would be sufficient ecclesial cause. In discussing the missions of the divine persons, specifically the sending of the Son and the Spirit into the soul of the Christian, St. Thomas Aquinas says that such a sending "is especially seen in that kind of increase of grace whereby a person moves forward into some new act or some new state of grace: as, for example, when a person moves forward into the grace of working miracles, or of prophecy, or out of the burning love of God offers his life as a martyr, or renounces all his possessions, or undertakes some other such heroic act" (Summa theologiae 1a, 43.6 ad 2). It is significant that the sending he speaks of is not the initial sending, but a subsequent "breakthrough" into a new experience of grace. It is further significant that the examples Aquinas gives of such an innovatio or profectus are connected with charismatic manifestation. These two aspects correspond to the charismatic experience as it is described and lived today by many Christians. It further appears that the division of grace into sanctifying (gratia gratum faciens) and charismatic (gratia gratis data), which in the past often led to a disregard for the latter in favor of the former, should be made with great caution, since what is aimed at building up the Church will normally also be related to a personal growth in grace (ibid. 43.3 ad 4). To seek the gifts and to yield to them may thus be as important an exercise for spiritual growth as practices of asceticism. The gifts are, at any rate, calculated to expand the community's experience of God as gift.

Although the charisms are sought as particular manifestations of the Spirit, the charismatic movement has a strong Christocentric devotional base, so that the Holy Spirit appears more as a power moving the Church through his gifts than as an object of devotion in himself.

Bibliography: D. L. GELPI, Charism and Sacrament: A Theology of Christian Conversion (New York 1976). K. MCDONNELL, The Holy Spirit and Power: The Catholic Charismatic Renewal (New York 1975). G. T. MONTAGUE, The Spirit and His Gifts (New York 1974); The Holy Spirit: Growth of a Biblical Tradition (New York 1976). E. D. O'CONNOR, Perspectives on Charismatic Renewal (Notre Dame, Ind. 1975) extensive bibliography. L. J. SUENENS, A New Pentecost? (New York 1975); Theological and Pastoral Orientations on the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (Notre Dame, Ind. 1974). F. SULLIVAN, "The Baptism in the Holy Spirit and Christian Tradition." New Covenant 3 (May 1974) 30.

[G. T. MONTAGUE]

HOLY SPIRIT, DAUGHTERS OF THE

(D.H.S., Official Catholic Directory #0820), a pontifical institute founded on Dec. 8, 1706, when Marie Balavenne and Renée Burel made their religious profession in the chapel of Plérin, Brittany, France, and dedicated themselves to the care of the sick and the education of youth. The founder and director of the young community was a priest of Plérin, Jean Leuduger. The congregation continued to grow in the 18th century until the French Revolution, when it suffered the suppression and confiscation that was the common fate of all the religious orders. Some of the sisters carried on their work secretly until the congregation was reconstituted in 1800. After its reorganization, and official recognition by imperial decree on Dec. 10, 1810, a new era of development followed. When the mother-house at Plérin was no longer large enough, the sisters chose a new site in Saint-Brieuc, western France, in 1834.

The 20th century brought new problems. The series of laws directed in 1902 and 1903 against teaching congregations in France suppressed Catholic schools. Seven hundred Daughters of the Holy Ghost were expelled from their convents. Seeking a place to carry on their work, a group of six sisters arrived in the United States on Dec. 8, 1902. Others went to Belgium, Holland, and England. In these areas the 20th century has been one of steady advance for the congregation. In 1936 the community found a new field of endeavor in Manchuria. Although expulsion from Chinese territory brought the missionary labors of the sisters there to an abrupt close in 1951, new missions were begun in Africa and South America. In addition to teaching at all levels, the sisters also work in healthcare services, pastoral ministries, catechetics, nursing and care facilities for the aged. The provincial center in the United States is in Putnam, Connecticut.

[C. P. COMTOIS/EDS.]

HOLY SPIRIT, DEVOTION TO

In the Christian Era has its roots in the Old Testament, although among the Hebrews the Spirit (ruah, breath, wind) was regarded more as a manifestation of the divine presence and activity than as a divine person. The operations of the Spirit (1 Cor ch. 14) were not uncommon in the apostolic Church, but these provide no clear evidence of the recognition of the personal distinction of the Holy Spirit or of the tribute of a special devotion. By the mid-fourth century Catholic doctrine regarding the Holy Spirit was explained fully and clearly, but for long this resulted in no widespread popular devotion. Among the elite, however, devotion to the Holy Spirit, especially as Sanctifier, existed from early times. From the earliest Christian writers, both Greek and Latin, to the present, there is a rich and unbroken tradition of devotion to the Holy Spirit that is supported by Christian art and archeology, hymnology (e.g., VENI SANCTE SPIRITUS, VENI CREATOR SPIRITUS), and liturgy. In the Middle Ages popular devotion to the Holy Spirit was given an impetus with the rise of confraternities dedicated to Him, notably those connected with the Hospitalers of the Holy Spirit (see P. BRUNE, Histoire de l'ordre Hospitalier du Saint-Esprit, Paris 1892). In the 17th century there was a remarkable surge of popular devotion to the Holy Spirit (see Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. Viller et al. [Paris 1932–] 5: 1604–10), and in recent times the encyclicals of Leo XIII (Provida Matris, 1895, and Divinum illud munus, 1897) and of Pius XII (Mystici Corporis, 1948) have been effectual in promoting devotion to the Holy Spirit among the faithful.

Bibliography: H. B. SWETE, The Holy Spirit in the New Testament (London 1909); The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church (London 1912). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 5.1:525–529. J. RUTHCÉ, L'Élite et la dévotion au Saint-Esprit (Gembloux 1926). F. SÜHLING, Die Taube als religiöses Symbol im Christlichen Altertum (Freiburg 1930). E. L. HESTON, The Spiritual Life and the Role of the Holy Ghost in the Sanctification of the Soul as Described in the Works of Didymus of Alexandria (St. Meinrad, Ind. 1938). P. GALTIER, Le Saint-Esprit en nous d'après les Pères grecs (Rome 1946). S. TROMP, De Spiritu Sancto anima corporis, mystici, 2 v. (Rome 1932). A. GARDEIL, Le Saint-Esprit dans la vie chrétienne (4th ed. Paris 1950). T. MAERTENS, Le Souffle et l'Esprit de Dieu (Paris 1955). J. ISAAC, La Révélation progressive des personnes divines (Paris 1960). G. LEFEBVRE, L'Esprit de Dieu dans la sainte liturgie (Paris 1958). F. VANDENBROUCKE, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 4.2:1316–18.

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

HOLY SPIRIT, FRUITS OF

Those good affections listed by St. Paul as the achievement of man's spirit (Gal 5.22–23) in contrast to the ills inflicted on him by his flesh (Gal 5.19–21). As in many other places, Paul was speaking of the soul transformed by the Holy Spirit. Thus, some Fathers considered his enumeration a partial list of the many goods effected in the soul by the Holy Spirit's unity of action. St. Thomas Aquinas, influenced by the Fathers, attempted an adaptation of St. Paul's concept by fitting the fruits into his own theory of a supernatural organism. He considered man's supernatural life an organic synthesis, the interaction of whose parts influenced the maturation of the soul in grace. The gifts and infused virtues are bound together, some gifts serving the theological virtues, others directing the cardinal virtues. Into this spiritual composite, he fitted the fruits, attaching each to intense acts of virtues or gifts. Because of a sort of blessedness that comes to the soul from the intense activity of certain gifts, he called their fruits beatitudes. The good affections wrought in the soul by other intense acts of the gifts and of the virtues he called simply fruits. The virtue of faith perfected by the intellectual gifts results in a fruit, a kind of security, called faith, to which is attached a fruit called joy. Charity also produces joy, to which is added peace and the special fruit, charity (acts of). Counsel has no special fruit, since its end is action; yet acts of counsel have mercy and kindness attached. Piety's direct fruits are goodness and benignity; its indirect fruit, serenity. The fruits of fortitude are patience and long-suffering. FEAR OF THE LORD, through its direction of temperance, produces the fruits of chastity, modesty, continence. Pope Leo XIII, though not citing the specific relationship of acts and fruits, spoke of "those blessed fruits enumerated by the Apostle which the Spirit produces and shows forth in the just" (Divinum illud munus).

Bibliography: L. M. MARTÍNEZ, The Sanctifier, tr. M. AQUINAS (Paterson 1957). B. FROGET, The Indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the

“Virgin Mary and St. John Receiving the Seven Gifts of the Holy Spirit,” Spanish Gothic Altarpiece. (©Andrea Jemolo/CORBIS)

Souls of the Just, tr. S. A. RAEMERS (Westminster, Md. 1950). LEO XIII, Divinum illud munus (encyclical, May 9, 1897), Acta Sanctae Sedis 29 (1896–97) 644–658, Eng. The Great Encyclical Letters, ed. J. J. WYNNE (New York 1903) 422–440, A. GARDEIL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903—50) 6.1: 944–949.

[P. F. MULHERN]

HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF

The source of the Church’s teaching on the gifts of the Holy Spirit is the manifestation of the Holy Spirit in the OT and the NT, and in the life of the Church. The Spirit promised in Isaiah (11.1–3) manifested Himself at the Baptism of Jesus and communicated Himself to the Apostles at Pentecost. Thereafter He gave Himself to the Church, which lived under His continuing influence. The Church sees the gifts promised in Isaiah (six in the Hebrew, seven in the Septuagint) realized first in Christ and then, by a participation in His plenitude, in itself, His body. As Vatican Council II has declared, it is in the souls of the faithful who make up this body that the Spirit gives His gifts for the welfare of the Church (see Dogmatic Constitution on the Church 7).

Teaching of the Fathers. Educated in the apostolic tradition, the early Fathers wrote of the Holy Spirit in the life of the Christian (see GOD [HOLY SPIRIT]). Most of them spoke of two stages, one the Christian life at its minimum, the other in which the Spirit dominates the soul under its constant motion. But the early Fathers did not speak clearly of seven special gifts distinct from the graces of the Holy Spirit in general and from the Pauline charisms.

The Greek Fathers, beginning with St. Clement, recalled Isaiah’s list of gifts, but they did not confine themselves to precise numbers. It was enough for them that the Spirit poured out His riches on Christ, then on the Church in its members. The Latin Fathers, however, cited the number and allegorized about it. St. Victorinus of Pettau (In Apoc. 1) related the seven gifts to the seven spirits of the Apocalypse; St. Hilary (In Mt. 15.10) connected them with the seven loaves in the miracle of the bread and fishes; St. Augustine (Serm. 347) traced a parallel between the seven gifts and the beatitudes, and he saw in Isaiah's words a complete description of the Holy Spirit's work in the soul. St. Gregory the Great drew on Augustine especially (Moralia 2); he saw the gifts as special aids to the Christian in his war against evil. His writings furnished a foundation for the theology on the gifts to be developed in the Middle Ages.

Middle Ages. From Gregory in the 7th century to the 11th century, nothing was added to the literature on the gifts. In the 12th century, there came a renaissance of interest attributable principally to the reading of SS. Augustine and Gregory. Inquiry began into questions that the Fathers had not asked: Are the gifts a species of VIRTUE, or are they quite distinct? What role do they play in the spiritual life? Why are there seven of them, and how are they classified? The answers to these questions were to have a profound effect on the theology of the spiritual life.

In the early 13th century, there was no precise terminology on the gifts, although much had been written on them. Some thought the gifts to be the source of the virtues; others saw them as effects. Most of the theologians, however, identified gifts and virtues. Then, in 1235, with the Summa of Philip the Chancellor (cf. Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 1:76–82), a trend began toward viewing the gifts as distinct from and superior to the virtues. This became the classic teaching at the University of Paris, especially by the Franciscan and Dominican schools, and it was given its perfect expression by St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa theologiae 1a2ae 68.2).

Teaching of St. Thomas. Beginning, as was his way, with an existent reality, Aquinas reasoned to the soul's need for supernatural aids, superior to the virtues and by which the soul could become habitually pliable to the influence of the Holy Spirit. He saw that, despite the dignity given the soul by the theological virtues, because of the supernatural object (i.e., God Himself) to which they oriented it, the virtues do not give to the soul a perfection of action comparable to what it has in the natural order from the natural virtues. It became clear to him that a man with the supernatural virtues alone would be much less at home in the things of God than a man with the natural virtues was in the things of nature. For, as he said, "We know and love God imperfectly with the supernatural virtues" (Summa theologiae 1a2ae 68.2). In effect, if a man had only virtues, without the gifts, he would be less able to achieve supernatural perfection than to achieve natural perfection.

It was unthinkable to St. Thomas that God, who shared His inner life with man by grace, would provide for his needs less perfectly in the supernatural than in the natural order. Thus, he argued that with the life of grace God gives supplementary forces to the soul by which it can achieve the same level of performance supernaturally that it achieves naturally. Since our sanctification is appropriated to the Holy Spirit, St. Thomas concluded that the same Spirit meets this normal need of the soul by directing it supernaturally, much as human reason directs it in the purely natural order. This influence of the Holy Spirit intervenes in man's supernatural psychology, bestowing on it a capacity for action parallel to the perfect action achieved by the natural virtues. The modifications, or dispositions, or tendencies in the soul, that result from the action of the Holy Spirit are called His gifts: wisdom, understanding, knowledge, piety, fortitude, counsel, and fear of the Lord. Through these the Holy Spirit can direct the supernatural life of the soul much as human reason, through the virtues, directs the moral life of the soul.

Because the need of the soul was lasting, it was clear to St. Thomas that the entities by which the need was met were lasting too. Hence, though distinct from the virtues, the gifts were like the virtues in that they were habits. As habits, the gifts and the supernatural virtues have the same efficient cause, God, the author of the supernatural order. But the principal or motor cause is different: for the infused virtues, the immediate principle of action is human reason elevated by grace; for the gifts, the principle of action is the Holy Spirit. Through the gifts, He moves men as His immediate and direct instruments. Therein lies a pivotal distinction: the infused virtues can be used by their possessor at will, presuming the actual grace, which is never wanting; the gifts, however, are actuated not at the will of the possessor but only at the will of the Holy Spirit. Thus, although the practice of the virtues is said to prepare the soul for the activity of the gifts, this is only because virtuous actions remove the obstacles in men that impede the activity of the Holy Spirit. The gifts will not operate if there are obstacles, but they do not operate automatically when the obstacles are taken away. Their action depends on the Holy Spirit.

The gifts, then, differ from the virtues. In the use of the virtues, even the infused ones, the soul is fully active; it is capable of such fully supernatural action because it is supernaturalized in its being by habitual grace. Still, its actions are performed in a human mode. A person in sanctifying grace, for example, elicits an act of love of God at will; the soul is the motor cause. A soul under the motion of the gifts acts vitally, but seconding a divine motion. It is passive only to the divine agent; it executes what the Holy Spirit executes in it. The action of the gift is an activity received.

Moved by the direct and immediate action of the Holy Spirit, the gifts, as His instruments, are subordinate to the virtues, but only in that the purpose of the gifts is the perfection of the infused virtues. So the fruits of the Holy Spirit are actions of virtues that have been perfected by the gifts. More perfect than the fruits are the BEATITUDES, actions that flow from the gifts and the virtues working together; these are the highest actions of the soul on earth, an anticipation of eternal beatitude.

The teaching of St. Thomas on the gifts found favor because of its simplicity and its principles. But it has always met opposition, especially from the Scotists, who deny the distinction between the gifts and the virtues. Since the gifts are not distinct entities to these theologians, they make no attempt to fit them into the supernatural organism. Today St. Thomas's exposition is sometimes criticized as being dependent on an imperfect understanding of the famous text of Isaiah. However, although he, following the Fathers, took the exact number of the gifts from Isaiah, his teaching on the function of the gifts in the spiritual life flows from the principle, verified throughout the NT, that the souls of the just need the special help of the Holy Spirit. What he says about the gifts has been given much authority in modern times by the generous use of his concepts and language in the encyclical on the Holy Spirit, Divinum illud munus of LEO XIII.

Bibliography: LEO XIII, "Divinum illud munus" (encyclical, May 9, 1897) Acta Sanctae Sedis 29 (1896–97) 644–658, Eng. Catholic Mind 36 (May 8, 1938) 161–181. B. FROGET, The Indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the Souls of the Just, tr. S. A. RAEMERS (Westminster, Md. 1950). JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, The Gifts of the Holy Ghost, tr. W. D. HUGHES (New York 1951). J. DE GUIBERT, The Theology of the Spiritual Life, tr. P. BARRETT (New York 1953). A. GARDEIL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 4.2:1728–81. R. CESSARIO, Christian Faith and the Theological Life (Washington, D.C. 1996). S. PINCKAERS, The Sources of Christian Ethics, tr. M. T. NOBLE (3d rev. ed.; Washington, D.C. 1995). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a2ae 68.2.

[P. F. MULHERN]

HOLY SPIRIT, ICONOGRAPHY OF

The third Person of the Holy TRINITY was represented in all periods of Christian art preeminently in the form of a snow-white dove. The use of the dove as a symbol of the Holy Spirit was formally approved by a local council of Constantinople in 536. In scenes of Pentecost, the Holy Spirit appears as described in Acts, in the form of fiery tongues descending on the Apostles. The additional symbolization of the Holy Spirit as a dove in Pentecost scenes, although not attested in the Biblical narrative, is supported by the anonymous Liber de rebaptismate (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 3:1203). The Holy Spirit has been represented anthropomorphically in painting and sculpture of the Holy Trinity, but this mode of representation declined after the Middle Ages and was ultimately declared unacceptable in a decree by Benedict XIV (Oct. 1, 1745).

The Holy Spirit is represented principally in three scenes from the New Testament: the Annunciation to the Blessed Virgin, the Baptism in the Jordan, and Pentecost. They occur then at the conception of Jesus Christ, at the beginning of His public life, and at His last manifestation in the cycle of the glorification, for it was He who promised that He would send the Holy Spirit.

Annunciation. In the Annunciation scene, the Virgin is present with the angel and the dove of the Holy Spirit. The dove is not found in all representations of the Annunciation, but it is present in the fully elaborated depictions. One may also find God the Father and an embryo or homunculus of Christ. The figure of the dove in its descent courses along golden rays of light proceeding from the mouth of God the Father on high. One may also mention at this point representations of Mary with the Holy Spirit present, which are not scenes of the Annunciation. In the "Virgin and Child with Angels, Prophets, and Symbols" by the early Netherlandish painter Provost (Hermitage, Leningrad), the dove of the Holy Spirit hovers over the Virgin with her crown in its claws.

Baptism of Christ. The three essential figures in representations of the Baptism of Christ are the Son, the Baptist, and the dove of the Holy Spirit, usually shown directly above the head of Christ. Sometimes at the top of the painting God the Father is also shown ruling over the scene that inaugurates the public life of Christ. According to Matthew, the Holy Spirit, at the moment of the Baptism, descended like a dove, but Luke avers that the Spirit descended indeed in the corporeal form of a dove. In the "Baptist" by Jan Joest (Church of St. Nicholas, Kalkar), the dove of the Holy Spirit is on a parallel with the head of St. John, with Christ in the center. Andrea Verrocchio (15th century) shows the dove issuing from the open hands of God, its beams forming a secondary radiance above the head of Christ and falling upon the lustral water in the scoop held above the head of Christ by St. John. Paintings of the Baptism of Christ, in their arrangement, frequently recall the vertical Trinities of the late Middle Ages and early Renaissance with God the Father uppermost, then the dove of the Holy Spirit, and Christ below.

Pentecost. The dove of the Holy Spirit occurs in representations of Pentecost, although its appearance is not mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. In Acts the Holy Spirit manifests itself to the disciples of Christ under the form of tongues of fire that descend upon their heads. The dove entered artistic representations of Pentecost on the authority of the early anonymous Liber de rebaptismate: “Et hominibus quidem Spiritus perseverat hodie invisibilis, . . . Sed in principio mysterii fidei et spiritualis Baptismatis hic idem Spiritus manifeste visus est et super discipulos insedissee quasi ignis: item, coelis apertis, descendisse super Dominum columbae similem” (Patrologia Latina, 3:1203).

“The Baptism of Christ,” panel of the “Altarpiece of Jan de Trompes” by Gerard David, depicting St. John the Baptist baptising Christ with God the Father and the Holy Spirit present above, 1505, in the Groeninge Museum, Bruges, Belgium. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

In one of the earliest representations of the Pentecost (sixth century, Gospel Book of Rabbula), the Holy Spirit is represented by tongues of fire alone descending upon the heads of the Apostles and the Virgin in their midst. However, the standard mode of representing the Holy Spirit in this scene is double, by the tongues of fire and by the dove (1403, fresco by Taddeo di Bartolo; Municipal Palace, Perugia). The flames may be represented directly on the heads of the participants in the Pentecost scene, as in the Gospel Book of Rabbula, or hovering a short distance above their heads, as in a late medieval painting of the Ulm school (Saint Bavo), or with the fiery tongues darting down upon their heads, as in a Pentecost painting by Rappaert (Bruges Museum). In a painting of deep agitation and physical movement, Titian combines the dove, streaming beams of light, and tongues of flame in a manneristic composition of the Pentecost (1543; S. Maria della Salute, Venice). The severely classical treatment of the same subject by Bordone (c. 1550; Brera Gallery, Milan) conceals the body of the dove of the Holy Spirit behind the central portion of a great classical arch showing only the lower limits of the burst of radiance behind the line of the stone archway that frames the scene.

Attribute of Saints. The dove appears as a source of inspiration to certain saints. It is an attribute of all those inspired by the Holy Spirit, notably the Evangelists and the Doctors of the Church. In Michael Pacher’s “The Four Latin Fathers” (c. 1483; Pinakothek, Munich) a dove appears over each of the Doctors: Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, and Gregory; Gregory bears his on the right shoulder. It is said in his Life by Paul the Deacon (ch. 28) that the dove of the Holy Spirit was seen repeatedly inspiring the author of the Pastoral Care and the Great Morals. Thus the dove appears in Carpaccio’s “Meditation on the Passion” (Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York) perched on the sarcophagus throne on which Christ sits—meditated upon by St. Jerome and Job. (The Great Morals of St. Gregory was based on the Book of Job.) St. Basil is shown dictating under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (c. 1656, painting by Francisco de Herrera, Louvre).

See Also: TRINITY, HOLY, ICONOGRAPHY OF.

“St. Gregory the Great and the Holy Spirit,” detail of a 13th-century fresco at Subiaco, Italy.

Bibliography: W. STENDEL, Das Taubensymbol des Heiligen Geistes (Strasbourg 1904). W. F. STADELMAN, Glories of the Holy Ghost (Techny, Ill. 1919), 100 illus. H. KÜCHES, Der Heilige Geist in der Kunst (Knechtsteden 1923). K. KÜNSTLE, Iconographie der Christlichen Kunst, 2 v. (Freiburg 1926–28) 1:221–239. F. SÜHLING, Die Taube als religiöses Symbol im christlichen Altertum (Freiburg 1930) 1–51. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l’art chrétien (Paris 1955–59) 2.1:11–29. V. H. ELBERN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:113–114.

[L. P. SIGER]

HOLY SPIRIT, ORDER OF THE

An order of HOSPITALLERS, founded c. 1180 in France by GUY DE MONTPELLIER. Through the patronage of INNOCENT III and later popes, the Order of the Holy Spirit rapidly became the vehicle of worldwide comprehensive social programs that lasted for more than 500 years. Before 1198 its chief center was the hospital of the Holy Spirit in Montpellier, which had eight affiliates, including two houses in Rome. Medically progressive in its care of the sick, it expanded Christian HOSPITALITY to embrace the works of mercy in general.

Within months of his accession in 1198, Innocent issued the brief His praecipue, recommending the order to all bishops of the world. In the briefs of July 1 and Nov. 25, 1198 (Religiosam vitam), Innocent moved to make the new order an instrument of his crusade on behalf of the suffering poor, which probably constitutes one of the grandest and least-heralded achievements of his pontificate. Of decisive importance is the bull Inter opera pietatis of June 19, 1204, which committed the newly built Roman hospital of the Holy Spirit near S. Maria in Saxia on the Tiber to the hospitallers of the Holy Spirit and united it with that of Montpellier under the spiritual administration of Guy. The church of S. Maria in Saxia stood near a ruinous complex of buildings that had once been a flourishing house of hospitality for English pilgrims, the Schola Saxonum, founded in the 8th century. Acquiring the site and properties of the Schola Saxonum, Innocent built the hospital of the Holy Spirit in Saxia, delivered it to the Order of the Holy Spirit, and made the entire project directly subject to the Holy See.

Probably from 1204 to 1208, when Guy is known to have lived in Rome, the ancient rule of the order took definitive shape. Both the brothers and the sisters observed the same rule and cared equally for the sick, the indigent, orphans, foundlings, unmarried mothers, the aged, the insane, and the homeless. To supplement the papal-guaranteed income and privileges, the Confraternity of the Holy Spirit enrolled laymen of every social rank. The members provided money and pledged themselves annually to some days of personal service.

By an amazing expansion, hospitals of the Holy Spirit and auxiliary associations, displaying the official device of the double cross surmounted by the dove, sprang up throughout Christendom as legal and spiritual affiliates of the Roman institute, sharing the latter's exemption from local ecclesiastical and civil authorities. The grand master or preceptor of the hospitallers exercised quasi-episcopal power over all affiliates, their workers, clients, and dependents, wherever they existed. There is written record of 1,240 affiliates throughout Europe, with 10 in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Many others left no written trace.

After this prodigious early growth and expansion, periods of decadence set in. EUGENE IV, in 1444, noting that the ravages of war, negligent administration, absence of the papacy from Rome, and breakdown of religious life had practically destroyed Christian "hospitality," undertook to reform the order, reestablish the confraternity, and personally assume the preceptorship. SIXTUS IV in 1477, as the order's second founder, tightened the administration and replaced the old buildings with splendid new constructions. Under LEO XII in 1826 reform again became urgent. His elaborate plan encountered the opposition of vested interests and died with him in 1829. Pius IX's bull Inter plurima (July 1, 1847) suppressed the Order of the Holy Spirit. Causes of the collapse included the following: rivalry between Rome and Montpellier, admission of unsettled religious from other orders, civil wars, loss of religious dedication to the poor, greedy enjoyment of fat priorates, and parasitic exploitation of the order's handsome properties.

In its best days, the Order of the Holy Spirit and its affiliates embodied the spirit of Christian mercy on a vaster scale and with more creative adaptability than anything hitherto seen in Christendom. From the beginning, it courageously enlisted women religious as infirmarians; it maintained an incorruptible policy of gratuitous service; it spurred medical progress by its schools of anatomy, surgery, and pharmaceuticals; it introduced an elaborate program of music therapy not only for mental patients but for all, including infants at feeding time. As an organization it passed from history, but as the spirit of humility serving Christ in the sick and poor it passed over into younger orders and lives on to this day.

See Also: HOSPITALS, HISTORY OF.

Bibliography: P. BRUNE, Histoire de l'ordre hospitalier du Saint Esprit (Paris 1892). A. CANEZZA, Gli arcispedali di Roma nella vita cittadina, nella storia e nell'arte (Rome 1933). O. DE ANGELIS, L'arcispedale di Santo Spirito in Saxia nel passato e nel presente (Rome 1952); Regula sive statuta hospitalis Sancti Spiritus: La piu antica regola ospitaliera di Santo Spirito in Saxia (Rome 1954); L'ospedale apostolico di Santo Spirito in Saxia nella mente e nel cuore dei papi (Rome 1956); L'ospedale di Santo Spirito in Saxia e le sue filiali nel mondo (Rome 1958). J. RATH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 5:114-115.

[P. L. HUG]

HOLY SPIRIT, SISTERS OF THE

(SHS, Official Catholic Directory #2040), a diocesan congregation founded on April 25, 1913, at Donora, Pennsylvania, by J. F. Regis Canevin, Bishop of Pittsburgh (1904 to 1920). The community follows the Rule of St. Augustine. As the number of sisters increased, larger facilities were needed, and on Aug. 14, 1926, a new motherhouse and novitiate were dedicated in West View, Pittsburgh. The sisters are principally engaged in teaching, nursing, and care of children and the aged. The motherhouse is in Ross Township, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

[M. E. KWIATKOWSKI/EDS.]

HOLY SPIRIT AND MARY IMMACULATE, SISTERS OF THE

The Sisters of the Holy Spirit and Mary Immaculate (S.H.Sp., Official Catholic Directory, #2050), a congregation with papal approbation (1939), was founded in 1893 in San Antonio, Texas, by Mrs. Margaret Mary Healy Murphy. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Murphy thought about several aspects of the apostolate to which she might devote the remaining years of her life. She was especially anxious to help educate black children. With ecclesiastical approval Mrs. Murphy and a small group of helpers took simple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Mrs. Murphy, as Sister Margaret Mary, was elected first superior general, and governed the congregation until her death in 1907. Her charity, faith, and courage inspired her successors to continue her work; the sisters staffed parochial schools in Texas, Louisiana, and Mississippi. Their chief work is the education of youth, especially the poor and the marginalized. The sisters are also involved in pastoral ministry, youth ministry, retreats, catechetics and social services. The generalate is located in San Antonio, Texas.

[M. I. MCGANN/EDS.]

HOLY SPIRIT MISSIONARY SISTERS

A pontifical institute founded specifically for the propagation of the faith in the underdeveloped countries of the world. The congregation, whose official title is Missionary Sisters Servants of the Holy Spirit (SSPS, Official Catholic Directory #3530), was begun by Arnold JANSSEN, founder of the Society of the Divine Word, at Steyl, Holland, in 1889. Devotion to the Holy Spirit and zeal for the salvation of souls are the characteristics of this society, which undertakes educational, medical, and social work in predominantly non-Christian areas.

Their work in the U.S. began when Mother Leonarda Lentrup came from Holland in 1901 with four other sisters and established a motherhouse in Techny, Ill. The congregation has conducted retreat houses, taught in schools, and trained missionaries to send abroad. Mother Leonarda was a pioneer in the lay retreat movement; she opened her motherhouse to this apostolate from the beginning. In 1908 the community staffed an elementary school for African-Americans in Vicksburg, Miss., the first of a series of schools established in Arkansas and Mississippi. The sisters' first secondary school for blacks, Sacred Heart High School, began its work in Greenville, Miss., in 1920. Maurice Rousseve, Anthony Bourges, and Francis Wade, members of the Society of the Divine Word and three of the first five black priests to be ordained in the U.S., had attended this high school.

As early as 1910 the U.S. province had begun work in the foreign missions. In that year four sisters went to New Guinea. In the intervening years, sisters were sent to China, the Philippines, India, Africa, and Japan.

The generalate is in Rome; the U.S. headquarters is in Techny, Illinois.

[T. M. MCNEELY/EDS.]

HOLY SYNOD

The Russian Holy Synod was instituted by PETER I, the Great (Jan. 25, 1721) to govern the Orthodox Church of Russia in place of the patriarchate. It consisted of a college of bishops and monks under a lay procurator. Its full name was the Most Holy Directing Synod. It originated after Leibniz suggested to Peter that he should complete his reorganization of the state by creating an ecclesiastical college. Peter conceived the idea of establishing an ecclesiastical body that would be unable to impede his reforms; yet he declined to become himself a part of the general structure of the Russian Church. He wanted to be its patron, not its spiritual head. On one occasion, however, when the Russian bishops asked him to restore the patriarchate, he struck his breast and replied, "Here is your patriarch."

The Church-State relation was outlined in detail in the organization of the Holy Synod. It was impossible for the hierarchy to meddle in state affairs, but the Czar would not be able to treat the bishops as Ivan the Terrible (1533–84) had. The opposition of the Russian episcopate to Peter's reform looked to Patriarch Adrian for support, but that indecisive churchman suffered from poor health and offered only a tacit resistance. Adrian died in 1700, and the Moscow Patriarchate, which began in 1589, ceased to exist in 1721. Peter the Great prevented the appointment of a patriarch of Moscow by naming STEFAN, Bishop of Riasan, as keeper and administrator of the patriarchal see (October 1721). Stefan sided with the Czar in the beginning, but later, especially after the execution of Czarevich Alexej, he became an opponent of the change. Peter found a more willing collaborator in Feofan PROKOPOVICH, whose ideas were embodied in the Church Statute of 1721. Stefan, a former Jesuit novice and a pro-Catholic, provided the last serious opposition to the Holy Synod, but he capitulated eventually and cooperated as an appointed member of it.

The statute was more a political charter than an ecclesiastical one; it provided for the reorganization of Church administration and outlined an educational program. Stefan opposed Prokopovich's episcopal consecration and accused him of Calvinism. Prokopovich, in his treatise The Right to the Monarch's Will, delineated modern Western ideas on the absolute power of the ruler combined with Byzantine theocratic concepts. His Ecclesiastical Regulation applied to religion and the state and made the Church subject to the state's laws and ordinances.

Members of the Holy Synod were drawn from both the “white” (secular) and the “black” (monastic) clergy. By founding the Synod, Peter ended the “state within the state” by abolishing the patriarchate, which had come to rival the Czar. Originally there were to be 12 members, all appointed by the Czar. The Ukase of 1763 determined that there should be at least six ecclesiastical members. In accord with the Czar, Prokopovich elaborated the spiritual regulations and in 1721 solemnly opened the Holy Synod, where, in spite of the nominal presidency of Stefan, he himself governed and reformed the Russian Church. The members of the ecclesiastical college had to swear that they recognized “as supreme judge of this college, our most clement monarch of all Russia.” By a decree of March 11, 1722, the Holy Synod was placed under the supervision of a lay chief procurator who was de facto the head of Church administration. During the reign of Peter the Great, the Synod retained, for the most part, its ecclesiastical character. After his death, however, this character was lost by degrees, and the Synod became a vast political bureaucracy. Under such rulers as Šakhovskij, Čebyšeff, and Galycin, the Russian Church was mistreated and humiliated. In 1881 Konstantin Pobedonostsev was called to the government of the Synod; he was a man of great culture who wished to unite all the religions professed in Russia into the one Orthodox Church. The Statute of 1721 provided the Holy Synod with the “full” rights and powers of the patriarch in religious matters, but in ecclesiastical administration it became a bureaucratic department. The jurisdiction of the Holy Synod extended not only to all kinds of ecclesiastical questions but also to some that were purely secular. All processes for heresy and all matrimonial cases were brought before the Synod.

The patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem recognized the Holy Synod in 1723, but the liberal Russian clergy attacked both the Synod and the anticanonical constitution of the Church and demanded a reestablishment of the patriarchate. The government then proposed the convocation of a great national synod to restore the Church’s liberties and to give it a new constitution, but this purpose was defeated by friction between the “white” and the “black” clergy and by the outbreak of the revolution. The Holy Synod survived until 1917, when the patriarchate was restored (November 5), with TIKHON as the first patriarch. On Jan. 23, 1918, a law of State-Church separation was promulgated. (See ORTHODOX CHURCHES ).

Bibliography: A. M. AMMANN, Storia della Chiesa Russa (Turin 1948), Ger. tr. Abriss der ostslawischen Kirchengeschichte (Vienna 1950). T. V. BARSOV, Sviatieiš Synod V jego prošlom (Most Holy Synod and Its History) (St. Petersburg 1896). F. DVORNIK, The Slavs in European History and Civilization (New Brunswick, N.J. 1962) 556–. M. I. FLORINSKY, Russia, A History and an Interpretation (New York 1960). J. LEDIT, “Russie,” Dictionnaire de theolo- gie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 14:324–333. A. PALMIERI, La Chiesa Russa (Florence 1908). J. SERECH, “Stephan Yavorsky and the Conflict of Ideologies in the Age of Peter I,” Slavonic and East European Review 30 (1951) 40–62. P. V. VERKHOVSKOI, Uchrezdenie dukhovnoi Kollegii i dukhovnii reglament (Establishment of the Ecclesiastical College and the Ecclesiastical Regulation) (Warsaw 1916).

[J. PAPIN]

HOLY THURSDAY

The Thursday before Easter, and first day of the Easter Triduum has had several names in the course of time; all of them point to one or another aspect of the day’s celebration. The official name, and at the same time probably the oldest, is Feria Quinta in Coena Domini (Thursday of the Lord’s Supper), because it chiefly commemorates the institution of the Holy Eucharist. The same idea lies behind the charming and original name given it in the calendar of Polemius Silvius (fifth century), natalis calicis (birth of the chalice), also current in southern Gaul during the sixth and seventh centuries. The term natale sacramenti (birth of the Sacrament) is similar in meaning. In some places in the past, it was called dies traditionis, referring to the many traditiones (betrayal or handing over) that occurred on that day: the betrayal of Jesus by Judas, Jesus’ handing over of himself for the salvation of humanity, and the giving of his body and blood in the Eucharist. English-speaking lands often call it Maundy Thursday, a corruption of the Latin word mandatum, used to describe the rite of washing of the feet associated with Holy Thursday for centuries. The Germans call it Gründonnerstag (Grinenden, greinenden, weinenden, weeping), which appears to be a reference to the reconciliation of the penitents that took place on this day for many centuries. The most popular name in all languages, however, is Holy Thursday.

Historical Background. The celebration of Holy Thursday is very ancient. Historically, the reconciliation of penitents took place on this day, to enable them to participate in the paschal feast. Traditionally, the holy oils were also consecrated on Thursday because they would be needed for the blessing of the baptismal water, and this was the last day that would be free for their consecration. Before the seventh century, however, they were consecrated during the East Vigil. The 1955 reforms of Pope Pius XII called for a special Mass of the Chrism, distinct from the solemn evening liturgy, to be celebrated in cathedrals in the morning. The prayers and the proper preface for the Mass of the Chrism were taken from the Gelasian Sacramentary, but new readings were provided.

It was altogether natural that there should be a special commemoration of the institution of the Eucharist on the day when this great event had taken place. Already in the fourth century it was known as in coena Domini, i.e., Thursday of the Lord's Supper. The custom of celebrating the Eucharist itself on the evening of Holy Thursday about the hour when it was instituted seems to have originated in Jerusalem.

The rite of WASHING OF THE FEET was originally a simple act of charity very common in the Church. It did not become a liturgical rite until about the seventh century. Its purpose is to manifest the charity and love that should motivate those who will be participating in the Lord's Supper.

The procession of the reserved sacrament to the altar of repose is the one modern survival of the earlier, more common practice of reserving consecrated hosts for Communion on those days when the Eucharist was not celebrated. Such aliturgical days occurred more frequently in earlier times. Originally, there was no special ceremony about it; as soon as Mass was over the deacon took the consecrated hosts in the pyx from the main altar and carried them to the sacristy where they were reserved until the next day. During the High Middle Ages this altogether practical procedure was transformed into an elaborate ritual. Once Good Friday had become the one day of the year when the Eucharist was not celebrated, reserving the Eucharist for Communion took place only once a year and became surrounded with greater ceremony. The first mention of a formal procession comes from the 11th century.

The stripping of the altars on Holy Thursday became a liturgical rite in the course of time. In reality it is a survival, on this one day of the year, of what was, for centuries, done every day after Mass; it was the practice to remove the altar cloths each day and put them on again the next. A simple everyday practice has thus been transformed into a religious rite.

Liturgical Structure. The present celebration of Mass of the Lord's Supper dates back from Pius XII's reforms of the Holy Week liturgy in 1955. His Holy Week Ordinal restored the Mass of the Last Supper to the evening hours. Normally, there is to be only one evening Mass in each parish and religious community; this is intended to emphasize the oneness of the Eucharistic celebration. The tabernacle is empty because all will receive Holy Communion from the bread and wine consecrated at this Eucharist. The washing of feet is placed within the Mass, instead of after Mass. After Mass the celebrant carries the ciborium containing the consecrated hosts for the communion service on Good Friday in solemn procession to the simply and soberly adorned repository. There, the Blessed Sacrament is reserved until the Communion service on the next day. Veneration of the Blessed Sacrament by the faithful is prescribed until midnight. After the Blessed Sacrament has been placed in the repository, the service concludes with the stripping of the altar.

Bibliography: W. J. O'SHEA, The Meaning of Holy Week (Collegeville, Minn. 1958). T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (Collegeville 1991). A. J. MARTIMORT, ed. The Church at Prayer IV: The Liturgy and Time (Collegeville 1986). A. NOCENT, The Liturgical Year (Collegeville 1977). J. M. PIERCE, "Holy Week and Easter in the Middle Ages," in Passover and Easter: Origin and History to Modern Times, eds. P. F. BRADSHAW and L. A. HOFFMAN (Notre Dame, Ind. 1999) 161–185. A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year: Its History & Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy (New York 1981).

[W. J. O'SHEA/EDS.]

HOLY UNION SISTERS

Officially, the Religious of the Holy Union of the Sacred Hearts (SUSC, Official Catholic Directory #2070); a congregation of teaching sisters with papal approbation, dedicated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the Immaculate Heart of Mary. Father Jean Baptiste Debrabant (1801–1880) founded the community in Douai, France, in 1826 to provide the religious instruction that was urgently needed in the period following the French Revolution. The community received full canonical approbation from Rome in 1843. In 1902, under a law authorizing the expulsion of all teaching religious from French schools, the French government confiscated 70 convents and schools of the congregation between 1902 and 1904. The sisters took refuge in their already established convents in Kain, Belgium (1833); Bath, England (1857); Bannagher, Ireland (1853); the U.S. (1886); and Argentina (1888). Not until 1941 did the sisters reopen their French schools.

Although the chief work of the community has always been teaching, on three occasions the sisters have taken up special tasks at the request of the Holy See. From 1923 to 1934 they assisted the Jesuit Orientalist Michael d' HERBIGNY by taking charge of the Villa Albani in Rome, a home for refugee Russians under the special jurisdiction of Pius XI. In 1928 the pope asked the sisters to train in their novitiate, then in Rome, candidates for the Byzantine Congregation of Sisters of the Theotokos Pam-makaristos (founded in 1921 by George Calavassy, then apostolic exarch of Constantinople). Then in 1941, at the suggestion of their cardinal protector, the sisters opened their convent, Villa Santa Teresa, as a hostel for college and university women studying in Rome.

The community came to the U.S. in 1886 when the Academy of Sacred Hearts, Fall River, MA, was opened by Mother Marie Helena (1849–1937). Mother Helena later became the first provincial superior in the United States. A novitiate was begun in Fall River in 1902. In the U.S., the congregation is divided into two separate provinces: Holy Union Fall River Province (headquartered in Fall River, MA) and Sacred Heart Province (headquartered in Groton, MA). Since 1958, the generalate is located in Rome.

“Semana Santa,” or Holy Week celebrations, Seville, Spain, ca. 1900–1925. (©Scheufler Collection/CORBIS)

Bibliography: A. CURTAYNE, Jean Baptist Debrabant (Paterson, NJ 1936). J. R. N. MAXWELL, Fifty Golden Years (Paterson, NJ 1963). A. DELPLANQUE, Portrait de M. Debrabant, fondateur de la Sainte Union des Sacrés Coeurs (Lille 1925).

[J. E. CREAMER/EDS.]

HOLY WEEK

Holy Week is the week immediately preceding Easter, the principal week of the liturgical year. Besides the name Holy Week, it is also called Major or Greater Week. In earlier centuries it was known as Passion Week because it commemorated the events of the Passion, as well as Paschal Week since in Christian antiquity the notion of Passion always included the resurrection. The AMBROSIAN RITE calls it “authentic week,” which is also an allusion to the events celebrated during these days. Because public sinners were absolved of their sins on Holy Thursday, Holy Week was in some places “the week of remission.” Less happy was the designation “painful week,” which it was given in other parts of the Church because of the increased burden of penance and fasting during these days. More to the point is what the Eastern Christians still call it, “the Week of Salvation”.

Although the first recorded reference to Holy Week is in St. Athanasius’s Festal Letters announcing the date of Easter, the original nucleus of Holy Week was the annual celebration of the Paschal Feast, which was then (3rd century) a three-day (triduum) commemoration beginning on Friday and ending on the morning of Easter Sunday. Holy Thursday was added by at least the 4th century. The entire week was rounded out at some time in the 5th or 6th century. Many of the Holy Week observances as we know them came originally from Jerusalem and spread through the West.

In 1955, Pius XII restored Holy Week to the prominence it had had in the early church, a prominence it had largely lost through the accretions of extraneous rites and ceremonies over time. In effect, Holy Week was restored as the heart of the Church’s year; through the rites of this week we relive the central elements of the paschal mystery. This pastoral consideration prompted Pius XII to insist on the active participation of the people in the Holy Week rites so that the whole Church is drawn into the celebration.

See Also: PALM SUNDAY; HOLY THURSDAY; GOOD FRIDAY; EASTER VIGIL.

Bibliography: M. TIERNEY, Holy Week: A Commentary (Dublin 1958). C. HOWELL, Preparing for Easter (rev. and enl. Collegeville, Minn. 1957). H. SCHMIDT, Hebdomada Sancta, 2 v. (Rome 1956–57). W. J. O’ SHEA, The Meaning of Holy Week (Collegeville, Minn. 1958). T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (Collegeville, 1991). A. J. MARTIMORT, ed., The Church at Prayer IV: The Liturgy and Time (Collegeville 1986). A. NOCENT, The Liturgical Year (Collegeville 1977). J. M. PIERCE, “Holy Week and Easter in the Middle Ages,” in Passover and Easter: Origin and History to Modern Times, eds. P. F. BRADSHAW and L. A. HOFFMAN (South Bend, Ind. 1999) 161–185. A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year: Its History & Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy (New York 1981).

[W. J. O’ SHEA/EDS.]

HOLY YEAR

A year during which a solemn plenary indulgence is granted to the faithful under certain conditions. Holy Years are ordinary when they occur at regular intervals (every 25 years in modern times) and extraordinary when they are proclaimed for some very special reason, e.g., in 1933, to celebrate the anniversary of the Redemption.

In pre-Exilic Judaism every 50th year was a JUBILEE YEAR, or year of remission (Lev 25.25–54), in which debts were pardoned and slaves freed. After the Exile and until A.D. 70, the Jews continued to hold a sabbatical year in which debts of fellow Jews were remitted. The medieval popes came to apply such a custom spiritually, decreeing a Holy Year or Jubilee, beginning and ending with special sacred ceremonies, which was intended to improve the religious life of the faithful.

History. The first Holy Year in 1300 began on the evening of December 24–25 (the end of the old year and beginning of the new, by the reckoning of the Roman Curia), when large crowds visited St. Peter's basilica. Others continued to come on the following days, for a tradition had arisen that the first year of every century was especially propitious for gaining special indulgences. Though no written source could be located, Pope BONIFACE VIII issued the bull Antiquorum habet (February 22), which determined that every 100 years a universal jubilee should be celebrated. During the centenary year, under condition of contrition and confession, the faithful could gain a plenary indulgence by making visits to the basilicas of ST. PETER'S and SAINT PAUL-OUTSIDE-THE-WALLS: 30 if they were Romans, otherwise 15. Immense crowds of pilgrims visited Rome in answer to this bull (engraved in marble and still found at the side of the Holy Door in St. Peter's). In 1342 CLEMENT VI decreed a jubilee every 50 years; hence the second Holy Year was in 1350. In 1389 URBAN VI reduced the time to 33 years (according to the belief that our Savior had lived that long) and proclaimed the third Holy Year for 1390. Two more basilicas were to be visited, St. John Lateran, and St. Mary Major. The fourth jubilee was the centenary year 1400, and the fifth was held in 1425 by MARTIN V, who preferred in those unsettled times to wait two years after the 33 years as determined by Urban VI had elapsed. In 1450, NICHOLAS V celebrated a jubilee and canonized the popular BERNARDINE OF SIENA. Finally, in 1470, PAUL II reduced the time to 25 years, so that the next Holy Year was in 1475, and up to our days this custom has remained. In 1500 ALEXANDER VI prescribed the ceremonies that are observed essentially even today: the pope opens the Holy Door of St. Peter's and appoints three cardinals to do the same in the other basilicas, using assigned rites and prayers. At the end of the Holy Year, the Porta Santa is again walled up.

Great pomp accompanied later jubilees, although the French invasion of Italy prevented its celebration in 1800. Though LEO XII in 1825 held another jubilee, political troubles prevented that of 1850. In 1875 Pius IX was a prisoner in the Vatican and felt obliged to celebrate the jubilee in a very restricted way. But LEO XIII renewed the solemnity in 1900, and PIUS XI proclaimed the ordinary Holy Year in 1925, and the extraordinary in 1933. The Holy Year of 2000, marking the transition to the third Christian millennium witnessed unprecedented crowds visiting Rome and other designated shrines worldwide for the jubilee indulgence.

Pope Boniface VIII blessing pilgrims during the Holy Year 1300; fresco in St. John Lateran, Rome, attributed to Giotto. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Requirements and Ceremonies. An ordinary Holy Year begins on December 24, with first vespers of Christmas. On this day, the Holy Doors of the four basilicas are simultaneously opened. Conditions for the jubilee indulgence include confession made especially for gaining the jubilee indulgence; communion, and visits to the four major basilicas, for those who are in Rome, but elsewhere, to churches designated by the local ordinary. Each papal document of proclamation specifies the exact conditions of the jubilee. Local ordinaries receive faculties to dispense from these conditions all those who are unable to fulfill them.

Bibliography: P. BREZZI, Storia degli anni santi (Milan 1949). R. FOREVILLE, "L'idée de jubilé chez les théologiens et les canonistes (XII<sup>e</sup>–XIII<sup>e</sup>): avant l'institution du jubilé romain (1300)," Revue d'Histoire Ecclesiastique 56 (1961) 401–423. F. FERRERO, "Año Santo y moral: originalidad y perspectivas históricas de un gesto eclesial controvertido," Studia Moralia 11 (1973) 181–200. T. J. REESE, "A Eucharistic Millennial Jubilee," Worship 69 (1995) 531–537.

[J. J. GAVIGAN/EDS.]

HOLYWOOD, CHRISTOPHER

Superior of the Jesuit mission in Ireland; b. Dublin, 1562; d. Dublin, Sept. 4, 1626. He was the elder son of Nicholas, Lord of Artane, County Dublin, and Elizabeth, daughter of John Plunket, third Baron Dunsany. He entered the novitiate at Verdun in 1584. After studies at the university of Pont-à-Mousson, he lectured on theology at Dôle and later at Padua. He was appointed superior of the Irish mission in 1598, but was arrested at Dover and detained in different prisons until May 1603. He was then transported to France, and eventually arrived in Ireland in March 1604. Although he suffered from poor health and impaired eyesight, his government of this Jesuit mission until his death fully justified his appointment. During his term of office the number of Jesuits in Ireland increased from 7 to 44, and residences were established by him in the principal towns of Leinster, Munster, and Connaught. He promoted the introduction and expansion of the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin, especially among the Anglo-Irish of the larger towns who were most exposed to the protestantizing influence of the government.

Hollywood was the author of two important controversial works published at Antwerp, and before his death had just completed a treatise on the moral virtues.

Bibliography: J. MACERLEAN, "Superiors of the Irish Mission, 1598–1774," Irish Jesuit Year Book (Dublin 1929). E. HOGAN, Ibernia Ignatiana (Dublin 1880). C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:446–447.

[F. FINEGAN]

HOLZHAUSER, BARTHOLOMEW

Ecclesiastical writer, founder of Bartholomites; b. Langna, Bavaria, Aug. 24, 1613; d. Bingen, May 20, 1658. He was one of 11 children of an impoverished family. In 1639, after working his way through school, he was ordained at Ingolstadt. The next year, while exercising his priestly duties, he attended the university and earned a licentiate in theology and a doctorate in philosophy. He served as pastor in Tittmonig, Leukenthat, and Bingen on the Rhine.

At the university, the general laxity in morals and weakening of the faith caused by the THIRTY YEARS' WAR disturbed him, and he envisioned a congregation for diocesan priests whose objective would be the sanctification of its members in their missionary apostolate. Other than a promise of obedience to a superior no vows would be taken. Those members leading exemplary lives were to teach in seminaries or live by twos and threes as zealous leaders in parishes. He was unable to make a foundation in Eichstadt, but established one at Tittmonig, Bavaria, in the Archdiocese of Salzburg, under the title Institutum Clericorum saecularium in communi viventium, often referred to as the "United Brothers" or "Bartholomites." The latter term is not to be confused with the Armenian monks of the same title who sought refuge in Italy in the 13th century. In 1658 the request for papal approbation was denied; however, at the request of Emperor Leopold, the approval was given in 1680, twelve years after Holzhauser's death. The institute flourished in many countries, having at one time more than 1,500 members; many seminaries were entrusted to its members. However, the institute had many enemies who helped bring about its extinction in the late 18th century. The congregation was restored in France in the 19th century.

One of Holzhauser's important writings is Constitutiones et exercitia spiritualia clericorum saecularium in communi viventium, a constitution used in many seminaries in the 17th and 18th centuries, and as a handbook for education of the laity. His Interpretatio Apocalypsis usque ad cap XV, has as its central feature the familiar theme of the Middle Ages, that of JOACHIM OF FIORE, the seven ages of the Church. De diversis orandi modis et de modo meditandi, De humilitate, and Epistola fundamentalis are among his writings aimed to help clerical and laic spiritual development. A petition for Holzhauser's canonization was begun in Rome.

Bibliography: M. HEIMBUCHER, Die Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche, 2 v. (3d ed. Paderborn 1932–34) 2:595–598. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:1039. M. J. HUFNAGEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 2:7; 5:458.

[C. LYNCH]

HOMILETICS

Homiletics in its broadest sense may be defined as the theory of preaching, and as such it is a part of pastoral theology, coordinate with CATECHETICS and liturgy. The part of this theory that considers the Church's mission to preach, the role of preaching in the economy of salvation, the supernatural efficacy of preaching, and the relationships of preaching to Sacred Scripture, to the liturgy, and to the hierarchical powers of teaching, Orders, and jurisdiction is more commonly called the theology of preaching. In a restricted sense, however, in which it is also sometimes called sacred eloquence or sacred rhetoric, homiletics may be defined as the body of concepts and principles that govern effective preaching. In this sense it is concerned with both the matter and the form of the preacher's discourse. To the extent that it is concerned with the actual substance of what is to be preached, it is known as material homiletics. To the extent that it is concerned with the investigation, arrangement, and expression of ideas, it is formal homiletics. Both material and formal homiletics may be general or special. General homiletics is the body of concepts and principles that govern all effective preaching. Special homiletics is a more limited body of concepts and principles, applying only to the preaching of a particular area of doctrine or discipline, or to a particular type of audience, or in a particular situation. Special homiletics has not achieved any typical systematization or organization of its concepts and principles, and therefore a synopsis of its content is scarcely possible. It must treat, however, the specific problems of missions and retreats, religious conferences and recollections, cursillos, novenas, and other types of preaching beyond the usual preaching during the Mass, all of which have their own characteristics.

General homiletics, concerned with all effective preaching, draws its concepts and principles from reflection on the example of Jesus Christ and His Apostles and Christian preachers who have followed them down through the centuries. Counsels for the preparation and delivery of effective discourse derived in this way have been organized in many different systems by various authors in the long history of the theory of preaching see PREACHING, II (HOMILETIC THEORY). The most typical system over the centuries has employed the framework of the perennial rhetoric, with its fivefold process of invention, arrangement, style, memory, and delivery. Employment of this rhetorical canon as a form of organization, however, indicates that general homiletics depends on the perennial rhetoric not as its foundation, but rather as its framework. This relationship is analogous to that between Catholic theology and scholastic philosophy, which are sciences independent of each other and yet of the greatest mutual assistance.

A synopsis of the content of general homiletics may therefore be given under six headings. The first of these, an introductory tract, stands for preliminary discussion of the whole of preaching, such as the role of the preacher, his personal qualities, his duty to preach, his mandate from the Church, his habits of study and work. For this tract, see PREACHING, III (THEOLOGY OF). The other five, corresponding to the rhetorical canon, are concerned respectively with finding the ideas (invention); putting them into effective order (arrangement); expressing them in words and sentences (style); fixing them in mind (memory); and uttering them with effective voice and action (delivery).

Invention. This tract deals with finding what is to be preached. It explains the principles of searching out the material, sifting it, rejecting what is less suitable, and finally selecting the ideas to be expressed. Important in this tract is the discussion of the psychological phenomena of the creative process in all its phases, to which the preacher, as any other creative worker, is subject. Principles are established for determining the preacher's theme in a given situation, such as the principles of adequate instruction, liturgical unity, and audience analysis. Methods of investigating the selected theme by reflection, discussion, and reading are expounded, with particular attention to the standard current reference works and available research tools. The various aims of preaching are then discussed: transcendent, generic, and specific. The ultimate or transcendent aim is the glory of God through the salvation of souls, from which it follows that preaching is a supernatural act and that all of its norms of effectiveness must not be literary or aesthetic, but functional and pragmatic. Moreover, since this aim is to be achieved through human cooperation with grace, which requires an act of will, Catholic preaching as a whole is persuasive and must lead ultimately to moral resolution and action. This, however, is not to say that every individual sermon must be persuasive. On the contrary, the intermediate or generic aims of preaching are traditionally to instruct, to affect, and to persuade, these three being English terms evolved from the docere, delectare, movere of St. Augustine after Cicero and Quintilian; and although they are seldom isolated from each other, each of the three aims suffices by itself for a single discourse. The specific or proximate aim of preaching is, finally, the particular good that the preacher intends to achieve in a given discourse.

In further discussion of the creative process a complete homiletic theory explains the topoi, otherwise known as "topics" or "commonplaces," after the τόποι and loci communes of the ancients. These are a list of general headings or concepts that the preacher will learn to check off in sorting out the ideas he has accumulated in his remote and proximate preparation for preaching on a given theme. Sometimes the topoi are broadly distinguished as instructive, affective, or persuasive, corresponding to the three generic aims served by the ideas to which each of the respective topoi are related.

The purpose of the instructive topoi is to provide the preacher with a checklist of headings that will help him to take inventory of the ideas he can use to instruct his listeners on a theme, such as definition, derivation, description, distinction, division, distribution, comparison, contrast, causality, quotations, statistics, probability, history, example, and analogy. Affective topoi provide the preacher with a checklist of clues to the inspiring aspects of a theme, such as size, power, magnificence, mystery, solemnity, terror, universality, antiquity, nostalgia, nobility, tenderness, and poignancy. Persuasive topoi are those aspects of his material that give the preacher the power to move his listeners to definite action. Any authentic series of motives or drives discovered in human psychology is a checklist of such topoi. One given by St. Thomas Aquinas consists of the 11 interrelated passions that he describes in the Summa theologiae. The doctrine of the topoi, long an integral part of homiletic theory, but often controversial and recently out of favor, is being revived by contemporary psychological investigation of the creative process.

Arrangement. The tract on arrangement is concerned with putting into the most effective sequence the thought that the preacher has chosen for expression. Its basic principle is that it is important to determine not only what is to be said in a given discourse but also in what order it is to be said, since each thought prepares the listeners either well or poorly for what follows. Principles of good arrangement are therefore concerned with the frame of mind and tone of feeling that listeners have at the outset, during the progress, and toward the conclusion of the discourse. Fundamental qualities to be observed in arrangement are: unity, the relation of ideas to each other and to the specific aim of the sermon; structure, the relationship among the major units of discourse; emergence, the clarity and force with which the essential message stands out from its background of supporting material; and progression, the forward movement of ideas that arouses, sustains, and finally satisfies the interest of the listeners. Basic also is the discussion of the laws of attention and interest and similar psychological factors.

Distinction may be made between static and dynamic arrangement: the former may be defined as a sequence characterized by neat divisions of material, well unified and structured, but in which the earlier part of the discourse does not set up psychological momentum to carry the interest forward; the latter may be defined as a sequence characterized by a kind of tension and involvement in the earlier parts that naturally drive the mind and emotions onward by setting up a need for satisfaction. Although the variety of sequences implementing these concepts and principles is unlimited, there are a number of formulas, or typical outlines, that historically and psychologically have proved themselves as basic plans of arrangement. From patristic and early medieval times there are the various forms of the HOMILY; from late medieval times there is the scholastic thesis and the simple syllogism; from the Renaissance tracts on ecclesiastical rhetoric there is the five- or six-part classical oration; from 17th-century France there is the Little Method of St. Vincent de Paul. All of these have had their vogue in the history of Christian preaching and are worthy of close study on the part of the student even in the 20th century. In addition, a number of formulas derived both from practical experience and from the psychological research of modern times can be brought forward as effective plans, such as those based on the problem-solution arrangement and the motivated sequence. These formulas serve in the creative process as topoi of arrangement, corresponding to the topoi of invention described above.

Style. The tract on style concerns the principles by which the actual words, phrases, and sentences are to be chosen for expressing the ideas already discovered and arranged. The general qualities of language, such as clearness, concreteness, emphasis, and coherence, are discussed. This tract deals also with the levels or types of style, of which three were distinguished by St. Augustine after Cicero and Quintilian and of which three may still be distinguished as corresponding to the generic aims of preaching, namely, the instructive style, the affective style, and the persuasive style. Avoiding any impression that style is concerned with literary ornament rather than with the functional effectiveness that is the touchstone of every other part of formal homiletic theory, the general features of each of these three styles and their relationship is described. A feature of all of them is the use of stylistic modes, a term that may be employed for the "tropes and figures" of earlier ecclesiastical rhetorics, standing for the rhetorical movement of phrases and sentences or even whole paragraphs, the same thought of which can be cast in a variety of stylistic modes, just as the same argument can be framed in a dozen different moods of syllogism. This part of the tract on style, almost entirely atrophied in contemporary manuals, must, like the topoi, be interpreted anew.

Memory and Delivery. The tracts on memory and delivery in general homiletics differ little, if at all, from the corresponding theory in secular rhetoric or public speaking. In these days, when discourses are commonly much shorter than in ancient times, the discussion of memory is limited almost entirely to a consideration of the comparative merits of preaching from manuscript, or from memory, or from nothing more than an outline firmly fixed in the mind. Which of these methods is best has been hotly debated since the time of St. Augustine. The merits of these various degrees of memorizing as against extemporizing may, however, be summed up in an explanation of an extempore-memoriter continuum to indicate the degree of memorizing as against extemporizing in any given type of preparation for preaching. What type is best in any instance will depend on the preacher's experience and aptitudes, the theme, the audience, and the circumstances.

The tract on delivery, finally, includes consideration of vocal variety and bodily action, elements so essential to effective preaching that they must be the object of extensive practice. Under the vocal aspect of delivery comes discussion of variety in the vocal elements of time, pitch, force, and quality. Under the bodily aspect comes discussion of covert and overt action, posture, and gesture.

For bibliography, see PREACHING, I (HISTORY OF).

[J. M. CONNORS]

HOMILETICS, TEACHING OF

After the Second Vatican Council II there were significant changes in the teaching of homiletics in Catholic seminaries. These changes were the result of a number of factors. Probably the most important one was the renewed emphasis on preaching within the Catholic Church. The Council's Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests states that the proclamation of the Word of God through preaching is the most important duty of the priest (Presbyterorum ordinis 4). Contemporary theology of preaching views preaching not as a message about faith, but as the occasion for an actual salvific meeting between God and man. "In still another way yet more truly . . . (God) is present in the Church as she preaches, since the Gospel proclaimed is the Word of God, which is preached only in the name and by the authority of Christ and with his presence . . ." (Paul VI MystFid; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 [1965] 763).

A second factor was the general decline in the public's unquestioning acceptance of institutional authority. In the Church one of the results has been a more vocal laity who feel freer to criticize the quality of preaching and the qualifications of preachers. This has been accentuated by the ecumenical movement which has familiarized Catholic clergy and laity with the centrality of preaching in the Protestant tradition in contrast to its lack of emphasis in the Catholic tradition.

A third factor was a change in the field of speech education. Public speaking, which provided the traditional framework for instruction in homiletics, came to be situated within the broader context of communication so that public speaking is seen as but one form of public communication. Introductory speech courses address include approaches to intrapersonal, interpersonal, and mass communication.

Curricular Elements. Although there is no standard homiletics curriculum, there is a consensus that an effective program of instruction in homiletics must include the following elements.

The Person as Preacher. From both a theological and a communications viewpoint the preacher is central to the preaching task. The homily in essence must be a witness to a saving encounter between God and the preacher. Thus his spiritual life is an essential part of preaching. The preacher must learn to be honest about his own concerns, failures, and successes. This portion of the course must provide the seminarian with tools for self-analysis and a setting for rededication in faith.

Theology and Preaching. The preacher must understand the importance of preaching in God's salvific plan. Preaching is the normative link between God and man. He must be aware of the kerygmatic nature of preaching in which Christ actually meets men through the preaching event (Ebeling). In another vein, instruction in practical exegesis must be given in which a biblical passage is analyzed not only for its theological but also its "homiletic" content.

Preaching as Communication. An overview of research in communication is crucial for effective preaching. A course would cover such topics as speaker credibility, persuasion, attitudes, dissonance theories. A preacher must know his congregation. Thus he must be provided with proper tools for audience analysis. These include strategies for overcoming audience barriers to the message. According to communication theory this is one of the most neglected and most important areas of preaching.

Homily Preparation and Evaluation. The elements of the traditional speech course are still essential for the preacher. Its format can be based upon the classical rhetorical canons (invention, arrangement, style, memory, and delivery) or on other contemporary arrangements. The element of added importance today is a full treatment of homily evaluation through individual critiques, video and audio taping, and critique teams.

New Forms of Preaching. While instruction in special forms of preaching (retreats, cursillos, etc.) has been a peripheral part of the curriculum in homiletics, being introduced are such types of preaching as dialogue homilies (chancel and congregational), multi-media homilies, and the use of radio and television. While these forms will not replace the traditional preaching format, they remain important to the preacher.

See Also: PREACHING III (THEOLOGY OF).

Bibliography: G. EBELING, Theology and Proclamation: Dialogue with Bultmann (Philadelphia 1966). R. HOWE, The Miracle of Dialogue (New York 1963); Partners in Preaching: Clergy and Laity in Dialogue (New York 1967). J. JUNGSMANN, The Good News Yesterday and Today (New York 1962). W. MALCOMSON, The Preaching Event (Philadelphia 1968). K. RAHNER, ed., The Renewal of Preaching: Theory and Practice (New York 1968). D. RANDOLPH, The Renewal of Preaching: A New Homiletic Based on the New Hermeneutic (Philadelphia 1969). W. THOMPSON and G. BEN-

NET, Dialogue Preaching: The Shared Sermon (Valley Forge 1969). G. ROXBURGH, ed., Clergy in Communication, 4 v. (Ottawa 1970). R. P. WAZNAK, Sunday after Sunday: Preaching the Homily as Story (New York 1983). G. S. SLOYAN, Worshipful Preaching (Philadelphia 1984). W. J. BURGHARDT, Preaching: The Art and the Craft (New York 1987).

[A. STEICHEN]

HOMILY

Derived from the Greek word homilia (verb form homilein) that means primarily a being together, communion, social intercourse; the parallel Latin word is commercium. Homily connotes the idea of a meeting of minds and hearts and so it very soon took on the meaning of familiar speech with someone, of conversation, and of familiar discourse with a gathering. These still remain the basic notes of a genuine homily: a familiar (in the sense of fatherly) conversation with a group of people.

History. Although the etymology is an aid to understanding what the homily essentially is, a familiar discourse, it does not really give the specific Christian meaning of the word. For that one must look to the history of preaching and the use of the term in Christian literature. There the homily is a familiar discourse made by a pastor of souls to the people confided to his care, a conversational discourse that is given during the liturgical action upon a text suggested by the liturgy. This is the character of the genuine homily from the time it makes its first appearance in the 2d-century description of the Mass given by St. Justin down through the golden age of the homily in the 4th and 5th centuries and well into medieval times. This form of preaching at once so pastoral and so biblical has been revived by the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican Council II.

Beginning. While the remote origin of the homily may have been the commentary on the Scriptures that were read in the synagogue service, the Christian form was something altogether new. The Scripture commentary that formed part of the synagogue service was more didactic and explanatory whereas the Christian homily appears more as an exhortation based upon the text, or an application of the text to Christian living. The homily described by Justin in his first Apology is certainly more than a mere exegesis of the text: "After the reading of the Scriptures the president of the brethren exhorts us (or verbally admonishes us) to the imitation of these good examples (things) in a speech" (1 Apology 67; J. Quasten, ed., Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima 19).

Patristic Period. From the 3d century onward the homily took more definite shape and this type of preaching reached its fullest development in the homilies of the Fathers of the Church, in both East and West. Normally the homily was given by the celebrant (who was usually the bishop) during the Eucharistic synaxis; in fact it was an almost indispensable part of Sunday worship. It consisted of an explanation and application of one or other of the texts read or sung in the liturgical assembly.

The great homilists among the Fathers were Origen, the Cappadocians, and John Chrysostom in the East, and Hippolytus, Ambrose, Augustine, Maximus of Turin, Zeno of Verona, and Leo the Great in the West. Origen himself shows that the homily is more than a mere commentary on the Scripture: "It is not a time to comment, but to edify the Church of God and to move inert and nonchalant hearers by the example of the saints and mystical explanations" (Hom. in Gen. 10.5; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 12:219). He was also the first to make the distinction between "logos" (sermo) and "homilia" (tractatus). The first was preaching in the style of the classical orations, while the homily was the form of preaching in which popular exegesis of Scripture was given.

Basil is remembered for his homilies on the Hexaemeron (six days of creation), on the Psalms, and on moral subjects. John Chrysostom commented upon Genesis, the Psalms, the Gospels of Matthew and John, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Paul. In the West Hilary of Poitiers gave homilies on the Psalms. From Ambrose came homilies on the Hexaemeron, the Psalms, and the Gospel of Saint Luke. Augustine emerged as the greatest preacher among the Western Fathers. He commented in homilies upon the Sermon on the Mount, the Gospel of John, and the Psalms, as well as upon numerous other isolated passages in the Scriptures. Less well known, yet of considerable value, are the Biblical homilies of Peter Chrysologus, Maximus of Turin, Faustus of Riez, and Caesarius of Arles. Gregory I kept up the patristic tradition of Biblical homilies.

Because the Scripture readings were, in due time, selected with a view to their appropriateness for the feast celebrated, the homily took on a new task, that of explaining the meaning of the feast. Consequently, many of the patristic collections of sermons center around the great feasts of the Church year. This is true both in the East and in the West. In the East John Chrysostom and the two Gregories are the most conspicuous. In the West Augustine is joined by Zeno of Verona and especially by Leo the Great. His sermons on the great feasts remain one of the best commentaries on the liturgical year.

The homilies spoken of up to this point were delivered by pastors to their flocks. They exemplify the principle that a true homily is a popular exposition and application of the Scriptures. There is another kind of homily however, delivered to a more select audience; this type had considerable influence on later spiritual writers. These were the monastic homilies, given to a community of monks by such leading writers as Jerome and Cassiodorus. Both of these men dealt with the Psalms in their homilies, but Jerome commented on the Gospels as well. Gregory the Great concentrated on the Book of Job, while the Venerable Bede dealt mostly with the Gospels. Some writers consider Bernard to be the last of the Fathers; in any case his sermons on the Church year and the Cantic of Canticles found many admirers and imitators.

In general one must say that the homilies of the Fathers from Origen to Bernard set the tradition for the homily for all time. For them the homily was essentially a popular exposition of the Scriptures read or sung in the liturgical assembly. The fact that they stayed close to the text and sought to make the Word of God the instrument for the spiritual formation of the faithful makes their approach valid in any age.

Medieval Period. The homilies of the Fathers set the tone for preaching right down to the 13th century. But with the coming of the friars the homily properly so-called declined, and it was replaced chiefly by the sermon, which developed more or less independently of the liturgical action.

The Council of Trent commanded pastors of souls to preach during Mass upon the text of the Mass, but it was not until the 19th century that the homily in the ancient patristic sense began to revive.

20th Century Developments. The 1917 Code of Canon Law enjoined the homily upon pastors of souls at the principal Mass on Sundays and feast days. But it was not until the LITURGICAL MOVEMENT began to take hold in Europe that the homily was revived in many places. It was the Second Vatican Council which gave the impetus needed for the restoration of the Homily to its privileged place within the Eucharist and, indeed, within the liturgies of all the Sacraments.

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican Council II not only enjoined the homily upon those who have the care of souls but it also restated and amplified the traditional concept of what a homily is. Never before in any official document has there been so clear a statement of the nature and aim of the homily. The homily is “an exposition of the mysteries of faith and the guiding principles of the Christian life expounded from the sacred text read in the liturgy during the liturgical assembly” (52). It is “a proclamation of God’s wonderful works in the history of salvation, the mystery of Christ ever made present and active within us, especially during the celebration of the sacred liturgy” (35). Consequently, the homily is “part of the liturgy itself” (52), “part of the liturgical service” (35). To this end, the Constitution decreed: (1) “more ample, more varied and more suitable readings from Sacred Scripture,” and (2) a sermon or homily drawing its content “mainly from scriptural and liturgical sources” and directed toward a deeper understanding of “the mystery of Christ ever made present and active in us,” especially in the liturgical celebration itself (34).

United States Bishops on the Homily. The 1982 United States Bishops’ document, Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly unfolds and develops the theological principles and pastoral norms on the homily that were enunciated in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, incorporating the “reading of the signs of the times” motif from the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World. In doing so, it speaks of the homily as “a scriptural interpretation of human existence which enables a community to recognize God’s active presence” (Fulfilled in Your Hearing 29). It reiterates the point that the homily does not primarily concern itself with a systematic theological understanding of the faith, because the liturgical gathering is not primarily an educational or catechetical assembly, but a worshipping assembly (Fulfilled in Your Hearing 17–18). The document defines the homilist as a “mediator of meaning” (Fulfilled in Your Hearing 7), who “does not so much attempt to explain the scriptures as to interpret the human situation through the Scriptures” (Fulfilled in Your Hearing 20). It explains that the preacher “represents this community voicing its concerns, by naming its demons, and thus enabling it to gain some understanding and control of the evil which afflicts it. He represents the Lord by offering the community another word, a word of healing and pardon, of acceptance and love” (Fulfilled in Your Hearing 7). Therefore, the primary responsibility of the homilist is not to explain but to interpret for the benefit of the liturgical assembly.

The Homily is conceived of not merely as a catechetical instruction located within the Eucharistic Liturgy; rather, it is conceived of primarily as a pastoral reflection on the mystery actually being celebrated in the liturgical event, an event which is a kind of peak moment in the ongoing mystery of the believer’s new life in Christ. This same view of the importance and the chief function of the Homily has prevailed in the post-conciliar development of the other Sacraments; it is reflected in the postconciliar rituals for Baptism, Penance, Matrimony, and the Anointing of the Sick. The ritual for each of these Sacraments calls for a Homily following selected scriptural Readings, based on the Readings, and directed towards a greater understanding of, and therefore a greater participation in, the sacramental mystery itself. The new regime of the Sacraments, therefore, calls for the closest possible integration of the ministry of Word and Sacrament, in order to bring about a more perfect interiorization of the Christian mystery itself, a mystery revealed in the Word, symbolized in Sacrament, and lived out in the faith-life of a believer continually inspired and energized by Word and Sacrament.

Bibliography: E. ECHLIN, Priest as Preacher (Cork 1973). J. HOFINGER, Evangelization and Catechesis (New York 1976). BISHOPS' COMMITTEE ON PRIESTLY LIFE AND MINISTRY: N.C.C.B., Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly (Washington, D.C. 1982). Y. BRILIOTH, A Brief History of Preaching (Philadelphia 1965). K. RAHNER, ed., The Renewal of Preaching: Theory and Practice (New York 1968). W. SKUDLAREK, The Word in Worship: Preaching in a Liturgical Context (Nashville 1981). T. K. CARROLL, Preaching the Word (Wilmington, Del. 1984). R. P. WAZNAK, Sunday After Sunday: Preaching the Homily As Story (New York 1983). R. P. WAZNAK, Like Fresh Bread: Sunday Homilies in the Parish (New York 1993). R. P. WAZNAK, An Introduction to the Homily (Collegeville, Minn. 1998). P. JANOWIAK, The Holy Preaching: The Sacramentality of the Word in the Liturgical Assembly (Collegeville, Minn. 2000).

[W. J. O'SHEA/T. D. ROVER/EDS.]

HOMINES INTELLIGENTIAE

Pseudomystic sect active in and around Brussels in late 14th and early 15th century. Aegidius Cantoris (Sanghers), an uneducated layman who was apparently influenced by the visionary and poetess Bl. HADEWIJCH and by Marie of Valenciennes, founded the sect, which was especially popular among women. The most notable convert was the Carmelite William of Hildernisse, who assumed leadership at the death of Aegidius and developed his ideas (see WILLIAMITES). The salient points of doctrine were pantheism; illuminism; belief in the age of the Holy Spirit and of spiritual freedom; sexual libertinism; contempt of good works; and rejection of the means of grace, of the priesthood, and of the Church. The sect was condemned by PETER OF AILLY in 1411 [E. Baluze, Miscellanea (Paris 1678) 2:277–297].

Bibliography: P. FRÉDÉRICQ, ed., Corpus documentorum Inquisitionis haereticae pravitatis Neerlandicae, 5 v. (Ghent 1889–1906) 1:267–279. H. C. LEA, A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages, 3 v. (New York 1958). F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7:38–39.

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

HOMINISATION

Hominisation is broadly understood as the process (and its implications) whereby a human being comes into existence. Three problematic aspects of the process can be specified: the biological, the medical/moral, and the theological. For the biologist, “hominisation (anthropogenesis) means the phylogenetic processes by which man has developed by continuous transformations from a presumed Primate group of the Tertiary era in his bodily characteristics and also in his psyche” (Overhage). The biologist recognizes, therefore, the close resemblance between man and the higher Primates, but also emphasizes that with the emergence of man there is a completely new type of organism, i.e., one endowed with speech, spiritual behavior, and the capacity to form a culture. Thus, although there are no unambiguous criteria for distinguishing man from lower animal organisms, and although substantial evidence for evolution from behavioral patterns common to all vertebrates clearly exists, all attempts to explain abstract thought by evolution remain unsuccessful. Discontinuity between animal and human behavior is acknowledged, and scientific research cannot yet give any definitive explanation of the evolutionary process leading to the appearance of man.

The term hominisation is also used in discussing the prenatal development of human beings, with obvious implications for the morality of abortion. Recent studies (Williams and Milhaven) have shown that Christian theology has varied considerably in its estimation of the moment when the fetus is endowed with a human soul (hominisation). The Church Fathers were divided on the issue, some holding that human life properly so-called was present at conception, while others decided upon hominisation at a later stage of fetal development. Thomas Aquinas's theory, defended today by Joseph Donceel both for its inherent worth and its appeal to the modern rejection of any soul-body dualism, supports delayed hominisation over immediate hominisation. According to Aquinas's hylomorphism, a substantial form—in this case a human soul—can exist only in matter developed sufficiently to receive it, i.e., only after several weeks of gestation. The more common Catholic teaching over at least the past two centuries, however, is that of immediate hominisation (Mangan). The absence of any qualitative difference in the human zygote from the time of conception to the time of birth is the central argument used for this position.

Theological reflection on hominisation deals especially with evolution and the place of man in the universe. Because any theological anthropology recognizes the radical difference between man and non-spiritual forms of life, it must hold for a definitive creative act in the evolutionary process whereby God brings man into being. Nor is this adequately conceived as an evolution of the human body and a special creative initiative by God in regard to the human soul. Since soul and body are not two autonomous entities but rather substantial principles of one individual being, “the spiritual soul which results from one direct creative act of God of necessity also signifies a transforming specification of the bodily component” (Rahner). This theory of moderate transformism seems to enjoy wide acceptance among Catholic theologians, especially insofar as it is compatible with biological theories of evolution, traditional teaching about the specific creation of man, and the eschatological dynamism whereby all existence tends toward spirit and spirit toward the one God (Teilhard de Chardin).

Bibliography: The March 1970 issue of Theological Studies (volume 31) is completely devoted to the problem of abortion and hominisation, and contains (among others) the articles by Williams, Donceel, Milhaven and Mangan referred to in the text of this article. P. OVERHAGE “Hominisation” in Sacramentum Mundi 2, 286–89. R. OVERMAN Evolution and the Christian Doctrine of Creation (Philadelphia 1967). K. RAHNER Hominisation, The Evolutionary Origin of Man as a Theological Problem (New York 1965). P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN The Phenomenon of Man (New York 1959); The Future of Man (New York 1969).

[T. M. MCFADDEN]

HOMOOUSIOS

This article considers the history of the term (1) before Nicaea I, (2) at Nicaea I and afterward, and (3) in Christology.

Before Nicaea I. The word homoousios (ὁμοούσιος), traditionally translated into English by “consubstantial,” (one in being) was an everyday word in the Greek language with the meaning “of the same kind of stuff as.” It had been used technically, however, in the vocabulary of Gnosticism. Thus, in the system of VALENTINUS, Truth emanates from the substance of Mind and is consubstantial with it. Christian writers at Alexandria adopted the word to express the eternal origin of the Son from the Father. In explaining Heb 1.3 Origen wrote:

Light without brightness is unthinkable. If that is true, there was never a time when the Son was not the Son. He will be . . . , as it were, the splendor of the unbegotten light. . . .

Thus Wisdom, too, since it proceeds from God, is generated out of the divine substance itself. Under the figure of a bodily outflow, nevertheless, it, too, is thus called “a sort of clean and pure outflow of omnipotent glory” (Wisd. 7, 25). Both these similes manifestly show the community of substance between Son and Father. For an outflow seems homoousios, i.e., of one substance with that body of which it is the outflow or exhalation. [Fr. in Heb. 24.359; J. Quasten, Patrology 2:78]

Homoousios had become so common a theological term by the middle of the 3rd century that one of the accusations made against St. Dionysius the Great, Bishop of Alexandria, when he was denounced to the pope was that he refused to use the word homoousios. On the other hand, in Antioch a synod held in the year 267 to anathematize PAUL OF SAMOSATA expressly condemned the use of the word. This almost forgotten fact was made much of a century later by the enemies of Nicaea I. Since no writings of Paul of Samosata are extant, it can only be surmised what he meant by the term. Probably he was asserting what would be termed today a unity of Person or HYPOSTASIS between Father and Son. This hypothesis is consonant with Paul’s known MONARCHIANISM. Another possibility is that in calling Father and Son consubstantial he was asserting their common origin from a third, preexisting substance. According to ARIUS this latter is what the Manichees meant by homoousios, and it was for this reason that Arius rejected the term.

In the West the equivalent term consubstantialis was already in use in the 3rd century. Tertullian spoke of the Trinity as a unity of substance (Adv. Prax. 12).

At Nicaea I and Afterward. The Council of NICAEA I (A.D. 325) in using homoousios intended (1) to exclude any imperfection from the Word and (2) to assert His full equality with the Father. Whether the Council intended to affirm the numerical identity of the substance of Father and Son is doubtful, since this question had not been raised by the Arians. Both before and after the Council homoousios was used of beings that are numerically distinct, as parents and children. ATHANASIUS spoke of Esau and Jacob as ὁμοούσιοι.

After Nicaea I homoousios became the touchstone of orthodoxy. Only after a long and bitter struggle did the formula of the Council find acceptance. At times during this period the term was abandoned, as in the third formula of the Synod of Sirmium, which was subscribed to by Pope LIBERIUS in 358. This did not always mean a compromise of principle with the Semi-Arians, however, because many churchmen, including Cyril of Jerusalem, adhered to the faith of Nicaea I but avoided using homoousios because of its Sabellian associations (see SABELLIANISM). Even Athanasius admitted:

Those who accept everything else that was defined at Nicaea and doubt only about the “consubstantial” must not be treated as enemies . . . , but we discuss the matter with them as brothers who mean what we mean and dispute only about the word. [De syn. 41]

It is interesting that 60 years after Nicaea I the Council of Constantinople I avoided homoousios in its definition of the divinity of the Holy Spirit.

In Christology. In the Christological conflict of the early 5th century the term homoousios was of secondary importance. On the one hand, NESTORIUS denied that the consubstantial Word was born, suffered, or rose from the dead. On the other hand, EUTYCHES was reluctant to admit that Christ is consubstantial with mankind. When interrogated, he replied:

I confess that the holy Virgin is consubstantial with us and that of her our God was incarnate.

Since the Mother is consubstantial with us, then surely the Son is also?

If you wish me to add that He who is of the Virgin is consubstantial with us, I will do so. . . . But I take the word consubstantial in such a way as not to deny that He is the Son of God. [Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum 2.1.1:135]

The Council of Chalcedon in its definition repeated the phrase of Nicaea I, “consubstantial with the Father,” and added “consubstantial with us in his humanity” (H. Denziger, Enchiridion symbolorum 148).

See Also: ARIANISM; CONSUBSTANTIALITY; GENERATION OF THE WORD; LOGOS; TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON; WORD, THE.

Bibliography: A. GRILLMEIER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–66) 5:467–468. I. ORTIZ DE URBINA, Nicée et Constantinople (Paris 1963) 82–87. G. L. PRESTIGE, God in Patristic Thought (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; 1935; repr. 1959).

[J. M. CARMODY]

HOMOSEXUALITY

Homosexuality is a sustained condition or adaptation in which erotic fantasy, attraction and arousal is predominantly directed toward one’s own sex. The term “sustained” is used because confusion about one’s sexual orientation is not unusual during adolescence. Although the Catholic Church recognizes that homosexual attraction is not chosen, and therefore the orientation in itself is not a sin (Catechism of the Catholic Church 2358), it has been the constant tradition in Church teaching, based on Scripture and natural law, that homosexual activity is morally wrong. This article expounds the basis for this judgment in terms of the Church’s teaching on marriage, and its proper, virtuous expression of sexuality.

Scripture. Traditionally, six texts in Scripture have been accepted in Christian Churches as condemnations of homosexual behavior. Genesis (19.1–29) contains the story of Sodom and Gomorrah, destroyed by God for wickedness which included homosexual demands on Lot’s guests. Leviticus forbids practices such as adultery and bestiality, and includes the prohibition: “You shall not lie with a male as with a woman; such a thing is an abomination” (18.20–23), a condemnation repeated in Lv 20.13. In the New Testament, St. Paul’s Letter to the Romans cites indulgence in same-sex lust and the perverse actions of men with men, women with women, as deserving penalty (1.26ff). In the First Letter to the Corinthians Paul includes homosexual activity as one of the sins that bars inheritance of God’s kingdom (6.9–11). The First Letter to Timothy also lists homosexual activity as an offense of the wicked and godless (1.8,11). Finally, the author of the Letter of Jude refers to Sodom and Gomorrah and surrounding towns which indulged in unnatural vice, with the admonition that their punishment is meant to dissuade us (1.6–8).

Beginning with Anglican author D. Sherwin Baily’s 1955 book Homosexuality and Western Christian Tradition, a number of scholars and pro-gay apologists have reinterpreted the standard scriptural texts, thereby encouraging a revisionist theology which accepts homosexual activity as morally acceptable for homosexual persons. This interpretation stands against the constant teaching of the Church, dating from the Fathers of the early Christian centuries, affirmed by the major theological Doctors of the Middle Ages, and reaffirmed in current Catholic magisterial pronouncements.

These revisionist views take various forms, generally proposing that the scriptural texts were written in the setting of a different culture, and in times when the notion of differing sexual orientations was not known. Some maintain that the sin of the Sodomites was inhospitality rather than homosexual activity, or, while admitting that the Genesis story concerns homosexual activity, see its condemnation aimed at the violence of threatened homosexual rape. Others maintain that the text in Romans refers to homosexual actions by heterosexual persons, and that the strictures were against homosexual prostitution in a setting of orgiastic idolatry.

A simple reply to these views would be to note that nowhere in Scripture is homosexual genital behavior mentioned in a positive manner. More striking, in both Testaments one finds the over-arching affirmation of heterosexual marriage as a symbol of God’s covenant relationship with his people and of the union of Christ with his spouse, the Church. The 1986 letter of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, On the Pastoral Care of Homosexual Persons, notes that God fashions mankind male and female, in his own image and likeness. Human beings therefore are nothing less than the work of God Himself; and in the complementarity of the sexes they are called to reflect the inner unity of the Creator. They do this in a striking way in their cooperation with Him in the transmission of life by a mutual donation of self to the other (6).

The Catechism of the Catholic Church, published in 1992, does not see ambiguity in the Scripture references to homosexual behavior. Citing four of the classic texts, it states: “Basing itself on Sacred Scripture, which presents homosexual acts as acts of grave depravity, tradition has always declared that ‘homosexual acts are intrinsically disordered’ . . . contrary to the natural law . . . (and) under no circumstances can they be approved” (2357).

The first chapter of Genesis contains the nucleus of the theology of marriage. “God created man in his image . . . male and female he created them, and blessed them saying ‘be fertile and multiply’” (1.27). “That is why a man leaves his father and mother and clings to his wife, and the two of them become one” (2.24).

Morality. Catholic moral theology sees marriage in terms of two inseparable purposes. One purpose is procreation, to which homosexual acts are obviously closed. “God created man in his image; in the divine image he created him; male and female he created them. God blessed them, saying; ‘Be fertile and multiply, fill the earth and subdue it’” (Gn 1.27f). The other purpose is the complementary union of the sexes. “This is why a man leaves his father and mother and clings to his wife and the two become one body” (Gn 2.24). The conjugal union is a symbol of the covenant relationship of God with his people, of Christ and the Church (Hos 2.21f; Is 54.10f.; Eph 5).

Sexuality in marriage is designed to be life-giving and love-giving, that is, open to children and establishing a permanent union of fidelity. The Second VATICAN COUNCIL brought into sharper focus the covenantal relationship of conjugal love, bringing it to equal emphasis with the begetting of children. This unitive relationship is of no less account than procreation (Gaudium et spes 50).

Magisterial Church teaching states that homosexual genital relations are objectively immoral because they “lack an essential and indispensable finality,” namely, the procreative function of sexuality, the openness to new life (Declaration on Certain Questions concerning Sexual Ethics [Dec. 29, 1975] #8). Homosexual activity annuls the goals and meaning of the Creator’s sexual design. Homosexual genital acts are not a truly physical or psychological union but an imitation of heterosexual intercourse. In marriage the psychological differences of the sexes sets the partners on an ongoing spousal journey toward a deeper, mutual understanding, thereby completing each other, with each partner called to transcend self through mutual self-donation. Homosexual acts join persons who are sexually and psychologically of the same gender, a sameness lacking the rich marital symbol of God’s union with His people, Christ’s union with His spouse, the Church.

Etiology. At the beginning of the third millennium the majority professional view is that homosexuality is inborn, immutable, and a normal variant of human sexuality. This is the stated position of the American Psychiatric Association, followed by the American Psychological Association, and other associations of various therapists such as social workers and marriage and family counselors, as well as the gay-lesbian activist organizations. These groups also emphasize that the origins of homosexual orientation are largely unknown.

However, acceptance of the inborn and immutable character of homosexual orientation has not gone unchallenged. Some members of the psychotherapeutic professions object that their professional organizations have taken a politically correct position rather than one based on scientific data, noting that the 1973 American Psychiatric Association’s decision to remove homosexuality from the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (3d ed.) was done in haste, bypassing ordinary decision-making channels, and under pressure from gay groups. The Catholic Medical Association, marshaling an impressive compendium of research, takes issue with the current prevalent professional position. The association does not accept that homosexuality is inborn, sees it as preventable, and treatable for those who are motivated (Homosexuality and Hope, 2000).

There is much yet to be learned about the origins and causes of homosexuality, and more is unknown than known. (It depends on one’s perspective whether the glass is partly empty or partly full.) There is a considerable body of research literature regarding possible correlates of homosexual development. Since the 1973 decision of the APA the research findings and clinical insights regarding homosexuality of the prior 75 years have been largely ignored. in many scientific circles. Subsequent research is better known by the general public through limited exposure in the media rather than through critical assessment of the studies themselves. There is sufficient research on homosexuality for some therapists to have formulated theories of its development, and to have devised therapy aimed at conversion from homosexuality to heterosexuality for those who desire to attempt to make this change.

The development of sexuality, both physical and psychological, is an extremely complex process. Empirical research and accumulated clinical experience does allow the construction of a tentative outline of development, while acknowledging that more is still unknown about it than has been firmly established, and that subsequent research may modify or radically change present theories.

Physical sexual history begins at conception and continues in a definite sequential pattern until birth. There are three principal stages in uterine sexual development, namely, genetic sex, gonadal sex, and sexual differentiation in the brain. At conception, a person receives a sex chromosome, X or Y, from each parent. XX produces a female, XY a male. Though there are anomalies such as XXY, or XYY, these are rare. From conception on, a person is male or female in every body cell. However, genetic sex alone does not constitute or guarantee proper physical sexual development. In the seventh week of human foetal development rudimentary sexual tissues begin to differentiate into female or male genital organs. In males the Y chromosome produces a protein which coats the tissues otherwise programmed to become female sexual organs, and effects the formation of male sexual organs. This development establishes gonadal sex. In the second trimester testosterone, produced by the newly formed testes, masculinizes clusters of cells in the "old brain," the brain structures humans share with lower vertebrates. In the female, estrogen and progesterone from the ovaries feminize corresponding brain tissues. These parts of the brain influence traits such as aggressiveness and preference for rough and tumble play, typical of males, and tendencies to nurture and cyclic sexual arousal in females.

Genetic sex, gonadal sex, and "brain sex" are the components of physical sexuality, the development of which continues after birth, particularly in adolescence when hormone function brings increased sexual drive and promotes development of secondary sex characteristics, such as male musculature and female breasts. Some experiments with animals as well as anomalous development in humans suggest that occurrences in fetal development may make an individual more vulnerable to later environmental influences on psychosexuality after birth.

Mental sex, distinct from physical sex, is a postnatal development. Psychosexuality or sexualized consciousness is sexuality as it manifests itself in the mind. It is a pervasive and fundamental personality feature which includes three interwoven components. The first component is the basic conviction of being male or female. The second component, subtly different, is the sense of being masculine or feminine. The third component is an individual's erotic preference for male or female partners, or both. These components, variously labeled in the literature, are core gender identity, gender role identity, and psychosexual orientation.

Core gender identity is the recognition "I am male" or "I am female." It begins to crystallize in the second year of life as the infant undergoes psychological birth, which includes moving away from his or her symbiotic relationship with the mother, and acquiring a dawning sense of being a separate individual who is a boy, or a girl.

Gender role identity is the subtly different recognition, "I am masculine" or "I am feminine." The individual gradually attains the conviction that he or she matches or falls short of the gender role expectations of a particular family and social environment. Gender role identity may vary on a fairly wide spectrum without infringing on core gender identity or orientation. Conversely, depending on a family and/or peer environment, gender role identity may become infected with a sense of inadequacy which can have a damaging effect on proper psychosexual orientation.

The third eventual psychosexual component is orientation: preferential erotic attraction to members of the opposite sex, same sex, or both sexes in varied degree. This is the defining element of heterosexuality, homosexuality, bisexuality.

This simplified division of interwoven physical and psychological elements in human sexuality provides some appreciation of its complexity and indicates that it cannot be viewed as a unitary dimension of personality. Sigmund Freud noted that the physical and mental characteristics of sexuality, including orientation, may vary independently of one another "up to a certain point . . . and are met within different individuals in manifold permutations" (Freud, 1962). It is hardly possible that these components of sexuality culminating in orientation are the result of a single gene. In addition, Columbia University researchers Byne and Parsons, reviewing the biological evidence and theories of the origins of homosexuality, concluded that it is extremely unlikely that the gamut and plasticity of human sexual behavior can be reduced to factors as simple as prenatal hormone programming. The general opinion among scientists who consolidate the various studies is that genetic, hormonal, and constitutional factors may predispose to sexual orientation, but it is postnatal environmental and psycho-social history which are its predetermining factors (Bancroft 1994; Byne & Parsons 1993; Money 1993).

Current Research. The current font of research does not include any that establishes or even claims a purely genetic base for homosexual orientation. A well-publicized study of monozygotic (identical) male twins found that 52 percent of the twin brothers of declared homosexual men were also homosexually oriented. (Bailey & Pillard, 1991) This finding does point to some common, as yet unidentified inherited factors which have an etiological role. The study does not support the direct inheritance of homosexuality itself since roughly half the identical co-twins, who share the same genetic program, were not homosexual. Other studies of identical twins, one of whom is homosexual, produced similar results, all with a lower percentage of homosexual co-twins than the study cited above. A study of identical lesbian twins reared apart from childhood, showed no concordance for homosexual behavior. This suggests that homosexuality is more dependent on acquired and learned factors than on genetic influences among lesbians (Elke et al., 1986). Sexual orientation may be less hardwired among women than among men.

As for immutability, the fact of change of orientation is cogent proof against it. Some pro-gay apologists claim that the persons who testified that they had changed were not really homosexual in the first place, a seeming case of killing the messenger. Prior to the 1973 APA decision to normalize homosexuality, the most generally reported therapeutic success rate for homosexual individuals who desired to change to heterosexuality was about 33 percent. Some homosexual clients who had sought reorientation motivated by religious convictions, disillusionment with the gay lifestyle and/or a desire for marriage, did in fact move to predominant heterosexual orientation (Hadden 1958; Bieber 1962; Willis 1967; Hatterer 1970; Soarides 1978).

A 1998 survey by the National Association of Research and Therapy of Homosexuality reported that a third of 882 homosexual persons made the transition to exclusive or predominant heterosexual orientation through therapy and counseling. The study confirmed that homosexuality is subject to modification through therapy (Nicolosi et al. 2000). At the 2001 APA convention in New Orleans, Robert L. Spitzer, M.D., presented a two-year clinical interview: "200 Subjects Who Claim to Have Changed Their Sexual Orientation from Homosexual to Heterosexual." The 143 men and 57 women who claimed reorientation which had lasted at least five years were recruited through Narth, ex-gay ministries, and individual therapists. Though complete change was uncommon, Spitzer concluded, "Some highly motivated individuals through a variety of change efforts can make substantial changes in multiple indicators of sexual orientation and achieve good heterosexual function."

This study is significant for two reasons: its results and its principal researcher. Spitzer was at the forefront of the movement to delete homosexuality from the official psychiatric diagnostic manual in 1973. The current results are a reversal of his own previously held opinion on the immutability of homosexual orientation. The Narth Bulletin (Aug. 2001) quotes Spitzer: "Like most psychiatrists I thought that homosexual behavior could be resisted—but no one could really change their sexual orientation. I now believe that's untrue—some people can and do change." Spitzer cautions that this study does not justify any coercion to change, but that individuals should have the right to explore their heterosexual potential.

Although the possibility of change through psychotherapy by some homosexual persons is definitely established, it is reckless to overplay it and arouse false hopes. The consistent figures on successful reorientation hover around 30 percent. Informed and experienced therapists are few. Commitment through the process is not easy. Over 40 percent drop out of the therapy which is long-term, minimally two years, and often requires considerable expense. Several Protestant groups, under the umbrella heading Exodus, stress religious motivation in working out of homosexuality to heterosexual orientation. Exodus, which relies on strong faith in the transforming power of Jesus Christ, sponsors more than 100 ministries in the United States, most of which are non professional counseling centers. The Mormon agency Evergreen also sponsors this work. Jonah is the Jewish counterpart.

As might be expected, conversion therapists do not accept homosexuality as a normal variant of human sexuality. Judgment on the outcomes of sexual development and of sexual behavior are regarded as evaluative judgments. Values, in this view, are outside the purview of science as science. Science tells us what is, ethics and religious morals state what ought to be. Conversion or reparative therapists do not hold that homosexuality is a mental illness but do consider it a developmental anomaly. Erik Erikson's socio-psychological theory of development outlines how excessive mistrust, self doubt, crippling guilt, inferiority feelings and the like are precipitates of dysfunctional family and other relationships. In parallel fashion some theorists see influences from difficult interpersonal situations as impinging on a vulnerable youngster, occasioning detachment from identification with the same-sex parent, and blocking the emergence of heterosexual orientation which they view as the proper development of the human person.

Ministry to Homosexual Persons. The Catholic Bishops of the United States have produced three documents regarding ministry to homosexual persons: To Live in Christ Jesus (1978); Human Sexuality (1991); and Always Our Children (rev. 1998), a pastoral message to the parents of homosexual children, with suggestions for pastoral ministers. All three documents emphasize that the homosexual condition itself is not sinful; it is discovered, not chosen by the individual. All three documents state categorically that homosexual persons are called to chastity as are unmarried heterosexual persons. They point out that prejudice, demeaning behavior, or derogatory humor aimed at persons with same-sex attractions is definitely not Christian and is indeed totally unjustified, a sin against charity. The documents call for the inclusion of homosexual persons in parish and other Church communities. The 1976 document states: "Some persons find themselves through no fault of their own to have a homosexual orientation. Homosexual persons like everyone else should not suffer from prejudice against basic human rights. They have a right to respect, friendship and justice. They should have an active role in the Christian Community . . . The Christian community should provide them a special degree of pastoral understanding and care." Always Our Children continues: "We understand that having a homosexual orientation brings with it enough anxiety, pain, and issues related to self acceptance without society adding additional prejudicial treatment."

The pastoral minister, therefore, must be charitable, compassionate and sensitive. It is hard to realize adequately the anguish that an adolescent experiences, sometimes with thoughts of suicide, upon first realizing he or she is different from the greater society of which each desperately wants to be a participant. As homosexual individuals grow older they hear, all too often, the mocking of peers and contemptuous, disparaging epithets. Thus it should be no surprise that persons with same-sex attractions are easily vulnerable to self-hatred, depression, and ultimately considerable anger against the society, mentality, and institutions which they see as demeaning and rejecting. The pastoral minister must be able to understand and cope with the negativism that they themselves will sometimes meet, to respond to it charitably and prudently, rather than react in ways that will only aggravate smoldering resentments. On the other hand, pastoral ministers must take care that compassion does not draw them into condoning or indirectly enabling sinful behaviors by a silence presumed to be consent. This approach can lead to the homosexual person's devastating physical and spiritual harm. Besides a firm conviction of Church teaching, the pastoral minister needs some appreciation of the psychology of persons with same-sex attractions. He or she needs an ability prudently to deal with opposition, both from the persons they seek to serve, and those who consider themselves supportive to the homosexual community by rejecting Church teachings.

In 1980 Cardinal Terrence Cook of New York City asked Fr. John Harvey O.S.F.S. to begin a ministry to Catholic homosexual persons. Fr. Harvey's efforts led to Courage, a movement which has grown to over a hundred chapters in the United States, Canada, England, Ireland, Australia, and other countries. The goals of Courage are to provide persons with same-sex attractions with a program of deeper spiritual life in order to deal with sexual issues and temptations, to deal with the unique difficulties of homosexual orientation, and to develop fellowship among them for facing their problems with mutual support amid chaste friendship. While some clergy and pastoral ministers may put emphasis on the sixth commandment, Courage moves to intimacy with Jesus Christ as the most cogent force in fostering interior chastity. It does not promote reorientation, leaving the choice of that goal to the individual. Instead it focuses on the member's spiritual life. Pope John Paul II has called Courage "the work of God."

Another outreach to homosexual persons is the National Association of Catholic Diocesan Gay and Lesbian Ministries. Several dioceses have adopted its mission statement which calls for fostering ministry with lesbian and gay Catholics, their families and friends. The NACDGLM also encourages the participation of lesbian and gay Catholics within the Church. It stresses that it is not enough that they should not suffer prejudice against basic human rights but also should have an active role in the Christian community, a goal set by the bishops pastoral documents cited above.

In 1999, Cardinal Francis George, Archbishop of Chicago praised the outreach to homosexual persons as an important and necessary ministry. Addressing the annual meeting of NACDGLM he stressed that such ministry must make clear the purpose "to help those who identify themselves in their own hearts and also publically, as homosexuals, to live chastely with the respect and encouragement of the Church." Acknowledging that some may not share this purpose, he stressed the Paschal Mystery: "To deny that the power of God's grace enables homosexuals to live chastely is to deny, effectively, that Jesus has risen from the dead."

Bibliography: J. M. BAILEY and R. PILLARD, "A Genetic Study of Male Sexual Orientation," Archives of General Psychiatry 48 (1991)1089-96. J. BANCROFT, "Homosexual Orientation: The Search for a Biological Basis," British Journal of Psychiatry 164 (1994) 437-440. A. BUTLER, "Trends in Same-Gender Sexual Partners, 1988-1998," Journal of Sexual Research 37 (2000) 333-343. W. BYNE and B. PARSONS, "Human Sexual Orientation: The Biological Theories Reappraised," Archives of General Psychiatry 50 (1993) 228-239. E. ELKE, et al., "Homosexuality in Monozygotic Twins Reared Apart," British Journal of Psychiatry 148 (1986) 421-425. S. FREUD, Collected Papers, v. 2, tr. J. RIVIERE (New York 1962). F. GEORGE, "Address to the Annual Meeting of the National Association of Catholic Diocesan Gay and Lesbian Ministries," Chicago (Oct. 9, 1998). S. HADDEN, "Treatment of Homosexuality by Individual and Group Psychotherapy," American Journal of Psychiatry 142 (1958) 810-815. J. HARVEY, The Truth about Homosexuality (San Francisco 1995). L. J. HATTERER, Changing Homosexuality in the Male (New York 1970). Catholic Medical Association, Homosexuality and Hope (Pewaukee, Wis. 2000). A. KINSEY, et al., Sexual Behavior in the Human Male (Philadelphia 1948); Sexual Behavior in the Human Female (Philadelphia 1953). J. MONEY, "Sin, Sickness, or Status? Homosexual Gender Identity and Psychoneuroendocrinology," in Psychological Perspectives in Lesbian and Gay Male Experiences, ed. L. D. GARNETS and D. C. KIMMEL (New York 1993) 130–167. J. G. MUIR, “Homosexuals and the 10 Percent Fallacy,” Wall Street Journal (March 31, 1993). J. NICOLASI, et al., “Retrospective Self-reports of Changes in Homosexual Orientation: A Consumer Survey of Conversion Therapy Clients,” Psychological Reports 86 (2000) 1071–1088. G. REMFEDI, et al., “Demography of Sexual Orientation in Adolescents,” Pediatrics 89 (1992) 714–720. C. W. SOCARIDES, Homosexuality (New York 1978). R. L. SPITZER, “200 Subjects Who Claim to Have Changed Their Orientation from Homosexual to Heterosexual,” presentation at the American Psychiatric Association annual convention, New Orleans (May 9, 2001). S. WILLIS, Understanding and Counseling the Homosexual Male (Boston 1967).

[J. KEEFE]

HOMOSEXUALS, PASTORAL CARE OF

A letter addressed to the worldwide Catholic episcopate by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF), “On the Pastoral Care of Homosexual Persons” (Oct. 1, 1986), effectively confirmed the position of the United States National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) that homosexual persons are entitled to “a special degree of understanding and care” from the Christian community (pastoral letter, “To Live in Christ Jesus,” Nov. 11, 1976).

The essential requisites of this special pastoral care, as indicated in the CDF letter and in previous statements of the Holy See and local/regional episcopates, can be discussed under the following headings: 1) a realistic and compassionate understanding of the homosexual orientation or condition; 2) the avoidance of permissive approaches to the moral evaluation of homosexual genital activity; and 3) positive initiatives to facilitate the harmonious integration of homosexual persons into the Christian community and wider society.

Homosexual orientation. In its earlier “Declaration on Certain Questions Concerning Sexual Ethics” (Dec. 29, 1975), CDF acknowledged the homosexual orientation as follows:

A distinction is drawn, and it seems with some reason, between homosexuals whose tendency comes from a false education, from a lack of normal sexual development, from habit, from bad example, or from other similar causes, and is transitory or at least not incurable; and homosexuals who are definitively such because of some kind of innate instinct or a pathological constitution judged to be incurable (n. 8).

Consistent with this acknowledgment, the NCCB stated in 1976 that “some persons” discover that they have a homosexual orientation “through no fault of their own,” and the 1986 CDF letter reaffirms that this orientation, in and of itself, “is not a sin” (n. 3). On the contrary, it is sinful to subject anyone to opprobrium or discrimination on account of his/her sexual orientation [Washington State Catholic Conference, “The Prejudice Against Homosexuals and the Ministry of the Church” (April 28, 1983)]. Persons so oriented, “like everyone else, . . . have a right to respect, friendship and justice, . . . [and] should have an active role in the Christian community” (NCCB 1976). Moreover, especially where a homosexual orientation is perceived as unalterable so as to exclude all prospect of marriage, it is precisely this fact which gives the person a special claim on the Church’s “pastoral understanding and care” (ibid.).

Considerable difficulties still beset efforts to reach a sound understanding of the homosexual orientation itself from an authentically Christian perspective. Behavioral and social scientists offer no clear or uniform account of this orientation in terms of its genesis, exclusivity, permanence or other related questions. Confronted with obscure data and often conflicting interpretations from within the scientific community, the Church disowns any pretense at “an exhaustive treatment” of the “complex” homosexual question, remaining open to enlightenment from the human sciences while confident of its own “more global vision . . . [of] the rich reality of the human person” (CDF 1986, n. 2).

In line with its mandate to uphold “the Catholic moral perspective” (ibid.), CDF indicates some concern lest a duly compassionate regard for persons with a homosexual orientation be misconstrued as license for the genital activity to which that orientation inclines. This is the evident sense of the Congregation’s statement that the homosexual “inclination,” understood as “a more or less strong tendency ordered toward an intrinsic moral evil”—i.e., seen under the precise aspect of an inclination toward sinful sexual acts—is itself “an objective disorder” (n. 3). Whatever legitimate difficulties may be raised concerning this last phrase, two points should be made clear: the phrase does not signify that the homosexual orientation itself is in any sense sinful (indeed, as noted above, the exact opposite is stated); and it refers only to “a particular inclination” toward sin inherent in the homosexual orientation, not globally to all aspects of the sexual affectivity of persons so oriented—nor, even less, to the overall personality or character of such persons.

Reactions to the 1986 CDF letter, however, indicated that pastors find it extremely difficult to dissuade homosexual people from the notion that the Church views them as fundamentally flawed persons on account of their sexual orientation. This misperception may reflect the prone-ness of many homosexual people to over-identify with their sexual orientation, viewing any criticism of any aspect of that orientation as a profound assault on their personal dignity. While such over-identification is surely inappropriate (CDF 1986, n. 16), it is often an understandable overreaction to the unjust rejection which these persons suffer [Bishop Francis Mugavero (Brooklyn), pastoral letter, “Sexuality: God’s Gift” (Feb. 11, 1976)]. Hence the foremost pastoral imperative—even prior to offering moral instruction—is for the Church to convince homosexuals in practical terms that it accepts them fully as persons whom it is ready to serve with genuine love and respect.

Homosexual activity. Inasmuch as pastoral care must also include moral instruction, the magisterium adheres to the traditional Judeo-Christian teaching that “homosexual activity, . . . as distinguished from homosexual orientation, is morally wrong” (NCCB 1976). Pope John Paul II, confirming this stand in an address to the United States hierarchy (Chicago, Oct. 5, 1979), stressed the obligation of bishops to maintain this teaching as “compassionate pastors” and “not betray [any homosexual] brother or sister” by holding out “false hope” that the teaching could change. The 1986 CDF letter echoes this approach (n. 15).

By contrast with the 1975 CDF declaration and the earlier tradition centered on natural law reasoning with reference to the procreative meaning of sexuality, the 1986 letter articulates the Church’s rejection of homosexual genital activity in terms of a theological anthropology emphasizing the unitive equally with the procreative dimension, as seen in the Genesis teaching on creation:

God . . . fashions mankind male and female, in his own image and likeness. Human beings, . . . in the complementarity of the sexes, . . . are called to reflect the inner reality of the Creator. They do this in a striking way in their cooperation with Him in the transmission of life by a mutual donation of the self to the other. . . . Homosexual activity is not a complementary union, able to transmit life; and so it thwarts the call to a life of that form of self-giving which the Gospel says is the essence of Christian living (nn. 5–7).

Although the same CDF document (n. 6) also cites various other biblical texts which comment adversely on homosexual practices—the Sodom story (Gn 19), the Levitical condemnations (Lv 18:22; 20:13) and Pauline writings (Rom 1:26–27; 1 Cor 6:9; 1 Tm 1:10)—these references are preceded by a stipulation that the Church’s position is not based “on isolated phrases for facile theological argument” (n. 5). In any case the relevance of this material is subordinate to that of the Genesis creation theology which provides “the basic plan for understanding this entire discussion of homosexuality” (n. 6). Hence, in accord with sound theology as well as pastoral sensitivity, the presentation of the Church’s moral teaching should avoid an exaggerated emphasis on the condemnation of homosexual activity (such as would result from simplistic Biblical proofing) but should concentrate on articulating the positive “spousal significance” of human sexuality as the basis for recognizing the deficiency of any genital activity that does not do full justice to that significance.

The Church’s pastoral strategy is less developed as regards the positive guidance of those believers whose homosexual orientation precludes marriage—perhaps permanently, if this orientation resists change—and who meanwhile seem unprepared to live a celibate life. The dilemma of such persons is a very difficult one demanding special support and help from pastors and from the entire Christian community, instead of the contempt or rejection which has too often been the response.

The authoritative teaching (CDF 1975) indicates a general negative norm, viz., that “no pastoral method can be employed which would give moral approval to these [homosexual] acts on the grounds that they would be consonant with the condition of such people,” but positive alternatives remain unspecified. Some local and regional episcopates (England and Wales 1979; San Francisco 1983), without recognizing committed homosexual relationships as an acceptable equivalent of marriage or morally endorsing homogenital acts within such relationships, have suggested the appropriateness of welcoming homosexuals thus situated into the full sacramental life of the Church if their relationship is prudently deemed the only present alternative to the incomparably worse evil of promiscuity (a particularly acute danger in face of the AIDS peril), and if there is reasonable hope that through prayer and the support of the Sacraments they may progressively grow into chastity. This approach emphasizes the need to respect the believer’s sincere and upright conscience, as well as the principle of gradualism as enunciated by John Paul II [Familiaris consortio, n. 34; confer, application to homosexuality by B. Kiely, L’Osservatore Romano (Nov. 14, 1986) n. 7].

Positive initiatives. The process of growth toward chastity itself requires support from pastors and the whole Church community. The Church cannot be effective in insisting upon rigorous moral standards for homosexual persons as regards chastity, or in discouraging their participation in permissive homophile communities, as long as it does not make wholesome friendship available to such persons within its own body. Ironically the deprivation of such friendship is itself a major provocation (often unconsciously) toward the very unchastity which the Church condemns; if the basic human need for companionship, affection and intimacy is not met in wholesome ways, its fulfillment will be sought in disordered ways including inappropriate sexual conduct. The 1986 CDF letter includes a guarded but unmistakably clear acknowledgment that all Catholics must take every reasonable opportunity to help their homosexual fellow believers replace their lonely isolation with healthy interpersonal relationships (n. 15).

The same document contains other noteworthy progressive elements, for example, the identification of “violent malice in speech or in action”—now often called homophobia—as a continuing evil which “deserves condemnation from the Church’s pastors wherever it occurs,” and likewise a strong affirmation that homosexual people share in “the intrinsic dignity of each person [which] must always be respected in word, in action and in law” (n. 10). Inclusion of the homosexual question in catechetical programs on sexuality is now encouraged, and particular concern is also to be shown for the families of homosexual persons (n. 17).

It is the responsibility of diocesan bishops, individually and/or in regional conference, to implement such initiatives according to conditions in their respective territories (CDF 1986, nn. 13, 15, 17). During the 1990s a growing number of United States dioceses developed programs of outreach and support for gay and lesbian Catholics; and the NCCB officially recognizes the National Association of Catholic Diocesan Lesbian and Gay Ministries (NACDLGM). In 1997 the NCCB Committee on Marriage and Family issued a warmly positive pastoral letter titled “Always Our Children” that was directed primarily to parents of homosexual persons but was also addressed to gay and lesbian Catholic themselves; it was slightly revised in 1998, following input from the CDF.

The tendency of the CDF has been to stress the cautionary points of its 1986 letter. In a June 1997 memorandum, the congregation again advised bishops to be wary of civil-rights initiatives regarding homosexual persons, even suggesting that some instances of social discrimination against these persons would not be unjust. In July 1999, after years of investigation by various church agencies, the CDF ordered Sr. Jeannine Gramick, SSND, and Father Robert Nugent, SDS, the co-founders of New Ways Ministry in the United States, to cease their nearly three decades of nationwide ministry to homosexual persons and their families; the two had not satisfied the congregation’s demand for an “unequivocal” declaration of their “personal assent” to the condemnations articulated in its 1975 and 1986 documents with regard to homosexual activity. NCCB president Bishop Joseph Fiorenza (of Houston, Texas) sought at once to assure gay Catholics and their families that the CDF action against Gramick and Nugent would not weaken the United States hierarchy’s commitment to promote a caring and compassionate ministry to the homosexual community.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church reiterates that homosexual acts can “under no circumstances . . . be approved” (no. 2357), and adds that the homosexual orientation itself is “objectively disordered” (no. 2358, in the editio typica). The same text also states, however, that the number of homosexually oriented men and women “is not negligible,” that these persons “must be accepted with respect, compassion and sensitivity,” and that any sign of “unjust discrimination” against them should be avoided. Even the summons to chastity is couched in terms of a confident expectation that homosexual people are capable of “Christian perfection” (no. 2359).

In presenting the full range of church teaching as summarized in these Catechism references, the more benign and positive elements of this teaching (which are less well known) need to be better highlighted and more broadly applied in practice, whereas the more severe and cautionary elements should be treated as subordinate though not ignored. These latter actually indicate problems, which can be effectively addressed only by a full and unambiguous commitment of the Church to a multi-dimensional effort of positive pastoral support for homosexual persons. If the attraction of such persons to homophile movements opposed to Catholic moral teaching is cause for concern, it must also be admitted that such movements have provided at least a modicum of the needed personal acceptance and understanding, which homosexuals have not often found in the Church or elsewhere. Hence the Church must provide an alternative for these men and women that clearly offers a more adequate and genuine affirmation of their personal worth. In sum, the commitment to uphold authentic Christian standards of sexual morality must be seen as an integral part of wider pastoral efforts to promote charity and justice.

Bibliography: Homosexuality and the Magisterium: Documents from the Vatican and the U.S. Bishops, ed., J. GALLAGHER (Mt. Rainier, Md. 1986). UNITED STATES CATHOLIC CONFERENCE, Human Sexuality: A Catholic Perspective for Education and Lifelong Learning (Washington, D.C. 1990). L. S. CAHILL, Sex, Gender, and Christian Ethics (Cambridge 1996). Sexual Orientation and Human Rights in American Religious Discourse, eds., S. M. OLYAN, and M. C. NUSSBAUM (Oxford 1998).

[B. WILLIAMS]

HONDURAS, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A republic located in Central America, Honduras is bounded on the north by the Caribbean Sea, on the south-

Capital: Tegucigalpa.
Size: 43,277 sq. miles.
Population: 6,249,598 in 2000.
Languages: Spanish; Amerindian dialects are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 4,999,678 Catholics (80%), 1,249,920 Evangelical Protestants (20%); indigenous tribal religions are also practiced.
Archdiocese: Tegucigalpa, with suffragans Choluteca, Comayagua, Juticalpa, San Pedro Sula, Santa Rosa de Copán, and Trujillo.

east by Nicaragua, on the South by the Pacific Ocean, on the southwest by El Salvador, and on the west by Guatemala. A mountainous country, Honduras contains deposits of gold, silver, copper, lead, iron ore, and other minerals. The population is predominately mestizo, with a large minority population of Amerindians descended from the region's ancient Mayan tribes. The Honduran economy is primarily agricultural and produces the tropical export crops of cacao, sugar, coffee, and bananas; it also has great forest wealth, although increasing deforestation due to logging activity raised environmental concerns beginning in the 1990s.

Christopher Columbus disembarked on the coast of Honduras on Aug. 14, 1502, and colonization of the region was begun two decades later, when Francisco de las Casas, a lieutenant of Hernan Cortéz, founded the port city of Trujillo. During the colonial period Honduras was one of the provinces of the captaincy-general of Guatemala. These provinces declared their independence June 24, 1823, and Honduras joined the short-lived United Provinces of Central America. One of the presidents of the confederation was Francisco Morazán, a Honduran.

A bishopric was erected in the Honduras area in the 16th century, and the See of Comayagua was functioning at the time of independence. However, there was no bishop there from 1819 to 1842. The constitution of republican Honduras gave preferential treatment to Catholicism until 1880 when complete religious freedom was established.

Throughout the late 19th century and into the 20th Honduras was the scene of continuous political upheaval, often of a violent nature. Internal wars and military coups were overshadowed during World Wars I and II, when Hondurans fought against Germany. During the 1950s and 1960s border disputes with neighboring Nicaragua and El Salvador seemed to be resolved, and with U.S. support the government adopted a new constitution in 1982. Unfortunately, the border dispute with Nicaragua continued to threaten violence as late as 1999, in part due to Honduras's use by guerilla fighters as a base during the Contra's war with the Nicaraguan government. A failing economy and increasing poverty was the result. By the late 1990s countries such as France came to the region's aid by agreeing to forgive its portion of the $4.3 million in assistance loans, and international aid arrived in the wake of the death and destruction caused by Hurricane Mitch in November 1998. Pope John Paul II was vocal in his encouragement of such efforts in the Honduras and neighboring countries, and he also engaged in efforts to mediate in Central America's political disputes.

Within this politically unstable region, a shortage of clergy was a continuing problem throughout the mid- to late 20th century. In 1964 there were fewer than 200 priests, half of them members of religious orders, although by 2000 that number had grown to 327 priests. Of the few secular clergy, about half were Hondurans; others traveled from Spain, Italy, and other Latin American countries. Regular clergy from Spain, the United States, Canada, and Italy included members of the Congregation of the Missions, Franciscans, Jesuits, the Society for Foreign Missions (Quebec), and Maryknoll. Franciscan Sisters, School Sisters of Notre Dame, and Sisters of Mercy conducted several primary and secondary schools throughout Honduras. The Honduran government continued its amicable relationship with the Church, funding the construction of a statue of Christ on a mountain overlooking Tegucigalpa in 1997. As the government moved from military to civilian control it also sought ways to involve members of the Catholic hierarchy in the transition as a way to establish confidence among Honduran citizens. In 1998 it authorized Solidarity Catholic, the first Church television network in Honduras. In a more controversial move, in 2000 the government ordered that the Bible be read in all Honduran schools, a measure even the Church opposed as unconstitutional. Into the 21st century the Church looked to address the problems of poverty, gang violence, threats to the family, and the growth of spiritual indifference.

The Honduran Catholic Church enthusiastically supported ecumenical outreach, and Archbishop Oscar Rodríguez Maradiaga of Tegucigalpa was given charge of interreligious relations in the country. The Archbishop also planned to create an interfaith library in the nation's capital that would be available to all. While ecumenism was encouraged among recognized faiths, controversial groups, such as the Unification Church and certain evangelical Protestant sects, continued to be viewed with disfavor by the government. A Methodist population, established in Honduras in 1859, was one of the largest recognized minority religions; others included Central American Missions, Quaker, Seventh-Day Adventist, Moravian, Foursquare Gospel, Baptist, and Mormon.

Bibliography: R. S. CHAMBERLAIN, Conquest and Colonization of Honduras, 1502–1550 (Washington 1953). F. D. PARKER, The Central American Republics (New York 1964).

[J. HERRICK/EDS.]

HONG KONG, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Hong Kong is adjacent to Guangdong province in southeast China, 40 miles east of Macau. It includes Hong Kong Island, the Kowloon peninsula and adjoining New Territories, and a number of offshore islands. Long a target of Western colonization efforts, it was administered by Britain from 1842 until 1997, when it became a special administrative region of China. The population is 95 percent ethnic Chinese.

The Church in Colonial Hong Kong. Almost immediately after China ceded Hong Kong to Great Britain in 1842, Protestant chaplaincies were established to minister the British colonists and soldiers and to evangelize the Chinese people. Baptist, Congregationalist and Basel missionaries formed congregations, and as early as 1849 the Anglicans constructed St. John's Cathedral. Schools, charity centers, and dispensaries soon followed up. In 1887, the London Missionary Society opened the first Christian hospital.

In 1841, the Holy See made Hong Kong into a prefecture apostolic independent from the diocese of Macau. The following year, Catholic missionaries began to build their first church dedicated to the Immaculate Conception. The first Catholic school for Chinese boys opened in 1843. Missionaries societies and orders also cared for foundlings, the sick, and old people. The Paris Foreign Missions Society came in 1847 and the Foreign Missions of Milan (PIME) took over the charge of the prefecture in 1867. In 1874, Hong Kong became a vicariate apostolic.

After the First World War, Hong Kong, like the rest of China, experienced great turmoil. In the midst of the Sino-Japanese war (1937-1945) and as a consequence of the civil war between Communist and Nationalist forces, Hong Kong was flooded with refugees. During the Japanese occupation of Hong Kong (1941-1945), most foreign missionaries were forced to flee or were interned. The Chinese clergy, however, proved to be self-reliant administratively, financially, and pastorally. In 1946, Hong Kong was elevated to a diocese, and its first bishop, Henricus Valtorta, was officially installed in 1948. The first Chinese Catholic bishop, Francis Hsu, was installed in 1969.

Church in Tegucigalpa, Honduras. (©The Purcell Team/CORBIS)

The Communist victory in 1949 was destined to make a notable impact on the ecclesiastical scene in Hong Kong. Refugees flowed from mainland China en masse in the 1950s and 1960s. As a result, emergency social work, temporary housing, and makeshift educational facilities were in great demand. The churches, Protestant and Catholic alike, rose to meet the challenge. They raised needed funds for relief services from abroad. They also set about opening much-needed regular schools and started educational services for children and young adults with learning disabilities and special needs.

The churches became pioneers in social services, sometimes encouraging the government to take on welfare programs, sometimes working with the government's social welfare department to provide social services. Caritas Centers, a network of social service centers organized by the Catholic Church with generous donations from abroad, became an important church-sponsored social service institution. The Protestant counterpart, the Hong Kong Christian Service, operated some 50 social service centers offering a wide spectrum of services and was an equally important church-related organization. By the end of the 20th century, 40 percent of Hong Kong's schools and 60 percent of social welfare services were administered by Church affiliated institutions. With 20 percent of the hospitals under their administration, the Churches performed important and innovative medical services. But most of the grass-roots health care services for the sick poor were performed in their community clinics.

Post-Colonial Development. On July 1, 1997, Hong Kong ceased to be a British Crown colony and reverted to Chinese sovereignty as a Special Administrative Region of the People's Republic of China. Under the "one country, two systems" formula, and the Basic Law that serves as Hong Kong's unofficial constitution, freedom of religion was guaranteed to all Hong Kong residents.

The Catholic Church, with its 56 parishes, was the largest Christian denomination in Hong Kong. Although many Catholics emigrated to foreign countries just before and after the 1997 handover, their number was replaced by over 2,000 adult converts and over 2,000 children baptized each year. With the increasing number of Filipino migrant workers, mostly women serving as domestic helpers, Filipino Catholics numbered about one-third of Catholics in Hong Kong. John B. Wu Cheng-chung was installed bishop of the diocese in 1975 and made cardinal in 1988. Beginning in 1996 he was assisted by a coadjutor, Bishop Joseph Zen Ze-kun and an auxiliary, Bishop John Tong Hon. The Hong Kong Catholic Church is still dependent on foreign mission clergy, with locally born clergy constituting only about 40 percent of the total Catholic clergy. Catholic schools, ranging from kindergarten to colleges and vocational schools, maintain a reputation for scholastic excellence. The Catholic Church also operates a healthcare network comprising six hospitals and numerous clinics, nursing homes, hospices and secondary care facilities.

The diocese supports two weekly newspapers. The Chinese-language Kung Kao Po was established in 1928; the Sunday Examiner began publication in English in 1946. In addition, two major Catholic journals are published in Hong Kong. Beginning in 1980 Tripod was published four times a year in Chinese and in English by the Holy Spirit Centre, focusing mainly on the Church in the Chinese mainland. It became a biannual in 2001. Spirit was established in 1989 as a quarterly review for Catholic theology and spirituality. The Union of Catholic Asian News (UCA News), has its headquarters and an office in Hong Kong. The Catholic Institute for Religion and Society runs workshops and publishes literature on the interaction of modern society and Christian living for Hong Kong people as well as those on the mainland.

Ecumenical Relations. Among the Protestants, the Baptists form the largest denomination, followed by the Lutherans, Adventists, Anglicans, Methodists, Pentecostal, the Christian and Missionary Alliance, and the Church of Christ in China. With their emphasis on youth work, many congregations contain a high proportion of young people. Protestant churches also operate three tertiary education institutions: Chung Chi College at the Chinese University of Hong Kong, Hong Kong Baptist University, and Lingnan University, as well as 13 theological colleges, seminaries and Bible institutes. Like the Catholic Church, they also have an extensive network of educational and healthcare facilities, with many kindergartens, elementary and high schools, hospitals, clinics and other medical facilities. The Christian Weekly and the Christian Times are the two principal vehicles for disseminating news of interest to Chinese Protestant communities.

Two ecumenical bodies facilitate cooperative work among the Protestant denominations. The Hong Kong Chinese Christian Churches Union, established in 1915, has a membership of 275 congregations. It coordinates

Capital: Victoria
Size: 415.3 sq. miles.
Population: 6.87 million in 2000.
Languages: Chinese (Cantonese) and English are both official languages.
Religions: Some 90% of the population practices a mix of Taoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism. Christians comprise about 8% of the total population (Catholics, 5%; Protestants, 3%). There are also small Muslim, Jewish, and Sikh communities.
Diocese: Hong Kong.

evangelistic activities and encourages Christians to play an active part in the development of Hong Kong society through a wide range of auxiliaries agencies. Another interdenominational body, the Hong Kong Christian Council was organized in 1954 to promote unity of witness and outreach by the mainline Churches to the people of Hong Kong. It coordinates their social services and maintain relationships with churches in China and overseas. The Catholic Church has not entered into any formal ecumenical links with the Protestant Churches, but collaborates in the areas of social services and audio-visual communication. Few of the Protestant independent churches that have developed in recent years are ecumenical-minded.

The Protestant and Catholic churches of the Special Administrative Region of Hong Kong maintain close ties with their counterparts on mainland China and assist them in materials and other ways. They interact according to the principles of mutual respect and mutual assistance but do not interfere with each other.

Bibliography: S BLYTH and I. WOTHERSPOON, Hong Kong Remembers (Hong Kong 1996). Catholic Hong Kong: A Hundred Years of Missionary Activity (Hong Kong 1958). Christianity Today Magazine 1999-2000. Hong Kong Catholic Church Directory, published annually. Hong Kong in a New Era: A Review of 1997 (Hong Kong 1998). "Hong Kong in Transition," Tripod March-April 1997. "Hong Kong: Between Optimism and Pessimism," Tripod May-June 1997. "Hong Kong: New Challenges and Identity," Tripod January-February 1997. C. K. LEE, Studies in the History of the Church in Hong Kong (in Chinese) (Hong Kong 1987). R. MALEK, ed. Hong Kong, Kirche und Gesellschaft in Übergang: Materialien und Dokumente (Sank Augustin, Germany 1997). Papers of the International Conference on the Transition of HK-SAR/PRC. Held at Hong Kong Baptist University, The University of Hong Kong, and The Hong Kong University of Science & Technology, July 7-9, 1997. People's Republic of China Year Book, published biennially. T. RYAN, Catholic Guide to Hong Kong (Hong Kong 1962). S. TICOZZI, Historical Documents of the Hong Kong Catholic Church (Hong Kong 1997).

[J.-P. WIEST]

HONOR

From the Latin honor, cognate to honestas, τὸ καλόν, τιμή, honorabilis and honestus, and by itself, without these fringe senses, a sufficiently ambiguous term. It signifies in an object a quality of being handsome, gracious, beautiful; a kind of embellishment of the good; a worth that is set off and exalted. Thus Aristotle, the Stoics, and the Fathers speak of an end as a bonum honestum, a value for its own sake and not because it is serviceable (bonum utile) or pleasurable (bonum delectabile). In the human subject it comes then to mean his response to such a special distinction, which is given glory and fame and held in respect and esteem. Thus one is said to do or pay honor to someone. Later this dignity may be assimilated; a personal sentiment of honor, a fine sense of what is due, may be cultivated and perhaps demand renown or at least some acknowledgement. So one gives his word of honor, and will neither brook offense nor bend to find recognition. It is an aristocratic and indeed, in the West, a soldierly notion, entering into the spirit and institutions of chivalry. It acquired a special Christian quality of gallantry and knightliness, which it still keeps, despite its sharing in the decay of chivalry into punctilio, mannerisms, and courtly sophistication. Since from the beginning honor seemed set on the glory of this world and later protested personal and independent values that were not the plain decencies of the common cardinal virtues or of humility, it is easy to see why Christian moralists have either neglected it for otherworldly categories, or have treated it as bound up with a pride of life that was either vain or at best to be suspected as a doubtful blessing. Nevertheless, it is clearly marked in a classical theology of the 13th century, where eschatological convictions, no less strong than any before or since, went with a welcome for what the Greco-Roman world respected and for the statesmanlike and military values that were forming a new civilization.

Honor enters into the Summa theologiae of St. Thomas at three points where he discusses the giving of honor, the striving for honor, and the feeling of honor.

The giving of honor. This is regarded as a matter of justice and specifically of that potential part of justice called RESPECT (observantia), a distinctive virtue, which, serving others because of the dignity of their office or character, finds its formal expression in the virtue of OBEEDIENCE to a superior, extends also to the honoring of excellence, not only in inward appreciation, but also in outward signs. This is due and proper, and when accompanied by feelings of veneration for a person who is leader of a country, race, corps, or family group, is called dulia (δουλεία) or worship, as in England, where this is an honorific title for mayors and magistrates.

The striving for honor. This belongs to the cardinal virtue of fortitude and specifically to that potential part called greatheartedness, or high-mindedness (MAGNANIMITY), though another potential part called grandeur (MAGNIFICENCE) may also be engaged. There is bravery in not shirking the renown that is the proper consequence of great deeds and the splendor it is laudable that some works should possess, so long as this is not allowed to become inflated into a display of ostentation and pompousness (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 129–135).

Feelings of honor. These are treated as an integral part of temperance. Aristotle and the Latin Stoics noted a certain fastidiousness (verecundia) in the life of virtue, a sensitiveness to what is shameful and disgraceful, which, though not itself a virtue, is a material condition of virtue. But more positive and to the point is the honorable quality (honestas) in virtue, in keeping with its dynamism as a disposition of the good to the best, a clean and candid beauty that relates honor to the virtue of temperance in particular and to all virtue in general (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 144–145), so much so that a high-mettled and fine-tempered morality will act to others not merely according to the debt of strict justice (debitum legale), but also from its charge of honor (debitum morale, ex honestate virtutis). The obligation, though it cannot be enforced by law, is no less grave for the life of virtue.

Bibliography: K. E. LOGSTRUP, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–63) 2:339–341. H. REINER, Die Ehre (Darmstadt 1956).

[T. GILBY]

HONORATUS OF AMIENS, ST.

Bishop of Amiens; b. probably in Port-le-Grand; d. in the Diocese of Amiens, c. 600. According to the unreliable biography written not earlier than the late 11th century, Honoratus was a contemporary of Pope PELAGIUS II (579–590). His cult became widespread in France as a result of cures effected when his body was elevated in 1060. In 1204 Reynold Cherez and his wife placed the church they had built in Paris under his patronage, and a century later the charterhouse at Abbéville was dedicated to him. The famous Faubourg and Rue Saint-Honoré in Paris are named also for him. He is recognized as the patron of bakers and those who work with flour.

Feast: May 16.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:3972–74. Acta Sanctorum May 3:609–613. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1907–15) 3:125, 143. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:330.

[C. R. BYERLY]

HONORATUS OF ARLES, ST.

Bishop, first abbot of Lérins; d. Arles, Jan. 14 or 15, probably 430. The anniversary Sermon preached at Arles by his successor, Hilary, notes that he was of a consular family but gives neither place nor date of birth. It records his baptism as an adolescent and subsequent embracing of monasticism with a brother Venantius and their friend (St.) Caprasius (d. 430), first at home, then at Marseilles (?), Greece (where Venantius died at Methoni), Italy, and eventually Lérins (modern Saint Honorat in the Bay of Cannes) on which island Honoratus established his renowned abbey (c. 410). Upon visiting his home (Toul?, Trier?), Honoratus induced Hilary, his kinsman and episcopal successor, to join him at Lérins. That Honoratus was a priest is certified by the anniversary Sermon (16) and by the writings of PAULINUS OF NOLA (Epist. 51).

From Lérins Honoratus was chosen bishop of Arles (Serm. 25, 28). Duchesne dates this 426 or 427, after the assassination of Bp. Patroclus. Chadwick more justly interposes Euladius between Patroclus and Honoratus, so that Honoratus's episcopate probably commenced in late 427 or early 428. He is the Arles prelate to whom Pope CELESTINE I refers (Epist. 4); his reputation is reflected in CASSIAN (Coll. 18). He died with Hilary at his side (Serm. 29), and was interred at Aliscamps in the now secularized church of his name on January 16.

Feast: Jan. 16.

Bibliography: S. CAVALLIN, Vitae Sanctorum Honorati et Hilarii (Lund 1952). HILARY OF ARLES, Sermon, tr. R. J. DEFERRARI, The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation, ed. R. J. DEFERRARI et al. 15 (New York 1952) 355–394. F. BONNARD, S. Honorat de Lérins (Tours 1914). É. GRIFFE, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine (Paris 1947) 2:191–197. J. R. PALANQUE, "Les Évêchés provençaux à l'époque romaine," Provence historique 1 (1951) 131–132. O. CHADWICK, "Euladius of Arles," Journal of Theological Studies 46 (London 1945) 200–205. R. FERAUT, La vida de Sant Honorat: Légende en vers provençaux (Geneva 1974).

[H. G. J. BECK]

HONORIUS I, POPE

Pontificate: Oct. 27, 625, to Oct. 12, 638. The LIBER PONTIFICALIS identifies Honorius as a native of the Campania and son of the consul Petronius. If his election as pope received the traditional imperial confirmation, it came not from the Byzantine Emperor himself, but from the exarch at Ravenna, as is known to have been the case in 686 (Liber pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne [Paris 1886–92, 1958] n. 85).

West. Honorius was immediately involved with affairs in Italy. In 625 he demanded that Exarch Isaac

St. Honoratus of Arles, detail of a miniature in the Book of Hours of the Maréchal de Boucicaut, 14th century, in the Musée Jacquemart, Paris. The saint has been given the features of Honorat Durand, chaplain and confessor of the Maréchal.

(625–643) send to Rome for penance those bishops who had helped Arioald, Duke of Turin, to overthrow the Lombard King Adaloald (616–625). Then, two letters of June 10, 627, deal with the excesses of the Sardinian official Theodore, and two later ones commit the government of Naples to the notary Gaudiosus and the military captain Anatholius. Honorius's epitaph asserts that he ended the minor schism caused by Istria's refusal to accede to the condemnation of the THREE CHAPTERS pronounced in 553 by the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II. The fact seems to be that on Feb. 18, 628, Honorius provided a Roman subdeacon, Primogenius, to Istria's See of Grado (which see Primogenius continued to hold as late as 642 or 649).

As for Spain, Honorius sent the deacon Turninus to the Council of TOLEDO VI (638) with instructions to urge the prelates to greater efforts in restraining the infidels. Caspar (2:671) holds that this letter referred to the Jewish question. In any event, the reply written by Bp. BRAULIO of Saragossa in the name of the whole synod (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 80:667–670) makes it clear that such a papal admonition was uncalled for. It is a fact, however, that the decrees of the Council of Toledo VI (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Graz 1960–] 10:663)—like those of the Council of Toledo IV in 663 (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 10:633–35)—reveal a decidedly anti-Jewish attitude on the part of the Spanish hierarchy.

Pope Honorius I, detail of the 7th-century mosaic in the apse of the church of S. Agnese at Rome.

England's Venerable Bede (Ecclesiastical History 2.17–19) records Honorius's grant of the PALLIUM in 634 to Abp. HONORIUS OF CANTERBURY and Abp. PAULINUS OF YORK. However, the document by which Honorius is supposed to have bestowed primacy upon Canterbury (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. P. Ewald, [Graz 1956] 590–882 2021) is now considered a forgery [Gregorianum 12 (1931) 44–46]. Bede notes that the Pope appealed to Britain's Celtic Christians to abandon their non-Roman manner of calculating Easter. Honorius also sent Bishop Birinus to labor among the West Saxons (Ecclesiastical History 3.7).

Controversy over Monothelitism. More important, perhaps, than Honorius's involvement in the West was the role he played in the BYZANTINE CHURCH's vital controversy over MONOPHYSITISM, which by this time had also given rise to MONOTHELITISM. His actions in this affair occasioned violent debate over his orthodoxy, over papal INFALLIBILITY, and over the relationship of pope and council—issues that were contested down to VATICAN COUNCIL I.

In a letter of 634 (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:529–37) Patriarch SERGIUS I OF CONSTANTINOPLE reported current developments to Honorius. At stake was an attempt to win Eastern Monophysites back to Catholic unity by means of a formula that stressed oneness of operation in Christ. A year earlier Patriarch Cyrus of Alexandria (630 or 631–643 or 644) had successfully reconciled dissidents in his patriarchate by professing “one theandric operation” in the Lord (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:565d). However, the monk Sophronius, soon to be patriarch of Jerusalem (633 or 634–638) had adduced patristic evidence for two operations in Christ and had required Cyrus to promise that in the future he would speak neither of one nor of two operations. In his letter Sergius stated that he himself accepted the Catholic faith as expounded by Pope LEO I. He too had counseled Cyrus to refrain from speaking of operations, even though the patriarch's personal sympathies lay with a theology of a single operation, and he thought that mention of a double operation would only imply that Christ was in possession of two contrary wills, with the human will being set against the divine in undergoing the Passion. At the end, his letter sought the Pope's reaction.

Honorius's reply has been preserved in the Greek translation that was read at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE III on March 22, 681 (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:537–544; the Latin in Patrologia Latina 80:470–474 is probably a retranslation). The Pope fully supported the position that there be no further discussion of either one or two operations, preferring to leave such questions to grammarians. Rather, he urged concentration upon the one Christ who operates both in His divine and in His human nature. He cited the formula of the Council of CHALCEDON to the effect that the two natures are unconfusedly and immutably united, and from this unity Honorius deduced the presence of a single will in Christ since His human nature is uncorrupted and not subject to the law of the members to which Rom 7.23 refers. He interpreted Mk 14.36 (“Not my will . . .”) as spoken for our instruction in accord with the “economy” of the assumed humanity and not as marking a will differing from that of the Father's will. By economy Honorius meant “a manner of speaking.” This, indeed, appears to be Monothelitism and would exclude a true human will in Christ. However, Galtier (Gregorianum [Rome 1920–] 29:53–61) maintains that the Pope was actually positing a real human will in a real humanity, yet a will that is ever submissive to Christ's divine will.

Chapman (Dublin Review 139:129–134) has remarked that Honorius's reply to Sergius was a private communication and does not fall into the category of public papal definitions of faith guaranteed by infallibility. However, it is undeniable that Honorius did counsel not mentioning either one or two operations in Christ, thus at least placing the heretical assertion (one operation) on an equal plane with the orthodox expression (two operations).

This papal fault was compounded after Honorius received a synodical letter (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:461–509) from Sophronius of Jerusalem that argued from the diversity of the divine and human natures to the distinction of operations in the Lord (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:481–484), although it did not raise the question of the number of wills in Christ. A fragmentary notice (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:580–581) to Sergius—Honorius's reply to Sophronius is lost—shows that the Pope was again intent upon terminating any discussion as to one or two operations and had received a pledge to this end from Sophronius. However, Honorius was quite insistent upon two integral natures in Christ, each operating in a manner proper to it in the one person of the Son of God. What is deplorable in Honorius's approach to the whole Monophysite controversy is not his theology, but his failure to realize that the new terms introduced into the discussion required official evaluation. Four years later (638) this line of thinking reached a natural conclusion with the appearance of Emperor HERACLIUS's Ecthesis (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 10:992–997), that simply forbade reference to operations and confessed but a single will in Christ (see TYPOS).

Honorius's successor, Pope SEVERINUS, seems to have condemned Monothelitism (Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, 2039); and Pope JOHN IV, who assuredly anathematized the Ecthesis (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:9), deplored the action of the new patriarch of Constantinople, PYRRHUS, when he cited Honorius's authority in favor of Monothelitism (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 10:682–686). John's interpretation of his predecessor's mind is that Honorius's exclusion of two contrary wills in Christ is explicitly limited to the human nature; he was in no way envisioning a single will common to both the divinity and humanity. This is a valid observation as far as it goes, but it says nothing of Honorius's blindness in prohibiting discussion on the number of operations in Christ.

His Condemnation Evaluated. Honorius's stand became the subject of much criticism. In a disputation of July 645 St. MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR (d. 662) replied to the deposed Patriarch Pyrrhus that Honorius kept within the limits of the problem proposed to him and thus did not have to enter into the further question of the will inherent in the divine nature of Christ (Patrologia Graeca ed. J. P. Migne, [Paris 1857–66] 91:329b). However, subsequent developments, especially the Lateran Synod of 649 under Pope MARTIN I, which condemned Monothelitism and whose 18th canon named Patriarch Sergius a heretic, and the assembling of the sixth ecumenical council, CONSTANTINOPLE III (680–681), led inevitably to a re-evaluation of Honorius's action. At Constantinople III, in the presence of papal legates who had delivered an important dogmatic letter from Pope AGATHO, Honorius was mentioned several times and his two letters to Sergius were read at the 12th and 13th sessions. At the 13th session (March 28, 681), Monothelites were condemned and expelled from the Church; these included Honorius "because . . . by his letter to Sergius he followed his opinion in all things and confirmed his wicked dogmas" (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:556C). In the final session of Sept. 16, 681, Honorius was again listed among the heretics because he had followed in the footsteps of Sergius and Cyrus (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:636; 656; 665). The council's letter to Pope Agatho, asking confirmation of the Acta and marked by recognition for Rome's magisterium (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 11:684–88), also lists Honorius among the heretics, where, the council fathers said, he was placed in accord with Agatho's own letter.

Agatho, however, had died Jan. 10, 681, and it was his successor, Pope LEO II, who had to evaluate the Acta. In 682 Leo wrote to Emperor CONSTANTINE IV approving the council and condemning Honorius "qui hanc apostolicam ecclesiam non apostolice traditionis doctrina lustravit sed prophana pro traditione immaculatam fidem dari permittendo conatus est" (MS Vat. Reg. lat. 1040, fol. 84r; variant reading Patrologia Latina 96:408). In a similar letter to the bishops of Spain, Leo charged Honorius with negligence: "qui flammam heretici dogmatis, non ut decuit apostolicam auctoritatem, incipientem extinxit, sed negligendo confovit" (Patrologia Latina 96:414B). A third papal letter, to the Visigoth King Ervigius, states that Honorius allowed the unsullied standard of apostolic tradition inherited from his predecessors to be soiled: "qui . . . regulam quam a praedecessoribus suis accepit, maculari consensit" (Patrologia Latina 96:419D). It is in this sense of guilty negligence that the papacy ratified the condemnation of Honorius.

Honorius is credited with beautifying several Roman churches and with founding the monastery of SS. Andrew and Bartholomew in the vicinity of the Lateran.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:323–327. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 80:469–484, P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD et al. (Graz 1956) 1:223–226; 2:698. Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Streenbrugge 1961) 1726–28. J. CHAPMAN, “The Condemnation of Pope Honorius,” Dublin Review 139 (1906) 129–154; 140 (1907) 42–72. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d’après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERECQ (Paris 1907–38) v.3. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 1:304–345. J. TIXERONT, History of Dogmas, tr. H. L. BRINCEAU, v.3 (2d ed. St. Louis 1926) 153–184. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:93–132. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique Tables générales 2112–13. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsstums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:523–619. P. GALTIER, “La Première lettre du Pape Honorius,” Gregorianum (Rome 1920–) 29 (1948), 42–61. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste vonden Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1959) 2:47–58, 74–76, 428–429. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 5:474–475. G. ROWEKAMP, Lexikon der antiken christlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1998). A. R. TERRERO, “El problema judío en la mente de tres importantes personajes del siglo VII: un papa, un Obispo español y un rey visigodo,” Espacio, Tiempo y Forma: Historia Antigua, Serie II (Madrid 1993) 585–604. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 70–71.

[H. G. J. BECK]

HONORIUS II, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 15, 1124 to Feb. 13 or 14, 1130; b. Lambert Scannabecchi, at Fagnano, near Imola, Italy, date unknown; d. Rome. Widely known for his learning, he entered papal service under URBAN II and was made a cardinal by PASCHAL II in 1117. His most important task as a papal diplomat was acting as CALLISTUS II’s representative in the negotiations with Emperor HENRY V that culminated in the Concordat of Worms in 1122. His pontificate was concerned in large part with securing for the Church the rights promised by that concordat. Lambert’s election as pope was marked by an outbreak of the feud between the PIERLEONI and the FRANGIPANI families, which divided the Roman nobility and interfered with the electoral process. The first CONCLAVE ended on Dec. 15, 1124, with the election of Honorius, supported by the Frangipani, and the election of an ANTIPOPE, Celestine II (Cardinal Teobaldo Buccapecci), supported by the Pierleoni. After it became clear that Honorius was supported by the sanior pars of the cardinals, Celestine lost his supporters and resigned. On December 21, Honorius also resigned, only to be reelected immediately by the assembled cardinals. With the death of Henry V in 1125, Honorius moved to consolidate the Church’s position with regard to the empire by supporting the election of LOTHAIR III, count of Supplinburg, to succeed to the imperial throne rather than allow either of Henry’s nephews, Frederick or Conrad of Hohenstaufen (later to rule as Conrad III), to assume power. When Conrad declared himself king in opposition to Lothair, Honorius excommunicated him, thus placing the papacy clearly on Lothair’s side. Within the papal lands Honorius sought to pacify the rebellious Roman barons and to defend the duchy of Apulia from ROGER II of Sicily, but after failing to prevent Roger’s seizure of the duchy, Honorius recognized his right to hold it in return for Roger’s oath of fealty, thus paving the way for the creation of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. In addition to these political controversies, Honorius was mindful of the spirit of reform within the Church. In 1126 he confirmed the establishment of the PREMONSTRATIENSIS, who combined the active with the contemplative life, and in 1128 he approved the rule of the TEMPLARS, who had been founded to protect pilgrims in the Holy Land. Even as he lay dying, however, the two factions that disputed his election were gathering for the new election, which was to lead to a serious schism.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (Graz 1956) 1:823–839, 2:755. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 166:1217–1320. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 8:228–305. E. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7:132–135. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, Histoire de l’église depuis les origines jusqu’à nos jours (Paris 1935—) 9:43–53. H. W. KLEWITZ, Reformpapsttum und Kardinalkolleg (Darmstadt 1957). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1956) 3:165–171. H. SCHMIDINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:476. U. R. BLUMENTHAL, “The Text of a Lost Letter of Pope Honorius II,” Bulletin of Medieval Cannon Law (Berkeley, CA 1974) 64–66. F. GELDNER, “Kaiserin Mathilde, die deutsche Königswahl von 1125 und das Gegenkönigtum Konrads III.,” Zeitschrift für Bayerische Landesgeschichte (München 1977) 3–22. G. HAENDLER, “Zur Missionsreise des Bischofs Otto von Bamberg, 1128–1278,” Theologische Literaturzeitung (Berlin 1981) 305–14. J. LECLERECQ, “La ‘paternité’ de S. Bernard et les débuts de l’Ordre cistercien,” Revue Bénédictine (Maredsous, Belgium 1993) 445–81. F. V. LOMBARDI, “La bolla di papa Onorio II a Pietro vescovo di Montefeltro (anno 1125),” Studi Montefeltrani (1976) 57–99. G. J. SCHIRO, “The Career of Lamberto da Fagnano: Honorius II 1035?–1130 and the Gregorian Reform,” Dissertation Abstracts (Ann Arbor, Mich. 1975/1976) 3913–14. R. SOMERVILLE, “Pope Honorius II, Conrad of Hohenstaufen, and Lothar III,” Archivum Historiae Pontificiae (Roma 1972) 341–6. H. STOOB, “Zur Königswahl Lothars von Sachsen im Jahre 1125,” Festschrift für Walter Schlesinger, II (Köln 1976) 438–61. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 165–66.

[J. M. MULDOON]

HONORIUS II, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: Oct. 28, 1061 to May 31, 1064. Known as Peter Cadalus (also Cadalous), he was born 1009 or 1010 into a wealthy family near Verona. He was bursar for the bishop of Verona in the early 1040s and was made bishop of Parma in 1045. He died in 1071 or early 1072. In the midst of the Investiture Controversy, Peter was selected as antipope in a meeting of the royal court in Basle. He was supported by the Empress Agnes, regent for the young Henry IV (1056–1106); various Lombard bishops, under the leadership of GUIBERT OF RAVENNA (later anti-Pope CLEMENT III, 1080–1100); and members of the Roman nobility, who saw this as an opportunity to regain control of the papacy. Peter Cadalus was known as an opponent of the papal reformers and also of the Pataria, a revolutionary movement among the middle and lower classes that sought both sociopolitical reform (the overthrow of the ruling oligarchy) and ecclesiastical reforms (e.g., in 1057 they used arms in an effort to force priests to give up their concubines). His election was meant to challenge that of the reform party's pope, Alexander II (1061–73).

On April 14, 1062 Honorius defeated Alexander's forces and took up residence in Rome, but the city remained divided into warring camps. When Duke Godfrey the Bearded of Lorraine arrived in May with superior forces, he compelled both claimants to leave the city for their former dioceses. Meanwhile the German court would decide who was rightful pope. This left the matter in the hands of Anno, the archbishop of Cologne (1056–75) and new regent. Anno favored Alexander (as did the influential reformer Peter Damian) and the Synods of Augsburg (October 1062) and Rome (Christmas 1062) upheld his decision. Nevertheless, the two rivals excommunicated each other. In May 1063, Honorius again attacked Rome and seized St. Peter's and the Castel Sant' Angelo. While he occupied Sant' Angelo for several months, he was more prisoner than victor. Soon Alexander, with strong Norman support, forced Honorius to flee back to Parma. In May 1064, a synod of German and Italian bishops met at Mantua; it invited both claimants to attend. Honorius asked to preside over the synod and decided to stay away when his request was denied. For his part, Alexander went to Mantua and presided over the synod. His claim as pope was upheld, and Honorius was formally deposed with the agreement of the imperial court under the leadership of Anno of Cologne.

Afterward, Cadalus remained in his diocese and continued to be recognized as bishop of Parma, even though he never formally abandoned his claim to the Holy See. In 1065 and again in 1068 he hoped the German court would rule in his favor, but it never did. He died as bishop of Parma in late 1071 or very early in 1072.

Honorius III, detail from "St. Francis Preaching Before Honorius III" by Giotto. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.281, 284, 336, 358–60. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1.530, 566–94. PETER DAMIAN, Letters 81, 88, 89, and 112, Die Briefe des Petrus Damiani, K. REINDEL, ed., Monumenta Germaniae historica, Briefe der deutschen Kaiserzeit (Munich 1983ff); trans. O. BLUM, The Letters of Peter Damian (Washington, DC 1989ff). See especially REINDEL 2.534, nn. 23–25 on Cadalus' election. I. M. WATTERICH, Pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig; repr. Aalen 1862) 1.235–90. F. HERBERHOLD, "Die Angriffe des Cadalus von Parma (Gegenpapst Honorius II.) auf Rom in den Jahren 1062 und 1063," Studia Gregoriana 2 (1947) 477–503. F. BAIX, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1949) 11.53–99. V. CAVALLARI, "Cadalo e gli Erzoni," Studi Storici Veronesi Luigi Simeoni 15 (1965) 59–170. T. SCHMIDT, Alexander II (1061–1073) und die Römische Reformgruppe seiner Zeit (Stuttgart 1972) 104–73 passim. W. ULLMANN, A Short History of the Papacy in the Middle Ages (London 1972). M. STOLLER, "Eight Anti-Gregorian Councils," Annuario historiae conciliorum 17 (1985) 252–321. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 153–54. T. STRUVE, "Kaisertum und Romgedanke in salischer Zeit," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 44 (1988) 424–54. Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1993) 24.1050.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

HONORIUS III, POPE

Pontificate: July 18, 1216 to March 18, 1227. He was from Rome, and his original name was Cencius. According to a later tradition, which is without contemporary foundation, he was a member of the Savelli family. He was probably born in the 1150s. This date supports the view that he was elderly when elected pope. He had been a canon of Santa Maria Maggiore and chamberlain under Popes Clement III and Celestine III. He was named cardinal-deacon of S. Lucia in Orthea before March 4, 1193 and raised to cardinal priest of Saints John and Paul in early 1200 by Pope Innocent III. His most important achievement prior to his pontificate was his compilation of the Liber Censuum Romane Ecclesie, a work which provided a detailed statement of the rights and patrimony of the Apostolic See. He was clearly in the mainstream of twelfth-century popes, who worked to establish and strengthen the position of the papacy in Rome. There is some evidence that he did not agree fully with his predecessor, Innocent III, but his differences seem to have been partly a matter of style. He generally refrained from broad statements regarding papal policy toward secular rulers, though he vigorously defended the interests of the church. He seems, however, to have sought cooperation and worked to promote good relations with secular powers. Some historians have viewed this as a policy of weakness.

Innocent III had died at a critical moment, with the Fourth Lateran Council recently completed and a new crusade already in the late planning stages. This crusade had recruited the youthful and recently-elected emperor Frederick II, whom Innocent had supported for the crown. Since it was supposed to begin in 1217, Honorius quickly reaffirmed the date of departure and vigorously supported efforts to collect the crusade tax levied on the clergy at the Fourth Lateran Council, so that momentum would not slip away after Innocent's death. The difficulties, however, were considerable, since, among other factors, Frederick could not depart while his opponents were still in the field. The problem of the crusade would remain central to Honorius's pontificate.

In order to understand the political role of Honorius, it is essential to view it in relationship to his crusade policies. The conflict between the English and French monarchies required intensive negotiations, not only to resolve differences between these rulers but also to ensure the succession to the English throne for the nine-year-old Henry III. Innocent III had been quite unpopular at the French court, because of his support for Queen Ingeborg of Denmark, whom Philip II, Augustus, wanted to divorce. Honorius lost no time in trying to build better relations with Philip, while giving strong support to Henry against his barons and Philip's son, the later Louis VIII. In this case, the results of his irenic policy were a major success, as the large number of English participants in the Fifth Crusade bear witness. On the French side, he altered Innocent's belated efforts to heal the wounds caused by the Albigensian Crusade by lending his support to Louis VIII against the nobility of the Midi, thus promoting the interests of the French crown. Still, the monarchy remained less supportive of the crusade and more concerned with protecting its rights.

Many historians have had a negative view of his pontificate because of the failure of his efforts to induce Frederick II to go on crusade, and later the disastrous loss of Damietta in Egypt by the crusaders. What has not been sufficiently understood is the genuine commitment that Frederick himself made to the crusade, but it was complicated by the complexities of his position as emperor and king of Sicily. Impelled by an extremely strong sense of his rights, which was fed by his advisors, Frederick was unwilling to depart on a crusade until he had arranged settlements in Germany as well as Italy. The patience of Honorius, which he himself said had brought criticism down upon him, may have been excessive, but he was working against conditions that were most unfavorable.

Honorius worked hard to continue the reform program of the Fourth Lateran Council. He was especially concerned about the reform of preaching. Like his predecessor and almost unique among the popes of his time, he authored a collection of sermons de tempore and de sanctis, which he sent, so far as we know, to the Dominicans in the Bologna, the Cistercians at Citeaux, and the Archpriest of Santa Maria Maggiore, which contained his views on preaching. He was, in fact, vaguely critical of the sermons of his predecessor, a point made more specific by his direct revisions of some parts of Innocent's sermons. His letter accompanying the sermons, which he sent to the Dominicans in Bologna, is of especial value both for his recognition of the order and for his active role in promoting its work.

Honorius also played a significant role in the foundation of the Franciscans. Because of problems in earlier Franciscan historiography, his efforts on behalf of the order have been neglected. His letters, however, give witness to his support for St. Francis of Assisi, and it seems unlikely that Francis would have received papal recognition of his rule, regula bullata so quickly without that support, since some in the curia were critical of Francis. In spite of the opposition, on Nov. 29, 1223, Honorius issued the bull Solet annuere, which gave formal approval to Franciscan rule. Honorius worked closely with Ugolino, cardinal bishop of Ostia, a devoted supporter of Francis, whom he appointed as the first cardinal protector of the order, in taking concrete steps to protect the Franciscans and to encourage their spread. Perhaps even more than the Dominicans, the Franciscans were active in the reform of the laity and so transformed their role in the church. This culminated in papal recognition of their Third Order in 1289.

The promulgation of Compilatio Quinta (Novae Causarum May 2, 1226) places this pope in the forefront, along with his predecessor, in the effort to influence the direction of the teaching of canon law in the schools. That work had been going on for more than a half century. It was quite clear that the canon law was an effective instrument in many aspects of reform. Law as an instrument of papal policy thus received a further impetus from this pope.

Bibliography: H. SCHULZ, Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie eds., J. J. HERZOG and A. HAUCK 8:318–323, excellent for bibliography to 1900. F. GREGOROVIVS, History of the City of Rome in the Middle Ages, tr. A. HAMILTON, 8 v. in 13 (London 1894–1902) v.5.1. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32), 13:1–164. J. CLAUSEN, Papst Honorius III (Bonn 1895); H. X. ARQUILLIÈRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, et al. (Paris 1903–50), 7.1: 135–138. M. MICHAUD, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 233–53. R. NAZ, ibid., 1239–41. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Historie de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–), 10, 291–304. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1931), 382–385. A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici: v. 1, Historia fontium (Turin 1950), 235–236. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (2d. rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53), 4:1–46. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jahrhunderts (Munich 1956), 3:390–411. P. MIKAT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, eds. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65), 5: 476–477. J. SAYERS, Papal Government and England during the Pontificate of Honorius III (Cambridge 1984). W. MALECZEK, Papst und Kardinalskolleg von 1191–1212 (Vienna 1984), 111–113. J. M. POWELL, Anatomy of a Crusade, 1213–1221 (Philadelphia 1986).

[J. M. POWELL]

HONORIUS IV, POPE

Pontificate: April 2, 1285, to April 3, 1287; b. Jacobus (Giacomo) SAVELLI, Rome, 1210. Of aristocratic Roman lineage, his family supported the GUELF party. His granduncle was HONORIUS III, whose name he adopted upon his election to the Holy See. As a student at the University of Paris, he obtained a prebend and a canonry at the cathedral of Châlons sur Marne, to which was later added a benefice at the church of Bert in the diocese of Norwich. MARTIN IV nominated him cardinal-deacon of Santa Maria in Cosmedin (1261). In this new capacity, he served as papal prefect in Tuscany and captain of the apostolic army. In 1274 he participated in the Second Council of Lyons (see LYONS, COUNCILS OF). Giacomo was actively engaged in papal diplomacy, especially in the negotiations concerning Sicily, and was a member of the apostolic delegation that invested Charles of Anjou with the Sicilian crown (July 28, 1265). He also took part in the papal negotiations with the German king, Rudolf I of Habsburg, over his imperial coronation and his dealings with Charles of Anjou in Sicily (July 1276). The imminent death of Pope ADRIAN V, however, postponed the conclusion of the deliberations.

“Tomb monument of Pope Honorius IV” in the Church of S. Maria in Aracoeli, Rome, 14th century.

Only four days after the death of Martin IV, the cardinal of Santa Maria in Cosmedin was unanimously elected to the See of Peter in spite of his advanced age and deteriorated health (crippled by arthritis, he could neither stand nor walk). The conclave’s speed, which was unprecedented in the history of the papacy, was meant to avoid both external, (i.e., Charles of Anjou’s) interference and any prolonged interregnum in the face of the Sicilian crisis. As son of a prestigious Roman family, Honorius was auspiciously accepted in Rome, where he was crowned shortly afterwards (May 20)—a privilege that had been denied to his immediate predecessor. Elected senator for life, Honorius commissioned his brother Pandulf—having being elected himself the preceding summer as an annual senator of Rome—to restore order in the city. The pope further annulled the interdict placed upon Venice by Martin IV (March 16, 1286), and canceled anticlerical legislation in Florence and Bergamo. Honorius’s conciliatory methods, together with his strong hand, brought about the pacification of Rome and the recognition of papal authority over an extensive territory, which included the Exarchate of Ravenna, the March of Ancona, the Duchy of Spoleto, the County of Bertinoro, the Mathildian lands, and the cities of Rimini, Pesaro, Fano, Sinigaglia, and Ancona (the Pentapolis). Once again, the pope was able to reside in Rome, where he built a magnificent palace on the Aventine.

A great supporter of the MENDICANT ORDERS, whose privileges he enlarged, Honorius IV promoted their members to the highest Church positions and entrusted them with the INQUISITION. He also confirmed the privileges of the CARMELITES and the AUGUSTINIAN hermits and improved the living conditions and privileges of the Williamites, an order founded by St. William of Aquitaine (d. 1156). On the other hand, he solemnly condemned the so-called APOSTOLICI or False Apostles (March 11, 1286). Established by Gerald Segarelli at Parma about 20 years earlier, the sect drew its inspiration from the Franciscan teaching on poverty, but in open defiance of ecclesiastical norms.

As a means of facilitating the union with the Eastern Church and the mission among the Muslims, Honorius encouraged the study of Oriental languages at Paris. On the other hand, the crusade announced by GREGORY X languished during his pontificate; the funds raised for the Holy Land were diverted to finance papal conflicts in Europe, especially in Aragon and Sicily, which he labeled a crusade.

Honorius's pontificate, indeed, was devoted to seeking a solution for the Kingdom of Sicily, where papal suzerainty had been seriously jeopardized as a result of the Sicilian Vespers (March 30, 1282). The brutal massacre of the French led to Charles of Anjou's loss of the kingdom, the crown of which was bestowed on Peter III of Aragon as Manfred's heir. Upon Honorius's accession to the papacy, the Sicilians cherished the hope that the pope would change the pro-French, Angevin policy fostered by Martin IV. Although the new pope was more conciliatory, he never renounced papal claims on the island, a policy that in actual practice meant the reestablishment of the House of Anjou. Still, aware of the oppressive rule of the Angevins and the many vicissitudes of the Sicilian people, the pope, as overlord, tried to pave the way for a more reliable and peaceful government, while giving all inhabitants the right of appeal to the Holy See. The 45 ordinances of the Constitutio super ordinatione regni Siciliae (Sept. 17, 1285) defined in detail the rights and limitations of royal administration vis-à-vis the local population, the clergy included. The constitution was a partial fulfillment of an earlier papal pledge to reestablish the laws of William II (d. 1189), whose reign was considered the golden age of Sicilian justice.

Still, beyond a benign policy in the long term, Honorius's most imperative ambition was to recover the kingdom as a papal fief for the Angevins. Under the influence of his family's links and the pro-French faction in the college, he pushed the policy of his predecessor, who had instigated an open conflict with King Peter III. The pope also rejected the mediation efforts of King Edward I of England. In order to force the withdrawal of the Aragonese from Sicily, Honorius called upon PHILIP III OF FRANCE to invade Aragon, while conferring upon the campaign all the spiritual and financial advantages of a crusade. Ravaged by disease, however, the French army was forced to withdraw, and both Philip and Peter died in the course of the year. Desolated by his allies' failure, and after a long captivity in Aragon, Charles of Anjou's son, Charles II of Salerno, renounced the Angevin claim to Sicily in return for his release (Feb. 27, 1287). Although Honorius refused to endorse the agreement—which actually meant the renunciation of papal control over the island—the kingdom of Sicily was lost to the Angevins. On the other hand, Honorius began negotiations with Peter's successor, Alfonso III of Aragon, but these did not bear fruit because of the pope's death.

With regard to the empire, as well, papal diplomacy did not encounter much success. Honorius reopened negotiations with the German king, Rudolf of Habsburg, in an attempt to bring about his coronation at Rome, an act that his predecessor had postponed time and again. The fixed date (Feb. 2, 1287), however, had to be postponed because of Rudolf's inability to make the Romfahrt owing to his own conflicts in Germany. A papal legate, Cardinal John of Tusculum, was sent to hasten the king's journey to Rome and to facilitate its implementation. The pope's envoy found a very obstructive audience at the Diet of Würzburg (March 16–18, 1287), with German prelates and princes uniting in an effort to safeguard their election prerogatives against any papal interference. The imperial coronation was postponed yet again, and never materialized. The question of whether this failure should be laid at the pope's door remains open to further research.

On the whole, Honorius's two-year pontificate, neither ambitious nor innovative, continued the aims and premises set by his predecessors.

Bibliography: Les registres d'Honorius IV, ed. M. PROU (Paris 1888). B. PAWLICKI, Papst Honorius IV (Münster 1896). E. JORDAN, Les Origines de la domination angevine en Italie (Paris 1909). S. RUNCIMAN, The Sicilian Vespers (Cambridge, Eng. 1958). J. R. EASTMAN, "Relating Martin Luther to Giles of Rome: How to Proceed!" Medieval Perspectives 8 (1993) 41–52. P. HERDE, "I papai tra Gregori X e Celestino V: il papato e gli Angiò," Storia della Chiesa, ed. D. QUAGLIONI, v. 11 (San Paolo 1994) 23–91. T. GRAAFEN and V. M. PUNDT, "Ein Appellationsverfahren an der päpstlichen Kurie gegen die Trierer Familie Systapp im 13. Jahrhundert," Liber amicorum necnon et amicorum für Alfred Heit (Trier 1996) 97–109.

[S. MENACHE]

HONORIUS, ROMAN EMPEROR

Honorius was Emperor in the West, 395 to 423; b. Constantinople, Sept. 9, 384; d. Ravenna, Aug. 15, 423. As a child Flavius Honorius accompanied his father THEODOSIUS I to Rome for his triumphal entry in 389, and was in Milan in 394 when he was proclaimed co-Emperor for the West. There with his brother Arcadius he witnessed the influence exercised by St. AMBROSE (d. 397) on both his father and Stilicho, the Vandal general who controlled the Roman military forces in Italy. Nothing is known of Honorius's formal education, but he seems never to have achieved the knowledge, energy, or resolution required of an efficient ruler. He succeeded Theodosius I as Emperor of the West (Jan. 17, 395) under the guidance of St. Ambrose and the guardianship of Stilicho, whose daughter Maria he married in 398. He journeyed to Ravenna, Brescia, Verona, Padua, and Altinum c. 399. During his early years the military and political difficulties of his reign were handled mainly by Stilicho.

One crisis followed another. Under Alaric, the Visigoths revolted, spreading death and desolation through Thrace and Macedonia and on the border of Italy until in 403 at Verona Alaric was defeated by Stilicho, but allowed to escape. In 405 Stilicho defeated the Ostrogoths and other tribes, but the defenses of the Rhine were weakened, so the Vandals, Suevians, and Alans were able to cross into Gaul. Constantine, a general in Britain, revolted, came to Gaul, and with the aid of his son Constans, who took control of Spain, ruled a strip of land from the Channel to the Mediterranean. Stilicho was accused of incompetence and treasonable plans and was put to death (408).

Alaric again invaded Italy. He besieged Rome three times. Finally in 410 he entered the city and allowed his followers to burn, pillage, and slay for three days, but neither the destruction nor the slayings were wholesale. Alaric carried off Galla Placidia, the sister of Honorius, and rich booty; however, he died at Cosenza on his way to Africa.

Constantius, Stilicho's successor as general, defeated Constantine at Arles (411). He also put down the revolt of Heraclian in Africa. Ataulf, the new leader of the Visigoths, supported Rome and ended the revolt of Jovinus in Gaul. He married Galla Placidia, but was forced down into Spain where he was assassinated. Wallia, a Gothic leader, finally came to terms with Rome. In return for the supply of corn, he agreed to return Galla Placidia and make war on the enemies of the empire who had been ravaging Spain. In pursuit of this policy he subjected the Alans, and in two years virtually wiped out the Siling Vandals. In 422 the Hasding Vandals and the Suevians went to Baetica, and the Visigoths got a permanent home in Aquitania Secunda. Constantius married Galla Placidia and became coruler with Honorius.

Sardonyx cameo carved with image of Emperor Honorius and wife Maria, ca. 398.

Honorius issued laws to alleviate the burden of taxation in Italy and to attract cultivators to the waste lands. He said that whatever had been laid down by his predecessors in regard to the Church would continue. When the civil jurisdiction of bishops was found to interfere with their pastoral duties it was required that both litigants should agree to use the bishops' services, before he was approached. In 395 the laws against pagans and heretics were reaffirmed: no one was allowed to enter the temples to sacrifice, and pagan priests lost their last immunities. However, Honorius endeavored to safeguard the decorations of the public monuments and to save the temples for public use.

As a result of acts of terrorism by the Donatists, a decree of suppression, the first of many such decrees, was put out against them in 405. In similar circumstances Honorius proceeded against the Pelagians. After Telemachus had paid with his life for his protest against the sanguinary combats, they were abolished. In the double election of Pope BONIFACE I (418–422) and Eulalius, the government at first favored the latter, but later it was arranged that a synod should decide between them, and until then neither was to sojourn in Rome. But Eulalius returned and so disturbed the peace that Boniface was recognized. When Honorius was asked to keep the peace in the event of another double election, he answered that he would recognize only a morally unanimous choice.

Upon receiving an appeal from the exiled JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, Honorius urged Pope Innocent I to hold the synod in which it was decided that a council should be held at Thessalonica to judge his case. But when Honorius sent a delegation to the Eastern Emperor Arcadius with this decision, the Eastern envoys were arrested and the Western envoys were deported. In 421 Theodosius II issued an edict supporting the authority of the bishops of Illyricum as dependent on the Patriarchate of Constantinople. Pope Boniface objected and Honorius obtained its revocation. He was buried in Ravenna, where he had maintained his official residence since 404.

Bibliography: G. BÓING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:478. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949–59) 1:218–311. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935– ) v.4. W. GWATKIN et al., Cambridge Medieval History, 8 v. (London-New York 1911–36) v.1. E. DEMOUGEOT, De l'unité à la division de l'Empire romain (Paris 1951). F. LOT, The End of the Ancient World and the Beginnings of the Middle Ages, tr. P. and M. LEON (New York 1931; Torchbk 1961). O. SEECK, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WIS-SOWA et al. 8.2 (1913) 2277–91.

[F. MEEHAN]

HONORIUS MAGISTER

Archdeacon of Richmond and outstanding canonist of the Anglo-Norman school of the late 12th century; date and place of birth unknown; d. Richmond, c. 1210–13. His scholastic career covered the period c. 1185 to 1195. He belonged to a group of English DECRETISTS active in Paris c. 1186 to 1190 (RICHARD DE MORES, the anonymous author of the Summa Omnis qui iuste, and others). During this time he wrote his only known work, the Summa decretalium questionum. It introduced a new didactic and literary method, soon to be imitated by others: a systematic treatise combined with the dialectical discussion and solution of problems of interpretation or, sometimes, of cases. Honorius's Summa grew out of a formal course given on Fridays (questiones veneriales secundum mag. Honorium in one MS); it is preserved in seven MSS, which is more than for any other work of the Anglo-Norman school of the time, indicating its success. Honorius taught at Oxford from 1192 (perhaps earlier) until 1195, when he entered the service of Abp. Geoffrey Plantagenet of York. In 1198 Geoffrey conferred the archdeaconry of Richmond upon Master Honorius, but the cathedral chapter of York sided with the king's candidate and refused his installation. This was the beginning of a lengthy and complex litigation, in the course of which Archbishop Geoffrey broke with Honorius; for a time two interlocking lawsuits were pending in Rome, where from 1201 Honorius pleaded his case in person. On the main issue Pope INNOCENT III finally pronounced sentence in his favor (June 1, 1202). Soon thereafter Honorius became a member of the household of Abp. Hubert Walter of Canterbury, for whom he performed important services. After the archbishop's death he was one of the proctors for King John in Rome (1205) in the great Canterbury election case. But a few years later he was stripped of all his possessions and in prison for a debt of 300 marks he owed the crown from the years of his struggle for Richmond. His name occurs for the last time in the records of the exchequer by Michaelmas in 1210. He must have died between that date and 1213, when the first mention is made of his successor in the Archdeaconry of Richmond.

Bibliography: S. KUTTNER and E. RATHBONE, "Anglo-Norman Canonists of the 12th Century," Traditio 7 (1949–51) 304–316, 326, 344–347, full coverage of sources and bibliog. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2: 956–957; 3:xxix. Bulletin of the Institute of Research and Study in Medieval Canon Law in Traditio 11 (1955) 448.

[S. KUTTNER]

HONORIUS OF AUTUN

Writer; b. c. 1080 or 1090; d. c. 1156. Notwithstanding his traditional association with Autun, cumulative evidence indicates Regensburg as the main scene of his activity. Honorius has been identified as a monk of Regensburg who concealed his name from envious critics under the pseudonym Augustodunensis, "the hill (dunum) of Augustus," i.e., the site of a supposed victory of Charlemagne before Regensburg. He has been distinguished from Honorius "the solitary," and identified with Honorius, a priest of Autun, who later joined the Irish Benedictines at Regensburg.

His success as a Christian teacher is attested by the numerous manuscripts and early printings of his theological manual, the Clarification (Elucidarium), as well as by medieval versions of it in French, Provençal, Italian, Old Norse, Swedish, Gaelic, English, and a German compilation of materials taken from the Philosophia mundi of WILLIAM OF CONCHES and from several of Honorius's works. Though devoted to tradition, Honorius was an original thinker. A zealous defender of the Real Presence and of moral standards for the clergy (see his Offendiculum), he claimed that a Sacrament confected by a priest of evil life is valid by the power of Christ but invalid should the priest be ex-communicated. The body of the Lord that an unworthy recipient of the Eucharist appears to receive is restored inviolate to the substance of Christ.

Honorius teaches that God is an invisible Spirit beyond the grasp of any creature, but He contains them all and is “the substance of all things” (Endres, 100). Everything created is good, and the term “good” is convertible with “substance” and “nature.” Evil, less a nature than the perversion of nature, is the nothing opposed to substance. A freely corrupted will is no longer nature and is rightly termed “sin.” The divine motive in tolerating evil in the universe is an aesthetic one: like an artist, God renders the just the more glorious with the contrast. In comparison with God, the created universe is, as it were, nothing—a kind of falsity in juxtaposition to the Truth that is God. At best, the world is a shadow of God who is Life and Truth Itself.

About man he taught that the reprobate have been created for the sake of the elect. Both Scripture and reason show that the creation of man is more than a device to supply for fallen angels. If man had not been created for his own sake, his dignity would be less than that of a worm, whereas the glory of his combat gives him a dignity greater than that of angels. Freedom of choice is the power of guarding “rectitude of will for the sake of rectitude itself” (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 172:1200C). A captive now, man can neither desire nor move toward a good without the prior grace of God. Predestination is two-fold, to glory or to punishment, but it is prepared eternally according to the merits of each one. Not the fall, but the predestination of man to deification is the cause of the Incarnation, for sin can be the cause of nothing good. At death the mortal Body will be changed into a spiritual one and what is spiritual into deity, its own substance perduring.

The derivative quality of much of his material shows Honorius to be a valuable witness to the learning considered respectable by his contemporaries. At the same time, his use of dialectic to expound the faith, at once daring and awkward, makes him a modest collaborator with the great 12th-century theologians.

Bibliography: Omnia opera: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 172; the Philosophia Mundi (Patrologia Latina 172:39–102) belongs to William of Conches, while Honorius’s Cognitio vitae is among the works of Augustine (Patrologia Latina 40:1003–32). Y. LEFÈVRE, L’Elucidarium et les Lucidaires (Bibliothèque des Écoles Françaises d’Athènes et de Rome 180; Paris 1954). E. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 7.1:139–158. J. A. ENDRES, Honorius Augustodunensis (Kempten 1906). E. M. SANFORD, “Honorius, Presbyter and Scholasticus,” Speculum 23 (1948) 397–425. Miscellanea Giovanni Mercati, 6 v. (Rome 1946); Studi e Testi 121–126. 2:220–258. P. DELHAYE, Catholicisme 5:929–932. H. MENHARDT, “Der Nachlass des Honorius Augustodunensis,” Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum und deutsche Literatur 89 (1959) 23–69. P. ROUSSET, “À propos de l’Elucidarium d’Honorius Augustodunensis: Quelques problèmes d’histoire ecclésiastique,” Zeitschrift für schweizer Kirchengeschichte 52 (1958) 223–230.

[E. A. SYNAN]

HONORIUS OF CANTERBURY, ST.

Archbishop, fifth successor of AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY; d. Sept. 30, 653. A disciple of Pope GREGORY THE GREAT at Rome, he may have been a member of Augustine’s original mission to England. He was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury by the senior English bishop, PAULINUS OF YORK, at Lincoln, 627. When the death of King EDWIN OF NORTHUMBRIA (633) and the collapse of the new Northumbrian church under the pagan king, Penda, sent Paulinus into exile, he fled to Honorius under whom he served as bishop of Rochester. Honorius received the pallium from the pope in 634. Early in his career Honorius had a valuable assistant in a Burgundian bishop, Felix of Dunwich, whom he sent to evangelize the East Anglians. Honorius retained a special interest in this mission and when Felix died there after 17 years, Honorius found the East Anglians another bishop, Thomas. It was under Honorius that BIRINUS began the conversion of the West Saxons. Although the death of Edwin and the flight of Paulinus had seemed to mark the end of the infant Northumbrian church, in 635 King OSWALD seized power there and invited a Celtic monk, Aidan, from IONA to become bishop of the Northumbrians. This created a difficult situation; although Honorius had great respect for Aidan, he opposed his Celtic customs for observing Easter. The matter did not, however, come to a head until after Honorius’s death (see WHITBY, ABBEY OF).

Feast: Sept. 30.

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiastical History bks. 2 and 3. A. W. HADDAM and W. STUBBS, eds., Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 3 v. in 4 (Oxford 1869–78) 3:82–98. F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947).

[E. JOHN]

HONTHEIM, JOHANN NIKOLAUS VON

Suffragan bishop of Trier and founder of FEBRONIANISM; b. Trier, Germany, Jan. 27, 1701; d. Montquintin, Luxembourg, Sept. 2, 1790. He studied jurisprudence and theology at Trier, Louvain (where he was acquainted with Zeger Bernhard van ESPEN), and Leiden. After extensive travels and a stay of three years in Rome, he obtained the degree of doctor of jurisprudence (1724) and was ordained (1728). He was a professor of the Pandects in Trier (1732–38), a chancery official of the bishop, and a parish priest at Koblenz (1739). He became the suffragan bishop of Trier (1748) and until 1778 was vicar-general for Trier and pro-chancellor of the university. In this capacity the learned and austere Hontheim became influential in the archdiocese. Already in his student days he had leaned toward GALLICANISM and had been interested in the union between Catholics and Protestants. In 1763 he published under the pseudonym Justinus Febronius the two-volume work De statu ecclesiae et legitima potestate Romani Pontificis liber singularis ad reuniendos dissidentes in religione Christianos compositus. The work, composed from Gallican, Jansenist, and Protestant sources, created such a stir that it soon appeared in German, French, and Italian translations. Its theses undermine papal authority: Christ transmitted the power of the keys to the faithful as a group (collectivity of the faithful) and only the execution of this power to the pope and the bishops. The pope has only a primacy of honor, not of jurisdiction, a primacy in the Church, not over the Church. At the same time Hontheim raises episcopal authority immoderately by maintaining, against historical truth, that in the course of history the popes, especially through the pseudo-Isidorian decretals (see FALSE DECRETALS), deprived the bishops of many rights conferred upon them by Christ Himself. Thus he denied supreme papal jurisdiction in favor of practically unlimited episcopal executive power. The bishops would still be in communion with the Holy See and were to report to Rome in important official matters, but they could appeal from a papal decision to a general council, since, according to Hontheim, only the collective Church is the real bearer of infallibility.

Significantly, Hontheim, having thus erected his episcopal system, turned to the secular princes and urged them to interfere, if necessary, with the internal affairs of the Church, even at the risk of a schism. His book was put on the Index by Clement XIII as early as Feb. 27, 1764. On May 21 of the same year the pope in a letter to the German bishops summoned them to suppress the work, whereupon Abp. Clement Wenceslaus of Trier and nine other bishops forbade it. Later Hontheim wrote a rejoinder to various refutations that appeared against his work, notably those by F. A. ZACCARIA and T. M. Mamacchi. Wenzel Anton von Kaunitz declared to Empress Maria Theresa that the doctrines of Hontheim were precisely those “that are publicly taught at all Your Majesty’s universities and are recognized as true and correct by the whole intelligent Catholic world, the only exception being the Roman curialists and their adherents.” Later the author of the book, who long remained unknown, was identified, and summoned by Rome to retract. This he did, but only half-heartedly, as appears clearly from his correspondence with Councilor Krufft, an administrative official in the state chancery in Vienna, and also from a commentary to his recantation, which he published in 1781. His real reconciliation with the Church took place only shortly before his death.

Bibliography: O. MEJER, Febronius (2d ed. Tübingen 1885). L. JUST, ed., Der Wiederruf des Febronius in der Korrespondenz des Abbé F. H. Beck mit dem Wiener Nuntius G. Garampi (Wiesbaden 1960). J. ZILLICH, Febronius (Halle 1906). E. WOLF, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:447–448. H. RAAB, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:479–480. T. ORTOLAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 5.2:2115–24. Y. M. J. CONGAR, Catholicisme 5:933.

[F. MAASS]

HOOKER, RICHARD

Leading Anglican theologian; b. Heavitree, near Exeter, March 1554; d. Bishopsbourne, near Canterbury, Nov. 2, 1600. He early demonstrated academic ability and, with aid from Bishop J. JEWEL and others, attended Oxford, distinguishing himself in Hebrew, Greek, and music. After graduation he stayed on as tutor and fellow at Corpus Christi College. He was ordained in 1581 and attracted notice by disagreeing with Calvin, then at the height of his influence. As a result, Hooker became known as an opponent of the PURITAN party, which was trying to infiltrate the Church of England and abolish the episcopate and Prayer Book. In 1585 he was appointed master of the Temple by the archbishop of York.

The Temple Church became the scene of a celebrated theological controversy. Hooker preached for the Established Church and his rival for the mastership, the reader Walter Travers, spoke for the thoroughgoing Calvinists. When the controversy moved from sermons to a series of tracts, Hooker felt obliged to treat the matter at greater length and was given a quiet country parish in Boscombe and later another benefice in Bishopsbourne. During this period appeared five volumes of his famous work, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (v. 1–4 in 1594, v. 5 in 1597). Volumes 6 and 8, suspected of revision by Hooker’s widow and Puritans, appeared in 1648; volume 7, by Bishop John Gauden of Worcester, appeared in 1662. This work, which showed the way later followed by the CAROLINE DIVINES, became the quasi-official apologia of the Church of England and influenced almost every position within Anglicanism. Hooker’s brilliant analysis of natural law has had a profound effect on subsequent political theorists. As a work of art, it stands as the first great original masterpiece of English prose.

The problem facing the Church of England was the claim of thoroughgoing Calvinists that the pattern of Geneva was the only legitimate one for a reformed church. Those who maintained this position held that only Presbyterian polity had the warrant of Scripture and that Anglican worship was vitiated by the “dregs of Popery.” The Puritans were encouraged in their hopes for further reform by the instability of the Anglican Church in its early years; they found much support for their position among those most influential in Church and State, that is, Leicester, Walsingham, and Archbishop Grindal.

Doctrinal Presuppositions. The ground taken by Hooker had previously been covered by Archbishop J. WHITGIFT, but less thoroughly, and from an essentially Calvinist position that prevented any critical examination of the Puritan presuppositions. The virtue of Hooker’s work was that it moved the whole issue to the higher ground of general principles and worked out a rationale for the Elizabethan settlement.

While agreeing with the Calvinists that Scripture was the ultimate source of authority, Hooker maintained that it was not a complete body of positive law governing every aspect of the life of the church. In matters of polity or worship, he found the Bible often ambiguous or silent and insisted that patristic tradition must be consulted to clarify the situation. In those details where tradition was also ambiguous or silent, he was convinced that the common understanding of reasonable men could be relied upon; when conclusions were reached in this manner, he required no explicit scriptural authority, but held that it was sufficient that the results should not be contrary to the Bible. By means of this analysis, he justified episcopacy and the Book of Common Prayer as both reasonable in themselves and congruous with Holy Writ.

In the course of this argument, it was necessary for him to demonstrate the reliability of reason, and this he did by relating it to natural theology. In so doing, he rejected the Augustinianism, or VOLUNTARISM, prevalent in the churches of the Reformation and based his theories upon Thomas Aquinas and the scholastics. Thus he saw reason as grounded in God Himself, and he could look upon the episcopate as divinely ordered even if its origin were to be found in the Apostles or in the church as a whole. The church, he said, had made use of reason to develop her tradition, and the episcopacy was a providential element of the constitution of the church, not an element of divine law.

Church and State. Hooker showed some concern to maintain the integrity of the Church with respect to the State. He granted the Church a juridical autonomy to determine her rites and ceremonies, but not complete autonomy in her own sphere. He saw Church and State as divinely ordered aspects of one society and united the two in an unstable equilibrium on the theories of MARSILIUS OF PADUA. The monarch, as head of the State, was head of the Church, though without any spiritual power. The exigencies of the Elizabethan establishment prevented the resolution of the problem in other ways that might have been more consistent with Hooker’s earlier volumes and more congenial to him personally. He is credited with determining the Anglican via media between Calvin and Rome, as well as the cosmic orientation of Anglican theology. His denial of transubstantiation may be viewed as linked with his denial of complete autonomy for the Church.

Richard Hooker, engraving by William Faithorne.

Hooker restored the idea of natural law and sought to harmonize it (or reason) with revelation. The supernatural law of Holy Scripture, he said, is only part of God’s law and requires knowledge of the natural law to be understood. He also sought to harmonize the two sources of the State: nature, (i.e., God); and the social compact (his notion of which is less individualistic than that of LOCKE). He rejects the theories of resistance and tyrannicide, emphasizing the divine origin of power more than its human origin.

Bibliography: Works, ed. R. W. CHURCH and F. PAGET, 3 v. (7th ed. Oxford 1888). L. S. THORNTON, R. Hooker: A Study of His Theology (London 1924). E. T. DAVIES, The Political Ideas of R. Hooker (London 1946). F. J. SHIRLEY, R. Hooker and Contemporary Political Ideas (London 1949). P. S. SCHÜTZ, R. Hooker, der grundlegende Theologie des Anglikanismus (Göttingen 1952). P. MUNZ, The Place of Hooker in the History of Thought (London 1952). J. S. MARSHALL, Hooker's Theology of Common Prayer (Sewanee 1956). A. PASSERIN D'ENTRÈVES, Medieval Contribution to Political Thought (New York 1959). Y. CONGAR, Catholicisme 5:935–937. G. HILLERDAL, Reason and Revelation in R. Hooker (Lund 1962).

[R. H. GREENFIELD]

HOOKER, THOMAS

Puritan clergyman, founder of Connecticut; b. probably at Marfield, Leicestershire, England, 1586; d. Hartford, Conn., July 7, 1647. He was a fellow (1609–18) of Emmanuel College, Cambridge University; rector (1620) of Esher in Surrey; and lecturer (1626) at St. Mary's, Chelmsford (Essex). His increasing reputation as a leader of the PURITANS finally caused William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, to retire him. To escape prosecution for his dissenting views, Hooker fled (1630) to Holland, where for two years he was minister of an English church at Delft, near Rotterdam. Meanwhile, a group of settlers from Chelmsford had settled in New England and they urged him to join them. He arrived in America on Sept. 4, 1633, and was chosen pastor of the church in Newton, Mass. Two years later, for reasons possibly more political than economic, he and his congregation applied for permission from the Massachusetts authorities to settle in Connecticut. When this was refused, they defied the magistrates, moving to Hartford, where Hooker was pastor until his death. Among all the New England ministers he was probably the best preacher, with a style filled with similes and examples. He believed in democracy and helped to draft the Fundamental Orders (1639), under which Connecticut was democratically governed.

In his sermon at the general court of Connecticut he declared that "the formation of all authority is laid . . . in the free consent of the people." His Survey of the Summe of Church Discipline (1648) held that since authority in both Church and State is founded on the consent of the people, a compact can be the basis for both ecclesiastical and civil government.

Bibliography: G. L. WALKER, Thomas Hooker (New York 1891). C. M. ANDREWS, The Beginnings of Connecticut, 1632–1662 (New Haven 1934). P. G. MILLER, "Thomas Hooker and the Democracy of Early Connecticut," The New England Quarterly 4 (1931) 4:663–712.

[E. DELANEY]

HOPE

The supernatural, infused, theological virtue that makes it possible for the Christian to expect with confidence to attain eternal life. The theological development of the virtue of hope has been less marked and less fruitful than that of faith and charity, although hope is mentioned in the Scriptures hardly less frequently than are the other two theological virtues. Classical treatises on hope contrast in their brevity with those devoted to faith and charity, but since World War II, perhaps in consequence of the turmoil of the war, the subject has received more adequate treatment. For the most part, however, what is human and natural in the notion has received more stress than what is divine and supernatural; and it is with the latter aspect, or the virtue of hope strictly so-called, that the present article is concerned. It considers hope first in itself and then in relation to analogous or connected realities.

Christian Hope in Itself

The word "hope," in its biblical and theological usage, sometimes signifies the act of hope (e.g., Col 1.23; Heb 3.6); at other times, the virtue (1 Cor 13.13) or the motive [e.g., Ps 69(70).3, 5; Col 1.27; 1 Pt 1.21]; and at still other times, the object or thing hoped for (e.g., Rom 8.24; Gal 5.5), these different notions lending themselves readily to the metonymy so common in the Scriptures. Beneath this figurative language, however, are to be found the principles by which Christian hope is particularized and defined. Since hope as a virtue is an operative habit, it must be identified by the relation of its proper act to its proper object (see St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 4.1; De Spe 1; hereafter all citations with the author unnamed will be to the works of St. Thomas). This portion of the present article must therefore discuss the object, the subject, the acts, and the habit of hope.

Object of hope. The term object, with reference to hope, may mean either that which hope seeks to obtain or the objective basis for regarding that object as attainable. The first is called the material or terminative object; the second, the formal object or motive.

Material Object. Christians hope to obtain from God all that He has promised to give them and all that they ask from Him with respect to eternal life. This embraces two things, namely, the ultimate end itself and the means that lead to the ultimate end.

The good promised by God and sought of Him in the OT consisted for the most part in the natural and material good of earthly life, such as health, long life, and victory over enemies. But supernatural and spiritual good was also promised and asked for, such as the coming of the Messiah, forgiveness of sin, and the service and love of God and its full possession in the future life (see Van der Ploeg, 481–507). In the NT, however, the eternal and imperishable good of the future life is primarily what is promised and sought, with the temporal and perishable goods of this life relegated to a secondary place. One is to seek first the kingdom of God and His justice (Mt 6.19–20). The object of hope is the clear and intuitive vision of what is now the object of belief; it is the full possession of what faith presents and anticipates, the full development of that of which faith is the substance, or the foundation and beginning—the vision of God as He is in Himself (cf. Rom 8.24–25; Heb 11.1). If we had hope only for the things of this life, we would be of all men the most to be pitied (1 Cor 15.19). We hope then for entrance into God’s rest (Heb 4.1–11), into the holies of heaven (Heb 10.19–23), the eternal dwelling (2 Cor 5.1, 8) that Christ has prepared for us (Jn 14.2; Phil 3.20–21).

Prayer is a manifestation and interpretation of hope. The material object of hope is nowhere more admirably expressed than in the “Lord’s Prayer,” which, as St. Augustine declared, contains all that we should hope from God (Enchir. 114; Patrologia Latina 40:285). In this prayer the heavenly Father is asked to grant us eternal life (Thy kingdom come) and also the means necessary to attain it. The means are both positive and negative. Positive means of a spiritual kind are summed up in the doing of God’s will, and temporal necessities to the end of eternal life are summed up comprehensively in the petition for our daily bread. Negatively, we stand in need of protection against the evils that could prevent the coming of the kingdom: the past evil we have done (forgive us our trespasses); the future evil we may do (lead us not into temptation); and the future evil of punishment we may have to suffer, especially the evil of eternal death (deliver us from evil).

The magisterium of the Church has also given expression to the object of hope. Since the object of hope is identified with the object of faith, inasmuch as faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen (Heb 11.1), the articles of faith and the definitions of the Church with respect to the object of faith, also indicate the object of hope. We not only believe in, therefore, but we also hope for the resurrection of the body and life eternal [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum (Freiburg 1963) 10–36, 72, 76, 150, 443]. The Council of Trent insisted that we should hope through the mercy of God for the pardon of our sins and the infusion of His grace, the final aim of which is eternal life (ibid. 1526–28). Those regenerated by Baptism should preserve the robe of grace clean and immaculate to present it before the tribunal of Christ to obtain eternal life (ibid.

Hope with the four Evangelists, Renaissance European Gold and Silverwork Reliquary. (© Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

1530–31). Those who persevere in good works, innocent or penitent, should consider eternal life as the greatest of the graces promised by God to His children (ibid. 1545–49).

The liturgy reinforces the same lesson, particularizing and interpreting in concrete form the good things for which we turn to God. Its incessant plea is that God grant us eternal life and deliver us from eternal death; and to that end it asks health of body, pardon of sins, fidelity to grace, and final perseverance. It contains petitions for every kind of good and for remedies against every kind of evil. In the Roman Missal there are Masses and prayers for peace; against war, illness and persecutions, drought and storms, the snares of the enemies of our souls; and for humility, purity, charity, and the other virtues necessary to our spiritual welfare. The litanies are rich in petitions for deliverance from every kind of evil of body or soul and for every kind of corporal and spiritual good. We beg God to deliver us from eternal damnation, from a sudden and unprovided death, from the occasions of sin, the attacks of the enemy, bad thoughts, ill will, every kind of uncleanness of body or soul, lightning, storms, earthquakes, plagues, hunger, and war. We ask Him to give and preserve for us the fruits of the earth, our homes and villages, our life and health and to bring about the propagation and increase of faith, and finally eternal happiness for each and every one.

The object of theological hope is thus the attainment of all true good and deliverance from all that is truly evil. This objective universality is characteristic of the theological virtues, which are primarily concerned with God but which, like God Himself, extend their radius of action and their dominion over everything. Thus faith is not concerned with God and divine things alone, but also with the whole of creation since it is God's handiwork. Charity does not consist in loving God only but extends its love also to ourselves, to our neighbors, and to all created things because they belong to God, being made in His image or committed to His service. In a similar way, hope not only aspires to the possession of God, but also reaches out to all the means of nature and of grace that lead to the possession of God and that free the soul from every temporal and eternal evil (see In 3 Sent. 26.2).

However, not all these things fall under hope in an equal way. There is a principal object, there are secondary objects, and there is an order between these. They pertain to hope analogically, the principal object being the supreme analogue and the other objects sharing in varying ways and degrees in its desirability.

Principal Terminative Object. The principal object of hope is the perfect and completely secure possession of God Himself for all eternity (Ps 72.25–28), the kingdom of God and His justice (Mt 6.33), the full possession of this kingdom (Mt 6.10; 25.34), the full vision of God as He is in Himself, so that He is seen face to face (1 Jn 3.2–3). In a word, it is eternal life, eternal happiness, as is stated in the symbols of faith and the definitions to which reference was made above.

That God Himself must be the principal object of hope is evident from the above-noted parallelism between faith and hope. We hope for a thing unseen, i.e., something that is now an object of belief (Rom 8.24–25). On the other hand, we believe what we hope for (Heb 11.1). Therefore what is now not seen, what is now invisible and inaccessible, but which we hope to see face to face in the future life, is the object both of faith and of hope—and that is God Himself as He is in Himself (Jn 1.18; 1 Jn 4.17; 1 Tm 1.17; 6.16; 1 Cor 13.2; 1 Jn 3.2–3).

The same truth is implied in the classification, based on the Scriptures and affirmed by the Fathers and theologians, of hope as a theological virtue. As such it must have God for its object, for it is by having God as its object that a theological virtue is distinguished from a moral virtue.

But further precision is necessary. God as eternal beatitude is the object of hope, but it remains to be determined whether the beatitude in question is to be understood in an objective, or a subjective (formal), or an integral sense—in other words, whether it is God, or the vision of Him, or both together for which we hope.

Some have held that the object of Christian hope is objective beatitude alone and that subjective or formal beatitude is necessary only as a condition sine qua non. This was the opinion of the Salmanticenses (Cursus Theologicus, “De spe” 1.1.4), but it is open to objection on the grounds that the object alone, without the possessive act, does not in fact beatify man. Eternal happiness is essentially something vital. It is eternal life, and this life for man does not exist in the object alone. Man's possession of it therefore must be something more than a mere condition of his beatitude.

Others, such as Durandus of Saint-Porçain, have held that the principal object of hope is only subjective beatitude, or the possessive act, although this demands and supposes the objective beatitude that is possessed. This view is unacceptable because man's formal beatitude is essentially something created and finite, since it is a vital act of man himself. If this were its principal object, hope would be a moral rather than a theological virtue.

A third position endeavors to synthesize these two extremes of opinion and sees the primary and principal object of Christian hope as including both the objective and the formal in a total or integral beatitude, an explanation that has been proposed in two forms. According to some—e.g., P. Lorca (De spe 2.7), G. Vázquez (In 1am2ae, 15.4), and F. Suárez (De spe 1.1.2, 4)—beatitude in both senses is equally contained, since formal beatitude is as essential as the objective to man's beatitude understood in an integral sense. Others—such as Cajetan (In 2a2ae, 17.2.1; 17.5.3–8) and John of St. Thomas (Cursus Theologicus, “De spe,” 4.205)—held that beatitude in both senses pertains to the object of hope, but unequally and distinctly. Directly (in recto) the object of hope is objective beatitude; obliquely (in obliquo) it is subjective beatitude. Objective beatitude pertains to the object constitutively; subjective beatitude, connotatively. This explanation has the advantage of preserving the due subordination of the created to the uncreated and prevents a confusion of their relative value and importance. Moreover, it eliminates the possibility of seeing hope as a kind of amphibious or hybrid virtue, theological in reference to its uncreated object, but moral so far as its created object is concerned.

Object difficult of attainment. The attainment of the primary object of hope is extremely difficult and arduous for man, especially in his present state of fallen and weakened nature. Moreover, this difficulty amounts to sheer impossibility if one considers it only from the point of view of man's inherent and natural power. Between God as He is in Himself and the natural powers, cognitive and appetitive, not only of man but also of any intellectual creature created or creatable, there is a radical and insurmountable disproportion. God as He is in Himself infinitely transcends every creature. He is higher than the heavens (Jb 11.8; 32.12; Heb 7.26), greater than the heavens and the earth and all gods (Ps 46.3; 76.14; 94.3). His greatness is incomparable and inscrutable (Is 46.9; Ps 114.3; Jb 36.32). He is essential greatness (Ti 2.13; Lk 1.15, 32; Heb 4.14; 6.13). His name is the Most High (Ps 17.14; 49.14; Lk 1.32, 35, 76; 6.28). "Thou only art Most High," as the Church declares in the Gloria of the Mass. God inhabits a light that is inaccessible to us: no one has seen Him or can see Him (Jn 1.18; 1 Tm 6.16). Only God knows Himself intimately. No one knows the Son but the Father nor the Father but the Son, and he to whom He has revealed Himself (Mt 11.27; Lk 10.22; Jn 6.46). Basing itself on these testimonies, Vatican Council I therefore taught that the hidden mysteries of God, and a fortiori His intimate being in itself, are naturally inaccessible to all created intelligence, whether human or angelic, in regard to both its simple existence and its intimate nature (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 3016). Not even when aided by the supernatural light of faith and theological science is one capable of seeing God face to face.

This radical and connatural impossibility of seeing God is further complicated in man's present state because his natural powers of both body and soul are greatly diminished (ibid. 371, 385, 1511). In his body he is subject to suffering, disease, and finally death (ibid. 371, 385, 1511). His soul has lost its innocence and original justice; the light of his intelligence is darkened (ibid. 1616, 1644, 2756), his will is weakened (ibid. 371, 378, 383, 396, 633, 622, 1486, 1521), and he is inclined to sin by the disorderly impulses of concupiscence (ibid. 1515). Furthermore, the wounds and weaknesses inherited with original sin are variously aggravated in different individuals by their own personal sins. And in addition to all this, man is beset by enemies, temptations, and dangers on every side, as is repeatedly stated in the liturgy (see, for example, the Collects for the 4th Sunday after Epiphany, the 2d Sunday of Lent, and Monday of Holy Week). The primary object of hope is thus extremely difficult of attainment; moreover, it is impossible to attain if man's natural powers only are taken into account, for these, even if they were undamaged by sin, would be essentially inadequate for the attainment of a goal infinitely beyond the grasp of any created power.

Secondary object of hope. Everything that one hopes from God in addition to the principal object will be either a means leading to the attainment of God or a consequential or complementary result of having attained God.

Means Leading to God. These include whatever really contributes to the attainment of eternal life. Some means are positive and include the gifts of nature and of grace that are to be used; others are negative and include protection against the evils or impediments that hinder or prevent the attainment of God. In summary and in condensed form, the necessary means are expressed, together with the primary object of hope, in the "Lord's Prayer," as was said above.

The positive means belong to two categories because gifts of nature as well as of grace are necessary. Grace supposes, elevates, and perfects nature (Summa theologiae 1a, 1.8 ad 2; 2.2 ad 1; 62.5; 1a2ae, 99.2 ad 1; 3a, 71.1 ad 1). Eternal life cannot be attained without good works (Mt 5.12; 16.27; Ti 2.12; 1 Cor 15.58). But good works are not performed without human acts, nor are the latter possible without nature and the human person. Moreover, by nature should be understood human nature, complete and perfect, composed of a rational soul and a body, with the operative faculties of the composite sound and developed, and its complement of intellectual and moral virtues. A sufficiency of material good is necessary to conserve and develop individual and social life in a manner worthy of a rational being. All this is contained in the petition: "Give us this day our daily bread" (Mt 6.11). Bread here is taken as representative of whatever is necessary to maintain life on earth. Not food only is needed, but many other things as well, such as clothing, shelter, health, employment, transportation, refreshment, relaxation, all of which can be understood as petitioned under the general heading of bread. Yet the wise man asks of God only what is necessary to live honestly (Prv 30.8). External corporal goods should always be considered according to their true worth in the designs of God. Essentially they are means, not ends; they represent useful, not absolute, values.

Moreover, gifts of nature, while necessary and useful, are neither sufficient in themselves nor proportionate to the supernatural end that is eternal life. Of themselves alone they cannot enable man to gain entry into the kingdom of heaven. This cannot be denied without falling into the naturalist heresy of Pelagianism or Semi-Pelagianism, later renewed by rationalism and semi-rationalism, and repeatedly condemned by the Church (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 226–227; In- diculus 243–245, 373–395, 3028, 3041, 2856, 2903–05, 2909). The ultimate end is essentially supernatural. Consequently, the natural powers and means of any nature, human or angelic, cannot suffice to attain it. Natural means, inadequate in themselves, can contribute only as conditions and as instruments and when used in perfect subordination to the proportionate and supernatural means.

The proportionate and supernatural means are all reducible to sanctifying grace, which includes all habitual grace, the Sacraments of the New Law (channels and instrumental causes of it), the infused theological and moral virtues, the gifts of the Holy Spirit, sufficient and efficacious actual graces, and merit.

These supernatural means operate directly toward the attainment of eternal life, each in its own way. Habitual grace is like an entitative habit deifying the soul; and it is the root, as it were, and remote principle of meritorious acts. The infused virtues and gifts of the Holy Spirit are the proximate principles from which these acts immediately flow. Actual graces put them in motion. Charity is the main principle, and the other virtues and gifts are secondary principles and subordinate to charity.

These means are condensed in the second petition of the “Lord’s Prayer,” that is, that we do God’s will here on earth as it is done by the blessed in heaven. This conformity to the divine will is expressed in the elicited and commanded works of charity, which are precisely the works that are meritorious of eternal life.

Negative Means. These consist in the overcoming or avoiding of the evils or impediments that might hinder or prevent the attainment of eternal life. The negative means are parallel to the positive, because they remove or overcome obstacles opposed to the positive means. Some of the obstacles are hindrances to the supernatural means; others, to the natural means. The first are evils of fault; the second, evils of punishment. The evils of fault are past, present, and future sins, which stand opposed to grace and charity and therefore to salutary and meritorious action. The evils of punishment are the miseries, infirmities, and calamities of body and soul that may oppress a man and prevent his leading a life worthy of his rational nature. In the fifth petition of the “Lord’s Prayer” we ask that the heavenly Father pardon our sins past and present; and in the sixth, that He permit us not to fall into temptation that will lead to future sin (Mt 6.12–13).

Complementary Result of Attaining God. The secondary object of hope also includes what will result from essential beatitude as its complement, i.e., all the gifts of nature and of grace that will result in the blessed in consequence of their seeing God (for an account of these, see BEATIFIC VISION).

Principal motive of hope. The motive or formal object of hope is the real and objective foundation of one’s hope, i.e., the objective basis for the expectation that one will be able to attain what is hoped for. It is that which makes the attainment of the object possible. As the motive is something essentially correlative and proportioned to the material object, Christian hope will have a primary and principal, and a secondary motive.

The chief motive and foundation of Christian hope is God, and God alone. This is an explicitly revealed truth, frequently repeated throughout the Old and New Testaments. There is nothing more insistently stated in the Psalms than that the Lord is our only hope, our refuge, our defense, our strength and counsel against every kind of enemy and difficulty (Ps 7.2; 15.1–2; 16.6–9; 32.20–22; 39.5; 61.2–10; 90.1–16; 145.2–6). In the NT it is also apparent that we must look to God alone for the realization of our hope—our liberation from all danger (2 Cor 1.9–10), the resurrection of our bodies (Acts 24.15), the salvation of our souls (1 Tm 4.10; 5.5). Therefore, God is called the God of hope (Rom 15.13); for He is the living God (1 Tm 4.10), who gives us eternal life (1 Jn 3.2–3).

It is true that Jesus Christ also is the foundation of our hope (1 Cor 15.19; Phil 2.19), and He is even called our hope (1 Tm 1.1). But, as St. Augustine observed, this is proper because of His divinity, not His humanity (In psalm. 145.9).

The magisterium of the Church also teaches that our hope is based on God. We hope to obtain from Him life eternal (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 72). We hope and trust in the mercy of God (ibid. 1525, 1676), in the help of God (ibid. 1541), in the promise of God (ibid. 1545), that He will Himself give us eternal life (ibid. 1545, 1576).

Theological reasoning confirms the same truth. Because Christian hope is a theological virtue properly and strictly speaking, just as are faith and charity (1 Cor 13.13; 1 Pt 1.21; 1 Jn 4.16; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1001), it must have God alone as its principal terminative object and motive. Again, since the primary and principal object of Christian hope is essentially supernatural and as such beyond the acquisitive powers of all created and creatable nature, it is attainable per se only by God. He alone is naturally blessed.

However, there are in God many attributes and perfections that, although they are not really distinguished from His being, manifest His infinite riches and are the exemplar causes of created things of the natural and supernatural order. Theologians ask which of the divine attributes is the formal motive of hope. God is the formal motive of faith inasmuch as He is Prima Veritas, and of charity as Prima Bonitas, and similarly He ought to be the motive of hope by reason of one or another of His attributes. Scripture and the magisterium of the Church indicate some attributes of God as the formal foundation of our hope.

God's Love. God desires to and can save us; He wants to grant us the good of eternal life. This is apparent from the fact of creation, from Redemption, from our status as His children. If the Father so loved us, despite our being sinners and as such His enemies, that He delivered His only begotten Son to death on the cross that we might be reconciled with Him and to give us His grace, what will He not do for us after we have been converted into His friends and His children? He will certainly lead us to eternal life and provide us with every means of attaining salvation (Rom 5.8; Ti 3.4–7).

God's Promise. God has given His solemn word, promising under oath to give the inheritance to His sons, the brothers of Christ, who believe in Him and live without stain. In this promise He cannot fail, for He cannot lie (Heb 6.18) but rather is faithful and unable to disown Himself (Heb 11.11; 2 Tm 2.13). He is called faithful and true (Rv 19.11). Nor can He be prevented against His will from fulfilling His promise, for He is omnipotent and can realize all that He has promised (Rom 2.21). A hope, then, founded on the infallibility of the word of God and on His omnipotence to fulfill it ought to be strong and unshakable. It is a firm and secure anchor, because He who has given the promise is faithful (Heb 10.23).

God's Mercy. In other places the Scriptures declare that our hope depends on the infinite mercy of God, who loves us and has greater pity for us than an earthly father for his children. He knows our weakness and misery and has pity on us (Ps 102.13–14). He is patient, long-suffering, deeply compassionate, and merciful (Ps 102.2; 144.8; Sir 2.11–13), the very Father of mercies and God of all counsel (2 Cor 1.3). Numerous texts from both Old and New Testaments could be adduced to show the divine mercy represented as the basis of our hope.

God's Almighty Power. At other times, the Scriptures point to the omnipotence of God, or His omnipotent help, as the foundation of our hope. The basis of human hope is human power; of Christian hope, divine power. All human power is weak, uncertain, fragile, and inconsistent; and therefore human hope is uncertain and changing, and fails many times (1 Tm 6.17). But the power of God is absolute and irresistible, and Christian hope cannot come to nothing through a failure on the part of Him in whom we hope (Ps 21.6; 30.2; 70.1; Rom 5.4; Col 1.23; Heb 10.23).

The teaching of the Scriptures regarding the motive of hope has been summed up and proposed in precise terms by the magisterium of the Church (e.g., see H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1526, 1533, 1576, 1670, 1676, 1693, 1638, 1649, 1689, 1545). The liturgy gathers together the same doctrine and formulates it in numerous ways (see Ramirez, La esencia, 71–84).

For the more abstruse but less practical theological question as to which of the divine attributes is more formally and immediately the motive of hope, the reader is referred to various theological treatises on the subject (see, e.g., S. Harent, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. Vacant [Paris 1903–50] 5.632–644). Suffice it here to say that just as God is that for which we hope, so is He also in His goodness, love, mercy, fidelity, and almighty power, that on which we rely in daring to hope.

Secondary motives of hope. Besides the proper and principal motive, other things may serve as secondary and derivative motives, but only in relation to and dependently on the principal motive. This is as should be expected, for between the object and the motive of hope there is a proportion and exact correlation, as between the end and the agent. Therefore, since the principal terminative object of hope leaves room for secondary objects referring to it and ordered to it, we should expect that in addition to the uncreated source of grace that is the principal motive of hope, there should be secondary motives deriving from it. These are the created graces given by God and received by us, together with their instrumental and moral causes.

First among the secondary or created motives of hope is the habitual grace that deifies the soul, making the Christian a true child of God by adoption (1 Jn 3.1), heir of God and joint heir with Christ (Rom 8.17). Habitual sanctifying grace, whose formal and proper effect is divine affiliation, of itself gives the right to eternal life. One's merits and good works, which are the fruit of grace, constitute another secondary motive for hope. Thus St. Paul reminded the Corinthians that they should be abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that their labor was not in vain (1 Cor 15.58; cf. Heb 10.32–36).

A third such motive is to be found in the created causes of grace, instrumental or ministerial, whether of the physical or moral order. First among these, and in a category apart, is the humanity of Christ. There is no salutary or meritorious act leading to eternal life that does not have this as its source, from the inexhaustible plenitude of which all our grace proceeds (Jn 1.16). Next come the Sacraments, which are instrumental causes of grace, producing their effect ex opere operato in all those who receive them with the proper dispositions.

The moral ministerial causes of grace are of two kinds. One is universal, having a part in the meriting and distribution of all grace. This is the Blessed Virgin Mary, spiritual mother of all and co-redemptress with Christ, who is believed to have merited congruously the graces that Christ merited condignly. Hence she is rightly called omnipotentia supplex, mother of our hope, and even, as in the Salve Regina, our hope. (Ramirez, La esencia, 92–100). Particular moral ministerial causes of grace are the merits and prayers of the angels and the saints in heaven and on earth, for all form one single Mystical Body, which is the Church, and are united one with the other in the Communion of Saints. Inasmuch as the unceasing prayer of a just man is of great avail and Christians are urged to pray for one another that they may be saved (Jas 5.16), such prayer is obviously a legitimate though secondary motive for hope.

Subject of hope. By the subject of hope is understood both the person who hopes (the subject qui) and the person for whom one hopes (the subject cui).

The Subject Who Hopes. The subject qui is necessarily a person in the strict sense, i.e., a rational intellectual substance, which is alone capable of the possession of God, the object of hope, in beatific vision. Irrational creatures are radically incapable of such happiness, and consequently also of its corresponding hope. Moreover, the subject of hope must be a viator, a wayfarer, or one journeying toward eternal life. Just as the obscure and imperfect knowledge of faith disappears at the journey's end when one enters upon the vision of God (1 Cor 12.9–12), so hope gives place to possession. "Hope that is seen is not hope. For how can a man hope for what he sees?" (Rom 8.24). Thus it was defined by Benedict XII that the vision of the divine essence and its enjoyment make void the acts of faith and hope in the blessed (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1001). This definition applies to the act of hope, but it is the commoner opinion of theologians that the habit or virtue does not remain in the blessed, since such a habit would be superfluous, inasmuch as its act would be perpetually and intrinsically impossible. Theological hope does not remain in lost souls, for the object of hope must be seen as a future good possible of attainment. For the souls in purgatory, beatitude is still a future good that will be reached only through hardship and suffering, and hence it remains for them an object of hope.

One who has not yet attained to the vision of God cannot be the subject of hope without possessing Christian faith, for if one does not believe in the God of the Christians, he cannot hope in Him. Therefore St. Paul spoke of the heathens and gentiles as being without God and without hope (Eph 2.12; 1 Thes 4.13). The first step toward God must be by faith (Heb 11.6). Everyone who believes can and should have hope, but faith is possible without hope.

Christ, as man, was simultaneously wayfarer and blessed. But inasmuch as He enjoyed the beatific vision from the beginning, there was clearly no role in Him for either faith or hope understood as theological virtues. Yet Scripture expressly says that He hoped in the Father and trusted in Him (Ps 30.1, 7, 15; Heb 2.13), and theologians commonly teach that in some sense Christ did hope while He was on earth, not with theological hope, for this would have lacked in His case its proper and principal object, i.e., blessedness not actually possessed, but with a hope identifiable with confidence and security and reducible to the virtue of magnanimity (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 129.6–7).

There is no role for hope in the angels or in the souls of the blessed with respect to the resurrection and the renovation of created nature. This they look to with simple desire and a secure and confident expectation.

Subject for Whom One Hopes. Does one hope only for oneself or for other men as well? Is hope a strictly personal expectation, or does it look to a social or communitarian good? This has been the subject of some controversy in the mid-20th century, some theologians making Christian hope primarily communitarian in character, others claiming the authority of St. Augustine, considering it something more purely personal and individual (Ramirez, La esencia, 128–129). However, in Christian tradition hope is, in fact, both personal and social, or communitarian.

It is personal inasmuch as each one hopes to attain his own happiness. He attains it by good works done in charity that are meritorious of eternal life, and these works or actions are properly personal: actiones sunt suppositorum. Moreover, the individual is saved individually. Scripture abounds in texts in which individual hope is mentioned. In the judgment, reward or punishment is meted out to each according to his personal deserts. The Apostle said, in the singular, "I have fought the good fight . . . For the rest there is laid up for me a crown of justice, which the Lord, the just judge, will give me in that day" (2 Tm 4.6–8). According to the universal practice of Christians, each one asks for the salvation of his own soul, as did the good thief on the cross.

However, hope is also social and communitarian. Its terminative object is accessible, its motive available, to all alike. Moreover, its subject also is in a real sense a community, that is, the people of God, or the Mystical Body of Christ, which is the Church. All are one with Christ (Gal 2.28), members of the same body and united one with the other (1 Cor 12.26; Eph 4.16; Col 2.19), children of the same heavenly Father (Mt 22.9; Eph 4.6), brothers of the same firstborn Jesus Christ (Heb 2.11), and heirs of the same glory (Eph 4.4; 1 Pt 1.3–4). From this there spontaneously arises a common interest and a common longing for the good of the whole body and of each one of its members, an ardent desire and a firm hope of the salvation of the whole Christian family. This social character of Christian hope finds strong expression in the “Lord’s Prayer,” the best interpretation of our hope, in which the singular, which could suggest pure self-interest, is avoided and in its place the plural is used, thus invoking God’s blessing on all alike.

Act of hope. There is a principal act of hope, which is one because the virtue and its corresponding object are one, and there are secondary acts that can be varied and multiple.

Principal Act. The proper and specific act of this virtue is to hope to attain eternal life by the help of God’s grace. It is an act elicited from the will (since its object is goodness, indeed the Supreme Good) with respect to the supernatural end. Now the acts of the will with respect to the end are three: simple volition, intention, and fruition. The act of hope cannot be simple volition, because this prescind from the presence or absence of its object, while the object of hope is the Supreme Good not yet possessed. Still less is it an act of fruition, for this supposes the good to be present and really possessed. Hope therefore must be an act of intention, an act intending the attainment of the Supreme Good through the use of the necessary and pertinent means.

It is an act having certain properties or characteristics, some by reason of its relation to the end (beatitude), others by reason of its relation to the means. With regard to the end, hope is the fixation of the intention upon God alone as one’s ultimate goal. But, as was shown above, subjective beatitude, or the possession of God, is included in the total or integral beatitude for which one hopes and pertains connotatively to the primary and principal object of Christian hope. Hope therefore looks to God as possessable, and the love or desire that is characteristic of hope as such is of a concupiscent kind, as distinguished from the benevolent love of friendship. Our possession of God is an accident, an operation in us, a thing, not a person. Still it is a good that is loved or desired for those whom one loves with the love of friendship: God, to whom the greatest glory is given by the salvation of the blessed; oneself, for it is the highest perfection of which one is capable; one’s neighbor, whose greatest good it also is. But while the note of concupiscence or interest characterizes the love of hope, this is not altogether lacking even in the benevolent love that is charity, for in its secondary act charity is concerned with the good things desired for persons loved with the love of friendship. When formal beatitude is hoped for oneself, the divine is not ordered to the human or God to oneself, with perverse or egoistic love, as quietists and semiquietists maintained. On the contrary, the proper order of things to persons, of accidents to substances, and of everything created to the Creator is duly observed.

The other property of the act of hope in relation to integral beatitude is the lifting up of the will (erectio animi) to the level of God Himself. The will marshals its forces and dares to aspire to the achievement of the divine good despite the difficulties that lie in the way.

In relation to its formal motive, the act of hope is characterized by a quality of firmness and certainty that is unshakable and absolute, for nothing can be firmer or more certain than its motive. God has promised to give the needed help; He cannot be unfaithful to His word, and no obstacle can be too great for His omnipotence to overcome.

However, the certainty of inclination or intention that characterizes hope is not the certainty of faith or of knowledge, as some theologians have claimed (see Ramirez, La esencia, 224–253). It does not exclude but rather postulates a holy fear that one may not arrive at the goal of eternal life, not because God may fail to give the necessary help but because one’s will to make use of that help may fail. The association of hope and fear is brought out in many passages of Scripture (e.g., Ps 39.4; Sir 2.9; Rom 11.20–23; 1 Cor 10.12; 1 Pt 5.8; Phil 2.12; Eph 6.10–17; 1 Cor 9.27; cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1533, 1541). Both are necessary: hope without fear degenerates into presumption; fear without hope leads to despair.

In regard to the means, the act of hope is dynamic, energizing the will most efficaciously and putting right order in its relation to the means. Its dynamic potential is caused by the fact that it brings to bear on the whole of one’s life and activity the powerful attractive influence of hope’s end and object. The will, intent on this object, is prepared to move and to exploit all the energies of grace and nature at its command with an active power proportionate to the great attraction of its object. The propulsive force of the habit and act of hope is thus a power of infinite energy, for by hope one is in direct and immediate contact with the fount of all energy, God Himself, so that St. Bernard could truly say that God “makes omnipotent all those who hope in Him (Sermo 83 in Cant. 5; Patrologia Latina 183:1190).

The act of hope also results in a true evaluation of the means, causing them to be seen at their true worth, i.e., as means, not as ends, and to be valued in proportion to the importance of their function as means. No one can serve two masters (Mt 6.24). To one who enters upon the service of God through hope, all else becomes subordinate to that commitment.

Secondary Acts or Effects. Certain secondary acts follow upon the principal act of Christian hope. Since there are in a sense caused by the principal act, it is proper to speak of them simply as effects. Among these, two in particular deserve special mention: joy and patience.

Because the Christian is a child of God, an heir and coheir with Christ, in whom he has been incorporated by Baptism, he possesses a living (or lively) hope (1 Pt 1.3–5), indeed a certain hope of eternal life, guaranteed by God’s own word (Heb 6.16–18). The prospect of seeing God and enjoying Him eternally invites the Christian to rejoice in hope (Rom 12.12). “Rejoice in the Lord always; again I say, rejoice. . . . The Lord is near” (Phil 4.4–5). Jesus Himself had declared that such joy is meet: “Rejoice and exult, because your reward is great in heaven” (Mt 5.12), where “your names are written” (Lk 10.20).

Along with joy Christians find in hope strength to endure patiently every trial. We shall be glorified with Christ if we suffer with Him (Rom 8.17). We shall not enter the kingdom of heaven except through tribulations (Acts 14.21). All who want to live piously in Christ Jesus will suffer persecution (2 Tm 3.12). But all this becomes endurable when compared with the glory that awaits us (2 Cor 4.7). And therefore can it be said: “We exult in tribulations, knowing that tribulation works out endurance, and endurance tried virtue, and tried virtue hope” (Rom 5.3–4).

Habit and virtue of hope. Christian hope is a VIRTUE, i.e., a good operative habit. Together faith, hope, and charity form a compact trilogy that abides throughout the Christian’s life as his breastplate and the principle of his well-doing (1 Cor 13.13; 1 Thes 1.3; 5.8; Heb 10.38; 1 Jn 3.3, 16–18). They constitute a kind of second nature. The magisterium of the Church so understands it: God infuses them with His sanctifying grace, which does not belong to man simply by extrinsic denomination but is something real and inherent in those who receive it, so that they are not only called, but truly are, just (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1530, 1561). The Catechism of the Council of Trent uses another equivalent formula: a divine quality inherent in the soul (2, De sacramento baptismi, 30). Vatican Council I expressly referred to faith as a virtue (ibid. 3008). With regard to hope and charity, Innocent III, the Council of Vienne, Benedict XII, and the practice of the Church in the processes of beatification and canonization take it for granted (ibid. 780, 904, 1001, 2021; cf. 1917 Codex iuris canonici c. 2104). Pius XII in the encyclical Mystici Corporis applied the term “virtue” to faith, hope, and charity [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 35 (1943) 227]. The dogmatic constitution Benedictus Deus of Benedict XII went so far as to determine the classification of these virtues and called them theological virtues (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1001).

That hope is a theological virtue is evident from the fact that its object and motive are God Himself. God is the object sought, and it is on God that one depends immediately for the attainment of what he seeks. It is distinguished from the other two theological virtues by the power that it perfects, by the nature of its act, by its object, and by its motive. Thus it is distinguished from faith, which is of the intellect or mind, whereas hope is a perfection of the will (cf. Pius X, Acerbo nimis; Acta Pii X, 2.72). It is distinguished from both faith and charity by its proper act, which is one of intention or expectation, whereas the act of faith is one of assent; and that of charity, one of dilection. Although all the theological virtues have God for their object, still in the case of each of these virtues it is God considered under a distinct aspect. The object of faith is God under the aspect of Supreme Truth; both hope and charity view Him as the Supreme Good, yet with this difference: that charity looks to this goodness as it is in itself, whereas hope looks to it as something that we can possess. In their formal motive they also differ: faith depends on the truth of God; charity, on His essential goodness; hope, on the readiness of His almighty power to come to our assistance.

Hope and Related or Connected Realities

Since aspects of this subject are dealt with in separate articles (e.g., the sins opposed to hope, PRESUMPTION and despair, and the gift of FEAR that corresponds to hope), attention here can be confined to two matters, namely, hope and the other theological virtues, and the precepts of divine law with regard to hope.

Hope and the other theological virtues. Faith is the first step toward God, the cornerstone on which the whole edifice of the house of God is built (1 Cor 3.9; 1 Tm 1.4; cf. Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 161.5 ad 2). Faith gives to hope the divine plan that is to be followed: it makes known the end and the road that leads to it. Hope, then, necessarily supposes faith and goes a step further in the approach to God. Without faith there could be no hope (Eph 2.12; 1 Thes 4.13), but hope is nevertheless superior to faith (De virt. card. 30). But it is charity, the bond of perfection (Col 3.14), that completes the work and abides forever (1 Cor 13.8). Charity is the most perfect of the three (1 Cor 13.13): faith and hope put us in contact with God as a means of raising ourselves up to Him, but it is charity that unites us to Him.

Hope is essentially an intermediary virtue between faith and charity: faith begins, hope follows, and charity concludes. Like every intermediary, it participates to an extent in both extremes. Hope can exist without charity, for charity is lost by mortal sin (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1544), but not hope. Therefore, sinners can and ought to hope for the pardon of their sins and the salvation of their souls (ibid. 1526, 1678, 1690). But without faith, which is its root and foundation, hope collapses. Faith, on the contrary, can exist without hope (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 20.2).

Precepts concerning hope. The precepts of divine law with regard to hope are primarily and directly concerned with acts of hope and the contrary acts of presumption and despair. These precepts are positive or affirmative if they prescribe acts of hope, negative if they prohibit acts of despair or presumption. What falls under precept is obligatory, and therefore something must be said about the necessity of hope.

Extreme and mitigated Protestant theology tends to deny the necessity of acts of hope for justification and salvation and prefers to regard such acts as sinful inasmuch as they are selfish and appear to ordain eternal happiness and the possession of God to an individual's own advantage, which would indeed be a true perversion of values. Thus the sinner who grieves for his sins because he fears losing happiness or tries to avoid sin in order to escape the punishment of hell is a hypocrite and sins the more for sorrowing for his sins or striving to avoid them for such a reason. The same could be said of the souls in purgatory who seek release from their punishment (propositions 6 and 39 of Luther, condemned by Leo X; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1456, 1488). In this theory there is no middle ground between the perfect love of charity and the sinful love of concupiscence; and therefore, since the love characteristic of hope is not that of charity, hope must be sinful concupiscence and should be avoided by Christians, whether just or sinners, as sinful and as self-defeating.

The quietists and semiquietists denied the necessity of hope for just and perfect Christians, holding it to be essentially imperfect and mercenary and therefore incompatible with a state of perfection. They did not, like the Protestants, contend that hope is evil or sinful but only that it is imperfect, as is servile fear, i.e., something useful and perhaps necessary for slaves and sinners desiring to be freed from their evil state but improper in the just and children of God. The love of God to which more perfect souls attain is so pure that it admits of no mixture of self-interest and is even prepared to sacrifice all for the love of God, including happiness and the possession of God Himself. Such a doctrine was attributed to Meister Eckhart (proposition 10, condemned by John XXII; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 957), and it was taught by Molinos (propositions 7, 12, 13, condemned by Innocent XI; H. Denzinger, ibid. 2207, 2212–14). Fénelon questioned the utility of the acts of hope in the mystical states and taught that one could habitually abstain from such acts as imperfect and selfish (propositions 1, 2, 6, 8, 21, condemned by Innocent XII; ibid. 2351–52, 2356, 2358, 2371).

However, both positions are manifestly contrary to the doctrine of the Scriptures. It cannot be said that God has invited us to sin and to hypocrisy; yet, He has invited us repeatedly to abandon sin for fear of losing eternal life and incurring damnation. John the Baptist preached repentance that was necessary if men would flee the wrath to come (Mt 3.8; Lk 3.8). Jesus warned his hearers that unless they repented, they would perish (Lk 13.3, 5). And He also said: "If thy right eye is an occasion of sin to thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee; for it is better for thee that one of thy members should perish than that thy whole body should be thrown into hell" (Mt 5.29); "Do not be afraid of those who kill the body, but cannot kill the soul. But rather be afraid of him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Mt 10.28). Texts such as these are too well known to need multiplication here.

The Scriptures also teach us to do good in order to attain eternal blessedness. "Do good to the just man and reward will be yours, if not from him, from the Lord" (Sir 12.2). "Everyone in a contest abstains from all things—and they indeed do receive a perishable crown, but we an imperishable" (1 Cor 9.25). "Whatever you do, work at it from the heart as for the Lord and not for men, knowing that from the Lord you will receive the inheritance as your reward" (Col 3.23). "Be steadfast and immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that your labor is not in vain in the Lord" (1 Cor 15.58). "Do not, therefore, lose your confidence, which has a great reward" (Heb 10.35). "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life" (Rv 2.10). "And everyone who has this hope in him makes himself holy, just as he is holy" (1 Jn 3.3).

Still less is it true that the exercise of hope is incompatible with the state of mystical perfection at which saintly souls have arrived. The love of concupiscence that is in hope is not a mercenary love, although it is a love of the reward that God has promised. It does not exclude Him, but on the contrary includes Him and leads to the most intimate love of Him. "Forgetting what is behind, I strain forward to what is before, I press on towards the goal, to the prize of God's heavenly call in Christ Jesus.

Let us then, as many as are perfect, be of this mind” (Phil 3.13–14). Thus did Moses stand firm, “looking to the reward” (Heb 11.26).

In the processes of beatification and canonization an examination is made among other things of whether or not the servants of God exercised theological hope in a heroic degree (1917 Codex iuris canonici c. 2104), which proves that the exercise of this virtue is not only not incompatible with the most perfect sanctity but is demanded by it.

Hope is indeed necessary for justification and salvation. This necessity is to be understood as one of means, if it is a question of habitual hope, or the virtue of hope; for no one is saved if not in the state of grace, and no viator can be in the state of grace without faith, hope, and charity. Actual hope, or the act of hope, is also necessary for the justification of all adult sinners and for the salvation of all those adults who are in the state of grace, for no one is saved in fact without final perseverance, and this is obtained only by a special grace that does not fall under merit. This should be sought by fervent prayer, which prayer will necessarily be an interpretation and manifestation of hope and indeed an act of hope. Moreover, actual hope is necessary by a necessity of precept, for it has been required by God with the greatest insistence (Ps 4.6; 36.3; 61.9; Hos 12.6; 1 Tm 6.17; 1 Thes 5.8). It is, furthermore, a precept inculcated with great frequency in the command to pray. As a positive command, its fulfillment is always obligatory, but not at each moment. It is difficult to indicate the exact times when one is obliged to make such an act. Theologians agree that it obliges at the beginning of the fully conscious moral life and at the end of life and also at different times during the course of life (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 2021). It is necessary on certain specific occasions because of other precepts that cannot be fulfilled without it, such as the precept to pray, to receive the Sacraments, and to resist serious temptation against hope.

There is a negative precept forbidding acts directly opposed to hope, such as acts of despair and presumption. As negative, this precept obliges always and at every moment. It is less explicitly formulated in the Scriptures, its distinct mention being less necessary. The equivalent is contained in the positive precept regarding the act of hope: he who commands one to hope forbids one to despair or to presume.

Bibliography: R. BULTMANN and K. H. RENGSTORF, in G. KITTEL, Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1964—) 2:515–531. J. VAN DER PLOEG, “L’Espérance dans l’A.T.,” Revue biblique 61 (1954) 481–507. W. GROSSOUW, “L’Espérance dans le N.T.,” ibid. 508–532. J. M. BOVER, “La esperanza en la Epístola a los Hebreos,” Gregorianum 19 (1938) 110–120. T. DE ORBISO, “Los motivos de la esperanza cristiana, según San Pablo,” Estudios bíblicos 4 (1945) 61–85, 197–210. F. ORTIZ DE URTARAN, “Esperanza y caridad en el N.T.,” Scriptorium Victorense 1 (1954) 1–50. C. SPICQ, La Révélation de l’espérance dans le N.T. (Paris 1931). L. FEDELE, “La speranza cristiana nelle lettere di San Paolo,” Studi di scienze ecclesiastiche 1 (1960) 19–68. S. PINKAERS, “L’Espérance dans l’A.T. est-elle la même que la nôtre?” Nouvelle revue théologique 77 (1955) 685–799; “Les Origines de la définition de l’Espérance dans les Sentences de Pierre Lombard,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 22 (1955) 306–312; “La Nature vertueuse de l’Espérance,” Revue thomiste 58 (1958) 405–442, 623–644; “Peut-on espérer pour les autres,” Mélanges de science religieuse 16 (1959) 31–46. C. ZIMARA, Das Wesen der Hoffnung in Nature und Übernatur (Paderborn 1933). J. PIEPER, Über die Hoffnung (4th ed. Munich 1949). B. OLIVIER, “Hope,” The Virtues and States of Life, ed. A. M. HENRY (Theology Library 4; Chicago 1957) 63–125. A. M. CARRÉ, Hope Or Despair, tr. R. HAGUE (New York 1955). P. CHARLES, “Spes Christi,” Nouvelle revue théologique 61 (1934) 1008–21; 64 (1937) 1057–75. P. DELHAYE and J. BOULANGE, Espérance et vie chrétienne (Tournai 1958), v. 3 of Rencontre de Dieu et de l’homme. S. HARENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 5.1:605–676. P. LATIN ENTRALGO, La espera y la esperanza (Madrid 1956). G. MARCEL, Homo Viator: Introduction to a Metaphysics of Hope, tr. E. CRAUFURD (Chicago 1951). L. B. GILLON, “Certitude de notre Espérance,” Revue thomiste 45 (1939) 232–248. J. M. RAMIREZ, De certitudine spei christianae (Salamanca 1939); De spei christianae fideique divinae mutua dependentia (Fribourg 1940); La esencia de la esperanza cristiana (Madrid 1960). C. A. BERNARD, Théologie de l’Espérance selon saint Thomas d’Aquin (Paris 1961).

[S. M. RAMIREZ]

HOPE (IN THE BIBLE)

Hope is an analogical term that has many different meanings in the Bible. The Hebrew words most frequently translated into English by hope have the basic meanings to trust (bṭḥ), seek refuge (ḥsh), expect (yhl), and wait for (qwh and sbr). Following the usage of the Greek OT (LXX), the biblical Greek of the NT uses ἐλπίζω in much the same way as the OT, especially in theological contexts, in contrast to the classical Greek usage, which makes hope to be more neutral, i.e., an expectation for the future that may be either good or bad, dependent upon how a man acts at the present time. Biblical hope is much more of a confidence in God, who is uncontrollable by man but who has committed Himself to His COVENANT promises. For the biblical man God is the basis for any future hope, whereas to base one’s expectations on anything less than God, be it human endeavor or magic, leads to frustration. Biblical hope is God-grounded, while the Greek ἐλπίζω stands or falls on the character of men and how they act.

In the Old Testament. Confident reliance on God, eager longing for His fidelity to be manifested, patient bearing of present trials in view of God’s promises of vindication, and taking refuge with God as one’s rock or for-truss to escape one's foes are all attitudes of OT hope. The object of such longing is not the future good, which may or may not be specified, so much as the person upon whom the realization of the future good depends, God who is full of loving covenantal loyalty (hesed, Ex 34.6 and parallels). God is the "Hope of Israel," its "savior in time of need" (Jer 14.8).

A graphic example of such confidence in YAHWEH is found in ch. 18 and 19 of 2 Kings. Hezekiah is classified as a king who above all others "trusted in the Lord" (18.5). He therefore fulfilled Isaiah's advice given to his father to trust not in foreign allies but in God alone who had made a covenant with the House of David (Is 7.10–16), but he had turned away from this advice by relying on Egypt, a reliance that led to the destruction of almost all his southern cities. Now Jerusalem itself was under siege, and, in a mocking speech, he was challenged to renew his trust in God (18.19–25) by an envoy of the king of Assyria, Sennacherib. Hezekiah's confident prayer that follows (19.15–19), Isaiah's oracle of deliverance for the holy remnant of Israel (19.20–34), and the destruction of Sennacherib's army (19.35–36) describe the ideal of Israelite hope in action; God is, indeed, Israel's "savior in time of need."

The quiet waiting for God, preached by Isaiah (Is 30.15) and so many other Prophets, eventually developed into a confident longing for deliverance not merely from present affliction but from all sorrow and pain in a new world (Is 11.6–9 and parallels; 25.9; 51.5–6; Jer 29.11; 31.16–17). There is nothing right in the world upon which one could rely for future happiness; but every faithful servant of Yahweh can cry out with Micah, "But as for me, I will look to the Lord, I will put my trust in God my savior; my God will hear me!" and, "I will arise" (Mi 7.7, 8).

In the New Testament. The patient yearning for the one who is to come to establish the new order continued to motivate the oppressed and poor servants of Yahweh (Zep 2.3; 3.11–20) until they recognized in Jesus "the consolation of Israel" (Lk 2.25), "the redemption of Jerusalem" (2.38), the revelation to the Gentiles and Israel's glory (2.32), and the Lord's gentle servant who was the hope of the Gentiles (Mt 12.21; 8.17). Their hope was for a moment shattered by His death (Lk 24.21), but it was revived in a way they had never dreamed by His Resurrection (24.25–35). Henceforth, the hope of the new Israel rested on Christ's Resurrection from the dead (Acts 23.6; 24.15; 26.6–7; 28.20), through which He had been proclaimed Lord and Christ (Acts 2.29–36), the giver of the promised Holy Spirit (1.4; 2.33, 38–39), and the only one "under heaven given to men by which we must be saved" (4.12). Even more concretely than in the OT, the new Israel's hope was grounded on God's presence in its midst rather than on any expectation based on human striving (Mt 1.23; 28.20). God had proved His fidelity once for all. Now all men must respond by turning to Him and waiting for the return of His Son for the restoration of all things (Acts 3.19–26).

For Paul hope is intertwined with faith and love, not as if they were separate virtues, but as aspects of the activity of Jesus Christ in His faithful, giving them the power to perform arduous good works with constancy and steadfastness (1 Thes 1.3; 1 Cor 13.7, 13). Christian hope, which is Christ Himself (1 Tm 1.1), expects the ultimate glory destined for God's sons and is very much involved in the process of patient endurance that produces tried character and thereby even greater hope. The whole movement is based on the Father's love for mankind revealed in His Son's death and the pouring out of the Holy Spirit (Rom 5.1–9). All creation is concerned with this hope and it will not be confounded because it is embedded in God's and Christ's ardent loyalty (Rom 8.18–39). Revelation, a book that is full of hope without specifically mentioning it, ends with the cry of hope, "Amen! Come, Lord Jesus!" (Rv 22.20).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr and adap. L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1024–27. P. S. MINEAR, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville, Tenn. 1962) 2:640–643. J. DUPLACY, Vocabulaire de Théologie biblique, ed. X. LEON-DUFOR (Paris 1962) 305–310. R. BULTMANN, Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. G. KITTEL (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1964—) 2:517–523, 529–535. C. F. D. MOULE, The Meaning of Hope (Philadelphia, Pa. 1963).

[J. E. FALLON]

HOPE OF SALVATION (IN THE BIBLE)

This article concentrates on the evolution of Israel's yearning for a definitive deliverance from all its woes and the fulfillment of this hope for the new Israel, in the new order, free from sin and death and wrought by the victory of Jesus of Nazareth, the MESSIAH.

IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

Israelite ideas on salvation originated from the experiences of the chosen people during the EXODUS FROM EGYPT, the desert journey of the Israelites, and the constant wars waged against neighboring nations after they gained a foothold in Palestine. The earliest meanings given to words coming from the Hebrew root yš centered on the idea of a military victory over Israel's enemies (Jgs 15.18; 1 Sm 11.13). Yahweh was, ultimately, the one who gave Israel its victories by raising up skilled military chieftains called rescuers or saviors (Jgs 3.9, 15) and by His presence at Israelite battles in the ARK OF THE COVENANT. He became therefore the SAVIOR above all saviors who led the armies of Israel out of the slavery of Egypt into the promised land through, for the Israelites, His greatest work of salvation (Ex 14.30). By the divine ELECTION and the covenant the Israelites were assured that He would remain their deliverer from all foes as long as they continued faithful to His pact and to the demands handed down to them in the Mosaic Law, especially in the Ten Commandments. The basic notion of salvation as a victory over one's enemies perdured in Israelite history down to the day when, after the multiplication of the loaves, the Jewish crowd wanted to seize Jesus and make Him their king (Jn 6.15), but in the meantime it had taken on other meanings that are concerned with the end of history [see ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE); DAY OF THE LORD] and MESSIANISM. The development of determinants of salvation, as it occurs in the course of SALVATION HISTORY, is a complex matter that demands a step-by-step examination, beginning with the pre-exilic Prophets followed by Second Isaiah, the restoration period, and the Psalms.

"The Crucifixion." (©Hulton/Archive Photos)

Preexilic Period. In what could be a somewhat old Israelite tradition, the antimonarchist account of the institution of the kingship (1 Sm ch. 8; 10.17–27; ch. 12), Samuel recalls to assembled Israel the mighty works of Yahweh, who had delivered the Israelites from all past evils (12.7–11), and claims that God, their savior, is now being rejected by their demands for a national king (10.17–19). The Prophets emphasized much the same message during the crisis of the last half of the eighth century, leading to the downfall of the Northern Kingdom, Samaria, and to the desolation and vassalage of Judah. Israel and Judah had defected from their only true King, Yahweh, refusing to put their hope for deliverance in Him alone (Is 2.6–22; 7.17–25; 8.5–8; 17.10; 30.15, cf. 7.9). In Isaiah's intention, the salvation that Israel rejected was more than merely deliverance from enemy empires; it was a holiness and justice coming from the Holy One of Israel Himself, a participation in His grandeur and an intimate knowledge of Him (Is 2.1–5; 4.2–3; 9.1–6; 11.1–9). The poem of Is 12.1–3 expresses beautifully this longing for a salvation that surpasses deliverance from political oppression. The Prophet Micah expressed a similar hope in Yahweh's salvation despite the universal rebellion against God that he saw all around him (Mi 7.1–7).

Among the Prophets of the eighth century, what the ordinary people longed for as a day of deliverance through Yahweh's power became a day of wrath, of dire punishment for the chosen people's defection from God (Am 5.18–20; Is 2.6–21; Mi 3.9–12; Hos 13.12–14.1).

Salvation would be granted only a few escapees, the remnant of Israel (Is 4.2–3; Am 3.12; 5.15; 9.8b–10). About a century later, the dreadful day of the Lord (Zep 1.14–18) is identified as a time when perhaps only the humble who observed God's commands would be sheltered from His anger; the hoped-for deliverance is no longer a rescue from oppressors, but from God Himself (2.3). This humble remnant, in contrast to the haughty rebels, "shall take refuge in the name of the Lord" and "shall do no wrong" but shall have a peaceful dwelling on the Lord's mountain (3.11–13). In this context, Yahweh is described as the mighty savior who will renew Zion "in his love" (3.14–18a), and, even if the following verses (18b–20) come from the period of the Exile, they are in the same tradition: Yahweh will "save the lame and assemble the outcasts" and "bring about their restoration." Jeremiah, with all his dire warnings, was in the same tradition. The salvation of Israel can come only from the Lord God (Jer 3.23); He alone is the champion who can save them (14.8–9). The deliverance for which Jeremiah hopes is not merely from the various tribulations afflicting the land; it is that of a new era when the people will be led by a new David whose symbolic name will be "The Lord our justice" (23.5–6). In fact, this deliverance will be a new covenant in which Yahweh's law will be written on the remnant's heart and their sins will be forgiven (31.31–34). The psalm of Habakkuk (ch. 3) recalls the tradition that God is a warrior-savior who, with all His cosmic power, will rescue His people from their foes; it adds very little to the evolution of the previous ideas about salvation, but it became an important antecedent and model for the apocalyptic traditions (see DANIEL, BOOK OF) and was popular in the QUMRAN COMMUNITY. Ezekiel does add something, however, to the idea of salvation, the regeneration of Israel by their deliverance from their sins of apostasy and from their impurities (Ez 37.23; 36.29).

Second Isaian (ch. 40–55; ch. 60–62). The themes of salvation, restoration, and creation are linked together in this masterpiece of consolation literature was intended to encourage the exiles who had returned to Yahweh during their banishment from the holy land. The JUSTICE OF GOD, His justification or vindication of His people, brings about their restoration and salvation (45.21). He is their only savior, and His acts of salvation establish the fact that He is the only God (43.3, 8–13). His present act of salvation is a more glorious deliverance than even that of the Exodus; it extends to wiping away and forgetting Israel's sins (43.16–28). It is a new creation (41.19–20). It is a gratuitous salvation, not merited in any way (55.1–3), a free and merciful act of God at the sight of which "all the trees of the countryside shall clap their hands." It has as its goal Yahweh's dominion (52.7), which will be over all the earth and not over Israel alone (45.22; 49.6). It is a glorious freedom for lowly prisoners who in their gleaming mantles will be “oaks of justice” reflecting the glory of Yahweh (61.1–3). God has clothed his faithful one “with a robe of salvation” and wrapped him “in a mantle of justice” (61.10). That the poetic raptures of Second Isaiah instilled hope for a deliverance from evil that exceeded the realities of the return from the Exile is obvious from the disenchantment of the refugees during the restoration period.

Restoration Period. Zechariah attempted to bolster the hopes of the few thousand who returned to Jerusalem in ruins (Zec 8.7–13). The Isaiah school also kept proclaiming that the Judeans’ disappointment would soon be ended by a revelation of God’s salvation and justice (Is 56.1); and if it was delayed (59.1), it was because of the people’s sins (59.2–15a). Yet a redeemer would come for those who repented (59.15b–20). In fact, because of the poverty and frustration of this period, the Isaiah school began to envision salvation beyond the confines of this life, when those who lie in the dust would awake and sing (Is 25.6–9; 26.17–19).

The Psalms. As one would expect, the prayers of Israel gave poignant expression to their longing for salvation. In them, the ideas abound of military victory, reconstitution of the nation centered on a new Jerusalem, and violent vengeance against all their foes [Ps 75(76).8–11; Ps 117(118); 131(132).14–18]. Salvation became more personal [Ps 7; 53(54).3–5] and included freedom from illness (6.5) and any kind of distress [68(69).2–5]. This personal deliverance evoked a desire for rescue from personal sins and for a more holy way of life [49(50).22–23; 50(51).3–14]. The spiritual descendants of Jeremiah and Zephaniah developed the longing for salvation on behalf of the just, pious men whose only hope was in Yahweh and whose earthly existence was miserable. Their delight was in the Lord, and salvation could come only by being near to Him [Ps 15(16).7–11; 17(18).21–31; 24(25).4–7; 144(145).17–20].

IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Rescue from evil through God’s intervention into man’s existence and human, experienced consciousness is proclaimed in the New Testament through the unthought-of newness of the mystery of Jesus from Nazareth, the Messiah and the completely dominating Lord of the process of salvation that is still being accomplished. What Jesus said and did and how He died and was raised from the dead form the inner reality of this mystery; and His chosen pupils’ elaboration and their understanding of it under the guidance of the Holy Spirit of God, His Spirit, leads the men who wish to listen to them into the fullness of truth (Jn 16.13).

In the Life and Teaching of Jesus. The kingdom that Jesus proclaimed to be at hand is God’s manifested conquest of all evil, i.e., disease, enmity, cosmic chaos, sin, and death through the salvific death and Resurrection of the SON OF MAN. He is the one who “took up our infirmities, and bore the burden of our ills” (Mt 8.17). This Palestinian peasant’s power to cure the sick, to transcend such an adamant force as humanly devised social hatred and bring salvation to the hated dogs, the Gentiles (Mt 8.5–13; Mk 7.24–30; Lk 10.25–37), to command the sea to be calm (Mt 8.23–27), to conquer the power of evil spirits (8.28–34), to forgive sins while curing paralysis (9.1–8), and to raise men from the dead (9.18–26; Lk 7.11–17) resulted from His complete submission to the Father’s will that the Son should die on behalf of all mankind so that man’s sin could be taken away and he could enter into everlasting life, free from all evil (Jn 1.29; Mk 8.31–33; 9.29–31; 10.32–34, 42–45; 14.34–36). Jesus was completely innocent of any rebellion against God; yet He identified Himself by His baptism with the sinfulness of all mankind. He lined up with John the Baptist’s repentant sinners, who were preparing themselves for the ultimate coming of God’s kingdom by symbolically taking a bath as they confessed sorrow for their sins in view of the coming kingdom. Jesus came up out of the water, having fulfilled all justice; the heavens were opened; the Spirit came upon Him; and He was proclaimed by God to be His beloved Son, His unique Son, in whom He was pleased (Mt 3.1–17). This is the salvation preached and lived by Jesus the Messiah—God’s pleasure with the new humanity created by Jesus’ willed solidarity with man’s sin, prefigured by His baptism and effected by His laying down His life for His sheep (Jn 10.11). The justice of God was thereby satisfied through His own gracious plan, and man was saved from the realm of sin, death, and the prince of this world (Jn 12.31–32). Jesus had lived up to His name; He had saved His people from sin (Mt 1.21).

In the Apostolic Preaching. The most difficult thing for the Disciples of Christ, so steeped in the Jewish tradition of a victorious Messiah-Savior, to understand was the death of Jesus on the cross. Yet this death was at the exact center of God’s idea of salvation in contrast with the traditional Old Testament view. So it was that, after His Resurrection, Jesus had to teach them that the Messiah had to suffer before entering into His glory (Lk 24.25–27, 44–49). The doctrine of the cross, i.e., the mystery of the Messiah’s death, revealed once for all God’s power in saving men not from an external oppressor, but from themselves, from the slavery to sin within them (1 Cor 1.18). Salvation came from believing in the favor that Jesus won for man by His cross (Acts 2.37–41; 11.14; 15.1, 11). Jesus’ own deliverance from death through the Resurrection the Father gave Him was merited by His submission and thus became the cause of eternal salvation for all who obey Him (Heb 5.7–10). The exaltation of Jesus proclaimed Him to be the all-powerful Lord of the universe (Phil 2.5–11) in whom everyone who wants to be saved must believe (Acts 16.17, 30–31; Rom 10.9–13). Because of the grace of justification that Christians already enjoyed, they were living a new life in Christ for God (Rom 6.1–11), but they still waited for the ultimate revelation of the glory of God’s sons at the Lord’s PAROUSIA (Rom 8.18–39). Then they would enjoy the salvation of living forever with Jesus in the kingdom of His Father (1 Thes 5.9–11; 1 Corinthians ch. 15). Every Christian was assured that he would be delivered from every evil and preserved for God’s heavenly kingdom (2 Tm 4.18) because, once justified by Christ’s death, he would be saved by the life that Christ lives now with His Father (Rom 5.9–10; Col 3.1–4). Indeed, “God our Savior . . . wishes all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, himself man, Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, bearing witness in his own time” (1 Tm 2.4–6; Ti 3.3–7).

See Also: REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE); REBIRTH (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 2101–07. A. RICHARDSON, The Interpreters’ Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville 1962) 4:168–181. C. LESQUIVIT and P. GRELOT, Vocabulaire de théologie biblique, ed. X. LÉON-DUFOUR (Paris 1962) 987–994. F. BAMMEL et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:584–590.

[J. E. FALLON]

HOPKINS, GERARD MANLEY

English poet; b. Stratford, Essex, July 28, 1844; d. Dublin, Ireland, June 8, 1889. Hopkins was the eldest of nine children in a comfortable family devoted to the Church of England. His father, Manley, headed a maritime-insurance firm and published two books of poetry and five of prose; his mother, Kate Smith, was a sensitive and accomplished Victorian woman. Both encouraged their children to develop their talents in drawing, painting, music, and writing.

Growing up in London’s Hampstead, Hopkins entered the nearby Highgate School (also known as Sir Roger Cholmeley’s School) in 1854, where he later boarded. Two early poems show talent: his prizewinning “The Escorial” (1860) manifests a painterly eye, vivid detail, and precise diction; “A Vision of the Mermaids” (1862) reflects the sensuous intensity of Keats.

In April 1863, Hopkins went up to Balliol College, Oxford, where he remained until June 1867, studying

Gerard Manley Hopkins.

Greek and Latin under Benjamin Jowett and Walter Pater, enjoying the stimulation of undergraduate life, and winning the highest honors. Skilled in drawing, he read John Ruskin and thought of becoming an artist. During summers he sketched, read, and traveled. At Oxford he developed a love of the Eucharist that enriched his whole life, and in the disputes between liberals and High-Church Anglicans he supported the Church party, following E. B. Pusey and H. P. Liddon and embracing a spirituality that blended High-Church ritual and evangelical morality. His poems reflect his religious struggle (“Non-dum”), his guilt (“Myself unholy”), his devotion to the Eucharist (“Barnfloor and Winepress”), and his distrust of the senses and the world (“Heaven-Haven,” “The Habit of Perfection”). His dry humor appears in light poems and epigrams, and his “St. Dorothea (Lines for a picture)” (1868) foreshadows his distinctive “sprung rhythm.” At Oxford he met Robert Bridges, later a physician and poet laureate, who became his dearest friend and lifetime correspondent.

Conversion and Vocation. Hopkins’s religious quest brought him to the Roman Catholic Church, into which he was received on Oct. 21, 1866 by John Henry Newman, from whom he had sought advice. In 1868, while teaching at Newman’s Oratory School, Birmingham, he decided to become a priest in the Society of Jesus. He burned his poems before entering the Jesuits, but few if any were lost since his friends had copies. He entered the Jesuit novitiate at Roehampton, London, on Sept. 7, 1868, and took perpetual vows on Sept. 8, 1870. Studying philosophy at St. Mary's Hall near Stonyhurst College in rural Lancashire, he learned traditional Suarezian Thomism, but was more excited by his first reading of Duns Scotus whose concept of haecceitas ("thisness") supported his already strong views on individuality and the self. In August 1873 he returned to Roehampton to teach literature to young Jesuits. A year later he began the study of theology at St. Beuno's College in North Wales, a beautiful land he loved and celebrated as "wild Wales."

The St. Beuno's Poems. As a Jesuit, Hopkins had written only a few poems in English and Latin: some Marian verses, an occasional presentation piece, the comic "'Consule Jones.'" Then in December 1875, moved by the drowning of five nuns in a shipwreck in the Thames estuary, he began "The Wreck of the Deutschland" at the suggestion of his rector. His first great poem, it is recognized as one of the finest odes in English. Complex in thought and brilliant in imagery and metaphor, "The Wreck" (1875–76) is a grand meditation on God and the world, on suffering and redemption, and on God's dealings with Hopkins, with the shipwreck victims, and with England itself. In "Part the First," the poet recalls a past religious struggle (his conversion or his decision to enter the Jesuits) with autobiographical accuracy and vivid imagery. "Part the Second" narrates the shipwreck, imagines one nun's vision of Christ, reflects on the nuns' deaths, begs for the redemption of Hopkin's "rare-dear Britain," and praises Christ as "hero of us, high-priest, / Oür héart's charity's héarth's fire, oür thóughts' chivalry's thróng's Lórd."

Popular among his fellow Jesuits, Hopkins was considered a good moralist. In 1877 he wrote eleven sonnets which reflect his love of nature and God, his moral concerns, and his Jesuit spirituality. In "God's Grandeur," the divine presence shines through nature with "the dearest freshness" even though humans disobey God and damage nature through industry and trade. In "The Starlight Night," the sky's "bright boroughs," "circle-citadels," and "elves' eyes" are like the chinks of a barn-wall which offer glimpses of bright light within "Christ and his mother and all his hallows." "As kingfishers catch fire" expresses both Hopkins's Jesuit spirituality and his Scotism: God is found in all things, "each mortal thing" proclaims its self, and "the just man justices" because (more than any actor can) "Christ plays in ten thousand places / . . . / To the Father through the features of men's faces." Two poems mark springtime and summer's end ("Spring," "Hurrahing in Harvest"), and "The Windhover" celebrates a falcon's flight as grandly masterful when smooth yet even lovelier when triumphing over strong opposing winds; many commentators, citing the poem's subtitle "to Christ Our Lord" (added seven years later), find the falcon a symbol of Christ. Popular and original is "Pied Beauty" which glorifies God for creation's quirky individualities; it also initiates Hopkin's experiments with the sonnet form as he changes the traditional structure (the eight to six ratio of octave and sestet) into a "curtal" (curtailed) sonnet three-fourths the normal length (a 6 to 4 2/5 ratio). Hopkins's sonnets are normally in the Italian form, more difficult than the Shakespearean form because its octave's rhyme-scheme (abbaabba) twice demands four rhymes, a feat more difficult in English than in Italian with its similar word-endings.

Poems of the Middle Years. Hopkins remained at St. Beuno's for three years, until after his priestly ordination on Sept. 23, 1877. He had expected a fourth year of theology, but his third-year examination grade, though sufficient to pass, did not merit a fourth year (a Jesuit friend wrote that he gave Scotist answers instead of the Suarezian Thomism he was taught). From 1877 to 1881 he worked in Jesuit schools and parishes in England and Scotland, enduring (like other British Jesuits) frequent changes of place: teacher at Mount St. Mary's College, Chesterfield, (1877–78) and Stonyhurst College (1878); then parish curate at the Immaculate Conception (Farm Street), London (1878); St. Aloysius's, Oxford (1878–79); St. Joseph's, Bedford Leigh (1879); St. Francis Xavier's, Liverpool (1879–81); and St. Aloysius's, Glasgow (1881). No lover of cities, Hopkins was pained by the Liverpool and Glasgow slums, yet wrote fine poems during this period. From Mount St. Mary's came "The Loss of the Eurydice," a second long shipwreck poem which recalls and prays for 300 young sailors drowned off the Isle of Wight. At Oxford he wrote "Duns Scotus's Oxford," which celebrates the philosopher and the city he most loved; "Binsey Poplars," which mourns the destruction of the nearby countryside; "Henry Purcell," which honors his favorite composer; and (with original rhythm and rhyme) "The Bugler's First Communion," which asks God to preserve a young soldier's "breathing bloom of a chastity in mansex fine." His Liverpool months brought "Felix Randal," which reflects on the death of a blacksmith under Hopkins's pastoral care, and the delicate "Spring and Fall" (perhaps his most approachable poem), which ponders the common mortality of nature and of a young girl. On a day's trip from Glasgow, the beauty and sound of a waterfall at "Inversnaid" evoked the cry, "O let them be left, wildness and wet; / Long live the weeds and the wilderness yet." Hopkins, also a master of prose, wrote fine sermons during these years and began two important exchanges of letters: in 1878, a ten-year correspondence with Richard Watson Dixon, an Anglican vicar and poet, with whom he discussed poetry and religion, and in 1883, a five-year correspondence with the Catholic poet Coventry Patmore.

Hopkins spent 1881–82 at Roehampton for a peaceful (though apparently poemless) “tertianship,” a final year of spiritual training during which he did a second 30-day retreat, delved into Jesuit history and spirituality, and began an unfinished commentary on the Spiritual Exercises. Sent afterwards to teach university-level students at Stonyhurst College, he was not heavily burdened, yet found his work tiring, suffered from melancholy, and worried that “there is no likelihood of my ever doing anything to last”—attitudes reflected in his sonnet “Ribblesdale.” The Stonyhurst years also brought forth the musical “The Leaden Echo and the Golden Echo” and the lyrical “The Blessed Virgin compared to the Air we Breathe.”

The Dublin Poems. Moving to Dublin in 1884 to teach Greek at the ailing Catholic University recently entrusted to the Jesuits, Hopkins found good friends, both Jesuit and lay, yet suffered from “nervous weakness,” “fits of sadness,” and “the melancholy I have all my life been subject to.” He was troubled by headaches, aching eyes, separation from family and friends, Irish rancor against Britain, exhaustion from examination grading, and a sense that God was absent from him. A number of marvelous, searing sonnets of 1885(–86?) express his anguish, especially “To seem the stranger,” “I wake and feel,” “No worst,” and “(Carrion Comfort).” Cries of deep pain (“I am gall, I am heartburn. God’s most deep decree / Bitter would have me taste: my taste was me”), they are written in perfect sonnet form. Peace begins to return in “Patience, hard thing!” and “My own heart.” Hopkins’ poetic experiments continue in several “caudal” sonnets (sonnets with tails), especially the difficult “Harry Ploughman” and “Tom’s Garland” (1887) and the exultant “That Nature is a Heraclitean Fire and of the comfort of the Resurrection” (1888), the latter a “sonnet” of 24 lines with its jubilant close, “In a flash, at a trumpet crash, / I am all at once what Christ is, since he was what I am, and / This Jack, joke, poor potsherd, patch, matchwood, immortal diamond, / Is immortal diamond.”

Hopkins’s last four poems (1888–89) return to traditional sonnet form and greater simplicity of language. “In honour of St. Alphonsus Rodriguez” recalls the poet’s own suffering and “war within,” while “The shepherd’s brow” is an ironic self-portrait. With subtler irony, “Thou are indeed just, Lord” and “To R.B.”

(Robert Bridges) are eloquent, perfect sonnets about Hopkins’s inability to write sonnets: “Send my roots rain,” “I want the one rapture of an inspiration.” On June 8, 1889, six weeks before his 45th birthday, Gerard M. Hopkins, S.J., (as he signed himself) died, a victim of typhoid fever. He is buried in the Jesuit plot at Glasnevin Cemetery, Dublin.

Inscape, Instress, Sprung Rhythm. To express insights into poetry and reality, Hopkins developed three concepts now associated with his name. “Inscape,” formed to imitate the word “landscape” and first used in 1868, means both the individual essence or uniqueness of a thing and its distinctive shape. “Instress” is the inner force which sustains a thing and its inner drive to express itself or be understood. “Sprung rhythm,” first significantly used in “The Wreck of the Deutschland,” “consists in scanning by accents or stresses alone, without any account of the number of syllables.” A line leaps or “springs” from stress to stress, downplaying the intervening unstressed syllables which may be several or none. Sprung rhythm stands in contrast to the smooth-flowing “running rhythm” of the ten-syllable iambic-pentameter line or of any line which counts syllables and alternates stressed and unstressed syllables. Instead, sprung rhythm “feels” the timing, as in music, and fits in unstressed syllables (or even silences, like rests in music) according to the poet’s ear or the subject of the line. The five-stress line “áll félléd, félléd, are áll félléd” (“Binsey Poplars”) catches in six syllables the harsh strokes of an axe felling aspens. Hopkins recognized that earlier poets had used such rhythm he cited Milton among others but held that none before him had used it as a structural principle throughout a poem. (The best treatment of sprung rhythm is in Stephenson, What Sprung Rhythm Really Is.)

Stature. A poet of nature, religion, and the self, Hopkins had an imagination that was inventive and leaping, reveling in physical images, rich sounds, and startling, self-crafted words. His poems were written to be “performed” rather than read. Yet Hopkins, conflicted about personal fame, published few poems during his lifetime. The first collection of his work, Poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins, did not appear until 1918, edited by his Oxford friend Robert Bridges (then poet laureate), to whom Hopkins had sent copies of most poems. An expanded second edition (also by Bridges) appeared in 1930 with an introduction by Charles Williams, and was praised by that era’s New Critics for its textual richness and complexity. Hopkins’s reputation grew gradually, but because of his limited experience and small output he was long deemed a minor Victorian poet inferior to Matthew Arnold, Robert Browning, and Alfred, Lord Tennyson. With Arnold’s and Tennyson’s reputations declining, Hopkins and Browning are recognized as the finest poets of Victorian England. In 1961, lines from "The Wreck of the Deutschland" were carved on a large wall at the United Nations' Palais des Nations in Geneva (the Lord Cecil Memorial), and on Dec. 8, 1975, a hundred years after the Deutschland's wreck, a memorial stone was dedicated to Hopkins in the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey. The 1989 centennial of his death brought celebrations throughout the world in books, journals, scholarly and popular essays, conferences, one-man plays, and exhibitions. Two journals are devoted to his work, The Hopkins Quarterly (Philadelphia) and Hopkins Research (Tokyo).

Bibliography: The Poetical Works of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. N. H. MACKENZIE (Oxford 1990). The Oxford Authors: Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. C. PHILLIPS (Oxford 1986). The Letters of Gerard Manley Hopkins to Robert Bridges, ed. C. C. ABBOTT (London 1955). The Correspondence of Gerard Manley Hopkins and Richard Watson Dixon, ed. C. C. ABBOTT (London 1955). Further Letters of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. C. C. ABBOTT (2d ed. London 1956). The Journals and Papers of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. H. HOUSE (London 1959). The Sermons and Devotional Writings of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. C. DEVLIN, S.J. (London 1959). P. L. MARIANI, A Commentary on the Complete Poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins (Ithaca NY 1970). N. H. MACKENZIE, A Reader's Guide to Gerard Manley Hopkins (Ithaca NY 1981). E. STEPHENSON, What Sprung Rhythm Really Is (Alma ON 1987). T. DUNNE, Gerard Manley Hopkins: A Comprehensive Bibliography (Oxford 1976). N. WHITE, Hopkins: A Literary Biography (Oxford 1992).

[J. J. FEENEY]

HOREB, MOUNT

The "mountain of God" where Moses received the Law. It was called Horeb by the Elohist and the Deuteronomist, whereas the Yahwist and the Priestly Writers call it SINAI. Horeb (Heb. ḥōrēb, "dryness, desolation") is mentioned in Ex 3.1; 17.6; 33.6; Dt 1.2, 6, 19; 4.10, 15; 5.2; 9.8; 18.16; 29.1; 1 Kgs 8.9; 19.8; 2 Chr 5.10; Ps 105(106).19; Mal 3.22. Elsewhere the mountain is called Sinai. As early as St. Jerome (De situ et nom. Hebr.) Horeb was considered another name for Sinai. According to some scholars, Horeb was the name of the whole mountain range of which Sinai was one of the peaks. The term Horeb may have been substituted for the term Sinai because of the worship of the god Sin.

Bibliography: G. HÖLSCHER, "Sinai und Choreb," Festschrift Rudolf Bultmann (Stuttgart 1949) 127–132. M. NOTH, Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch (Stuttgart 1948) 150–155.

[C. MCGOUGH]

HORGAN, THADDEUS DANIEL

Franciscan, ecumenist, administrator, author; b. Jersey City, NJ, March 16, 1936; d. Waterbury, CT, April 19, 1990. Thaddeus Daniel Horgan entered the Atonement Friars of Graymoor in 1956 and was ordained a priest in 1963. After receiving the S.T.L. degree from the Catholic University of America in 1965, he pursued further studies at Columbia University and the Gregorian University. A prolific writer, he wrote and edited seven books and more than 150 articles and pamphlets on Catholic teachings, ecumenism, and Franciscan spirituality.

An energetic ecumenist, in 1968 Horgan established the Centro Pro Unione in Rome, an ecumenical library and conference center. He was director of this center until 1973, when he was elected to the general council of the Atonement Friars and had oversight responsibility for its ecumenical ministries. Horgan served in various capacities at the Graymoor Ecumenical Institute, where he participated in national and international ecumenical initiatives. He also filled editorial positions for Ecumenical Trends, a monthly ecumenical journal. Dedicated to both scholarly and grassroots ecumenism, he served in numerous organizations, including the Faith and Order Commission of the National Council of Churches of Christ, USA, and the North American Academy of Ecumenists. From 1988 until his death, he was associate director of the Bishops' Committee for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. This position brought him into direct involvement with the ecumenical bilateral dialogues in the United States.

In addition to his ecumenical work, Horgan was noted for his activity among Third Order Regular Franciscans. A member of the International Franciscan Commission from 1979 to 1982, he was an instrumental collaborator for the revised Rule of the Third Order Regular of Saint Francis that received papal approval in 1982. His pastoral ministry also included a three-year tenure as pastor in Jamaica, West Indies, from 1982 to 1985 at a covenanted Anglican/Roman Catholic parish where he combined daily parochial leadership and ecumenical life.

Bibliography: T. D. HORGAN, ed., Walking Together: Roman Catholics and Ecumenism 25 Years After Vatican II (Grand Rapids 1990).

[P. COGAN]

HORMISDAS, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: July 20, 514 to Aug. 6, 523. Pope Symmachus was succeeded by Hormisdas, archdeacon of the Roman Church, whose name points to a Persian or Eastern origin, possibly on the maternal side. The new pope's father was Justus; Hormisdas's son Silverius later became pope. Under Hormisdas hopes were raised for a settlement of the ACACIAN SCHISM. In a conciliatory gesture, Hormisdas received the remaining followers of Laurentius into communion. After consulting Theodoric, Arian Gothic king of Italy, Hormisdas dispatched an embassy consisting of Bp. ENNODIUS of Pavia and Bp. Fortunatus of Catina to Constantinople with precise instructions on how to act in reply to Emperor ANASTASIUS I's request for a council. The schism with the East was ultimately settled, four years later, in almost exact conformity with the terms laid down by Hormisdas in 515, and it was insisted that the council was to clearly recognize CHALCEDON and the Tome of Leo as the standard of orthodoxy; that the emperor's letter requesting the bishops' signatures must state this unequivocally; that the bishops must make a formal profession of orthodoxy in their churches and must condemn the Monophysite leaders by name; that, in the presence of witnesses, they must sign a formula or libellus containing a statement of the true faith drawn up by the papal notaries; and that the cases of exiled bishops must be examined afresh by the apostolic see, while those of bishops who were accused of persecuting the orthodox were to be reserved to the pope.

Hormisdas promised to come to Constantinople if his presence were needed but Emperor Anastasius I had overcome the immediate danger to his throne and began to temporize on the question of holding a council. He tried to stir up the Roman senate against Pope Hormisdas. New legates were sent to Constantinople, but they were dismissed after an attempt had been made to corrupt them. At this juncture, the emperor died and was succeeded by the Chalcedonian Prefect of the Praetorian Guard, a former peasant, JUSTIN I.

Aided by his nephew and mentor JUSTINIAN I, the new emperor at once took steps aimed at restoring Chalcedonian orthodoxy in the empire and invited the pope to send legates to end the schism. Hormisdas complied, designating two bishops, a priest, a deacon, a notary, and the skillful deacon DIOSCORUS (later pope) to represent him. The papal emissaries arrived at Constantinople on March 25, 519; they were greeted outside the city walls by Count Justinian and escorted with great pomp into the presence of the emperor, who received them surrounded by the senate and the four patriarchs of the East.

Since the legates had come only to receive signatures, they refused to enter into discussions. Three days later, Patriarch John II of Constantinople and all the bishops present in the capital, as well as the heads of monasteries, signed the papal statement of faith, and the names of Acacius, ZENO, and Anastasius I were stricken from the diptychs. The pope had not requested condemnation of the emperors, but Justin and Justinian decided to demean the reputations of their predecessors to strengthen their own positions. The legates remained in the East for a year and a half, collecting signatures and supervising the restoration of communion. Only in a few instances did they meet with effective resistance from churches that objected to the stringency of the demand regarding the removal of names from the diptychs. Justin and Justinian both appealed to the pope for a more lenient attitude, and Hormisdas agreed to allow the patriarch of Constantinople "to put on our person" and decide each case on its merits, informing the apostolic see of the results. But there were also setbacks. The emperor refused to agree to sending Eastern bishops to Rome for trial; he also denied Hormisdas' wish that Dioscorus be appointed Bishop of Alexandria.

The statement signed by the Eastern bishops is commonly known as the formula of Hormisdas and undoubtedly represents a great triumph for the Roman see, or rather, for the orthodoxy for which it so firmly stood. It is unquestionably the most pro-Roman, propapal statement ever signed by the Byzantine bishops. Some of them, doubtless, signed against their better judgment. The recognition of Roman claims implicit in some of the language, particularly the apparent identification of what is orthodox with what the Roman see has defined, and the equating of communion with that see with the Catholic Church, was probably going further than many would have preferred. However, when viewed in context, it is evident that the pro-Roman phraseology used was compatible with looser Byzantine notions about the hierarchy and the papal primacy, and there is danger in attempting to read too much into it as an acknowledgment of Roman claims. It must also be recognized that this triumph resulted almost completely from the desire of the emperor and his nephew to settle the schism not only because they were Chalcedonians but also because they considered that step to be a prerequisite to their intended extension of Byzantine power into Italy.

The text of the formula is extant in seven ancient versions that differ slightly one from another. The version that Pope Hormisdas sent to the bishops of Spain in 517 is probably the most authentic. The preface that Patriarch John II insisted on appending to the version he signed was designed to safeguard the rights of his see as defined by previous councils. Its acceptance by Rome implied at least tacit recognition of the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE I (381) as ecumenical, which Rome had hitherto always refused. It was not the intention of this preface to water down the language of the formula itself.

Before leaving Constantinople the papal legates were approached by the theopaschite monks from Little Scythia, so called because they endeavored to reconcile the Monophysites by winning general acceptance for the formula: "One of the Trinity suffered in the flesh." Undaunted by the refusal of the legates to approve the phrase since it had Monophysite associations, the monks came to Rome and besieged the pope with entreaties until he finally had them expelled from the city. To Emperor Justin, who had meanwhile taken up the phrase in the hopes of being able to reconcile the Severan Monophysites to Chalcedon, the pope wrote that the Council of Chalcedon and the Tome of Pope Leo were sufficient; he would neither approve nor disapprove the new formula, but he warned against its possible misinterpretation.

The death of King Thrasamund (523) brought an end to the persecution of the Church in the Vandal kingdom of North Africa, and the pope re-established contact with the African hierarchy. He also requested Dionysius Exiguus, a Scythian monk resident in Rome, to prepare a Latin translation of the canons of the Eastern churches. Pope Hormisdas was buried in the portico of St. Peter's. Over 100 of his letters are extant; most of them are preserved by the Collectio Avellana (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiarum latinorum 35).

Feast: Aug. 6.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (2d. ed. Streenbrugge 1961) 1683–1684. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ (Paris 1878–90) 63:367–534. A. THIEL, ed., Epistolae romanorum pontificum, v.1 (Braunsberg 1868) 741–990. R. HAACKE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:483–484. F. DVORNIK, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium and the Legend of the Apostle Andrew (Cambridge, Mass. 1958). R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei papi (Paris 1957) 105–106. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 1:545. W. H. C. FREND, Rise of the Monophysite Movement (Cambridge 1972) 227–229. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:435–437; 622–625. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 52–54. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 100–109. S. RANALLI, "L'epistolario di Papa Ormisda, nel quadro della letteratura latina cristiana del VI secolo," Studi e Materiali di Storia delle Religioni 19:19–54. S. RANALLI, L'opera del pontifice Ormisda nel panorama del monachesimo occidentale del VI secolo," Rivista Cistercense 12:3–20.

[J. CHAPIN]

HORNER, NICHOLAS, BL.

Lay martyr; b. at Grantley, Yorkshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at Smithfield, London, d. March 4, 1590. Arrested in London on the charge of assisting Catholic priests, he was released after contracting blood poisoning that required the amputation of his leg. Charged a second time with assisting Bl. Christopher BALES, a seminary priest, he refused to conform religiously in exchange for his life. On the eve of his execution, according to a letter from Horner's friend to St. Robert SOUTHWELL (dated March 18, 1590), he had a vision of a crown of glory hanging over his head, which filled him with courage to face the impending ordeal. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924), I, 166, 169, 218. J. MORRIS, ed., The Troubles of Our Catholic Forefathers Related by Themselves (London 1872–77), v. 3. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HOROSCOPES

Originally the Greek word horoskopos denoted the point of the ecliptic rising at any given moment, that is, the intersection of the zodiac with the eastern horizon. Because of the great importance of this point in astrological forecasts, the term came to mean an entire prediction. Hence the ordinary sense of the word horoscope.

Astrological Backgrounds. Many peoples have believed that the heavenly bodies exert a preponderant influence over the world and its inhabitants and that man's fate, at least in part, is fixed in advance and can be predicted by carefully observing at the moment of birth or conception the positions of the sun and moon and the planets in relation to each other, to the signs of the zodiac, and to the eastern and western horizons and midheaven, the highest point of the ecliptic. On this foundation the pseudoscience of astrology was erected. It was a highly complicated and technical structure requiring considerable knowledge of mathematics and astronomy in its practitioners, who often differed from one another in the details and even in the fundamental assumptions of their profession.

Astrologers sometimes made predictions applying to cities, states, or entire regions of the earth. For this purpose the regions of the ancient world were apportioned among the signs of the zodiac according to various systems, of which Ptolemy's (Tetrabiblos 2.3) is the most elaborate. For instance, Britain was assigned to Aries. Eclipses, comets, and other phenomena occurring in Aries and observed in Britain would then be interpreted as applying to Britain.

Genethliology. The astrologer's highest knowledge was exhibited in genethliology, the art of prediction applied to an individual, based on the positions of the heavenly bodies at the moment of his birth. Each planet was believed to have its own nature and influence, which were nevertheless capable of great variation, just as the gods were variable and capricious.

The twelve loci of the horoscope.

Houses and Loci. Each planet had its day and night houses, or signs of the zodiac in which it was especially "at home," where its natural influence would be accentuated; its exaltation and depression, particular degrees of the ecliptic where its influence would be maximum or minimum; and its terms, a fixed section in each sign of the zodiac. For example, Mars had its day house in Scorpio and its night house in Aries; its exaltation at  $28^{\circ}$  in Capricorn and its depression at  $28^{\circ}$  in Cancer; and a term of a certain number of degrees, arranged on any of three systems, in each sign. In addition, each planet might affect various features of a man's life, depending on its location in one of the 12 loc. The significance of the loci was as follows: I, life, body, spirit or breath; II, livelihood, property, partnership, intercourse with women, business, profit from inheritance; III, brothers, living abroad, royalty, wealth, friends, relatives, slaves; IV, parents, spirits, life in the temple, repute, children; V, children, good fortune, friendship, accomplishments, marriage; VI, slaves, bad fortune, illness, enmity, infirmity; VII, marriage; VIII, death, trial, penalty, loss, weakness; IX, travel, friendship, benefit from kings, revelations, manifestations of gods, soothsaying; X, careers and honors, accomplishment, reputation, children, wife; XI, "good daemon," friends, hopes, gifts, children, freed persons, accomplishment; and XII, "bad daemon," enmity, foreign country, slaves, illness, dangers, court trials, infirmity, death.

Aspects of the Planets. More important than the loci were the aspects of the planets, the angles at which they "looked at" one another and the earth, depending on their relative positions in the signs of the zodiac. Astrologers recognized conjunction of planets in the same sign and four aspects as especially important. (1) Opposition: this occurs when two planets are in opposite signs, as Aries and Libra. (2) Trine aspect: the 12 signs can be connected by threes to form equilateral triangles, such as Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius, so that planets in any two of such a set are in trine aspect. (3) Quartile aspect: similarly, the signs can be connected by fours to form squares, e.g., Aries, Cancer, Libra, Capricorn; planets in Aries and Cancer or in Aries and Capricorn are in quartile aspect. (4) Sextile Aspect: the 12 signs can be connected to form two different equilateral hexagons; thus, a planet in Aries is in sextile aspect to one in Gemini or Aquarius. Opposition was regularly, and quartile aspect generally, considered ill-omened; trine and sextile aspects, favorable.

Elaboration of Horoscopes and Their Wide Use.

Horoscopes of a simple type have been found in great numbers in the "library" of the Assyrian king Assurbanipal (7th century B. C.) at Nineveh (now in the British Museum). Great elaboration became possible only when Babylonian doctrines were combined with Hellenistic Greek astronomy in Egypt, culminating in the astronomical works and extant handbook of astrology, the Tetrabiblos, of Claudius Ptolemaeus (2d century A.D.). Representative Roman works are the Astronomica of Manilius (fl. early 1st century A.D.) and the handbook by Vettius Valens (2d century A.D.). Horoscopes were widely used in the Green-Roman period by all classes, from the Roman emperor to the humblest slave. The curious hold that astrology had on men is well illustrated by the fact that Constantine, after his victory over Licinius, removed the sun-god Helios from his coins, but had an astrologer cast the horoscope of his new capital, Constantinople.

The Church Fathers opposed astrology, but it revived during the Byzantine renaissance of the 9th century, when Greek astrology was rediscovered along with astronomy. From then on astrology flourished and horoscopes were cast although the Church officially was opposed. In the later Middle Ages the Universities of Padua, Bologna, and Paris (among others) provided expert instruction in casting horoscopes. Most of the leading astronomers of the age of the Renaissance and the Reformation, among them Tycho Brahe, Copernicus, Galileo, and Kepler, practiced astrology; and all the rulers of the time, including several popes, employed official astrologers at their courts. The art of casting horoscopes still flourishes, and this form of astrology continues to have a surprising number of adherents at all intellectual levels.

See Also: ASTRAL RELIGION; ASTROLOGY; MAGIC.

Bibliography: Ptolemy, Tetrabiblos, ed. F. E. ROBBINS, with Eng. tr. (Loeb Classical Library 1940). BOUCHÉ-LECLERCQ, L'Astrologie grecque (Paris 1899), still the best account of Greco-Roman techniques. F. W. BOLL, Sternglaube und Sterndeutung, 4th ed. W. GUNDEL (Leipzig 1931), brief on technique but excellent on history. O. NEUGEBAUER and H. B. VAN HOESSEN, Greek Horoscopes (Philadelphia 1959), 1,099 Greek horoscopes with astronomical commentary, glossary of terms, and bibliography. J. H. CREHAN, "Astrology and Theology", H. F. DAVIS, et al., A Catholic Dictionary of Theology (London 1962-) 1:179-182.

[H. S. LONG]

HORTON, DOUGLAS

U.S. Protestant leader; b. Brooklyn, New York, July 27, 1891; d. Berlin, New Hampshire, Aug. 21, 1968. Horton graduated from Princeton University in 1912 and then studied at New College, Edinburgh; Mansfield College, Oxford; and the University of Tübingen, Germany. He received a B.D. from Hartford (Connecticut) Theological Seminary in 1915. After ordination as a Congregational minister the same year, he served as minister of First Church of Christ in Middletown, Connecticut (1915-25); Leyden Congregational Church in Brookline, Massachusetts (1925-31); and United Church of Hyde Park, Chicago (1931-38). He then became chief executive officer of the Congregational Christian Churches, serving until 1955 as minister and executive secretary of the denomination's General Council.

He led his denomination's representatives in the merger negotiations with the Evangelical and Reformed Church that resulted in formation of the United Church of Christ in 1957. The concept of the new church, along with its theology, structure, and program, was explained in The United Church of Christ, a book he published in 1962. Meanwhile, he had become dean of the Harvard Divinity School in 1955 and served in that position until 1959. He had also become prominent in the ecumenical movement, participating in the formation of the National and World Councils of Churches and holding important positions in both council, including chairmanship of the WCC's Faith and Order Commission (1957-63).

As an observer for the International Congregational Council he attended all four sessions of the Second Vatican Council and published four volumes of sympathetic diary reports. His publications included 14 books, the last being Toward an Undivided Church (1967). By translating Karl Barth's Word of God and Word of Man in 1928 he became one of the first to introduce the Barthian theology to the English-speaking world. In 1945 he married Mildred McAfee, president of Wellesley College from 1936 to 1949 and holder of other significant posts in church and public affairs.

Bibliography: D. HORTON, The United Church of Christ (New York 1962); Vatican Diary, 4 v. (Philadelphia 1964-66).

[T. EARLY]

HORTULUS ANIMAE

The Little Garden of the Soul, a type of devotional book of prayers, intended for the laity, that was widespread in Germany in the early 16th century. The hortuli are to be distinguished from the medieval Psalter, which contained Psalms and part of the liturgical Office, with perhaps a supplement of miscellaneous prayers. They were similar in general content and arrangement to many of the Latin Horae, or books of hours, or to the English primers, from which they developed; however, they were more popular in character. The hortuli contained the Little Office of Our Lady, extracts from the Gospel accounts of the Passion, the Penitential Psalms, and the Litany of the Saints, with a large selection of supplementary devotional matter. This material of private prayer had the tendency to increase in size and in extravagance. For example, promises of spurious indulgences and of complete forgiveness of sins became attached to many prayers. That these devotional books were very popular can be judged by the number of editions. Early copies c. 1500 had numerous woodcuts, sometimes by famous artists such as Hans Holbein. After the Reformation the Lutherans put out a modified version. The Council of Trent legislated against the accretions, the false promises of indulgences, and the incorrect versions of the Little Office of Our Lady. A bull of Pius V (March 11, 1571) demanded rigorous censorship of all editions. A modern "Garden of the Soul" is the book of prayers and instructions in the spiritual life written by Richard Challoner in 1740 and reprinted seven times by 1757.

See Also: PRAYER BOOKS.

Bibliography: H. THURSTON, "The Original Garden of the Soul," American Ecclesiastical Review 26 (1902) 167–187. A. A. SCHMID and A. BOECKLER, in Handbuch der Bibliothekswissenschaft, ed. F. MILKAU, 3 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1931–40) 1:121.

[M. M. BARRY]

HOSANNA

A liturgical exclamation derived through the Greek transcription ὡσαννά of the Aramaic term hōša'-nā' that represents the Hebrew term hōšā'ā-nnā meaning "Do save (us)!" It occurs in Ps 118.25 as a cry for continued help after victory and a joyous shout of homage to God. This Psalm is one of the Hallel Psalms (Psalms 113–118) that were recited especially at the Jewish feasts of PASSOVER, PENTECOST, BOOTHES (TABERNACLES), and the DEDICATION OF THE TEMPLE. The verse Ps 118.25 was sung during the octave of the feast of Booths once a day and seven times on the seventh day while the priests went in procession around the altar. During the procession on the seventh day, the people waved festive branches (hōšannōt) and sang hymns of praise with "Hosanna" as their refrain (Josephus, Ant. 3.10.4; 3 Maccabees 10.6–7). This spontaneous acclamation of joy and supplication was sung when Christ entered Jerusalem at His last Passover (Mt 21.9, 15; Mk 11.10; Jn 12.13). In the context here Hosanna expresses the messianic hopes of the people; it is the cry of welcome ("Blessed in the name of the Lord be he who come"—the standard Hebrew formula of welcome) to "the Son of David," i.e., the Messiah. At a very early date (Didache 10.6; Const. Apost. 8.13) the word Hosanna was incorporated in the Christian liturgy at the Sanctus of the Mass; later it was introduced into the Palm Sunday procession.

[M. R. E. MASTERMAN/EDS.]

HOSEA, BOOK OF

Hosea, whose name is an abbreviated form meaning "Yahweh is salvation," was one of the two Prophets from the Northern Kingdom who left us writings of their ministry.

The Prophet. Unlike Amos, his predecessor from the South, Hosea was probably an Ephraimite, for he frequently refers to this tribe and to sites in this geographical area. He possessed a perceptive mind and refined sensitivity and, like Jeremiah a century later, had to endure the personal agony of announcing the visitation of divine retribution upon his native land. Because of the many images drawn from agriculture and nature, it is likely that he came from a rural rather than an urban background. There is no evidence that he belonged to one of the prophetic guilds or was of priestly descent, though he is acquainted with both offices as well as with the political realities of his time. The opening verse places his ministry during the reigns of Jeroboam II (786–746 B.C.) to Hezekiah (715–687 B.C.), but this is a later Judean addition to the work intended to make Hosea a contemporary of Isaiah (Is 1.1). Internal evidence points to the last years of Jeroboam II as the beginning of his ministry, thus, c. 750 B.C. The turbulent years of the dynastic upheavals from 746–732 B.C. are alluded to (5.8–10; 7.3–7; 8.4), but the end of his ministry is a matter of conjecture. Since the fall of Samaria (721 B.C.) is nowhere mentioned, it is probable that Hosea did not live to see it. (For the social conditions and the political situation of this period, see ISRAEL, 3.)

Characteristics of the Book. Hosea stands at the head of the canon of the "Twelve Prophets" in the Hebrew and Greek Bibles. From a literary point of view, the work is a mélange of terse, originally independent oracles that contain warnings, threats, pleas for conversion, and a number of Messianic passages of hope for a happier future. Characteristic of the book is the abrupt alternation between the words of Yahweh and those of the prophet (4.10–15; 12.1–15). This is best explained as a conscious use of the disputation form (rib) common in litigation before the elders at the gate of the city. The prophecy is rich in imagery redolent with the language of love; parallelism, play on words, alliteration, and repetition of a key idea are devices employed by Hosea to seize the attention of his hearers. Hosea's fragmented style, due in part to the poor condition of the text, raises many problems about the original order and sequence of his preaching. Various statements about Judah, at times interrupting the harmony of thought, are signs of a Judean redaction after the death of the Prophet (1.7; 5.5; 6.11; 12.1). These were probably interpolated to make the prophecy pertinent to readers of the South. There are also some other additions and glosses (e.g., 14.10) but the present form was perhaps fixed by the year 700 B.C. Scholars are generally agreed today upon the substantial genuineness of the work and attribute it to Hosea himself, though much was recorded and compiled by his disciples.

Contents. The prophecy falls into two unequal divisions: ch. 1–3 treat of the marriage of Hosea; ch. 4–14 are a collection of oracles that evince little logical organization or chronological continuity.

The celebrated marriage of the Prophet to Gomer is presented in an unusual fashion: in chapter one the episode is related biographically; in chapter three the Prophet speaks of it in a firsthand account; chapter two contains in oracular speech the divinely intended significance of the event. The juxtaposition of these forms in one literary unit is almost certainly artificial and the result of editing.

From the patristic age to modern times an allegorical interpretation of the marriage was in vogue. Since the 19th century, however, exegetes have tended to view the marriage as an historical reality that had symbolic meaning. An attempt at reconstruction is as follows: At the bidding of God, Hosea took to wife Gomer, who is called a harlot (1.2). After bearing Hosea several children, who by divine command received the ominous names: "Jezrael," "Unpitied," and "Not my People," she abandoned her husband and gave herself up to a life of adultery. The outraged anger of the Prophet is vanquished by the still more ardent love he feels for his perfidious spouse. At this point the seer is instructed to reclaim his erring wife; symbolism demands that the unnamed woman of ch. 3 be Gomer. Hosea ransomed her for the price of a slave and then imposed upon her a time of salutary chastisement before restoring her to full marital union. Aided by revelation Hosea understands that his unrequited love for Gomer and her wayward conduct are but a reflection of what Yahweh has experienced from faithless Israel (2.4–15).

In the second part of his prophecy (ch. 4–14), Hosea applies this symbolism to the concrete reality of his society in a series of severe denunciations of the immorality of the priests (4) and the princes (5) who bear a major share of guilt for the apostasy of the nation. He deplors Ephraim's ephemeral conversions to the Lord, which are likened to the passing of the morning dew (6). He warns of the folly of political alliances with Assyria and Egypt (7–8), as if these could deliver the land from the "day of the Lord" (9). Idolatry, a syncretism of Baalistic practices with the worship of Yahweh, is the crime of Ephraim (9), which merits utter destruction of king and people alike (10). Yet for all this, God's love for His son endures, and in ch. 11 Hosea rises to one of the most sublime expressions of Yahweh's tender concern for the chosen people. To this, Israel continually responds with rebelliousness (12–13). The prophecy closes with an impassioned plea for a sincere return to God with the assurance of His pardon and favor (14).

Theology. The prophet's chief complaint is the lack of knowledge of God in the land (4.1,6; 5.4; 6.6), which is practically synonymous with faithful obedience to the religion of Moses. No other prophet insists so poignantly upon the loyal devotedness (hesed) that binds Yahweh and Israel and that should inspire the Israelites in their dealings with each other. Hosea in his portrait of Yahweh as a God of love (2.21–25; 11.1–4) approaches as close as anyone in the OT to the conception of the fourth Evangelist. The idolatrous Baal ritual he terms the whoredom of Israel. While the overall tone of the message is one of despair of salvaging the ancient alliance, there appear passages of hope for a new covenant (2.20–22) to be based on right, justice, love, and loyalty, which will bring about the reunion of all of the chosen people (2.2; 3.5). Hosea's grasp of Israel's past as a history of salvation, his insistence upon purity of worship and a morality in accord with the postulates of the Law certainly influenced the Deuteronomical writers. He was the first to conceive of the marriage image to describe the relation of Yahweh and his people, which became a classical figure in the writings of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and St. Paul.

Bibliography: Commentaries A. VAN HOONACKER, Les Douze Petits Prophètes (Études bibliques) (Paris 1908). W. R. HARPER, Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Amos and Hosea (International Critical Commentary), ed. S. R. DRIVER et al. New York 1905. H. W. WOLFF, Dodekapropheten I: Hosea (Biblicher Kommentar: Altes Testament 14; Neukirchen 1961). G. RINALDI, I Profeti Minori II: Osea-Gioele-Abia-Giona (Turin 1960). A. DEISSLER, Les Petits prophètes (Osée; Bible Pirot-Clamer, 8.1; Paris 1961). Studies. A. GELIN, "Osée (Livre D)," Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928– ) 6:926–940. H. H. ROWLEY, "Marriage of Hosea," The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 39 (1956) 200–233. N. H. SNAITH, Mercy and Sacrifice (London 1953). J. L. MCKENZIE, "Divine Passion in Osee," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 17 (1955) 287–299; "Knowledge of God in Hosea," Journal of Biblical Literature 74 (1955) 22–27. E. H. MALY, "Messianism in Osee," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly

19 (1957) 213–225. B. VAWTER, Conscience of Israel (New York 1961).

[J. K. SOLARI]

HOSIUS, STANISLAUS

Ecclesiologist and leading churchman during the Counter Reformation; b. Cracow, Poland, May 5, 1504; d. Rome, Aug. 5, 1579. He studied humanities at the Universities of Cracow and Padua and pursued law in Bologna. Paul III nominated him bishop of Culm in 1549; in 1551 he was transferred to the see of Ermland in East Prussia. He was the spirit behind the Catholic movement to stem the tide of Protestantism not only in his native land but throughout Europe. He combatted heresy; rallied wavering bishops, clergy, and princes to the cause of Catholicism; convoked synods; and opened schools and colleges for training future priests. His Confessio Catholicae Fidei Christiana—32 editions appeared during his lifetime—numerous polemical writings, and a constant flow of correspondence with leading personalities of the day gained him universal esteem and prestige. He came to be called the “second Augustine” and “hammer of heretics.” Paul IV called him to work in Rome; Pius IV sent him on diplomatic missions to Vienna with a view toward reopening the Council of Trent. He was created cardinal on Feb. 26, 1561, and appointed papal legate to preside at the Council. He is buried in Rome in the Church of S. Maria in Trastevere.

Bibliography: Complete bibliog. to 1937, J. SMO CZYNSKI, Bibliographia Hosiana (Pelplin 1937). A. HUMBERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 7.1: 178–190. G. M. GRABKA, Cardinalis Hosii doctrina de corpore christi mystico (Washington 1945); “Cardinal Hosius and the Council of Trent,” Theological Studies 7 (1946) 558–576. F. J. ZDRODOWSKI, The Concept of Heresy According to Cardinal Hosius (Washington 1947).

[G. M. GRABKA]

HOSPICE MOVEMENT

The modern hospice movement is a medically directed, nurse-coordinated program providing a continuum of home and inpatient care for the terminally ill and their families. The program affords palliative and supportive care to meet the special needs arising out of the physical, emotional, spiritual, social, and economic stresses that are experienced during the final stages of illness, and during dying and bereavement. An interdisciplinary team, under the direction of an autonomous hospice administration, provides the care.

In medieval times many hospices such as that connected with the monastery of St. Bernard in the Swiss Alps were established to care for sick travelers and indigent pilgrims. The modern movement, however, with its concern for the terminally ill, traces its origins to the 19th century. The Irish Sisters of Charity, inspired by the vision of their foundress, Sister Mary AIKENHEAD (d. 1858), a one-time coworker of Florence Nightingale, established Our Lady’s Hospice at Harold’s Cross, outside Dublin in 1879. Another of the early hospices, Sacred Heart Hospice, was founded by the Sisters of Charity in Australia in 1890. In the United States there were a few not-for-profit institutions such as Calvary Hospital in New York and Youville Hospital in Cambridge, Mass., that cared for dying patients who were indigent. About the turn of the century, two hospices in London, St. Luke’s Home (1893) and St. Joseph’s (1905), developed the groundwork for the holistic care that has become the hallmark of the modern movement.

The hospice movement, as it is known today, is associated with the names of Dame Cicely Saunders and Elizabeth Kübler-Ross. Dame Cicely worked at St. Joseph’s until 1967 when, with an initial gift of £500 from a dying patient, she established St. Christopher’s Hospice in Sydenham, just outside London. Dr. Saunders stated: “the name hospice, ‘a resting place for travelers or pilgrims,’ was chosen because this will be something between a hospital and a home, with the skills of one and the hospitality, warmth and the time of the other.” In 1963 Saunders lectured at Yale University; the audience included Florence Wald, who was to become a pioneer in the movement in the United States. Wald was a founder of the freestanding Connecticut Hospice in Cambridge, Mass., the first such agency in the United States.

The ground had been prepared for the hospice concept by The Meaning of Death (1959), a series of essays edited by Henry Fiebel, and similar works, but it was the publication of Kübler-Ross’s On Death and Dying (1970) that proved the real catalyst to the acceptance and development of hospice care in the U.S. Acute-care hospitals have as their primary purpose the cure of sick patients and are not equipped to attend the wide range of stresses that concern the terminally ill. Until recently, medical and nursing schools seldom dealt with the many aspects of death and dying; physicians and nurses, trained to save lives, were not instructed on how to address the varied needs of dying patients and their families.

The hospice movement centers on the freestanding, autonomous agency that provides comprehensive home-care services as well as inpatient care. Most hospices also provide hospital back up. The treatment parameters have been broadened to include patients with any prognosis in need of symptom management.

Whatever the organizational basis, hospice care is provided by a physician-directed team that invariably includes a nurse and several if not all the following: a social worker, a pastoral counselor, a dietician, and volunteers to assist the patient and family with personal care and the chores of daily living. Despite the recognized need for a more humane and sensitive approach to palliative care, the hospice movement in the U.S. has not become more widespread because of financial, organizational, legal, and psychological obstacles. Major strides have been made in funding, with 95 percent of the daily sum covered by health care, the remaining five percent being obtained by volunteer hours.

The National Hospice Organization (NHO), established in 1978, has as its primary functions the promotion of hospice care, research, consultation, education and the advocacy of patients' interests, as well as those of their family and care givers. Presently, there are more than 3,000 organizations providing hospice interests. The NHO headquarters is located in Arlington, Va.

Bibliography: J. E. CIMINO, "Palliative Care: Overview of the Major Hospice Movement—Some Issues and Some Answers," Journal of Long-Term Home Health Care 17 (Fall 1998).

[M. CRONIN-MARTHALER]

HOSPITALITY

Almost all of the religious traditions of the world regard hospitality as a universal value and obligation. In ancient Greek mythology, the gods sometimes appeared on Earth disguised as humans who rewarded humans who offered them hospitality. For example, by offering hospitality to Zeus and Hermes in their human form, Baucis and Philemon were saved from the flood. In the Hindu tradition, hospitality is one of the five obligatory offerings required of all Hindus. In Buddhism, offering hospitality to monks is regarded as a virtuous deed with favorable karmic consequences. In the Qur'ān, hospitality toward strangers and the unfortunate is one of the principal ethical duties of all Muslims. Islamic hospitality is patterned upon the hospitality that the inhabitants of Medina showered upon the prophet Muḥammad when he was fleeing from his enemies in Mecca. These ideals are also found in Jewish and Christian understandings of hospitality.

In the OT the patriarchs are cited as models (Gn 19.2; 24.17–33; 43.24, etc.) particularly since the visit of Yahweh to Abraham (Gn 18.2–8) left a religious mark upon Jewish hospitality that was further emphasized by Dt 10.18–19. In the NT hospitality is connected with the Christian's earthly condition as a pilgrim (Heb 11.13). It is a charism from heaven (1 Pt 4.9), assimilates man to angels (3 Jn 8), and was recommended by Christ (Lk 11.5–8; 14.12–15) who set an example (Mk 6.41–45; 8.6–9; Lk 22.27; Jn 13.1–17) and gave Himself to His guests (Mk 14.22). Hospitality is a function of charity (Lk 10.33–37) whose practice is decisive for eternal life, when the Son of Man comes in His glory (Mt 25.35–42). In a NT exhortation the guest is identified with Christ Himself (Mt 10.42; 25.35–44), and this explains the frequency with which it is mentioned (Acts 10.6; 10.23; 18.1–2; 21.16; 28.23; Rom 16.23; 1 Cor 16.19; Gal 4.14; 3 Jn 5, 9–10). However its practice was not without limitation since Christ Himself drew up rules for the Apostles (Mt 10.9–14; Mk 6.10–11) and Disciples (Lk 10.5–11) in accepting hospitality; and St. Paul cautioned the Thesalonians against vagabonds and those living in idleness (2 Th 3.6–15) or consorting with excommunicated Christians (1 Cor 5.11–12), while St. John outlawed the company of heretics (2 Jn 10).

In the post-Apostolic times, the letter of CLEMENT I of Rome (1 Clem. 1.2) praised Corinthian hospitality, and ARISTIDES credited all Christians with similar virtues (Apol. 15.7). Missionaries, bishops and priests visiting a neighborhood community, deacons serving as messengers, and simple Christians working in another village were given hospitality (Didache 11.1–10; 13.1–4; Hermas, Shepherd 8.10.3; 9.27.2). IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH insisted on the presence of Christ in guests (Ad Eph. 6.1) and lauded hospitality as gratitude to Christ. ORIGEN devoted two homilies to hospitality (In Gen. hom. 4–5) and St. CYPRIAN appointed a priest to take over the care of poor foreigners during his absence (Epist. 7), while St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM boasted that the community of Antioch took care of 3,000 widows, foreigners, and patients daily (Hom. in Mt. 66.3). By the 4th century special buildings (xenodochia) were constructed for the lodging of pilgrims and strangers, as well as for foundlings, orphans, aged people, and the sick. Most impressive was the village near Caesarea, founded by St. BASIL for such indigents (Epist. 94). Hospitality was a special duty of the bishop (Didasc. 2.58.6; Synod of Elvira, c.25; of Arles, c.9; of Antioch, c.9) who delegated this task often to the deacons or the DIACONIA. Gradually, hospitality became the duty of the monks and was subsequently incorporated in St. Benedict's Rule (ch. 53).

Bibliography: D. W. RIDDLE, "Early Christian Hospitality," Journal of Biblical Literature 57 (1938) 141–154. J. MARTY, "Sur le devoir chrétien de l'hospitalité aux trois premiers siècles," Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses 19 (1939) 288–295. D. GORCE, Les Voyages, l'hospitalité . . . dans le monde chrétien des IV<sup>e</sup> et V<sup>e</sup> siècles (Paris 1925). E. VON SEVERUS, Fremde beherbergen (Hamburg 1947). M. DHAVAMONY, "Hindu Hospitality and Tolerance: Hindu Attitude to Foreigners, Strangers and Immigrants," Studia Missionalia 39 (1990) 303–320. D. B. GOWLER, "Hospitality and Characterization in Luke 11:37–54: A Socio-Narratological Approach," Semeia 64 (1994) 213–251. J. KOENIG,

New Testament Hospitality: Partnership with Strangers as Promise and Mission (Philadelphia 1985).

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

HOSPITALLERS AND HOSPITAL SISTERS

These are general terms used to describe the various nursing orders whose chief duty was serving medieval hospitals.

Origins. Although by 800 every important city of the Muslim world had its medical hospitals with trained physicians and substantial endowments, western Europe did not come near to matching that achievement until about 1200. A distinction was drawn between the hospice, a house for permanent occupation by the poor, the insane, and the incurable, and the hospital, a place where the sick were temporarily accommodated for medical treatment, though the same foundation could be both hospice and hospital, and guests, especially pilgrims, were often cared for in both. In many instances the hospital developed from the hospice, and a majority of hospitals came to be administered by a community vowed to the religious life. Some were staffed only by men, others only by women, others still—e.g., scores of Maisons-Dieu and Hôtels-Dieu (see HÔTEL-DIEU DE PARIS)—by both sexes. Even the patients might be bound by a form of religious profession. A monastery could itself be a hospital, as were certain English GILBERTINE houses. Conversely, some hospitals developed into monasteries, and even lost their eleemosynary character. St. Bartholomew's, London, was both a monastery and a hospital, each division having its own organization, seals, and income. Many a hospital, without being integrated into a particular order, observed the Rule of St. AUGUSTINE (the most popular), or the BENEDICTINE RULE, or that of the FRANCISCANS, or the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem (see KNIGHTS OF MALTA). Even so, the diocesan bishop was often called upon to compile hospital statutes. During the 13th and 14th centuries in Germany and Italy the control of many of these independent hospitals passed to the municipalities. In every century the solicitude of the popes for the hospitallers expressed itself in innumerable bulls granting them chapels, cemeteries, exemptions, and indulgences. Lay patronage had a significant share in the distribution of wardenships, hospital offices, and corodies. The master was sometimes a layman, more often a religious; generally he lived in a separate house, and he might also be a physician. The professed brothers and sisters, who often paid entry fees, might live in a corody house and carry out only honorary duties; but for the most part they were nurses of the sick, and in the larger hospitals they were assisted in worship and work by clerks in minor orders and lay servants.

Original of the "Agreement whereby the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem surrender to Richard of Ilchester, Bishop of Winchester, the charge and administration of the hospital of St. Cross without the walls of Winchester," dated at Dover, April 10, 1185. Attached at bottom are the seals of Roger des Moulins, Master of the Hospitallers, Bishop Richard, and Garnier de Nablus, prior of the order in England.

The Nursing Orders. The 11th and 12th centuries were an age of momentous increase in the number of hospitals. In medieval England, for instance, 980 hospitals have been identified, their number reaching its maximum in the 13th century, and diminishing after 1350. In every generation, old hospitals, usually un-endowed, disappeared and new ones were founded. The pattern was similar in all Catholic countries, and by the 14th century such great cities as Rome and Florence had 30 hospitals each. This hospital expansion must be associated with the development of orders specifically devoted to nursing, of which the history of the ANTONINES may be taken as characteristic. About 1100, a nobleman, Gaston de Dauphiné, founded the hospital of SAINT-ANTOINE-DE-VIENNOIS as a dependency of the monastery of the same name, establishing an almonry house with a separate hospital for poor persons suffering from the diseases (including erysipelas and ergotism) known collectively as "St. Anthony's Fire." During the 12th and 13th centuries Antonine hospitals were founded in most of the larger towns of France, Italy, Spain, and Germany and at Constantinople and Acre. The chief officers of the order and the heads of its houses were priests, though the majority of the members in the early years were lay brothers and lay sisters. In 1231 statutes were drawn up under papal supervision, and the order was freed from subjection to the Benedictines and put under the government of an elective master and an annual chapter-general of all the commanders. In 1247 the order adopted the Rule of St. Augustine, and in 1301 Pope BONIFACE VIII converted it to an order of Augustinian Canons and exempted it from episcopal jurisdiction. The Antonines wore a black habit with the blue St. Anthony's cross (the tau). Included among their patients were the sick of the papal household.

Mention should be made also of the work of the Order of the HOLY SPIRIT, founded at Montpellier in 1145, and confirmed by Pope INNOCENT III in 1198. By 1250 its houses were to be found in every important town in western Europe. The Order of St. William of the Desert (see SAINT-GUILHEM-DU-DÉSERT, ABBEY OF), the Knights of Malta, the BETHLEHEMITES, and the hospital sisters of the Order of St. Catherine all made significant contributions to the development of the movement. The influence of the MENDICANT orders is illustrated by the work of St. ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY, Landgravine of Thuringia, who, after founding a hospital with 28 beds near Eisenach in 1226, and attending 900 poor daily, became a Franciscan tertiary in 1228 and built a second hospital for the sick at Marburg; or by the hospital of POOR CLARES that her great-niece St. ELIZABETH OF PORTUGAL established at Coimbra.

From early in the 13th century the BEGUINES, an association of women in the Low Countries started by the priest Lambert le Bègue (d. 1177), frequently supported themselves by nursing the sick, especially at Liège, Malines, Brussels, Louvain, and Bruges. The Beguines were devoted to a life of religion and sometimes organized into semiconventual communities and later even into houses of Dominican, Franciscan, or Augustinian tertiaries. The similar male communities of Beghards, first appearing at Louvain in 1220, also nursed the sick, but hospital nursing was never the major preoccupation of the Beguines and Beghards. In contrast, the ALEXIAN BROTHERS, whose patron was St. Alexius of Edessa, arose in Malines in the early 15th century under the layman Tobias to succor plague victims and bury those who died (hence their other name of Cellites, from cella, a grave). The Alexians spread through Flanders, Brabant, and Germany; they are still active in hospital work today.

The Knights of St. John of Jerusalem (more widely known as the Knights of Malta) were founded not later than 1108 to nurse the sick and tend pilgrims in the Holy Land. They soon became a MILITARY ORDER, but they always laid special emphasis on medical work, founding and managing hundreds of hospitals and hospices in Catholic Europe and the Levant. Unlike their rivals, the TEMPLARS, they affiliated hospitaller sisters to their order, many of them with the duty of ministering to patients (chiefly women). Such were the Johannines St. Toscana at Verona (d. 1338) and St. Ubaldesca at Pisa (d. 1206). The order's principal hospital, at Jerusalem from 1108 to 1187, was governed under the rules drawn up by the Grand Masters Raymond du Puy (d. c. 1160) and Roger des Moulins (d. 1187) and accommodated 2,000 patients. In their later Convent (or headquarters) of Rhodes (1306–1523), the Knights of St. John sheltered pilgrims in the Hospice of St. Catherine and also built a commodious infirmary exclusively for the sick and wounded, which was administered by their Hospitalarius (always a French knight), two prud'hommes, and a lay staff of physicians (some of them Jews), surgeons, apothecaries, and male nurses. The infirmary in Malta, where the Convent was located from 1530 to 1798, was completed in 1578; it had a great ward 503 feet long, 35 feet wide, and 30 feet high, one of Europe's largest interiors, free from draughts and sun-glare, and equipped with the unusual luxury of 300 single beds. After Malta was lost, the order eventually reestablished its headquarters in Rome (1834), and its medical role has since then vastly expanded.

No medieval hospitallers had greater influence on medical progress than those who served leper-houses. In the ancient world there had been no consistent understanding of the spread of infection by contact. In the Middle Ages the group of diseases today termed leprosy was treated by regarding it as contagious (although not all such medieval diseases were properly leprosy) and sternly excluding it by confining all known lepers to leper-houses. Leprosy appeared in Catholic Europe about 500, reached its apogee in the 13th century, was in decline by 1350, and was extremely rare by 1500. The success of isolation (helped by leprosy's low infectivity) led to the realization that other diseases were infectious: e.g., erysipelas, scabies, conjunctivitis, phthisis, fevers with rashes, and bubonic plague; and medieval governments began to enforce rigorous measures against the spread of epidemics. The leper-house was a group of individual houses clustered around a chapel, standing well out of town in the open country, sometimes close to a healing spring, e.g., the famous wells at a house near Nantwich, England. The master would be a priest presiding over a community of nursing brothers and sisters, often 13 in number, who might well be lepers themselves, and who would include a capellanus and a clerk to collect rent and alms. Usually their patients were also regarded as brothers and sisters of the house. By the 13th century the comprehensive attack on leprosy had produced 2,000 leper-houses in France alone, and hundreds in every other country of Europe. Most houses were autonomous, not belonging to any congregation. A great house such as Saint-Lazare at Paris was dependent on the local bishop, though after 1200 many municipalities took over control of their leper-houses. The HOSPITALLERS OF ST. LAZARUS, founded to treat leprosy in 12th-century Jerusalem, acquired many houses and endowments in the West, but their work is only part of a story that has been deemed "a great social and hygienic movement."

Hospital Facilities Hospitals other than leper-houses were usually located at a town, preferably on a site outside the walls to counter the spread of disease (e.g., S. Spirito, Florence), and if possible on a river bank (e.g., St. Francis, Prague). The early form was that of a church, with the aisled hall opening at the east end into a chapel. Later there was developed a plan resembling that of a monastery or college. King HENRY II of England built the hospital of Saint-Jean at Angers with three wings, and in many hospitals the hall ranged around three or four sides of a quadrangle. It must be emphasized, however, that most medieval hospitals had fewer than 30 beds, although every country had its great infirmaries. Margaret of Burgundy built one at Tonnerre with a hall 260 feet long, 60 feet wide; the main ward of S. Spirito, Rome, was 409 feet long, 40 feet wide, and that of the Holy Ghost, Lübeck, 300 feet long with 140 beds in four rows of cubicles. The lavishly staffed St. Leonard's, York, could accommodate 224 sick and poor. At Milan between 1445 and 1500 the Visconti and the SFORZA built the finest hospital of the Middle Ages. Toward the end of the period the great new foundations, such as Santa Cruz, Toledo (1504–14), were often given a cruciform plan, with four wards meeting at a central altar. An alternative, late-medieval design was the row of almshouses, each with its own fireplace and offices. The hospital hall or ward had a tiled floor and large windows, the lower parts of which could be opened, and it was sometimes divided into private cubicles, each patient being expected, if well enough, to join in evening prayers at his cubicle door.

Medical Knowledge of the Hospitaliers. By 1200 the medieval hospitalier worked under physicians trained at Salerno, Montpellier, and other universities (compared with which the monastic orders contributed little to the progress of medical science). These men, though their pathology was still that of the four humors and their knowledge of drugs empirical, could refer to the consilia of such writers as Taddeo Alderotti (d. 1295) with their careful and perceptive descriptions of symptoms and treatments. There was, for example, a rich variety of mercurial recipes for the nurse to apply against a large group of chronic skin infections, some probably syphilitic. Guglielmo di Saliceto (d. 1276) had challenged the Arab view that pus-formation was good for wounds and had recommended dressings to heal "by first intention," though his new principle was to be painfully slow in acceptance; he had also pointed to the connection between dropsy and nephritis, prescribing draughts of oxymel and barley water. The nurse needed an understanding of the use of traction in the treatment of fractures; of uroscopy; of the use of the instep of the naked foot as a clinical thermometer; and of the anesthetic sponge, impregnated with opium and mandragora, and soured in hot water, to produce fumes for the patient to inhale. The miniatures that illuminate some of the Salernitan codices show the wide range and enterprising techniques of medieval surgery. The hospitalier attended on operations for piles, fistula, stricture, nasal polyps, rupture, and cataract, as well as on venesection, cupping, and trephining. Thousands of foundation charters, statutes, and ordinances testify to the well-regulated character of medieval nursing: the prohibition on leaving the sick unattended, the confinement of the very sick to private wards (some Italian hospitals having separate wards—pazzerie—for the delirious), and the emphasis on the care of women in childbirth and for 3 weeks thereafter as a major duty. Above all, in hospitals following a rule, the canonical hours had to be strictly observed, and even patients were often enjoined, under vows, to perform their religious exercises.

See Also: HOSPITALS, HISTORY OF, 1.

Bibliography: P. HÉLYOT, Histoire des ordres monastiques, 8 v. (Paris 1714–19). M. A. NUTTING and L. L. DOCK, A History of Nursing, 4 v. (New York 1907–12). Knowles-Hadcock. W. G. WYLIE, Hospitals: Their History, Organization, and Construction (New York 1877). R. M. CLAY, The Mediaeval Hospitals of England (London 1909). R. GRAHAM, "The Order of St. Antoine de Viennois and Its English Commandery, St. Anthony's, Threadneedle Street," Archaeological Journal NS 34 (1927) 341–406. H. PIRENE, Histoire de Belgique, v.1 (Brussels 1903) 337–340, for Beguines and Beghards. P. FERRAND, Précis historique des Ordres de Saint-Lazare et de Saint-Maurice (Lyons 1860). C. A. MERCIER, Leper Houses and Mediaeval Hospitals (London 1915). C. J. SINGER and E. A. UNDERWOOD, A Short History of Medicine (2d ed. New York 1962). A. CASTIGLIONI, A History of Medicine, ed. and tr. E. B. KRUMBHAAR (2d ed. New York 1947). F. H. GARRISON, Introduction to the History of Medicine (4th ed. Philadelphia 1929). L. THORNDIKE, A History of Magic and Experimental Science, 8 v. (New York 1923–58). v.1 and 2. L. C. MACKINNEY, Early Medieval Medicine, with Special Reference to Paris and Chartres (Baltimore 1937); Medical Illustrations in Medieval Manuscripts (Berkeley 1965). D. RIESMAN, The Story of Medicine in the Middle Ages (New York 1935). P. DIEPGEN, Geschichte der Medizin, 2 v. (Berlin 1949–55). K. SUDHOFF, ed., Studien zur Geschichte der Medizin, 23 v. (Leipzig 1907–37); Beiträge zur Geschichte der Chirurgie im Mittelalter, 2 v. (Leipzig 1914–18); Aus der Frühgeschichte der syphilis (Leipzig 1912). P. GIACOSA, ed., Magistri Salernitani nondum editi (Turin 1901), 1 v. and atlas. E. E. HUME, Medical Work of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem (Baltimore 1940).

[L. BUTLER]

HOSPITALLERS OF ST. JOHN OF GOD

(Official Catholic Directory #0670) A nursing order of brothers founded in Spain in 1537 by St. JOHN OF GOD, a Portuguese shepherd who became an apostle of charity among the sick and needy of Granada. Pius V, in 1572, 22 years after the founder's death, recognized the Hospitaller Order of St. John of God (OH), which had adopted the Rule of St. Augustine and a monastic habit of robe, cincture, scapular, and cowl. In addition to solemn vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the brothers take a vow of hospitality by which they bind themselves to work for the sick. The spirit of the order is summed up in its motto "Caritas," which denotes a striving after the love of God through a love of the sick, in each of whom the brothers see the person of Christ.

The order spread rapidly throughout Europe where some of its hospitals acquired renown because of the brothers' medical and surgical skill. Still more widespread was the rural hospital where the brother-infirmarian paid daily domiciliary visits to the sick, the brother-pharmacist grew herbs to treat diseases, and the brother-chaplain (some of the members become priests) cared for the spiritual needs of religious, patients, and peasants. In the 17th century nearly 70 such hospitals were established in South America, where by the example of their charity the brothers played a part in the conversion of the native Americans. In the 18th century the order had 300 hospitals in Europe and South America, staffed by 2,700 brothers.

The French Revolution (1789) and its aftermath proved calamitous to the order; the brothers were expelled from 40 hospitals. With the return of religious tolerance, however, the brothers opened new hospitals. Their history in the first half of the 20th century was marked by a wider diffusion throughout the world. The brothers arrived in the U.S. in 1941. The generalate is in Rome. The U.S. provincialate is in Los Angeles, CA.

Bibliography: N. MCMAHON, The Story of the Hospitallers of St. John of God (Westminster, Md. 1959).

[N. MCMAHON/EDS.]

HOSPITALLERS OF ST. JOHN OF GOD, MARTYRS OF THE, BB.

Also known as Blessed Braulio María Corres, Federico Rubio, and companions; d. 1936–37, Spain; beatified at Rome by John Paul II, Oct. 25, 1992.

The 71 Hospitallers of St. John of God assumed under this title died at various times and places during the infamous persecution of the Church during the Spanish Civil War. At the outbreak of violence, the prior general, Father Narcissus Durchschein, urged the brothers to continue their sacred duty to the sick, unless the civil authorities took over the work or "until such time as a force majeure obliges them to leave" (letter dated April 4, 1936). The martyrs were all brothers serving in different capacities, ranging in age from 18 to 75 years old, and were Spaniards except seven young Colombians.

Apostolic School of Talavera de la Reina. (d. July 25, 1936, Toledo). The first four martyrs ran the order's new Juniorate (opened 1935) in Talavera near Toledo:

Federico Rubio Alvarez, baptized Carlos, brother and priest; b. 1862, Benavides, León.

Jerónimo Ochoa Urdangarín, brother; b. 1904, Goñi, Navarre.

Juan de la Cruz Delgado Pastor, baptized Eloy, brother; b. Dec. 10, 1914, Puebla de Alcocer, Badajoz.

Primo Martínez de S Vicente Castillo, superior; b. 1869, San Román de Campezo, Alaya.

At the outbreak of civil unrest, they sent their 22 youngest charges home. The brothers' house was searched twice for weapons (July 23 and 25, 1936). Following the second raid the brothers were arrested, interrogated, and taken to a site near the Virgen del Prado, where they were shot. All four were buried in a common grave in Talavera's cemetery, but reinterred in separate tombs (November 1936). On Nov. 22, 1946, their bodies were translated to Ciempozuelos (Madrid), where they were buried in the Pantheon Chapel (Jan. 14, 1937).

San Juan de Dios Sanitarium at Calafell. (d. July 30, 1936, Tarragona). About the same time as the house of the Hospitallers was searched in Toledo, the Communist authorities began harassing the brothers in Tarragona (July 23–29, 1936). On July 25, the militia took charge of the institute. They stripped the brothers of their habits and removed any sign of religion. The brothers continued their work for the next several days, while increasing the time spent in prayer. The brothers were provided documentation to travel to France, but warned that their safety could not be guaranteed. Nevertheless, 19 of the 27 Hospitallers left for Barcelona the morning of July 30. They were picked up by the militia en route. The truck stopped within the border of the Calafell District and four youths were removed from the group. A firing squad of 19 militiamen shot the others:

Antonio Llauradó Parisi, novice; b. June 13, 1920, Reus, Tarragona.

Antonio Sanchiz Silvestre, novice; b. Dec. 6, 1910, Villamarchante, Valencia.

Benito José Labre Mañoso González, baptized Arsenio, brother; July 19, 1879, Lomoviejo near Valladolid.

Braulio María Corres Díaz de Cerio, baptized Pablo, brother and priest; b. 1897, Torralba de Rio, Navarre.

Constancio Roca Huguet, baptized Saturnino, brother; b. Aug. 12, 1895, Sant Sadurn d'Anoia near Barcelona.

Domingo Pitarch Gurrea, novice; b. Feb. 12, 1909, Villareal, Castellón.

Enrique Beltrán Llorca, novice; b. Nov. 14, 1899, Villareal, Castellón.

Eusebio Forcades Ferraté, baptized Antonio, brother; b. September 28, Reus, Tarragona.

Ignacio Tejero Molina, novice; b. July 31, 1916, Monzalbarba near Zaragoza (shot the day before his twentieth birthday).

Julián Carrasquer Fos, baptized Miguel, superior; b. 1881, Sueca, Valencia.

Manuel Jiménez Salado, brother; b. Oct. 29, 1907, Jerez de la Frontera near Cadiz.

Manuel López Orbara, novice; b. Feb. 5, 1913, Puente de la Reina, Navarre.

Rafael Flamarique Salinas, novice; b. Oct. 24, 1903, Mendivil, Navarre.

Tomás Urdanoz Aldaz, novice; b. March 7, 1903, Echarri, Navarre.

Vicente de Paúl Canelles Vives, brother; b. June 25, 1894, Onda, Castellón.

Colombian Martyrs. (d. Aug. 9, 1936, Barcelona). These seven Colombians became the first of their homeland to be beatified. They were sent from the Colombian mission (opened 1920) to the San José Psychiatric Institute in Cienfuegos (near Madrid) for training. When the Spanish brothers of the community were taken into custody on August 7, Br. Guillermo Llop arranged with the Colombian ambassador, Dr. Uribe Echeverry, for their safe passage and repatriation and with the Claretian Sisters for money to cover travel expenses. The seven young brothers were taken off the train from Madrid to Barcelona, incarcerated overnight, and kept incommunicado with the embassy. Embassy officials found their bodies at the hospital mortuary the following morning, together with more than 100 others killed that day in Barcelona. The first Colombian beati are:

Arturo Ayala Niño, baptized Luis, brother; b. April 7, 1909, Paipa, Boyacá, Colombia. Brother Arturo joined the Hospitalers (1928) and joined the community at Cienfuegos, Spain, in 1930.

Esteban Maya Gutiérrez, baptized Gabriel, brother; b. March 19, 1907, Pácora Calda, Antioquia, Colombia. In 1932 he joined the order, where he was known for his humility, intelligence, and obedience.

Eugenio Ramírez Salazar, baptized Alfonso Antonio, brother; b. Sept. 2, 1913, La Ceja, Antioquia, Colombia. He entered the order (1932), professed his vows (1935), then was transferred to Spain.

Gaspar Páez Perdomo, baptized Luis Modesto, brother; b. June 15, 1913, La Unión, Huila, Colombia. Shortly after joining the Hospitalers (1933) and professing his solemn vows, he was sent to Spain to finish his religious and professional formation.

Juan Bautista Velázquez Peláez, baptized Juan José, brother; b. July 9, 1909, Antioquia, Colombia. He was a teacher prior to joining (1932) the Hospitalers, who characterized him as joyful and pious. After traveling to Spain (1934), he lived with the communities at Córdoba, Granada, and Cienfuegos.

Melquíades Ramírez Zuloaga, baptized Ramón, brother; b. Feb. 13, 1909, Sonsón, Antioquia, Colombia. Ramón entered the order at age 21. In April 1935 he traveled to Spain to complete his professional and religious formation at the community of Cienfuegos, where he was known for his simplicity and patience.

Rubén de Jesús López Aguilar, brother; b. April 12, 1908, Concepción, Antioquia, Colombia. He was known for his spirit of prayer and obedience. During the armed conflict between Colombia and Peru (1933), he volunteered to work in the hospital at Pasto in the militarized zone. In 1936 he joined the community at Cienfuegos, Spain.

Institute San José de Carabanchel Alto. (d. Sept. 1, 1936, Madrid). The isolated hospital for epileptics was relatively untouched by the violence of early July. On July 29, 1936, militia searched the institute for three hours and forbade the brothers to engage in any further "worship or religious expression." Undeterred, the brothers continued to pray together in secret for the next month. The mayor of Carabanchel arrived (August 29) with an armed escort, confiscated administrative records and money, and appropriated the hospital. Three days later (September 1) the brothers were herded into vehicles and taken to the "Charco Cabrera," where they were executed for being the servants of God. The mortal remains of the following martyrs were solemnly translated, June 18, 1942, to the church crypt in the Institute of San José:

Benjamín Cobos Celada, baptized Alejandro, brother; b. July 9, 1887, Palencia.

Canuto Franco Gómez, baptized José, brother; b. Dec. 23, 1871, Aljucer, Murcia.

Carmelo Gil Arano, baptized Isidro, brother; b. May 15, 1879, Tudela, Navarre.

Cecilio López López, baptized Enrique, brother; b. June 25, 1901, Fondón, Almería.

Cesáreo Niño Pérez, baptized Mariano, brother; b. Sept. 15, 1878, Torregutiérrez near Segovia.

Cosme Brun Arará, baptized Simon, brother; b. Nov. 12, 1894, Santa Coloma de Farners, Girona.

Cristino Roca Huguet, baptized Miguel, priest, director of the juniorate; b. June 6, 1899, Mollins de Rei, Barcelona.

Dositeo Rubio Alonso, baptized Guillermo, brother; b. Feb. 10, 1869, Madrigalejo near Burgos.

Eutimio Aramendía García, baptized Nicolás, assistant superior; b. Dec. 23, 1878, Oteiza de la Solana, Navarre.

Faustino Villanueva Igual, baptized Antonio, brother; b. Jan. 23, 1913, Sarrión, Teruel.

Proceso Ruiz Cascales, baptized Joaquín, superior; b. Oct. 4, 1887, Beniel, Murcia.

Rufino Lasheras Aizcorbe, baptized Crescencio, brother; b. June 15, 1900, Arandigoyen, Navarre.

Martyrs at Barcelona. (d. 1936). The Hospitallers of St. John of God ran two institutions in Barcelona. All but one of the 52 brothers who staffed the Psychiatric Hospital of Our Lady of Monserrat of San Baudilio de Llobregat made it safely to Marseilles, France, after a period of physical and psychological harm.

Protasio Cubells Minguell (baptized Antonio, provincial councillor and secretary; b. 1880, Coll de Nargó near Lleida; d. Dec. 14, 1936) was arrested while giving music lessons to two children. His body was found in the street the next day.

The others martyred in Barcelona were attached to the Children's Hospital, whose institute was the residence of the Brother Provincial of Aragon. The 22 brothers were subjected to various threats and indignities, including the confiscation of the hospital and all its goods, July 20–26. The brothers scattered to find refuge in various parts of the city, but five were killed:

Acisclo Piña Piazuolo, baptized Joaquín, brother; b. 1878, Caspe, Zaragoza; d. Nov. 10, 1936. He was arrested in the home of his superior's relative on November 5 and killed with 40 other people after suffering in St. Elia Prison.

Francisco Javier Ponsa Casallach, brother; b. 1916, Moiá near Barcelona; d. Sept. 28, 1936. He was arrested at his family's country home (September 27), taken to San Feliu de Codinas, Barcelona, by truck, and shot.

Juan Antonio Burró Más, brother; b. June 28, 1914, Barcelona; d. Nov. 5, 1936. Although attached to the institute at Barcelona, Juan Antonio was completing his military service at the time of the revolution. He was betrayed as a brother and killed.

Juan Bautista Egozcuezábal Aldaz, brother; b. March 13, 1882, Nuin, Navarre; d. July 29, 1936. Juan Bautista was captured near Esplugas de Llobregat and shot. He died in the hospital the following day.

Pedro de Alcántara Villanueva Larráyo, baptized Lorenzo, brother; b. 1881, Navarre; d. Sept. 11, 1936. He was arrested (September 4) with the family who gave him refuge.

Hospital of San Rafael. (d. Madrid). The 35-member community at San Rafael's were harassed from the middle of July 1936. The situation was made more difficult because the hospital depended on charity personally collected by the brothers, who could no longer walk safely through the streets. The hospital was confiscated by the government August 20 and the brothers force to leave by October 24. Although there were members of the community who were missing after 1939, only three were known to have been martyred:

Gonzalo Gonzalo Gonzalo, brother; b. Feb. 24, 1909, Conquezuola, Soria; d. Aug. 4, 1936. He was killed while dressed as a peasant to collect alms to support the hospital and institute.

Jacinto Hoyuelos Gonzalo, brother; b. Sept. 11, 1914, Matarrepudio near Santander; d. Sept. 19, 1936.

Nicéforo Salvador del Río, brother; b. Feb. 9, 1913, Villamorco near Palencia; d. Nov. 30, 1936.

Psychiatric Hospital of San José, Ciempozuelos. (Madrid). As in the other hospitals, the government took over the hospital (July 31, 1936) at Ciempozuelos (about 18 miles from Madrid), posted militiamen around the perimeter, removed all religious symbols, and suppressed worship. The brothers continued to nurse the sick and to gather early in the morning for worship. On August 7 each brother was searched, imprisoned, and told he would die the following day. Brother Guillermo Llop asked the chief of general security to spare the brothers. The chief responded by having all 53 religious taken to an underground prison for the night and transferred on August 9 to San Antonio Prison in the former Scolopian College on the Calle Hortaleza. They were temporarily separated on November 28 when 15 were assassinated; another six died on November 30, and the last, on February 11.

Angel Sastre Corporales, novice; b. Aug. 16, 1916, Vallaralbo del Vino near Zamora; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Antonio Martínez Gil-Leonis, novice; b. Nov. 2, 1916, Montellano near Seville; d. Nov. 30, 1936.

Arturo Donoso Murillo, brother; b. March 31, 1917, Puebla de Alcocer near Badajoz; d. Nov. 30, 1936.

Clemente Díez Sahagún, brother; b. Nov. 23, 1861, Fuentes de Nava, Palencia; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Diego de Cádiz García Molina, baptized Santiago, provincial secretary; b. Dec. 14, 1892, Moral de Calatrava near Ciudad Real; d. Nov. 30, 1936.

Eduardo Bautista Jiménez, brother; b. Jan. 5, 1885, La Gineta, Albacete; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Flavio Argüeso González, baptized Atilano, brother; b. 1877, Mazuecos, Palencia; d. Dec. 12, 1936.

Francisco Arias Martín, priest, novice; b. April 26, 1884, Granada; d. Aug. 18, 1936.

Guillermo Llop Gayá, baptized Vicente, brother, superior; b. Nov. 10, 1880, Villareal, Castellón; d. Nov. 28, 1936. Brother Guillermo had a distinguished career among the Hospitallers. He entered the order in 1898. From 1912 to 1922 he served as novice master for the Roman province, where he tended the wounded during World War I, and later he became prior of the house at Frascati. He helped reinvigorate the order in Chile (1922–28). He returned to Spain in 1928 to serve as prior of community running the Psychiatric Hospital in Ciempozuelos near Madrid.

Hilario Delgado Vilchez, baptized Antonio, brother; b. April 18, 1918, Cañar near Granada; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Isidoro Martínez Izquierdo, novice; b. April 9, 1918, Madrid; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Jesús Gesta de Piquer, brother; b. Jan. 19, 1915, Madrid; d. Nov. 30, 1936.

José Mora Velasco, priest, postulant; b. Aug. 18, 1886, Córdoba; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

José Ruiz Cuesta, postulant; b. Nov. 6, 1907, Dílar near Granada; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Juan Alcalde Alcalde, novice; b. Oct. 20, 1911, Zuzones near Burgos; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Juan Jesús Adradas Gonzalo, baptized Maríano, priest and brother; b. Aug. 15, 1978, Conquezueta, Soria; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Julián Plazaola Artola, brother; b. Sept. 12, 1915, San Sebastián, Guipúzcoa; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Lázaro Mújica Goiburu, baptized Juan María, brother; b. April 5, 1867, Ideazábal, Guipúzcoa; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Martiniano Meléndez Sánchez, baptized Antonio, brother; b. Jan. 15, 1878, Malaga, Costa del Sol; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Miguel Rueda Mejías, baptized Francisco, brother; b. Jan. 19, 1902, Motril near Granada; d. Nov. 30, 1936.

Pedro de Alcántara Bernalte Calzado, novice; b. Aug. 4, 1910, Moral de Calatrava near Ciudad Real; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Pedro María Alcalde Negro, brother; b. Nov. 26, 1878, Ledesma near Soria; d. Nov. 28, 1936.

Román Touceda Fernández, baptized Rafael, assistant superior; b. Jan. 22, 1904, Madrid; d. Nov. 30, 1936.

Tobías Borrás Román, baptized Francisco, brother; b. April 14, 1861, San Jorge, Castellón; d. Feb. 11, 1937.

Feast: July 30 (Hospitallers).

Bibliography: V. CÁRCEL ORTÍ, Mártires españoles del siglo XX (Madrid 1995). F. GÓMEZ CATÓN, La Iglesia de los mártires en la provincia eclesiástica tarraconense (Barcelona 1989). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Catholic Martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, tr. M. F. INGRAMS (Kansas City, Mo. 1993). Acta Apostolicae Sedis, no. 21 (1992) 1064.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HOSPITALLERS OF ST. LAZARUS OF JERUSALEM

An order of knights and nurses following the Rule of St. AUGUSTINE, the Hospitallers of St. Lazarus of Jerusalem was founded c. 1120 in Jerusalem. Its functions were to operate hospitals, especially hospitals for lepers; to spread the faith; and to assist and protect pilgrims to the Holy Land. During the first century of its existence the order operated principally in the Holy Land. Following the drastic contraction of the Latin CRUSADER states there in the 13th century, the order transferred its activities to Europe (1253) and established houses in France, Italy, England, Scotland, Hungary, Germany, and Switzerland. During the 14th and 15th centuries the order fell into decay and in 1490 INNOCENT VIII decreed that it be united with the Order of the Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem (see KNIGHTS OF MALTA). The French knights of the Lazarite Order, however, opposed this union vigorously, and the Lazarites lived on as an independent order in France, subject to their own grand master at Boigny, near Orléans. Bowing to this opposition, LEO X restored the Lazarites as an independent order early in the 16th century. In 1572, under the Grand Master Gianetto Castiglione, a further attempt was made to suppress the Lazarites when GREGORY XIII ordered their union with the Order of St. Maurice and installed Duke Emmanuel Philibert of Savoy as grand master of the united orders. Once again the French Lazarites resisted and refused to accept the union. In 1608 King HENRY IV united the French Lazarites with the Knights of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. Both the French and Italian branches of the order were suppressed during the French Revolution, and the hospitals that they operated disappeared. The Hospitallers of St. Lazarus were revived in Italy in 1814 by Victor Emmanuel I and in France in 1830. The order survives now as a purely honorific organization.

See Also: HOSPITALLERS AND HOSPITAL SISTERS; HOSPITALS, HISTORY OF.

Bibliography: Sources. A. DE MARSY, "Fragments d'un cartulaire de l'ordre de S. Lazare en Terre Sainte," Archives de l'orient latin 2 (1884) 121–157. Literature. P. BERTRAND, Histoire des chevaliers-hospitaliers de Saint-Lazare (Paris 1932). M. HEIMBUCHER, Die Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche, 2 v. (3d ed. Paderborn 1932–34) 1:612–613. E. NASALLI-ROCCA, "Gli ospedali italiani di S. Lazzaro o dei lebbrosi," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 27 (1938) 262–298. R. JANIN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:494.

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

HOSPITALS, HISTORY OF

Hospital history in the Christian era is here discussed under three headings: (1) the Christian hospital to 1500; (2) the hospital from 1500 to the twentieth century; (3) the Catholic hospital in the twentieth century.

1. THE CHRISTIAN HOSPITAL TO 1500

The history of hospitals has been shaped by principles in accord with the teachings of Christ and the commandment of fraternal charity. The origin of the institutions of the early and late Middle Ages that we now call hospitals, was the hospice. The Christian virtue of hospitality (hospitalitas) had broad significance, its application extending to embrace various forms of assistance, both individual and collective, and to meet a diversity of needs. Hospices sheltered travelers, gave help to the poor, the sick, the aged, orphans, abandoned children, and widows.

Diaconia. The earliest forms of Christian "hospital" assistance, organized from the 2d to the 5th centuries around active ecclesiastical centers, had their origin and development in the diaconate. The deacon, collaborating with the presbyter and bishop, had the explicit duty of carrying out the functions of hospitalitas. His duty was to help needy brethren in the name of the Christian community. Around the diaconia a variety of activities, primarily eleemosynary in character, gradually developed into centers of operation, known variously as xenodochia (inns for travelers), nosocomia (infirmaries), brephotrophia (foundling homes), orphanotrophia (orphanages), gerocomia (homes for the aged).

Although permanent charitable institutions were not established until later, the Church early concerned herself with collective assistance as such, depending on individuals to perform this task. Since the functions of deacons included, among others, the providing of material aid to all in need (the indigent, the homeless, widows, orphans, etc.), they could not exclude the care of the sick grouped in institutions. Historians of the diaconia agree in attributing a medical function to deacons; in some instances their duties were those of hospital workers or nurses in the strict sense. The diaconia existed in every city, even in the smaller ones, and very often their names signified that they were hospitals. The diaconiae of Rome in the late Empire were situated usually in municipal buildings located on spacious and convenient sites in the busiest sections of the city.

Byzantine and Western Xenodochia and Hospitals. A specific form of assistance, developing directly from the ancient concept of hospitality, provided for individuals who were obliged to make long journeys for personal or commercial reasons, or in fulfillment of a public responsibility. These works of Christian fraternal charity were intended primarily to help pilgrims on long and dangerous journeys of a religious character to the great sanctuaries of the faith, such as Compostella, Rome, and Jerusalem (see PILGRIMAGES).

The xenodochium (from ξένος, stranger) was the first hospital institution attached to the diaconia. It was open to all in need of shelter, and was originally a hospice for travelers and pilgrims from distant places and in financial need. However, in most cases a change of emphasis gradually took place. Assistance to the sick took precedence over the provision of shelter that was limited by regulation to three days. The name increasingly signified shelter for the sick and in time the xenodochium became synonymous with hospitale. Up to the 9th century in the West xenodochium was used in its Byzantine sense. The Latin word, hospitale, however, was gradually preferred, causing xenodochium to disappear by the 12th century.

Early operative surgical procedure, Bellevue Medical Center, New York. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Public assistance to the sick, already favored by the Church at the time of the institution of the diaconate, was subsequently encouraged by the directives of Emperor CONSTANTINE I, who arranged for the systematic erection of hospitals. Reflecting his actions and the approval of the Council of NICAIA (325), canon 75 of the pseudoapostolic Canones Arabici Nicaeni declared that in every city separate facilities were to be provided for pilgrims, the sick, and the poor.

Such were the origins of public hospitals, or rather of the institutions later to be called hospitals. As activities relating to the care and healing of the sick were extended and improved, the other forms of welfare activity originally included were eliminated from them. The first historical records of institutions of this sort date from the 4th century. A large hospital, the Basiliad, erected by St. BASIL near Caesarea in Cappadocia c. 370, is described by Gregory Nazianzus; the hospital of the Roman matron, FABIOLA, and another erected by the patrician PAMMACHIUS at the mouth of the Tiber, are mentioned by JEROME and others. Subsequently many similar institutions were built with the encouragement of GREGORY THE GREAT and other popes. Along with xenodochia for pilgrims, hospitals for the sick were constructed in various dioceses. Antioch and Alexandria had them, and at Constantinople the earliest hospital activity was associated with JOHN CHRYSOSTOM.

In the West episcopal hospitals were built in Merovingian Gaul during the 6th and 7th centuries; the famous HÔTEL-DIEU DE PARIS, however, supposedly founded by St. LANDRY in 651, can be documented only as early as 829. The hospital of Milan, specializing in assistance to foundlings, was founded in the 8th century by the priest Dateo.

Henceforth hospitals were under the supervision of bishops and their organization varied with the needs of the times. At first they were situated in monasteries, but as they branched out into dioceses, they were located near city cathedrals and in rural parishes in outlying areas. In the cities organizations similar to those of the city hospitals were founded near the cathedral chapters and the houses of Canons Regular. Later both religious and private institutions were established by kings and lords.

These different types of hospital organization developed under specific juridical regulations that determined their essential characteristics. At first ecclesiastical authorities ruled in these juridical matters, as the civil authorities were later to do. The generosity of private donors, under the supervision of bishops, encouraged the steady growth of hospital institutes, a noble work that was to continue to the present time.

In the early period of Christianity, the East played an important part in the history of hospitals. The Eastern Church already had its own bureaucratic organization strongly bound up with the institutions of the Byzantine Empire. The hospital specialization of the East was of great interest, even though it was not adopted in toto by the West. It disappeared during the progressive decadence of the Byzantine Empire, and hospital organization declined also in the West during the age of the barbarian invasions.

Western Hospitals through the Carolingian Age.

Nevertheless, the technical and juridical experience of the Late Empire and of the early Middle Ages bore fruit in later centuries, influencing the affirmation of the medieval world that substituted its own laws for those of the early Christian period. Byzantine juridical tradition, together with the intellectual legacy of the patristic age, both depending on fundamental Gospel principles, helped to mold the thought of the early Middle Ages. Ecclesiastical bodies, such as bishoprics, parishes, and monasteries, on which the society was built, were responsible for the founding and organizing of hospitals. The work represented a moral and juridical obligation in justice and charity. The bishop had the obligation of hospitality, which he fulfilled, not in his own person, but through his priests living in common as "canons regular" in cities and rural parishes. It was they who set up the basic jurisdictional church organization of the Middle Ages from the 4th century onward. They represented the community of the faithful in the earliest civic and religious centers scattered over the countryside—situated along the chief routes, near the centers of trade; in the vicinity of castles, which were seats of government; and in mountain valleys.

In the 8th and 9th centuries, hospitality found expression not only in dioceses and parishes, but also in the monasteries, especially after the period of Benedictine reform. It was considered a fundamental obligation of the monks to exercise hospitality toward travelers. At first it was limited to pilgrims, but it gradually took on the more permanent aspect of hospitality to the sick and the disabled. The Benedictine interest in medicine, evident in the medical manuscripts preserved in their libraries, is perhaps best illustrated by the work of CONSTANTINE THE AFRICAN who provided Monte Cassino and the West with medical translations from Arabic and Greek.

Before the year 1000 an innovation had appeared with the founding of the first private lay hospitals. A few appeared at the peak of the Lombard era, but in the Frankish period their number increased rapidly. These foundations owed their existence primarily to feudal influences and to the Emperor who was the head of organized political society. There were also several imperial hospitals; accordingly, a considerable body of Carolingian legislation regarding hospitals is to be found in the CAPITULARIES.

From Feudal Times to the Age of Communes. In the period following the depression of the 9th and 10th centuries and the weakening of the imperial concept, a form of particularism, typical of the Middle Ages, developed in government and was reflected also in hospital structure. The influence of centralized civil legislation practically disappeared and no longer shaped hospital organization. However, hospitals continued to spring up in great numbers through the 11th and 12th centuries. During this time the canonical legislation of the Church exerted a growing and more exclusive influence. Typical were the "roadside" hospitals, "bridge" hospitals, "valley" hospitals in the Alps and Apennines, and "port" hospitals on the seacoasts.

But where and how did these hospitals come into being and in what form? An interesting phenomenon of this period was the development of what might be called the "hospital guild," the universitas. It had points in common with the more familiar universitas or guild, related to the institutions of Roman law. These new institutions were guilds of the sick and the well alike, organized confraternities of laymen, usually living under a religious rule, who dedicated themselves to the care of the sick. But the sick also were considered to be active members of the hospital community, and as such participated in the financial if not the disciplinary administration of the hospital, which was under the direction and government of the magister. This typical medieval hospital organization is of great interest because it provided the first and most unique forms of statutes, many of them worthy of careful study. For with the establishment of hospital guilds, there emerged a body of hospital law, regulated by Canon Law through decretals, to which were added the interpretations of jurists (see HOSPITALLERS AND HOSPITAL SISTERS).

By the 12th and 13th centuries towns and communes began to grow in size and power. The men of the communes gave an important place to hospitals in the texts of their statutes, but respected the form and structure of hospital guilds, which were at least semi-religious confraternities. It was inconceivable in the Middle Ages for any individual or collective work of charity to be excluded from the discipline of ecclesiastical authority. The communes intervened in political and social matters, however, and sought to assert their influence on these activities.

Meanwhile the generosity of private individuals toward hospitals continued to increase, especially in grants of real estate. Many persons, both men and women, also offered their services to hospitals as nurses, oblates, and lay brothers.

Hospitals of Military Religious Orders. A new development appeared in the rise of military religious orders whose private hospitals were forerunners of many present-day hospitals. The MILITARY ORDERS had gone to the Middle East during the CRUSADES, joining military action in defense of the Holy Land to medical care of the sick and wounded. Among them were the Knights Hospitaller of St. John, founded early in the 12th century (see KNIGHTS OF MALTA), the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, and the HOSPITALLERS OF ST. LAZARUS. The last-named order, also founded in the 12th century, was dedicated specifically to the care of lepers, and had a history all its own. It was founded in the East, but eventually spread to Europe where it established many hospitals.

Another order of the same period, specifically dedicated to hospital work, was the Order of the HOLY SPIRIT, founded by GUY DE MONTPELLIER, propagated throughout Europe and established in Rome by INNOCENT III. A similar group with hospital statutes such as those of the Order of St. John had its seat at Altopascio in Tuscany. The military hospital orders of the Middle Ages disappeared after the loss of the Holy Land. Only one of these survived, the above mentioned Order of St. John, afterward known as the Knights of Rhodes and the Knights of Malta. It resumed its hospital activities in Cyprus, Rhodes, and Malta with the same spirit it had once displayed at Acre.

Rise of Large Hospitals. In the era of the city-states (signorie) of the Renaissance, hospital organization was again transformed. The change, which reached its height at the end of the 15th century, consisted in the centralization of hospitals and the suppression of a great number of small hospitals and infirmaries. The latter had been inspired by the spirit of charity—in itself a praiseworthy effort—but at the same time their proliferation reflected the anarchic and individualistic tendencies of the Middle Ages. There was a futile splintering of effort and initiative. Small hospitals existed often simply to provide sustenance to a few of the fratres of the surviving hospital confraternities, as well as to members of certain types of trade corporations. Some of the hospitals were convinced that they had established effective universitates attached to their own institutions, but many of them had meager resources and few beds.

The centralization of hospitals conformed to political trends of the modern state in the 15th century and to the spirit of the city-states and principalities. This phenomenon of consolidation is of historical and juridical interest for it represented the joining of the exercise of individual spiritual initiative with both traditional and newer forms of economic activity, involving all classes and social institutions, lay and ecclesiastic, individual and collective. Individual and concentric forces could not coalesce, however, without papal sanction and authorization. For ecclesiastical authority continued to have complete supervision and control over all such organizations. This principle had been affirmed in a famous decree of the Council of Vienne of 1311, issued by Pope CLEMENT V in the constitution Quia contingit (Conciliarum oecumenicorum decreta 350–352). Besides papal sanction, the new trend needed local episcopal authorization, and in the area of civil jurisdiction, the authorization of the lords (which was decisive), as well as that of the communes. Henceforth, however, the communes were completely under the control of the lords, and their influence diminished until it was absorbed by royal authority.

By the end of the 15th century large hospitals had been established in the major cities throughout Europe, especially in northern and central Italy. Milan provided a typical example of this trend with the foundation of a hospital sponsored by Duke Francesco Sforza. But in many other European cities there were similar and equally interesting examples of territorial and disciplinary centralization, and of administrative reform involving both ecclesiastical and lay institutions.

The foundation of large hospitals necessitated the construction of new unitary structures or the adapting of old buildings, usually monasteries, and a consequent modification of hospital architecture. Formerly, in the small hospitals there had been a rectangular ward with an altar in the rear, following ancient traditions of Roman and Byzantine architecture. An example of the new 15th-century hospital structure was the Hospital of the Holy Spirit in Rome, on which many subsequent institutions of the same order were modeled. The typical shape of the building was cruciform. The ward usually had four arms with the altar in the center for the celebration of divine services.

Critique of Medieval Hospital Effort. Given the great body of hospital sources still in part unedited, it is difficult to assess the number of hospitals erected in the lands of western Europe. If England in the 14th century could count 600 hospitals, large and small, serving a population of 3,750,000 (1347), the more populous and socially advanced countries of France, Germany, and Italy had many more. The quality of medical and nursing service and the efficiency of administration, however, are the other side of the coin. Until the end of the 14th century, hospitals in France—and presumably elsewhere—were without resident physicians and surgeons. Before that time when professional service was needed, the physician was called in and paid by the day or by the visit. Generally, hospital care included attention to both the temporal and the spiritual needs of the patient. The prevailing view that all medieval hospitals practiced “bed-crowding” needs some emendation. The practice was indeed widespread—in the interest of saving space. But in the larger and better organized hospitals, in addition to a number of oversized beds, accommodating three and four patients, there were always single beds for the serious cases. The latter were also assigned separate wards where special-duty nurses attended their needs day and night.

Upon arrival, the patient was bathed “head and foot”—a practice that perhaps had connotations more religious than sanitary. He was fed wholesome food of the same quality taken by the hospital personnel and, according to the statutes of many hospitals, at fixed times (11 A.M. and 6 P.M.)—before the attendant brothers or sisters had eaten. Medication and treatment tended to be stereotyped, consisting of syrups, herb drinks, bloodletting, and baths. The death rate in medieval hospitals was moderate. At Saint-Jean en l’Estrés in Arras, serving from 2,000 to 4,000 patients annually, the average number of deaths per year between 1307 and 1336 was 102.

The status of medieval hospital nursing was proportionate to the status of medicine in the same period. Yet the religious orientation of most hospital institutions, founded on the traditional virtue of hospitality, generally guaranteed a higher type of bedside service than might be expected. Especially after the development of religious hospital orders of women, living by a rule adapted from the Rule of ST. AUGUSTINE, the sick were treated as “masters of the house.” Abuses were, of course, recurrent; but episcopal supervision of both the finances and the internal department of the religious and lay personnel of the hospital was designed to reform any malpractice and restore the institute’s original fervor.

The tendency for many medieval hospitals in the late Middle Ages, e.g., in France, to become secularized has been noted with some surprise. That this was the result of a growing antagonism between the lay and clerical world is an unwarranted conclusion. The development came about largely for financial reasons. Never affluent, the medieval hospital depended for its income on land (the original foundation and subsequent grants), on rents, decima, donations, annual fund-raising days (such as those approved by INNOCENT III for the hospital of the Holy Spirit in Rome), and by will and testament. Medical care in the Middle Ages, it should be noted, was free to the patient; the obligation for financing his recovery and his return to productive society was corporate. With the devastation of the Hundred Years’ War and its concomitant impoverishment of many hospitals, the Church in France found it increasingly difficult to continue hospital service on the level demanded by the age. The depression of the 14th and 15th centuries increasingly led to urban, lay control of hospital administration and finance.

Bibliography: L. LE GRAND, ed., Statuts d’Hôtels-Dieu et de léproseries (Paris 1901). J. J. WALSH, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 7:480–487. L. LALLEMAND, Histoire de la charité, 4 v. in 5 (Paris 1902–12). H. LECLERQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 6.2:2748–70. R. M. CLAY, The Mediaeval Hospitals of England (London 1909). W. LIESE, Geschichte der Caritas, 2 v. (Freiburg 1922). S. REICKE, Das deutsche Spital und sein Recht im Mittelalter (Stuttgart 1932). G. E. GASK and J. TODD, “The Origin of Hospitals,” Science, Medicine, and History, ed. E. A. UNDERWOOD, 2 v. (New York 1953) 1:122–130. E. NASALLI-ROCCA, Il diritto ospedaliero nei suoi lineamenti storici (Milan 1956). J. IMBERT, Les Hôpitaux en droit canonique (2d. ed Paris 1958). D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953) 250–324. M. T. BASSEREAU, Hôtels-Dieu, hospices, hôpitaux et infirmeries au moyen-âge (Paris 1958). A. PAZZINI, L’ospedale nei secoli (Rome 1958). P. DE ANGELIS, L’ospedale di Santo Spirito in Saxia e le sue filiali nel mondo (Collana di studi storici sull’ ospedale di Santo Spirito in Saxia e sugli ospedali romani; Rome 1958). B. TIERNEY, Medieval Poor Law (Berkeley 1959). Atti del I e II congresso Italiano di storia ospitaliera (Reggio Emilia 1957; Turin 1962). Atti del I congresso europeo di storia ospitaliera (Bologna 1962). U. CRAEMER, Das Hospital als Bautyp des Mittelalters (Cologne 1963).

[E. NASALLI-ROCCA]

2. 1500 TO PRESENT

With the dawn of the 16th century and of the modern era, new forms relating to a changing religious orientation developed in various countries. Ethical criteria and even the juridical organization that had governed the hospitals of Christian Europe in the Middle Ages underwent alteration. This transformation appeared in the change of concepts on which charitable institutions were founded, in the favoring of secularization, the dispersal of religious hospital institutes, and the intervention of absolute kings.

Prior to the Reformation provision for medical care was primarily a local responsibility, shared by the church and the town. The sick poor were cared for in the monasteries or in hospitals that were a combination almshouse, home for the aged, and shelter for the sick. Physicians and attendants were engaged by the community. With the advent of the Reformation and the rise of the absolutist state, management of hospital services became a municipal responsibility. The immediate cause of this transition was the confiscation of church property and revenues, but more remote factors had initiated the trend in this direction. The breakdown of the feudal system and the social unrest and economic changes following the Black Death in 1348–49 contributed to the decline of a rural economy in favor of growing urbanization. The decimation of the population by the plague created a premium on labor, and the availability of higher wages in the cities, combined with the rise of a mercantile class, attracted workers in large numbers.

Nevertheless, the hospitals of the Renaissance perpetuated in new forms a tradition that had already persisted more than 1,000 years. Nearly all modern hospitals, whether they were new or reformed or improved hospitals of former times, had their origins and inspiration in medieval hospitals. For whether medieval hospitals were founded to provide assistance of a general nature or specifically to provide collective care of the sick in the interests of society, they were imbued with the spirit of charity. Awareness of the essential need for fraternal collaboration by all who were united in faith in Christ was their foundation.

Evolution of the Function of Hospitals. The quality of hospital care during the 17th century was very poor. Hospitals were primarily almshouses, serving to isolate from the community those who were considered undesirable rather than providing medical treatment for the ill. However, a trend toward the study and teaching of medicine centered in the hospitals of this period was initiated in Holland with the introduction of bedside teaching in Leiden in 1626. Later in the century, under the leadership of Herman Boerhaave (1668–1738), a Dutch physician and professor of medicine at Leiden, this trend was consolidated and influenced other medical centers, especially in Edinburgh. Francis Bacon was one of its leading exponents in England, although the technique was not actually put into practice there until the 18th century. By the beginning of the 18th century the character and concept of the hospital was becoming more socially constructive, and there was a growing emphasis on its function of treating illness.

The investigations published by John Howard (1726–90), a prison reformer, by James Lind (1716–94), a pioneer of naval hygiene in England, and by M. Tenon, a professor at the Royal Academy in Paris, revealed the deplorable conditions in hospitals of the period and instigated needed reforms. A brief summary of Tenon's findings gives some idea of the conditions, typical in varying degrees, of the hospitals of the period. The mortality rate for the Hôtel Dieu was 25 percent, and the figure included six to 12 percent of the physicians and attendants; mortality for obstetrical patients was one out of 15 and for births one out of 13. Diseases of the 2,500 to 3,000 patients included smallpox, measles, rabies, dysenteries, and fevers of all kinds. In addition there were accident, surgical, and obstetrical cases. Segregation was provided by one ward for smallpox, one for obstetrics, and two for accident and surgical cases; all other patients, including the insane, were grouped indiscriminately. Beds were 52 inches wide and accommodated four to six patients, ranging from convalescent to dying. Surgery was performed without anesthesia under restraint by strapping and powerful attendants. Wards were unheated (except by pails of live coals, a fire hazard) and unventilated, and sanitary facilities consisted of five seats over a sewer per 583 patients, plus a few commode chairs for the nonambulatory. All waste was disposed of in these same sewers.

At the beginning of the 18th century the involuntary hospital, supported by the community and designed for the curable poor, appeared in England and France. The municipal hospital administered by stewards appointed by the city council dates from the same period. Toward mid-18th century special hospitals for the treatment of specific illness, e.g., venereal (lock hospitals), smallpox, chest, eye, and orthopedic diseases, were developed, as well as lying-in and mental hospitals, lazarettos, and hospitals for incurables.

In the American colonies a hospital for sick soldiers was built on Manhattan Island in 1633, but it was not until mid-18th century that hospitals functioning without interruption from their foundation were established. The oldest of these hospitals is Philadelphia General, which evolved from a public almshouse for the infirm and insane. The first incorporated hospital for the cure of the physically and mentally ill, receiving its charter from the King of England in 1751, was the Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia. It provided city physicians with a facility for treatment of private patients and was not charitable in purpose. It is the prototype of the modern voluntary, nonprofit hospital. The New York General Hospital and the New York Dispensary were founded in 1791; and Bellevue, which originated as an infirmary in the public workhouse (1736), became a general hospital in 1816. It established the first city ambulance service in the world in 1869. In Boston, the Massachusetts General and the MacLean Hospital for the Insane were founded in 1813, and by 1825 there were general hospitals in Baltimore, Maryland; Cincinnati, Ohio; and Savannah, Georgia. The American Medical Association (AMA) was founded in 1847.

Mental hospitals, as such, date their development from later in the 18th century. For centuries prior to that time, ignorance, superstition, and moral condemnation dominated the treatment of the insane. They were confined in jails, workhouses, and so-called madhouses for the protection of the community. More humane and enlightened treatment was initiated by Philippe Pinel (1745–1826) in France and by William Tuke (1732–1822) in England. Pinel, a physician to the Bicêtre in Paris, replaced brutality with humane treatment for the mentally ill male patients under his charge. Tuke, a Quaker merchant, interested the Society of Friends in founding the York Retreat in 1792 to replace the York Asylum (1777). The new institution incorporated a regimen of care for mental patients based on Christian principles and common sense. It represented a major influence in effecting reforms throughout Great Britain, the Continent, and the United States. The Friends' Asylum in Frankford, Pennsylvania (1817) and the Bloomingdale Asylum in New York (1821) were patterned after it. Dorothea Dix (1802–87), an American philanthropist and reformer, worked for legislation and the establishment of proper hospital facilities for the mentally ill in the United States and was instrumental in the founding of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Washington, D.C. (1855). She was directly responsible for the foundation or enlargement of 30 other mental hospitals. By 1870 there were approximately 50 public and 16 private mental hospitals in the United States, having a total capacity of 17,000 patients. This trend implemented the scientific study of various mental illness.

The development of military hospitals is also of significance. With the rise of national states in the 15th and 16th centuries, a form of military hospital emerged. Queen Isabella is credited with maintaining a field hospital service, and in the late 16th century there were stationary military hospitals in England and in Pamplona, Spain. France and Prussia, however, gave the first real impetus to the development of military hospitals on a large scale. In the United States by the end of the 18th century, permanent army, navy, and marine general hospitals had been established; and in the 19th century station hospitals were attached to army posts. Hospitals for sick and wounded soldiers during the Civil War embodied principles later applied to postwar civilian hospitals and adapted by the Germans during the Franco-Prussian War. Base and evacuation hospital units, composed of medical and nursing teams from civilian hospitals, were introduced in World War I.

Modern Hospital Care. In the latter part of the 19th century there began to emerge a type of health facility that was to evolve into the highly scientific, well-managed, 20th-century hospital. Many forces were developing that would change the character of the hospital from a forbidding, infection-laden last resort for the indigent dying to a modern, aseptic institution in which emphasis was placed on curative procedures.

Under the influence of Florence Nightingale and certain religious congregations of women, nursing became an art dedicated to giving continuous care to sick beings. This influence of improved nursing brought order and cleanliness to hospital wards and provided a means of giving, on a continuing basis, the care the physician prescribed. The discovery and use of anesthesia made possible longer and more delicate surgical procedures. In 1847 Ignaz Philipp Semmelweis (1818–65) of Vienna demonstrated that infections were transmitted by personal carriers; a few years later Louis Pasteur (1822–95), by his discovery of the reproduction of bacteria, originated the modern science of bacteriology and the beginnings of the hospital clinical laboratory. At the end of the 19th century Joseph Lord Lister (1827–1912), carrying Pasteur's work further, proved that wound healing could be hastened by the use of antiseptics.

The acceptance and use of these discoveries by physicians and nurses practicing in the hospital gave the institution a completely new image. Thus began the institutional evolution that made the hospital an environment where advancements in medicine would be attracted. Medical students and young physicians were sent to the hospital for basic and advanced education. Formal nursing education first reached professional status in the hospital and the hospital school. Physicians and hospital officials, mobilizing all of these forces, translated them into better patient care. Improved procedures and standards of care attracted patients in numbers that required a rapid and continuing expansion in facilities and services up to and beyond the mid-20th century. The United Federal government constructed an elaborate system of hospitals for veterans of military service in addition to large numbers of general and special hospitals. There developed a widespread awareness of the important role of the hospital in the health of the people. All types of hospitals—governmental, voluntary, and religious—accepted responsibility for developing and giving the best possible care.

Bibliography: N. W. FAXON, The Hospital in Contemporary Life (Cambridge, England 1949). A. C. BACHMEYER and G. HARTMAN, eds., The Hospital in Modern Society (New York 1943). G. ROSEN, Encyclopedia Americana 14:427–433. J. J. WALSH, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 7:480–488. C. U. LETOURNEAU, “A History of Hospitals,” Hospital Management 87 (1959), March, April, May, June.

[A. B. MCPADDEN/J. FLANAGAN]

3. CATHOLIC HOSPITALS

Catholic health care began in America under the sponsorship of religious communities of women. As health services became institutionalized, the Catholic hospital evolved a parallel course with nonprofit, public, and investor owned institutions. Because Catholic health care institutions developed in concert with secular institutions, they are an integral part of the American health care establishment and share the concerns of other providers of health care. When the Catholic Hospital Association of the United States and Canada was organized in 1915, there were 541 Catholic hospitals in the United States. By 2001, Catholic hospitals were the largest group of not-for-profit hospitals, and accounted for 11 percent of all admissions to community hospitals.

After 1950 lay personnel began to take an increasingly important place in the operation and management of Catholic hospitals. Not only did they come to constitute the major part of the nursing and technical staff, but they held administrative positions as supervisors, department heads, accountants, purchasing agents, personnel directors, and assistant and associate administrators. By the late 1980s, lay administrators sat in board rooms of Catholic hospitals.

It became clear by the early years of the 20th century that the Catholic hospital could not concentrate on care of the indigent sick alone. Because the well-organized hospital had become the center for improved care, physicians tended to bring their patients to the hospital rather than to see them in their homes. Like other health care facilities Catholic hospitals found themselves assuming the responsibility of caring for patients who could pay for their care. Gradually all hospitals, including Catholic, were expected to serve the communities in which they were located by providing a level of care that reflected the advances in medicine, nursing, and paramedical services.

This acceptance of community responsibility necessitated a more complex administrative organization and forced the hospitals to conduct their activities in a more businesslike manner. General and financial administration became important functions in developing health services that were both apostolic and professional in nature.

Health Care Systems. The economic depression that began in 1929 sharply focused attention upon the difficulties many people had been experiencing in paying for hospital care. From this experience developed a program of prepaid hospital care: by paying regular monthly premiums individuals and families insured the payment of their basic hospital expenses in the event of illness. This program, known as the Blue Cross Plan, spread and a similar voluntary plan of prepaying doctor's bills, popularly known as the Blue Shield Plan, was developed. The success of these plans stimulated many commercial insurance companies to offer their own group health insurance programs.

In 1965 the federal government began funding health insurance for people over 65 years of age (Medicare) and supported health insurance for recipients of state welfare programs (Medicaid), making it the major health insurance agency in the country. In the nineties, Medicaid was separated from the welfare program and the state children's health insurance program (SCHIP) was added to make health insurance available to poor children whose mothers were not eligible for welfare.

Another force to be considered in the Catholic health care environment is the development of multi-institutional groups or systems, one or more hospitals owned, leased, or managed by a central organization. Although investor-owned systems dominate the multi-hospital establishment, local systems in the non-sectarian voluntary sector have joined together. There has also been system development under Catholic sponsorship. In 2001, there were 61 multi-hospital systems under Roman Catholic auspices. The Catholic systems are unique in that they offer a continuum of care which includes senior housing programs, adult day care, home health and hospice programs and community-based services, often linked to Catholic Charities. The emergence of the for profit hospital systems and the development of managed care as the dominant form of health insurance re-inforce competition, concern with return on equity, and innovative marketing and management techniques designed to attract cost-conscious physicians and insured patients to investor-owned and not-for-profit acute care hospitals.

Hospitals under Catholic sponsorship experience financially driven health care as a tension between mission and market. The awakened fiscal consciousness in all parts of the health community has stimulated mergers between Catholic and non-Catholic hospitals. Strengthening the essence and meaning of Catholic identity and sponsorship of hospitals is a continuing concern. In the years before the Second Vatican Council, Catholic hospitals were identified with the numbers of women and men religious in administrative and clinical positions. In 1965, 96.8 percent of administrators in Catholic hospitals were religious; by 1986, the figure was 38.9 percent, and the number continued to decline. It is no longer possible to explain the mission of Catholic hospitals by reference to the presence of religious sponsors in acute care hospitals.

The Catholic Mission. The charism that prompted attention to the sick as a work of mercy, the autonomy and decision making processes of the sponsoring religious communities, the age and declining numbers of religious women engaged in health ministry, and the growing secularization in the health care field threatens the continuation of large health care systems under Catholic auspices and Catholic influence in acute care. New structures, like the leadership development and mission integration programs that exist in Catholic systems and the revised ethical and religious directives for Catholic health care services, are being developed to present, monitor, and preserve the enactment of the Catholic health care ethic.

Bibliography: Health and Health Care: A Pastoral Letter of the American Catholic Bishops (Washington, D.C. 1981). "Is Religion a Competitive Edge?" Hospitals (April 20, 1987). R. A. MCCORMICK, Health and Medicine in the Catholic Tradition (New York 1984). THE CATHOLIC HEALTH ASSOCIATION, Annual Report (St. Louis 2001–86); No Room in the Market Place: The Health Care of the Poor (St. Louis 1986).

[J. FLANAGAN/R. DONLEY]

HÖSS, CRESCENTIA, BL.

Eminent mystic of the Franciscan Third Order; b. Kaufbeuren, Bavaria, Oct. 20, 1682; d. there, April 5, 1744. From her childhood she showed unusual spiritual maturity and special regard for virginity. The benevolence of the Protestant burgomeister assisted her entrance into the Franciscan convent, frustrated earlier by her lack of the needed dowry. There she endured the severe trials that developed her religious perfection. During her appointment as mistress of novices and superior, her reputation for visions, ecstasy, prophecy, and the mystical suffering of the Passion, brought her into correspondence with ecclesiastics and many of the Catholic and Protestant laity. She was beatified by LEO XIII on October 7, 1900. In 1849, six sisters from Kaufbeuren came to Milwaukee, Wis., and founded the first community of the Franciscan Tertiaries in the U.S.

Feast: April 6 (formerly April 5).

Bibliography: R. PAZZELLI, Il Terz'ordine regolare di S. Francesco (Rome 1958). E. SCHLUND, Zeitschrift für Ascese und Mystik 2:295–319. A. M. MILLER, Crescentia von Kaufbeuren; das Leben einer schwäbischen Mystikerin (Augsburg 1968), extensive bibliography. D. OTT, Crescentia Höss v. Kaufbeuren in der Sicht

ihrer Zeit, ed. J. GATZ (Landshut 1971). M. J. HEINRICHSPERGER, Die Ältesten Quellen zum Leben der Schwester Crescentia Höss (Landshut 1975), critical ed. F. BOESPFLUG, Dieu dans l'art: Sollicitudini Nostrae de Benoît XIV et l'affaire Cresence de Kaufbeuren (Paris 1984). R. GLÄSER, Die selige Crescentia von Kaufbeuren: Leben, Worte, Schriften und Lehre (St. Ottilien 1984). K. PÖRNACHER, Crescentia Höss von Kaufbeuren (Weissenhorn 1993).

[V. PETRICCIONE]

HOSTIENSIS (HENRY OF SEGUSIO)

Hostiensis (Henry of Segusio, Enrico Bartolomei), cardinal and canonist whose writings exerted a great influence on Canon Law in the 13th century; b. Susa (Segusia, Diocese of Turin), c. 1200; d. Lyon, Oct. 25 or Nov. 6, 1271. He was not only one of the most famous DECRETALISTS, he proved himself also a capable diplomat. Hostiensis studied civil law in Bologna at the time of Sinibaldus de' Fieschi (later Pope Innocent IV), under Jacobus Balduinus and Homobono, and Canon Law under JAMES OF ALBENGA. Later he taught, perhaps at Bologna and certainly at Paris (1239). Before 1233 he became a cleric; he was appointed prior of Antibes (perhaps in 1234), and made frequent visits to England, where he gained the confidence of Henry III. When consecrated bishop of Sisteron (at the end of 1243), Hostiensis soon caught the eye of Innocent IV, and he was appointed archbishop of Embrun (about 1250). He was entrusted with a mission to Germany in support of William of Holland (1251–52) and with other legations, particularly that to Treviso against the ghibelline Ezzelino (1259). Named cardinal by Urban IV (1262), he continued to discharge numerous duties until the conclave of Viterbo, which he was compelled to abandon because of illness (June 1270).

Works. He began his Summa in 1239 in Paris; it was partially destroyed by a fire, but he continued and completed it in 1253 at Embrun. This monumental work, often called Summa 'Copiosa', was inspired by the writings of Pillius (De feudis), but most of all by the works of Godfrey of Trani and of Azo, from which some passages were taken word for word. Nevertheless, the originality of the work cannot be doubted. If Hostiensis followed the decretals of GREGORY IX, he also added many new titles. He made a synthesis of Roman law and Canon Law and thus accomplished a summary of the utrumque ius. This treatise became the vade mecum of canonists until the 17th century.

The Lectura in novellas Innocentii IV followed the Summa almost immediately, but preceded the bull Ad explicandos (Sept. 9, 1253). It is a commentary on the decretals of the Collectio I and II, on five decretals from the Collectio III (28 s. 32, 40 s.), and on two extravagantes

(see QUINQUE COMPILATIONES ANTIQUAE). Also to be noted are a short treatise on the framing of a decree concerning episcopal elections [cf. A. von Vretsckho, Ein Traktat d. Kard. H. in Deutsche Zeitschr. f. KR 17 (1907) 73- ] and the Diamargariton (MS 993 Leipzig University Library). The Lectura in quinque libros decretalium, like the Summa, goes back to the time of Hostiensis' teaching in Paris, and is thought to have been written at the request of Alexander IV. That it was completed is known from the author's testament (April 30, 1271). All the decretals are commented on, but some rather briefly. The spirit of this work appears to be somewhat different from that of the Summa: the author is more openly under the influence of theologians than previously (HUGH OF SAINT-CHER, ODO OF CHÂTEAUROUX). As a result Canon Law is often presented in opposition to Roman law; thus, the aequitas canonica is preferred to the ius civile. The importance of the commentary allowed the author to make more frequent references than in the Summa to canonists and civil jurists who had preceded him and to contemporaries such as BERNARD OF PARMA and Innocent IV. In it he criticized Innocent often and somewhat sharply for his devotion to Roman law and was at pains (10.3, 5, 33) to emphasize that the Lectura represents his own considered state of mind.

Principles. The chronicler Rolandino of Padua has underlined Hostiensis' profound knowledge of both canon and civil law, as well as his being theologia scientia plenus. This is apparent particularly in the Lectura: emphasis is put on aequitas canonica, on natural law, on good faith, on sin, but also on the power of the pope and on the power of bishops. Theological principles are given precedence over juridical concepts.

Natural law is divided into rational and common. The former must be respected by any positive law and by any institution. Its violation brings with it sin, and every effort must be made in order to avoid sin: in fact, the periculum animae is to be avoided before all. Many a time Hostiensis invoked this principle in order to reject a solution sponsored by some canonists. This recourse to the gospel also led him to emphasize equity, which he claimed should be invoked not only in the application or nonapplication of law, but also in its interpretation. In the same spirit, he admitted the binding force of natural obligations and of good faith, particularly in matters of prescription, except in respect to custom (because of its nature). This same approach is found again in connection with summary procedure and, above all, when he treats of the gospel condemnation of sin (denunciatio evangelica).

Hostiensis held for the plenitude of papal power. If he allowed that the civil and spiritual powers were completely distinct, he recognized that the pope could intervene in an imperial vacancy, as well as when (ratione peccati) an imperial incumbent was disqualified because of sin (a fortiori in cases of a refusal to admit justice). For Hostiensis, this papal control of the imperium derived from the Church, which in turn had inherited it from the Roman Empire and from Christ.

Manuscript opening page from "Summa Copiosa," 13th century, by Hostiensis.

The influences of Hostiensis' works, especially of the Summa, have been considerable, although the Lectura numbers fewer manuscripts and fewer editions than the Summa. However, unlike Innocent IV or the glossa ordinaria, Hostiensis was not held to possess the authority to offset a standard interpretation (opinio communis).

Bibliography: C. LEFEBVRE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935-65) 5:1211-27, with complete bibliog.; "La Doctrine de l'Hostiensis sur la préférence à assurer en droit aux intérêts spirituels," Ephemerides iuris canonici 8 (1952) 24-44. N. DIDIER, "Henri de Suse en Angleterre (1236?-1244)," Studi in onore di Vincenzo Arangio-Ruiz, 4 v. (Naples 1952) 2:333-351. P. VACCARI, "Teologia e diritto canonico nel XII se-colo," in Scritti in onore di Contardo Ferrini, 4 v. (Milan 1947–49) 1:418–428. G. SIMON, La Conception du droit naturel chez un canoniste du XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle, Henri de Suse, cardinal d'Hostie (doctoral diss. unpub. Institut Catholique, Paris 1954). G. LE BRAS, "Théologie et droit romain dans Henri de Suse," Études historiques à la mémoire de Noël Didier (Paris 1960) 195–204; et al., Sources et théorie du droit au moyen-âge (Paris 1964), passim. P. MICHAUD-QUANTIN, "Commentaires sur les deux premières décrétales du recueil de Grégoire IX au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle," in Die Metaphysik im Mittelalter, ed. P. WILPERT (Miscellanea Mediaevalia 2; Berlin 1963) 103–109.

[C. LEFEBVRE]

HOTCHKIN, JOHN FRANCIS

Ecumenist, theologian, and priest; b. Mokena, Illinois, Feb. 3, 1935, d. Washington, D.C., June 24, 2001; son of John E. and Sarah (Cure) Hotchkin; ordained in Rome (July 12, 1959) for the Archdiocese of Chicago, Hotchkin served in two successive parish assignments in Chicago (1960–4). Albert Cardinal Meyer assigned him in 1964 for further studies in Rome during the Second Vatican Council when major shifts were occurring in Catholic thinking—on the nature of the church, the promotion of Christian unity, and relations with Jews and peoples of other Religions—that would shape the career of the future ecumenical leader. Hotchkin earned a doctorate in sacred theology with a specialization in ecumenical theology from the Pontifical Gregorian University (1966). He accepted an appointment to the U. S. Catholic bishops' conference and its Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs (SEIA) beginning Jan. 1, 1967; in April 1971, he became SEIA Executive Director, a post he would hold until his death.

Hotchkin was a member of the U. S. Faith and Order Commission and other joint commissions co-sponsored by the National Council of Churches of Christ in the USA, and beginning in 1967 he served as a Catholic observer and consultant to the Consultation on Church Union, attending every plenary assembly from its inception. He received numerous appointments: observer to the fifth Assembly of the Lutheran World Federation (Evian, 1970); delegate to the first Assembly of the World Conference on Religion and Peace (Kyoto, 1970); consultor to the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity (1973), renewed every five years for the rest of his life; voting member, international Roman Catholic-Lutheran Commission (1973–84); observer to the fifth Assembly of the World Council of Churches (Nairobi, 1975), to the sixth assembly of the same body (Vancouver, 1983), and to the World Convocation on Justice, Peace, and the Integrity of Creation (Seoul, 1990); co-chairman of the Anglican-Roman Catholic Consultation on Women's Ordination (Versailles, 1978); consultor to the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue (1985–90); and observer to the signing of the Joint Declaration on Justification by Faith (Augsburg, 1999).

Among his awards were: James Fitzgerald Award for Ecumenism (1990), National Association of Diocesan Ecumenical Officers; Patron of Christian Unity (1991), the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Joseph Cardinal Bernardin Laureate in Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs (1997), Archdiocese of Chicago; and Paul Wattson Christian Unity Award (2000), Franciscan Friars of the Atonement.

Under his direction, ecumenical dialogues were initiated with the Oriental Orthodox Churches, the Polish National Catholic Church, the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), and the Southern Baptist Convention. These and the already ongoing ecumenical dialogues produced dozens of reports during his tenure; among these, two were ostensibly significant in increasing reconciliation between Christian communities and the Catholic Church: the U. S. Lutheran-Catholic dialogue report, Justification by Faith (1983), and the Polish National Catholic-Roman Catholic report, Journeying Together in Christ (1990). In addition, he played a significant role in the preparation of two evaluations by the U. S. bishops' conference of international ecumenical documents that affected meaningfully the worldwide response to these documents: The Final Report (1981) of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission and Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (1982).

Finally, he often drew attention to Facing Unity (1984), a report of the international Roman Catholic-Lutheran Commission produced while he was a member, as an example of a new and third stage in the ecumenical movement that he termed "phased reconciliation." While Executive Director, Hotchkin successfully added to the Secretariat expertise in the fields of interreligious relations and Eastern Christianity, expanding the staff from five to nine. In 2001, the BCEIA established a Subcommittee on Interreligious Dialogue. At the time of Hotchkin's death, there were nine Christian bi-lateral dialogues, two dialogues with Jewish groups, and three dialogues with Islamic groups—all benefitting from his guidance in varying degrees. Hotchkin was at the service of the whole conference of Catholic bishops whether offering insight on a particular case, updating progress on Christian unity, drafting reflections on a theological or pastoral question, or responding to ecumenical texts.

As a long-time participant in the ecumenical movement, Hotchkin was often requested to offer insights and observations on various aspects of the progress towards Christian unity. Numerous church leaders and ecumenical staff sought his counsel. In an address on the 1993 Ec- umenical Directory to the National Association of Diocesan Ecumenical Officers, he reminded them that “the work of ecumenism is to remove all obstacles to that communion so this energy and life may flow forth with ever greater power and abundance” and thus “that is why ecumenism is not something extra or a specialty for a few; it is a constitutive element of our very lives as Christians” (Origins, 24, 3). In the Hecker Lecture for 1995, reviewing the ecumenical movement, he deduced that “what is developing among us is so far reaching and loaded with implications that it is hard to think it all through and see it whole.” He cited Vatican II’s Decree on Ecumenism, saying that indeed movement to restore unity “transcends human energies.” In an address to the Mercersburg Society in 1998, he observed that “dialogue can only appear a magic sure-fire trick to those who have not tried it” and described how theological progress is experienced in dialogue: “At different points, after an arduous trek, I can almost name the day and the hour when a corner was turned, the key turned in the lock of a previously barred passageway.” He noted that “at such moments a truly palpable sense of relief and lifting of the atmosphere.” In his last published piece, an address to the Canon Law Society of America (2000), Hotchkin affirmed that there can be no real reconciliation without true repentance: “What we experience in our individual spiritual growth, Christian communities also will experience in their growth in unity.” A few weeks later, when he received the Paul Wattson Award, he expressed the hope that Christians of the third millennium will be remembered as “those who worked and succeeded with the Lord’s help to free themselves of splits and divisions and be blessed with reconciliation in the unity which will ever be Christ’s will and prayer for us, that we may be one, as he and the Father are one, that this old world may believe. And have hope.”

His published works included contributions to the New Catholic Encyclopedia and the New Dictionary of Sacramental Worship. His prominent essays and articles include: “Ministry – An Ecumenical Concern,” The American Ecclesiastical Review 161 (1969) 386–95; “Ecumenism in the 1970s: Is There a New Direction?” CTSA Proceedings 31 (1976) 203–15; “Familiaris Consortio: New Light on Mixed Marriages,” One in Christ 22 (1986) 73–9; “Bilaterals: Phasing into Unity?” Journal of Ecumenical Studies 23 (1986) 404–11; “Standards for Measuring Ecumenism’s Course,” Origins 20, 32 (Jan. 17, 1991) 509–14; “Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism,” Ecumenism 117 (March 1995) 4–12, appeared earlier in Origins 24, 3 (June 2, 1994): 23–8; “The Third Stage of Ecumenism,” Occasional Paper, No. 45, Institute for Ecumenical and Cultural Research, Collegeville, MN (November 1995), appeared also in Origins 25, 21 (Nov. 9, 1995): 355–61; and “Canon Law and Ecumenism: Giving Shape to the Future,” CLSA Proceeding 62 (2000) 1–16, appeared also in Origins 30, 19 (Oct. 19, 2000) 289–98.

[J. BORELLI]

HÔTEL-DIEU DE PARIS

Hospital located near Notre Dame cathedral in Paris. Having grown out of an early monastery that was transformed into a hospice for the poor in the 9th century, the Hôtel-Dieu was a dependency of the cathedral chapter of Notre Dame by 1006. It was called the Hôpital Notre Dame at that time, but during the 12th century it became known as the Maison-Dieu de Paris—the modern name of Hôtel-Dieu being a late medieval term. From the middle of the 12th century—when it seems to have begun accepting the sick of Paris rather than the poor—the Hôtel-Dieu was continually enriched by donations. During the 13th century the kings expanded the hospital on the land lying along the Seine between the cathedral and the Petit Pont: the hospital consisted of three large Gothic halls divided by rows of pillars. Vaults (the famous “cagnards”) protected the building against floods. The oldest known rule for the hospital dates from this time (1217) and is attributed to the canon Stephen. It required a sick person to confess and receive Communion before being admitted; he was then brought to a bed and from then on the lay brothers and sisters serving the hospital were to treat him as master of the house. During the late 13th century, religious replaced the lay brothers and sisters. In 1352 King John the Good granted the Hôtel-Dieu the right to levy a tax on all seafood and other produce brought into Paris. At the same time the guilds were to provide the meals for the hospital on stated days. Louis XI provided a new building for the sick. Because of certain abuses, the Parlement of Paris in 1505 deprived the cathedral canons of the temporal administration of the hospital and entrusted it to eight townsmen. At the same time the Parlement requested the chapter to reform the religious men and women who staffed the hospital, but it was only under Prioress Geneviève (Soeur du Saint Nom de Jesus) Bouquet (d.1665) that the discipline of the hospital’s AUGUSTINIAN NUNS (the male branch of the community having disappeared) was fully restored. Meanwhile, in an effort to relieve the shortage of beds and to isolate the plague victims, Francis I founded the Hôpital de la Charité. In 1530 the generosity of Cardinal A. Duprat provided for the building of the Salle du Légat. Under HENRY IV, when the hospital had 500 beds, the buildings were reinforced and the St. Thomas and St. Louis halls were remodeled: a several-storied structure replaced the ogival naves. Be-

Exercice des Religieuses de l'Hotel Dieu de

Paris a 5. heures et demy du matin.

- A. Religieuses faisant les lits a la paille des malades avec vne Nouice*
- B. jeune Religieuse faisant boire vn malade*
- C. Religieuse et vne nouice portant vn mort a la Salle des morts*
- D. Nouices ecurant les bassins des malades*
- E. Jeunes Nouices rendant les bassins aux malades.*
- F. Nouice baleyant la Salle*

"Exercice des Religieuses de l'hôtel Dieu de Paris a 5 heures et demy du matin," Paris. (©CORBIS)

ginning in 1626 the Pont-au-Double was built and surmounted by the Rosary House connecting the later St. Jacques and St. Charles halls, built along the left bank of the Seine. In 1634 St. VINCENT DE PAUL doubled the hospital's religious staff by introducing the Ladies of Charity. Despite the founding of the Hôpital Sainte-Anne for contagious cases and the Hôpital General, the old Hôtel-Dieu proved inadequate. In 1709, for example, some 6,000 patients were admitted while the hospital had been planned for only 2,000. During the night of Dec. 30–31, 1772, fire destroyed almost all the buildings along the right bank. In the new hospital, Louis XVI prescribed facilities for 3,000 patients, with a single bed for each, and with halls segregated according to sex and particular illnesses. During the French Revolution (1791) the hospitals of Paris were entrusted to a commission of five members, and the Hôtel-Dieu became the Grand Hospice d'Humanité. Rebuilt at the beginning of the 19th century and reserved for serious illnesses exclusively, the Hôtel-Dieu proved again to be too small. It was demolished under the Second Empire and rebuilt (1868–78), not at its previous location, but along the northern side of Notre-Dame Square, and the principal façade of the three buildings, which altogether occupy an area of about 5 acres, faces on the square itself. The Augustinian nuns who were expelled from the Hôtel-Dieu in 1907 went to the hospital of Notre-Dame-de-Bon-Secours, which was also in Paris.

Bibliography: F. DISSARD, La Réforme des hôpitaux et maladies au XVIIe siècle (Paris 1938). P. VALLERY-RADOT, Nos hôpitaux parisiens, v.2: Un siècle d'histoire hospitalière. . . (Paris 1949). H. LEGIER-DESGRANGES, Hospitaliers d'autrefois (Paris 1952). E. WICKERSHEIMER, Les Édifices hospitaliers à travers les âges (Paris 1953). P. PARENT, Vieux hôpitaux parisiens (Paris 1943).

[J. DAOUST]

HOUBEN, CHARLES OF MOUNT ARGUS, BL.

Baptized Johannes Andreas, Passionist missionary priest; b. Dec. 11, 1821, Munstergeleen, the Netherlands; d. Jan. 5, 1893, Dublin, Ireland. The fourth of the 11 children of Peter Joseph and Elizabeth Houben, Johannes had difficulties with his studies, yet persevered and realized his religious vocation. While serving five years in the military reserves (1840–45), Houben worked in his uncle's mill. He entered the Passionist novitiate (1845), took his vows (1846) and the name Charles of St. Andrew, and was ordained (1850). Thereafter he worked among the poor and humble in England. In July 1857 he was assigned to the Mount Argus Retreat House, Dublin, Ireland, where he distinguished himself through his apostolate as a confessor. He remained in Dublin the remainder of his life, except for a short return to England in 1866. Houben suffered patiently in his later years. Since 1949 his relics have been interred in the Passionist church at Mount Argus. Pope John Paul II praised Houben during his beatification ceremony (Oct. 16, 1988) for his ecumenical work and ministry of reconciliation.

Bibliography: P. F. SPENCER, To Heal the Broken-Hearted (Dublin 1988).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HOUCK, GEORGE FRANCIS

Diocesan chancellor, author; b. Tiffin, Ohio, July 9, 1847; d. Lakewood, Ohio, March 26, 1916. He was the son of John and Odile (Fischer) Houck, both natives of Germany. He was educated in Ohio at Heidelberg College, Tiffin; Mount St. Mary's Seminary, Cincinnati; and St. Mary's Seminary, Cleveland. After his ordination on July 4, 1875, he was pastor of St. Joseph Church, Crestline, Ohio, until 1877, when he was appointed first chancellor of the Diocese of Cleveland and secretary to the bishop. While holding these offices under Bps. Richard Gilmour, Ignatius F. Horstmann, and John P. Farrelly, he also served (1877–94) as the first Catholic chaplain to the Cleveland Workhouse and as chaplain at St. Vincent Charity Hospital. He organized the diocesan system of burials in Catholic cemeteries and purchased the property for Calvary Cemetery, the largest in the diocese in 1900. Under Gilmour, he acted as spokesman for the diocese in refuting the violent anti-Catholic attacks that appeared in the Cleveland Leader. In 1905 he was made a domestic prelate, and in 1909 he resigned as chancellor and retired as chaplain to the convent of the Sisters of Charity of ST. AUGUSTINE.

Houck devoted much of his time in his early years to the organizational task of bringing order to a rapidly growing diocese. This work brought him into close contact with individual parish administrations and led to his exhaustive History of the Catholic Church in Northern Ohio and the Diocese of Cleveland (2 v. 1903).

[N. J. CALLAHAN]

HOUGHTON, JOHN, ST.

Carthusian martyr; b. Essex, England, ca. 1487; d. Tyburn (London), May 4, 1535. He received the LL.B. degree at Cambridge in 1506. To avoid the marriage planned by his parents, who were of minor gentry, he left home to live with a secular priest who trained him for ordination. In about 1514 he entered the London Charterhouse, then governed by the Irish Prior Tynbygh. There he served for seven years as sacristan, and for four years as procurator. In May 1531 he was elected prior of Beauvale in Nottinghamshire, but returned to London in November to succeed the deceased Prior Batemanson. In the next year he was chosen by the chapter general to be covisitor of the English province.

During his visitation of Mountgrace Priory in Yorkshire occurred an incident said to presage his future martyrdom. The traveling clothes of both visitators were left to dry, and Houghton's were found pecked and torn by birds, whereas his companion's were untouched. The details of his interior life and external administration attest to his reputation for holiness, austerity, zeal for the Divine Office, love of books, enlightened handling of his subjects. He is said to have had the gift of tears. His confessor was the martyr, Bl. William EXMEW.

In April 1534 Houghton with his procurator, Bl. Humphrey MIDDLEMORE, was imprisoned in the Tower for a month for refusing to swear to the Act of Succession, which denied the validity of HENRY VIII's marriage to CATHERINE OF ARAGON. They were persuaded to take the oath with the reservation "as far as it was lawful." On February 15, 1535, the king announced his title of supreme head of the English Church. After being advised by Father Fewterer, confessor general of the Bridgettines of Syon, that he must die rather than accept this title (advice that this counselor did not himself keep), Houghton convened his monks and warned them of the danger.

At the beginning of April, accompanied by St. Robert LAWRENCE and St. Augustine WEBSTER, priors of Beauvale and Axholme, he called upon Thomas Cromwell for a form of the oath that would be acceptable in conscience. Instead of being granted their request, they were imprisoned in the Tower together with St. Richard REYNOLDS, a Bridgettine of Syon. On April 20 they were examined by royal commissioners and sent to trial in Westminster Hall. They pleaded not guilty since they had not seditiously opposed the king's supremacy. A hesitant jury after two days and pressure from Cromwell found them guilty. On May 4, accompanied by Bl. John HAILE, the aged vicar of Isleworth, and seen from a window by Thomas MORE and his daughter, Margaret Roper, these protomartyrs were placed on hurdles, dragged to Tyburn, where they were hanged, cut down while alive, eviscerated, and quartered. As the executioner groped for his heart, Houghton was heard by a spectator, Anthony Rescius, OP, to say, "Good Jesu, what will ye do with my heart?" Houghton was canonized by Paul VI on October 25, 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Feast: Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

Bibliography: Contemporary accounts by M. CHAUNCY, "De B.B. Martyribus Carthusiensibus in Anglia," ed. F. VAN ORTROY, Analecta Bollandiana 14 (1895) 268-283; "Martyrum Monachorum Carthusianorum in Anglia Passio minor," ed. F. VAN ORTROY, ibid., 22 (1903) 51-78; Passion and Martyrdom of the Holy English Carthusian Fathers, tr. A. F. RADCLIFFE (New York 1936). L. HENDRIKS, London Charterhouse, Its Monks and Its Martyrs (London 1889). E. M. THOMPSON, The Carthusian Order in England (New York 1930). L. E. WHATMORE, Blessed Carthusian Martyrs (London 1962). El Beato Juan Houghton, 1487-1535 (Madrid 1965).

[L. E. WHATMORE]

HOUSELANDER, FRANCES CARYLL

Writer and artist; b. Bath, England, Sept. 29, 1901; d. London, Oct. 12, 1954. Houselander was the younger daughter of Willmott and Gertrude Houselander. She was educated in a Jewish kindergarten, French and English convents, a state school, a Protestant private school, St. John's Wood Art School, and St. Martin's Art School. Although she was baptized in the Church of England, she became a Catholic at the age of six. She worked at various occupations: as a layout artist for an advertising firm; as a scuplor, carving crib figures and stations of the cross for an ecclesiastical decorator; as a house decorator; and as a book illustrator. During World War II she worked in the censorship office.

Houselander wrote and illustrated stories, verses, and articles for the Messenger of the Sacred Heart, the Children's Messenger, and the Grail Magazine. She also wrote powerful and original works of spirituality on the theme of the suffering Christ in man that became best sellers. From 1942, doctors sent both children and adult patients to her for therapy. The best authorities on Caryll Houselander are her own writings: This War is the Passion (1941), revised as The Comforting of Christ (1946); The Reed of God (1944); The Flowering Tree (1945); The Dry Wood (1947); The Passion of the Infant Christ (1949); Guilt (1951); The Stations of the Cross (1955); and The Risen Christ (1958). Her books of children's stories, collected and published posthumously, include Inside the Ark (1956), Terrible Father Timson (1957), and Bird on the Wing (1958).

Bibliography: F. C. HOUSELANDER, A Rocking-Horse Catholic (New York 1955), brief autobiog. M. WARD, Caryll Houselander (New York 1962), biog.

[E. FALLAUX]

HOUTIN, ALBERT

Historian of Biblical criticism and of the religious and moral crises at the time of Modernism; b. La Flèche, France, Oct. 4, 1867; d. Paris, July 28, 1926. He was ordained (1891) for the Angers diocese and taught at the minor seminary. He left his diocese (1901) because of difficulties with his bishop over research on local ecclesiastical history and went to Saint-Sulpice in Paris, where he was in touch with many of the chief figures in Modernism. His La Question biblique chez les catholiques de France au XIX<sup>e</sup> siècle was placed on the Index (1903), a fate shared by four of his other books. About 1900 his faith began to deteriorate. By 1912 he put aside clerical garb and worked from 1913 on at the Musée pédagogique, whose director he became in 1919.

From a broad idea of the evolution of dogma he moved to a Christian theism akin to that of the Unitarians, then to a conviction that there is no revealed religion, and finally to a philosophy of distrust that considered religion as "humbug." As a "disabused Don Quixote" he looked continually in history for the "pious lie" and considered the Church as the personification of it. His ultimate position questioned the sincerity of all men, systems, and beliefs, a stance that he denied was misanthropic. Houtin had a strong, uncompromising mind, which was neither supple nor subtle. His narrowing of vision to a search for insincerity and fraud led many observers, including several figures in Modernism, simultaneously to prize certain facts that he had documented and to assail his evaluation as vitiated by his personal assessment of the presence of insincerity. His two volumes on La Question biblique and the Histoire du modernisme catholique (1913) are his best known works. The ceremonies at his funeral were civil only. His body was cremated.

Bibliography: A. HOUTIN, Mon expérience, 2 v. (Paris 1926–28). J. RIVIÈRE, Le Modernisme dans l'Église (Paris 1929). É. POULAT, Histoire, dogme, et critique dans la crise moderniste (Tournai 1962).

[J. J. HEANEY]

HOVDA, ROBERT W.

Priest, writer, editor, leader in the liturgical movement; b. Wisconsin, April 10, 1920; d. New York City, Feb. 5, 1992. Raised in Minnesota, Hovda discovered the social gospel in the Methodist youth movement. By the time he left high school he was a member of the Socialist party, and in college he discovered the connections being made between liturgy and social justice. As a conscientious objector during World War II he came to know the Catholic Worker movement; before the war ended he had entered the Roman Catholic Church and was attending the seminary in Collegeville, MN. Hovda was ordained for the Diocese of Fargo and served for ten years in North Dakota parishes.

Drawing on his pastoral experience and interest in the liturgical movement, he began publishing in Amen, Commonweal, Worship, and Liturgical Arts. Teaching and campus ministry followed. In 1965 Hovda began thirteen years as an editor at The Liturgical Conference in Washington, DC. The liturgical, social and ecumenical directions of the conference mirrored Hovda's own developing thought. His monthly essays, published in Living Worship and in several books, especially Manual of Celebration and Strong, Loving and Wise, were of critical importance to implementing the reforms of Vatican II. Environment and Art in Catholic Worship, a document of the Bishop's Committee on the Liturgy, was written largely by Hovda.

In the 1980s Hovda lived in New York City, doing parish work there and extensive speaking around the United States. He continued his writing in the "Amen Corner" for the journal Worship. Hovda was an outspoken advocate of the ordination of women, the rights of homosexuals, and a host of causes that flowed from his conviction that the exalted equality Christians are meant to experience at the eucharistic table is a model for their only politics, in church and out. Until his death, he continued to insist in every forum that the liturgy both inspires and expresses those apparent opposites, human freedom and human solidarity.

[G. HUCK]

HOWARD, FRANCIS WILLIAM

Bishop, educator; b. Columbus, Ohio, June 21, 1867; d. Covington, Ky., Jan. 18, 1944. He studied at the Seminary of Our Lady of Angels, Niagara, N.Y., and at Mt. St. Mary Seminary of the West, Cincinnati, Ohio. He was ordained by Bp. John Watterson, on June 16, 1891, at St. Joseph Cathedral, Columbus. From 1891 to 1895, Howard was stationed at Holy Trinity parish, Jackson, Ohio. After three years at Columbia University, New York City, and a year of study in Rome, he returned to Columbus, where he received assignments in educational work. In May 1905, he was appointed pastor of Holy Rosary parish in Columbus, holding this pastorate until his appointment as bishop of Covington, March 26, 1923. He was consecrated by Abp. Henry Moeller of Cincinnati at St. Mary's Cathedral, Covington, July 15, 1923.

As bishop, Howard continued to labor for Christian education. He established in his diocese special schools known as “Bishop’s Schools,” with a specially adapted classical curriculum. They were open to talented boys at the completion of the sixth grade. Howard was convinced that such schools would elevate contemporary standards of education, and he hoped they would be established in other dioceses. He enjoyed international recognition as an educator. Howard served the interests of the NATIONAL CATHOLIC EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION for more than 40 years as its first secretary general (1904–28), as its president (1929–35), and as chairman of its advisory board (1936–44). He always insisted that the association remain a voluntary organization and provide Catholic educators with a forum in which they could strengthen their agreements and debate their differences.

Bibliography: Archives, Diocese of Covington. P. E. RYAN, History of the Diocese of Covington, Kentucky (Covington 1954).

[P. E. RYAN]

HOWARD, PHILIP, ST.

Earl of Arundel and English martyr; b. Arundel House, London, June of 1557; d. Tower of London, Oct. 19, 1595. Philip was the eldest son of the fourth Duke of Norfolk by his first wife Anne Fitz-Alan Howard, daughter and heir of the Earl of Arundel, the premier earl of England. As Earl of Surrey, heir to the only dukedom in Tudor England, heir to the premier earldom and five baronies, Philip was born to the highest position in the land after the throne. Philip II, king of Spain, stood godfather at his christening. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, Philip’s father adopted the new religion and Philip was brought up a Protestant, with John Foxe, the Protestant martyrologist, as tutor (see FOXE’S BOOK OF MARTYRS). However, the Arundels were disgraced when the duke proposed marriage to the captive MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS. She would have been the duke’s fourth wife. He was tried, found guilty of high treason, and executed Feb. 11, 1572, after appointing Lord Burghley as Philip’s guardian.

Burghley sent Philip to Cambridge and then introduced him to the glittering court. Philip was married to his stepsister Anne Dacres, daughter of the duke’s third wife. Philip, witty, handsome, and well-born, neglected his wife and won the favor of the queen.

In 1580, on the death of his grandfather, Philip became the Earl of Arundel and was reconciled with Anne. In 1581 he attended a dispute at court between the notorious prisoner Edmund CAMPION and Protestant theologians. Philip left convinced of the truth of Campion’s mission, but he was still unable to sacrifice his gay life as a courtier and to face probable death as a Catholic. Meanwhile the queen became angered at Philip’s devotion to his wife, who had become a Catholic.

In 1584 he was received into the Church by William WESTON, SJ. He attempted to leave England on April 14, 1585, but was betrayed and captured at sea. He was fined and sent to the Tower. He was never allowed to see Anne again or to see his son born after his imprisonment. In the Tower Philip grew in holiness, assisted by letters from Robert SOUTHWELL (later published as The Epistle of Comfort). Philip was tried in 1589 for allegedly having prayed for the success of the Armada. Although his accuser admitted the story was fabricated and many judges thought a prayer could not constitute treason, he was found guilty and sentenced to death. The queen stayed the execution expecting Philip to recant. After 11 years of imprisonment he died from the hardships.

Philip Howard, whose body is venerated in the Fitz-Alan Chapel, Arundel, was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929, and canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970, as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Feast: Oct. 19; Oct. 25 (Feast of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: H. G. F. HOWARD, ed., The Lives of Philip Howard and of Anne Dacres, His Wife (London 1857). A. BUTLER, The Lives of Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v., (New York, 1956) 4:152–154. M. WAUGH, Blessed Philip Howard (Postulation pamphlet; London 1961). Publications of the Catholic Record Society, v. 21 (1919) devoted to Philip Howard. M. CREIGHTON, in The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; reprinted with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; supplement 1901– ) 10:52–54.

[G. FITZHERBERT]

HOWARD, PHILIP THOMAS

Cardinal–protector of England; b. Arundel House, London, Sept. 21, 1629; d. Rome, June 17, 1694. He was the great grandson and namesake of the Elizabethan martyr Philip HOWARD, Earl of Arundel, and the son of Henry Frederick Howard, third Earl of Arundel, and Elizabeth, daughter of Esmé Stuart, Lord d’Aubigny. Because of his Protestant grandfather, Thomas Earl of Arundel, some of his tutors were Protestant, but Philip’s education was essentially Catholic. In 1640–41 he was at St. John’s College, Cambridge, but after that was sent to Utrecht and then to Antwerp. Over the severe objections of his grandfather, he entered the Dominican Order at Cremona (1645), taking the religious name Thomas. The lengthy struggle between the youth and his grandfather was settled by Innocent X. The Pope decided after careful investigation that Howard's vocation was genuine and sent him to Naples for study (1646–50). From there Howard went to Rennes, Brittany, where he finished his studies and was ordained at 23, by a papal dispensation necessitated by his age.

He raised money (£1,600) in England (1655–57) to found an English friary at Bornhem, Flanders, whose first prior he became on Dec. 15, 1657. Prince Charles (later Charles II) sent him on a secret mission to England, where he was denounced by an informer and forced to flee in the suite of the Polish ambassador. Returning to England at the Restoration, he, engaged in furthering a Portuguese marriage for Charles II, to which he was a witness. He became Queen Catherine's first chaplain (1662) and her grand-almoner (1665) with an annual salary of £500, plus £500 for his table, and £100 for Her Majesty's oratory at Whitehall. He became entangled in the dispute among English Catholics concerning the appointment of a bishop or vicar-apostolic for England. In 1672 he resigned as grand-almoner and returned to Bornhem, where he was reappointed prior. Clement X created him bishop in partibus (1672) and cardinal priest (1675), attaching him thereafter to the papal Curia.

Titus Oates implicated him in the Popish Plot, but, although he was condemned for treason, he was in Rome and the sentence could not be executed. In 1679 he was created cardinal protector of England and Scotland, and was principal counselor to the Holy See in English affairs. Under his direction a series of new buildings was erected for the English College at Rome, including his own palace, completed in 1685. He himself lived as a simple friar in the convent of Santa Sabina. He viewed James II's policies with alarm and foresaw their unfortunate results. In the political atmosphere that prevailed after the REVOLUTION OF 1688, he was cut off from communication with England. He continued to live quietly in Rome until his death.

Bibliography: B. JARRETT, Letters of Philip Cardinal Howard . . . (London 1925). B. HEMPHILL, The Early Vicars Apostolic of England, 1685–1750 (London 1954). A. WALZ, I cardinali dominicani (Rome 1940). C. F. R. PALMER, The Life of Philip Thomas Howard, O.P., Cardinal of Norfolk . . . (London 1867). M. V. HAY, The Jesuits and the Popish Plot (London 1934). G. ANSTRUTHER, "Cardinal Howard and the English Court 1658–94," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 28 (Rome 1958) 315–361. T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 10:54–57. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present time 3:442–451. A. SCHMITT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup> 5:498.

[H. S. REINMUTH, JR.]

Philip Thomas Howard, miniature painting on copper, 17th century.

HOWLETT, WILLIAM JOSEPH

Missionary, writer; b. Monroe County, N.Y., March 6, 1847; d. Loretto, Ky., Jan. 17, 1936. His parents, John and Ellen (Doyle) Howlett, came from Ireland to the U.S. by way of Canada. The family settled first in New York; they then moved to Michigan, and finally to Denver, Colo. In spite of his limited early education, Howlett entered St. Thomas's Seminary, Bardstown, Ky., and later continued his studies at the Sulpician seminary, Issy-sur-Seine, France, the Grand Seminary in Paris, and the University of Würzburg in Bavaria. He was ordained for the Diocese of Denver on June 11, 1876, by Cardinal Joseph H. Guibert, Archbishop of Paris. Howlett served in Denver for 36 years, first as a pioneer missionary, then as a pastor and builder of churches. During the last 23 years of his life, which he spent as chaplain at the motherhouse of the Sisters of Loretto in Loretto, Ky., he wrote works of biography and history, including an account of St. Thomas's Seminary in Bardstown and biographies of Bp. Joseph P. Macheboeuf of Denver and Charles Nerinckx, the Kentucky missionary. He published also brief lives of early Kentucky and Colorado priests and a number of historical articles.

[M. M. BARRETT]

HROZNATA, BL.

Crusader, monastic founder, and Premonstratensian canon; b. Tepl, Bohemia, c. 1170; d. Alt-Kinsburg, near Cheb, present-day Czechoslovakia, July 14, 1217. A descendant of the counts of Mielnic, as a young man he found a place at the court of Henry Bretislav (d. 1197), PRINCE-BISHOP of Prague. The sudden and tragic death of his wife and young son brought about a profound transformation in his life, leading him to join the Crusade of Emperor HENRY VI. When the expedition failed to get under way, Hroznata sought a dispensation from his crusading vow, which Pope CELESTINE III commuted into a vow to found a religious institute, and returned to Bohemia, where he tried to end the civil war that raged over the inheritance of Henry Bretislav. Before he had left on Crusade he had founded a monastery at TEPL and settled it with PREMONSTRATENSISANS from STRAHOV. After he returned he established a convent of nuns of the same order in his family castle at Choteschau. Hroznata himself entered Tepl, receiving the habit from INNOCENT III when he went to Rome in 1202 to seek confirmation of his foundations, and was placed in charge of the abbey's temporal affairs. A group of local nobles, envious of the house's growth and wishing to extort some of its revenues, seized the holy founder, who died of the maltreatment he received at their hands. Venerated as a martyr, he was buried at Tepl; his cult was approved by LEO XIII in 1897.

Feast: July 14.

Bibliography: J. LE PAIGE, Bibliotheca praemonstratensis ordinis (Paris 1633) 440–445. Acta sanctorum July 3:793–810. Analecta ecclesiastica 5 (1897) 452–453. I. VAN SPILBEECK, Vie du bx. Hroznata, prince de Boheme (Tamines, Belg. 1897). GEUDENS, Life of Blessed Hroznata (Manchester 1899). Todestage: Zum 700 jährigen, des seligen Hrozanta (Marienbad 1917). N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense 1:315. F. PETIT, La Spiritualité des Prémontrés aux XII<sup>e</sup> et XIII<sup>e</sup> siècles (Paris 1947), passim. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 3:102. A. K. HUBER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 5:500–501. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 5:996.

[L. L. RUMMEL]

HUBERT, JEAN FRANÇOIS

Ninth bishop of Quebec, Canada; b. Quebec, Feb. 23, 1739; d. there, Oct. 17, 1797. He was the son of Jacques François, a baker, and Marie Louise (Maranda) Hubert. After studies at the Quebec seminary, he was ordained July 20, 1766, the first candidate to receive Holy Orders after the reestablishment of the episcopate under the English regime. He served as professor, procurator, and first Canadian superior of the seminary. In 1785 he went first to the Illinois and then to the Detroit missions.

A year later he was consecrated coadjutor of Quebec, with the title of bishop of Almyra, and he succeeded to the see in 1788. In 1797, a few months before he died, Hubert resigned his see, having distinguished himself by receiving several refugee priests of the French Revolution, by encouraging Catholic education, and by safeguarding against the threat of a nondenominational university in 1789.

Bibliography: H. TÊTU, Les Évêques de Québec (Quebec 1889). A. H. GOSSELIN, L'Église du Canada après la conquête, 2 v. (Quebec 1916–17) v.2. L. P. AUDET, Le Système scolaire de la Province de Québec, v.2 (Quebec 1951).

[H. PROVOST]

HUBERT OF MAASTRICHT, ST.

Bishop, count Palatine; b. c. 655; d. Tervueren, near Brussels, May 30, 727. Leaving the world, Hubert worked under St. LAMBERT OF MAASTRICHT. He succeeded Lambert as bishop of Tongres-Maastricht in 705 and is responsible for converting the last pagans of the Ardennes. In 717 or 718 he moved Lambert's remains and the episcopal seat to Liège. Hubert's own relics were transported to the Abbey of SAINT-HUBERT in the Ardennes in 825 but were lost during the Reformation. In the late Middle Ages he became the protector against mad dogs because of a miraculous stole supposedly given him by the Blessed Virgin. Hubert and St. Eustace—and many other saints—were supposed to have been converted by seeing a stag with a cross between its antlers, and hence they are patrons of hunters. Hubert's cult has been popular also with artists and noblemen. A confraternity, the two military orders of SAINT HUBERT, and the city of Liège claimed Hubert as patron.

Feast: Nov. 3.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863–) Nov. 1:759–930. É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945–) 53–70. L. HUYGHEBAERT, S. Hubert, patron des chasseurs (Antwerp 1927); S. Hubert, patroon van de jagers (Antwerp 1949). A. J. BARNOUW, The Pageant of Netherlands History (New York 1952) 10–11. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:247–248. W. HILDEBRAND, Sankt Hubertus und Sankt Eustachius (Gräfelfing 1979). Centre Pierre-Joseph Redouté (Saint-Hubert, Belgium), Le culte de saint Hubert en Namurois, ed. A. DIERKENS and J. M. DUVOSQUEL (Brussels 1992). M. DENIS, Maurice Denis: la légende de saint Hubert (Paris 1999).

[R. BALCH]

HUBERT WALTER

Archbishop of Canterbury, chancellor of England; d. en route, Canterbury to Boxley, England, 1205. He was brought up in the household of his uncle, the great lawyer Ranulf de Glanville, and so was early prepared for the career of civil servant that he pursued with consummate skill. In 1186 he was appointed dean of YORK and in 1189, Bishop of SALISBURY. The following year he accompanied King RICHARD I and Abp. BALDWIN OF CANTERBURY on the Third CRUSADE where he distinguished himself by both his diplomatic ability and his practical care for the crusaders in distress. During the return journey to England he visited the imprisoned King Richard in Austria. Hubert was elected archbishop of CANTERBURY in 1193; the next year Richard appointed him justiciar of England. As justiciar in Richard's absence Hubert governed England, devising new forms of taxation, new methods of local government, and a superior system of governmental record-keeping. Then in 1198, when INNOCENT III renewed the ancient prohibition against priests holding secular office, Hubert resigned the justiciarship. But with the death of Richard the next year, he accepted the office of chancellor under King JOHN and exercised that office with great efficiency until his death. In the course of his unceasing public work, Hubert became embroiled in many quarrels, some with saintly antagonists such as Bp. HUGH OF LINCOLN, others with egotists such as GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS, one with his own chapter at Christ Church, Canterbury. He incurred at times the wrath of kings and popes. As a result Hubert gained a somewhat justified reputation for being too worldly, though his foundation of PREMONSTRATENSIS at West Dereham, his solicitude for WITHAM CHARTERHOUSE, and his concern for his cathedral at Canterbury betoken genuine piety.

Bibliography: K. NORGATE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 10:137–140. C. R. CHENEY, From Becket to Langton (Manchester 1956). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 661.

[D. NICHOLL]

HUBMAIER, BALTHASAR

Anabaptist leader involved in the 16th-century Peasant War and key figure in the Moravian Anabaptist movement; b. Friedberg near Augsburg, after 1480?; d. Vienna, March 10, 1528. A priest and disciple of Johann Eck, Hubmaier followed his teacher from Freiburg to Ingolstadt (1512) where he served as professor and pastor. When called to the cathedral at Regensburg (1516), Hubmaier participated in the expulsion of the Jews and served as chaplain of the church, which replaced the razed synagogue. While pastor in Waldshut on the Rhine after 1521, Hubmaier read Luther and personally contacted Erasmus and Zwingli, supporting the latter in the Second Zurich

“The Conversion of St. Hubert.”

Disputation (1523), but later joined the Anabaptist opposition. He was involved in the abortive revolt of the peasants and Waldshut against Austrian rule, and fled first to Zurich, and later to Nikolsburg, Moravia, where he led a large Anabaptist community. Arrested upon the request of the Austrian authorities, he was turned over to them and burned at the stake in Vienna. His work is distinguished from other Anabaptist writings by scholastic learning (e.g., On Free Will vs. Luther) and the acknowledgment of the legitimacy of government (e.g., On The Sword vs. absolute pacifists).

Bibliography: T. BERGSTEN, Balthasar Hubmaier: Seine Stellung zu Reformation und Täuferium 1521–1528 (Kassel 1961). H. C. VEDDER, Balthasar Hubmaier, the Leader of the Anabaptists (New York 1905). G. H. WILLIAMS, ed.; Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers (Philadelphia 1957); The Radical Reformation (Philadelphia 1962). F. ZOEPFL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:503–504. R. DOLLINGER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:464–465.

[G. W. FORELL]

HUC, ÉVARISTE RÉGIS

Missionary and traveler; b. Caylus, Tarn-et-Garonne, France, June 1, 1813; d. Paris, March 1860. He entered the Vincentians Sept. 5, 1836, and after being ordained in 1839, was sent to China. In Macau and then at a Christian mission in southern China he further prepared himself for missionary work and learned the Chinese language. For several years he labored at the Mission of the Valley of Black Waters about 300 miles north of Beijing within the newly created (1840) Vicariate of Tatar-Mongolia. There he studied the dialects and customs of the Tatars and translated various religious works.

In 1844 Huc and his fellow Vincentian Joseph Gabet (1808–53) were ordered by the Vicar Apostolic Martial Mouly to journey through Mongolia and Tibet in order to gain knowledge of the various peoples included in the vicariate. Dressed as lamas to escape attention, and with only a young Christian native, they set out in early August 1844 for Duolon in Inner Mongolia, where they obtained supplies and information for their further journey. They left there October 1 and proceeded westward, crossing the Huang-Ho and the Mu Us Desert to Dabsun-nor and Ninghsia. After reaching Gansu province, they were hospitably received at the large and famous Buddhist monastery of Kumbum. Remaining there for some months, they learned the Tibetan language, and Huc translated a small Tibetan work dealing with the 42 points of Buddha's instruction.

In October 1845 they joined at Qinghai the caravan of a Tibetan embassy returning from Beijing, and after much hardship crossing the snow-covered Bayan Kara and Tanggula Mountains, they entered Lhasa Jan. 29, 1846. There they enjoyed the favor of the Tibetan officials and began their apostolate. However, after about six weeks the enmity of the Chinese ambassador, Ki-Chan, forced their departure. At the end of September they arrived in Guangzhou, where Huc remained for nearly three years, but Gabet returned to Europe and later went to Rio de Janeiro. Huc returned to France in 1852 in shattered health and left the order in 1853.

Along with the many other writings of Huc and Gabet in the Annales de la propagation de la foi and the Annales de la Congregation de la Mission, Huc is renowned for Souvenirs d'un voyage dans la Tartarie, le Thibet, et la Chine pendant les années 1844–46 (2 v. Paris 1850), which has gone through numerous editions and has been published in eight languages. He wrote also L'Empire Chinois (2 v. Paris 1854), which received recognition from the French Academy, and Le Christianisme en Chine, en Tartarie, et au Thibet (4 v. Paris 1857–58).

Bibliography: E. R. HUC, Souvenirs of a Journey through Tartary, Tibet, and China during the Years 1844, 1845 and 1846, tr. J. M. PLANCHET, 2 v. (Peking 1931); High Road in Tartary, ed. J. BEDIER (New York 1948); Mémoires de la Congrégation de la Mis- sion, v.3 La Chine (Paris 1912) 407–. R. STREIT and J. DINDINGER, Bibliotheca missionum (Freiburg 1916–) 12:230–238. H. CORDIER, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 7:510.

[J. C. WILLKE]

HUCBALD OF SAINT-AMAND

Benedictine poet, hagiographer, and theorist of GREGORIAN CHANT; b. c. 840; d. SAINT-AMAND, France, June 20, 930. He studied with his uncle Milo and HEIRIC OF AUXERRE before becoming director of schools at Saint-Amand. Hucbald's musical fame rests on the Offices he composed and his treatise De institutione harmonica, one of the first attempts to unite Greco-Boethian theories with chant practice and to find an accurate symbol for pitch notation [M. Gerbert, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum, 3 v. (Milan 1931) 1:104–121]. His poem in honor of Charles II the Bald, Ecloga de calvis, is a tour de force, using only words beginning with "c" [Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae (Berlin 1826–) 4:265–271]. Lives of several saints [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v. indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 132:825–1050] may safely be attributed to him.

Bibliography: H. MÜLLER, Hucbalds echte und unechte Schriften über Musik (Leipzig 1884). L. VAN DER ESSEN, "Hucbald de Saint-Amand et sa place dans le mouvement hagiographique médiéval," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 12 (1923) 331–351; 522–552. R. G. WEAKLAND, "Hucbald as Musician and Theorist," Musical Quarterly 42 (New York 1956) 66–84. "The Compositions of Hucbald," Études grégoriennes 3 (1959) 155–162. Y. CHARTIER, "La Musica d'Hucbald de Saint-Amand: Introduction, établissement du texte, traduction et commentaire" (Ph.D. diss. University of Paris, 1972); L'Œuvre musicale d'Hucbald de Saint-Amand: Les compositions et le traité de musique (Quebec 1995). R. L. CROCKER, "Hucbald" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 8, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 758–759. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 398. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, (New York 1992) 808.

[R. G. WEAKLAND]

HUDDLESTON, JOHN

Benedictine monk; b. (place unknown) 1608; d. London, Sept. 22, 1698. The second son of Joseph of Farington Hall, near Preston, Lancashire, he is said to have served in the army of Charles I during the Civil Wars. He is considered to have been educated and ordained at Douay College, although his name is not found in the Douay lists. When he came to the English mission, he served first in Wensleydale, Yorkshire, and then at the home of Mr. Whitgrave at Moseley, Staffordshire. On Sept. 3, 1651, CHARLES II was defeated by Cromwell at the Battle of Worcester, and fleeing in disguise he came to Moseley, where HUDDLESTON hid him in his own room for several days. Charles never forgot that Huddleston had saved his life, and when he returned to power he lodged him in the palace of Somerset House in London as chaplain to the Queen Mother, Henrietta Maria, and after her death in 1669 appointed him chaplain to Queen Catherine of Braganza. When Charles was on his deathbed, he was asked by his Catholic brother, the future James II, if he wanted a priest. Replying fervently that he did, the king was converted and received the Last Sacraments from Huddleston, who had been fetched secretly by a back stair to the bedroom, after the Protestant clergy had departed.

Bibliography: B. WELDON, Chronological Notes (London 1881). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 3:463–465. H. FOLEY, Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82). J. S. CLARKE, Life of James II, 2 v. (London 1816).

[B. WHELAN]

HUDSON, DANIEL ELDRED

Editor; b. Nahant, Mass., Dec. 18, 1849; d. Notre Dame, Ind., Jan. 12, 1934. He was the son of Samuel Henry and Mary (Hawkes) Hudson. He received his early education in the public schools of Nahant and at Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass. He entered the novitiate of the Congregation of Holy Cross at Notre Dame, March 7, 1871, and was professed March 19, 1872. He was ordained on June 4, 1875, and appointed editor of the Ave Maria that same year. This octavo weekly magazine, which became an important factor in the propagation of devotion to the Blessed Virgin, had begun publication at Notre Dame in May 1865 under the direction of Rev. Edward F. Sorin and his associates, Mother Angela Gillespie of the Sisters of Holy Cross and her brother, Rev. Neal Gillespie, CSC. Although other priests of the Holy Cross Congregation assisted Hudson, the magazine came to have a special tone that was attributed to him. Little that he wrote in Ave Maria was signed, but he was considered the author of its editorial comments during these years. Hudson did not hesitate to answer journalists who attacked the Church, and he had definite opinions on most of the religious problems of the day. He exerted a directing influence on the careers of Charles Warren Stoddard, Maurice Francis Egan, and Christian Reed (Frances Tierman) and gave encouragement to many young Catholic writers. He retired in 1928 because of illness.

Daniel Eldred Hudson. (Ave Maria Press)

Bibliography: J. W. CAVANAUGH, Ave Maria NS 39 (Jan. 27–Feb. 17, 1934) 97–101, 135–140, 169–173, 201–205. J. J. WALSH, Catholic World 139 (April 1934) 31–39.

[T. T. MCAVOY]

HUELGAS DE BURGOS, ABBEY OF

Cistercian convent of the Blessed Virgin, BURGOS archdiocese, established and richly endowed on June 1, 1187, by Alfonso VIII of Castile as a burial place for his family. Huelgas became the head of the Cistercian convents in Castile and León, and in 1199 was affiliated with CÎTEAUX rather than with its own mother convent, that of Tulebras. It had civil jurisdiction over 64 villages. Not only was Huelgas exempt from episcopal jurisdiction but it exercised its own quasi-episcopal authority over convents, churches, and towns, conferring benefices, authorizing and restricting preaching, judging papal dispositions and matrimonial and civil cases, supervising charitable works and notaries, giving faculties to confessors, and even presiding over synods of abbesses of divers convents. Its abbesses were usually of royal blood, and many of the nuns were of the high nobility. In 1257 the number of noblewomen was restricted to 100. The abbey's spiritual jurisdiction was not granted by the pope but was based on immemorial custom. The bishops of Burgos and even the abbot of Cîteaux contested this jurisdiction, but Urban VIII confirmed it. In 1873 Huelgas, along with all other exempt jurisdictions in Spain, was suspended by Pius IX.

In 1590 the official term of the abess, which had been perpetual, became triennial. Not all of the medieval building remains, but the architecture is noteworthy (Romanesque ogives, Mudéjar, ornate floral decorations). In 1808 the convent was looted by Napoleonic troops. Huelgas contains the Moorish banner captured at Las Navas de Tolosa in 1212, the cross of Rodrigo XIMÉNEZ, many documents, and a codex of medieval songs. Alfonso XI, Henry II, and John I were crowned there, and in 1938 the Nationalist government was sworn in at Las Huelgas. The Cisterian convent of Las Huelgas in Valladolid, founded in 1282 by Maria de Molina, was modeled on that at Burgos.

Bibliography: A. RODRÍGUEZ LÓPEZ, El real monasterio de las Huelgas de Burgos, 2 v. (Burgos 1907). M. GÓMEZ-MORENO, El panteón real de las Huelgas de Burgos (Madrid 1946). L. DE ECHEVERRÍA, "En torno a la jurisdicción eclesiástica de la abadesa de las Huelgas," Revista española de derecho canónico 1 (1946) 219–233. J. M. ESCRIVÁ, La abadesa de Las Huelgas (Madrid 1944). Enciclopedia de la Religión Católica, ed. R. D. FERRERES et al., 7 v. (Barcelona 1950–56) 4:254–255.

[D. W. LOMAX]

HUET, PIERRE DANIEL

Theologian and philosopher, the last of the "Christian skeptics" following after M. E. de MONTAIGNE and P. CHARRON; b. Caen (Normandy), Feb. 8, 1630; d. Paris, Jan. 26, 1721. In 1670 Louis XIV appointed him Bossuet's assistant in teaching the Dauphin. Here he initiated the famous set of classical texts, ad usum Delphini. At court Huet became a priest, and was later appointed bishop of Soissons, which diocese he traded for Avranches. He retired in 1699 to a Jesuit establishment in Paris to which he had given his immense library (now in the Bibliothèque Nationale), and he remained there until his death.

His most important works were Demonstratio Evangelica (1679), which grew out of his conversations with Rabbi Menasseh ben Israel in Amsterdam; Censura philosophiae cartesianae (1689), a skeptical critique of Cartesianism; and the posthumous skeptical Traité philosophique de la foiblesse de l'esprit humain, written around 1692, first published in 1723. Huet's views combined thorough-going SKEPTICISM, LATITUDINARIANISM, probabilistic defenses of Christianity, empirical scientific researches, and advocacy of FIDEISM. He was considered the most learned man of his age, and his erudite findings were used by Enlightenment figures to attack traditional religion.

Bibliography: P. D. HUET, Traité philosophique de la foiblesse de l'esprit humain (Amsterdam 1723), Eng. A Philosophical Treatise concerning the Weakness of Human Understanding (London 1725). C. J. C. BARTHOLOMËSS, Huet, évêque d'Avranches, ou le scepticisme théologique (Paris 1850). L. TOLMER, "Pierre-Daniel Huet: Humaniste-physicien," Académie Nationale des Sciences, Arts et Belles-lettres de Caen. Mémoires NS 11 (1949) 718.

[R. H. POPKIN]

HÜGEL, FRIEDRICH VON

Theologian, philosopher, writer; b. Florence, Italy, May 5, 1852; d. London, England, Jan. 27, 1925. Baron Carl von Hügel, his father, was of German origin and was serving as Austrian ambassador to Tuscany in 1852. Friedrich's mother, who was of Scottish origin, was a convert from Presbyterianism. Anatole, a younger brother, became well known as an anthropologist at Cambridge University. Educated by private tutors and given no formal university training, Friedrich was left deaf, nervous, and delicate in health by an attack of typhoid fever (1870). Raymond Hocking, a Dutch Dominican, exercised great influence over his early spiritual development. In 1873 Hügel married Lady Mary (Molly) Herbert, a convert from Anglicanism, and by her had three daughters. The couple dwelt in England from 1876, at Hampstead (1876–1903) and then in London at Kensington (1903–25).

Among Baron von Hügel's close friends were Wilfrid WARD and two French priests: Henri BREMOND and Henri HUVELIN. Huvelin had great spiritual influence over Hügel and guided him in his attempt to overcome discouragement over ill health and a tendency to worry excessively. Under Huvelin's influence, Hügel came to distrust a type of SCHOLASTIC theology that resorted to syllogisms to answer current philosophical and scientific attacks on Catholicism. Encouraged by Louis DUCHESNE, the Baron studied the Church's historical foundations, utilizing his command over English, French, German, and Italian. After learning Hebrew he commented regularly on Biblical topics for the Bulletin Critique, edited by Duchesne. Hügel came early under the influence of the philosophers Rudolf Eucken, Maurice BLONDEL, and Lucien LABERTHONNIÈRE. Contact with Ernst TROELTSCH from 1902 confirmed Hügel in his conviction that religion begins with the otherness of reality originating in the transcendent God.

In 1897 Hügel contributed to the Catholic International Scientific Congress at Fribourg, Switzerland, a paper entitled "The Historical Method and the Documents of the Hexateuch." His first writing published in English was a privately-printed pamphlet on Biblical inspiration and inerrancy (1901). Hügel began in 1897 a lifelong friendship with George TYRRELL, who was later expelled from the Jesuits and excommunicated as a Modernist. After the Baron had introduced Father Tyrrell to the religious writings of Continental authors, the two men frequently discussed Biblical criticism and mysticism, Hügel's favorite topics. By 1901 Hügel was disturbed by the storm brewing over the head of another of his friends, Alfred LOISY, whose views on the Book of Genesis and on the Fourth Gospel were troubling the Holy Office. When Loisy's L'Évangile et L'Église appeared in 1902, Hügel praised it as an effective reply to Harnack's Das Wesen des Christentums (1900). He was more reserved in his praise for Loisy's Autour d'un petit livre (1903). Both of these books were placed on the Index in 1904. In 1904 von Hügel founded the London Society for the Study of Religion, a discussion group that developed into a notable society of Catholic scholars. Hügel was never condemned as a Modernist, but his admiration for and friendship with many Modernist leaders caused deep concern when Modernism was officially condemned in 1907.

Hügel's best book was The Mystical Element of Religion as Studied in St. Catherine of Genoa and Her Friends (1908). In Eternal Life (1912) he argued that eternal life is not restricted to the hereafter but is part of man's earthly existence. The first volume of his Essays and Addresses on the Philosophy of Religion appeared in 1921, and the second volume in 1926. Hügel was too ill to deliver the Gifford Lectures for 1924–25, but his incomplete manuscript was printed in 1931 as The Reality of God.

Bibliography: Selected Letters, 1896–1924, ed. with a memoir B. HOLLAND (New York 1928); Letters to a Niece, ed. G. GREEN (Chicago 1955). M. NÉDONCELLE, Baron Friedrich von Hügel: A Study of His Life and Thought, tr. M. VERNON (New York 1937). M. DE LA BEDOYÈRE, The Life of Baron von Hügel (New York 1952). R. MARLÉ, comp., Au Coeur de la crise moderniste: Lettres de Maurice Blondel, Henri Bremond, Fr. von Hügel, Alfred Loisy (Paris 1960). M. D. PETRE, Von Hügel and Tyrrell (New York 1938). J. STEINMANN, Friedrich von Hügel (Paris 1963).

[F. M. O'CONNOR]

HUGH BONNEVAUX, ST.

Cistercian monk, abbot of Bonnevaux in Dauphiné, France; b. Châteauneuf d'Isère, France, c. 1120; d. 1194. He was born into the family of the counts of Châteauneuf and was a nephew of St. HUGH OF GRENOBLE. About 1138 he entered the Cistercian Abbey of Miroir, near Louhans. When he became ill during his novitiate, he received a letter of encouragement from St. BERNARD. He was sent to the Abbey of Léoncel, near Saint-Jean-en-Royans, where he became abbot in 1162. In 1166 he was elected abbot of Bonnevaux, the mother abbey, and founded three daughter abbeys: Sauveréal (1173), Valbenoîte (1184), and Valcroissant (1188). During the Octavian schism (see ANTIPOPE) his efforts led Emperor FREDERICK BARBAROSSA to recognize Pope ALEXANDER III (1177) by the Peace of Venice. Hugh's grave, defiled (1576) during the THIRTY YEARS' WAR, was recently discovered in the ruins of a small chapel built in his honor.

Feast: April 1 (Cistercians; Breviary of Valence since 1473 and in its Proper since 1884).

Bibliography: Sources. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, Epistola 322; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE 182:527–528. FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA in E. MARTÈNE and U. DURAND, Thesaurus novus anecdotorum (Paris 1717) 1: 585. ALEXANDER III, Epistola, ibid. 1:1847. U. CHEVALIER, Cartulaire de l'abbaye N.-D. de Bonnevaux (Grenoble 1889). M. A. DIMIER, Cartulaire de l'abbaye N.-D. de Bonnevaux (Tamié 1942). S. Bernardi vita prima, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE 185–345. Exordium magnum, ibid. 1193–95. Literature. M. F. CHUZEL, Histoire de l'abbaye de Bonnevaux (Bourgoin 1932). M. A. DIMIER, Saint Hugues de Bonnevaux (Tamié 1942); "Un Office rimé de saint H. de B.," Revue Bénédictine 68 (1958) 265–280. M. B. BRARD, Catholicisme 5:1018–19.

[M. A. DIMIER]

HUGH OF AMIENS

Archbishop of Rouen; b. c. 1080; d. Rouen, Nov. 11, 1164. He was educated in the famous Cathedral School of Laon, and entered the monastic life at CLUNY. His administrative qualities marked him for rapid promotion and he was appointed prior of LEWES in 1123, then, at the instigation of Henry I of England, abbot of the new foundation at READING in 1125. He is said to have been a champion of the formal celebration of the Feast of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. He gave active support to the claims of Pope INNOCENT II against those of Anacletus II. He welcomed (May 9, 1131) Anacletus as his guest at Rouen, to which see he had been elevated Sept. 11, 1130. As a strict disciplinarian, Hugh came into conflict with certain abbots, notably Alan of Saint-Wandrille, who disputed his authority over them. He was much sought after as an arbitrator in both ecclesiastical and secular matters and enjoyed the support of Henry I, Stephen, and Henry II.

Hugh was the author of several exegetic and polemical writings. Notable are the seven books of Dialogi, dealing with God and His attributes, the creation, the fall of Satan and of man, free will, the Sacraments, and life eternal. He also wrote three books Contra haereticos. His views on the nonvalidity of the Sacraments administered by excommunicated priests caused some scandal, but he is one of the most redoubtable 12th-century champions of Church tradition. He was influenced by St. AUGUSTINE in the matter of grace and free will.

Bibliography: Works. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 192:1131–1352; Epistolae, Patrologia Latina 179: 665–666; 180:1617; 186:1399. E. VACANDARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951– ) 7.1:205–215. P. HÉBERT, “Hugues III d’Amiens,” Revue des questions historiques 64 (1898) 325–371. J. B. HURRY, In Honour of Hugh de Boves (Reading, Eng. 1911). D. VAN DEN EYNDE, “Nouvelles précisions chronologiques sur quelques oeuvres théologiques du XII<sup>e</sup> siècle,” Franciscan Studies 13 (1953) 71–118. F. LECOMTE, “Un Commentaire scripturaire du XII<sup>e</sup> s.: Le Tractatus in Hexaemeron de Hugues d’Amiens,” Archives d’histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 33 (1958) 227–294. J. C. DIDIER, Catholicisme 5:1038–39.

[P. B. CORBETT]

HUGH OF BALMA

Carthusian mystical writer. Precise information regarding the dates or other circumstances of his birth and death is not available. It is known only that he was a Carthusian monk, and later prior of the Charterhouse of Meyriat. Sometime between 1246 and 1297 he wrote a work called De theologia mystica. This book has also been attributed to St. Bonaventure and printed in collections of his works under the title Theologia mystica. This is not to be confused with Bonaventure’s De triplici via, of whose authenticity there is no question. Hugh’s De theologia mystica was also sometimes known as De triplici via, and sometimes, from its first words, as Viae Sion lugent. This book was among the first to attempt a methodical description of the interior life according to the schema of the “three ways.” In the purgative way the soul considers God’s goodness in the mysteries of Creation and Redemption, and is cleansed of its sin by contrition. In the illuminative way, it meditates upon the Scriptures and becomes more enlightened and guided by grace. In the unitive way, it is closely united to God by the experience of divine wisdom in contemplation. In describing contemplation as a cognitio Dei per ignorantiam—a knowledge of God by unknowing—Hugh showed himself a disciple of Pseudo-Dionysius. He held that the affective union with God in which contemplation culminates confers a knowledge far more penetrating than intellect and reason can provide. Among the means of arriving at truly contemplative prayer, Hugh made much of the usefulness of “anagogic movements” of the soul, short upward movements of mind and heart, fervent aspirations that build up and maintain the desire of tending toward God. The analogy of this type of prayer with that of the CLOUD OF UNKNOWING is evident. It may also be compared with the Jesus-Prayer of Hesychasm in the Eastern Church, as this was described in the Story of a Russian Pilgrim [see B. du Moustier, “The Jesus-Prayer,” Cross and Crown (September 1960) 301–312]. Through the De triplici via this simple way to unitive prayer seems to have influenced the teachings of JEAN GERSON, DENIS THE CARTHUSIAN, HENRY OF HERP (HARPHIUS VAN ERP), BERNARDINO OF LAREDO, David Augustine BAKER, and many others. Most of these also show the influence of Hugh in other points of spiritual doctrine.

Bibliography: S. AUTORE, in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 7.1:215–220. A. M. SOCHAY, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd’hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947– ) 5:1028–30. J. KRÛNEN, “La Pratique et la théorie de l’amour sans connaissance dans le Viae Sion lugent d’Hugues de Balma,” Revue d’ascétique et de mystique 49 (1964) 161–183.

[B. DU MOUSTIER]

HUGH OF CLUNY, ST.

Sixth abbot of CLUNY; b. Burgundy, 1024; d. Cluny, April 29, 1109. Hugh, son of Dalmace, Count of Semur and of Aremberge, was educated by Bp. Hugh of Auxerre. In 1038 he entered Cluny, then governed by Abbot ODILO. He was ordained in 1044, was named prior in 1048, and succeeded in ending a controversy between Emperor HENRY III and the Abbey of Payerne. On the death of Odilo, January 1049, Hugh was elected abbot of Cluny, receiving the abbatial blessing from Abp. Hugh of Besançon on Feb. 22, 1049. His 60 years as abbot were prodigiously fruitful and marked the apogee of Cluny (see CLUNIAN REFORM). Hugh took part in numerous councils and synods, such as those at the Lateran (1050, 1059, and 1080), Vienne (1060), and Plaisance and Clermont (1095). The popes entrusted him with important diplomatic missions to Hungary (1051) and Germany (1072); he was present at the encounter between Emperor HENRY IV and GREGORY VII at Canossa. Although the greatest expansion of Cluny had taken place before Hugh’s abbacy, Cluny continued to found new monasteries and aggregate older ones during his term. Of particular interest is the founding of the first convent of Cluniac nuns at Marcigny in 1056. Hugh obtained papal confirmation of the temporal and spiritual privileges of his order. A former Cluniac monk, Pope URBAN II, returned to consecrate the main altar of the abbey church on Oct. 25, 1095. Despite intense activity in the service of his monks and of the Church, Hugh remained a man of prayer. His human qualities won him the friendship of the great and the confidence of men of lesser estate. His prudence and humaneness were noteworthy, especially in his rulings on liturgical celebrations and monastic discipline. Hugh was canonized by CALLISTUS II, Jan. 1, 1120.

Feast: April 29.

Bibliography: Sources. M. MARRIER and A. DUCHESNE, eds., Bibliotheca cluniacensis (Paris 1614; 1915) 413–472. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 159:857–984. A. BRUEL, ed., Recueil des chartes de l'abbaye de Cluny, 6 v. (Paris 1876–1903) 4:174–824; 5:1–230. Literature. A. L'HUILLIER, Vie de saint Hugues (Solesmes 1888). G. TELLENBACH, "Zum Wesen der Cluniacenser," Saeculum 9 (1958) 370–378. K. HALLINGER, "Klunys Bräuche zur Zeit Hugos des Grossen, 1049–1109," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 45 (1959) 99–140. H. DIENER, "Das Verhältnis Clunys zu den Bischöfen, vor allem in der Zeit seines Abtes Hugo, 1049–1109," in J. WOLLASCH et al., Neue Forschungen über Cluny und die Cluniacenser, ed. G. TELLENBACH (Freiburg 1959) 219–352. G. CANTARELLA and D. TUNIZ, eds., Cluny e il suo abate Ugo: splendore e crisi di un grande ordine monastico (Milan 1983).

[R. GRÉGOIRE]

HUGH OF DIE

Gregorian reformer, archbishop; called also Hugh of Romans; b. c. 1040; d. Susa, Italy, October 1106. He was ordained and served as precentor of the Cathedral of Lyons. He was consecrated bishop of Die in 1074 and was translated to the archbishopric of Lyons in 1082–83. From 1075 to 1087 he was papal legate in France and, in addition, from 1082–83 he was primate of the French Church. A stern and uncompromising advocate of Pope GREGORY VII's Church reforms, Hugh battled successfully with both the French hierarchy and the French monarchy to secure the objectives of the reform in France (see INVESTITURE STRUGGLE). After Gregory VII's death, Hugh criticized his successor, Pope VICTOR III, for compromising the principles of the GREGORIAN REFORM. As a result, Hugh was excommunicated at the Council of Benevento (Aug. 29, 1087). He was soon reconciled, however, and in 1094 Pope URBAN II restored him to the post of papal legate. In 1095–96 Hugh accompanied Urban on his tour through France. As a leading advocate of monastic reform, Hugh was an early patron and supporter of the CISTERCIANS, and became that order's first protector. In 1100 Hugh went on crusade to the Holy Land.

Bibliography: Sources. HUGH OF DIE, Epistolae et privilegia, M. BOUQUET, Recueil de historiens des Gaules et de la France (Rerum gallicarum et francicarum scriptores), 24 v. (Paris 1738–1904) 14:776–797; Patrologia Latina 157:507–528. HUGH OF FLAVIGNY, Chronicon, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826– ) 8:280–503. Literature. F. LIEBERMANN, "Anselm von Canterbury und Hugo von Lyon," Historische Aufsätze dem Andenken an Georg Waitz gewidmet (Hanover 1886) 156–203. ABBÉ RONY, "Hugues de Romans: Légat pontifical," Revue des questions historiques 107 (1927) 287–303; "La Politique française de Grégoire VII: Conflit entre le pape et son légat," ibid. 109 (1928) 5–34; "La Légation d'Hugues . . . sous le pontificat d'Urbain II," ibid. 112 (1930) 124–147; "Élection de Victor III: Conflit entre le nouveau pape et Hugues . . .," Revue d'histoire de l'Église de France 14 (1928) 145–160. T. SCHIEFFER, Die päpstlichen Legaten in Frankreich vom Vertrage von Meersen (870) bis zum Schisma von 1130 (Berlin 1935). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935– ) v.8.

[J. A. BRUNDAGE]

HUGH OF DIGNE

Franciscan Provincial Minister in Provence and commentator on the Franciscan Rule; date of birth unknown; d. between 1254 and 1257. He was a native of Provence, the son of Berengar of Digne, a merchant, and Huguette of Barjols; St. DOUCÉLINE was his sister. Hugh was of dark complexion, and medium height; he had a powerful voice. He was an eccentric but influential figure among the Franciscans of southern France and was regarded by the FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS as one of their forerunners. In his later years he lived at Hyères, where he preached to St. LOUIS IX, and where he was visited by the chronicler SALIMBENE, who gives a vivid account of his austerity, his freedom of speech in denouncing the inadequacies even of the papal Curia, and his devotion to poverty and to the doctrines of JOACHIM OF FIORE. Hugh inspired the formation of the Order of Friars of the Sack, and also of his sister's Order of Beguines, of which he was the spiritual director (see BEGUINES AND BEGHARDS). He wrote two treatises on poverty, De finibus paupertatis and Tractatus de paupertate inter zelatorem paupertatis et inimicum domesticum, and an elaborate exposition of the Rule (probably 1241–43), which was the first fully systematic commentary. In his zeal for poverty, his learning, and Joachism he resembled the later leaders of the Spirituals. His interpretation of poverty was strict, but by no means rigid or inflexible; and he took pains to defend by scholastic argument a fairly extensive use of books—without which his own range of learning would have been impossible.

Bibliography: HUGH OF DIGNE, Expositio regulae, in Firmamenta trium ordinum (Paris 1512; 2d ed. 1513) pt. 4: fol. 34 va–54 rb; also in 1st ed. Monumenta ordinis minorum (Salamanca 1506–11); Tractatus de paupertate, in Firmamenta (1512) fol. 105 ra–108 vb. N. MORIN, Speculum minorum (Rouen 1509). C. FLOROVSKY, "De finibus paupertatis auctore Hugone de Digna, O.F.M.," Archivum Franciscanum historicum 5 (1912) 277–290. SALIMBENE, Cronica fratris Salimbene de Adam, ed. O. HOLDEREGGER in Monumenta Germanica Scriptores 32 (1905–13). J. POULENC, Catholicisme 5:1020–22. R. B. BROOKE, Early Franciscan Government: Elias to Bonaventure (Cambridge, Eng. 1959).

[R. B. BROOKE]

HUGH OF FLEURY

Historian, biographer; d. after 1118; not to be confused with Hugh of Fleury of Canterbury (d. 1124). Hugh was a Benedictine priest of Saint-Benoît-sur-Loire, who was known also as Hugh of Sainte-Marie. In 1109 he wrote a Historia ecclesiastica in four books, dedicated to Adela, Countess of Blois. In 1110 he reworked the Historia into six books, covering the period to 855. In about 1114, he wrote a chronicle of the kings of France, Moder-norum regum Francorum liber (842–1108). Sometime after 1102, he wrote a Tractatus de regia potestate et sacerdotali dignitate in two books, addressed to HENRY I of England. This work presented Hugh's stand in the INVESTITURE struggle, restating the divine rights of both royal and ecclesiastical authority. Besides the Vita sancti Sacerdotis, a biography of Bishop Sacerdos of Limoges, several other works have been attributed to him, including the De miraculis s. Benedicti.

Bibliography: Works. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum (Berlin 1826– ) 9:237–395. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 163:821–830; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Libelli de lite. (Berlin 1826– ) 2:465–494; Vita s. Sacerdotis, Acta Sanctorum (Antwerp 1643– ; Venice 1734– ; Paris 1863– ) May 2:15–23; De miraculis s. Benedicti, in Les Miracles de S. Benoît, ed. E. DE CERTAIN (Paris 1858) 357–371. Literature. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:518–521. A. WILMART, “L’Histoire ecclésiastique composée par Hugues de Fleury et ses destinataires,” Revue Bénédictine 50 (1938) 293–305. Y. M. J. CONGAR, Catholicisme 5:1033.

[B. LACROIX]

HUGH OF FOSSE, BL.

First abbot general of the PREMONSTRATIENSIS; b. Fosses, near Namur, Belgium, probably 1093; d. Prémontré, Feb. 10, 1164. Chaplain of Bp. Burchard of Cambrai, he became the leading disciple of NORBERT OF XANTEN in 1119. Having been appointed Norbert's representative at PRÉMONTRÉ in 1126, he succeeded him as abbot in 1128. Hugh guided the rapid development of the order and formulated its first constitutions, which were in many ways similar to those of the CISTERCIANS. He drafted the first Vita Norberti and promulgated the ceremonial books of the order. It is not certain that he was the “Hugo Farsitus” who wrote De miraculis b. Mariae Suessionensis (c. 1135; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 79: 1777–1800). His cult was approved in 1927; it is doubtful that the relics in the priory of Bois-Seigneur-Isaac are his.

Feast: Feb. 10.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 2:378. H. LAMY, Vie du B. Hugues . . . (Charleroi 1925). F. PETIT, La spiritualité des Pré- montrés (Paris 1947). P. F. LEFÈVRE, L'Ordinaire de Prémontré (Louvain 1941). J. DUBOIS, Catholicisme 5:1025–26.

[N. BACKMUND]

HUGH OF FOUILLOY

Prior, spiritual writer, CANON REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE; b. Fouillois, near Corbie and Amiens, between 1100 and 1110; d. Saint-Laurent-au-Bois, 1172–73. Probably a student at the Benedictine Abbey of CORBIE, he joined the nearby priory of Saint-Laurent-au-Bois in the period when it was not under Corbie but was held by Austin canons. In 1153 he became prior, four years after declining the more important priorship of Saint-Denis, Reims. Before the research of J. MABILLON his works were usually attributed to his famous contemporary, HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR (d. 1141). Each of his four major spiritual treatises is built upon a sustained analogy; the religious cloister and the detached, recollected soul; medicines for physical illnesses and remedies for analogous sins; carnal marriage and spiritual marriage with Christ; and the hub, rim, and spokes of a wheel as the figure of the religious superior, community, and the various virtues or vices that may govern their relationship. These four are the De claustrum animae (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 176:1017–1182), the De medicina animae (Patrologia Latina 176:1183–1202), the De Nuptiis (Patrologia Latina 176:1201–18), and the unpublished De rota praelationis et de rota simulationis. He wrote also the De avibus ad Raynerum, which is included as bk. 1, ch. 1 to 56 of the treatise De bestiis (Patrologia Latina 177:15–55). His De pastoribus et ovibus and his chartulary of Saint-Laurent are both unpublished.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, 6 v. (Lucca 1739–45) 6:421–425, with his letter of refusal to Reims, repr. in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 196:1553–58. Histoire littéraire de la France (Paris 1814–1941) 13:492–507. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:226–228. H. PELTIER, “Hugues de Fouillois, chanoine régulier de Saint-Laurent-au-Bois,” Revue du moyen-âge latin 2 (1946) 25–44. J. C. DIDIER, Catholicisme 5:1033–34.

[W. E. WILKIE]

HUGH OF GRENOBLE, ST.

Bishop and reformer; b. Châteauneuf-d'Isère, Dauphiné, France, 1052; d. Grenoble, France, April 1, 1132. His father, Odilo, a military man, ended his days in a Carthusian monastery. Hugh's first ecclesiastical office was a canonry at the cathedral of Valence, an office he held although still a layman. His learning and other qualities so impressed Bp. HUGH OF DIE, who was papal legate and later to become archbishop of Lyons, that he took him into his service. In 1080, while at a synod at Lyons, Hugh, although only 27 and not yet ordained, was elected bishop of Grenoble, a see much in need of reform. Ordained immediately, Hugh went to Rome and received consecration from Pope GREGORY VII. His strenuous efforts at reform during an episcopate of 52 years were marked with success, although at times he thought himself a failure and repeatedly asked to be replaced. His friendship with BRUNO THE CARTHUSIAN and the monks of La Grande Chartreuse, to whom he gave land and a warm welcome in 1084, was a source of great comfort to him. He was canonized by INNOCENT II in 1134; his life was written by his contemporary, GUIGO I, prior of La Grande Chartreuse. His relics, preserved in the cathedral at Grenoble, were lost in the THIRTY YEARS' WAR.

Feast: April 1.

Bibliography: GUIGO I OF THE GRANDE CHARTREUSE, Vie de saint Hugues, tr. M. A. CHOMEL (Salzburg, Austria 1986). Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 153:759–784. Acta Sanctorum April 1:36–46. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:4016. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 4:18–24. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 663. L. GAILLARD, Catholicisme 5:1022. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:3–5.

[H. MACKINNON]

HUGH OF HONAU

Theologian of Alsace-Lorraine, author of two works in MS Cambridge Univ. Lib. Ii.4.27. The first is entitled A Book Concerning Homousion and Homoeusion (fols. 2–129) and aims mainly at the clarification of such concepts as substance, nature, person, essence, existence, divinity, and many others. The author offers a multitude of texts gathered from Greek and Latin writings, including Aristotle's Physics, in support of his views. The second work, A Book Concerning the Difference between Nature and Person (fols. 130–177), explains the meaning of Trinitarian terminology and contains translations from the Greek Fathers made by Hugh Etherian at Hugh of Honau's request. The date of the first work is uncertain; the second was completed about 1180.

Hugh of Honau, a canon regular, was a "schoolman" and a "deacon of the Sacred Palace" at the court of Frederick Barbarossa (1152–91). As Barbarossa's legate to Manuel I (1143–80), Hugh went to Constantinople twice. On his first mission, about 1171, he asked Hugh Seal of St. Hugh of Lincoln.

Etherian for translations of texts in which Greek Fathers speak of a distinction between nature and person in God. Hugh's teacher, GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE, had insisted on the necessity of making such a distinction, but his view had been criticized at Rheims (1148). Gilbert's followers, however, were anxious to prove that Greek Fathers had taught the same doctrine. Hugh received the evidence of this on his second mission to Constantinople in 1179.

Bibliography: Two letters to Hugh of Etherian ed. by A. DONDAINE, Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 27 (1952) 128–131. V. LAURENT, Catholicisme 5:1034. N. M. HARING, "The Liber de diversitate naturae et personae by Hugh of Honau," ibid. 29 (1962) 120–216; "The Liber de differentia naturae et personae by Hugh Etherian and the Letters Addressed to Him by Peter of Vienna and Hugh of Honau," Mediaeval Studies 24 (1962) 16–19.

[N. M. HARING]

HUGH OF LINCOLN, ST.

Carthusian bishop; b. Avalon, France 1140; d. London, Nov. 16, 1200. He was educated by the Austin Canons of Villarbenoit and was professed there at an early age. Soon he joined La Grande Chartreuse, where he became procurator some years later. In 1179 he came to the notice of HENRY II, who made him prior of the languishing charterhouse at WITHAM, which Henry had founded in partial expiation for the murder of Thomas BECKET. In a short time Hugh built a church and monastery, and the community's fervor attracted many recruits. Hugh became bishop of Lincoln in 1186, at the instigation of Henry II and under obedience to the prior of the Grand Chartreuse. At Lincoln he proved himself a firm and resourceful defender of the Church's liberties, a zealous pastor and incorruptible judge, a contemplative whose prayer bore fruit in tireless action and devotion to others. He won the affection and respect of Henry II, RICHARD I, and JOHN, even when he opposed and rebuked them. Moreover, his charity was extended toward lepers, children, the Jews, etc. He spent one month every year with his community of Witham. He rebuilt Lincoln Cathedral and established a notable clerical school there. On occasion he served as royal ambassador and papal judge-delegate. His funeral, at which three kings and three bishops carried his coffin, is depicted in contemporary stained glass in the Dean's Eye of Lincoln Cathedral. Hugh was the first of the CARTHUSIANS to be canonized (1220), and Lincoln's principal saint throughout the Middle Ages. His most common iconographical attribute is his pet swan.

Feast: Nov. 17.

Bibliography: ADAM OF EYNHAM, The Life of St. Hugh of Lincoln, eds. D. L. DOUIE and D. H. FARMER, 2 v. (New York 1961–62, repr. New York 1985). GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS, The life of St. Hugh of Avalon, Bishop of Lincoln, ed. and tr. R. M. LOOMIS (New York 1985). The Metrical Life of Saint Hugh of Lincoln, tr. C. GARTON (Lincoln 1986), Latin and English. R. M. WOOLLEY, St. Hugh of Lincoln (London 1927). J. CLAYTON, St. Hugh of Lincoln (New York 1932). D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962) 375–391. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:370–374. D. H. FARMER, "The Canonization of St. Hugh of Lincoln," Lincolnshire Archaeological Society of Reports and Papers 6 (1956) 86–117; Saint Hugh of Lincoln (London 1985). H. MAYR-HARTING, ed., St Hugh of Lincoln (Oxford 1987), lectures delivered at Oxford and Lincoln to celebrate the eighth centenary of St Hugh's consecration as bishop of Lincoln.

[H. FARMER]

HUGH OF LINCOLN, ST.

Known also as Little St. Hugh to avoid confusion with Bp. St. HUGH OF LINCOLN; d. at Lincoln at the age of nine on Aug. 27, 1255. His death, believed to have followed scourging, crowning with thorns, and crucifixion, was allegedly the work of Koppin, a Lincoln Jew, who confessed under torture and was put to death along with 18 supposed accomplices. The other 74 accused were bailed out of prison by Franciscans who interceded for them and paid heavy fines. Hugh's body was thrown down a well and discovered later; it was translated to a shrine in the cathedral and was laid beside that of ROBERT GROSSETESTE. Modern historians, Christian and Jewish, have refuted general charges of such ritual murder by the Jews, and no single case of it has ever been proved. Such allegations were widely believed, however, in the Middle Ages; thus Chaucer's Prioress's Tale ends with an invocation to this saint (684–687):

O yonge Hugh of Lincoln, slayn also With [by] cursed Jewes, as it is notable, For it is but a litel while ago, Preye eek [also] for us. . . .

Little Hugh's feast on Aug. 27 has been removed from the calendar of the Diocese of Nottingham, England, where it had been celebrated for centuries. His cultus was never officially recognized.

See Also: MEDIEVAL BOY MARTYRS.

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum July 6:494–495. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 3:421–422.

[H. FARMER]

HUGH OF NEWCASTLE (NOVOCASTRO)

Franciscan theologian, Doctor scholasticus; b. Newcastle, Durham (or Neufchâteau, Lorraine), c. 1280; d. Paris, after 1322. He studied at the University of Paris as a disciple of DUNS SCOTUS, and between 1307 and 1317 commented on the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD. He was a master of theology and doctor of both laws, exercising his regency c. 1322. Hugh attended the Franciscan general chapter in Perugia (1322), where, with WILLIAM OF ALNWICK, he signed the declaration concerning the poverty controversy.

Only a few questions of his commentary on the Sentences have been edited: Franziskanische Studien (Münster-Werl 1914– ) 20 (1933) 177–222; Studi Francescani 41 (1944) 126–47; Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale (Louvain 1929– ) 18 (1951) 112–13; 21 (1954) 111; 22 (1955) 294–302; and Mélanges J. de Ghellinck (Gembloux 1951) 2:867–871. Hugh wrote also a series of Quaestiones quodlibetales (mentioned in his In 2 sent. 2.5; Cod. Vat. lat. 4871, fol. 25a), in addition to De victoria Christi contra antichristum. Certain other works whose authenticity is yet to be established, such as De commercio indulgentiarum, Mariale, and the Collationes, are also attributed to him.

Hugh is a faithful, though independent, follower of Duns Scotus, not infrequently developing his own points of view. His doctrine is presented clearly and precisely. In his discussions he often deals with Thomistic doctrines, which he frequently, but not invariably, rejects. Some names that repeatedly occur in Hugh's commentary are HENRY OF GHENT, DURANDUS of Saint-Pourçain, GODFREY OF FONTAINES, GILES OF ROME, and JAMES OF VITERBO.

During the 14th and 15th centuries Hugh enjoyed considerable fame among Franciscans. An unnamed 15th-century Franciscan of Greifswald remarked that "the Doctor scholasticus, Hugh of Novocastro, leads students marvelously from natural philosophy and metaphysics to growth in virtue; his discussion of predestination and divine foreknowledge in In I sent. pleased me very much when I read it" [F. Ehrle, Die Ehrentitel der scholastischen Lehrer des Mittelalters (Munich 1919) 47.10]. He was repeatedly quoted by Prosper of Reggio (fl. 1320), Alphonsus of Toledo (fl. 1345), John Bremer (fl. 1429), and WILLIAM OF VAUROUILLON.

In his question De conceptione B. M. V. he defends in a modest, fully impersonal way, the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, relying principally on Duns Scotus and secondarily on St. BONAVENTURE and WILLIAM OF WARE. As a defender of the Immaculate Conception he influenced Bernard de Deo (fl. 1320), Thomas de Rossy (fl. 1373), and Andrew Novocastro (fl. 1387). He is quoted as one of the earliest defenders of this doctrine by Gerard Rondellus (fl. 1400), by Ludovicus a Turre (fl. 1485), and by Anthony de Cucharo (fl. 1507).

Bibliography: A. EMMEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:515–516. J. H. SBARALEA, Supplementum et castigatio ad scriptores trium ordinum S. Francisci a Waddingo, 2 v. (Rome 1806; new ed. in 4 v. 1906–36) 1: 383. C. V. LANGLOIS, "Hugo de Novocastro," Essays in Medieval History, ed. A. G. LITTLE and F. M. POWICKE (Manchester 1925) 269–275; Histoire littéraire de la France (Paris 1814–1941) 36:342–349. E. AUWEILER, "De codice commentarii in IV librum sententiarum H. de N., OFM, Washingtonii servato," Archivum Franciscanum historicum 28 (1935) 570–573. F. STEGMÜLLER Repertorium Commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi (Wurzburg 1947) 1:nos. 366, 366.1. V. HEYNCK, "Der Skotist H. de Novo Castro, OFM," Franziskanische Studien 43 (1961) 244–270.

[A. EMMEN]

HUGH OF REMIREMONT

Cardinal, known also as Hugo Candidus, early promoter and later adversary of the GREGORIAN REFORM; b. Lorraine, c. 1020; d. after 1098. He was called from his Abbey of REMIREMONT with the original group brought to Rome by Pope LEO IX and was created cardinal priest of S. Clemente in 1049. He next appeared in 1061 opposing the reform party and supporting Cadalus of Parma (d. after 1071), the antipope Honorius II. Soon disillusioned, he was absolved by Pope ALEXANDER II and made his legate to Spain in 1063; he subsequently convoked synods in Avignon (1063), Aragon (1065, 1067), Auch, Toulouse, Barcelona, and Gerona (1068). After an interval in Rome Hugh again returned to Spain in 1071 but conflict with CLUNY, whose hitherto exclusive interest in Spain was thus reduced, culminated in charges against Hugh at a Roman synod in February 1073. Hugh was exonerated, perhaps with the help of Hildebrand, in whose election as Pope GREGORY VII he had a leading part. His Spanish legation was renewed in 1073 (Registrum 1.6, 7). Thus under two popes Hugh zealously promoted the aims of the Holy See: moral reform, establishment of papal authority and liturgical uniformity, and reconquest of the Spanish Muslim dominions (see SPAIN, MEDIEVAL). In conformity with his instructions he made special efforts in the kingdom of Aragon to replace the MOZARABIC RITE with Roman usages. For reasons still obscure, from 1075 he definitively joined the anti-Gregorian party and took a decisive part in synods convoked by Emperor HENRY IV in Worms, January 1076, incurring excommunication the same year and deposition in 1078 (Registrum 5.14a). He was at Brixen in 1080, where he signed the decree deposing Gregory VII and supported GUIBERT OF RAVENNA (d. 1100) as the antipope Clement III. As Clement's legate in Germany he was excommunicated by the QUEDLINBURG Synod of 1085, and an attempt to win England to the anti-Gregorian party was thwarted by LANFRANC of Canterbury. At Rome in August 1098 he signed the proclamation of the schismatical cardinals against Pope URBAN II as bishop of Palestrina, a post Hugh had received some years before. The harm done by a quarter century of relentless schismatical activity overshadowed his earlier services for the reform.

Bibliography: Sources. BONIZO OF SUTRI, Liber ad amicum, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Libelli de lite. (Berlin 1826–) 1:568–620. Benonis aliorumque cardinalium schismaticorum contra Gregorium VII. et Urbanum II. scripta: Epist. IV, V, VIII, ibid., 2:403–405, 405–407, 408–416. Literature. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 8:36–37, 47–48, 53, 65, 90, 96, 133, 149. F. LERNER, Kardinal Hugo Candidus (Historische Zeitschrift Beiheft 22 (1931). G. B. BORINO, "Note gregoriana, 2: Quando il card. Ugo Candido e Guiberto arcivescovo di Ravenna furono insieme scomunicati," Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. BORINO 4 (1952) 456–465. A. DUMAS, Catholicisme 5:1047–48. A. POSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:516.

[J. J. RYAN]

HUGH OF SAINT-CHER

Theologian and Biblical scholar; b. Saint-Cher, Dauphiné, France, c. 1200; d. Orvieto, Italy, March 19, 1263. He studied at the University of Paris and was already a doctor in law and a bachelor in theology when he entered the Dominican Order in 1225 at St. Jacques, Paris. Within a year he was elected provincial of France, but he continued his studies under ROLAND OF CREMONA, first Dominican master of sacred theology at the University of Paris. Relieved of provincial's duties in 1230, he taught theology and Sacred Scripture at the university. Again as provincial (1236–1244) he played an important part in Dominican affairs, particularly in the election of (St.) RAYMOND OF PEÑAFORT as master general, and served as the order's vicar-general in 1240 and 1241.

On May 28, 1244, he became the first Dominican cardinal, his titular church being S. Sabina. He participated in the 12th ecumenical council, held at Lyons, France (1245). By papal commission he reformed the Carmelite rule and liturgy (1247), a reform used again by (St.) John of the Cross and (St.) Teresa of Avila in the 16th century. While cardinal legate to Germany (1251–53), he sanctioned the institution at Liège of the feast of CORPUS CHRISTI, a feast extended through his urging to the universal Church by Urban IV in 1264.

Under Alexander IV he became embroiled in the acrid controversy at the University of Paris between the religious orders and the secular professors, and he was a member of the commission that condemned William of St. Amour's "Tract concerning the dangers of these latter days," a bitter tirade against the religious. Although he received power from Alexander IV in 1255 to revise the legislation of the Dominican Order, why he did not do so is not clear. Some suspect that HUMBERT OF ROMANS, then master general, was opposed to the revision. After his death Hugh was accorded the same Dominican suffrages that were extended to deceased master generals.

Although his interest also embraced theology, Hugh is particularly remembered for three Biblical works: a Latin Concordance of the Bible (1240), which served as a model, despite its crudities, for more elaborate subsequent attempts; the Postillae (exegetical notes on the whole Bible according to the literal and spiritual senses), which was reprinted many times up to the 17th century; and a Correctory of the Latin Vulgate, now extant only in MSS (a noble effort, but hardly adequate because of the primitive state of textual criticism).

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1:194–209, C. JERMAN, "Hugh of St. Cher," Dominicana 44 (1959) 338–347. E. FILTHAUT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:517–518.

[A. SMITH]

HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR

Biblical interpreter, theologian and mystical writer; b. end 11th century; d. Paris, Feb. 11, 1141.

Life. Very little is known about Hugh's origin and early youth. He reveals but one detail about that period when he writes: "Since my childhood I have been an exile" (Didasc. 3:20). According to one tradition, founded partly on Victorine and partly on German sources, he was descended from the family of the counts of Blankenburg in Saxony and related to Reinhard, Bishop of Halberstadt. After joining the community of Canons Regular of St. Augustine at Hamersleben, he was sent abroad by the bishop. Traveling with his uncle, Archdeacon Hugh of Halberstadt, he first obtained relics of the martyr Victor at Marseilles, then went to Paris. There around 1115 they settled in the newly founded monastery of Saint-Victor. The Victorine necrology records a major gift to the abbey by Hugh's uncle. Another substantial tradition points to a non-Saxon origin. Robert of Torigny, writing about Hugh as early as 1154, calls him Magister Lothariensis, and two manuscripts from the end of the 12th century (Douai 361 and 362) put his birthplace in the region of Ypres in Flanders. The diversity of opinions originating from the disagreement of the sources has lasted for several centuries. Even modern scholars are divided on the matter: neither F. E. Croydon, who rejects, nor J. Taylor, who supports the traditional view was able to settle the question for lack of sufficient evidence. It may well be that some combination of the two traditions, such as Saxon birth coupled with formation in the Low Countries before coming to Saint-Victor, offers the most suitable solution barring further discoveries.

About Hugh's later life, there are reliable but meager records. From the mid-1120s until his death he was the leading master at the school of Saint-Victor. His signature appears on official acts in 1127, 1139, and again between 1133 and 1140. Only a few times did he leave the abbey, once to visit the papal court under Innocent II (1130–43), either in France or in Italy. He took no part in the condemnation of Abelard's errors at Sens, June 2 and 3, 1140. Canon Osbert, who was in charge of the infirmary at Saint-Victor, left a written account of Hugh's pious death (Patrologia Latina 175:161–163).

Doctrine. Although Hugh's merits as a scholar are well recognized, only in recent years, with the careful study of his works by Roger Baron, Heinrich Weisweiler, Ludwig Ott, Damien van den Eynde and others, has it been possible to be confident that his authentic works have been identified and spurious ones weeded out. Moreover, the careful work of van den Eynde now makes it possible to have a good sense of the sequence of Hugh's writings, something that is of great assistance in judging his mature thought. Among all the authors of the time, none dealt more thoroughly with a broad range of basic questions and topics such as: the method of reading and studying; the fundamental task of the trivium and the quadrivium; the distinction the “works of creation” (the natural order) and the “works of salvation” (the sacraments); the nature of philosophy, conceived as universal knowledge, and its division into “theoretical, practical, mechanical, and logical” parts; the classification, origin, and progress of all sciences; the primary importance of the literal sense for the interpretation of Scripture; the rules of exegesis; the creation of a “summa” of theological doctrine; and the formation of a body of literature directed toward instruction in the ascetic/contemplative life leading to what today is called mysticism.

As a philosophical thinker Hugh made only a limited contribution, but his effect on the study of the liberal arts and philosophy was exceptional. Except the Epitome in philosophiam, the treatise De unione spiritus et corporis, and the first half of the Didascalicon (critical ed. C. H. Buttner, Washington 1939), none of his works is dedicated exclusively or even principally to philosophical matters. However, in his Didascalicon: On the Study of Reading, Hugh outlines a program of study for the pursuit of “Wisdom” embracing the parts of philosophy (Books 1–3) and the study of divine Scripture (Books 4–6). As a guide to subjects, a classification of the parts of philosophy, and a guide to reading, the Didascalicon exerted a long and deep influence on medieval intellectual culture. Hugh divides philosophy into four major categories of arts and disciplines: theoretical, practical, mechanical, and logical. For Hugh these are necessarily related to the “restoration of humanity” following the Fall, the primordial event which resulted in human ignorance, concupiscence and bodily weakness. The theoretical arts restore the loss of knowledge; the practical arts restore the loss of virtue, the mechanical arts ameliorate the weakness of body consequent on the Fall, while the logical arts insure clarity in pursuit of the others. The important place Hugh granted to the mechanical arts is striking. Integrated into this broader scheme are the seven “liberal arts” around which so much medieval philosophical learning was initially ordered. Hugh’s concern with proper reading, the proper books to read, and the demeanor of the reader (see Book 3 of the Didascalicon) reflects the insights of a master teacher, the central figure in a major school founded in the early part of the 12th century by William of Champeaux. William, former chancellor of the cathedral school of Notre Dame, Paris, left his position at the cathedral school to establish a small religious community on the left bank of the Seine. That community grew into the major abbey and school of Saint-Victor, a community of Regular Canons. The Victorine school was open to “outsiders” during Hugh’s lifetime and later. Connected with Hugh’s concern with reading is the fact that the preface to his Chronicon is an important text teaching an “art of memory,” one of the few between classical antiquity and the 13th century.

Exegesis. Hugh was an exegete, practical and theoretical; besides expounding many parts of the Bible, he was concerned with the method and rules of its interpretation. Beryl Smalley, who brought to scholarly attention Hugh’s insistence on the fundamental role of history and the literal sense in Christian Biblical exegesis, rightly stressed the innovative aspect of this. Henri de Lubac considered Hugh to be merely a continuator of traditional 3- or 4-fold Biblical exegesis. While Hugh did follow tradition, his emphasis on history as the foundation of all Biblical study and interpretation (especially allegory and tropology) truly brought a new focus to the exegetical project. The Didascalicon (Books 4–6) offered an outline of an ideal syllabus of readings for scripture study (what Biblical books to read for “history,” what for “allegory”), the distinction of the three senses (there called “disciplines” to be mastered in sequence by the student) of history, allegory, and tropology (using Gregory the Great’s illustration of history as the foundation, allegory as the structure, and tropology as the beautiful coloring of a building), and general directions for the reader, cautions against error, and an affirmation of the place of a firm doctrinal foundation preceding allegorical exegesis. Nevertheless, it remained for another work to provide the true introduction to the craft of Biblical interpretation. Often relegated to a secondary place, Hugh’s De scripturis et scriptoribus sacris is shown by its placement in manuscripts to be the work Hugh intended as an introduction to the practice of exegesis (the Didascalicon seems more like a handbook for a school master). In formal structure, and in the fact that in manuscripts it prefaces Hugh’s literal notes on Genesis and other books of the Hebrew Bible, De scripturis is an accessus ad auctores text, modeled directly on the accessus form then widely used in the arts faculty for non-Biblical texts. It covers the usual topics: titulus libri, nomen auctoris, materia libri, modus tractandi, ordo libri, utilitas, and cui parti philosophiae supponitur. Hugh’s extant works of Biblical exegesis are directed toward the literal sense of the Hebrew Bible. Notulae (Adnotationes elucidatoriae) exist for the Pentateuch, Judges, Ruth, Kings, and Lamentations, with commentary on diverse Psalm texts found as Book II of Hugh’s Miscellanea printed in vol 177 of Migne. A brief summation of exegetical principles is found in the opening prologue to Hugh’s De sacramentis; there he points out that the historical sense is served by the trivium (grammar, dialectic and rhetoric), while allegory and tropology are served by the quadrivium (arithmetic, music, geometry and astronomy) plus physics. His spiritual writings often draw directly on Biblical verses and images; see especially De arca Noe morali and De vanitate mundi, plus the Libellus de formatione arche (also known as De arca Noe mystica).

Theology. Hugh was one of the most creative and innovative theologians of the 12th century and deeply influenced succeeding generations through the creation of the first summa of theology in the Parisian schools and through his theological analysis and conclusions. His major work, De sacramentis christianae fidei (On the Sacraments of the Christian Faith) raises and answers essentially all significant theological questions, while keeping to what Hugh understood to be an historical and Biblical framework. Structuring his thought around the two great divine works, the work of creation (the natural world) and the work of restoration (Christ and all his sacraments, those that preceded and those that followed the Incarnation), Hugh utilized the quaestio form then becoming popular in the schools and in the work of Abelard for the purpose of exploring reflection on theological matters. He was indebted to William of Champeaux and Anselm of Laon, whose Biblical commentary and question tradition preceded his own work. Hugh was thought of in the middle ages as a “second Augustine.” Bonaventure, who owed much to Hugh’s influence in theology and spirituality, reflected the specialization of the 13th century when he noted that while individual patristic and contemporary writers were masters of the fields of rational thought (theology), preaching, and contemplation (here Richard of Saint-Victor figured), only one was master of all three: Hugh of Saint-Victor.

Hugh’s theology follows the pattern of the historical economy of salvation, beginning with the Creation of the cosmos and the fall of the first humans, culminating in Christ’s Incarnation, and ending with the consummation of all things. Deeply indebted, like most in his generation, to the thought of Augustine, Hugh made extensive use of the works of previous thinkers. He rarely cites his sources, hence his dependence is harder to note. The work of Weisweiler and Ott has, however, made quite clear his extensive citation and paraphrase of Augustine, Gregory the Great, Hilary of Poitiers, as well as texts from Ivo of Chartres and other more nearly contemporaries. His definition of faith as “a certainty about things absent, above opinion and below science,” became classical throughout scholasticism. He contributed notably to the elaboration of the definition of a Sacrament in the strict sense of the term, considering extensively each that would become constitutive of the “seven sacraments.” Moreover, he was the only theologian of his day who emphasized the role of absolution in Penance and associated divine grace with Matrimony, which he considered (as did Bonaventure later) the sole sacrament established before the Fall. Thanks to his initiative, theology was enriched with two hitherto neglected treatises, one on the Church, the other on the Last Things. Although he wrote no separate treatise on ethics, the portion of De sacramentis devoted to that topic shows the clarity and breadth of his thought on such topics, with an emphasis on the analysis of the nature of love, and, in the case of marriage, an emphasis upon the vow between two persons, rather than consummation, as the essential element. Hugh commented on Eriugena’s translation of the Celestial Hierarchy of Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite, thus introducing the thought of that enigmatic Eastern Christian writer of the 6th century to a wider audience. One also finds in Hugh’s theology and especially his spirituality a distinctive Dionysian element, found particularly in Hugh’s sense that the material world is a divinely meant “upward leading” guide for the spiritual quest.

Spirituality. Hugh’s spiritual writings were part of the great upsurge in mystical and devotional writing fueled in part by the spirit of reform and regeneration that took root in the later 11th and early 12th century, producing the Cistercian Order, numerous wandering preachers, a renewal of the “apostolic life,” and a greater concern with the systematic ordering of the spiritual life. Hugh shared the heritage of centuries of “monastic mysticism” (to use Bernard McGinn’s phrase) with the Cistercians; he was also part of the new move to systematize thought in the schools and brought that spirit to his analysis of the mystical quest. Hugh’s two major spiritual treatises, De arca Noe morali and Libellus de formatione arche (also known as De arca Noe mystica) utilize a drawing based on Christ seated in Majesty (based on Isaiah’s vision recounted in Isaiah, 6) and incorporating a diagram of Noah’s Ark to represent the line of history, the centrality of Christ, and the 12 stages of the mystic’s quest. This drawing (described by Hugh but thus far not found in a realized form) functioned much like a device for focusing and meditation, as well as for spiritual transformation and the conveying of spiritual/theological teaching. Hugh also wrote other spiritual treatises: De vanitate mundi (which again uses vivid visual images and the image of the Ark as well), De arrha anima (The Soul’s betrothal gift, which concerns with love relation between the soul and the divine), De substantia dilectionis (On the substance of love), and others. Hugh presents the spiritual quest as a return from fallen humanity’s scattered, diffuse, misdirected love of the material world to a unifying (and unified) love evoked by the Incarnate Christ, the divine Bridegroom, who has come to call humans back to reformation, transformation and experience of the divine presence. This return begins with the material reality of the world, which is a manifestation of God’s creative power and functions as an initial “vehicle” of divine presence, moves through a deeper understanding of Scripture as the “new” voice of God which speaks to fallen humanity, and finally comes to an inward transformation (presented as a melting) which reforms human beings into the lost image of God.

Bibliography: Works. HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR, Omnia opera, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 175–177. Hugonis de Sancto Victore, Didascalicon: de studio legendi. A Critical Text, ed. C. H. BUTTIMER (Washington, D.C. 1939). The “Didascalicon” of Hugh of St. Victor: A Medieval Guide to the Arts, tr. J. TAYLOR (New York 1961). Hugh of Saint Victor on the Sacraments of the Christian Faith (De sacramentis), tr. R. J. DEFERRARI (Cambridge 1951). Hugh of Saint-Victor: Selected Spiritual Writings, tr. A. Religious of C.S.M.V. (London 1962). L’Oeuvre de Hugues de Saint-Victor, coll. “Sous la règle de Saint Augustin,” dir. P. SICARD (Turnhout v. 1, 1997; v. 2, 2000). Hugues de Saint-Victor et son École, intr. and tr. P. SICARD (Turnhout 1991). Textes Spirituels de Hugues de Saint-Victor, tr. R. BARON (Tournai 1962). Hugonis de Sancto Victore: Opera Propaedeutica. Practica geometriae, De grammatica, Epitome Dindimi in Philosophiam, ed. R. BARON (Notre Dame 1966). R. BARON, “Hugues de Saint-Victor: Contribution à un nouvel examen de son oeuvre,” Traditio 15 (1959) 223–297; “Études sur l’authenticité de l’oeuvre de Hugues de Saint-Victor d’après les mss. Paris Maz., 717, BN 14506 et Douai 360–6,” Scriptorium 10 (1956) 182–220. P. GAUTIER DALCHÉ, La “Descriptio mappae mundi” de Hugues de Saint-Victor. Texte inédit avec introduction et commentaire (Paris 1988). D. VAN DEN EYNDE, Essai sur la succession et la date des écrits de Hugues de Saint-Victor (Spicilegium Pontificii Athenaei Antonianum 13; Rome 1960). General. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:112–118. F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER (Berlin 1923–28) 2:261–267. J. DE GHELINCK, Le Mouvement théologique du XII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Bruges 1948). Life. F. E. CROYDON, “Notes on the Life of Hugh of St. Victor,” Journal of Theological Studies 40 (London 1939) 232–253. R. BARON, “Notes biographiques sur Hugues de Saint-Victor,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 51 (Louvain 1956) 920–934. J. TAYLOR, The Origin and Early Life of Hugh of St. Victor (Notre Dame, Ind. 1957). Exegesis. B. SMALLEY, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages 3rd ed. (Oxford 1983), chap. 3. H. DE LUBAC, Exégèse médiévale, 2 v. (Paris 1959–64) 2.1:287–359. Doctrine. H. WEISWEILER, Die Wirksamkeit der Sakramente nach Hugo von St. Victor (Freiburg 1932); “Die Arbeitsmethode Hugos von St. Viktor. Ein Beitrag zum Entstehen seines Hauptwerkes De sacramentis,” Scholastik 20–24 (1949) 59–87, 232–267. L. OTT, “Untersuchungen zur theologischen Briefliteratur der Frühscholastik,” Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 34.2 (Münster 1937) 126–347. D. LASI, Hugonis de S. Victore theologia perfectiva (Studia Antonia 7; Rome 1956). R. BARON, Science et Sagesse chez Hugues de Saint-Victor (Paris 1957). J. P. KLEINZ, The Theory of Knowledge of Hugh of St. Victor (CUA Philosophical Studies 87; Washington 1945). B. LACROIX, “Hugues de Saint-Victor et les conditions du savoir au moyen-âge,” An Etienne Gilson Tribute, ed. C. J. O’NEIL (Milwaukee 1959). J. EHLERS, Hugo von St. Viktor: Studien zum Geschichtsdenken und zur Geschichtsschreibung des 12. Jahrhunderts (Wiesbaden 1973); “Arca significat ecclesiam: ein theologisches Weltmodell aus der ersten Hälfte des 12. Jahrhunderts,” Jahrbuch des Institutes für Frühmittelalterforschung der Universität Münster 6 (Münster 1972) 121–187. I. ILLICH, In the Vineyard of the Text: A Commentary to Hugh’s Didascalicon (Chicago and London 1993). A. M. LAND-GRAF, Introduction à la littérature théologique de la scolastique naissante (Montréal 1973). A. M. PIAZZONI, ed. “Il De unione spiritus et corporis di Ugo di San Vittore,” Studi Medievali 21 (1980) 861–888. R. ROQUES, “Connaissance de Dieu et théologie symbolique d’après l’In Hierarchiam coelestem sancti Dionysii de Hugues de Saint-Victor,” in R. ROQUES, Structures Théologiques de la Gnose à Richard de Saint-Victor. Essais et analyses critiques (Paris 1962) 294–364. P. SICARD, Diagrammes médiévaux et exégèse visuelle. Le “Libellus de formatione archae” de Hugues de Saint-Victor Bibliotheca Victorina 4; Turnhout-Paris 1993). R. W. SOUTHERN, “Aspects of the European Tradition of Historical Writing, 2: Hugh of St. Victor and the Idea of Historical Development,” Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, fifth series, v. 21 (London 1971). J. W. M. VAN ZWIETEN, The Place and Significance of Literal Exegesis in Hugh of St Victor (Ph.D. dissertation, University of Amsterdam, 1992). G. A. ZINN, “Hugh of St. Victor and the Art of Memory,” Viator 5 (1974) 211–234; “Hugh of St Victor, Isaiah’s Vision, and De arca Noe,” in The Church and the Arts, ed. D. WOOD (Oxford 1992); “Hugh of St. Victor’s De scripturis et scriptoribus sacris as an Accessus Treatise for the Study of the Bible,” Traditio: Studies in Ancient and Medieval History, Thought, and Religion 52 (1997) 111–134.

[G. A. ZINN/D. VAN DEN EYNDE]

HUGHES, ANGELA, MOTHER

Social worker, administrator; b. Annalohan, County Tyrone, Ireland, c. 1806; d. New York City, Sept. 5, 1866. Ellen was the daughter of Patrick and Margaret (McKenna) Hughes. She immigrated to the U.S. in 1818 and lived with her family at Chambersburg, Pa. She attended St. Joseph Academy (now College), Emmitsburg, Md., where she entered the Sisters of Charity in 1825, receiving the name of Sister Mary Angela; she pronounced her vows in 1828. Between 1837 and 1846, she served in asylums for children in St. Louis, Mo.; Utica, N.Y.; and New York City.

Then in December 1846, at the first election of the New York community since it had separated from the Sisters of Charity at Emmitsburg, she was elected assistant to Mother General Elizabeth Boyle. In 1849 Sister Mary Angela founded the New York community’s first mission and New York City’s first Catholic hospital, St. Vincent’s. In 1855 she was elected mother general. A year later she bought the Font Hill estate on the Hudson River and in 1859 the motherhouse was moved to this site from McGown’s Pass (present Fifth Avenue and 107th Street), New York City. In the same year two branches of her community were established with independent motherhouses at Mt. St. Vincent, Halifax, Nova Scotia; and at Newark, N.J. During her two terms as general, 15 schools and convents were opened also. In 1861 Mother Angela returned to New York City as superior of St. Vincent’s Hospital, where she died two years after the death of her brother, Abp. John J. Hughes, of New York.

John Joseph Hughes.

Bibliography: M. A. MCCANN, History of Mother Seton's Daughters, 3 v. (New York 1917–23). M. DE L. WALSH, The Sisters of Charity of New York, 1809–1959, 3 v. (New York 1960).

[M. L. FELL]

HUGHES, JOHN JOSEPH

First archbishop of New York; b. County Tyrone, Ireland, June 24, 1797; d. New York, N.Y., Jan. 3, 1864. John was the third of seven children of Patrick and Margaret (McKenna) Hughes, small farmers who avoided involvement in Ireland's political disturbances. John attended the local schools, and soon showed an interest in the priesthood. In 1816 the father and an older son immigrated to the U. S., sending for John the following year, and for the rest of the family in 1818. They settled in Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, where John worked in the quarries, at mending roads, and as a gardener. He made several applications for admission to Mt. St. Mary's Seminary, Emmitsburg, Md., only to learn that there was no room. When, however, Rev. John DUBOIS offered to take him as a gardener until a vacancy occurred, Hughes went to Mt. St. Mary's on Nov. 10, 1819, and a year later was received in the seminary. He was accepted by Bp. Henry CONWELL for the Diocese of PHILA-DELPHIA, Pa., and ordained in St. Joseph's Church, Philadelphia, on Oct. 15, 1826; arrangements were made for him to continue his studies under Michael Hurley, OSA, who was assigned to St. Augustine's parish in that city.

Career in Philadelphia. When Hughes arrived, the trustees of St. Mary's Cathedral were in open conflict with Conwell as a result of the Hogan schism, which dated from 1821. After about a year at St. Augustine's, where he had a chance to watch developments at St. Mary's, Hughes spent a few weeks as pastor of Bedford, Pa.; he was then recalled to Philadelphia to become, successively, pastor at St. Joseph's (January 1827) and at St. Mary's (April 1827). When the trustees of St. Mary's refused to pay his salary, he returned in July to St. Joseph's, where he remained until St. John's Church was built and dedicated in April 1832. The new church had no lay incorporators and Hughes administered his parish with a firm hand.

Although highly successful in his pastoral activities, he attracted more attention by his controversial writings and speeches. His first published sermon, which enhanced his reputation as a preacher, was on Catholic EMANCIPATION, then recently granted in Ireland, and was dedicated to Daniel O'Connell, whom he greatly admired. Anti-Catholicism, then strong in Philadelphia, was expressed freely in sermons, lectures, and the bitterly polemical Protestant weeklies. There was no Catholic paper, since many Catholics, including Bp. Francis Kenrick, who had been appointed coadjutor with full jurisdiction in 1830, thought the best policy was to suffer in silence. Hughes, on the contrary, believed in a vigorous defense. He founded the Catholic Herald, a newspaper that he later turned over to the diocese. Earlier he had established a Catholic Tract Society to distribute free pamphlets. In 1830, using the pseudonym "Cranmer," he wrote letters to the Protestant, a New York weekly specializing in anti-Catholic propaganda. When, however, his wildly improbable accounts of Catholic plots and progress failed to strain the credulity of the editors and readers, he exposed the hoax. His best known controversy in Philadelphia was with Dr. John Breckinridge, a Presbyterian clergyman, with whom he debated in writing (1833) and orally (1835) on the Rule of Faith, and Catholicism as an obstacle to civil and religious liberty.

Hughes did not overestimate the value of controversy, but used it to make the enemies of the Church more cautious and to raise the morale of the sorely tried Catholic masses. His talents and his achievements attracted attention, and his promotion to the episcopate was generally expected. He had been recommended as coadjutor of Philadelphia by Conwell in 1829, and for Cincinnati in 1833. In 1836 the Holy See designated Hughes as coadjutor of Philadelphia and Kenrick as bishop of a new see to be erected at Pittsburgh, but Gregory XVI delayed formal approval. In 1837 when the Third Provincial Council of Baltimore asked that the division of Philadelphia be postponed, Hughes was preconized titular bishop of Basileopolis and coadjutor, with the right of succession, of New York. He was consecrated there on Jan. 7, 1838, in old St. Patrick's Cathedral.

New York. The diocese then consisted of all of New York State and about one-half of New Jersey, an area of about 55,000 square miles. Hughes found 22 churches, 10 of which had been erected in 1837, and 40 priests, to serve the needs of 200,000 Catholics, in a total population of about 2,700,000. The Emmitsburg Sisters of Charity were the only religious community in the diocese. Seven parochial schools, all in New York City, and four orphan asylums, two of which were in the city, made up the total of Catholic charitable and educational institutions. The population of the U.S. was increasing rapidly; in New York City the increase was five times the national rate. Moreover, the churches of the city were burdened with a heavy debt, $300,000. When, in January 1838, Dubois suffered a stroke, responsibility for the diocese devolved upon Hughes, who was named apostolic administrator in August 1839 and succeeded to the see on Dec. 20, 1842. He became archbishop of New York on July 19, 1850, when it was made an archdiocese.

Hughes's authority was challenged in February 1839, when the cathedral trustees had a catechist appointed by Dubois ejected from the Sunday school by the police. A pastoral, written by Hughes and signed by Dubois, threatened the parishoners with an interdict unless they repudiated the trustees. This was done promptly, at a meeting summoned, addressed, and presided over, by Hughes. Except for the parish of St. Louis in Buffalo, where the trustees held out for years, New York had no further difficulty with TRUSTEEISM.

After a preliminary visitation of the diocese, Hughes went to Europe in October 1839, seeking aid in Paris, Rome, Munich, Vienna, and Dublin. On his return in 1840, he engaged in his greatest contest over the question of religion and the public schools. The Public School Society, a private organization, practically monopolized public funds for education in New York City from 1825 to 1840. Professedly nonsectarian, it provided religious training that was offensive to Catholics, who wanted state aid for denominational schools and a proportionate share of public funds. Governor William Seward agreed with the Catholics, but the city aldermen and the state legislature were hostile. The resultant controversy, which destroyed the Public School Society, led to two quite unexpected developments—the total secularization of U. S. public education on all levels, and the creation of the parochial school system in the U. S.

The growth of political nativism had led, in 1844, to the burning of Catholic churches and widespread riots in Philadelphia. Hughes's success in arousing his people to defend the churches against mob violence, while exhorting them to give no provocation, prevented similar disorders in New York. His firm stand on this and on the school question made him known throughout the country. Although attacked and misrepresented in the press, he was, nevertheless, highly respected in both Catholic and non-Catholic circles.

His achievements in the diocese included the erection of four new sees; the beginning of the new St. Patrick's Cathedral; the founding of a seminary, and of a college at Fordham, New York City, which he later transferred to the Jesuits; the introduction of many religious communities; and the development of charitable and educational works. He was instrumental in separating a group of Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md., thus founding the independent Mt. St. Vincent community in New York City.

National and International Affairs. Hughes was a vigorous defender of the temporal power of the pope, and sponsored more than one special collection to help Pius IX. He took a leading part in the founding of the North American College at Rome in 1859. Thoroughly unsympathetic to the abolitionist movement in the U. S., he believed that sudden emancipation would injure the slaves. He opposed plans to settle Irish immigrants on farm lands in the West, fearing they would be lost to the Church because of the shortage of priests. Although he endorsed Irish nationalism, he disapproved of risings that he thought could not succeed, and condemned Irish antislavery sentiment as an intrusion into U. S. politics. Because he was convinced of the basic harmony between American political institutions and Catholicism, he urged Catholic support of the U. S. Constitution and was friendly with officials of the national government. When President James Polk tried to send him to Mexico in 1847, he refused the mission because of its unofficial character. A visit to Europe in support of the Union, 1861–62, was undertaken at the request of President Lincoln and Secretary Seward. He was recommended to Rome for the red hat by Lincoln's government; when no action was taken, some believed the time was not ripe for an American cardinal, while others thought Hughes was not the best choice. His last public appearance was made in July 1863, at the request of New York Gov. Horatio Seymour, who was attempting to stop the draft riots that were then occurring in the City of New York.

Character and Personality. Archbishop Hughes was a born leader and fighter. Prompt and vigorous in action, and unyielding in conflict, he believed he had the duty and the ability to lead and defend his people, and to prove that American Catholics were not second-class citizens. If he was autocratic and at times fought harder than was necessary, he merely displayed the defects of his virtues.

Although Hughes became increasingly intolerant of disagreement, he nevertheless rendered valuable service to both Church and country. As his successor, Abp. John McCloskey, said: “. . . if ever there was a man who in the whole history and character of his life impressed upon us the sense and conviction that he had been raised up by God, was chosen as His instrument to do an appointed work . . . that man was Archbishop Hughes.” Hughes died of Bright’s disease, after a long illness, and was buried in the old cathedral. His remains were translated to the new St. Patrick’s Cathedral in 1883.

Bibliography: Complete Works, comp. and ed. L. KEHOE, 2 v. (New York 1865). J. R. HASSARD, Life of the Most Reverend John Hughes, D.D., First Archbishop of New York (New York 1866). H. A. BRANN, Most Reverend John Hughes: First Archbishop of New York (2d ed. New York 1912). E. M. CONNORS, Church-State Relationships in Education in the State of New York (Washington 1951). F. D. COHALAN, A Popular History of the Archdiocese of New York (Yonkers, N.Y. 1983). R. SHAW, Dagger John: The Unquiet Life and Times of Archbishop John Hughes of New York (New York 1977).

[F. D. COHALAN]

HUGHES, PHILIP

Internationally recognized authority on Roman Catholic Church history; b. Manchester, England, May 11, 1895; d. South Bend, Indiana, Oct. 6, 1967. He was educated in Manchester at St. Bede’s College, then at Ushaw seminary and the University of Louvain. This was followed by two years of research in Rome. Following ordination to the priesthood on Aug. 8, 1920, he spent seven years (1924–31) in parish work in the Diocese of Salford before becoming archivist of the Archdiocese of Westminster (1931–43). Poor health required him to relinquish this position but did not prevent him from continuing his research and writing. He became professor of Church history at the University of Notre Dame in 1955, where his courses, spiced with as much wit as learning, became favorites of the graduate students. Frail health forced him to give up regular teaching in 1963, at which point he became a scholar-in-residence.

Hughes’s reputation as a scholar is based largely on two major works. The three-volume History of the Church (1933–47), which carried the story up to the beginnings of the Reformation, is a synthesis of the best scholarship of his generation on the subject. His most important study is the three-volume History of the Reformation in England (1951–54). Both works incorporated his penetrating insights and frank evaluations of crucial events and periods.

The range of his scholarship can be seen in such books as The Catholic Question, 1688–1829 (1929), St. John Fisher (1935), and The Life of Pius XI (1937). A priest of deep faith, he wrote two books for the spiritual life of the faithful: The Faith in Practice (rev. ed. 1965) and Meditations for Lent from St. Thomas Aquinas (1938). He also wrote three books to help the general reader to understand the background of the Christian world he lived in: A Popular History of the Church (1938), A Popular History of the Reformation (1957), and The Church in Crisis: A History of the General Councils, 325–1870 (1961).

Bibliography: London Times (Oct. 7, 1967). Catholic Historical Review 53 (1968) 703–704.

[J. A. CORBETT]

HUGO, CHARLES HYACINTHE

Norbertine (O Praem.) historiographer; b. St. Mihiel, France, Sept. 20, 1667; d. Étival Abbey, Aug. 2, 1739. He was professed at the Premonstratensian Abbey at Pont–Mousson Aug. 28, 1685, taking Louis as his religious name. He received a doctorate in theology from the University of Bourges (1691) and taught theology at the Abbeys of Jandevres (1691) and Étival (1693) until elected prior at Nancy (1700). He was named historiographer and councilor of state by Duke Leopold of Lorraine (1708).

Hugo’s Traité historique et critique sur l’origine et la généalogie de la maison de Lorraine (1711) irked Louis XIV and was condemned by the Parliament of Paris Sept. 27, 1712. In 1710 he accepted his election as coadjutor abbot at Étival, having refused a similar post at the Abbey of Flambémont, which was held in commendam by Nicholas Brisacier, doctor of the Sorbonne. In the next year he received the title of abbot of Fontaine–André, a suppressed abbey in the Swiss canton of Neuchâtel. In 1722 he assumed full control of the Étival Abbey and began the coordination of his historical research.

The list of Hugo’s works includes Vie de St. Norbert, fondateur des Prémontrés (1704), Sacrae antiquitatis monumenta historica, dogmatica, diplomatica notis illustrata (2 v. 1725–31), and Sacri et canonici ordinis Praemonstratensis annales (2 v. 1734–36). In 1725 Hugo was in conflict with the bishop of Tours over his rights as abbas nullius. The bishop, who ignored the abbot's immunity, brought the affair to the general assembly of the clergy, which condemned Hugo. He was exiled to the Abbey of Rangeval (1726), but upon appeal to Rome was named bishop of Ptolemais in partibus (1728).

Bibliography: N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense, 3:68–71. A. L. GOOVAERTS, Écrivains, artistes, et savants de l'ordre de Prémontré, 4 v. (Brussels 1899–1920) 3:110–129. N. BACKMUND, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 5:520. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme, 5:1007–08.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

HUGOLINO OF GUALDO CATTANEO, BL.

Augustinian friar; b. Bevagna, Italy; d. Gualdo Cattaneo, Jan. 1, 1260. He accepted a former Benedictine monastery in Gualdo (Diocese of Spoleto) in 1258, becoming its first prior. At his death, his body was transferred to the parish church, SS. Anthony and Antonine, which on Sept. 2, 1262, was solemnly consecrated by the seven bishops of the district, who mentioned the relics of "Hugolino" in their letter of indulgence. Local veneration resulted in a penitential society that engaged in charitable work. His cult was approved Mar. 12, 1919. However, W. Hümpfner identifies this Augustinian as Hugolino Michaelis of Bevagna, a hermit who erected a monastery in 1340, followed the BENEDICTINE RULE, and was alive in 1393. In 1425 his monastery was given to the Olivetans of Foligno and in 1437 to the AUGUSTINIANS, who had been in Gualdo since 1363. He was venerated as an Augustinian saint by 1482.

Feast: Jan. 1 (formerly Jan. 3).

Bibliography: For the older viewpoint, Analecta Augustiniana 8 (1919) 49–51. W. HÜMPFNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:520–521.

[F. ROTH]

HUGOLINO OF ORVIETO

Augustinian friar and important representative of the Augustinian School; b. sometime after 1300, Orvieto, Italy; d. 1373, Aquapendente. Mentioned for the first time in 1334, he studied in Paris from 1335 to 1338. In 1347–1348 he gave his lectures on the Sentences in Paris and in 1352 was promoted to Master of Theology. He taught from 1357 to 1360 as head of his Order's house of studies in Perugia. From 1360 on he taught in Bologna as a member of the theological faculty for which he wrote statutes. His ecclesiastical career began in 1368 with his election as prior general of the Augustinians. In 1370 he was consecrated bishop of Gallipoli in the Dardanelles. On Oct. 2, 1371 Pope Gregory XI named him Latin Patriarch of Constantinople and administrator of the diocese of Rimini.

Hugolino was a clear and sharp thinker who oriented his teachings on the Augustinian theology of grace, following closely both St. AUGUSTINE and GREGORY OF RIMINI. He drew only seldom on the work of Aristotle. The main idea of his theology is the living God (deus vita). His sacramental theology is based on his Christology. Foundations of his thought include the Augustinian doctrine of illumination, theological enlightenment (lumen theologicum), and the necessity of grace for every morally good act. He fought against Joachimite errors (Joachim of Fiore) regarding the doctrine of the Trinity. He was open to contemporary language theory, but tried to find his own way between realism and conceptualism. His Commentary on the Sentences exerted a decisive influence on the theological development of the late Middle Ages, and served as a foundation and preparation for other Commentaries on the Sentences, notably those of Konrad von Ebrach, Dionysius of Moden and Simon of Cremona. His work was used extensively by Johannes Hiltalingen of Basel, Angelus of Dobeln, Johannes Zachariae and Augustinus Favaroni of Rome. His Commentaries continued to be influential at the universities of Paris, Bologna, and Vienna.

Bibliography: Works. W. ECKERMANN, ed., Hugolini de Urbe Veteri OESA Commentarius in quatuor libros Sententiarum, 4 vols. (Wurzburg 1980–88); Zwei neuentdeckte theologische Principien Hugolins von Orvieto: Schwerpunkte und Wirkungen (Wurzburg 1990), 43–83; Der Physikkommentar Hugolins von Orvieto OESA: Ein Beitrag zur Erkenntnislehre des spatmittelalterlichen Augustinismus (partial edition) (Berlin and New York 1972). Literature. V. MARCOLINO, "Die Wirkung der Theologie Hugolins von Orvieto im Spatmittelalter," Analecta Augustiniana 56 (1993) 5–124. W. ECKERMANN and B. U. HUCKER, eds., Hugolin von Orvieto, ein spatmittelalterlicher Augustinertheologe in seiner Zeit (Cloppenburg 1992). W. ECKERMANN, ed., Schwerpunkte und Wirkungen des Sentenzenkommentars Hugolins von Orvieto OESA (Wurzburg 1990).

[W. ECKERMANN]

HUGON, ÉDOUARD

Theologian; b. Lafarre, France, Aug. 25, 1867; d. Rome, Feb. 7, 1929. He joined the Dominican Order in 1885 and was ordained in 1892. He taught philosophy and theology at Rosary Hill, New York, and at Poitiers, Angers, and Rijckholt. Hugon became one of the first professors at the Pontifical Institute Angelicum founded in 1909. His teaching and his written works won him the esteem of contemporary popes. Benedict XV made him a consulter on the Congregation for the Oriental Church on March 21, 1918, and Pius XI asked him to prepare a draft for the encyclical Quas Primas (1925) on the kingship of Christ.

Hugon's incisive teaching has been preserved in volumes often reprinted: Logica (Paris 1902), Philosophia Naturalis (Paris 1905), Metaphysica (Paris 1907), Tractatus Theologici (5 v. Paris 1920–27). As quasi-popular monographs he published Le Mystère de la Rédemption (Paris 1910), Le Mystère de la Trinité (Paris 1912), Le Mystère de l'Incarnation (Paris 1913), La Sainte Eucharistie (Paris, 7th ed. 1935), Les Vingtquatre thèses thomistes (Paris 8th ed. 1938). His work Vierge-Prêtre (Paris 1911) occasioned a lively reaction [cf. R. LAURENTIN, Marie, l'Église et le Sacerdoce (Paris 1952) 476–479]. He also made notable contributions to La Vie Spirituelle.

Bibliography: R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Un Théologien apôtre: Le Père Maître Edouard Hugon (Paris 1929). H. HUGON, Le Père Hugon (Paris 1930). Y. CONGAR, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Tables Générales 16.2:2123–24.

[A. DUVAL]

HUGUCCIO (HUGH OF PISA)

Classical canonist and the most famous of all decretists; b. Pisa, Italy, during the first half of the 12th century; d. Ferrara, Italy, April 30, 1210. His name appears under various forms: Hugo, Ugo, hugucio, huguccio, hugutio, uguicio, hugwiccio, ugwicio, uguicio, hugotio, and so on. His identifying initials in the glosses are: hug., ug., hu., hugu., h., N., yg., wig., gw., Gwi., and wiz. His Pisan origin is confirmed not only by a constant tradition but also by references found in his works. In fact, frequent allusions are made to the conditions existing in Pisa, while in the foreward of the Liber derivationum he calls himself patria Pisanum and, under the term Pis/pisa, clearly professes his origin from this city.

Indications obtained from his works show that Huguccio dedicated himself to profound studies of liberal arts. At the same time he devoted himself to the study of theology and especially of Canon Law in Bologna, where he also taught, counting among his disciples Lotharius of Segni, who later became Innocent III. On May 1, 1190, Clement III appointed him bishop of Ferrara. During this time the Roman pontiffs entrusted him with numerous assignments, references to which are to be found in the decretals of the pontiffs [Corpus iuris canonici, ed. A. Friedberg (Leipzig 1879–81) X 1.29.34; 3.41.8; 4.19.7; 5.39.43; 3.43.3].

His works are divided into three classes: grammatical, theological, and juridical. Among the grammatical works are the Tractatus de dubio accentu wherein the accent of composed terms is determined together with prosodic explanations. This work was composed before the Liber derivationum in which it is cited. The Rosarium, which deals with declination of verbs, was likewise written before the Liber derivationum, wherein it is quoted. In the Summa artis grammaticae the author reveals his juridical knowledge, and therefore the work appears to have been composed at a later date.

The Liber derivationum, however, assured Huguccio of philological and lexicographic fame. In alphabetical order it gives etymological explanations of words. This extensive work followed the pattern of similar publications by Osbern of Gloucester and Papia and for nearly two centuries was known throughout Europe, until it was superseded by the Catholicon of John de Balbis Januensis. Even today it holds its importance, and an edition is projected by the Istituto di Studi Romani in Rome. The date of composition of this work has always been attributed to the years of his episcopacy in Ferrara and more precisely to the period 1197 to 1201, when he was present in Nonantula. The work reveals a lack of perfection of that juridical thinking that he shows later, in his Summa decretorum.

Consequently, it must have preceded this last publication. In fact, Hugguccio himself quotes the Liber derivationum in his Hagiographia, which appears together with the Summa decreti (manuscript Paris, Biblical naturalist, 14877, folio 127r). This later work, therefore, seems to be a product of his activities as a young student diligently and profoundly dedicated to the study of arts, as proved by his writings.

Three treatises give testimony of his theological studies. The above-mentioned Hagiographia constitutes a transition from grammatical works to theological ones. It is an etymological glossary of the names of the days of the week, of the months, and of the saints assigned to each day; it was composed before the Summa decreti. Huguccio's principal theological writings are the Expositio symboli apostolorum, containing numerous etymological explanations that confirm his broad grammatical knowledge, and the Expositio dominicae orationis, wherein are illustrated seven invocations, the seven Gifts of the Holy Spirit, seven Beatitudes, and compiled at an earlier date than that of the Summa decreti.

Huguccio's principal work, which reveal his exceptional qualities and profound culture, is the Summa super decreta, or Summa super corpore decretorum, which, according to the testimony of John of God, he wrote ad instantiam discipulorum. Huguccio's Summa excels as the most complete of all commentaries written on the Decree of Gratian and justly honors the author as the greatest of all DECRETISTS.

Origin. The Summa was for the most part published between the years 1188 and 1190. At a later date appeared Causa I, the Tractatus de poenitentia (33.3) and Pars III (De consecratione), Causa 23.1–4 ad 34. The continuation of this incomplete part was written by the Portuguese John of God about 1243. In certain manuscript codes these Causae (23–26) were replaced by other works of that time. The manuscript codes of the Summa, more or less complete, amount to more than 40. This Summa is a treatise ad modum apparatus; that is, it explains in synthesis not only the matter and doctrine but also the legal text that is examined and interpreted exagetically and analytically.

Sources. The works and glosses that Huguccio consulted quoted implicitly or explicitly, analyzed, discussed, and followed in his writings, were almost all of his own time. With reference to Roman law, the great doctors Irnerius, Bulgarus, Martinus Gosia, Placentinus, Joannes Bassianus, and other legal experts were mentioned by name. Among the theologians, he quoted all those of greater fame, especially those of the school of Paris, such as Peter Lombard, P. Cantor, P. Comestor or Manducator, and Gilbertus Porretanus. In addition, he did not neglect mentioning the works of all preceding and contemporary canonists, not only of the school of Bologna, but almost in the same manner, of the Gallo–Rhine and Anglo–Norman schools as well. Among the scholars of Bologna, he quoted very frequently Gandulphus, Albert, Cardinalis, Bazianus, John of Faenza, Rufinus, Stephanus Tornacensis, Simon de Bisignano, Siccardus of Cremona. With reference to legal texts not contained in the Decree, he often cited the Decretum of BURCHARD, the Canones Concilii Romani (Lat. III from 1179), and the decretals of the Roman pontiffs, especially of Alexander III, up to Gregory VIII. Nevertheless, Huguccio did not make use of the Compilatio prima antiqua.

Importance. The Summa is not a mere compilation of glosses and doctrines, though as was then the custom Huguccio did report, even word for word, many passages from the works of others. It is rather a personal exposition, discussion, and elaboration by which Huguccio manifested his competent opinion, often with vivid expressions, and submitted the opinions of others to a sometimes meticulous analysis. At that time, when the classical juridical doctrine was being expounded by means of the teaching and legislation of the Roman pontiffs, his opinions played a most important role in this effort, though they were not always totally correct and definitive. Almost no subsequent author has disregarded Huguccio's Summa. All have more or less depended on, mentioned, and quoted it. Owing to the fact that Huguccio's Summa touches on numerous other subjects, such as theology, Roman law, liturgy, historical happenings of his time, philology, and grammar, it is of utmost importance for sciences besides Canon Law. Furthermore, it is significant for the explication of the text of the Decree.

An edition of this vast work, now in preparation by a number of collaborators, will undoubtedly favor a more thorough inquiry.

Bibliography: J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80) 1:156–170. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937) 155–160. S. KUTTNER, "Bernardus Compostellanus Antiquus," Traditio, 1 (1943) 283. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I, V. 1–5 (Mechlin 1928—) 1:419. G. CATALANO, "Contributo alla biografia di Uguccione da Pisa," Diritto Ecclesiastico 65 (1954) 3–67. G. LE BRAS, "Notes pour l'histoire littéraire du droit canon: Du nouveau sur Huguccio de Pise," Revue de droit canonique, (Strasbourg 1951—), 5 (1955) 133–146. C. LEONARDI, "La vita e l'opera di Uguccione da Pisa decretista," Studia Gratiana, 4 (1956–57) 37–120. A. M. STICKLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:521–522. Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 7:1355–62. J. ROMAN, "Summa d'Huguccio sur le Décret de Gratien d'après le Ms. 3891 de la Bibliothèque Nationale, Causa XXVII, q. II," Nouvelle revue historique de droit français et étranger (Paris 1877–1921) 27 (1903) 745–805. F. GILLMANN, "Die Abfassungszeit der Dekretsumme Huguccios," Archiv für katholisches Kirchenrecht, 94 (1914) 233–251, comment by F. HEYER, 513–514; "Paucapalea und Paleae bei Huguccio," ibidem, 88 (1908) 466–479. L. PROSDOCIMI, "La 'Summa decretorum' di Uguccione da Pisa: Studi preliminari per una edizione critica," Studia Gratiana, 3 (1955) 349–374; "I manoscritti della Summa decretorum di Uguccione da Pisa, I: Iter Germanicum," ibidem, 7 (1959) 251–272. A. M. STICKLER, "Problemi di ricerca e di edizione per Uguccione da Pisa e nella decretistica," Actes du Congrès de droit canonique médiéval, 1958 (Louvain 1959) 111–122. Bulletin of the Institute of Research and Study in Medieval Canon Law in Traditio 11 (1955) 435, 441–444; 12 (1956) 559, 563; 13 (1957) 465, 469; 15 (1959) 450; 17 (1961) 534; 18 (1962) 449; 19 (1963) 511, for catalogs of modern manuscripts and editions in progress. V. ROSSI, "Per una edizione delle Magna derivationes di Uguccione da Pisa," in Atti del III congresso nazionale di Studi Romani, 2 (Rome 1935) 42–46. A. MARIGO, I codici manoscritti delle "Derivationes" di Uguccione Pisano (Rome 1936). S. G. MERCATI, "Sul luogo e sulla data della composizione delle Derivationes di Uguccione da Pisa," Aevum, 33 (1959) 490–494.

[A. M. STICKLER]

HUGUENOTS

The nickname given to the French Protestants who followed the teachings of John CALVIN. During the wars of religion the term referred to a militant political party. The Huguenots were the most revolutionary of 16th-century Protestants.

Origin of the Term. The official name given to the Huguenots before the French Revolution was the “pseudo-reformed” (les prétendus réformés); after the revolution it was “French Protestants” or “Calvinists.” The etymology of the term “Huguenot” is hazy. According to one view it may derive from the German Eidgenossen (confederates, conspirators), which in Geneva became eiguenotz—a popular term for those rebelling against authority. By coincidence the Genevan conspirators who revolted (c. 1520–24) against the Duke of Savoy and advocated union with the Swiss confederation were called “huguenots,” after one of their leaders, Hugues Besançon, or Bezanson. According to another view the word hugonot was a local term, which in 1552 was used at Tours with reference to adherents of the reformed religion who gathered at night near the tower named after the legendary King Hugon. Still another legend has it that “King Hugon” was a nocturnal spirit in whose existence the inhabitants of Tours believed. Mockingly they called the Calvinists the disciples of Hugon or huguenaux. The term was in common use after the Conspiracy of Amboise, which occurred in 1560.

Doctrine and Organization. Both the doctrine and the organizational structure of Calvinism matured between 1510 and 1559. The pioneer brain of French reform was Jacques LEFÈVRE D'ÉTAPLES, the author of Quincuplex Psalterium . . . (1509) and of a Latin version of the Epistles of St. Paul (1512). In his commentary on the latter Lefèvre stated that the Scriptures are the chief authority in religious matters. After 1520 the writings of Luther gave the French reform movement a strong impulse. In 1535 appeared a revised version of Lefèvre's Bible by Pierre OLIVÉTAN; and in March 1536, Calvin's Institutio Christianae Religionis (see INSTITUTES OF CALVIN), the most systematic exposition of Protestant doctrine. The book taught glorification of and obedience to God as the chief ends of man. It served as a declaration of faith, a justification for the new doctrine, and a program for the new Protestant adherents. The Institutes won Calvin many followers and helped to establish his leadership of the reform at Geneva, when he went to live there in the same year. His reform program soon proved too extreme for the Genevans and he and his associate William Farel were expelled from the city in 1538. Despite these fits and starts, Calvin and Farel returned to Geneva in 1540 and began to mold the city into a disciplined outpost of their reformed teaching. Throughout the 1540s and 1550s they were able to wrest important powers from the town council, despite the frequent vocal opposition of some of the town's most prominent families. By the 1550s, most of the components of Geneva's theocracy were in place: Christian ministers and magistrates shared power in a consistory that met regularly to discipline moral infractions and to insure purity of teaching and uniformity of belief and practice. At the same time Geneva became an important missionary training ground for the movement. The town's population doubled, swelled by students, disciples, and Protestant refugees from throughout Europe. Eventually these missionaries would carry Calvinist teaching back to their homelands.

Persecution. From the onset of his work as a reformer, Calvin had longed for the conversion of France and his missionary efforts at Geneva cannot be understood outside of his attempt to establish a Protestant Church in his native land. As the movement grew in France, so did the monarchy's desire to destroy heresy. Francis I (1515–47), who at first assumed an ambivalent attitude, decided in favor of persecution and passed a series of edicts to that end (1539, 1540, 1542, 1543). In 1545 the Sorbonne published a list of 65 condemned books, which included the works of Calvin, Luther, and Melancthon. Toward the end of Francis' reign persecution was encouraged by both the king and the Paris parlement (the chief organ of justice). Between 1544 and 1547 many were martyred in Toulouse, Rouen, Grenoble, Bordeaux, and Paris. Provence became the scene of a large-scale massacre of the Vaudois Protestants in which 3,000 died. The effort of Henry II (1547–59) to systematize persecution consisted of appointing a special commission of the Paris parlement (chambre ardente) in 1547 to try heretics and of codifying in 1551 (Edict of Chateaubriand) all the previous enactments against them. But persecution proved ineffective. By 1555 Paris had its first Reformed church. In 1559 the first national synod, representing 72 churches, met at Saint-Germain and organized a National Evangelical Church. A confession of faith and disciplinary rules, as prescribed by Calvin, were drawn up (see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH PROTESTANT). Furthermore Calvin's compact organizational structure was adopted for the Church. The constitution prescribed the method of appointment of ministers and lay elders (grouped in the consistory), by whom each congregation was governed. Consistories were linked by the colloquy, or district assembly. Higher up the scale was the provincial synod; still higher was the national synod, consisting of two ministers and two elders for each province (see REFORMED CHURCHES).

Political Influence. After 1559 Calvinism came into the open, and for 70 years the Reformed Church played an important political role. Individual churches sought the protection of the nobility. The military and political organization of the party took shape. The leadership of the Huguenot organization was assumed by a president, known as the protector of the churches; the Huguenot system of laws extended to administration, justice, commerce, finance, and war. Military and ecclesiastical organization were closely related to each other. Thus, to conform with the military organization established in November, 1561 in the Provinces of Bordeaux and Toulouse, the congregation had its captain, the colloquy had its colonel, and the province had its general. After 1572 the religious elements in the Huguenot camp were dominated by the military and political factions; significantly, its religious organization was conducive to political separation. The final organizational structure did not come into being until 1611 (Assembly of Saumur).

During the short reign of Francis II (1559–60) persecution of the Huguenots was intensified by the Dukes of GUISE. Chambres ardentes were established under the local parlements; heresy was punishable by death, banishment, and confiscation. But the Huguenot ranks were strengthened by many nobles, like Admiral Gaspard de Coligny and the Dukes of Bourbon and CONDÉ, who became the party leader. (The Huguenot party remained mainly aristocratic until the end of the 16th century; then the character of its membership changed to include more “popular” elements, particularly middle-class townspeople.) The conspiracy of Amboise (1560), initiated by Louis I, Prince of Condé, against the Guises, ended in failure. Under Charles IX (1560–74) and the regency of the Queen Mother CATHERINE DE MÉDICIS, a policy of compromise and concession was sought (inspired by Chancellor Michel de l’Hôpital). At the States-General of the same year Coligny tried to promote a program including a national council under the king to settle religious matters. The results were the suspension of persecution and the convening of a special religious conference of all beliefs in 1561 (see POISSY, CONFERENCE OF). The chief spokesmen for the Catholics were Louis II de Guise, Cardinal de Lorraine, and for the Huguenots, Theodore BEZA. Other main participants included PETER MARTYR VERMIGLI and the Jesuit Diego LAÍNEZ. No agreement resulted from the debates. The next step was taken by the government: the edict of January 1562, was a measure of toleration introduced by de l’Hôpital. Its intention was to grant the Huguenots civic status and the right to worship outside the towns; the Huguenot nobles were given the privilege of organizing religious rites on their own estates. But the attempts of de l’Hôpital and Catherine to bring peace were ineffective. The Guises strongly opposed the policy of conciliation, and both sides prepared for war. The massacre of Vassy (March 1, 1562) began the THIRTY YEARS’ WAR.

Wars of Religion. In the next two decades there were seven wars and the Massacre of ST. BARTHOLOMEW’S DAY (1572). Among the many leading Huguenots killed were Anthony de Navarre (first war), Louis I Condé (third war), and Coligny (St. Bartholomew); victims on the Catholic side were Marshal de St. André (first war), Francis, Duke of Guise (first war), and Constable Anne de Montmorency (second war). During the second decade the Huguenot organization was so strengthened and unified that it resembled a state within the state. Wherever they held power, the Huguenots imposed a rigid rule, which demanded obedience to their code and included censorship and severe penalties. They cultivated their own way of life and educational institutions (e.g., five academies: Montauban, Saumur, Nîmes, Montpellier, Sedan). The Holy LEAGUE, which emerged in 1576 to meet the need for an alliance outside the monarchy and to make the COUNTER REFORMATION more effective, took the Huguenot organization as its pattern.

The Huguenots participated in the battle of ideas that accompanied the wars of religion; they were noted for vigorous political pamphleteering. Among the outstanding Huguenot books were: François Hotman’s Franco-Gallia (1573), a defense of limited popular monarchy; Vindiciae contra tyrannos (1579), a classical work of the Huguenot monarchomach theory that justified the right to rebel against a tyrant; and Mémoires de l’Estat de France, edited by Simon Goulart (1576), a massive collection of materials relating to political theory.

The wars of religion were marked by an abundance of short-lived treaties and ineffective edicts. The so-called intervals of “peace” (Amboise, 1563; Longjumeau, 1568; Saint-Germain, 1570) were no more than truces. Measures intended to bring peace and order alternated with enactments revoking rights and privileges. The only measure of note (introduced before the Edict of NANTES) was the Edict of Beaulieu, or of “Monsieur” (1576), which was revived the following year, after the Peace of Bergerac, as the Edict of Poitiers. Although it brought no essential change, it implied broad religious liberty—a remarkable achievement but a compendium of edicts previously passed.

Edict of Nantes. The Edict of Nantes did not result from a true spirit of tolerance but from a number of political factors. These included the decline of the Guises; the rise to power of Henry de Navarre (a Huguenot who, upon the death of Francis, Duke of Alençon, Catherine’s youngest son, became heir to the throne in 1584); and the growing influence of the politiques (include Navarre), who were anxious to end hostilities and put a stop to foreign influence.

Unlike its predecessors, the Edict of Nantes was to remain in effect, at least nominally, for 87 years. From the beginning, however, its fate was precarious. Despite genuine efforts to carry out its provisions, it was never applied in its entirety because French society was not ready to adopt its principles and was therefore unwilling to aid their application.

The relative sense of security enjoyed by the Huguenots ended with the assassination of HENRY IV in 1610. The reign of his son, Louis XIII (1610–43), saw the end of their political hopes. The Huguenot organization reached its peak at the Assembly of Saumur (1611), where final form was given to the representative system. In the religious sphere the existence of consistories, colloquies, and provincial and national synods was confirmed. In the political sphere, corresponding provincial councils, circles assemblies, and general assemblies were provided. The provincial councils, although known before Saumur, did not meet regularly before 1611; it was then that their continuous history began, to be interrupted after the fall of La Rochelle in 1629. Although not all the decisions made at Saumur were carried into full effect, the problem of extending political activities was taken up at La Rochelle in 1621. A provisional Protestant republic was then created, following the manifesto Ordre et Règlement Général, which gave a pattern for an autonomous organization. France was subdivided into eight departments, each to be headed by a governor general (chef général) concerned with justice, finances, and the militia. La Rochelle was given a supreme court with the powers of an emergency tribunal.

In 1615 three Huguenot provinces—Languedoc, Guigenne, and Poitou—rose under the leadership of Henry de Condé (the party's spokesman, although not a Huguenot) against the Regent Marie de' Médicis as a protest against her pro-Spanish policy. Henry, Duke of Rohan, the official protector of the Huguenots, also took up arms. Hostilities ended with the Treaty of Loudun (May 3, 1616), which extended for six years the use by the Huguenots of their strongholds ("places of surety").

In 1620 another rising took place following restitution to the Catholic bishops of their property in Béarn after absorption of the latter by France. (Catholic worship was reintroduced to Béarn by Henry IV when he abjured Protestantism.) The revolt was led by Rohan and his brother Soubise. It ended with the Peace of Montpellier (Oct. 18, 1622), which confirmed the Edict of Nantes but forbade political assemblies without royal authorization and left the Huguenots only two "places of surety": La Rochelle and Montauban. Hostilities were started again in 1625 by Soubise, who first seized the Isle of Ré and then Oléron. Cardinal RICHELIEU brought the war to a temporary end in February 1626. He needed internal peace in order to set out on an expedition to deal with the Mantuan succession and undertook no action until 1627.

Policy of Richelieu. In 1627, in accordance with his design to destroy the Huguenot party—a matter of raison d'état since the Huguenots constituted a threat to the central government—Richelieu launched a full-scale assault against La Rochelle, defended by Jean Guiton who was ineffectively aided by the English. (There were abortive attempts by the fleet of George Villiers, the duke of Buckingham, to support the besieged city.) Richelieu entered La Rochelle on Oct. 30, 1628; he then led his forces against Rohan, took Privas, and besieged Alais. Rohan capitulated, and Richelieu dictated the terms of the Peace of Alais (June 1629). The Huguenots lost their "places of surety" and became politically subservient to the state. Although the Edict of Nantes was reaffirmed in the sense that their liberty of conscience was preserved, the Huguenot party was in reality doomed.

Until his death in 1643 Richelieu refrained from active oppression of the Huguenots and created a fairly strong impression of being tolerant—an impression that persisted during his lifetime because events moved against his proselytizing plans (comprised in the Plan Codur). Richelieu accepted toleration of the Huguenots as a temporary political expedient, even as he ultimately aimed to eliminate the Huguenot minority. Richelieu had destroyed the Huguenots politically, not in order to assure their survival in the religious sphere but in order to make their religious practice at a later stage difficult and, much later, impossible. His political will was executed with great accuracy. Jules MAZARIN entirely, and LOUIS XIV to a large degree, continued his policy. (The revocation of the Edict of Nantes probably reflected Richelieu's intentions quite accurately.)

Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Persecution was begun again by Louis XIV (1661–1715) after Cardinal Mazarin's death (1661). The rights enjoyed by the Huguenots were gradually withdrawn; after 1680 the government resorted to brutal dragonnades, or quartering troops in Huguenot households, in order to force conversions. On Oct. 18, 1685, the Edict of Nantes was revoked, causing massive Huguenot emigration (between 200,000 and 300,000 left France). During Louis XIV's War of the Spanish Succession there was a Huguenot uprising in the Cevennes by the CAMISARDS (1702–04), led by Jean Cavalier. In 1724 the revocation of the Edict of Nantes was confirmed. The situation did not change until 1787, when by the Edict of Toleration partial equality of rights was reestablished (except the right to hold public office) and marriages and baptisms in the Protestant faith were declared valid. The Calvinists were granted full equality by the Napoleonic code.

Bibliography: General. J. VIÉNOT, Histoire de la réforme française, 2 v. (Paris 1926–34). E. LÉONARD, Histoire générale du Protestantisme, 2 v. (Paris 1961). R. STÉPHAN, L'Épopée huguenote (Paris 1945); Histoire du Protestantisme français (Paris 1961). A. J. GRANT, The Huguenots (London 1934). Calvin and Geneva. R. N. C. HUNT, Calvin (London 1933). A. BOSSERT, Calvin (Paris 1906). R. M. KINGDON, Geneva and the Coming of the Wars of Religion in France (Geneva 1956). J. A. F. PUAUX and L. A. SABATIER, Études sur la révocation de l'édit de Nantes (Paris 1886). W. J. STANKIEWICZ, "The Edict of Nantes in the Light of Mediaeval Political Theory," Proceedings of the Huguenot Society of London 19 (1955) 82–91. Particular reigns. J. E. NEALE, The Age of Catherine de Medici (new ed. London 1957). L. ROMIER, Catholiques et Huguenots à la cour de Charles IX (Paris 1924). W. J. STANKIEWICZ, "The Huguenot Downfall: The Influence of Richelieu's Policy and Doctrine," Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society 99 (1955) 146–168. J. ORCIBAL, Louis XIV et les Protestants (Paris 1951). Problem of toleration. J. LECLER, Toleration and the Reformation, tr. T. L. WESTOW, 2 v. (New York 1960). A. J. GRANT, "The Problem of Religious Toleration in XVIth Century France," Proceedings of the Huguenot Society of London 13 (1923–29). W. J. STANKIEWICZ, "Intoleranz im Frankreich des XVI. Jahrhunderts," Der Deutsche Hugenott 23 (1959), tr. from the English by M. GOETZ; "Rationalismus gegen Theologie: der Bayle-Jurieu Streit ueber die Toleranz," ibid. 22 (1958), tr. from the English by M. GOETZ. R. H. BAINTON et al., Castellioniana (Leiden 1951). J. A. F. PUAUX, Les Précurseurs français de la tolérance au XVIIIe siècle (Paris 1881). H. ROBINSON, Bayle the Skeptic (New York 1931). Political and social thought. E. ARMSTRONG, "The Political Theory of the Huguenots," English Historical Review 4 (1889) 13–40. J. E. ACTON, "The Protestant Theory of Persecution," Essays on Freedom and Power (Boston 1948). S. J. BRUTUS, A Defence of Liberty against Tyrants, tr. W. WALKER (London 1924), see introduction by H. J. LASKI. E. BARKER, "A Huguenot Theory of Politics: The Vindiciae contra tyrannos," in his Church, State and Education (pa. Ann Arbor 1957). W. F. CHURCH, Constitutional Thought in Sixteenth-Century France (Cambridge, MA 1941). G. J. WEILL, Les Théories sur le pouvoir royal en France pendant les guerres de religion (Paris 1892). J. A. F. PUAUX, Les Défenseurs de la souveraineté du peuple sous le règne de Louis XIV (Paris 1917). R. LUREAI, Les Doctrines politiques de Jurieu, 1637–1713 (Bordeaux 1904). P. HAZARD, The European Mind, 1680–1715, tr. J. L. MAY (New York 1963). G. H. DODGE, The Political Theory of the Huguenots of the Dispersion (New York 1947). W. J. STANKIEWICZ, Politics and Religion in Seventeenth-century France (Berkeley 1960). P. BENEDICT, The Huguenot Connection (Philadelphia 1981). R. KINGDON, Myths about the Saint Bartholomew's Day Massacre, 1472–1576 (Cambridge, MA 1988). R. MENTZER, Blood and Belief (West Lafayette, IN 1994). E. PERRY, French Religious Controversy and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes (The Hague 1973).

[W. J. STANKIEWICZ]

HULL, ERNEST REGINALD

Author, editor, pioneer of the Catholic press in India; b. Sept. 9, 1863, Greenhays, Manchester, England; d. July 19, 1952, Roehampton, England. Converted from Anglicanism in 1882, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1886 and was engaged in literary work when a request came from India for an English Jesuit to edit the Bombay Catholic Examiner, a 53-year-old diocesan paper. He arrived in Bombay in 1902, and remained there until 1932, occupying the position of editor from Jan. 1, 1903 to Nov. 29, 1924. During his editorship, the papers rose from its former status of "a derelict" to become an important organ in the apostolate.

An index of Hull's writing from 1903 to 1930 contains 15,000 titles. Reprints of series originally written for the paper total 56, and cover character building, morals, culture, religion, science doctrine, controversy, and history (both English and Indian, ecclesiastical and secular). From 1924 to 1932 he was archivist and secretary to the archbishop of Bombay. On his return to England, he was editor of Stella Maris (1934–35), and wrote for various journals. Of his many books, the most influential was Man's Great Concern: The Management of Life (1918), which was adopted as a textbook in schools; translated into Hindi, Malayalam, Tamil, and Chinese; and ran into several editions.

[H. ROZARIO]

HUMAN ACT

An ACT that is performed only by a human being and thus is proper to MAN. Not every act that a human being does is a distinctively human act. Some acts that human beings do are performed also by animals, e.g., vegetative acts and acts of perception and of emotion. When a human being does such acts, they are called acts of man but not human acts. Acts of man, therefore, are acts shared in common by man and other animals, whereas human acts are proper to human beings. What makes an act performed by a human being distinctively a human act is that it is voluntary in character, that is, an act in some way under the control or direction of the will, which is proper to man. One can therefore identify the human act with the voluntary act. A voluntary act proceeds either from the will itself—for example, an act of love or of choice—or from some other human power that can in some way be moved by the will, whether an act of the intellect, of sense cognition, or of emotion; even an act of some bodily member as commanded by the will can be a voluntary act.

A moral analysis of the human act analyzes the human act in relation to the good that is sought and insofar as all acts are moved to their ends by the will. A psychological consideration of the human act distinguishes the internal and external principles of the human act, treats the notion of human freedom, and analyzes the human act into its component parts. This article deals with the human act primarily in its psychological aspect, which a moral analysis must presuppose.

INTERNAL PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTS

The internal principles of human acts include the intellect, the will, and the sense appetites, and the habits—both virtues and vices—with which these powers, or faculties, are endowed (see FACULTIES OF THE SOUL).

Intellect. As a power of the human soul, the INTELLECT is the principle of all intellectual acts of knowing. The human intellect is either speculative or practical, a difference deriving from the end to which knowledge is ordered (see COGNITION SPECULATIVE-PRACTICAL). If the end in view is the consideration of truth itself, the intellect is speculative in its mode of knowing. Thus through acts of understanding and reasoning man arrives at scientific knowledge, when possible, or at something less than truth and certainty—opinion, for example. If the end in view is operation or action of some kind, then the intellect is practical in its knowing, as in the making of works of art or in judgments of prudence in regard to actions one is to perform. And just as in speculative knowing ordered to arriving at truth where there are FIRST PRINCIPLES grasped by the special habit of UNDERSTANDING, from which true and necessary conclusions follow, so in practical knowing there are the primary practical principles grasped by the special habit of SYNDERESIS, enabling man to know the common precepts in regard to good and evil action.

Will and Sense Appetites. The WILL, as intellectual APPETITE, is a power directed to some object under the aspect of universal GOOD. Because the good so understood is the object of the will, it moves the will as an end, and in this sense the will presupposes the intellect, which thus moves the will to its appropriate end; the intellect, in other words, moves the will as specifying the act of the will. The will, on the other hand, moves the intellect in the manner in which one thing moves another as an AGENT. Since each power is directed to a good suitable to it and since the object of the will is the universal good, the good of the intellect, to know the true, falls within the scope of the will. Although the will tends to objects as universal, it tends also to singular things existing outside the mind by tending to them under a universal aspect. One person loves another, for example, because of the latter's virtuous character, which is a good realized in this person. The desiring of a good in this way, and in general the desiring of an immaterial or spiritual good, distinguishes the will as rational appetite from sense appetite.

The sense appetite is related to sense cognition as the will is related to intellectual knowing, each appetite tending to a good as apprehended. But since sense cognition cannot apprehend the good as universal, the sense appetite cannot be directed to the common notion of the good. Hence the will and the sense appetite can be basically contrasted as desire for a universal good and desire for a particular good. There are two fundamentally different aspects of the particular good that differentiate the sense appetite, or EMOTION, into two main parts: the concupiscible and the irascible. The concupiscible appetite is concerned with a particular good as pleasing and suitable; the irascible appetite is concerned with repelling and combating harmful aspects of objects that prevent the attaining of a particular good.

Habit. In addition to the various human powers, habits are also internal principles of human acts. A HABIT can be understood initially as a disposing of a power to act in a determinate way. In virtue of the intellectual and appetitive powers man has, he is able to do a variety of acts, but without the disposing influence of habit upon his powers of acting, most of his distinctively human acts would be done haphazardly. A habit therefore develops and strengthens a human power, enabling the power to operate more effectively and with more facility.

Accordingly, a habit can be defined as a firm DISPOSITION of a power to act regularly in a determinate way. So understood, a habit is then seen to be a perfection. Man's powers of themselves are largely indeterminate with regard to their objects. The engendering of habits, acquired by repeated acts of a certain kind, dispose and determine powers more readily and more determinately to their objects. Hence a habit, far from being merely mechanical in operation and somehow alien to good human action, actually enters into the performing of human acts so intrinsically that it may be regarded as a second nature; habit makes its distinctive act a kind of natural act just as a power is the first source of a natural act. For this reason, in addition to a habit's producing uniformity in operation and enabling an act to be done more quickly and effectively, a habit makes human action pleasurable in operation. The meaning of habit as developed here restricts habit to the intellectual and appetitive human powers.

Virtue and Vice. The notion of habit as bettering human action is not in conflict with the division of habit into good and bad, that is, into VIRTUE and VICE. Any habit permits man to operate better than he otherwise would, but whether a habit is good or bad is a moral consideration, distinct from the psychological point showing how any habit develops a power more fully. In general terms, the distinction between virtue as a good habit and vice as a bad habit turns on whether the habit produces acts conducive to promoting man's moral good or evil. Acts of virtue are those that are suitable to human nature; that is, they are acts habitually performed according to the rule of reason. Acts of vice are opposed to human nature inasmuch as they are habitually opposed to the direction of reason.

Virtue may then be defined somewhat as St. Augustine phrased it: virtue is a good habit of the mind, by which one lives righteously and of which no one can make bad use. In a somewhat more specific way, virtue can be defined also as a habit inclining one to choose the relative mean between the extremes of excess and defect. Vice, as the contrary habit, would incline one to choose either of the extremes, both morally evil.

These definitions apply primarily to moral virtue, the primary meaning of virtue. However, human virtue is divided analogously into moral and intellectual. This division follows upon the fact that there are two principles of human action, the intellect and the appetite. Any virtue perfects one of these two powers. Good habits of thinking perfect the human intellect either in its speculative dimension with the intellectual virtues of understanding, science, and wisdom, or in its practical dimension with the virtues of art and prudence, although the latter virtue is also moral to the extent that it requires right appetite for its good operation. Good habits of desiring perfect the appetite, either the will by means of the cardinal virtue of justice or the sense appetite by means of the cardinal virtue of fortitude for the irascible appetite and temperance for the concupiscible appetite. The fourth cardinal virtue, prudence, as has been noted, is both intellectual and moral. There will be corresponding vices for each of these virtues by way of contrary habits.

In addition to moral and intellectual virtues, theological virtues also are principles of human acts. The need of such virtues for man arises from the fact that man's happiness, the goal of all his actions, is twofold: a happiness proportionate to human nature and obtainable by means of natural principles including the moral and intellectual virtues; a happiness surpassing human nature and obtainable by and through God's power alone. Since the natural virtues cannot suffice to direct man to supernatural happiness, man has need for additional principles of action in order to be directed to attaining supernatural happiness. Such principles are the theological virtues, which are infused by God, in which respect they are not wholly intrinsic principles of human action. These theological virtues are faith, hope, and charity.

EXTERNAL PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTS

Among the internal principles of human acts, virtue is the primary means of directing man to the good of human happiness. Other means by which he is ordered to leading the good life are law and grace, both of which may be referred to as extrinsic principles of human action.

Law. As is evident from experience, the COMMON GOOD is the end or purpose of all LAW, and without an understanding of what the common good properly is, the nature and function of law in directing human acts cannot be appreciated. A common good is clearly distinct from a private good, the latter being the good of one person only, to the exclusion of its being possessed by any other.

A common good is distinct also from a collective good, which, though possessed by all of a group, is not really participated in by the members of the group; as divided up, a collective good becomes respectively private goods of the members, as in the manner in which a man's estate is divided up among his inheritors.

A true common good is universal, not singular or collective, and is distributive in character, being communicable to many without becoming anyone's private good. Moreover, each person participates in the whole common good, not merely in a part of it, nor can any one person possess it wholly. The distinctive common good to which human law is ordered is the civil, or political, common good of peace and order. Such direction of human acts by law is clearly indispensable for human development and perfection.

Civil Law. The classic definition of law is based on the foregoing notion of the common good: law is a certain ordination of reason for the common good, promulgated by one who has care of the community. This common definition of law applies proportionately or analogously to the different kinds of law. According to man's mode of knowing, civil, or human positive, law primarily realizes the common definition of law. Hence law is first understood to be an ordinance of reason by one who has authority to direct the political society and its members to the common civil good, a happiness consisting primarily in peace and order. Civil law directly concerns the external acts of human beings, presupposing the interior principles and acts. Although civil law therefore does not directly aim to make men virtuous in their actions, it does command certain acts that dispose men to become virtuous and forbid other acts that lead to vice and tend to make life in society impossible.

Natural Law. Every civil law, insofar as it aims at the common good and is accordingly a just law, carries an obligation to be obeyed. Yet this obligation rests on more than civil law itself. It derives from a law more fundamental than civil law and its political sanction, viz, what is called natural law. This is the "unwritten law" that, in its most common precepts, is fundamentally the same for all. The natural law expresses, in universal form primarily, the fundamental inclinations of human nature formulated by reason in a judgment naturally made, that is, with little or no discursive reasoning. Such law, then, is natural on two scores: (1) it is not law made by reason so much as discovered by reason; and (2) all men thus naturally know the most universal precepts expressed in natural law. Natural law, so understood, is clearly a fundamental principle for directing human acts. (See NATURAL LAW.)

Eternal Law. One other kind of law must still be mentioned: eternal law. It is even more fundamental than natural law, being the law in which even natural law participates. Eternal law refers to the idea of the government of things that exists in the mind of God; it is the plan of God's wisdom by which all action and motion of the universe is directed. It directs the universe as a whole to the common good of God Himself. This is not the law given through revelation (see LAW, DIVINE POSITIVE). The knowledge about eternal law can be arrived at by reason alone, though usually indirectly. Eternal law is therefore the ultimate source of all law and the ultimate directive principle of all acts and motions of creatures to their proper ends.

Grace. As a principle of human action, GRACE differs from virtue not only as an external principle differs from an internal one, but also in that grace is infused directly into the human soul itself, whereas virtue is realized in some power of the soul. Grace differs from law in that, though both are external principles, law directs man by instruction and command, whereas grace supernaturally elevates him so that he can participate in the divine life, receive assistance in doing so, and attain the happiness that is eternal life. Hence sanctifying or habitual grace is a supernatural quality of the soul by which man participates in the divine nature and is thereby enabled to perform acts meriting supernatural happiness. It is clear that such a principle directing human action is absolutely necessary for all human beings if they are to obtain eternal life.

HUMAN FREEDOM

A discussion of the internal and external principles of the human act is logically followed by a consideration of the human act itself. Prior to an analysis of the human act into its component parts, however, it is convenient to treat how and in what way the human act is free. At the beginning of this article, the human act was identified with the voluntary act, an act proceeding either immediately from the will or from some power or act in some way under the control and direction of the will. (For a consideration of the voluntary act especially in its moral dimension, see VOLUNTARITY.)

It is now necessary to distinguish between a voluntary act and a free act; for although every free act is necessarily a voluntary act, not every voluntary act is strictly a free act. A free act, most properly speaking, is an act of CHOICE. There are occasions, however, when it makes sense to say that man has no choice and that what he wills to do he must will to do. Such acts are voluntary in that they still proceed from the will as a principle, but they are not free, at least in the usual and proper sense of the term.

Freedom of Exercise. It must be recognized, however, that there are two types of free act, or two kinds of freedom. One type is freedom of exercise. This is the freedom of an agent to act or not to act in an absolute sense; freedom of exercise is thus said to be about contradictory alternatives. In any given situation, a man at all rational can will to act or not. This sort of freedom man as a voluntary agent always has; and as related to the interior act of willing or not willing, the voluntary act and the free act, for all practical purposes, are identifiable.

Freedom of Specification. The other type of freedom is freedom of specification. This is the sort of freedom one usually has in mind when he speaks of man as being a free agent and is what he means by the act of choice. This freedom arises not in terms of the agent as acting or not acting (which is freedom of exercise and is presupposed) but in terms of some object specifying the act to be done by the agent. Freedom of specification, in other words, is the choice of this alternative rather than that alternative or, to put it more precisely, the choice of this means in relation to a desired end. The free act as choice, therefore, is concerned with means properly, not with ends as ends. In this context, one can distinguish voluntary acts that are not free acts strictly. To will an end as an end is not a matter of choice but a matter of simple willing. An act of the will centering precisely on the means is the act of choice. This meaning of freedom, the freedom of specification exercised by choice, is the relevant meaning of human freedom in the discussion here. (See FREE WILL; FREEDOM.)

Limitations of Freedom. Many contemporary authors point out that to be fully human in its exercise, the will must be free both philosophically and psychologically. Philosophical freedom is the power, given certain prerequisites of knowledge and motivation, of saying yes or no freely to a proposed action or of choosing freely between two alternative courses. It means that at the time the choice was made, the person could have made the opposite choice even though with difficulty or repugnance. Psychological freedom is a freedom from obstacles and pressures that make the exercise of philosophical freedom difficult. Philosophical freedom is freedom to determine its own choices; psychological freedom is freedom from the obstacles, pressures, and impediments which make choices difficult. In the minds of some contemporaries, the classical tradition in moral theology seemed to take for granted the human person's freedom as a perfectly autonomous power of decision hindered in the exercise of its sovereignty only accidentally by factors that are rather exceptional. Contemporary authors seem to be less reluctant to admit that freedom of the will can be influenced only in exceptional cases. They tend to see human freedom as "freedom in situation" and they insist that the dialectic between freedom and determinism is essential for every human action.

Many contemporary moralists indicate the presence in all of the human person's actions of a determinism traceable to three sources—the biological, the social, and the psychological. They point out that recent discoveries of neurosurgery, endocrinology, and the use of drugs have demonstrated the influence of biological factors on the freedom of moral action. The pressure of society can also exert great influence on free activity and pressure groups and pressure factors have enormous determining potential in contemporary society. Finally, studies in depth psychology reveal constant neuroticizing factors under which many people live within the course of their growth and development as human beings.

ANALYSIS OF THE HUMAN ACT

The full grasp of what the free human act is and the role it plays in human action cannot be appreciated without an analysis of the whole human act as it is exercised in the concrete order, involving both the intellect and the will.

Component Parts. Presupposing what has been said about the internal and external principles of human action, one may distinguish the component parts or specific acts that make up the complex human act, which is always concerned in some way with ends and means. The list below analyzes the human act in terms of its various steps.

Intellect

Concerning the end

Apprehending an end

Judgment about an end

Concerning the means

Deliberating about means

Judgment about choice

Concerning execution

Command to execute choice

Judgment of end attained

Will

Concerning the end

Willing an end

Intending an end

Concerning the means

Consent to means

Choice of means

Concerning execution

Use of powers to execute

Enjoyment of end attained

This list outlines a fully conscious human action in dealing with a more or less complex practical situation. Not every human act man performs involves all these individual steps, but every human act in the practical order does involve seeking some end, a judgment and choice of means, and a consequent decision to attain to a desired end by carrying out the chosen course of action. It is well to bear in mind also that man does not always proceed in his human action in so orderly a way as the diagram list suggests. Often, indeed, particularly in difficult situations, he vacillates between one act on the part of the practical intellect and a corresponding act on the part of the will. But a knowledge of these various steps within the complex human act is helpful for successfully carrying out human decisions and choices; such knowledge is helpful also when one cannot resolve a practical problem, for he can, with reflection, ascertain where he is in the process and which step is holding him up or preventing him from attaining a resolution.

Interplay of Intellect and Will. The numbering of the steps, evenly divided between the intellect and the will, manifests the intimate connection between the intellect and the will in human action. On the one hand, the intellectual acts specify the acts of the will, for what one wills does depend on what he knows; on the other hand, each act of the will subsequently moves the intellect to a further act of knowing until the will is brought to some rest in an enjoyment of what was initially desired or, if unsuccessful, to a sorrow in not attaining what was initially desired. It should be noted that the human act is outlined here in terms of its intrinsic parts; the role of the emotions and other influences have also to be taken into account. Primarily, however, the human act is constituted of individual acts on the part of the intellect and the will.

This analysis of the human act enables one to understand human freedom better and to see, more precisely, what constitutes the free human act, which is usually spoken of as free will. One can now comprehend that actually a man's free act is a joint product of intellect and will. It is exercised principally, though not exclusively, in steps seven and eight of the list, the judgment on the part of the intellect that is inseparably allied with the choice of means. The connection between intellect and will is most intimate here. The intellect, in its practical judgment with regard to a means, is a determining cause of the will's choosing one object rather than another. But this is a determination coming from knowledge; and hence the will, in exercising the act of choice, is still choosing freely what is proposed on the part of the intellect. In a concrete instance facing man in knowing what he should do, his judgment of the choice is made and the will accordingly freely exercises its act of choice. This is positive freedom of specification: freely choosing to do what one knows one should do. Negative freedom consists in one's being able to reject what he knows he should do. What is involved here also is the judgment of CONSCIENCE, which is still distinct from the practical judgment of the intellect in regard to choice. The latter judgment, as has been seen, is inseparably connected with appetite—with the will in its act of choice. The judgment of conscience, analytically prior to the practical judgment with reference to choice, is wholly an act of the intellect and thus apart from an actual choice to be made here and now; in an act of conscience one judges that an individual act is right to do as falling under a universal judgment or precept that acts of this kind should be done. It is a judgment of conscience, for example, that this debt should be paid, as falling under the universal judgment that debts should be paid. It is not yet the practical judgment with regard to choice and the ensuing act of choice, which takes place here and now, and where freedom of the human act is ultimately and principally located.

The foregoing discussion of the human act, starting with the internal and external principles and extending to the analysis of the human act into its component parts, is primarily psychological in character and treatment. A moral consideration of the human act, analyzing when and how acts are good or bad, presupposes this analysis (see MORALITY).

See Also: SIN.

Bibliography: ARISTOTLE, Eth. Nic. 1103a 12–1119b 19, 1138b 15–1145a 12. THOMAS AQUINAS 1a2ae, 6–21. J. A. OESTERLE, Ethics: The Introduction to Moral Science (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1957) 45–100. M. V. MURRAY, Problems in Ethics (New York 1960) 72–106. V. J. BOURKE, Ethics (New York 1951) 57–120. J. FORD and G. KELLY, Contemporary Moral Theology 1 (Paramus, N.J. 1958) 174–312. J. FUCHS, Human Values and Christian Morality, tr. M. H. HEELAN (Dublin 1970), esp. “Basic Freedom and Morality,” 92–111. E. MCDONAGH, “Towards a Christian Theology of Morality: The Moral Subject,” The Irish Theological Quarterly 39 (1972) 3–22. L. MONDEN, Sin, Liberty and Law (New York 1965) 19–72. G. REGAN, New Trends in Moral Theology (New York 1971) 187–207.

[J. A. OESTERLE/J. A. O'DONOHUE]

HUMAN GENOME

A genome is an aspect of living organisms that enables them to pass on characteristics to the next generation. “Genome” specifies the totality of genes that make up the hereditary constitution of any particular organism. While each organism will have its own distinct set of genes (unless it is a twin), scientists seek to uncover the general attributes of the genomes of species as a whole. Thus, there are specialists studying the mouse genome, the frog genome, or the human genome. While this project lies within the field of organic science, much discussion has taken place over the social, ethical and economic implications of the study of the human genome. After giving a brief description of the Human Genome Project, this article will discuss the various issues raised, which can be grouped as follows: (1) marketplace issues, including ownership of genetic knowledge or materials, and patenting; (2) genetic discrimination, which leads to questions about privacy, about health insurance, life insurance, and employment; (3) genetic testing, both adult testing and pre-natal screening; (4) genetic counseling and its new challenges; (5) eugenics and the use of gene selection for trait enhancement rather than treatment of disease; (6) gene therapy, both somatic cell therapy and germline therapy; (7) theological principles and questions of free will, determinism, and “playing God” and (8) cloning and embryo research.

The Human Genome Project. The Human Genome Project has been the collaborative work of many scientists and laboratories in the United States seeking to chart the DNA of the human genome. The idea of coordinating genetic research first surfaced in 1985 and 1986 from several directions, involving both the U.S. Dept. of Energy and the National Institutes of Health. By 1990 the U.S. Congress had allocated 3 to 5 billion dollars to be spent over 15 years in the quest to “map” and “sequence” the human genome. Similar work has been undertaken in other countries, coordinated by an international group, the Human Genome Organization (HUGO).

As the scope and funding of this project has been vast, so has its goal. The proteins needed to keep a human person functioning are coded in approximately 30,000 genes. These genes make up the “words” of the code, using four different nucleotides. Each nucleotide contain a nitrogenous base (Adenine, Cytosine, Guanine, or Thymine) attached to an outer structure of sugar and phosphate. These nucleotides pair up along the spiraled double helix: A with T and G with C. It is estimated that the human genome contains three billion of these base pairs. If one considers each base pair as a single “letter,” creating the code book for the human genome is equivalent to decoding 13 complete sets of the Encyclopedia Britannica. Furthermore, such a code book is only useful if a “grammar” is developed by which one can “read” what has been gathered. So this massive project involves both finding what is there, in terms of strings of nucleotides, and interpreting what it means.

While the HGP is publicly funded, other private industry groups have been seeking to map the human genome on their own. In June of 2000, a joint announcement was made by the National Institutes of Health and Celera Genomics, a private corporation in Maryland, claiming that the human genome had now been mapped. While these two endeavors have taken different research strategies, and while significant gaps in information still exist, the work of the two groups together constitutes a significant advance in the goal of identifying all the genetic markers on the human genome.

Selected Issues.

Ownership. In the United States, the rise of new technologies, as a necessary side-product of research, as well as new forms of genetic material (cloned strings of base-pair sequences) has stirred up a significant controversy over the patenting of genetic materials and processes. U.S. patent law was derived as an incentive for private industry to engage in research and development, but has long since recognized that natural materials cannot be patented. In other words, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has functionally recognized a distinction between inventions and discoveries, refusing to patent the latter. Work in genetics has challenged this easy distinction. For example, in 1991 a California company, SyStemix, applied for a patent on a composition of stem cells developed out of bone-marrow stem cells, a biological product that could be useful in treating leukemia or AIDS. Both the process of production and the stem cell composition were patented. Since the particular stem cell composition does not exist in human bodies on its own, this is deemed an invention rather than a discovery.

The patenting issue raises broader questions about the commodification of genetic knowledge. This became evident early on in the U.S. program, when one of the researchers from the National Institutes of Health sought a patent for the gene sequences he had identified. A controversy arose over whether NIH ought to seek patents, something that James Watson—co-discoverer of DNA and head of the HGP at the time—vehemently opposed on the grounds that such action would hamper the free flow of information, on which scientific collegiality depends. The controversy had several results: James Watson resigned as director of the HGP, while NIH withdrew its patent applications. The questions of (1) whether genetic knowledge involving so-called inventions can/should be patented and (2) whether such patents should be granted to government agencies (and whose names will appear on them) remain highly contested (see Peters, 1997, 126ff).

Another set of ownership questions arises in light of the Human Genome Diversity Project (Peters, 1998). While its goal is admirable, seeking—through regional centers around the world—to advance the study of genetic diversity (and thereby offset the assumption that the “normal” genome is that of a Western Caucasian), the ethical and legal problems have mounted quickly. The project depends on the collection of vast numbers of DNA samples from widely diverse populations. The question of ownership rights over these samples is complicated by the fact that the Western notion of informed consent assumes an individualism with little salience in non-Western cultures. Further, who will benefit from the knowledge gained by such samples? Are we once again facing a situation in which aboriginal and Third World peoples are exploited, for access to their DNA, so that the more prosperous might benefit? Finally, how can we deal with the normative judgments that come with potential discoveries for example, if it were to be disclosed that the gene for schizophrenia is more prevalent in Native Americans than in other populations? Will the quest for diversity turn into another excuse for racism?

Students pose with model of DNA molecule. (©James A. Sugar/CORBIS)

Genetic Discrimination. Once tests or treatments for a certain genetic condition are available (and some are), will this information will be used to segregate the “normal” from the “diseased”? Advances in treatment of such things as growth hormone deficiency, using genetically engineered techniques, raise fears that those living with certain congenital conditions will be pushed more and more to the margins. Those living with deafness, dwarfism, and other conditions, already vulnerable to social disdain, may be made to feel even more isolated. In sum, will new developments in the treatment of genetic conditions exacerbate prejudice with regard to certain disabilities?

Genetic Testing. With tests for adult onset diseases such as Huntington’s Chorea now available, the possibility of genetic discrimination is real. Debates in this area revolve around concerns for confidentiality, employment, and life and health insurance. With the growing ability to determine which individuals carry which disease genes, efforts to ensure genetic privacy are increasing. There is particular concern that genetic information, in the hands of insurers or employers, will lead to discriminatory practice.

Mary Pat Reeves-Daly, mapping human Y chromosome, as part of Human Genome Mapping Project. (Roger Ressimyer/CORBIS)

The insurance industry will change dramatically once genetic disease testing becomes routine. There are two approaches to risk classification and health insurance: the libertarian approach assumes that persons should pay premiums according to their risk classification, while the egalitarian view assumes that the risk burden should be borne by all, regardless of the personal probability of illness. As the ability to predict health risks based on genetic tests grows, these two approaches will come into conflict. The entire insurance industry, founded as it is on actuarial tables and calculations of risk, will be challenged by new information about probabilities of future illness.

The possibility of being tested to see if one has a gene for a specific disease has been the most immediate practical result of the Human Genome Project. Yet the benefits of such testing are not so simple as they might seem. Not all genetic disorders arise from a single genetic mutation; some are multifactorial, meaning that they arise from the interaction of several genes, along with environmental factors. In these cases, as with breast cancer, heart disease, and diabetes, identifying genes simply indicates a propensity for a disease. Other cases are much more clear cut but nonetheless raise difficult questions. Huntington's disease is determined by a single genetic mutation: a person either does or does not have it, and one who does will get the disease. Having a relative who has had the disease is the indicator of risk. Whether an individual at risk wants to know for certain or not is a further question. In almost all cases, the technology for testing an individual's disease status has far outrun the development of treatments for a disease, putting many in the situation of having knowledge without effective options. Moreover, such genetic testing is almost never an individual matter: others who are at risk will be affected by the knowledge, either because they will be caretakers or because one person's status may have implications for their own. The potency of such genetic knowledge has led some to label this "toxic knowledge."

The genetic testing issues come to a head in the case of prenatal genetic testing. This can take the form of testing fetuses in the womb or of testing embryos in vitro, before implantation. The lack of effective treatment for most genetic diseases means that the point of genetic testing is simply to provide parents with the option of not having a certain child, either by abortion (in the case of fetal testing) or through discarding embryos before implantation. The Catholic position rejects both abortion and in vitro fertilization, raising the question of whether genetic screening (of all pregnant women) or genetic testing (of those shown to be at risk) is even desirable. Assumptions of "normality" versus "deformity," along with the presumption in favor of abortion for defective children, press the questions of genetic discrimination once again: to choose to have a child with a disability, even a fatal one, can put parents in a counter-cultural position.

Genetic Counseling. Genetic counseling is a relatively new profession, begun in order to explain genetic risks and probabilities to parents, usually those who already have one child suffering from a genetic disease. The rapid growth in genetic testing technology has created many new challenges for those in this profession. As genetic testing becomes more and more common, not only with regard to prospective parents but with persons tested for adult onset diseases, the engagement of the counselor in making normative judgments comes to the fore. Counselors are seeing the limitations of merely providing information, and are being pressed to help in decision-making and on-going support of families in crisis. The presumption of value neutrality on the part the genetic counselor is being questioned. Clergy and other pastoral counselors may have an important role to play in this area, though many, if not most, are poorly informed in basics of genetic medicine. Further, counselors themselves are raising concerns over genetic enhancement and the criteria for normalcy. What is the counselor to do, for example, if parents come seeking ways to ensure that they have a child who is tall, or bright, or, alternatively, deaf or dwarfed?

Eugenics. Another area of concern emerges: the question of eugenics and whether genetic technology ought to be used to engineer ideal traits in individuals or a more ideal population in general, or both. The notion that humans might enhance the gene pool through social policy and mating practices is an old one, with a very jaded history. Many discussions of genetic engineering move quickly to recounting the horrors of Nazi eugenic policies and the incipient racism of earlier eugenics movements. Nevertheless, dismissing eugenics as prejudicial requires further nuance with regard to the very category of "disease." Here the question is where and how to draw the line between genetic traits and genetic diseases, and which deserve medical treatment (Shinn 1996; Walters and Palmer 1997).

For example, if genetically altered hormones are available to help those with Growth Hormone Deficiency, what about their use in promoting tallness for those who wish it? If parents' hopes for their child include developing talents as a basketball player, why not use genetically engineered drugs to assist in this goal? These questions strike at the heart, not only of ideals about perfection and normality, but of the freedom of choice that grounds modern culture. If a couple wants to use genetic knowledge to enhance their child's biological makeup, and if they can afford to pay for the necessary procedures, what should prohibit them from doing so? Likewise, if parents want a child with certain characteristics, why not select among embryos screened for such characteristics in order to implant the desired ones in the mother's womb?

Such eugenics, whether based on individual choice or social policy, is rejected on several accounts from the Catholic perspective. First, modern genetics depends almost entirely on the conception of embryos outside the womb, in vitro, and the subsequent selective implantation of genetically preferred embryos in the mother. This technology was rejected by the encyclical Donum vitae in 1987 due to its violation of the marital act. Further, the commodification of children involved in such a eugenics mentality directly contradicts the Catholic notion that children are gifts, not products or achievements. Children, complete with their genetic assets and liabilities, are to be conceived through unitive marital acts and to be welcomed as gifts from God.

Genetic Therapy. Another complex result of the Human Genome Project lies in the area of genetic therapy. The first point to be made in this regard is the distinction between somatic cell therapy and germline therapy. Somatic cells include all the cells of the body, while germline cells are the reproductive cells, eggs and sperm as well as embryos. Gene therapy that targets somatic cells seeks to affect the symptoms of a disease, or alter the genetic composition of cells that are defective due to genetic disease. For example, cystic fibrosis arises from a defective gene that prevents liquid from being transported through cell membranes, resulting in mucous accumulation in the lungs. Attempts have been made to deliver aerosolized, normal genes to the lungs of affected patients in order to correct the deficiency. These kinds of treatments need to be repeated regularly and, even if the effectiveness of the technology improves dramatically, will have an impact only on the life of the individual patient. Germline therapy would involve altering the genes of the patient's egg or sperm (or an embryo conceived by the patient) so that his or her child would not be affected by the disease. What is distinctive about this latter kind of therapy, yet to be developed, is that it would have an impact on all future generations, not merely the affected individual (Walters and Palmer 1997).

Generally, the ethical concerns over somatic cell therapy remain simply those of any medical research: informed consent, assessment of risk, cost-benefit analysis, etc. These standard principles break down with germline therapy: the persons affected do not yet exist and cannot therefore provide informed consent, and the risks are hard to calculate since the effects of tampering with DNA may not appear for several generations. Further, the research itself cannot go forward without experimentation on human embryos. While those who do not hold that life begins at conception find such research not only acceptable but urgent, the Catholic insistence on the dignity of life from the moment of conception rejects all such research. Even if germline therapy could move beyond tampering with embryos in vitro (to altering ova and sperm), there still remains the concern over eugenics and discrimination: if we begin altering future generations in order to cure disease, what is to stop persons from using the same techniques to eliminate unwanted characteristics from the population? What will happen to the diversity of the gene pool?

Theological Principles. Implicit in many of the concerns about justice and social policy discussed above is the notion of the dignity of the human person and the preferential focus on the poor, the vulnerable, and the marginalized, including embryos. This applies to questions of global justice as well as issues of discrimination, access to health care, racist eugenics, and concerns for the unborn.

A related salient question with regard to the Human Genome Project has to do with theological anthropology and the divine. Just what does it mean to be human and how do new genetic knowledge and capabilities alter our view of the human-divine relationship? These questions have entered the literature as discussions of the "gene myth" and "playing God" (Peter 1997). Almost all Christian theologians reject any absolute genetic determinism, harkening to the theological notion of humans as created imago Dei—in the image of God—with rationality and free will. Yet the limit of this freedom is highlighted by the oft-repeated insistence that humans must not try to usurp the role of God. Still, this latter injunction raises its own problems, since not intervening at all in the natural order is an utter impossibility. How far human agents can go in altering processes at the level of DNA remains a hotly disputed question.

The two sides of this conundrum are evident in the different models to which theological ethicists appeal. Those more in favor of pressing the edges of genetic therapies emphasize the duty toward alleviating suffering, and insist on modeling this work after Jesus as a divine healer. Those who want to be more cautious about advances in genetic research and treatment tend to focus more on natural law and the dangers of human hubris. Both streams of thought are present in the Roman Catholic tradition, with its legacy of works of mercy and medical missions as well as its adherence to a natural law theory that cautions against excessive intervention in nature.

Cloning. While not a direct result of the HGP, cloning nevertheless has yielded great debate in the past several years. The birth of Dolly, the cloned sheep, at the Roslin Institute in Scotland in the spring of 1997 brought the possibility of human cloning to the fore. This event elicited a wide range of perspectives, ethically, theologically, and denominationally (Cole-Turner 1998). Those who oppose human cloning most strongly identify themselves with either the Reformed tradition or the Roman Catholic tradition. Their arguments focus on the uniqueness and divinity of each individual, the reductionism and consumerism inherent in most bio-technologies, the disruption of family integrity, and the hubris of genetic manipulation.

For those who are not entirely opposed to human cloning, several themes appear repeatedly. Many question whether human cloning is even possible, given the technological and moral obstacles. It took 277 tries before Dolly was born. Of these, only 29 embryos survived beyond six days and 62 percent of fetuses implanted in ewes were lost by 14 days. In other words, the wastage in terms of human embryos would be extreme, not to mention the number of women needed to undergo implantation and pregnancy, with little hope of bringing a baby to term. Many believe that these facts alone will set sanctions against proceeding towards human cloning. Others believe that the technology already exists, and it is only a matter of time before it reaches the public domain.

The point most often made by those cautiously accepting of human cloning is that this reproductive process, in and of itself, will not destroy the unique identity of an individual. Genetic makeup is only a portion of individual identity, as is illustrated in the case of identical twins.

Other ethical concerns focus on the motives for creating a clone. Given other available procedures for dealing with infertility, the reasons for wanting a clone come down to the following: (1) to clone oneself or to create children with enhanced genetic capabilities; (2) to create a second child genetically identical to a first child who is terminally ill, in order to aid in treatment of the ill child; or (3) to create a replacement for a child who has died. None of these seem to be warranted, on the grounds that each motive makes of the clone an instrument used in fulfilling another's aspirations or needs. Since there is no way to obtain informed consent from the clone for such an instrumental birth, human cloning is rendered suspect.

Bibliography: A. R. CHAPMAN, Unprecedented Choices: Religious Ethics at the Frontiers of Genetic Science (Minneapolis 1999). R. COLE-TURNER, ed., Human Cloning: Religious Responses (Louisville 1997). M. JUNKER-KENNY and L. S. CAHILL, eds., The Ethics of Genetic Engineering (Maryknoll, NY 1998). J. F. KILNER, R. D. PENTZ, and F. E. YOUNG, eds., Genetic Ethics: Do the Ends Justify the Genes? (Grand Rapids, MI 1997). T. PETERS, Playing God? Genetic Determinism and Human Freedom (New York 1997). T. PETERS, ed., Genetics: Issues of Social Justice (Cleveland 1998). R. L. SHINN, The New Genetics (London 1996). L. WALTERS and J. G. PALMER, The Ethics of Human Gene Therapy (New York 1997). R. A. WILLER, ed., Genetic Testing and Screening: Critical Engagement at the Intersection of Faith and Science (Minneapolis 1998).

[C. S. W. CRYSDALE]

HUMAN RESPECT

Human respect is an excessive regard for the opinions or esteem of other men. The expression is not used by classical theologians, but it does signify a powerful influence in human affairs and one of which Christian moralists have not been unaware. Because honor or the recognition of a person's worth is so great a human good—the greatest of man's external goods (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 129.1)—men naturally strive for it. Theologians note the special virtue of MAGNANIMITY or greatness of soul that moderates one's undertaking works worthy of honor. Human respect, then, is not to be confused with magnanimity or with the reticence that prevents one from rashly divulging his inner secrets or hidden defects that would ruin his reputation. Since human respect is a kind of fear of the judgment of others, one acting from this motive lacks courage or fortitude, but as a vice human respect seems more directly opposed to magnanimity because it seeks honor rather than the works worthy of honor.

Concern for the opinion of others may lead one to act against moral principles and thus to do evil in order to gain the esteem of others. This obviously is morally wrong, for it involves an inversion of moral values, a preferring of human esteem to the virtuous good. If the matter is serious, the sin can be grave.

But the common human tendency to be concerned about the favorable opinion of others can be put to better use. If care is taken to associate with those who hold virtue in honor, the desire for the approval of others can encourage one to right living. This appears to be a matter of importance especially for adolescents, who are particularly concerned for the approval of others, since they are just becoming aware of their individuality and are searching for value and meaning in their lives.

If a morally good act is motivated purely, or at least principally, by human respect, it falls outside the order of merit. Such an act, performed not because of its intrinsic goodness or out of obedience to divine law, is not done, even virtually, for the love of God. However, such acts may have a certain utility insofar as they are at least an external fulfillment of the moral law and may lead to the formation of good habits.

Bibliography: C. DAMEN, in F. ROBERTI et al., Dictionary of Moral Theology, ed. P. PALAZZINI et al. from 2d Ital. ed. (Westminster, Md. 1962) 1310–11. N. JUNG, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 13.2:2461–66.

[J. HENNESSEY]

HUMANAE VITAE

Encyclical letter of Pope PAUL VI, on the regulation of birth, issued July 29, 1968.

Background. In acknowledgment of a growing sentiment both within and outside the Church, John XXIII appointed a commission (March 1963) to restudy the morality of using anovulant pills as a precoital measure of birth prevention; such use had once been characterized by PIUS XII (1958) as a direct temporary sterilization and therefore as immoral. Paul VI twice reconstituted Pope John's commission and, in response to mounting public agitation, invited it to evaluate the Church's overall ban on contraception rather than simply the application of that ban to the anovulant pill.

The commission majority's report (June 1966) favored leaving the method of birth regulation to the con-sciences of individual married couples, provided that selfishness were excluded and the conjugal life taken as a whole were open to procreation. The pope, however, undertook an independent study and eventually, in Humanae Vitae, rejected the commission's recommendations for a relaxation of the Church's traditional teaching.

Doctrine. After reviewing the controversy that occasioned its issuance and reasserting the Church's competence to interpret the natural law, Humanae Vitae articulates fundamental principles concerning conjugal love and responsible parenthood. Conjugal love, like marriage itself, is described as a good instituted by God "to realize in mankind his design of love" and to enable spouses "to collaborate with God in the generation and education of new lives" (No. 8). Responsible parenthood involves understanding and respecting the biological laws "which are part of the human person," mastering instinct and passion by rational control, deciding prudently about family size in concrete circumstances, and adhering to "the objective moral order established by God" (10).

While he did not assign an order of priority between the procreative and unitive goods of marriage, Pope Paul did insist that both values taken together are essential to the integrity of the conjugal act. Accordingly, he reiterated the requirement of natural law that "each and every marriage act (quilibet matrimonii usus) must remain open to the transmission of life" (11). This entails rejection of the following birth control techniques: (1) direct abortion under all circumstances; (2) direct sterilization of either spouse, whether permanent or temporary; (3) any procedure "which, either in anticipation of the conjugal act, or in its accomplishment, or in the development of its natural consequences, proposes, whether as an end or as a means, to render procreation impossible" (14). The italicized words in the last quoted phrase refer to the anovulant pill.

In an apparent response to the papal commission's majority, Pope Paul emphasized that deliberate violence to the integrity of even a single conjugal act constitutes an evil which cannot be rectified either by a good ulterior motive or by other conjugal acts left open to procreation (14). The pope further sought to counter the consequentialist reasoning of contraception advocates by observing that contraception, in addition to its intrinsic evil, can have disastrous consequences, such as encouraging promiscuity and marital infidelity, degrading women into objects of sexual satisfaction, and furnishing unscrupulous governments with the means of violating the procreative freedom of their subjects (17).

While rejecting contraception, the pope reaffirmed the legitimacy of conjugal acts foreseen to be infecund

"for causes independent of the will of husband and wife" (11). It is therefore allowable to use therapeutic measures necessary for health which are not calculated to suppress procreation, even if an obstacle to procreation will arise as a side effect (15). Moreover, for "serious motives," spouses may regulate births by utilizing "the natural rhythms immanent in the generative functions" (16). Acknowledging that the observance of rhythm necessitates self-discipline and restraint, the pope affirmed that this can contribute significantly to developing the mutual unselfishness that is essential to a happy and stable marriage.

In the lengthy pastoral section that concludes Humanae Vitae (19–30), Pope Paul admonished public authorities to promote a social climate favorable to chastity and to refrain from either supporting or imposing unnatural birth-control techniques to solve demographic problems. Scientists are asked to search out a way of furnishing "a sufficiently secure basis" for birth regulation through the observance of rhythm (24). Married couples are exhorted to pursue the positive value of conjugal chastity aided by prayer and the Sacraments, without being discouraged by natural weakness. Priests and bishops, finally, are urged to propose the Pope's teaching faithfully and to encourage spouses to adhere to it.

Authority. The encyclical was released to the press by Msgr. (later Archbishop) Ferdinando Lambruschini, with the comment that the document did not propose its teaching as infallible and irreformable although it did reflect the serious judgment of the Church's highest magisterial authority. Barely a month later, writing to an assembly of German Catholics, Pope Paul himself expressed hope that "the lively debate aroused by our encyclical will lead to a better understanding of God's will" (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 60 [1968] 575). The authoritative status of Humanae vitae has itself become the subject of lively debate. Some scholars, notably John C. Ford and Germain Grisez, have argued that the teaching against contraception bespeaks a long unbroken tradition of the ordinary magisterium and, therefore, was already infallible before Pope Paul issued his encyclical (Theological Studies 39 [1978] 258–312). In 1984 Pope John Paul II claimed that this teaching "belongs not only to the natural moral law, but also to the moral order revealed by God: also from this point of view, it could not be different, but solely what is handed down by Tradition and the Magisterium and, in our days, the Encyclical Humanae vitae as a modern document of this Magisterium" (General Audience, July 18, 1984; L'osservatore Romano [Eng. ed.], July 23, 1984, 1; italics original). This papal statement, however, is not itself a definitive declaration; and the anti-contraception teaching is not included in a more recent list of moral and dogmatic teachings characterized by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith as infallible even though not formally defined (L'osservatore Romano, June 30–July 1, 1998, 5). Theologians such as Francis A. Sullivan have meanwhile contested the arguments of Ford and Grisez (Sullivan, Magisterium: Teaching Authority in the Catholic Church [1983] 119–152). Grisez has published several additional articles replying to Sullivan and other critics, thus keeping “the lively debate” going in scholarly circles. Among Catholic believers generally, it is apparent that the teaching of Humanae vitae has not been effectively received or widely practiced. Many dioceses in the United States and elsewhere, however, refer married and engaged couples to the Natural Family Planning services which are increasingly available. Some proponents of the encyclical’s teaching suggest hopefully that further advances in the development of reliable natural methods of monitoring fertility, combined with greater apprehensions about the safety of much contraceptive technology (including the anovulant pill), will eventually foster a more favorable climate for the wider reception of papal teaching about responsible birth regulation.

Bibliography: PAUL VI, Humanae Vitae (July 25, 1968), Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 60 (1968) 481–503; Eng. tr. Humanae Vitae (Washington, D.C. 1968), also Pope Speaks 13 (1968–69) 305–316 and Catholic Mind 66 (Sept. 1968) 35–48; address to obstetricians and gynecologists (Oct. 29, 1966), Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 58 (1966) 1166–70; Eng. tr. Pope Speaks 11 (1966) 401–402. Human Life in Our Day, pastoral letter of U.S. bishops (Washington, D.C. 1968). J. COSTANZO, “Papal Magisterium, Natural Law and Humanae Vitae,” American Journal of Jurisprudence 16 (1971) 259–289. C. CURRAN, ed., Contraception: Authority and Dissent (New York 1969). J.A. KOMONCHAK, “Humanae vitae and its Reception: Ecclesiological Reflections,” Theological Studies 39 (1978) 221–257. R.A. MCCORMICK, “Notes on Moral Theology, 1978: Humanae vitae and the Magisterium,” Theological Studies 40 (1979) 80–97. R. DENNEHY, ed., Christian Married Love (San Francisco, 1981). R. MALONE, “Humanae Vitae Revisited,” Communio (US) 15 (Winter 1988) 517–520. J. E. SMITH, Humanae vitae: A Generation Later (Washington, DC, 1991). C.E. CURRAN and R.A. MCCORMICK, eds., Dialogue about Catholic Sexual Teaching (New York 1993). P. BRISTOW, “Dualism: The Obstacle to Understanding Humanae Vitae,” Downside Review 113 (1995) 104–111. D. S. CRAWFORD, “Humanae Vitae and the Perfection of Love,” Communio (US) 25 (Fall 1998) 414–438.

[B. A. WILLIAMS]

HUMANI GENERIS

An encyclical issued by Pope PIUS XII on Aug. 12, 1950, to meet the thrust of the theological revival after World War II. At the end of that war the pent-up energies of Catholic scholars, together with the freedom to publish and exchange opinions, set in motion the theological revival sometimes labeled the “new theology.” The purpose of the encyclical was twofold: to correct certain extreme opinions held in some Catholic circles; and to restate those traditional Catholic teachings relative to the direction in which the postwar theological revival was heading.

The opening paragraphs of the encyclical catalogued extreme non-Christian philosophies of evolutionism, existentialism, and HISTORICISM as contributing to the spread of error. However, at the same time, it called for Catholic philosophers and theologians to study these philosophies for the purpose of combating them. The encyclical significantly stated that each of these philosophies contains a certain amount of truth, and that such study will lead Catholic scholars to a fruitful discussion and evaluation of philosophical and theological truths.

In the field of theology the encyclical specifically restated the condemnations of earlier pontiffs of merely relativistic conceptions of Catholic dogma. Such conceptions lead to the more dangerous error of neglect of the teaching authority of the Church. At this point the encyclicals themselves are spoken of as organs of the ordinary teaching (magisterium) of the Church.

In modern Biblical studies the encyclical condemned as specific errors the exegesis of Scripture that ignores or is opposed to the analogy of faith and the tradition of the Church and that which is marked by either ignorance or contempt for the literal meaning of the text in favor of a purely spiritual interpretation.

Theological reaffirmations of traditional Catholic teaching concerned the following: the demonstration of the existence of God, creation, predestination, the existence of ANGELS, the gratuity of the supernatural order, ORIGINAL SIN, the meaning of SIN, TRANSUBSTANTIATION, and membership in the Church, MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST. In philosophy, the encyclical reaffirmed the Church’s approval of THOMISM according to the norms of Pope LEO XIII and Pope St. PIUS X.

Finally, the encyclical considered specific teachings derived from the “positive sciences” but more or less connected to the truths of the Christian religion. In the question of human evolution specific direction is given to continue present research and inquiry by specialists; in addition, two statements are made about problems related directly to evolution. The first concerns the evolution of the human body from preexisting and living matter, that is, that such an opinion is not as yet a certain conclusion from the facts and that revelation demands moderation and caution. The second concerns polygenism, and is to the effect that it cannot at the present time be taught by Catholics, for it is not yet apparent how polygenism is to be reconciled with the traditional teaching of the Church on original sin. Finally, in the sphere of historical study, the encyclical condemns those who empty the Genesis accounts in the OT of any historical sense. However, the history contained in those accounts is, according to the encyclical, to be determined by exegetes keeping in mind the process of inspiration, the popular intent of the documents, and the metaphorical nature of the language.

Humani generis did not stop the postwar theological revival, nor was it intended to do so; but it did serve to channel that revival toward constructive work, and to limit prudently certain areas of speculation. The ultimately prudential nature of the encyclical is evident in its refusal to name or censure specific persons or even titles of works, and in its evident awareness of and interest in modern thought.

The significance of Humani generis as regards to various theological topics has been discussed where pertinent in the respective related articles of this encyclopedia.

Bibliography: PIUS XII, "Humani generis" (Encyclical, 12 Aug. 1950) ActApS 42 (1950) 561–578, Eng. Catholic Mind 48 (Nov. 1950) 688–700. A. C. COTTER, The Encyclical "Humani generis" (Weston, Mass. 1951). S. TROMP, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:524–525. J. M. CONNOLLY, Voices of France (New York 1961). J. LEVIE, "L'Encyclique Humani generis," Nouvelle Revue théologique 72 (1950) 785–793. F. TAYMÁNS, "L'Encyclique Humani generis et la théologie," ibid., 73 (1951) 3–20. R. GUELLEY, "Les antécédents de l'encyclique Humani Generis dans les sanctions Romaines de 1942: Chenu, Charlier, Draguet," Revue d'Histoire Ecclesiastique 81 (1986) 421–97.

[J. M. CONNOLLY]

HUMANISM

The term humanism has a number of more or less distinct meanings, all referring to a world view in some way centered on man rather than on the suprahuman or the abstract. In its strictest sense, the word refers to a literary and intellectual movement, the "new learning," running from 14th-century Italy through Western culture generally into the 17th century or, more vaguely, even beyond, and marked by devotion to Greek and Latin classics as the central and highest expression of human values. The term has been extended to comparable movements in the Middle Ages, notably to the 12th-century educational reform typified by the ideals of JOHN OF SALISBURY (d. 1180) and to Carolingian scholarly activity centering around ALCUIN (see CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE). Humanism refers at times also to certain specific 20th-century developments. One of these early in the century, growing out of the work of William JAMES, John Dewey, and F. C. S. Schiller, envisioned joining scientific concerns with the "higher" life of the human spirit. A second was that of Irving Babbitt and Paul Elmer More, who reacted strongly against vocational specialization and scientism. Twentieth-century Neothomism, particularly as propounded by Jacques Maritain, has often viewed itself as a Christian humanism (see NEOSCHOLASTICISM AND NEOTHOMISM; HUMANISM, CHRISTIAN). More recently, Christian humanism has acquired further meanings, some of them associated with the views of Pierre TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, SJ (with whom, however, the term humanism itself found little favor). Taking mankind in a fuller cosmic setting, these later humanisms make much of the "hominization" of the globe, its increasing subjection to man, as the culmination of the cosmic evolutionary processes to which the Incarnation gives a new and final significance. On the other hand, an atheistic type of existentialism has been proposed by Jean Paul Sartre and others as a humanism, a view of life centered on man conceived of as creating himself for himself in his own system of values. The term secular HUMANISM is often used for this and various other systems of thought that propose purportedly integrated views of life which, often in a highly polemic spirit, exclude belief in the existence of God.

The present article is concerned with humanism in the strict sense. Often styled Renaissance humanism, this 14th-century movement is sometimes taken as coextensive with the Renaissance itself, and sometimes as a more specific manifestation. In its specific sense, Renaissance humanism is basically academic. Humanists as such were textual scholars and devisers of curricula—on the one hand the successors of the medieval scribes, that is, of the masters of the ars dictaminis, and on the other hand more or less professional educators. At the core of humanism lay the studia humanitatis of the Renaissance, a specific educational curriculum that stressed grammar, rhetoric, history, poetry, and ethics, all studied in classical texts, and competed as an educational alternative with the established scholasticism of the arts course or SCHOLASTIC "philosophy," which had stressed logic or dialectic and natural philosophy (something akin to modern "science," of which it was one of the seedbeds), with some token interest in ethics and metaphysics (see SCHOLASTICISM, 1). Attentive to man's life in the world as such rather than to abstractions, humanism encouraged music and the visual arts as well as the cultivation of manners and at times, especially in Italy, of athletic skills. As a concrete educational program, humanism incorporated various and even competing ideologies and resources; and, although it effected changes, its breaks with the immediate past were seldom clean. Scholastic dialectic and humanist rhetoric, for example, often clearly overlapped not only in matter but even in method: typical humanist rhetorical procedure was far more committed to logical formalism than what is generally considered RHETORIC today.

Cosimo de' Medici as patron of philosophers and artists, detail of a fresco by Giorgio Vasari in the Sala di Cosmo il Vecchio, Palazzo Vecchio, Florence.

Pietro Cardinal Bembo.

Humanism, even in the strict sense of an academic phenomenon, is connected with and often intimately dependent on political, intellectual, artistic, social, and other cultural developments. Thus interpretations of humanism have varied in accord with interpretations of the Renaissance itself. Since the Renaissance is handled in a separate article, the present article treats humanism chiefly in its academic aspects.

Beginnings. Humanism developed in an academic tradition that had never associated serious teaching with any language other than Latin, and it represents in great part a crisis within the use of that language.

Linguistic and Cultural Background. When, between the 6th century and the 9th, the modern romance languages were evolving out of Latin and new non-romance languages were flooding into the late Roman Empire, schools and learned circles in western Europe generally had continued to conduct their business as usual—that is, with Latin texts, which did not change as the spoken language did and had no competition since virtually nothing was written in the vernaculars.

At first there was relatively little difference between the Latin of the schools and that which was spoken, but, as the spoken language changed more and more, even speakers of languages developed out of Latin found it necessary to study Latin as more or less a foreign language in order to go to school. The problem of translating Latin texts into the hundreds of rapidly evolving and largely unwritten dialects was too vast to be seriously considered. These dialects did not even have words needed to express what was studied in school (grammatical terms, for example), so that classroom explanation itself had somehow to be couched in Latin. After antiquity the Latin used in learned circles changed somewhat, but negligibly. Medieval Latin added greatly to its vocabulary and devised or favored some few characteristic structures of its own, and some medieval users knew Latin better than others; but essentially the language remained Learned Latin, a written language modeled on the Latin of classical antiquity.

Humanism and the Middle Ages. The Middle Ages thus remained in contact to a degree with the ancient world and were consistently nourished by it directly or indirectly. In the early Middle Ages classical works that were directly utilized tended to be those serving in a utilitarian fashion the study of the Latin language and of rhetoric, but by the 11th and 12th centuries works of literary and scientific value were widely used. Ovid, Horace, Persius, Juvenal, and Terence were among the favorites, as well as the first two treatises of Aristotle's Organon, translated into Latin, of course, often from Arabic versions. Knowledge of Greek was exceedingly rare. In the mid-13th century even a scholar of the distinction of St. THOMAS AQUINAS could do without a personal mastery of Greek in explaining Greek authors themselves, relying on his younger Dominican brother, WILLIAM OF MOERBEKE, who had gone to Greece to learn the language, as his philological adviser.

As a continuation of the medieval dependence upon texts of classical antiquity, Renaissance humanism was thus not only nothing new but was rather one of the most typically medieval phenomena the Middle Ages produced. Humanism did, however, reorient and intensify devotion to antiquity, making of this devotion a symbol of something new, opposed to the cultural status quo. It is this reorientation and intensification that needs to be explained.

The Role of Petrarch. PETRARCH is generally identified as the first significant writer to evince the kind of enthusiasm for the ancients that was typical of Renaissance humanism. He was an enthusiast for literature as a manifestation and implement of the "good life," that is, of a self-conscious, urbane, moderately austere, but open and genial appreciation of the goods of the natural world, combined with a sense of the limitations of human existence, of the “tears of things.” Thus viewed, this “good life” did not foster the other-worldly religious intensity of either a St. IGNATIUS LOYOLA or a Martin LUTHER, but as Petrarch viewed it, it was nevertheless Christian. Europe in places, notably in northern Italy, had reached a state of opulence (Florentine humanists were rather uniformly of the wealthy class), civic organization, and cultural self-confidence sufficient for Petrarch’s type of enthusiasm to have appeal and to be indulged on a significantly wider scale than before. Petrarch and his circle found little to feed this love of literature and the good life in the world of scholasticism, whether “philosophy,” medicine, law, or theology, but much to nourish it in classical antiquity.

Petrarch and later Renaissance humanists, however, appropriated classical writers quite selectively, apotheosizing only those who struck a responsive chord and downgrading those, largely technical or “abstract” writers such as Aristotle, who had chiefly interested the Middle Ages. The good life was served at best only to a limited extent by technical, abstract knowledge and utilitarian approaches to the natural world. Science, if indulged, was to be pursued in leisurely and genteel fashion. The master art for Petrarch was rhetoric, which had dominated liberal education in antiquity and which related to human action, not dialectic or logic, which had to do with technicalities and were at best a part of elementary education not worth the attention of mature men.

Petrarch’s love of the classics was closely tied to Italian patriotism and to the feeling that the Rome of his day and that of the ancient Republic were one. He wrote a book (De viris illustribus) on the great men of the ancient Roman Republic, and here, as elsewhere, laid the ground for the cult of fame and glory and of gracefully competent and spectacular individual achievement, or virtù, which was to remain a noteworthy feature of Renaissance humanism. Under Cicero’s influence, Petrarch had believed that Latin literature was far superior to Greek, but by 1342 he began to learn Greek; while he never became fully adept in the language, he prepared Italy for the reception of ancient Greek culture. Petrarch’s devotion to the classics was crucial in arousing the interests of his compatriot Giovanni Boccaccio in ancient Latin literature.

Manuscripts and Libraries. Humanism fed on addiction to reading, grown notably stronger during the Middle Ages; the ancients had been more deeply committed to the spoken word both in educational procedure and in cultural life. Petrarch himself was a manuscript hunter and collector, as were Boccaccio and the chancellor at Florence, Coluccio SALUTATI. The age immediately following Petrarch’s—that of POGGIO Bracciolini (1380–1459), Niccolò dei Niccoli (1363–1437), and NICHOLAS OF CUSA—was marked by the greatest discoveries of Latin manuscripts the West had ever seen.

Interest in texts bred interest in textual criticism, and the humanist drive toward textual accuracy manifested itself in efforts to get at the two principal substrata underlying Western Latin literary culture, namely, Greek and Hebrew. Humanist interest in Greek has sometimes been dated from the fall of Constantinople to the Ottoman Turks in 1453 and the consequent flight to the West of Greek Christians, who were fluent in classical Greek because their own vernacular Greek had kept close to the classical and because the study of classical Greek had remained the basic tradition in Eastern schools as had the study of Latin in the West. But it is certain that interest in Greek texts was growing massively in Italy long before 1453. The correspondence of the Camaldolese monk Ambrogio Traversari (1386–1439) lists acquisitions of Greek manuscripts sent by Giovanni Aurispa and Francesco Filelfo to Florence upon their return from the East in 1424 and 1427. The fall of Constantinople simply stimulated existing activities. The archbishop of Nicaea, Cardinal BESSARION, who adhered to Rome after the Council of FLORENCE (1438–45), put much of his energy into acquiring Greek manuscripts, and John (or Janus) Lascaris, one of the refugee Greek scholars, collected for the MEDICI, and brought back, over 200 Greek manuscripts at one time in 1492.

Hebrew manuscripts, extant in Europe through the Middle Ages but virtually ignored by medieval Christians, also began to make their way into Christian collections at this time, although to a limited degree. Giovanni PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA owned more than 100 Hebrew manuscripts, and Federigo, Duke of Urbino, had nearly as many.

Many of the great European libraries date from this period of manuscript collecting, when the VATICAN LIBRARY in particular began to acquire its preeminence under NICHOLAS V (1447–55), himself a copyist, manuscript collector, and patron of the arts.

Greek Revival, Florentine and Other Academies. In the humanists’ self-conscious return to the past and their general expansion of intellectual horizons, Greek played the most significant linguistic role, with Rome, Venice, and Florence the chief centers of activity. Nicholas V patronized the great project of translating the principal Greek prose authors into Latin, carried forward by the Greek exiles Bessarion, George of TREBIZOND, known also as Trapezuntius, and Theodore of Gaza (c. 1400–75), as well as by Italian scholars such as Lorenzo VALLA, Niccolo Perotti (1430–80), Poggio Bracciolini, and Guarino da Verona (1374–1460). The Venetian humanist printer Aldus MANUTIUS and the scholars he had gathered around him in the Venetian Academy undertook the printing of careful first editions of the Greek texts of many of the authors translated into Latin at Rome.

Florence a Center. Florence became especially important as a center of Platonic studies, which were undertaken largely by some of the most well-to-do among the citizenry. Manuel Chrysoloras, a Byzantine schoolmaster turned diplomat, had taught Greek at Florence and translated Plato's Republic at the beginning of the 15th century. Gemistos PLETHON, a native of Constantinople and teacher of Bessarion, as a representative of the Greek Church at the Council of Florence had fanned the interests of the Florentine Cosimo de' Medici in PLATONISM, and, with Theodore of Gaza on the opposite or Aristotelian side, had touched off the controversy between Platonists and Aristotelians that polarized much philosophical discussion for generations. Cosimo founded the Accademia Platonica of Florence, where scholars gathered to exchange ideas and thus cultivate the good life. The Accademia achieved its greatest fame under Lorenzo de' Medici, "The Magnificent," who reigned from 1469 to 1492, the "incarnation of the spirit of the Renaissance," politician, poet, patron of the arts, philosophy, and classical learning. This academy had counterparts in Naples and Rome. The Roman Academy flourished especially under LEO X (Giovanni de' Medici) from 1513 to 1521, with the future cardinals Pietro Bembo and Jacopo SADOLETO as members, together with Paolo Giovio (1483–1552) and Baldassare Castiglione.

Ficino and Pico della Mirandola. These academies, particularly that of Florence, gave humanists an interest in intellectual speculation largely missing among the early Greek immigrants, men who had often found a place in the Western intellectual world because they knew Greek rather than because they had serious intellectual interests. The center of the Florentine academy was Marsilio FICINO, who, when still a mere boy, had been selected by Cosimo to be educated in Greek. Ficino and Giovanni PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, who together set the tone of the academy, depended more on the Neoplatonism of PLOTINUS and of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS than on Plato himself for their deepest inspiration. Ficino's Platonic philosophy was based on the harmony he believed existed between Platonism and the Christian faith, and in its holistic approach resembled the thought of the early Fathers of the Church, particularly AUGUSTINE, rather than that of the scholastics, although Ficino perceived less of a gulf between Platonism and faith than had Augustine. Both philosophy and the Christian religion were for Ficino manifestations of the spiritual life, as the created worlds emanate from God in a descending hierarchical order. He emphasized the divine element in man and other created things, from literature to sexual love (aroused by beauty and terminating in the begetting of children), and put high value on many forms of ardor, such as the drives toward glory, honor, and patriotism. Ficino, a devout Christian ordained at the age of 40, was more tolerant of the material world than ancient pagan Greek thinkers had been: although the soul finds happiness only in God, it retains permanently its affinity to matter, so that the body itself must have its eternity.

Ficino's thought was complemented by that of Pico della Mirandola, whose view of man somewhat anticipated certain elements of 20th-century existentialism: man's distinctive humanness is due to his power of free choice. For Pico, however, this power of choice does not isolate man but rather enables him to share in the properties of all other beings. The holistic sense of actuality here evident appears also in Pico's other important idea of the unity of all philosophical thought, a unity that, as Paul Oskar Kristeller has explained, is not a blurred product of fuzzy syncretism or SKEPTICISM but is quite clear-cut: in various philosophers, Pico maintains, one can isolate specific instances of clearly articulated truths that bind the philosophers together despite varying admixtures of error. Even more than Ficino, Pico made use of the scholastic heritage, which he often defended against other humanists.

Ficino and Pico were typical in that they processed Greek thought somewhat in Western terms, for contact with that thought did not cure the Renaissance of its clearly Western bias, marked by a stress on sobriety and order, on dignity and a sometimes ponderous magnificence, rather than on Greek spontaneity, grace, and venturesomeness. The spirit of ancient Greece came more alive for the West only in the 19th century.

Although with Renaissance humanism ancient Greek literature entered into the mainstream of Western thought as never before, the end result of the humanist excursion into Greek as a language fell short of sanguine humanist ambitions. Under humanist encouragement, Greek was indeed added to the regular program of the best schools throughout Europe from the 15th century on, but it was regularly accorded only a fraction of the curricular time assigned to Latin. Greek never remotely approached Latin as a means of communication among educated men. But, scarce as they always remained, Western scholars who had truly mastered ancient Greek were still numerous enough during the Renaissance to have a tremendous effect on the intellectual life, as they always have had since.

Hebrew Revival. Hebrew, the third of the major ancient languages championed by humanists, never achieved more than a small fraction of the limited currency of Greek, despite the brave talk at institutions such as the Collegium Trilingue for Latin, Greek, and Hebrew founded in Louvain in 1517 by Jerome Busleiden. Yet the work of Renaissance Hebrew specialists was of major importance.

Italy and Spain were the first centers of Hebrew scholarship. In early 15th-century Italy, Ambrogio Traversari had studied Hebrew, and, under Nicholas V, Giannozzo Manetti was known as a Hebrew scholar and collector of Hebrew manuscripts. In Spain, where Jewish exegetical and mystical thought had developed greatly in the Middle Ages, often under the direct influence of ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY, the influence of both the Jewish CABALA and the TALMUD had begun to be felt in Christian thinking by the second half of the 15th century.

To Christian Neoplatonists, the Jewish works appeared often to provide welcome, because seemingly independent, confirmation of some of their own persuasions, particularly those regarding divine TRANSCENDENCE and the importance of love in the scheme of things. In fact, however, the Christian Neoplatonists were picking up in the Jewish works chiefly echoes of their own Neoplatonic sources, which had come into Jewish thinking through the Arabs.

Pico della Mirandola, the outstanding Hebrew scholar of his day, shows the influence of Jewish thought in much of his encyclopedic work. Following Pico's premature death, the greatest Hebraist of the age was the Alsatian Johann REUCHLIN, who began his study of Hebrew in Italy and published the first Hebrew grammar for Christians in 1506. He immediately became embroiled in the dispute over the activities of a converted Jew, Johannes PFEFFERKORN, who, under a mandate from the Emperor Maximilian, was supervising the destruction of those Jewish works he considered a danger to Christianity; according to his accusers, he was extorting bribes from wealthy Jews for immunity. As referee in the disputes swirling around Pfefferkorn, Reuchlin pleaded moderately for minimal destruction of dangerous books and for a positive approach by Christians to the study of Jewish literature. He was attacked by Pfefferkorn, who soon had the Dominicans of Cologne on his side, while champions of the new learning made common cause with Reuchlin. The controversy occasioned a major Latin satirical work, the anonymous EPISTOLAE OBSCURORUM VIRORUM, which attacked religious and scholarly obscurantism and helped discredit both the Church and older methods of teaching.

Textual Scholarship, Biblical and Other. The Reuchlin-Pfefferkorn controversy showed how central the question of textual scholarship had become to the intellectual life of the age affected by humanist learning. Intent on matters of style, Petrarch and his successors had focused attention as never before on the exact way a document originally read. Resulting close textual study alerted thinking men to the temporal and geographical variations in human experience and expression, sowing the seeds not only of modern "scientific" history—political, intellectual, religious, and other—but also of modern linguistics, cultural anthropology, sociology, political science, comparative religion, and many other areas of study.

The work of Lorenzo Valla was both epoch-making and representative. He was able to show (1440) on stylistic grounds that the DONATION OF CONSTANTINE could not have been written at its supposed date but was in fact a Carolingian production. The demonstration had interesting implications, since it made law dependent on philology. Valla turned also to the textual study of the Scriptures; in his Annotationes he pointed out various errors and suspect translations in the Latin Vulgate by comparing it with Greek texts. ERASMUS, who found this work of Valla's unpublished and edited it in 1505, set himself the task of producing his own new Latin version of the New Testament, with a commentary (1516). Meanwhile, the University of Alcalá, founded (1508) by Cardinal Francisco XIMÉNEZ, was laboring on the Complutensian Polyglot Bible (the Latin for Alcalá is Complutum). This edition (completed 1522) ranged in parallel columns the Old and New Testaments in their original languages and the Vulgate version. However great the admirable industry devoted to this edition, the aims of Ximénez were less in accord with the ideals of modern scholarship than were the aims of Erasmus, whose critical attitude toward textual study represented the best in Renaissance tradition and was, indeed, in many ways far ahead of his own time. Ximénez presented the original texts as supports rather than sources of the Vulgate.

Humanism and Typography. Alphabetic typography, developed toward the middle of the 15th century when humanism was in full career, was intimately connected with the humanist desire for controlled texts. It resulted from the application of mechanical techniques (in which the Middle Ages, by and large, had advanced far beyond ancient Greece and Rome) and accumulated capital to scribal problems, manifesting that juncture of craftsmanship, business sense, and scholarly interests which is one marked feature of the humanist milieu. Although the first typographers were hardly working under direct humanist inspiration, the concurrence of the invention of printing with the peak of humanist activity is something more than a coincidence, for the drive toward alphabetic typography grew out of the general avidity for textual material that had been built up by the end of the Middle Ages, and which formed a seedbed for humanism itself.

Typography gave Renaissance humanistic scholarship much of its effectiveness. The effort put into textual scholarship could now be conserved with only negligible error instead of being dissipated by successive copyists. Moreover, information-retrieval techniques, such as indexing, eventually cut down on the time and effort consumed by massive memorization. The indexing of manuscripts had never been very inviting because each handmade copy would have to have its own specially made index, which was seldom worth the time required. Printing and indexing helped give special contours to humanist educational techniques. One of the humanists' most widespread methods of teaching classical literature and of doing their own writing was through use of indexed excerpts or loci communes.

The close alliance of humanist and typographic interests can be seen everywhere—from Venice, where the printer Aldus Manutius preempted the services of exiled Greek scholars, through Basel, Strasbourg, and Paris to London, where St. Thomas MORE's brother-in-law, John Rastell, was a printer. The plaque on Erasmus' tomb in Basel openly advertises the printer-publisher-humanist alliance: it was erected by the three great Basel printing firms of Johannes Amerbach, FROBEN, and Episcopus.

Humanist Methods of Study. These all cluster around the doctrine and practice of imitation of the classics.

Imitatio. This had roots in antiquity but became especially critical in humanist procedure because the humanists were training in a language no longer the vernacular it had been for Cicero's and Virgil's world (although humanists almost never discussed this obvious fact). Boys generally came to Latin in medieval and Renaissance times not with a limited vocabulary and limited modes of expression, as schoolchildren come to the study of their own languages today, but with no vocabulary at all, no ability to say anything. They had to be taught simultaneously even the most elementary Latin words and the proper way to use them. This meant for humanists the way classical writers had used them, particularly Cicero, whose usage was admired by everyone and proposed by some Ciceronian extremists, such as Cardinal Bembo, as practically the sole model for Latin style.

To foster imitation, humanists undertook among other things to cut up the entire corpus of classical Latin (and, less successfully, Greek) writings into excerpts. Of the hundreds of major collectors of classical phrases, turns of expression, and anecdotes, Erasmus was the most indefatigable and influential. As he read through the classics, he digested virtually the entire corpus into a series of anecdotes and phrases for classroom use in his De copia verborum et rerum, his Adagia, his Apophthegmata, and other works, which indexed the excerpts under appropriate headings; one could find exactly what classical writers had said about virtue, vice, death, learning, ignorance, and so on, including anecdotes ranged under such headings, and variant ways of expressing an idea.

In the De copia, for example, Erasmus listed over 400 different ways, each presumably found in a classical Latin writer, to say "has delighted" in the Latin equivalent of "Your letter has delighted me." Collecting and arranging excerpts under headings was essentially the same procedure used by the Middle Ages in compiling its florilegia of stories for preachers. The humanists, however, who scorned the medieval florilegia, generally cited their sources and kept the exact original expressions, for they were interested in manner as much as in matter. Schoolboys often translated the passages from the classics into the vernacular and then, with the original text removed, from the vernacular back into Latin. In the process, no direct attention at all was given to vernacular training.

This method crammed the minds of even very young boys with a mass of classical lore—mythological, historical, philosophical, medical, and much other—and it accounts in great part for what appears to be fantastically wide reading in such writers as Shakespeare. The method produced a Latin style close to, but not identical with, the classical. The difficulty with the method was its assumption, never fully articulated but still operative, that the total effect of a work of literature is the sum of separate impressions. Humanist literary criticism, like most previous criticism, was much more able to treat special rhetorical effects in separate passages than to deal with sophisticated questions of overall organization.

Relation to Oral Performance. It is becoming more and more apparent that the humanist approach to literature by excerpts to be stored on the page or in the mind and then retrieved as occasion offered and "rhapsodized" or "stitched together" to form a whole was a technique belonging more properly to oral performance than to literature or writing as such—the technique of tremendously skilled, generally illiterate verbalizing experts such as Homer. This is not to say that the approach did not help produce effective writers. If it did not place the value on "originality" that post-romantic writers did, neither did it value sheer plagiarism; one should have an abundant store (copia) of material so that one could weave together a whole never before put together quite this way. Not originality, but superlative skill, virtù, was of prime value. Pope's "What oft was thought but ne'er so well expressed" catches the feeling of the older tradition, which was essentially conservative, as oral performance or orally oriented performance must be.

The oral residue in the humanist mentality was heightened by the humanist revival of interest in rhetoric and in the classical ideal of the public speaker as the most fully or most liberally educated man. But the humanists were ambiguous on this point: when they said rhetoric or oratory they often meant writing. Erasmus' program was concerned essentially with written expression.

Humanism and Vernacular Languages. Although, as has been seen, humanism itself was directly concerned only with the "learned languages," Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, together with related tongues such as Arabic and "Chaldean" (now known as Aramaic), the effect of the movement on the vernacular languages was massive. Since the vernaculars as such were not taught in school, writers inevitably imported into the vernaculars the procedures, literary values, and even the vocabulary ("ink-horn terms") they learned studying Latin.

Imitations of the classical genres, such as epics, odes, satires, pastoral, stage plays, and orations (which often served the functions later to be fulfilled by the essay when this developed out of the collections of loci communes), proliferated in most European languages, and not the least in English. Translations of the classics supplied the needs of those who had not been to school (this included women generally, for schools had from antiquity been only for boys, so that girls could learn Latin only privately) or of the countless thousands who, despite 6, 8, or 10 years of Latin, had never acquired fluency in the language. Modern scholarship has made it evident, however, that Renaissance writers, like their successors, by no means always read, even in translations, the works they refer to or quote. They often knew classical works in snippets, acquired either in school or from the multitudinous books of reference compiled by humanist scholars. But in one way or another the classics were a massive presence. Virtually all Renaissance vernacular literature, except such popular non-academic forms as the ballad, show classical influence, many of them predominantly. By putting the classics in the mouths of educated persons generally, humanism thus enabled the vernaculars to mature quickly: they could borrow from the classics some of the sophistication they themselves lacked because, largely through the work of the humanists, the classical heritage had been made a permanent part of Western sensibility. Moreover, by intensifying study of language in the classics, humanism sensitized western European man to language generally and improved vernacular expression by raising vernacular ideals. Groups of vernacular writers, such as the 16th-century Pléiade in France or the group around the Countess of Pembroke, Sir Philip Sidney's sister, in England, undertook explicitly to raise the vernacular to the level of the classical languages. The vernaculars eventually became the real heirs of humanism, for the humanists' program deliberately to rehabilitate Latin was, in fact, advance notice of the effective demise of Latin as an academic lingua franca.

Humanism, Change, and History. One of the noteworthy features of humanism, as of the Renaissance itself, is its sense of involvement in change. Petrarch, Valla, Erasmus, and their circles were aware that they were doing something to make man's life-world different. With some exceptions, they were commonly inclined to think of the change they envisioned as a revivification of the remote past, involving a repudiation of their immediate scholastic predecessors, particularly the logicians. But the very return to the past and the accumulation of knowledge implemented by printing produced a sense of historic distance, not so developed as that of 20th-century man, but far more active than that of the Middle Ages, which had been curiously insensitive to the reality of time.

The close textual scholarship fostered by humanism led inevitably to recognition that many dimensions of existence previously taken for granted as inalterable were not indeed so: conditions had been quite different in other ages. In historians such as Francesco Guicciardini, human motives and free decisions are seen as shaping man's life and history, and both history and biography are freed from the fatalistic and unconsciously pagan determinism so common in the Middle Ages. At that time the typical saint's life was a pastiche of predestinarian patterns, built around clear signs present from the moment of the saint's birth, or even before, showing that he was unerringly destined for sainthood, and minimizing the real decisions that actually structure any person's life. Direct personal accounts of historical developments, such as the Memoirs of Philippe de Comines, register the new outlook. They contrast with the older-style world chronicles that had lumped side-by-side contemporary and Biblical events in settings and costumes suggesting that they had all occurred simultaneously.

The humanist break with the immediate past in favor of antiquity was not always clear-cut. St. Thomas More's Richard III (1557), touching and full of human interest though it is, predestines its protagonist to villainy and mounts him on the cyclic wheel of Fortune, guaranteeing the fall of the mighty from high places in the style of medieval works de casibus virorum illustrium. More's Utopia (1516) is more typical of the Renaissance in its message, somewhat enigmatically delivered, that men can plan society to be different from the way it has been and different from the way it is.

Spread of Humanism. Outside Italy, humanism at first developed more rapidly in the territories of the Empire. They were relatively free of the nationalism growing in France, England, and Spain, where scholarly talent was often siphoned off into governmental work.

Germany. The community-minded German principalities often patronized humanists for their local schools. Moreover, the Empire, whose universities were newer than those of France, England, or Spain, was prone to accept Italian cultural leadership (and then, of course, to resent it) possibly more than the other countries. Shortly after the mid-15th century, humanist centers were to be found at Vienna, Heidelberg, Wesel, and Emmerich. Rudolphus Agricola, a kind of minor Erasmus, played a major role in importing Italian humanism to German lands, and Conrad Celtis, who was crowned poet laureate by Frederick II in the late 1480s, in domesticating and disseminating it. Agricola's early education had been under the BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE, who conducted a complex of humanist-oriented schools in the Low Countries. The brothers of this order can be credited also with some of the early training of the most universally influential and in many ways the greatest of all Renaissance humanists, Erasmus of Rotterdam.

France. French humanism, initiated when Jean de Montreuil (1354–1418) espoused the cause of Petrarch, was slow in really getting under way until the military expedition of Charles VIII in quest of the Kingdom of Naples in 1495 aroused enthusiasm for the Renaissance as a byproduct among French courtiers. The group of professeurs royaux, or regius professors, later known as the Collège de France, was founded in 1530 by Francis I, inspired by the Italian academies. Perhaps the most famous of these regius professors was their first “dean,” the programmatically anti-Aristotelian Peter RAMUS (PIERRE DE LA RAMÉE). He was a polymath who had read exhaustively in the classics but notoriously lacked poetic sense; his passion for a supersimplified logical “method” nullified the original Petrarchan humanist program for gracious and technically uncomplicated academic living. Ramus's “method” was taken over throughout Europe, largely in Calvinist circles, where it fostered a perfunctory encyclopedism developed extensively among 3rd- and 4th-generation German humanists through the late 16th and 17th centuries. Humanism in countries adjacent to the Empire, such as the Scandinavian and Slavic countries, grew largely under German influence.

England. In England, Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, was educated by Italian teachers and collected Renaissance manuscripts. Early English visitors to Renaissance Italy, such as Gloucester's younger contemporary John Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, William Grey (d. 1478), and John Free (or Phreas), however, were to become servants of State or Church, with little time for spreading classical learning. The first noteworthy flowering of humanism in England occurred in the circle of the physician Thomas LINACRE, the Oxford dons William Grocyn and Hugh LATIMER, and William Lily, the first headmaster of St. Paul's School, founded under humanist inspiration by another of this group, John COLET, Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral. All these men were associated with the young Thomas More, later lord chancellor and finally martyr, and, with Erasmus, a frequent house guest of More's. Less closely involved with this group, but still a patron of the new learning and in particular of Erasmus, was More's fellow martyr under Henry VIII, John FISHER, Bishop of Rochester, canonized with More in 1935 (see MORE, SCHOOL OF).

Colet and More were the most interested in new ideas and in literary style, and it is significant that Erasmus' most subtle piece of writing was his Encomium Moriae (1511), a pun on More's name meaning simultaneously “The Praise of Folly” and “The Praise of Moreishness.” The work caught the spirit of More's own bantering seriousness and advertised the fact that, although More was a competent scholar, his humanism transcended imitation of the classics to concern itself with social improvement, notably in his Utopia.

With few exceptions, English humanism did not succeed in producing classical scholars of the competence of those on the Continent. The chief literary monuments to humanism in the British Isles are in the vernacular literature, which shows the marks of the movement in style, literary genres, subject matter, literary theory, and criticism. Many Englishmen, such as Arthur Golding (1536?–1605?), Sir Thomas North (1535?–1601?), Philemon Holland (1552–1637), and George Chapman (1559?–1634?), produced English translations of classical Latin and Greek writings. The work of the mid-17th-century philosophers known as the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS—Ralph Cudworth, Henry More, John Smith, and Nathanael Culverwel—may be regarded as a late flowering of British humanism.

Humanism and Religion: Scholasticism, Reformation and Counter Reformation, Secularism. The relationship between humanism, the Protestant REFORMATION, and reform within the Catholic Church itself has always been a live question. The age of humanism coincided closely with the age of the Reformation. Humanism and Protestantism both sought a return to conditions reputed to have existed in the remote past and to have been “corrupted” in the intervening ages, and certain humanist preoccupations, such as textual criticism, were related closely to certain Protestant principles, such as the necessity of reading the Bible. Moreover, humanism tended to mingle a concern for the reform of society generally, including ecclesiastical institutions, with its concern for bettering the education of the members of society.

Early humanism in Italy, Spain, France, and England generally managed to effect changes within the existing intellectual and educational framework without physical or intellectual violence. The humanist temperament was in accord with St. Thomas Aquinas's teachings on the positive relationships obtaining between nature and grace (see GRACE AND NATURE). These relationships were worked out on various grounds by various humanists. Typical of Florence was the Neoplatonism of Ficino and Pico, mentioned above. In Spain, Cardinal Ximénez made specific provision for accord between the older scholasticism and the new learning as part of his reform program within the Church, which he brought under rather effective, and austere, secular control. France had as a typical figure Jacques LEFÈVRE D'ÉTAPLES, who mingled medieval Christian mysticism, textual work on the Scriptures, and a strong preference for Biblical over scholastic formulas with a professional interest in developing the technicalities of logic inherited from the Middle Ages. He appeared to the theology faculty at Paris to be aligned with Luther, and they therefore condemned him. But he repudiated the reformers and died in communion with Rome.

Humanists expressed divergent views regarding religious orders. The humanist authentication of the natural world led some, such as Valla, to condemn the taking of the vows of religion, which appeared to pass adverse judgment on the naturally good life, but other humanists, such as Coluccio Salutati, were more favorably disposed; indeed, some, such as the Carmelite Latin poet Bl. Giovanni Battista Spagnuoli (1447–1516), known as Mantuanus from his birthplace, were themselves members of religious orders. In his Enchiridion Militis Christiani (1504), Erasmus expressed the view that the value of monastic life depended on the suitability of the individual for it. The Society of Jesus, approved by Pope Paul III in 1540, can be seen as influenced in its Constitutions by the humanist spirit: its members bound themselves by the three vows of religion—poverty, chastity, and obedience—but they also retained contact with the secular world to a degree unusual among earlier religious orders.

Scholasticism. In England, the circle of St. Thomas More reveals some of the underlying issues between humanism and scholasticism. Although medieval scholasticism had been far from being purely, or even chiefly, a religious phenomenon, since it governed logic, natural philosophy (physics, meteorology, etc.), medicine, law, and other miscellaneous disciplines quite as much as or even more than it governed theology, the humanist attack on scholasticism did have a special religious relevance. The attack was commonly made not on scientific grounds—humanists had no logic or physics seriously competing with these scholastic disciplines—but in terms of value judgments: scholasticism was thorny, knotty, tortured, and generally repulsive to man as man.

The qualities that More objected to in scholastic logic were actually its technical virtues, the suppositional and other theories that carried medieval logic far beyond Aristotle toward modern quantified formal logic (see LOGIC, HISTORY OF). But technical virtues are not always humanly appealing. Insofar as scholasticism was used to purvey or explain religious truths, this kind of attack was particularly telling, for what is religion if it is not adapted to man and his real life-world? By contrast with technical scholastic treatments, John Colet's historical and humane approach to St. Paul in his sermons had tremendous religious immediacy. Still, the most virulent humanist attacks were directed not against scholastic theologians but against scholastic logicians such as PETER OF SPAIN. The great theologians, such as St. THOMAS AQUINAS and St. BONAVENTURE, were often not skilled in the technicalities of scholastic logic propounded by their contemporaries, and, as a matter of fact, Erasmus, with some warrant grouped Aquinas with the Fathers of the Church rather than with scholastic logicians.

Reformation and Counter Reformation. If the humanists' attacks on scholasticism had religious implications, the humanists themselves were assaulted by two kinds of religious zealots: first, by anti-Greek "Trojans" who were addicted to scholastic manipulation of abstract theological questions in a historical and philological vacuum, and, second, by pietists who maintained that humanist interest in the natural world was irreligious and that many humanist writers, particularly Italians, purveyed pagan immorality by teaching the classics. St. Thomas More indicted and convicted the "Trojans" of gross ignorance and of seeking to protect themselves by means of what today are called defense mechanisms. The pietists he found guilty of betraying the Catholic tradition that grace works with nature. He further pleaded that both types of accusers deny the patristic heritage and narrow the scope of Catholic teaching to their own forms of thought—indeed, that the scholastics make revelation itself worldly with their logic. Each side thus accused the other of secularism, and both with some warrant (see PIETISM).

In the Empire the struggle between advocates of the old order and the new took on particularly violent religious overtones, in part because the absence of a central secular authority left the Church the most obvious target for deep-seated resentments about the state of society at large. German humanism has been divided into three successive schools in terms of religious attitudes. The first group consisted of earlier, more scholastic humanists, such as Rudolphus Agricola and Alexander Hegius, who were loyal supporters of the Church.

A second, later group of humanists protested strongly against scholasticism and abuses in the Church, wishing to put humanism to the service of Church reform. Reuchlin belonged to this group, but Erasmus was its outstanding representative, proposing a docta pietas or educated piety as a pedagogical ideal. Like St. Ignatius Loyola and Luther, Erasmus advocated an interiorization of religious motivation, but his concern with corresponding religious institutions was minimal. To many Catholics Erasmus seemed to favor Luther; yet he was certainly a loyal Catholic, whose loyalty, however, did not lead him to countenance obscurantism, of which Catholic apologists were not always innocent. Even after Luther's break with Catholicism, Erasmus continued to speak his mind as pre-1517 critics of the Church had regularly done, never fully recognizing the fact that the Church was under siege and that what was once commendable frankness could now be taken as disloyalty. In this sense Erasmus was living in the past. In another sense he was far ahead of his age and his spirit more like that of later 20th-century Catholicism: he felt that the truth would not destroy anything in the Church worth saving and that Catholics generally should be able to live as he himself did, with some unresolved tensions concerning the relationship of ancient classical culture and Christianity. Erasmus has sometimes been taken to be a "rationalist"; if this means that he believed in the powers of natural intelligence, he was. But in his truly profound Encomium Moriae (1509), written at More's instigation, he satirized those who would place reason above faith and, indeed, ultimately vindicated, above everything, the Christian folly of the cross. Erasmus ultimately repudiated Luther and Luther's break with Rome as spelling the ruin both of the Church and of humanistic studies. The future of reform and of true scholarship lay for him within the old unity.

Secularism. The third and later group of German humanists felt otherwise than Erasmus. These were avowedly Protestant humanists, typified by Ulrich von HUTTEN, one of the principal authors of the above-mentioned Epistolae obscurorum virorum. Hutten's protestations in favor of liberty were at best somewhat disorganized and at worst licentious, hardly representative of the best in Protestantism. Even among more devout reformers, however, the relationship of humanism to the Protestant spirit was uneasy. Luther's stress on the depravity of human nature appeared to rule out genuine humanism, and Protestant mobs sacked the studies of humanist scholars such as Conrath Muth (Mutianus Rufus, c. 1471–1526). But Luther's close associate Philipp MELANCHTHON was a great humanist scholar and educator and had hundreds of distinguished Protestant successors. Among Calvinists, humanism, often under Ramist influence, tended to run to encyclopedism. Encyclopedic humanism was strong in Lyons and Geneva, and up the Rhine valley from Leiden through Frankfurt on the Main to Basel.

Results and Interpretations of Humanism. As a pedagogical program, humanism advanced classical scholarship and vastly improved critical and historical methods. In its sensitive concern with literature and history, it directed serious effort to the mature interpretation of concrete everyday human experience, which possessed great cultural, intellectual, and scientific potential, and about which scholasticism had been inarticulate. In the process, humanism opened the way to modern philology and to the vast fields of study which philology in turn has opened into, as mentioned above. The influence of humanism on painting, sculpture, architecture, and other arts is seen in the proliferation of classical themes and forms in these fields, where such themes and forms have not played out even today.

Insofar as it competed with scholasticism as a pedagogical program, humanism can hardly be said to have won any clear-cut victory. While humanist scholarship grew and while scholastic logic after about 1530 lost its medieval vigor and seriousness, which it never completely recovered, scholasticism continued through much or most of the 18th century to dominate school curricula in the West. Far from becoming the all-encompassing mature pursuit that Erasmus and other humanists wanted it to be, the humanist study of rhetoric, with which poetic was in effect more or less identified, remained virtually always a course to perfect the student in his early teens in the practical use of Latin so that he could go on to logic, philosophy, and, if he wished, medicine, law, or theology. Scholastic philosophy (including physics) commonly remained at the top of arts curricula. In Jesuit schools, for example, the student typically ceased studying literature as such around age 13: the "humanities" were basically an elementary school subject by today's standards (see RATIO STUDIORUM). Individual scholars might, of course, devote their whole lives to philology and its manifold derivatives. But the establishment of literature as such in the upper reaches of the curriculum hardly began before the mid-19th century and became widespread only in the 20th. In the extent, depth, and maturity of academic literary and cultural studies, humanism, for all its weaknesses, is in a far stronger condition today than ever, most notably in the U.S.

One of the results of humanism has been the widespread study of humanism itself as a historical phenomenon. Until recently, the accepted view, derivative from the work of Georg Voigt and Jakob Burckhardt in the 19th century, had seen humanism as a definitive break with the Middle Ages, antischolastic, antiauthoritarian, and even anti-Christian. This concept was modified when more detailed studies of medieval culture by Heinrich Thode, Charles Homer Haskins, Paul Renucci, and others revealed many elements of Renaissance humanism in the Middle Ages and much medievalism in the Renaissance. The concept of humanism as essentially and unequivocally pagan was quite completely discarded by the mid-20th century, but Giuseppe Toffanin's reduction of humanism to a body of appealing truths perennially accessible to natural reason and in incontestable accord with Christianity has not found wide acceptance. The relationship of humanism to religion and to the maturing knowledge of the natural world has come to be recognized as exceedingly complex, with humanists and anti-humanists on both Catholic and Protestant, religious and irreligious sides. Earlier views of humanism as favorable to modern science, based on the uninformed assumption of a simple opposition between medieval scholasticism and the modern mind, have been seriously modified as it has become apparent that the scholastic mind was often more scientific in tone, if not always in content or procedure, than the minds of typical humanists.

The relationship of humanism, an academic movement, to other cultural developments is still actively debated. In recent decades the work of Charles Trinkaus revived the notion that a Burckhardtian individualism was to be found in the texts of Renaissance humanists, but this humanism, he argued, was more religious and spiritual than Burckhardt had originally characterized it. By contrast Hans Baron labored to show how actively humanism was allied with civic life, stressing the movement's political impact in Florence and in subsequent centuries. Still others have viewed humanism as a basically conservative textual movement, often more antiquarian in its outlook than revolutionary in its impact. Clearly the last word about humanism has not been written. Most scholars continue to recognize a link between the movement and modern forms of education and consciousness, although they often disagree about the precise influence the movement has had on those phenomena.

Bibliography: H. BARON, The Crisis of the Early Italian Renaissance, 2 v. (Princeton 1955). R. R. BOLGAR, The Classical Heritage and Its Beneficiaries (Cambridge, England 1954). W. J. BOUSMA, The Interpretation of Renaissance Humanism (Washington 1959), pamphlet. J. C. BURCKHARDT, Die Cultur der Renais- sance in Italien: Ein Versuch, 2 v. (Basel 1860), Eng. tr. available in many eds., e.g., The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy, ed. H. HOLBORN, tr. S. G. MIDDLEMORE (New York 1954). D. BUSH, The Renaissance and English Humanism (Toronto 1939). E. GARIN, L'educazione in Europa, 1400-1600 (Bari 1957). M. P. GILMORE, The World of Humanism, 1453-1517 (New York 1952). E. H. HARBISON, The Christian Scholar in the Age of the Reformation (New York 1956). C. H. HASKINS, The Renaissance of the Twelfth Century (Cambridge, MA 1927). P. O. KRISTELLER, "Studies on Renaissance Humanism during the Last Twenty Years," Studies in the Renaissance 9 (1962) 7-30. L. MARTINES, The Social World of the Florentine Humanists, 1390-1460 (Princeton 1963). W. J. ONG, Ramus: Method, and the Decay of Dialogue (Cambridge, MA 1958). A. RENAUDET, Humanisme et Renaissance (Geneva 1958). P. RENUCCI, L'aventure de l'humanisme européen au Moyen Age, IV<sup>e</sup>-XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1953). J. E. SANDYS, History of Classical Scholarship, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng.), v. 1 (3rd ed. 1921), v. 2, 3 (2d ed. 1906-08); repr. (New York 1958). H. THODE, Franz von Assisi und die Anfänge der Kunst der Renaissance in Italien (2d ed. Berlin 1904). G. TOFFANIN, History of Humanism, tr. E. GIANTURCO (New York 1954). B. L. ULLMAN, Studies in the Italian Renaissance (Rome 1955). G. VOIGT, Die Wiederbelebung des classischen Alterthums, ed. M. LEHNERDT, 2 v. (3d ed. Berlin 1893). A. GRAFTON, Defenders of the Text (Cambridge, MA 1991). D. KELLEY, Renaissance Humanism (Boston 1991). B. KOHL, Renaissance Humanism, 1300-1550: a Bibliography (New York 1985). C. TRINKAUS, In Our Image and Likeness, 2 vols. (Chicago 1970).

[W. J. ONG]

HUMANISM, CHRISTIAN

"Christian humanism" means the view (and action based upon this view) that human culture and its tradition have value in the Christian life to the extent in which they are subordinated, in some way, to Christ's teaching, to what is preeminent in the tradition of the faith and consequently in the tradition of the Church. St. Justin seems to have been the first to offer a basic formulation of Christian humanism, for he held that Christ the Word had subordinated all culture to Himself (Apol. 1.46). Justin's position has been reflected in the Christian use of the doctrines of Plato and Aristotle, as well as in the Christian appraisal of such artifacts as the plays of Sophocles and ancient architectural masterpieces. According to Justin's formulation, Christian humanism avoids the errors of philistinism, which would leave the Christian in a vulgar condition during his earthly life, as well as the mistake of those who attach more importance to human culture than to the truths of the faith.

The need for a contemporary formulation of Christian humanism arose especially in the 1930s, when the Socialist Popular Front movement began to use the ideal of "Socialist humanism." Christian thinkers like Jacques Maritain, F. Charnot, A. Rademacher and others thought out the conditions for Christian humanism. (See Maritain, Humanisme intégral.)

The Judeo-Christian revelation contains a virtual humanism with its notion of man as the image of God. St. Thomas Aquinas lays the basis for Christian humanism with his teaching that philosophy is distinct from theology, and that human reason has its own value and consistency apart from grace and must build the under-structure for the life of grace. The great medieval adage, "Grace does not destroy nature but perfects it," can be deemed a basic tenet of Christian humanism. The perfection of grace requires at least some perfection and balance in the human subject, and, in turn, it acts through that subject, drawing out latent powers and developing them.

According to Maritain, Christian humanism integrates all that is best in the humanist effort of the centuries. He admits that classical Renaissance humanism discovered the values of human liberty, but accuses it of being anthropocentric; man is turned in upon himself, cut off from God. The great intuition of Marxist humanism is to recognize that proletarian man has been estranged from his true nature by being dispossessed of property and subordinated to material, economic forces. Christian humanism is ultimately theocentric; man fully realizes himself only in right relation to God and must develop himself according to the exigencies of the actual supernatural order as the "new creature" of revelation (2 Cor 5.17; Gal 6.15).

Several recent writers, like Louis Bouyer, have observed that the cross must not be absent from Christian humanism. The Christian's true pathway of development is a dialectic from life through the death of the cross to higher life.

Bibliography: L. BOUYER, Christian Humanism, tr. A. V. LITLEDAL (Westminster, Md. 1959). H. E. BRUNNER, Christianity and Civilization, 2 v. (New York 1948–49). F. HERMANS, Histoire doctrinale de l'humanisme chrétien, 4 v. (Tournai 1948). W. JAEGER, Humanisme et théologie, tr. H. D. SAFFREY (Paris 1956). L. LENHART, Das Problem des Humanismus in der neuzeitlichen katholischen Theologie (Mainz 1947). J. MARITAIN, Du régime temporel et la liberté (Paris 1933); Freedom in the Modern World, tr. R. O'SULLIVAN (London 1935); Humanisme intégral (Paris 1936); True Humanism, tr. M. R. ADAMSON (6th ed. New York 1954). F. MARTY, La Perfection de l'homme selon s. Thomas d'Aquin (Analecta Gregoriana 123; Rome 1962). C. MOELLER, Humanisme et sainteté (Tournai 1946). A. RADEMACHER, Religion und Leben (2d ed. Freiburg 1929); Religion and Life (Westminster, Md. 1962). J. SELLMAIR, Humanitas Christiana: Geschichte des christlichen Humanismus (Munich 1950). P. TILLICH, Theology of Culture, ed. R. C. KIMBALL (New York 1959).

[D. J. FORBES]

HUMANISM, DEVOUT

This expression, though used earlier, was given currency by H. Brémond, who employed it as the title of the first volume of his Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France (11 v. Paris 1915–33). The movement was a conscious effort to wed humanism's favorable attitude toward the "goodness" of human nature to Christian teaching on original sin and predestination. The problem was to avoid both the rigorous views of human fallibility inherent in AUGUSTINIANISM (and much more in CALVINISM) and the canonization of human perfectibility espoused by PELAGIANISM and proclaimed by some of the more secular-minded humanists.

The movement's great theological proponent was L. LESSIUS, professor at the University of Louvain, who opposed the doctrines of M. BAIUS; Baius's teaching was condemned by Pope St. Pius V in 1567 [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 1901–80] and by Gregory XIII in 1579. Lessius's theological bases were welcomed and put into practical use especially by St. FRANCIS DE SALES in his Introduction to the Devout Life and The Love of God. Through him, perhaps more than through anyone else, humanism responded to the needs of the interior life and opened to all the principles and spirit of Christian humanism (Brémond, op. cit. 1:17). St. Jane Frances de CHANTAL, the disciple of St. Francis de Sales, was instrumental in the diffusion of devout humanism through her Visitation foundation. Others who popularized the movement were É. BINET and Jean Pierre Camus (1584–1652), Bishop of Belley.

The spirit of devout humanism is now part of the authentic humanism represented by such thinkers as J. Maritain, G. Marcel, Christopher Dawson, M. D'Arcy, John Courtney Murray, and many others, both Catholic and non-Catholic.

See Also: HUMANISM; HUMANISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography: P. POURRAT, Christian Spirituality, tr. D. ATTWATER, v.4 (Westminster, Md. 1955) 1–30. G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme, 5:1077–78.

[H. C. GARDINER]

HUMANISM, SECULAR

A humanism so-called to distinguish it from Christian or other theological humanisms. It may be defined as any philosophical, political, or cultural affirmation of man as the principal object of concern, to the exclusion of all religious or theological theses about his origin and destiny. Secular humanism, however, sometimes identifies itself as religious, as in the two significant humanist manifestoes. In 1933 a group of Unitarian ministers and educators published "The Humanist Manifesto," which affirmed the relevance of religion as a "shared quest for the good life” and established social reform as one of the principal aims of religion. In 1953 the Humanist published “A Humanist Manifesto,” in which the authors refer to themselves as “religious humanists.” Their doctrine may be summarized as follows: (1) the universe is self-existing and not created; (2) man is part of nature and has evolved as part of a continuous process; (3) modern science provides the only acceptable description of the universe; (4) modern science excludes any supernatural explanation of the universe or of human values; and (5) the end of man’s life is the complete realization of the human personality in this world. Although it is unequivocally secularist, this humanism is called religious because it offers a doctrine that claims the ultimacy of a religious truth. While secular humanism is generally associated with a definite ATHEISM, AGNOSTICISM, or SCIENTISM, attempts have been made to show that a secular humanism is completely compatible with belief in the supernatural. Pragmatism and NATURALISM, for example, strive for peaceful coexistence with religious doctrine.

Historical Origins. Secular humanism in its recent manifestations shares certain common characteristics with the teachings of Protagoras and other SOPHISTS. Protagoras’s well-known dictum to the effect that “man is the measure of all things, of those that are that they are, and of those that are not that they are not” may have been intended to apply as well to individual men as to the community. It implies not a necessary hostility to the gods but rather a pragmatic neutrality. “With regard to the gods, I cannot feel sure either that they are or that they are not, nor what they are like in figure; for there are many things that hinder sure knowledge, the obscurity of the subject and the shortness of human life.” The Sophists, in true humanitarian spirit, espoused the cause of the defenseless and the less fortunate; in time, however, their efforts were strongly disparaged.

Renaissance humanism was generally Christian in its attitude, although it revived classical learning and the study of pagan sources that were in opposition to scholastic forms of thought. Paralleling its development, the physical sciences began to assume a new autonomy. NOMINALISM had already drawn into question the continuity and agreement between the eternal verities of philosophy and theology. The result was a reduction of natural philosophy to mathematical-scientific description and a reduction of theology to blind faith. The ENLIGHTENMENT of the 17th to the 19th centuries finally asserted the autonomy of reason as absolute ruler of man’s life and supreme arbiter of truth (see RATIONALISM).

Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU gave impetus to the new humanism by seeking to explain the origin and destiny of man without reliance on theological sources. He argued that for man to be himself he must defy the institutions of Christian Europe, return as closely to natural simplicity as possible, and then reconstruct a new, democratic society that embodied the general will of all men. No longer, in his view, does man have to appeal to God for his sacredness; he is sacred in himself. Among other things, religion and philosophical reasoning have robbed man of his pristine innocence.

Julian Huxley.

Auguste Comte argued in reverse, in the name of science, that the theological and metaphysical stages of human development were a result of primitive superstition and ignorance. The time had arrived, he claimed, when the “positive” stage—in which factual knowledge is gathered and interpreted scientifically—would show what men are and how they should live. The science of sociology was thus born and was destined to rival ethics and theology in their efforts to relate man to reality.

Feuerbach, Marx, and Engels. The new humanism had a theological beginning also in the works of Ludwig FEUERBACH, who was preoccupied with questions about the nature of theology, the relationship between man and God, and the mysteries of Christian faith and yet concluded by reducing theology to anthropology. Karl Barth suggests that this reduction was the logical outcome of the Protestant (and especially Lutheran) shift of interest from what God is in Himself to what He means for men [Introd. to L. Feuerbach, The Essence of Christianity (New York 1957) xix]. Feuerbach declares the purpose of his undertaking to be “to show that the antithesis of divine and human is altogether illusory, that it is nothing else than the antithesis between the human nature in general and the human individual; that, consequently, the object and contents of the Christian religion are altogether human” (ibid. 14). His humanism strongly emphasizes the intrapersonal “I” and “Thou” and the social aspect of salvation. “My fellow-man is per se the mediator between men and the sacred idea of the species. Homo homini Deus est” (ibid. 159). It is in Feuerbach particularly that one sees humanism raised to the level of a religion. “The beginning, middle and end of religion is man” (ibid. 184).

The dialectical MATERIALISM of K. MARX and F. ENGELS is an attempt to establish the theoretical foundations and practical implications of Feuerbach’s humanism. All reality is explainable as matter. Even mind is only an outgrowth of matter. Moving in space and time, matter transforms itself by creating oppositions and by resolving them. Man, both ontologically and chronologically, is totally and exclusively a product of this process. His destiny is bound up in his understanding and control of the dialectics of matter, especially as these are realized in social forces. Communism represents itself as a totally materialistic, socialistic, and scientific humanism in which, in the words of N. LENIN, “every religious idea is an abomination.” All morality derived from religion or from any other social institution must give way to an ethic based on the ever developing self-interest of man. To emphasize its humanistic superiority over Western Christendom, communist societies stress the importance of excellence in every endeavor, scientific, athletic, and cultural.

Empiricist Bias. In the English-speaking world secular humanism has been characterized by a strong empiricist bias expressed in the writings of F. C. S. Schiller (1864–1937), William JAMES, and John Dewey. In England Schiller described his brand of pragmatism as humanism in Humanism, Philosophical Studies (London 1903) and other works similarly titled. He revived the thought of Protagoras that man is the measure of reality and indeed the creator of the meaning of reality (Plato or Protagoras?, London 1908). While Schiller’s humanism centered more on questions of logic and epistemology, James’s thought had wider scope and currency because he dealt with man as a psychological and social whole and paid particular attention to religious faith. His humanism placed a high value on religion as an expression of the human will; for him, however, God shares fate and becoming with man. Dewey advanced the thesis of pragmatism by accommodating it to the scientific and democratic ambitions of American society and, as a philosopher of education, profoundly influenced the development of humanism in the U.S. For him, there is no true religion with a fixed dogma and an ultimate end; there is only the adjective “religious,” which applies to the search for a working truth that becomes instrumental in the endless pursuit of scientific meaning. His naturalism concedes no content to the supernatural, while his INSTRUMENTALISM has both personal and social implications, for it is proposed as the only way that man can achieve any measure of peace and happiness.

Although a radically scientific humanism tends to treat generalizations and spiritual concepts as meaningless because they are beyond the pragmatic test, still there are some authors—J. B. Conant, for one—who grant that such spiritual notions as generosity and kindness are valuable hypotheses capable of proving their worth for society (Modern Science and Modern Man, New York 1952). More representative of humanist thought based strictly upon scientific method, however, is the evolutionary humanism of Sir Julian Huxley (1887–1975). Huxley views man as a self-contained, self-sufficient entity and suggests that to know how man has evolved in the past and to contemplate with awe what he might yet make of his destiny is to be reverent and even religious. One of the major results of religious psychology, in his view, is “the realisation that God is one among several hypotheses to account for the phenomena of human destiny, and that it is now proving to be an inadequate hypothesis” (Religion without Revelation, New York 1927; pref. to rev. ed. 1957).

Aesthetic Humanism. There also exists what might be called an aesthetic humanism, which is embodied in the thought of Arthur SCHOPENHAUER and Rainer Maria Rilke. As the pragmatist proposes that human activity creates the scientific meaning of the world, Schopenhauer urges that music creates the meaning of the world as will and power. In his view, music transcends time and place and the natures of particular things and reveals the onward thrust of being itself. He does not hesitate to proclaim that in music “I recognize the highest objectification of the will once more, the rational life and aspiration of man” (The World as Will and Idea, London 1907). Rilke, a poet, speaks in obscurities but is nonetheless influential, especially in existentialist circles. For him, God is in the process of creating Himself, and the poet is an active and conscious partner in that struggle; God is in fact “a direction of the heart” who depends as much upon man for His fulfillment as man does upon himself. “Indeed man must transform and transfigure himself; and in transfiguring himself he will be the redeemer and transfigurer of all existence” (Sonnets to Or- pheus, tr. J. B. Leishman, London 1936). Although art need not be didactic, mid-20th-century art has become consciously preoccupied with matters of “ultimate concern,” as Paul Tillich expresses it. This follows logically from a secular humanism in which there is no place for theology and in which philosophy bemoans its own lack of content. When a foundation for ultimate meaning cannot be found apart from human SUBJECTIVITY, art must create an imaginative meaning for man. This was the poetic and humanistic ambition of Rilke; it remains the concern of contemporary artists generally.

Existentialism. In its philosophical and literary attitude, existentialism lays strong claim to being the secular humanism of the 20th century. Despite origins in the religious thought of S. A. KIERKEGAARD and the support of religious protagonists such as Gabriel Marcel, the existentialist thought of F. W. NIETZSCHE, Albert Camus, and Jean Paul Sartre has marked atheistic presuppositions. The humanism of other existentialists such as Martin Heidegger, Franz Kafka, Karl Jaspers, and Paul Tillich, although ambiguous in its evaluation of religion, is also partially reflected in the thought of Nietzsche, Camus, and Sartre. It was Nietzsche who celebrated the “death of God” and the apotheosis of man. The Superman is the one who rises above the distinction between good and evil, a distinction that is necessary only in the slave morality of those who cannot stand freedom. Nietzsche predicts no utopia, for there must always be slavery and war if there is to be heroism and superiority. Camus, a novelist, shares this characteristically sober view. In the Myth of Sisyphus (Paris 1943) he explains that man reaches heroic stature when he is conscious enough to accept the tragedy of fate. “There is no fate that cannot be surmounted by scorn.” This tragic heroism “drives out of this world a god who had come into it with dissatisfaction and a preference for futile suffering. It makes of fate a human matter, which must be settled among men.” Sartre, finally, gives full expression to the humanistic pretensions of existentialism in the essay Existentialism and Humanism (tr. P. Mairet, London 1948). Though Sartre has modified his view since its publication, this essay has become influential on all levels. In it he laments the impossibility of God, for without God all order and consequence disappear, leaving man with the freedom to create his own nature and thus with the total responsibility for his destiny. Man desires to be God, but cannot be God without self-contradiction. Hence his dictum, “man is a useless passion” [Existentialism and Human Emotions (New York 1957) 90].

In spite of Sartre’s onetime espousal and subsequent disavowal of Marxism, there are definite points of agreement in the two systems as humanisms. Each accepts the definition of man as conditioned by the contingencies of history. Each makes man totally responsible for his own future and denies him any escape from responsibility through established moral systems. And each insists that activity takes precedence over speculative thought. Both the Marxist revolutionary and the existentialist must act in the face of opposition, in a dialectical situation. The result is not derived; it is created anew.

Other Directions. Under the influence of existentialism and PHENOMENOLOGY, the science of psychology has modified its earlier positivistic approach to man and is reconsidering such questions as freedom, responsibility, finality, conscience, and faith. Gordon Allport, Carl Rogers, and Abraham Maslow have criticized the methods of radical empiricism because they exclude from study any aspect of man that cannot be reduced to mechanistic principles. Similarly, the Freudian reduction of religious faith and conscience to blind drives for gratification has been seriously criticized, although it had constituted a basic theme in secular humanism until the middle of the 20th century.

In legal philosophy and politics, secular humanism continues to influence American society. Since the turn of the century such organizations as the American Secular Union have striven to effect a total separation of Church and State, especially in the area of education. The underlying philosophical supposition of this movement is that religious values are merely personal and should not be allowed to influence the laws and institutions of a democratic society. Much legal philosophy and jurisprudence is likewise under the influence of the pragmatic legal theory of Supreme Court justices such as O. W. HOLMES, who, rejecting all absolute moral standards, maintained that the “ought” of natural law can be expressed in the metaphor “a dog will fight for his bone.”

Critique. Every form of humanism must be judged as a historical reaction to some dehumanization of philosophy, theology, or social life. When humanism is atheistic, it can survive only on the destruction of false images of God, themselves often the result of a prior disintegration in theology. When it is agnostic, it derives its vitality from some misrepresentation of the evidence for the existence and nature of God. Thus the Stoics reaffirmed man against the idealism of the Academy and the anthropomorphized gods of the state. Rousseau reacted against rationalism and a not-too-healthy Christianity. Feuerbach condemned the ego of I. Kant, the absolute identity of F. W. J. Schelling, and the absolute mind of G. W. F. Hegel. Communism stands in direct contradiction to the false alliance of Christian ethics and capitalist exploitation. Pragmatists and naturalists react against a disembodied supernaturalism, and existentialism rejects all pretense of finding meaning in idealist philosophies of history. In contrast to a totally atheistic secular humanism, there stands the humanism of reformed theology, as expressed by Karl Barth, who, even in his later writings, still claims “there is no humanism without the Gospel” [The Faith of the Church (New York 1958) 32]. The assumption here is that humanity has no meaning other than the meaning it receives from the divine history of redemption and that even with redemption humanity remains without inherent value.

Between a godless humanism and a hyper-Christian humanism, there stands the Christian humanism of the Aristotelian-Thomist tradition, which maintains that humanity, even damaged with sin, retains an essential meaning and value. Man is the image of God, not exclusively in grace, but “inasmuch as he too is the principle of his actions, as having free-will and control of his actions” (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, prol.). It is important to note that, whereas neither secular humanism nor hyper-Christian humanism can tolerate or assimilate each other, the Christian humanism of Aquinas can reconcile both. It can admit the measure of autonomy proper to man, as well as tolerate the ambiguities involved in the human struggle for knowledge and self-control. In its view, God is not the primum cognitum from which man discovers his own value. Rather God is discovered only as the term of a process that begins with man’s self-understanding as part of a truly meaningful world. Yet THOMISM can admit, with equal simplicity, the transcendence of the supernatural order. Grace and redemption perfect nature and give it a meaning it could never achieve of its own power. Merely by being true to his nature man does not merit supernatural glorification; but by being untrue to his nature, he can jeopardize his supernatural destiny.

See Also: HUMANISM; HUMANISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography: J. MARITAIN, True Humanism, tr. M. R. ADAMSON (6th ed. New York 1954). É. H. GILSON, Elements of Christian Philosophy (New York 1960). W. A. KAUFMANN, ed., Existentialism from Dostoevsky to Sartre (New York 1956). C. CARBONARA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 4:1373–79. H. DE LUBAC, The Drama of Atheist Humanism, tr. E. M. RILEY (New York 1949). C. N. R. MCCOY, The Structure of Political Thought (New York 1963).

[W. P. HAAS]

HUMBELINE, BL.

Sister of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX; b. c. 1091; d. before 1136. Humbeline was married to a wealthy nobleman and lived a worldly life until a visit to her brothers at CLAIRVAUX. Her magnificent dress and splendid retinue caused Bernard to refuse to see her. She burst into tears, moaning, “I may indeed be a sinful woman, but it was for such as me that Christ died on the Cross and because I am so sinful that I seek and need the help of godly men.” Bernard then urged her to shun the dictates of the world and follow the holy example of her mother, Bl. Alice. She thereafter lived a life of prayer and fasting and two years later, with her husband’s consent, entered the Benedictine priory of Jully where she was prioress when she died in the presence of her surviving brothers.

Feast: Aug. 21 (formerly Feb. 12).

Bibliography: A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:203–205. WILLIAM OF SAINT-THIERRY, Vita prima sancti Bernardi, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 185:244–245; Eng. St. Bernard of Clairvaux, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (Westminster, Md. 1960) 51–52. M. RAYMOND, The Family That Overtook Christ (Boston 1986) 258–292.

[J. R. SOMMERFELDT]

HUMBERT OF MAROILLES, ST.

Benedictine abbot; b. Mezières-sur-Oise, beginning of the seventh century; d. Maroilles, March 25, c. 680. According to tradition, he became a monk and priest at Laon, from which he retired upon the death of his parents to claim an inheritance. Having made two pilgrimages to Rome, he became first abbot of Maroilles and, according to a later working of the legend, bishop. The document by which he ceded (675) his villa at Mezières-sur-Oise to Maroilles has survived [J. M. Pardessus, Diplomata 2:155f; Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores 7:412]. His cult was already widespread in the Frankish kingdom in the eighth century.

Feast: March 25.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 v. (Paris 1668–1701; 2d ed. Venice 1733–40) 2:767–772. Acta sanctorum Belgii selecta, ed. J. H. GHESQUIÈRE et al., 6 v. (Brussels 1783–94) 4: 146. Acta Sanctorum March 3:557–565. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 3:547–548. P. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 5:1088. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:370–372.

[B. F. SCHERER]

HUMBERT OF ROMANS

Fifth master general of the Order of Preachers; b. Roman, Diocese of Vienne, c. 1194; d. Valence, July 14, 1277 (also given as Jan. 15, 1274). Having graduated as master of arts at Paris, Humbert of Romans (de Romanis) became a Dominican in 1224. He was appointed professor of theology in 1226 and elected prior at Lyons in 1236, serving until 1239. In 1240 he was elected provincial of the Roman Dominican province and in 1244, of the French province. The 1254 general chapter at Budapest elected him master general. After nine years as general, he resigned in 1263, retiring to Valence where he devoted the remainder of his life to writing books that were the fruit of his experience as master general. These works still exercise an influence within the order. While he was general the order perfected itself liturgically, academically, and governmentally. The broad lines of administration that he laid down remained guiding principles for many of his successors.

In 1256, Humbert completed the revision of the Dominican liturgy, which had been started in 1244. He also consolidated the order's internal regime of studies and unified its ranks. During the conflict between the mendicant orders and the University of Paris in 1252, Humbert sponsored the creation of the office of procurator general to represent the order at the papal court, and with papal support, vindicated the position of the mendicant orders at the University. Humbert's ascetical works—Epistola de tribus votis substantialibus religionis, Expositio Regulae B. Augustini, Expositio in Constitutiones (a partial commentary), De Officiis Ordinis, De Eruditione praedicatorum, De Dono timoris, De Praedicatione Crucis contra Saracenos—as well as his encyclical letters to the order, did much to solidify and interpret the Dominican spirit and have always been highly regarded within the order.

Bibliography: F. HEINTKE, Humbert von Romans (Berlin 1933). J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23) 1:141–148.

[C. LOZIER]

HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA

Papal legate and adviser, canonist and publicist; b. Lorraine c. 1000; d. Rome, May 5, 1061. The events of his early years are unknown until 1015, when he entered MOYENMOUTIER as a novice. His studies centered on law and theology, and he became concerned with the problem of the temporal–spiritual relationship and with the EASTERN SCHISM. Humbert also learned Greek, which later proved useful in the dispute between Rome and Constantinople, 1053–54. His career from c. 1035 to 1049 cannot be delineated exactly, but two things seem certain: he became associated with Bruno of Toul (later Pope Leo IX), and he began his career as a writer, initially as a hagiographer.

Humbert's main period of influence was from 1050 to 1061, covering the reigns of four popes. Late in 1049

Leo IX brought Humbert to Rome and first created him archbishop of Sicily and later cardinal bishop of Silva Candida. His opposition to ecclesiastical abuses, together with Leo's reforming zeal, made Humbert an ideal instrument of reform. Already in 1050 he had condemned the heresiarch Berengarius of Tours. Humbert's subsequent activities marked him a legate, a theologian of the school of St. Cyprian, and a strong proponent of Roman primacy (see PRIMACY OF THE POPE).

As a legate he went to Benevento in 1051 to recover that city for the papal patrimony; and in 1054, on the mission to Constantinople, Humbert's correspondence leaves no doubt that his was an intransigent attitude. He began by hoping to win the Greek Emperor and Church over to the papacy; he ended by excommunicating the Patriarch MICHAEL CERULARIUS and alienating Greek sympathy. Meanwhile Leo IX had died, and the legates returned to Rome.

The cardinal continued as a papal adviser. He accompanied Victor II to Germany in 1056 and then went to Monte Cassino where he had his old colleague, Frederick of Lorraine, elected as abbot. Frederick presently became Pope Stephen IX (Aug. 5, 1057). This event promised an even greater degree of influence for Humbert. Stephen appointed him chancellor and librarian of the Roman Church, in which capacity he directed the papal chancery and helped to formulate policy. But Stephen died on March 29, 1058, and the papacy fell into schism.

Some historians, like A. Michel, have exaggerated Humbert's part in the subsequent pontificate of Nicholas II. Certainly he participated in formulating the Papal Election Decree (see POPES, ELECTION OF), in the Normanno–Papal alliance (1059), and in measures against simony. But Humbert's was not the only voice. Late in 1060 Humbert visited Moyennoutier and then returned to Rome, where he died and was buried in the Lateran.

The question of Humbert's influence is integrally related to the problem of the authenticity of writings attributed to him. His main work was the Libri tres adversus simoniacos (1054–58); but Michel and others have attributed to him such other works as the vitae of Saints, HIDULF and Deodat of Moyennoutier, Bruno's privileges, the Pseudo-Wido, works on the Greek Schism (1053–54), papal privileges (1051–61), the Vita Leonis IX, the Collection in 74 Titles (see CANONICAL COLLECTIONS BEFORE GRATIAN) and the 1059–60 synodal decrees at Rome. The authorship of these works can never be decisively proved, but certainly Humbert's ideology fits most of them. Moreover, Humbert's known works sufficiently indicate that he identified the problems and solutions commonly regarded as the GREGORIAN RE-FORM, such as the separation of temporal and spiritual jurisdiction, and opposition to lay ownership of church property. At times Humbert's influence was disastrous, as in 1054. His theological extremism, rejecting the validity of heretical (and simoniacal) sacraments, brought him into unsuccessful conflict with PETER DAMIAN. With Damian and Hildebrand (see GREGORY VII) he ranks as one of the great churchmen of the 11th century.

Bibliography: Texts of Pseudo-Wido and Libri tres adversus simoniacos, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite (Berlin 1826—) 1:5–7, 100–253. Patrologia latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 143:929–1218. For a discussion of works, see articles by HALLER, MICHEL, PELSTER, TRITZ, ULLMANN, and KRAUSE, Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. BORINO, 1–7 (Rome 1947–1960). A. MICHEL, Humbert und Kerullarios, 2 v. (Paderborn 1924–30); “Die folgenschweren Ideen des Kardinals Humbert,” Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. BORINO, 1 (1947) 65–92. J. J. RYAN, “Cardinal Humbert De s. Romana ecclesia,” Mediaeval Studies, 20 (1958) 206–238. J. GILCHRIST, “Cardinal Humbert of Silva-Candida (d. 1061),” Annuaire Mediaevale, 3 (1962) 29–42; “Humbert of Silva-Candida and the Political Concept of Ecclesia . . .,” Journal of Religious History 2 (1962) 13–28.

[J. GILCHRIST]

HUME, DAVID

Scottish philosopher, political theorist, and historian; b. Edinburgh, April 26, 1711; d. there, Aug. 25, 1776. Little is known of his education, save that he completed it at Edinburgh University and that he spent much of his time even as a youth reading philosophy and classical literature. When he was 17 he tried to study law, but he eventually abandoned his efforts and entered a merchant's office in Bristol for a few months. However, his “passion for literature” made commerce as distasteful as the law, and in 1734 he went to France and settled at La Flèche to pursue his studies.

Works. In 1737 Hume returned to London with the completed MSS of A Treatise of Human Nature, which remains to this day the most widely read and warmly discussed study in classical British EMPIRICISM. He published the first two volumes anonymously in 1739 and the third volume in 1740; but to his intense disappointment they attracted little attention. The work, he said, “fell dead-born from the press.” On returning to Scotland, Hume published two volumes of Essays Moral and Political (1741–42), which sold so well that he was encouraged to revise the Treatise and present its contents in a style better suited to the ordinary reader. In 1745 he applied unsuccessfully for the chair of ethics and pneumatic philosophy at Edinburgh University. In 1746 he went to France as secretary to Gen. J. St. Clair and in 1748 accompanied him to Vienna and Turin on a diplomatic mission, returning to England in 1749. In 1748 he published a third volume of Essays Moral and Political and Philosophical Essays concerning Human Understanding (the revision of the first book of the Treatise), later known as An Enquiry concerning the Human Understanding from the title he gave the second edition (1751). In 1751 he published An Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals, which was in effect a revision of book three of the Treatise, and also completed his Political Discourses, which added considerably to his fame at home and abroad. About this time he began work on the Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, which he revised many times but withheld from publication during his lifetime.

In 1751 he also became librarian to the Faculty of Advocates and, having access to a large collection of books, began writing the four volumes of his History of England, in which he worked his way back from the Revolution of 1688 to the invasion of Caesar. Hume wrote the greater part as an anti-Whig polemic, and it became the center of disputes between Whigs and Tories for several years. The History occupied him from 1754 to 1761, but he found time to publish Four Dissertations (1757) containing a revision of the second book of the Treatise (on the passions), and a natural history of religion, in which he tried to show that polytheism was the earlier and more natural form of religion than monotheism. In 1763 Hume went to Paris and served as secretary to the embassy. He was received with enthusiasm by the court and consorted with les philosophes of Encyclopedist circles in Paris. In 1766 he returned to London with J. J. ROUSSEAU, but they soon parted as the result of their famous quarrel. Hume stayed in London for two years as undersecretary of state, and in 1769 he returned to Edinburgh. When in 1775 his health began to fail, he wrote the well-known sketch of My Own Life, which his lifelong friend Adam SMITH published in 1777. His nephew published his Dialogues concerning Natural Religion in 1779 in accordance with his will.

Method. On the title page Hume described his Treatise as “an attempt to introduce the experimental method of reasoning into moral subjects.” At the starting point of his philosophy is his complete SKEPTICISM about “the tedious lingring method, which we have hitherto followed,” which made it necessary for him to reject all the uncritical convictions of common sense and the dogmatic assurance of philosophers concerning the existence or reality of unperceived and unperceivable metaphysical entities. As he explains in the introduction to the Treatise, Hume's ambition was to set all the sciences on the sure path to the conquest of truth by introducing two radical reforms.

First, he accepted the basic position of “some late philosophers in England, who have begun to put the science of man on a new footing,” and took it to its logical conclusion by treating the science of man as “the only solid foundation for the other sciences.” All other sciences have a relation of some kind to man, the study of whose nature pertains to the philosopher. Hence Hume proposed “to march up directly to the capital or center of these sciences, to human nature itself” in the anticipation that “from this station we may extend our conquests over all those sciences, which more intimately concern human life, and may afterwards proceed at leisure to discover more fully those, which are the objects of pure curiosity.” Given a new science of man, Hume argued, “’tis impossible to tell what changes and improvements we might make in these sciences were we thoroughly acquainted with the extent and force of human understanding, and could explain the nature of the ideas we employ, and of the operations we perform in our reasonings.” Thus by “moral subjects” Hume understood questions about the nature and limits of human understanding; the workings of the passions, feelings, and sentiments; the origins of belief; and the first principles of conduct.

Second, Hume proposed to apply Newton’s method for the study of the physical world to the study of human nature, to the exclusion of any other method. He assumed without question that “as the science of man is the only solid foundation for the other sciences, so the only solid foundation we can give to this science itself must be laid on experience and observation.” EXPERIENCE is the one and only source of human knowledge, according to Hume, and “a cautious observation of human life” is the only possible method of constructing the science of man “which will not be inferior in certainty, and will be much superior in utility to any other of human comprehension.” Plainly, then, Hume was committed from the start to a conception of experience as purely sensible and to the postulate that the one “true metaphysics” is a phenomenalist study of human life.

Empiricism. Hume called the contents of human experience “perceptions” and found that all man’s perceptions are of two kinds, “impressions” and “ideas.” The difference between them is that impressions are given sensations that arise “from unknown causes,” whereas ideas are man’s thoughts, i.e., fainter copies or images in the imagination or memory of the sensations he has experienced. Hume argued that “every simple idea is derived from a corresponding impression,” which is best understood by saying that “every indefinable term can be explained ostensively, by indicating the sort of experience to which it refers” (MacNabb, 30). Complex ideas are just those that can be analyzed into simple ideas or explained by a definition; ultimately, Hume insisted, all definitions must be reduced to certain simple indefinables, whose meaning one must learn from “simple impressions” or ostensively.

David Hume.

Substance. On the basis of this doctrine that man’s knowledge of things is solely of his impressions of sense, or of what can be pointed out empirically, Hume denied reality to any kind of SUBSTANCE, material (Treatise, 1.1.6) and immaterial in the case of persons (1.4.3, 5). What one calls substance is nothing more than a bundle of sense data one finds constantly associated with each other. There is no such reality as a permanent essence or structure proper to things. The self is just a flux of impressions, emotions, and feelings linked together in the unity of the person one observes in memory (1.4.6). One should not speak of a SELF but only of ideas attracting each other and becoming associated.

Causality. If Hume banished the idea of substance altogether, he transformed that of EFFICIENT CAUSALITY in accordance with the demands of his PHENOMENALISM. Hume held that causality involves a necessary relationship between the thing called a cause and its effects. But one has no sense impressions of a necessary link between a cause and its effects. What, then, is the origin of this idea of “necessary connection”? Hume held that the constantly repeated conjunction of the same sense impressions in the same temporal sequence gives rise to the expectation that they will continue to be conjoined in the future, and thus to the idea of the imagination that they must be conjoined. There is nothing objectively or inherently necessary in the links observed between things (cf. 1.3.14–). Hume considered that the proposition “whatever has a beginning has also a cause of its existence” is neither intuitively nor demonstrably certain, for “as all distinct ideas are separable from each other, and as the ideas of cause and effect are evidently distinct, ’twill be easy for us to conceive any object to be non-existent this moment, and existent the next, without conjoining to it the distinct idea of a cause or productive principle. The separation, therefore, of the idea of cause from that of a beginning of existence, is certainly possible for the imagination; and consequently the actual separation of these objects is so far possible, that it implies no contradiction nor absurdity” (1.3.3)—an argument that simply assumes what it purports to prove, namely, that beginning to exist does not necessarily imply being caused.

God. Hume denied that one can establish the existence of God by a causal argument, for God and his relation to the universe lie beyond experience. He agreed, however, that one can postulate a cause or causes of the order exhibited in the universe on the probability that it bears a remote analogy to the human mind. But he denied that man can go any further. One cannot ascribe any attributes to a divine cause (Dialogues, ed. N. K. Smith, 227). [See MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF).]

Critique. Hume’s world was that of a radical skeptic, for “it is not a world of persons and things but one of transitory atomic events. The connection of these events is in principle wholly unpredictable. Terms like being, substance and cause become almost or entirely meaningless. There is no room in such a world for a metaphysic or general science of Being” [D. J. B. Hawkins, Being and Becoming (New York 1954) 23]. Hume neglected all the permanent or enduring data of experience; he denied any permanent structure inherent in things and reduced human experience to transitory impressions and images. He concentrated on the purely passive aspects of mental receptivity to the point of ignoring the activities of man’s thinking life. Thus he reduces things to sensible impressions, mind to memory and imagination, and philosophy to empirical psychology. He is, however, the most ruthlessly consistent of the empiricists and remains to this day the guiding light of all empiricists in philosophy.

See Also: EMPIRICISM; PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF.

Bibliography: Works. The Philosophical Works, ed. T. H. GREEN and T. H. GROSE, 4 v. (London 1878); A Treatise of Human Nature, ed. L. A. SELBY-BIGGE (Oxford 1896); Enquiries concerning the Human Understanding and Concerning the Principles of Mor- als, ed. L. A. SELBY-BIGGE (2d ed. Oxford 1902; repr. 1951); Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, ed. N. K. SMITH (New York 1947), contains sketch of My Own Life; Letters, ed. J. Y. T. GREIG, 2 v. (Oxford 1932). Literature. A. CARLINI, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:1128–44. N. K. SMITH, The Philosophy of David Hume (London 1941). H. H. PRICE, Hume’s Theory of the External World (Oxford 1940). R. W. CHURCH, Hume’s Theory of the Understanding (Ithaca, N.Y. 1935). J. A. PASSMORE, Hume’s Intentions (Cambridge, Eng. 1952). D. G. MACNABB, David Hume: His Theory of Knowledge and Morality (London 1951). M. O’DONNELL, “Hume’s Approach to Causation,” Philosophical Studies 10 (Maynooth 1960) 64–99. A. E. MICHOTTE, La Perception de la causalité (2d ed. Louvain 1954).

[E. A. SILLEM]

HUME, GEORGE BASIL

Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, 1976–1999; b. Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England, 1923; novitiate at Ampleforth Abbey 1941; studied at Ampleforth, Oxford (history), and Fribourg University (theology); ordained priest 1950; elected Magister Scholarum for the English Benedictine Congregation 1957, 1961; Abbot of Ampleforth 1963–1976; appointed by Pope Paul VI to the Metropolitan See of Westminster on Feb. 17, 1976; created cardinal May 24, 1976; d. Westminster, June 17, 1999.

Hume was widely regarded as the spiritual leader in Britain at the end of the twentieth century. Part of the legacy he left is the acceptance of the Roman Catholic Church as a native (and not foreign) Church, alongside the Established and Free Churches, thus signaling the demise of any lingering effects of the Penal Laws in Britain.

As abbot of a large monastery at the time of the Second Vatican Council and as archbishop of the premier see in Britain, he was able to maintain peace, stability, and unity within the communities he served. Hume could do this because he listened with great honesty and openness and recognized that whatever tensions there might be, all involved shared a common faith. The last talk he prepared on this theme, under the auspices of the Catholic Common Ground initiative, was called “One in Christ, Unity and Diversity in the Church Today.”

His episcopate was marked by a number of significant events. Among these was the National Pastoral Congress (1980), which elicited The Easter People, the bishops’ accompanying response. His tenure also saw the publication of The Common Good, which articulated Catholic social teaching for contemporary society (1996), and the publication of One Bread, One Body (1998), which set out teaching on the Eucharist. This latter document was to be useful in making decisions about the admission of non-Catholic Christians to communion, reconciliation, and the anointing of the sick.

Hume served the Church in England and the world in a number of roles. From 1979 to 1999 he was president of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales. From 1979 to 1987 he served as president of the Council of European Bishops' Conferences, which was established to deal with social and ethical problems within the European Economic Community. He was also co-chair of the Council of European Churches (Orthodox, Reformed and Anglican Churches). He was a member of the Secretariat for Christian Unity, Congregation of Religious and Secular Institutes, Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Canon Law, and the Joint Commission set up by the Holy See and the Orthodox Church to promote theological dialogue between their Churches. He also attended the synods of bishops in 1977, 1980, 1983, 1987, 1990, 1994 (serving as relator general); and the Extraordinary Synod in 1985.

Ecumenism and Social Justice. Hume played an important role in ecumenism. He began to dialogue with the Orthodox while he was abbot of Ampleforth. Recognizing the special position of the Anglican communion in ecumenical affairs, he made particular efforts to ensure close and developing relationships with the Church of England. His first act as archbishop of Westminster was to lead a group of Benedictine monks to Westminster Abbey to sing Vespers there for the first time since the Reformation. Pope John Paul II's visit in 1982 was both a celebration for Catholics in Britain and an occasion of great ecumenical significance. During this visit the pope met Queen Elizabeth II at Buckingham Palace and the archbishop of Canterbury at the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket.

In 1987 at an important ecumenical gathering at which plans for new ecumenical instruments were being discussed, Hume urged Catholics to move from "cooperation to commitment" in the search for Christian unity. He subsequently became joint president both of Churches Together in England and of the Council of Churches for Britain and Ireland.

After the decision of the Church of England to ordain women as priests, large numbers of Anglican clergy petitioned to join the Catholic Church. Rome gave permission for married convert clergy, under certain conditions, to be ordained priests. In his most public initiative (encouraged by the Holy See), Hume managed to ensure that individuals whose conscience led them to the Catholic Church were duly welcomed, but without the cordial relationships with the Church of England being spoiled. At the same time Catholic sensitivities to the introduction of married clergy, and anxieties there might be over priestly celibacy were largely overcome.

A reconciler and bridge-builder, Hume did much to heal wounds between the Jewish and Catholic communities. He was active in promoting understanding with people of other faiths. He was with Pope John Paul II at the gathering of world religious leaders at Assisi to pray for peace (1986).

Hume was deeply committed to matters of justice. His initiative in highlighting certain serious miscarriages of justice in England led to the release of a number of prisoners and to a new system of investigation of such cases. By other initiatives he gave clear guidance on a wide variety of public moral and social issues: life issues, marriage and family life, global poverty and international debt, human rights, homelessness, refugees and asylum seekers, the arms trade and nuclear disarmament, homosexuality, and education. Hume was instrumental in mounting significant seminars in London that discussed topics like business and moral standards in post-communist Europe (1992), the arms trade (1995), and world debt (1996).

Two weeks prior to Hume's death Queen Elizabeth II presented him with the Order of Merit—awarded to individuals of exceptional merit, in the personal gift of the Queen. The Chief Rabbi in England (Dr. Jonathan Sacks) wrote of him in The Times: "He spoke of God in a secular age and was listened to. He articulated clear moral values and his words shone through the relativistic mist. He took principled political stands and was respected for it.

He showed that humility has a power and presence of its own.”

At the time of Cardinal Hume’s death, Pope John Paul II commented on his devoted service, thanking God for “having given the Church a shepherd of great spiritual and moral character, of sensitive and unflinching ecumenical commitment and firm leadership in helping people of all beliefs to face the challenges of the last part of this difficult century.”

George Basil Hume was an outstanding figure in the Catholic Church in the latter part of the twentieth century, with an influence far beyond his own country and his own family of faith. He was a leader, a profoundly spiritual, impressively intelligent, a man of great authority. His loyalty to the Church was complete and came from his childlike faith in Christ. Hume always kept in touch with his Benedictine roots; he was described as “someone who turns strangers into friends.”

Bibliography: G. B. HUME, Searching for God (London 1977); In Praise of Benedict (London 1981); To Be A Pilgrim (London 1984), Towards a Civilisation of Love (London 1988); Light in the Lord (London 1991); Remaking Europe: the Gospel in a Divided World (London 1994); Footprints of the Northern Saints (London 1996); Basil in Blunderland (London 1997); The Mystery of the Cross (London 1998). Mystery of the Incarnation (London 1999). “Basil Hume, Archbishop of Westminster” in Oremus (Magazine of Westminster Cathedral, Special Edition, July 1999). Bishops’ Conference of England and Wales. Briefing 29 (July 1999). C. BUTLER. Basil Hume by His Friends (1999). T. CASTLE, ed., Basil Hume, A Portrait (1986). P. STANFORD, Cardinal Hume and the Changing Face of English Catholicism (London 2000).

[D. KONSTANT]

HUMILIANA DE CIRCULUS, BL.

Franciscan tertiary; b. Florence, Italy, December 1219; d. there, May 19, 1246. Married at 16, she was freed by the death of her husband (c. 1241) from a difficult marriage patiently borne for five years. As the mother of two little girls, she was prevented from entering the POOR CLARES of Monticelli; instead she became a Franciscan tertiary, living a life of prayer and penance in a tower of her father’s home, which she left only to attend church services and to help the poor. The recipient of notable graces, and impervious even to diabolical attacks, she was also a model of meekness and courage during her last illness. She was buried at the Franciscan Church of Santa Croce where her relics are kept in the Calderini chapel. Many miracles have been ascribed to her, some even in her lifetime. The first translation of her remains occurred in August 1246; the second, in November 1314. Her cult was confirmed by INNOCENT XII (1694).

Feast: May 19 (Florence); June 15 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 4:384–418. F. CIONACCI, Storia della beata Vmiliania de’Cerchi (Florence 1682). C. VITUS, Leggenda della beata Vmiliania de’Cerchi, ed. D. MORENI (Florence 1827). Z. LAZZERI, Studi francescani 7 (1921) 196–206. LÉON DE CLARY, Lives of the Saints and Blessed of the Three Orders of St. Francis, 4 v. (Taunton, England 1885–87) 2:275–279. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 5:370–373. J. CABELL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:534.

[J. CABELL]

HUMILIATI

Members of a 12th-century lay-poverty movement, known also as Berettini, so-called because of their ash-gray garments of undyed (berrettine, humile) wool. They first appeared in Lombardy in the second half of the 12th century. Their origin is obscure, but seems to be connected with the then prevalent desire to return to the state of the primitive church. The theory that associates their origin with Emperor HENRY IV, or with St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX and St. John Meda, is at best improbable. The Humiliati first lived as devout laymen (mostly members of the higher social levels) in the married state, or in double convents observing continence. Distinguished for their penitential austerity, they fasted frequently, spoke little, refused to bear arms, and preached publicly against heresy and abuses in the church. They observed personal and communal poverty, but as manual laborers rather than as mendicants, and became involved in the wool industry. The women cared for the sick poor, especially lepers, while the men devoted themselves to social and civic affairs, providing work for the unemployed, forming trade associations, and aiding the indigent. Though orthodox in intention, they were closely related to the PATARINES and other heretical penitential sects of the period. In the matter of apostolic preaching, they resembled the CATHARI; they also resembled the WALDENSES, but differed from them in their interpretation of evangelical poverty. When their attacks on the clergy became excessive, Pope ALEXANDER III forbade them to preach in public (1179), but they refused to obey. LUCIUS III excommunicated them together with the Waldenses in 1184. Many submitted, however, and in 1201 INNOCENT III reorganized them as a three-order institute: canons and sisters in solemn religious consecration living in double monasteries; continent laymen and laywomen; and married men and women living as secular tertiaries; the last group withdrew in 1272. The order grew rapidly in power and prestige, rendering distinguished service to the Church in the struggle against heresy and against the socioeconomic problems of the times. However, their association with the wool industry brought them wealth and rapid decline. Toward the end there were only 170 members for the 94 houses. When St. Charles BORROMEO undertook their reform, some of the members attempted to take his life; whereupon PIUS V suppressed the male branch of the order (1571).

Bibliography: G. TIRABOSCHI, Vetera humiliatorum monumenta, 3 v. (Milan 1766–68). L. ZANONI, Gli umiliati nei loro rapporti con l'eresia, l'industria della lana ed i comuni nei secoli XII e XIII (Milan 1911). J. B. PIERRON, Die katholischen Armen (Freiburg 1911). F. VAN DEN BORNE, Die Anfänge des franziskanischen Dritten Ordens (Münster 1925). F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:311–321. P. GUERRINI, “Gli umiliati a Brescia,” Miscellanea Pio Paschini, 2 v. (Rome 1948–49) 1:187–214. A. MENS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d. new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:534–535. H. GRUNDMANN, Religiöse Bewegungen im Mittelalter (2d ed. Hildesheim 1961). M. H. VI-CAIRE, Catholicism 5:1097–98.

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

HUMILITY

The virtue by which a man attributes to God all the good he possesses. In this article humility is treated (1) as it appears in the Bible, (2) as it is considered by theology, and (3) as it is applied to practice.

In the Bible. According to the OT, man, created by God's love but preferring proud disobedience to filial dependence (Gn 2.17), broke the bonds with his Creator (Gn 3.22–24) and the harmony of creation (Romans ch. 1–2) by introducing sin and death into the world (Rom 5.12).

When God revealed his plan of salvation, the chosen people learned again its complete dependence on God in all things (Hos 13.9) by witnessing the powerful works of Yahweh (Dt 11.7) who created it as the PEOPLE OF GOD (Dt 32.6), fed its poverty in the desert (Ex ch. 16), and defended it in its helplessness (Ex ch. 14). It learned also its sinfulness and the mercy of Yahweh (Ps 78[77]) and underwent the purifying chastisement of the exile (Jer 16.12–13, 31; Ez 36.24–28). This humble attitude was expressed and fostered by the cult of praise, thanksgiving, and propitiation. The real people of God, then, was the small “remnant” of the “poor of Yahweh” (Zep 3.12–14), whose attitude was one of trustful and humble dependence (Jdt 9.11), filial fear (Prv 15.23; 22.4), faithful obedience (1 Mc 2.20–22), CONTRITION (Is 57.15; 66.2), poverty (Ps 9–10; 22[21]), MEEKNESS, and MODESTY (Nm 12.3).

In the NT, all these traits converge, through the humble handmaid of the Lord (Lk 1.38, 48), upon the real Servant of Yahweh (Isaiah ch. 42, 50; Lk 4.17–21; Is 61.1–2), the King meek and humble of heart (Zec 9.9; Mt 21.5; Zep 3.12; Mt 11.29), born as a child of men, Jesus. Being the Son of God, He came to obey (Jn 4.34), to save (Jn 3.17), to serve (Mt 20.28), and to accept the humiliation of the cross (Phil 2.8). Thus He revealed the humility of love: charity stooped down, renouncing all SELF-LOVE, so that nothing might hinder His communion with the little ones (Phil 2.2–8). He was the definitive image of humility (Jn 13.1–17).

His kingdom is to be received, not as a right, but as a gift (1 Cor 4.7), in the manner of a child (Mt 18.3–5). Hence the poor and the meek are blessed (Mt 5.3–5). The basic new law of love implies service (Eph 4.2; 1 Pt 3.8–9), but it implies also humble forgiveness (Lk 18.14).

Humility (ταπεινοφροσύνη) opens man to grace (1 Cor 15.10) and to divine secrets (Mt 11.25), makes him an instrument of salvation (1 Cor 1.25–31; 2 Cor 12–10), and will exalt the humble forever (Mt 23.12); while pride closes man to grace (1 Pt 5.5) and causes the horror of God (Lk 16.15) and His chastisements (Is 2.6–22; Mt 23.12).

In Theology. Humility is the moral VIRTUE by which the human will accepts readily the fact that all a person's good—nature and grace, being and action—is a gift of God's creative and salvific love, and by which one wants consequently to “unself” the self radically in thought, word, and deed, in order to be true to his (natural and supernatural) being. The opposite of humility is PRIDE, by which man thinks and wants to be independent of God (and of others) and, consequently, self-sufficient (in being), self-reliant (in action), and self-seeking (morally).

As any sin is fundamentally a form of pride and perverse self-love, so any good act of the just man is basically an act of love (charity), which is the fundamental driving force of his SELF-OBLATION to God and men. But because he is a creature, a redeemed sinner, and an adopted son, this love must be humble: it is totally received (Phil 2.13) and gratefully returned by a liberty that itself is made possible by the gratuitous help (conkursus) of God. Humility is thus as essential for a man as is his creaturehood and adoptive sonship.

After the theological virtues (charity founded on faith and hope), which constitute the (supernatural) soul of our moral activity by immediately connecting us with God (Col 3.14), humility is the most important moral virtue since it regulates the whole of virtuous life by submitting it to the true order of being. It even affects charity, hope, and faith themselves insofar as these are the theological virtues of a created, adopted son; humility is their creaturely aspect. It is thus the foundation of all virtues

The Humility of the Publican and Haughtiness of the Pharisee, miniature illustrating the parable in the Gospel of Luke 18.9–14.

(see St. Augustine, Serm. 69, Patrologia Latina 38.441). It opens us to the gifts of the Father (1 Pt 5.5) by breaking open the closed and separate selfhood. While pride tends to make an absolute of man's littleness, humility opens it to the infinite by accepting its relativeness to God and to others. Hence the evangelical paradox: "Whoever exalts himself shall be humbled, and whoever humbles himself shall be exalted" (Mt 23.12). When the one who receives is nothing of himself, his independence from the source of being means self-destruction, and his dependence, self-fulfillment. Humility is the true greatness of a creature; it is liberation from its limited selfhood.

At a deeper level still, humility shares in Christ's filial humility. As God, the Son receives Himself totally from the Father, but is equal to Him in all things (Phil 2.6). As man, His sonship expresses itself in a total relativeness by which He voluntarily receives all from His Father (Jn 4.34; 5.30; 7.16; Lk 22.42), who is greater than He (Jn 14.28). The humility of Christ's members participates in this filial "receptiveness" and is an expression of their adoptive sonship. It has a trinitarian value. In Christ, one may speak of the humility of God. Some even see it as an attribute of the divinity, inclining God's love toward the littleness of his creatures (R. Guardini).

Besides, Christ, accepting the solidarity with man's sinfulness (2 Cor 5.21), was humiliated unto death in order to save his brethren (Phil 2.7–11). This humiliation of Christ is an exigency of His charity: His love does not suffer its self-surrender to be limited by any prerogative that could hamper communion. Superiority is service (Mt 20.25–28). Man's fraternal charity has the same exigency of humility.

In a classical Aristotelian context, St. Thomas Aquinas classified humility as a virtue moderating the irascible appetite in its tendency to excel, restraining it from presumption and thus balancing the effects of MAGNANIMITY, which stimulates reasonably the same appetite against DESPAIR (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 161.1). As such humility is one kind of modesty that, in turn, is a potential part of the cardinal virtue of TEMPERANCE (ibid. 161.4). Essentially in the will, it presupposes as its rule a judgment of faith and reason about man's utter CONTINGENCY (ibid. 161.2). For St. Thomas, humility is more important than any moral virtue except (legal) JUSTICE; it is also second to the theological and intellectual virtues (ibid. 161.5). Evangelical humility is too rich and positive to be classified in any moral category.

In Practice. Humility has as its foundation the sincere acknowledgment of truth perceived clearly by faith. Humility indeed is truth: all good comes from God as its first cause. Only deficiencies belong to man. Hence a humble man can acknowledge the good in others and himself as it really is, i.e., as coming from God and not from self (Rom 12.3), and only the evil as his own work. Therefore, there is no room for vainglory, but only for gratitude and contrition, nor for presumption, but only for the duty of using the gifts with magnanimity; for the humble are God's fearless trustees (Lk 17.10). The "little way" of St. THÉRÈSE DE LISIEUX inspires both boldness and generosity. Humility does not abolish true self-respect, nor oblige anyone to say that God's gifts of nature and grace are greater in others than in himself, except to such extent as that may be true. But humility abhors envy of the gifts of others, or the attributing to self of superiority or talent as if these were not God-given. It genuinely rejoices in acknowledging the superiority of others when in fact they are superior. Moreover, as a remedy to the propensity to self-complacency and pride that are results of original sin, humility inclines a person to consider chiefly in others the good in which he himself is lacking, and in himself the defects others do not have (Phil 2.3). The saints excelled in this practice of humility, entertaining thereby a low estimate of themselves and positively choosing contempt with Christ. An excellent example of this is to be found in the third kind of humility described in the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius of Loyola. Humiliation is the touchstone of humility. Only true humility can save a man from a false pride in his truly splendid achievements without at the same time discouraging his effort.

Bibliography: X. LÉON-DUFOUR, ed., Vocabulaire de théologie biblique (Paris 1962). E. HUGUENY, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, ed. A. D'ALÈS, 4 v. (Paris 1911–22; Table analytique 1931) 2:519–528. G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 5:1098–1103. B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ, tr. E. G. KAISER (Westminster, Md. 1961–) 1:546–557. FATHER CANICE, Humility (Westminster, Md. 1951). S. CARLSON, The Virtue of Humility (Dubuque 1952). A. TANQUEREY, The Spiritual Life, tr. H. BRANDERIS (2d ed. Tournai 1930; repr. Westminster, Md. 1945) 1127–53. N. KINSELLA, Un- profitable Servants (Westminster, Md. 1960). H. VAN ZELLER, "Of Humility," American Benedictine Review 8 (1957) 324–349.

[G. GILLEMAN]

HUMILITY OF MARY, SISTERS OF THE

(HM, Official Catholic Directory 2110), or "Blue Nuns"; a pontifical institute that conducts schools, catechetical centers, and hospitals under two separate motherhouses, one at Villa Maria, Pennsylvania, and the other at Ottumwa, Iowa. The congregation was established in 1854 by John Joseph Begel, parish priest of the Diocese of Nancy. At the invitation of Bishop Amadeus Rappe of Cleveland, Ohio, the entire community immigrated to the United States in 1864, when an anticlerical French government frustrated its teaching apostolate. The foundress, Mother Magdalen Potiers, died before the voyage and the group of ten professed sisters and three orphans was under the leadership of Mother Anna Tabourat, the American foundress. After a brief stay in Louisville, Ohio, the sisters settled near New Bedford, Pennsylvania, on a large farm assigned to them by the bishop. Despite severe trials and hardships, the sisters learned the language and, within a few years, were conducting parochial schools in nearby towns. Mother Anna guided the sisters until 1883 when illness forced her resignation. Mother Patrick Ward, the first American-born general superior, was elected (1889) and served for 27 years. In 1870 four sisters were sent to the Diocese of St. Joseph, Missouri; 11 years later this group formed the nucleus for a separate Congregation of the Humility of Mary (CHM, Official Catholic Directory #2100) with its motherhouse located at Ottumwa, Iowa. In addition to their principal ministries of education, healthcare and catechetics, the sisters also operate extensive outreach programs to Native Americans, immigrant communities, the homeless and marginalized. The motherhouse is located in Villa Maria, Pennsylvania.

[M. K. FLANIGAN/EDS.]

HUMMEL, JOHANN NEPOMUK

Pianist and composer whose works were important sources of the romanticist idiom; b. Bratislava, Slovakia, Nov. 14, 1778; d. Weimar, Germany, Oct. 17, 1837. He studied under MOZART and Clementi and succeeded Franz Joseph HAYDN as Prince Esterházy's music director. After a productive period in Vienna, where he was BEETHOVEN's chief rival as pianist, he became Kapellmeister in Stuttgart in 1811, and in Weimar, 1819, whence he toured Europe as a piano virtuoso. His early compositions are often crude and derivative (especially from Mozart), but his later works, with their elaborate pianistic figurations and subtle harmonic sense, anticipate Chopin and the young SCHUMANN. His chamber music is melodious and well constructed, if not always profound. His church music is in the Viennese classical style of Mozart and Michael HAYDN. A Graduale and Offertorium are still performed in Austrian churches. Of his three Masses the B-flat is best known and typifies the “popular” church music of the early 19th century.

Bibliography: K. BENYOVSKY, J. N. Hummel (Bratislava 1934). D. HUME, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 4:406–409. D. BROCK, “The Instrumental Music of Hummel” (Ph.D. diss. University of Sheffield 1976). J. R. KERSHAW, “The Solo Keyboard Works of J. N. Hummel” (Ph.D. diss. Balliol College, Oxford University 1976). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 399–400. J. RICE, “The Musical Bee: References to Mozart and Cherubini in Hummel's ‘New Year’ Concerto,” Music and Letters 77 (1996) 401–424. J. SACHS, Kapellmeister Hummel in England and France (Detroit 1977); “Johann Nepomuk Hummel” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 8, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 781–788. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (New York 1992) 812.

[R. M. LONGYEAR]

HUMMEL, MARIA INNOCENTIA

Franciscan; b. Massing, Bavaria, 1909; d. Siessen, 1946. Berta Humel was the third of six children. She began her education in a local Catholic elementary school. At the age of 12, she enrolled in the Institute of English Sisters, a boarding school in Marienhöhe. There, she demonstrated an early artistic talent, especially in watercolor and pastels. From 1927, she attended the Academy of Applied Arts in Munich from which she graduated in 1931. The predominant theme in her art was children in a Bavarian rural and folk setting. After graduation, she entered the Convent of the Franciscan Sisters of Siessen, a community of 250 sisters with an apostolate of teaching. She took the name in religion of Sr. Maria Innocentia. During her novitiate, she designed vestments and altar clothes. Upon her profession she taught for a time at St. Anna, a school for girls in Saulgau. Her art was published in books and art cards where it caught the eye of Franz Goebel of Goebel Porzellanfabrik, the head of a porcelain company who was looking to establish a new line of porcelain figurines. Based on her watercolors of children in Bavarian folk settings, the line of “Hummel” figures was introduced in January 1935. They were immediately popular within Germany. During the occupation after May 1945, they were especially popular with GI's who brought them back to the U.S. Sr. Mary Innocentia died from tuberculosis at the young age of 37 in 1946. New figures are still being produced in Sr. Mary Innocentia's style after review by the Artistic Board of the Siessen Convent. The M. I. Hummel figures have achieved world renown and are widely collected.

[D. P. SHERIDAN]

HUNEGUNDIS, ST.

Virgin, monastic foundress (known also as Hunégonde); b. Lemblais (Picardy, France), first half of seventh century; d. Homblières, c. 690. She was compelled by her parents to marry, but simultaneously took a vow of virginity and promised to enter a convent. She persuaded her bridegroom to accompany her on a pilgrimage to Rome and there vowed perpetual virginity before the Pope St. VITALIAN and asked him for the veil. On her return to France she founded the monastery of Homblières near Saint-Quentin. She was widely venerated in the West Frankish kingdom as early as the ninth century.

Feast: Aug. 25.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 5:223–240, Vita by BERENGAR OF HOMBLIÈRES. J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 v. (Paris 1668–1701; 2d ed. Venice 1733–40) 2:977–983; 5:216–224. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 2: 417–420. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:618, 620–. The Book of Saints (4th ed. New York 1947) 301. J. VAN DER STRAETEN, “S. Hunégonde d'Homblières,” Analecta Bollandiana 72 (1954) 39–74. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.2:667.

[M. CSÁKY]

HUNFRIED, ST.

Benedictine abbot and bishop; d. Thérouanne, France, March 8, 870. Having become a monk at an early age, he was abbot of PRÜM on his election as bishop of Thérouanne (856). In 861 the NORMANS devastated Thérouanne. Discouraged by the disaster, Hunfried wished to return to Prüm but was dissuaded by Pope NICHOLAS I (Monumenta Germaniae Epistolae 6:613). Thérouanne was rebuilt, and Hunfried marked the restoration with the solemn celebration of the Feast of the ASSUMPTION in 862. He was abbot of SAINT-BERTIN (864–866) and assisted at a number of councils in France, including the Third Council of Soissons, September 866. Hunfried's relics were exhumed April 13, 1108, by Bp. John of Thérouanne. His head is venerated at Saint-Omer; in 1553 the rest of his relics were brought to Ypres, where they were burned by the anti-Spanish faction, the Geuzen, in 1563.

Feast: March 8.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 1:789–792. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 3:175–176. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:300–302.

[G. J. DONNELLY]

HUNGARY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Hungary is bordered on the north by Slovakia, on the northeast by Ukraine, on the east by Romania, on the south by Yugoslavia and Slovenia, on the west by Austria and on the northwest by Slovakia. Primarily consisting of flat or rolling plains rising to low mountains in the northwest, Hungary has a temperate climate, with humid winters. Natural resources in the region include bauxite, coal and natural gas; its fertile land produces such crops as wheat, corn, sunflower seeds, sugar beets and potatoes. Budapest, its capital city, is on the Danube River, which bisects Hungary from north to south.

Hungary became an independent kingdom in 1000. From 1526 to 1686 much of the country was under Turkish control. After that Hungary was ruled by the HAPSBURG HOUSE until 1918, when it became independent of Austria but lost most of its territory and population. In 1946 Hungary was proclaimed a republic. A Communist People's Republic was proclaimed in 1949, and remained under Soviet control until 1991 despite an effort to break the Warsaw Pact in 1956. A member of NATO since 1999, Hungary was slated for inclusion in the European Union by 2000.

The following essay is in two parts. Part one discusses the history of the church through 1950; Part two discusses the Church under communism and into the 21st century.

Christian Origins

As part of the Roman Empire, the region comprised portions of the provinces of Pannonia and Dacia. Accounts of martyrdoms and remains of tombs, funeral chapels and churches attest to a thriving Christian community, with some groups surviving the barbarian migrations that accompanied the fall of the Empire. Sizable Christian communities may have lasted into the AVAR rule from 500–700, while Christian traditions may also have been inherited by the SLAVS and passed to the Hungarians (Magyars), who eventually subjugated and assimilated the people of the region.

Capital: Budapest.  Size: 35,919 sq. miles.  Population: 10,138,845 in 2000.  Languages: Hungarian.  Religions: 6,833,580 Catholics (67.5%), 2,534,710 Protestants (25%), 770,555 without religious affiliation.
--

Conversion of Magyars. Even before invading Hungary the Hungarians had encountered Christianity. The Finno-Ugric Hungarian nomads of Eurasia's Great Steppes, composed of western and eastern Turki tribes, became a nation in the fifth century. They adopted the religion of the shamans, which was influenced by the religions of the East, and eventually came into contact with the BYZANTINE CHURCH and BYZANTINE CIVILIZATION. Many of their slaves were Christians. Christian missionaries visited them on several occasions. As allies of Byzantium the Hungarians entered the northwestern shores of the Black Sea. After being defeated by the Bulgarians, they moved into the Danube Basin and gradually spread throughout the Great Plain subjugating Slavonic, Bulgarian and Avar minority groups. For the next six decades their destructive raids into Western Europe reminded medieval chroniclers of the Huns. The tendency by tribal chiefs of making raids on their own authority tended to weaken the central power established by Árpád (d. 907), Hungary's national hero, who had led the Magyars into the Danube area c. 875. In 955 Emperor OTTO I annihilated the Magyars on the Lechfeld, near Augsburg.

Géza became the national leader (972–997), restored the central power, and recognized that some accommodation to Western Christianity was essential for the survival of his people, as it had been for the neighboring nomadic or seminomadic tribes. Géza, whose wife was the daughter of a tribal chief in Transylvania who had been converted to Byzantine Christianity, was baptized by St. ADALBERT OF PRAGUE (986). Thereafter he welcomed German missionaries from Passau and Regensburg. Adalbert, a supporter of the CLUNIAC REFORM, strengthened the faith of Géza's son Stephen (Istvan), who had been baptized as a child by Bishop PILGRIM OF PASSAU, and who was married to Blessed GISELA. As ruler (997–1038), St. STEPHEN I promoted the evangelization of Hungary by inviting German and Italian missionaries and the scholar St. GERARD OF CSANÁD. With the approval of Emperor Otto III, Pope Sylvester II crowned Stephen as first king of Hungary (1000). Stephen organized the Church in Hungary by creating the archdioceses of Esztergom and Kalocsa, eight dioceses and five Benedictine abbeys (notably PANNONHALMA). From his headquarters in Esztergom, the capital, Stephen organized the country politically as well. He defeated pagan tribes, re-

Archdioceses	Suffragans
Budapest-Esztergom	Győr, Székesfehérvár
Eger	Debrecen-Nyíregyháza, Vác
Kalocsa-Kecskemét	Pécs, Szeged-Csanád
Veszprém (1993)	Kaposvár, Szombathely

Pannonhalma is an abbey nullius, immediately subject to the Holy See, and a military ordinariate is also located in the country. The Hungarian Byzantine-rite has a metropolitan in Hajdúdorog and an apostolic exarchy at Miskolc. The Ruthenian-rite diocese of Munkács (Mukachevo; created 1771) is suffragan to Esztergom.

placed the tribal divisions by territorial counties and resisted the ecclesiastical influence of Byzantium, which remained strong. Stephen's religious accomplishments, which were not based on mere power politics, survived a pagan reaction after his death that was partly motivated by hostility to Western influences. Paganism gradually disappeared, only to reappear later with the arrival of the nomadic Cumans, belonging to the Turki peoples. Some of these pagan traditions were assimilated into Christian customs and folklore. In 1996 the relics of Stephen and Gisela were reunited in Veszprem to mark the 1,000th anniversary of their wedding, as well as the founding of the local diocese.

Árpáds. The Church and the Árpád dynasty were sources of strength to one another. The 40 or so Árpáds who became saints or blessed indicate the genuine spirituality that characterized this dynasty, which played an important role in imbuing Hungary with the Christian spirit. At the same time the kings enjoyed the privileges of creating dioceses, naming bishops and supervising Church property. The archbishops of Esztergom, who became primates of Hungary, crowned the kings and exercised great authority. Together with the other bishops and the abbots, they were a potent political force. Until the battle of Mohács in 1526, prelates, especially along the frontiers, commanded the military forces against sporadic pagan invasions. Hierarchical influence served to curb abuses of royal power and anarchical tendencies of the nobles while fostering ties with Rome.

Hungary became a bulwark of Western Christianity against barbarian incursions from the east. As king (1077–95), St. LADISLAUS I (László) promoted the canonization of Stephen I and EMERIC (1083), defended Hungary's Christian culture against the pagan Cumans, conquered Croatia, and accepted the GREGORIAN REFORM. King Kálmán I (Coloman, 1095–1114), who conquered Dalmatia, completed the Christianization of Hungary, which served as an avenue for the armies of the CRUSADES on their route to the Holy Land. Kálmán's successors had to protect Hungarian independence against Byzantium. Géza II (1141–62) settled Catholic Germans (Saxons) in the southern passes of Transylvania. Under Béla III (1173–96) Cistercians spread rapidly in Hungary. King Andrew II (1205–35), father of St. ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY, headed an unsuccessful Crusade to Palestine (1217) and was constrained to sign the Golden Bull (1222), which became a charter of feudal privileges for the nobles. Devastating invasions by the MONGOLS from 1241–42 destroyed six dioceses and retarded Hungary's development but did not undermine the country's Christian foundation. Béla IV (1235–70) had three daughters renowned for sanctity: St. MARGARET OF HUNGARY, Blessed JOLENTA and Blessed Kinga. Following the Mongol raids Catholics emigrated from Germany and Bohemia, Orthodox from Romania and Ruthenia, and pagan Cumans from outside the frontiers. Cuman influence proved particularly harmful to the Church, especially under the half-Cuman King Ladislaus IV (1272–90), who in 1279 forcibly dissolved a synod in Buda presided over by a papal legate. With Andrew III (1290–1301) the Árpád dynasty became extinct.

Work of Religious Orders. Religious orders played an important role in Hungary's religious and cultural development. Following the Benedictines came the PREMONSTRATENSIS (1130), the CISTERCIANS from France (1142) and CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE (1198). The HERMITS OF ST. PAUL, founded in Hungary in 1250, spread to Italy, Germany, Austria, Poland, Lithuania and Sweden. The KNIGHTS OF MALTA, CARTHUSIANS, CARMELITES, FRANCISCANS, DOMINICANS, and TEUTONIC KNIGHTS also established houses in the country. Religious houses and churches became the centers around which new towns developed. Priests and religious, who served to maintain concord between the Hungarians and other ethnic groups in towns and villages, were responsible for erecting schools, hospitals, leprosaria and a variety of charitable institutions. Because Hungary possessed few institutions of higher learning until the 17th century, ecclesiastics and nobles attended the universities of Paris, Bologna and Padua. Later they studied at Vienna, Cracow and Charles University in Prague. The various religious orders introduced German, Italian and French influences. Priests who had been educated in Western European universities provided the officials in the royal chancery.

Franciscans and Dominicans took a leading role in fostering an intensive spiritual life among the laity. They were the first to distribute religious literature to lay persons and to groups of women dwelling in communities, such as the BEGUINES. The Franciscans, who in 1232 established a separate Hungarian province with its center in Eger, had more than 50 houses by 1300. After the Mongol devastations the Franciscans were utilized by the kings to restore religious life. During the 14th century they evangelized the Mongols and Tatars in Russia, and also took the lead in opposing the heresy of the BOGOMILS, which infiltrated Hungary from the Balkans. Later the heretical influences of the WALDENSES and HUSSITES penetrated Hungary from the West and caused widespread social upheavals. Hussites, or Franciscans influenced by them, made the first translation of the Bible into Hungarian.

Growing Turkish Menace. The Neopolitan branch of the House of Anjou came into control of the Hungarian throne with Charles I (1308–42). Charles I of Anjou was aided by the papal embassy of Cardinal Gentilis in gaining the throne. The Anjou dynasty continued the close relationship with the Holy See that had characterized the rule of the Árpáds. Under Louis I, the Great (1342–82), who also governed Poland, both State and Church reached their peak. Hungary's influence extended to Moldavia, Wallachia, Bosnia and Serbia. Louis I built churches and monasteries, filled church offices with competent ecclesiastics, and strove for the reunion of the Orthodox within his kingdom. He founded the first Hungarian university at Pécs in 1367. In his last years he confronted the threat of invasion by the OTTOMAN TURKS, who were followers of Islam. SIGISMUND (1387–1437), emperor in 1433, kept Hungary on the side of Rome during the WESTERN SCHISM; but he appropriated ecclesiastical funds for his own purposes, subjected papal documents to his royal placet (1404), and presumed to nominate bishops. After his disastrous defeat at Nicopolis in 1396 during his crusade against the Turks, Sigismund's authority in Hungary passed to the feudal nobility. From 1420 Hussite armies ravaged the country.

Ladislaus V (Ladislaus III of Poland) lost his life at Varna in 1444 doing battle against the Turks, whereupon John Hunyadi became governor of the kingdom. Hunyadi's leadership in the crusade against the Ottomans made him a national hero, supported as he was in his military campaigns by the papal envoys Giuliano CESARINI and Juan de CARVAJAL. Hunyadi's greatest victory over the Turks came in 1456, two years after their conquest of Constantinople, at Belgrade, where St. JOHN Capistran urged on Christian troops by his preaching. Although the battle cost Hunyadi his life, it arrested the Turkish advance for 70 years.

High altar in the interior of the Coronation Church of the Hungarian Kings, Budapest, designed by F. Schulek, 1898.

Matthias Corvinus, Hunyadi's son, ruled from 1458 to 1490, the sole Hungarian to be king after the disappearance of the Árpáds. He continued the war against the Turks with little help from Western Christendom except from Rome. His conquests of Vienna in 1485 and other western territories were lost to Hungary after his death. The principality of Transylvania, established with the help of Paulite diplomat György MARTINUZZI, had to defend itself against both Hapsburgs and Turks. In his dealings with the Church Matthias Corvinus appropriated ecclesiastical revenues to his own use and appointed foreigners to Hungarian sees. Both he and his father promoted Renaissance humanism in Hungary, especially at the court in Buda. It was there that Matthias collected his famous library, the Bibliotheca Corvina. Although he founded the University of Bratislava (1465), he later neglected it as he did the University of Pécs.

1526 to 1918

Ladislav II (1490–1516), king of Bohemia, proved to be a weak ruler in Hungary. A group of peasants protesting the Turks and organized by Tamás Bakócz, turned against the nobles; in 1514 the crusade was ruthlessly suppressed, and participants condemned to "eternal servitude." Ladislav's children entered into arranged marriages with members of the Hapsburg family. The codification of Hungarian customary law by Stephen Verböczi (1514) never received official approval, but it was regarded as authoritative until 1848. In 1526 Louis II (b. 1516) and most of the Hungarian bishops died in the defeat of the Hungarian army by the Turks at Mohács, whereupon central and southern Hungary were annexed to the Turkish empire for the next 150 years. In the struggle (1526–28) for the throne between Ferdinand I of Hapsburg and John Zápolya, ecclesiastical possessions were looted by both claimants. Western and northeastern Hungary were organized as a kingdom under the Hapsburg emperors and served as a bulwark for Catholicism. Transylvania, in the southeast, became a separate principality held by the Turks in vassalage but left semi-independent under Cardinal Martinuzzi.

The Protestant Reformation. It was while Hungary was weakened by Turkish conquerors from without and rent by political discord within, that the Protestant REFORMATION began to influence the region. Until 1526 LU-

The largest Roman Catholic Cathedral in Hungary, located in Esztergom; its dome is fashioned after Saint Peter's in Rome.
(©Peter Wilson/CORBIS)

THERANISM was repressed; after that it made rapid progress, particularly in Transylvania, where it was welcomed by local Germans who had maintained contacts with Germany since the 12th century. CALVINISM entered later and found wide acceptance, particularly among the Magyars. SOCINIANISM won followers among the Szekels. By allying itself with anti-Hapsburg nationalism, Protestantism helped its cause. At the court of Louis II, many German nobles welcomed the new doctrines, which were at first promoted as internal reforms in the Church. When the Catholic bishops decreed stern measures against the religious innovators, many returned to their faith. In Transylvania, however, Protestantism was too powerful to be overcome by forceful measures, gaining in some towns the support of the majority of the citizenry. The religiously indifferent Emperor Maximilian II (1564–76), son of Ferdinand I, facilitated further progress of Protestantism; at the end of his reign there were about 900 Lutheran congregations and as many more Calvinist ones in the sections not subject to the Turks. About 90 percent of the population had gone over to Protestantism, mostly to Calvinism. Scarcely 300 Catholic priests and religious remained in the country.

Altar with Latin inscription in low relief on front, in cemetery chapel, Pécs, Hungary.

Catholic Restoration. The COUNTER REFORMATION began in the second half of the 16th century and proved extremely successful. Emperor Rudolf II (1516–1608) and succeeding Hapsburg rulers gave it strong support. More important were the reforms undertaken in the Church, the improvement in the quality of the clergy by the introduction of SEMINARY EDUCATION, and closer contacts between clergy and laity, and the promotion of more fervent interior life. A key role was played by the JESUITS, who were welcomed into the royal territories by Miklós OLÁH (Olahus), archbishop of Esztergom, and into Transylvania by Stephen BÁTHORY, prince of Transylvania (1571–76) and king of Poland (1575–86). The Jesuit college in Nagyszombat (Tmava) developed into a university under the patronage of Péter PÁZMÁNY (1570–1637), archbishop of Esztergom and the leading figure in the Catholic restoration. The Jesuit university eventually became the University of Budapest, while the German-Hungarian College in Rome, founded in 1578, was also very important for its work in training priests.

The majority of Hungarians in the sections ruled by the kings ultimately returned to the Church, and Lutheranism lost most of its following. However, the country remained permanently divided religiously. In Transylvania the Magyars adhered in large part to Calvinism, and became a Protestant bastion with close ties to the Netherlands and England. Transylvania granted religious liberty to all in 1557. Aiding the Protestant cause was the struggle led by Transylvanian rulers Stephen Bocskay (1557–1606), Gabor Bethlen (1580–1629) and Georg Rákóczi I (1591–1648) against the Hapsburgs, wherein national independence and defense of Protestantism went hand in hand. The Serbs and a large percentage of the country's Romanians retained their allegiance to the Orthodox Church. Many Ukrainians (Ruthenians) did also, but a sizable minority later united with Rome after successful missionary work among them.

Interior and altar of parish church, designed by Mihaly Pollack in 1820, Theresa district, Budapest, Hungary.

Little was recorded of Turkish Hungary during its 150 years of subjection to Muslim rule. Plague and starvation killed many of those who were not carried off into slavery, leaving surviving Magyars clustered in the towns for protection. Serbs and Romanians moved into the vacated countryside. While the Reformation did not concern the Turks directly, they showed less tolerance toward Catholics than toward Protestants. The Church survived mainly due to the work of the Franciscans, although the laity also did much to keep their faith alive by organizing pilgrimages to Marian shrines and by maintaining religious customs.

To defend the Hapsburg territories the government depended partly on Hungarians, and partly on foreign mercenaries, who tormented the peasants almost as much as the Turks did. The Holy League, formed in 1684 under the sponsorship of INNOCENT XI, joined Austria, Venice, and, for a short time, Poland against the Turks. Their armies, together with those of other Western powers, succeeded in liberating most of Turkish-occupied Hungary by 1700. Buas was regained in 1686. According to the Treaty of Karlowitz (1699) the Hapsburg emperor received all of Hungary (except the Banat of Temesvar). Hapsburg rule continued until 1918. Once Hungary was liberated the former ecclesiastical organization was reestablished.

The 18th Century and the Rise of Liberalism. Emperor from 1658 to 1735, Leopold I set out to crush Hungarian separatism and Protestantism. His policy of cuius regio eius religio caused the anti-Hapsburg movement to assume a predominantly Protestant tinge. Catholic Francis Rákóczi II (1676–1735) headed the struggle for Hungarian independence, his armies fighting under flags adorned with pictures of the Blessed Virgin. After Rákóczi's defeat in 1708 he went into exile. Transylvania joined the rest of Hungary in being incorporated into the Hapsburg Empire, and Charles VI, emperor from 1711 to 1740, repopled devastated regions with foreign settlers, mostly Germans. He also granted full religious liberty to Protestants but required them to restore confiscated Catholic churches. Mixed marriages were permitted, with the provision that any children of such marriages be reared as Catholics. Charles created a seminary for each diocese and ordered that monastic revenues be diverted for their support.

Education continued under Church control during the reign of Charles VI, most prominently under the Jesuits, who ran about 40 schools by 1700. The Hermits of St. Paul, Benedictines, Cistercians, Premonstratensians and PIARISTS became increasingly active in education from the late 17th century onward, the Piarists introducing the study of Hungarian history and literature, geography and natural science.

The reign of MARIA THERESA (1740–80) was characterized by attempts to dominate the Church in the name of enlightened humanism and state absolutism. The state established its own schools and exercised control over private ones. It sought further to supervise all religious life, Catholic or Protestant. JOSEPH II (1765–90) carried his mother's policies to their conclusion by suppressing most religious orders, cutting off much contact with Rome, and otherwise attempting to bend the Church to the will of the state while otherwise granting extensive liberties to Protestants. His system, dubbed JOSEPHINISM, remained influential within Hungarian political, intellectual and religious life until 1918, despite efforts of the Church to counter it.

Meanwhile, Cardinal Leopold Kollonitsch (1637–1707), archbishop of Esztergom, succeeded in reuniting with Rome more than 100,000 Romanian- and Ukrainian-rite schismatics in southeastern Hungary. To care for Romanian-rite Catholics in 1721 the diocese of Făgăras was erected, followed in 1777 by the diocese of Oradea Mare (Nagyvárad; both now in Romania). The diocese of Križevci was erected in 1777 for Byzantine-Rite Catholics (now in Yugoslavia), and the diocese of Munkács (Mukachevo), was created in 1771 for the Ruthenians. Five Latin-rite dioceses were created in 1776 and 1777: Besztercebánya (Banská Bystrica, 1776), Rozsnyó (Rožnava, 1776) and Szepes (Spiš), all now in the Czech Republic; and Szombathely and Székesfehérvár, in western Hungary.

Although the ENLIGHTENMENT, patronized by Joseph II, increasingly influenced late 18th-century intellectual life more and more, most Hungarian intellectuals came from the religious orders and belonged to the Benedictines, Hermits of St. Paul, Piarists, and Jesuits. Abbot Ignác Martinovics headed the sole professedly revolutionary society upholding the ideals of the French Revolution.

The Rise of Nationalism: The 19th Century. Humanism and ever-increasing, anti-Hapsburg nationalism were dominant and closely connected trends in 19th-century Hungarian political and intellectual life. Magyar asserted itself as the official language, the condition of the serfs improved, greater liberty was granted, and a Hungarian assembly was established that was responsible only to the imperial parliament. An awakening Hungarian consciousness also aroused nationalist sentiments within those ethnic groups living within Hungary. As revolution swept over Europe in 1848, Metternich was driven from power. Lajos (Louis) Kossuth led an unsuccessful two-year struggle for independence that drew nobles and peasants together, but was unable to destroy the mutual hostilities of the national groups within the Hapsburg dominion. After the Russian army came to the aid of Austria, Hapsburg absolutism retrenched for another two decades. Among the many Catholic clerics who participated in this independence movement was Mihály Horváth (1809–78), bishop of Csanád and an outstanding historian who served in the short-lived cabinet as minister of worship and education. Following the Hungarian defeat, he and several other patriotic archbishops and bishops were removed from office and imprisoned or exiled.

After the revolution of 1848 political and intellectual life became completely secularized. Protestants, more active in the uprising, accommodated themselves more easily to the new developments and gained political power disproportionate to their numbers. It became increasingly difficult to differentiate creative intellectuals on the basis of their faith, as religious and metaphysical viewpoints faded into the background. By the time of the 1867 compromise agreement that granted Hungary extensive independence within the Hapsburg empire, scarcely any of the prominent statesmen or intellectuals owed their outlook to Catholic convictions; notable exceptions included distinguished statesman Count István Széchenyi (1791–1860), statesman, humanist and novelist Baron József Eötvös (1813–71) and composer Franz LISZT.

The 20th Century. After 1867, religious literature, art, music and philosophy maintained an existence apart from the cultural mainstream. Still, the Catholic viewpoint became an important element of balance as Catholic priests produced important theological, historical and sociological studies. Nationalism, however, provided for many a substitute for religion. The rise of capitalism in Hungary also influenced the Church, which still owned much of its huge holdings from the past and was therefore forced into a defensive position politically and intellectually. In virtue of its rights of patronage, the government exercised great influence in episcopal nominations and selected as bishops men favorable to its policies. Baron Eötvös and other convinced Catholics among the ranks of statesmen, scholars, and writers considered it desirable for the Church to obtain independence of the State. The conference of bishops drafted a preliminary plan to this effect in 1869, but it did not receive the approval of Emperor Francis Joseph I. When the minister of worship and education kept deferring consideration of it, the bishops did not press the matter. Count Albert Apponyi (1846–1933), one of Hungary's leading statesmen at the turn of the 20th century, submitted a bill granting autonomy to the Church, but the military collapse of the Central Powers and the onset of World War I shattered all hopes for its passage. The measure was eventually nacted after Hungary became independent but within the framework of an arrangement that made Catholicism the state religion.

Catholic Life. Religious statistics for 1914 indicated that in Hungary (including the autonomous areas of Croatia and Slovenia) Latin-rite Catholics constituted half the population, Catholics belonging to the Eastern Churches under ten percent, Orthodox 14.3 percent, and Calvinists, Lutherans and Jews comprising the remainder. Despite their majority, most people who identified themselves as Catholics retained their faith as something hallowed by tradition; Catholic beliefs did not guide their outlook and actions. Sunday Mass was esteemed as a social gathering. Very few Catholics went to confession except at the times of marriage and death. There existed a chasm between the hierarchy and the lower clergy and between priests and laity. Higher ecclesiastical positions signified primarily temporal dignity and power. Indicative of the close connection between the ecclesiastical and political spheres was the fact that János Czernoch (1852–1927) became archbishop of Esztergom and cardinal after serving for years in parliament as representative of the People's party and after promoting the Christian Socialist party, whose program was pseudo-social. The diminished numbers in religious orders provided an index of the decline in the spiritual life.

New Movements. To remedy these deficiencies the Catholic Youth Association (1856) and the Altar Society (1859) were formed, largely on the initiative of the Piarists. Alkotmány, founded in 1896, was the first Catholic daily newspaper to enjoy an extended existence. Until its demise in 1919 it promoted the agenda of the People's party, a Catholic party whose program represented the ideals of the Catholic aristocracy and lower middle class.

Hungarian Catholics followed the example of the German Catholic Katholikentage by organizing annual gatherings and imitating several other initiatives before later gaining inspiration from French Catholicism. The Regnum Marianum, organized in 1903, became a flourishing spiritual center among Catholic students and bourgeoisie in Budapest. About this time Gyula Glattfelder, Bishop of Csanád, founded St. Emeric Catholic Youth Association and St. Emeric College, which provided a residence for Catholic university students. Worthy as these and later organizations were, they suffered from their obsessive opposition to LIBERALISM and freemasonry and from their failure to understand Hungary's social problems.

Catholic reform movements demonstrated a close connection between the strengthening of discipline within the religious orders and the deepening of popular religious life. As a result of improvements within the orders, the Benedictines, Carmelites, Capuchins, Dominicans and Jesuits increasingly engaged in apostolic endeavors. The leading pioneers of Catholic renewal before 1914 were Ottokár Prohászka (1858–1927) and Sándor Giesswein (1856–1923). As bishop of Székesfehérvár, Prohászka was the first to coordinate developments in the natural and social sciences and modern intellectual trends with the Catholic viewpoint, his aim to win the educated classes back to the Church. Giesswein, a prelate, sought to implement Catholic social principles, especially through movements for Catholic workers.

Since 1918

The collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1918 ended Hungary's political connections with Austria. After the October Revolution (1918), an independent republic was proclaimed, but much of the region was occupied by the newly created states of the Little Entente. Since the governing classes were unconcerned with social problems, dissatisfaction was widespread and a chaotic situation developed that made possible a brief Communist takeover in 1919 under Béla Kun, the first dictatorship of the proletariat. Short as this regime was, its consequences were momentous.

Citing as their motivation the close relationship between the Church and the semifeudal landowners, the Communist government enacted severe antireligious legislation. Following the regime's military collapse under an attack from the armies of the Little Entente, the conservatives regained power and anti-semitism increased. A "white" terror then followed the "red" terror. While some priests and laymen believed the time propitious for the establishment of a political, social and cultural order based on Catholic principles, conservatives, led by Admiral Miklós (Nicholas) Horthy (1868–1957), nullified most of their proposals. In order to put into effect some of their program Catholic reform leaders had to make compromises. Horthy proclaimed Hungary a monarchy in 1920 and, in the absence of a king, ruled the country as regent. Jusztinian Serédi, an outstanding canon lawyer who collaborated with Cardinal Gasparri in the codification of the Code of Canon Law, was archbishop of Esztergom (1927–45). During these years as primate, his episcopate manifested the contradictory trends that characterized Hungarian life as a whole.

By the 1920 Treaty of Trianon, based on the principle of nationality, Hungary lost almost 75 percent of its territory and over half its 18 million inhabitants to the newly established states of Czechoslovakia, Romania, and Yugoslavia. As a result of the change, the percentage of Latin-rite Catholics and Calvinists increased, while that of Eastern-rite Catholics declined considerably and that of the Orthodox fell to negligible size.

Ecclesiastical organization underwent radical changes also. Five Latin-rite dioceses and two Eastern-rite sees passed to Czechoslovakia. Four Latin-rite dioceses and four Eastern Catholic sees became part of Romania. Three Latin sees, one Eastern see, and territory later formed into two apostolic administrations went to Yugoslavia. Italy acquired territory that later became a diocese. Only four sees in Hungary remained territorially intact. As reorganized at this time Hungary possessed three metropolitan sees and eight dioceses.

Catholic Activities to 1944. During his term as regent (1920–44), Horthy, a Calvinist, permitted the Church to realize partially its ambition of freedom from state supervision. In 1929 Horthy exercised the traditional governmental power of ecclesiastical patronage, at which time the Holy See admitted that the assent of the minister of worship and education, always a Catholic, was necessary for the nomination of bishops, chosen on the basis of recommendations by the conference of bishops. Despite such government intervention, the Church continued to control most elementary schools and a substantial minority of the secondary ones, while the state maintained all higher education. The government supported the Church's right to establish, administer and supervise schools and subsidized Church-affiliated schools with public funds. Seminaries enjoyed freedom from government interference.

Among those noted for their apostolic endeavors were the Jesuits Béla Bangha (1880–1940) and Ferenc Biró (1869–1938), who worked in Budapest to foster a Catholic press; Count Gusztáv Majláth, a bishop of Transylvania, who was known as "everybody's confessor," and Sándor sík, a Piarist priest, university professor and noted poet who was a leader in the Catholic Boy Scout movement and founder of the Young Hungarians, an organization for youthful intellectuals. Tihamér Tóth (1889–1940), bishop of Veszprém, was a noted preacher, writer, and an apostle of youth. The Catholic People's Alliance (Katolikus Népszövetség) maintained a close relationship with the Catholic political parties and declined in importance with them.

Congregations of religious women were founded to engage in educational and charitable works. The Social Mission Sisters were started in 1908. From this institute developed the Sisters of Social Service, founded in 1923 by Margit Schlachta, and active in the U.S. since 1926. Osvát Oslay, OFM, founded the Sisters of the Poor. These and other religious congregations, in collaboration with lay Catholics, organized the Association of Catholic Working Girls and Women and the Crusade of the Sacred Heart (Szigvárd), which became very popular among elementary school children. Ward College trained lay teachers of religion.

Jenő Kerkai, SJ, and other priests cooperated to organize the long-neglected rural youths and to instill in them a Catholic social spirit by means of retreats and “people’s universities.” To aid young urban workers, EMSZO (Egyházközségi Munkás Szakosztályok) and KIOE (Katolikus Iparos Ifjak Országos Egyesülete) were created in the 1930s. KALÁSZ (Katolikus Lányok Szövetkezete) sought to assist young women in country districts.

The Rising Tide of Fascism and Anti-Semitism.

Late in the 1930s the Fascist states gained a steadily increasing influence in Hungary, particularly after the German annexation of Austria in 1938. As a result Hungary’s fascist element became increasingly aggressive. Following the Munich Agreement in September of 1938, Hungary, supported by Germany and Italy, acquired southern Slovakia, then moved, with German backing, to occupy Carpathian Ukraine in March of 1939. When Germany, Italy and Japan concluded their three-power pact in September of 1940, the Hungarian government endorsed it.

Under pressure from German chancellor Adolf Hitler, in May of 1939 the Hungarian parliament passed drastic anti-Jewish laws, which rendered precarious the fate of Hungarian Jews, including many Christians of Jewish origin and many converts. Following the German occupation of Hungary in March of 1944, anti-Semitism was carried to extremes, as it was elsewhere under Nazi domination. Huge numbers of Jews were sent to extermination centers in Germany or Austria. Only a temporary halt in this program of genocide was effected by the strong resistance of the Hungarian populace, aided by Western European nations, the United States and particularly by the Holy See. Angelo Rotta, the papal nuncio, sent numerous protests against the deportations of Jews, organized the united remonstrations of Western diplomats and gave papal safeguard to many Jews by letters of asylum and by homes rendered inviolable by Vatican protection. While many individual Christians helped the persecuted Jews, organized help only came from the Catholic and Protestant churches. Religious orders and congregations of men and women were especially active in this work, many, like as did Bishops József Mindszenty and Vilmos Apor and Archabbot Krizosztom Kelemen of Pannonhalma, endangering their own lives in the process. As a result the majority of the Jews in Budapest were spared.

The Church under Communism. After the collapse of Germany, Hungary was occupied by Soviet troops in late 1944. Some contacts with the West survived until 1948, sparking hope that the country would once again gain political and cultural independence. However, a totalitarian Communist regime remained in power until the early 1990s. By 1970 all the Church-related elementary schools and the 32 Church-related teacher’s colleges existing in 1945 had disappeared. Church-related secondary schools dropped in number from 49 to eight, Catholic newspapers from 68 to four, Catholic publishers from 50 to two, and religious societies for lay Catholics from 4,000 to two.

Persecution. The Catholic Church ceased to be the state religion. Bishops, provincial superiors of religious orders and archbishops lost their membership in the upper house of parliament. In 1945 the government confiscated huge amounts of ecclesiastical possessions, depriving the Church of almost all its 1,225,000 acres of land. Despite the long-recognized need for land reform in the region, this action was not so much a reform as a confiscation intended to prepare the way for a collective farming system in which private property scarcely existed.

The government abolished also the parish assessments, resulting in a great decline in revenues and forcing the Church to depend more and more on government subsidies. The Communist regime used these subsidies as a means of intimidating the Church. Another part of the government program, which called for the confiscation of books from private and Church libraries, resulted in the sequestration or burning of a large percentage of the existing religious literature. Until 1957 it was forbidden to publish religious books, and from that date until the fall of communism this type of literature was given no space in Hungary’s public libraries.

Under communism, many priests were deported or imprisoned, generally on the pretext that they were conspiring against the state. The same reason was used to justify the suppression of almost all Catholic organizations, particularly youth movements. The Soviet army of occupation put to death Bishop Vilmos Apor of Győr on March 30, 1945, while he was defending women against brutalities.

Mindszenty. József MINDSZENTY (1892–1975) led the Hungarian people in their steady opposition to communism. In the eyes of the masses he was the nation’s leader. As pastor in a small town and as bishop of Veszprém (1944–45) he was very active in apostolic and social endeavors. In conjunction with several other bishops, he sought the cessation of useless blood shedding, causing fascist agents to imprison him. In 1945 he became archbishop of Esztergom, and in 1946 cardinal. As primate he composed the pastoral letters of the hierarchy revealing the details of religious persecution and decrying tyranny and atrocities, although Archbishop Gyula Czapik and other bishops preferred a more conciliatory attitude.

The year 1948, proclaimed by the cardinal as the Year of Our Lady, was marked by massive demonstrations in favor of religious and national freedom. To the Communists, Mindszenty's tremendous popularity was the main obstacle to their success. Annihilation of the Church's power and influence became their immediate objective. To attain it, and also to remove political rivals, they purged the Christian Democratic People's party, the Liberty party, and the Smallholders party, all of which favored the Church. Ferenc Nagy, prime minister and Monsignor Béla Varga, president of Parliament, went into exile. In December of 1948 Mindszenty was accused of subversion, treason, spying and currency manipulation and was arrested, tried, and condemned to death. After torture and drugs had extorted a confession of guilt from him, his statements were publicized during a showcase trial, and his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.

Concurrent with Mindszenty's imprisonment, the anti-Catholic efforts of the government escalated. Leading Catholic priests and laymen were condemned. Arrests of many other outstanding priests followed. Almost all members of religious orders were imprisoned or deported. Compulsory religious instruction was abolished. All Catholic schools were closed, and their property was confiscated.

By means of intimidation the bench of bishops was constrained to sign an agreement with the government on Aug. 30, 1949 that assured the Church liberty and the ability to conduct its work. Six Catholic schools for boys and two for girls were returned. Except for the Benedictines, the Franciscans, the Piarists and the School Sisters of Szeged, all religious orders were suppressed, but deportations of religious ceased. The hierarchy recognized the existing regime and permitted priests to take an oath of loyalty to the government. The Church was obligated to support the economic goals of the regime and to condemn anti-Communist activities. The government, on its part, assured a meager financial subsidy to the Church. Despite this agreement, relations between the Church and the Hungarian government remained strained into the 1950s.

The Communist government now claimed the right to exercise the power formerly held by the minister of worship and education in the nomination of bishops. Through its Office of Church Affairs (1951), the government named and transferred pastors and supervised or otherwise controlled other Church business through its own "Progressive" Catholic church. In June of 1951

József Grösz, archbishop of Kalocsa, was sentenced to 15 years in prison after a forced confession of guilt. Mindszenty and Grösz were placed under house arrest in 1955. In 1956 Grösz was freed and permitted to assume leadership of the hierarchy; Cardinal Mindszenty was liberated by freedom fighters during the failed October Revolution against Soviet control led by Imre Nagy but, after the defeat of the national uprising, took refuge at the U.S. legation in Budapest, where he remained in permanent protest against the subjugation of the Catholic faith. Upon Pope Paul VI's emphatic request, Cardinal Mindszenty left for Rome in September of 1971 and later moved to Vienna. Until Mindszenty's death in 1975 the pope declared the primate's chair in Esztergom as vacant.

Bibliography: Bibliographia hungariae, ed. R. GRAGGER, 4 v. in 1 (Berlin 1923–39). L. BALICS, The History of the Catholic Church in Hungary to c. 1300, 3 v. (Budapest 1885–90) in Hung.; The History of Christianity in the Area of Our Present Homeland until the Settling of the Hungarians (Budapest 1901) in Hung. E. HORN, Le Christianisme en Hongrie (Paris 1906); Organisation religieuse de la Hongrie (Paris 1906). Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:41–61, 9.2:1566–71. C. WOLFSGRUBER, Kirchengeschichte Österreichs-Ungarn (Vienna 1909). T. NAGY, History of Christianity in Hungary (Budapest 1939), in Hung. B. HÓMAN and G. SZEKFÜ, Hungarian History, 5 v. (2d ed. Budapest 1935–36), in Hung. B. HÓMAN, Geschichte des ungarischen Mittelalters, 2 v. (Berlin 1940–43). J. CSUDAY, Die Geschichte der Ungarn, tr. M. DARVAI, 2 v. (2d ed. Berlin 1900). C. A. MACARTNEY, Hungary (London 1934); Hungary: A Short History (Chicago 1962); The Magyars in the Ninth Century (Cambridge, Eng. 1931); A History of Hungary, 1929–1945, 2 v. (New York 1956–57). D. G. KOSÁRY, A History of Hungary (Cleveland 1941). F. DVORNIK, The Making of Central and Eastern Europe (London 1949). L. FEKETEKÚTY, Ungarn vom heiligen Stephan his Kardinal Mindszenty (Zurich 1950). J. ZEILLER, Les Origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'Empire romain (Bibliothèque des Écoles françaises d'Athènes et de Rome, fasc. 112; Paris 1918). H. LECLERCQ, "Pannonie," Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, eds., F. CABROL, H. LE CLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1046–63. J. DEÉR, Heathen Hungarians, Christian Hungarians (Szeged 1934), in Hung. B. RÖSS, "Die Bekehrung der Ungarn," Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft, 24 (1934) 301–311. G. LÁSZLÓ, "Die Reiternomaden der Völkerwanderungszeit und das Christentum in Ungarn," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, 59 (1940) 125–146. A. LIPPOLD and E. KIRSTEN, "Donauprovinzen," Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER [Stuttgart 1941 (1950)–] 4:147–189. K. JUHÁSZ, Das Tschanad-Temesvarer Bistum im frühen Mittelalter, 1030–1307 (Münster 1930); Laien im Dienst der Seelsorge während der Türkenherrschaft in Ungarn (Münster 1960). B. EBERL, Die Ungarnschlacht auf dem Lechfeld (Gunzenlê) im Jahre 955 (Augsburg 1955). A. LEFAIVRE, Les Magyars pendant la domination ottomane en Hongrie, 1526–1722, 2 v. (Paris 1902). A. S. ATIYA, The Crusade of Nicopolis (London 1934). L. POLGÁR, Bibliographia de historia Societatis Iesu in regnis olim corona hungarica unitis, 1560–1773 (Rome 1957). J. MISKOLCZY, Ungarn in der Habsburger-Monarchie (Vienna 1959). W. P. JUHÁSZ, "Social and Political Catholicism in Hungary," in Church and Society, ed. J. N. MOODY (New York 1953) 659–719; Blueprint for a Red Generation (New York 1952); Hungarian Social Reader, 1945–1964 (Munich 1965). K. KIRALY, The History of Attempts for a Catholic-Protestant Unity in Hungary (New Brunswick, NJ 1965). The Red and the Black: The Church in the Communist State (New York 1953). A. GALTER, The Red Book ! of the Persecuted Church (Westminster, MD 1957), tr. from French. S. MIHALOVICS, Mindszenty, Ungarn, Europa (Karlsruhe 1949). G. N. SHUSTER, Religion behind the Iron Curtain (New York 1954). G. SZÉCHÉNYI, Ungarn zwischen Rot und Rot (Munich 1963). R. A. GRAHAM, The Church of Silence (New York 1955). J. S. SZABÓ, Der Protestantismus in Ungarn (Berlin 1927), tr. from Hung. W. TOTH, "Christianization of the Magyars," Church History, 11 (1942) 33–54; "Highlights of the Hungarian Reformation," ibid. 9 (1940) 141–156; "Trinitarianism versus Antitrinitarianism in the Hungarian Reformation," ibid. 13 (1944) 255–268; "Stephan Kis of Szeged," Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte, 44 (1953) 86–181. Bilan du Monde. Encyclopédie catholique du monde chrétien, 2 v. (2d ed. Tournai 1964). 2:452–461. Annuario Pontificio has information on all diocese. Katholikus szemle (Rome 1936–). Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>1</sup>, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) v.1, 10:383–389; v. 2, 10:488–494.

[W. JUHÁSZ]

The Church under Communism. The effects of decades of communist oppression were many. Beside the loss of political faith, the national traditions were being eliminated under far-reaching modernization policies. The agricultural sector was collectivized, and the peasantry fled to the cities. The existing geographical and social structure disintegrated. The totalitarian regime made the organization of a new social system difficult. Individualism and atomization increased, as did social problems. The rate of suicides, divorces, abortions and alcoholism rose to among the highest in the world, while the life expectancy of Hungarians began to drop markedly during the 1970s.

While in the official central government the role of the party and the ideology decreased, society began to become independent. In 1966 the government instituted economic reforms designed to overcome the inefficiencies of central planning, increase productivity, make Hungary more competitive in world markets and create prosperity to ensure political stability. In contrast to the state-controlled economy, the home economy and moonlighting became so dominant that it generated a greater part of the national product than did the state economy. Beside the centrally controlled press, a larger number of illegal samizdats appeared. In the state-supervised Church, there flourished an underground activity and social groups. In short, the development of society outsmarted and undermined central control and supervision. Until the mid-1980s this was a spontaneous process; after that time there was a conscious pursuit to the regime. The political revolution of 1989 was successful in Hungary because it took place over an already existing market economy, on the initiatives of democratic institutions and on private enterprises.

Development of the Underground Church. While after the 1949 agreement between the bishops and the government the practice of religion was allowed in the churches, the state continued to prohibit congregational activity, all movements and organizations, public activity and religious presence in every day life. Religious instruction became impossible, or was forced underground. As priests became the subject of surveillance due to their public profile, ties between the visible Church and the underground Church weakened, and the two levels began to develop independently of one another. In the end the underground sector disintegrated as well, since during the persecution everyone strove for the utmost secrecy.

On the underground, or unofficial level, the key questions for the Church were community building, religious instruction, the fostering of spirituality, and the acquisition of a Christian culture. These goals were achieved primarily through the small communities and through camps camouflaged as tourist sites. All these were considered illegal by the state, or classified as conspiracy against the state, and persecuted and punished accordingly. In the 1970s the number of illegal Catholic communities was around 4,000, with an estimated membership of 100,000. Apart from the Communist Party and the party-supervised unions, there was no other social movement comparable in size. While during the first two decades of Communism persecution was directed primarily towards priests and religious, from the 1960s increasingly the laity was targeted.

Between 1945 and 1964, 360 diocesan priests (out of a total of 3,600), 940 religious priests (out of 1,420), 200 religious brothers (out of 1,300) and 2,200 women religious (out of 10,000) were imprisoned or placed in concentration camps. Thirty-four priests were either executed or died in prison. The most common forms of persecution against laypeople were loss or restrictions on jobs, prohibitions against higher education, and continual police surveillance; such persecutions often extended to other members of the family. Community-organizing activities resulted in imprisonment. Those arrested in these persecutions were gradually released during the 1970s; Pope Paul VI won the release of the last of the imprisoned priests in June of 1977 when he gave an audience to János Kádár, the secretary general of the Hungarian Communist Party.

Both the Vatican and Hungarian bishops attempted to maintain religious life within the framework authorized by the state. Faced with the possibilities of leaving sees long vacant or having them filled by unworthy government appointees, the Holy See signed an agreement with the Hungarian government on Sept. 30, 1964 whereby bishops appointed in accordance with the pact were required to take oaths of loyalty to the communist government following their consecration. This agreement resulted in the appointment of five bishops; the state and the Vatican shared the appointment of future bishops. Further results included the opening of the Hungarian Pontifical Institute in Rome in 1965 and a pilgrim house in 1967; permission for a pilgrimage to Rome in 1972; and the opening of a Christian museum. Unfortunately, because the issue of the imprisoned priests and other Catholics was not addressed in this agreement, many Catholics felt betrayed and the Church began to lose parishioners.

The presence of Cardinal Mindszenty in Budapest had remained a constant irritant to the state, and his departure for Rome in 1971 at the urging of the pope did much to improve Hungarian-Vatican relations. György Lázár, the Hungarian prime minister, received an audience with Pope Paul VI in November of 1975, followed by a meeting between the pope and Communist Party general secretary János Kádár, two years later. In November of 1984 Pope John Paul II received the president of the Office of Church Affairs, which had been in charge of the church persecutions. In response, the state continued to loosen restrictions on Church activity. In 1978, it allowed lay people to register for theological studies and permitted Hans-Peter Kolvenbach, the superior general of the Society of Jesus, to visit his fellow Jesuits in Hungary in 1985, the latter move interpreted as an unspoken recognition of the Jesuit order, which had been suppressed in 1950.

The Fall of Communism. Because of the moderate economic programs of its communist leadership, Hungary experienced a smooth transition to capitalism and parliamentary democracy compared to many nations in the Soviet sphere. Social and political activism increased and by 1987 nationalist movements were active and Budapest-based intellectuals were increasing pressure for change. Numerous political parties came into being, their purpose to gain independence. In 1988 the constitution was revised to allow freedom of association and freedom of religion. The Soviet Union reduced its presence within Hungary, and withdrew its forces by June of 1991. A symbolic reburial in June of 1989 of executed October Revolution leader Imre Nagy and his associates, helped to give closure to those victimized during the tragedy of 1956.

On Oct. 18, 1989 a new constitution was promulgated and two days later the region became a democratic republic. The fall of Communism wrought a fundamental change in ecclesiastical policy, as well as social and political life. The new Hungarian government extended an invitation to Pope John Paul II to visit Hungary. The diplomatic ties that had been severed in 1945 were reestablished. The 1950 decree that had suppressed religious orders was repealed. Early in 1990 the Parliament passed a law guaranteeing freedom of conscience and religion. The Supreme Court nullified the 1948 verdict against Cardinal Mindszenty. Representatives of the state and the Church mutually declared void the 1950 agreement between the Hungarian Catholic Church and the state that had been forced by the Communist government. A Christian democratic coalition won the elections that were held in the spring of 1990. It was a free Hungary that received Pope John Paul II in August of 1991.

The Resurgence of the Church. Between 1945 and 1990 the nature of religion changed, moving from an integral part of Hungarian culture to an antiquated tradition out of touch with a society devoid of hope. Before the late 1950s most Hungarians attended church regularly, and all children were baptized. The failure of the October Revolution and the concurrent economic downturn marked a shift, and between 1960 and 1978 the percentage of children baptized fell to 69 percent, and Sunday church attendance fell from 70 to eight percent.

Despite the large scale de-Christianization of Hungarian society, the phenomenon of a religion based on personal conviction increased during the last two decades of the 20th century. As the public lost faith in the Communist regime during the 1980s, many reverted to their traditional faith and looked for solutions to the country's social and economic ills to the same Church-run institutions that had supported the social fabric through schools, hospitals and other social outreach programs in the past. The rural congregations of the past were replaced by an evolving urban-based faith that gained strength among the intellectuals, the young, and those in major cities. A surge in religiosity became apparent. Hungarian society, while becoming more independent economically and culturally, demonstrated that it had become independent ideologically as well. In 1986, 60 percent of the population considered themselves religious; by 1991, that figure had risen to 70 percent. In 1990 Hungary reestablished diplomatic relations with the Holy See, and three years later Pope John Paul II restructured the hierarchy to realign the diocese with territorial changes as well as the growing population.

During the 1990s the government enacted economic reforms and privatized many industries, also adopting a policy of fiscal austerity in 1995. In response to voters's demands for the inclusion of the churches in public affairs and the return of previous ecclesiastical institutions, a law was passed in 1990 that legalized religious institutions. However, three issues remained unresolved. The government declared the separation of church and state, but the meaning of the "separation" remained unclear. In addition, the legal status of the Churches was unclear.

Also, there was no mention of the return of Church property nationalized in the 1950s, nor of compensation for losses suffered due to persecution under the Communist era. Separation meant that the Church, plundered and ruined, was left on its own. During the debates that followed, a strong social polarization developed along religious lines, showing that communist indoctrination of anti-Church prejudice had been successful among some Hungarians. In 1991 a law was passed allowing partial compensation to the churches for property confiscated in the 1940s and 1950s, and for the restoration of property required for religious, educational, welfare, health and monastic purposes within ten years; due to financial difficulties, the law was amended in 1995. On June 20, 1997 the government and the Vatican concluded an agreement regulating state subsidies for Church-operated schools and hospitals, and setting up the restoration of former Church property. The 850 properties in state hands were scheduled to be returned between 1998 and 2010, while an additional 1,000 formerly church properties would be retained and compensated for by the state. Restitution for the over 600,000 Hungarian Jews killed during the Holocaust Parliament was also granted through the creation of a Hungarian Jewish Heritage Fund. The state also passed a law allowing citizens to allocate one percent of their personal income tax to the Church.

Into the 21st Century. The documents of Vatican II appeared in Hungarian only in 1975, and were of little relevance for a Church then attempting to survive in an oppressive environment. A defense against persecution at times led to a fundamentalist position that contravened the spirit of the Second Vatican Council. Any renewal, a dialogue with the rest of the world, or ecumenical cooperation occurred among the secular Christians and within the small, underground communities. The fall of communism resulted in a reappraisal of the Church; the recognition of its institutionalized, structured ecclesiastical order and its practical re-evaluation. During his trip to Hungary in September of 1996, Pope John Paul II encouraged Catholic leaders “to promote unity among Christians,” through “engagement in dialogue, in listening, and in the advancement of those things which bring us together.”

The rebuilding of the Church would be a monumental challenge that would continue for many decades. By 2000 the religious orders were regaining their former strength, with over 60 female orders and 25 male religious orders in Hungary. The rebuilding of Catholic education institutions was underway, and by 2000 there were 50 nursery schools, 96 elementary schools, 50 secondary schools, 18 teacher-training colleges and several colleges directed by catholic communities or religious orders. The Catholic media also expanded. However, crime and an increasing indifference to religion on the part of many Hungarians was also noted, and during the 2001 ad limina visit from Hungary’s bishops, the pope expressed his concern over the rising abortion rate in the country resulting from the availability of legal abortions. He encouraged the bishops to extend their ministries to younger generations, who had not grown up with faith, and establish a Catholic university in the country.

By 2000 there were 2,214 parishes tended by 2,000 diocesan and 505 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 160 brothers and 1,700 sisters, who were involved in education and other outreach programs. In 2000 a step toward resolution between Orthodox and Catholics in Hungary was made when the Patriarch of Constantinople recognized the Catholic saint King Stephen I, founder of Hungary in 1000, as an Orthodox saint; both faiths celebrated St. Stephen’s day for the first time on Aug. 21, 2000, in a gathering in Budapest.

Bibliography: E. ANDRÁS and J. MOREL, Kirche im Übergang. Die katholische Kirche Ungarns 1945–1982 (Wien 1982); Hungarian Catholicism: A Handbook (Wien 1983). I. ANDRÁS, “L’Église de Hongrie,” Pro Mundi Vita Dossiers, 2 (1984). P. G. BOZSOKY and L. LUKÁCS, De l’oppression à la liberté. L’Église en Hongrie 1945–1992 (Paris 1993). A. MOLNÁR and M. TOMKA, “Youth and Religion in Hungary,” Religion in Communist Lands, 3 (1989) 209–229. M. TOMKA, “Stages of Religious Change in Hungary,” in World Catholicism in Transition, ed. T.M. GANNON (New York 1988) 169–183; Religion und Kirche in Ungarn. Ergebnisse religionssoziologischer Forschung 1969–1988 (Wien 1990); “Secularization or Anomy?” Social Compass, 1 (1991) 93–102; “Church and Religion in a Communist State 1945–1990,” New Hungarian Quarterly, 121 (spring 1991) 59–69; “Religion and Religiosity,” in Social Report, ed. R. ANDORKA, T. KOLOSI and G. VUKOVICH (Budapest 1992) 379–393; “Modernizzazione e Chiesa: l’esperienza dell’Ungheria comunista e postcomunista,” in La religione degli europei, ed. D. HERVIEU-LÉGER, et al. (Torino 1992).

[M. TOMKA]

HUNS

Mongolians who invaded Europe via the Russian steppes during the 4th century A.D. and precipitated the Germanic invasions of the Roman world. Their identity and their reasons for migrating westward are undetermined. True nomads, grouped in many small tribes and clans without a central government, they advanced into Europe presumably after an ephemeral tribal coalition. Ammianus Marcellinus indicates that with their strange racial features, crude habits, expert horsemanship, swift movement, and short, powerful bow they had psychological and military advantages over more sedentary peoples. About 369 they swept along the conquered Alans as their unwilling allies. They decimated the Ostrogoths and occupied their land (370–375). For five decades they dominated East Central Europe as Germans fled from them across the Rhine-Danube frontier. Little is known of their internal affairs. Loosely organized, they were ready to serve as mercenary troops for the Visigoths (Adrianople 378), Theodosius (388), Stilicho (406), or Aetius (425, 433–439). They raided the Balkans in 395, 408, and 422, but only after they had concentrated their forces under a centralized government could they threaten the Roman Empire. By 425 three brothers (Mundiuch, Octar, and Rua) ruled the Huns. When Rua died in 434 Attila and Bleda inherited the power of their uncles. Attila reigned alone after he murdered Bleda c. 445. The Huns crossed the Danube in raids (422, 441–443, 447) and exacted tribute from Byzantium (430, 435, 443, 448). The historian Priscus supplies valuable information about them in these years. When Marcian in 450 stopped the tribute, Attila for unknown reasons decided to undertake a western campaign. In early 451 the Huns and their Germanic allies crossed the Rhine to Metz and Orléans where they were stopped in June. Attila retreated to the "Mauriac Plain" near Troyes, where the Roman general Aetius attacked him. The battle was indecisive but Attila withdrew and, as Aetius failed to exploit his advantage, descended into Italy in 452. Cities surrendered without resistance until food shortages, losses of troops, and an East Roman attack at his rear disposed Attila to heed the pleas of an embassy from Rome: Pope Leo I, the Prefect Trygetius, and the Consul Avienus. Attila returned to Hungary and died in 453. Quarrels among his sons permitted the Germans to rebel and shatter the Hun empire in a battle at the Nedao River in Pannonia c. 454. Thereafter Hunnish remnants entered the East and West Roman armies or wandered about the steppes as Kotrigurs, Onogundurs, and Utigurs. They probably merged with Bulgarians, Avars, and similar Mongol groups eventually.

Attila ("King of the Huns"). (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Bibliography: E. A. THOMPSON, A History of Attila and the Huns (Oxford 1948). F. ALTHEIM, Geschichte der Hunnen, 5 v. (Berlin 1959–62). C. D. GORDON, The Age of Attila (Ann Arbor 1961).

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

HUNT, DUANE GARRISON

Bishop, preacher; b. Reynolds, Nebraska, Sept. 19, 1884; d. Salt Lake City, Utah, March 31, 1960. He was the son of Andrew Dixon and Dema (Garrison) Hunt, both Methodists. Hunt attended Cornell College, Mount Vernon, Iowa, and the State University of Iowa, Iowa City. While doing graduate work at the University of Chicago, he began to study the history of the Catholic Church, into which he was received in January 1913. He accepted a position on the faculty of the University of Utah, Salt Lake City, where further study in the field of religion led him to enter St. Patrick's Seminary, San Francisco, to prepare for the priesthood. He was ordained in 1920 by Joseph Glass, second bishop of Salt Lake City, and served in various parishes of that diocese. Its third bishop, John J. Mitty, appointed him vicar-general, a position he retained during Bishop James E. Kearney's administration (1932–37). When Kearney was transferred to the Rochester Diocese, Hunt was appointed fifth bishop of Salt Lake City and was consecrated on Oct. 28, 1937. In 1946 he was made an assistant at the pontifical throne.

Hunt was outstanding as a preacher and for many years conducted a popular radio program of Catholic information, which served to dissipate anti-Catholic prejudice and led many to enter the Church. He wrote The People, the Clergy and the Church (1936) and was editor of the Intermountain Catholic (1930–32).

[J. E. KEARNEY]

HUNT, THOMAS, BL.

Priest, martyr; vere Benstead; b. c. 1574 in Norfolk, England; d. c. July 11, 1600, hanged, drawn, and quartered at Lincoln. He studied at the English Colleges of Valladolid and Seville, Spain, where he was ordained (c. 1599). He was not in England long before he was arrested. Imprisoned at Wisbeach, Hunt escaped with five others and remained free for several months. He was with Bl. Thomas SPROTT at Saracen's Head Inn, Lincoln, when he was arrested a second time. They were convicted of treason for being priests. The two were beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast: Feb. 12; May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HUNT, THURSTAN, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Greenlow; b. ca. 1555 at Carlton Hall (near Leeds), Yorkshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered ca. April 3, 1601 at Lancaster. The well-born Hunt was ordained (1585) at Rheims by Cardinal de Guise after he completed study there in 1584. Thereafter he worked in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Cheshire for 15 years. On Sept. 30, 1600, he was captured near Preston by the authorities while trying to rescue Bl. Fr. Robert MIDDLETON as he was being taken to prison. They were imprisoned in London, but returned to Lancaster for sentencing and execution. Following their execution, their relics were eagerly gathered and venerated. Hunt's "haughty courage stout" was commemorated in a contemporary song. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast: Feb. 12; May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HUNT, WALTER

Carmelite theologian; b. in the west of England, early 15th century; d. Oxford, England, Nov. 28, 1478. A member of the CARMELITES, he was by 1450 a doctor in theology from the University of OXFORD. He attended the Ecumenical Council of FLORENCE, during which he was presumably prominent in the doctrinal discussions with the Greeks. He wrote a work about this council and compiled its acta, but neither this work nor his other writings on a wide range of subjects are extant [for a list of his writings, some with incipit's, see A. B. Emden, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:986–987]. Hunt was a representative of the Oxford section of the English Carmelite province at a provincial meeting held in 1446 or 1447 concerning reform measures to be taken up at the general chapter of 1447. In 1450 he was a chaplain to Cardinal John KEMP, and despite his status as a friar he had dispensations for livings and held various benefices, canonries, and prebends. He was buried in the church of the Carmelite friary at Oxford.

Bibliography: J. BALE, Scriptorum illustrium maioris Brytanniae, quam nunc Angliam et Scotiam vocant, catalogus, 2 v. (Basel 1557–59), 1:615–616. C. DE VILLIERS, Bibliotheca carmelitana, ed. G. WESSELS, 2 v. in 1 (Rome 1927) 1:579–581. J. TAIT, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 10:281.

[K. J. EGAN]

HUONDER, ANTON

Jesuit missiologist and ascetical writer, whose works were mainly concerned with the history, development, and peculiar problems of the various missionary fields; b. Chur, Switzerland, Dec. 25, 1858; d. Bonn, Germany, Aug. 23, 1926. He entered the Society of Jesus on Sept. 30, 1875, made his theological studies in Holland and England, and was ordained in 1889. He became a renowned preacher of the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius, specializing in retreats to priests. He waged a constant battle against Europeanism in the missions, and was a contributor to and the vigorous director of the periodical Die Katholischen Missionen. He exercised a great and efficacious influence in his many writings on the development of the native clergy and the growth of missionary societies at home. His principal works began to be published in 1899 and extend through 1932. A three-volume work, Die Mission auf der Kanzel und im Verein, was published at Freiburg im Breisgau between 1912 and 1914. As an ascetical writer, he is best known for his series of meditations, Zu Fuessen des Meisters, in four volumes, and for his character study of St. Ignatius Loyola, published posthumously in 1932.

Bibliography: J. A. OTTO, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:542.

[J. FLYNN]

HUREZI (HOREZI), ABBEY OF

In Moldavia, district of Vîlcea, built in 1690 by order of Prince John Constantin Brâncoveanu in the forest of Hurezi. Accomplished craftsmen, using the costliest material, worked on the abbey, which was built to commemorate Brâncoveanu's reign. It was the most important and representative Romanian monastery of its time, and was made stauropelial, i.e., subject directly to the patriarch of Constantinople. It comprises, besides the principal church, a chapel to the Virgin, several sketes (hermitages), and a hospital. Its beautiful arcades, graceful loggias, and intricate columns, as well as its windows and gates framed with floral designs, show the influence of Venice on Romanian religious art. The walls of the principal church are richly decorated with paintings representing religious subjects and also portraits of the founder, of his family and ancestry. This abbey once owned an excellent library and a rich treasure of sacred objects. At present it is inhabited by nuns.

Bibliography: N. IORGA, Istoria bisericii românești, 2 v. (2d ed. Bucharest 1929–32); and G. BALS, Histoire de l'art roumain ancien (Paris 1922). Enciclopedia României, 4 v. (Bucharest 1936–43) 2:506.

[T. FOTITCH]

HURLEY, MICHAEL

Religious superior; b. perhaps in Ireland, c. 1780; d. Philadelphia, Pa., May 15, 1837. His father, Thomas, an Irish immigrant, settled the family in Philadelphia. In 1797 or 1798 Michael Hurley became the first American candidate for the Augustinian Order. He went to Italy for his clerical education, and was ordained in 1803. He returned to Philadelphia to assist the founder of St. Augustine's Church (1796), Rev. Thomas Matthew Carr. In 1805 Hurley went to help at St. Peter's Church in New York City, where he remained for two years. During that time he met Mrs. Elizabeth Bayley SETON and became her spiritual adviser and close friend. After returning to Philadelphia, Hurley became pastor of St. Augustine's (1820) and Augustinian superior in the U.S. (1826). As one of the promoters of the St. Joseph's Society for Catholic Orphans, he was instrumental in bringing the Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md., to Philadelphia for this work in 1814. He assisted Bp. Henry Conwell at the public excommunication (1821) of the renegade priest William HOGAN. In 1832 he was acclaimed by Philadelphia city officials for his services during the cholera epidemic.

[A. J. ENNIS]

HURTADO, CASPAR

Jesuit theologian; b. Mondejar, New Castile, 1575; d. Alcalá, Aug. 5, 1646. He studied at the University of Alcalá de Henares, where he won high honors over many competitors in his doctoral examination. He was immediately appointed professor at the University, where he lectured with success until 1607. Then, at age 32, he resigned his chair to enter the Society of Jesus. He continued lecturing in theology, with brief stays at Murcia and Madrid. Subsequently, he went to Alcalá, where he taught for the remaining 30 years of his life. When he died, he was dean of the faculty. Hurtado's life was distinguished by learning and piety. A famous orator as well as a distinguished lecturer, he preached successfully before the Spanish Court. In his theological writings, noted for their concision and clarity, Hurtado was among the first to depart from the method of St. Thomas and to follow a system of his own. His principal works are: De Eucharistia, sacrificio missae et ordine (Alcalá 1620), De matrimonio et censuris (Alcalá 1627), De incarnatione Verbi (Alcalá 1628), De Sacramentis in genere et in specie (Alcalá 1628), De beatitudine, de actibus humanis, bonitate et malitia, habitibus, virtutibus et peccatis (Madrid 1632), Disputationes de sacramentis et censuris (Antwerp 1633), and De Deo (Madrid 1642).

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932) 4:532–533. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:922–923. J. SIMÓN-DÍAZ, Historia del Colegio imperial de Madrid, v.1 (Madrid 1952). J. URRIZA, La preclara Facultad de Arte y Filosofía de la Universidad de Alcalá de Henares en el siglo de oro, 1509–1621 (Madrid 1941). N. ANTONIO, Bibliotheca hispana sive Hispanorum, 2 v. (Rome 1672). P. ALEGAMBA, Bibliotheca scriptorum Societatis Jesu (Antwerp 1643).

[J. E. KOEHLER]

HURTADO CRUCHAGA, ALBERTO, BL.

Jesuit priest; b. Jan. 22, 1901, Viña del Mar, Chile; d. Aug. 18, 1952, Santiago de Chile. Hurtado, known as "the Apostle of the Poor," experienced poverty himself following the death of his aristocratic father when he was four. While attending the Jesuit Colegio San Ignacio (1909–17) in Santiago, he spent his Sunday afternoons tending the city's poor. He postponed entering the Jesuit novitiate until Aug. 14, 1923, in order to support his family, complete his military service, and earn a law degree (August 1923) at the Catholic University of Santiago.

He entered the Jesuit novitiate at Chillán (1923–24) and Córdoba, Argentina (1925). After professing his first vows (Aug. 15, 1925), he continued his studies in the humanities, philosophy, and theology in Spain (1927–32), Ireland, and finally Belgium, where he was ordained at Louvain in 1933. After completing his final year of training at Drongen, he returned to Santiago de Chile (1936) to teach theology at the Colegio San Ignacio and pedagogy at Catholic University of Santiago.

As a frequent retreat master he affected the lives of many young men. He fostered more than 100 priestly vocations and led others to committed service as laymen. In 1941, he undertook the chaplaincy of Catholic Action's youth movement in Santiago, and later nationally. In 1944, the charismatic priest challenged female retreatants to assist the city's poor. Their response resulted in the founding of El Hogar de Cristo (Christ's Hearth), family-like housing first for homeless children, then for adults, that provided vocational training and/or rehabilitation.

In 1945–46, while studying sociology at the Catholic University of America and residing with the Jesuit community at Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., Fr. Hurtado visited Fr. Flanagan's Boys Town to adapt the concept to Chile. Returning to Chile he founded (1947) the Chilean Trade Union Association (ASICH) based on the social teachings of the Church. His last years were spent extending his work and the social teachings of the Church. He died in 1952 of pancreatic cancer.

His most famous composition is Is Chile a Catholic country? (Santiago 1941); however, between 1947 and 1950 he wrote on the Church's social teaching, including Social Humanism, On Unions, and The Christian Social Order. In 1951 he founded the journal Mensaje (Messages) to further explain magisterial teaching on social justice.

During the beatification ceremony, Oct. 16, 1994, Pope John Paul II praised him for his use of modern communications methods to spread the Gospel.

Feast: Aug. 18 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: Alberto Hurtado: cómo lo vimos, ed. H. M. BRUNET (Santiago, Chile 1994). El padre Hurtado: quién fue?: qué haría hoy? (Santiago, Chile 1994). Padre Alberto Hurtado: "contento, señor, contento," vida, obra y testimonios (Santiago, Chile 1990). A. MAGNET, El Padre Hurtado (Santiago, Chile 1990). O. MARFÁN, Alberto Hurtado: Cristo estaba en él (Santiago, Chile 1993). L. E. MARIUS, Mensaje y compromiso del Padre Alberto

Hurtado (Caracas 1994). J. L. RUIZ-TAGLE IBAÑEZ, Alberto Hurtado: un hombre, un santo (Santiago, Chile 1992). J. VADELL, Bienaventurados los pobres (Santiago, Chile 1978).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HURTER, HUGO VON

Jesuit theologian and historian; b. Schaffhausen, Switzerland, Jan. 11, 1832; d. Innsbruck, Austria, Dec. 10, 1914. With training in historical method from his father, he became a Catholic in 1844 in Rome. He was ordained in 1855, received doctorates in philosophy and theology at the German college in Rome in 1856, and became a Jesuit in 1857. From 1858 to 1912 he taught dogmatic theology at the University of Innsbruck. His reputation rests on his works Theologiae dogmaticae compendium (3 v., 1876–78, 12th ed. 1909), an abridgment of the Medulla theologiae dogmaticae (1870, 8th ed. 1908), and especially Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (3 v., 1871–86), an annotated catalogue of Catholic theologians from the Council of Trent to his day. The second edition of the Nomenclator (1891–92) includes the period 1109 to 1563, and the third edition (1903–13) begins with the Patristic period, and is indispensable for the study of the history of Catholic theology.

Hugo's father Frederick, b. Schaffhausen, March 19, 1787; d. Graz, Austria, Aug. 27, 1865; was a Protestant minister from 1808 to 1841. Through his sympathy with Catholicism, because of his attitude toward authority in an age of revolution, and perhaps through the influence of the ethos of Romanticism, he and his family were converted to the Church in 1844. He favored Metternich. In 1846 he was made a noble and historian of the court of Vienna. He wrote historical studies of Innocent III (4 v., 1834–42), Emperor Ferdinand II (11 v., 1850–64), and Wallenstein (1855, 1862), and several volumes of an autobiographical nature. A son, Henry, wrote his biography (2 v., Graz 1876–77).

Bibliography: J. M. HILLENKAMP, P. Hurter, S.J. (Innsbruck 1917). P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:332–333. F. LAKNER, "Die Dogmatische Theologie an der Universität Innsbruck," Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie (Vienna 1877—) 80 (1958) 104, 111–113.

[F. X. MURPHY]

HUS, JOHN

Czech reformer; b. Husinec, southwest Bohemia, 1369?; d. Constance, July 6, 1415. In 1393 he received a B.A. and in 1396 an M.A. in Prague. He was ordained in 1400, and from 1402 he was the preacher at Bethlehem chapel, which had been founded in 1391 for sermons in the Czech language. He became a bachelor of theology in 1404 and taught philosophy and theology. At Bethlehem he followed the tradition of other reforming preachers, advocating reform in morals with great oratorical success. He wrote theological treatises, commentaries on Holy Scripture, various pieces on the spiritual life, and works of controversy in both Latin and Czech. Excommunicated in 1412, he left Prague to spare his fellow citizens the penalties of interdict. He was invited to the Council of CONSTANCE, where he was condemned to death in the absence of a supreme pontiff (JOHN XXIII had fled, GREGORY XII had abdicated, and BENEDICT XIII had refused to come to the council). Hus went to the stake on July 6, 1415. Under various headings the council condemned 30 propositions extracted from his works (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, [Freiburg 1963] 1201–1230).

The nineteenth century saw Hus mainly as a national hero. The historical pretext for this view was the fact that King WENCESLAUS IV in 1409 had altered the method of voting at the Charles University of Prague. To make sure that the university would support the reform-minded cardinals at the Council of PISA, who in turn would support his imperial title, Wenceslaus gave three votes to the Czech nation, which was well-disposed toward Pisa, but only one vote to the combined “foreign” nations (the Bavarian, Saxon, and Polish) who chose instead to remain faithful to Pope Gregory XII. Legend credits this victory of the Czechs over the Germans to Hus. In fact, the king had acted from purely political motives. Further, among the nations discriminated against, one, the Polish, was Slavic; while the Czech nation itself comprised a good percentage of Bohemians originally of German stock. The cleavage, then, did not have a national basis. Besides, at the moment Wenceslaus made his decision at Kutna Hora, Hus lay seriously ill in Prague. Moreover, the myth that Hus was a nationalist leader was strengthened by the fact that he was executed at Constance, despite the safe conduct that the Emperor SIGISMUND had rather unwisely granted.

There was in fact much rivalry in Prague between Czech and German masters in the early fifteenth century, but not on the basis of nationalism. Age divided them, the Czechs on the whole belonging to a younger generation. There were also doctrinal dissensions, for in philosophical matters the Czechs were usually adherents of REALISM, and the Germans of NOMINALISM. The Czechs on the whole favored reform, while the Germans, as holders of large benefices, were conservative. This explains their attitude in 1409. The Germans wanted the status quo, but the Czechs supported the accession of Wenceslaus at Pisa, because they looked forward to the end of the WESTERN SCHISM and to reform in the Church.

Influence of Wyclif. About 1400, the reformers in Bohemia came strongly under the influence of John WYCLIF. Quite early in the movement, Hus became the leader of the Wyclifite party and did not conceal his admiration for the Oxford master. He defended his books and copied him widely. But although Hus adopted Wyclif’s ideals of reform, he avoided subscribing to his formal heresies. A fortiori, he knew nothing of sola fides or sola scriptura, or of the great theses of future Protestantism. Most of Wyclif’s ideas were to be found in Hus, but in his writings they received a Catholic inflection. Hus insisted on the sacramental idea of the Eucharistic bread, without denying TRANSUBSTANTIATION. Basing himself on the doctrine of the Good Shepherd, he taught that a bishop was “true” in the sense of “good,” only so far as he lived an evangelical life, but he did not deny the sacramental character of episcopal orders. He accepted a legal, empirical, and transitory Church, but believed in another Church whose character was changeless and eternal: the Church of the predestined, as he called it. He taught that a person was a worthy member of the Church on earth only so far as he gave indisputable signs of belonging to the heavenly Church. He did not attack indulgences, but was opposed to those granted by the antipope John XXIII, who had attached them to his “crusade” against Pope Gregory XII in Rome. The only real heresy in his teaching concerned the primacy of the Bishop of Rome. The latter appeared to him to go back to Jesus Christ, but not in the sense that he possessed a formal and necessary primacy of jurisdiction (see PAPACY). In addition he attributed this predominance of Rome, which was unknown in the Gospel, to the Emperor CONSTANTINE. He did not reject the idea of a pope, but accepted it only on condition that the pope’s conduct marked him as a disciple of Jesus Christ.

Council of Constance. Hus’ teaching alone does not account for his tragic end at CONSTANCE. Together with his compromise with Wyclifite doctrines, both his character and the provocative turn of his ideas against avarice and simony, and against the richly endowed prelates guilty of those vices, must all be borne in mind. He alienated the most influential of his earliest friends, both Czechs and reformers. These led a tireless cabal against him in Constance, where they found an audience that was only too attentive, in an assembly prejudiced by his reputation as a heretic—for which the Germans, who left Prague in 1409, were responsible. In the last analysis, the emergence of a Hus must be ascribed to the condition of Christianity after almost 40 years of schism. The degradation of authority, the perversion of institutions, the general state of corruption supported his protest.

Hus went voluntarily to the council. If he did not come to an understanding with his judges, it was primarily because he refused to renounce a body of heresies that he had either not taught at all or only to a slight degree. He was condemned because he lacked suppleness, and because he appeared before a tribunal that had already reached its verdict. Hus died pardoning his enemies, invoking the name of Jesus, and reciting the Credo.

See Also: HUSSITES.

Bibliography: Sources. Historia et Monumenta Johannis Hus . . ., 2 v. (Nuremberg 1558). K. J. ERBEN, Mistra Jana Husi Sebrané spisy české z nejstarších známých pramenů, 3 v. (Prague 1865–68). For the many recent partial editions see below. Literature. J. SEDLÁK, M. Jan Hus (Prague 1915). V. NOVOTNÝ and V. KYBAL, M. Jan Hus: Život a Učení, 5 v. (Prague 1919–31). M. VISCHER, Jan Hus: Aufruhr wider Papst und Reich (Frankfurt an Main 1955). M. SPINKA, John Hus and the Czech Reform (Chicago 1941). F. G. HEYMANN, John Žizka . . . (Princeton 1955). P. DE VOOGHT, L'Hérésie de Jean Huss (Louvain 1960); Hussiana (Louvain 1960). M. SPINKA, John Hus' Concept of the Church (Princeton 1966).

[P. DE VOOGHT]

HUSSERL, EDMUND

Philosopher, founder and originator of the phenomenological movement in twentieth-century European thought; b. Prossnitz, Austria, April 8, 1859; d. Freiburg im Breisgau, April 27, 1938. Of Jewish background, Edmund Husserl was schooled early in Vienna and Olmütz. In 1897 he entered the University of Leipzig to study science, but he transferred in 1878 to Berlin and studied mathematics under Kronecker, Kummer, and Weierstrass. Returning to Vienna in 1881, he received his doctorate two years later for his dissertation (unpublished) on the calculus of variations. Here he fell under the strongest intellectual influence of his life, the teaching and the person of Franz BRENTANO.

Teaching. The first period of Husserl's philosophical career, the prephenomenological period, consists of the 15 years he spent as privatdocent at the University of Halle. During this time he was assistant to the psychologist Carl Stumpf and engaged in an intensive study of mathematics and logic. In Philosophie der Arithmetik (Halle 1891) Husserl proposed the thesis of PSYCHOLOGISM, namely, that the structure and principles of mathematics were reducible to psychic acts and the content of psychic acts.

The publication of Logische Untersuchungen, 2 v. (Halle 1900–01), won for Husserl the post of lecturer in philosophy at Göttingen, where he remained until 1916.

The first volume of this work gave public expression to Husserl's rejection of his earlier thesis of psychologism. The six studies of the second volume were preliminary studies in phenomenology concerned with the meaning of meaning and the theory of knowledge. His early lectures at Göttingen continued these interests in phenomenology. The five spring lectures of 1907 were published posthumously as Die Idee der Phänomenologie. In 1910 appeared the famous essay entitled "Philosophie als strenge Wissenschaft," Logos (1910–11) 289–341, in which Husserl criticized both naturalism and the historicism of Weltanschauung philosophy in his attempt to establish philosophy as a strict science.

During the 15 Göttingen years, Husserl suffered from professional disappointments and from severe doubts over his vocation as a teacher and as a philosopher. His intense discussions attracted a small and devoted circle about him, the original Göttingen Circle, from which the Munich Circle of phenomenologists drew their ideas and enthusiasm. In 1913 Husserl collaborated with Max SCHELER in founding and editing the phenomenological journal Jahrbuch für Philosophie und phänomenologische Forschung. Part one of volume one was the first volume of Husserl's major work, commonly referred to as Ideen I, although he was never well enough satisfied with the two subsequent volumes to allow their publication in his lifetime. Here he worked out many of the detailed techniques of phenomenology. Phenomenological reduction (epoché) is achieved by "bracketing off" every irrelevant item in a given experience in order to gain direct intuition into the essence immediately given as the object of the experiencing act. In the truncated article on phenomenology in the Encyclopaedia Britannica (14th ed. 1929), Husserl stated that the object of phenomenology must be to proceed from psychological descriptions of eidetic essences (first philosophy) to a transcendental phenomenology of total intentional subjectivity. Such a science of pure consciousness would be the pure phenomenology announced in the title of Ideen I.

In Formale und transzendente Logik (Halle 1929) Husserl attempted to solve the problem of idealism through a careful phenomenological investigation of the mind's activity constituting its own ideating acts and the study of that constitution in the very moments of their genesis. Thus a "genetic phenomenology" was to lead to "transcendental phenomenology," that is, one that would transcend the purely ideal limitation of the individual subject.

In February of 1929 Husserl delivered a series of lectures at the Sorbonne in Paris known as the Méditations cartésiennes. The chief purpose of these lectures was to escape from idealistic SOLIPSISM. In them Husserl maintained that the transcendental ego enters into partnership with an intersubjective community by “pairing” itself off against another ego; through empathetic understanding of the whole transcendental intersubjective community, the first ego is in community with the second.

After retirement in 1929, Husserl wrote Die Krise der europäischen Wissenschaften und die transzendente Phänomenologie; here he worked out his notion of the Lebenswelt, the world of lived experience. Husserl’s Jewish family background served as the grounds for political harassment during his last years, and so he withdrew quietly to a Benedictine monastery to be near a former student; there he died, silently aware of the transcendence of God.

Influence. It has been difficult to assign Husserl’s significance in the phenomenological movement. He was slow to publish his own manuscripts—H. L. Van Breda has gathered all of Husserl’s papers into the Husserlian Archives at the University of Louvain—and, at times, he openly rejected the work of his closest followers. The original circles of phenomenologists gathered in Munich and Göttingen were small, but the personnel carried out their projects with great enthusiasm and great scientific rigor. The original spirit and methodology of phenomenology remains strong in Continental thought, not only in philosophy, but also in literature, psychology, psychoanalysis, sociology, and theology.

See Also: PHENOMENOLOGY.

Bibliography: Works. Gesammelte Werke (Husserliana) (The Hague 1950–) v. 1, Cartesianische Meditationen und Pariser Vorträge, ed. S. STRASSER (1950); v. 2, Die Idee der Phänomenologie, ed. W. BIEMEL (1950); v. 3–5, Ideen zu einer Reinen Phänomenologie und phänomenologischen Philosophie I–III, ed. W. and M. BIEMEL (1950–52); v. 6, Die Krise der europäischen Wissenschaften und die transzendente Phänomenologie, ed. W. BIEMEL (1954); v. 7–8, Erste Philosophie (1923–24) I–II, ed. R. BOEHM (1956–59); v. 9, Phänomenologische Psychologie, ed. W. BIEMEL (1962). Translations. Cartesian Meditations, tr. D. CAIRNS (The Hague 1960); Ideas: General Introduction to Pure Phenomenology, tr. W. R. BOYCE GIBSON (New York 1931; repr. 1962); “Philosophy as a Strict Science,” tr. J. Q. LAUER, Cross Currents 6 (1956): 227–246. Literature. Edmund Husserl, 1859–1959 (The Hague 1959), centenary commemoration. J. Q. LAUER, The Triumph of Subjectivity (New York 1958). H. SPIEGELBERG, The Phenomenological Movement, 2 v. (The Hague 1960). J. OESTERREICHER, “Edmund Husserl: Acolyte of Truth,” Walls Are Crumbling (New York 1952) 49–97. M. FARBBER, The Foundations of Phenomenology (Cambridge, Mass. 1943).

[E. W. RANLY]

HUSSITES

Even before John HUS, a Hussite spirit characterized the Czech reform movement whose origins go back to the rule of the archbishop of Prague, ERNEST OF PARDUBICE (1343–64). After the Hussite wars of the 15th century, the Hussite spirit persevered among the UTRAQUISTS (Calixtines) and in the communities of the BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. It left its imprint on the Protestant sects that entered Bohemia in the 16th century. After World War I, it prompted the foundation of a national Czechoslovak church which drew 300 priests and a million Catholics away from their allegiance to Rome (1920). It remains alive among non-Catholic Christian sects of present-day Czechoslovakia. Strictly speaking, however, the history of the Hussites in Bohemia is limited to the period between the death of Hus (1415) and the end of the Hussite wars (1436).

Pre-Hussites. There are several important figures in the pre-Hussite reform movement: Conrad of Waldhausen, summoned to Bohemia by Archbishop Ernest to assist attempts at reform (1360); JOHN MILÍČ, his successor, an ascetic visionary, originator of a program for the rehabilitation of reformed prostitutes, and the first of a line of reforming preachers reaching down to Hus; Matthias of Janov (d. 1393), a theologian of great originality whose work was a powerful attempt to restore a Biblical character to theology; Thomas of Štítné (d. 1409), a lay writer on spiritual matters who translated Christian teaching into vivid and familiar language, bringing it closer to the everyday life of the humblest man. These four spearheaded the reform. In their struggle against relaxed moral standards, they tried to lead Christians, especially the clergy, back to the way of Christ. They fought idolatry and the traffic in relics, the superstitious abuse of indulgences, pseudo pilgrimages to places made famous by “miracles” that were often only frauds, excessive veneration of images and statues, and pompous, expensive church ceremonies. The reformers, however, held the Sacrament of the Eucharist in great esteem and even encouraged frequent Communion, although they criticized all ritualistic and simoniacal administration of the Sacraments. They insisted on the need for preaching, appealing frequently to Scripture, which was the word of God to them.

About 1400, these tendencies became stronger and veered away from orthodoxy as the reformers adopted the teaching of John WYCLIF. However, the violent behavior of reformers like Hus, JEROME OF PRAGUE, James of Stříbro (Jacobellus), and Nicholas of Dresden led to a conservative reaction on the part of men like Stanislas of Znojmo and Stephen of Pálec, who were likewise reformers but who had come to the conclusion that Wyclif was a heretic. When this latter group rallied to the Church, the “Hussites” adopted a more demanding attitude, insisting on the poverty of the clergy and on the punishment of priests guilty of mortal sin. They also demanded that the word of God be preached freely. After the departure of Hus for the Council of CONSTANCE, Jacobellus at Prague inaugurated Communion under both species. Although the position of Hus on reform was less cogent than that of his friends, his death at the stake (1415) and the condemnation of Communion under both species at Constance infuriated the Czechs. These two events changed the reformers into real “Hussites.” Their program was reduced to four points: the word of God should be preached freely by Christian priests, in the way that Christ had commanded; the Eucharist should be distributed under both species to all believing Christians; all who committed mortal sins should be punished, including priests; the clergy should renounce ownership of worldly goods in order to live and work according to the teaching of the Apostles.

Hussite Wars. Deaf to the remonstrances of MARTIN V and heedless of the threats of the Emperor SIGISMUND, the Hussites decided on armed resistance. Enrollment in the Hussite armies was furthered by religious motivation and also by merely temporal considerations; by the desire of the workers in the towns, especially in Prague, to wrest power from the patrician families; and by the urge of an impoverished nobility to enrich itself by seizing the possessions of the Church and by sharing in the spoils. Two crusades instigated by Martin V and a third by EUGENE IV (1431) failed to put down the Czechs. A military genius, John ŽIŽKA, had emerged from their ranks, and on his death (1421) a priest, Prokop the Great, succeeded, proving as invincible as his predecessor. It was a war marked both by acts of generosity and by atrocities. For 15 years Bohemia was ravaged. Žižka “punished one sacrilege by a thousand sacriliges.” Sigismund likewise gave free rein to cruelty.

No army could conquer the Hussites, but internal dissensions did. The TABORITES, the Prague party, the Adamites, and the “Orphans” fought each other in the pauses in the war against Pope and Emperor. In 1434, the imperial troops, with the help of the Hussites from Prague, defeated the Taborite extremists at Lipany. Meanwhile, the Council of BASEL had invited the Hussites to discuss differences. After a preliminary meeting at Cheb (1432), the Council received a Hussite delegation with great ceremony in Basel itself (1433). They conferred together, and after much emendation four articles were accepted by both parties: the word of God was to be preached freely, but only by those who had received their mission from the Church; the use of the chalice was conceded to the laity, i.e., Communion under the species of wine was conceded, provided it was believed and taught that Christ was present wholly under either species; mortal sins, particularly those causing public scandal, were to be punished in conformity with divine and ecclesiastical laws, though only by legitimate authority; the Church had a right of ownership and so did the clergy, but they were obliged to administer and use their goods in an entirely just way. In 1436 these four articles, under the name of Compacts, were promulgated solemnly at Jihlava. On the same occasion the Czechs recognized Sigismund as their king. The status quo regarding Church property that had changed hands during the disturbances, as well as the churches taken over by the Calixtines, was accepted. Thus ended the Hussite wars. Of the Hussite movement, only the Catholic UTRAQUISTS remained, for whom the fundamental charter was provided by the Compacts. But the spirit of Hus was soon to revive through another great spiritual adventure, that of the Bohemian Brethren.

Manuscript illustration depicting John Žižka leading Hussite troops.

Bibliography: V. V. TOMEK, Dějepis města Prahy (Prague 1855–). C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. And continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38), 7. P. MONCELLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 7.1:346–348. F. HREJSA, Dějiny křesťanství v

Bohemian martyr John Hus being burned at the stake, engraving. (Hulton-Getty/Tony Stone Images)

Československú (Prague 1950). F. G. HEYMAN, John Žižka and the Hussite Revolution (Princeton 1955). F. SEIBT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 5:546–549. P. DE VOOGHT, L'Hérésie de Jean Huss (Louvain 1960). F. BARTOS, The Hussite Revolution, 1424–1437 (Boulder 1986). F. GRAUS, "The Crisis of the Middle Ages and the Hussites," in S. OZMENT, ed. The Reformation in Medieval Perspective (Chicago 1971). H. KAMINSKY, A History of the Hussite Revolution (Boulder 1978). J. MACEK, The Hussite Movement in Bohemia (New York 1980).

[P. DE VOOGHT]

HUTTEN

A family of knights within the Holy Roman Empire, of whom the following are notable.

Ulrich von, Romantic imperialist German knight and militant humanist critic of the Church; b. Fortress Steck-elberg, April 21, 1488; d. Island of Ufenau, Lake Zurich, Aug. 29, 1523. Ulrich at age 11 was sent to the monastery at Fulda, but at 17 he fled; he subsequently studied at Cologne, Erfurt, and Frankfurt on the Oder, received an A.B. degree (September, 1506), and then traveled to Leipzig, Greifswald, and Rostock. He published De arte versificandi and the Querelae, blistering attacks on his former hosts, the Lötze family in Greifswald. As a member of the knightly class then rapidly losing status, Hutten looked back romantically to better days. In 1515 he addressed five orations against Duke Ulrich of Württemberg, who had murdered his cousin Hans. He studied law in Italy (1515–17) and grew increasingly critical of the Curia. He criticized current ecclesiastical abuses in a series of violent tracts, the Vadiscus dialogus sive Trias Romana (Roman Trinity), Febris I, Febris II (Fever I and II), Inspicientes (Spectators), and the Nemo (Nobody), playing up the themes of Italian exploitation of the Germans and corruption in the church. Together with Crotus Rubeanus he published the Epistolae obscurorum virorum, ridiculing the scholastics of Cologne as obscurantists persecuting Reuchlin and the humanist defenders of Hebrew letters.

In 1517 he published an edition of Lorenzo Valla's De donatione Constantini intended to cast doubt on the legal foundation of papal temporal authority. Although Hutten did not really appreciate the deeper levels of Luther's theology, he wrote a series of polemical pamphlets in his support, the Bulla Decimi Leonis contra errores Martini Lutheri, in which he indicted the Pope as anti-christ; the Bullicida, in which the papal bull, German liberty, Hutten, Franz von Sickingen, and other Germans carry on the dialogue; the Monitor I and Praedones, contrasting papal tyranny and Christian liberty; and a Gesprächbüchlein (Dialogue). He turned to the use of the vernacular in his first German tract, A Remonstrance and a Warning against the Presumptuous, Unchristian Power of the Bishop of Rome and the Unspiritual Estate. This was followed by Invective against Aleander, Invective against the Luther-chewing Priests, Exhortation to Emperor Charles V, Litany to the Gemans, and Expostulatio. Luther maintained a careful reserve, disapproving of Hutten's threats of force and resort to arms. Illness prevented Hutten from participating with Franz von Sickingen in the Knights' revolt (1522). He sought refuge with Erasmus in Basel (1522–23), but Erasmus had him driven away. Hutten avenged himself with an Expostulatio cum Erasmo (1523), to which Erasmus replied with his unworthy Spongia adversus aspergines Hutteni. Zwingli gave Hutten refuge and sent him for medical care to a pastor, Hans Klarer, of Ufenau, where he died of syphilis in poverty at the age of 35.

Moritz von, Bishop of Eichstätt; b. Arnstein, Nov. 26, 1503; d. Eichstätt, Dec. 6, 1552. He studied in Ingolstadt and became a canon in Eichstätt, 1512; canon in Würzburg, 1530; and provost of the cathedral in Würzburg, 1536. He became bishop of Eichstätt, 1539; he was personally above reproach and sought to reform the clergy of his diocese. He attended the Council of Trent, June 1543, presided at the Regensburg Colloquy, 1546, and held a diocesan synod, 1548.

Christoph Franz von, Prince-bishop of Würzburg; b. Jan. 19, 1673; d. Würzburg, March 25, 1729. Well educated, he promoted art and learning during his brief ecclesiastical career, during which he rose from dean of the cathedral to bishop.

Franz Christoph von, Bishop of Speyer; b. Wisenfeld, March 6, 1706; d. Bruchsal, April 20, 1770. He became bishop of Speyer on Nov. 14, 1743, and was created a cardinal on Nov. 23, 1761. An aristocratic ecclesiast, he patronized art and music, conducted a resplendent court life, promoted education of laity and priests, constructed many churches and completed the castle at Bruchsal.

Ulrich von Hutten.

Bibliography: Ulrici Hutteni Equitis Germani opera . . ., ed. E. BÖCKING, 7 v. (Leipzig 1859–70). H. HOLBORN, Ulrich von Hutten and the German Reformation, tr. R. H. BAINTON (New Haven 1937). D. F. STRAUSS, Ulrich von Hutten, 2 v. (Leipzig 1858). P. HELD, Ulrich von Hutten: Seine religiös-geistige Auseinandersetzung mit Katholizismus, Humanismus, Reformation (Leipzig 1928). L. FISCHER, ed., Beiträge zur Geschichte der Renaissance und Reformation: J. Schlecht . . . als Festgabe (Freising 1917), on Moritz. L. STAMER, Kirchengeschichte der Pfalz (Speyer 1959) 3.2:116–120, on Franz Christoph. F. ZOEPFL et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:549–551. D. STRAUSS, Ulrich von Hutten His Life and Time (Reprint: New York 1974).

[L. W. SPITZ]

HUTTER, JAKOB

Anabaptist leader who organized orderly Christian communist communities that have survived to the present under the name Hutterites; b. Moos, South-Tyrol, date unknown; d. Innsbruck, Feb. 25, 1536. An itinerant hat-maker possessing only rudimentary formal education, Hutter early joined the Anabaptists, and he became the acknowledged leader of this movement in Tyrol after the execution of Georg Blaurock (1529). When it became known that Moravia offered a haven to religious nonconformists, Hutter tried to make it a refuge for his persecuted adherents. After initial conflicts with the existing ineffective leadership in Moravia, he reorganized some Anabaptist communities into collective farms (Bruderhof or Haushaben) in and around Auspitz, Moravia. The basic pattern developed by him at that time has been retained by his followers. As a result of renewed persecution, Hutter left again for Tyrol. He kept in touch with his Moravian followers by letters, which are his only genuine literary remains. Arrested in Clausen, Tyrol, in November 1535, he was taken to Innsbruck, where, after lengthy cross-examination and torture, he was condemned to death and burned at the stake.

Bibliography: H. FISCHER, Jacob Huter (Newton, KS 1956). R. FRIEDMANN, Hutterite Studies (Goshen, IN 1961). G. H. WILLIAMS, The Radical Reformation (Philadelphia 1962). K. ALGERMISSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:551. G. MECENSEFFY, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:495–496.

[G. W. FORELL]

HUTTERITES

The only pacifist ANABAPTIST sect practicing complete community of goods and the only communitarian lay group that has lasted more than 200 years. The Hutterian Brethren were founded in Moravia (1529–33) by the Tyrolean Jakob HUTTER, who was burned at the stake in Innsbruck in 1536.

Doctrine. Their Christocentric theology, derived primarily from the Synoptic Gospels, stresses several basic Anabaptist concepts: Nachfolge Christi, a voluntary obedience of the thorn-crowned Redeemer in a life of committed discipleship, sealed by the covenant of (adult) Baptism; and Gelassenheit, a serene ascetical submission to God's will. But to the Anabaptist social ideals of non-resistance, martyrdom, and a free congregational church, Hutter added a radical extension of Gemeinschaft as not only a loving brotherhood, ritually celebrated in the Lord's Supper, but as complete renunciation of all private property, selfless service of a community of God's chosen people (Acts 2.44–45; 4.32–35), and absolute separation from the world (2 Col 6.14–18). A corpus of traditional Hutterian doctrines was recorded in a rich collection of 16th and 17th century tracts, sermons, epistles, rules, hymns, and chronicles, which are still extant and often reread in hand-copied manuscripts.

Growth and Organization. Despite the loss of more than 2,000 martyrs in successive waves of persecution, missionaries active in all German lands sent streams of converts to establish numerous agricultural colonies in Moravia (1542–56) under the Vorsteher (bishop) Peter Riedemann and after 1546 also in Slovakia. At the peak of their "golden period" around 1585, about 25,000 brethren farmed 100 prosperous colonies on the estates of tolerant manorial lords. Turkish incursions, persecution under Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein, and depredations during the Thirty Years' War drove them from Moravia in 1622. A colony of refugees flourished in Transylvania, but had to flee into the Ukraine (1767–70). Hundreds of "Habener" colonists in Slovakia underwent forced conversions between 1759 and 1762 under the Empress Maria Theresa. Spiritual declines resulted in abandonment of missions after 1662 and of community of goods in 1685, 1695, and between 1819 and 1854. To avoid conscription (1874–77) the three colonies surviving in Russia migrated to the U.S., where in South Dakota they increased to 17 by 1913. Severe hardships suffered as German-language pacifists induced most Hutterites to move to Canada after 1917. In 1965 a total of 15,000 Hutterian Brethren were living in 150 colonies (four-fifths in Alberta, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan; one-fifth in South Dakota and Montana).

Now classed among MENNONITES, they have no central organization, but form three kinship branches. Each branch has a bishop, and its ministers meet at intervals. Each independent colony is governed by a minister, chosen by lot for life (subject to recall) from among a council of elders elected by adult males. Colonies have 60 to 150 members, farming from 4,000 to 12,000 acres under a business manager and assistant "bosses." Job assignments may be regularly rotated. Colonies buy coffee, salt, drygoods, leather, and machinery, and sell crops and cattle. Shoes, clothes, and furniture are homemade. Colonies pay taxes, refuse social security, but accept crop limitation payments.

Other Characteristics. Daily evening prayer hours and Sunday morning hymn-and-sermon services are held in the school. Families average six to ten children, who are taught in English until the age of 14 by teachers from outside, with religion classes in German under the minister. They live in two- to four-bedroom apartments or houses (without kitchen or dining room). While retaining their Old World costume, the Hutterites accept electricity, modern farm equipment, and trucks, but exclude radios, musical instruments, dancing, smoking, gambling, and motion pictures.

Hutterite children in Forest River Colony, Fordville, North Dakota. (©Kevin Fleming/CORBIS)

Psychological and sociological surveys have shown that despite inner tensions, most colonists have excellent mental health, well-balanced personalities, and remarkable peace of soul, with a deep Bible-based culture. Significant recent trends include moves toward more centralized authority, stress on education, participation in civic charities, and official agreements accepting dispersal patterns for daughter colonies which each existing colony must found every 15 to 20 years, owing to their record high 45.9 per 1,000 annual birth rate. M. Bach's novel The Dream Gate (Indianapolis 1949) and a 1963 National Film Board of Canada documentary depict life in modern Hutterite colonies.

The Society of Brothers. A modern branch of the sect was founded independently in Germany in 1922 by Dr. Eberhard Arnold (1883–1935), who was ordained in 1930 by Hutterite ministers in Canada. Its Bruderhof communities in Germany (1926–37), Lichtenstein (1934–38), and England (1936–40) moved to Paraguay during World War II (1940), and in 1954 to the U.S. Their three church communities in Rifton, NY; Norfolk, CT; and Farmington, PA, with a fourth in England, number 1,000 members engaged in education, publishing, and the manufacture of playthings. The Society of Brothers is not affiliated with the Hutterian Brethren; it practices community of goods with an open interest in current thought and problems.

Bibliography: Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, ed. E. WALTER (Scottsdale, PA 1914, 1953). A. J. F. ZIEGLSCHMID, ed., Die älteste Chronik der Hutterischen Brüder (Ithaca, NY 1943); Das Klein-Geschichtsbuch der Hutterischen Brüder (Philadelphia 1947). J. HORSCH, The Hutterian Brethren, 1528–1931 (Goshen, IN 1931). R. FRIEDMANN, Hutterite Studies, ed. H. S. BENDER (Goshen, IN 1961), reprints of articles from The Mennonite Encyclopedia. J. A. HOSTETLER, Education and Marginality in the Communal Society of the Hutterites (University Park, PA 1965). “Arnold, Eberhard,” in The Mennonite Encyclopedia, 4 v. (Scottsdale, PA 1955–60) 1:162–164. “Society of Brothers,” ibid. 4:426–427, cf. 976. Eberhard Arnold (Rifton, NY 1964). E. ARNOLD, Torches Together: The Beginning and Early Years of the Bruderhof Communities, tr. from Ger. (Rifton, NY 1964). P. J. KLASSEN, The Economics of Anabaptism, 1525–1560 (The Hague 1964). P. RIEDEMANN, Account of Our Religion, Doctrine and Faith, tr. K. E. HASENBURG (London 1950). V. PETERS, All Things Common: The Hutterites and Their Way of Life (Minneapolis 1965). B. S. HOSTETLER and J. A. HOSTETLER, The Hutterites in North America, 3d. ed. (Orlando 1995).

[R. BROWN]

HYACINTH, ST.

Apostle of the Slavs, patron of Poland; b. Duchy of Oppeln, between Breslau and Cracow, Silesia, before 1200; d. Cracow, Aug. 15, 1257. His Polish name, Jacek, is a form of John; his family (Odrawaź) belonged to the nobility. He studied at the University of Cracow and perhaps also at Bologna. The traditional account of his entry into the Order of Preachers relates that he and Bl. Ceslaus (either his brother or his cousin) accompanied their uncle Ivo Odrawaź to Rome, where he was to be consecrated bishop of Cracow. There they witnessed St. DOMINIC's miraculous resuscitation of a young man who had been killed by a fall from his horse. Both Hyacinth and Ceslaus became DOMINICANS in Rome (c. 1217–18). The earliest biography of Hyacinth was written a century after his death by STANISLAUS OF CRACOW. Subsequent accounts are more like sagas than sober historical records. Although it is certain that during his time the Dominicans carried on extensive missionary activities, the exact details of Hyacinth's career have not been established. Tradition credits him with the founding of numerous convents (e.g., at Cracow, Danzig), and missionary journeys of thousands of miles on foot, preaching in many countries, including Lithuania, Bohemia, Denmark, Greece, Russia, Tatar, and Tibet, besides his native Poland. Among the miracles attributed to Hyacinth are the crossing of rivers dry-shod, restoration of sight to the blind, and the raising of the dead. Hyacinth was celebrated for his devotion to the Blessed Virgin; he died on the feast of the Assumption. He was canonized in 1594.

Feast: Aug. 17.

Bibliography: STANISLAUS OF CRACOW, De vita et miraculis sancti Jacchonis (Hyacinti) Ordinis Fratrum Praedicatorum in Monumenta Poloniae historica, 6 v. (Lvov 1864–93) 4:818–903. Année Dominicaine (Lyons 1898) Aug. 2:613–646. B. ALTANER, Die Dominikanermissionen des 13. Jh. (Habelschwerdt 1924), best modern study. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:338–339. R. J. LOENERTZ, “La Vie de S. Hyacinthe . . .,” Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 27 (1957) 5–38. M. F. WINDEATT, Northern Lights: The Story of Saint Hyacinth of Poland and His Companions (New York 1945).

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

HYDATIUS

Bishop of Chaves? (Portugal) and historian; b. Lemica, c. 395; d. Galicia?, after 468. As a child he visited the Levant. He was a priest in 416, bishop in 427, and legate to Aetius in 431. He opposed the misrule of the Sueves and the heresies of MANICHAISM and PRISCILLIANISM (441–447). Hydatius seems to have annotated and kept up to date a list of consuls (Fasti) from 509 B.C. to A.D. 468 at the same time that he continued the chronicle of JEROME from 379 to 468. Dates in his chronicle are erratic, and signs and wonders become portentous; but he gives a valuable contemporary account of the barbarian invasions of Spain. After ISIDORE OF SEVILLE his work was neglected.

Bishop pronouncing a benediction, unfinished miniature from the “Benedictional of St. Ethelwold,” written at Hyde Abbey, c. 965 (Add. MS 49598, fol.118v). Some scholars believe the bishop is St. Ethelwold.

Bibliography: ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, Vir. illus., ch. 9. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Auctores antiquissimi (Berlin 1826—) 9:197–247, 11:3–36. O. SEECK, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893—) 9.1 (1914) 40–43. C. TORRES RODRÍGUEZ, “Hidacio, el primer cronista Español,” Revista de Archivos, Bibliotecas y Museos, 62 (1956), 755–794. J. KRAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:554. F. TOLLU, Catholicisme, 5:1170.

[E. P. COLBERT]

HYDE, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery, known also as New Minster, in the county of Hampshire, England, ancient see of WINCHESTER. In 901 King Edward the Elder, in fulfilment of the wishes of his father, ALFRED THE GREAT, established the New Minster in honor of the Holy Trinity, the Blessed Virgin, and St. Peter. Located at Winchester, it was the church where Alfred was buried. In 965 ETHELWOLD OF WINCHESTER replaced the secular canons with Benedictine monks from ABINGDON. The community moved from its original site close to Winchester cathedral to new buildings at Hyde in 1111. After destruction by fire during the Barons' War (1141) the monastery was rebuilt. It was famous for the production of fine liturgical and Biblical manuscripts, of which the Benedictional of St. Ethelwold is an excellent example. At the Dissolution in April 1538 the 21 monks of the community were pensioned and the buildings completely destroyed.

Pope Hyginus, effigy from 9th-century series of papal portraits in basilica of St. Paul at Rome, Italy.

Bibliography: Hampshire Record Society, Liber vitae: Register and Martyrology of New Minster and Hyde Abbey, Winchester, ed. W. DE G. BIRCH (London 1892). The Victoria History of the County of Hampshire and the Isle of Wight, ed. H. A. DOUBLEDAY and W. PAGE, 5 v. (Westminster, Eng. 1900–12) v. 2. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962). D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1948–60). D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953).

[F. R. JOHNSTON]

HYGINUS, ST. POPE

Pontificate: 138 to 142 or 149. Eusebius dates his reign from 138, the year of Telesphorus's death, and indicates that Hyginus died in 142 (Hist. 4.10, 11; 5.6, 24).

The Liberian catalogue says he reigned 12 years. The Liber pontificalis fixes his term as four years and says he was a philosopher from Athens. Since Justin Martyr was a philosopher who joined the Roman church, the LP account is possibly true. There are no sources to support the report in the Roman MARTYROLOGY that he was a martyr. According to St. IRENAEUS (3.4) the Gnostic heretics VALENTINUS and Cerdo, predecessors of MARCION, came to Rome during his pontificate. Although nothing is known of their effects on the community, their presence proves that Rome was becoming a Christian intellectual center. Modern excavations do not confirm the statement in the Liber pontificalis that Hyginus was buried in the Vatican near St. Peter.

Feast: Jan. 11.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:56–57, 131. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:356–357. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 10. CH. BREURER-WINKLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (3d ed. Freiburg 1996).

[E. G. WELTIN]

HYLOMORPHISM

A term coined from the Greek words ὕλη (matter) and μορφή (form) and used to designate the Aristotelian-scholastic teaching that all natural or physical bodies are composed of matter and form as essential substantial principles. Apart from its philosophical importance, the doctrine has been used extensively by Catholic theologians to explain transubstantiation, the soul-body relationship, and various points of sacramental theology. This article sketches the salient features of the doctrine and then outlines its principal applications in Catholic theology.

Doctrine. Hylomorphism (sometimes spelled hylemorphism) is usually opposed to ATOMISM, which attempts to explain all natural changes and the properties of bodies in terms of atoms or some purely material principle, and to DYNAMISM, which attempts to explain similar phenomena in terms of energy or some purely formal principle. Hylomorphism, as opposed to such monistic doctrines, is dualistic in character. It maintains that the SUBSTANCE and activity of things found in the physical universe must ultimately be explained in terms of two principles, one material and the other formal, traditionally referred to as primary matter and substantial form, respectively. As coconstituting substantial principles, these are not to be confused with elements, which enter into the structure of compounds but are not their essential constituents (see PRINCIPLE; ELEMENT). No inconsistency need be involved, however, in invoking both an essential composition and a structural composition in explaining the properties of bodies.

Primary matter, as the material principle, is undetermined, passive, and purely potential; the same in all bodies, it serves to explain such common features as extension, mass, and inertia. Substantial form, as the formal principle, is determining and actualizing; it accounts for the specific properties and characteristics that serve to differentiate one type of body from another. Primary matter and substantial form unite under the influence of their reciprocal CAUSALITY as intrinsic principles and go to make up secondary matter—a term used to designate a corporeal substance of some determined nature, such as marble. Secondary matter, in its turn, is regarded as the recipient of accidental forms, or accidents, that further modify the substance without changing its nature; an example of such further modification is the shape imposed on marble by a sculptor.

The existence and characteristics of primary matter and substantial form have been established traditionally by an analysis of the changes taking place in the order of nature, particularly those of the type recognizable as SUBSTANTIAL CHANGE. Other arguments in support of hylomorphic composition also have been proposed—some metaphysical, based on the application of the doctrine of potency and act to material substance; others logical, based on the analysis of modes of predication respecting subjects of change; and still others phenomenological, based on the classification of various opposed properties of bodies, such as their activity and passivity and their individuality and common essential characteristics.

When classical atomic theories of the mechanist and determinist type were in the greatest vogue among scientists, before the advent of quantum mechanics, some thinkers rejected hylomorphism as in conflict with reigning scientific theories and attempted to replace it by a more concordist doctrine referred to as HYLOSYSTEMISM. With the advent of quantum theory and the various philosophical interpretations placed on the uncertainty principle, however, together with developments in high-energy physics, particularly the discovery of large numbers of so-called elementary particles, hylomorphism has again found favor among scholastics interested in the philosophy of science and its problems. (For a fuller explanation and justification of hylomorphic doctrine, see MATTER AND FORM; MATTER; FORM.)

Applications. From the beginning of the 13th century on, with such thinkers as WILLIAM OF AUXERRE, PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR, and WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE, Aristotelian terminology worked its way gradually into theology. The climax of the Aristotelian development was reached in the teachings of ALBERT THE GREAT and of THOMAS AQUINAS during the high scholastic period, the latter in particular making extensive use of matter and form as well as the related doctrines of potency and act and of essence and existence in his theological elaborations. The Thomistic influence persists in Catholic theology to the present, and serves to explain much of its terminology. Yet the concepts of matter and form have not always been understood exactly as Aquinas proposed them, there being considerable controversy over such topics as the unity of substantial form in composites. Though agreeing on fundamental doctrines, the Franciscan school opposed Aquinas in a number of particulars, as did F. Suárez in a later thought context.

An important theological application of hylomorphism is in explaining what happens during the Eucharistic rite of transubstantiation. Medieval theologians regarded bread and wine as single substances composed of primary matter and substantial form. In their view, when the words of consecration are spoken, under God's action the single substance of bread is converted into the substance of Christ's Body in such a way that the substantial form of bread no longer remains; the primary matter is likewise changed, so that only the accidents of bread remain after the conversion has been effected (Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 3a, 75.6–8). Modern Catholic theologians, making use of scientific analyses, no longer regard bread and wine as single substances but otherwise employ a similar conceptual framework when explaining the effects of consecration (see TRANSUBSTANTIATION).

Another theological application of hylomorphism is in explaining how the human soul is united to the body (see SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP), a teaching that has been further developed in conjunction with the doctrines of the HYPOSTATIC UNION and of the immortality of the human soul (see IMMORTALITY). The teaching on sanctifying GRACE as an accidental and supernatural form of the soul is also based on matter-form concepts. The same may be said in an analogous way for much of sacramental theology, where the notion of a matter and a form proper to each Sacrament has its historical origin in hylomorphism.

See Also: HYLOSYSTEMISM.

Bibliography: G. MEYER and E. GUTWENGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:556–58. A. M. MOSCHETTI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1235–36. M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952) 1:526–542, 2:63–79. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 10.1335–55.

[W. A. WALLACE]

HYLOSYSTEMISM

A philosophical theory proposed by Albert Mitterer (1877–1966) as an alternative to HYLOMORPHISM for explaining the substantial composition of inorganic bodies. Instead of regarding elements and compounds as composed of primary matter and substantial form, Mitterer sees them as composed of “hylons,” or matter-particles (e.g., electrons, positrons, protons, and neutrons), that form a “hylomeric” (from the Greek ὕλη, matter, and μέρος, part or particle) system. Hylosystemism differs from hylomorphism in the following aspects: (1) it is pluralistic, as opposed to dualistic, in enumerating the essential constitutives of inorganic bodies; (2) it holds that the essential components of inorganic bodies are complete substances, as opposed to incomplete substantial principles; (3) it maintains a heterogeneity of structure within the inorganic body, as opposed to the homogeneous structure attributed to elements and compounds by medieval scholastics; and (4) it allows for empty space between hylons, as opposed to the continuity of matter usually associated with hylomorphic doctrine. Mitterer’s ideas were popularized in the United States by C. N. Bittle (1884–1960) and enjoyed considerable vogue at a time when the Bohr-Rutherford model of the atom was regarded by scientists as an actual picture of matter’s structure. They have not been generally adopted by scholastic philosophers, however, partly because of the naïve interpretation they place on hylomorphism, particularly by regarding it as irrevocably tied to the conceptual framework of medieval science, and partly because of the awkward dichotomy they introduce between explanations of substantial composition in the realm of the organic and in the realm of the inorganic.

See Also: MATTER AND FORM; ATOMISM.

Bibliography: A. MITTERER, Wandel des Weltbildes von Thomas auf heute, 3 v. (v.1 Innsbruck 1935; v. 2 Bressanone 1936; v. 3 Vienna 1947). C. N. BITTLE, From Aether to Cosmos (Milwaukee 1941). L. A. FOLEY, Cosmology: Philosophical and Scientific (Milwaukee 1962).

[W. A. WALLACE]

HYLOZOISM

Hylozoism, from the Greek ὕλη meaning matter, and ζωή meaning life, is the doctrine according to which all matter is animated, either in itself or as participating in the action of a superior principle, usually the WORLD SOUL (anima mundi).

Historical Origins. The term appears for the first time in the works of Ralph Cudworth (1617–88), one of the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS. Taken in its strict sense, it indicates a conception of matter that is different both from ANIMISM, the imaginary personification of nature in primitive races, and PANPSYCHISM, the theory that matter is not only alive but possesses some form of sensation or consciousness. This distinction is not clear in the early Greek philosophers, the first hylozoists recorded in history. Thales, for example, is reported by Aristotle as holding that water is the primary substrate (Meta. 983b 21), and that “all things are full of gods” (Anim. 411a 8). For Anaximander the universal material cause and animating principle is an infinite and indeterminate substance; while for Anaximenes it is air; and for Heraclitus it is fire.

Hylozoism acquires its distinct traits from Strato of Lampsacus, successor of Theophrastus as the head of the peripatetic school at Athens. While rejecting the mechanistic theory of the atomists, Strato retains their materialistic monism. He reduces all reality to matter and all vital and psychical activities to motion, thus making life a property of matter. Hylozoism is also the characteristic feature of the Stoic doctrine that the entire universe forms a unitary and living whole, in which all things are the determinate forms assumed by a divine primitive power. This power is described either as soul, mind, and reason, or as fire, ether, and pneuma, but in all cases it appears to be something material.

The Stoic concept of a world soul was taken over by the Neoplatonists and adapted to their system. For PLOTINUS and his followers the world soul is a spiritual principle emanating from the One, the supreme transcendent Being, through Intellect or Nous. Matter proceeds from the One inasmuch as it becomes a factor in the constitution of the phenomenal world, but in itself it forms the lowest level of being. As the principle of imperfection, limitation, and evil, it is like darkness compared to light; it is the antithesis of the One. Thus it is only in a qualified sense that Plotinus and the Neoplatonists can be called hylozoists.

Renaissance and Modern Times. The notion of an animated world gained wide acceptance among Renaissance philosophers, although it is difficult in specific cases to tell a hylozoist from a panpsychist. Paracelsus (1493–1541) conceived the world as animated by an immanent but unconscious vital principle, the Archeus. His disciple, J. B. van Helmont (1577–1644), called this principle aura vitalis and made it responsible for the formation of each individual organism and its different parts. Geronimo Cardano (1501–76) shared the belief in universal animation through the world soul, as did Giordano BRUNO after him. A somewhat different hylozoist theory was advanced by the Cambridge Platonists, Ralph Cudworth and Henry More, through their doctrine of “plastic nature,” an incorporeal but unconscious substance that acts like an instrument of God in the production of natural events. The plastic nature exercises its power over matter by organizing it and directing all its motions and activities. Like an inferior soul, it does for nature as a whole roughly what the soul of a plant does for a plant.

Traces of hylozoism can be found in Spinoza's conception of reality, as well as in Leibniz's theory of monads. However it is with a group of 18th-century ENCYCLOPEDISTS, such as D. Diderot, P. J. G. Cabanis, and J. B. R. Robinet, that hylozoism comes again into prominence. Their dynamic-materialistic view of the world is in many respects similar to that of Strato. This same attitude toward the problem of matter and life can be observed in 19th-century philosophers who supported evolutionism. If matter is the only reality, as E. H. Haeckel maintained, and life comes from matter, then life must be contained virtually in matter as one of its essential properties. Hylozoism becomes for Haeckel a necessary postulate of his system.

Not all evolutionists would commit themselves to Haeckel's thoroughly materialistic view. Some, like B. SPINOZA, modified the very concept of matter and described both matter and mind as two distinct aspects of one and the same reality. For Herbert SPENCER (1820–1903) this reality is unknowable and different from matter and mind; for Gustav Fechner, Rudolph LOTZE, and William Wundt the reality is matter and mind, these two latter being nothing but its outer and its inner sides. In both views we are faced with a psychophysical parallelism that closely resembles panpsychism. The recent evolutionary theories of H. BERGSON and P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN are also preeminently of a panpsychic nature.

Evaluation. Hylozoism fails to recognize the characteristic properties that distinguish living beings from brute matter. The differences between the two orders of being are so fundamental, especially when highly developed organisms are considered, that to confuse one with the other is to disregard completely the observational and experimental methods professed by scientists. To consider life derived from brute matter in virtue of some hidden and mysterious potentialities, without the action of an extrinsic agent, is also to violate the fundamental principle that no being can be the adequate cause of its own transition from potentiality to actuality. A being would give to itself what it does not have, or, which is equally contradictory, it would be in act and potency at one and the same time and in the same respect (see POTENCY AND ACT; EFFICIENT CAUSALITY). Hylozoism has, therefore, the support of neither science nor philosophy.

See Also: LIFE; MATTER; MECHANISM, BIOLOGICAL.

Bibliography: A. LALANDE, Vocabulaire technique et critique de la philosophie (8th ed., rev. and enl. Paris 1960). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:641–642. G. MARTANO, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome) 2:1257–60. J. BURNET, Early Greek Philosophy (4th ed. New York 1957). J. CARLES, Les Origines de la vie (Paris 1950). G. MATISSE, A la Source des phénomènes vitaux (Paris 1951). J. M. DE CORRAL, El Problema de las causas de la vida y las concepciones del mundo (Madrid 1956).

[B. M. BONANSEA]

HYMNARY

The hymnary is the medieval liturgical book of the ROMAN RITE containing the hymns of the divine office arranged according to the days of the week and the feasts of the ecclesiastical year. Its contents, often appended to the Psalter or to the Antiphony, were later incorporated into the medieval Roman BREVIARY.

Five extant manuscripts, representative of which is the Vatican Library's MS Vat. Reg. 11, preserve the oldest hymns in monastic usage, i.e., from the 6th century. St. BENEDICT (d. 543) gives directions for hymns in the BENEDICTINE RULE; CAESARIUS (d. 542) and AURELIAN (d. 551), bishops of Arles, name many of the hymns they prescribe for use in the canonical hours. In 1908 Clemens Blume, in comparing the rules of these successors of St. Benedict and collating the manuscripts, constructed the Old Cycle, or Old Hymnal, containing 34 hymns, which he believed comprised the original Benedictine hymnary. Although the majority of the hymns are anonymous, there are several, attributed to St. AMBROSE, that form the basis of all hymnaries in the Western Church.

In the 9th century a new cycle of monastic hymns appeared. Believed by Blume to be of Anglo-Irish origin in use in Britain since Gregory the Great, this later hymnal, which numbers 37 hymns (only seven repeated from the Old Cycle) gradually replaced the original throughout the Continent.

The Benedictine scholar André WILMART, reinterpreting Blume's conclusions in 1911, contended that the Old Cycle was only a Gallican hymnal, which fell into disuse during the Carolingian period, and that the later hymnal, for which Blume posited Anglo-Irish origin, was only the normal outgrowth of Benedictine practice as it evolved through the centuries. Wilmart's position seems justified by the progress of the BENEDICTINES during the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, when learning flourished with the expansion of monasteries, and ecclesiastical reform led to renewed interest in the liturgy and a revival in hymnology. Celtic, Byzantine, and Germanic influences impinged on the culture of this period between the 6th and 10th centuries in the Carolingian Empire, enriching and diversifying the new hymn cycles. By the 10th century, ten representative hymnals show 50 to 100 hymns, many of which are common to several hymnals. Writers of a few of these may be identified, e.g., Ambrose and his contemporary PRUDENTIUS.

The process of growth continued through the Middle Ages. Although a few hymns were added after the 16th century, the great body of Office hymns was in fact determined by 1100.

See Also: LITURGY OF THE HOURS.

Bibliography: C. BLUME, Der Cursus S. Benedicti Nursini und die liturgischen Hymnen des 6–9 Jahrhunderts (Leipzig 1908). Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922) 51, introd. D. A. WILMART, “Le Psautier de la Reine, N. XI, sa provenance et sa date,” Revue Bénédictine, 28 (1911) 341–376. J. MEARNES, Early Latin Hymnaries (Cambridge, Eng. 1913). A. S. WALPOLE, Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922) xi–xxi. R. E. MESSENGER, “Whence the Ninth Century Hymnal?” Transactions of the American Philological Association 69 (1938) 446–464; The Medieval Latin Hymn (Washington 1953), valuable bibliog. and notes pp. 114–117. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian–Latin Poetry (2d ed. Oxford 1953) 36–41.

[M. I. J. ROUSSEAU/EDS.]

HYMNOLOGY

Hymnology is that discipline that is concerned with the historical and scientific study of the hymn, from both a textual and musical point of view. Hymns have been a part of Christian worship from its very beginnings. Originally the word seems to have been used to describe any song in praise of God—scriptural or not, stanzaic or free. Later it came to be applied in a more restrictive sense to any nonscriptural, religious poem in strophic form, usually in a regular meter, and set to a relatively simple melody. This entry restricts itself to the various forms of Christian hymnody as they evolved through the centuries to 1500, with emphasis on representative authors and texts, and points to some of the hymnographical problems in the field through the bibliography here cited.

Early Christian period. Christian worship first developed chiefly from patterns supplied by the traditions of the Temple and the Jewish synagogues. Thus the PSALMS and CANTICLES of the OT (as well as the NT MAGNIFICAT, NUNC DIMITTIS, BENEDICTUS) played an important role. In addition, the NT contains many passages that are regarded by scholars as echoes of early Christian hymns (among others, Phil 2.6–11; 1 Tm 3.16). In this connection reference can be made to St. Paul’s words (Col 3.16) speaking of three categories of early Christian songs (among them hymns and psalms). With few exceptions, early Christian hymns did not survive because they were not written down and were often the product of sudden inspiration. They probably resembled Jewish psalms and canticles, using parallelism in structure, long enumerations of the attributes of the Deity, etc.

Manuscript folio, 8th or 9th century, hymns used in services of Greek Church.

The transition to Greek hymnody was made by hymns composed by the Gnostics. Many texts scattered in apocryphal literature prove that GNOSTICISM made definite efforts to establish a new kind of hymnody, amalgamating early Christian and Hellenistic traditions; cf. the “Naassene Psalm” and the “Valentinus Psalm”; a special place is occupied by the Odes of Solomon, which belong, perhaps, to the earliest strata. As a reaction to this tendency, a new Greek hymnody gradually emerged. To this group, besides the hymn attributed to CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA and the OXYRHYNCHUS hymn, belong also a Morning Hymn, a hymn of the APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS (written before 150?), an Evening Hymn, the Hymn of Grace at meals, the Candle-light Hymn (Φῶς ἰλαρὸν), and others.

Syriac hymnody. This linguistic group was also affected by the propaganda of the heretics, the chief representatives of which were BARDESANES (BAR-DAISĀN) and his son Harmonius, against whose hymns the new orthodox hymns of St. EPHREM were directed. Two hymn categories are represented in Syriac hymnody: the Mêmêrê, or “poetic speeches and expositions of Holy Scripture in a uniform meter, without strophic division,” and the Madrashê, or songs and hymns of four to six lines and refrain. Of the latter, more than 60 are directed against the heretics; others celebrate Christian mysteries (the Incarnation), the faith, death, paradise, and similar topics. Many of these gained liturgical acceptance. By stressing apologetics, Ephrem laid the foundation of later Christian hymnody and also influenced its development in the West. He had various lesser followers: Cyrillonas (end of the 4th century), with hymns on the Crucifixion, Easter, and the Grain of Wheat; Balaeus (c. 430), creator of a new, “baleasic” form of pentasyllabic verse; and James of Sarough (d. 521), with Monophysite tendencies (see MONOPHYSITISM).

Greek and Byzantine hymnography. The growing influence of Hellenistic traditions roused opposition in monastic and ecclesiastical circles, and attempts were made to suppress all but hymns of scriptural character. This led to the destruction of many ancient texts and traditions; nevertheless a new hymnody emerged. At an early stage, a nonliturgical hymn poetry in the wider sense of the word was represented by METHODIUS OF OLYMPUS or Philippoi, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, SYNESIUS OF CYRENE, with anacreontic hymns. Metrophanes of Smyrna and ANATOLIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, also belong to this period. Synesius is particularly important since he attempted to insert Neoplatonic ideas into Christian hymns.

Three main poetic forms dominate Greek-Byzantine hymnody: the troparion, the kontakion, and the kanon. “The name troparion . . . was given to short prayers which, in the earliest stage of hymnography, were written in poetic prose and inserted after each verse of a psalm. In the 5th century, when the troparia were composed in strophic form and became longer, these . . . were sung only after the 3 to 6 last verses of a psalm” (Wellesz). A later development is the kontakion, associated with the names of Kyriakos and ROMANUS MELODUS. “The kontakion . . . consists of from 18 to 30 or even more stanzas, all structurally alike. The single stanza is called troparion; its length varies from 3 to 13 lines. All the troparia are composed on the pattern of a model stanza, the hirmus . . . . At the beginning of the kontakion stands a short troparion, metrically and melodically independent of it; this is the prooemium . . . or kukulion” (Wellesz). From the 7th century onward, the kanon was inserted into the liturgy. The kanon is a complex poetical form, built up of nine odes, each containing six to nine troparia. The odes of the kanon have praise character, based on the nine Canticles from Sacred Scripture. The kontakion, however, is a kind of poetic homily.

Nothing has been identified from the hymn production of the first Byzantine hymnodists, who are known only by name: the Orthodox Anthimus and the Monophysite Timocles, both living in the reign of the Emperor LEO I (452–474). Auxentius, poet of troparia, came from Syria to Constantinople during the reign of Theodosius II. His songs were inspired by Hebrew poetry, both in style and in form. Anastasius, Kyriakos, and Romanus Melodus were authors of kontakia and came to Byzantium during the reign of Anastasius I (491–518). Romanus learned much from St. Ephrem’s Syriac hymns but followed another path in many ways. Because of their excellence, kontakia of these authors were in continuous use at the Imperial Palace in Constantinople until the 12th century.

One of the most famous Byzantine hymns is the AKATHISTOS, a Marian hymn that exercised great influence on both Western hymnody and Western theology from the 11th century onward. It, too, is attributed to Romanus as well as to Patriarch SERGIUS I; it is a panegyric poem, associated with the successful defense of Constantinople against the AVARS. Its prooemium may have served as a model for the “hymn introductions” in the Irish LIBER HYMNORUM.

Traditionally, the kanon is said to have been invented by ANDREW OF CRETE; his technique owed much to that of Romanus. The monastery of St. Sabas near the Dead Sea became a center of kanon writers (Greek, Syrian, Armenian, and Coptic monks), led by JOHN DAMASCENE and his foster-brother, COSMAS THE MELODIAN, who lived during the first period of the iconoclastic controversy (see ICONOCLASM). The production of kanons later shifted to the monastery of STUDIO, where Abbot THEODORE THE STUDITE excelled, following the tradition created by Romanus. These compositions, however, were no longer paraphrases of the Canticles. Contemporary and later hymnodists were Joseph of Thessalonica, Theodore’s brother; the brothers THEOPHANES (c. 759–842) and Theodore; METHODIUS I, patriarch of Constantinople, mutilated by the iconoclasts; Joseph of Studion (c. 883); METROPHANES OF SMYRNA; and the nun Kasia (Ikassia), who lived during the middle of the 9th century. Emperors who wrote hymns were LEO VI (d. 917) and CONSTANTINE VII PORPHYROGENITUS (d. 959).

Near Rome a new center of hymnody was created at GROTTAFERRATA, founded by NILUS OF ROSSANO, himself a hymnodist, who was followed by his successor, Paulus, and a continuing line of poets: St. Bartholomew, Clement, Arsenius, Germanus, John, Joseph, Pancratius, Procopius, Sophronius, and others. The last great hymn writer of the East was John Mauropus (d. 1060), metropolitan of Euchaita, the contemporary of Nicetas Serron (d. 1075). After the 11th century, Byzantine hymnody underwent a critical change; the immense number of hymns already introduced into the liturgy necessitated a limitation that slowed down further hymn production. Later Byzantine hymnography is represented by NICEPHORUS BLEMMEYDES (d. 1272); Theodore I Lascaris, emperor of Nicaea (1204–22); John Vatatzes (d. 1222); GERMANUS II of Constantinople; Giobasus Vlachus (13th century); Athanasius the Younger, patriarch of Alexandria (d. c. 1315); GREGORY SINAITES; and Isidore Vouchiras, patriarch of Constantinople (d. 1349). The 13th and 14th centuries brought a new development in musical style, ornamented with extended coloraturas; among the masters of this period were John Glykys, Manuel Chrysaphes, Theodulos Hieromonachus, John Koukouzeles, and John Lampadarius.

Armenian Hymnody. Among the Armenians hymnography flourished particularly in the period between the 12th and the 14th centuries. Representative Armenian hymnodists were NERSES GRATIOSUS (Snorhali; d. 1173); Nerses of Lambron (d. 1198), regarded as the second St. Paul; Chatshatur of Taraun (d. 1197); Wardan the Great (c. 1271); Wardan of Bardzrberd (d. c. 1310); John of Erznga or Erzingan (1250–1330); Constantine Srik; and the catholicos Constantine I (d. 1267).

Beginnings of western Latin hymnody. St. AMBROSE (d. 397), bishop of Milan, is regarded as the father of Latin hymnody. He had several minor predecessors. The African rhetor MARIUS VICTORINUS (c.360?) left three Trinitarian hymns of apologetic character, but they belong to the category of free compositions, influenced by scriptural and psalm traditions. Pope DAMASUS I, however, wrote only epigrams; no hymns can be attributed to him with certainty. The first Latin hymnodist in the traditional sense, so styled by St. Jerome and by Isidore of Seville, was St. HILARY OF POITIERS, who brought his inspiration to the West from his Eastern exile. His Liber hymnorum is lost, but in 1884 G. F. Gamurrini rediscovered three hymn fragments from this work. A fourth hymn, the Hymnum dicat turba fratrum, is ascribed to him by several MSS and by some recent scholars (S. Gaselee), but it may not be his. Two of Hilary's genuine hymn fragments are alphabetic poems. They contain many dogmatic elements, and the first of them can be regarded as a solemn declaration of faith against the Arians. The second is a symbolic representation of the rebirth of the soul in Baptism. The third treats of the Redemption, and there Christ is represented as the second Adam. None of Hilary's hymns had popular appeal, which may explain his failure as a hymnodist.

St. Ambrose and the Ambrosian school. Thus it fell to the lot of Ambrose of Milan to create a Western Latin hymnody. The occasion was the struggle against the Arians in 385 and 386, when Ambrose composed several hymns for the use of his congregation. They have a simple, popular form, are written in a uniform meter (the Ambrosian strophe: four-line iambic dimeters with irregular rhyme), and proclaim the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. Nonetheless, they have an extremely high poetic value, never surpassed in the history of Western hymnody.

Only 14 pieces can be identified as genuine hymns of Ambrose. They serve partly for the Hours of the Divine Office, partly for the feasts of Christmas, Easter, and Epiphany; for the feasts of SS. Peter and Paul, St. John the Evangelist, St. Lawrence, SS. Gervase and Protase, and St. Agnes; and for the common of the martyrs. Four others, of which three are still used in revised form at Terce, Sext, and None, and one for the common of the virgins, cannot be attributed to him with certainty, but they belong to the Ambrosian (Milanese) tradition, together with some 41 other hymns recorded in relatively early MSS. In the AETERNE RERUM CONDITOR, a genuine hymn of Ambrose, the cock appears as the symbol of Christ. The hymn describes the awakening of the soul from the dangerous and deadly sleep of night. There, and in the Splendor paternae gloriae, Christ is the embodiment of light, the reflection of the Father's glory, the real Sun. He is also the eternal food and drink, by whom man becomes mystically intoxicated—an image borrowed from the writings of PHILO JUDAEUS. The Christmas hymn celebrates the mystery of the Incarnation, the Virgin Birth, and has a Mariological motif as well. The Epiphany hymn refers to four biblical miracles associated with the liturgy of the feast. The Peter and Paul hymn relates briefly their martyrdom and echoes the end of the Gospel of St. John. The Agnes hymn is a detailed narrative of her martyrdom, containing high praise of virginity. The AETERNA CHRISTI MUNERA recalls the memory of the cruel persecution of the Christians in terms borrowed from legend.

Some would call the Ambrosian hymns austere; but in fact they are well balanced, functional, and simple. "Dignity, directness, and evangelical fervor" prevail in them, and "the hymns of Ambrose reflect the mind of the great teacher of the Latin Church. Bred as a lawyer and man of affairs, with all the practical genius of the Roman . . . , Ambrose cared little for the speculations which exercised fascination over the Greek Fathers" (Raby). His hymns served well their congregational purpose and became, gems of the liturgy in the West. He was so cleverly imitated in the Milanese Church that it becomes difficult to reestablish the identity of several genuine hymns among their many imitations. In the 5th century the hymns of Ambrose spread throughout the Church, and they were accepted by the BENEDICTINE RULE for the monastic liturgy. The Ambrosian hymn formed the basis for CISTERCIAN liturgical reform in the late 11th and the early 12th centuries. St. AUGUSTINE and many others in successive generations bear witness to the greatness of Ambrosian hymnody.

Augustine himself did not imitate the Ambrosian hymns, but he wrote an alphabetic poem entitled the Psalm Against the Donatists, characterized by long lines with a kind of rhythmical structure, regarded by some as a precursor of later accentual poetry. It was also designed for congregational purposes and possesses a distinctly apologetic quality. Its Syriac and Punic heritage is beyond doubt; it may have been imitated by others, but the only surviving piece of its kind is a psalm by FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE.

Early Middle Ages. While Ambrose composed liturgical hymns for his congregation, his younger contemporary PRUDENTIUS was writing exquisite hymns for cultured Romans, who preferred the blending of classical literary taste and the Christian spirit. Prudentius created two collections of hymnological interest, the Cathemerinon and the Peristephanon, with 36 poems in all. The first shows occasional influence from Ambrose and contains hymns for the daily round as well as several for specific feasts. The second celebrates Spanish and Roman martyrs. Their inspiration is mainly literary, but one cannot ignore Prudentius's Christian fervor. Whereas Ambrose displays a striving for classical dignity, Prudentius betrays a romantic spirit and a rare literary talent. His poems are long and rich in imagery, but they are often rhetorical and dense. Although his hymns first served as literary readings, selections were later made from them and used as centos in the liturgy, mainly in Spain. A few (seven selections in all) are still in the Roman liturgy.

Little is known about 5th-century hymnody, except for a few names. PAULINUS OF NOLA and Paulinus of Pella (d. c. 459), the grandson of Ausonius, were chiefly religious poets but wrote no real hymns. The greatest hymnodist of the age was Sedulius (possibly an Italian), who wrote two poems, one of which, the A solis ortus cardine, is an alphabetic hymn on the life of Christ. Two extracts from it are still in the Roman Breviary, and its influence was very great throughout the Middle Ages. In this hymn much space is devoted to various biblical events, which are narrated in Ambrosian verses. Raby identified as north Italian several hymns of nonliturgical character that had hitherto been assigned to the early Spanish tradition: the Obduxere polum nubila, Squalent arva soli, Saevus bella serit, and Tristes nunc populi, which refer to the frequent incursions of the barbarians into Italy.

Quite different in character is the first St. Patrick hymn, the Audite omnes amantes, which may be a poem by St. Sechnall (Secundinus, d. c. 447). The hymn quotes from the Old Latin and not from the Vulgate version of the Bible; it is constructed of 23 alphabetic stanzas of four long lines each, accentual in type, without rhyme. Another piece, the famous Eucharistic hymn Sancti venite, is also ascribed to Sechnall, but probably without sufficient evidence. Of the hymns of Pope GELASIUS I little is known, but there is more solid support for the Gallican hymns that were used in religious houses of the 6th century or earlier. CAESARIUS OF ARLES and his successor, AURELIAN OF ARLES, list nine of these, in addition to several Ambrosian hymns. The Ambrosian form survives, but makes some concessions to the accentual rhythmical principle; assonance is sparsely used, as in several other contemporary poems. All the hymns in question served the daily liturgy. The cult of the saints is more strongly reflected in the hymnody of ENNODIUS, bishop of Pavia, a mediocre poet who wrote the first Marian hymn, the Ut virginem fetam. The attribution of the Peter and Paul hymn, the Aurea luce et decore roseo, to a certain Elpis, long assumed to be the wife of BOETHIUS, is certainly wrong; it is a fine Carolingian hymn (see DECORA LUX, AETERNITATIS; EGREGIE DOCTOR PAULE) and, in revised version, is in the Roman Breviary.

The most celebrated hymnodist of the 6th century was Venantius FORTUNATUS, an Italian priest, a favorite of the Austrasian court, who became bishop of Poitiers. He is best known for his hymns of the Holy Cross, the PANGE LINGUA and VEXILLA REGIS (also the Crux benedicta nitet), included in the liturgy of Passiontide. He was, moreover, the author of another hymn, the Tempore florigero, which became the model for numerous processional hymns in the Middle Ages of the type, Salve festa dies. Two further hymns, the Agnoscat omne saeculum and QUEM TERRA, PONTUS, SIDERA, were wrongly ascribed to him. King Chilperic of Neustria (d. 584) was another contemporary hymnodist (e.g. his Medard hymn). Liturgical MSS attribute the Tellus ac aethra iubilent, a hymn for the mandatum on Holy Thursday, to Bp. Flavius of Châlon-sur-Saône (d. 591). Its dramatic text recalls the biblical events on which the ceremony is based.

Seventh and Eighth Centuries. The authorship of GREGORY I (THE GREAT) in the field of hymnology has aroused much controversy. C. Blume ascribed 16 hymns to Gregory, but it cannot be proved that he is the author, even if most of them were written by the same hand. The Milanese poet Maximian (c. 600) composed hymns for use in the local liturgy, e.g., his Ambrose hymn,

Miraculum laudabile. An Irish hymn of the same period is the famous Altus prosator, an early medieval Paradise Lost, attributed to St. COLUMBA OF IONA. R. J. Hesbert assumes that the hymn of praise in honor of St. COLUMBAN OF LUXUEIL was written by another famous Irishman, St. GALL. Another Columban hymn, the Nostris solemnibus saeculis, is a poem of JONAS OF BOBBIO. Here the legend of the saint is recounted and his miracles are praised.

No definite chronology can be given for the Spanish hymns of the period, listed by C. M. Diaz y Diaz. Many of them celebrate Apostles and Spanish saints; others were written for special occasions, e.g., the consecration of a church, a burial, a marriage, a war. A hymn honoring the Holy Cross, the Ab ore verbum prolatum, written in the meter of the Pange lingua of Venantius Fortunatus, may precede them in time. A. Baumstark assumes here Byzantine liturgical patterns. Another famous hymn of the period (7th century?) is the URBS BEATA JERUSALEM, which Diaz y Diaz assigns to Spain. It is a poetic vision of the heavenly Jerusalem, often imitated by later hymns. Among Spanish hymn writers are the following: ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, BRAULIO of Saragossa and his brother John, MAXIMUS OF SARAGOSSA, ILDEFONSUS OF TOLEDO, EUGENE II (III) OF TOLEDO, and Quiricus of Barcelona (d. 666). Among other works, there are Braulio's hymn honoring St. Aemilian (O magna rerum Christe) and two Eulalia hymns from Quiricus; only one hymn, the Adsunt punicea floscula, can be ascribed with certainty to Isidore. From Eugene several have survived, e.g., the Inclitae parentis almae, completed by the recent discovery of J. Leclercq. The author of the Saint-Denis hymn, the Coeli cives adplaudite, however, is neither Eugene of Deuil nor Eugene of Toledo, but HILDUIN OF SAINT-DENIS (first half of the 9th century).

The most important Irish monument of the period is the Antiphony of Bangor (end of the 7th century), which also contains the Hymnum dicat turba fratrum, a Gallican hymn wrongly attributed to Hilary of Poitiers. It is difficult to date a peculiar Irish-Celtic hymn type called the lorica (breast-plate), displaying a mixture of Christian and pre-Christian Celtic beliefs. One of them, the Suffragare trinitatis unitas, is described as a lorica of GILDAS (c. 516–570), but without foundation. Another is the Sancte sator suffragator, imploring heavenly protection on the user (reciter) of the text.

Some 16 hymns represent the so-called Gallican liturgical tradition between 600 and 700 (cf. MS Vat. Reg. lat. XI, analyzed by A. WILMART). Many of them appear later in Spanish-Mozarabic and other local liturgies (cf. the Hymnarium Moissiacense). Anglo-Saxon hymnodists of the period include ALDHELM and the Venerable BEDE. At least 16 hymns are attributed to Bede, but many may not be his. Among his genuine compositions is a hymn in honor of St. ETHELREDA, the Alma Deus trinitas, a laud of virginity, which he opposes to the heroic subjects celebrated by Virgil and Homer. Fortunately for the historian, Bede mentions a number of hymns in his other works, e.g., the St. Lupus hymn, Trecassinorum antistitem. He also refers to the Apparebit repentina dies magna, one of the precursors of the famed Dies irae. It is a poem containing a detailed description of the Last Judgment, based on scriptural background, and was once believed to be of the late classical period. K. Strecker sees in it reflections of the sermon tradition of St. Ephrem.

The 8th century produced another harvest of Spanish hymns, many of them composed in the territory occupied by the Arabs and therefore called MOZARABIC. Some are unusually long, such as the Christopher hymn, O beate mundi auctor, based largely on the Oriental branch of the St. CHRISTOPHER legend. Two hymns can be attributed to Bp. Cixilianus of Toledo (d. 783): the Exulta nimium turba (on St. Thyrsus) and the Urbis Romuleae iam toga (on St. Torquatus). A St. James hymn (JAMES [SON OF ZEBEDEE]) in 12 strophes has an acrostic, indicating that it was composed during the reign of King Mauregato between 783 and 788. Many Irish-Latin hymns recorded in the Irish Liber hymnorum (MSS from the 11th century) are ascribed to persons living during the period: St. Ultan of Ardbreccan (d. 656); Colman MacMurchon, abbot of Maghbie (d. c. 731); Oengus MacTpiraithe (c. 741); Cuchuimne (c. 746); and St. Maolruain, abbot of Tallaght (d. 792). Among the saints celebrated in these hymns are BRIGID OF IRELAND, Kiaran of Cluain-Macnois, Michael, Peter, MARTIN OF TOURS, Aed MacBricc, and Andrew.

Carolingian period. The first stage of early Christian and medieval hymnography ends with a succession of Carolingian poets belonging to several generations. The earliest group lived as part of the entourage of CHARLEMAGNE and as members of his court were strongly influenced by classical literary traditions.

The Court Circle. PAUL THE DEACON (d. 799), who came from northern Italy, in addition to a St. Benedict hymn, the Fratres alacri pectore, was credited also with the authorship of the famous hymn in honor of St. John the Baptist, UT QUEANT LAXIS RESONARE FIBRIS. This view is no longer held; but this hymn, a masterpiece in its own right, is regarded as a product of the Carolingian era. The attribution to Paul of the Marian hymn Quis posuit amplo fame is uncertain. His contemporary ALCUIN is the author of the St. Vedast hymn, Christe, salvator hominis, of the evening song Luminis fons, lux et origo, and the Holy Cross hymn Crux decus es mundi. Two hymns called the Rhythms of Gotha, written c. 800, belong to anonymous poets in Alcuin's circle. The first, a double alphabetic poem, Altus auctor omnium, was directed against the heresy of ADOPTIONISM. A large number of hymns is associated with the name of PAULINUS OF AQUILEIA, but his authorship is not quite clear. Of these, the Peter and Paul hymn Felix per omnes shows some affinity to that attributed to Elpis, and the two appear as an amalgam in the Roman Breviary. The hymn to St. Mark, the Jam nunc per omne lux, is clearly linked with Aquileia. His accentual hymn on the resurrection of Lazarus is unusually long. According to D. Norberg, the Congregavit nos in unum, a laud of fraternal charity that later became a part of the mandatum ceremony, is also the work of Paulinus. WALAFRID STRABO asserted that Paulinus wrote hymns for private Masses, a statement that some scholars interpret in favor of the early origin of the SEQUENCE. The Spaniard THEODULF OF ORLÉANS is the author of the processional hymn for Palm Sunday, the GLORIA, LAUS ET HONOR.

With this period are associated numerous Carolingian "rhythms," chiefly hymns without liturgical function, which closely adhere to the principles of accentual versification. Most of them are edited (in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae [Berlin 1826–]). No fixed chronology can be assigned to these works, but some of them go back to the Merovingian period. Several have eschatological character; others are Christmas and Marian hymns. One of them, the Gratia excelso regi, was written by a certain Gaidhaldus, a parish priest in Verona. Another, the unusual Audiat coelum atque terra, describing Christ's harrowing of hell, closely follows the story of the apocrypha. [See BIBLE] The Venetian bishop Christophorus (c. 800) is credited with the translation of a Marian hymn, the Akathistos (Meersseman). Among the anonymous hymns are two that are particularly beautiful: the VENI CREATOR SPIRITUS, a hymn of the Holy Spirit (not by Rabanus Maurus), and the famous Marian hymn AVE MARIS STELLA, a glorification of the Virgin Mary, who changed Eve's heritage. The hymn Alleluia dulce carmen refers to the symbolic liturgical ceremony of the time in which one bade farewell to the ALLELUIA during lent.

Later Carolingian period. An outstanding figure of the time was RABANUS MAURUS, archbishop of Mainz (d. 847), whom G. M. Dreves credited with some 27 hymns, most of which are of uncertain ascription and are even earlier than Rabanus. Walafrid Strabo (d. 849), a pupil of Rabanus, left many works, including several hymns and related types of poetry. His lengthy hymn on the THEBAN LEGION is particularly impressive, showing the influence of Prudentius. The renowned Lupus of Ferrières (d. after 862) was a gifted letter-writer, but the two Wigbert hymns associated with his name are somewhat less than outstanding. The deacon FLORUS OF LYONS, the adversary of the liturgist AMALARIUS of Metz, apart from psalm paraphrases, left several hymns (Michael, John and Paul, etc.) and a Laus cerei paschalis. His hymns are dramatic and vivid, conjuring up great scenes and visions and contrasting Christianity and paganism.

The greatest hymnodist of the time was GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS (or Fulda), who was involved in the PREDESTINATION controversy and was excommunicated over that issue. His hymns are the moving expression of a soul seeing its own sinfulness and helplessness. Gottschalk left two series of hymns, the second of which was discovered by G. Morin and N. Fickermann. Eight of these are for the Hours of the Office; another is a "kind of personal litany full of melancholy but of considerable poetic power" (M. L. W. Laistner, Thought and Letters in Western Europe, A.D. to 900 [New York 1957]). Five of the older series are personal confessions and prayers to Christ, and the sixth is a much-discussed poem in praise of the Trinity. Trust in the mercy of God is one of the dominating themes of these poems.

Abbot ERMENRICH OF PASSAU (ELLWANGEN), who also belonged to the circle of Rabanus, wrote a St. Sualo (Solus) hymn. Wandalbert of Prüm (d. c. 870) is known for his versified martyrology. His hymn of All Saints, the Christe coelorum modulans caterva, is not recorded in liturgical MSS. The Unam duorum gloriam, on SS. Chrysanthus and Daria, whose relics were translated to a church associated with Prüm, may also be by Wandalbert. BERTHARIUS of Monte Cassino wrote several hymns about which there is some confusion. Among the Spanish hymnodists of the Carolingian period were the martyr EULOGIUS and his friend Albar of Córdoba. According to B. Thorsberg, three hymns honoring SS. Euphemia, Dorothy, and Sebastian belong to Eulogius. Albar honored his friend in the acrostic poem Almi nunc revehit. He may have also written a hymn on St. Jerome, the Christus est virtus, and a nuptial hymn, Tuba clarifica plebs. HUCBALD OF SAINT-AMAND (d. 930), important for the history of early Offices, was the author of hymns (listed by R. Weakland), sequences, and poetic offices. Bishop Stephen of Liège is credited with the composition of the earliest Trinity Office. Abbot Gurdestin (Wurdestinus, d. 884) and the monk Clement (c. 870) represent the monastery of Landévennec with hymns and an Office of St. Winwaloe. The celebrated Irish poet Sedulius Scotus, living on the Continent, wrote three religious poems for the feast of the Resurrection and another praising the Irish victory over the Norsemen. His splendid Easter song, Haec est alma dies almarum, drew its inspiration partly from the work of Fortunatus. About 886 an unknown monk wrote two hymns in honor of St. Cornelius, and the 9th century also saw the birth of the Caritas songs, extolling fraternal charity in the monasteries.

Perhaps no monastery in the 9th century contributed more to the growth of hymnody than SANKT GALLEN. Three particular hymn types flourished there, the versus, the TROPE, and the Sequence. Three monks of the abbey wrote versus (processional hymns): Ratpert (d. 890), Hartmann the Younger (d. 925), and Waldram (c. 900). The authorship of Hartmann is doubted by some. Sankt Gallen produced also semiliturgical hymns of greeting (susceptacula regum) for members of royal families. A master, but not the inventor of the trope, was Tutilo, whose Christmas trope, Hodie cantandus est, has dramatic character.

Tropes are particularly important since they form the starting point for the development of the liturgical drama. The Sequence, on the other hand, is essentially a textual and musical trope attached to the Alleluia of the Mass. The first Sequence, as is now known, came from JUMIÈGES (Gimèdia) to Sankt Gallen just after the middle of the 9th century. Its pattern was greatly developed and extended by NOTKER BALBULUS (d. 912), who wrote his first Sequences between 860 and 870; his Liber ymnorum, a generous selection of early Sequences, was edited by W. von den Steinen. In other monasteries, however, Sequences were composed before and simultaneously with Notker (e.g., the Stans a longe); there is also early evidence of them in a MS from Verona (before 900), at Toul, and soon afterward at the Abbey of St. Martial in Limoges. The Notkerian Sequence became the model for the German type, and that of Limoges served as an example for France. Notker wrote at least 40 Sequences and several tropes as well; his most important compositions are Laudes Deo, Psallat ecclesia and Sancti Spiritus assit nobis (to the Holy Spirit). His Peter and Paul Sequence, the Petre, summe Christi pastor, had widespread acceptance. In the early non-Notkerian Sequence tradition are a Swan-sequence, the Clangam filii, a lyrical allegory; the Alleluia dic nobis, a "sequence counterpart" of the farewell to the Alleluia; and a number of "double sequences" (called also da capo sequences), e.g., the Dulce carmen et melodum (a St. Maurice Sequence). The Notkerian and early French Sequences may be called "irregular"; after the 11th century the Sequence type becomes "regular," or normalized; those lying between may be regarded as transitional.

Tenth and eleventh centuries. The 10th century marks the extension of the hymn tradition. At the turn of the century lived such authors as Peter the Deacon of Naples (Barbara, Martin the Hermit, and Agnellus hymns) and EUGENIUS VULGARIUS (d. c. 928). Bishop RADBOD OF UTRECHT was credited with the Sequence Ave summa praesulum (about Martin of Tours), which is not his. However, he wrote an Office and a long hymn in honor of St. Martin. Other hymnologists include Abbot Pilgrim of Bremati (Belegrimmus, early 10th century), the author of a Marian hymn, and ODO OF CLUNY (d. 943), with hymns about St. Martin of Tours. The first Mary Magdalen hymns, the Jesu Christe, auctor vitae and Votiva cunctis orbita, and one Sequence, the Adest praecelsa, are from the 10th century. Some uncertainty prevails about the identity of the poet Cosmas of Matera (or Cosmas of Japygas, 950 or early 11th century?). The Sequence Gaude coelestis sponsa was once wrongly attributed to the nun ROSWITHA OF GANDERSHEIM (P. von Winterfeld). EKKEHARD OF SANKT GALLEN (910–973) had six Sequences and one hymn; his Columbanus Sequence and that on the Trinity were composed c. 950; other hymnodists of Sankt Gallen were Notker Physicus (d. 975) and Ekkehard II (d. 990). In this period the early Sequence was gradually replaced by a new type, the Ottonian Sequence. Also at that time an anonymous poet of Reichenau (c. 1000) was the author of five Pentecost Sequences; the Office of St. Folcwin was written by FOLCWIN OF LOBBES (d. 990); Bishop Reginold of Eichstätt composed a multilingual (Latin, Greek, and Hebrew) "Sequence" of St. Willibald and several poetic Offices; and ADSO OF MONTIER-EN-DER (d. 998) wrote hymns not yet identified.

The English hymnodist Wulfstan of Winchester (d. 990), cantor of S. Swithun, wrote many hymns, Sequences, and tropes of local and English saints (Ethelwold, Swithun, Birinus, Augustine of Canterbury). He often followed patterns created by Bede. Two important MSS of the period are the Winchester tropes; and another liturgical book of hymnological interest is the Hymnarium of MOISSAC (i.e., Saint-Martin of Montauriol, c. 1000), with two series of hymns (about 140 items). The Hymnarius Severinianus is a Neapolitan hymn collection of liturgical poems used in southern Italy. In Spain many hymns are associated with the monastery of Silos. Several hymnodists of this period are Abbot Salvus Albeldensis, Orientius, Sarracinus, and Grimoaldus. The curious and dramatic processional Sancta Maria quid est was used in Rome about the turn of the millennium; Meersseman associates it with the name of Pope SYLVESTER II. It is difficult to date the strange hymn on the divine names, the Deus pater piissime, which probably originated in France under Irish influence and spread to the North. Other hymnodists c. 1000 are Abbot HERIGER OF LOBBES (d. 1007), author of a St. Ursmar hymn; Virus Felix Decanus, with a hymn to St. Genevieve; and the Anonymus Augiensis of Reichenau, author of three long, interesting hymns on the life of the Virgin Mary and the Holy Cross.

The greatest representative of the poetry of the cathedral schools is FULBERT OF CHARTRES (d. 1029). Some of his hymns have Oriental (Byzantine) inspiration and background (A. Baumstark), especially his hymn on the Magi and his famous Easter hymn, Chorus novae Jerusalem. His hymn on peace, the Sanctum simpliciter patrem cole, betrays classical influences (Horace, Vergil, Juvenal), but basically it is an echo of the Treuga Dei movement of his age (see PEACE OF GOD). The morning song of Fleury, the Phoebi claro nondum orto, has bilingual features and is thought to have been influenced by Mithraic traditions.

Hymnodists of the 11th century are Adenulphus of Capua (d. 1058); Melus; Carus; Giraldu, a monk of Fleury; Frulandus of Murbach; Dietrich of St. Matthew in Trier; and above all, Adhémar of Chabannes (d. 1034), whose several Eparchius hymns have survived. The friends Meginfred of Magdeburg and Arnold of Vohberg (d. 1035) wrote St. Emmeram hymns. Bishop Heribert of Rothenburg (d. 1042) left a legacy of hymns in honor of the Holy Cross; of All Saints; and of SS. Willibald, Walburga, Stephen, and Lawrence. Mention should also be made of Olbert of Gembloux (d. 1048); Odoramnus of Sens (d. 1046), author of an Office (c. 1029) of SS. Savinian and Potentian; and BERNO OF REICHENAU, author of tropes, hymns, and Sequences. Wipo of Burgundy, the chaplain of Emperor Conrad II, was the author of the Easter Sequence VICTIMAE PASCHALI LAUDES. J. Handschin sees distinct apologetic tendencies in this beautiful Sequence of the transitional period. It was soon accepted by various liturgies and is still in use. ODILO OF CLUNY (d. 1048) composed, among other works, some eight Maiolus hymns. HERMANNUS CONTRACTUS of Reichenau was credited with the authorship of the Marian antiphons the ALMA REDEMPTORIS MATER and the SALVE REGINA (MATER) MISERICORDIAE. Others named as possible authors of these hymns are Adhémar of Puy and Peter of Compostella. Hermannus, moreover, composed several outstanding Sequences: the Grates, honos (Holy Cross), Ave praeclara (the Assumption), Exurgat almiphonus (Mary Magdalen), Benedictio trinae unitati (Bl. Trinity), and an Office of St. Afra. Pope LEO IX (d. 1054) left an Office of St. Gregory the Great and several other poems.

Italian poets of the second half of the 11th century are Guaiferus, Amatus of Monte Cassino, Alberic of Monte Cassino, and Wido of Ivrea (d. 1075), who produced a number of hymns honoring Irish and other saints. Albertic has hymns on SS. Dominic of Sora and Scholastica, but he may also have been the author of many others (O. J. Blum). PETER DAMIAN, cardinal bishop of Ostia (d. 1072), was credited with many hymns, among them four eschatological poems. The beautiful Quis est hic qui pulsatur, inspired by the Song of Songs does not belong among his poems. Alphanus of Salerno (d. 1085) composed more than 30 liturgical and nonliturgical hymns; some were elegant odes that are among his best. The O ROMA NOBILIS, a song on SS. Peter and Paul, is not a poem from Verona but probably from southern Italy or Monte Cassino (B. Peebles). OTHLO OF SANKT EMMERAM (d. 1072) has two Easter hymns; Eusebius Bruno, bishop of Angers (d. 1081), with 11 hymns, and BERENGARIUS OF TOURS, with one, are all contemporary hymnodists. Gottschalk of Limburg, monk and imperial chaplain, is a master in Sequence composition (23 Sequences). The Christmas Sequence Laetabundus, one of the most frequently imitated of the time, is a lofty piece by an anonymous author. The first of the "regular" Sequences appear at the end of the 11th century; among them are many Marian Sequences and the famed Verbum bonum et suave for Christmas.

Twelfth century. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY was not a hymnodist, as Dreves had assumed. REGINALD OF CANTERBURY (d. 1109) wrote poems on St. Malchus, some of them possessing hymn characteristics. A typical expression of monastic mysticism is the long Epithalamium Christi virginum by a monk of HIRSAU (Peregrinus or Conrad of Hirsau?). Abbot THIOFRID OF ECHTERNACH (d. 1110) is the author of the Holy Cross hymn Salve crux sancta but not of the Willibrord Sequence Willibrordi sancti. Franciscus Camenus Perusinus (fl. 1098–1117?), a somewhat mysterious poet, composed a hymn in sapphics honoring Nicolas of Trani. A Spanish monk, Grimold, wrote, among other works, three hymns on St. Felix. Some scholars have ascribed the hymn Cives coelestis patriae to ANSELM OF LAON (d. 1117) or to MARBOD OF RENNES (d. 1123), who has many other hymns, among them several on Mary Magdalen. HILDEBERT OF LAVARDIN (d. 1133), along with Marbod, is representative of the hymnography of the 12th-century Renaissance. His best-known hymn is the Alpha et O, magne Deus, a praise of the Trinity; his Christmas hymn, Salve festa dies, follows Fortunatus and echos Vergil's fourth Eclogue. Baudry of Bourgueil (d. 1130) is less important (hymns on Samson of Dol and on St. Catherine). GEOFFREY OF VENDÔME (d. 1132) wrote Marian hymns and several on Mary Magdalen. Reginaldus of Colle di Mezzo (d. 1165) is associated with hymns of St. Placid. ORDERICUS VITALIS, a historian, reworked several hymns written by Wulfstan, in addition to writing his own compositions.

Peter ABELARD, abbot of St. Gildas, was one of the most original and prolific hymnodists of the century with his Hymnarius Paraclitensis (133 hymns) and his series Planctus. By contrast BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX wrote only two hymns, one on St. Victor, the other on Malachy of Armagh. The famous Jubilus, Dulcis Jesu memoria, later in the Roman Breviary "reformed" to JESU, DULCIS MEMORIA, is not Bernard's. It belongs to an English Cistercian at the end of the 12th century who was influenced by Bernard's ideas. Nicholas of Clairvaux (d. 1176) wrote some ten Sequences, only recently discovered.

Bishop Hatto of Troyes (d. 1145) may have been the author of one hymn in the Codex Calixtinus (see below). BERNARD OF CLUNY (Morlas, d. 1140) wrote the poem De contemptu mundi and a long Mariale, which also contains the hymn OMNI DIE DIC MARIAE.

Other hymnodists of the period include Abbot Udalric of Maissach (d. 1150), PETER THE VENERABLE (d. 1156), and the Goliardic poet Hugh of Orleans or Primas (d. 1160), who is the author of the Holy Cross Sequence Laudes crucis. ADAM OF SAINT-VICTOR is credited with many regular Sequences, e.g., Profitentes unitatem and some 50 others. He uses many ideas borrowed from contemporary theology, biblical allusions, and legendary material and presents a highly developed system of symbolism (allegories, typology, etc.) well-established in homiletic and exegetic literature. In Adam's Sequences "the whole visible universe in its smallest details appeared . . . as fraught with a hidden meaning" (Raby). His Sequences were acclaimed and imitated as well as plagiarized. His melodies were composed not by him but by a fellow monk (H. Spanke). Another great poet is WALTER OF CHÂTILLON (d. 1180), author of many Christmas and Marian songs (nonliturgical and paraliturgical texts). The Codex Calixtinus, originally from the 1160s, is the chief monument of contemporary polyphonic music. Its St. James hymns (about 25) are ascribed in the MS to a variety of poets. The canonization of Charlemagne by the antipope Paschal III in 1165 brought about the composition of the famous Sequence Urbs Aquensis, urbs regalis, followed by many used in the Diocese of Aachen. Other hymnodists are the Englishman Osbert of Clare (d. 1160), with the first hymns of St. Anne; Bishop Adalbert III of Tournel (or of Mende, d. 1187), with 11 hymns on St. Privatus; and ECKBERT OF SCHÖNAU, belonging to the circle of German mystics. In the same group were St. HILDEGARDE OF BINGEN (d. 1179) and the Abbess HERRAD OF LANDSBERG (d. 1195), compiler of the Hortus deliciarum. Thomas BECKET, too, wrote a hymn on the joys of the Virgin. GODFREY OF SAINT-VICTOR (not Godfrey of Breteuil) is the author of the famous Planctus ante nescia (end of the 12th century). Contemporary poets are Stephen of Tournai (d. 1203), with hymns honoring St. GERARD OF SAUVE-MAJEURE; ALAN OF LILLE, one of the most outstanding poets and thinkers of the fin du siècle, with three hymns and a rather curious Christmas song about the failure of the arts, the Exceptivam actionem; and Guy of Bazoches (d. 1203), with a long series of hymns for friends and acquaintances. Mathieu, Cantor of Rievaulx, was identified by A. Wilmart as a hymnodist, a contemporary of the Cistercian Anonymus Noanus. The beginnings of Scandinavian hymnody are also associated with the 12th century.

Thirteenth century. After 1200 the Dominicans, Franciscans, and Cistercians created a new hymnody. ALEXANDER NECKHAM (d. 1217), abbot of Cirencester, was a schoolman writing among other works Marian Sequences. Peter Corbeil (d. 1222, as bishops of Sens) compiled the texts of the Office of the FEAST OF FOOLS. The authorship of the Pentecost Sequence VENI SANCTE SPIRITUS, still used in the liturgy, is a debated subject; it is likely that the author was STEPHEN LANGTON, archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228). The Cistercian Gosswin of Bossut (d. c. 1230) wrote hymns on St. Arnulf of Villers-en-Brabant. The most distinguished poet of the period is PHILIP, the chancellor of the University of Paris (d. 1236 or 1237), wrongly identified with PHILIP OF GRÈVE. His Mary Magdalen hymns and songs (conductus, motets, etc.) for Easter and Passiontide are unsurpassed. The Premonstratensian HERMAN JOSEPH (d. 1241) has the distinction of producing the first hymn of the Sacred Heart, the Summi regis cor aveto. Authors of hymns in honor of St. FRANCIS are Pope GREGORY IX (d. 1241), Thomas of Capua (d. 1243), and JULIAN OF SPEYER, author and composer of poetic Offices of great importance. THOMAS OF CELANO (d. 1250?) has been credited with three hymns, including the DIES IRAE. His authorship, however, cannot be proved, since the Dies irae, though it may be a Franciscan product, seems not to have been composed by Thomas. The first hymns for the feast of CORPUS CHRISTI were written by John of Mont-Cornillon (c. 1246). Arnulf of Louvain (d. 1248) is a hymnodist of the Cistercian Order; and Constantine of Medici, bishop of Orvieto (d. 1257), was the Dominican author of the Office of St. Dominic. Another Cistercian, Jean de Limoges (d. 1250 or after), wrote a hymn honoring St. Bernard. Three hymns on St. CLARE may be attributed to Pope ALEXANDER IV. THOMAS OF CANTIMPRÉ wrote a St. Jordan hymn; JAMES OF VORAGINE, author of the Golden Legend, supposedly composed several Syrus hymns.

Generally, St. THOMAS AQUINAS is credited with the Corpus Christi hymns, PANGE LINGUA, SACRIS SOLEMNIIS, and VERBUM SUPERNUM PRODIENS, and the Sequence LAUDA SION SALVATOREM; but his authorship is difficult to prove. The ADORO TE DEVOTE is certainly not by him (Wilmart). BONAVENTURE (Cardinal John of Fidanza, d. 1274) is mentioned as the poet of the Holy Cross and of the Laudismus de s. cruce, but none of these can be surely ascribed to him. Two English poets are John of Garland (d. 1258) and Henry of Avranches; but the best English poet of the century may have been JOHN OF HOVEDEN (Howden, d. 1275), a representative of mystical poetry. Adam de la Bassée wrote poetic inserts for a dramatized form of Alan of Lille's Anticli audianus, and a Franciscan of high reputation, JOHN PECKHAM (Pecham), archbishop of Canterbury (1292), was the author of the long Philo- mena and of a poetic Office of the Trinity with hymns. Spain is represented by another Franciscan, Gil de Zamora (c. 1300); the Milanese Origo Scaccabarozzi wrote a Liber Hymnorum for Milanese churches. Although the Franciscan JACOPONE DA TODI (Jacobus de Benedictis, d. 1306) is probably not the author of the Sequence STABAT MATER, it possesses a spirit common to his Laude. Scandinavian hymnodists are Ragvaldus I (1266) or Ragvaldus II (1321), the Dominican Jón Halldorsson (d. 1339?, author of a St. Torlach Office?), and Brynolf Algotsson (d. 1317, bishop of Skara), who wrote several hymns and other pieces.

Fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Among the hymnodists of the 14th century are Frater Honofrius of Sulmona; William of Mandagout, bishop of Palestrina (d. 1321); Engelbert of Volkersdorf (d. 1331); the Cistercian Christian of Lilienfeld (d. before 1332), with some 150 hymns; the plebanus Jakob von Mühlendorf (d. 1350); the English mystic and hermit Richard ROLLE DE HAMPOLE (d. 1349); Cardinal JAMES GAËTANI STEFANESCHI (d. 1343); the Franciscan General Gerardus Odonis (d. 1349), with hymns for the feast of stigmatization of St. Francis; two Carthusians, Conrad of Gaming (d. 1360, called also Conrad of Haimburg) and Albert of Prague (d. 1386?); the Cistercian William de Deguilleville (d. after 1358); Johannes Decanus (c. 1360, in the Mosburg Cantionale); and a series of Scandinavian hymnodists associated with St. BRIDGET OF SWEDEN (Petrus Olavi, d. 1378; Birger Gregersson, d. 1383; NICHOLAS HERMANSSON, d. 1391) also Raymund delle Vigne (d. 1399); Archbishop Johannes de Jetzenstein (d. 1400) and Cardinal ADAM EASTON (d. 1397), hymnodists of the Visitation. Philippe de Mézières (Frater Rostagnus, d. 1405), too, belongs to this group, composing hymns for Mary's Presentation. About the turn of the century there were Peter of Candia, the antipope Alexander V (d. 1410); Lippold of Steinberg (d. 1415); Jean GERSON OF France (d. 1429), with hymns and poems on St. Joseph; and John HUS (1415). The monk Ronto, Dante's translator into Latin (d. 1443); Abbot Ulric of Stöcklin (d. 1443); Winand Ort von Steeg (d. 1447); and Johannes Hofmann, bishop of Meissen (d. 1451), belong to another generation. Two Dominicans are Petrus Ranzanus and Martialis Auribellus (c. 1455); John Benechini and John de Beka are less important. Pope PIUS II (Aeneas Silvius Piccolomini, d. 1464) is credited with hymns on St. Catherine of Siena. DENIS THE CARTHUSIAN (d. 1471) left more than 120 hymns written in the mystical spirit. The spirit of the DEVOTIO MODERNA is expressed in hymns by THOMAS À KEMPIS (d. 1471). Jerome of Wörth (Hieronymus de Werdea, d. 1475); Heinrich of Gundelfingen (d. 1490, hymns on St. NICHOLAS OF FLÜE); Arnoldus Heimerich (d. 1491); and the Carthusian Antonius de Lantsee (c. 1492) are representatives of late medieval hymnody. The Franciscan Jean Tisserand (d. 1494) wrote, among other works, the Easter song O FILII ET FILIAE. Among the last names to be mentioned are Johannes Mauburnus, abbot of Livry (d. 1503), and Franciscan Bernardino de' Busti (d. 1500).

There were many minor hymnodists in the period, but the new spirit was then represented by the humanists. The tradition of Western Latin hymnody, more than 1,000 years old, was interrupted by HUMANISM, by the REFORMATION; and by the COUNTER REFORMATION, which brought forth a new hymnody, only faintly resembling the old hymns and Sequences, written for use in dioceses and religious orders, which are still found in the Roman Breviary and in local liturgies. The systematic study of hymnody did not emerge until the 19th century. It began with the work of H. A. Daniel, J. Kehrein, F. J. Mone, G. Morel, G. Milchsack, R. C. Trench, J. M. Neale, R. Stevenson, W. H. Frere, G. E. Klemming, and mainly the two Jesuits G. M. Dreves and C. Blume.

Bibliography: A. THIERFELDER, De Christianorum psalmis et hymnis usque ad Ambrosii tempora (Leipzig 1868). J. B. PITRA, Hymnographie de l'Église grecque (Rome 1867). W. VON CHRIST and M. PARANIKAS, eds., Anthologia Graeca carminum Christianorum (Leipzig 1871). P. MAAS, Frühbyzantinische Kirchenpoesie (2d ed. Berlin 1931), cf. also G. CAMMELLI, ed., Romano il melode (Florence 1930). E. J. WELLESZ, "The Earliest Example of Christian Hymnody," Classical Quarterly 39 (1945) 34–45. H. FOLLIERI, Initia hymnorum ecclesiae Graecae, 4 v. (Studi e Testi 211–214; 1960–63), a complete list of Greek and Byzantine hymns known to date (a most important instrument of research and study). E. WELLESZ, A History of Byzantine Music and Hymnography, a summary of modern research with extensive bibliog. M. SIMONETTI, "Studi sull'innologia popolare cristiana dei primi secoli," Atti dell'Accademia nazionale dei Lincei. Memorie Classe di scienze morali, storiche e filologiche, Ser. 8, 6 (1952) fasc. 6. Texts. Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922) is the largest single collection. W. BULST, ed., Hymni Latini antiquissimi LXXV (Heidelberg 1956), an excellent source for the earliest hymns, superseding in many ways A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922). Still indispensable are H. A. DANIEL, Thesaurus hymnologicus, 5 v. (Halle-Leipzig 1841–56). F. J. MONE, ed., Lateinische Hymnen des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Freiburg 1853–55). Repertory. U. CHEVALIER, Repertorium hymnologicum (Louvain-Brussels 1892–1921), with correction by C. BLUME, Repertorium repertorii (Leipzig 1901) and J. MEARNES, Early Latin Hymnaries (Cambridge 1913). Melodies. B. STÄBLEIN, ed., Die mittelalterlichen Hymnenmelodien des Abendlandes (Monumenta monodica medii aevi 1; Kassel 1956). B. RAJECZKY, Melodiarium Hungariae medii aevi (Budapest 1956— ) v. 1. History. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung, 2 v. (Berlin 1964–65), the most detailed work at present. R. E. MESSENGER, The Medieval Latin Hymn (Washington, D.C. 1953), a good summary of all problems involved. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (2d ed. Oxford 1953); A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages (2d ed. Oxford 1957). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROT, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 6.2:2901–28. Roman liturgy. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, Md. 1957). W. H. FRERE, Historical

Catholic priest at Saint Joseph's School leads the choir in a hymn during Sunday Mass, Singmari, India. (©Earl & Nazima Kowall/CORBIS)

Edition of "Hymns Ancient and Modern" (London 1909). M. FROST, ed., Historical Companion to "Hymns Ancient and Modern" (London 1962). The Hymnal 1940, Companion (3d rev. ed., New York 1951). G. P. JACKSON, Spiritual Folk Songs of Early America (New York n.d.). H. A. L. JEFFERSON, Hymns in Christian Worship (London 1950). B. STÄBLEIN, "Hymnus," Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart 6:987–1032. O. WESTENDORF, "The State of Catholic Hymnody," The Hymn 28 (1977) 54–60.

[J. SZÖVÉRFY/R. B. HALLER/EDS.]

HYMNS AND HYMNALS, I: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENTS

Until the Reformation, melodies of the Latin hymn predominated in Christian worship. The vernacular hymn has been used in worship since the Reformation in both the Catholic and the Protestant tradition. This article traces the history and development of Latin hymnody, Catholic vernacular hymnody in Europe, Protestant hymnody in Europe since the Reformation, Protestant hymnody in the U.S., and Catholic vernacular hymnody in the U.S. until the Second Vatican Council. For developments after Vatican II, see HYMNS AND HYMNALS, II: VATICAN II AND BEYOND.

Latin Hymnody. The music of Latin hymnody may be divided into three periods: the formative phase from the 4th to the 8th century; the period of florescence in the Middle Ages, from the Carolingian period to the end of the Renaissance; and the decline during the baroque, classical, and romantic periods.

Earliest Western Hymnody. Although it is certain that the early Christians used Psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs (Col 3.16) derived from the Jewish worship in the synagogue, knowledge of the music of these hymns can be only conjectural. With regard to hymn melodies prior to the 9th century, the date of the first MSS with musical notation, any assertion must be based on the deduction or assumption that the melodies are older than the MSS in which they are first recorded.

Latin hymnal. (©Ted Streshinsky/CORBIS)

Perhaps the greatest, as well as the most popular, Christian hymn of all ages is the TE DEUM. Unlike other Office hymns, the Te Deum is written in rhythmic prose. Textually as well as musically it is composed of three distinct parts. The first, in praise of the Holy Trinity, consists of 15 verses with an alternation of two melodic elements, which are initially stated with the words Te Dominum confitemur and Te aeternum Patrem. The second part is in praise of Our Lord as Redeemer; thus, at the words Tu Rex gloriae, Christe appears a new melodic formula retained through verse 23 (the Aeterna fac cum Sanctis), which in earlier times marked the end of the hymn. The antiquity of the melodies of these first two sections cannot be doubted. The third part, of later accretion, consists of an old series of verses drawn from the Psalms [27 (28).9; 144 (145).2; 122 (123).3; 32 (33).22; 30 (31).2]. Since the Middle Ages the Te Deum has inspired a number of polyphonic and free compositions. It has also been frequently translated as a strophic vernacular hymn. Notable among these is the forceful version in English by the Paulist Clarence WALWORTH, "Holy God, We Praise Thy Name," a translation of the German Grosser Gott, wir loben Dich. Both are commonly sung to a melody from Allgemeines katholisches Gesangbuch (Vienna 1774).

Influence of the Ambrosian Hymn. The strophic Latin hymn as it is known today came into being in the 4th century. It may safely be stated that important hymn writers of the period, such as St. Ambrose, Bishop of Milan (340–397), were acquainted with and influenced by the hymns of the Eastern Churches. From a textual point of view it is generally believed that the impetus occasioning early hymnody came as a result of the Arian heresy, whose proponents used popular songs to promulgate their false teaching. Responding in kind, Ambrose and his followers wrote and used hymns to stir up and inspire the faithful to withstand the Church's enemies. In view of the Arian heresy, it is understandable that the tradition of closing each hymn with a doxology was already firmly established in these earliest Latin hymns, for example in the following (from Ambrose, Splendor Paternae gloriae):

Deo Patri sit gloria, Ejusque soli Filio,

Cum Spiritu Paraclito, Nunc et per omne saeculum.

It can therefore be assumed that the text and the melodies of the Ambrosian hymns had immediate congregational appeal, for they were written with congregational participation in mind. First, they were written in simple Latin, which would have been readily understood by the common people, not in Greek, the language of the learned. Second, the hymns drew liberally from scriptural sources and stressed orthodox faith and pious living. Finally, the simple meter selected (iambic dimeter) could be rendered easily by a congregation and must have added to the hymns' effectiveness. Although St. HILARY OF POITIERS (c. 310–366) also wrote hymns against the Arians and earned for himself the title Malleus Arianum (hammer of the Arians), the authenticated fragments of his hymns never enjoyed the same kind of popularity because they lack congregational appeal.

The number of authentic Ambrosian hymns is still a matter of conjecture. (See HYMNOLOGY.) Not all are in liturgical use, but the following three were found in the Tridentine Roman Breviary: Aeterna rerum conditor (Sunday at Lauds), Splendor paternae gloriae (Monday at Lauds), and Aeterna Christi munera (Common of Apostles and Evangelists). Another authentic hymn from the pen of St. Ambrose is Veni redemptor gentium. Though not in Roman usage, it survived in the Sarum (see SARUM USE) and other rites. It is important because of its subsequent translation into German as Nun komm der Heiden Heiland. The tremendous influence of the Ambrosian hymns on the music of hymns in later centuries has been noted by M. Britt:

The Breviary hymns written in iambs outnumber all other verse forms combined. Iambic meter has always been popular. It is closer to prose than any other kind of verse, and it thus gives a poet an opportunity to give expression to his thoughts in a form which will appeal both to the learned and the unlearned. St. Ambrose understood this well, as did the long line of his imitators, many of whose hymns have found their way into the liturgy. [The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (rev. ed. New York 1948) xxvii.]

Other Metrical Hymns. Another important hymn writer of the early period was Aurelius Clemens PRUDENTIUS (348–413). Seven of his hymns were used in the Tridentine Breviary. These, however, are all centos of hymns from his Liber Cathemerinon, a great poetic work containing hymns for the daily hours and feasts of the year. Of particular note are the cento O sola magnarum urbium (for Lauds on Epiphany and its octave) and the Christmas hymn Corde natus ex parentis, which has become very popular among English-speaking Christians because of John Mason Neale's translation, "Of the Father's Love Begotten." It is unlikely that the present melodies for these hymns are as old as the texts. The same is true of the beautiful Christmas hymn A solis ortus cardine by Caelius Sedulius (fl.450), which has assured its author a place among the great hymn writers of antiquity. It is an alphabetic acrostic in which each strophe begins with successive letters of the Latin alphabet. In liturgical usage the hymn has been divided, the first part being used at Lauds from Christmas to the eve of the Epiphany, and the second for Matins and Vespers for Epiphany and its octave. The use of an acrostic points to an influence from Byzantium, where such acrostics are common. Also of note is Venantius FORTUNATUS (530–609), a native of Treviso who became bishop of Poitiers. His best-known hymns are Vexilla Regis prodeunt (traditionally sung for Vespers from Passion Sunday to the Wednesday of Holy Week) and Pange, lingua, gloriosi Lauream, which has a considerably wider usage. It is sung on Good Friday at the Veneration of the Cross. It has been said that Fortunatus as a poet is one of the last of the Latin classicists. The truth of this statement may be seen in the meter of the Pange, lingua, which is trochaic tetrameter instead of the popular iambic dimeter. Music historians have assumed that these hymns give some idea of the style of Gallican chant; they are among the few remnants that survived the Carolingian attempts at suppression of it.

Although Rome was slow to adopt the hymn, it became the task of the monasteries to preserve and further develop the hymnody of the Latin Church. The establishment of the canonical hours in the Benedictine Rule helped foster the use of hymns of the Ambrosian type along with the singing of the Psalter. Latin hymns gradually developed into cycles for the entire Church year. They commemorated the great feasts of the year, as well as the feasts of the saints. The pope and doctor of the Church whose name was given to the music of the Church in the West should certainly not be overlooked, even though scholars disagree on the number of hymns that might be attributed to him. As abbot of the Benedictine monastery of St. Andrew, which he founded in Rome, St. Gregory the Great (540–604) certainly must have had more than a passing interest in the Office hymn. At least fourteen hymns are attributed to him. Of these, mention should be made of Nocte surgentes vigilemus omnes (historically sung at Matins on the fourth and subsequent Sundays after Pentecost), its companion hymn Ecce jam noctis tenuatur (for Lauds during the same period), and the great hymn for Vespers on Sunday Lucis Creator optime. The melodies of these hymns were among the most popular in the Middle Ages. In popularity they rivaled only the Veni, Creator Spiritus, which is generally, but probably erroneously, ascribed to Rabanus Maurus (776–856). With perhaps the exception of the Te Deum, this hymn of invocation to the Holy Spirit has had wider use for liturgical and extraliturgical functions than any other.

Two hymns may serve as examples of a difficult musical problem upon which scholars are not in agreement: Ut queant laxis in Sapphic meter and Gloria, laus et honor in elegiac meter. There is disagreement concerning the relationship between the poetic meter of the text and the rhythm of the music in these and similar Carolingian attempts at classic meter. Most scholars fail to see how the metrics of the texts are reflected in the music. The Ut queant laxis (traditionally assigned to the Vespers of feast of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist) is attributed to Paul the Deacon (d. 799) of Monte Cassino; Gloria, laus et honor (Palm Sunday processional hymn) is attributed to Theodulph, Bishop of Orleans (760–821). The former acquired great popularity in providing the basis for the system of solemnization because the first syllable of each line of the first stanza begins on successively rising pitches; ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la.

Hymn and Sequence. With the rise of the SEQUENCE the composition of new hymns seemed less necessary. In the Sequence the medieval composer found opportunity for emotional and musical expression and for experimentation with new meters and forms. It is not surprising that it is more and more difficult in the late Middle Ages to differentiate between hymns and Sequences. The great Sequence authors and writers in general were also the great hymn writers. They include Abelhard and Bernard of Clairvaux (1091–1153) who is credited with one of the most popular of hymns, Jesu, dulcis memoria. Thomas Aquinas (1227–74) contributed to the repertoire by writing hymns for the Office of Corpus Christi and the famous Sequence Lauda, Sion, Salvatorem. The music for these, and the famous Sequences of Adam of Saint-Victor

(d. 1192), was not newly composed, but the melodies were, almost without exception, adaptations of existing pieces. The distinction between Sequence and hymn eventually became one of function only.

Decline. From the 16th century onward, Latin hymnody was on the decline. One of the chief reasons advanced is the fact that Latin ceased to be a “mother tongue,” even among religious orders. Another reason is that the Renaissance passion for classical purity overemphasized form to the detriment of thought and content. C. Blume depicted the situation in these words: “The humanists abominated the rhythmical poetry of the Middle Ages from an exaggerated enthusiasm for ancient classical forms and meters. Hymnody then received its death blow as, on the revision of the Breviary under Pope Urban VIII (1568–1644), the medieval rhythmical hymns were forced into more classical forms by means of so-called corrections.” Hundreds of “corrections” were made by Urban and a commission of scholars appointed by him. Fortunately, the Breviaries of some monastic orders, e.g., the Benedictine, did not adopt the changes. Although the texts of some of the ancient hymns were changed, the melodies remained the same. In several chant MSS of the Renaissance the hymns are in measured notation; they were sung in a style different from that of the remaining chant repertory. Yet, even the period of decline of the Latin hymn, from the Renaissance to the present, is not completely devoid of pieces of poetic and musical inspiration. Notwithstanding the fact that it is not in liturgical usage, there is no hymn more beloved by all Christians than the Christmas Adeste Fideles, ascribed to John Francis Wade (1711–86). Father Charles Coffin (1676–1749), Rector of the University of Paris, was among those commissioned to revise the Paris Breviary of 1736. The revision included a number of his Latin hymns, of which two Advent hymns are remarkable: Jordanis oras praevia and Instantis adventum Dei.

Vernacular Hymnody. Medieval vernacular hymnody had its roots in the development of the TROPE and Sequence. The use of the vernacular was to serve as an aid in comprehending the Latin of the chant. Many of the Latin sacred tropes were written to the various melodies of the Kyrie eleison. The hymns derived from this source were called Kirleis or Leis. A good example of this type of hymn is Nun bitten wir den Heiligen Geist (13th century) with its kyrieleis refrain. Another, from a later period, is the chorale Kyrie, Gott Vater in Ewigkeit . . . Eleison eleison, derived from the Kyrie fons bonitatis.

The vernacular hymns derived from the Sequences were called Leich. The following example will serve to show the relation between the vernacular strophe and the Latin Sequence from which it was derived:

Ave Maria Klarer Meerstern zum Licht der Heidschaft aus Gottesgnaden aufgegangen.

Ave praeclara maris stella in lucem gentium Maria divinitus orta.

The 13th-century Christ ist erstanden is another example of a vernacular Sequence hymn. It is derived from the Easter Sequence Victimae paschali laudes. Both the Leis and the Leich are found in Germany as early as the 9th century.

The development of polyphony also gave impetus to the development of vernacular hymnody. The harmonic structure of the laudi (Italy), the cantigas (Spain), the cantique (France), and Lieder (Germany) was, however, more of a conservative type than that of the essentially intricate contrapuntal style of the Mass and motet of that era. Hymns of this type are found in the repertory of the trouvères and minnesingers alongside their secular airs.

Throughout this development vernacular hymns were restricted to extra- and nonliturgical devotions and functions, especially in France and Italy. In Germany, however, possibly because of the influence of the Lutheran vernacular service, vernacular hymns invaded the domain of the Catholic liturgy after the 16th century. By 1605 the Cantual of Mainz allowed the use of German hymns for the Proper of the Mass. Later in the same century this was expanded to include portions of the Ordinary. Such Masses were called Singmessen. The widespread use of chorales by the Lutherans in Germany precipitated a further demand for congregational singing among Catholics. In response to this need, the first Catholic hymnbook with German text appeared in Leipzig in 1537. This was Michael Vehe's Ein New Gesangbuechlein geystlicher Lieder. Other such collections appeared soon after, among them Johann Leisentritt's Geistliche Lieder und Psalmen, which went through three editions between 1567 and 1584. A 17th-century collection of importance was David Gregor Corner's Gottweihher Gesangbuch of 1625. Under the impact of the baroque concertato style, Singmessen were expanded to include the choir and instruments, as well as congregational singing. Ignaz Holzbauer (1711–83), for example, composed German Masses of this type. The Singmesse continued to find favor in Germany throughout the 18th century. Its popularity caused an ever-widening separation from the liturgy, and it became one of the objects of reform by the 19th-century CAECILIAN movement.

While the chief objective of the Caecilianverein was to raise the standards of German Catholic church music in general, it attempted also to restore order in the use of the vernacular hymn. There were two aspects to hymn reform. The first was the historic restriction of vernacular hymns to extralitururgical services and devotions. The second was the elimination of secular and rationalistic influences. The most lasting result of this reform was a renewed interest in the older Latin hymns.

Protestant Hymnody. Two distinct types of hymns developed at the time of the Reformation: the great body of German vernacular chorales fostered by the Lutheran reformers, and the French metrical Psalms developed by Calvin and his associates (see PSALTERS, METRICAL). The distinction between them is more than one of language. It is primarily one of divergent theological approaches to worship.

German Chants. Martin Luther's (1483–1546) practice was to retain all of the Catholic liturgy that in his opinion was not contrary to the Scriptures. This permitted retention of the Ordinary of the Mass together with its great repertory of music, whether chant or polyphony, as well as some of the musical Propers, the ancient pericopes, and many of the Collects. In the Calvinistic concept of worship, only what was specified in the Scriptures and was in use in the primitive Church could be used in worship—in other words, the Psalter, the Canticles, and the Decalogue. While the shape of the Lutheran liturgy retained most of the traditional musical elements of the Mass, these still had to be sung by trained choristers, and they were still in Latin. They were never discarded, and the excellent musical standards of the Kantorei have been maintained down to the present. It was necessary, however, to find suitable hymns for the congregation. As previously indicated, some popular German hymns were already in use, but the greater number of congregational hymns had to grow out of the experience and ability of the reformers.

In general, the chorale may be divided into four classes: (1) Hymns that were translated directly from Latin hymns and whose melodies were preserved with slight alterations, e.g., Komm, Gott Schöpfer, Heiliger Geist, translated from Veni, Creator Spiritus; Christum wir sollen loben schon, translated from Sedulius's A solis ortus cardine. (2) Vernacular hymns based on parts of the Latin Ordinary; Kyrie: Kyrie, Gott Vater in Ewigkeit, which makes use of the melody of the Kyrie fons bonitatis and is a partial translation by an unknown writer of the fons bonitatis trope; Gloria: Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr, a metrical paraphrase of the Gloria by Nikolaus Decius (?–1541), who adapted the melody from that of the Paschal Gloria (see Mass I in the Liber Usualis); Credo: Wir glauben all' an einen Gott, a metrical paraphrase of the NICENE CREED by Luther, who adapted the melody from Credo IV; Sanctus: Jesaia dem Propheten, das geschah' (also called the German Sanctus), which paraphrases the vision of the Prophet Isaiah (Is 6.1–4) and was adapted by Luther from the melody of the Sanctus of Mass XVII (Liber Usualis); Agnus: O Lamm Gottes, unschuldig, by Nikolaus Decius, who adapted the melody of the Agnus of Mass IX. (3) Metrical versions or paraphrases of Psalms and canticles; e.g., Psalm 129 (130) De Profundis: Aus tiefer Noth by Luther; the melody has a strong Phrygian character but cannot be traced to any Gregorian source; Nunc Dimittis: Mit Fried' und Freud', also by Luther; the melody is in the Dorian mode but it cannot be traced; Te Deum: Herr, Gott, dich loben wir, adapted by Luther from the ancient simple tone. (4) Hymns that are original in text and melody. These became more numerous with the passage of time and eventually formed the great bulk of the German chorale. Among the important hymn and tune writers were Paul Speratus, Johann Walter, Ludwig Helmbold, Nicholas Selnecker, Philipp Nicolai, Johann Franck, Paul Gerhardt, Johann Freylinghausen, and Erdmann Neumeister.

The chorale is of the greatest musical significance because of its use as a vehicle for choral and instrumental compositions. The climax of its importance is seen in the works of J. S. BACH. For him the chorale was at the very center of the Passions, the church cantatas, and the great part of his organ pieces.

French Psalters. English hymnody was in part influenced by the French metrical PSALTERS. John Calvin (1509–64), because he considered only the Scriptures suitable vehicles for congregational singing, literally fettered his followers to the Psalter for centuries. In 1538, during his exile in Strassburg, Calvin heard the congregational singing of Psalms and hymns in German, set to melodies by Matthias Greiter. The singing impressed him greatly, paving the way for a whole new series of French Psalters, beginning with the Strasbourg Psalter of 1539 and culminating in the first complete Geneva Psalter of 1562. The literary task of translation and versification was principally that of Clément Marot (c. 1497–1544) and, after his death, Théodore de Bèze (1519–1605), although Calvin supplied some of the earlier ones. The principal musical editor of these Psalters was Louis Bourgeois (c. 1510–61), who gave final form to approximately 85 melodies of the completed Psalter. While Calvin was opposed to polyphony, and insisted that the Psalms be sung in unison, nevertheless part settings using as many as six voices appeared in the hymns of Bourgeois himself. More important musically are those of Claude Goudimel (?–1572).

English Hymns and Psalters. Pre-Reformation vernacular hymnody in England consisted mostly of spiritual folksongs and carols. In 1531 Miles Coverdale (1486–1569) attempted to introduce Lutheran chorales into England. His collection, Goostly Psalmes and Spiritual Songes, is generally regarded as the first English hymnbook. All but five of the hymns in this collection were translations from the German. In 1546 Henry VIII prohibited the use of this hymnal.

The most important aspect of Reformation hymnody in England was what Millar Patrick has called “the battle of the Psalters.” Early English metrical Psalters, begun by Thomas Sternhold (1500–49) as an attempt to substitute pious and serious songs for the ribald ballads sung by his fellow courtiers, went through a series of turbulent editions. In 1549, the year of his death, Sternhold published 37 of his own Psalter translations. His work was continued by John Hopkins (d. 1570). With the accession of Queen Mary to the English throne, many of the English reformers took refuge in Geneva. As a result, there appeared in 1556 the first Anglo-Genevan Psalter (One and Fiftie Psalmes of Davide in English Metre), which contained 44 settings by Sternhold and Hopkins plus seven by William Whittingham, Calvin’s brother-in-law. This Psalter, together with its second edition of 1558, shows the strong influence of the French Psalters, the melodies having been modeled on those of Bourgeois. After the death of Queen Mary, a first complete English Psalter was published by John Day in 1562, by coincidence the same year as the first complete French Psalter. Today this Psalter is known as the “Old Version.” It remained in use until 1696, when the “New Version” of Nahum Tate and Nicholas Brady supplanted it. During the intervening century other attempts were made by John Playford, Francis Rous, and Thomas Ravenscroft to supplant the Old Version.

In Scotland, likewise, the Lutheran influence was short-lived with the return of John Knox from Geneva in 1559; he brought with him the Anglo-Genevan Psalter. A new version, based in part on the Anglo-Genevan Psalter, appeared as part of the Book of Common Order in 1564. Much of the work of revision and expansion was done by Robert Pont and John Craig. This was supplanted in 1650 by a final version.

While such men as George Wither (1588–1667), John Cosin (1594–1672), Thomas Ken (1627–1711), Richard Baxter (1615–91), and Joseph Addison (1672–1710) made some attempt to liberate English hymnody from the shackles of metrical psalmody, it was the work of Isaac Watts (1674–1748) that ushered in a new era of English hymns. What he first attempted to do is unfolded in the lengthy title of his 1719 publication, The Psalms of David Imitated in the Language of the New Testament, and Apply’d to the Christian State and Worship. From this “Christianization” of the Psalms it was just one step to the writing of new and thoroughly original Christian hymns. For this Watts justly deserves the title “Father of English Hymnody.” Many of Watts’s hymns have become standard among English-speaking peoples of all denominations. Some of the best known are: “Our God, Our Help in Ages Past”; “Before Jehovah’s Awful Throne”; “Jesus Shall Reign Where’er the Sun”; “Come, Holy Spirit, Heavenly Dove,” and “Joy to the World! the Lord Is Come.” The new burst of song attracted numerous other hymn writers in imitation, as St. Ambrose’s hymns had centuries before. Among the imitators of Watts were Simon Browne (1680–1732) and Philip Doddridge (1702–51). Even as late as 1787, John Rippon (1751–1836) published what was intended to be an appendix to Watts’s Psalms and Hymns.

Methodist Hymns. The next stage in the development of the English hymn paralleled the rise of Methodism. In 1735, through a chance meeting with a group of Moravians on their way to America on the same ship with him and his brother Charles, John WESLEY (1703–91) was introduced to the German pietistic hymns of Count von Zinzendorf and Johann Freylinghausen. Wesley’s first hymnbook was printed in America in 1737. It also showed the extraordinary influence of Watts, since half of its 70 hymns were by him. Five more were Wesley’s translations of German hymns, probably from the Zinzendorf Herrnhut Gesangbuch. Others were by his father and some by his brother Samuel, but none by Charles. His second hymnal appeared almost immediately after his return to England in 1738.

While Wesley gave the initial impetus to the early hymns of the Methodist Revival, he gradually turned this task over to his brother Charles. Of certain hymns it is difficult to ascertain which of the two is the author. It is said that Charles Wesley wrote some 6,500 hymns, many of which were intended only for the occasion or moment. Many, however, have passed into general Protestant usage and, judged by the highest standards, they are excellent hymns. Among them are the well-known Christmas and Easter hymns, “Hark, the Herald Angels Sing” and “Christ the Lord Is Risen Today.” “O for a Thousand Tongues to Sing,” “Jesus, Lover of my Soul,” “Come, Thou Long-Expected Jesus,” and “Christ, Whose Glory Fills the Skies” were composed by him also. Although John Wesley’s greatest contribution to English hymnody consisted in masterful translations, especially of German hymns, he wrote also some excellent original hymns, “Jesus, Thy Boundless Love to Me” and “Thee Will I Love, My Strength, My Tower,” among them.

Protestant Hymnody in the U.S. It would be difficult to divorce early American hymnody from that of England. Protestant hymnody in the U.S. also had its roots in metrical psalmody.

Early American Hymnody. The Puritans, both orthodox and separatist, brought with them their Psalters. The orthodox adhered to those of Sternhold and Hopkins, and the separatists kept the Ainsworth Psalter printed in Amsterdam in 1612. General dissatisfaction with all of these led to the publication of the first book of any kind printed in the U.S., the BAY PSALM BOOK (called also the New England Version) printed at Cambridge, Mass., by Stephen Day in 1640. It was not long, however, before the influence of Isaac Watts began to be felt in the New World. His Psalms of David appeared in Boston in 1729. This and the publication of his Hymns in 1739 were British imports. A distinctively American hymnody began only with the revision of Watts, attempted by Joel Barlow in 1786 and by Timothy Dwight in 1801. In the American spirit of independence, Dwight, who was president of Yale from 1795 to 1815, showed no inclination to be tied down to mere paraphrases of existent metrical Psalms. Typical of Dwight's hymns is "I Love Thy Kingdom, Lord."

At the same time, the impact of the Wesleys was felt by reason of their mission to the U.S. and the 1737 publication of John Wesley's hymns. From these facts alone it could be predicted that 18th- and 19th-century Protestant hymnody in America would become largely a matter of denominational development.

During the mid-19th century, the GOSPEL SONG took root in many parts of the U.S. While many had a part in its development, the gospel song is chiefly the work of Dwight L. Moody and Ira D. Sankey as part of their evangelistic campaigns, which penetrated even the British Isles. Such gems as "Let the Lower Lights Be Burning," "Almost Persuaded Now to Believe," and "I Love to Tell the Story" almost uprooted established hymnody, especially in the Methodist and Baptist Churches, and perhaps would have done so had the tide not been turned by the hymns that came out of England's Oxford Revival.

The Oxford Movement. The Oxford Revival in England was preceded by a rediscovery of the great Latin hymns of the Breviary. All who worship in the English language are indebted to John Mason Neale (1818–66) for his masterful translations, not only of many Latin, but also of many ancient Greek hymns. There is not a contemporary good Protestant hymnal that does not contain some of his translations. Many Catholic hymnals also include them. The list of his translations is too lengthy for enumeration. His "All Glory, Laud and Honor" was translated from Theodulph's Gloria, laus et honor, and "Come, Ye Faithful, Raise the Strain" was translated from John of Damascus' Ἀσωμεν, πάντες λαοί. Other translators were Edward Caswall (1814–78), Richard F. Littledale (1833–90), and John Brownlie (1859–1925), the last contributing English versions especially of Greek hymns. Because the Oxford Movement was a spiritual revival based on the liturgical life, it was bound to produce many good hymns and hymn writers. A compromise between the "high church" and evangelical schools had to be achieved. It came about with the publication of Hymns Ancient and Modern, For Use in the Services of the Church (1861). Sir Henry Baker (1821–77) was chairman of the commission that produced this most influential hymnal, which in little more than a century was disseminated in one edition or another to a total of almost 200 million copies. Sir Henry himself contributed what is possibly one of the most sublime hymns based on Psalm 22 (23), "The King of Love My Shepherd Is." Other significant contributors and their hymns were: John Keble (1792–1866), author of "Sun of My Soul"; William Chatterton Dix (1823–98), writer of the joyful Epiphany hymn "As with Gladness Men of Old"; William Walsham How (1823–97), "For All the Saints Who from Their Labours Rest"; William Whiting (1825–78), "Eternal Father, Strong to Save"; and C. F. Alexander (1825–78), "I Bind unto Myself Today." Musically, too, Hymns Ancient and Modern produced excellent tunes that are still widely used. Coronae, Diademata, St. Crispin, St. George's Windsor, Aurelia, St. Agnes, and Nicaea are but a few of the most representative ones.

Influence of the Spiritual. Another important phase of 19th-century Protestant hymnody in America was the rise of the spiritual. Its development paralleled the increasing dissent from the established Protestant denominations at the time of the American Revolution and the establishment of splinter sects from these branches. The initial desire for religious freedom, which had motivated some of the early settlers (e.g., the Pilgrims), had slowly but surely crystallized itself into a new authoritarian establishment. The great mass of subsequent settlers chafed under this ecclesiastic authority. Hence at the dawn of the Revolution there was, in addition to a wish for political independence from the crown, a demand for renewed religious liberty as well. Shortly after the close of the War for Independence, itinerant preachers of Baptist and Methodist origin began evangelistic crusades throughout the states, especially in the rural areas. For their enthusiastic type of preaching and worship, the Psalters of the established churches were too staid and dull. Even the hymns of Watts and the Wesleys had to be recast to British and American popular folksongs. Among numerous collections of this type, a notable one was Jeremiah Ingall's Christian Harmony, published in 1805.

In time, even these spirituals proved to be too severe in style, and the texts and tunes were gradually lightened and simplified. This took place at the same time as the emergence of camp meeting revivals in the mid-19th century. Both were part of a missionary effort among the African Americans undertaken by Baptists and Methodists.

They, together with some Presbyterians, showed more of an interest in Christianizing the slaves than did the established denominations. A people for whom English was little more than a foreign language could hardly be expected to take to the severe hymnody of the established churches. Hence the spiritual folksongs of the Nonconformists appealed to the slaves, and over time they became a part of the African American musical idiom. An examination of numerous tunes and lyrics of Black Spirituals reveals a striking similarity to the spiritual folksongs of the camp meeting evangelists.

20th-century Protestant Hymnody. Accordingly, at the dawn of the 20th century, the hymnody of the established English-speaking Protestant denominations shows an understandable dichotomy. There are, on the one hand, the substantial hymnals containing metrical Psalms, the hymns of Watts and the Wesleys, Latin and Greek translations by Neale and others, and hymns drawn from Hymns Ancient and Modern. On the other hand, there are also hundreds of collections of gospel songs, spirituals, and so-called choruses. As a rule, the former were used at the regular services of worship, the latter at revivals and youth meetings.

Catholic Vernacular Hymnody in the U.S. Catholic vernacular hymnody in America in its incipient stages reflected the cosmopolitan quality characterized by the nation itself. Through the activities of the missionaries and early settlers, practically every European nation indirectly transplanted its own heritage of religious song to the young nation. The adoption of these hymns, or at least of their stylistic traits, is an integral part of the history of hymnody in America from the first years of colonization until the 20th century.

Missionary Efforts. Manuscripts found in the Franciscan missions of the southwestern U.S. contain a number of hymn tunes in the style of the Spanish folk hymn with texts in Spanish. The earliest published collection in America, however, the Psalmodia Christiana compiled by Fray Bernadino de Sahagun, consists of hymns in the language of the Aztecs sung to Native American melodies. The melodies, unfortunately, were never recorded. French Jesuit missionaries, active in eastern Canada and the northeastern U.S. at about the same period of the 17th century, adapted the Huron language to Gregorian chant melodies and to French cantiques. Many of these can be found in Catholic hymnals compiled for the Native Americans, the earliest of which dates from 1847. Because both melody and words were preserved, the Christmas hymn Jesous Ahatonnia, composed by Jean de Brebeuf, SJ, and adapted to a 16th-century Breton noel tune, may be considered the earliest of extant vernacular American hymns. (See LITURGICAL MUSIC, HISTORY OF.)

The hardships experienced by the early English colonists in the practice of their religion may account in part for the substantial lack of evidence concerning Catholic church music until the last quarter of the 18th century. It was not until 1787 that the first printed collection containing Catholic hymn tunes was published in the U.S. This Compilation of the Litanies and Vespers Hymns and Anthems as They Are Sung in the Catholic Church was published by John Aitken in Philadelphia and contains almost as much Anglican music as music for the Catholic service. The book is significant for its inclusion of traditional chant hymns and several German chorales.

19th-Century Hymnals. Catholic hymn publications in the 19th century include Anthems, Hymns Usually Sung at the Catholick Church, edited by Rev. John Cheverus at Boston in 1800; Morning and Evening Service of the Catholic Church, Comprising a Choice Collection of Gregorian and Other Masses, Litanies, Psalms, Sacred Hymns, Anthems, Versicles and Motetts, compiled by G. Garbett (New York 1840); and Catholic Melodies, edited by Rev. James Horner (Baltimore 1845). English influence in late 19th-century hymnals resulted in publications of poor taste, which often featured adaptations of secular music. The more unscrupulous compilers even adapted themes of popular instrumental and operatic music of famous composers such as Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. German Catholic immigrants of the mid-19th century were provided with a publication of the hymns they knew in the 1858 collection of B. H. F. Hellebusch entitled Katholisches Gesang und Gebetbuch: Eine Auswahl der vorzüglichsten Choräle und Kirchenlieder. Unfortunately, many of the German Catholic chorales and folk hymns introduced in America through this publication were presented in the decadent rhythmic style then prevalent in Germany. Many other tunes of inferior quality also were included. A higher musical standard was maintained in other German Catholic hymn collections of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, and these became basic material for many subsequent Catholic hymnals with English texts, of which the following are representative: Laudate pueri, compiled by Sisters of Notre Dame (Cleveland, Ohio 1886, 1903); Psallite, compiled by Alexander Roesler, SJ (St. Louis 1901, 1909); Laudate, compiled by Rev. Joseph Hohe (Kansas City 1909); Hosanna, compiled by Ludwig Bonvin, SJ (St. Louis 1910); Cantate, compiled by John Singenberger (New York 1912); and New Hymn Book for Church and School, compiled by Hans Marx for the Chicago Archdiocese (New York 1917). Many of these hymnals represented the reforming efforts of members of the American Caecilian Society. Characteristic of the American-Caecilian style of hymn writing were the use of slightly florid rhythms within a common meter, and melodies of a diatonic nature with a judicious use of skips.

France and England exerted the second influence on 19th-century American Catholic hymnody. French borrowings were evident particularly in the Catholic Youth's Hymnbook, edited by the Brothers of the Christian Schools (Montreal 1871; New York 1885). Many of the tunes in the collection were French cantique tunes of a degenerate type; a few were representative of better French tradition; while a third group were original tunes in the style of the cantique. Many were traditionally associated with certain religious events and devotions. Mid-19th-century English tradition was superimposed on the French tradition in the following collections: Laudis corona (New York 1885) and St. Basil's Hymnal (Toronto 1889; 5th ed. New York 1896). These and others, such as The Crown Hymnal (Boston 1911), De La Salle Hymnal (New York 1913), Gloria Hymnal (New York 1933), and American Catholic Hymnal (New York 1913), reflected the traditions of the 19th century. Typical of the style of this tradition is the dancelike 3/4 and 6/8 meters with melodies of a triadic outline that feature also melodic intervals of a sixth. Harmonically, the progressions are frequently static or else chromatic.

The best traditions of Germany, France, and England were represented in the best Catholic hymnal published in America in the 19th century, namely, the Roman Hymnal, compiled and arranged by J. B. Young, SJ (New York 1884). This collection included many Gregorian chant melodies, as well as some original American tunes.

20th-Century Hymnals. Early 20th-century hymnals of a cosmopolitan character included Hymns for the Ecclesiastical Year, compiled by Alphonsus Dress (1908); Parish Hymnal, compiled by Joseph Otten (1915); and Manual of Catholic Hymns, compiled by B. Dieringer and J. Pierron (1916). Many English Catholic hymn tunes were contained in Choir Manual, compiled by G. Burton (1914); A Treasury of Catholic Song, compiled by Sidney Hurlbut (New York 1915); and Standard Catholic Hymnal, compiled by James A. Reilly (Boston 1921). Three hymnals in the early decades of the 20th century included traditional Protestant hymn tunes: St. Mark's Hymnal (1910), Oregon Catholic Hymnal (1912), and St. Francis Hymnal and Choir Manual (1912). A few other significant hymnals of the same period were Holy Cross Hymnal (1915) with original texts and music by Cardinal William O'Connell; Catholic Education Series Hymnal, compiled by Justine Ward (Washington 1918); Catholic Hymns for the People, edited by James M. Rakar (1919); and Catholic Hymnal, compiled by John G. Hacker, SJ (New York 1920). The St. Gregory Hymnal and Catholic Choir Book, edited by N. A. Montani, was the result of interest in the improvement of Catholic hymnody, an aim of the newly formed Society of St. Gregory. Slightly more than half the compositions included are original American tunes, but German, Slovak, Gregorian chant hymns, English, Italian, and French tunes also were represented.

This same interest in the improvement of hymnody was evident in significant publications between 1920 and 1945: St. Mary's Hymnal, edited and compiled by C. A. Zittel (New York 1924); St. Joseph Hymnal, edited by Joseph Wolf (Chicago 1925); Diocesan Hymnal, compiled by Rt. Rev. Joseph SCHREMBES (New York 1928); St. Caecilia Hymnal, compiled and edited by J. Alfred Schehl (New York 1929); Ave Maria Hymnal, compiled and edited by Rev. Joseph Pierron (Milwaukee 1929); Parochial Hymnal, compiled and arranged by Rev. Carlo Rossini (New York 1936); Mt. Mary Hymnal, compiled by Sister M. Gisela, SSND (Boston 1938); Saint Rose Hymnal, compiled by the Sisters of St. Francis of Perpetual Adoration (Boston 1940); and Laudate Hymnal and Choir Book, originally compiled by Rev. Joseph Hohe and completely revised by Rev. Herman J. Koch and Rev. Andrew Green, OSB (Boston 1942). Notable hymnals in the 1940s and early 1950s included St. Andrew Hymnal, compiled by Philip Kreckel; Official Holy Name Hymnal, compiled by Rev. J. J. McLarney, OP; Alverno Hymnal and Choir Book, compiled by Sister M. Cherubim, OSF; Gregorian Institute Hymnal, Catholic Hymns, compiled by Rev. John C. Selner, SS; Cantemus Domino, by the Sisters of Marylhurst, Oregon; Pius X Hymnal, compiled and edited by the faculty of the Pius Tenth School of Liturgical Music; Monastery Hymnal, compiled and edited by Achille Bragers; Mediator Dei Hymnal, compiled and edited by Cyr de Brant (pseud. of V. J. Higgenson); and The New Saint Basil Hymnal.

[M. M. HUELLER/M. A. BICHSEL/E. J. SELHORST/EDS.]

HYMNS AND HYMNALS, II: VATICAN II AND BEYOND

The promulgation of the Constitution on the Liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium [SC]) on Dec. 4, 1963, profoundly affected the development and publication of hymnody and hymnals in the Roman Catholic Church in the United States. Responding to the Vatican Council II's call to promote the active participation of the assembly, composers, text writers, and publishers began researching traditional hymnody, revising and adapting Latin hymn tunes to vernacular languages, composing new texts and melodies, and adapting contemporary musical styles to church music from a variety of cultural contexts. This entry will provide a summary of what has been a complex development. Its primary focus is Roman Catholic hymns and hymnals in the United States since Vatican II. In addition, some general remarks will be made regarding trends and developments in some mainline Protestant churches.

The Introduction of the Vernacular. Permission to introduce the use of the vernacular in the liturgy was the catalyst for far-reaching changes in Roman Catholic hymnody. In the majority of parishes in the United States, this meant the introduction of English into the Eucharist, followed by Spanish and other ethnic languages. Although the liturgical reforms did result in some bitter divisions regarding the direction of church music, there was, in general, widespread enthusiasm for singing hymns and service music in the vernacular.

Nevertheless, in the late 1960s, there was little available repertoire for singing either the Propers or the Ordinary of the Mass in English. Hymnody available in the vernacular had been composed for popular devotions rather than for liturgical celebrations. Almost overnight, there was a demand for hymns in the vernacular that would promote the active participation of the assembly and appropriately serve the reformed liturgy of Paul VI. In an effort to preserve the rich heritage of church music, composers and translators set about the work of adapting traditional chants and translating the Latin texts. The results of early efforts were mixed. Some later efforts, notably the work of such arrangers and composers as Robert Batastini, David Hurd, and Paul Ford have been more musically and linguistically satisfying. Because vernacular hymnody had been an important component of Protestant worship since the Reformation, it was natural that Roman Catholics turned to Protestant resources for vernacular repertoire. Many Catholic hymnals incorporated a large percentage of original Protestant hymns in their early editions. Later editions continued to include Protestant hymnody, but often with new texts or translations. As part of the reform, the new emphasis on the centrality of Sacred Scripture encouraged composers to set scriptural texts. The biblical hymns and psalm settings of the French composer and liturgist, Lucien Deiss, and the Canadian composer, Stephen Somerville, helped to set the standard for new vernacular hymn texts.

Folk Music. In addition to the publication of traditional hymnody in the vernacular, a style of music developed that was commonly referred to as “folk.” Within the Catholic context, these songs, inspired by the secular folk-music culture of the time, often included trite texts and simplistic music. Singing congregations were often led by self-taught amateur guitar players who could not read music. Folk music’s major contribution to liturgical renewal was its success in coaxing congregations to sing. It also convinced Roman Catholics that contemporary cultural expressions could have a meaningful place in liturgical prayer.

The earliest “folk” or “guitar” hymnal was Hymnal for Young Christians, Volume I: With Roman Catholic Mass Supplement, published by F.E.L. Publications of Los Angeles in 1966. It included early folk hymns, e.g., “They’ll Know We Are Christians” by Peter Scholtes, “Here We Are” and “Of My Hands” by Ray Repp, and “Sons of God” by James Thiem. Early folk groups used this hymnal, reprinted several times, well into the 1970s when it was eventually superseded by the “Glory & Praise” hymnals published by the North American Liturgy Resources in Phoenix.

Glory & Praise: Songs for the Worshipping Assembly, Volume 1 was published in 1977. This hymnal included 60 contemporary folk hymns and 20 pieces of service music. Settings of the lectionary psalms were not included. Two additional volumes were published in 1979 and 1982, respectively. Glory & Praise: Comprehensive Edition, published in 1987, added for the first time 50 traditional hymns to the usual repertoire of contemporary music. This edition was soon followed by Glory & Praise: Volume 4 and Glory & Praise: Classic Edition in 1990. The 1998 edition was entitled Glory & Praise: Second Edition, published by Oregon Catholic Press.

In many ways, the history of the publication of the various editions of Glory & Praise provides a record of the development of folk music in the United States since the early days of the liturgical renewal. The more elementary guitar accompaniments of many of the early folk hymns were gradually replaced by accompaniments that required more guitar skill. Additional instrumental accompaniments, including parts for piano, woodwind, brass, string, and percussion were gradually included by many composers. Texts improved significantly, not only in the quality of the poetry and their use of Sacred Scripture, but also in their attention to inclusivity. Instead of serving as a “folk” resource exclusively, Glory & Praise eventually included a significant amount of traditional hymns and an expanded selection of higher quality service music.

G.I.A. Publications contributed to the development of “folk” hymnals in their publication of Gather in 1988. Contemporary composers who published in this hymnal include J. Michael Joncas, Marty Haugen, and David Haas. In addition to offering contemporary hymns, the various editions of Gather include contemporary psalm settings, a more generous amount of service music, and settings for morning and evening prayer, all easily located through extensive indices.

Traditional Hymnal Development. Since the promulgation of SC, an unusually large number of hymnals—over 100 new and revised hymnals—have been published in the United States for use in Roman Catholic worship. The People's Mass Book, published in 1964 by World Library of Sacred Music in Cincinnati, was a post-conciliar version of the People's Hymnal originally published in 1955. This hymnal, probably the first major response to the renewal of Vatican II, included hymns, psalms, Mass settings, and Bible services to enable the active participation of the faithful as mandated by SC. It was particularly important because it included European music, especially from the Netherlands, Belgium, and France. It was through the People's Mass Book that most Catholics were first introduced to the biblical psalms and canticles of Lucien Deiss. The hymnal also helped to popularize several Protestant hymns among Roman Catholics, including such traditional hymns as "A Mighty Fortress" and "Lord, Who at Thy First Eucharist."

It was the hymnal entitled Worship, however, which eventually was to set a new standard for Roman Catholic hymnals, especially in its later editions. The first edition, published in 1971, printed 351 items, including extensive ecumenical hymnody, the Gelineau psalms, and such contemporary hymns as "I Am the Bread of Life" by Suzanne Toolan. A second edition, entitled Worship II, appeared in 1974. This hymnal set a new standard for Catholic hymn texts by its inclusion of such noted poets as Fred Pratt Green and Brian Wren. Worship, Third Edition: Hymnal and Service Book for Roman Catholics, was published in 1986. The arrangement of this hymnal by seasons, topics, and liturgical themes with its numerous and comprehensive indices, settings of morning and evening prayer, and other ritual music, again raised the standards that other publishers have since emulated. G.I.A.'s publication of RitualSong in the 1990s is an example of a trend toward the more comprehensive hymnal as opposed to the more specialized book. Whereas in the past, G.I.A. published Worship as its traditional hymnal and Gather as its more "folk" oriented hymnal, RitualSong and Gather Comprehensive are hymnals that contain both styles in significant proportions, including African American, Hispanic, and other ethnic entries from around the world.

While periodic worship aids, often referred to as missalettes, cannot properly be considered an example of hymnals, Music Issue and Breaking Bread by Oregon Catholic Press represent a new development for providing congregations with inexpensive, albeit disposable hymn books. These publications, issued annually, provide the publisher with the opportunity to update the collections more easily and more frequently. Generally, such annual hymnals do not provide the exhaustive indices of the more permanent hymnals. We Celebrate by World Library Publications, on the other hand, is an example of a softcover hymnal of a more permanent nature.

The traditional hymnal is becoming increasingly an expression of the global church. More and more hymnals, not only in the Roman Catholic tradition, but also various Protestant traditions, have begun to include not only traditional and contemporary African American and Hispanic music, but also Asian and African hymns. The Taizé music by Jacques Berthier and the music of the Iona Community by John Bell are also increasingly found in traditional hymnals.

Texts and Translations. Vernacular texts immediately after the council were often only partially successful as translations of Latin texts or attempts at contemporary expression. Gradually, the poetic quality of hymn texts improved and attentiveness to giving expression to a wider gamut of both Christian and human concerns became more evident. Increasingly, Scripture became a primary source of inspiration for text writers. Beginning in the late 1970s and early 1980s, inclusive language emerged as an important issue.

Hispanic Hymnals. The first Hispanic hymnal, Can-temos al Señor: Himnos para Celebración Litúrgica, was published in the United States by Our Sunday Visitor in 1974. Alleluya, Alabad al Señor, edited by Elias Isla, followed in 1977. In addition to the Ordinary of the Mass and a format for morning and evening Prayer, this hymnal included hymns from 14 Spanish-speaking countries. Other hymnals followed in the 1980s, including Canticos de Gracias y Alabanza published in 1982 and Flor y Canto in 1989, both by Oregon Catholic Press.

African American Hymns and Hymnals. Beginning in the 1980s, both Roman Catholic and Protestant churches began including a significant number of African spirituals, hymns, and gospel songs in their principal hymnals. Some have also published separate African American hymnals. In 1981 the Church Hymnal Corporation published Lift Every Voice and Sing: A Collection of Afro-American Spirituals and Other Songs as a supplement to the hymnal of the Episcopal Church. In 1987 G.I.A. Publications published Lead Me, Guide Me: The African-American Catholic Hymnal. This hymnal, a response to the small, but growing black community within the Roman Catholic Church, features gospel songs, spirituals, African and Caribbean material, plus hymnody from Catholic, Protestant, and evangelical traditions. It also includes new compositions by such leading black composers as Edward Bonnemere, Leon Roberts, Grayson Warren Brown, and Clarence Rivers. In 1999 Augsburg Fortress Press published This Far by Faith: An African American Resource for Worship. This hymnal was a joint project of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod. Like the Episcopal hymnal, Lift Every Voice and Sing,

This Far by Faith can be considered a supplement to the Lutheran Book of Worship.

Protestant Hymnals. Enthusiasm for liturgical renewal generated by Vatican II spilled over into mainstream Protestant denominations. In the United States, Canada, and Great Britain most of the major denominations have published a new hymnal, sometimes even a revised edition, since the mid-1960s. Similar to the Roman Catholic hymnals, the Protestant hymnals offer a broad range of offerings, including psalmody, both metrical and responsorial; international hymnody, especially from non-European areas of the world, including Central and South America, Asia, and Africa; African American spirituals and gospel songs; music from the Taizé community; and new mainstream hymn writers from the United States, Canada, and Great Britain. The new hymnals have been designed to focus on the following: the celebration of the Christian year, the celebration of the Lord's Supper, the need for responsible stewardship of Earth's resources, a belief in the Church as an expression of the presence of Christ on Earth, the incorporation of more scripturally based hymn texts, and attentiveness—in varying ways—to inclusive language.

Divergent Efforts to Retrieve Traditional Catholic Hymnody. In the decades that have passed since 1963 when article 114 of SC stated that “the treasury of sacred music is to be preserved and fostered with great care,” divergent views continue to critique the direction church music has taken. Some have worked to adapt the ancient treasury of sacred music to the requirements of the reformed liturgy. An example of this approach is Paul Ford's By Flowing Waters published by the Liturgical Press. Others have looked to contemporary musical vocabulary to discover a voice for worship. A great number of new hymnals include a generous number of selections that reflect this approach. Still others have maintained the “classicalist” view that sees in the ancient treasures of chant, hymnody, and polyphony the only authentic means for worship. The Adoramus Hymnal embodies this approach.

Future Developments. Shortly after the close of Vatican Council II, there was much speculation regarding the potential for creating a national hymnal for the United States. Since then, there seems to be no evidence that such a hymnal is on the horizon. Using an official hymnal in the United States has not been mandated by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. While some conversations have occurred among publishers and within the forum of the National Association of Pastoral Musicians regarding the feasibility of a national hymnal, no concrete steps have been taken to make this a reality.

Bibliography: C. M. HAWN, “A Survey of Trends in Recent Protestant Hymnals: African-American Spirituals, Hymns, and Gospel Songs,” Hymn 43:1 (Jan. 1992) 21–28. C. M. HAWN, “A Survey of Trends in Recent Protestant Hymnals: Mainstream American, British, and Canadian Hymnody since 1960,” Hymn 42:3 (July 1991) 17–25. F. A. PISCITELLI, “Thirty-five Years of Catholic Hymnals in the United States (1962–1997): A Chronological Listing,” Hymn 49:4 (1998). J. M. KUBICKI, “The Role of Music as Ritual Symbol in Roman Catholic Liturgy,” Worship 69 (1995) 427–446. G. BLACK, “Gather and Worship: One Concept in Two Books and Many Editions,” Hymn 42 (1991) 12–15. E. FOLEY, “When American Roman Catholics Sing,” Worship 63 (1989) 98–112. W. F. SMITH, “Lead Me, Guide Me: The African American Catholic Hymnal,” Hymn 40 (1989) 13–15.

[J. M. KUBICKI]

HYPATIUS OF EPHESUS

Sixth-century bishop of Ephesus; d. after 536. Hypatius was one of the chief advisers for ecclesiastical affairs to the Byzantine Emperor JUSTINIAN I from 531 to 536. About 531 Justinian invited Monophysite leaders to Constantinople in order to persuade them to accept the Christological formula of the Council of CHALCEDON (451). First mentioned in 531, Hypatius spoke in 532 for the orthodox at a colloquy between orthodox and Monophysite bishops. Here Hypatius' Christology was that of a moderately strict Dyophysite: Jesus Christ is one of the Trinity not so much in His one person as by reason of His divine nature. Hypatius also denied the authenticity of the writings of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS the Areopagite and the so-called Apollinarian frauds. Justinian sent him to Pope JOHN II in Rome in 533–534 to win papal approval of the Theopaschite formula “one of the Trinity suffered in the flesh.” At the Council of Constantinople in 536, which banished the Monophysites, he played a role second only to that of the Patriarch Mennas. He is not heard of afterward.

Hypatius composed a work called Various Questions, a collection of replies to questions asked by one of his suffragan bishops. Only fragments remain, including his defense of icons in the church. He is perhaps the author also of a commentary on the Minor Prophets. In 1904 an inscription was found in Ephesus containing the promulgation of his directives to his diocese concerning the burial of the dead.

Bibliography: F. DIEKAMP, Orientalia Christiana Analecta 117 (1938) 109–153. C. MOELLER, in A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 1:661–662, 674–676. E. KITZINGER, “The Cult of Images before Iconoclasm,” Dumbarton Oaks Papers 8 (1954) 137–139.

[D. B. EVANS]

HYPOCRISY

Form of SIMULATION or acted lie. Indeed, it is simulation at its worst, for it prostitutes works of VIRTUE to the ignoble ends of self-glorification or monetary gain or worse, and it lowers men's esteem for the life of the spirit. Our Lord uttered his severest rebukes against the Pharisees precisely for their hypocrisy (Mt 23.23), and one of His saddest complaints was against the hypocritical treachery of Judas: "Dost thou betray the Son of Man with a kiss?" (Lk 22.48).

In its strictest sense, hypocrisy is the simulation of one who wishes to seem, but not to be, virtuous. This is a serious sin since it shows indifference and contempt for virtue, while at the same time using it for base and selfish ends. This type of hypocrisy especially makes virtue appear mean and ugly. It discourages honest men from giving themselves to virtue and religion and provides the godless man with an excuse for avoiding them.

But hypocrisy is seldom realized in so serious a form. Far more common is the hypocrisy of the man who does have some appreciation for virtue and religion, and perhaps for this very reason simulates a degree of goodness or holiness beyond what is actually his. He does not think enough of virtue to expend the effort required to achieve it, but he does find it sufficiently worthwhile to pose as virtuous. Here the sin is mortal or venial according to one's motive. For example, to make a show of virtue in order to prepare the ground for an eventual seduction would be a mortal sin, while to do so out of mere vanity would rarely be more than a venial sin.

If an individual merely conceals his sin, even if this results in his being mistakenly regarded as good and holy, he is not on that account a hypocrite. Indeed, he ought to avoid the scandal that could easily be the consequence of imprudently advertising the sinful state of his own soul. As long as he does nothing to encourage belief in his supposed goodness or sanctity, he is not being hypocritical by simply remaining silent about his sin. Nor would it be hypocrisy for a person to show himself as having the virtue that he really has. On the contrary, though it is always wise and prudent for one not to wear his virtue on his sleeve, he lies who, being good and virtuous, openly claims or pretends to be vicious.

Bibliography: J. A. MCHUGH and C. J. CALLAN, Moral Theology, rev. E. P. FARRELL, 2 v. (New York 1958) 2:2405.

[S. F. PARMISANO]

HYPOSTASIS

The theological equivalence of hypostasis with person is the result of a long development. The original meaning of the Greek word was substructure, support. Then it came to mean something real and objective as opposed to a mere appearance or abstraction. In Scripture it usually means moral support, assurance, conviction, e.g., in Heb 11.1: "Now faith is the substance [ὑπόστασις; Vulgate: substantia] of things to be hoped for . . ." (cf. Heb 3.14; 2 Cor 9.4).

In patristic writings it was first used about the Trinity. Origen speaks of three hypostases in God—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Dionysius of Alexandria, writing against Arius and Sabellius, says that there are three hypostases in the unity of the divine monarchy. Gradually hypostasis came to be distinguished from οὐσία (ousia; being, reality), which was reserved for what was common to the three Persons, the divine nature. In the Council of Nicaea I, nevertheless, ousia and hypostasis are still roughly equivalent: "If anyone says . . . that the Son of God is from a different hypostasis, or ousia [than the Father], . . . him the Catholic Church anathematizes" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 126).

The translation of hypostasis into Latin by its literal equivalent, substantia, aroused in the West the suspicion that the Greeks were Arians or tritheists, while the translation of the Latin persona into the Greek πρόσωπον made the West sound Sabellian to the East. The good sense of men like Gregory of Nazianzus brought East and West to see that they held the same faith despite the different connotations of the terms in Greek and in Latin. The acceptance of the term "person" as orthodox in the East can be seen in a synodal letter of Eastern bishops to Pope Damasus in 382: "in three perfect hypostases, or three perfect Persons [πρόσωπα]."

Hypostasis played an important part in the Christological controversies of the 5th century. APOLLINARIS OF LAODICEA held that the human nature of Christ does not include a human soul. One of his arguments was that this would make Him two hypostases and therefore not really a unity. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA expressed the union of the human and the divine in Christ as a union in hypostasis (ἕνωσις καθ' ὑποστάσιν), a phrase that meant for him, as Galtier has shown, merely that the union is one in reality, not in mere appearance. Cyril did not distinguish between physis (φύσις) and hypostasis, and his terminology laid him open to the charge of MONOPHYSITISM. The distinction between the two terms was formulated by Pope LEO I as a unity in Person, or hypostasis, and a duality in nature, or physis. Chalcedon canonized the distinction as well as the equivalence of the respective Greek and Latin terms: "[T]he particular natures unite in the one person and one hypostasis" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 302).

After Chalcedon the theologians' task was to convince the Monophysites that the decrees of Ephesus had not been abandoned and to explain the difference between person and nature. Boethius made clear that only a rational being could be a hypostasis: "We have found the definition of person, 'the individual substance of a rational nature.' Now by this definition we Latins have described what the Greeks call hypostasis" (Tract. theol. quintus 1.4). Leontius of Byzantium answered the Monophysite objection that nature without hypostasis is nothing, and hence one hypostasis in Christ means one nature, by saying that the human nature of Christ is "neither uncentered [anhypostatos] nor self-centered, but 'en-centered' [enhypostatos] in God" (Hardy and Richardson, 375–376). Finally, John Damascene summed up the tradition of the earlier Fathers and further emphasized that hypostasis implies incommunicability (De fide orthodoxa 1.8; Patrologia Graeca [Paris 1857–66] 95:828) and that it signifies not what, but who.

Modern theological speculation on the HYPOSTATIC UNION has centered on the question of what the formal constituent of personality is and, more recently, on the relation between the human consciousness of Christ and the hypostasis of the Word.

See Also: JESUS CHRIST; TRINITY, HOLY; INCARNATION; INCOMMUNICABILITY; PERSON (IN PHILOSOPHY); PERSON (IN THEOLOGY); SUBSISTENCE; SUBSISTENCE (IN CHRISTOLOGY).

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:369–437. V. HAMP and H. DIEPEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:577–579. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart (Würzburg 1951–54). E. R. HARDY and C. C. RICHARDSON, eds., Christology of the Later Fathers (Philadelphia, Pa. 1954). P. GALTIER, "L'Unio secundum hypostasim chez s. Cyrille," Gregorianum 33 (1952) 351–398. M. NÉDONCELLE, "Prosōpon et persona," Revue des sciences religieuses 22 (1948) 277–299. M. RICHARD, "L'Introduction du mot hypostasis dans la théologie de l'incarnation," Mélanges de science religieuse 2 (1945) 5–32; 243–270.

[J. M. CARMODY]

HYPOSTATIC UNION

The union in one PERSON, or HYPOSTASIS, of the divine and human natures. Jesus Christ is both God and man in virtue of the hypostatic union, a mystery of faith in the strict sense. "As God he was begotten of the substance of the Father before time; as man he was born in time of the substance of his mother. He is perfect God; and he is perfect man, with a rational soul and human flesh. He is equal to the Father in His divinity but He is inferior to the Father in his humanity. Although he is God and man, he is not two but one Christ. And he is one, not because his divinity was changed into flesh, but because His humanity was assumed to God. He is one, not at all because of a mingling of substances, but because he is one person" [the so-called Athanasian Creed; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 76; tr. J. F. Clarkson et al., The Church Teaches (St. Louis 1955) 5–6].

Biblical affirmations of the divinity and humanity of Christ were transformed into technical, theological expressions and (to some extent) explanations of the mystery when heresies began to pervert the true faith. Docetism, Arianism, and Apollinarianism attacked the true humanity of Christ; Arianism, rationalism, Modernism, the true divinity. In addition, NESTORIANISM, ADOPTIONISM, MONOPHYSITISM, and MONOTHELITISM erroneously understood the manner of the union between the divine and human natures. The evolution of the fixed technical terminology of the hypostatic union was gradual. The Council of CHALCEDON (451) established the usage whereby hypostasis means person and whereby ousia and physis mean substance and nature. A consideration of the Council of Nicaea I's use of hypostasis and ousia (Denzinger 126) will bring out the earlier (325) fluidity of terminology.

See Also: JESUS CHRIST, II (IN THEOLOGY); HYPOSTATIC UNION, GRACE OF; PERSON (IN PHILOSOPHY); PERSON (IN THEOLOGY); NATURE; JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:437–568. M. SCHMAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:579–583.

[E. A. WEIS]

HYPOSTATIC UNION, GRACE OF

The INCARNATION of the SON OF GOD is the supreme gift or GRACE of God to man. From the 12th century, theologians have designated this aspect of the hypostatic union as "the grace of union" (gratia unionis).

Historical. The New Testament frequently speaks of Christ as the manifestation or gift of God's graciousness toward sinful man, sometimes using the word χάρις (grace), e.g., Jn 1.14–17; Ti 2.11. For St. Augustine, the hypostatic union is the model of man's grace; just as Jesus did not merit to be the Christ, the unique and sinless Son of God, so men do not merit to be Christians, reborn, freed from sin (Praed. sanct. 15.30–31, Patrologia Latina 44:981–983; cf. Enchir. 36, Patrologia Latina 40:250). The Middle Ages in developing Augustine's teaching sought to safeguard the gratuity of the Incarnation without making Christ a merely adoptive son. Against Spanish ADOPTIONISM of the late 8th century, Alcuin (Adv. haer. Felic. 69; Patrologia Latina 101:116) insisted on distinguishing grace and adoption. In the 12th century, a frequent formula (attributed, without clear textual support, to both Ambrose and Augustine) was that the humanity or soul of Christ received by grace all that His divinity had by nature. Christ as man, though not an adoptive Son, was declared to be Son by grace and Son by union, in contrast with His being in His divinity Son by nature. Finally Peter Lombard (3 Sent. 10.2.67–69; Quaracchi 2.595–596) combined both expressions in the phrase “grace of union.” Thirteenth-century theologians explored this gratia unionis and identified it variously as the Holy Spirit producing the union, as a created disposition for the union, as the hypostatic union itself, etc. St. Thomas Aquinas (Comp. theol. 214; cf. Summa theologiae 3a, 7, introd.; 8.5 ad 3) and others distinguished a threefold grace in Christ: grace of union, habitual grace, and grace of headship. In subsequent theology the grace of union was discussed primarily in connection with the substantial sanctity of Christ and was explained in accordance with various speculative theories of the hypostatic union. The two principal questions on which theologians continued to differ were the following: (1) Is the grace of union created or uncreated? (2) Does the grace of union sanctify the humanity of itself or only because it has habitual grace as consequence?

Systematic. The hypostatic union, as a gift proceeding from the gracious will of God communicating Himself substantially to man beyond the powers, exigencies, or merits of human nature, is the supreme grace. This grace of union may be termed uncreated or created accordingly as one regards the Divine Person of the WORD, who communicates Himself to His humanity, or the created reality of union in that humanity. Theologians commonly distinguish this substantial grace, which is identical with the hypostatic union, from Christ’s habitual or sanctifying grace and His grace of headship, accidental graces that flow from the grace of union and are measured by it. Because of the grace of union, Christ’s humanity is holy and sinless (see IMPECCABILITY OF CHRIST), and the man Christ is the natural, not adoptive, Son of God. It is ultimately because of the grace of union that His habitual grace and virtues have a quasi-infinite perfection, and His salvific actions are intrinsically apt to sanctify all mankind, whose grace is incarnational and filial because it participates in the grace of union through the mediation of Christ’s habitual grace and virtues as informing His saving action.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:437–568. A.

VUGTS, La Grâce d’union d’après S. Thomas d’Aquin: Essai historique et doctrinal (Tilburg 1946). J. ROHOF, La Sainteté substantielle du Christ dans la théologie scolastique: Histoire du problème (Fribourg 1952). se

[T. E. CLARKE]

HYSTERECTOMY

Hysterectomy is the surgical removal of the womb by an incision in the abdomen or through the vagina. A hysterectomy is called subtotal, supracervical, or supravaginal if the cervix (the neck of the womb) is left in place. It is called radical if the entire womb, fallopian tubes, and ovaries are removed.

As early as 1768 Cavalini had speculated on the feasibility of the surgical removal of the womb, and the first recorded hysterectomy was reported by G. Bixby in 1869. According to Bixby it was done by one H. R. Stover as an emergency procedure in the presence of massive hemorrhage subsequent to caesarean section. The patient died after 78 hours. During the next few years, E. Porro (for whom the caesarean hysterectomy is now named) conducted surgical experiments on rabbits; in 1876 he performed the first completely successful hysterectomy and recommended the procedure whenever caesarean section was to be done.

As surgical technique improved and hazards decreased, hysterectomy increased at such a rate that in 1946 Norman Miller, in his review of the procedure in the American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology, entitled his article: “Hysterectomy: Therapeutic Necessity or Surgical Racket?” [51 (1946) 804], and in 1956 Waverly R. Payne made unnecessary hysterectomy the subject of his presidential address to the South Atlantic Association of Obstetricians and Gynecologists [72 (1956) 1165]. This type of study may indicate a too free attitude on the part of some physicians in regard to hysterectomy, but it is much more indicative of the constant self-evaluation of the medical profession, with a view to the best welfare of the individual patient.

The principal moral considerations involved in the surgical removal of the womb arise from the fact that hysterectomy is an operation that seriously compromises the functional integrity of the body and results in the permanent loss of the reproductive function. When this is done simply as a contraceptive measure, it is recognized by the Church as humanly disordered and morally wrong. An example of this would be a hysterectomy performed because the abdomen is already open in the surgical treatment of some benign adnexal disease and the patient likewise wished to be rid of her childbearing potential [A.

D'Esposito, "Hysterectomy when the Uterus Is Grossly Normal," American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology 83 (1962) 113–122].

The moral questions concerned with hysterectomy can be conveniently divided into three categories. First there are those cases in which some pathology of the womb itself makes its continued presence in the body a threat to life or health independent of any future pregnancy. Such, for example, would be the presence of a malignant tumor, irreparable damage of the uterine wall, or placenta accreta in a pronounced degree. When this kind and degree of uterine pathology is verified, the principle of totality indicates the removal of the womb. The consequent loss of the reproductive function is acceptable and justified under the principle of DOUBLE EFFECT.

The second category of cases can be classified under the concept of functional compromise of the womb because of the impossibility of adequate and lasting surgical repair. These are cases in which the womb itself has become affected in a way that will (or may) demand a future hysterectomy, although at the present an inadequate sort of repair, consisting mainly in plication of the fascia and shortening of the relaxed ligaments, as well as a modification of the cervix, would be adequate. This would enable the woman to have another pregnancy or two, with delivery usually by caesarean section; eventually, however, a hysterectomy would likely be indicated. However, if the patient should prefer that the definitive surgery be done right away, instead of later, because she is not so anxious to increase her family as to be inclined to undergo this extra surgical procedure, there is no reason, from a moral viewpoint, why hysterectomy could not be done initially. Since under ordinary circumstances one is not obliged to take extraordinary measures to prolong one's life, she is certainly not obliged to take them to prolong her generative function.

In much the same way, if, after a varying number of caesarean sections, the obstetrician judges that the womb is beyond safe and adequate repair in regard to future childbearing, it can be removed as a damaged organ. Although some theologians have been disturbed by an apparent contraceptive dimension of this procedure (Zalba, 2:152, ad 4), still one must consider that the primary approach to the problem is in terms of the removal of a damaged organ of the body that can no longer function safely and may therefore be removed, despite the fact that its function is generative. This opinion favoring hysterectomy is sufficiently established to be followed safely (G. Kelly, "Notes on Moral Theology," 70–71). Moreover, a view that would permit tubal ligation in this particular case, as a measure of simply isolating the uterus instead of removing it, is being studied (from a moral viewpoint) by a number of theologians (see Tesson and Cardegna in bibliography).

Bibliography: G. A. KELLY, Medico-Moral Problems (St. Louis 1958); "Notes on Moral Theology, 1950," Theological Studies 12 (1951) 70–71. J. P. KENNY, Principles of Medical Ethics (2d ed. Westminster, Md. 1962). C. J. MCFADDEN Medical Ethics (5th ed. Philadelphia 1961). T. J. O'DONNELL, Morals in Medicine (2d ed. Westminster, Md. 1959). C. MCLANE et al., "Indications for Hysterectomy: A Panel Discussion," American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology 72 (1956) 534–533. M. ZALBA, Theologiae moralis summa, v. 2 (Biblioteca de autores cristianos 106; 2d ed. Madrid 1957) 152, ad 4. E. TESSON, "Discussion morale," Cahiers Laennec 24 (1964) 64–73. F. F. CARDEGNA, "Contraception, the Pill, and Responsible Parenthood," Theological Studies 25 (1964) 611–636, see esp. n. 21.

[T. J. O'DONNELL]

HYVERNAT, HENRI

Orientalist and professor; b. Loire, France, June 30, 1858; d. Washington, D.C., May 29, 1941. In 1877 Hyvernats began his studies for the priesthood at Issy and Paris. Fellow students who became his lifelong friends included M. J. LAGRANGE and P. BATIFFOL. Hyvernats, encouraged by the famous Abbé F. G. Vigouroux, made the Semitic languages, including Babylonian and Egyptian, his chosen field of study and began to prepare for a scientific career. After ordination in Lyons, France, on June 3, 1882, he was appointed chaplain at the French church of St. Louis in Rome. In 1885, with his degree of doctor of divinity from the Pontifical University, he was made professor of Assyriology and Egyptology at the Roman Seminary and interpreter of Oriental languages at the Congregation De Propaganda Fide.

In 1883 Le Monde published Hyvernats's study of the Assyrian monuments in the Vatican. In 1886–87 he published his Actes des Martyrs de l'Égypte (Coptic text with French translation), and in 1888 his Album de paléographie Copte.

In 1887 he accepted the offer of a professorship at The Catholic University of America that was to be established in Washington, D.C., in 1889. During the intervening year he undertook a scientific survey for the French government of the cuneiform inscriptions preserved in Armenia and Kurdistan. The account of the results and adventures of this survey appeared in book form in 1892 (Du Caucase au golfe Persique, with P. Müller-Simonis). Hyvernats assumed his duties at Catholic University on the day of its solemn opening in 1889 and he retained his professorship there for 52 years until his death.

Besides teaching, Hyvernats wrote articles on the Coptic versions of the Bible and other subjects related to Egypt for Vigouroux's Dictionnaire de la Bible in 1895, for the Jewish Encyclopedia in 1901, and for the Catholic Encyclopedia in 1903. For the Revue Biblique he wrote his Études sur les versions Coptes de la Bible in 1896 and his Petite introduction a l'étude de la Massore between 1902 and 1904. In 1903 he collaborated with Dr. J. B. CHABOT in founding the Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium, and he edited its volumes of the Coptic Acta Martyrum. In 1912 he was instrumental in having the Corpus enterprise transferred to the joint ownership of the two Catholic Universities of Louvain and America.

While in Europe in 1910, Hyvernats became deeply interested in the unique collection of 50 ancient Coptic manuscripts discovered at Hamuli in Egypt. When this was purchased by J. P. Morgan of New York in 1911, Hyvernats obtained the commission to prepare a catalogue of the manuscripts, to have them taken to the Vatican Library Studios to be repaired, rebound, and photographed, and to have a photographic edition prepared for distribution to a list of great libraries. The work was completed in 1925.

While recovering from serious illness in 1927, Hyvernats began his work on a Catalogue raisonné, which was to fill ten or more volumes and serve as a Summa of all Coptic learning. This he completed in abbreviated form by 1932 and turned over to the Pierpont Morgan Library. To the Institute for Christian Oriental Research at the Catholic University of America, a project he had planned, he deeded his library and all his life's savings. In this way he secured for himself a share in the continuation by others of his long life's unfinished labors.

Bibliography: T. C. PETERSEN, "Professor Henry Hyvernats," Catholic World 153 (Sept. 1941) 653-666.

[T. C. PETERSEN]

I

IAM CHRISTUS ASTRA ASCENDERAT

Office hymn that was historically prescribed for Matins on the feast of Pentecost. It dates from the fourth or fifth century and some ascribe the hymn to St. AMBROSE. Others disagree, however, basing their opinion in part on metrical variations that are unusual in Ambrosian hymns. The hymn, in eight strophes, is a somewhat pedestrian metrical setting of Acts 2.1–16, describing the coming of the Holy Spirit upon the Apostles, the miracle of tongues, and St. Peter's response to the charge of drunkenness made by some of the mystified hearers. The meter is iambic dimeter.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 2:49; 51:98. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 1:576. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948). J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 108–109.

[J. P. MCCORMICK]

IAM SOL RECEDIT IGNEUS

Office hymn that was traditionally used at first Vespers of the Sundays after Epiphany and after Pentecost. With the variation of one word in the fourth line of the first stanza (Infunde amorem cordibus instead of Infunde lumen cordibus), it was also assigned for use at Vespers of Trinity Sunday. The original text began O lux beata trinitas, / Et principalis unitas. The original hymn, written in iambic dimeter, is often ascribed to St. AMBROSE; he is actually cited as its author by Hincmar of Reims in a work of 857. However, more recent works on hymnology tend to refer to the authorship as unknown. Some would ascribe it to GREGORY THE GREAT; however, it may date only from the 9th century. The 1632 revision of the Roman Breviary abbreviated the hymn to two stanzas and a doxology.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 51:38. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 1:842. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948)

62–63, 164–165. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 43. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65)1:142, 214.

[J. P. MCCORMICK]

IAM TOTO SUBITUS VESPER

Office hymn that was historically sung, first at Matins, subsequently at Vespers, on the feast of the Seven Sorrows of Our Lady. Its composition is ascribed to Calisto Palumbella, a bishop of the 18th century, who was a member of the SERVITES, and to whom the feast had been granted in 1688. The meter is minor asclepiadic in the first three lines of each strophe and glyconic in the fourth line. Within the space of its six stanzas the hymn details the sufferings of Christ upon the cross and stresses their effect on His Mother.

Bibliography: J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 1:578. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948).

[J. P. MCCORMICK]

IAMBLICHUS

Neoplatonist philosopher; b. Chalcis in Coele Syria, c. A.D. 250; d. c. 325. He was a student of PORPHYRY, the successor of PLOTINUS, and later conducted his own school, possibly at Apamea. He is credited by his successors with important elaborations within the scheme of Neoplatonist emanation, with the promotion of theurgy and with the dethronement of the human soul from its Plotinian perpetual union with the intellect. Unfortunately, his commentaries upon various dialogues of PLATO have not survived, and one is left to conjecture what his system may have been from quotations and testimonies in later writers, especially PROCLUS and Damascius.

See Also: NEOPLATONISM.

Bibliography: His extant works form part of a Pythagorean collection: De vita pythagorica, ed. L. DEUBNER (Leipzig 1937);

Adhortatio ad philosophiam or Protrepticus, ed. H. PISTELLI (Leipzig 1888); De communi mathematica scientia liber, ed. N. FESTA (Leipzig 1891); In Nicomachi arithmeticae introductionis liber, ed. H. PISTELLI (Leipzig 1894); Theologoumena arithmeticae, ed. V. DE FALCO (Leipzig 1922), authorship disputed; De mysteriis liber, ed. G. PARTHEY (Berlin 1857), probably correctly attributed to Iamblichus. Grouped together with commentary are fragments of his lost treatise De anima, in La Révélation d'Hermès Trismésiste, ed. and tr. A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, 4 v. (Paris 1950–54) v.3. Lost are works on the gods and on the Chaldean oracles. G. FAGGIN, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 2:707–708. F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al., 5 v. (12th ed. Berlin 1923–28) 1:612–618. P. MERLAN, From Platonism to Neoplatonism (2d ed. The Hague 1960). ARISTOTLE, Protrepticus, ed. I. DÜRING (Göteborg 1961).

[W. H. O'NEILL]

IBARRA Y GONZÁLEZ, RAMÓN

Mexican archbishop and educational reformer, first archbishop of Puebla; b. Olinalá, Guerrero, Mexico, Oct. 22, 1853; d. Mexico City, Feb. 1, 1917. Educated in Puebla and in Rome, he was personally presented with a special medal by Pope Leo XIII for his brilliant scholarship. After being ordained on Feb. 21, 1880, he returned to Mexico in 1883. In August 1889, he was chosen bishop of the Diocese of Chilapa. In 1902 he was transferred to the Diocese of Puebla, which became an archdiocese a year later by order of Pius X. Thus he was the last bishop and first archbishop of Puebla. At the time of his death he was in hiding because of religious persecutions: his flock dispersed, the clergy scattered in all directions, many of his works undone, the seminary and Catholic university that he founded destroyed.

A man both gentle and firm, he is remembered for his nobility and his many accomplishments. He was extremely active, talented, and highly creative, optimistic and generous by nature, and a tireless fighter in the cause of God. He founded 15 schools, a preparatory school, and a Catholic university that had six faculties. He was responsible for bringing into Mexico the Christian Brothers and the Teresians. The poorer classes owe to him the founding of two free hospitals, an asylum, a Catholic workers' circle, and a theater that he endowed. He improved the Palafoxiano Seminary, for which he obtained the privilege of offering academic degrees. He founded the Institute of Missionaries of Guadalupe especially for the Indian population and the Mexican Congregation of the Missionaries of the Holy Spirit. He also obtained pontifical approval for the order of the Religious of the Cross, and founded the Apostolic League of diocesan priests. He organized the First Catholic National Congress in 1903. He published a total of 17 pastoral letters, held four diocesan synods, and founded two Catholic chapters and a Catholic social action center.

Bibliography: O. MÁRQUEZ, Monseñor Ibarra: Biografía del Excmo. Sr. Dr. y maestro D. Ramón Ibarra y González . . . (Mexico City 1962).

[R. GUÍZAR DÍAZ]

IBN AL-'ASSĀL

Canon lawyer and chief of protocol to the Coptic Patriarch Cyril III (1235–43). Little else is known of his life and death. In preparation for the synod of 1239 he prepared a canonical collection known as the Nomocanon of Ibn al-'Assāl. It gives the civil and ecclesiastical law of the Monophysite Coptic Church and is noted for its orderliness and careful reproduction of sources. Manuscripts of the work can be found in the Vatican Library, the British Museum, and the Bibliothèque Nationale of Paris. Two editions in Arabic were published in Cairo in 1908 and 1927. The work is sometimes erroneously attributed to two younger brothers of the author.

Bibliography: S. JARGY, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 5:1237–42. J. M. WANSLEBEN, Histoire de l'Église d'Alexandrie (Paris 1677) 335.

[H. A. LARROQUE]

IBN 'ARABĪ

Muhyī al-Dīn ibn 'Arabī, Islamic philosopher; b. Murcia, Spain, 1165; d. Damascus, 1240. Making use of the contribution of his predecessors in all branches of religious and philosophical science, and guided by his own unique spiritual experience, Ibn 'Arabī conceived a vast theosophical synthesis, monistic in inspiration, which he set forth in many writings. Although his work was severely criticized by orthodox SUNNITES, it had a decisive influence on the subsequent development of Muslim mysticism and of esoteric speculation in the East and the West, e.g., Dante.

Life. Ibn 'Arabī's family, of Arabic origin, had ties with SUFISM. When he was eight years old he was sent from his birthplace in southeastern Spain to Lisbon to study the QUR'ĀN and Muslim law. He then went to Seville, where he pursued his studies in the philosophical and religious sciences. His education kept pace with his initiation into the mystical life, which was greatly influenced by his filial friendship with two venerable Sufi women. On a journey to Cordova, his father, a friend of Averroës (ibn-Rushd), arranged an interview for his son with the famous philosopher, who was amazed at Ibn 'Arabī's genius.

In 1200, when he was 35, Ibn 'Arabī had a vision. Because of it, he left Spain permanently for the Orient in the hope of finding a more favorable reception for his symbolical exegesis. This was the beginning of an itinerant life that took him to Arabia, Egypt, Iraq, Syria, and Asia Minor, and continued until 1223, when he settled permanently in Damascus. There he spent the last 17 years of his life, working in tranquility. An encounter he had in Mecca in 1201, during his first sojourn there, influenced the orientation of his thought. The daughter of his host seemed to him the earthly manifestation of eternal Wisdom. She became for him what Beatrice would be for Dante later on.

Works. Ibn ‘Arabī’s writings, unequal in length, number in the hundreds. Three of them deserve to be mentioned as the foundation of his fame. His Tarjumān al-ashwāq (The Interpreter of Eager Desires) is a collection of love poems composed in honor of his Meccan Beatrice; it is dated 1215. At Aleppo a few months later, the author prepared an esoteric commentary on these poems. His Futuḥāt al-makkiyah (The Revelations Received at Mecca concerning the Knowledge of the Secrets of the King and of the Kingdom) constitutes a summa of mystical theosophy, at once theoretical and experimental, developed as inspiration dictated. The editing of these works, begun in 1230, was to occupy Ibn ‘Arabī for many years. Finally, the Fuṣuṣ al-Ḥikam (The Gems of the Wisdoms of the Prophets, 1230) summed up the author’s esoteric doctrine. It should be noted that the style of this last-named work is particularly difficult. It is marked by discontinuity, permutation of contrary and complementary terms, a taste for paradox, and fluctuation of a vocabulary borrowed from disparate sources. These qualities are a challenge not merely for the translation, but even for the comprehension of the author’s thought.

Teaching. Ibn ‘Arabī’s doctrine, which is very complex, is never explained by him in systematic fashion. The terms “pantheism” and “existential monism,” which are usually used to describe it, are equivocal and could mask its originality. H. Corbin rightly prefers the term kathenotheism, which means: the presence of the divine Being, total each time and in each being, an epiphanic form, in which it manifests itself as clothed with one or several of its Names.

“I was a hidden Treasure and I loved to be known. Therefore I created creatures so as to be known by them.” Meditation on this ḥadīth brought Ibn ‘Arabī to the conception of an eternal cosmogony, “a sequence of manifestations of being, by the intensification of a growing light, within the primordially undifferentiated Divine”; strictly, a succession of tajalliyāt, “theophanies” (Corbin, 88). The divine Essence conceals many attributes, designated by the divine Names, which have meaning only for beings that are its epiphanic forms. In a “compassionate sigh” for his unnamed Names, God conceives in Himself the latent individualities of these forms (archetypes, angels, Islamic Reality). These individualities are concretized in creatures, in which and through which God reveals Himself to Himself, contemplating Himself in them as in a mirror. Each divine Name is the Lord of the being that manifests it. Each being manifests the divine Essence only as particularized in its own particular lord; hence the diversity of individual vocations, as well as of religions. The Perfect Man, the final cause of creation, is the epiphany of the totality of the divine Names. To speak of union with God is a snare, presupposing an illusory duality. The good and heaven consist in consciously realizing ever more perfectly the epiphany of God in Himself and in creatures. Evil and hell consist in conferring an illusory autonomy upon created things. The Prophets, manifestations of the divine wisdoms, guide men toward Reality. Their messages, which are also epiphanic, are to be interpreted symbolically. Muhammed is the most perfect of the Prophets.

Bibliography: A. E. AFFIFI, The Mystical Philosophy of Muḥyid Dīn-Ibnul ‘Arabī (Cambridge, Eng. 1939). R. LANDAU, The Philosophy of Ibn ‘Arabī (London 1959). M. ASÍN PALACIOS, El-Islam cristianizado (Madrid 1931), stresses the Christian influences. H. CORBIN, L’Imagination créatrice dans le soufisme d’Ibn ‘Arabī (Paris 1958), stresses the Oriental esoteric influences.

[S. DE BEAURECUEIL]

IBN EZRA, ABRAHAM BEN MEÏR

Hebrew poet, hymnographer, philologist, grammarian, and commentator on the Bible; b. Toledo (Castile) or Tudela (Navarre), Spain, 1092; d. Calahorra (Logoño), Spain, Jan. 23, 1167. Known to the Christians of the Middle Ages as Ebenare and given the epithet of the Great Sage by his fellow Jews of Spain, Ibn Ezra was one of the most celebrated rabbis of the 12th century. He first settled in Cordova, but being of a restless nature and in quest of an encyclopedic knowledge, he became a wanderer in search of the Eternal. His footsteps can be traced on all the roads of Europe and Egypt; he visited Narbonne (1139), Rome (1140), Salerno, Mantua, and Lucca (1145), Verona (1146–47), Beziers and Rodez in southern France (1155–57), London (1158–59), and again Rome (1166). Shortly after his return to his native land, he died at the age of 75.

During his travels Ibn Ezra never ceased to compose his works. His writings are as varied and turbulent as his life and reflect his versatility and encyclopedic knowledge. His chief work is his commentary on the Bible (printed in RABBINICAL BIBLES), which treats of all the OT books except Chronicles; he issued several recensions of his commentary on the Pentateuch. He even availed himself of the cabalistic genre (see CABALA) in his works: The Book of the Secrets of the Law (an attempt to explain the mysteries of the Pentateuch); The Mystery of the Form of the Letters; The Enigma of the Quiescent Letters; and The Book of the Name (which treats of the sacred Tetragrammaton YHWH). To these must be added numerous poetic, philological, astronomical, and grammatical works, such as The Book of the Balance of the Holy Tongue, The Book of Purity (of language), The Pure Lip, and The Speech of Nobility, which explains the rare and difficult words of the Bible.

To be appreciated, Ibn Ezra must be seen in the setting of his own time. Contrary to the previous servile and punctilious rabbinical compilations of Palestine and Babylon, the period extending from the 10th to the 15th century ushered in a personal, conscientious, and deeper study of the word of God. Grammar and lexicography became the foundation of a saner and more open-minded exegesis. This became the golden age of Jewish exegesis, and the movement achieved its most brilliant triumphs in the West, especially in Moorish Spain. Ibn Ezra was one of the leaders of this movement. Prolific and marvelously learned, he gave, through his commentaries, added impulse to the Biblical studies of his coreligionists. His prodigious memory enabled him to propagate and popularize in Latin and Saxon lands the works of his illustrious Andalusian compatriots of the 10th and 11th centuries. His supple mind was able to digest them and to set them forth with great clarity.

In his commentary on the Bible he gave attention, first of all, to the grammatical sense of the words, and he then looked for the direct, literal interpretation. The allegorizing so dear to the rabbis and the futile fantasies of the cabalists are absent from this work. With the cabalists, however, he was acquainted, since in other works he developed them with great relish. But in his commentary his erudite and scientific mind showed the way to a group of enlightened men who sought to explain the Bible with the aid of reason and science. He offered for the first time the spectacle of the tension between faith and reason, between traditional piety and a critical approach. His exegetical work vacillated between these two poles just as he himself wandered from one country to the other. He had one fixed purpose—the faithful interpretation of the Bible—and one goal—to reveal to his coreligionists of France, Italy, and England the renaissance of the intellectual and scientific spirit of Jewish Spain. “He can be considered as the first Biblical critic who elevated exegesis to the level of a science” (I. Bloch and E. Levy). Spinoza has described him as having been “a man of free mind and of great erudition.”

Ibn Ezra was the first to sense the problem of the different sources in the Pentateuch and the problem of Deutero-Isaia. He was the first to uphold the opinion that in order to cross the Red Sea the Israelites had availed themselves of a low tide and that they had crossed at the end of the gulf. In proposing such daring opinions he felt the necessity of veiling his thought in allusions and involved constructions.

Ordinarily, however, his style was correct, clear, supple, and elegant; his expression was vibrant and witty. Having succeeded in creating a style of remarkable precision, he bequeathed a prose without peer. He made it a point of honor to write in the purest Hebrew, although up to that time Arabic was the cultural bond of the Mediterranean world. Every Jewish writer who then wished to gain an audience with the mass of the people and ensure the diffusion of his ideas wrote in Arabic. Ibn Ezra broke the trend, and he succeeded remarkably well. “One can rightly say of him that he created Hebrew prose as a medium of scientific thought” (Cecil Roth). For this reason also he may be placed in the ranks of the best Hebrew poets and hymn writers, although his poetry is characterized, not by lyrical flights and soulful effusions, but by reflections, maxims, and moralizings. Richard SIMON declared that “his style approaches that of Sallust.”

See Also: JEWISH PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: W. BACHER, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, (New York 1901–06) 6:520–524. S. BERNFELD, Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Berlin 1928–34) 8:326–341. C. LEVIAS, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, (New York 1939–44) 5:523–525. J. CANTERA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 2 1:60–61. D. ROSIN, “Die Religionsphilosophie Abraham Ibn Ezras,” Monatschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums 42–43. D. HERZOG, “Bemerkungen zu Abraham Ibn Ezra dem Historiker,” ibid. 81. R. LEVY, Astrological Works of Abraham Ibn Ezra (Baltimore 1927).

[A. BRUNOT]

IBN PAQŪDA

Jewish religious philosopher, active in the second half of the 11th century. Nothing is known of his life except that his full name was Bahya ben Joseph ibn Paqūda (Pakūda) and that he was a dayyan (rabbinical judge) in Saragossa or Cordova in Muslim Spain. Besides writing a certain number of liturgical poems, he was the author of an important work in Arabic on Jewish ethics, Al-hidāya ila farā'id al-qulub (Introduction to the Duties of the Heart). Joseph Kimchi's Hebrew translation of the work has not been preserved, but the 12th-century Hebrew version of it by Judah IBN TIBBON under the title Ḥovot ha-levavot (Duties of the Heart) became very popular and has been preserved in many MSS. A critical edition of the Arabic text was published by A. S. Yahuda (Leyden 1912). Modern translations have appeared in German by E. Baumgarten (Hamburg 1922) and in French by A. Chouraqui (Paris n.d.), but the English translation by M. Hyamson (New York 1945) offers only the sixth, seventh, and eighth treatises.

Ibn Paqūda set himself the task of harmonizing seemingly incompatible values: soul and reason, faith and science, Hellenistic systems of wisdom and Judeo-Islamic religious practices, the external “duties of the members” and the interior “duties of the heart.” To the revealed religion of the Bible and rabbinical tradition he brought the support of a rational theology concerning God, the soul, and the world in general. His doctrine has three aspects: the one God, the relationship between man and God, and the relationship between man and man. These are distributed through a “preliminary elevation” and through the “ten portals” through which the truly pious man must ascend to the divine union.

Although Ibn Paqūda insists on a negative theology—for while the God of the Bible is one, discursive human knowledge is necessarily multiple—he endeavors to give proof of God’s existence in terms of a Neoplatonic dialectic that does not exclude traces of pseudo-Aristotelian texts.

The basic attitude of the believer must be one of abandonment to God’s will, and his most serious obstacles are passion and pride. Therefore repentance and an effective return to God should be conspicuous among the “duties of the heart.” The means thereto are examination of conscience, prayer, corporal works of mercy, purity of intention, and asceticism; but the goal of all should be the pure love of God and the union it effects. In language of distinguished poetic quality (even in translation) this Jewish sage praises the delights of mystical union. The product of the interaction of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, Ibn Paqūda’s religious philosophy breathes an ecumenical air that conforms to his idea of the theologian as one who would reconcile but not suppress conflicting claims. Although Ibn Paqūda remained scrupulously faithful to rabbinical Judaism, he was not blind to the spiritual values current outside the Synagogue in 11th-century Spain.

Bibliography: G. VAJDA, La Théologie ascétique de Bahya Ibn Paquda (Paris 1947); Introduction À la pensée juive du moyen-âge (Paris 1947). A. KAHLBERG, Die Ethik des Bachja Ibn Pakuda (Heidelberg 1914). M. SISTER, Bachja-Studien (Berlin 1936). M. RAFFAELLA DE SION, “Bahya Ibn Paquda: Tutor of Hearts,” The Bridge, v.4 (New York 1959). J. CANTERA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:1180. J. GUTTMANN, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, 10 v. (New York 1939–44) 2:34–35. The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed.

J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–06) 2:447–454. Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 10 v. (Berlin 1928–34) 8:358–368.

[M. R. NÔTRE]

IBN TIBBON

A famous Jewish family of Hebrew translators from the Arabic of philosophical, linguistic, and scientific treatises by Jewish and Arab scholars. It flourished in Provence (southern France) during the 12th and 13th centuries. The prodigious efforts of the members of this family made available to non-Arabic-speaking Jews (and through renditions of their translations, to non-Jews) works previously inaccessible and established Hebrew as a useful vehicle of scientific expression by embellishing the language with new words and an appropriate style. Among the more notable representatives of the family are Judah ben Saul, Samuel ben Judah, Moses ben Samuel, and Jacob ben Makhir.

Judah ben Saul. The family patriarch; b. Granada, Spain, c. 1120; d. Marseilles, France, c. 1190. He fled his birthplace in 1150 because of the Almohade persecution of the Jews and settled in Lunel, France, where he practiced medicine. The pioneer of Hebrew translators, he was especially suited for his avocation by virtue of a thorough knowledge of Arabic, a resourcefulness in adapting Hebrew to new and intricate terminology, and a very precise and pedantic approach to his work, the last characteristic a source of criticism for a style deemed overly literal. In the preface to his translation of IBN PAQŪDA’S Duties of the Heart, he expressed some doubts concerning his Hebrew competence, excused his invention of new vocabulary, criticized those who failed to adhere to the original by interpolating their interpretations of the text, and recommended a literal rendering as the basis for an original revision. Among his other translations are Ibn Gabirol’s (Avicbron’s) Improvement of the Moral Qualities, Judah ben Samuel ha-Levi’s Kuzari, SA’ADIA’S Beliefs and Opinions, and the grammar and lexicon of Ibn Janah (Jonah Marinus). He appears to have composed a treatise on grammar and rhetoric and possibly a commentary on Proverbs ch. 31.

Judah ben Saul’s character, outlook, and concerns are revealed in his ethical will, A Father’s Admonition, in which he reproved and counseled his son, Samuel, regarding the latter’s course and purpose in life. In the Admonition he extolled the usefulness and care of books, commended the pursuit of scientific studies (with emphasis on medicine), advised meticulousness in handwriting and language, and urged respect for the son’s wife.

Samuel ben Judah. Physician and scholar; b. Lunel, France, c. 1150; d. Marseilles, France, c. 1230. Although the recipient of a very thorough education in medicine, Talmud, Arabic, and philosophy under the compulsive supervision of his father (whose material support he enjoyed), he early rebelled against his parent's overbearing control and influence. But following a period of independence marked by failure in various business ventures, he applied for Judah's help and resumed his studies, destined to excel the father, who had despaired of his son's chances for success.

Samuel's most notable accomplishment was the translation of the Guide of the Perplexed by MAIMONIDES, with whom he corresponded for advice on difficult passages. Very much influenced by the teachings of the great philosopher, he was attacked by the anti-Maimonists for contributing to the dissemination of the latter's rationalistic approach. He translated also Maimonides's treatise on resurrection, the introduction to the MISHNAH, and the commentary on its ethical tract, PIRKE AVOTH. Other translations include Ibn Ridwan's commentary on Galen's Ars Parva, works of Averroës, and the Arabic version of Aristotle's Meteora. Among his original works are philosophical commentaries on Genesis, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs, which evidence a reliance on Maimonides's allegorical method. He also compiled glossaries of the philosophical terms and foreign words in the Guide of the Perplexed.

Moses ben Samuel. Prolific translator of Arabic versions of Greek works; b. Marseilles, France, c. 1240; d. there, c. 1283. He translated Euclid's Elements, ALFARABI's Book of Principles, Avicenna's digest of his Canon of Medicine, and Averroës's commentaries on Aristotle. He added to his father's translations of Maimonides's works with renditions of the Book of the Commandments, essays on logic, hygiene, and poisons, and the commentary on the Mishnah.

His original works include commentaries on the Cantic of Canticles and the Pentateuch, and Sefer haPe'ah, an allegorical interpretation of Haggadic (see HAGGADAH) portions of the TALMUD and Midrash (see MIDRASHIC LITERATURE) in which he polemicized against the Christian contention of anthropomorphism in these writings. He also wrote a commentary on Avicenna's Canon.

Jacob ben Makhir. Known also as Don Profiat Tibbon and Profatius Judaeus, physician, noted astronomer, and grandson of Samuel; b. Marseilles, France, c. 1230; d. Montpellier, France, c. 1312. He headed the medical school of the University of Montpellier and was a leader of the Jewish community. A strong exponent of scientific studies, he led the struggle against the anti-Maimonists who attempted, under the direction of Solomon ben Adret of Barcelona, to impose a ban on philosophical interpretation and speculation in Provence.

His translations include Euclid's Elements and Data, Averroës's Compendium of Logic and his commentaries on Aristotle, Costa ben Luka's treatise on the sphere, and Ibn al-Saffar's on the astrolabe. He composed astronomical tables and wrote a description of a new quadrant that he had devised, which came to be known as Quadrans Judaicus. Both works were rendered into Latin and quoted by Copernicus and Kepler.

Bibliography: M. SCHLOESSINGER et al., The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–06) 6:544–550. Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, 10 v. (New York 1939–44) 5:530–531. H. H. GRAETZ, History of the Jews, ed. and tr. B. LÖWY, 6 v. (Philadelphia 1945) 4:30–34, 40–42. I. ABRAHAMS, ed. and tr., Hebrew Ethical Wills, 2 v. (Philadelphia 1926; repr. 1948) 1:54–92.

[R. KRINSKY]

ICELAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Iceland is an island located in the North Atlantic between NORWAY and GREENLAND, touching the Arctic Circle. A volcanic island, Iceland is noted for its hot springs and other volcanic geological formations. It forms a tableland the average elevation of which varies from 2,000 to 3,000 feet and whose highest point is 6,952 feet. A large part of the interior of the island is uninhabitable, and the island contains no arable land. Iceland's capital city of Reykjavik is home to almost half the country's total population, the vast majority of which belong to the Evangelical Lutheran Church, the state church. Boasting one of the world's oldest parliaments, Iceland also has among the world's highest literacy and personal income levels.

As an island with few natural resources and no agriculture, Iceland has traditionally relied on the fishing industry to buoy its economy. An independent republic from 930 to 1262, it fell under the control of Norway, and then Denmark due to its reliance on imports of wood and agricultural products. Iceland has been an independent state since July of 1944.

Catholic Origins and Development. By the 8th century Irish hermits were already dwelling in Iceland. Between 870–930 settlers began immigrating to Iceland from Norway and that country's possessions in Ireland, Scotland and neighboring islands. Some of these settlers were Christians while others were pagans familiar with Christianity. Missionaries first came to Iceland at the end of the 10th century, bringing priests from abroad to convert the island's inhabitants. The first recorded missionary, Thorvaldur Kodransson brought the German bishop Fredrekur in 981, while in 996, the recently converted King OLAF I TRYGGVESSON of Norway sent Stefnir Thorlilsson over the sea to Iceland. While these early missionaries had some success, their methods were too violent and they were forced to leave the country. In 997 Olaf again attempted conversion through Thangbrand, a “belligerent man and a warrior, but a good priest and efficient,” in the words of Snorri Sturluson in Heimskringla. While able to convert several chieftains, other disgruntled Icelandic chiefs eventually forced Thangbrand back to Norway, and his negative report to Olaf caused the king to threaten to kill every Icelander in Norway. It was only after the converted chiefs Gizurr Teitsson and Hjalti Skeggjason promised Olaf they would make open their conversion to the new faith that Christianity made rapid progress in Iceland.

In 1000 Christianity was officially accepted as the national faith by the Icelandic parliament—called the Althing. To keep good relations with Norway and to prevent warring between Christians and heathens, non-Christian leader Thorgeir Ljosvetningagodi proposed that the Christian law should serve the whole country, and this was accepted by all; mass baptisms were undertaken in one of the island’s hot springs. By this time a few small Christian churches had been built on private lands. During the next 50 years a few priests and bishops moved to Iceland, and in 1056, Isleifur Gizurrarsson, was consecrated by ADALBERT OF BREMEN as bishop of Skalholt in southern Iceland.

Isleifur’s son Gizurr, who succeeded him as bishop (1082–1118), built the cathedral of St. Peter in Skalholt and endowed it with his patrimony. The tithe was introduced in 1096. A second bishopric was founded at Holar in the north, where Jon helgi Ogmundarson, one of Isleifur’s disciples, was its first bishop (1106–21). Church schools were founded with native and foreign teachers. Monasteries were established in the north, with Benedictines at Thingeyri (1133), Munkathvera (1155) and Mordrúvellir. In the south, Augustinian canons were installed at Thykkvabaer (1168), Flatey-Helgafell (1172) and Skriduklaustur. A convent was established at Kirkjubæur in the south in 1186 and at Reynistadir in the north in the 13th century.

The Church in Iceland was at first suffragan to Bremen-Hamburg, to Lund from 1104 and to Trondheim from 1152. THORLÁK THÓRHALLSSON, who became the first Augustinian abbot at Thykkvibaer, was elected bishop of Skaholt from 1178–93 and struggled to make the Church independent of the local government as well as the laity, many of whom had erected Church buildings on their property and now sought to gain from this arrangement. Thorlák became the patron saint of Iceland. Gudmundur godi, Bishop of Holar (1203–37), also had difficulties, but there is no evidence that the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE reached Iceland, for the bishops were elected by the clergy and people and sent to the metropolitan to be consecrated. In Bishop Pall Jonssons’ time (1195–1211) there were 220 small churches and 290 priests in the See of Skalholt alone. Between the 12th and the 18th century the total population was less than 100,000.

Capital: Reykjavik.  Size: 39,758 sq. miles.  Population: 276,365 in 2000.  Languages: Icelandic.  Religions: 251,492 Lutherans (91%), 2,950 Catholics (1%), 8,291 other (3%), 13,632 without religious affiliation.  Diocese: Reykjavik.
--

In the 13th century, the great century of the sagas, monks were active in cataloguing and translating Icelandic literature. Previously the libraries in the monasteries were much like those on the Continent, for Icelanders were in constant contact with Norway and some studied in Germany, France and England.

The fierce 13th-century struggles among the foremost families, combined with the continued economic dependence upon Norway for wood, grain and other necessities, drove Iceland into a union with Norway by 1264. Bishop Arni Thorlaksson (1269–98) fought against proprietary churches and in favor of clerical celibacy, but without significant success. In the 14th century bishops still had a high sense of duty. In the middle of the century, Brother Eysteinn Arngrimsson wrote Lilja (“The Lily”), a pearl of literature and theology. Then a great decline set in. Several foreigners were sent to Iceland as bishops.

Early in the 15th century the plague epidemic (1402–05) reached Iceland. A third of the population perished and few priests survived. Iceland, under the control of Denmark since 1380, was more isolated than ever; this attracted ecclesiastical adventurers. Foreign bishops such as Jon Gerreksson (1426–33) were sometimes corrupted by business or political interests and did harm, but others, such as Gotsveinn Comhaer, a Dutch Carthusian monk at Skalholt, were loved by their people. At the close of the century a new epidemic nearly as severe as the Black Death struck Iceland.

The 16th Century and Reformation. After the 15th century spiritual decline and economic misery set in; celibacy was less observed by priests and discipline in the monasteries was relaxed. The influence of the REFORMATION was felt via Denmark, prompting Bishops Jon Arason of Holar (1524–50) and Ogmundur Palsson, OSA

(1522–40), of Skalholt to unite in an effort to prevent it. However their efforts proved futile. Soon German merchants had introduced writings of the reformers. A priest named Jon Einarsson was accused of reformed preaching at Skalholt. Gizurr Einarsson, educated at the bishop's expense in Germany, became acquainted with the Reformation; together with Oddur Gottskalksson, son of Bishop Gottskalk Nikulasson and others, he worked to alienate people from the bishops.

The efforts of the Reformers proved successful. Christian III, the Lutheran king of Denmark, sent two warships to Iceland and with the help of Lutheran Gizurr Einarsson, abducted Iceland's aged and blind Bishop Ogmundur onboard one of these ships. The bishop later died, probably en route to Denmark, and Gizurr installed himself as the first Lutheran bishop at Ogmundur's former see at Skalholt.

The Reformation continued to be imposed upon the Icelanders between 1537 and 1552. Denmark's King Christian III claimed the property of the Church, much of which was destroyed. Monks were forced to leave their monasteries, with the consequence that the pillage of monastic libraries resulted in the loss of much valuable information about the Icelandic Middle Ages. Bishop Jon Arason, who continued his ministry in defiance of the orders of King Christian as well as the king of Iceland, held his see at Holar until he too was taken prisoner and beheaded with both his sons at Skalholt (1550), a martyr for his faith and his country.

The Church after the Reformation. The history of the Catholic Church in Iceland following the Reformation was closely associated with the history of the Lutheran Church in Denmark. The Catholic Church was now illegal, although the faithful continued to worship in secret gatherings. With relations with Rome and almost all of Europe now at an end, Iceland maintained a cultural exchange only with Denmark. Society remained static but stable: the king of Iceland provided good schools to replace those of the Church, while Oddur Gottskalksson translated the New Testament into Icelandic (printed 1540 in Roskilde, Denmark). Gudbrandur Thorlaksson, Lutheran bishop of Holar (1571–1627), edited an Icelandic version of the entire Bible (1584), as well as translated and published many other devotional writings using the printing press brought to the county by Bishop Jon Arason.

In 1783 terrible earthquakes struck Iceland, destroying most of Skalholt. Two years later Reykjavik became the Lutheran bishopric for the south, spreading its influence to the whole island after Holar was suppressed in 1801.

When Denmark revised its constitution to include freedom of religion in the mid-1800s, a similar change in Iceland soon followed. Two Catholic chaplains administering to the spiritual needs of Iceland's French fishing fleet started missionary work in Iceland in 1857, and an increasingly liberal Icelandic government granted total freedom of religion in 1874. By 1900 secular priests had established a church and the Sisters of St. Joseph opened the kingdom's first hospital in Reykjavik under the vicar apostolic of Denmark. In 1903 the German MONTFORT FATHERS (SMM) arrived on the island.

Church Reasserts Itself in Twentieth Century. In 1923 Cardinal Willem van Rossum, prefect of Propaganda Fide, visited Iceland's Catholic minority and was welcomed by the Icelandic government. Van Rossum announced the creation of the Vicariate Apostolic of Iceland, and in 1929 Montfort priest Martin Meulenbergh, (d. 1941) was ordained as bishop. The cathedral of Landakot was also constructed during this period; for many years it would be the largest church in Iceland.

A resurgence of interest in the Church continued prior to World War II, with literature reflecting aspects of the Catholic faith and the growth of the Catholic community. A Carmelite convent was opened in Hafnarfjörður, while schools and hospitals run by the Church sprang up in other communities. Jóhannes Gunnarsson, the first Icelandic bishop in three centuries, was ordained in 1943. Iceland became independent of Danish rule in 1944.

Reykjavik was made a diocese in the mid-1960s, and by 2000 Iceland had four centers of Catholicism—Reykjavik, Hafnarfjörður, Stykkisholmur and Akureyri—although the majority of the country's Catholic minority made their home in Reykjavik. While the Icelandic government financially supported the Lutheran Church as the state church, freedom of religion was guaranteed in the country's constitution and continued to be protected in full. In the 1990s a church registration and tax was imposed by the government, with a portion of the proceeds distributed to the Catholic Church.

By 2000 Iceland had 12 priests, 4 parishes, 9 churches and one school, the Lankdakot School located in Reykjavik, which provided religious instruction to over 160 students. Religious instruction was also provided by Iceland's public schools, although debate had risen by 2000 over whether such instruction should be "Christian" in nature or more inclusive of a variety of religions. In June 2000 Iceland celebrated its first millennium of Christianity by hosting a representative of Pope John Paul II at ecumenical festivals around the country.

Bibliography: Sources. Diplomatarium Islandicum (Copenhagen-Reykjavik 1857–), 16 v. to 1956. F. JÓNSSON (Johannaeus), Historia ecclesiastica Islandiae, 4 v. (Copenhagen 1772–78). "Die Kirche in Island," v.2 of Ekklesia, ed. F. SIEGMUND-SCHULTZE (Leipzig 1937). Literature. B. THÓRDARSON, Iceland Past and Present (2d ed. New York 1945). H. P. BRIEM, Iceland and the Icelanders (New York 1945). J. C. F. HOOD, Icelandic Church Saga (London 1946). E. O. SVEINSSON, Age of the Sturlungs: Icelandic Civilization in the 13th Century, tr. J. S. HANNESSON (Ithaca, NY 1953). V. WASCHNITIUS, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart<sup>3</sup>, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:932–935. W. GÖBEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:799–801. G. SCHWAIGER, Die Reformation in den nordischen Ländern (Munich 1962) 86–99, 165–166, bibliog. Scandinavian Churches, ed. L. S. HUNTER, (New York 1965). Anuario Pontificio (1965) 753.

[M. P. JAKOBSSON/EDS.]

ICHTHUS

The Greek word (ΙΧΘΥΣ) for FISH was used in Christian antiquity as an acrostic formed by the initial letters of a primitive symbol of faith. When the word Savior (Σωτήρ) was added to the formula confessed by the Ethiopian eunuch whom Philip baptized (Acts 8.37), the acrostic was evident: Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτήρ, Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior. There are abundant monumental and literary witnesses to the popularity of the formula. Tertullian (De Baptismo 1) spoke of Christians as "little fishes" (pisciculi) like our "ΙΧΘΥΣ Jesus Christ." Application of the symbol to the Holy Eucharist is found in the inscriptions of ABERCIUS and PECTORIUS; Pectorius bound together his first five verses with the acrostic. Other Eucharistic associations are found in funeral inscriptions, where, in at least one case, the formula is found thus: ΙΧΘΥΣ ΖΩΝΤΩΝ (the Fish of the living). The Christian Sibylline Oracles (bk. 8) make use of the acrostic for eschatological purposes.

See Also: ACROSTIC.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie Chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 7.2:1990–2086. E. DIEZ,

Icon of Saint Anthony the Great, 17th century painting. (©Chris Hellier/CORBIS)

Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER (Stuttgart 1950–) 3:667–682. F. J. DÖLGER, IXΘΥΣ, v.1 (Münster 1910) 8–15, 87–182; v.2 (1922) 454–574. A. C. RUSH, Death and Burial in Christian Antiquity (Washington 1941) 86–87.

[M. C. HILFERTY]

ICON

Icon, from the Greek eikon meaning image, is a word now generally applied to paintings of sacred subjects or scenes from sacred histories. As established in the Byzantine Orthodox Church icons were a liturgical art, theology in visible form. By presenting the physical appearance of a holy figure the icon itself became imbued with the sanctity of its divine prototype, serving as an object of religious contemplation and as a conduit for the prayers of the faithful.

Tradition names the Evangelist Luke as the first icon painter and the Virgin and Child as the first subjects. Other icons were said to be acheiropoietoi, not made by human hand. One such icon is the Mandyllion, a cloth believed to have been imprinted with the features of Christ. The origins of Christian icons and their veneration can be traced with surety only to the sixth century—the date of the earliest surviving icons—but textual evidence documents their earlier use. Eusebius, the fourth-century bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, writes of having seen icons of Christ and his Apostles. He traces icon veneration back to “the ancients” who used icons in “their pagan customs,” reflecting knowledge of Greco-Roman practices. SS. Basil the Great (Patrologia Graeca, ed J. P. Migne [Paris 1857–66] 31:489), Gregory of Nyssa (Patrologia Graeca 46:737) and Paulinus of Nola (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 61:339) also record Christian veneration of icons in the fourth and fifth centuries.

By the seventh century icons permeated nearly every aspect of Byzantine life. Multiple icons were combined into an iconostasis, or icon-screen, which separated the sanctuary from the nave in Byzantine churches. Icons were hung on church walls for veneration by the faithful and were displayed in private homes. Monumental two-sided icons were processed through towns and villages and small icons were carried or worn by individuals. While the most familiar type of Byzantine icon is a painting executed in tempera on a wooden panel, icons were also made of mosaic tesserae (cubes), carved of marble, steatite or ivory and painted onto walls or the pages of illuminated manuscripts. Famous icons were copied on coins and lead seals or recreated in gold and jewels and worn as rings, necklaces and bracelets.

More than simply objects of religious contemplation, icons also protected believers, healed the sick, punished the wicked and ensured truthfulness. The Virgin, known in Byzantine theology as the Theotokos (Bearer of God), was the patron saint and traditional protector of Constantinople. An icon of the Theotokos was paraded on the walls of the city during periods of siege and was carried into battle at the head of the imperial army. Some icons wept, bled or worked miracles—the latter sometimes on a regular schedule, as is documented by accounts of what is called “the usual miracle,” performed every Friday night by an icon of the Theotokos in the Blachernai church in Constantinople.

The power and prevalence of icons in Byzantine society provoked a theological debate in which the ability to represent the divine and the role of art in Christian worship were central issues. From 726–843 the Byzantine Empire was shattered by ICONOCLASM (image-breaking), during which icon veneration was forbidden, icon painters were persecuted, and icons were destroyed. While there are numerous documents describing events and defining the ideologies of the iconophiles (image-lovers) and iconoclasts (image-breakers), the very nature of the contest means that little in the way of religious art survives to us from before or during the time of the destruction of images.

Icons are not portraits in the modern sense—icon-painters did not strive for realism, for example—but served as visible symbols of their divine prototypes. In this sense they are one of the more conservative forms of art: by their very definition icons must provide a readily recognizable representation of a holy person or scene. Particular costumes, emblems, and attributes were developed to indicate specific categories of holy men and women. Prophets hold scrolls, indicative of the Old Testament, while Evangelists wear antique tunics and display their codices, the more modern book-form. Soldier saints wear military costumes and some are shown on horseback while monks wear habits and healing saints display medicines and surgical instruments. Handbooks created for Byzantine icon painters list the characteristic traits of each holy figure, including facial expressions, hair (or the lack thereof) and age. John the Baptist, for example, is depicted with the tattered garments, wind-blown hair, and gaunt face appropriate for a desert-dwelling ascetic. Church Fathers, such as John Chrysostom, are shown in venerable old age wearing the robes of their office.

While icon painters were required to faithfully replicate the traditionally-accepted physical attributes of their holy subjects, icons did not remain wholly static, but reflected doctrinal, societal, and artistic changes. Before Iconoclasm, most icons were painted in encaustic, using pigments suspended in a wax medium. This resulted in a soft, unfocused line. After Iconoclasm, encaustic was replaced by tempera, which dries to a matte finish and creates a sharp, clearly-defined line, allowing artists to achieve a new level of detail. The catalog of icon subjects was also expanded to include newly-recognized saints and martyrs, and there was an increase in the production of narrative icons, particularly scenes from the life of Christ and the Theotokos. Narrative and iconic subjects were also combined to create so-called biographical icons. These feature a central large icon of one saint en- framed by a series of smaller scenes illustrating key events in the saint's life.

After Iconoclasm icons were also increasingly accompanied by inscriptions identifying the subject by name, category and/or type, further strengthening the link between the image and its prototype. These inscriptions reflect the development of different types of representations of one subject, particularly icons of Christ and the Theotokos. One famous type of Christ is the Pantokrator, or Ruler of All, which depicts Christ as a mature, bearded man in a frontal pose, raising his right hand in blessing and holding the Gospel Book in his left. The Theotokos, the most frequently depicted subject on surviving Byzantine icons, is represented by more icon types than are accorded to her son. Famous miracle-working icons of the

Our Lady of Perpetual Help, original icon preserved at Redemptorist Church of Sant' Alfonso, Rome.

Theotokos such as the Hodegetria, Eleousa, and Kykko-tissa show her in different guises and were named for the shrines in which they were held. Icons such as these became the focus of pilgrimage, and pilgrims commissioned copies that were then disseminated throughout the Empire.

As the production and veneration of icons spread from Byzantium into other Orthodox cultures, new subjects and styles were introduced and established images were given new artistic interpretations. Icons of holy bishops produced in Russia show their subjects wearing the local liturgical garments and thus differ from those produced in Constantinople. Despite such differences, each icon presented a faithful replication of its subject for the contemplation of the believer. Today, the legacy of Byzantine icons is evident in the many parts of the world where icons remain a vital and integral part of spiritual life.

Bibliography: H. BELTING, Likeness and Presence: A History of the Image before the Era of Art (Chicago 1994); The Image and its Public in the Middle Ages (New York 1990); "An Image and Its Function in the Liturgy: The Man of Sorrows in Byzantium," Dumbarton Oaks Papers 34–35 (1980–81): 1–16. M. CHATZIDAKIS, Icons of Patmos: Questions of Byzantine and Post-Byzantine Painting (Athens 1985). R. CORMACK, Writing in Gold (London 1985). G. DAGRON, "Holy Images and Likeness," Dumbarton Oaks Pa- pers 45 (1991): 23–33. H.C. EVANS and W.D. WIXOM, The Glory of Byzantium. Art and Culture of the Middle Byzantine Era, AD 845–1261 (New York 1997). A. GRABAR, L’Iconoclasm byzantin: Le dossier archéologique (Paris 1984). A. KARTSONIS, Anastasis. The Making of an Image, (Princeton 1986). E. KITZINGER, “Reflections on the Feast Cycle in Byzantine Art,” Cahiers archéologiques 36 (1988): 51–73; “The Cult of Images in the Age before Iconoclasm,” Dumbarton Oaks Papers 8 (1954): 81–150. H. MAGUIRE, The Icons of Their Bodies. Saints and Their Images in Byzantium (Princeton 1996). J. PELIKAN, Imago Dei: The Byzantine Apologia for Icons (Princeton 1990). R. OUSTERHOUT and L. BRUBAKER, The Sacred Image East and West (Chicago and Urbana, Illinois 1995). N. ŠEVČENKO, The Life of St. Nicholas in Byzantine Art (Turin 1983). A. M. TALBOT, Byzantine Defenders of Images: Eight Lives in English Translation (Washington D.C. 1998). M. VASSILAKI, ed. Mother of God. Representations of the Virgin in Byzantine Art (Milan 2000). K. WEITZMANN, The Icon, Holy Images, Sixth to Fourteenth Century (London 1978).

Leo III, Byzantine Emperor, 717–741, who condemned the veneration of images in c. 724. (Archive Photos)

[L. JONES]

ICONOCLASM

A term meaning “image breaking,” referring to extreme opposition to the representation of the human figure and the veneration of images, the two being held inseparable. Iconoclasm in its Christian context is especially associated with a period in the history of the Byzantine Empire that can be divided into three discernible phases; that of its emergence under emperors Leo (717–741) and CONSTANTINE V (741–775), and the iconoclast council of 754; its check at the second ecumenical council of Nicaea (787), and its restoration (815–842) and final extinction.

Emergence and Apogee. The exact origin of the movement is obscure. Iconoclasm was based on the First Commandment (Ex 20.4–5) and other biblical passages and iconoclasts were genuinely concerned that increasing devotion to icons would lead to idolatry. They accepted that only the Eucharist, church buildings and the sign of the cross were fully holy as they had been consecrated either by God directly or through a priest. Iconophiles referred to biblical passages that showed approval of images, and claimed that the Commandment was not intended for the Christians, but only for the Jews who were prone to idolatry. They argued that icons and relics were effective vehicles of the holy. Unease about the artistic depiction of sacred figures was present in early Christianity, and in the fourth century Eusebius, following Origen, had denied that Christ’s image could be delineated. He in turn was followed later in the fourth century by Epiphanius of Salamis, who claimed that images in churches distracted Christians from the contemplation of purely spiritual matters. However, apart from a short-lived iconoclastic movement in Armenia in the late sixth and early seventh centuries, there was no further discussion of the issue until the eighth century.

In c. 724 two bishops of Asia Minor, Constantine of Nakoleia and Thomas of Claudiopolis, supported by Emperor Leo III and some of his advisers, condemned the veneration of images, citing traditional biblical prohibitions. They were opposed by Patriarch Germanus I, but in 726 the emperor publicly supported the new movement when he ordered the figure of Christ surmounting the Chalke palace gate to be taken down. Finally, pressing Germanus in a solemn audience to sign a decree against images of the saints, he in effect forced the patriarch to resign on Jan. 7, 730. The nature and exact wording of the decree are unknown as is its application. The ensuing destruction of icons, crosses, and storied reliquaries seems to have been concentrated primarily on movable objects that lent themselves to manifestations of devotion (kissing, surrounding with votive lamps, etc.). Destruction was neither general nor equally intense in all places. Leo’s alleged hostility to the cult of the cross was a later invention; nor is there any proof that he was opposed per se to the cult of the saints or of relics. The chief opponents of Leo’s policy were the monks and members of the civil service of Constantinople. Leo’s repressive action against the opposition was limited to exile, confiscation, and at worst, mutilation. There is no certain proof of any martyrdom in this period: the passio of the Chalke martyrs is a worthless document, and the burning of the “university” library, together with its scholars, is a legend. The higher clergy submitted to the emperor, accepting the new Patriarch ANASTASIUS (730–741) while applying the imperial directives with greater or lesser zeal. Outside the capital JOHN DAMASCENE, spokesman for the patriarch of Jerusalem, wrote three defenses of sacred images, while the papacy, still politically subject to the Byzantine Empire, reacted vigorously against the imperial policy. Popes GREGORY II (715–731) and GREGORY III (731–741) wrote letters of protest, and the Roman synod of 731 expressed its opposition. Tension was further exacerbated by Leo’s decision to remove Illyricum, Sicily and Calabria from the papal jurisdiction. This schism was to drive the papacy into the hand of the Franks.

Historians are divided as to Leo’s basic motivation. At this time, there was little theological basis to support iconoclasm. Some claim the influence of Islamic culture; the emperor was aware of Islam’s opposition to the human figure in art, and even though he did not imitate his contemporary Caliph Jazid’s decree against images, he may have come under its influence. Moreover, in Asia Minor, which was then the main source of army recruits, there were many groups unfavorable to images (heretically or otherwise); the whole of Asia Minor in fact became the main enclave of iconoclasm and the army became its most fanatical agent. Others have suggested political motives, but the emperor’s opposition to MONASTICISM was a result, not a cause, of iconoclasm, and there is no foundation for the contention that he had an economic goal in mind; that is, that non-compliance would lead to confiscation of monastic and ecclesiastical property. On theological grounds, it can be noted that Leo III’s family came from a MONOPHYSITE region and that iconoclasm was seen by many as the logical, if extreme conclusion, to monophysite Christianity. However, the most likely reason was that iconoclasm, which began in the eighth century as a small movement, attracted imperial support at a time when Byzantium was suffering a series of disasters. In 726 there was a severe volcanic eruption at Thera, and territory had been lost to the Slavs, Avars and Arabs. The letters of the patriarch Germanos and the chronicles of Theophanes and Nikephorus give testimony to the hypothesis that Leo regarded these setbacks as a sign of God’s displeasure at the veneration of images; the purity of Islamic worship which did not allow the depiction of holy images had led to a spectacular success.

Leo III’s policy suffered from having no theoretical foundation in theology. To eliminate this handicap, his successor Emperor Constantine V Copronymos sought to have images condemned by the Church and to impose iconoclasm as a duty of conscience as well as the obligation of a citizen. About 752 he elaborated an original theory of images, which he developed into treatises and which he—like his father—defended in public audiences. Two years later he had it ratified in a general council of the Byzantine episcopate held in the suburban palace of Hiereia from February 10 to August 8. Though 338 council fathers attended, the protagonists were three prelates of Asia Minor, in particular the Metropolitan, Theodosius Apsimar of Ephesus (the patriarchal see being vacant). The definition of iconoclasm prepared by this council—which was proclaimed “ecumenical”—has been preserved in the Acta of the seventh council (Nicaea II). The iconoclasts denounced all pictorial representations as idols, and declared that any such representation of Christ was false because it must necessarily either separate the two natures of Christ (which had been the error of Nestorius) and thus create a fourth member of the Trinity, or circumscribe the person of the Word who has no limits (the confusion of the divinity with humanity had been the error of the monophysites). The Eucharist was the only appropriate non-anthropomorphic image of Christ. The iconophiles argued that God had been uncircumscribable, but following the Incarnation when God had revealed Himself in the flesh, it was now possible to make a pictorial representation of Christ. To deny that Christ had assumed a circumscribable form would be to deny the Incarnation, the instrument of man’s salvation. Iconoclasts rejected representations of saints for moral reasons; adoration of such images amounted to adoration of dead matter. Iconophiles countered that they adored not the materials, but the subjects represented in the images. The Council of Hiereia, however, did set strict bounds to any extension of its definitions to include a complete negation of the veneration of saints or relics. It based its definitions on Scripture and tradition and ended by anathematizing the Greek champions of images, namely, Germanos, John Damascene and George, a monk of Cyprus.

Artistically these decisions resulted in a substitution of secular decorations for biblical and hagiographic scenes and the replacement of monumental figures in apses by a cross. At first the authorities showed a certain moderation in effecting the anti-image decisions of the emperor and the council; violent repression of the opposition did not occur until a dozen years later. Then in 761 or 762 the monk ANDREW OF CRETE was executed, and in 756 persecution broke out in full force. A holy recluse, Stephen the Younger, promoted a movement hostile to the Council of Hiereia, some few miles out of Constantinople, and among his followers were many of the elite of Constantinople’s society. Patriarch Constantine II himself (754–766) was lukewarm in applying the imperial edicts, and the emperor came more and more to suspect a cabal or even a plot. On Nov. 20, 765, Stephen was killed by the populace; shortly thereafter the emperor imposed a loyalty oath to promote the hostile imperial policy. On his return from the summer campaign of 766 he humiliated all monks by a grotesque parade in the hippodrome; he attacked members of his own entourage and high officials; and finally dismissed the patriarch and had him beheaded the next year. He followed this up by seizing any monastery where he encountered resistance. Simultaneously he placed loyal generals in key command of military areas in Asia Minor, the most famous of whom, Lachanodracon, distinguished himself in the region of Ephesus by dispersing the monks, giving them their choice between marriage, on the one hand, or mutilation and exile, on the other, and by confiscating monastic property. Iconoclasm had thus evolved by force of circumstances into a war on monasticism, although they were two distinct movements. It is not clear whether monks were targeted by Constantine because they resisted his imperial policy more robustly, or whether he saw them as a drain on manpower and economic resources. Emperor Constantine's enemies attributed to him attacks on Mary's divine maternity and on the intercession of the saints, but such accusations were undoubtedly biased and must be handled with caution. According to the Life of St. Stephen the Younger, Constantine replaced the pictures in the Church of the Virgin at Blachernae with mosaics of trees, birds and animals. However, images of Christ and saints remained in the St. Sophia until 768–769 when the patriarch Nicholas I (766–780) had them removed. From this period of persecution non-iconoclasts have preserved the names of four martyred monks who are commemorated in liturgical calendars on November 20 or 28: Peter, Stephen (the best known), Andrew and Paul. Eastern patriarchs outside Constantinople were deeply stirred by Constantine's persecutions, for they condemned the Council of Hieria and advised Pope Paul I (757–767) of their condemnation; Pope Stephen III (IV) (768–772) convened a second Roman synod on the subject in 769.

Temporary Restoration of Images. The accession of Emperor Leo IV (775–780) marked a relaxation of iconoclastic policy that members of the bureaucracy had been waiting for and were able to exploit to the fullest when Empress Irene assumed the regency (780). Assisted by a high palace official, Tarasius, whom she made patriarch of Constantinople (784), she set to work forthwith preparing a reconciliation of the Eastern and Western Churches on the basis of ancient and common custom. The ecumenical Council of Nicaea II was announced and the pope sent two legates. The council convened on Aug. 1, 786, in Constantinople at the church of the Holy Apostles, but the imperial guard, in league with some bishops, dispersed the council fathers attending the first session.

Irene maneuvered skillfully to get her own men into the garrison, and the council convened a year later at Nicaea. It lasted 15 days (Sept. 24–Oct. 7, 787) and was entirely dominated by Patriarch Tarasius. As for what to do about the known iconoclasts among the council fathers, the council decided to admit the iconoclastic bishops en bloc after nine iconoclastic metropolitans and two archbishops of Asia Minor had abjured their heresy. The council decree of iconoclasm, generically and moderately phrased, defined the legitimacy, the excellence and the limitation of veneration or "relative" cult of images. Because of political circumstances the council's action was badly received by the Carolingian court in the West, and Pope ADRIAN I had to defend it in a letter to Charlemagne. There was even some dissatisfaction among Western iconophiles who opposed such a complete endorsement of the worship of icons; they believed that images should be used to educate Christians about the virtuous deeds of Christ and the saints. In Byzantium, however, the council ushered in a short period of tranquillity, which the orthodox turned to their profit: Irene showered the monks with endowments, Tarasius improved the standards of the upper clergy, THEODORE THE STUDITE began restoring monastic discipline. Thus the Eastern Church was better prepared for the second wave of iconoclasm.

Renewed Iconoclasm and Final Restoration of Images. The pressure to return to a policy of iconoclasm initially came from the army, who supported the rise of an Armenian governor of the Anatolikon thema to imperial power. Leo V the Armenian (813–820) dismissed Patriarch Nicephorus (806–815), used the Easter Synod of Hagia Sophia (815) to annul the decree of 787 and recognised the ecumenical status of the Council of Hieria. But times had changed, and this synod made no mention of idolatry in connection with the veneration of images. Further, the enemies of images distinguished between devotional images and educational images and listed real abuses in their use. But orthodox Christians had enlightened spokesmen, such as Nicephorus and Theodore the Studite, and the bishops' opposition to iconoclasm was better organized. Both camps adopted a more refined dialectical technique, although in truth the theology of images did not become more profound. Persecution this time was less cruel. Emperor Michael II (820–829) was even tolerant of individuals. His son Theophilus (829–842), however, under the influence of his teacher, the future patriarch JOHN VII GRAMMATICUS (837–843), was more violent in his disapproval of images; Euthymius of Sardis was beaten to death (831); Theodore and Theophanes of Palestine were tattooed on their faces as foreign agitators. But a year after the death of Theophilus, regents Empress THEODORA (2) and Theocistus restored images. A hastily summoned synod, inspired by MET-HODIUS, who had become patriarch (834–847), and by Hilarion, Symeon, and Joannicios, the grand survivors of 815 declared in favor of the ecumenical Council of Nicaea II. The churches under the patriarch of Constantinople still celebrate this event every year on the Feast of Orthodoxy, the first Sunday of Lent, by a triumphant procession of images and by the Synodicon of Orthodoxy. The decree of 843 was renewed by more solemn councils in 861, 867, 869, 879. Iconoclasm soon disappeared from Byzantine society though not from all individual consciences.

The policy of the iconoclastic emperors, despite the ruin and abuse it cost, make a positive contribution to the joint development of the Byzantine Church and State since it fostered an increase in the prestige of the patriarch through an awareness of dogmatic autonomy. Meanwhile, the victory of the orthodox brought with it a revival of sacred art, made icons more popular than ever, and entailed a concentration of religious feeling on the humanity of Christ. This long dispute, however, did little to advance theology or to enrich contemplative spirituality. The supporters of image worship seem indeed to have had scarcely any idea of the development of the image in the early Church, and, consequently, of the proper limits on the veneration of images.

Bibliography: Acta of the Synod of 754 and of the seventh ecumenical Council of Nicaea in J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Florence-Venice 1757–98) v.12–13. Synod of 815, ed. P.J. ALEXANDER, Dumbarton Oaks Papers 7 (1953). Writings of Germanus (Patrologia Graeca 98:77–80; 156–193), John Damascene (PG 94:1232–1420), Nicephorus (PG 100:169–850. Life of Stephen the Younger PG 100, (1069–1186). Orations of Constantine V, ed. G. OSTROGORSKY, Studien zur Geschichte des byzantinischen Bilderstreites (Amsterdam 1964). The Chronicle of Theophanes Confessor, tr. C. MANGO and R. SCOTT (Oxford 1997). Chronicle of Patriarch Nicephorus, ed. D. DE BOOR (Leipzig 1880). Nicephorus, Patriarch of Constantinople: Short History, ed. and tr. C. MANGO (Washington 1990). D.J. SAHAS ed., Icon and Logos: Sources in Eighth-century Iconoclasm: An Annotated Translation of the Sixth Session of the Seventh Ecumenical Council (Toronto 1986). M.V. ANASTOS, “Leo III’s Edict against the images in the year 726–727 and Italo- Byzantine Relations between 726 and 730,” Byzantinische Forschungen 3 (1968), 5–41. L. W. BARNARD, “Byzantium and Islam: The Interaction of Two Worlds in the Iconoclastic Era,” Byzantinoslavica 36 (1975). L. BRUBAKER and J. HALDON, Byzantium in the Iconoclast Era (c. 680–850): The Sources (Aldershot 2000). A. BRYER and J. HERRIN, eds., Iconoclasm (Birmingham 1975). P. BROWN, “A Dark-Age Crisis: Aspects of the Iconoclast Controversy,” English Historical Review 88 (1973) 1–34. R. CORMACK, Writing in Gold (London 1985). P. CRONE, “Islam, Judeo-Christianity and Byzantine Iconoclasm,” Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 2 (1980) 59–95. S. GERO, Byzantine Iconoclasm during the Reign of Leo III (Louvain 1993). A. GRABAR, L’iconoclasme byzantin: le dossier archéologique (Paris 1984). J. HERRIN, “Women and the Faith in Icons in Early Christianity,” in Culture, Ideology and Politics, ed. R. SAMUEL and G. STEDMAN JONES (London 1982) 56–83. J. HERRIN, The Formation of Christendom (Oxford 1987). G. R. D. KING, “Islam, Iconoclasm, and the Declaration of Doctrine,” Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 48 (1985). J. MOORHEAD, “Iconoclasm, the Cross and the Imperial Image,” Byzantion 55 (1985) 165–179. J. PELIKAN, Imago Dei: The Byzantine Apologia for Icons (Princeton 1990). P. SCHRINER, “Der byzantinische Bilderstreit; kritische Analyse der zeitgenössischen Meinungen und das Urteil der Nachwelt bis heute,” Settimane di Studio del Centro Italiano di Studi sull’-alto medioevo 34.1 (1988) 319–407. D. STRATOUDEAKI-WHITE, “The Patriarch Photois and the Conclusion of Iconoclasm,” Greek Orthodox Review 44 (1999) 341–355. D. STEIN, Der Beginn des byzantinischen Bilderstreites und seine Entwicklung (Munich 1980). W. TREADGOLD, The Byzantine Revival, 780–842 (Stanford, CA 1988). M. WHITTOW, The Making of Orthodox Byzantium, 600–1025 (Basingstoke 1996).

[F. NICKS/J. GOUILLARD]

ICONOLOGY AND ICONOGRAPHY

The terms iconology and iconography are derived from the Greek word for image (εἰκόν) combined with either the word for writing (γράφειν, to write, thus iconography) or with the word for reason and thought (λόγος, thus iconology). The two terms are closely connected and have often been used interchangeably. However, different meanings can be attributed to each term.

Iconography ordinarily refers to historical documentation through imagery. Portraiture is an important aspect of image documentation, and thus in archeological circles the term iconography is used to denote the study of historical portraiture, which by its nature is closely connected with numismatics. But to the art historian iconography generally refers to the description of an image or representation; the term is used either to describe an independent work of art or collectively to designate all the representations of a single subject matter.

For years the word was given the meaning more properly attributed to iconology, namely, the extended explanation of the deeper implications of the subject represented in a picture, sculpture, etc. For practical reasons, in order not to complicate matters further, some authors (e.g., J. J. M. Timmers) prefer to avoid the term iconology. At the end of the 16th century, Cesare Ripa, one of the first users of the term iconology, gave it a meaning completely different from the modern one. For Ripa iconology consisted of the description of the symbols and personifications used in emblems and allegories for the purpose of aiding artists.

Since the studies of Erwin Panofsky in 1930, iconology has come to mean the explanation of the work of art in its entire historical context as an unmistakable symptom of a specific situation in the history of culture and human ideology. The preparations for this explanation are then called pre-iconography, which is the determination of the primary, natural meaning of things; and iconography, which is the subsequent determination of their secondary conventional meaning as allegories (see the Panofsky schema below).

In 1952 Creighton Gilbert added yet another nuance to the meaning of the word iconology. According to him, iconology was not the actual investigation of the work of art but rather the result of this investigation. Hans Sedlmayr makes the distinction between sachliche and methodische iconology. Thus sachliche iconology refers to the “general meaning of an individual painting or of an artistic complex (church, palace, monument) as seen and explained with reference to the ideas which take shape in them.” Methodische iconology, on the other hand, is the “integral iconography which accounts for the changes and development in the representations.”

Each of the various definitions of iconography and iconology is only partially acceptable. And although reviewing the series of definitions clarifies the matter, in practice one cannot work simultaneously with all definitions. The discussion presented by G. H. Hoogewerff [Ikongraphie en Ikonologie . . . (Gravenhage 1950)] provides clarification:

Iconography amounts to a description of the works of art and a systematic division according to the subject matter represented. Its approach is descriptive, but when applying detailed observations it becomes analytical. It points out and determines existing differences. It is not its task to make any further distinctions. It is synoptical only insofar as it observes existing and always external connections between motifs. Iconology, on the other hand, consists of the investigation and explanation of the meaning of the representations. Its purpose is to explain as much as possible its meaning and essence. It uses pre-iconographical observation and from the results it not only tries to recognize as such the themes which are represented, but whenever feasible and in so far as possible, it tries to penetrate them. It does not decipher: it analyzes. Its method is truly synoptical and exegetical.

Hoogewerff further observes that outstanding iconographers have not limited themselves to describing and classifying images, but have in fact if not in name practiced iconology.

ICONOLOGY AND ICONOGRAPHY AS SCIENCES

It is noticeable that Hoogewerff in the explanation quoted above does not use the term “science,” but other statements in the same work reveal that he considered both iconography and iconology to be sciences. If it is agreed that science is the systematically ordered integration of a specific knowledge and of the methods according to which this knowledge can be developed, then both iconography and iconology as described by Hoogewerff can be considered sciences and hence deserve the academic chairs that they have received. Nevertheless they remain subdivisions of art history and are related in a somewhat less immediate sense to the history of civilization.

The field of art cannot reject iconography or iconology under the pretext that they are concerned—and sometimes by preference—with objects that no longer, or do not yet, belong to the realm of art, such as a simple popular design or an artistically inferior but clearly legible copy. The latter are not goals in themselves, but merely instruments in reaching, not only precise accreditation, dating, localization, and stylistic classification, but especially a deep insight into the meaning and objective of true art works. Thus, they answer the common questions: why did the artist do this, what is he telling us consciously or unconsciously, to what does he want to move us, either consciously or unconsciously? These are questions that even the most abstract work of art cannot avoid. When iconography and iconology at times attempt to reply to these questions by means that lie outside the realm proper to art, then, mutatis mutandis, they act no differently than the science that examines the chemical formula of a specific paint, not as a phenomenon that has something to do with the essence of art, but simply in order to understand better and to enjoy the work of art in its totality.

Naturally, iconology and iconography demand a strict discipline of thought. This particularly applies to iconology, in which imagination and intuition play a role. If these are not constantly tested against the factual data, then it is only too easy to lose oneself in unscientific fantasy. Erwin Panofsky stressed this in both theory and practice.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

Iconography and iconology are relatively young sciences. The beginning of iconography can be traced to 16th-century works such as those of Achilles Statius [Inlustrium virorum ut extant in Urbe expressi vultus (Rome 1569)] from Portugal and Fulvius Ursinus [Imagines et elogia virorum inlustrium et eruditorum. . . (Rome 1570)] from Italy. Both were archeologists with particular interest in portraiture. Their work was followed by the Iconographia (1669) of G. A. Canini.

Preoccupation with this particular form of iconography was not widespread until the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Germany produced a number of scholars: J. J. Bernoulli [Römische Ikonographie (Stuttgart 1882–94)] and Griechische Ikonographie (Munich 1901)], P. Arndt [Griechische und Römische Porträts (Munich 1891)], and A. Hekler [Die Bildnisskunst der Griechen und Römer (Stuttgart 1912)]. Meanwhile, the kindred science of numismatics was pursued in France by H. Cohen (1808–80) and E. Babelon (1854–1924). In England from 1923 on, H. Mattingly, E. A. Sydenham, and C. H. V. Sutherland published standard works on these matters. Although their studies were oriented toward archeology, they made an important contribution to the development of iconography as an integral part of art history. Accordingly, a work of art was viewed not only from the standpoint of aesthetics, but also from that of history and of the work's didactic intent. This concurred with the then existing desire for a reclassification of collected material on the basis of concrete and objective characterizations.

Because of the lack of sufficient graphic material and photographic documentation, minute descriptions of the art works were required. At the same time, in connection with archeological research, attention was paid to the classification of works on the basis of subject matter. The first to use this iconographical method was Ph. de Caylus [Recueil d'antiquités . . . (Paris 1761–67)]. Johann J. Winckelmann [Geschichte der Kunst des Altertums (Dresden 1764)] strongly opposed him by stating that the artistic elements and style of a work of art are more important than its antiquarian and hermeneutic character. In spite of this E. Q. Visconti [Iconographie ancienne (Paris 1811–29)] and F. de Clarac [Musée de sculpture antique et moderne (Paris 1850–53)] continued to use the method of classification by subject. Scientific contributions were made by specialists in the restoring of objects (e.g., B. Cavaceppi, 1786). Iconographical investigations were linked also with the comparative philological investigations of relevant texts. In this respect J. Overbeck [Galerie heroischer Bildwerke der alten Kunst (Brunswick 1853); Griechische Kunstmythologie (Leipzig 1871–89)], H. von Brunn [Geschichte der griechischen Künstler (1883–)], A. Furtwängler [Die antiken Gemmen (Berlin 1900)], and A. della Seta [Il nudo nell'arte (Rome 1930)] aided the advancement of iconography.

The Stimulus of Christian Art. Early Christian art lent itself to archeological iconography, since objects found did not have their own stylistic character but in primitive manner imitated the forms of their environment. Their specific value was derived from their content, which was related to religious beliefs and meanings. It is natural when investigating the content of Christian art to seek explanatory texts not only in the Bible and the Fathers, which are so important for early Christian art, but also in other valuable sources such as the medieval works of WALAFRID STRABO and Berchorius (Reportorium morale), liturgical writings such as the Rationale by Durandus, compilations of saints' lives such as Legenda aurea by JAMES OF VORAGINE, and the Speculum of VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS.

Although religious art activity in the East was often controlled by canones, that of the West revealed a freedom and a progressive development.

Johannes Molanus (Jan Vermeulen) was one of the first Christian iconographers. His De picturis et imaginibus sacris (Louvain 1570) was written with the intention of prescribing to artists how they might correctly (in the spirit of the Counter Reformation) represent Biblical, hagiographical, liturgical, and other religious subjects. In this field he fulfilled the role that Cesare Ripa would later play in the field of secular art. According to present-day thinking, Molanus is somewhat rationalistic and does not leave much room for feeling or fantasy. This lack is understandable when judged against the background of the confusion of Christian iconography of the Middle Ages and the period of Mannerism. The same spirit is evident in the 1679 reformatory treatise of P. Rohr, Pictor errans.

The rediscovery of the catacombs was an important event in the development of Christian iconography. In 1578 the Spanish historian Alphonso Ciacconio (Chacón) chanced upon the Coemiterium Jordanorum on the Via Salaria. This stimulated Philips van Winghe from Louvain and Hendrik de Raeff from Delft to further research in the same century. However, systematic research was not started until 1593 by Antonio Bosio whose work Roma subterranea was published posthumously in Rome in 1632.

The Legenda aurea lost its supremacy when systematic work in hagiography was initiated by a group of Jesuits from the southern Netherlands, the so-called BOLLANDISTS; their work was realized in the continuing Acta Sanctorum (1643–).

French Studies. There was little advance during the period of the Enlightenment, but the beginning of the 19th century saw renewed interest in early Christian art. In France, under the influence of the Catholic "revival" of Chateaubriand and others, interest in early Christianity was initially apologetical and religious rather than directed to art history. Yet important works in iconography were published in time by J. Seroux d'Agincourt [Histoire de l'art par les monuments . . . (Paris 1810–33)] and A. N. Didron [Iconographie chrétienne (Paris 1843)]. The latter attained special fame by the publication in 1845 of the so-called "Painter's Book of Mount Athos," an 18th-century MS that leaned, however, on early Christian iconographical traditions. Then followed iconographic studies by C. Cahier and A. Martin, C. Rohault de Fleury [Archéologie chrétienne: Les saints. . . (Paris 1890–1900)], X. Barbier de Montault, E. Le Blant, and L. Bréhier. Next came the Byzantinists G. Millet, C. Diehl, and André Grabar. The Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie by the Benedictines F. Cabrol and H. Leclercq, which appeared between 1907 and 1953 in 15 parts (30 volumes), constitutes the most valuable single source of iconographical data. With some reservation about incomplete documentation, the reference works of L. Réau are also an invaluable source. Emile Mâle has produced expert studies of iconography of religious art after the 12th century in France. His works [L'art religieux du XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle en France (Paris 1898); L'art religieux après le concile de Trente (Paris 1932)] are still being reprinted. Canon V. Leroquais produced outstanding studies (1940–41) on the illuminated liturgical MSS, and P. Thoby has studied the development of the crucifix (1959).

Germanic and Central European Scholarship. The interaction between the religious thoughts expressed in the literary and plastic arts was indicated by A. Springer [Ikongraphische Studien (Vienna 1860)] and F. Piper [Mythologie und Symbolik der christlichen Kunst (Weimar 1847–51)]. Important work was done also by F. F. Leitschuh and J. J. Tikkanen. The latter was a Finn who published in German and is known, among other things, for his intensive studies on Eastern and Western Psalters, particularly the Psalter of Utrecht (1900). Several decades later K. Künstle [Ikongraphie der christlichen Kunst (Freiburg 1926–28)] and the Jesuits S. Beissel and J. Braun, hagiographer-liturgist, began to attract notice.

The works of F. X. Kraus, H. Detzel, and R. Garrucci [Storia dell'arte cristiana (Prato 1872–81)] can be viewed as an introduction to the publications of Joseph Wilpert [Die Malereien der Katakomben Roms (Freiburg 1903); Die Römischen Mosaiken und Malereien. . . (Freiburg 1916); I sarcofagi cristiani antichi (Rome 1929–36)], who at the same time continued to build on the extensive research performed by Giovanni B. de Rossi in the Roman catacombs and elsewhere [La Roma sotterranea cristiana. . . (Rome 1864–77); Mosaici cristiani e saggi dei pavimenti della chiesa di Roma anteriori al secolo XV (Rome 1872–96)]. Victor Schultze turned in revolt against the religious and apologetical tendencies of this group, and Josef Strzygowski opposed their one-sided orientation in a study pointedly entitled Orient oder Rom (1901). However, in the long run his Oriental theories can be considered to be just as one-sided. Nearly the same point of view was adopted by Oscar Wulff, N. Kondakov from Russia, and L. H. Grondijs, professor of art history at the University of Utrecht.

Rafael Ligtenberg, OFM, who laid the foundation of iconographical-iconological studies in the Netherlands, was followed by Grondijs and G. J. Hoogewerff. Research was undertaken at the Catholic University of Nijmegen by J. J. M. Timmers [Symboliek en iconografie der christelijke kunst (Roermond-Maaseik 1947)], J. B. Knipping [De iconografie van de contrareformatie in de Nederlanden (Hilversum 1939–40)], and above all F. van der Meer.

American and English Work. There was much activity also in the English-speaking countries, by E. Baldwin Smith [Early Christian Iconography. . . (Princeton 1918)] and the excellent medievalist F. Wormwald. In 1947 Charles Rufus Morey founded the Department of Art and Archeology at Princeton University, Princeton, N.J.

He was instrumental in founding the Index of Christian Art, which initially contained entries only of early Christian art but now goes to 1400. Copies of this reference work (under continuing compilation) can be found in the Dumbarton Oaks Research Library and Collection in Washington, D.C., in the Pontificio Istituto di Archeologia Christiana in Rome, and since 1963 in the Rijksuniversiteit in Utrecht. Princeton has beautiful facsimile editions in this field, edited by E. T. DeWald, K. Weitzman, M. Avery, and others. O. M. Dalton and D. Talbot Rice are specialists of Byzantine art; Byzantine art scholarship is represented in the work also of Greek scholars such as F. Sotiriou and M. Chatzidakis.

Secular Iconography. Secular art, as well as Christian, attracted diligent iconographers. In France P. L. Duchartre, R. Saulnier, and P. Saintyves described imagery in popular art, which, in addition to devotional pilgrimage souvenirs, includes objects of everyday life, e.g., housewares, kitchen utensils, clothing.

In the Germanic and Scandinavian countries an interest developed in the original Germanic style and decoration motifs. It was expressed by F. Adama van Scheltema (1924), W. A. von Jenny (1933), and also Josef Strzygowski. Particular contributions to the iconography of secular art qua talis were made by R. van Marle [Iconographie de l'art profane. . . (The Hague 1931–32)] and Guy de Tervarent [Attributs et symboles dans l'art profane, 1450–1600 (Geneva 1958–59)].

It was only natural that in this age of evolving cosmopolitanism, interest would extend beyond Europe. The art of India with its characteristic form and religious content was iconographically examined in the 19th century by J. Fergusson, J. Burgess, and Alfred Foucher [Étude sur l'iconographie bouddhique de l'Inde (Paris 1900–05)]. Studies in the 20th century were published by E. A. G. Rao, A. K. Coomaraswamy, J. N. Banerjea, and H. Zimmer. O. Sirèn and E. Chavannes delved into the Buddhist art of China, while George Coedès, W. F. Stutterheim, R. von Heine-Geldern, and P. Mus pursued that of Indo-China and Indonesia. Giuseppe Tucci, Antoinette Gordon [The Iconography of Tibetan Lamaism (New York 1939)], and others examined iconographical phenomena in Central Asia. The art of Japan was treated by indigenous scholars, especially Anesaki and Ōmura Seigai. Ancient Judaic symbolism was extensively described by E. R. Goodenough [Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, 11 v. (New York 1953–64)].

MODERN ICONOLOGY

As has already been explained, iconographical development was consistently and necessarily under the influence of what today would be called iconological research. To some extent this applies to each branch of art history, but most of all to the study of early Christian and Indian art works, which were closely linked with religious, social, and historical ideologies. However, not until the early 20th century, was iconology considered to be a discipline distinct from iconography. Until then the term iconography had been used as a label for both disciplines. The term iconology had quite a different meaning from that understood today when it was first used in 16th- and 17th-century handbooks on symbols, allegories, personifications, emblems, etc., as for instance, the handbooks of A. Alciati (1548), J. P. Valeriano (1556), and P. Picinelli (1695). Its initial designation has been discussed above in reference to the most famous of these handbooks, namely the Iconologia (Rome 1593) by Cesare Ripa. The same meaning as Ripa's can be found in J. Lacombe's Dictionnaire iconologique (Paris 1756), namely the description, for the convenience of artists, of symbols and personifications used in emblems and allegories.

Schools of Thought. Hippolyte Taine, in the mid-19th century, studied the relationships between art objects and the race and social class of their creators and the historical circumstances of their inception. Subsequently, E. Müntz [L'Histoire de l'art pendant la Renaissance (Paris 1889–95)] and others viewed iconographical matter more explicitly against the background of social, technical, and stylistic conventions.

In comparing the various schools of iconographical and iconological thought, one finds them classifiable according to the element of art that they considered primary. The positive-visual school emphasized stylistic qualities and reduced iconography to the realm of a secondary or auxiliary science. This was the viewpoint of L. Venturi [Storia della critica dell'arte (Rome 1945)]. Max Dvořák qualified that idea and formulated a doctrine that was acceptable to many scholars. Although he himself was a disciple of the classical visual school of A. Riegl, he saw a connection between the artistic composition and the religious and philosophical content of a work of art. He predicted a shift to a method of iconographical interpretation that would be very searching. Similar statements were made by H. Tietze and P. Toesca.

The development of psychoanalysis at the beginning of the 20th century corroborated and directed the method of interpretation. It forced the analysis of art works to the deepest, even unconscious sources of their origin and the meanings connected therewith. S. Freud applied his system to iconographical interpretation and thereby made it available to the field that has come to be known as iconology. Pioneers of the modern science of iconology are Aby Warburg (Nachleben der Antiken), Fritz Saxl, and Erwin Panofsky.

Erwin Panofsky. Aby Warburg used the term iconology in its new meaning as early as 1907, as has been proven by recent research by W. S. Heckscher. Hoogewerff formulated his definition of this concept in 1928. He was followed by Panofsky, who in 1930 in his introduction to Hercules am Scheidewege set forth some basic principles of the new method. He further developed this in 1932 in the philosophical journal Logos. But it was especially in the introduction to his now famous Studies in Iconology (New York 1939) that he revealed himself the great theorist in this field. According to Panofsky, iconology is a method of interpretation that arises from synthesis rather than from analysis. For him, just as the correct identification of motifs is the prerequisite of correct iconographical analysis, so the correct analysis of images, stories, and allegories is the prerequisite of correct iconographical interpretation, unless it is a question of works of art from which the whole sphere of secondary or conventional subject matter is eliminated, as is the case in certain landscape, still life, and genre paintings, as well as in nonobjective art. The interpreter must possess practical experience (familiarity with objects and events) and he must have a knowledge of the history of styles (insight into the manner in which, under changing historical conditions, objects and events are expressed by forms). For further iconographical analysis he must have knowledge of literary sources and be familiar with the history of types and iconographical themes. Finally, for iconological interpretation, he will need to have the so-called "synthetic intuition" (familiarity with the basic drives of the human mind as well as deep understanding of the manner in which, under varying historical conditions, these basic drives are expressed by specific themes and concepts). This approach by Panofsky can be best understood through the outline he published originally in Studies in Iconology.

The objections that can be made against these theories, at least in their most extreme forms, have already been mentioned. The greatest difficulties lie in the art after the Renaissance. The medieval artist thought in symbols that in general were easily understood. But after the beginning of the 15th century, naturalistic realism, of which the new emphasis on perspective is an example, became dominant in art. At first, however, this realism was still in the service of a thousand years of Christian tradition. The result was a veiled symbolism in which it is often very difficult, if not impossible, to decide where the symbol begins and reality ends. This explains why Panofsky tempered his statements on works of the period.

The spreading of his ideas to England and to America resulted to a great extent from the transfer in 1933 of Kulturwissenschaftliche Bibliothek Warburg from Hamburg to London, where it is presently kept in the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes, as well as from the departure to the New World of several German iconologists, among whom were Aby Warburg and Panofsky himself. The Netherlands also felt the effects of his widening influence. In 1955 Utrecht instituted a chair of iconology and W. S. Heckscher placed an Index Iconologicus alongside the copy of the Princeton Index of Christian Art. H. van de Waal, an art historian from Leiden, applied iconological interpretation to the paintings of the Dutch school of the 16th and 17th centuries, which are usually considered to be purely realistic.

Finally, the iconological interpretation of architecture was pursued by E. Panofsky, E. Baldwin Smith, R. Wittkower, R. Krautheimer, H. Sedlmayr, and others. In 1956 A. Pigler analyzed baroque motifs, and the Zentral Institut für Kunstgeschichte in Munich construed an index of baroque ceiling decorations that are characterized by complicated types of iconographical programs.

For specific iconographic themes, see GOD THE FATHER, ICONOGRAPHY OF; TRINITY, HOLY, ICONOGRAPHY OF; HOLY SPIRIT, ICONOGRAPHY OF; JESUS CHRIST, ICONOGRAPHY OF; MARY BLESSED VIRGIN, ICONOGRAPHY OF; SAINTS, ICONOGRAPHY OF; EVANGELISTS, ICONOGRAPHY OF; SACRAMENTS, ICONOGRAPHY OF; ICON; etc. For problems related to the use of image in Christianity see IMAGES, VENERATION OF; ICONOCLASM.

Bibliography: M. DVOŘÁK, Kunstgeschichte als Geistesgeschichte (Munich 1924), posthumous. K. KÜNSTLE, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst, 2 v. (Freiburg 1926–28). A. WARBURG, Gesammelte Schriften (Leipzig-Berlin 1932). R. VAN MARLE, Iconographie de l'art profane au moyen-âge et à la Renaissance, 2 v. (The Hague 1931–32). F. SAXL, Classical Mythology in Mediaeval Art (Metropolitan Museum Studies 4; New York 1933) 228–280. E. PANOFSKY, Studies in Iconology (New York 1939). J. B. KNIPPING, De iconographie van de Contrareformatie in de Nederlanden, 2 v. (Hilversum 1939–40). J. J. M. TIMMERS, Symboliek en iconographie der Christelijke kunst (Maaseik 1947). G. J. HOOGEWERFF, Ikonographie en Ikonologie van de oude christelijke kunst (The Hague 1950). D. T. RICE, Byzantine Art (Baltimore 1962). L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59). W. S. HECKSCHER and K. A. WIRTH, "Emblem, Emblembuch," Reallikon zur deutschen Kunstgeschichte, ed. O. SCHMITT v.5 (Stuttgart 1959) 85–228. J. BIALOSTOCKI, Encyclopedia of World Art (New York 1959–) 7:769–785.

[J. H. A. ENGELBREGT]

IDA, BB.

Three CISTERCIAN nuns of this name in the 13th century.

Ida of Leeuw; b. Leeuw (Léau), Belgium; d. c. 1260. Sometime after 1216 she entered the convent of La Ramée in Brabant, where she became known for the mystical graces she received and for her love of learning. Her cult spread through Belgium in the 16th and 17th centuries.

Feast: Oct. 30.

Ida of Louvain; b. Louvain, Belgium, early 13th century; d. c. 1300. She entered the Abbey of Roosendaal near Malines. Her biography attributed to a certain Hugh, her confessor, is of doubtful historical value but recounts that she received extraordinary mystical graces and was marked with the stigmata. Her relics were venerated in the church of the monastery until the advent of CALVINISM. CLEMENT XI established her feast for the Cistercians and BENEDICTINES in 1719.

Feast: April 13.

Ida of Nivelles; b. Nivelles, Belgium, c. 1190; d. Brabant, Belgium, Dec. 11, 1231. She entered Kerkhem Abbey near Louvain at the age of 16 and moved with her community to La Ramée in 1215. She meditated with special predilection upon the Passion of Christ and had particular devotion to the Blessed Sacrament. She had an apostolic outlook, offering her sufferings for harassed priests and religious. She was reputed to enjoy mystical favors, and she used her supernatural gifts to help others. Shortly before her 33d birthday she died after a long and harrowing illness. Her cult is one of long standing at the convent of La Ramée.

Feast: Dec. 12.

Bibliography: Ida of Leeuw, Bl., and Ida of Louvain, Bl. Acta sanctorum April 2:156–189, Oct. 13:100–124. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum 2:49–51; 3:235–236. K. SPAHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 25:600. M. B. BRARD, Catholicisme 5:1172–73. Bibliographica hagiographica latina 4144–45. Ida of Nivelles, Bl. Vita, ed. C. HENRIQUEZ, Quinque prudentes virgines (Antwerp 1630) 199–297. Bibliographica hagiographica latina 4146–47. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum 3:421–422. M. B. BRARD, Catholicisme 5:1173. S. ROISIN, L'Hagiographie cistercienne dans le diocèse de Liège au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Louvain 1947) 54–59.

[F. M. BEACH/C. SPAHR]

IDA OF BOULOGNE, BL.

Noblewoman; b. Bouillon, Belgium, c. 1040; d. April 13, 1113. Ida, daughter of Duke Godfrey II, of Lower Lorraine, and niece of Pope STEPHEN IX, married Eustace II, count of Boulogne, c. 1057. She was the mother of GODFREY OF BOUILLON and King BALDWIN OF JERUSALEM. A correspondent of ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, Ida practiced the highest Christian virtues. She built the church of Notre Dame of Boulogne, founded several monasteries, and was especially generous to SAINT-BERTIN and AFFLIGEM. She ceded her domains in Brabant to the convent of Nivelles. She was buried at the Abbey of SAINT-VAAST, where shortly after her death a monk of the abbey wrote her life. Her relics were brought to Paris in 1669 and transferred to Bayeux during the reign of Napoleon I, a small relic being given to Arras.

Feast: April 13 (Dioceses of Arras and Bayeux).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 2:139–150. La Vie de la bienheureuse Ide, tr. D. HAIGNERÉ (Boulogne 1852). A. LEROY, Biographie nationale de Belgique, 28 v. (Brussels 1866–1944) 10: 3–4. F. DUCATEL, Vie de sainte Ide (Brussels 1900). G. MARSOT, Catholicisme 5:1171–72. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:85.

[É. BROUETTE]

IDA OF HERZFELD, ST.

Widow; d. Herzfeld, Sept. 4, 825, or possibly 813. Ida was the sister of Abbot ADALARD and of WALA. A descendant of Charles Martel and a member of the court of CHARLEMAGNE, she married Egbert, a Saxon duke, and was the mother of Bl. WARIN. As a widow she lived at Herzfeld, where she was distinguished for piety, penance, and charity, exercised especially at the church founded by Egbert and herself in Herzfeld (Diocese of Münster). Bishop Dodo (980) exhumed her remains. There are pilgrimages to her tomb, where she is invoked especially by expectant mothers. A monk of WERDEN, named Uffing, wrote her vita.

Feast: Sept. 4, Nov. 26.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 2:255–270. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 2:569–576. I. HELLINGHAUS, Die hl. Ida von Herzfeld (Kaldenkirchen 1925). Heilige Ida von Herzfeld: Festschrift zur tausendjährigen Wiederkehr ihrer Heiligsprechung, ed. G. JÁSZAI (Munster 1980). G. MARSOT, Catholicisme 5:1172.

[G. J. DONNELLY]

IDA OF TOGGENBURG, BL.

Died between 1138 and 1410. Nothing is known of her except that she has been honored since before 1410 at the church of Fischingen, near Lake Constance in Switzerland. A biography of St. Ida dating from the late 15th century is a fictitious account based on an old legend. She was probably a recluse (see ANCHORITES) who lived near the Benedictine convent at Fischingen. Her cultus was confirmed in 1724.

Feast: Nov. 3.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2.1:102–125. L. KERN, Die Ida von Toggenburg-Legende (Frauenfeld 1928). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 11:100–101. H. DELEHAYE, Nova et vetera 4 (1929) 359–365; Subsidia hagiographica 21 (1934) 38–40. I. LÜTHOLD-MINDER, Heilige Idda von Toggenburg: Beschützerin der Armen, Kranken und Sterbenden (Einsiedeln 1976). W. BÖHNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:600.

[J. C. MOORE]

IDAHO, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The first Catholic influence within the territory of the present-day Diocese of Boise, which comprises the entire state of Idaho, came with French-Canadian fur trappers during the mid-18th and early 19th centuries. In the early 1800s, a band of Iroquois migrated from eastern Canada to Idaho, bringing with them the rudiments of the Catholic religion; they often spoke of the necessity of having “Black Robes” to teach them the way to Heaven. In spite of four journeys made by members of the Flathead and Nez Perce tribes to St. Louis, Missouri, to plead for a priest, none came until February 1840. At that time a Belgian Jesuit, Pierre Jean DE SMET, was appointed superior of the Rocky Mountains Mission. He celebrated the first Mass in Idaho on July 22, 1840, at Henrys Lake, near the western end of what is today Yellowstone Park.

The first Catholic Church in Idaho was built in 1843 by Father Nicholas Point, S.J., on the St. Joe River, near the present Idaho town of St. Maries. Though it was originally called Sacred Heart, it is popularly known as the Cataldo Mission, named after a much-loved Jesuit missionary, Father Joseph Cataldo. The church was opened for services in 1853 and is the oldest building still standing in Idaho. These early missionaries had some success in making converts among the various tribes of Native Americans. Nevertheless, after the discovery of gold in the Boise Basin caused an influx of prospectors and miners into the southern part of the state, the Catholic population became predominantly Irish, many of whom moved to Idaho from the exhausted gold mines of California.

On March 5, 1863, President Abraham Lincoln signed legislation creating the Territory of Idaho. Five years later, on March 3, 1868, Pope Pius IX declared

Roman Catholic Mission: before the mission's dedication in 1874, it was called the Slickpoo Mission, Near Culdesac, Idaho.
(©Michael Lewis/CORBIS)

Idaho a vicariate apostolic, a jurisdiction that also included some parts of what are now Montana and Wyoming. The first vicar apostolic was Louis Aloysius Lootens, a Belgian and a priest of the Archdiocese of San Francisco. At the time, Catholics numbered a little over seven percent, or 1,500, of the state's population of about 20,000, many of whom left in the early 1870s with the end of the gold rush. Bishop Lootens resigned in 1875, and returned to Oregon, where he had previously served as a missionary. He died on Jan. 12, 1898. The vicariate was then placed under the administration of the archbishops of Oregon City (now Portland). A new vicar apostolic for Idaho, Alphonse Joseph Glorieux, also a Belgian, was not appointed until Oct. 7, 1884. On his arrival, he found that the entire vicariate consisted of only two secular priests, four Jesuits, eight nuns, and a widely scattered Catholic population of about 3,500 people.

By the time Glorieux was consecrated bishop in Baltimore in 1885, the territory of the vicariate had been restructured by the Holy See to its present boundaries. He made Boise City his see city and established the parish church of St. John the Evangelist as his cathedral. In 1893, when the Catholic population had doubled to 7,000, Boise City was established as a diocese and Bishop Glorieux was appointed its first ordinary. The passage of the Homestead Act (1862) and similar laws, as well as the building of the transcontinental railroad, opened up vast tracts of former Native American lands to settlement. Many of these settlers were German Catholics from the Midwest, eager for religious training for their large farm families. Now with sufficient population, Idaho became the 43rd state to enter the Union, on July 3, 1890.

Bishop Glorieux's successor, Iowan Daniel Mary Gorman (1918–1927), presided over a time of rapid growth in the diocese. By the end of his nine-year tenure, the cathedral had been completed to its present size (1921), there were 32 more diocesan priests, and twice as many students in the parochial schools. The growth continued under the long episcopate of Bishop Edward J. Kelly (1928–1956), resulting in the building of 41 churches, and the construction or purchase of 26 rectories, 4 convents, and 10 additional schools. Those schools were staffed almost entirely by Benedictine Sisters, who established their motherhouse near Cottonwood in 1907. They staffed their first school at Genesee in 1896 and grew in numbers and influence until 1968, when they were teaching in 15 elementary schools. Membership in the order peaked in 1967, when they counted 183 Sisters. At the urging of Popes Pius XII and John XXIII, and after a year of intense preparation, Sisters from St. Gertrude's joined other Benedictines in 1963 in an educational mission venture at San Carlos, Bogotá, Colombia. They later worked at Colegio Santa María and at Colegio San Benito, where they also opened a dependent priory in order to foster local vocations. The final member of the order serving in Colombia returned to the States in 1989. During the mission period several priests of the diocese also served in Colombia.

One of the many outstanding members of the community was Sister M. Alfreda Elsensohn, O.S.B. (1897–1989), a noted natural scientist, historian, and writer. She published Pioneer Days in Idaho County (v. 1, 1947; v. 2, 1951), Idaho Chinese Lore (1970), and Idaho County's Most Romantic Character: Polly Bemis (1980). During her teaching career she cataloged the flora of the prairie and began a collection of natural science specimens and artifacts that is preserved at the Historical Museum at St. Gertrude's. She received the Governor's Award, a special recognition in the arts and humanities from then-Governor Don Samuelson, and membership in the American Association of Museums, the Idaho Writers League, the Idaho Academy of Science, the Northwest

Scientific Association, and the American Benedictine Academy.

During Kelly's episcopacy, hospitals and other buildings were erected or enlarged throughout the diocese, including a chancery office building in Boise. At the death of Kelly, who was the first native of the Pacific Northwest to be appointed a bishop, James J. Byrne, the auxiliary bishop of St. Paul, Minnesota, was named the ordinary (1956–62). In 1958 Bishop Byrne established a diocesan newspaper, the Idaho Register, which became the largest weekly in the state, with a circulation of 16,000. During his short administration the Catholic population increased to over 44,000.

The fifth bishop, Sylvester Treinen (1962–88), had been a priest of the Diocese of Bismarck, North Dakota. He attended three sessions of Vatican Council II and returned to Idaho, endeavoring to implement the decrees of the council there. Initiatives under his leadership included the establishment of a new Catholic Education Office, the Idaho Catholic Liturgical Commission, the Search Program for youth retreats, the Catholic Communication Center, and Catholic student centers at each of Idaho's three state universities. In 1978 the diocese acquired 15 acres near the western boundary of Boise for Nazareth Retreat Center, a place for spiritual growth and renewal. Bishop Treinen served as ordinary for 34 years, the longest episcopacy in the history of the diocese.

The sixth bishop of Boise, Tod David Brown, a Californian, was ordained and installed in 1989, remaining in the state until he was appointed the third bishop of Orange, California, in 1998. Bishop Brown presided over sweeping administrative and financial changes in the Diocese of Boise. His successor in 1999, the seventh bishop, was Michael P. Driscoll, also of California. His early efforts focused on a local response to "Our Hearts Were Burning within Us," a document from the U. S. Catholic Bishops calling for adult education, and on the formation of Catholic Charities in the diocese.

Religious Communities. Since its organization into a vicariate apostolic, several congregations of women and men religious have come to Idaho and have served its people in important ways, initially concentrating in education and health care ministries. The Holy Cross Sisters were the first to arrive, opening a school in Idaho City in 1868. Franciscan Sisters conducted St. Aloysius Academy in Lewiston from 1884 to 1887. They were followed by the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet (1903), Immaculate Heart of Mary Sisters (1903), Benedictine Sisters (1904), Ursulines (1908), and the Sisters of Mercy (1916). In addition to the Jesuits, Salvatorian, Redemptorist, Marist, and Oblate of Mary Immaculate priests have served in Idaho over the years. Monks occupied St.

Priest and Native American woman, dancing outside Cataldo Mission, Idaho. (©Dean Conger/CORBIS)

Michael's Benedictine Monastery at Cottonwood from 1904 to 1924.

Thirteen different religious communities of women were represented at the beginning of the third millennium, working in a variety of ministries: education, migrant services, hospital chaplaincies, retreat work, parish work, and others. Only the Benedictine Monastery of St. Gertrude, with its 58 members, had a numerically large presence. They continued the Benedictine mission to transform the world through prayer, community, and service, and are especially active in retreat work.

Other groups represented at the end of the twentieth century were the Congregation of Sisters of the Holy Cross (5); Dominican Sisters of Edmonds, Washington (1); Dominican Sisters of Sinsinawa, Wisconsin (1); Franciscan Sisters of Perpetual Adoration (2); Franciscan Sisters of the Eucharist (7); Marymount Hermitage (2); Sisters of Providence (1); Sisters of St. Francis of Assisi (1); Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet (3); Sisters of the Holy Name (2); the Society of Sisters for the Church (1); and the Ursulines (5). At the same time, there were only 14 men religious, most of whom were members of the Benedictine Monastery of the Ascension in Jerome, founded in 1968.

Catholic Education. In 2000 the Church in Idaho was maintaining 13 Catholic grade schools, located in Coeur d'Alene, Grangeville, Lewiston, Moscow, Idaho Falls, Rupert, Twin Falls, Nampa, Pocatello, and Boise (4). They had a total enrollment of 2,478 students, and were staffed primarily by Catholic laywomen, and not by Sisters, as in previous years. The diocese operated a single Catholic high school, Bishop Kelly, in Boise, with an enrollment of 672. There were no Catholic colleges, but seven Catholic student centers were in operation for the benefit of college and university students throughout the state. Moreover, Catholic education was extended to over 7,000 grade school children, more than 3,000 high school students, and some 3,000 adults. The Rite of Christian Initiation for Adults had been firmly established throughout the diocese, and was the principal vehicle for the formation of new Catholics.

In 1996 the permanent diaconate program was begun. The first class of 17 candidates was ordained in 2001, and a new class was scheduled to begin later in the year. LIMEX, an extension program offering a master's degree in theology from Loyola University in New Orleans, and After-Renew programs were in operation at parish and deanery levels. Parish efforts at adult education were extensive, though local offerings were sometimes uneven. The diocese continued its leadership role in trying to overcome these types of inequities, especially through the use of the Instrument of Growth Survey.

The KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS, CATHOLIC DAUGHTERS OF AMERICA, and the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CATHOLIC WOMEN were the most prominent among the lay Catholic organizations in existence. These organizations performed many works of service in the diocese while building community with Catholics in other states and nations. Membership in many of these organizations declined in the 1990s in light of the changing nature of ministry in parishes and the nearly universal entry of women into the workplace.

Catholic Charities of Idaho, seeking to develop social services throughout the Diocese of Boise, was incorporated in 2000. Services have included individual, marriage, and family counseling; outreach and development assistance to the Hispanic population of Idaho; family and youth support services; advocacy for social justice; and consultation services in order to assist Catholic parishes to develop parish-based social ministries programs.

In the 2000 census, the population of Idaho was approximately 1,350,000, and the Catholic population had risen to somewhere between 10 and 11 percent, making it the state's second-largest religious group after the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, or Mormons.

Among Catholics, slightly fewer than 70 percent were Caucasian. Hispanics, a growing population, came to constitute the next-largest ethnic group in the state, particularly in south, where migrant laborers came to work in the irrigated agricultural industry and have remained. Hispanics comprised about 7 percent of the general population of the state and about 50 percent identified themselves as Catholics. Spanish Masses were being offered wherever the size of the Spanish-speaking population indicated they were needed. Other ethnic groups included the Basques, who emigrated early in the twentieth century mainly to work in the sheep industry, Native Americans, Southeast Asians, and a small number of African Americans.

The diocese, divided into six deaneries, includes 55 parishes, 32 chapels, and 24 stations, served by approximately 80 priests and 29 deacons. Fifteen seminarians were preparing for service in the Diocese of Boise in 2001. Despite the decline in farm and small-town populations in the north and north central deaneries due to the scaling back of resource-based industries such as mining and timber harvesting, major growth in the state has taken place in the south and southwestern parts of the state during the 1990s. As the possessor of the nation's fifth-fastest-growing economy, the state attracted young professionals to jobs in high-tech industries. Among other industries that contributed to the state's economy were agricultural processing, chiefly potatoes, and recreation.

Bibliography: C. BRADLEY and E. J. KELLY, History of the Diocese of Boise, 1863–1952 (Boise, Idaho 1953). Z. CHEDSEY and C. FREI, Idaho County Voices (Grangeville, Idaho 1990). M. A. ELSEN-SOHN, Pioneer Days in Idaho County, v. 1 (Cottonwood, Idaho, 1978). M. L. NACHTSHEIM, On the Way: The Journey of the Idaho Benedictine Sisters (Cottonwood, Idaho 1997).

[C. J. FREI]

IDEA

Derived ultimately from the Greek verb ἰδεῖν, to see, to know; and proximately from the noun εἶδος, that which is seen, the form, shape, or figure (Lat. species). In current usage idea has acquired two meanings: (1) a conception or representation that is known; and (2) a pattern or plan according to which a thing is made.

Platonic Concept. The word idea has strong Platonic overtones, for it forms the keystone of Plato's philosophy. The poetic sage had been exposed to two apparently contradictory influences: HERACLITUS, who emphasized that the world was in a state of constant flux; and SOCRATES, who insisted that the goal of the philosopher's search was the attainment of fixed and eternal truth. The philosophy of PLATO may be called an attempt to counterbalance the teachings of Heraclitus and Socrates. Consequently, Plato held that determinate, universal knowledge could not be derived from the continually changing world of sense; at best one could derive only δόξα (opinion). Yet he experienced within himself an awareness of the fixed and the universal. “When returning into herself [the soul] reflects, then she passes into the other world, a region of purity, and eternity, and immortality, and unchangeableness, which are her kindred, and with them she ever lives, when she is by herself and is not let or hindered; then she ceases from her erring ways, and being in communion with the unchanging is unchanging. And this state of the soul is called wisdom” (Phaedo 79D).

Since Plato could not explain the origin of such experience from below, he tried to explain it from above, by positing a world of Ideas wherein man-himself, beauty-itself, health-itself existed as things. Each human soul had also previously existed in that blessed land, and had directly contemplated these Idea-things. After being imprisoned in the body, probably for some sin, on the occasion of sensing some object in the world below the soul recalls what it previously intuited in the world of Ideas (Phaedrus 249E).

Having thus arrived at the existence of a world of ideal types, and facing the fact that the perception of concrete things on earth at least occasioned the presence of certain thoughts in the mind, Plato posited some vague sort of influence of the archetypes on the corresponding imperfect reflections in the world of sense. “As to the manner, I am uncertain, but I stoutly contend that by beauty all beautiful things become beautiful” (Phaedo 100D).

Hence, through Plato, the word idea came to have two different but related meanings: (1) what the intellect knows; and (2) the pattern in imitation of which things come to be.

Reactions to Plato. Although ARISTOTLE was Plato’s pupil, he was vigorously opposed to the notion of a world of Ideas. He regarded it as contradictory: a subsistent Idea would have to be simultaneously incommunicable (since it was singular) and communicable (since it was universal); it would have to be unchanging and changing. He stated summarily: “The Forms we can dispense with, for they are mere sound without sense” (Anal. post. 83a 33). Aristotle seldom, if ever, used the Platonic word ἰδέα; even when discussing Plato’s theory he would use εἶδος (form). When speaking of human “ideas,” Aristotle preferred to use ὑπόληψις (conception) or παθήματα τῆς ψυχῆς (passions of the soul).

The Neoplatonists, seeing the difficulty in accepting a sphere of impersonal immaterial essences, interpreted the Platonic Ideas as thoughts of God and placed them in the Nous, the divine mind that emanates from the One. St. AUGUSTINE found this notion attractive for two reasons: it would avoid any contention that God had created unintelligently; and it would explain the fact that every man has some unchanging standards of beauty and truth. Hence Augustine posited exemplar ideas and eternal truths in the mind of God (see EXEMPLARISM). “The ideas are certain archetypal forms or stable and immutable essences of things, which have not themselves been formed but, existing eternally and without change, are contained in the divine intelligence” (Divers. quaest. 46.2). This doctrine forms the ultimate basis for his theory of knowledge based on ILLUMINATION. Augustine held that just as the sunlight makes corporeal things visible to the human eye, so a divine illumination makes the eternal truths visible to the human mind (Trin. 12.15.24).

Aristotle and Plato in dialectical debate, from the Campanile del Duomo, Florence. (Art Resource)

Aquinas’s Synthesis. St. THOMAS AQUINAS synthesized the opinions of the two most prominent ancients. He agreed with Aristotle that the world of Ideas is contradictory and that all universals are derived from sense data. Yet he agreed with Plato (through Augustine) that there are eternal exemplars according to which all things are made; but these he regarded not as subsistent entities, but as objects of divine thought. Hence, in Aquinas and his followers, idea is used to refer to three quite different but interrelated data: (1) divine ideas, the eternal exemplars; (2) human practical concepts, the mental plans of an artisan; and (3) human speculative concepts, the subjective means by which man knows the universal and the abstract.

Divine Ideas. First, idea refers primarily to the divine ideas, the notions in the divine mind according to which all things were created. It would be inaccurate to say that, for Aquinas, the Platonic world of Ideas was simply transplanted to the divine mind. The divine ideas are not individual things, they are objects known. For St. Thomas these exemplars do not exist in God formally as things, but merely eminently as objects known. Thus, he wrote: “But the divine essence comprehends within itself the nobilities of all beings, not indeed compositely, but . . . according to the mode of perfection. . . . The intellect of God, therefore, can comprehend in His essence that which is proper to each thing by understanding wherein the divine essence is being imitated and wherein each thing falls short of its perfection. Thus, by understanding His essence as imitable in the mode of life and not of knowledge, God has the proper form of a plant; and if He knows His essence as imitable in the mode of knowledge and not of intellect, God has the proper form of animal, and so forth” (C. gent. 1.54). Consequently, the plurality of divine ideas is in no way opposed to God’s simplicity, for there is no multiplication of concepts as entities (formal concepts) but merely a multiplicity of objects known (objective concepts).

Practical Concepts. Second, by analogy the term idea has been properly applied to human practical concepts, the subjective exemplars according to which an artisan intends to produce something. Aquinas wrote of the human analogue to the divine ideas: “The likeness of a house preexists in the mind of the builder. And this may be called the idea of the house, since the builder intends to build his house like to the form conceived in his mind” (ST 1a, 15.1). The noted commentator JOHN OF ST. THOMAS took special pains to emphasize that such practical ideas must include not only the “whatness” of the thing, but also the practical plans for its production. He wrote: “For an idea it is required, not only that the thing be known absolutely in itself, but that it is formulated in considering the form as imitable in another, not by a natural propagation, but through an imitation directed by the intellect. [An idea] is a form as imitable, not by propagation, but by direction” (Curs. phil., phil. nat. 1.11.3). The truth or goodness of the practical order consists in the conformity of the thing produced to the practical concept of the artisan. Thus a work of art is not called good to the degree that it perfectly represents a thing in nature, but rather it is called good if it conforms to the artist’s idea (cf. ST 1a2ae, 64.1; 2a2ae, 57.1 ad 2).

Speculative Concepts. Third, the term idea is most frequently but least precisely used for any notion or CONCEPT; as when one says, “My idea about democracy is . . . .” St. Thomas himself acknowledged that idea could signify either practical or speculative notions. He wrote: “The Greek word idea is in Latin forma. Hence by ideas are understood the forms of things, existing apart from the things themselves. Now the form of anything existing apart from the thing itself can be for one of two ends; either to be the type of that of which it is called the form, or to be the principle of knowledge of that thing, inasmuch as the forms of things knowable are said to be in him who knows them” (ST 1a, 15.1). Here again an important distinction must be made between the subjective means by which something is known and the object that is thus immanently attained. The commentators distinguished these two aspects of the concept or idea, calling the one the formal concept and the other the objective concept. John of St. Thomas explained: “The concept is not known as an object except reflexly, when the very entity of the concept itself is known . . . [and not when] only the object is known as constituted in its status as an object illumined and understood as an object . . . . For thus the mental word is not numerically identical with the internalized object, since a mental word is especially required for us, that the object be made spiritualized or illumined and formed in its status as an object, as a term intrinsically understood” (Curs. phil., phil. nat. 1.11.3).

Interrelation. The synthesizing mind of Aquinas saw a close interrelation in these various usages of idea. The divine ideas were the originating exemplars, which, in creation, implanted faithful exemplifications of themselves in creatures. Creatures, thus realizing the divine ideas in their structure, could impress themselves on the human mind and thereby enable man to form speculative ideas from the created exemplifications by which he knew not only the created thing but also something of the Creator. In imitation of Him of whom he is an image, man the maker forms his own practical ideas, to some degree based on divine artifacts, which direct his production of human artifacts.

Modern Views. The clear-cut and cohesive development of the term idea from Plato through Aristotle and Augustine to Aquinas has not been continued in modern thought. René DESCARTES is commonly regarded as the father of modern philosophy, and he is the source of modern confusion about ideas. A classic example is to be found in his Meditations on First Philosophy: “And although it may be that one idea gives birth to another, this process cannot be carried back in an infinite series: we must eventually reach a first idea whose cause is, as it were, the archetype in which all the reality or perfection that is in the idea only objectively, or by representation, is contained formally or actually. Thus the natural light makes it evident to me that ideas are present in me like pictures or images which, although they may certainly fall short of the perfection of the things from which they are derived, can never contain anything greater or more perfect" (Med. 3). Two things are especially noteworthy in Descartes's statement. First, he still maintains the original Platonic notion of external archetypes, regarding these as somehow in the mind of God and yet containing the perfections of creatures formally and actually. Second, he regards the human idea as the thing known, missing entirely its intentional function.

The English philosopher, John LOCKE, was vigorously opposed to Descartes's INNATISM, but he further accentuated the subjectivism implicit in Descartes. He ignored or rejected any divine exemplars influencing human conceptualization, even indirectly. But more clearly, he made the subjective modification, on whatever level, to be the object known. At the beginning of An Essay Concerning Human Understanding he stated that the word idea stands "for whatsoever is the object of understanding when a man thinks. I have used it to express whatever is meant by phantasm, notion, species, or whatever it is which the mind can be employed about in thinking" (Introd. sec. 8).

George BERKELEY accepted the Lockean interpretation of idea as something subjectively known, but went beyond Locke to hold what many regard as a type of subjective idealism. Berkeley maintained that there were only three existents: the Infinite Spirit, finite spirits, and their ideas. Hence Berkeley seems to have regarded ideas as purely subjective objects of thought without any counterpart in the world or in God. David HUME, in a sense, went even a step beyond Berkeley. For him there was no Infinite Spirit and no finite spirits; there were merely disembodied and desubjectivized ideas and sense impressions. Hume held only a difference of degree between impressions and ideas, the latter being merely faint copies of the former. He wrote in An Inquiry Concerning Human Understanding: "By the term impression, then, I mean all our more lively perceptions, when we hear, see, or feel, or love, or hate, or desire, or will. And impressions are distinguished from ideas, which are less lively perceptions of which we are conscious when we reflect on any of those sensations or movements above mentioned" (sec. 2).

Subjectivist Connotations. After Hume, the general significance of idea was well established as something purely subjective. While almost every dictionary in any modern language will give idea and concept as synonyms, philosophers are significantly more discriminate. The more subjectively inclined the philosopher, the more he tends to use idea; the more realistically inclined, the more he tends to use concept; the more undecided he is, the more he is inclined to use both indiscriminately, with a preference for a different word of his own choosing such as perception or intuition. As noted above, Descartes's subjectivist proclivities inclined to the use of idea; Berkeley's idealism and Hume's panphenomenalism are expressed in their exclusive use of idea. Significantly, the absolute idealist, G. W. F. HEGEL, called the manifestations of Reason idea; and A. SCHOPENHAUER entitled his main work The World as Will and Idea.

Realist Connotations. On the other hand, those who have some commitment to REALISM tend to use concept more frequently. Concept implies a passivity to an external force, as in animal and human conception. Thus Kant requires sense data for his a priori concepts to organize. The American pragmatists, who were not nearly so much concerned about ideogenesis as its practical effects, used both terms indiscriminately. William JAMES is typical: "A glance at the history of the idea will show you still better what pragmatism means. . . . Our conception of these effects, whether immediate or remote, is then for us the whole conception of the object, so far as that conception has positive significance at all" [Pragmatism, 7th ed. (New York 1960) 43]. As Gilbert Ryle has become less positivistic, he tends to use concept more frequently. For example, in his book—significantly entitled The Concept of Mind—Ryle used concept six times in a nine-sentence paragraph. To take a portion: "It does not, of course, follow from its being a technical concept that it is an illegitimate or useless concept. 'Ionisation' and 'off-side' are technical concepts, but both are legitimate and useful. 'Phlogiston' and 'animal spirits' were technical concepts, though they have no utility" (62).

Thus, it seems that idea is irrevocably a part of the vocabulary of mankind and that it will forever bear at least the overtones of its Platonic origins.

See Also: IDEALISM; PLATONISM; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–). W. D. ROSS, Plato's Theory of Ideas (Oxford 1951). N. GULLEY, Plato's Theory of Knowledge (New York 1962). A. E. TAYLOR, Aristotle (rev. ed. New York 1956). C. BOYER, Christianisme et néo-platonisme dans la formation de saint Augustin (Paris 1920). É. H. GILSON, The Christian Philosophy of Saint Augustine, tr. L. E. M. LYNCH (New York 1960); The Spirit of Medieval Philosophy, tr. A. H. C. DOWNES (New York 1940); The Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, tr. L. K. SHOOK (New York 1956). J. MARITAIN, The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN et al. from 4th Fr. ed. (New York 1959). J. F. PEIFFER, The Concept in Thomism (New York 1952). V. M. KUIPER, "Pour ou contre l'idée-objet," Angelicum 15 (1938) 121–138. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, God: His Existence and His Nature, tr. B. ROSE from 5th Fr. ed., 2 v. (St. Louis 1934–36). M. DE MUNNYNCK, "Notes on Intuition," Thomist 1 (1939) 143–168. M. C. BEARDSLEY, ed., The European Philosophers from Descartes to Nietzsche (New York 1960). E. A. BURTT, ed., The English Philosophers from Bacon to Mill (New York 1939). W. BARRETT and H. D. AIKEN, eds., Philosophy in the Twentieth Century, 4 v. (New York 1962). G. RYLE, The Concept of Mind (New York 1949).

Immanuel Kant. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

[J. F. PEIFER]

IDEALISM

In philosophy, the family of doctrines revolving around the contention that the OBJECT is dependent on, and constituted by, the experiencing SUBJECT. In objective idealism the relation of interdependence holds mutually between subject and object in experience; in subjective idealism the dependence is one-way, upon the subject. Idealism is opposed to MATERIALISM, denying that mind originates from or is reducible to matter. It is equally opposed to all types of REALISM holding that either the objects of experience, or at least noumenal things-in-themselves, exist apart from being experienced. Idealisms may be either rationalistic, as with Leibniz, or empiricistic, as with Berkeley. Historical examples of both pluralistic and monistic-pantheistic idealisms can be found, although the post-Kantian systems of absolute idealism are monistic.

This article is divided into three parts: the first surveys the development of idealism from its earliest origins to its classical statement by Hegel; the second concentrates on post-Hegelianism idealism in Europe; and the third, on post-Hegelian idealism in the United States.

Origins and Development

Idealism as above described strictly speaking is found only in modern philosophy, and pure examples of this position cannot be found in either ancient or medieval philosophy.

Ancient Thought. The famous remark of PARMENIDES in frg. 3 (H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch, ed. W. Kranz) equating thinking and being has sometimes been understood as idealistic; but Parmenides seems rather to have meant by it that thought has to be explained in terms of being as its object rather than being by thought. The pre-Socratic philosophers seem to have been materialists. For the Sophists, the assertion that the object of perception exists only in relation to a perceiving subject led not to idealism but to SKEPTICISM, or to a pragmatic concern with the utility, rather than truth, of opinions.

Plato's famous theory of transcendent Ideas, or Forms, has often been denominated as idealism. Certainly PLATO is in agreement with modern idealists in holding, as he does in Laws (book 10), that soul is the eldest of all things and that the physical is the product of the spiritual. The order of nature is due to divine mind, as the Demiurge of the Timaeus, but there is an undervived material principle, and the archetypal Ideas, or Forms, to which the Demiurge looks are not thoughts in any mind, as the Parmenides explicitly states. The Platonic Ideas are the ultimate objective realities apprehended by knowledge in the soul, which has for Plato an intermediate grade of reality between the Ideas and the changing sensibles.

Curiously it is in Aristotle rather than in Plato that a certain anticipation of modern idealistic doctrine is to be found. The being qua being of metaphysics is identified by Aristotle with the divine entities separated in existence and definition from matter and motion; and these entities in turn, with perfect intelligences, "thinking upon thinking," in whom knowing subject and known object are identical. But such divine minds do not creatively produce lesser realities, nor are they even cognizant of them. No one is more uncompromisingly realistic than Aristotle in his account of physical nature and of human knowledge, and his theory has often been regarded, with some plausibility, as tending to naturalism.

PLOTINUS, and the Neoplatonic tradition, contributed perhaps more to the formation of modern idealism than any other ancient or medieval thinkers. The Aristotelian identification of contemplative mind and divine being was taken over, and an effort was made to account for soul and physical nature by a process of emanation out of divine mind, which precontains in a higher, more unified mode all that exists in exile here below. But divine mind itself, although inclusive of the fullness of being, was seen as derived from a higher principle that is not intelligence or being.

Medieval Thought. No medieval thinker can be regarded as an idealist in the modern sense, although there were developments in the Middle Ages that helped to prepare the ground. The Augustinian tradition of interiorism, with its insistence that the road to truth and being lies within, was one such development. Augustine's doctrines of the spiritual autonomy of the soul and the active production by the soul of its own sense data, on the occasion of bodily changes, were others. Avicenna's famous "floating man," who still knows himself and his own mental operations even though all channels of physical sensation are blocked off, epitomized a long tradition, opposed by THOMAS AQUINAS, that extended to Descartes. There is even a sense in which medieval "realism" concerning UNIVERSALS—as found in such thinkers as BOETHIUS, WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX, and DUNS SCOTUS, who attributed to physical objects the identical forms or essences found in abstract thought—constituted a remote preparation for modern idealism.

Lastly, there was a little-noted medieval background for the 17th-century assumption that man experiences only his own ideas—an assumption that came to be crucial for the subjective, empirical idealism of Berkeley. This was to be found in the "formal object" analysis of sensation, common to much medieval and late medieval SCHOLASTICISM. The ultimate "given" of sensation, for this theory, becomes a congeries of atomic colors, sounds, odors, tastes, and tactile sensations. Sensation experiences, in this view, only the sensible accidents, not substance or the "This man Callias" of Aristotle's account; and the intellectual inference to underlying realities was opened to the critical attacks later to be launched by the British empiricists. When such "data" (themselves the product of formal intellectual abstraction) were made into the direct objects of sensation, contrary to St. Thomas's injunction against making sensible species objects, the characteristic modern epistemological situation was produced—within which modern idealism came to flower. It is remarkable that SOLIPSISM seems to have become a serious philosophical problem only in the modern era.

Modern Thought. The egocentric predicament has typified most of modern philosophy since R. DESCARTES, for if one directly experiences only one's own ideas, problems of extramental reference and reality become crucial. The very existence of physical entities outside of and independent of mind thus became a significant question for modern philosophers.

Berkeley. G. BERKELEY initiated the empiricist variety of modern idealism by answering in the negative. J. LOCKE had made the famous distinction of primary and secondary qualities, the former being regarded as properties of physical substances, the latter being dismissed as subjective and relative. Berkeley was able to show that the so-called primary qualities are just as dependent on their being perceived as the secondary ones. As an empiricist, he held that all of man's knowledge is derived from the ideas of sense experience, and cannot reach to anything different from ideas, apart from minds in which ideas exist. The very being of ideas, for him, is their being experienced. Consequently, the very existence of independent material substances was denied; in this step Berkeley believed he had refuted not only materialism but also atheism and skepticism. Skepticism is overcome since man is certain of his own existence and of the ideas in his mind. The insuperable problems of representational theories of knowledge need not be faced, for there are no real physical entities beyond such ideas. Atheism is refuted by showing that it is impossible for the whole or any part of the visible world to exist without a mind. Since collections of ideas (trees, rocks, etc.) exist independently of human will, and appear in regular order, they are results of divine will, and exist in God's mind when not perceived by creatures.

Leibniz. In the works of G. W. LEIBNIZ, idealistic conclusions were reached by a purely rationalistic method. Taking as a premise that every complex is analyzable into simples, a proposition he considers self-evident, Leibniz shows that the simple units or monads of reality cannot be material, since everything material is infinitely divisible. Leibniz's system is summarized in his Monadology (1720).

Kant. While Berkeley had attempted to found idealism on empirical grounds, D. HUME held that the EMPIRICISM of ideas led rather to skepticism. The impact of Hume on the great German philosopher I. KANT led to the central crisis of modern philosophy. Kant saw that if a radical empiricism entails skepticism, a radical RATIONALISM in its turn leads to sterility. The empirical critique had made the supposed primary data of experience into a manifold of sense in itself unordered and unintelligible, incapable by itself of constituting scientifically knowable objects or even experiential objects. In the Critique of Pure Reason (1st ed. 1781; 2d ed. 1787), Kant maintains that the objective world of experience that founds mathematics and physics must be constituted by the organizing forms and categories of mind out of the materials of the sensuous manifold. Such a scientifically meaningful objective realm of experience is, however, only phenomenal, not noumenal. The mind determines only the forms in which things appear, but man's mentality is devoid of intellectual intuition and real "things-in-themselves" are unknowable to him. The attempt by pure reason to attain metaphysical knowledge is doomed to founder in illusion and antinomy. There is, however, a practical use of reason that establishes, over against deterministic physical nature, the spiritual world of moral duty and freedom. Confidence in the reality of this moral universe is an affair of faith, not of pure speculative reason.

Post-Kantian Idealism. Post-Kantian German philosophers sought to restore authentic metaphysical knowledge by insisting on the fact of intellectual INTUITION and by abandoning the unknowable Kantian Ding ansich. J. G. FICHTE thus sought to advance beyond Kant's transcendental idealism to a new form of subjective idealism. In particular, Fichte (and Schelling and Hegel after him) desired to overcome the Kantian dualisms: the form and matter of experience, physical necessity and spiritual freedom, theoretical and practical uses of reason, and phenomenal and noumenal worlds. To do so, they evolved a general idealistic premise that philosophy must begin with the unconditioned absolute met with in human CONSCIOUSNESS. For Fichte, this is the ego or SELF, and its unity is the ground of the systematic interconnection of the antithetic principles of experience. The entire body of knowledge is to be deduced starting with the first three principles that the self posits. In the thesis, the ego posits its own being; in the antithesis, the nonego is "op-positd" to the ego; in the synthesis within the absolute ego there is "op-positd" a divisible, finite nonego to the divisible, finite ego. "Being," for Fichte, is this self-positing process. The nonself is irreducible only from the point of view of the theoretical ego, but not in relation to the practical ego, which posits this barrier to force the theoretical ego to reflect back upon itself. The realms of morality and right are deduced from the infinite striving of the practical ego.

In the works of F. W. J. von SCHELLING, nature is given more than a moralistic significance in relation to the practical ego. The identical activity of the absolute is manifested unconsciously in nature and consciously in human mind. The absolute, which is the source of both, was originally conceived as a point of indifference, in which the oppositions characterizing finite perspectives are overcome. Hegel's ridicule of this position forced Schelling to attempt to explain how such opposites can be radicated in God, or the ABSOLUTE, and distinctions borrowed from the theosophist J. BÖHME were employed.

Post-Kantian absolute idealism culminated in the great system of G. W. F. HEGEL. Absolute spirit is identified by Hegel with the concrete universal, the absolute concept whose self-development is traced through the dialectical phases of logic, philosophy of nature, and philosophy of spirit, and is finally consummated not in religion but in philosophical thought. The object in finite understanding is other than mind, but philosophic reason manifests their dialectical identity in the union of absolute mind. Schelling rejected Hegel's dialectic of absolute concept as neglecting the existential factor.

Post-Hegelian Idealism in Europe

Idealism, as described in the preceding section, continued as a living philosophical movement beyond Hegel into the 19th and 20th centuries although it was somewhat in eclipse by the middle of the 20th century. This part of the article considers post-Hegelian thinkers in Germany (Schopenhauer), England, France, and Italy.

Germany. The voluntaristic, pessimistic idealism of A. SCHOPENHAUER grew out of Kant more than Hegel, whose dialectic of rational concepts was rejected. A non-rational metaphysical intuition was sought to attain the noumenal order; this was identified with a blind, irrational will to live, a unitary principle manifesting itself in the pluralistic phenomena. As for Kant, objects of knowledge for Schopenhauer are phenomena constituted by forms organizing the inchoate sensuous manifold. But sufficient reason applies only to phenomena, not to the world as a whole or to its noumenal basis. There cannot be a plurality of things-in-themselves, since the forms of space and time that individuate objects apply only to phenomena. Human experiences of the self and of one's own body as striving expressions and manifestations of will and freedom, combined with an inference extended to all perceived objects, point to a unitary cosmic will. Although man's knowledge of this cosmic will is interior and privileged it is known by him only through the form of time and, indirectly, in the acts of the body. In its own nature, the thing-in-itself, or will, is not a knowing subject, but is nonrational, even irrational, since that which is the ultimate ground of every kind of sufficient reason cannot be proportionate to any cognitive power. The will-to-live incarnates itself at every level of nature, according to Platonic ideas, but such archetypal patterns do not imply intelligent planning. The higher and lower levels of will's embodiment are incessantly at war, objectively manifesting will's own internal hostilities and essential need, deficiency, and consequent pain. This is the source of Schopenhauer's famous PESSIMISM. Schopenhauer considers three ways of escape from the egoism and hatred stemming from the will-to-live, viz, suicide, art, and morality. Suicide is futile, since it destroys not the will but only the phenomenal individual. Art, in contemplating disinterestedly the "Platonic Ideas," is only temporary release. Moral sympathy and renunciation in an ascetic denial of the will-to-live constitute the only cure. There is a final suggestion that perhaps such a renunciation might lead to a positive union with the thing-in-itself in a character transcending its aspect of pain-bearing will.

England. The definitive entrance of German idealism into England was signaled by the publication (1865) of J. H. Stirling's Secret of Hegel. Thomas Hill Green (1836–82) is the first important figure in the British idealistic school of the late 19th century. Green accepted the main tendencies of post-Kantian German idealism, and on this basis attacked the traditional British empirical and utilitarian positions, as well as the evolutionism of Herbert SPENCER. Man could not, according to Green, be a product of natural forces or a member of the phenomenal series since such a product could not know and explain himself, and thereby possess moral significance. It is the spiritual that produces the order and unity of nature, which is radicated finally in self-consciousness, an all-uniting consciousness that is eternal mind. Biological evolution itself, culminating in human mentality and self-consciousness, manifests the eternal, universal spirit. Human free activity is not in time and has no antecedents, just as self-consciousness has no origin. Human conduct, to be distinctively human, involves the conscious presentation of a want to a subject who identifies himself with it, transforming natural desire into will. Green's ethical theory is based on self-realization, the self being understood as the ideal self whose good includes the perfection of all rational agents.

The greatest of the English post-Hegelian idealists is F. H. BRADLEY, whose metaphysical masterwork is Appearance and Reality (London 1893). Bradley is not a Hegelian; he rejects the dialectical unfolding of the Idea. Rather, Bradley is a modern Eleatic, a disciple of Parmenides who employs, like his ancient predecessors, sharp dialectical instruments of refutation to convict the pluralistic phenomenal world of contradiction and unreality. The German realist J. F. Herbart also had held that nothing can be real that is contradictory, maintaining that reality must be an absolutely self-consistent system. Using this test, Herbart had found contradictions in such supposedly clear concepts as thing, change, becoming, matter, and self-consciousness. The Herbartian critique had been aimed at establishing the reality of many unchanging reals only externally related to each other. The Bradleyan dialectic, more powerful and subtle than Herbart's, proposed to show the internal contradictions of all realistic or pluralistic hypotheses. As opposed to Hegel, the Absolute Reality that is a coherent whole is not identified with dialectical reason; reason itself, in its discursive movement, deals only with appearances and can never be consummated in a union of identity with the Absolute. Thinking is essentially relational. External relations, which make no difference to their terms, require in turn new relations to bond them with their terms and an infinite regression arises. Even internal relations, where the relations bite into the being of the terms, only import into the interior of such entities the same disjunction and residual externality. Reason, in its effort to judge truly that A is B, must expand A beyond its naked isolation (in which state it cannot be a subject of judgment at all, even of identical predication) until it becomes the totality of the real, which is "such that" the predicate B can be truly asserted of it. But reason can never achieve this final synthesis or reunion of concrete existence and separated abstract content. Even if, per impossibile, reason could complete its infinite task, it would not be the Absolute, although the Absolute is a unity of experience, a seamless whole beyond all disrupting relationships, which mysteriously includes reason and all else. Man's experience begins with an immediate unity of feeling that is below the level of rational analysis, although it is somehow pregnant with such structures and contrasts. It is by a remote analogy with this original felt unity that man forms his notion of the Absolute Reality. It is an experience having for its sole materials feeling, thought, and volition—there are no others—but uniting them in a harmonious whole above the relations of the many appearances dealt with by reason. Thought cannot give man any intuitive vision of this ultimate harmony of experience, nor does Bradley posit any mystical union with the Absolute.

Bernard Bosanquet (1848–1923), whose most important work is The Principle of Individuality and Value (London 1912), followed Bradley in many respects but was more akin to Hegel than his famous contemporary had been. As for Hegel, for Bosanquet the notion of the concrete universal, of a universal which determines its own particularization, is central. Individuality is a striving toward completion and fulfillment, and may be exemplified in a logical system, a work of art, the moral self, a social institution. In all cases the fulfillment of individuality is in the whole, so that the goal of knowledge, moral conduct, and artistic creation is always the Absolute. Reality and value are inseparably one. In the sphere of knowledge, truth is the ideal completed totality of the system of knowledge; thus Bosanquet affirms the characteristic idealistic theory of degrees of truth and reality and the coherence theory of truth. Ethically, the moral value of an action is judged by coherence with a more inclusive scheme, and ultimately with the Absolute itself. In art, the ideal of beauty is the harmony of the completed whole.

A more minor figure in post-Hegelian British idealism is John Ellis McTaggart (1866–1925), who did commentaries on Hegel's logic and dialectic and developed, in The Nature of Existence (2 v. Cambridge, Eng. 1921–27), a pluralistic, personalistic idealism more akin to that of the American personal idealists Bowne and Brightman than to that of Hegel. All beings are spiritual persons, including God, if He exists. Such a God, however, would be finite, and is not to be identified either with the infinite personal God of traditional Christianity or with the Absolute of Green, Bradley, and Bosanquet. Others who contributed to the development of British idealism are Edward Caird (1835–1908), who wrote The Critical Philosophy of Kant (2 v. Glasgow 1889); John Caird (1820–98); and the great Platonic scholar Alfred Edward Taylor (1869–1945), whose early work, the Elements of Metaphysics (London 1903), was heavily influenced by Bradley.

France. French idealism was less a development out of German and Hegelian idealism than was the case in England. Negatively, it developed as a reaction against the POSITIVISM of Auguste Comte. The activist or dynamic philosophy of MAINE DE BIRAN, which opposed positivism, became one of the native sources of French idealism. Maine de Biran organized his philosophy around the notion of the active force or effort of which one is conscious in overcoming obstacles, a concept having some kinship with Fichte's active ego that requires the nonego for its fulfillment. But Kant lay in back of the French idealistic development, as did native sources. C. B. Renouvier named his philosophy neocriticism to indicate its Kantian source. However, like McTaggart later in England and the American personalists, Renouvier moved beyond Kantian criticism to the construction of a pluralistic and personalistic idealistic metaphysics. The thing-in-itself was abandoned. Unlike Royce in America, Renouvier regarded actual infinity as self-contradictory, and his world is a finite sum of finite beings. Infinite transition is impossible, so that real discontinuity in nature must be admitted, and to Renouvier this provides an opening for uncaused beginnings and consequently for free will.

The emphasis on the reality of contingency and freedom is characteristic of French idealism. A. A. COURNOT, in terms of mathematical probability theory, had opposed the reigning dogma of the certitude and necessity of scientific laws, and with É. BOUTROUX this dogma received its definitive challenge in The Contingency of the Laws of Nature (1874, 4th ed. 1902, tr. F. Rothwell, London 1916). Real indeterminacy was taken as the foundation for freedom, and God was regarded as the maximal point in the hierarchy of beings in terms of freedom and indeterminacy.

One more figure in French idealism deserves mention. Alfred Jules Emile Fouillée (1838–1912) was not, to be sure, an idealist strictly speaking, since he sought to synthesize idealism and MATERIALISM in an evolutionistic and voluntaristic philosophy that makes mind and matter aspects of one and the same thing. Nevertheless, for him only psychi phenomena are directly experienced by man, and consequently the primary analogate for man's understanding of reality must be active mind and its idées-forces.

Italy. Italian idealism derived from Hegel but chiefly from the historical side of HEGELIANISM, the Hegel of the Phenomenology of Mind, where the dialectical advance of the human spirit in history, art, religion, and philosophy is described. The absolutism of Hegel's thought, which made such a strong appeal in England, was regarded in Italy as static and alien to the dynamic, temporal, and progressive movement of the human spirit. It was the latter that B. CROCE understood as reality, rather than some transcendent absolute experience. Reality is focused on the present, and past and future are real only in relation to present experience. One of Croce's most influential contributions was in the area of AESTHETICS. Sense perception and artistic creation differ only in degree; intuition is creative of the data of both.

The other prominent modern Italian idealist was G. GENTILE, who, unlike Croce, made common cause with the fascism of his day. The dualisms engendered by the subject-object contrast are synthesized in the unity of self-consciousness, which is manifested at its peak in philosophy. Art is one-sidedly subjective, religion one-sidedly objective, but philosophy alone achieves perfect synthesis; it not merely knows reality, it is reality. But since philosophical reflection develops through history, philosophy is history.

Critique. From the point of view of Catholic Christian theism, two variants of modern idealism appear clearly unacceptable. The absolute MONISM of post-Kantian German idealism is certainly one. But even the pluralistic, personalistic idealisms cannot be reconciled with Christian theism if they are regarded as implying divine finitude.

Bibliography: J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–), esp. v.7, Fichte to Nietzsche (1963). J. MARÉCHAL, Le Point de départ de la métaphysique, v.4 Le Système idéaliste chez Kant et les postkantians (3d ed. Paris 1947). R. JOLIVET, Les Sources de l'idéalisme (Paris 1936). H. D.

GARDEIL, Les Étages de la philosophie idéaliste (Paris 1935). A. CARLINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1189–1201. J. MÖLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:601–02. W. WIELAND, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:556–62. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:672–81.

[L. J. ESLICK]

American Idealism

Although American idealism reflects the many varieties of its British and German antecedents, most American idealists fall into one of two groups, personal or absolute. Personal idealists conceive reality as a self or as belonging to a self; they are indebted to Berkeley, whom they consider to have shown conclusively that matter does not exist, and are usually theistic. Absolute idealists, on the other hand, tend to be monistic and pantheistic; they hold that reality is included within one complete system, present to an all-comprehensive Mind called the ABSOLUTE. They believe that Berkeley went too far in denying the existence of matter altogether, although they credit him with rightly insisting that everything in reality is dependent on mind. They are convinced also that personal idealism places too much emphasis on the separateness of persons from one another and from God.

The history of idealism in America is largely a record of protest by religious-orientated thinkers against various forms of materialism, naturalism, and positivism that tend to deny the intelligible order of the universe and its dependence on mind. Most American idealists have been led to their position in search of a rational basis for morality and religion. This is true equally of the early idealists of New England, of the St. Louis Group, of B. P. Bowne and J. Royce, and most recently of Errol Harris.

Early Idealists. American idealism finds its earliest representatives in Jonathan EDWARDS and Samuel Johnson (1696–1772), both of Connecticut. Although Edwards is known primarily as a Calvinist theologian and preacher, he developed from a critical reading of Newton and Locke a personal idealism that was to parallel in many respects the work of Berkeley, although he was probably ignorant of the fact that the British philosopher had reached similar conclusions. Johnson, who was the founder and first president of King's College, was directly influenced by Berkeley, with whom he became personally acquainted during Berkeley's visit to America (1729–31). Johnson retained enough of his earlier acquaintance with scholasticism, however, to prevent him from accepting outright Berkeley's nominalism. Neither Johnson's idealism nor Edwards', however, were to make a permanent impression on American thought.

Idealism in the U.S. was to receive its major impetus through the efforts of a group of influential teachers and professional men who met regularly in St. Louis during the years immediately following the Civil War. This group met at first informally in the home of William Harris, the future U.S. commissioner of education, for the study of German philosophy. Later, owing to the influence of Henry Conrad Brockmeyer (1828–1906), it undertook the serious study of Hegel, methodically analyzing Brockmeyer's translation of one of Hegel's works. It eventually founded the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, the first philosophical periodical in the English language, in which it published translations and commentaries on German philosophy. Other members included G. H. Howison, Thomas Davidson, and Joseph Pulitzer. Bronson Alcott was so impressed with the St. Louis Hegelians, as they came to be known, that he resolved to make their Hegelianism known in the East, which he did by inviting various representatives of it to the Concord Summer School of Philosophy.

Howison and Bowne. George Holmes Howison (1834–1916), who later taught for many years at the University of California, Berkeley, became one of the better-known members of the St. Louis group. A personal idealist, he devoted much of his effort to combating the evolutionary agnosticism of Herbert Spencer. He also attacked the pantheistic and solipsistic tendencies of absolute idealism. He suggested that cosmic evolution, as a judgment about nature, is essentially a teleological idea. Science must rest upon the assumption of an all-pervading rationality in things. This implies, he thought, a self-conscious intelligence underlying, and responsible for the connectedness of, all phenomena.

The cause of personal idealism was simultaneously advanced, and perhaps with greater success because he was a more systematic thinker than Howison, by Borden Parker Bowne (1847–1910) of Boston University. In his major work, Personalism (New York 1908), Bowne discloses himself as at once indebted to and critical of Kant. He believed that Kant and his followers paid so much attention to the forms by which the mind organizes experience that they had all but forgotten the self whose characteristic activity is to know by means of the organization of experience. Bowne taught that man's cognitive powers are in general reliable. "Intelligence is simply a bottom fact which explains everything but accepts itself." Persons and the external world exist, but they exist as objectified or realized ideas. Bowne's epistemology is dualistic insofar as he holds that the idea and its object are numerically distinct. He accepts the Kantian distinction between the phenomenal and the noumenal, identifying the latter with the personal. A Supreme Person is the ground for both the system of nature and the community of persons. Bowne's personalism is also voluntaristic. To be is to act, and to act is to will. Attacking a mechanistic sense-bound naturalism on the one hand, Bowne criticizes an idealistic impersonalism on the other.

Royce and Others. Of American idealists, Josiah ROYCE is probably the most outstanding. His principal work, The World and the Individual, the Gifford lectures of 1899–1900 (2 v. New York 1900–01), earned him a lasting place in the history of American philosophy. In these lectures Royce argued that “the whole universe including the physical world is essentially one living thing, a mind, one great spirit.” This conclusion, Royce believed, was not only in accord with the demands of reason but also with the facts of human experience and the assumptions of science. Since the universe is one great all-inclusive mind, the best method of acquiring an understanding of its nature is by an examination of one's own conscious experience. Just as the human mind is the sum total of fleeting conscious experience, so the Absolute is composed of all the conscious selves into which he has differentiated himself and whose conscious experiences are embraced in his own universal Mind. Royce believes it impossible to think of the world in a realistic or materialistic sense, as first having existence independent of human minds and later producing them. Like Howison and Bowne, he attacks materialistic conceptions of evolution. For Royce, the world and the mind are organically related; neither can be taken apart from the other; there can be no object without a subject that knows it.

The cause of idealism was advanced also by James E. Creighton (1861–1924), for many years the editor (from 1893 until his death) of the Philosophical Review; by W. E. Hocking (1873–1966), an absolute idealist; by E. S. BRIGHTMAN, whose idealism is best described as PERSONALISM; and most recently by E. E. Harris, who in his Nature, Mind and Modern Science (New York 1954), attempts to show that classical empiricism and LOGICAL POSITIVISM are dead ends, reopening the idealistic examination of evolution.

Although between 1875, and 1900 almost every professor of philosophy in the U.S. was an idealist, and idealists remained in the majority for a decade or two later, idealism could not maintain itself on the American scene. Bowne and Royce bequeathed to America a host of inspired religious teachers, ministers, and administrators; but their influence was to give way before the criticism of REALISM and naturalism. This trend from idealism to naturalism is strikingly reflected in the intellectual development of John Dewey as he moved from an early defense of idealism to an outright naturalism. In general, idealism came to be regarded as unscientific or as insufficiently imbued with the scientific spirit.

Critique. From the viewpoint of moderate realism, American idealism begins not with experience but with the problems bequeathed to it by the erroneous epistemologies of Locke and Hume, whose empiricism, in turn, has its origin in the exaggerated realism of Descartes. A moderate realism, offered as an alternative explanation, would insist that things exist independently of the human mind, which is capable of discovering not only their phenomenal but also their essential aspects. The intelligibility of the universe is accounted for in terms of a personal, creator God, distinct in essence from His creatures, who is at once their origin and their goal, as well as continually responsible for their existence.

See Also: TRANSCENDENTALISM.

Bibliography: C. M. PERRY, ed., The St. Louis Movement in Philosophy (Norman, Okla. 1931). W. G. MUELDER and L. SEARS, eds., The Development of American Philosophy (New York 1940). H. G. TOWNSEND, Philosophical Ideas in the United States (New York 1934).

[J. P. DOUGHERTY]

IDENTITY

A RELATION distinct from all others in its being the most fundamental both in thought and in reality. All others in one way or another are reducible to it. It is both mental and real. As mental it is the essential relation in JUDGMENT and in the PROPOSITION. When the subject and the predicate of the proposition are in no way different either in extension or in comprehension, then their identity makes the proposition a tautology. When both of these differ as aspects of one and the same reality, then the proposition is held to be formal. Many philosophers hold that only the latter is the valid type of proposition. If its real identity is substantial, then it points to the most fundamental ontological unity. Accidental identity according to quantity or form is less fundamental. The real existence of this relation is much disputed. In some schools of philosophy it is categorically denied.

The sort of pluralism implied by the logical atomism of B. RUSSELL is an example of this. For him, reality is an absolute plurality to which the relation of identity is brought by the mind. This alone creates the unity of experience. Other philosophers deny this. PARMENIDES thought that all being is identically one in number and that diversity is an illusion of the mind caused by sense knowledge. B. SPINOZA held the same doctrine, attributing the appearance of multiplicity to the fracturing effect of imagination exercised upon the continuum of sense experience. F. W. J. SCHELLING, G. W. F. HEGEL and F. H. BRADLEY taught a somewhat similar doctrine, holding that the beginning of experience is in an un-differentiated being, which is then rendered multiple and structured through the insertion of the relation of identity. Identity therefore was a relation immanent in being and in experience.

Many other philosophers, such as St. THOMAS AQUINAS, take a mediating position between these two extremes. They therefore admit of an ontological structure in things by reason of which they are partly diverse and partly identical. Things that are identical in form but different in number are thereby similar and come under one genus or species. The identity, in this case, is real since it has a real grounding. But it can also be purely mental, as happens when it binds together different concepts of one and the same thing. Modern mathematical logic has been much concerned with this relation, but less from the point of view of its nature than from the point of view of its application in particular cases.

See Also: IDENTITY, PRINCIPLE OF.

Bibliography: S. VANNI-ROVIGHI, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:1214–15. B. SPINOZA, Ethics, pt. 1, props. 18, 25, 28; pt. 2, definitions and prop. 10. G. W. LEIBNIZ, “Præmae veritates,” in his Opusculæ et fragmenta inedita de Leibniz, ed. L. COUTURAT (Paris 1903) 518–. F. H. BRADLEY, Essays on Truth and Reality (Oxford 1914); Appearance and Reality (2d ed. London 1902). B. STEVENS, The Identity Theory (2d ed. London 1936). H. GLOCKNER, Identität und Individualität (Willhelmshaven 1952).

[K. A. WALL]

IDENTITY, PRINCIPLE OF

A principle asserting the unity, consistency, and stability of being, and commonly enumerated among the FIRST PRINCIPLES. In ONTOLOGY it is expressed: “Every being is determined in itself, is one with itself, and is consistent in itself”; in LOGIC: “What belongs to being must be predicated of it,” or, “Whatever is true (e.g., a CONCEPT, a PROPOSITION, or a relationship) is, as such, absolutely and always true.” Since the notion of identity is closely associated with that of UNITY, similar distinctions may be applied to both. Thus one may speak of an identity that is real or logical, physical or moral, and numerical or specific (cf. Aristotle, Meta. 1015b 17–1017a 7; St. Thomas Aquinas, In 5 meta., 8–9; ST 1a, 11.1 ad 2).

Explanation. The principle of identity is itself an explication of the concept of BEING. Being denotes positiveness and determination; it also implies coherence and agreement with itself, without which the determination, and consequently being itself, would dissolve. Although explicitly concerned with the unity of being, the principle of identity also contains an implicit reference to the distinction and multiplicity of being.

The algebraic statement of the principle of identity, “A being is a being, or  $A = A$ ,” is somewhat tautological.

If the predicate in no way amplifies the subject, or does not fulfill the expectation of the copula, it would seem that no judgment has in reality been expressed. Thus the statement, “A man is a man,” really says nothing; its predicate belies the promise of the verb “is.” On the other hand, when the principle is expressed “A being is identical with itself, or is one and consistent in itself,” the subject is determined as something underlying unity, and therefore the statement asserts something definite and positive.

Various Interpretations. As a metaphysical principle, the principle of identity has been variously interpreted, while as a logical principle it receives rather uniform interpretation. The statement, “A being is identical to itself and is one in itself,” usually is interpreted as applying to being in a transcendental sense, that is, with a potential reference to all its possible concrete determinations, but without referring to any one thing in particular. Thus, identity and coherence with itself is said not merely of the one, eternal, and unchangeable Being, but rather of being as such, whether this be one or multiple. In its logical formulation, the principle of identity presupposes no precise concept of real being, and thus does not create serious theoretical disagreements.

Monistic Views. PARMENIDES presumed to deduce a sweeping theory of reality from the concept of being alone: “One must say and think that being exists” [H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch, ed. W. Kranz, 3 v. (8th ed. Berlin 1956) frg 6]. “Being is without origin, is immortal, and is everything in itself. It was not, and it will not be, because it is complete in itself, one and continuous” (ibid. frgs 7–8). By reasoning analogous to this, the ancients thought that all reality could be resolved to one identity; the Epicureans and the Stoics understood this in a materialist, the Neoplatonists in a spiritualist sense. A like tendency is at the roots of the various forms of MONISM in modern thought—e.g., that of G. BRUNO, B. SPINOZA, and F. W. J. SCHELLING. Schelling’s conception is in fact known as the “philosophy of identity,” according to which the diversity and multiplicity manifest in the world is relative and phenomenal and does not mar the absolute unity that is the foundation of being.

Dualism and Multiplicity. A metaphysical DUALISM within being is, on the other hand, essential to Aristotelian and to Christian thought, with their accent on matter and form, participated and unparticipated being, and the unity and multiplicity of being. This dualism presents a fundamental problem: how to reconcile the multiplicity of entities with the concept of unity. In Christian thought, a solution is furnished in terms of the concept of PURE ACT, infinite and unparticipated in Itself, and at the same time the creative and exemplary principle of PARTICIPATION for individual and finite beings. The doctrine of ANALOGY is further proposed as a logical and metaphysical concept that is most useful for an objective understanding of being in its totality. As Aristotle has remarked, "There are many senses in which a thing may be said to be" (Meta. 1003a 33). The concept of being is formally one, but it is not univocal in its concrete manifestations, and therefore does not warrant an absolute resolution into uniform identity. On the contrary, it manifests an immanent tension, in a real as well as in a dialectical sense, toward an infinity of both determinations and forms.

Evaluation. No solution to the metaphysical problem of unity and multiplicity can be deduced simply from the principle of identity. It is impossible for the human mind to determine the absolute structure of being in general, or of concrete beings, by means of a purely transcendental deduction from the concept of being itself. The intellect does not grasp being in its original concreteness by intuition, but rather attains knowledge of being through abstract concepts based on EXPERIENCE. The basic problem of the unity or multiplicity of concrete being is intimately connected with the processes of analysis, interpretation, and deduction, whereby thought is brought to bear on experience.

With regard to its logical and metaphysical import, one may say that the principle of identity is of lesser significance than the principle of CONTRADICTION. Its chief contribution is that it accentuates the value of the positiveness that is essential to the concept of being. Because of this positiveness and consistency in itself, being contains, implicitly and virtually, infinite possibilities of differentiation and development. Given the fact of CREATION, since being is positive, it can (and perhaps must) set in motion, embrace, and stimulate the processes generating the diverse, the relative, and the contrary, all of which it potentially holds within itself. But these processes, which take place in reality and in history on so grand a scale, are determined by the principle of identity only so far as this in turn implies the principle of contradiction. The expansion of the principle of identity into the principle of contradiction is spontaneous and even necessary, since in its implication of diversity and distinction the very concept of identity becomes, at least indirectly, dialectical. For this reason, St. THOMAS AQUINAS, following Aristotle, accords a primacy among first principles to the principle of contradiction.

See Also: IDENTITY

Bibliography: L. FUETSCHER, "Die ersten Seins- und Denkprinzipien," Philosophie und Grenzwissenschaft 3:2-4 (1930). E. MEYERSON, Identity and Reality, tr. K. LOEWENBERG (New York 1930); "La Notion de l'identique," Essais (Paris 1936). J. MARÉCHAL, Le Thomism devant la philosophie critique (2d ed.) 561-68, v.5 of Le Point de départ de la métaphysique, 5 v. (3d ed. Paris 1944-49). J. M. DE ESTRADA, "Reflexión acerca del principio de identidad," Sapientia 8 (1953) 276-82. S. VANNIROVIGHI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1215-19. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927-30) 1:700-13.

[U. VIGLINO]

IDESBALD, BL.

Cistercian abbot; b. Flanders, 1100; d. between Dunkirk and Nieuport, after July 22, 1167. Idesbald was probably a member of the higher nobility in the area of Furnes in Flanders. Some sources relate that he was married, but after a few years of married life, his wife died. After spending 30 years in public service, which culminated in a post at the court of the count of Flanders, Idesbald entered the Cistercian Abbey of LES DUNES. A few years later, he was elected the third abbot; he ruled the monastery for 20 years. His vigor in religion was matched by his energy in increasing the possessions of the monastery. At his death, he was interred in a lead sarcophagus, contrary to the custom of the order. His cultus was approved in 1894.

Feast: April 18.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Apr. 2:584-590. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 2:69, 72. J. DE CUYPER, Idesbald van der Gracht (Bruges 1946). J. ARNOLD, Idesbald, le phare du Westhoek (Bruges 1969). S. LENSSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense 109-111.

[J. R. SOMMERFELDT]

IDLENESS, MORAL ASPECTS OF

Idleness is inactivity, although when applied to persons it is often understood less as a negation than as a misdirection of activity, as when a person busies himself with trivial or futile things and neglects what is serious and worthwhile. In contrast to terms sometimes taken as its synonyms—laziness, indolence, and slothfulness—it may or may not have moral connotations. The enforced idleness of workers in times of general unemployment, for example, is not a moral situation, so far, at least, as the workers are concerned. Idleness is the substantive of the adjective idle, which comes from the Middle English and Anglo-Saxon idel, meaning vain or useless. This sense persists in the use of the adjectival form, but the current meaning of the substantive tends to emphasize the derived notion of inactivity, and it is often accompanied by the disparaging suggestion of culpable laziness. This trend to a moral sense brings the meaning of the word close to that of other terms more familiar in the Latin tradition—otiositas, pigritia, segnities, and torpor. However, because the meaning of these terms is only indifferently conveyed by the English “idleness,” this word is not commonly used in manuals of asceticism, moral theology, or ethics. Laziness, or sloth in the sense of spiritual laziness, are the more common terms.

Idleness, even when voluntary, is not necessarily sinful. Eagerness to improve each shining hour can be excessive, for a man has need of rest and relaxation (see EUTRAPELIA). When in the overall picture too much time is given to relaxation, there is inevitably some fault because of the neglect both of duty and of the opportunity for good. Thus it is stated in the Rule of St. Benedict, “Idleness is an enemy of the soul” (ch. 48). The law of work is the law of man’s nature as well as the law of God (Gn 2.15; 3.19). Created imperfect, man must use his faculties to develop them. Idleness is a threat to, if not a frustration of, this process. In this sense it is opposed to all virtue, rather than to any virtue in particular, and this perhaps explains why St. Thomas Aquinas treated it only in passing (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 41.4; 44.4 ad 3), associating it with fear, and specifically the fear of the exertion that work would entail.

Since idleness is culpable because it involves the neglect of something obligatory, its specific nature and gravity as a sin depends on the character of the obligation that is left unfulfilled. Sometimes idleness is blameworthy because of its source, as when it comes from a disinterest in or distaste for the spiritual values that should arouse one to effort and activity (see ACEDIA). Finally, idleness can be culpable because it provides an occasion of sin, “for idleness is an apt teacher of mischief” (Sir 33.28). The specific malice in this case is indistinguishable from that of the mischief to which it generally leads.

Bibliography: E. VANSTEENBERGHE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 11.2:2023–30.

[P. FITZGERALD]

IDOLATRY

The worship or paying of divine honors to a false god as represented by some image or idol in which he is believed to be present. Idolatry is an offense against the virtue of religion and a direct violation of the First Commandment. It is also opposed to charity and faith: to charity, because it would deprive God of the supreme sovereignty that is His; to faith, because it is a denial of the truth that faith professes. This opposition to faith is manifestly evident when the external act of idolatrous worship proceeds from an inner conviction, or opinion, or suspicion, that the idol is adorable, because such a state of mind is radically incompatible with faith in the one true God. But there is opposition to faith even if the act is only externally simulated in conformity to custom or law but without internal belief in the false divinity or desire to honor it, for it is a transgression of the precept of divine law obliging men to confess their faith externally and under no circumstances to deny it (Mt 10.32–33). How abhorrent even a pretense of idolatry is to the Christian conscience is apparent from the reaction of 3d-century Christians to the behavior of the so-called libellatici, i.e., those who purchased or secured in some other manner libelli, or certificates attesting that they had conformed to idolatrous religious tests required by an edict of Decius, even though they had not in fact done so.

Idolatry is not formally sinful on the part of those who are in inculpable ignorance of the true God and of the sham and falsity of the idol. It is, however, a misfortune and an evil, because the worshiper puts his trust in a lifeless idol from which no good can come [Ps 113B(115)] and accepts in some degree at least the perversion or distortion of values that it represents.

In modern times idolatry in any strict sense of the word is not a sin of frequent occurrence in the Western world, although it appears to have a place in the practices of DEVIL WORSHIP and SATANISM. For the most part, however, modern man’s closest acquaintance with it is likely to be in its metaphorical form, i.e., the idolatry into which one falls when he attributes supreme value to something less than God and pursues it as his ultimate goal in life. Avarice in its grosser forms seems to invite this metaphor. It is the worshiping of a golden calf; thus Our Lord personified Mammon and represented it as a false god (Mt 6.24), and St. Paul spoke of covetousness as a serving of idols (Eph 5.5; Col 3.5).

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, ST 2a2ae, 94, 1–4. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7:602–669.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

IDOLATRY (IN THE BIBLE)

In the OT, idolatry was strictly prohibited; Yahweh is represented as a “jealous God” who tolerates no other god or idol besides Him (Ex 20.3–6; Dt 5.7–10). However, the Israelites at various times in their history committed idolatry, worshiping Canaanitic and Mesopotamian deities (Nm 25.3; Jgs 2.12; 3.37; 1 Kgs 14.22–24; 2 Kgs

Israelites Worshipping the Golden Calf, from “Liber Chronicarum.” (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

21.2–7; Hos 2.8–13; Am 8.14; Jer 2.23). Various deities, symbols, and images were worshiped, e.g., the Canaanite god BAAL (represented as a bull), the goddess ASTARTE, the stars, and the sun. After the division of Solomon’s kingdom Jeroboam I sponsored idolatrous worship of the cities Dan and BETHEL (1 Kgs 12.29–33). Ahab, under the influence of Jezebel, established the cult of Baal in Samaria (1 Kgs 16.32; 2 Kgs ch. 10). Earlier the liberal policy of SOLOMON had encouraged the idolatrous cults introduced by his foreign wives into Judah (1 Kgs 11.1–12; 15.13). The later reforms of Kings Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18.4) and Josiah (2 Kings ch. 23) indicate to what extent idolatry had pervaded Jerusalem and even the Temple itself. But after the death of Josiah even grosser forms of idolatry were practiced (Ez 8.10, 14, 16; Is 65.2–7; 66.3, 17). The Israelite exiles, however, regarded the Babylonian cults with ridicule and supreme contempt (Is 40.18–26; 44.9–20; 46.1–2). The true worshiper of Yahweh always considered idolatry as infidelity or adultery (in symbolic language) against God (Hos 2.4–7; Jer 2.20–24); Yahweh alone is the one true God, and outside of Him there is no other (Dt 4.35; 1 Kgs 8.6–60; 2 Kgs 19.15; Jer 2.11; Is 41.29; 46.9). The Prophets often inveighed against Baal and other idols venerated by the Israelites (1 Kgs 18.27; Is 2.8; Ezekiel ch. 6). Amos (2.4) branded idols as “lies which lead men astray”; and Jeremiah (2.5, 11; 5.7) called them “empty idols” and “no-gods” (Wis 13.10–14.11; Bar ch. 6). According to Wis 14.15–21, idolatry is caused by images made in memory of the dead that in the course of time became objects of worship. Later Judaism regarded pagan deities not merely as nonentities or as dead but also as spirits or angels sent by God Himself to rule over pagan nations (Dt 32.8; Dn 10.20–21; 12.1; Enoch 89.59), or as demons and evil spirits (Dt 32.17; Bar 4.7; Enoch 19.1).

In the NT the same ideas prevail for the most part: idolatry refers to the worship of gods other than the one, true God, and the use of images is characteristic of the life of the heathen. Idols are viewed as nonentities and helpless (Acts 7.41; 15.20; Rom 2.22; 1 Cor 12.2; 2 Cor 6.16; 1 Thes 1.9; 1 Jn 5.21; Ap 9.20); they have no real existence (1 Cor 8.4; 10.19; Gal 4.8), and they are nothing more than the inventions of sinful men (Rom 1.23). Pagan worship is really paid to evil spirits (1 Cor 8.4–5; 10.19–21) and thereby viewed as a grave sin (1 Cor 5.10–11; Gal 5.20). The term idolatry is used also figuratively in the NT to signify the undue desire for wealth and created things instead of fidelity and devotion to God (Mt 6.24; Eph 5.5; Phil 3.19; Col 3.5).

Bibliography: M. REHM and J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v (2nd, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65). 4:1146–49. K. KOCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65). 2:1680–82. A. GELIN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed., L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–). 4:169–187. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963). 1047–48. J. GRAY, G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., The Interpreters’ Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962). 2:675–678. F. BÜCHSEL, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch Zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–). 2:373–377.

[C. H. PICKAR]

IDUBERGA, BL.

Widow; b. c. 592; d. Nivelles, May 8, 652. Iduberga (Ida or Itta) was the daughter of a count of Aquitaine, was married to Bl. Pepin of Landen, the mayor of the palace, and was the mother of SS. BEGGA and GERTRUDE OF NIVELLES. As a widow, she was advised by St. AMANDUS to found an abbey at Nivelles (Belgium). She dedicated herself and all her property to this monastery, whose first nuns came from Ireland. Five years before she died Iduberga arranged for her daughter Gertrude to succeed her as superior at Nivelles; she was buried in St. Peter’s, Nivelles. Later her relics were placed in a reliquary that is carried in a procession each year with the relics of the other saints of Nivelles.

Feast: May 8.

Bibliography: Life. Acta Sanctorum March 2:594–600. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptorum rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 2:447–474. Literature. B. DELANNE, Histoire . . . Nivelles (Nivelles, Belgium 1944). É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945–) v.1. J. J. HOEBANX, L'Abbaye de Nivelles . . . (Brussels 1952). G. MARSOT, Catholicism 5:1172–73.

[É. BROUETTE]

IGNATIAN SPIRITUALITY

The JESUITS have derived their spirituality from the experience of their founder, St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, and from the spirit that he inculcated in his growing order. The writings that he left—his Autobiography, SPIRITUAL EXERCISES, Letters, Spiritual Journal, and Constitutions—give an idea of what these were, although he did not present them systematically or didactically. From this material it is evident that the principal features of Ignatian spirituality can be traced back to St. Ignatius' personal concept of God and to his concept of the behavior and the prayer life of the spiritual man.

Concept of God. After his interior transformation at Loyola, Ignatius remained at Manresa from March 1522 to February 1523. "At that time," as the Autobiography declares (n. 27), "God treated him exactly as a schoolmaster treats a child—He instructed him. This can be seen in the five points that follow." These five points describe the mystical knowledge he received about the Trinity, creation, Christ in the Eucharist, Jesus in His humanity, Our Lady, and finally, of all things seen in a new light (Autobiography 28–30). Thus God revealed Himself to Ignatius as the transcendent Trinity, which creates the world, sends the Son to it in the Eucharistic Sacrament, and brings all back to Itself through the mediation of Jesus and the Virgin, following a design that embraces all terrestrial reality in salvation.

These elements of Ignatian spirituality are expressed in the Exercises and perhaps more explicitly in the Spiritual Journal. He emphasizes in his "Contemplation to Attain the Love of God" (Exercises 230–237), which seems to be the goal of his Exercises, that it is God who gives blessings and Himself. It is He who lives in His creatures and works through them for us, He who is the source of all good things. It is He who moves the will and brings to one's mind what he ought to do (ibid. 180) by His love that descends from above (ibid. 184), for it has designs for us, a holy will (ibid. 1, 91, 135) that is dynamically made known in the inner recesses of our being.

Such a concept explains the titles that Ignatius easily gives to God, calling Him, for example, Creator, Goodness, and Providence. These terms had a very concrete sense for Ignatius. They imply a divine action exercised upon us and one that we can "feel." In the Trinity the Autograph vote of St. Ignatius Loyola, April 5, 1541, for the election of preposito generale.

God of infinite fullness pours Himself forth in an unceasing creative act and in an operation that in us is light, incitement, and union. Ignatius' letters generally were concluded with some such expression as "I close asking that God will grant us grace to know His holy will and perfectly to do it." The will of God is a "divine motion" (Monumenta historica Societatis Jesu "Epistolae" [Rome 1932–] 7.465). "I hope in the Lord," he wrote, "that if my prayers win you any favor, it will be entirely from on high, descending from His infinite goodness" (ibid. 1.339). "May it be pleasing to His divine clemency to communicate Himself so intimately to you and to direct your house and all that is entrusted to your care with a providence so particular that it may be known in a tangible manner that it is His divine majesty that disposes and watches over all in this matter" (ibid. 3.14). In heaven "all our wickedness will be entirely consumed in the furnace of the everlasting love of God, our Creator and Lord, when our souls shall be completely penetrated and possessed by Him and our wills thus totally conformed to—or rather, transformed into—His will, which is rectitude and infinite goodness" (ibid. 1.627).

This divine influence passes through Christ. Jesus Christ is at the center of Ignatian spirituality. He is "the Creator who has stooped to become man" and who became “the eternal Lord of all things” (Exercises 53, 98); He calls us, and our whole destiny consists in knowing the Lord intimately in order to love Him more and follow Him more closely (ibid. 104). Thus the will of God is done through Christ, who incorporates it and brings it to fulfillment. Through the work done in Him (ibid. 95), the story of salvation is completed. During the year and a half between his ordination and his first Mass, Ignatius frequently asked Mary to “put him with her Son”; before celebrating Mass, he had a vision in the chapel of Storta near Rome in which Christ, carrying a cross and accompanied by His Father, said to him: “I want you to serve us.” One enters the “Company of Jesus” to “fight under the standard of the Cross and to serve the one Lord as well as the Church, His Spouse, under the guidance of the Roman Pontiff, who takes the place of Christ on earth” (Formula Instituti 1). It is not surprising that the great majority of spiritual authors of the society in their works have emphasized assimilation to Christ, the Incarnate Word, or that the Jesuits have been ardent promoters of devotion to the Sacred Heart.

The Spiritual Man According to St. Ignatius.

From this view of God, an idea of the behavior that befits a Christian is easily deduced. In the presence of the Divine Majesty who is the source of all good, man must respond with reverence and grateful attention. He should feel what Ignatius calls “loving humility” (Spiritual Journal March 30) and a eucharistic kind of gratitude that causes him to say: “You have given me all, I give it back to You, Lord” (Exercises 234). He is aware that priority in the spiritual life must be given to “the interior law of charity and love that the Holy Spirit writes and imprints in our hearts” (preamble to the Constitutions). That is to say, the creature is called upon to abandon itself to belong to its Creator (Epistolae 1.339), to become docile to the action of the Holy Spirit in it, to submit itself lovingly to the divine will. Because of this, Ignatius attached great importance to self-denial, spiritual DISCERNMENT, and obedience. One must be attentive in following the divine will in all decisions that he makes (Constitutions 3.1, 26); the examination of conscience, to which St. Ignatius held so strongly and which is the daily repetition of the “Contemplation to Attain the Love of God,” is for the purpose of causing one to keep check upon the rightness of his dispositions.

However since one is engaged in work with Christ, one must have a spirituality that directs the heart, with Christ’s, toward others, the Church, and the design of God that must be fulfilled here on earth. Ignatian spirituality is essentially apostolic, that is, concerned with the kingdom. Ignatius frequently used, especially in the Constitutions, the formula “to help one’s neighbor”; his eternal King calls each in particular “to the conquest of the world” (Exercises 95). Man is created to serve God and Christ in the enterprise of the salvation of mankind (ibid. 146). Reverence toward the God of majesty is expressed in the service of others accomplished under the impetus coming from this same God, who is at work on earth through Jesus Christ. For St. Ignatius, the glory of God always connotes an apostolic perspective, a reference to neighbor, to the “universal good”; a truly remarkable view of this is found in the Spiritual Journal. After his mystical insight into the divine essence, the Persons of the Trinity, the humanity of Christ, Ignatius was moved to a profound, reverential love for these great things and was also moved in an extraordinary manner by the Lord, to a similar loving reverence for creatures (Spiritual Journal, March 30). The whole Ad amorem of the Exercises is there; it is “to love and serve the divine majesty in all things” (Exercises 233). If this apostolic ideal in the society presupposes a magnanimous docility on the part of all, it nevertheless demands a strong cohesive bond tying Jesuits one to another: in his Constitutions Ignatius insists upon fraternal charity as well as upon obedience.

Ignatian Prayer. Faithful to the graces he had received, Ignatius placed the life of prayer more in work undertaken under the impulse of love than in the repose of contemplation. His Lord is a God of action, present in the world and in history; it is a duty of man to “seek God in all things,” to “love Him in all His creatures” (Constitutions 3.1, 26), to “serve Him in all” (Exercises 233). Thus one ought to be, according to the formula of Ignatius’ confidant, G. NADAL, a “contemplative in action.” In union with God in every thing and activity, St. Ignatius saw an eminent form of prayer. He declared: “Occupations undertaken for His greater service and in conformity to His divine will interpreted through obedience, can be not only the equivalent of the union and recollection of uninterrupted contemplation, but even more acceptable to God, proceeding as they do from a more active and vigorous charity” (Epistolae 4.127).

That is not to say that he belittled prayer. He wanted novices to be taught “the way of praying and meditating” (Constitutions 3.1, 20), and although he generally dispensed his students from meditation, leaving them the Mass, two examinations of conscience a day, and vocal prayer (ibid. 4.4, 3), he wished for those religious who have arrived at the term of their formation that “there should be no other rule except the one that prudent charity would dictate” (ibid. 6.3, 1). He himself had recourse to long prayers as is revealed in his Spiritual Journal.

There was a tension in him between mental prayer and contemplative action. In his order this tension soon took on the form of a conflict between the contemplatives and those who held to practical prayer. In 1590 C. ACQUAVIVA, then general of the society, ended the debate by determining that the daily prayer hour for all, instituted by Borgia, should remain in the rule, but that formed religious should not be forbidden to exceed that time, nor should those who had the grace be forbidden to practice higher forms of prayer provided these did not prove to be an obstacle to apostolic works. Forty years later M. VITELLESCHI approved the teaching of Louis LALLEMANT on contemplation.

Even if some Jesuits have shown opposition to mysticism, one could not fairly accuse the society itself of it. Ignatius was a mystic, as were several of his companions and first disciples, and in the long course of its history the society has given great spiritual writers to the Church. At the end of his book An Ignatian Approach to Divine Union (tr. H. L. Brozowski, Milwaukee 1956), Louis Peeters, SJ, names about 100 Jesuits who were mystical authors. It remains true, nevertheless, that the spirituality proper to St. Ignatius is complete "familiarity with God" that causes one to be a "united instrument" of God (Constitutions 10.2).

Conclusion. St. Ignatius, who so often received "visits from the Lord," always kept to himself his nostalgia for the luminous abysses of the Trinity; but he knew he had been chosen more to transmit the divine light than to enjoy it. God called him to the work of the redemption, to the service of the Lord in the establishment of the kingdom. Thus he chose to be a soldier under the standard of the cross. Above, and at the same time the source of both contemplation and action, there is "love" (Exercises 230). However, though loving action often demands that one renounce the pleasures of contemplation, these are not lost without compensation in the holy gifts and spiritual favors from the Lord (cf. Epistolae 2.236; Exercises 316). Such a spirituality reminds one of St. Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, "urged by a love of Christ" and living in the intimacy of the Spirit.

Bibliography: Bibliographies. J. JUAMBELZ, Bibliografía sobre la vida, obras y escritos de San Ignacio de Loyola 1900–1950 (Madrid 1956). E. F. SUTCLIFFE, Bibliography of the English Province of the Society of Jesus (London 1957). J. F. GILMONT and P. DAMAN, Bibliographie Ignatienne 1894–1957 (Paris 1958). I. IPARRAGUIRRE, Répertoire de spiritualité ignatienne de la mort de S. Ignace à celle du P. Aquaviva, 1556–1615 (Rome 1961). Writings of St. Ignatius. Spiritual Exercises, tr. L. J. PUHL (Westminster, Md. 1951); Letters of St. Ignatius Loyola, ed. and tr. W. J. YOUNG (Chicago 1959); Constitutiones Societatis Iesu, ed. A. CODINA (Monumenta historica Societas Jesu; Rome 1934–38); "Spiritual Journal of St. I. Loyola," tr. W. J. YOUNG, Woodstock Letters 87 (1958) 195–267; St. Ignatius' Own Story as Told to Luis González de Cámara, tr. W. J. YOUNG (Chicago 1956). Literature. P. DE CHASTONAY, Les Constitutions de l'Ordre des Jésuites (Paris 1941). J. F. CONWELL, Contemplation in Action (Spokane 1957). J. DANIELLOU, "La Vision ignatienne du monde et de l'homme," Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 26 (1950) 5–17. J. DE GUIBERT, The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice, tr. W. J. YOUNG (Chicago 1964). J. A. HARDON, All My Liberty: Theology of the Spiritual Exercises (Westminster, Md. 1959). I. IPARRAGUIRRE, "Visión ignaciana de Dios," Gregorianum 37 (1956) 366–390. M. NICOLAU, Jeronimo Nadal, S.J. 1507–1580: Sus obras y doctrinas espirituales (Madrid 1949). L. PEETERS, An Ignatian Approach to Divine Union, tr. H. L. BROZOWSKI (Milwaukee 1956). E. PRZYWARA, Majestas divina: Ignatianische Frömmigkeit (Augsburg 1925); Deus semper maior: Theologie der Exerzitien, 3 v. (Freiburg 1938–40). H. RAHNER, The Spirituality of St. Ignatius Loyola, An Account of Its Historical Development, tr. F. J. SMITH (Westminster, Md. 1953). W. J. YOUNG, tr., Finding God in All Things: Essays in Ignatian Spirituality, Selected from "Christus" (Chicago 1958).

[J. LEWIS]

IGNATIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, ST.

Patriarchate, July 4, 847 to 858, and Nov. 23, 867 to Oct. 23, 877; b. c. 798; d. 877. He was the son of the Byzantine Emperor Michael I Rhangabe. When Michael was deposed in 813 by the iconoclastic Emperor LEO V, his sons, Nicetas, Theophylactus, and Stauracius, were castrated and with their whole family were obliged to take monastic vows. On becoming a monk, Nicetas took the name of Ignatius. He became abbot of three monasteries that he had founded in the Islands of the Princes. After the death of Patriarch METHODIUS I (847), who had condemned ICONOCLASM in 843, Empress Theodora (2) appointed Ignatius patriarch of Constantinople without convoking a local synod. She was motivated by fear of new conflicts between the zealot monks of STUDIO, excommunicated by Methodius for their opposition to his ecclesiastical policy, and the liberals who recommended milder treatment of penitent iconoclasts. Ignatius reconciled the Studite monks with the Church, and while patriarch manifested himself in sympathy with the policy of the zealots. Because of this he was sharply criticized by the more liberal prelates, some of whose leaders he suspended in 853. They appealed from the judgment of their patriarch to Pope LEO IV, who asked Ignatius to send a representative to Rome to vindicate his action. Ignatius complied. But before Rome could make a decision on the appeal, Ignatius became involved in the conflict between Theodora and her brother Bardas, who had forced her to end her regency for Emperor MICHAEL III. When Theodora tried vainly to return to power, she was forced to join her daughters in their confinement in a monastery. Ignatius refused to bless their monastic garb and abdicated (858), on the advice of the bishops who feared a harmful conflict between the Church and the new regime. PHOTIUS was elected as his successor by a local synod and recognized as legitimate patriarch by all the bishops, even by the followers of Ignatius on his recommendation. However, about two months after the enthronement of Photius, the radical followers of Ignatius rejected the new patriarch and demanded the restoration of Ignatius. Their revolt seems to have been directed against the new government. The leaders of the revolt were arrested by the imperial police and condemned by a local synod, convoked by Photius; the regent Bardas imprisoned Ignatius and interned him in various places, ultimately on the island of Terebinthus. Bardas must have recognized, however, that Ignatius was not the initiator of the revolt, because in 860 he permitted him to live in Constantinople in the palace of Posis built by Ignatius' mother. At the request of Michael III and Photius, Pope NICHOLAS I sent two legates to Constantinople to investigate the legality of Photius' election. After learning of the circumstances leading to Ignatius' abdication and Photius' election, the legates confirmed (861) the decision of the synod of 858, which had declared the patriarchate of Ignatius illegitimate because he had not been elected by a local synod, and they confirmed his deposition. Ignatius also seems to have accepted the decision of the synod, declaring that he had not appealed to Rome and had no intention of doing so. However, some radical supporters of Ignatius, especially Abbot THEOGNOSTOS, took refuge in Rome and appealed to Pope Nicholas in the name of Ignatius. The pope disavowed the action of his legates and, won over by the radical Ignatians, excommunicated Photius in a Roman synod (863), calling on Michael III to reinstate Ignatius as legitimate patriarch. Four years later the new Emperor Basil I, after murdering Michael III, looked for support from the radical Ignatians and Rome. He therefore deposed Photius and reinstated Ignatius (Nov. 23, 867). The legates of Pope ADRIAN II obtained from the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE IV in 869–870 the confirmation of the decisions of the Roman synod, although the majority of the clergy remained faithful to the deposed Patriarch Photius. The reinstated Ignatius soon came into sharp conflict with Pope John VIII because he established a hierarchy in Bulgaria, which defected from Rome. And when he defended his action and the interests of his Church among the Bulgars, he was threatened with excommunication by Rome. When Photius was recalled from exile by Basil I, who confided to him the education of his sons, Ignatius became reconciled with Photius and took the initiative in calling for another council, which would confirm the pacification of his Church. But before the papal legates had reached Rome, Ignatius died and Photius recovered the see. Ignatius was canonized by Photius himself. The mosaic portrait of Ignatius recently discovered in the HAGIA SOPHIA was probably initiated by Photius.

Feast: Oct. 23.

Bibliography: NICETAS DAVID, Life, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 105:487–574. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98); reprinted and continued by L. PETIT and J. B. MARTIN, 53 v. in 60 (Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960–) 16:209–550. Synodicon vetus: Monastery of Sinai, MS. Graecus Sinaiticus 482 (1117), fols. 364ff., for reconciliation and canonization. J. HERGENRÖTHER, Photius, Patriarch von Konstantinopel, 4 v. in 3 (Regensburg 1867–69) v.1, 2. J. B. BURY, A History of the Eastern Roman Empire . . . A.D. 802–867 (London 1912). R. JANIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 7.1:713–722. V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople (Kadikoi-Bucharest 1932–) v.1, 2 (1936). V. GRUMEL, “La Genèse du schisme photien,” Studi Bizantini 5 (1939) 177–185; “Le Schisme de Grégoire de Syracuse,” Échos d’Orient 39 (1940–42) 257–267. P. STÉPHANOU, “La Violation du compromis entre Photius et les ignatians,” Orientalia Christiana periodica 21 (1955) 291–307. F. DVORNIK, The Photian Schism (Cambridge, Eng. 1948); The Patriarch Photius in the Light of Recent Research (Munich 1958). R. J. H. JENKINS, “A Note on Nicolas David Paphlago and the Vita Constantini,” Dumbarton Oaks Papers (Cambridge, MA 1941–) 19 (1965).

[F. DVORNIK]

IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH, ST.

Bishop, primitive Church theologian, and martyr; b. Syria; d. Rome c. 110. Ignatius is known primarily through seven epistles he wrote in the course of his journey from Antioch to Rome as a prisoner condemned to death for his faith during the reign of Trajan (98–117). Apparently of Syrian origin and a convert from paganism, he was one of the earliest bishops of Antioch, possibly the third (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.22). Ignatius was received with great honor at Smyrna by Bishop (St.) POLYCARP, and visited by representatives of nearby churches. From Smyrna he wrote letters to the churches at Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles, and Rome. When taken to Troas, he wrote to the churches at Philadelphia and Smyrna, and to Polycarp. His journey then proceeded through Macedonia and Illyria to Dyrrachium, where he took a ship to Italy. His martyrdom in Rome is attested to by Polycarp, whose epistle to the Philippians appears to consist of two sections: chapters 13 and 14 are a note that accompanied a collection of the Ignatian epistles sent to Philippi soon after the visit of Ignatius; chapters 1 to 12 were written c. 130 or 140 when Ignatius' martyrdom had become a memory that was already cherished throughout the Church.

Referring to himself as Theophorus, the God-bearer (Rom. praef.; Trall. praef.), Ignatius addressed the various churches to thank them for the sympathy they had expressed regarding his fate; he then exhorted them to fidelity to God and obedience to their superiors, warning them against heretical doctrines, and providing them with the solid truths of the Christian faith. He pleaded with the Romans not to use political influence to prevent his martyrdom since he considered himself the “wheat of God; and I must be ground by the teeth of wild beasts, to become the pure bread of Christ” (Rom. 1.2; 2.1; 4.1).

Ignatius recognized the continuity of revelation between the Old and the New Testament, seeing God’s providence as fulfilled in Jesus Christ “our only teacher, of Whom the prophets were disciples in the Spirit” (Mag. 9.1–2). He asserted unequivocally both the divinity and the humanity of Christ, the Savior: “the one and only physician, Who is both flesh and spiritual, born and unborn, God in man, true life in death, both of Mary and of God, first subject to suffering and then incapable of it, Jesus Christ our Lord” (Eph. 7.2). Against the heresy of DOCETISM, he insisted on the reality of Christ’s human sufferings, and His Real Presence in the Eucharist, and His Resurrection in the flesh: “He is really of the line of David according to the flesh, and the Son of God by the will and power of God; was truly born of a Virgin; and baptized by John to comply with all justice” (Smyr. 1.1). The Docetists, he charged, “refrain from the Eucharist and prayer because they do not confess that the Eucharist is the Flesh of our Savior, Jesus Christ, Who suffered for our sins; and that the Father in his goodness raised up” (Smyr. 7.1).

Concerning the Church, Ignatius insisted upon its sacramental character and unity under the governance of the bishop. “Take care to use one Eucharist: for there is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, and one cup in the union of His blood, and one altar, as there is one bishop, assisted by the presbytery and the deacons, my fellow servants” (Phil. 4). Insisting on the bishop’s function, Ignatius described the bishop and priests as representing Christ and the Apostles; and warned that nothing should be done concerning the Church without the bishop; Eucharist, Baptism, the celebration of the agape were valid only when done with his approval. “Wherever the bishop is, there let the people be, for there is the Catholic church” (Smyr. 8.1–2). Despite his possible youth, the bishop “presides in the place of God; the presbyters function as the council of the apostles, and the deacons are entrusted with the ministry of Jesus Christ” (Mag. 6.1).

In regard to the daily life of the Christian, the Ignatian epistles display a different concern from that of the Epistles of St. Paul. Addressing an audience almost completely devoid of the Judaic preoccupation with justification by the Law, Ignatius dealt with the Hellenistic experience of the omnipresence of death and destruction, and the longing for an imperishable life. In opposition to the superstitions and false beliefs of his pagan fellow citizens, he focused attention on the “newness of eternal life in Christ,” and urged on his Christian converts a complete transformation of mentality brought about by regeneration in Christ through Baptism.

The Christian, then, imitates God (Trall. 1.2; Pol. 1.3) and Christ in His Passion (Rom. 6.3); death in and with Christ will be the consummation of the union with God that he strives for in the practice of virtue, particularly in charity (agape), whereby he gives himself totally to the community (Eph. 10.1–3; 14.1–2; Smyr. 6.2–7). This becomes concrete in the care for the “widow and the orphan, the oppressed, the prisoner, as well as the freeman, the hungry and the thirsty” (Smyr. 6.2).

Concerning marriage, Christians have a right to enter the married state with the sanction of the bishop that it may be according to the Lord, and not for passion. Wives who love the Lord will be content with their husbands in body and in spirit; and husbands are to love their wives as Christ loves the Church. At the same time “if any man can remain continent to the honor of the flesh of the Lord, let him do so without boasting” (Pol. 5.1–2).

Writing to the Romans, Ignatius acknowledged that their Church “presides in the land of the Romans” and is worthy of God; of honor, blessing, praise, success, and holiness; and of presiding in love. He likewise acknowledged that he could not command them as did “Peter and Paul who were apostles.” Despite considerable discussion and controversy over the significance of this deference and extensive praise, the letter cannot be used as witness to the primacy of the Roman See as such, since Ignatius’ purpose was instead to persuade the Romans to do nothing to interfere with his martyrdom.

His literary style, while highly personal, reflects the Asianism then characteristic of the Hellenistic education he received. His doctrine is strongly Pauline, particularly in Christology and moral direction, but he exhibited also a close familiarity with the Johannine theology.

The manuscript tradition of these letters presented a long and a short recension, the former containing six spurious letters added by an interpolator in the fourth century. The authenticity of the original short recension is now fully vindicated.

Feast: Oct. 17 (formerly Feb. 1); Dec. 20 (Greek Church).

Bibliography: Cartes, tr. M. ESTRADÉ (Montserrat 1988). K. BIHLMAYER, ed., Die Apostolischen Väter, v.1 (2d ed. Tübingen 1956). M. P. BROWN, The Authentic Writings of Ignatius: A Study of Linguistic Criteria (Durham, N.C. 1963). K. LAKE, ed., The Apostolic Fathers, 2 v. (Loeb Classical Library; London–New York–Cambridge, Mass. 1912–13) v.1. T. LECHNER, Ignatius adversus Valentinianos?: chronologische und theologisches Studien zu den Briefen des Ignatius von Antiochien (Leiden 1999). J. RIUS-CAMPS, The Four Authentic Letters of Ignatius, the Martyr (Rome 1980). W. R. SCHOEDEL, A Commentary on the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch, ed. H. KOESTER (Philadelphia 1985). C. UHRIG, Sorge für die Einheit, über die nichts geht: zum episkopalen Selbstverständnis des Ignatius von Antiochien (Altenberge 1998), bibliography. L. WEHR, Arznei der Unsterblichkeit: die Eucharistie bei Ignatius von Antiochien und im Johannesevangelium (Münster 1987), Eucharistic theology. C. T. BROWN, The Gospel and Ignatius of Antioch (New York 2000). J. KLEIST, ed. and tr., Ancient Christian Writers 1 (1946) 52–146. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–53) 1:63–76. J. LEBRETON, Recherches de science religieuse 15 (1925) 97–126, Trinity. J. JOUSSARD, ibid. 39 (1951–52) 361–367, martyr. J. H. CREHAN, Studia patristica v.1 (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 63; 1957) 23–32. L. CRISTIANI, Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 25 (1949) 109–116, mysticism. V. CORWIN, St. Ignatius and Christianity in Antioch (New Haven 1960). H. RIESENFELD, Studia patristica, v.4 (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 70; 1961) 312–322, theology. P. MEINHOLD, Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 77 (1958) 50–62, ethics. K. P. WESCHE, “The Criterion of Orthodoxy and the Marks of Catholicity,” Pro Ecclesia 3 (winter 1994): 89–109. A. BRENT, “History and Eschatological Mysticism in Ignatius of Antioch,” Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 65 no. 4 (1989): 309–329.

[F. X. MURPHY]

IGNATIUS OF LACONI, ST.

Lay brother; b. Laconi (Nuoro), Sardinia, Dec. 10, 1701; d. Cagliari, Sardinia, May 11, 1781. The second of seven children born to peasants Mattia and Anna Maria Peis was baptized Francis Ignatius Vincent. He was never taught to read or write, but from childhood he gave evidence of sanctity. On Nov. 10, 1721, he entered the Capuchin Order at Cagliari as a lay brother. For 60 years he edified his confreres and the people of Cagliari, where he served his Order as questor for alms, by his heroic austerity, humility, and charity, and the gift of miracles. Ignatius was beatified by PIUS XII, June 16, 1940, and later canonized by the same pontiff, Oct. 21, 1951.

Feast: May 11 (formerly May 12).

Bibliography: A. FIORENTINO, Yours Is the Kingdom: The Life of St. Ignatius of Laconi, ed. tr. C. FLORA and M. MOAKLER (Paterson, N.J. 1953). Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 800–801.

[T. MACVICAR]

IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, ST.

Founder and first general of the Society of Jesus; b. Casa Torre of Loyola, Azpeitia, province of Guipúzcoa, Spain, 1491; d. Rome, July 31, 1556. This last son of Beltrán Yáñez de Oñaz and María Sáenz de Licona was baptized Iñigo in the parish church of St. Sebastian. From 1537 on he used also the name Ignatius, particularly in official documents, because it was more universally known (Ribadeneyra). There is no justification for the family name Recalde, as formerly alleged. His boyhood was spent in the Casa Torre, and during his adolescent years (1506?–17), he was a page of Juan Velázquez de Cuéllar, alcalde of the fortress towns of Arévalo and Truxillo, and ministro de Hacienda (treasurer general) for Ferdinand the Catholic. Ignatius followed the court to Arévalo, Valladolid, Medina del Campo, Segovia, and Madrid; and when Velázquez lost the favor of the king, Ignatius was attached to the household of Antonio Manrique de Lara, Duke of Nájera and Viceroy of Navarre (1516). In his service he accomplished successful military assignments, including the defeat of the Comuneros of Guipúzcoa (a faction opposed to Emperor Charles V).

Conversion. When King Francis I of France sent troops into Spain to reestablish the claims of Jean d'Albret to the kingdom of Navarre, Ignatius, while defending the castle of Pamplona, was struck by a cannon shot that wounded one leg and broke the other (May 20, 1521). In the course of his convalescence at Loyola he learned of the heroism of sanctity by reading the Vita Christi of LUDOLPH OF SAXONY and the Flos sanctorum of JAMES OF VORAGINE, and he resolved to go to the Holy Land. He traveled first to Montserrat, where he made a night vigil before Our Lady (March 24–25, 1522) and received spiritual direction from the French Benedictine Jean Chanones. Before reaching Montserrat Ignatius vowed perpetual chastity and dedicated himself to a spiritual life. Then for 11 months he remained at nearby Manresa, residing for a time in a cell of the Dominican priory, administering to the sick at the Hospital of St. Lucy, and spending hours in penance and prayer in a cave. At this time he wrote in substance the SPIRITUAL EXERCISES, which he completed in Paris and Rome (1522–41). At Manresa he suffered from scruples, which gave way to spiritual revelations and the decisive illumination near the Cardoner River.

Ignatius left Manresa toward the end of February 1523, and after many delays landed at Jaffa on September 1, with a party of pilgrims. The hostility of the Turks prevented fulfillment of his original plan to remain in the Holy Land, so he returned to Europe and began a program of study at Barcelona (1524–26), Alcalá (1526–27), Salamanca (1527), and Paris (1528–35). During these 11 years he studied Latin, philosophy, and theology. Both at Alcalá and Salamanca he was suspected of being an ALUMBRADOS (ILLUMINATI) and was interrogated and imprisoned.

Ignatius obtained his master of arts degree at Paris in 1534, and on August 15 of that year, together with Peter FABER, Francis XAVIER, Diego LAÍNEZ, Alfonso SALMERÓN, Nicolás de BOBADILLA, and Simón Rodriguez, he vowed to live in poverty and chastity and to go to the Holy Land. It was determined that, if this journey became impossible, the group would offer itself to the apostolic service of the pope. The following year on the same day, he renewed the vows with three new companions, Paschase Broët, Jean Codure, and Claude LE JAY. When the war between Venice and the Turkish Empire prevented their pilgrimage, they placed themselves in the hands of Paul III (1538).

Foundation of the Society of Jesus. At this time Ignatius resolved to make their association permanent. After the encouragement of his vision at La Storta, a shrine nine miles from Rome (November 1537), in which he heard the words, “Ego vobis Romae propitius ero” (“I shall be favorable to you at Rome”), and after long deliberations with his followers, he drew up the five fundamental chapters of the rule for a new institute. The Society of Jesus was approved orally by Paul III at Tivoli (Sept. 3, 1539), and solemnly confirmed by him in the bull Regimini militantis ecclesiae (Sept. 27, 1540). During Lent 1541, Ignatius, against his desire, was elected general of the new society and on April 22, with his companions, went on pilgrimage to the seven stational basilicas of Rome and made solemn profession at St. Paul–Outside–the–Walls. While his companions were sent on missions by the pope, he remained in Rome to consolidate the society, direct the admission of new members, write the first two texts of the constitution (1547–49), and carry on an enormous correspondence (more than 6,000 letters are published). At the same time he founded and supported many apostolic projects for the moral renewal of the city—homes for orphans, for catechumens, and for penitent women (House of St. Martha). Through the influence of Francis BORGIA, Duke of Gandia, he obtained Paul III’s approval of the Spiritual Exercises (July 31, 1548). JULIUS III, by the bull Exposcit debitum (July 21, 1550), reconfirmed the society and determined its internal structure, giving as its goal the defense and propagation of the faith. In February 1551 Ignatius founded the Roman College, intended as the prototype for the colleges of the society. By the next year it had 300 students. Although initially dedicated to the teaching of grammar and humanities, it offered classes in philosophy and theology in 1553. He also instituted the German College (1552) for the training of future apostles of Germany.

Constitutions. During his generalate, besides writing rules of conduct and instructions, such as the famed letter on obedience (1553), Ignatius spent years of thought and experimentation in determining the Constitutions. To his followers, designated canonically as Canons Regular, he gave distinctive characteristics that would have extensive effect in religious life in general. To assure efficacy and mobility in the apostolate, he proposed obedience as the prominent virtue, renounced monastic choir, a fixed garb, and penances obligatory on all. Members of the society in any of its various grades must shun high ecclesiastical office unless ordered by the pope. Ignatius prolonged the novitiate to a period of two years, established simple vows that preceded the solemn profession, and a third probation after studies. He was inflexible in refusing the regular ministry of religious women, and excluded the foundation of any women’s branch of the society, especially after the unsuccessful experiment in which, to please his benefactress, Isabel Roser, he allowed a group of religious women to place themselves under his obedience. He also replaced various types of capitular jurisdiction with a monarchical organization, in which the general, though aided by consultors and provincials, was elected for life and responsible only to the general congregation.

St. Ignatius of Loyola.

Ignatian Ideal. By those portions of his Diario espiritual that have been preserved (Feb. 2, 1544–Feb. 27, 1545), Ignatius is revealed as a true mystic. His spiritual life moved in an atmosphere that was particularly Trinitarian, Christological, and Eucharistic. To his devotion to the Trinity, Christ as Savior and prototype of perfection, and the Eucharistic life centered in the Mass, he added a great affection for Our Lady. His ideal was the greater promotion of God's glory (ad majorem Dei gloriam), and he saw this as the work of the society. To bring men to know their destiny and to teach them how to attain it is the apostolic ideal that guided his actions and his rules. All apostolic action must however be guided by true love of the Church and an unconditional obedience to the Vicar of Christ. For this end Ignatius imposed on all professed members a fourth solemn vow of obedience to the pope. His aspiration was to give the Church and the papacy the greatest possible service, and his direction of the society was based on this foundation.

Ignatius' emphasis upon obedience has often given a misguided impression of inflexibility and militaristic regime. The love from his subjects and the admiration of contemporaries for his genius in organization and profound understanding of personalities prove such a view unjustified. In 1551 he asked the fathers, assembled for the examination of the Constitutions, to be relieved of his office because of ill health, but was refused. He continued in power and at the end of his life declared that God had granted the three graces he most desired: the confirmation of the Society, the approval of the Spiritual Exercises, and the completion of the Constitutions. At his death, the Society had 1,000 members distributed throughout 100 houses in 12 provinces. Ignatius was beatified by Pope Paul V on July 27, 1609, and canonized by Paul's successor, Pope Gregory XV on March 12, 1622. Pope Pius XI in 1922 declared him patron of spiritual exercises and retreats.

Iconography. Besides the death mask (see illustration) and portraits taken from it, three paintings are considered authentic, those by Jacopino del Conte and Alonzo Sánchez Coello, and an anonymous portrait. Among numerous artistic representations are the statues by Juan Martínez Montañés, Gregorio Hernández, and Pierre le Gros. The last exists in a copy by Ludovisi in the church of the Gesù, Rome. There are paintings by Andreas Pozzo, SJ, in the church of S. Ignazio, Rome; by Juan Espinosa in the museum in Valencia; by Peter Paul Rubens, painted for the Jesuit church at Antwerp and now in the Hofmuseum, Vienna; and by Juan de las Roelas; and bas-reliefs by Allesandro Algardi and Renato Fremin.

Feast: July 31.

See Also: JESUITS.

Bibliography: Obras completas, ed. I. IPARRAGUIRRE and C. DE DALMASES (Biblioteca de autores cristianos 86; 2d ed. Madrid 1963). Extensive sources for his life and writings are found in the Monumenta historica Societatis Jesu (Madrid 1894–Rome 1932–). Autobiography, ibid. v.1, critical text; St. Ignatius' Own Story as Told to Luis González de Cámara, tr. W. J. YOUNG (Toronto 1956); Cartes espirituales de S. Ignasi de Loyola, ed. I. CASANOVAS,

2 v. (Barcelona 1936); Lettres, tr. G. DUMEIGE (Paris 1959); Letters and Instructions, ed. A. GOODIER, tr. D. F. O'LEARY, v.1 (St. Louis 1914); Letters to Women, ed. H. RAHNER, tr. K. POND and S. A. H. WEETMAN (New York 1960). Literature. J. BRODRICK, Saint Ignatius Loyola: The Pilgrim Years (New York 1956). P. DUDON, St. Ignatius of Loyola, tr. W. J. YOUNG (Milwaukee 1949). P. LETURIA, Iñigo de Loyola, tr. A. J. OWEN (Syracuse, N.Y. 1949). L. VON MATT and H. RAHNER, St. Ignatius of Loyola: A Pictorial Biography, tr. J. MURRAY (Chicago 1956). M. PURCELL, The First Jesuit (Westminster, Md. 1957). P. TACCHI-VENTURI, Storia della Compagnia di Gesù in Italia (2d ed. Rome 1950–51). R. GARCIA-VILLOSLADA, Ignacio de Loyola, un español al servicio del pontificado (Zaragoza 1956). J. DE GUIBERT, The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice, tr. W. J. YOUNG (Chicago 1964). A. M. ALAREDA, Sant Ignasi a Montserrat (Montserrat 1935). A. HUONDER, Ignatius von Loyola: Beiträge zu seinem Charakterbild (Cologne 1932). H. RAHNER, The Spirituality of St. Ignatius Loyola, tr. F. J. SMITH (Westminster, Md. 1953). J. F. GILMONT and P. DAMAN, Bibliographie ignatienne 1894–1957 (Paris 1958). I. IPARRAGUIRRE, Orientaciones bibliográficas sobre san Ignacio de Loyola (2d ed. Rome 1965). J. F. CONWELL, Impelling Spirit: Revisiting a Founding Experience: 1539, Ignatius Loyola and His Companions (Chicago 1997). M. J. BUCKLEY, "Ecclesial Mysticism in the Spiritual Exercises of Ignatius," Theological Studies 56 (1995): 441–463. J. I. TELLECHEA IDIGORAS, Ignatius of Loyola: The Pilgrim Saint, trans. C. M. BUCKLEY (Chicago 1994). J. GIULIETTI, "Contemplative Hearts, Compassionate Hands: The Ignatian Vision of Justice," in Let Justice Roll Down Like Waters, ed. W. J. O'BRIEN (Washington, D.C. 1993), 1–17. P. CARAMAN, Ignatius Loyola: A Biography of the Founder of the Jesuits (San Francisco 1990). J. L. SEGUNDO, The Christ of the Ignatian Exercises (London 1987). A. RAVIER, Ignatius of Loyola and the Founding of the Society of Jesus (San Francisco 1987). F. WULF, Ignatius of Loyola: His Personality and Spiritual Heritage, 1556–1956: Studies on the 400th Anniversary of His Death (St. Louis 1977).

[C. DE DALMASES]

IGNORANCE

Lack of knowledge in someone capable of having such knowledge (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 101.1 ad 2; 1a2ae, 76.2; De malo 3.7). As a defect of KNOWLEDGE, ignorance resembles ERROR and nescience. However, ignorance denotes no cognitive activity, whereas error denotes cognitive activity of a kind that is either positively or negatively inadequate. Ignorance differs from nescience also in that ignorance is the lack of knowledge in someone who is by nature capable of having it; nescience is the absence of knowledge in someone not naturally capable of having it. Hence, one should attribute nescience rather than ignorance to infants.

Role in Knowledge. Ignorance can be privative or negative respectively, insofar as he who lacks knowledge can or cannot reasonably be expected to possess it. Thus ignorance of anatomy is negative ignorance for an engineer; it is privative ignorance for a medical doctor.

Unconscious, unrecognized ignorance is sterile—equivalent in effect to mere nescience. However, ignorance recognized as such ceases to be complete ignorance (cf. ST 1a2ae, 27.2 ad 1), and indeed plays a fundamental role in the acquisition of knowledge. WONDER is said to be the beginning of philosophizing, but wonder itself is founded on awareness of one's ignorance and the desire to be rid of it (In 1 meta. 3.55). One wonders and begins to investigate because he or she perceives some effect but is ignorant of its cause (ST 1a2ae, 3.8; 32.8). The wish to escape ignorance thus fosters a desire for the deeper and more ultimate understanding of things that constitute philosophy.

See Also: DOUBT; EPISTEMOLOGY.

Bibliography: L. M. RÉGIS, Epistemology, tr. I. C. BYRNE (New York 1959). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Beatitudo, tr. P. CUMMINS (St. Louis 1956). T. J. HIGGINS, Man as Man (rev. ed. Milwaukee 1958).

[J. B. NUGENT]

Moral Aspect. As it affects the morality of an action, ignorance can be defined as the lack of knowledge in a person with regard to the nature or moral quality of an act he or she is performing or proposes to perform.

Ignorance may be viewed under different aspects. As to its object or subject matter, it may be ignorance of law (ignorantia iuris) or ignorance of fact (ignorantia facti); that is, an agent may be ignorant of the existence of a law covering the matter in hand, or of the extension of the law to it; or he may be ignorant of some circumstance or condition of his action which would cause it to fall under a law that is known to exist.

Of more importance, however, is the distinction made on the basis of the subject's accountability for the ignorance. Ignorance is said to be invincible when it cannot be dispelled by the reasonable diligence a prudent man would be expected to exercise in a given situation—and situations vary according to circumstances of persons, places, etc. In the case of invincible ignorance, the agent is inculpably unaware of the nature of a situation or of the obligations it involves. Ignorance of this kind excuses from moral fault. It causes the act to be involuntary, at least as far as its objective moral character is concerned. What is unknown cannot be the object of volition.

Vincible ignorance, on the other hand, is that which could be dispelled by the application of reasonable diligence. Because the agent culpably neglects to make the effort necessary to become better informed, his ignorance is, in one degree or another, voluntary and imputable. The degree of imputability is measured by the extent of the agent's culpable negligence.

Authors distinguish between simply vincible ignorance, which exists when some, but insufficient, effort is made to be rid of it, and crass or supine ignorance, in which very little effort, if any at all, is made to dispel it. Ignorance is said to be affected or a studied ignorance when it is directly voluntary; a person prefers to remain in ignorance so as to be free from a sense of obligation. A wrong done out of simply vincible ignorance, or even of crass ignorance, is less imputable than if it were done with full knowledge, for the act is less voluntary.

Since affected ignorance is a species of vincible ignorance, directly willed and positively fostered, what is done through it remains entirely voluntary. This is a hypocritical type of ignorance and leaves the voluntariness of one's action almost untouched. It may indicate a certain respect for law that one should prefer to act without the consciousness that he is violating the law, and from that point of view, an act committed through affected ignorance is not quite as voluntary as the same act committed with full knowledge; however, this consideration is of small moment and the lessening of voluntariness in such a case is so slight as to be negligible.

St. Thomas distinguished between antecedent, consequent, and concomitant ignorance. His "antecedent" ignorance corresponds so closely with the "invincible" ignorance described above that it needs no special discussion here; the same is true of his "consequent" ignorance, which corresponds with what is today more commonly called "vincible" ignorance. His "concomitant" ignorance is that of an agent who does something he is not aware he is doing, and who yet would be quite willing to do the same thing even if he were not ignorant. For example, a man unwittingly insults another person whom he happens to dislike and would be only too happy to insult if an occasion presented itself. His act is not involuntary in the sense that it is opposed to his will; neither is it voluntary in this particular case because he does not know what he is doing. He acts, therefore, with ignorance but not out of ignorance. St. Thomas describes such an act as nonvoluntary. The external act is not imputable to the agent, but he is not free of fault because of his habitual malicious disposition toward his neighbor.

See Also: HUMAN ACT; VOLUNTARITY.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 1a 2ae, 6.8; 19.6; 76. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis, ed. P. L. GAUDÉ, 3 v. (Paris 1938) 1:80–83. H. NOLDIN, Summa theologiae moralis, ed. A. SCHMITT, 3 v. (Barcelona 1945) 1:48–50. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology, 4 v. (3d ed. New York 1938) 1:16–19. E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:734–740.

[F. D. NEALY]

ILDEFONSUS OF TOLEDO, ST.

Bishop and writer; b. probably in Toledo, Spain, c. 610; d. Toledo, 667. Ildefonsus entered the monastery of Agalia near Toledo, became its abbot, and in 657 was chosen archbishop of Toledo. Nothing is known about his government of the archdiocese, and no national councils were held during his tenure; but he did play a part in the development of the MOZARABIC RITE.

Two of his letters and four of his writings are extant: De viris illustribus contains brief biographies of 14 men, all of whom had lived in Spain except GREGORY THE GREAT; De cognitione baptismi contains interesting information about the administration of Baptism in Visigothic Spain; De progressu spiritualis deserti traces the road by which the neophytes must travel in order to reach heaven; and his De virginitate sanctae Mariae, though neither original nor profound, is an excellent summary of what JEROME and earlier theologians had written. It deepened the devotion of the Spanish people, writers, and artists to the Blessed Virgin. A legend in which Mary is said to have placed a chasuble over Ildefonsus' shoulders was depicted by Spanish artists of the 17th and 18th centuries.

Feast: Jan. 23.

Bibliography: A. BRAEGELMANN, The Life and Writings of St. Ildefonsus (Washington 1942). M. SCHAPIRO, The Parma Ildefonsus: A Romanesque Illuminated Manuscript from Cluny. . . (New York 1964). E. FERNÁNDEZ-PRIETO DOMÍNGUEZ, Actas de visitas reales y otras realizadas por acontecimientos extraordinarios a los cuerpos santos de San Ildefonso y San Atilano (Zamora, Spain 1973). J. M. HORMAECHE BASAURI, La pastoral de la iniciación cristiana en la España visigoda: estudio sobre el De cognitione baptismi de San Ildefonso de Toledo (Toledo 1983). J. F. RIVERA RECIO, San Ildefonso de Toledo: biografía, época y posteridad (Madrid 1985). O. ENGELS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 5:622. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:155-156.

[S. J. MCKENNA]

ILGA, BL.

Recluse; d. c. 1115. Ilga (Hilga, Helga) is said to have lived as a recluse in Schwarzenberg (in the forest of Bregenz). According to tradition she was the sister of Bl. Merbot and Bl. Diedo. Persons suffering from diseases of the eye used to visit a spring named for her. She has never been canonized.

Feast: June 8.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 3:890, n.8. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954-58) 2:387. L. WELTI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 5:6:23.

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

ILLIG, ALVIN ANTHONY

Paulist priest, evangelist, and founder of the Paulist National Catholic Evangelization Association; b. Los Angeles, California, Aug. 17, 1926; d. Washington, DC, Aug. 2, 1991. Alvin Illig, the third of four sons born to Joseph and Katherina Illig, entered the Paulist novitiate in 1945 and completed his studies at St. Paul's College in Washington, DC. He was ordained a priest by Bishop Fulton SHEEN on May 1, 1953 at the church of St. Paul the Apostle in New York City.

Illig was assigned to Paulist Press following his ordination, and served as an assistant editor of Information magazine. During his twenty years at the press, he was part of a team of young PAULISTS who transformed this pamphlet and tract house into one of the largest Catholic publishing houses in the United States. Illig's particular talent was marketing, and by the late 1960s he had created the American Library and Education Service Company (ALESCO) that distributed books and audio-visual materials to school libraries. When the program was criticized for making Catholic incursions into the American public school system, ALESCO was sold. Seeking a new challenge, Illig retired from publishing in 1973.

In January 1974 Illig went to Pascagoula, MS, to devise a campaign of Catholic evangelization that involved radio ads, billboard space, telephone volunteers, and door-to-door visitations. In two months, his success led to a program called "We Care, We Share," that expanded the outreach campaign across the diocese of Natchez-Jackson. In 1975, Illig became Director of Evangelization for the Archdiocese of Washington. He established the Paulist National Catholic Evangelization Association in November 1977 and was simultaneously named the first Executive Director of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops' Committee on Evangelization.

Illig used his marketing and communication skills to promote Catholic evangelization and became a significant influence in the national Church's growing awareness of the unchurched and of inactive Catholics. He was an early and important influence in the development and dissemination of new forms and approaches to evangelization in the modern church. The American Bishops' National Plan for Evangelization, Go and Make Disciples, issued in November 1992, is dedicated to his memory.

Bibliography: D. R. HOGE, Converts, Dropouts, and Returnees (Washington 1981). A. A. ILLIG, Evangelization Portraits (Washington 1981). K. BOYACK, ed., Catholic Evangelization Today (New York 1987); The New Evangelization (New York 1992).

[P. ROBICHAUD]

ILLINOIS, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A north central state in the Great Prairie region of the U.S., admitted (1818) to the Union as the 21st state, Illinois is bordered on the north by Wisconsin, on the northeast by Lake Michigan, on the east by Indiana, on the southeast by the Wabash and Ohio Rivers, on the south by the Ohio River, and on the west by the Mississippi River. Springfield is the capital; the largest city is Chicago. In 2001 there were 3.8 million Catholics, about 32 percent of the total population (12.1 million) of the state. They are served by the Archdiocese of Chicago and five suffragan sees: Belleville (1887), Joliet (1919), Peoria (1877), Rockford (1908), and Springfield (established as diocese of Quincy, 1853).

Early History. The Illinois country was under the jurisdiction of the Quebec diocese from 1674 to 1784, during which period from 15,000 to 20,000 members of Native American tribes and eventually about 2,000 French trappers and settlers formed the Illinois mission field. Among the early Jesuits to serve the area were Jacques MARQUETTE, who accompanied the Louis Jolliet expedition (1673); Claude ALLOUEZ, who labored there for more than 11 years; and Jacques Gravier, Pierre Gabriel Marest, Jean Mermet, and Alexandre Guyenne. Other missionaries active in Illinois included the Seminary Priests of the Foreign Missions of Quebec and the Franciscans Zenobius Membré, Louis HENNEPIN, and Gabriel de la Ribourde. When the century-long struggle between England and France in the New World ended in French defeat (1763) and British occupancy of the Illinois country, there was a mass exodus of French Catholics to the Louisiana territory. Among the many priests who worked in Illinois from 1763 to 1843, when Chicago was made a diocese, were Sebastian MEURIN, SJ, the “patriot priest” Pierre GIBault, the Sulpician Gabriel RICHARD, and Donatien Olivier. Other itinerant priests who visited the area from time to time were Stephen Theodore BADIN, Elisha DURBIN, Charles Felix VAN QUICKENBORNE, SJ, Peter Doutreluingue, CM, John Francis Loisel, Vitalis Van Coostere, John Mary Irenaeus St. Cyr, Peter Paul LEFEVERE, John Blase Raho, CM, Aloysius Parodi, CM, and Patrick McCabe. Chicago was designated a metropolitan see in 1880, and its suffragans eventually included the Dioceses of Belleville, Joliet, Peoria, Rockford, and Springfield.

Diocesan Development. On Feb. 12, 1875, the Diocese of Peoria was created, embracing 23 counties in central Illinois; it now consists of 26. On Jan. 7, 1887, the 28 southernmost counties of the state were detached from the Diocese of Alton and formed into the Diocese of Belleville. The Diocese of Rockford was established on Sept. 23, 1908, for 11 counties of northwestern Illinois.

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of Chicago	1880
Diocese of Belleville	1887
Diocese of Joliet in Illinois	1949
Diocese of Peoria	1877
Diocese of Rockford	1908
Diocese of Springfield in Illinois	1853

Finally, the Diocese of Joliet came into being on Dec. 11, 1948, covering seven counties. Thus the see of Chicago was left with only two counties, Cook and Lake. Meanwhile, on Sept. 10, 1880, Chicago had been raised to metropolitan rank. The new ecclesiastical province was coterminous with the State of Illinois; the first archbishop, appointed on the same date, was Patrick Augustine Feehan, a native of Ireland and formerly Bishop of Nashville. The Ukrainian Catholic Diocese of St. Nicholas in Chicago was established in 1961; it comprises all the United States west of the western borders of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi.

The first American-born bishop in Illinois was Thomas Foley, a native of Baltimore, who in 1869 was appointed coadjutor to the bishop of Chicago with right of succession, and apostolic administrator of the diocese (because of the insanity of Bishop James Duggan); he served in that office until he died in 1879. In 1924 George William Mundelein, Archbishop of Chicago, became the “First Cardinal of the West” (i.e., west of the Alleghenies). The first black to head a diocese in Illinois was Wilton D. Gregory, who was appointed to the See of Belleville in 1993 after having been an auxiliary to the Archbishop of Chicago for ten years.

Illinois was the scene of the labors of the first black American priest recognized as black, namely, Augustus Tolton. Born a slave of Catholic parents in Missouri in 1854, he was brought by his mother to Quincy during the Civil War and was tutored by a German priest and educated at Quincy College. He then studied at the Urban College of the Congregation de Propaganda Fide and was ordained in Rome in 1886. Having been accepted by the Diocese of Alton, he became pastor of a black church in Quincy, but because of opposition from the clergy and the paucity of black Catholics, in 1889 he was transferred at his request to Chicago, where he was appointed founding pastor of St. Monica’s Parish. He died in 1897 and was buried in Quincy.

Education and Catholic Schools. Catholic schools at all levels have flourished in Illinois although the State Constitution of 1870 denies public funds to sectarian institutions. In 1889 the General Assembly, dominated by Republicans, passed the Edwards Law, named after the superintendent of Public Instruction, Richard Edwards, which provided for compulsory school attendance and required that the elementary subjects be taught in the English language. Catholics and Lutherans protested vehemently against it, mainly because it vested undue power over parochial school in local school boards, which could determine whether private day schools satisfied the state requirements for instruction. This controversy should be viewed in the context of a national intensification of anti-Catholic feeling and the rise of the nativist American Protective Association, which was strong in Illinois. In a joint pastoral letter issued in September, 1892, the Catholic bishops of Illinois denounced the law as a violation of their constitutional rights and urged that it be repealed. After the Democrats won majorities in both houses of the General Assembly and the governorship in the November elections, the law was repealed. When the Illinois Federation of German Catholic Societies was organized in 1893, it established a Legislative Committee to scrutinize bills dealing with education; its members also testified frequently before the Education Committees of both the House and the Senate.

Following the chartering of the short-lived University of St. Mary of the Lake, 23 Catholic institutions of higher learning were founded in Illinois, ten of which survived into the 21st century, namely, St. Francis Xavier College for Women (now Saint Xavier University) in Chicago, founded by the Sisters of Mercy and chartered in 1847; Quincy College (now University), founded in 1860 by the Friars Minor (Diocese of Springfield); Loyola University Chicago (St. Ignatius College until 1909), founded in 1870 by the Jesuits; St. Procopius College (now Benedictine University), founded in 1887 by the Benedictine monks at Lisle (Diocese of Joliet); DePaul University, founded in 1898 by the Vincentian Fathers in Chicago; Barat College, founded in 1918 by the Religious of the Sacred Heart in Lake Forest (Archdiocese of Chicago); College (now University) of Illinois, St. Francis, chartered in 1920 and opened in 1925 by the Sisters of St. Francis of Mary Immaculate in Joliet; Rosary College (now Dominican University), founded in 1922 by the Dominican Sisters of Sinsinawa (Wisconsin) at River Forest (Archdiocese of Chicago); Springfield College in Illinois, founded in 1929 by the Ursuline Sisters; and Lewis College of Science and Technology (now Lewis University), founded in 1930 by the Brothers of the Christian Schools at Lockport (now Romeoville, Diocese of Joliet).

The only major seminary for diocesan students in the state, founded by Archbishop Mundelein, opened in 1921. The University of St. Mary of the Lake and Mundelein Seminary, as it came to be called, was staffed by Jesuits of the Missouri Province who occupied the principal chairs in theology and philosophy and provided spiritual direction. By virtue of its 1844 charter from the State of Illinois, the University of St. Mary of the Lake was authorized to confer the bachelor of arts degree and the master of arts in religious studies. In 1929 the Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities granted the theological faculty the power to confer a baccalaureate, license, and doctorate in Sacred Theology. At this time the seminary was also designated a provincial seminary and opened to students from other dioceses in Illinois. St. Mary of the Lake became the first American institution designated as a ‘‘pontifical faculty of theology’’ under the apostolic constitution Deus Scientiarum Dominus (1931). In 1970 the seminary became an associate member of the Association of Theological Schools and in 1972 a full member with the right to award the master of divinity degree and to have its other academic degrees recognized as accredited.

Catholic Conference of Illinois and the Historical Society. The Catholic Welfare Committee of Illinois, organized by the bishops in 1929 to give a unified and official expression of the positions of the Church on pending and proposed legislation, was superseded in July, 1969, by the Catholic Conference of Illinois. Under the leadership of John Cardinal Cody, Archbishop of Chicago, the Conference was formed originally to obtain from the state direct financial aid for Catholic schools. It is the agency that enables the six dioceses of the state to develop, coordinate, and implement interdiocesan programs and to cooperate with other religious bodies and with secular and governmental organizations in promoting the social and moral welfare of the people of Illinois. The Conference has its headquarters in Chicago and an office in Springfield. It is governed by a board of directors composed of the six diocesan bishops of the state, all auxiliary and retired bishops, one priest, one lay man, and one lay woman from each diocese, and four religious who are at-large members. The Archbishop of Chicago is ex officio chairman of the board.

The Illinois Catholic Historical Society was founded and incorporated in 1918, the centenary of statehood and the 75th anniversary of the erection of the See of Chicago. It was organized at Loyola University in Chicago under the guidance of Frederic Siedenburg, S.J., dean of the School of Sociology, who became first vice-president. The first president was the prominent layman, William J. Onahan. It published a quarterly, the Illinois Catholic Historical Review from July, 1918, to April, 1929. Articles and source materials on the colonial era predominated. Since the editors felt themselves hampered by the limitations imposed by the name of the state in the title of the journal, the name of the journal was changed to Mid-America beginning with the 12th volume in July, 1929, and the administration was taken over by Loyola University.

Bibliography: G. J. GARRAGHAN, The Catholic Church in Chicago, 1673–1871 (Chicago 1921, reprinted Ann Arbor 1968). J. P. DONNELLY, Jacques Marquette, S.J., 1637–1675 (Chicago 1968); Pierre Gibault, Missionary, 1737–1802 (Chicago 1971). D. W. KUCERA, Church-State Relationships in Education in Illinois (Washington, D.C. 1955). H. C. KOENIG, Caritas Christi Urget Nos: A History of the Offices, Agencies, and Institutions of the Archdiocese of Chicago, 2 vols. (Chicago 1981). J. F. MCDERMOTT, Old Cahokia: A Narrative and Documents Illustrating the First Century of Its History (St. Louis 1949). R. R. MILLER, That All May Be One: A History of the Rockford Diocese (Rockford 1976). A. O'ROURKE, The Good Work Begun: Centennial History of Peoria Diocese (n.p. 1977).

[I. EVANS/R. TRISCO]

ILLTUD, ST.

One of the founders of Welsh monasticism; b. c. 450; d. c. 525. The earliest account of Illtud (Illtyd or Latin, Illutus) is in the vita by St. SAMSON, written c. 610 in Brittany, where Illtud is said to have been a disciple of St. GERMAIN OF AUXERRE, who ordained him priest. Later he established a monastery and school in Wales (probably at Llantwit Major in Glamorgan), and many of the great Welsh saints (Paul Aurelian, GILDAS, Samson, and even DAVID) were said to have been his pupils. The earliest vita of Illtud himself dates from 1140 and links his name with King Arthur. He is honored in Welsh tradition for his great learning and for giving shape to the monastic movement of the sixth century. Many of the legends associated with him—angelic visitations, the taming of a stag, his being miraculously fed from heaven—are commonplaces of Celtic hagiography. But the account of his death in the vita of Samson seems to be an authentic picture of a saint of acknowledged holiness, surrounded by devoted disciples. On the evidence of a stone inscription at CALDEY Island, Illtud's monastery has sometimes been identified with that early Christian center; Breton tradition gives a prominent place to his work in that country, where he is said to have died, at Dol. We may suppose him to have been a man of learning, inheriting the Roman traditions of early Christianity in Britain, whose monastery was the training ground for the intense religious revival of sixth-century Wales.

Feast: Nov. 6 (Archdiocese of Cardiff and Brittany).

Bibliography: G. H. DOBLE, Saint Illtud (Cardiff 1944). A. W. WADE-EVANS, ed. and tr., Vitae sanctorum britanniae et genealogiae (Cardiff 1944), includes text of Latin life of St. Illtud.

[I. EVANS]

ILLUMINATION

Literally, the action of illuminating or the condition of being illuminated; in philosophy and theology, a special divine influence aiding man in obtaining certain, necessary, and universal knowledge. The latter notion is discussed here in its sources, in Augustinian thought, and in some later applications.

Sources. In ancient and medieval thought, light was considered ontologically as both a physical and a spiritual substance. On this basis a metaphysics of LIGHT developed; its offspring was a noetics of light called the theory of illumination. The premises for such a theory were found in the monistic system of emanation of PLOTINUS, who taught that the WORLD SOUL emanates from the One via the Nous. This world soul sends its rays and mirrors itself in bodies as the fourth hypostasis. Such illumination is a two-way process, however, for the rays reflected from the bodies return to the soul, to the Nous, to the One in a mystic ascent, and to a final reunion in which being and cognition are identical.

Plotinus's teaching was transmitted to the later Middle Ages through NEOPLATONISM. The Arabs generally adopted the theory, but brought into it Aristotelian notions. In this amalgam the intellectus agens of Aristotle was no longer an individual human possession, but one for the entire human species, identified with the tenth Cosmic Intelligence.

Augustine's Theory. St. AUGUSTINE utilized the doctrine of divine light in St. John's gospel to develop a theory of knowledge. Convinced of man's personal nature, Augustine was safe from Plotinus's monopsychism of the fourth hypostasis; human knowledge, for him, does not originate in an identity of man with the intelligible world, but rather in an encounter with this world without loss of personal uniqueness.

Augustine's theory of knowledge distinguishes an object, a subject, and a medium of knowledge. These three components are proportioned to, and cooperate with, one another in the noetic process. The objects are the material and immaterial things known. The knowledge of sensible things, as well as the knowledge of spiritual objects, can be obtained only under the influence of divine illumination. The senses draw the soul's attention to what is happening outside the soul, and their reports are judged in the divine light by the intellect. The true objects of knowledge are the eternal reasons, which rank higher than the created intellect, being contained in the divine intelligence. They constitute the intelligible world of truths hierarchically ordered to, and culminating in, eternal truth. By participation in these rationes aeternae a thing is what it is. Therefore, the human intellect can find these reasons in all things. It depends on these truths for its judgment and certainty.

The subject in this process of knowledge is the knowing intellect, man's soul. The soul is not the very nature of truth. Although "all men are lamps" (In Ioann. 23.3), they remain in darkness unless they are illuminated by the true Light. And while man, by virtue of his intellectual nature, corresponds to the intelligible truths in the divine light, the whole man (intellect and will) is required in knowing by divine illumination. The medium through which object and subject unite in knowledge is the divine light. God alone is the true light. It is He who enlightens and makes intelligible.

Later Developments. In the 13th century, because of contact with Arabian theories of knowledge and with translations of Aristotle's works (especially William of Moerbeke's), Augustine's theory of illumination—until then the only theory of knowledge for Christian thinkers—was gradually supplanted by the theory of ABSTRACTION. St. BONAVENTURE, however, while using the Aristotelian theory to explain sense knowledge, invoked divine illumination—i.e., direct action of the eternal reasons upon the intellect—as necessary for making infallible judgments.

St. THOMAS AQUINAS replaced divine illumination by the agent INTELLECT, a power created and given by God to man for the purpose of knowing and judging. Thus, for him, the illuminating factor is given in man's nature. In a "conversion to the phantasm" the agent intellect makes the noetic object appear in the human consciousness. But that which is seen (illuminated) is not the thing as such (a form in matter) but a form abstracted from matter, the universal abstracted from the particular, the intelligible species abstracted from the phantasm. "Therefore, we must say that our intellect understands material things by abstracting from the phantasms; and through material things thus considered we acquire some knowledge of immaterial things" (Summa theologiae 1a, 85.1).

A return to the illumination theory occurred in the 17th century with Nicolas MALEBRANCHE. He says in his answer to the first objection to the tenth of his Éclaircissements sur les six livres de la Recherche de la Verité (Paris 1678, 3:124): "Naturally, the mind is capable of movement in its ideas. . . . But it does not move itself, it does not enlighten itself; it is God who effects everything (qui fait tout) in the minds as well as in the bodies." This ontological premise led Malebranche directly to OCCASIONALISM, which holds that God establishes occasional causes in order to produce definite effects—such as the individual man's recognizing and knowing the here-and-now presented object.

A 20th-century controversy arose over interpretations of St. Augustine's illumination theory, with various scholars favoring the ontologicist, the historical, the concordant, and the existential schools respectively. Although many issues of Augustinian epistemology were thus clarified, there remained a shadow of opacity, for Augustine himself never completely elucidated the function of the divine light in the noetic realm.

See Also: ILLUMINISM; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946) v. 2, 4. S. VANNI-ROVIGHI, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:1237–41. J. AUER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:624–625. É. H. GILSON and T. D. LANGAN, Modern Philosophy: Descartes to Kant (New York 1963). A. A. MAURER, Medieval Philosophy (New York 1962). K. RAHNER, Geist in Welt (2d ed. Munich 1957). J. RATZINGER, "Licht und Erleuchtung: Erwägungen zur Stellung und Entwicklung des Themas in der abendländischen Geistesgeschichte," Studium generale 13 (1960) 368–378. C. E. SCHÜTZINGER, The German Controversy on St. Augustine's Illumination Theory (New York 1960).

[C. E. SCHÜTZINGER]

ILLUMINISM

A term for any teaching concerning the ILLUMINATION of the human mind; it is attributed to enthusiasts of two distinct types: those who have the "light" as a direct communication from a higher source; and those who possess "enlightenment" as a result of a clarified and exalted condition of the human reason.

Direct Illumination. To the first class belong various religious sects who claimed direct enlightenment by God, chiefly the Gnostics, the Alumbrados of Spain, and the Illuminés of France. Historically first among these was GNOSTICISM, a generic name for a group of heretical religious movements that flourished during the early Christian centuries, all of whom commonly held that salvation comes through "enlightened knowledge," a knowledge that is secret and mysterious, based on direct revelation, and limited to a gifted elite.

Alumbrados. In 16th-century Spain, the adherents of illuminism were called Alumbrados. The name identifies a group of pseudo-mystic Spaniards who claimed to act always under illumination received directly and immediately from the Holy Spirit, and independently of the means of grace dispensed by the Church.

Illuminés. In 1623 there appeared in southern France what appeared to be a branch of the Alumbrados, under the name of Illuminés. The sect developed and gained proportion when it was joined in 1634 by Pierre Guérin, curé of Saint Georges de Roze. Under his strong influence, the group soon became known as the Guérinets. Both the Alumbrados and the Guérinets were suppressed by the middle of the 17th century.

In its broadest meaning, illuminism could further be applied to any and all groups or sects that claim the possession of an inner light by a select group of enlightened souls who have received the illumination as a revelation directly from God. Examples are the ROSICRUCIANS, who rose to public notice in 1537—a sect that combined enlightened possession of esoteric principles of religion with the mysteries of alchemy; the Molinists, founded by Miguel de MOLINOS in 1697; the French Martinists founded in 1754 by Martinez Pasqualis, as well as the Russian Martinists headed by Schwartz of Moscow about 1790. Both of these latter groups were cabalists and allegorists, and followers of the ideas of Jakob BÖHME and Emanuel SWEDENBORG (see CABALA).

Illumined Human Reason. Illuminism applies also, and more commonly, to those who possess enlightenment as a result of a clarified, purified, and exalted condition of the human reason. In this sense of the word, illuminism has two major historical applications, viz, the Enlightenment and the Illuminati.

The Enlightenment. First, both chronologically and influentially, is illuminism as referring to the intellectual and cultural movement more widely known as the ENLIGHTENMENT. Originating in England in 1688 at the close of the Glorious Revolution, it reached its violent climax in the French Revolution a century later. This illuminism enthroned reason and empowered it infallibly to judge, condemn, and banish all the nonreason of the past. Culture, religion, and government of the past was claimed to be unworthy of enlightened man and therefore had to be changed or abolished.

Such illuminism could neither exist, nor can it be understood, apart from the philosophical RATIONALISM, EMPIRICISM, and MECHANISM that preceded it, nor isolated from the social and political evils of the later 17th and 18th centuries, from the progress of science, nor from the spirit of independence and rebellion against TRADITION and AUTHORITY characteristic of Europeans since the 16th century. Philosophically it was an amalgam of empiricism, DEISM, rationalism, HEDONISM, UTILITARIANISM, RELATIVISM, antihistoricism, egoistic humanism, optimism, and a veneration of science—all springing from nature and converging toward naturalism, with its emphasis on natural rights, natural society, and natural religion.

Illuminati. Again, illuminism is identified with a group of Bavarian enthusiasts, known as the Illuminati (Perfectibilists or Perfektibilisten). Their main objective was to establish and propagate a new religion, and politically to establish a universal democratic republic that would follow the overthrow of existing government. The foundation of both was “enlightened reason,” i.e., reason liberated from the dominating authority of Church and State. The group was founded by Adam Weishaupt on May 1, 1776. Weishaupt had been educated by the Jesuits, and became the first lay professor of Canon Law at the University of Ingolstadt.

Three factors in Weishaupt’s background were manifest in his group: (1) his association and familiarity with Jesuit methods of education, organization, and discipline, although here he missed the essential point and actually made a caricature of Jesuit authority and obedience; (2) his association with, and knowledge of, FREEMASONRY, which he used as a prototype for the structure and model for the degrees and ceremonials of his organization; and (3) the rationalism, free thought, naturalism, anticlericalism, egotistic humanism, and antitraditionalism, characteristic of the Enlightenment, which he imbibed from his contemporaries. His great goal, viz, a world where all men would be free and happy, was to be achieved by the establishment of a secret and highly organized Order of Illuminati. Weishaupt considered this end desirable enough to justify any and every means in its attainment.

Illuminist Ethics. From the above, it is immediately evident that illuminism includes a wide range of ethical theories, from divine illumination and passivism, to hedonism, utilitarianism, naturalism, humanism, altruism; and of these latter, some atheistic, some deistic; some associated with rationalism as a basis, some with empiricism; some optimistic, some pessimistic, some even nihilistic.

A detailed critique of illuminist ethics would entail a critique of each of the above-mentioned ethical theories. However, in any and all of them, one or more of the following truths that are fundamental to a discussion of morality have been overlooked or denied: (1) Man has a rational nature; i.e., he is a PERSON endowed with reason and free will. Therefore, his moral judgments, like all other judgments, are either self-evident truths or are arrived at by reasoning; and he is personally responsible for his moral decisions and actions. (2) Man is saved by fulfilling his nature, i.e., by knowing and doing. Action without knowledge is unintelligent, and knowledge without action is sterile with regard to salvation. Salvation demands intelligence, faith, and good works. (3) By his nature, man is under moral OBLIGATION to obey the NATURAL LAW. Man possesses natural rights, but he also has moral duties. (4) Although God does act within man, He has ordained that this action be through the instrumentality of the Church, and that normally His interior guidance of a soul is conditioned by His exterior guidance through the Church established by Jesus Christ, His Son. Thus, He “enlightens” human minds to accept what the Church teaches; He moves human wills to execute what the Church advises and commands.

See Also: ENLIGHTENMENT, PHILOSOPHY OF; SYNDERESIS; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF.

Bibliography: J. P. ARENDZEN, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 6:592–02. F. H. KRUGER, La Grande Encyclopédie 20:573–74. A. SCHWARZ, E. HEGEL and L. SCHEFFCZYK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:1055–66. G. CAPONE BRAGA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1242–54. E. CASSIRER, Die Philosophie der Aufklärung (Tübingen 1932). G. BAREILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 7:756–66. J. ROBISON, Proofs of a Conspiracy Against all the Governments of Europe Carried on in the Secret Meetings of Free Masons, Illuminati, and Reading Societies (2d ed. London 1797). V. STAUFFER, New England and the Bavarian Illuminati (Studies in History, Economics and Public Law . . . Columbia University 82.1; New York 1918).

[M. W. HOLLENBACH]

ILLYRICUS, THOMAS

Theologian; b. Vrana (near Zadar in modern Yugoslavia), c. 1485; d. Menton, near Monaco, 1528. He entered the Franciscan Observants at Osimo, Italy, and preached throughout Italy, France, and Germany. Clement VII named him inquisitor general in Savoy. Besides his Sermones (2 v. Toulouse 1521), he wrote works against Protestantism, including Libellus de potestate summi pontificis (Turin 1523) and In lutheranas haereses clypeus catholicae ecclesiae (Turin 1524). In his teaching on the papacy, Illyricus held that ecumenical councils are superior to the Roman pontiff.

Bibliography: F. SCHUBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 10:128–129.

[J. H. MILLER]

IMAGE OF GOD

Genesis teaches not only the EXEMPLARITY OF GOD relative to the created universe but also the correlative truth that man is the image of God (Gn 1.26). In fact, “image of God” is the theological definition of man that is the only basis for an authentic Christian anthropology.

It belongs to the nature of an image to imitate, in some manner and degree, the being and activity of the thing imaged. In classical theology, the relevant being and activity of God were regarded as those of a pure spirit knowing and loving itself. Therefore, of all the creatures of the material universe, man alone can be called the image of God, because man’s soul and its faculties for knowing and loving are spiritual (St. Augustine, Gen. ad litt. 6, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum, 28.1:170–200; St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae, 1a, 93.2).

The image of God that is in man by reason of his intellectual nature can be perfected by the “image of recreation” that is GRACE, and, finally, by the “image of glory” (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, 1a, 93.4). But even the “perfect” image of glory will always be imperfect as image. This is because man can never achieve equality or identity of nature with God.

Only the Son is so perfect an image of His Father as to be equal to, and identical in nature with, Him. Hence it is that the WORD is called the image of God, while man is said to be created to that image. The preposition “to” implies the approach of the image which is distant from the exemplar (St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, 1a, 35.1, 2; 93.1, c. and ad 2). This “approach” of the image to the divine exemplar reveals the image as the dynamic source of man’s striving toward “the mature measure of the fullness of Christ” (Eph 4.13) and of man’s transformation “into his very image from glory to glory” (2 Cor 3.18).

See Also: CREATION; EXEMPLARISM; EXEMPLARY CAUSALITY; LOGOS; MAN, 3.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) Tables générales 2:2181–86. H. GROSS et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1087–92. H. LESÈTRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 3:843–844. H. CROUZEL, Catholicisme 5:1238–40. J. E. SULLIVAN, The Image of God: The Doctrine of St. Augustine and Its Influence (Dubuque 1963).

[C. J. CHERESO]

IMAGES, BIBLICAL PROHIBITION OF

Not only metal statues or plaques (Ex 34.17) or gold or silver images (Ex 20.23) representing pagan gods, but images of Yahweh were prohibited by the Mosaic Law (Ex 20.4–5; Dt 5.8–9; Lv 26.1). The OT offers several reasons for this prohibition; e.g., according to Dt 4.15–19 images of Yahweh were forbidden because on Mt. Sinai God did not permit the Israelites to see Him in any form or figure; in Is 40.18–26 the point is made that no image of a creature can depict Yahweh, the Creator of the universe. From various Biblical accounts it is evident that the true worship of God was devoid of images: the ARK OF THE COVENANT, the CHERUBIM above it, and the oxen that supported the bronze sea (1 Kgs 7.23-25) were never considered objects of worship by the Israelites. For a time the bronze serpent (Nm 21.8-9) was venerated with incense, but eventually it, too, was removed from the Temple (2 Kgs 18.4). All other objects, such as the Ephod and the Theraphim (teraphim), found in certain sanctuaries of God were never considered to be objects of divine worship in themselves.

Images, however, occurred in the illegitimate worship of Yahweh, e.g., in that of the Danites (Jgs 17.4-5, 13; 18.24, 30). Although the golden calves of King Jeroboam I of Israel served originally as pedestals upon which the invisible God Yahweh was enthroned, the Israelites later worshiped these as the God (or gods) who liberated them from Egypt (1 Kgs 12.28; Hos 8.5; 13.2; cf. Exodus ch. 32). Eventually Yahweh was reduced to the status of a nature god like BAAL, and these images were stigmatized as foreign gods [1 Kgs 14.9; Ps 105 (106).19-22; 2 Chr 11.13-15; 13.8-11]. The deuteronomic reforms of King Josiah of Judah (2 Kgs 23.4-20) purified Israel of all form of idolatry, but illegitimate acts of worship continued until the Fall of Jerusalem (587 B.C.). After the Babylonian Exile images of Yahweh and of strange gods disappeared almost completely among the Jews (Josephus, Ant. 18.3.1; 6.2.8).

In the NT, too, the worship of alien gods and idols is prohibited (Acts 15.20, 29; 21.25; Rom 2.22; 1 Cor 5.10; 10.14, 28; 2 Cor 6.16; 1 Thes 1.9; Rev. 9.20). In Christian as in Jewish literature IDOLATRY is a common term of abuse for pagan worship, even though for the pagan the idol was often regarded merely as a symbol of a god and not the god itself and, therefore, not divine.

Bibliography: J. HASPECKER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957-65) 2:459-460. G. VON RAD and G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935) 2:378-386. B. GEMSNER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957-65) 1:1271-73. J. B. FREY, "La Question des images chez les juifs a la lumière des récentes découvertes," Biblica 15 (1934) 265-300.

[C. H. PICKAR]

IMAGES, VENERATION OF

The phrase refers to those exterior acts of honor or reverence directed to God, the angels, or the saints through some artifact of the representative or symbolic arts. Veneration is a religious act, an act of WORSHIP; and images can include not only pictures, ICONS, statues, and symbols, but also ritual acts such as the Sign of the Cross, the crowning of statues, processions of the cross, the Way of the Cross, and other symbolic acts of worship. The practice of veneration of images has a distinctive and continuous tradition in Christian history, with roots in the Old Covenant, and with natural counterparts in the religious practices of paganism. The doctrinal development is related to the history of religious practice. It is in this broad historical frame of reference from paganism to Christian renewal that the full meaning of the Catholic position on veneration of images can be understood. The following summary traces those parallel lines of development.

A young congregation member venerates the cross, St. Martin of Tours Catholic Church, St. Martinsville, Louisiana. (©Philip Gould/CORBIS)

The veneration of images is natural to man. The religious practice of veneration of images is related to the natural inclination of man to express his thoughts and feelings in various forms of art. "It is natural for man to imitate" is axiomatic, and its correlative, "Man delights in imitation," assures the spontaneous practice of imitative arts, whether in image-making or in dramatic or ritual acts. Since man has always expressed his most profound thoughts, needs, and desires in art forms, it is normal that man's religious beliefs and sentiments should be channeled through every form of artistic expression. ART is rooted in human nature and sacred art is the expression of religious belief.

Images in Pagan Religions. The pagans employed art forms corresponding to and expressing their beliefs. Some pagans, awed by the phenomena of nature, worshiped the sun, the moon, etc. This worship was expressed in various art forms—ritual dances, offerings, incantations, and the like. These ritual acts themselves became sacred, honored, and venerable because of their association with the gods. Other pagans made use of totems in a form of animal worship. Often they made images of the sacred animals, which they sometimes believed to possess hidden powers and divine qualities worthy of adoration. However, it should be noted that not all paganism involved idol worship, for not every figure was an idol, but was sometimes an image representing or symbolizing a force or power considered to be divine. IDOLATRY is itself a degenerate form of paganism. This was the form of paganism practiced in the Gentile nations surrounding Israel: "They changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of the image of a corruptible man, and of birds, and of four-footed beasts, and of creeping things" (Rom 1.23). This fact has important bearing on the use of images in the worship of the Chosen People.

Images in the Old Testament. Consideration of the use of images in the Old Testament centers on two factors—the milieu of idolatrous polytheism in which the Old Covenant was established between the Chosen People and the one true God, and the conditions (the Commandments) of that covenant revealed by God. The First Commandment, a condition of the lasting covenant between Yahweh and the Israelites, was "Thou shalt not have strange gods before me. Thou shalt not make to thyself a graven thing, nor the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth below, nor of those things that are in the waters under the earth. Thou shalt not adore them, nor serve them" (Ex 20.3–5). The implication is clear: once God has revealed Himself as the one true God, then in distinction to the Gentiles, Israel was to worship the unseen God; Israel was to avoid paganism; thus, to attempt to represent the God of Israel in idols was an abominable practice in imitation of idolators, but it is not verified by fact that the Israelites understood the Commandment to be an absolute prohibition of the use of an image in authentic worship of the true God. If "veneration of images" is understood in a broad sense to include not only "graven things," but ritual acts, symbolic representations, and sacred signs, the Old Testament is replete with sensible representations of divine truth, and these representations were honored, revered, and venerated. Far from being condemned by God, the use of sensible material adorned by human art was directed by God, and demanded by Him as integral to the worship due Him. The ARK OF THE COVENANT, a sensible sign of the sacred covenant, was held in honor by the Jews; the temple itself was a sign of the presence of God. Although they were not idols to be adored, they were sacred signs to be revered and venerated. Even the use of carved images of creatures was generally not considered forbidden. Great carved figures of beasts (Ez 1.5; 10.20) stood over the Ark of the Covenant itself (Ex 25.18–22; 1 Kgs 6.23–28; 8.6–7). Examples of such images include fruits, flowers, trees, lions, bulls, and others too numerous to mention here (Nm 8.4; 1 Kgs 6.18; 7.36; 10.19–20).

During the Maccabean period, however, a strong reaction arose against the use of any kind of carved image of living creatures (Josephus, Antiq. Jud. 1.17. 6.2). It was unlawful to have images or pictures or any representation of a living thing in the temple (Josephus, De bello Jud. 1.1.33(4).2; cf. also Tacitus, Hist. 5.4). This severe interpretation of the law did not last. Although faithful Israelites always resisted idol worship, the use of images—pictures, symbols, carvings, etc.—continued and became very much a part of the culture of the Jews of the Diaspora.

There are a number of Jewish catacombs, cemeteries, and sarcophagi containing examples of pictures, wall and ceiling paintings, and carved figures of every kind of creature (cf. H. Leclercq, Manuel d'archéologie chrétienne 1.4:95–528). That such images had a place of honor can be surmised not only from the fact that they are associated with sacred rituals, but from their association with the very artifacts of worship (e.g., the figures supporting the seven-branched candlestick; see Leclercq, op. cit., 522).

Although such usage does not throw much light on the kind or degree of veneration, or on the doctrinal basis of the practice, it reflects, at least, that these Jews did not consider the use of images—whether pictures or carvings of creatures—or sacred symbolics—whether in material artifacts or ritual acts—as forbidden in the worship of the true God. Further, such an understanding does give historical continuity to the development of Christian art and symbolics in the earliest days of Christianity.

Images in the New Testament. The use of images in early Christian worship cannot now be reasonably questioned in view of the modern discoveries of archeology. Although there were some who doubted the early Christians employed images in worship (e.g., Erasmus), it can no longer be doubted, for the Christian catacombs are veritable galleries of early Christian art. Scenes from the Old and New Testaments, the symbolism of palms, the vine, etc., the CHI-RHO monograms, and even mythological figures adorn the holy chambers of sacred worship and burial. Typical of Old Testament scenes are Daniel in the lion's den, Noah and the ark, and Moses striking the rock. From the New Testament there are the Nativity, the visit of the wise men, the baptism of Jesus, the raising of Lazarus, the marriage feast at Cana, and Christ teaching the Apostles. Examples of symbolism are a woman lifting her hands (symbolizing the Church) and harts drinking from a fountain (flowing from the symbolic Chi-Rho monogram). Among memorials are to be found the Cross, Christ the Good Shepherd, the Madonna, SS. Peter and Paul, and martyrs. (See BIBLE CYCLES IN ART; ART, EARLY CHRISTIAN)

Doctrine. Very little was written about the veneration of images during the early period of Christianity. In one sense, then, little is known about the doctrinal basis of veneration as practiced by Christians of that time. Yet the very number of images associated with worship, their location in places of honor, the absence of controversy about images at a time when much religious teaching was aimed at protecting the true faith in the face of public hostility, the casualness of the few references made to images (e.g., St. Ambrose, Ep. 2, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 17:821; St. Augustine, Cons. Evang., Patrologia Latina 34:1049; Gregory of Tours, Historia Francorum 2.17, Patrologia Latina 71: 215) all testify to the perfect orthodoxy of their understanding of the use of images. In a sermon St. Basil (d. 379) suggested that painters gave St. Barlaam more honor by making pictures of him than Basil himself could do with words (Or. in S. Barlaam, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1857–66] 31:488–489). This reveals what must have been the general attitude of early Christians to images. The paintings, etc. were an expression of their thoughts and feelings, and perhaps a better expression than words of the honor and reverence they felt for Christ, the Apostles, the martyrs, and the saints. Far from being an abuse of their faith and worship, the use of images was a spontaneous and reverent expression of their faith in the word of God and their love for Christ, His mother, His Apostles, and His Church. No more doctrinal justification or explanation was needed for a practice that was a simple, normal, instructive, and appealing expression of the true faith.

During the era of development of Christian art after Constantine, when Christians began to build basilicas adorned with mosaics, carvings, and statues, images were venerated with more elaborate ritual. Especially in the East, the means of showing respect and of honoring persons of high station (e.g., reverence to the empty throne as a symbol of civil authority) were employed in the rituals of religious reverence. Thus bows, kisses, incensing, and other ritual acts were used in reverence to images of Christ, the altar, the cross, etc. Such traditions of reverence became fixed ceremonials. Some of the practices spread to Rome and the West, but usually in less elaborate form.

Doctrinally, this era, from Constantine to the eighth century, evidenced no change from the earlier era of Christian worship; but ritually, the practices—now enjoyed in greater freedom, manifested more publicly, and exercised with more elaborate pageantry—were more susceptible to misunderstanding and abuse. That abuses did creep in, and that these did to some degree contribute to the Iconoclast persecutions (726) can hardly be doubted. The Iconoclasts, whether from a misunderstanding of orthodox practice, or from the existence of real abuses, or from political motives, made many charges of idolatry, superstition, and magic in the use of images. (See ICONOCLASM).

Nicaea II (787) was the result of the Iconoclast persecutions. The council, in its seventh session, clarified the confusion that had arisen over the ritual use of images in worship and, while correcting excesses, allowed wide range of practice according to the customs of various nations. The council distinguished adoration (λατρεία; in Latin, latría), which according to Catholic faith is due only to the divine nature, and the respect and worshipful honor (ἄσπασμόν καὶ τιμητικὴν προσκύνησιν) given to Our Lady, angels, saints, and holy men. Further, the council made clear that the veneration of images is not directed to the image, but to the person worthy of honor. “For honor paid to an image passes on to its prototype; he who worships an image worships the reality of him who is painted in it” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 601). Thus the council defined the doctrinal basis for the pious custom of ancient times. The practice of early Christianity was to continue and be embellished according to the customs of the times, but now with the clear teaching of the Church to direct it and enable it to avoid the excesses of idolatry, superstition, and magic.

The practice of veneration of images, however, awaited the Summa of St. Thomas Aquinas to find its place within the total synthesis of Catholic doctrine and, consequently, to find its own fullest explanation. St. Thomas treats of two kinds of worship: latría, the adoration due to God alone, and dulia, the honor or homage due to distinguished persons. Adoration is an exterior act of the virtue of religion that is directed to God (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 84.1–3). Honor or veneration is a part of the virtue of observance, which pays homage to those in a position of dignity. Thus, the adoration of God and homage to saints are distinct but complementary elements in worship. With regard to the use of images, St. Thomas placed the question within the broader context of sacred signs. He showed the difference between the sign as a thing in itself and the sign as referring to the thing signified. It is as a sign—a category that includes the Sacraments, sacred symbolics, ceremonial rites, etc.—that the use of images should be understood. “There is a twofold movement of the mind toward an image: one toward the image as a thing in itself; another toward the image insofar as it is a representation of something else. . . . Therefore, we must say that no reverence is shown to Christ’s image as a thing—for instance, carved or painted wood. . . . It follows therefore that reverence should be shown to it insofar only as it is an image” (Summa theologiae 3a, 25.3). Since the worship given to an image reaches and terminates in the person represented, the same type of worship due the person can be rendered to the image as representing the person: the worship of latría, to Christ as the Divine Word; dulia, to the angels and saints.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Manuel d’archéologie chrétienne depuis les origines jusqu’au VIII<sup>e</sup> siècle, 2 v. (Paris 1907). F. X. KRAUS, Geschichte Handbuch der christlichen Archäologie (Paderborn 1905). W. PALMER, An Introduction to Early Christian Symbolism (London 1885). J. P. REID, Anatomy of Atheism (Compact Studies; Washington 1965). D. ROVER, “Poetics of Maritain,” Texts and Studies (Washington 1965) esp. 68–78. D. SABBATUCCI et al., Encyclopedia of World Art (New York 1959–) 4:364–382. M. ELAIDE et al., ibid. 382–420. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l’art Chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 1:410–4:15.

[A. D. LEE]

IMAGINATION

From the Lat. imaginatio (Gr. φαντασία), the power or faculty of imagining, i.e., of representing in an image or PHANTASM, something past or absent or otherwise inaccessible to the external senses. This article discusses the notion from the viewpoint of Thomistic and modern psychology, with emphasis on the nature of the imagination, its use, and its control.

Thomistic Notion. According to St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa theologiae 1a, 78.4), the CENTRAL SENSE (sensus communis) forms images of sensible things, and the fantasy or imagination preserves them to be available when needed. The memorative power, by contrast, preserves former estimates of good and bad made by means of the ESTIMATIVE (COGITATIVE) power. Both imagination and memorative power are active as well as passive. They not only receive and preserve what has been experienced before but they also revive these experiences. The imagination revives sense images, whereas the memorative power revives former estimates of the way things affect one. When sense images are revived by the imagination, this can be done in exactly the same sequence and pattern as the original experience so that one reexperiences what has happened before, though it is recognized as past through the memorative power. Or, the imagination can recombine sense images in different patterns so that one can experience in imagination what has never been experienced in fact (e.g., a golden mountain).

St. Thomas’s use of the term imagination covers what in modern times is called memory, but also what is called fantasy or imagination. And his term memoria or memorative power is hardly recognized in modern usage, largely because psychologists do not often engage in an exact analysis of psychological functions. It could be called “affective memory” because the revival of past estimates and the recognition of something as past is affective rather than cognitive in nature.

Uses of Imagination. Modern psychological notions of fantasy and imagination have been influenced by S. Freud’s notion that the first psychological activity of the infant consists in fantasy images of wish-fulfilling objects. This “primary process” thinking, Freud says, is used even by the adult whenever wishes are not immediately gratified. But contrary to Freud, imagination is used not only for purposes of wish fulfillment but for almost every action of everyday life. Whenever a person has to do anything that is not strictly repetitive, he imagines what needs to be done and what are likely to be the consequences before he decides on action.

Imagination is used also to supplement memory. Bartlett has shown that a picture, a story, or an experience that cannot be remembered exactly is reproduced by filling in the memory gaps by imagination. When disease has made the recall of memories impossible, as, for instance, in Korsakoff psychosis, imagination takes over altogether and the patient confabulates instead of remembering. During sleep, sense experiences such as warmth, cold, and pressure cannot be identified because the recall of memories is blocked. Consequently, imagination weaves such experiences into dream sequences that may be bizarre and illogical because one cannot check dream imaginings against what he knows to be true, possible, or expedient.

Control of Imagination. Whether in waking life or in dreams, the imaginative process must be directed in some way. When awake and planning action, man directs imagination deliberately to explore various possibilities. In daydreams, he also directs and controls his imagination; but this time, to engage in imaginary actions that offer some emotional satisfaction (the conquering hero dream, or the suffering hero dream). This is the “wish fulfillment” through fantasy of which Freud speaks.

Nondeliberate Direction. In addition to such deliberate control of imagination, there are also imaginative processes that run their appointed course without deliberate direction. The DREAM is the best but not the only example. In writing a story, for instance, the decision to do so merely supplies the impulse to start imagining; it does not direct the creative process. Novelists often say that the story writes itself, that the characters develop a life of their own which unfolds in front of their eyes. And Arnold Schönberg tells how he wrote down the whole of his “String Quartet No. 2” as he heard it in imagination, without stopping or deliberating.

Still, there must be some direction in dreams as well as in products of artistic imagination. For imagination is a cognitive function and can only preserve and reproduce images; it cannot choose them any more than the eye can choose what it will see. Something else must guide the brush and sketch the outline: and that something can be only an appetitive tendency, either deliberate or emotional. This seems to be the will impulse when imagination is used for the purpose of daily life, and emotion when imagination is released from deliberate control (in dreams and stories). Since affective memory, in the modern sense, always accompanies imagination, the emotional attitudes a person has developed as a result of his life experiences are bound to affect and direct his creative efforts. A novelist recreates human life as he sees it and unwittingly passes judgment on his story characters and their actions in the way he lets them live and love, suffer and die.

Creativity. In present-day psychological writings, there is a reawakening of interest in “creativity,” though the role of imagination in creative effort is almost forgotten. One reads, for instance, that creativity implies prelogical thought, an “appropriate selection and rejection of available connections” (Roe)—yet it is the hallmark of creative work that available connections are neglected and entirely new ones are hit upon. Surely, creativity implies imagination freed from deliberate control, imagination that is extraordinarily fertile and original. When a man’s attitudes are so rigid that they prevent him from looking for the unexpected, the unconventional, his imagination remains fettered and never blossoms into creativity. (See CREATIVE IMAGINATION.)

As a human power, imagination is active whenever conditions are favorable. If man does not employ it deliberately, in planning, or creatively, in writing or artistic pursuits, it will call to mind spontaneous images that mirror his desires, emotions, and appetites. A man tormented by hate will be plagued by thoughts of revenge, the lover distracted by the image of his beloved. So also, sexual desire will inevitably arouse tempting images. Since all these images arouse action tendencies, this poses a moral problem (see THOUGHTS, MORALITY OF). To avoid taking delight in such unsought fantasies, imagination must be employed in other ways, in absorbing interests, stimulating work. To block fantasy by engaging in exhausting physical effort is rarely effective because imagination will flourish more luxuriantly during enforced rest.

See Also: SENSES; PHANTASM.

Bibliography: M. B. ARNOLD, Story Sequence Analysis (New York 1962); “The Internal Senses: Functions or Powers?,” The Thomist 26 (1963) 15–34. J. A. GASSON, “The Internal Senses: Functions or Powers?” ibid. 1–14. H. RUGG, Imagination (New York 1963). A. ROE, “The Psychology of the Scientist,” Science 134 (1961) 456–59. S. FREUD, New Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis, tr. W. J. H. SPOTT (New York 1933). F. C. BARTLETT, Remembering (New York 1932).

[M. B. ARNOLD]

IMĀM

Imām is a substantive from the Arabic verb amma meaning to precede, to lead; serving as an example or object of imitation, particularly in prayer. The substantive imām may designate a person, or an object serving as a model or guide. The Prophet Muhammad is the imām of the Muslim community. In this sense, the successor to the Prophet, the CALIPH, is the imām of his subjects. The “four imāms” are the founders and heads of the four principal schools of the SUNNITES. In the sense of religious leader, the term is also applied to the great jurisconsults and theologians of Islam, such as ALGAZEL (GHAZZĀLĪ, AL-) and Ibn Taimīya. In the sense of guide, imām is applied to the QU’RAN (sacred scripture of the Muslims) as the guide of the Muslims; it also designates the vulgate of the Qu’ran, the copying of which was ordered by the third caliph, ’Uthmān. In the Qu’ran itself, the term imām is used to designate the scripture of any people. The term was also used to designate the leader who guided travelers, or the driver of camels.

In Muslim constitutional law, the imām is the supreme head of the executive power (see ISLAMIC LAW). As such, “the Supreme Imām” (al-imām al-a’zam) is the title given to the caliph. The function itself is called “the imamate” (al-imāma) or “the supreme imamate” (al-imāma al-’uzmā), a term that is synonymous with caliphate (khilāfa). The imām is also the person who leads the prayer, and imāma is the term applied to that function (originally, the caliph led the prayer). This is not necessarily an official function; any competent Muslim may lead the prayer, and as such would be the imām of the prayer.

Imām is also used by the SHĪ'ITES to designate a legitimate successor of the Caliph 'Alī. Shī'ites Imāms are believed by their followers (currently 9 percent of Islam) to be impeccable; in Shī'ites usage the term takes on mystical and eschatological overtones.

See Also: ISMAILITES.

[G. MAKDISI]

IMBERT, JOSEPH, BL.

Martyr, Jesuit priest, apostolic vicar for the Diocese of Moulins; b. ca. 1720; Marseille, France; d. June 9, 1794 on the Deux-Associés. Imbert entered the Jesuits at Avignon (1748), took his first vows (1750), and was ordained (1754). Thereafter he was a teacher at Châlons-sur-Saône, Besançon, and Grenoble until the Society of Jesus was suppressed (1762). He then placed himself under the authority of the bishop of Moulins and accepted parochial responsibilities. Instead of fleeing the country during the persecution, he continued to minister covertly until his bishop was expelled and Imbert appointed apostolic vicar for the diocese. He was arrested (1793) and imprisoned locally until his deportation in early 1794 with 24 diocesan priests. During their several-month journey to the prison ship at Rochefort to await deportation, Father Imbert wrote The Priests' Marseillaise, uplifting words to the national anthem of the French Revolution. He was beatified by John Paul II, Oct. 1, 1995, together with other martyrs of La Rochelle.

Feast: Jan. 19 (Jesuits).

See Also: ROCHEFORT SHIPS, MARTYRS OF, BB.

Bibliography: I. GOBRY, Les martyrs de la Révolution française (Paris 1989). J. N. TYLEND, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs, 2d ed. (Chicago 1998): 165–167. Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 923–926. L'Osservatore Romano, no. 40 (1995): 3–5; Documentation Catholique 19 (1995): 923–26.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

IMITATION OF CHRIST

One of the best-known classics of devotional literature. It is generally claimed to be the work, indeed the chief work, of THOMAS À KEMPIS, but it would be a more accurate expression of scholarly opinion to say simply that this book and the name of Thomas à Kempis are inseparably linked. It is a work that opens the way to an understanding of the spirit of the DEVOTIO MODERNA and of late medieval piety in general and is among the most widely read books in the whole of world literature. It has appeared in innumerable editions and has been translated into more than 50 different languages. This accounts for the great attention that has been given to the problem of its authorship—a problem that was first raised shortly after the death of Thomas à Kempis and is still discussed. The many editions and translations testify that the question of authorship has not detracted from the attention given to its content. On the contrary, the controversies about its origin appear to have stimulated an ever increasing interest in the Imitation itself, and the counsel of the author—“Ask not who said this, but give your attention to what is said; for men pass away, but the truth of the Lord abides forever”—has not been entirely unheeded. After reviewing the controversy about the authorship, Lucidius Verschueren, OFM, expressed satisfaction that not only was the Imitation being debated, but that its contents were being taken to heart.

Authorship. If anything is to be said about the origin, composition, sources, and inspiration of the Imitation, the problem of authorship must be faced. Among the first to discuss the question was Nicholas of Winghe, the earliest translator of the Imitation, who in 1548 published a Dutch version. (It can be safely assumed that the Latin text is to be considered the original.) Winghe opposed the claim that Jean GERSON, chancellor of the University of Paris, was the author. In this he was supported by Heribert Rosweyde, who in his Vindiciae Kempenses (1617) and later in his treatise Certissima testimonia a quibus Thomas à Kempis asseritur auctor librorum de Imitatione Christi concluded that the book was written by à Kempis. His argument was based on the testimony of John Busch, chronicler of Windesheim, and the abbot, TRITHEMIUS. Rosweyde's work was written in reaction to a claim to the authorship made on behalf of the Italian abbot, Giovanni Gersen, to whom the work was attributed in certain old Italian MSS of the Imitation.

From the beginning of the 17th century onward, there appeared a long succession of controversial works on the question of authorship, and even by 1965 the controversy was not completely settled. The discussion waxed keen during the 19th century, and as late as the end of the century various works were being published defending the authorship of Thomas à Kempis with sound arguments. The evangelical theologian Karl Hirsche, the Catholic theologian O. A. Spitzen, and J. B. Malou, Bishop of Ghent, defended the authorship of Thomas à Kempis vigorously and incisively. About the turn of the century a period of silence began, and it appeared as if the opinion in favor of Thomas à Kempis had become generally and firmly established. However, the authorship of Giovanni Gersen was still being advocated by P. E. Puyol, and that of Jean Gerson by J. B. Monneyeur.

More impressive, however, was the series of writings published after 1925 by J. van Ginneken, SJ, favoring the view that not Thomas à Kempis but Gerard GROOTE was author of the famous work. Van Ginneken's thesis was that Thomas à Kempis only formulated and edited posthumously the diary notes of Groote, and this version was later erroneously taken to be an original work of Thomas à Kempis himself. According to Van Ginneken, the original text existed before Thomas à Kempis came to work upon it. This idea was adopted and further developed by Fritz and Liselotte Kern, who tried to reconstruct the text that supposedly preceded that of Thomas à Kempis.

L. M. J. Delaissé brought the problem closer to a solution with his basic and detailed study Le Manuscrit autographe de Thomas a Kempis (MS Bruxellensis 5855–5861) et l'Imitation de Jésus-Christ. First, he rather satisfactorily ruled out the authorship of Giovanni Gersen and of Jean Gerson. Second, he convincingly proved that there never was a pre-Kempian text of the Imitation as a whole. On the basis of a profound archeological analysis of the Brussels manuscript, Delaissé showed it probable that Thomas à Kempis wrote 13 short and independent treatises (libelli) and brought them together in one and the same codex. Afterward he conscientiously and thoroughly rewrote the text of each of these treatises and, as it were, made them ready for the press. Therefore, this codex (MS Bruxellensis 5855–5861) is an autograph that makes it possible to bring the problem of the origin of the Imitation closer to solution. In it are found four treatises that came—at a time when printing was not in common use everywhere—to be copied together. They thus came to be considered as one coherent work to which the name De Imitatione Christi was given, drawn from the thought expressed in the first words of chapter one of the first treatise: “Qui sequitur me non ambulat in tenebris, dicit Dominus. Haec sunt verba Christi quibus ammonemur quatenus vitam eius et mores imitemur.” When at a later date this collection of the four libelli came to be printed, the same tradition was adopted. Thus, not only the title of the book, but also the book itself in its familiar form does not date back to Thomas à Kempis; however, the four libelli are by his hand.

Sources. Thomas à Kempis drew from a number of sources. In the first place, he drew from the New Testament, as Gerard Groote had already commended: “Radix studii tui et speculum vitae sint primo evangelium Christi, quia ibi est vita Christi.” Second, Thomas drew from the writings that were being read at the time in the circles of the Devotio Moderna and were therefore at his disposal. Enough is known about the copying of MSS done by the Brethren of the Common Life and the religious of the Windesheim Congregation to justify the assumption that a series of more or less complete manuscripts of devotional works were available to Thomas. Among these were the Collationes patrum of John CASSIAN and the Vitae patrum, a collection of monastic biographies. Both works were very much read among the devoti (as is shown in the chronicle of the Augustinian chapter-house at Frenswegen). The study of these works had also been recommended by Gerard Groote. In the Imitation, Thomas mentions his sources only in a number of cases in which he deals with passages from the Bible, but through studies of certain sections it has been established that, besides the more than a thousand Biblical passages pointed out by M. J. Pohl, there are also indications of the influence of the great masters of the spiritual life upon Thomas in his writing of the Imitation; especially noticeable is that of St. Bernard of Clairvaux, whose sermons, and particularly his Sermones in canticum, were greatly esteemed by the devoti. In addition, some other writings, mistakenly attributed to St. Bernard, very probably exercised an influence on the Imitation. Among these were the Speculum monachorum (also called Speculum Bernardi or Speculum peccatorum), the Meditationes, and the Epistola ad fratres de Monte Dei of William of Saint-Thierry. All these works are recorded in biographies of devoti as being among their daily reading matter; for example, in the Conclusa et proposita of Gerard Groote and in the chronicle of Frenswegen. Furthermore, the Speculum monachorum of David of Augsburg and the Scala paradisi of John Climacus deserve mention. Both works were much read, often quoted, and parts of their text have found a place in various rapiaria. Of the older texts, the Homiliae of Gregory the Great and his Moralia in Job should receive particular mention.

Thomas à Kempis. (©Michael Nicholson/CORBIS)

The library of the brethren in Deventer undoubtedly included copies of these works, and considering the scriptorial activity of the devoti, which contributed much to the circulation of these works, one has the right to assume that they were also to be found at Mount St. Agnes, the monastery near Zwolle where Thomas wrote the Imitation. Among the works mentioned in the chronicle of the brethren's house at Emmerich as copied by the devoti at Deventer during Thomas's life were: the Horologium aeternae sapientiae of Henry Suso (which was much read and frequently quoted in the circle of the Devotio Moderna), the Dialogus miraculorum of Caesarius of Heisterbach, the Vitae patrum, the Libellum de arte moriendi (another name for the Quattuor novissima of Dionysius the Carthusian), et multa huiusmodi quibus usque hodie laici nostri utuntur, as the chronicle of Emmerich says. It is not likely that all these works were available to Thomas in their complete version. It is rather to be assumed that he partly used spiritual notebooks (or rapiaria, as they were called among the devoti) that included extensive quotations from these works. Thus, for example, the Omnes, inquit, artes of Florentius Radewijns was a rapiarium that belonged to the inventory of every house of the brethren and of the Augustinian house of Windesheim. The treatises of Gerard Zerbolt of Zutphen, equally familiar to Thomas, can also in part be traced back to this work. Finally, the affinity of the Imitation with the two works of Gerard Groote, the Dicta and the Conclusa et proposita non vota, should be noted.

As yet no systematic investigation has been undertaken to discover all the sources not mentioned by name in the Imitation. This would be no simple task, since Thomas, following the medieval manner of quoting, did not, in most cases, reproduce the exact text of the source. This style of quotation was used not because the writer wished to conceal his source, but because he had to use texts that had perhaps been altered or incorrectly quoted by other authors, or because he had made the original text his own by way of personal assimilation.

Content. It is impossible to summarize the contents of the Imitation in a few lines. The book shows that Thomas, like other devoti, was moved by a strong desire to serve and to imitate Christ. This ideal permeates all his thoughts and his whole life in all its manifestations. The Imitation has opened the way to a more personal and inner life of faith for many people, especially for those who want to renew their spiritual lives without contracting permanent ties in a religious community. The Imitation was intended to strengthen them in their striving for communion with God and in their effort to prepare themselves for eternal life. The first book contains admonitions useful to the spiritual life and deals with the means of liberating oneself from worldly inclinations and of preparing for conversation with God. The second book contains an appeal and admonitions to promote the interior life that leads to conversation with God and the interior consolation of the third book, starting with the words: "audiam quid loquatur in me Dominus Deus." The fourth book urges the reader to receive Holy Communion in a devout manner. The Imitation has impressively summarized the religious attitude of the Devotio Moderna and given it its most representative expression. In this light it is possible to explain its impact upon later generations. The renewal in spiritual life brought about by the Devotio Moderna did not come from the introduction of new ideas opposed by the Church or contrary to its doctrine. On the contrary, the movement aimed at leading people closer to God within the Church. Although Protestants, as well as Catholics, have found inspiration in it, it is incorrect to speak of a unilateral continuity between the Devotio Moderna and Protestantism.

Bibliography: W. JAPPE ALBERTS, "Zur Historiographie der Devotio Moderna und ihrer Erforschung," in F. PETRI and W. JAPPE ALBERTS, Gemeinsame Probleme deutsch-niederländischer Landes- und Volksforschung (Groningen 1963) 144–171, discussion of much of the lit. on the Imitatio Thomae Hemerken a Kempis opera omnia, ed. M. J. POHL, 7 v. (Freiburg 1902–22), v.2 contains the Imitatio, v.7:87–109 contains G. Groote, Conclusa et proposita non vota. S. AXTERS, Geschiedenis van de Vroomheid in de Nederlanden, 3 v. (Antwerp 1950–56), v.3 for Devotio Moderna, 3:170–198 on Thomas à Kempis, an excellent work; The Spirituality of the Old Low Countries, tr. D. ATTWATER (London 1954). R. R. POST, Kerkgeschiedenis van Nederland in de Middeleeuwen, 2 v. (Utrecht 1957) 1:367–414, a clear, orderly discussion of the spirituality and writings of the Devotio Moderna. A. HYMA, The Brethren of Common Life (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1950); Hyma's thesis that Gerard Zerbolt is the author of the first book of the Imitatio is rejected by several scholars, such as P. Grootens and B. Spaapen. See Ons Geestelijk Erf 25 (1951) 300; 28 (1954) 91. G. BONET-MAURY, Quaeritur e quibus nederlandicis fontibus hauserit scriptor libri cui titulus est "De Imitatione Christi," 1384–1464 (Paris 1878). J. J. VAN GINNEKEN, De navolging van Christus naar de oudsten teksten in de authentieke volgorde bewerkt (Amsterdam 1944); Van Ginneken's ideas are disputed by many authors. L. M. J. DELAÏSSÉ, Le Manuscrit autographe de Thomas à Kempis et "L'Imitation de Jésus-Christ": Examen archéologique et édition diplomatique du Bruxellensis 5855–61, 2 v. (Brussels 1956), reviewed by R. POST, in Bijdragen voor de geschiedenis der Nederlanden 13 (1958) 59–62, and E. F. JACOB, English Historical Review 75 (1960) 302–303. M. VAN WOERKUM, "Het libellus Omnes, inquit, artes een rapiarium van Florentius Radewijns," Ons Geestelijk Erf 25 (1951) 113–158, 225–268, esp. important for the literary sources of the Imitatio. W. JAPPE ALBERT and A. L. HULSHOFF, Het Frensweger handschrift betreffende de geschiedenis van de Moderne devotie (Groningen 1958), text of the chronicle of the Augustinian chapter-house at Frenswegen, with extensive bibliog.

[W. JAPPE ALBERTS]

IMMA, BL.

Known also as Emma, Imina, Immina, Benedictine abbess; d. c. 750. According to a 12th-century life of St. BURCHARD, Bp. of Würzburg, she was the daughter of Hetan II, Duke of Thuringia, who built a church on the Burgberg (known later as Marienburg) that dominated the city of Würzburg. Here Imma established a Benedictine monastery that she later gave to Burchard in exchange for a location at Karlsburg-on-Main (Karlstadt) a few miles north. Her burial there is noted in a 9th-century martyrology. After the destruction of this house in 1236, her relics were transferred on October 27 of that year to the choir of the cathedral in Würzburg. Exhumed in 1700 to be placed in a new reliquary, they disappeared. The village of Himmelstadt (Imminestat given in 840 by Louis I the Pious to the bishopric of Würzburg) is named for Bl. Imma.

Feast: Nov. 25 or Dec. 10.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 6:584–585. J. MABILLON, Annales ordinis S. Benedicti, 6 v. (Lucca 1739–45) 2:138–139. W. SCHATZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:629.

[W. E. WILKIE]

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

The term “Immaculate Conception” designates the belief that the Virgin Mary was free from ORIGINAL SIN from the very beginning of her life, i.e., from her conception. The rest of mankind inherits a human nature infected with sin, because of the Fall of ADAM, from whom the human race takes its origin. Each person is delivered from this original sin only by his adherence to Christ, the Redeemer. But Mary was, by a unique GRACE, preserved from ever contracting original sin; she inherited human nature in an untainted condition and hence is said to have been conceived immaculate. This privilege, designed to make her a suitable mother for Christ, was given her in view of His future merits.

The Church holds that the Immaculate Conception was included in the body of doctrine originally entrusted to the Apostles and transmitted by them to the Church (see DEPOSIT OF FAITH); otherwise it could not now be made a matter of faith. But this does not imply that the Apostles received an explicit instruction on the matter. If the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was, in the beginning, only a hidden implication contained in other more express teachings, and destined to be perceived and brought out into the open only after the gospel had germinated in the Christian mind and brought forth fruit through centuries of meditation, this would suffice to make the Immaculate Conception part of the Apostolic teaching in the sense required by the Church.

Scriptural and Apostolic Teaching. Historical research indicates that such was, in fact, the case. For, in the first place, Scripture makes no direct reference to Mary’s conception. Some hold that her absolute sinlessness is referred to in Gn 3.15: “I will put enmity between you and the woman, between your seed and her seed: he shall crush your head, and you shall lie in wait for his heel.” Pope Pius IX cited this text as a prophecy of the Immaculate Conception (Ineffabilis Deus, Acta Pii IX 1.1:607). This text by itself, however, would hardly suffice to make the doctrine known. The Immaculate Conception needs to be established on some other basis, and then may be seen as included in the broad reference of Gn 3.15.

Much confusion has resulted from the fact that the second half of this verse was inaccurately translated in the Vulgate to read, “She shall crush your head.” This translation, which has strongly affected the traditional representations of the Blessed Virgin, is today generally recognized to be a mistake for “it [or ‘he,’ i.e., the seed of the woman] shall crush,” and consequently can no longer be cited in favor of the Immaculate Conception. (See PROTO-EVANGELIUM.)

The words of Gabriel, “Hail, full of grace” (Lk 1.28), have also been appealed to as a revelation of the Immaculate Conception, on the grounds that to be truly full of grace, Mary must have had it always. This interpretation, however, overlooks the fact that the Greek term κεχαριτωμένη is not nearly so explicit as the translation “full of grace” might suggest. It implies only that God’s favor has been lavished on Mary, without defining the degree of grace.

But even though the Immaculate Conception is not taught explicitly in Scripture, the question must be considered whether it may not have belonged to the oral teaching of the Apostles and been recorded only later on. Historical evidence, however, is against such a supposition, as will be clear from the discussion that follows.

Explicit belief in the Immaculate Conception seems to have arisen in the Church as an application or specification of the general doctrine of Mary’s holiness. Chapters 1 and 2 of Luke (confirmed by ch. 1 of Mt) represent Mary as an exceptionally holy person. They also seem to relate her holiness to her being chosen as Christ’s Mother: “thou hast found grace with God. And behold, thou shalt conceive” (Lk 1.30–31). It is clear that only a flawless holiness would be in any way proportionate to the sacredness of her office. To determine just how far such considerations can take one is a delicate task. They must be considered against the background of God’s universal demand for holiness on the part of those who draw near to Him (see 1 Pt 1.16) and the thoroughly biblical doctrine that it is God who calls and fashions His saints according to His good pleasure (Rom ch. 8, 9). Mary’s virginity, which must be viewed in a Christian perspective, and the miracle by which God preserved it, even when calling her to motherhood, are signs of the extraordinary way in which divine grace fitted her for her vocation. That these indications, taken together, imply an incomparable holiness in Mary that was not only actual at the moment of the ANNUNCIATION, but extended back to the very beginning of her life, is a judgment that the Church has made—but only after the way had been prepared by centuries of reflection, clarification, and discussion. There were two phases to the historical process: first, development of an adequate appreciation of the immensity of Mary’s holiness in general; second, realization that this holiness included her initial preservation from all taint of sin.

“The Immaculate Conception,” 14th- or 15th-century manuscript painting by a Flemish artist from “The Life of Our Lady.” This drawing is one of the earliest representations of the Immaculate Conception in art.

Early Development. The earliest Church Fathers regarded Mary as holy but not as absolutely sinless. Origen and some of his followers assumed that she had been imperfect like other human beings. But as time went on, the thought of her became more and more characterized in the mind of the Church by the note of holiness—a tendency that was powerfully stimulated in the East by the Council of EPHESUS (431), when it ratified her title MOTHER OF GOD. By the 8th century, belief that her holiness was both flawless and immense was firmly established throughout the Byzantine world. In the Latin West, the same development took place more slowly; but by 1099 St. Anselm was writing, “it was fitting that she be clothed with a purity so splendid that none greater under God could be conceived” (De conceptu virginali 18).

Such affirmations arose, not from a clear concept or definite thesis about the degree of her grace, but from an obscure yet powerful impulse of Christian hearts to attribute to her the greatest holiness and glory compatible with her status as a creature. This was not mere pious wishfulness, but the germination of the Gospel teaching in souls that had incarnated the truths of faith in their own lives, and now experienced the inherent demands of these truths in their own inclinations.

The further specification that Mary had never been tainted by sin, not even at the first moment of her existence, came to be affirmed quite spontaneously, as a natural part of this same development. The affirmation appears first in the East, without emphasis, in the course of general eulogies of the holiness of the Mother of God. Usually it is expressed only by vague and sometimes indirect references. There seems to have been little reflection upon the difficulty of reconciling such a teaching with the doctrine of original sin, and no great issue was ever made of the point. It is impossible to give a precise date when the belief was held as a matter of faith, but by the 8th or 9th century it seems to have been generally admitted. After the separation of the Eastern Church from Rome, the belief gradually languished (although it appeared as late as the 15th century, in George Scholarios [Gennadius II], d. c. 1472) and finally disappeared altogether from the Byzantine tradition, so that to the Greek Orthodox theologians of the 19th century, the doctrine of Pius IX appeared as an innovation.

Theological Objections in Medieval West. Meanwhile, however, the belief had been transplanted to the Western Church by means of a feast in honor of Mary’s conception. This feast had originated before 700 (probably in the monasteries of Syria) and had since spread throughout the Byzantine world. It reached England—no one knows exactly how—around 1050, but was suppressed during the reform of the Anglo-Saxon Church under William the Conqueror (reign 1066–87). When it was revived in spite of some protests a few decades later (about 1125), an argument ensued, in which, for the first time, the character of Our Lady’s conception became the direct subject of critical discussion. It was through this discussion that the idea of Mary’s Immaculate Conception was gradually brought to general attention, clarified, and eventually accepted in the Church.

In the beginning, the argument bore directly on the question whether it was right to celebrate the new feast, and only incidentally on the question of Mary’s sinlessness. (It must be kept in mind that the feast itself did not represent Mary’s conception precisely as immaculate, but merely honored the event.) Gradually, however, the argument came to focus on the issue of an Immaculate Conception. The earliest extant defense of the feast, and also of belief in a sinless conception for Mary, is a charming and naive, yet substantial little treatise, De conceptione B. Virginis Mariae, composed (1123?, 1139?) by the English monk Eadmer (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 271 v., indexes 4 v. [Paris 1878–90] 159:301–318; critical ed. H. Thurston and T. Slater [Freiburg im Breisgau 1904]). The classic condemnation of the feast (and of the belief) is a letter from St. Bernard of Clairvaux to the canons of the Cathedral at Lyons in 1140 or thereabouts (Letter 174, Patrologia Latina 182:332–336). Bernard argues that the Holy Spirit could not have been involved in anything so inherently evil as the conception of a child.

The scholastic theologians began to interest themselves seriously in the question at Paris about a third of the way through the 13th century. Their discussions were complicated by the biological notion, then prevalent, that the human soul is not infused into the fetus until 40 or 80 days after its conception. They were handicapped also by a lingering tendency to imagine original sin as a quality infecting the body even prior to the soul’s advent. Hence, they posed the question in terms of three possibilities: whether the Blessed Virgin had been sanctified (and hence made free from original sin) before, after, or at the very instant of the infusion of the soul into her body.

At first, the theologians were practically unanimous in declaring that Mary could not have been sanctified until after the infusion of the soul into her body; hence they held that she must have been subject to original sin prior to that moment. The reasons for rejecting the possibility of an earlier sanctification were various, but the crucial one was thus formulated by St. Thomas: “If the soul of the Blessed Virgin had never been stained with the contagion of original sin, this would have detracted from Christ’s dignity as the savior of all men” (Summa theologiae 3a, 27.2 ad 2). For she would not have needed the Redemption that Christ brings; hence He would not be, as Scripture says He is, the savior of all men (cf. 1 Tm 4.10). St. Thomas concludes: “The Blessed Virgin indeed contracted original sin, but was cleansed from it before her birth” (ibid.). For the view that St. Thomas did not intend to deny the Immaculate Conception as the Church defines it, see N. Del Prado, Divus Thomas et bulla dogmatica “Ineffabilis Deus” (Fribourg 1919); P. Lumbreras, “St. Thomas and the Immaculate Conception,” Homiletic and Pastoral Review 24 (1924) 253–263.

The Paris theologians were not insensitive to the general inclination of Christendom to credit Mary with the greatest possible sanctity. On the contrary, they testified to it. St. Thomas declared that she enjoyed a fullness of grace surpassing any other under Christ (Summa theologiae 3a, 27.5), and others expressed similar views. All these theologians tended to reduce to the minimum the length of time during which they supposed Mary had been under the stain of original sin. But they hesitated to say that she had been completely exempted from sin for fear of jeopardizing another doctrine of the faith, the universality of the REDEMPTION.

Scotus's Solution, Spread of Explicit Acceptance.

Acceptance of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception in the Church came about, not as the result of any decisive demonstration, but in consequence of the elimination of the obstacle that was holding back the natural inclination of Christians to believe it. That is to say, the doctrine was shown not to be in contradiction with the doctrine of the universal Redemption. John DUNS SCOTUS (c. 1264–1308), a Franciscan from Oxford, was chiefly responsible for this. He argued that if Mary had been preserved from original sin, this would not have freed her from dependence on Christ's redemptive work; on the contrary, "Mary more than anyone else would have needed Christ as her Redeemer, since she would have contracted original sin . . . if the grace of the Mediator had not prevented this. Thus, as others needed Christ so that the sin already contracted should be remitted for them through His merit, so Mary had even greater need of a prevenient Mediator lest there be sin to be contracted and lest she contract it" (In 3 sentences 3.1, "Per illud patet" [Vivès 14:171]; cf. C. Balič, I. D. Scoti theologiae marianae elementa [Sibenik 1933] 35).

The intervention of Duns Scotus seems to have been the factor that turned the tide of theological opinion in favor of the belief. Not, of course, at once; a controversy was to rage for centuries over the matter, embittered by the fact that those who opposed the Immaculate Conception felt that the faith itself was at stake, while its defenders regarded it as a matter of loyal devotion to the Mother of God. But as generations reflected prayerfully on the question, the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception steadily gained adherents, as the position more in accord with the profound exigencies of the Christian faith. By the end of the 17th century, scarcely any question was raised about it anymore.

Meanwhile, the great Thomistic commentator, Cajetan (1469–1534), gave the discussion a new direction by asserting that the Immaculate Conception could be reconciled with the universal Redemption only on condition that one acknowledge in Mary a debitum peccati, that is, an inherent tendency toward original sin, although not its actuality. This would explain why she would have contracted original sin had it not been for the intervention of grace (De conceptione B. Mariae Virginis ad Leonem X [Opuscula omnia, Venice 1580, 2.1:71–73]). This notion of a debitum in Mary has been variously interpreted and bitterly debated. Cajetan himself modified his first notion in his commentary on Summa theologiae 3a, 27.2, no. 7. The question whether a debitum peccati should be postulated in Our Lady remains today one of the principal points of theological controversy on the subject of the Immaculate Conception. See J. Bonnefoy, OFM, "La negacion del debitum peccati en Maria. Sintesis historica," Verdad y Vita 12 (1954) 103–171.

Popes and Dogmatic Definition. The popes at first, and for a long time, left the question of the Immaculate Conception, like so many other theological disagreements, open for free discussion. From time to time, however, the heat of the controversy obliged them to intervene in order to protect the peace of the Church. When this occurred, they tended to assume more and more decidedly the role of defenders of the belief against its attackers. Thus Sixtus IV, in 1482 and 1483, forbade the accusation of heresy to be used by either side in the dispute when it was being used chiefly by the opponents of the belief; he had given permission for a liturgical office of the Conception (1477 and 1480). This had the effect of reassuring proponents of the belief, and led to an outburst of artistic representations, above all in Spain, where the classical iconography of the Immaculate Conception became fixed during the 17th century (MURILLO [1617–82]).

During the 17th century, numerous requests for a favorable definition of the belief were firmly declined by the popes. Gregory XV declared, "The Holy Spirit, although besought by the most constant prayers, has not yet opened to His Church the secrets of this mystery" (see O'Connor, 306). After a peaceful 18th century, the 19th began with a new campaign of requests, as devotion to the belief continued to grow. This devotion was further stimulated by the MIRACULOUS MEDAL apparitions in Paris in 1830. The Sixth Provincial Council of Baltimore made the Immaculate Conception the patronal feast of the United States, 1846. POPE PIUS IX (1846–78), almost immediately after his election, undertook a series of acts in favor of the belief, and in 1854, after consultation with all the bishops of the Church as well as several theological committees, defined the dogma of faith: "the doctrine," he said, "which holds that the most Blessed Virgin Mary was preserved from all stain of original sin in the first instant of her Conception, by a singular grace and privilege of almighty God, in consideration of the merits of Jesus Christ, savior of the human race, has been revealed by God and must, therefore, firmly and constantly be believed by all the faithful" (H. Denzinger, Enchi- ridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 2803). The text of the definition was published and explained in the encyclical letter of that same year, Ineffabilis Deus (Acta Pii IX 1.1:616).

See Also: DOCTRINE, DEVELOPMENT OF; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris; Tables générales 1951– ) 2:2193–2214. “Unbefleckte Empfängnis Mariä,” Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) v. 10. K. H. SCHELKLE and O. SEMMELROTH, H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 2:111–122. CONGRESSO MARIOLOGICO INTERNAZIONALE, Virgo Immaculata: acta congressus mariologici-mariani Romae anno 1954 celebrati, ed. C. BALIČ, 18 v. (Rome 1955–56). M. JUGIE, L’Immaculée conception dans l’Écriture Sainte et dans la tradition orientale (Rome 1952). E. D. O’CONNOR, ed., The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception (Notre Dame, Ind. 1958). J. B. CAROL, A History of the Controversy over the “debitum peccati” (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1978).

[E. D. O’CONNOR]

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, DAUGHTERS OF MARY OF THE

(D.M., Official Catholic Directory #0860), a congregation founded in New Britain, Conn., in 1904 by the Rev. Lucian Bojnowski. Wishing to help orphaned children and at the same time to commemorate in a special way the golden jubilee (1904) of the proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, Bojnowski gathered together a group of devout sodalists of his parish and formed the nucleus of the community. The sisters adopted royal blue for the color of their habit and the miraculous medal as their official emblem. In 1939 the congregation was raised to the status of a pontifical institute. The sisters are concentrated in the Middle Atlantic states. The generalate is in New Britain, CT.

[M. L. PERZANOWSKI]

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, MISSIONARY SISTERS OF THE

(SMIC, Official Catholic Directory #2760), a pontifical institute founded in Santarém, Brazil, in 1910 by Bp. Amandus Bahlmann, OFM (d. 1939). The congregation follows the rule of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis. Elizabeth Tombrock, a German schoolteacher who became Mother Maria Immaculata of Jesus, and four Conceptionist nuns exclaustated by papal indult from Ajuda Convent in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, made up the first community. Mother Immaculata, the first superior general, died on April 23, 1938, in Allegany, N.Y., where the congregation had made its first U.S. foundation in 1922. The sisters staff schools, hospitals and other healthcare facilities, and centers for catechetical instruction and for social work. The generalate is in Paterson, NJ.

[J. B. CAROL]

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION BROTHERS

Or Maastricht Brothers (Congregatio Fratrum Immaculatae Conceptionis, FIC), a congregation founded at Maastricht, Netherlands, by Louis Rutten (1809–91), a secular priest, and Jacob Hoecken (1810–80), a layman. Papal approval came in 1848 and 1870. The brothers have taught in schools, cared for orphans, and nursed the sick. Missions were opened in South America, Africa and Asia. In all these missions the brothers teach boys, especially in secondary schools, and also direct training schools for teachers.

[W. UBACHS/EDS.]

IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY

Devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary has always been closely associated with devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. It has, however, a distinct history, a distinct essential nature, and a distinct and specific purpose among spiritual devotions.

Since 1942, when PIUS XII solemnly consecrated the world to the Immaculate Heart of Mary, this devotion has been incorporated into the official liturgical worship of the Church. In 1944, to commemorate this special consecration, Pius XII extended the solemn feast to the universal Church, naming August 22 as the new feast date and giving it a proper liturgical formulary.

History. Devotion to the heart of the MOTHER OF GOD can be traced to the commentaries of the Fathers on the Sponsa of the Song of Songs. However, although the heart of Mary is twice mentioned in the Gospel of Luke, there is no indication of any truly significant devotion of this nature in the early centuries of Christian history. It was not until the 16th century, and notably in the 17th, under St. John Eudes, that there arose a widespread devotional practice honoring Mary’s heart. In 1805, Pius VII granted general approbation for the celebration of a special feast by any diocese or religious institute that desired to adopt it.

In recent times, devotion to Our Lady of Fatima and new theological studies have brought the devotion into prominence, and the special recognition of Pius XII has established it as a singularly worthy form of consecration.

The Immaculate Heart of Mary. (©Andrea Jemolo/CORBIS)

Meaning. The heart of Mary is the material object of this devotion, and it is from the material object that its title is derived. It is however, the formal object, namely, Mary's love, that gives the devotion its true meaning and significance.

All forms of Marian cult, of course, whether they look to some particular mystery in the life of Our Lady, or to some special attribute, have in common a single object—the person of Mary. Devotion to the heart of the Mother of God is most fitting, therefore, since veneration is directed toward an object that symbolizes and encompasses all the qualities that are predicated of her.

In a very real sense, the heart of the Virgin played an important role in her physical maternity and is associated directly with the affections of her maternal soul. The splendor of Mary's sanctity and the great mysteries of her life, especially that of the divine maternity, are closely related to her love, and since the word "heart" frequently has a symbolic or metaphorical meaning, devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary is properly understood to include and represent Mary's entire sanctity and inner life, along with her various gifts and perfections, all related intimately to her love.

The Church considers it fitting to approve for veneration objects that are sensible manifestations of spiritual truth, for man himself is composed of elements both sensible and spiritual. It is, therefore, appropriate that a physical element, such as Mary's heart, be chosen to objectify the great charity or love of the Mother of God.

Finally, in any Marian devotion a threefold homage is rendered to Mary. Honor is paid to her maternity, her sanctity, and her role in the redemptive mission of Christ, her Son. Since each of the three is inseparably associated with her love, and is thus truly reflected in her heart, the Church has further reason for fostering this devotion.

Beyond what it obviously incorporates and symbolizes, devotion to the Immaculate Heart has as a prime purpose the recognition of the special instrumentality of Mary in the bringing of souls to God. This is achieved in the practice of the devotion through two acts, themselves part of the devotion—the acts of consecration and reparation.

Since one is consecrated to Mary only because she is the Mother of God and closely associated through her Queenship with the Deity, such a consecration is always referred ultimately to God Himself. Proper foundation for a consecration to Mary, however, is to be sought in her dominion over and concern for her spiritual children.

This is typified in her Queenship, and the better this is understood, the more evident becomes the dignity of the act of consecration, and the more clear all that is implied in it. It is significant, therefore, that the opening words of the formula of consecration employed by Pius XII in the world consecration ceremonies of 1942 directly concern Mary's sovereignty and call upon her as "Queen."

A true and complete act of consecration is actually a state in which the faithful are totally and perpetually dedicated to the Heart of Mary, entrusting to her all that they have and are. For this reason the act of consecration constitutes a relationship that affords Our Lady complete veneration.

Because of the broad nature of its object—the entire sanctity and love of the Mother of God—and because of the ramifications and significance of an act of consecration, the devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary can be regarded as the synthesis of all Marian doctrine and devotion.

Bibliography: PIUS XII, "Regina del Santissimo Rosario" (Prayer, Oct. 31, 1942) Acta Apostolicae Sedis 34 (1942) 345–346, act of consecration to the Immaculate Heart. Office and Mass of the feast, with decree of promulgation and changes in rubrics, ibid. 37 (1945) 44–52. E. DUBLANCHY, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 3.1:351–354. J. EUDES, The Admirable Heart of Mary, tr. C. DI TARGIANI and R. HAUSER (New York 1948). T. M. SPARKS, Summarium de cultu Cordis Immaculati Beatae Mariae Virginis (Turin 1951). J. F. MURPHY, Mary's Immaculate Heart (Milwaukee 1951).

[J. F. MURPHY]

IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY, CONGREGATION OF THE (MISSIONHURST)

Also known as, Scheut Missionaries or Immaculate Heart Missioners or, in the U.S., Missionhurst Missioners. The Congregatio Immaculati Cordis Mariae (CICM, Official Catholic Directory #0860) is a mission society of priests and brothers founded by Theophile VERBIST at Scheut (Brussels, Belgium) in 1862. It was originally limited to recruiting Belgian and Dutch missionaries for China, but it became international in 1947 when members from other nationalities were accepted.

In 1865 Verbist, with three priests and one lay helper, left for the Apostolic Vicariate of Xiwanzi (Siwanzte) in Inner Mongolia. Verbist died in China in 1868; his remains were transferred to Scheut in 1931. His followers were instrumental in improving social conditions for the native converts in Inner Mongolia (250,000 Catholics before World War II). The missionaries bought land, leased it to small farmers who formed Catholic towns, and introduced irrigation in the Province of Ning-hia. In 1931 the Scheut missionaries, through the efforts of Rev. Joseph Rutten, were instrumental in finding a vaccine against spotted typhoid, thus saving the lives of hundreds of Catholic missionaries in China. Ten Scheut missionaries were victims of the Boxer uprising (1900). Another 16 met violent death at the hands of bandits, Communists, or Japanese troops. A total of 665 priests and two brothers served in six dioceses and one archdiocese of Inner Mongolia and northern China. The last foreign-born member of the congregation left China in November 1955.

The Scheut missionaries began mission work in the Congo in 1885; the first native priest was ordained in 1934, and the first native bishop was consecrated in 1959. A foundation was made in 1907 in the Philippine Islands, where the missionaries concentrated their efforts in Mountain Province, northern Luzon. Other foundations followed in Singapore (1932), Indonesia (1937), Japan (1947), Hong Kong (1949), Haiti (1953), Chile (founded 1953, terminated 1957), Taiwan (1954), Guatemala (1955), and the Dominican Republic (1958). In 1946 the first permanent establishment was made in the U.S.

Scheut missionaries are ordained for foreign mission. The generalate is in Rome; the U.S. provincialate is in Arlington, VA.

Bibliography: J. RUTTEN, Les Missionnaires de Scheut et leur Fondateur (Louvain 1930). V. RONDELEZ, Scheut, Congregation missionnaire (Brussels 1962).

[A. F. VERSTRAETE/EDS.]

IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY, SISTERS, SERVANTS OF THE

(IHM); founded in Monroe, MI in 1845 by Louis Florent Gillet and Theresa Maxis DUCHEMIN. To the original foundation in Monroe were added two independent congregations in Pennsylvania, one centered in Immaculata, and the other in Scranton. All three congregations engage in a variety of ministries evolving from their original focus on the works of education.

Gillet, a Redemptorist missionary from Belgium, established a mission in Monroe in 1843. Concerned about the evangelization of the French Canadian girls in the area, Gillet was eager to obtain the collaboration of bilingual sisters. He turned to a sister he had known in Baltimore, Theresa Maxis Duchemin.

Duchemin was a member of the Oblate Sisters of Providence, the first congregation of African American sisters. She was one of the four founding members of the congregation, all women of Haitian ethnicity, and the first U.S.-born African American to become a woman religious. The congregation's original ministry was the education of Haitian immigrant children. As the number of Haitian children dwindled and the poor African Americans who attended could not afford to pay, the sisters turned to manual labor activities to support themselves. Archbishop Samuel Eccleston, who was not supportive of the congregation, ordered them to discontinue accepting new members.

Gillet had visited the Oblate convent during his trips to Baltimore, happy to minister to the French-speaking sisters. In 1845, he proposed that Duchemin assist him in founding a new congregation in Monroe to minister to the French-speaking girls. It seemed to Theresa that the Oblate congregation was fated to disband. She therefore accepted Gillet's invitation, traveled to Monroe, and on Nov. 10, 1845 initiated community life with two other sisters, Charlotte Shaaff (also from the Oblates) and Theresa Renault. Louis and Theresa provided an Alphonsian foundation for the congregation, adapting the Redemptorist rule to the circumstances of the new congregation of sisters. The school for girls opened in January 1846, initiating IHM ministry that has extended throughout the U.S. and to Latin America, the Middle East, and Africa.

After almost a decade of successful ministry and growth in Michigan, the congregation was caught up in difficulties arising between the bishop, Peter Paul Lefevre and the Redemptorist Fathers. The bishop's reaction was to strive to eradicate all Alphonsian influences on the IHM congregation. Theresa was eager to preserve the Alphonsian tradition to the congregation and recognized this was no longer possible in Monroe. She persuaded Bishop Lefevre to allow her to accept a mission in the diocese of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, where the Redemptorist Saint John Neumann was bishop. Her efforts to move the entire congregation to Pennsylvania led the bishop to dismiss those sisters he deemed to be disloyal and to declare the two convents separate congregations as of 1859. The diocese of Scranton was created in northeastern Pennsylvania in 1868; in 1871 William O'Hara, the first bishop of Scranton, separated the sisters within his jurisdiction from the Philadelphia congregation, establishing the third independent congregation.

For the first one hundred years after the original foundation, each of the three IHM congregations focused its ministry of education. The endeavors extended from day nurseries and kindergartens to the three higher education institutions the congregations founded: Marygrove College in Detroit (1905), Marywood University in Scranton (1915), and Immaculata College (1920). During this period, some sisters engaged in social service and health care ministries, but the majority were in the education ministry.

The reforms of Vatican Council II brought numerous radical changes to the lives and ministries of the sisters. They responded to the Church's call to a more incarnationally centered and more scripturally based spirituality. They heeded the Council's urging to return to the roots of the foundation and to discern its charism and the vision of the founders. The Council's focus on individual personal dignity strengthened the sisters' commitment to personal responsibility and to supportive community. In striving to respond to the needs of God's people in contemporary times, the sisters engage in a wide range of health care, human service, educational, spiritual, and pastoral ministries. They understand their ministries as participation in the Church's mission of action on behalf of justice. Each congregation maintains a number of congregation-sponsored institutions and congregational commitments to parishes and schools. Many sisters are engaged in individual ministries within the Church and in the broader society.

The three IHM congregations, which number more than two thousand sisters, share planning on significant issues in the Tri-IHM Conference. In the late 20th century the Oblate Sisters of Providence joined with the IHM congregations in their deliberations, creating the Tri-IHM/Oblate Conference, thereby bringing the history of the four congregations full circle in the Providence of God.

Bibliography: Official Catholic Directory #2150; Official Catholic Directory #2170; Official Catholic Directory #2160. M. GANNON, ed., Paths of Daring, Deeds of Hope: Letters by and about Mother Theresa Maxis Duchemin, Sisters of IHM (Scranton, PA 1992). R. KELLY, No Greater Service: The History of the Congregation of the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (Monroe, MI 1948). G. H. SHERWOOD, The Oblates One Hundred and One Years (New York 1931). SISTERS, SERVANTS OF THE IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY, MONROE, MICHIGAN, Building Sisterhood: A Feminist History of the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (Syracuse 1997). The Sisters of the IHM (New York 1923).

[M. GANNON]

IMMACULATE HEART OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY, SISTERS OF

(IHM, Official Catholic Directory #2930); a congregation with papal approbation whose official title is The California Institute of the Sisters of the Most Holy and Immaculate Heart of the Blessed Virgin Mary (IHM).

Motherhouse of the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, Monroe, Michigan.

This community, which follows the Rule of St. Augustine, dates its foundation from April, 26, 1924, when what had formerly been a province connected with the original motherhouse in Gerona, Spain, became a pontifical institute in its own right. At that time there were 100 professed sisters, whose chief work was in Catholic education on the elementary, secondary, and college levels. The sisters staffed educational institutions in various parts of California, although most of their work was done in and around Los Angeles, where the motherhouse is located. As the community expanded during the next 40 years, schools and convents were erected in Texas and Arizona. Missionary work with the native children on government reservations in Canada was inaugurated in the 1940s.

Some 30 years after the break with the governing body in Spain, the members of the congregation voted to include hospital work as one of their specific aims. Subsequently they opened medical hospitals in Apple Valley (1956) and West Covina (1962), and a convalescent hospital in Salinas (1956), all in California. About the same time a retreat house for married couples was opened in Montecito, Calif.

Two sisters whose work was outstanding in the growth of the community were Mother Eucharist Harney, Superior general (1939–51), whose administration provided new vigor to the congregation; Mother Regina McPartlin, superior general (1951–63) who was responsible for the expansion of the apostolic work of the sisters. By the mid-1960s, there were 600 professed sisters, most of them engaged in teaching in 68 grammar schools, eleven high schools, and one college (the Immaculate Heart College), which was closed in 1980.

In response to the Second Vatican Council's call for renewal of religious life and under the leadership of Mother Humiliata (later President Anita Caspary) (1963–73), the IHM sisters entered a period of prayer and reflection culminating in a Chapter of Renewal in 1967. Specific aspects of the renewal led to disputes both within the community and between the IHM sisters and the local ordinary, Cardinal James Francis McIntyre. With no satisfactory resolution of the disputed issues, in 1969 more than 300 sisters voted to become a non-canonical community of religious persons, the Immaculate Heart Community. About 50 sisters chose to continue in the traditional, canonical structure, retaining the name Sisters of the Immaculate Heart.

At the beginning of the 21st century, the Immaculate Heart Community numbered about 175 members, single and married, female and male, from several Christian denominations. The members were involved in public and private education, law, social work, parish ministry, retreat work, and health care. The Sisters of the Immaculate Heart had about 20 members engaged in retreat work and education. Both groups maintained their headquarters in Los Angeles.

[M. SHARPLES/M. EGAN]

IMMANENCE

From the Latin manere, meaning to remain within as distinct from to go beyond or outside of; a term used generally to designate the self-sufficiency and interiority of being. Immanence is opposed to TRANSCENDENCE, although it is sometimes used as complementary to it. If it excludes transcendence, it ignores extrinsic causality and an external referent for knowledge; if it recognizes transcendence, it emphasizes the inner dynamism and self-perfecting character of being or the awareness of self in the knowing act.

History. When the problem of immanence presents itself in history, it is usually stated in relation to that of transcendence. Philosophers have sought to solve the problems raised by the notions of BEING and the SELF by alternately emphasizing immanence to the exclusion of transcendence or transcendence to the exclusion of immanence. The IMMANENTISM of the pre-Socratics and the Stoics, who posited the unfolding of the physical universe from a material principle, has thus been balanced by the TRANSCENDENTALISM of others, such as the Platonists and the Augustinians, who located the fullness of reality in the world of SPIRIT. Intermediate between these are philosophies such as those of SOCRATES, PLATO, ARISTOTLE, and St. THOMAS AQUINAS, which recognize the mutual complementarity of immanence and transcendence.

The earliest concept of immanence is that associated with units that are self-perfecting in their being and operation. The Greek naturalists saw the universe as composed of such units, which develop organically and possess within themselves their own perfective principle. Thus they tended to solve the problem of the one and the many in terms other than those of extrinsic causality. Concern with the living and self-sufficiency of the organism led to the immanentist philosophy of HYLOZOISM, formulated by the pre-Socratics and the Stoics and later developed more systematically by vitalists and creative evolutionists. A similar concern with animal life prompted the emergence of PANPSYCHISM, as exemplified in the philosophies of G. BRUNO, R. H. LOTZE, and E. H. Haeckel.

Aquinas's treatment of immanence associated it with the activity of the AGENT. He implicitly distinguished between transient activities, which pass outside the agent and produce an effect in the patient, and immanent activities, which remain within the agent and contribute to its own perfecting (Summa theologiae 1a, 18.3 ad 1); this distinction was made explicitly by later scholastics such as T. de Vio CAJETAN and JOHN OF ST. THOMAS. The scholastic tradition recognized also various degrees of immanent activity, which was associated with the degree of IMMATERIALITY on the part of the agent. The ultimate of interiority, autonomy, and independence was attributed to God—a type of immanence Aristotle earlier had seen in divinity when he described it as Thought Thinking Itself (Meta. 1074b 34).

The scholastic conception of immanence was gradually rejected with the development of modern philosophy. At one extreme, the mechanistic conception of the universe fostered by thinkers such as R. DESCARTES and I. Newton accented the determinism imposed on matter from without, with a consequent deemphasis on intrinsic principles of operation (see MECHANISM). At the other extreme, the monistic theory of cosmological immanence proposed by B. SPINOZA placed great stress on substance as embodying the principles of its own activity and development. It prepared the way for other monistic philosophies of an idealistic, materialistic, or pantheistic turn, all of which developed the concept of immanence in an absolute and exclusive sense; typical thinkers were J. G. FICHTE, F. W. J. SCHELLING, and G. W. F. HEGEL. In reaction to these extremes, existentialist and personalist philosophers have stressed the inadequacy of the concept of self and its perfecting without some acknowledgment of exteriority and dependence on others.

Kinds. The various meanings of immanence, usually discernible from the context in which the term is used, may be reduced to five, viz, cosmological, psychological, epistemological, ontological, and apologetical.

Cosmological Immanence. This type of immanence stresses the autodetermination and the self-sufficiency of the universe, and in so doing excludes the influence of a transcendent being. Evolution or an inner dynamism of some type is used to replace transcendent causality. God is either eliminated in favor of some type of energy principle, or the universe itself is absorbed in Absolute Substance (Spinoza) or Absolute Spirit (Hegel). Because of the monistic attitude it fosters, cosmological immanence is the key concept in philosophies of absolute immanentism, among which may be enumerated ATHEISM, evolutionism, MATERIALISM, vitalism, and secular HUMANISM.

Psychological Immanence. This term is used to describe the attributes of living and knowing beings whose activities originate within themselves and also are self-perfecting. It recognizes a distinction between such activities and those that pass outside the subject, otherwise known as transient actions. While stressing interiority in vital and cognitional activities, psychological immanence admits a plurality of entities in the universe and does not exclude transcendence, as does cosmological immanence. Usually psychological immanence is regarded as present in different types of being in varying degrees, ranging from the lowest level, that of vegetative life, to the highest level, that of pure spirit. When applied to God, psychological immanence takes on an absolute character in the sense that God's being is absolute perfection and His knowledge is all-embracing, uncaused, and immutable.

Epistemological Immanence. In some theories of knowledge the immanent activity involved in knowing is so stressed as to exclude everything extrinsic to the knowing subject. Insistence on immanence in this sense gives rise to theories variously designated as immanentism, SOLIPSISM, IDEALISM, PHENOMENALISM, and subjectivism. Their proponents affirm a principle of immanence, which they state in either absolute or relative fashion. The absolute principle of immanence maintains that anything beyond thought is unthinkable, that the human mind can know only what is already contained within it (E. LE ROY). According to this principle, it is impossible to know anything existing outside one's self in any way whatsoever. The relative principle of immanence maintains that man cannot know anything unless he has somehow an inward preparation or need, either intellectual or moral, to assimilate it to himself (M. BLONDEL). This principle is at the basis of the so-called method of immanence, whereby man prepares himself to enter into relation with the truth on the theory that nothing radically foreign to his thought can be assimilated by him.

In the Kantian theory of knowledge, immanence is used to designate what remains within the domain of experience. For I. KANT, the "transcendental illusion" consists in regarding principles of immanence as having transcendental applications, i.e., to conclude that what is valid within man's experience is valid also for the thing-in-itself.

Ontological Immanence. From the viewpoint of metaphysics, one meaning of ontological immanence is that everything is intrinsic to everything else, that all elements of the real rigorously imply all other elements and actually constitute only one reality. Carried to its logical extreme, such a concept of ontological immanence leads to PANTHEISM or PANENTHEISM. Another meaning of ontological immanence allows for God's presence within the world while maintaining His transcendence. God's relative immanence in the universe, in this understanding, is explained by the doctrine of the PARTICIPATION of being and by God's causal influence on creatures (see CASUALITY, DIVINE).

Apologetical Immanence. The term immanence is given prominence also by some apologetes who propose a method of immanence as the way to discover God from a study of man's consciousness. According to their method, the discovery of the insufficiency of the self and the obvious implications of human activity call man's attention to God as a transcendent Absolute Being without whom man cannot attain his fulfillment. There are various ways of proposing apologetical or religious immanentism, some of which are condemned by the Catholic Church. (See IMMANENCE APOLOGETICS.)

Critique. Immanence and transcendence are pivotal notions for explaining the relationships between the universe and God and between man and the universe. Thinkers through the ages have been tempted to choose between universe and God, and between self and nonself. Thus some have maintained that the universe alone exists and that there is no God, whereas others have made God or Spirit the supreme reality and the universe only a mode of the Divine Being; similarly, some center on the self to the exclusion of the nonself in their concern over the problem of knowledge. Too great a stress on immanence accents interiority and self-sufficiency, but it also impoverishes the universe and the self by closing both in upon themselves. The more balanced view of immanence accents its polarity with transcendence. While admitting the existence and reality of the universe, it affirms a transcendent God above and beyond the universe as its first cause and ultimate explanation. While admitting the immanence involved in knowledge, it admits the knower's ability to attain the universe, other selves, and ultimately God, and thus to transcend knowledge of self.

The extreme notions of absolute immanence proposed in the history of thought, when viewed comparatively, effectively counterbalance each other. Thus cosmological immanence, which stresses a universe without a transcending God, is at the opposite polarity from ontological immanence, which stresses the absolute being of God and underemphasizes His creatures. Similarly, epistemological immanence, which places such stress on the thinking subject as to neglect the object of his thought, is offset by apologetical immanence, which stresses to an extreme the insufficiency of the human person and his exigency for God as the Transcendent Being.

A correct understanding of the concepts of relative immanence and relative transcendence, on the other hand, provides a natural basis for man's appreciation of the supernatural order. These concepts need not entail the reduction of the supernatural to the natural or the identification of the order of grace with that of nature. Rather, they serve to focus man's attention on the means whereby he, through an appreciation of his own immanent activity, can rise to a knowledge of the entities that transcend his limited mode of being and are ultimately most meaningful for him.

See Also: GOD; KNOWLEDGE; INTENTIONALITY; MODERNISM.

Bibliography: J. DE TONQUÉDEC, Immanence (3d ed. Paris 1933); Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique 2:579–612. A. and A. VALENSIN, ibid. 2:569–579, doctrine. H. LECLÈRE, Catholicisme 5:1295–1303. A. C. MCGIFFERT, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS 7:167–172. E. CORETH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 5:629–631. J. B. LOTZ, “Immanenz und Transzendenz,” Scholastik 13 (1938) 1–21, 161–172. G. DI NAPOLI, Enciclopedia filosofica 2: 1277–80.

[B. A. GENDREAU]

IMMANENCE APOLOGETICS

Immanence here refers to relative IMMANENCE, not the philosophy of absolute immanence condemned by Pascendi (Enchiridion symbolorum<sup>31</sup> 2103, 2106) and Humani generis (Enchiridion symbolorum 3878, 3894). Absolute immanence rules out the possibility of anything transcendent or SUPERNATURAL. Relative immanence admits this possibility and provides a method for studying the steps of the approach to Christianity. Though it is used as apologetics for Christianity, it is properly an APOLOGETICS for the supernatural. Since it draws its arguments from a study of human actions, it might also be regarded as a philosophy of action.

Historical Background. St. Justin's apologetics recognized in man a germ of truth (λόγος σπερματικός) that finds its fulfillment only through union with Christ, the LOGOS. Apart from St. Augustine and a few other exceptions, apologists of succeeding ages have argued their case with external proofs. The most important reemphasis of the internal or subjective arguments came from Cardinal V. DECHAMPS (1810–83). He wrote: “There are only two facts to verify, one is in you [the human heart], the other is outside you [the Church]. They search for each other to embrace each other, and of both of them you are the witness” (see Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique 2:610). Though Cardinal Dechamps stressed the subjective aspect of apologetics, the scientific study and organization of this aspect of apologetics was the independent work of Maurice BLONDEL (1861–1949).

Absolute IMMANENTISM was the prevailing philosophy at the beginning of the 20th century. In reaction to it, Blondel's deeply Christian spirit led him to seek a solution to the apparent mutual exclusion of immanentism and Christianity. Immanentists held as valid only those truths coming from within. Their principle was: “Nothing can enter man which does not issue from him and correspond in some way to a need for expansion. Neither historic fact, nor traditional teaching, nor an extrinsic, superadded obligation is reckoned as truth for him and admissible as precept if it is not in some way autonomous or autochthonous” (Lettre 34). Traditional external apologetics was unacceptable unless its arguments corresponded to some need for expansion within man. Writing as a philosopher, Blondel attempted to show that such an inner need for Christianity existed. According to him, immanentism leads autonomously and spontaneously to a confrontation with Christianity.

Blondel's Method of Immanence. He accepts the immanentist's principle cited above as his point of departure. To discover man's inner needs referred to in this principle, he studies man's actions since they are the most perfect expression of the human personality. They involve the whole man; in them man commits himself in one way or another. Through a regressive analysis of man's actions, he comes to discern the fundamental needs and desires inspiring man's actions. Between man's WILL involved at this deep level (his implicit, or willing-will) and his will involved in his actions (his explicit, or willed-will) lies a conflict. His implicit will seeks one thing, but the explicit will acts otherwise; man's actions do not seem to be able to satisfy the demands of his inner will. A dialectic exists between the implicit will (voluntas ut natura) and the explicit will (voluntas ut elicitata). Blondel's method of immanence seeks to equate these two wills: “equate within conscience itself what we seem to think, to wish and to do with what we really wish and think” (Lettre 39).

In reconciling these two wills, Blondel distinguishes three steps. First, it is through a manifestation of this inner will that the nonbeliever can come to see that Christian truth and life concern him. His awareness of these inner needs and demands leads him to recognize a two-fold impossibility: (1) the impossibility of not recognizing the insufficiency of the natural order and of not experiencing a further need; and (2) the impossibility of finding within oneself the wherewithal to satisfy this religious need (L'Action 319). The discovery of these inner demands and the impossibility of satisfying them does not follow any set pattern but varies as forms of human activity vary. The general conclusion, however, is the same; namely, that the necessary condition for the perfection of human action is inaccessible to human action.

Confronted with this impossible situation, man passes on to the second and crucial step through his recognition and acceptance of a new affirmation, namely, that there is a unique necessary being (unique nécessaire). He affirms either that he himself is "god," his own master, the unique necessary being, or that this unique necessary being exists outside himself, the omnipotent God of the universe. To consider oneself as god is to revert back to the frustration of the first step. To acknowledge God exists, however, is to admit one's powerlessness; God is needed to satisfy the demands of the inner will. Here the supernatural is involved in a general, undetermined sense. In speaking of the absolute necessity of the supernatural in this sense, Blondel is referring to man's acknowledgment of his inevitable dependence on the Creator. Man sees he cannot enter into communion with God except by God's initiative and sovereign action. It is the creature's recognition of his need for his Creator. Even men unacquainted with Christianity admit this absolute need. It means opening oneself to the divine action, whatever it be. Many have failed to distinguish Blondel's general use of the term "supernatural" in this step and have rejected his method as denying the gratuity of the strictly supernatural (see Bouillard 86–131).

In the third step the interested nonbeliever studies the religions that would specify the notion of the generic supernatural idea referred to in step two. No sincere study could overlook the Christian explanation of the supernatural order. The dogmas of Christianity are considered as a hypothetical answer to man's needs. Neither the reality nor even the intrinsic possibility of this hypothesis is an issue at this point. The nonbeliever studies the correspondence of these hypothetical truths to his needs. If the Christian hypothesis is seen as the answer to those needs, Christianity then becomes a necessary hypothesis. If preaching effectively shows him that this hypothesis is a reality, he has a practical obligation to accept it. God's gift of FAITH, however, must intervene for the nonbeliever to be converted and receive the reality of Christian truth and life. In this third step, therefore, one sees the internal apologetics of relative immanentism join with the external apologetics of tradition to form an integral apologetics including both the subjective and objective aspects.

Appreciation of Immanence Apologetics. Blondel's writings on this subject have been a source of controversy since they first appeared. The two main charges brought against them are naturalism and FIDEISM. His supposed denial of the gratuity of the supernatural has already been treated. Despite numerous clarifications of his teachings, critics still disagree in their interpretation of his idea of the supernatural (cf. Bouillard, Duméry, and Nicolas for opposed interpretations). As regards fideism, some have thought that this method overstressed the study of action to the point of neglecting the role of the intellect. Blondel, however, notes the role of the intellect both in the theoretical considerations preceding action and in the practical or experimental knowledge associated with action. One of the main values of immanence apologetics is its reemphasis of subjective apologetics as part of an integral apologetics. In this respect it has helped to throw light on the question of miracles and the relation of faith and reason.

See Also: CONVERSION, III (PSYCHOLOGY OF); CONVERSION, II (THEOLOGY OF); MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF); OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY; SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL.

Bibliography: J. TRÜTSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:631–633. L. MAISONNEUVE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 1.2:1573–80. A. VALENSIN, Dictionnaire apologetique de la foi catholique, ed. A. D'ALÈS, 4 v. (Paris 1911–22; Table analytique 1931) 2:569–612. M. BLONDEL, L'Action (1893; Paris 1950); "Lettre sur les exigences de la pensée contemporaine en matière d'apologétique . . . (1896)," Les Premiers écrits de Maurice Blondel (Paris 1956). A. HAYEN, Bibliographie Blondélienne, 1888–1951 (Brussels 1953). H. DUMÉRY, Blondel et la religion: Essai critique sur la "Lettre" de 1896 (Paris 1954). D. GABOARDI, "Teologia fondamentale: Il metodo apologetico," Problemi e orientamenti di teologia dommatica, 2 v. (Milan 1957) 1:57–103. G. COLOMBO, "Il problema del soprannaturale negli ultimi cinquant'anni," ibid., 2:547–563. R. AUBERT, Le Problème de l'acte de foi (3d ed. Louvain 1958) 265–392. J. SOMERVILLE, "Maurice Blondel, 1861–1949," Thought 36 (1961) 371–410. H. BOUILLARD, Blondel et le Christianisme (Paris 1961). J. H. NICOLAS, "Le Centenaire de Blondel," Revue thomiste 62 (1962) 432–444.

[R. X. REDMOND]

IMMANENTISM

A philosophical position maintaining that human experience is the only ultimate source of VERIFICATION. Absolute immanentism insists upon the self-sufficiency of man as the measure of all reality and defends its doctrine on the grounds that any supposed transcendence of reason would be, by definition, "beyond reason" and therefore beyond the scope of discourse or rational penetration.

Kinds. The various kinds of immanentism may be classified as metaphysical, existentialist, ethical, religious, and political.

Metaphysical immanentism restricts reality either to the data of human experience furnished by the senses, as in the EMPIRICISM of D. HUME and his positivist heirs, or to the data of human thought, as in subjective IDEALISM. Another instance is HISTORICISM, particularly as developed in the thought of W. DILTHEY and B. CROCE. This maintains that the only field of reference for all human knowledge and activity is history and that judgments must be verified historically or not at all.

Existentialist immanentism maintains that man encounters himself as "thrown" into a world to which all his acts are related intentionally. All significant action and thought grow out of the human situation in which man finds himself. It follows that any metaphysics of being implicates man as the articulation of being; this prevents any effective transcendence. (See EXISTENTIALISM.)

Ethical immanentism denies the possibility of an ethics formulated objectively and without immediate reference to the immanent or existential situation in which man finds himself. This position is related to SITUATIONAL ETHICS, which stresses the personal element in choice at the expense of universal moral principles.

Religious immanentism supposes the impossibility of distinguishing between religious experience and its object and teaches, as did W. JAMES, that belief must be measured by human response. MODERNISM, a heresy condemned by the Church, is related to this in attempting to reduce all dogmatic formulations to their subjective and historical antecedents.

Political immanentism reduces all reality to the state and denies man any transcendence of the political order. The doctrine is latent in the thought of J. BODIN and N. MACHIAVELLI, and explicitly stated by T. HOBBS. It is linked also with Hegel's insistence upon the state as the only synthesis capable of resolving the alienation and abstraction found in the individual (thesis) and his disappearance in communities such as the family (antithesis). This position is adopted, with some modifications, by Marxist communism.

Critique. Realist objections to immanentism have most cogency when couched in terms of an analysis of the concept of the immanent. Logically, the immanent makes sense in terms of the non-immanent, or of that which transcends or falls outside the immanent; it follows that the very meaning of immanence implies its own limit, i.e., transcendence. Phenomenologically or experientially, cognitive, volitional, and emotive experiences reveal man's being as structurally related to something beyond itself, as having meaning in terms of the other, as being intentional or "toward the other," i.e., as transcending.

See Also: IMMANENCE; INTENTIONALITY; TRANSCENDENCE.

Bibliography: G. DI NAPOLI, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:1277-80 (Venice-Rome 1957). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 1:718-721 (4th ed. Berlin 1927-30). P. FOULQUIÉ and R. SAINT-JEAN, Dictionnaire de la langue philosophique 348 (Paris 1962).

[F. D. WILHELMSSEN]

IMMATERIALITY

The state of being or acting in independence of MATTER. The term is applied in an ontological sense to any SPIRIT, such as GOD, ANGELS, or the human soul (see SOUL, HUMAN). It is used also in an epistemological sense in scholastic discussions of knowledge and the knower, and it is in this sense that is the concern of this article.

Matter and Knowledge. The things that are directly apprehended with the SENSES and the INTELLECT are things that exist in the external world and have their own natural being distinct from man's knowledge of them. They are sensibly various, extended, and multiple, in motion or at rest. Some are generated and come into being, whereas others become corrupted and cease to be. Such things are said to be material, that is, potential and capable of change. Although they actually exist, they are not completely actual, but include in their makeup something imperfect and passive, something potential and determinable, called matter. By reason of matter or the material principle in things, they are capable of becoming otherwise and even other than they are. Such things include also the formal determinations by which they are what and as they are, for instance, a red rose or a gold ring.

In their reflections on the mysteries of nature and knowledge, the early Greek philosophers assumed that only material things exist, and that both the knower and the things known are made of the same matter or material elements, which also constitute food and drink for the knower. These philosophers thought that like is known by like, namely, that man knows water in the outside world by water within himself, air by air, etc. Further reflection, however, on the order and harmony of the world convinced other thinkers that material things and material principles are not sufficient to account for nature and for knowledge. They decided that there must be something of a different kind, something simple and unmixed, indeed some divine intelligence that rules the world. In this intelligent principle man somehow participates by reason of his intellect, which is distinct from sense and much more perfect, because by intellect he knows not only sensible things but also relations and causes that are not sensible. Thus the problem of accounting for knowledge became more complex, and included not only the sensible and sense but also the intelligible and intellectual knowledge.

PLATO regarded sensible things as objects for opinion only, or likely interpretation, and maintained that the things known by intellect in a philosophical way are Forms or Ideas existing apart in a world of realities separated from sensible matter. Aristotle rejected this explanation as incomplete and unnatural, and held that even sensible things are intelligible. These things consist not merely of potential matter but also of sensible and intelligible forms or specifying principles by which they are what they are and as they are. Aristotle distinguished between the sensible in potency and the sensible in act. In the dark, something colored is sensible in potency, but in the light and with an eye present to see it, the colored thing is sensible in act. Likewise, he distinguished in the knower an organ and power for sensing that is sometimes merely in potency, that is, able to sense, and sometimes in the act of sensing. This occurs when the sensible is present and acting on the organ of sense. Indeed, the sensation is the very action of the sensible in the sense, and there are not two activities, but only one activity with two aspects. The very same action that proceeds actively from the sensible is received passively in and by the sense, but it is received by the sense according to its own manner of sensitivity, and this is the sensation itself. In view of this account, Aristotle did not simply concede that like is known by like, but maintained that the sensible thing acts upon the sense, and by its action makes the sense like itself, whereas the sense was previously in potency and unlike the sensible disposed for action.

Immateriality in Knowing. Considerations such as these lead to the question of what precisely is KNOWLEDGE, or what is a knower, and whether one can determine the different kinds and degrees of knowledge and knowers. One can proceed to solve these questions by reflecting on acts of knowing, and by contrasting the knower with the nonknower. A nonknower, such as a piece of wood or of wax, is limited to itself and within itself. It is a material thing that is distinct from all others. It has certain formal determinations of color, figure, etc., that are its own, not another's, and it is capable of receiving other determinations in a passive and subjective way, as its own and not another's. A knower, on the other hand, is a distinct individual; it is not limited to itself, or closed within itself, but is open to others.

Indeed, a knower is open to all the others that it can know, and thus it is not only itself but also in some manner it is everything that it can know. A knower is somehow able to transcend the real distinction between itself and the others that are found in the natural world, and somehow becomes and is the other that it knows. This it does by way of increase: remaining itself, it becomes also the other. It receives formal determinations not merely as its own, but also as the other's. Thus it receives not only in a subjective manner, as material things receive, but also in an objective or intentional manner. Hence the knower has a certain preeminence over the potentiality of matter, an amplitude of being and perfection, a removal of the limitations of matter that is manifested by the objective, intentional, or immaterial way by which it receives formal determinations in knowing. This fullness or perfection of being by which the knower can overcome its own material limitations and its distinction from other things, so that it can become and can be in an objective or intentional way everything it can know, is called immateriality, that is, removal from the limitations of matter and eminence over the potentiality of matter.

The immateriality of the knower can be appreciated through the contrast between eating and knowing. The organism draws its food from the environment and by the processes of digestion and assimilation makes the food become part of itself. The organism consists materially of what it eats, although it does not become like the food but changes the food into itself. On the other hand, the knower also draws its knowledge from the environment, but not in a material way. It does not materially change the things that it knows, nor does it take them into itself materially. Rather, it is the knower that becomes changed in acquiring knowledge, yet in such a way that, without ceasing to be what it was, it becomes assimilated to the thing known. The knower becomes and is the thing known in a way that transcends the distinctions between them and unites them in the most intimate union of all, that is, in a kind of identity, not material or subjective but objective and immaterial. This eminent perfection of the knower, its immateriality or fullness of being and perfection by which it transcends material things as such and is able to become and to be other than itself, extending to everything it can know, is what essentially constitutes a knower and knowledge itself. A knower has a double mode of being, and leads a double life. A knower is what it is in itself materially, and it is immaterially, objectively, or intentionally all that it knows or can know.

Degrees of Immateriality. By reflecting on knowledge and by comparing the self with other knowers, one can distinguish various kinds of knowledge and various degrees of immateriality in knowledge and knowers. Because of the peculiar identity between the knower and the things known that is established in and by the act of knowledge, the degree of immateriality in knowledge and in the knower is proportioned to the thing known, as such. From this point of view one can differentiate between sense knowledge and human intelligence or reason. Sense knowledge is dependent upon the presence and action of SENSIBLES on the senses, and is really the same as the action of the sensible in the sense. The sensible acts on the sense, not by means of its material being, but by means of a special quality, which is an active FORM in singular matter. The SENSATION, or act of sensing, is the action of the sensible through its special quality, by which the sense is assimilated to the sensible in act. When the sense is activated in this way, the knower receives an impression by which it is assimilated to the sensible and, by reason of its own immateriality, it becomes and is the sensible in act. This is the lowest degree of immateriality, according to which the knower is or can be immaterially or objectively identified with singular sensible things. Within this first degree of immateriality, however, many species of sense knowledge are found in man and other animals. These can be differentiated by their peculiar objects, and by the special ways in which various sensible things act on different sense organs, as the eye, the ear, the tongue, etc.

In addition to sense knowledge, man has intellectual knowledge of boundless scope. He understands not merely this or that in the particular case, but BEING in general, and also NONBEING, one and many in general, whole, and part in general. He understands not merely this or that natural body, but matter and body in general, plant or animal in general, man or human nature in general. The proper object of the human intellect is indeed something in the material world, but this man knows by intellect as universal, that is, as abstracted from singular matter. Thus the human knower enjoys a higher degree of immateriality, by which he becomes and is in an immaterial way not merely a singular material thing but something universal and transcendent or simply immaterial (see UNIVERSALS). Hence the human knower as intellective is simply immaterial, and the intellective power is anorganic or spiritual.

Above man as a knower are the angels and God. The angels are immaterial or spiritual creatures of limited being, and the proper objects of their knowledge are correspondingly immaterial. God is PURE ACT, immateriality without any limitation, and so he is knower in the highest degree, incomparably transcending created knowers. In God, being and knowing are one and the same, and so He is subsistent intellection or comprehensive knowledge of Himself.

See Also: IMMORTALITY; INTENTIONALITY; KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF; SPECIES, INTENTIONAL.

Bibliography: L. M. RÉGIS, Epistemology, tr. I. C. BYRNE (New York 1959) 157–252. J. OWENS, An Elementary Christian Metaphysics (Milwaukee 1963) 217–219. J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite, or The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN (New York 1959).

[W. H. KANE]

IMMORTALE DEI

Encyclical letter of Pope LEO XIII, issued Nov. 1, 1885; frequently entitled in English “The Christian Constitution of States,” after a phrase from the final paragraph. It was one of a long series of letters that Leo wrote on the political order, whose declared aim was “to contrast with the lessons taught by Christ the novel theories now advanced touching the State” (par. 2). Scholars agree that it contains the most complete exposition and clarification of Leo’s teaching on the problem of CHURCH AND STATE.

During the 19th century the concept of “the modern state” became widely accepted in many parts of Europe. “Liberal democracy” was the most common of the many terms used to describe it. It is a state governed by elected representatives of the people; maintaining neutrality on questions of religion, professing neither to support nor to suppress any particular creed or cult; considering public, nonreligious education to be the business of the state; recognizing as valid only those marriages which are contracted according to civil regulations; providing for divorce and the remarriage of divorced persons; sponsoring freedom of speech and press, completely rejecting government censorship. Many Catholics in Europe, especially in France, wondered whether a good Catholic could actively support the modern state. The encyclical set forth some broad principles to help Catholics answer the question; in addition, it included some particular directives relevant to the actual situation in France.

Unless studied in its proper context, and in the light of the full papal teaching on the political order, Immortale Dei can be easily misunderstood by present readers. The following generalizations indicate its contents: The Church is not opposed to the rightful aims of civil government. Any mode of government is legitimate as long as rulers govern with justice and for the common good. Since the authority of the state, like all authority, is from God, the state must acknowledge its indebtedness to God by professing religion and indeed the true religion, which is not hard to discover. God has established two powers: the ecclesiastical power set over divine things and the civil power set over human things. Since each of these two powers has authority over the same subjects, there should exist between them a certain orderly connection and collaboration; the contemporary doctrine that favors their separation is absurd. It must be remembered that the Church is the true and sole guardian of morals. Individual Catholics must cooperate with any form of government that is not obviously immoral. By thus restating traditional teaching and noting the legitimacy of differences among Catholics “in matters merely political” (par. 49), Leo made it clear that the Church was not opposed to the ascendant democracy, even though it deplored its tolerance or legalization of certain social evils.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sedis 18:161–180, has the official Latin text. E. T. GARGAN, ed., Leo XIII and the Modern World (New York 1961), includes bibliog. items.

[D. L. LOWERY]

IMMORTALITY

The doctrine that the human soul is immortal and will continue to exist after man's death and the dissolution of his body is one of the cornerstones of Christian philosophy and theology. Because of its importance, it is treated here from four different points of view: first the history of the problem in ancient and medieval thought is sketched; then a philosophical analysis is given that relates the doctrine to modern thought; thirdly, the place the teaching holds in the Bible is indicated; and finally revelational data pertinent to the doctrine are presented and analyzed.

1. History of the Problem

When the Apologists and early Fathers presented Christianity to the Greeks, the Last Judgment formed part of their message. Since this doctrine implied the survival and immortality of the soul, they appealed to the poets and philosophers and general tradition of Greek thought in support of belief in immortality. Later, the scholastics preferred to make use of Plato or principles from Aristotle.

Ancient Thought. Despite a generally materialist concept of soul, all ancient peoples seem to have had some belief that a part of man survives the death of the body and is subjected to reward or punishment in another world. An exception may be found in those pantheistic religions which taught an absorption at death, at least for the virtuous, into some higher entity—e.g., Brahmanism, DAOISM, perhaps ancient BUDDHISM, and certainly more than one Greek tradition, as in Euripides. In Egypt, the myth of Osiris and the 42 judges, together with the care lavished upon the dead (because the survival depended on the preservation of the body); in Persia, the cult of Mithra as judge of the dead; and in Greece, the myths of Homer, such as the descent of Ulysses into Hades (Odyssey 11), ORPHISM and the cult of Dionysos, the theme of escape to the Isles of the Blessed, and the myths of transmigration related by Plato are all tenuous examples sometimes advanced of more positive beliefs. Yet one may reasonably doubt whether such traditions touched the daily lives of ordinary people. Immortality of fame or even of posterity seems to have been a more prevalent ideal (cf. Plato, Symp. 206E–209E).

Angels carry the soul of Germanus, Bishop of Capua, to heaven in the view of St. Benedict and Servandus, illumination in an 11th-century manuscript of the life of St. Benedict

It is rather in the philosophers that the Fathers found support for the message of Christianity. PYTHAGORAS and EMPEDOCLES, cited by Saint Justin (Apol. 1.18.5), both teach the survival and transmigration of the soul, which for them is made from heavenly particles of ether. Yet the doctrine is less philosophical than religious, and may have been borrowed from Orphism. The thought of SOCRATES, who left no writings, is probably that expressed in Plato's Apology: that some “divine element” in him makes him believe death is no evil; he hopes it is a good, though he has no proof of this.

Platonic doctrine, often cited by the Fathers, is clear-cut and positive. The soul, for PLATO a self-moving principle, is ungenerated and eternal; it has existed before the body, to which it is united by way of punishment for some fault, and will therefore survive it. To be without the body is indeed the natural and proper state of the soul, though Plato admits transmigrations and future unions should the soul not attain full purification in this life (Phaedo 81). A series of arguments is offered in the Phaedo based on reminiscence or recollection (Phaedo 72–77; Meno 81–86; Theaet. 150B–151D), the simplicity and spirituality of the soul, its likeness to the divine (Phaedo 78–80) and, by contrast, its loose union with the body (87B–88C), and its likeness to, and participation in, the Ideas (99D–105C), especially in the Idea of life (105D). Yet Plato himself, in accordance with his theory of knowledge (cf. Tim. 29C), seems to admit that these arguments give no more than a “likely account” because of “the greatness of the subject and the weakness of man” (Phaedo 107A). For Christian thinkers, Plato’s position was sometimes considered dangerous, since it implied not only the preexistence of soul but also a certain divine character attaching to it.

The same must be said of the early Aristotelian teaching in On Philosophy, Eudemus, and other dialogues, since Aristotle first saw the soul as something divine, sojourning on earth and longing to return to its natural state of separate existence. When, however, he attained the maturity of his thought in the De anima, he had long since abandoned such Platonic dualism. As ENTELECHY of the body, the soul is distinguished from the body as act from potency. Aristotle concedes that “mind may be capable of existing apart, as what is eternal from what is corruptible” (413b 25–27); and in the Metaphysics he grants that “there is nothing to prevent some form surviving the union with the body; the soul, for example, may be of this sort, not all soul, but the reason” (1070a 25–28). In another text only the “active reason” is said to be immortal and eternal because it alone is by nature impassible and simple (Anim. 430a 20–25). Since this obscure passage has given rise to greatly divergent interpretations, one cannot conclude from it that Aristotle explicitly taught a personal immortality.

The explicit negation of immortality in the earth-bound atomism of DEMOCRITUS is repeated by EPICURUS. Since for these thinkers the soul as well as the body is composed of atoms, it dissolves at death: “So death, the most terrifying of ills, is nothing for us: for as long as we exist, death is not with us; and when death comes, then we do not exist” (Epist. 3). Though, at the other extreme, STOICISM made the soul a spark from the Eternal Fire, a particle of God, and spoke of it as immortal, individual Stoics were never agreed whether the separated soul retained its own existence or was absorbed into the monistic Fire.

If Christianity roughly disposed of these philosophies (cf. Augustine, Serm. 150, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 38:807–14), it found NEOPLATONISM more tempting. Yet it soon realized that the immortality proposed therein, though of a spiritual and intellective soul of “the same species as the gods” (Plotinus, Enn. 5.1.2), was not greatly different from that of Stoicism. Souls came from Soul, the third of Plotinus’s divine hypostases, and yet were never quite separate from it. They would return to it after a good life on earth (Enn. 4.3.24) and make but one Soul, to the point of having no individual identity. Fundamental to such a doctrine, Augustine points out, is the argument that nothing can be immortal unless it has existed eternally (Civ. 10.31).

If Greek philosophy thus favors rather than denies immortality, it has no clear conception or proof of such a doctrine. Given indeed the whole framework of Greek thought on God and His relation to the world (as in Aristotle), a doctrine of personal immortality has relatively little meaning or importance to the Greek mind.

Patristic Teaching. Even when it used the dualistic language of the Greek world, patristic thought recognized that man is not a soul that has descended to the body as to an alien dwelling, but is a living whole created as such by God and called in body and soul to the resurrection and to eternal life (Pseudo-Justin, De resurrectione 8, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 6:1585). Yet some early Fathers were persuaded that the soul was mortal by nature but could become immortal by good works, or, as others preferred to stress, by union with the Spirit of God, a teaching they thought to find in Saint Paul. Thus, in writing that “immortality is not the consequence of nature, but the reward and prize of virtue,” Lactantius (Div. instit. 7.5) repeats a thought expressed before him by Justin and Tatian. Yet these same Fathers claimed that the wicked are to live on, to receive “the punishment of death in immortality” (Tatian, Discurs. 13). Such imprecision was abolished by AUGUSTINE, with his distinction between physical and moral immortality (Civ. 13.2; C. Maximin. 2.12.2; Serm. 65 4–6).

Again, under the influence of the Jewish belief in Sheol, the parable of Dives and Lazarus, Christ’s descent into hell, millenarianism, and sometimes in reaction to Gnosticism, most of the early Fathers posited a period of rest and even of “sleep” for souls between death and the general resurrection. The wicked, they generally admitted, were immediately subjected to some intermediate punishment; but of the just, only the martyrs were, according to IRENAEUS, TERTULLIAN, and even Augustine, admitted immediately to the beatific vision (cf. Augustine, Retract. 1.14, Patrologia Latina 32:606).

Very few Fathers attempt lengthy rational proofs for immortality. Tertullian suggests a reason from simplicity (De anim. 14); LACTANTIUS, from the moral order (Div. instit. 7.8–9). Augustine, who knew the Phaedo at least indirectly, preferred to formulate his own, from the indestructibility of truth (Soliloq. 2.19.33) and of the thinking subject (Immort. anim. 11.18). Neither proof is very convincing; both works show the incomplete development of his thought shortly after his conversion. His later works offer only one new argument, from incorporeality (Gen. ad litt. 7.28.43). More philosophical is Gregory of Nyssa's approach in Macrina, a Christian adaptation of the Phaedo, where one finds a long proof based on the simplicity of the soul and the immateriality of its intellectual operations (Patrologia Graeca 46:44–49). NEMESIUS OF EMESA recalls that Plato and others offer many arguments, but they are difficult and obscure; man's assurance is rather from Sacred Writ (De nat. homin. 2, Patrologia Graeca 40:589). Saint Bonaventure repeats Nemesius's words almost literally (Opera omnia 6:37).

Scholasticism. Interest in a philosophical demonstration of immortality was awakened in 12th- and 13th-century SCHOLASTICISM by the De immortalitate animae of DOMINIC GUNDISALVI composed at Toledo after 1150. A century later the question became acute as scholastics recognized that Averroës and Moses MAIMONIDES denied personal immortality. Still later, the value of such philosophical proofs was subjected to much debate, which carried over into the Renaissance.

Besides theological arguments from the justice of God, Gundisalvi proposed a whole series of demonstrations ex propriis, from the proper nature, activities, properties, and relations of the soul. His arguments, many drawn from Avicenna, others based on Aristotelian principles of being, become almost standard among such scholastics as Robert of Melun, William of Auvergne, Alexander of Hales, Philip the Chancellor, and John of La Rochelle. Yet with the expansion of the university programs, the schoolmen began to develop more original arguments and to probe such questions as the status and activity of the separated soul. The proofs offered varied from theologian to theologian. Saint BONAVENTURE considered the final end of man the most apt means of establishing the doctrine (Opera omnia 2:460), a proof that is primarily theological. Saint THOMAS AQUINAS, improving considerably on the philosophical proofs of Gundisalvi, found immortality a consequence of the spirituality and substantiality of the soul. The intellectual operations prove the soul is a spiritual subsistent being, which is subject to no type of corruptibility. Only secondarily did Aquinas advance as a proof man's universal desire or appetite for immortality, or appeal to God's will not to take from things what is proper to their natures (Summa theologiae 1a, 75.6; De anim. 14; C. gent. 2.55, 79). The metaphysical proofs were called into question by John DUNS SCOTUS; not indeed denied, any more than Scotus denied immortality itself, but not accepted as valid philosophical demonstrations; for immortality man has only probable reasons (Opus Ox. 4.43.2.46). Not all Scotists accepted this viewpoint; William of Alnwick directly attacked it as extreme [Gregorianum 30 (1949) 279–289]. The Latin Averroists, for quite other reasons, held that no rational proof was possible; their discussions filled the late Middle Ages at Bologna and Padua. The debate was renewed with Donato's translation (Venice 1495) of the first book of Alexander of Aphrodisias' De anima and the teachings of P. POMPONAZZI and others. Cardinal Tommaso de Vio CAJETAN was drawn into the question and led to change his opinion. If in his commentaries on Saint Thomas (1507) and Aristotle (1509) he was sure that immortality could be proved, by 1532 he had reached the conclusion that it was a matter of faith only, though supported by probable arguments. The controversy continued through much of the 16th century.

Bibliography: A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, L'Idéal religieux des Grecs et l'Évangile (Paris 1932). F. CUMONT, Lux perpetua (Paris 1949), to be read with caution. J. DANÉLOU, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique aux II<sup>e</sup> et III<sup>e</sup> siècles (Tournai 1961). M. SCHMAUS, "Die Unsterblichkeit der Seele und die Auferstehung des Leibes nach Bonaventura," L'Homme et son destin, d'après les penseurs des moyen âge (Congrès international de philosophie médiévale 1; Louvain 1960) 505–19. S. VANNI ROVIGHI, L'immortalità dell'anima nei maestri francescani del secolo XIII (Milan 1936). E. VERGA, "L'immortalità dell'anima nel pensiero del Card. Gaetano," Rivista di filosofia neoscolastica 27 supplement (1935) 21–46. R. M. MARTIN, "L'Immortalité de l'âme d'après Robert de Melun," Revue néo-scholastique de philosophie 36 (1934) 128–45.

[I. C. BRADY]

2. Philosophical Analysis

Immortality means immunity from death, or unceasing duration of life. It differs from ETERNITY in that the latter implies no beginning. Here it means that the human spiritual soul will endure forever, regardless of biological DEATH or subsequent resurrection of the body. It does not mean mere temporary revival after apparent death or continuation of some functions for a short time. Nor does it mean metaphorical immortality by continued existence in the memory of mankind or as a symbol. Lastly, it does not mean absorption into the eternal existence of God or transmigration into another being. Immortality means actual continued existence in one's own identity.

Arguments for Immortality. Three chief arguments are usually given for the immortality of the human soul: one from its nature, another from its unlimited spiritual capacities, and a third from the necessity of a future sanction for the moral order. Claims of contact with the spirits of the dead, through spiritualist mediums and the like, are, at best, evidence of some future life but not of strict immortality.

Nature of the Soul. Of its nature the human soul is incorruptible. Being simple, it lacks any spatial or constitutive parts into which it can break up. Being spiritual, at the death of the body it is not subject to corruption incidental to any intrinsic dependence on matter, for its spiritual operations of intellection and volition show it to have only extrinsic dependence on matter (see SOUL, HUMAN 4; SPIRIT). The only way it could cease to exist is by annihilation, the failure of God as First Cause to conserve it in being. But for God to annihilate what He has made immortal by nature would be inconsistent and unreasonable, a contradiction of His own design. Such an imperfection is impossible to God.

Capacities of the Soul. The argument for immortality from the soul's unlimited capacities is sometimes called the argument from desire; but one might desire many things and not get them, or one might not consciously desire immortality. It argues rather from the very nature of man's two highest powers to the conclusion that he is made to live forever, whether he desires it or not. The INTELLECT can know whatever is or can be, all that is intelligible. This unlimited capacity for truth sets up in man an insatiable curiosity. The WILL has a corresponding capacity for unlimited goodness. However much it may possess, it can always want further. True, one may rightly expect a reasonable amount of happiness in this life, but even those who claim to be quite content are capable of having much more.

Now these unlimited capacities of intellect and will can never be fully satisfied in this life, or with anything less than an eternity with God. Only when the intellect can explore the inexhaustible intelligibility of Infinite Truth will curiosity be sated. Only when the will possesses the infinite goodness and beauty of Goodness Itself will it rest content. But it is absurd that in a universe where other things reach their natural goals, for the most part and with admitted exceptions, only man should be necessarily and completely frustrated in achieving the end for which he was designed. If the human soul is not immortal, it means that no man achieves his end, that the entire species is aimed at a nonexistent goal.

It is true that some people may not attain God and thus may miss their end. This possibility is the inevitable consequence of free choice. But they do so by their own agency, not because their end was impossible of achievement.

Moral Sanctions. Lastly, one may infer the logical necessity of a life after death from the fact that people generally experience moral obligation and a sense of responsibility. The question is whether this widespread phenomenological fact has any validity if the soul is not immortal. In an orderly universe it is preposterous that disorder would reign only in the case of man. Yet one sees people trying to do what they think right, and receiving no reward in this life. Others, who commit crime, go unpunished; and still others are punished unjustly for crimes they did not commit. Moral values, a sense of obligation, and responsibility find no adequate sanction in this life. Unless there is a life after death in which wrongs will be righted and people receive what they deserve, the whole notion of obligation seems irrational.

Some scholastic philosophers claim that this last argument proves that there will be some future life, but not that it will last forever. Others disagree, for the reason that a sanction that is not everlasting is not adequate ultimately. If the good knew that heaven would eventually cease, they would be tempted to feel that a virtuous life is not worth the effort. Likewise, if the bad knew that they would be freed no matter what they did or how severe the punishment was, it would mean that in the end everybody would be the same; so the difference between moral and immoral would become zero eventually, and mere expediency would become at least as reasonable as obligation. Only immortality provides adequate sanction.

Conditions of Afterlife. It is argued that the existence of the immortal soul after death of the body would be meaningless because the soul would be without its proper operation, viz, perceptual knowing or understanding derived from sense. It is true that without some special supernatural aid the human intellect will be unable to know singular material objects or acquire further knowledge of the physical universe. But there seems to be no intrinsic impossibility of knowing spiritual realities, for they are intelligible and the intellect is spiritual. God, angels, one's own, and other human souls would thus be known without need of the senses. Again, habitual knowledge is stored in the intellect by way of HABIT. The use of this and the acquisition of other knowledge does seem to call for extra help on the part of God to substitute for the role played by sense knowledge when the soul is joined to matter. But although one does not know exactly how, there seems to be no absurdity in this possibility because matter has only an extrinsic and subordinate part in human intellection. Even God could not supply for sense if matter entered intrinsically and necessarily into the activity of the intellect. But since it does not, it seems legitimate to assume that He will somehow provide the necessary conditions for man's intellect to function (Saint Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 75.6 ad 1–3; 89.1–8).

If its highest powers are satisfied, the soul's happiness will be essentially achieved. It will be too absorbed in enjoying God to be distracted by any desire for bodily pleasures, for God contains all such pleasures equivalently and to a supereminent degree. Failure to grasp the essential nature of the future life causes people to claim they do not desire heaven because they imagine it an eternity of harp playing, instead of the enjoyment of God as Infinite Truth and Goodness. Any other objects or persons or the lack thereof are so minor as to be negligible.

As to maintaining one's personal identity when the soul is no longer united with matter, a soul is not any human soul but is identifiable as the soul that united with matter to form this person in a certain place at a certain time. This is historically and irrevocably true. Even after separation by death, for all eternity the human soul retains this transcendental relation to the composite who was this man and no other. (See METEMPSYCHOSIS.)

See Also: SOUL, HUMAN, ORIGIN OF.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1, 75.2, 6; 89; 1a2ae, 85.6; C. gent. 2.55, 79–82; De anim. 14. M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952) 1:784–804. E. PEILLAUBE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 1.1:1021–41. M. T. COCONNIER, Dictionnaire apologetique de la foi catholique, ed. A. D'LES, 4 v. (Paris 1911–22) 1:86–107. A. VACANT, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 1:453–73. M. C. D'ARCY, Death and Life (London 1942). A. E. TAYLOR, The Christian Hope of Immortality (New York 1947); Faith of a Moralist (London 1951). M. MAHER, Psychology (9th ed. New York 1921) 525–44. J. E. ROYCE, Man and His Nature (New York 1961) 321–36. R. VERARDO, "Il problema dell'immortalità," Sapientia 2 (1949) 283–309, esp. 294. W. E. HOCKING, The Meaning of Immortality in Human Experience (New York 1957). R. A. FALCONER, The Idea of Immortality and Western Civilization (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1930). C. LAMONT, The Illusion of Immortality (3d ed. New York 1959), strong but often confused case against immortality. A. MONTAGU, Immortality (New York 1955), dismisses personal immortality as wishful thinking; takes advantage of the fact that scholastic arguments are sometimes poorly put.

[J. E. ROYCE]

3. In the Bible

When we speak of the immortality of the soul in the Bible, we must clearly distinguish between the general notion of survival after DEATH and the Platonic idea of specific survival of an immaterial principle after death.

Survival of Soul. The notion of the soul surviving after death is not readily discernible in the Bible. The concept of the human SOUL itself is not the same in the Old Testament as it is in Greek and modern philosophy, and the Hebrew OT has its own idea of a future life (see AFTERLIFE, 2). Immortality, ἀθάνασία, has no Hebrew equivalent in the Masoretic Text and occurs only five times in the Septuagint (LXX), all in the Book of Wisdom. The adjective ἀθάνατος occurs once in Wisdom (1.15), where it modifies justice, and perhaps twice in Sirach. The substantive occurs only three times in the New Testament: 1 Timothy 6.16 speaks of the immortality of the Lord of lords; and 1 Corinthians 15.53–54 speak of mortal nature putting on immortality. The closely allied concept of incorruptibility, ἀφθαρσία, occurs a little more frequently in the Epistles of Paul (see 1 Cor 15.42, 50, 53, 54), but only twice in Wisdom (2.23; 6.19).

Moreover, although the LXX renders it as ψυχή, the Hebrews nepeš is a term of far greater extension than our "soul," signifying LIFE (Ex 21.23; Dt 19.21) and its various vital manifestations: breathing (Gn 35.18; Job 41.13), blood [Gn 9.4; Dt 12.23; Ps 140(141).8], desire (2 Sm 3.21; Prv 23.2). The soul in the Old Testament means not a part of MAN, but the whole man—as a living being. Similarly, in the New Testament it signifies human life: the life of an individual, conscious subject (Mt 2.20; 6.25; Lk 12.22–23; 14.26; Jn 10.11, 15, 17; 13.37; Acts 27.10, 22; Phil 2.30; 1 Th 2.8). Consequently, for the Israelite, man dies when his nepeš leaves him (Gn 35.18; 2 Sm 1.9; 1 Kgs 17.21), and death is somehow a diminution of life, a loss of life. The New Testament remains faithful to this understanding of death (Mt 16.25; 20.28; 1 Jn 3.16). Hence, save for a few important examples (Wis; Mk 8.35; Mt 10.39; 16.25–26; Lk 9.24–25; Jn 12.25) where life is seen as a necessary condition for eternal blessings, the Bible does not speak of the survival of an immaterial soul. This is not surprising if one considers that categories of Greek philosophy are not likely to be found in a Semitic corpus of literature.

Survival after Death. A general notion of survival after death is found, however, both in the Old Testament and New Testament. In examining the evidence, a distinction between the fact of survival and its mode is useful. The fact, stated negatively, is that in neither Testament is death regarded as an absolute end to all life, as a total annihilation. Such passages as Gn 42.13; Job 7.21; Psalms 38(39).14; and Jeremiah 31.15 speak of "being no more" with regard to earthly existence, not existence as such. Survival after death is attested to in the Old Testament by the burial of the dead (Gn 23.1–20) and the desire to be buried with one's own (Gn 47.29–31; 49.29); especially by the belief in an abode for the dead (SHEOL, HADES, the "nether world") as in Numbers 16.30, 33; Job 7.9; 14.13; Psalms 29(30).4; Hosea 13.14; Isaiah 5.14; 14.9; by some prayers in the Psalter, which possibly indicate a desire for a vital afterlife [Ps 6; 7; 29(30).9–10; 87]; and by a growing sense of the divine justice that will punish the persecutor and crown with glory the works of the suffering just [Ps 9A.18, 19;15(16).10; especially the late wisdom Ps 33(34).20–23].

On the other hand, the mode of survival after death is extremely confused in its inception, but gains greater clarity with the approach to New Testament times, receiving in some quarters (e.g., the tenets of the Essenes as related by Flavius Josephus in The Jewish War 2.8) a formulation distinctly Hellenistic. The confusion is owing to the imperfect state of Biblical anthropology, to the lack of sufficient revelational data on the subject, and to the prevalent Hebrew mentality that regarded the permanence of the community as more fundamental than that of the individual. Hence, there is an ardent desire for progeny and a curse attached to sterility in Genesis 30.1; 1 Samuel 1.5; Isaiah 4.1; 47.9; Jeremiah 18.21; Hosea 9.12; and Luke 1.25. Moreover, the lot of the evil and the good who died remained for a long time in the Hebrew mind the same lot in Sheol (see Smith, ch. 3, 8).

A succession of national tragedies and the sufferings endured by the just on earth brought about a deeper reflection upon the specific lot of each individual after death. Here the wisdom of Israel's scribes achieved greater precision concerning the afterlife. It reached its apogee shortly before our era in the Book of Wisdom. Although Wisdom's formulation of the doctrine of immortality is still disputed by exegetes, it seems likely that "the whole Book has at its basis the conviction that the soul survives after death," while "the immortality of which the author speaks is never the immortality which the soul has of its very nature" (Weisengoff, 109–110).

Is the New Testament more explicit on the point? Recent exegetes [Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul; see J. Coppens in Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 33 (1957) 372–73; J. Levie in Nouvelle revue théologique 80 (1958) 537–38; and P. Benoit in Revue biblique 65 (1958) 147–48] have maintained that the New Testament does not teach the immortality of the soul in the Hellenistic sense of survival of an immaterial principle after death. This does not mean that the doctrine is denied there; but it does emphasize that the ultimate solution to the problem is to be found not so much in philosophical speculation as in the supernatural gift of the Resurrection.

Bibliography: G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 2:844–53, 857–58; 3:7–21. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 508–10, 532–36, 1052–54, 1347–49, 2196, 2286–90. C. R. SMITH, The Bible Doctrine of the Hereafter (London 1958). J. P. WEISENGOFF, "Death and Immortality in the Book of Wisdom," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 3 (1941) 104–33. O. CULLMANN, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? (New York 1958).

[S. B. MARROW]

4. Revelational Data

The immortality of the human soul is a truth that has always been asserted by professing Christians. It was taken for granted by both sides at the Reformation. As examples of this one can recall John Calvin's use of the arguments from moral consciousness and the way Saint Thomas More in his Utopia made public denial of this truth punishable by death. René Descartes illustrates how philosophers who are Christians have tried to find a place for immortality in their systems. It is because of this agreement that the official Church pronouncements are few.

A Theological Issue. Since the immortality of the soul is a truth that is to some extent attested by reason as well as by faith, Catholic apologists have always been ready to demonstrate the reasonableness of the teaching of revelation. But, valuable as these arguments have been, one must remember that for Catholic theology the immortality of the soul is not primarily a philosophical problem. The theologian must begin with the fact of man's restoration through Christ to a share in the divine life (see ELEVATION OF MAN). This is the "life everlasting" of the early creeds. God alone is truly immortal and incorruptible by nature; He is the eternal one who transcends the categories of space and time. But man is made in the image and likeness of God, and by the free gift of eternal life he finds his fulfillment in a sharing in the intimate life of God. The immortality of the soul is bound up with the immortality of God and the life of GRACE. Consequently in the first Christian writers one does not find arguments from reason concerning the immortality of the soul but rather the proclamation that God through Christ has called man to a life of HAPPINESS that will never end. It begins here in the new life one receives in Baptism, but it will reach its fulness only at the PAROUSIA, when the resurrection of the flesh takes place. The gaze of the early Fathers is fixed on entrance into the full possession of immortality so that the life everlasting is to be associated with the resurrection of the flesh; it concerns the destiny of the whole of man. Sometimes this stress on the gratuitous nature of immortality and the desire to distinguish it from a merely natural quality of the soul led Christian writers to deny that the soul is immortal by nature. Irenaeus was so conscious of the supernatural life of the soul as union with God that he opposed the Gnostic idea of a natural immortality.

God's original plan was that this God-directed terrestrial life would prolong itself into eternity, but as a result of the sin of Adam this life was lost and death ensued. Death in the theological sense is the loss of this eternal life, of the sharing in the divine nature. This loss is manifested to man by the death of the body. This dissolution of man's being is but a symbol of his separation from God that is due to his sin. Saint Augustine develops this line of thought, and in this he is simply following the teaching of Saint John. But Christ conquered death insofar as He brought back to men true life, union with God in grace. The death of the body still remains for men, but now it no longer signifies their final separation from God. It is now the means of union with Him. It is the way to sanctification, since men have to follow Christ through death to resurrection. One dies only to rise with Christ. This changed attitude to death is seen in many of the early catacomb paintings in which the figures of Jonas, Daniel, and the children in the fiery furnace show one that death does not conflict with the hope of immortality.

Yet death of the body is an overwhelming fact of human experience, and despite the claims of spiritualism one has no sure sensible evidence of survival. One knows from faith that there is a life beyond the grave and knows further that this is a survival of the individual in the sense that there is a continuity between this life and the next. This is brought home by the Scripture teaching on RETRIBUTION. In the next life one will be rewarded or punished as he has lived in this life: Romans 2.7; Matthew 25.34–46. A just retribution demands the permanent existence of the subject. It was to safeguard this truth that the Church spoke out at the Fifth Lateran Council in 1513 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 1440) and affirmed the survival of the individual soul. The teaching of Averroës that there is one common intellect for all mankind was thus rejected. It was not that the Church was particularly interested in Averroism as such, but only insofar as this doctrine endangered the idea of individual responsibility (see AVERROISM, LATIN).

Theology Looks at Rational Arguments. And so the theologian starts his reflections with what revelation teaches about man's share in the everlasting life of God that begins at Baptism and will continue into the next life. However, the Church has always insisted that reason has a contribution to make to the question of immortality. The apologists of the 2d and 3d centuries were quick to seize on those aspects of Greek thought that could be made to show that the Christian message was not at complete variance with man's desires and thoughts on this subject. Tertullian in his De anima gave a fairly full treatment of the soul, and Lactantius made use of some of the arguments of Plato and other pagan authors in favor of immortality. However, the use of reason in this matter can never be completely satisfactory, and many of the pagan philosophers held to a view of immortality that involved a preexistence of the soul, i.e., before this earthly life. Irenaeus was aware of this danger and distrusted the Gnostic's arguments from reason; but Origen, who was much more susceptible to rational argument, was led to the opinion that souls did indeed preexist and were put into bodies as a punishment for sins committed in a previous life. This view was partly motivated by a desire to show that the sorrows of this life are not an argument against the justice of God. There was a reason for suffering. This idea of his met with general opposition. Methodius explicitly rejected it, and later, under Pope Vigilius in 543, this view of the Origenists was condemned (Enchiridion symbolorum 403). In the early 16th century when disputes arose in Italy concerning the true interpretation of Aristotle on the nature of the soul, the Fifth Lateran Council, already referred to, defended its immortality as not being contrary to reason and required teachers at universities to make clear to students of philosophy what the Christian view on this matter is (Enchiridion symbolorum 1440–41, but for full text see Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta 581–82).

This of course does not rule out the view of those theologians who follow Duns Scotus and Cajetan and allow only a probable probative force to the arguments from reason when taken in isolation from the facts of revelation. In more recent years (1844) it has been stated against Bautain that reason can prove the immortality of the soul, although there has been no indication of what the actual proof is (Enchiridion symbolorum 2766). Nowadays this fact is taken for granted (cf. Pius XI, Divini Redemptoris; Enchiridion symbolorum 3771).

Immortality of the Damned. The problem of the eternity of Hell is also connected with the immortality of the soul. From time to time there has recurred the idea of a conditional immortality. That is, survival after death is conditional on conformity with God's law and wishes. Against the Gnostics Irenaeus said that the soul is not immortal by nature, but it can become immortal if it lives according to God's law. Arnobius the Elder also held this view; it implies that the damned are not in fact called to immortality. In their eagerness to point out the salvific significance of immortality, that it is a gratuitous gift and is intended to benefit man, some writers, such as Justin and Tatian, tended to favor the idea that the souls of the wicked died or were annihilated (thanatopsychism). They did not fully appreciate that the eternal death of which the Apocalypse speaks, i.e., being cut off from God forever, does involve some sort of immortality, although not the immortality intended by God. They did not pay sufficient attention to the fact that man's conduct here on earth decides his lot forever, not only in the sense that he can earn eternal reward but in the sense that he can also earn eternal damnation.

Intermediate State. Some of the most difficult problems from both the philosophical and theological viewpoints arise in connection with the intermediate state between death and final resurrection. The first-generation Christians faced the problem concerning the state of those who die when they began to recognize that the Parousia would be delayed. Saint Paul himself seems to have changed his emphasis. In the earlier Epistles, for example, Thessalonians, he looked forward to the Parousia, although he had already to meet the objection as to what happens to those who die before this event. But in his later writings he sees the probability of his own death before the Lord's coming, and he says something about those who are already dead. In Philippians 1.23–26 he tells of their union with Christ, a union much fuller than anything achieved on this earth, although it is not yet the glory of the resurrection. In the 14th century the discussions about the nature of the human soul led finally to the question concerning immediate retribution at death. John XXII in two sermons before he became pope expressed the view that no full reward or punishment would be given until the last day. The social character of retribution was uppermost in his mind, and perhaps the Aristotelian notion of man as a complete entity of body and soul and not a soul imprisoned in a body also created a difficulty in explaining the intermediate state. But in Benedict XII's constitution BENEDICTUS DEUS (Enchiridion symbolorum 1000–02) it is laid down that the BEATIFIC VISION is given before the resurrection and also eternal punishment. This doctrine about the particular judgment is repeated in the Council of Florence (Enchiridion symbolorum 1304–06).

But there still remains a difficulty in understanding this state. It is a greater one for those of an Aristotelian or Semitic turn of mind who consider man as being truly man only when he is body and soul, a totality. It is difficult to see how there can be a full reward if man is essentially incomplete and how the resurrection of the body can add something that is only accidental. The capabilities of the separated soul have exercised the ingenuity of Catholic thinkers, but perhaps there has been too much consideration of the problem in terms of the nature of the soul and not sufficient attention paid to the element of time. Death is a transitus, a going over, to a new order of reality; and man enters a world where the time differences are transcended. To speak of a resurrection in the future would not have the same connotations for the departed as it has for those here on earth.

This problem has become increasingly prominent as the tendency has been away from a Platonic view of the soul as being a complete entity in itself and toward a Semitic notion of man. This has brought a deeper appreciation of the resurrection of the body. But one must not see the resurrection of the body as a truth that is in opposition to the immortality of the soul. O. Cullmann revived the idea that at death the soul enters into a state of unconsciousness or sleep until the resurrection. This was rightly criticized by Biblical scholars as being contrary to the teaching of the Gospel of Saint Luke and the Epistles of Saint Paul. The references to death as a sleep in early Church documents are not to be taken as a denial of consciousness beyond the grave, but as a natural metaphor for death. Moreover, the Benedictus Deus and Catholic teaching on PURGATORY rule out such a view. Likewise the view of J. Héring as to the possibility of reconciling a doctrine of reincarnation with that of the resurrection seems to be doomed to failure from a Catholic point of view, since the good and the wicked receive their final reward "soon after death" (Enchiridion symbolorum 1001–02).

See Also: DEATH (THEOLOGY OF); DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON; HEAVEN (THEOLOGY OF); HELL (THEOLOGY OF); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); MAN, 3; RESURRECTION OF CHRIST; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD; SOUL, HUMAN, 5.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Tables générales, ed. A. VACANT et al. (1951– ) 2:2218–21. "Unsterblichkeit," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) v.10. A. ETCHEVERY et al., Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947– ) 5:1316–28. ἀθάνατος, ἀθανασία, ἄφθαρτος, ἀφθαρσία in G. W. H. LAMPE, ed., A Patristic Greek Lexicon (Oxford 1961– ). "Unsterblichkeit," K. RAHNER and H. VORGRIMMER, Kl-eines theologisches Wörterbuch (Freiburg 1961). O. CULLMANN, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? (New York 1958). C. DAVIS, Theology for Today (New York 1962). R. W. GLEASON, The World to Come (New York 1958). J. N. D. KELLY, Early Christian Doctrines (2d ed. New York 1960). G. PALA, La risurrezione dei corpi nella teologia moderna (Rome 1963). K. RAHNER, On The Theology of Death, tr. C. H. HENKEY (Quaestiones disputatae 2; New York 1961). M. SCHMAUS, Katholische Dogmatik, 5 v. in 8 (5th ed. Munch 1953–59) v.4.2. A. VONIER, The Human Soul and Its Relations with Other Spirits (3d ed. Saint Louis 1925; repr. London 1939). S. GAROFALO, "Sulla eschatologia intermedia in S. Paolo," Gregorianum 39 (1958) 335–52. É. H. GILSON, "Autour de Pomponazzi: Problématique de l'immortalité de l'âme en Italie au début du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 36 (1961) 163–279. J. HÉRING, "Entre la mort e la résurrection," Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses 40 (1960) 338–48; "Eschatologie biblique et idéalisme platonicien" in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology: Studies in Honour of C. H. Dodd, ed. W. D. DAVIES and D. DAUBE (Cambridge, Eng. 1956) 443–63. Y. B. TRÉMEL, "L'Homme entre la mort et la résurrection d'après le N.T.," Lumière et vie 24 (1955) 33–58.

[M. E. WILLIAMS]

IMMUTABILITY OF GOD

Immutability is the divine attribute whereby God is said to be completely changeless and unchangeable.

Biblical basis. The Old Testament reveals that God, through his immanent actions within time and history, is personal, knowing, and loving. Moreover, these same immanent divine acts reveal that God transcends all else that exists. As the One God, who is Savior, Creator, and Sanctifier, he is completely “other,” and so cannot be numbered among all else that exists. Thus, God is present and active within the created order of time and history as the one who, as the “wholly other,” transcends it. Unlike creatures, who change either through their own actions or by being acted upon, God transcends this changeable created order. He can neither change himself nor be changed by another and so He is immutable. Thus the Old Testament speaks of God as unchangeable. “Surely I the Lord do not change” (Mal 3:6); and the Psalmist echoes this, “Thou art unchanging” (Ps 101:27). With greater explicitness the author of the Letter of James in the New Testament writes of the “Father of lights with whom there is no change nor shadow of alteration” (Jas 1:17).

The Old Testament also speaks of God changing his mind. In Genesis, because of the wickedness of the human race, God is said to have been sorry that he had created humankind (Gn 6:6–7). In Exodus, Moses implored God “to change his mind” and so not bring disaster on his people; God heard Moses’ prayer and so “changed his mind” (Ex 32:12–14). Moreover, at the repentance of the Ninevites God changed his mind and did not bring calamity upon them (Jon 3:10). Again, God hoped that his people would reform their lives so that he could change his mind concerning his threatened catastrophe (Jer 26:3). However, there are also passages where it is stated that God does not change his mind. Because he is not human or mortal, he will not change his mind (Nm 23:19). Because of his oath, he will not change his mind (Ps 110:4, 132:11). God will do what he has promised and so will not relent (Jer 4:28, Ez 24:14, Zec 8:14). In 1 Samuel 15 on the one hand God is said to regret and be sorry that he had made Saul king, and, on the other hand, it is said that: “Moreover the Glory of Israel will not recant or change his mind; for he is not a mortal, that he should change his mind.” These seeming contradictions within God of changing and not changing his mind can be reconciled if one interprets those passages where God is said to change his mind as God expressing his unchanging nature. It is precisely because God is unchangeable in his love, mercy and compassion and yet equally adamant in his demand for goodness and justice that he is said to forgive the Ninevites or his people and regret that he had created humankind or appointed Saul king. As “wholly other” God does not change as to his perfect love, mercy and compassion or as to his unalterable demand for righteousness and holiness, but the manifestation of these unchanging divine attributes may find different expressions depending upon the changing human situation. The Old Testament thus testifies that God is ethically immutable, that is, that he is unchanging in his love and justice. This ethical immutability would seem to demand an ontological immutability: that is, God can only be unchangeable in his love and justice if he ontologically immutably perfect. This is a philosophical issue the Bible does not address.

Christian tradition. The Fathers of the Church consistently taught that God is immutable. ATHENAGORAS stated that unlike the pagan gods, who are subject to time and so change, the true God is “immortal, and immovable, and unalterable” (Leg. pro Christ., 22). Theophilus stated that God is without beginning because he is unbegotten and “he is unchangeable, because he is immortal” (Ad Autol. 1.4). For IRENAEUS God, unlike changing created beings, is “unchangeable Being” (Adv. Haer., 2.34.2). Similar passages can be found in, for example, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (Strom. 2.11; 4.23; 6.7), ORIGEN (C. Cel., 1.21; 4.14; 6.62) and AUGUSTINE (De Trin., 3.2; 4.1; 5.5). In stating that God is immutable the Fathers were primarily denying of him anything that would place him within the changeable world of creation. Because God, unlike creatures, is perfectly good and loving, he cannot change. God’s nature is unalterably perfect.

Scholastic theologians of the Middle Ages gave further philosophical depth to the notion of God’s immutability. St. THOMAS AQUINAS offers three arguments, metaphysical in nature, that establish that God is immutable (Summa theologiae, 1.9.1). These are based upon understanding divinity as pure act, as simple and as omniperfect. All change is incompatible with these three concepts. First, anything that undergoes change must be able to change, that is, it must be in potency with regard to what it can actually become (see MOTION; BECOMING). Thus creatures, while they exist and so are in act, possess the potential to change either accidentally (i.e., acquire new actuality) or substantially (i.e., become something else). God, unlike creatures, is being itself (ipsum esse). His very nature is the act “to be,” and so he is pure act (actus purus). Thus God possesses no interior potential to become more of what he is. All of his attributes are perfectly in act, and thus he is perfect wisdom in act, perfect love in act, perfect knowledge in act. To say then that God is immutable is to say that he does not undergo change, as do creatures and to accentuate that he is perfect in every way and that no change could make him more perfect. Second, Aquinas argues that since creatures are composite beings, they can undergo change and mutation, again either accidental or substantial (see MATTER AND FORM). However, God is perfectly simple, for he is simply pure being itself and thus is simply pure act; therefore he cannot undergo change. Third, following upon the first argument, Aquinas argues that change within creatures testifies that they are not perfect for through change they acquire new perfection. However, since God is pure act he possesses all goods perfectly and thus is in no need to change in order to actualize further perfection.

The Church's liturgical practice testifies to God's immutability. For example, in the Liturgy of the Hours the hymn for Prayer during the Day reads: "While all must change and know decay, You are unchanging, always new." The Church at the Council of NICAIA (425) solemnly condemned those who would hold that "the Son of God is subject to change and to alteration" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 126). Other councils have also upheld God's immutability, especially Lateran IV (Denzinger 501) and Vatican I (Denzinger 3001).

The modern challenge to the doctrine of God's immutability is rooted in Hegelian philosophy, yet its most ardent proponents are found within process philosophy and theology, following the lead of A. N. Whitehead and C. Hartshorne (see, for example, J. B. Cobb, D. Griffin, N. Pittenger, S. Ogden). It is argued that an immutable God is static and inert and so incapable of having personal and loving relationships. To make God more active and relational it is proposed that God, as a member of the eternal cosmic process, changes as he interacts with the world and human beings and so develops and actualizes his own potential. Such a proposal for a mutable God makes him dependent upon the world for his existence. He is no longer wholly other than all else, and thus he is no longer the creator God who gives existence to all else. He merely becomes another acting member within the ever-changing process of finite reality, and as such is himself trapped within the vicissitudes and evils of human history, so undermining his transcendent ability to save.

Immutability of the Trinity. The Fathers and Scholastics almost exclusively focused their attention upon the immutability of God in so far as he is one. However, the one God is a trinity of persons, the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, immutable in themselves. Because the Father eternally begets the Son and spirates the Holy Spirit as his eternal love for the Son, he is immutably the Father. Equally the Son as eternally begotten and who eternally loves the Father in the Holy Spirit is immutably the Son. The Holy Spirit as the eternal love of the Father for the Son and the eternal love of the Son for the Father and who thus conforms the Father to be the loving Father for the Son and conforms the Son to be the loving Son for the Father is immutably the Holy Spirit. Neither the Father, nor the Son, nor the Holy Spirit can become more perfectly who they are for one another. They too are perfectly in act in relation to one another, and so subsist, that is, be who they are, only in their immutably perfect relationships with one another. These immutably perfect relationships not only distinguish who they perfectly are, but also make them the one immutably perfect God. (see TRINITY, HOLY)

Some theologians, again often influenced by Hegelian or PROCESS PHILOSOPHY, argue that God becomes a trinity of persons through his interaction with the world and human history (see, for example, P. Fiddes, R. Jenson and J. Moltmann). The persons of the Trinity become who they are through their historical actions and thus the Trinity itself comes to be. The motivation for such a developmental view of the Trinity is to allow for greater salvific interaction and interplay between the divine and human persons, bringing about the mature evolution of both. However, only if God is an eternal Trinity of immutably (and so dynamically) mutually related persons can they act in time and history in such a manner as to bring others into their divine life and love. It is only because the Father is eternally the Father that he can send his eternal Son into the world as man so that through his salvific work the eternal Holy Spirit is able to transform human persons into the likeness of the Son and so become children of the Father.

Further issues. If God creates, does this not imply that he changes from being noncreator to being creator? It must be noted that if the act of creation is an act whereby something comes to be and so be actual, only a being who is BEING itself (ipsum esse) can create for it is the precisely existence (esse) that is needed in order for something to exist. Thus, when God creates, he creates by the immutably pure act that he is for no other act will do. While God, BEING PURE act, has no interior potential to be actualized, his being pure act gives him the potential to perform actions that only he can perform, such as to create out of nothing. The act of creation does not imply then a change in God for he acts by no other act than the immutably pure act that he is. The "change" that occurs at the "moment" of creation is entirely on the part of creatures, the transposition from nonexistence to existence. The term "creator" does not then imply a change in God but rather that since creatures have come to exist by the act of God, he is now newly called creator. The mystery of the Incarnation offers a somewhat similar problem. While the Son of God comes to be man at a certain moment in time, this "becoming" man does not imply a change in the eternal and immutable Son. The change that takes place is that within the womb of Mary the humanity comes to be and is united to the person of the Son by the power of the Holy Spirit in such a manner that the Son now exists as man. There is a change in that the Son now exists as man, but there is no change in so far as the Son exists as God. Equally, the Son of God as man experiences changes. He is born, hungers, thirsts, weeps, suffers and dies. It is truly the Son of God who is experiencing these changes, but he is experiencing these changes in so far as he truly exists as man for they are truly human experiences. As God, the Son remains immutable and impassible (see INCARNATION; IMPASSIBILITY OF GOD).

However, does not creation and incarnation imply an act of the will on the part of God, that is, he freely transposes himself from indetermination to determination and so changes? Within human beings free acts bring about change within the person freely acting. Human freedom is a power through which a person is capable of electing to act or not to act in a certain manner. The act of choice then involves the transition from possibility to actuality. However, freedom itself does not necessarily imply change. In God's case there is no previous state of indifference. He is eternally freely self-determined. He eternally wills what he wills for his will is commensurate with his nature as immutably pure act. The effects of what he wills may take place in time and history and so bring about changes, but his act of willing itself transcends time and history.

Bibliography: Process Philosophy and Christian Thought, eds., D. BROWN, R. JAMES, and G. REEVES (Indianapolis 1971). D. BURRELL, Aquinas: God and Action (Notre Dame 1979); "Does Process Theology Rest on a Mistake?," Theological Studies, 43 (1982) 125–35; Knowing the Unknowable God (Notre Dame 1986). J. B. COBB, A Christian Natural Theology (London 1966). J. B. COBB and D. GRIFFIN, Process Thought: An Introductory Exposition (Philadelphia 1976). M. DODDS, The Unchanging God of Love (Fribourg 1985). P. FIDDES, The Creative Suffering of God (Oxford 1990); Participating in God (London 2000). C. HARTSHORNE, The Divine Relativity (New Haven 1948). W. HILL, "Two Gods of Love: Aquinas and Whitehead," Listening, 14 (1979) 249–278; "The Historicity of God," Theological Studies, 45 (1984) 320–33. H. KÜNG, The Incarnation of God (New York 1987). J. MOLTMANN, The Crucified God (London 1974); The Trinity and Kingdom of God (London 1981); History and the Triune God (London 1991). S. M. OGDEN, The Reality of God (New York 1971). N. PITTINGER, God in Process (London 1967). S. SIA, "The Doctrine of God's Immutability: Introducing the Modern Debate," New Blackfriars, 68 (1987) 220–32. R. SWINBURNE, The Coherence of Theism (Oxford 1993). R. SWINBURNE, The Christian God (Oxford 1994). T. G. WEINANDY, Does God Change?: The Word's Becoming in the Incarnation (Petersham 1985); Does God Suffer? (Notre Dame 2000).

[T. G. WEINANDY]

IMPASSIBILITY OF GOD

Impassibility is that divine attribute whereby God is said not to experience inner emotional changes of state whether enacted freely from within or effected by his relationship to and interaction with human beings and the created order. More specifically, impassibility means that God does not experience suffering and pain, and thus does not have feelings that are analogous to human feelings. Divine impassibility follows upon His IMMUTABILITY, in that, since God is changeless and unchangeable, his inner emotional state cannot change from joy to sorrow or from delight to suffering.

Biblical basis. The Bible does not address the philosophical question of whether or not God is impassible. Nonetheless, divine impassibility is founded upon the same scriptural evidence as that of divine immutability. Summarily, God, within the Old Testament, reveals through his immanent actions within time and history that he is personal, knowing, and loving. He is the One God who is Savior, Creator, and Sanctifier. These immanent divine acts reveal that God transcends all else that exists. He is completely "other," and so He cannot be numbered among all else that exists. Thus, God is present and active within the created order of time and history as the one who, as the "Wholly Other," transcends it. Unlike creatures, whose emotional inner states change either through their own actions or by being acted upon, God as all perfect transcends this changeable created order. He neither can change his own inner emotional state nor can another effect a change in his inner emotional state, and thus He is impassible.

Within this Old Testament context God, nonetheless, is seen as displaying a variety of emotions. Due to his faithful love, God hears the cry of his enslaved people in Egypt and so "suffers" over their plight (Ex 2:23–25; 3:1–8, 15–17; Dt 4:37). Moreover, because of his love God equally grieves over the sinful disloyalty of his people and even becomes angry (Hos 11:1–4). Yet, his heart "recoils" within him and his compassion "grows warm and tender," and thus he will not execute "his fierce anger." The reason is, "For I am God and not mortal; the Holy One in your midst and I will not come in wrath" (Hos 11:8–9). While God's wrath rises in justice, it is always tempered by his forgiving, compassionate, and faithful love (Ex 32:11–14; 1 Sam 15:11). Within the Old Testament then God is seen as "suffering" with, or on behalf of, or because of his people, and so he grieves with or over them (Ps 78:40, 95:10–11). These various "emotional" states are said to cause God to "repent" or "change his mind" (Gn 6:6–7; Judg 2:18; 2 Sam 24:16; 1 Chr 21:15; Ps 106:45; Jer 18:8; Amos 7:3 & 6; Joel 2:13; Jon 3:19). In the end, God consistently acts with great compassion and mercy. "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, nor are your ways my ways, says the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways and my thought about your thoughts" (Is 55:6–9).

The traditional defense for God's impassibility, in the light of such passages, was to argue that the Old Testament is using anthropomorphic language, and so cannot be taken literally. Therefore, God does not literally “groan,” “suffer,” or “grieve,” nor does his heart “grow warm.” However, while the Old Testament is undoubtedly using anthropomorphic language, it is nonetheless saying something that is actually true about God. Such passages can only rightfully be interpreted if one keeps in mind that they are predicated of the Wholly Other, “the Holy One in your midst.” The very superlative, extravagant, and even excessive, expression of the love, the compassion, the forgiveness and, indeed, the anger, accentuates that the one who displays all of this intense passion is someone who transcends what is beyond the merely customary and human. The Lord is “God and not mortal.” God is supremely passionate but his passion is that of the Wholly Other, and he is able to express such depth of passion only because he is the Wholly Other. Therefore, there is a legitimate literalness to what is said, but it is a literalness that must be interpreted from within the complete otherness of God, for this is the manner in which this passion is expressed. If God were not wholly other, he would not be able to be as passionate as He is. Moreover, the various passions that are predicated of God—affection, pity, mercy, compassion, forgiveness, anger, suffering—must be placed within the primary attribute of God’s unchanging, faithful, and all-consuming love. Thus, to speak of God’s grief or suffering over the plight of his people or over their own sin is not to denote an emotional change within God, but rather to accentuate his unchangeable and all-consuming love. Even God’s anger is an expression of his unchanging love. Such references to God’s emotional changes of state are not then expressions of God actually experiencing first pleasure and then sorrow, or joy and then suffering; rather, they express the reality of his unchanging love which is experienced differently depending upon historical situations and circumstances. God’s unchanging love is experienced as grief or even anger in the face of sin. Because of his love God is said to be jealous at losing his people due to their sinful disloyalty. His love is experienced as forgiveness and mercy in the face of repentance. Because of God’s unchanging love, it is said that he suffers at the plight of his people.

Christian tradition. While the Fathers of the Church inherit the term “impassibility” from Greek philosophy, they nonetheless interpret it, for the most part, from within the biblical understanding of God’s transcendence. Because God differs from created reality, in that He is eternal and incorruptible, JUSTIN MARTYR professes that Christians dedicate themselves to the “impassible God” (Apol., 1.13). Similarly, Irenaeus argues that because God as Creator is unchangeably perfect, He is impassible (Ad. Haer., 2.12.1; 2.17.3, 8). Tertullian states that because God is eternal, and thus outside of time, He does not change or suffer (Ad. Mar., 1.3, 8). Yet, precisely because God is perfectly and unchangeably good, Tertullian holds that creatures experience this goodness in differing manners—anger toward sinners and mercy toward the repentant (Ad. Mar., 2.13). Origen holds that one cannot interpret literally those passages which speak of God being subject to any humanlike emotion, for “God must be believed to be entirely without passion and destitute of all these emotions” (De Prin., 2.4.4). Nonetheless, because the Father is moved by our sinful plight, Origen can also state that “the Father is not impassible” (In Ezech. Hom., 6.6). God is impassible in the sense that He does not undergo emotional changes of state, but He is not impassible in the sense that He is devoid of passionate love. It is precisely because of His unchanging and abiding all-consuming love that He comes to our aid. In attributing impassibility to God, then the Fathers of the Church are primarily denying of him anything that would place Him within the changeable created order, and thus, unlike human beings, He does not undergo emotional changes of state. Moreover, in their denial, they wish to enhance the absolute perfection of God’s unchanging passionate love.

THOMAS AQUINAS discusses God’s impassibility within the context of His will and love. He argues that God does not undergo passible emotional changes as do human beings. Human beings either tend toward a known good or attempt to avoid a known evil and in so tending or avoiding their sensitive (bodily) emotions and feelings are aroused, such as affection or fear. In contrast, God does not undergo this passible process. He neither possesses a body nor sensitive appetites, and “therefore, there is no passion in God” (S.C.G., I.89.2; see also I.89.1–7). However, God does possess intellect and will, and being pure act, He knows and wills in the one act that He himself is (Summa Theologiae, I.14.1–4; I.19.1). Thus God loves not in the human sense of arousing affectionate feelings or passions, but in that His perfect love is eternally in act, and in this sense God loves without passion (ibid., I.20.1.ad 1). However, God is passionate in the sense that His all-consuming and perfect love is fully in act, and so He can be said to be the most passionate of all beings. Moreover, because God’s love is fully in act, unlike the love of human beings, all facets of his love are fully in act. His fully actualized love embraces goodness, kindness, mercy, compassion, justice, admonition, anger, correction, and so on. God need not undergo passible changes in order to lovingly reprimand the sinner or be lovingly merciful to the repentant. Thus God, within His fully actualized love, can even be said to grieve over sin, not in the sense that He undergoes an emotional change of state or experiences sorrow in the human sense of feeling bodily sadness, but because, in His love, He always is concerned with those He loves, even sinners. Moreover, God is merciful and compassionate, not in the sense that He “feels” pain or suffering, but in the sense that His perfect love embraces those who suffer. His mercy is primarily expressed by acting to alleviate the cause of the suffering, something that even compassionate human beings are often unable to do. For Aquinas God’s omnipo-tence is ultimately expressed in His mercy, the alleviation of sin and death and in the outpouring of grace and the bestowal of eternal life (ibid., II–II.30.4).

The persons of the Trinity are equally impassible, though this has not been developed within the Christian tradition. The persons of the Trinity subsist as who they are only in relation to one another. The Father subsists as Father in that through the procession of the fully actualized Spirit of love he begets the Son. The Son subsists as Son in that through the same procession of the fully actualized Spirit of love, He equally loves the Father. The Holy Spirit subsists as Holy Spirit in that through proceeding from the Father and the Son as their fully actualized love He conforms the Father to be the loving Father of the Son and conforms the Son to be the loving Son of the Father. Thus, the persons of the Trinity need not undergo passible emotional changes of state, for they eternally and perfectly express and enjoy the bliss of their mutual fully actualized love for one another. Equally then, it is the fully actualized persons of the Trinity who embrace human beings, through Their redemptive work, within Their fully actualized love.

Contemporary issues. From the later part of the nineteenth century to the present, many Christian theologians have come to deny that God is impassible by specifically asserting that God must suffer. There are three reasons for this radical shift: (1) The experience of immense suffering within the world, exemplified in the Holocaust and similar horrendous events, produces an ardent yearning for the consolation of knowing that God suffers in solidarity with those who unjustly suffer. Only in a suffering God does one truly find a loving and compassionate God. An impassible God, it is asserted, is aloof to human suffering and thus indifferent. (2) The Bible bears witness to a passible and so suffering God. As seen above God, within the Old Testament, is said to suffer with, on behalf of, and because of his people. Moreover, through the INCARNATION, the Son of God must not only suffer as man but also as God. This divine suffering within the Incarnation discloses that God has always suffered in solidarity with human suffering. Likewise in the crucifixion, the Son not only suffers the loss of his Father, but the Father equally suffers the loss of his Son. (3) PROCESS PHILOSOPHY, has fostered the notion that God’s immanence within the world and its history demands that he changes and develops in relation to the world and its history. Thus he experiences time and changeable emotional states such as suffering.

In response to this denial of God’s impassibility, a number of points can be made: (1) As seen above, to say that God is impassible is not a positive statement affirming that God is static, inert, and lifeless, and so aloof and indifferent. Rather it is a denial of those “human” characteristics that would make Him less than fully loving. (2) Moreover, God is impassible precisely because He need not undergo passible changes of state that would make him more loving. As PURE ACT God is pure and perfect love in act. (3) Because God, both in His unity and in His triunity, possesses all his attributes fully in act, He cannot suffer the loss of any these perfect goods and so He cannot experience the suffering due to their loss. (4) If God did suffer, not only would His love not be perfect, but His love would also not be entirely altruistic and beneficent in the face of human suffering. He would be acting so as to relieve His own suffering. (5) Equally, while God is immanent within the world, He is immanent as the one who is wholly other than the world. He acts immanently within time and history as the One who transcends time and history. Thus, while God is in the midst of evil, the evil of the created order does not reverberate back into His divine being and so cause Him to suffer. As Creator, He exists in a distinct ontological order from that of the created order. (6) If God did suffer, it would mean that He was a member of the created order and so He would not be the Creator and thus, as a suffering member of that order, would Himself need to be freed from evil. Thus those who espouse a suffering God by necessity advocate panentheism, as exemplified in process philosophy, that is, that while God is more than all else that is, He nonetheless embodies and so experiences all that is, including suffering. However, having placed God within the created order, He can no longer be its omnipotent Creator since He himself is now dependent upon the finite order for His own development and growth. (7) Moreover, God could no longer be the omnipotent God of mercy who could act so as to surmount the causes of suffering such as sin, death, and damnation.

Similarly, a number of points can be made with regard to the suffering of Jesus: (1) The Church’s doctrinal understanding of the Incarnation demands that, since the divine Son of God actually existed as man, all human attributes could truly be predicated of Him. The Son of God as man hungered, cried, suffered, and died; however, within His divine nature He remained impassible. (2) The assertion that the Son of God, within His incarnate state, suffers as God robs the Incarnation of its authentic salvific value. What is important is that the Son of God experiences authentic human suffering in an authentic human manner and not that He experiences human suffering in a mitigated divine manner. It is the Son of God as man who offers His human life to the Father as a sacrifice for sin that is salvific. (3) Moreover, on the cross, the Son of God as man may humanly experience being forsaken by the Father, but He equally trusts that He is not so forsaken and that the Father will come to His aid (Ps 22). As God, though, He was not forsaken. Nor does the Father suffer the loss of his Son. To place the suffering of the cross as an experience within the Trinity itself deprives Christ's suffering of its authentic historical importance and human value, and instead places it within an ahistorical and ethereal divine realm where what is transpiring is more significant for the Trinity than for humankind. (4) While the Father may judge that the crucifixion of his Son is unjust, yet the New Testament testifies not to His suffering but to His pleasure in what his Son is doing on behalf of humankind in accordance with his will (Mt 20:28, Jn 15:13, Eph 5:2, 1 Jn 3:16). Such pleasure is radically and dramatically manifested in the Father raising his Son gloriously from the dead. (5) While Jesus, as the Son of God incarnate, is now gloriously risen from the dead, yet as head of His body, He continues to suffer in union with His body—the church. This is central to Paul's conversion experience. "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? . . . I am Jesus, whom you are persecuting" (Acts 9:4–5, see 1 Cor 12:26). Augustine exemplifies this tradition: "For whatever he has suffered we too have suffered with him, and what we suffer he too suffers with us. If the head suffers in any way, how can the hand assert that it does not suffer? If the hand suffers, how can the head say that it does not suffer? . . . and he is now ascended into heaven and is seated at the right hand of the Father, whatever his Church suffers by way of this life's tribulations, temptations, constrictions and deprivations, . . . this he also suffers" (Enar. in Ps., 62.2). This is what brings true consolation to human beings in the midst of their suffering, not that God suffers in his divine nature, but that Christ, who has conquered all evil, continues to suffer in union with His body so as to assure that It too will triumph with him. "For as we share in Christ's sufferings, so through Christ we share abundantly in comfort too" (2 Cor 1:5; see Phil 3:10, Rom 8:17, 1 Pt 4:12, 1 Pt 5:1).

Bibliography: T. AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae, I.20; II–II.30; Summa Contra Gentiles, I.89–91. R. BAUCKHAM, "'Only the Suffering God Helps': Divine Passibility in Modern Theology," Theologos 9.3 (1984) 6–13. J. B. COBB and D. GRIFFIN, eds., Process Thought: An Introductory Exposition (Philadelphia 1976). R. CREEL, Divine Impassibility (Cambridge 1986). N. M. DE S. CAMERON, ed., The Power and Weakness of God (Edinburgh 1990). M. DODDS, The Unchanging God of Love (Fribourg 1985); "Thomas Aquinas, Human Suffering, and the Unchanging God of Love," Theological Studies 52 (1991) 330–44. P. FIDDES, The Creative Suffering of God (Oxford 1990); Participating in God (London 2000). T. E. FRETHEIM, The Suffering of God: An Old Testament Perspective (Philadelphia 1984). J. GALOT, Dieu Souffre-t-il? (Paris 1976).

R. GOETZ, "The Suffering God: The Rise of a New Orthodoxy," New Christian Century 103/13 (1986) 385–89. G. HANRATTY, "Divine Immutability and Impassibility Revisited," in At the Heart of the Real, ed. F. O'ROURKE (Dublin 1992). A. HESCHEL, The Prophets (New York 1962). W. WILL, "Two Gods of Love: Aquinas and Whitehead," Listening 14 (1979) 249–265. JOHN PAUL II, Salvifici Doloris (1984). K. KITAMORI, Theology of the Pain of God (London 1966). J. LAMBRECHT and R. F. COLLINS, eds., God and Human Suffering (Louvain 1990). J. Y. LEE, God Suffers for Us: A Systematic Inquiry into a Concept of Divine Passibility (The Hague 1974). J. MOLTMANN, The Crucified God (London 1974). J. K. MOZLEY, The Impassibility of God: A Survey of Christian Thought (Cambridge 1926). M. SAROT, God, Passibility and Corporeality (Kampen 1992). T. G. WEINANDY, Does God Suffer? (Edinburgh 2000). H. ROBINSON WHEELER, Suffering Human and Divine (New York 1939).

[T. G. WEINANDY]

IMPECCABILITY

Impeccability is more than freedom from sin. It is the impossibility of sinning. It can be considered as intrinsic, springing from a being's nature, or extrinsic, resulting from special help. It can be absolute, without any conditions, or relative and conditioned. Both angels and men are, by nature, capable of sin [2 Pt 2.4; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 800; Rom 5.12; H. Denzinger, ibid., 1511–12]. It is of faith that Christ, as man, was without sin (Jn 8.46; 14.30; H. Denzinger, ibid., 434). Because of His fullness of grace, the beatific vision, and, especially, the hypostatic union, He could not sin. Faith teaches that Mary had the unique privilege of an immaculate conception and was free from all actual sin (H. Denzinger, ibid., 2803). Some hold that St. Joseph also, at least after marriage, was free from all sin. The Apostles are considered to have been confirmed in grace after Pentecost (St. Thomas Aquinas, De verit. 24.9). Even the holy, however, do sin venially (Jas 3.2; 1 Jn 1.8). The blessed, being in eternal possession of their final end, will not and cannot sin (Jn 10.28; 1 Thes 4.17; H. Denzinger, ibid., 1000). They are immediately united to the fullness of truth, goodness, and beauty. Theologians agree that beings could be created with the beatific vision and thus be impeccable, or they could be preserved by special grace. It is disputed, however, whether a creature could be impeccable by nature (intrinsically) either absolutely, and so be incapable of sin against natural or supernatural law, or relatively, and so be impeccable with respect only to natural law. It is commonly held that absolute impeccability is impossible. All creatures "are changeable because they were made from nothing" (H. Denzinger, ibid., 1333). The created will has rectitude of action only when "regulated according to the divine will" (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae, 63.1, C. gent. 3.109). Most Thomists hold that it is possible for a creature to be relatively impeccable by nature and that the angels were in fact so created.

Bibliography: Commentaries on Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae, 1, esp. q. 63, by CAJETAN, SALMANTICENSES, JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, D. BÁÑEZ, J. CAPREOLUS, In Sent. 22. FERRARIENSIS, In C. gent. 3.109. DUNS SCOTUS, In 2 sent. 5.1. F. DE SUÁREZ, De angelis (Lyons 1620), bk. 3, ch. 7. E. HUGON, Tractatus dogmaticus, v.1 (11th ed. Paris 1933). P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 7.1:1265–80.

[P. J. KELLY]

IMPECCABILITY OF CHRIST

It is a defined dogma of faith that Jesus Christ in His humanity never committed a sin (Council of Florence, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 1347). He was sinless—He knew neither mortal nor venial sin, neither original nor personal sin. As the earlier Third Council of Constantinople also firmly had asserted, “Christ has two volitions or wills, and two natural operations, without division or change, without partition or commingling. And the two natural wills are not opposed (by no means!) as the godless heretics have said; but the human will is compliant, and not opposing or contrary; as a matter of fact it is even obedient to his divine and omnipotent will” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 556; The Church Teaches, tr. J. F. Clarkson et al. [St. Louis 1955] 187).

The conciliar teaching is a careful reflection of the testimony of Sacred Scripture. “Which of you can convict me of sin?” (Jn 8.46). “I will no longer speak much with you, for the prince of the world is coming, and in me he has nothing” (Jn 14.30). Or, as the Epistle to the Hebrews affirms emphatically, “For it was fitting that we should have such a high priest, holy, innocent, undefiled, set apart from sinners” (7.26).

Although not defined, it is of Catholic faith that Jesus Christ was in His humanity not merely sinless but impeccable; that is, He could not sin; He did not have the power to sin. It is theologically certain (from the consensus of theologians) that such impeccability was antecedent and internal. By antecedent is meant that the impeccability of Christ was effected by the will of God before, so to speak, God consulted His own knowledge of the FUTURIBLES. By internal is designated that kind of impeccability that flows from the very ontological constitution of the creature, at least as an exigency of that constitution. That is, it is an impeccability that, if it is not effected by the very ontological constitution itself, is at least demanded by the ontological constitution.

Conciliar affirmations such as that of CONSTANTINOPLE III cited above and equivalent ecclesiastical affirma-tions are the basis of the theological qualification “of Catholic faith” given to the fact of Christ’s impeccability. The consensus of theologians concerning the antecedent, internal character is based on the facile reasoning that any sin of the human will of Christ would be attributable to the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity. Such an attribution is inconceivable and hence the firm note of “theologically certain.”

As to how the impeccability is actually effected, that is, as to what psychic means are present in the humanity of Christ whereby impeccability is brought about, two principal schools of thought exist. Thomists hold that the impeccability is brought about by the beatific vision possessed by Christ from the first moment of His life. According to them, the beatific vision by itself always renders sin absolutely impossible. Scotists say otherwise. According to them the will remains free even though the intellect sees God face to face. God, however, knowing that no happiness can be perfect unless it is to endure forever, “prevents,” in the radical sense of going before or guiding, the will so that it never interrupts its act of enjoying God, and as long as this act continues, sin is impossible. Theologians commonly differ from the Scotistic view, but the view may not be censured.

A theological question closely connected with the explanation of Christ’s impeccability is the problem of the MANDATE.

See Also: JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) Tables générales 2:2225–27. L. SCHEFFCZYK, “Unsündlichkeit Christi,” Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 10:527–528. L. LERCHER, Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae, v. 3 (5th ed. Barcelona 1951). I. SOLANO, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. FATHERS OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS, PROFESSORS OF THE THEOLOGICAL FACULTIES IN SPAIN, 4 v. (4th ed. Madrid 1961) 3.1:329–369.

[E. A. WEIS]

IMPENETRABILITY

The impossibility of one body’s receiving another within itself, or the impossibility of two bodies’ occupying the same space at the same time. Impenetrability is not resistance, which seems to be an active quality; nor is penetration to be identified with absorption or similar phenomena, which are the result of the porous or reticular structure of matter. The fact of impenetrability is a datum of sensible experience.

The search for a causal explanation of impenetrability arises from the theological consideration of the GLORI-

IFIED BODY of Christ, and from speculation about the glorified bodies of the blessed. Christ's emergence from the sealed tomb at the Resurrection and His entrance through the closed doors of the Upper Room represent suppressions of the natural impenetrability of bodies (see RESURRECTION OF CHRIST). Discussion of such miracles leads to an analysis of the nature and cause of impenetrability.

Two opposing solutions were offered in the Middle Ages. St. THOMAS AQUINAS sees impenetrability as an effect, in the order of formal causality, of the accident of QUANTITY. Bodies are numerically diverse by reason of their dimensions, dimensions follow on SITUATION (situs), and situation derives from quantity (In Boeth. de Trin. 4.3; In 4 sent. 44.2.2.2). In the terminology of later commentators, impenetrability is a secondary formal effect of the accident of quantity, something negative and arising from the relationship of a body to PLACE. John Duns Scotus holds that impenetrability is an active force, the result, in the order of efficient causality, of quantity (In 4 sent. 49.16).

Most 20th-century scholastics follow the solution of St. Thomas. Others, while not accepting Scotus's reasons, agree with him in assigning a positive, active nature to impenetrability. All concur that God can miraculously suppress impenetrability as an effect, while retaining intact the quantity that is its cause.

See Also: LOCATION (UBI); BILOCATION; EXTENSION.

Bibliography: J. GREDT, Elementa Philosophiae Aristotelico-Thomisticae, ed. E. ZENZEN, 2 v. (13th ed., rev. and augm. Freiburg 1961) 1:279–282. P. HOENEN, Cosmologia (5th ed. Rome 1956). A. TOGNOLO, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 2:1293–94.

[W. B. MAHONEY]

IMPENITENCE

The primary condition for the forgiveness of sin is the transgressor's heartfelt sorrow for his culpable act as an offense against God, together with his firm intention to sin no more and to make satisfactory amends so far as this is possible. Impenitence is the state of the sinner who either has not yet achieved this primary condition or, worse, is positively unwilling to achieve it. Thus there is the simple fact of impenitence and also a willful or directly voluntary impenitence which is itself a special sin.

The Council of Trent in 1551 expressly taught that REPENTANCE is necessary at all times for the remission of serious sin (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1676). Without sorrow for sin there is no forgiveness. Grief for sin, reformation of life, and willingness to expiate form the object of manifold exhortations and warnings in both the Old and New Testaments. These are summarized in the words of Christ: "Unless you do penance, you shall all likewise perish" (Lk 13.5). Theologians agree that there is question here not only of God's positive command establishing penance as requisite for forgiveness but also of a real necessity of means, so that in the present order of providence God Himself cannot forgive sins unless there is real repentance.

Although any impenitence makes the forgiveness of sin impossible, there is a great difference between simple impenitence and willful impenitence or sinful obstinacy. A sinner is not obliged to repent immediately after his sinful act, and his nonrepentance does not necessarily imply a sin distinct from that of which he is already guilty. Unless there is a particular reason making repentance an urgent necessity, he may postpone his sorrow for some time without falling into the special sin of impenitence. Generally, however, a sinner cannot remain in the state of grave sin for long without falling into other sins, because deprived of sanctifying grace, he will lack the strength to resist them. It is impossible to determine the length of this time with mathematical precision. Differences in state of life, moral formation, and tenderness of conscience inevitably make the length of time different for each individual.

The special sin of impenitence consists in willing not to do penance and a resolution not to be converted to God. This voluntary impenitence will necessarily be only relative and incomplete on earth and will vary in individuals in degree of malice and formal guilt, but in any case it will constitute a dangerous predisposition to final impenitence.

Final, like temporary, impenitence may or may not be directly voluntary. Basically final impenitence means that death comes while one is in the state of mortal sin. Although every sinner is undoubtedly obliged to repent at least at the moment of death, it does not follow that all final impenitence is directly voluntary. A sinner may die without having done penance but without conscious rejection of a final grace of repentance. As a special sin, final impenitence includes an ultimate voluntary rejection of grace, aptly described as a sin against the Holy Spirit. This final impenitence may or may not be a sequel to voluntary temporary impenitence. The mystery of divine predestination is here much involved. In all cases, final impenitence on earth opens the way to the eternal impenitence of the damned.

See Also: REPENTANCE; CONTRITION

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 14. P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VA-CANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 7:1280–85.

[J. F. RIGNEY]

IMPETUS

An anglicized Latin term from the Latin roots in and petere, meaning a thrust toward some goal, it was commonly used in classical, ecclesiastical, and scholastic Latin without the technical connotation it was to acquire in the 14th century. Hence, in Roman and Biblical literature it was used for military attacks, the force of a river's current, and human drives; it was almost synonymous with nisus. In the first quarter of the 14th century, however, the term acquired a technical, philosophical meaning that eventually was rendered as impeto and momento by GALILEO in the field of mechanics. The term lost much of its original scholastic significance in discussions of the "quantity of motion" by Galileo, R. DESCARTES, and G. W. LEIBNIZ. The last replaced it with the concept of force, lebendige Kraft, which is measured by MASS times velocity squared ( $mv^2$ ). Here the term is considered in its technical scholastic context.

The origin of the notion was the Aristotelian problem of explaining violent, or compulsory, motion after the body was separated from the impelling agent. Natural motion springs spontaneously from NATURE (φύσις), an internal, innate principle of motion and rest motion of heavy bodies, but it cannot explain the unnatural motion of a heavy body upward. All unnatural, or violent, motions must be explained in terms of an extrinsic, alien mover; insofar as a thing is moved at all, it must be moved by something distinct from its own nature. PLATO suggested that the original mover also moves the medium, which continues to move the projectile by rushing behind and pushing it forward ἀντιπερίστασις (Tim. 80C). ARISTOTLE rejected this as insufficient and held that the original mover gives not only movement, but also the power of moving (δύναμις τοῦ κινεῖν) to the medium (Phys. 226b 27–267a 22; Cael. 301b 17–33). In this way the reality of nature was preserved and violent motion could continue as long as there was sufficient force in the medium to move the body. Aristotle argued further that if there were no medium, there could be no violent motion (Phys. 215a 1–18).

JOHN PHILOPONUS presented many commonsense objections to Aristotle's theory and concluded: "It is necessary that a certain incorporeal motive power (κίνητικὴν τινὰ δύναμιν ἀσώματον) be given to the projectile in the act of throwing" [Commentaria in Aristotelem Graeca 17 (Berlin 1888) 636–642]. He pointed out that the motive "energy" (ἐνέργεια) is only borrowed and is decreased by the natural tendency of the body and the resistance of the medium. This new theory of an alien energy given to the body by the original mover was attacked by Simplicius (d. 549), who did not present the new view clearly and adequately. The scholastics did not have a Latin translation of Philoponus; thus it is doubtful that he played any role in the scholastic concept of impetus.

The scholastic theory seems to have been first suggested by Francis of Marchia. While discussing sacramental causality in his commentary on the Sentences, bk. 4, he used a concept of impetus to explain how both Sacraments and projectiles have a certain force resident within, by which something is produced. This virtus derelicta in lapide a motore is a "certain extrinsic form" that will in time diminish. JOHN BURIDAN, perhaps independently, reached the same conclusions in his Quaestiones super lib. Physicorum, 8.12, and Quaestiones de caelo et mundo, 2.12–13, 3.2. For him, the mover impresses a certain impetus on the body itself by which the body continues to move until overcome by air resistance and natural gravity. He insisted that impetus is "violent and unnatural, since it is violently impressed by an extrinsic principle and foreign to the natural form." He even suggested impetus as a possible explanation for the perpetual rotation of celestial bodies, in which there is no resistance or fixed natural inclination. ALBERT OF SAXONY and MARSILIUS OF INGHEN promulgated the theory and continued to speak of impetus as an "accidental and extrinsic force," thus preserving the Aristotelian notion of nature and violence. Later scholastics—such as Laurence Londerius, first rector of St. Andrew's; Agostino NIFO; Tommaso de Vio CAJETAN; Alessandro PICCOLOMINI; and J. C. Scaliger—interpreted Aristotle's words in a wide sense consistent with the theory of impetus. Thomists such as John CAPREOLUS and Domingo de SOTO claimed it as the "opinion of St. Thomas."

Some scholastic authors considered impetus to be a "mover" accompanying the body. However, if impetus were a true efficient cause of motion, then it would be philosophically impossible to distinguish projectiles from living things, which move themselves. Domingo de Soto argued against this misconception and explained that impetus is only an instrument of the AGENT who is the true efficient cause. He pointed out the analogy between impetus and nature. Both are formal principles of motion, not efficient causes; just as the cause of natural activity is the progenitor, not nature, so too the cause of violent motion is the agent, not impetus.

See Also: SCIENCE (IN THE MIDDLE AGES).

Bibliography: A. MAIER, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1299–1301. J. A. WEISHEIPL, "Natural and Compul-

Miniature from "Pontifical of Arles," depicting imposition of hands, 14th century sory Motion," The New Scholasticism 29 (1955) 50–81; "The Principle Omne quod movetur ab alio movetur in Medieval Physics," Isis 56 (1965) 26–45. M. CLAGETT, The Science of Mechanics in the Middle Ages (Madison, Wis. 1959).

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

IMPOSITION OF HANDS

The rite of imposing hands on the head of another is one of the most frequent in both Old and New Testaments and in Christian liturgy, although in very different circumstances and with different significations. The fundamental idea seems to be that of the transmission of some power or quality, in most cases beneficent and mainly by way of conferring a blessing.

Old Testament. In the books of the OT the rite occurs only once for the transmission of something not beneficent, namely, in putting on the SCAPEGOAT the iniquities, transgressions, and sins of Israel (Lv 16.21–22). The belief that sin, disease, and the like can be transferred to living creatures, beasts, or birds, and so be removed from man, finds some analogy in Lv 14.4–7 (cf. also Zec 5.5–10).

A beneficent use of the rite occurs in Gn 48.14, where it conveys the blessing of Jacob-Israel to the two sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh. The blessing imparted by the Patriarch is fecundity, so that the two blessed persons may grow into "numbers on the earth," "a multitude of nations."

A second beneficent use of the laying on of hands is present in the stories relating the installation of Joshua as successor to Moses. The tradition is not quite homogeneous. In Dt 34.9 the rite is attested, and Joshua's spirit of wisdom seems to be attributed to it. According to Nm 27.18–30, which is considered a younger tradition, Joshua already possessed this spirit of wisdom, and the rite seems to be used only for the solemn and public installation of Moses' successor. It appears to be more in conformity with the views of the OT that the gift of the Spirit was not bound to certain external rites (cf. Dt 31.14–15; Nm 11.25).

The rite appears as a purely indicative gesture in Lv 24.14 and Dn 13.34, as testimony against the presumed culprits.

Another use of the rite belonged to the offering of sacrifices. It was used in all sacrifices except the guilt offering, namely, the āšām that was prescribed in the Levitical system for cases involving restitution (see, for the holocaust, or burnt offering, Lv 1.4; 8.18; Ex 29.15; Nm 8.12; for the peace offering, Lv 3.2, 8, 13; for the sin offering, Lv 4.4, 24, 29, 33; Ex 29.10; Nm 8.12; 2 Chr 29.23). There is much difference of opinion about the exact meaning of this rite in the sacrifice. Many hypotheses have been proposed: rite of liberation from slavery, of appropriation, of substitution. The texts do not provide sufficient information. The fundamental meaning seems to be an indicative gesture by which the offerer intends to make his own the sacrifice that the priests will present to God for him. The idea of substitution, which appears only very late in the OT, does not seem to have been present in the older period. The rite is said to have been present also in Mesopotamian rituals.

Sometimes it is supposed that laying on of hands was also part of the so-called ordination of the LEVITES (Nm 8.5–22). Though a laying on of hands is mentioned in the text, it does not indicate ordination. It is part of the text because the installation of the Levites is described as a sacrificial oblation, and all sacrificial offerings, with the exception of the guilt offering, included a laying on of hands.

Judaism. At the time of Christ, the documents of Judaism relate two additional applications of the old rite that are very important for understanding the rite in the NT. First, the rite was used for healing (see the Qumran document: N. Avigod and Y. Yadin, A Genesis Apocryphon [Jerusalem 1956] 20.22.29). Second, it was employed also in the Judaism of NT times as a ceremony for the installation of rabbinic teachers. (See RABBI.) According to the latest research (H. Mantel, "Ordination and Appointment in the Period of the Temple," Harvard Theological Review 57 [1964] 325–346), one must distinguish between the appointment of judges "to judge cases involving fines" (an appointment called minnûi and not involving the laying on of hands) and the giving of permission (rêšûit) to teach, involving in Palestine, even at the time of the temple and of Christ, the semîkâ, or imposition of hands.

If one looks for the fundamental symbolism of the rite, it must first be answered that it is quite a natural gesture. Reference should also be made to the Hebrew concept of man (see A. R. Johnson, The Vitality of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel [Cardiff 1964]). The Israelites regarded man as a psychophysical unity. Hence the hand is not merely an instrument but is in some way an extension of the self, especially of its power. Hence the "hand of God" stands for the power of God. The "hand" becomes nearly equivalent to the personal pronoun, and in Is 45.12 it is used to emphasize this pronoun: "It was I, my hands."

New Testament. For his deeds of healing, Jesus made constant use of the rite. So did the Apostles. Mention of the gesture occurs in those texts that are called "summaries," covering in a concise manner the usual way of acting of Christ and his Apostles (Mk 6.5; 16.18; Lk 4.40; Acts 5.12; 9.17).

This use is illustrated by the above-mentioned texts of Qumran. The blessing of the children by Christ through the imposition of the hands (Mk 10.13–16; Mt 19.13–15; Lk 18.15–17) poses no problem, since this custom continues that of the OT and is attested for NT times (see E. Tisserant, Ascension d'Isaïe [Paris 1919]). A special mention is due the blessing of the Apostles by Christ in Lk 24.50, because this blessing follows closely the promise of the mission of the Holy Spirit and so seems to be in some relation with the apostolic rite of giving the Holy Spirit.

Apostolic Age. In addition to the practices already mentioned in biblical literature and continued by the Church, this period reveals two new Christian uses for the laying on of hands.

Rite of Ordination. Apparently, by way of analogy to the use of this rite in Jewish circles, laying on of hands was introduced for Christian ordination. If Acts 13.1–3 is of dubious interpretation (the ceremony may connote only a blessing), the testimony of Acts 6.1–6; 1 Tm 4.14; 5.22; 2 Tm 1.6 is perfectly clear. The ceremony was performed by Paul himself (2 Tm 1.6) or was to be performed by Timothy (1 Tm 5.22); the elders or PRESBYTERS collaborated in the rite (1 Tm 4.14). The ordination followed an election by the local church and was accompanied by prayer and a profession of faith on the part of those to be ordained.

A more complicated problem is whether those rites of ordination concern the various degrees of ecclesiastical ministry recognized by the Catholic Church. The ordination of Timothy by Paul was ordination to the ministry of bishop (2 Tm 1.6); the ordinations committed to Timothy (1 Tm 5.22) concerned the ministry of priests; and the ordination of the seven by the Apostles had to do with the ministry of deacons (Acts 6.1–6). Nevertheless, in the several texts that tell of the institution of presbyters (see Acts 14.22; Ti 1.5), it is difficult to determine whether the texts always meant priests or sometimes, only "older men" whose role was to preside over the local church as far as discipline was concerned. In the subapostolic age, the terms ἐπίσκοποι, πρεσβύτεροι, and διάκονοι, indicate without doubt three orders of a hierarchy, endowed not only with disciplinary power but also with a liturgical one. At that time, they were bishops, priests, and deacons in the strict sense of those words. St. Jerome, however, still seems to understand the πρεσβύτεροι of Acts 20.17 as majores natu, i.e., elders.

The laying on of hands was kept for ordination universally in the Church both East and West. There was even a tendency to extend the rite to the consecration of virgins (see R. Metz, La Consécration des vierges dans l'Église romaine [Paris 1954]), but this untraditional use of the rite was quickly dropped. In the ordination of priests, the porrectio instrumentorum, i.e., the delivery of the symbols and instruments of the priesthood, won great prestige in the course of time, but the apostolic constitution Sacramentum ordinis (1947) firmly reemphasized the imposition of hands with the accompanying prayer as the essential sacramental rite.

Rites of Initiation. The second new application of the rite in the apostolic age was for imparting the postbaptismal gift of the Holy Spirit. Apart from a rather ambiguous text in Heb 6.1–3, there are two major witnesses to this new sacramental ceremony, namely, Acts 8.8–25; 19.1–6. Apart from these three references, there is no other mention of this postbaptismal rite in the writings of the NT, and the Christian authors of the 2d century are almost silent about it.

This gives rise to several questions. Was the rite an ordinary or an extraordinary element of Christian initiation? Did the rite disappear under the influence of Pauline theology, which stressed already among the effects of baptism a giving of the Holy Spirit, and later under the influence of a new rite, the postbaptismal unction with chrism? If the rite was combined with baptism, did Christians continue to distinguish a twofold gift of the Holy Spirit and does the term sphragis signify the second one? What is the exact meaning of the postbaptismal gift of the Holy Spirit if such a gift is to be admitted?

A radical solution was adopted by some scholars who contend that in the beginning the gifts of baptism and of the laying on of hands (ἐπίθεσις τῶν χειρῶν, χειροθεσία) were distinguished as the baptism in water for the remission of sins and the baptism of the Holy Spirit for full aggregation to the people and the Church of God. Paul was the Christian theologian who united the two gifts and connected both with baptism. The Pauline conception won general support and became dominant in the 2d century. The combination persisted in the Greek Church, but the baptismal gift of the Holy Spirit was more specially attributed to a newly introduced baptismal rite, the unction with myron or chrism. In the Latin Church the two gifts continued to be clearly distinguished and the laying on of hands reappeared as a distinct, postbaptismal rite.

The author of the treatise De rebaptismate adopts a position that is very near to the so-called primitive, pre-Pauline doctrine. The heretics can confer baptism, but they cannot give the Holy Spirit with the laying on of hands. Cyprian denied the validity of either Sacrament when conferred by heretics. Stephen I considered both valid Sacraments, but in his milieu there was introduced an imposition of hands for the reconciliation of the heretics.

Some people regard the laying on of hands as the reconciliation of the penitents in 1 Tm 5.22, but without sufficient foundation (see P. Galtier, "La réconciliation des pécheurs dans la première épître à Timothée," Recherches de science religieuse 39 [1951] 317–320). The history of the rite of reconciliation in the first centuries is a complicated one (see A. Vacandard, La Pénitence publique dans l'Église primitive [2 v. Paris 1903]).

In the light of the documents still available, one can draw certain conclusions. In the very beginning there seems to have been a distinction between the gifts of baptism and the gift (which may be termed "pentecostal") of the Holy Spirit. This second gift was not always given in the same way. It appears that sometimes it was given without any rite; sometimes it was conferred by the laying on of hands; it is possible that it came to be imparted at the moment of baptism itself.

Paul seems to have conceived the initiation into Christianity as one complex thing. So the rite of laying on of hands is no longer explicitly mentioned, although it may have been practiced. Even if the rites were combined, Paul and those churches that followed him closely could still have distinguished the gifts to some extent and could have reserved, some scholars still maintain, the term sphragis (seal) to the special gift of the Holy Spirit. There is no doubt that later this term designated the postbaptismal gift.

Only if it is supposed that the Church was always mindful of this distinction can it be explained how the Greek Church introduced and put so much stress on the rite of anointing with chrism at the time of baptism. Although the postbaptismal laying on of hands is not frequently mentioned in the first centuries, there are some witnesses to it coming from the Church of Alexandria (SS. Athanasius, Cyril of Alexandria), and in some late Greek writers there is a tendency to return to the title of "laying on of hands" instead of "the chrism." There is, however, no reason to suppose that a notable change of practice was introduced (see the writings of Anastasius of Sinai, St. John Damascene, Oecumenius, Theophylactus), for the stress on the old terminology may be a result of their commenting on the Acts of the Apostles or the Epistle to the Hebrews. In sharp contrast with those of the Greek Church, the writers of the Latin Church gave much attention to the postbaptismal laying on of hands and distinguished more clearly between baptismal and postbaptismal gifts, although they did not succeed in proposing a clear and unanimously accepted view of the postbaptismal gift of the Holy Spirit.

Bibliography: J. COPPENS, L'Imposition des mains et les rites connexes dans le Nouveau Testament et dans L'Église ancienne (Paris 1925). N. ADLER, Taufe und Handauflegung: Eine exegetisch-theologische Untersuchung von Apg 8, 14–17 (Münster 1951). E. LOHSE, Die Ordination in Spätjudentum und im Neuen Testament (Göttingen 1951). B. NEUNHEUSER, Baptism and Confirmation, tr. J. J. HUGHES (New York 1964). L. VISCHER, La Confirmation au cours des siècles, tr. J. CARRÈRE (Cahiers théologiques 44; Neufchâtel 1959). B. KLEINHEYER, Die Priesterweihe im römischen Ritus (Trier 1962). J. NEUMANN, Die Spendung der Firmung in der Kirche des Abendlandes bis zum Ende des kirchlichen Altertums (Mettingen 1963). On the terms episcopos, presbyters, diaconos, see M. GUERRA Y GOMEZ, Diaconos helenicos y biblicos (Burgos 1962); Episcopos y presbyteros: Evolución semántica de los términos episcopos—presbyteros desde Homero hasta el siglo segundo después Jesucristo (Burgos 1962). On the interpretation of sphragis, see J. YSEBAERT, Greek Baptismal Terminology: Its Origin and Early Development (Nijmegen 1962).

[J. COPPENS/EDS.]

IMPROPERIA

The reproaches directed against God's own people, and appearing as utterances of Jesus during the Adoration of the Cross in the Roman liturgy of GOOD FRIDAY. The first part of the Improperia consists of three verses (Popule meus, Quia eduxi te per desertum, and Quid ultra), including the TRISAGION. This first part is found in the Antiphonale Sylvanectense (of Senlis; c. 880; ed. R. Hesbert, Antiphonale missarum sextuplex [Brussels 1935]) and in the Pontificale Romano-Germanicum (c. 950; ed. M. Hittorp, De catholicae ecclesiae divinis officiiis [Cologne 1568]). The second part, which is not found until the 11th century, consists of nine verses, all of which begin with the word Ego (I). A Gallican origin has been claimed for the plain chant melodies (see GALLICAN CHANT).

“Improperia,” by Palestrina, liturgical sheet music.

Bibliography: H. A. SCHMIDT, Hebdomada Sancta, 2 v. (Rome 1956–57) 2:794–796. E. WERNER, “Zur Textgeschichte der Improperia,” Festschrift Bruno Stäblein, ed. M. RUHNKE (Kassel 1967) 274–86. W. SCHÜTZ, “Was habe ich dir getan, mein Volk?: die Wurzeln der Karfreitagsimproperien in der alten Kirche,” Jahrbuch für Liturgik und Hymnologie, 13 (1968) 1–38. J. DRUMBL, “Die Improperien der lateinischen Liturgie,” Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft, 15 (1973) 68–100. M. MARX-WEBER, “Die Improperien im Repertoire der Cappella sistina,” Studien zur Musikgeschichte: eine Festschrift für Ludwig Finscher, ed. A. LAUBENTHAL (Kassel 1995) 157–62.

[E. J. GRATSCH/L. J. WAGNER/EDS.]

IMPUTATION OF JUSTICE AND MERIT

The early reformers, founders of Protestantism, identified CONCUPISCENCE in fallen man with ORIGINAL SIN. Knowing as they did that the corruption of nature remains even in the justified, they refused to admit that in justification the believer undergoes any real ontological change such as takes place, according to Catholic doctrine, in the infusion of sanctifying GRACE and the theological VIRTUES. For that reason justice, or righteousness, is not intrinsic in the full sense of the word but rather extrinsic. The sinner, they said, is justified when God imputes to him the justice of Christ. Though his sins are forgiven when by faith he takes to himself the merits of Christ, still they are not really blotted out or extirpated from the soul but remain in it covered over by the merits of the Savior as long as this mortal life endures. It is thus that the justified man is at the same time just and sinful, simul justus et peccator.

Martin Luther at the height of his career commented on Gal 3.6: “Abraham believed God, and it was credited to him as justice.” He wrote:

Christian righteousness is to be defined properly and accurately, namely, that it is a trust in the Son of God or a trust of the heart in God through Christ . . . two things make Christian righteousness perfect. The first is faith in the heart, which is a divinely granted gift and which formally believes in Christ; the second is that God reckons this imperfect faith as perfect righteousness for the sake of Christ His Son . . . On account of faith in Christ God does not see the sin that still remains in me. For so long as I go on living in the flesh, there is certainly sin in me. But meanwhile Christ protects me under the shadow of His wings and spreads over me the wide heaven of the forgiveness of sins, under which I live in safety. This prevents God from seeing the sins that still cling to my flesh. My flesh distrusts God, is angry with Him, does not rejoice in Him, etc. But God overlooks these sins, and in His sight they are as though they were not sins. This is accompanied by imputation on account of the faith by which I begin to take hold of Christ; and on His account God reckons imperfect righteousness as perfect righteousness and sin as not sin even though it really is sin. [Luther's Works, ed. J. Pelikan, v.26 (St. Louis 1963) 231–232.]

But it should not be thought that Luther conceived of no internal change in the justification of the sinner. In the same commentary he writes:

We become doers of the law and are accounted guilty of no transgression. How? First, through the forgiveness of sins and the imputation of righteousness on account of faith in Christ; secondly, through the gift and the Holy Spirit, who creates a new life and new impulses in us, so that we keep the Law also in a formal sense. Whatever is not kept is forgiven for the sake of Christ. Besides, whatever sin is left is not imputed to us. [Op. cit. 260.]

The great reformer, therefore, thought that the justified man received "new life" from the Spirit, but he never admitted an ontological sanctification and interior renovation in the sense of the Council of Trent.

John Calvin also taught the total depravity of fallen man, and justification by faith alone.

The just man, excluded from the righteousness of works, apprehends by faith the justice of Christ, invested in which he appears in the sight of God not as a sinner but as a just man. Thus we simply explain justification to be an acceptance by which God receives us into His favor and esteems us as just persons; and we say that it consists in the remission of sins and the imputation of the justice of Christ. [Inst. relig. chr. 3.11.2.]

Luther was always adverse to the idea of personal MERIT on the part of man, not only before but also after justification. His disciple Philipp Melancthon, however, admitted "spiritual and corporal rewards in this life and the next for the good works of those who were reconciled and pleased by their faith." By this, however, he did not mean to imply that the good works of the righteous really merit glory, for he added, "Our virtues are not the price of eternal life; this is surely given for the sake of the Mediator" (Loci theologici 9, De bonis operibus; Corpus reformatorium 21:778, 780).

The concept of imputation of merits comes out more clearly in Calvin.

It is the teaching of Scripture that our good works are constantly bespattered with much uncleanness by which God is rightly offended and is angry with us . . . but because through His leniency He does not weigh them with all strictness, therefore He accepts them as though they were very pure. Hence, though these works are not worthy of it, He remunerates them with infinite benefits both of this life and the future life. [Op. cit. 3.15.4.]

In modern times Protestant theologians have tended to abandon the idea of imputation and to postulate a real internal renovation of the justified man. However, they do not generally concede the ontological change that is an essential part of Catholic doctrine.

See Also: JUSTIFICATION; CALVINISM; COLOGNE, SCHOOL OF; EXTRINSICISM; JUSTICE, DOUBLE; JUSTICE OF MEN; LUTHERANISM; PHILIPPISM; SYNERGISM.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Tables générales 2:2790–93. H. VOLK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:641–642. L. BOUYER, The Spirit and Forms of Protestantism, tr. A. V. LITLEDALE (Westminster, Md. 1956). H. KÜNG, Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, tr. T. COLLINS et al. (New York 1964). J. LORTZ, Die Reformation in Deutschland, 2 v. (Freiburg 1940; 4th ed. 1962). J. H. NEWMAN, Lectures on the Doctrine of Justification (London 1838; New York 1900). Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, v.16.

[T. J. MOTHERWAY]

INCA RELIGION

Originating in the Peruvian highlands, the Incas were, by the time of the arrival of the Spaniards, the supreme rulers of a vast region that extended from Quito, Ecuador, to the Maule River in Chile. Their religion, an integral part of the empire, was established and supported by the state. In addition, the local people supported their own cults, whose shrines and priests were a part of the total religious complex and differed only in elaboration and formalization. Emphasis was placed mainly on ritual and organization rather than on mysticism and spirituality. The chief function of the religion was the increase or maintenance of the food supply and the cure of the sick. The concepts of sin and purification were vital. Sacrifice, although rarely of human beings, was an important part of almost every religious rite.

The Incas worshiped many supernatural beings of varying power and importance. The supreme deity was regarded as the creator, and adored under the name of Viracocha. However, he was little worshipped by the masses, since he had little to do with their destinies. The sun god, the servant of Viracocha, was believed to be the progenitor of the Inca dynasty. The Incas worshiped natural phenomena also, such as thunder, the moon, the earth, and the sea, as well as sacred places and beings called huacas. The priesthood, consisting of a graded hierarchy of which the head was generally a near relative of the emperor, was expected to participate in religious rites, make divinations, interpret oracles, offer sacrifices, pray for suppliants, and cure the sick. The major Inca religious ceremonies were annual religious holidays associated with stages in the agricultural year or with the calendar.

Bibliography: J. ROWE, "Inca Culture at the Time of the Spanish Conquest," Handbook of South American Indians, 2 v.

(Bureau of American Ethnology, Bull. 143, 1946) 2:293–314. J. A. MASON, The Ancient Civilizations of Peru (Baltimore 1961). J. A. VÁZQUEZ, “The Reconstruction of the Myth of Inkari,” Latin American Indian Literatures Journal 2:2 (1986) 92–109. D. A. BRADING, “The Incas and the Renaissance: The Royal Commentaries of Inca Garcilaso de la Vega,” Journal of Latin American Studies, 18 (1986) 1–23. M. M. MARZAL, “Andean Religion at the Time of the Conquest,” in South and Meso-American Native Spirituality (New York 1993) 86–115.

[J. RUBIN/EDS.]

INCANTATION

Incantation, the speaking or singing of words that are thought to have, by the mere fact of being said, power to work magic and produce the results desired. The practice is found universally from remote antiquity. In the Odyssey, reference is made to incantation’s stopping the flow of blood, and working other wonders. There is evidence that in the early historical period of both Greece and Rome, people believed in the efficacy of incantation, but subsequently philosophers and lawgivers condemned it. In the Hellenistic period it had a considerable vogue, as is indicated by magical papyri, inscriptions, and literary works. Orpheus, the legendary singer, was a magician, as were also Musaeus and others. The best-known practitioner of the art in Greek literature was Medea, who was the daughter of the sun. In the magical papyri the incantations read almost like prayers, but these utterances were undoubtedly thought to have in themselves magical powers to accomplish results. Christianity from the beginning opposed this and other forms of magic.

See Also: MAGIC.

Bibliography: F. PHISTER, “Epode,” Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. Supplement 4 (Stuttgart 1924) 323–343. K. PRÜMM, Religionsgeschichtliches Handbuch für den Raum der altchristlichen Umwelt (2d ed. Rome 1954) 366–371. S. THOMPSON, Motif-Index of Folk-Literature, 6 v. (rev. and enl. ed. Bloomington, Ind. 1955–58) v.5 index s.v. “Incantation.”

[T. A. BRADY]

INCARNATE WORD, SISTERS OF CHARITY OF THE

The Congregation of the Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word (CCVI) was founded by Bp. Claude Marie Dubuis of Galveston, Tex., to exercise the spiritual and corporal works of mercy in that state, ravaged by the Civil War. In 1866 he went to Europe seeking help, especially for the many victims of yellow fever in his diocese. Unable to persuade any European community to sponsor a branch house in Texas, he secured three volunteers from among the sisters in the hospital of L’Antiquaille, Lyons, France, and with them he established a new congregation. Mother Angélique, superior of the Monastery of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament in Lyons, agreed to train these mission-minded French girls. From 1866 to 1869 she formed 19 young women for mission work in Texas. For their habit, she replaced the white garb worn in her own cloister by a black one, modified to fit the active apostolate. She gave them the rule of her order, recommending adaptation to the exigencies of missionary activity, and selected their title: Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word. In 1867 Dubuis requested the first three sisters who arrived in Galveston to found St. Mary’s Infirmary, the first Catholic hospital in Texas. Two years later he sent three sisters to open Santa Rosa Infirmary in San Antonio. From these two independent centers, two distinct congregations evolved.

Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word, Houston. (Official Catholic Directory, #0470). This group developed from the foundation at St. Mary’s Infirmary, Galveston. In July 1867, three months after the opening of the infirmary, an epidemic of yellow fever took the lives of more than 1,100 people in Galveston, among them Mother Blandine, one of the pioneers. The two remaining religious, Sisters Joseph and Ange, continued to care for the sick in their crowded and understaffed hospital, and also provided for the children orphaned by the epidemic. From 1867 until the opening of St. Mary’s Orphanage in 1874, the children were cared for on hospital property. During the storm of 1900 in Galveston the congregation lost 10 sisters and 91 orphans. The constitutions of the congregation received the approbation of the Holy See in 1912. In 1904 the motherhouse and general administration was established at St. Mary’s Infirmary, Galveston. Since 1928, however, the motherhouse and novitiate have been located at Villa de Matel, Houston, Tex.

Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word, San Antonio. (Official Catholic Directory #0460). This group began with the three sisters who founded Santa Rosa Infirmary in 1869. When they admitted their first postulants in 1870, Dubuis appointed Mother Madeleine as the first superior and Mother Pierre as novice mistress. Considered the foundresses of the congregation, these two pioneers gave, between them, more than 30 years of leadership to the community. Under their direction the new congregation rapidly expanded its work to meet contemporary needs. In 1874 Mother Pierre opened St. Joseph Orphanage and San Fernando parochial school, the first of many to be added in Texas in the succeeding decades. In 1881 the congregation became a chartered body under the laws of Texas, empowered to conduct nonprofit institutions and to grant diplomas. The work assumed national scope when, in 1889, Mother Pierre sent sisters north to staff the Missouri-Pacific Hospital in St. Louis, Mo. In the years that followed, schools and hospitals were opened throughout Missouri, and in Illinois, Oklahoma, and Louisiana. Simultaneously, the apostolate spread south beyond national boundaries as the sisters successively pioneered 17 foundations in Mexico, stretching from Oaxaca in the south to Chihuahua in the north. In 1910 the congregation received final papal approbation of their rule, based on that of St. Augustine. The general administration is located in the motherhouse in San Antonio.

Bibliography: M. H. FINCK, The Congregation of the Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word of San Antonio, Texas (Washington 1925). L. V. JACKS, Claude Dubuis: Bishop of Galveston (St. Louis 1947).

[M. L. HEGARTY/A. POWER/EDS.]

INCARNATE WORD AND BLESSED SACRAMENT, CONGREGATION OF

Official Catholic Directory #2200 (see also #2190 and #2205). The Order of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament was founded in seventeenth century France by Jeanne CHÉZARD DE MATEL as a contemplative cloistered Order. Teaching was an early and very important ministry with the students coming into the cloister for classes, but Mother de Matel does not describe the purpose of her Order in terms of any ministry. Rather, she describes it sometimes as “the extension of the Incarnation,” sometimes as an Order through which the Incarnate Word would be introduced into the world once again.” Ministry, especially the ministry of teaching, is an important means to achieve the ends of the Order. The structure of the Order was monastic with each monastery governmentally autonomous. The foundress did, however, urge her Sisters to foster a sisterly love between monasteries.

The Seventeenth Century

The first small community of three came together in great poverty in Roanne, France, on July 2, 1625. The group consisted of the foundress, Mother Jeanne Chézard de Matel (1596 to 1670), and two friends. Shortly thereafter, a fourth woman joined them, and with her arrival, teaching became a primary ministry of the incipient Institute. During the lifetime of the foundress, four Monasteries of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament were canonically erected in France: Avignon (1639), Grenoble (1643), Paris (1644), and Lyon (1655). Because of exterior interference, the Monastery of Paris was suppressed in 1672.

In prayer, Mother de Matel became convinced that the title of the new Institute should be “Incarnate Word,” and this was the title that she requested for her Order. However, the Apostolic Bull of Erection for Lyon issued by Pope Urban VIII and dated May 21, 1633, gave as title “Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament.” Mother de Matel, who said of herself that she “rejoiced in being a daughter of the Church,” accepted this decision of the Church and used it interchangeably with the shorter title, “Incarnate Word.” The Apostolic Bull also gave the Institute the Rule of Saint AUGUSTINE.

In July 1645, after Mother de Matel had founded three canonical Monasteries, she sought and received aggregation of the three existing Monasteries and all future houses of the Incarnate Word to the Order of Saint Augustine. This resulted in a spiritual union between the two Orders but preserved the autonomy of each.

In the late 1640's, Mother de Matel worked to establish a male branch of her Order, the Fathers of the Incarnate Word. Several priests worked with her on this project. However, the death of her advisor, Father Jean-Baptiste Carré, O.P., and other factors caused the project to fail at that time. It would be revived in the late twentieth century.

After the canonical establishment of the Monastery of Lyons in 1655, Mother de Matel worked to place on a firm footing and strengthen the spiritual life of all of her Monasteries. From 1662 until 1670, she lived in the Monastery of Paris, suffering much from a series of difficulties which beset that Monastery. Her death occurred in Paris on Sept. 11, 1670. Her heart was removed and sent as a precious relic to her beloved Monastery of Lyon. Then her mortal remains were interred in the crypt of the Monastery of Paris.

After the death of the foundress, the Monastery of Grenoble founded a daughter house in Sarrians in 1683. This community moved to Orange in 1687, then to Roquemaure in 1697. The Monastery of Lyon established a daughter house at Anduze in 1697.

The Eighteenth Century

In 1717, the Monastery of Grenoble was suppressed because of lack of vocations, but the Monasteries of Avignon and Lyon together with the second generation Monasteries of Roquemaure and Anduze continued to develop. Throughout the eighteenth century, vocations increased, and the various communities acquired additional property. But in 1790, the revolutionary government passed a decree suppressing all religious Institutes. This decree was not enforced in Lyon until 1792. On Sept. 29, 1792, when the Lyon Sisters refused to take the oath demanded by the state, they were expelled from their Monastery. Some returned to their families, others lived unobtrusively in small groups, one went into exile in Italy. All other Monasteries of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament were suppressed about the same time.

The Nineteenth Century

Europe. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Order of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament seemed to be dead. Most of the Sisters who had survived the Revolution were living quietly at home, alone, or in small groups, and most were advanced in years. But the flame of life had not gone out entirely from the Institute. Through the joint efforts of a French diocesan priest, Father Stephen Denis, and a member of the suppressed Monastery of Lyon, Mother Anne of the Holy Spirit Chirard-Durieux, the Institute was restored. In 1817, a group of religious women whom Father Denis had founded exchanged their original habit for the habit of Mother de Matel's community. At the same time, they accepted the Rule and Constitutions of the Sisters of the Incarnate Word. Twenty-five years after its suppression, the Order of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament was restored.

As many as nine new foundations were made directly from Azerables and one of these, the Monastery of Evaux, gave rise to two other non-cloistered Institutes. The first was a Second Order of the Incarnate Word founded in 1834. Later, the title of this Institute was changed to the Order of the Savior and of the Blessed Virgin. The second was an Institute of Hospital Sisters in 1846, founded to do works of charity such as visiting the sick in their own homes. The Monastery of Lyon was restored through the efforts of a diocesan priest of Lyon, Father Galtier, and a Sister, Rosalie Hiver. Rosalie was accepted as a postulant in the community of the Incarnate Word in Azerables on June 29, 1832. After she became a novice (at which time, she received the name of Sister Angelique of the Incarnation), she, a former Superior, and a postulant from Azerables went to Lyon to work toward the restoration of the Monastery there. On May 27, 1833, the chapel of the new Monastery was blessed, Mass was celebrated in it, and the cloister was established. Thus the Monastery of Lyon was formally re-established. In 1842, the Monastery of Lyon founded a daughter house, the Monastery of Belmont, which, in spite of great poverty and many difficulties, was in existence for 60 years.

The New World. In 1852, at the request of Bishop Odin, Bishop of the whole state of Texas, Mother Angelique Hiver of Lyon assigned four Sisters to make the first Incarnate Word foundation in the New World. Two were from the Monastery of Belmont: 23-year-old Sister Saint Claire Valentine, the founding Superior, and a lay Sister, Sister Dominique Ravier. The other two were from the Monastery of Lyon: Sister Saint-Ange Barre and Sister Saint-Ephrem. At the end of February 1853, in the border town of Brownsville, Texas, the first foundation in the New World was made. Just one week later, on March 7, 1853, the Sisters opened a school. In spite of great difficulties, the foundation flourished. In 1866, the Monastery of Brownsville established a daughter house in Victoria, Texas, and in 1871, Victoria and Brownsville cooperated in making a foundation in Corpus Christ, Texas. The Monastery of Victoria founded other daughter houses, among them the Monastery of Houston in 1873, Hallettsville in 1882, and Shiner in 1897. In 1898, Brownsville made a foundation in Rio Grande City, Texas, which lasted until the 1920s.

In 1866, at the request of Bishop Dubuis, second Bishop of Texas, the Monastery of Lyon gave preliminary formation to three women who would found a related Order to do the works of mercy in Texas, the Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word. After a very brief time in the Monastery of Lyon, the Sisters of Charity went to Galveston. From there the present Congregations grew and developed.

In 1894, the Monastery of Brownsville extended the international character of the Order by making a foundation in Mexico: San Juan Bautista in Tabasco, Mexico. In 1896, the Monastery of Corpus Christi made a foundation in Puebla, Mexico, which lasted until it was closed by religious persecution in 1929.

The Twentieth Century

France and Spain. In 1902, a leftist government came to power in France, and this led to a renewed attack on religion. As a result, some of the Incarnate Word communities, including the Monastery of Belmont, were dispersed. The community of the Incarnate Word of Lyon spent 25 years in exile in Fribourg, Switzerland. In the 1920s, they returned to Lyon, but had to leave again during the Second World War. When the war was over, the Sisters returned to Lyon and opened a boarding house for women. They also sent Sisters to Spain to open houses there. In the twentieth century, the other Incarnate Word foundations in France closed one by one. Now the only surviving French house is that of Lyon which continues to have Sisters in Spain. In 1970, this house was amalgamated with the Mexico City Generalate.

Mexico. In the twentieth century, the Monastery of Brownsville continued to make foundations in Mexico. In addition, the communities already in Mexico made further foundations. In 1903, a Monastery was established in Guadalajara by three French Sisters from the suppressed French Monastery of Belmont. About 1916, one of the three French Sisters made a foundation in Cuba which grew and developed until the Sisters were expelled in 1961 in the regime of Fidel Castro. In the early part of the century, the revolution in Mexico brought religious persecution and consequent suffering. For many years, there existed a pattern of expulsion of the Sisters from schools and convents, later return of their property, then a new wave of expulsion. The Sisters persevered throughout these difficult days and re-opened their schools whenever possible. By 1912, Mother Teresita Solis of Chilapa, Mexico, and Mother Stanislaus Dedieu of Brownsville, Texas, were dialoguing about the possibility of setting up a Generalate for the Order of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament—a radical change from the traditionally monastic structure of the Order. This did not happen in the lifetime of either of these Superiors. However, in 1929, Mother Concepción Solis of Mexico City set up the first Generalate in the Order, uniting in one Congregation three formerly autonomous Monasteries of the Incarnate Word—Chilapa, Matehuala, and Mexico City. The Motherhouse is in Mexico City. The decree of authorization from the Sacred Congregation for Religious is dated Feb. 28, 1929.

In addition to incorporating the European houses in France and Spain into its Generalate, the Mexico City Congregation opened many houses throughout Mexico and also in Guatemala, Argentina and Uruguay. In 1980, the Sisters of the Incarnate Word from Mexico City made the first Incarnate Word foundation in Africa — in Kenya where there are now native Kenyan Sisters. Most recently, they have opened missions in Tanzania.

In 1914, persecution caused the autonomous community of the Incarnate Word in Gomez Palacio in the state of Durango to go into exile. They went to Cuba where they stayed as refugees for many years. Eventually they were able to return to Gomez Palacio, but a new wave of persecution in 1926 caused those who were not Mexican citizens to leave Mexico again. These Sisters went first to Incarnate Word communities in Texas, then to Cleveland, Ohio, in the United States, where they made a foundation in 1927. The Cleveland Sisters are an Institute of diocesan right. They maintain a sisterly relationship with the Sisters from Gomez Palacio.

The United States in the United States, in the early part of the twentieth century, at the request of the Bishops of Texas, the Sisters of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament petitioned Rome for the abrogation of the cloister in order to better serve the Church in Texas. In 1915, the Monastery of Corpus Christi received permission from Rome for the abrogation of the cloister, and other Monasteries did likewise in the ensuing years.

In the 1930s, for vocational, financial or other reasons, two Generalates were formed in Texas, one with Motherhouse in Corpus Christi in 1932 and the other with Motherhouse in Victoria in 1939. Constitutions were rewritten which sought to preserve the ideals of Mother de Matel while providing for the new form of government. At this time, the monastic practice of having choir and lay Sisters ceased. All Congregations of the Incarnate Word now have only one class of religious.

In the twentieth century, Sisters of the Incarnate Word emphasized education and obtained academic degrees in a variety of fields. The number of Catholic schools increased as did the enrollment in individual schools and the workload of teaching Sisters. There was also an increase in vocations. These factors led to the erection of new convents and school buildings. In the 1950s, Pope Pius XII called for religious Institutes to update their life style and customs. This led to relatively minor changes in religious dress and customs just before the Second Vatican Council.

From 1965 to 1981, the Sisters of the Incarnate Word of Houston staffed a mission in Guatemala. In 1981, this mission was taken over by the Sisters of the Incarnate Word from Mexico City.

Worldwide Conciliar and Post-Conciliar Renewal. After the Second Vatican Council, about 1968, in response to directives from the Holy See, all the autonomous Congregations of the Incarnate Word held special renewal General Chapters. The decade of the 1970s and the early 1980s was a time of experimentation and renewal. In the experimental period, interim Constitutions were written and rewritten, but the new Constitutions were finalized and approved for each Congregation about the mid-1980s. The new Constitutions are couched in biblical terms and make a real effort to recapture the authentic vision of the foundress. They reemphasize the foundress' vision of "the extension of the Incarnation" as the primary end of the Order and broaden the understanding of ministry to enable Sisters to meet other needs of the Church.

In 1980, a series of International Reunions began in which all the Congregations share on the charism of the Order. The single Constitution that had spelled out the way of life of Sisters of the Incarnate Word everywhere for more than three hundred years was now replaced by individual Constitutions developed after the Second Vatican Council. To maintain unity of heart and to spell out together those basic points which are central to the charism of the Order, the representatives of each Congregation wrote a document called the Charter of Communion. It was agreed that this document would be placed with (but not as part of) the Constitutions of the various Congregations. One year later, on Dec. 22, 1981, this document was accepted and signed by the Superiors General of each Congregation.

Worldwide, autonomous Congregations of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament now number nine. There are four in the United States with Motherhouses in Cleveland, Ohio, and in Texas in Corpus Christi, Houston, and Victoria. In Mexico, there are five with Motherhouses in Mexico City, Mixcoac, Guadalajara, Gomez Palacio, and Tezuitldn. More than ever, representatives from the nine groups share in international and national meetings, and formation reunions. They work together to bring about the beatification of the foundress, Mother Chézard de Matel and to translate and make available her many writings in English and in Spanish. They have also cooperated in staffing mission houses. Nov. 5, 1995 began a Year of Jubilee for the worldwide Order in celebration of the 400' birthday of Mother de Matel on Nov. 6, 1996. The many activities of the year resulted in a new understanding and appreciation of the charism and spirit of the foundress and of the Order which she founded.

In the 1990s, there arose a new interest in establishing an Institute of Fathers of the Incarnate Word, a project dear to Mother de Matel's heart in the seventeenth century. This movement is still in its infancy but its growth is being fostered by more than one Incarnate Word Generalate.

In November 1994, Pope John Paul's Apostolic Letter, Tertio Millennio Adveniente, announced the Great Jubilee of the Incarnation to be celebrated in the Year 2000—a momentous event for Sisters of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament. As a result, the Sisters of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament are fully involved in preparing for and celebrating the 2000' anniversary of the Incarnation. The year 2000 also marks the 375th anniversary of the first beginnings of the Order in Roanne, France in 1625. At the beginning of the third millennium, the exterior milieu in which the Sisters of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament live is very different to that of the cloistered Sisters of the past. Interiorly, however, they strive to be ever faithful to the charism and spirituality entrusted to them by their seventeenth century foundress, Mother Jeanne Chézard de Matel.

Bibliography: J. CHÉZARD DE MATEL, Autographic Life, 1, 11, tr. SR. C. CASSO, IWBS (Rome 1993). Positio for the Beatification and Canonization of the Servant of God, Jeanne Chézard de Matel, 1, II (Rome 1987) tr. SR. C. CASSO, IWBS, 1989. T. DIAZ CONTI TENORIO, C.V.I. and S. E. MARES BANUELOS, C.V.I., 100 Años de Anunciar la Encarnacion del Ferbo en Mexico (Mexico 1994). MOTHER M. P. GUNNING, To Texas with Love (Corpus Christi, Texas 1971). SR. M. X. HOLWORTHY, Diamonds for the King (Corpus Christi, Texas 1945). J. M. LOZANO, Jeanne Chézard de Matel and the Sisters of the Incarnate Word (Chicago 1983). SR. S. MARBACH, IWBS, et al., Extending the Incarnation into the Third Millennium (Victoria, Texas 1998). SR. K. MCDONAGH, IWBS, A Hundred Letters from the Correspondence of Mother Jeanne Chézard de Matel (Corpus Christi, Texas 1994). MOTHER SAINT-PIERRE OF JESUS, Life of the Reverend Mother Jeanne Chézard de Matel, tr. H. CHURCHILL SEMPLE, S.J. (San Antonio, Texas 1922). Unpublished Manuscripts. Annals of our Monastery of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament of Azerables, I, II, anonymous English translation revised by SR. K. MCDONAGH (Corpus Christi, Texas 1991). Annals of Lyon, anonymous English translation. Annals of the First Monastery of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament in America (Brownsville, Texas 1890). J. DE JESUS DE BÉIY, Memoirs, I, II, III, tr. SR. N. BEGLEY, IWBS, and SR. K. MCDONAGH, IWBS (Corpus Christi, Texas 1992). C. L. CRISTIANI, Historical-Critical Study of the Writings of Jeanne de Matel v. I, II and III, tr. SR. C. CASSO, IWBS (Victoria, Texas 1981, 1996). Biography of Father Antoine Galtier, tr. SR. C. CASSO, IWBS (Victoria, Texas 1997). Bodas de Oro de la Academia de Villa de Matel, (Gomez Palacio, Durango 1906–56), tr. SR. S. PENA, IWBS, (Gomez Palacio, Mexico 1956). First Convents of the Order of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament, tr. SR. C. CASSO, IWBS (Victoria, Texas 1978). SR. M. GRACE, CVI, The Incarnational Spirituality of Jeanne Chézard de Matel (doctoral dissertation St. Louis University, 1991). SR. J. M. GUOKAS, CVI, History of the Generalate of the Congregation of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament of Houston, Texas (Houston, TX, 1994); How We Live the Incarnation (Houston, Texas, 1994). FR. HELYOT, “Le Verbe Incarné (Ordre de)” in L'Encyclopedie Theologique XXIII, ed. L'ABBÉ MIGNE (Paris 1850) tr. for private use by SR. K. MCDONAGH, IWBS (Rome 1984).

[K. MCDONAGH]

INCARNATION

The mystery of the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity's becoming man, the mystery of Jesus Christ's being God and man, the mystery of His being the God-Man. The word Incarnation (from the Latin caro, flesh) means the putting on or the taking on of flesh. “Καὶ ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο”—“And the Word was made flesh” (Jn 1.14). The word Incarnation may refer to the Word's becoming man; thus it would mean the operation by which the Triune God, forming a determined human nature in the womb of the Virgin, elevated it and efficiently united it to the Second Divine Person. The word Incarnation may also refer to the resultant union; thus it would mean the wondrous, singular, and eternally permanent union of the divine nature and the human nature in the one Person of the Word.

Scholastic theology considers the Incarnation in the following way. It first deals with the fact of the Incarnation, that is, that Jesus Christ had two natures, one divine, one human; it goes on to investigate the manner of this union; it then takes up the immediate consequences of the mystery: the holiness of Jesus, His knowledge, impeccability, power, His human limitations, divine sonship, mediatorship, as well as the adoration due Him, and the communication of idioms. All the above is the science of CHRISTOLOGY. Systematic theology then goes on to consider the work of Jesus Christ, His Redemption of man and how it was accomplished. This is the science of SOTERIOLOGY.

Mode of Union. How is the union of the two natures to be conceived? Under the guidance of the magisterium of the Church, theology rejects a moral or accidental union; it likewise rejects a union of coalescence, whereby the divine and human natures would merge into a divine-human nature. The union that it accepts is a hypostatic union, a union in Person. The Divine PERSON subsisting in the divine nature begins to subsist in a human nature. In its understanding of the terms nature and Person the magisterium of the Church does not canonize any purely scientific or purely philosophical definition of them, nor does it exclude such scientific or philosophical definitions. It is up to the theologians to reject definitions that are not in accord with the dogmas of the Church concerning this substantial union, that tend, on the one hand, to a Monophysitic, or Eutychian, understanding of the union, or, on the other hand, to a Nestorian understanding, both of which the Church has definitively rejected. The terminology of the Church itself, however, has undergone evolution.

There are, in Christ, consequently, two wills and two operations. Christ can act at the level of His divine nature, or He can act at the level of His human nature. This was denied by the Monothelites, who considered Christ to have only a divine will and only a divine operation. The impossibility of Christ's merit or satisfaction is a logical consequence of this heretical position. It is at this point that theology may aptly discuss the theandric acts of Christ.

It is of faith that the union of the human and divine natures in Christ, once effected, was never dissolved and will never be dissolved. The hypostatic union will endure forever.

Character of Union. Scholastic theology next takes up the question of the formal character (ratio formalis) of the HYPOSTATIC UNION, the ultimate human explanation of what is in fact a strict mystery. There have been, historically speaking, three stages in the doctrinal progress of this core area of Christology: (1) the scriptural (e.g., Phil 2.5–8); (2) the ecclesiastical, as formulated definitively by the Council of CHALCEDON; (3) and the theological. At the theological stage, theologians ask (relative to the specifics supplied by Chalcedon) such questions as how can one, perfect, integral human nature be joined to the divine? How can two things complete in themselves become one being? Reflecting on the definitions of the Church, theologians see the opening to an explanation in the fact that this human nature lacks a human personality. Christology proceeds from there in its various theories of the ratio formalis presented by individual theologians and schools.

Consequences of Union. As for the consequences of the hypostatic union for the human nature of Christ, it is almost axiomatic to say that the human nature of Christ is ontologically and substantially holy by virtue of its intimate union with the Word. Sanctity in the divine nature is the very being of the divine nature insofar as it is the infinite good and the infinite love of the infinite good. Sanctity in creatures is a participation of the divine goodness; it is limited. According to most theologians, the human nature of Christ was sanctified by the grace of union directly and immediately. All theologians hold that Christ's humanity was sanctified by abundant sanctifying grace and the accompanying supernatural gifts; the gift of grace was in proportion to the magnitude of the gift of union—it was measureless in the sense that no one will ever receive more sanctifying grace.

Christ also had at every moment of His existence the beatific vision, and the support of magisterial affirmations in this regard has been greatly strengthened by the forthright statements of Pius XII's Mystici corporis (47, 76). Along with the knowledge of vision, Christ had infused knowledge and acquired knowledge. He was, moreover, impeccable, although it is of faith that He had the freedom requisite for meriting, and theologically certain that He had the freedom of active indifference. It is in this connection that the interesting theological problem of the mandate is discussed.

Although He possessed in His humanity the power of working miracles, Christ assumed with His humanity for the time before His death all and only those natural defects that are common to mankind and unblameworthy.

Regarding the consequences of the hypostatic union for the God-Man considered in His totality, theology affirms a true communication of idioms, that is, a manner of logical attribution, of predication, that is possible in speaking about Christ and that is entirely unique to Him. Designated according to one of His natures, He may have attributed to Himself predicates that are His because of His other nature.

Theology is careful to affirm that this man Jesus Christ is the natural Son of God, in no way His adoptive Son. It also says that even in His humanity He should be the recipient of the cult of absolute latria, that is, that His humanity is the object of adoration in the strictest sense.

In summary, theology says that because of the Incarnation, because Jesus Christ is who and what He is, He is the ontological mediator between God and men, perfectly suited to take up the work of moral mediation. This He did by all the salvific actions of His life, but especially by freely undergoing His Passion and suffering death on the cross.

See Also: JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON;
REDEMPTION, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7.2:1445–1539. H. VORGRIMLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER 1957–65) 5:678–679. F. MALMBERG, H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe (Munich 1962–63) 1:706–715. L. CERFAUX, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (New York 1959). J. DANIELOU, Christ and Us, tr. W. ROBERTS (New York 1961). H. M. DIEPEN, La Théologie de l'Emmanuel: Les Lignes maîtresses d'une christologie (Bruges 1960). F. X. DURRWELL, The Resurrection: A Biblical Study, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1960). J. GIBLET et al., Lumière et vie 7 (1958) 1–122. R. W. GLEASON, Christ and the Christian (New York 1959). L. DE GRANDMAISON, Jesus Christ, tr. B. WHELAN et al. (New York 1961). L. LERCHER, Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae, v.3 (5th ed. Barcelona 1951). S. LYONNET, De peccato et redemptione (Rome 1957–), 4 v. planned. Son and Savior: The Divinity of Jesus Christ in the Scriptures, tr. A. WHEATON (Baltimore 1960), symposium. L. RICHARD, Le Mystère de la rédemption (Tournai 1959). I. SOLANO, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed., Fathers of the Society of Jesus, Professors of the Theological Faculties in Spain (Madrid 1962) 3.1. B. M. XIBERTA Y ROQUETA, Enchiridion de Verbo Incarnato (Madrid 1957).

[E. A. WEIS]

INCARNATION, NECESSITY OF THE

Why the INCARNATION? What was the ultimate purpose of God taking on human nature? All theologians agree that Jesus Christ came primarily to save sinners. This is expressed in the earliest creeds: “Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven and was made flesh” (Nicene Creed). This creedal statement echoes the words of Christ Himself: “. . . the Son of Man has not come to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mt 20.28). Paul puts it emphatically: “This saying is true and worthy of entire acceptance, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners” (1 Tm 1.15).

The creedal statement gave rise to another question that theologians have discussed through the course of centuries: Did the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity have to become man or could satisfaction for sin have been made in another way? It is the classic question concerning the necessity of the Incarnation.

Anselm. Historians of dogma generally agree that St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY was the first great systematic theologian who gave classic expression to the question in his Cur Deus Homo. In Anselm’s framework, man was created in a state of justice by God, in order that enjoying God he might be happy. Created by God and remaining a creature of God, destined one day to take the place of the fallen angels of God, man owed all his service to God and was God’s debtor for everything he could do or produce. Sin, Anselm went on, is simply nonpayment of this debt.

The effects of man’s sin are that, though God’s honor remains intact, man himself suffers consequences in the moral order that in turn have consequences in the physical order. Man must either suffer from God’s eternal punishment or give God satisfaction—and this latter is the giving to God of what service he withheld along with something extra for the contumely. Man could not by himself give God this required satisfaction (1) because even his present service was owed, (2) because sin is an infinitely grave offense, (3) because he would have to conquer the devil, and (4) through one man justify others. “Nothing more just, nothing more impossible,” as Boso, Anselm’s partner in the Cur Deus Homo dialogue, commented succinctly.

Anselm went on to say that God’s constancy to His own purpose required that He restore man by arranging for satisfaction to be given; and, taking the nature of sin and satisfaction to be as he described it, there was only one way—God had to become man. With the same “austere metaphysic” (J. Rivière’s phrase) Anselm also reasoned to the necessity of Christ’s death on the cross.

Thomistic and Scotistic Views. Anselm’s basic reasoning was accepted by St. THOMAS AQUINAS as the ultimate motive for the Incarnation so that, had man not sinned, there would have been no Incarnation. Theologians in the Thomistic tradition hold that given God’s decree requiring condign satisfaction from man for sin, it was necessary that one of the Persons of the Trinity become incarnate. For them Incarnation did not have an internal necessity, that is, of itself, or one consequent merely on the creation of the world, or one consequent on the Fall, or, finally, one consequent even on God’s decree to restore man. The followers of DUNS SCOTUS, on the other hand, hold that the Incarnation was decreed by God even before the advent of sin. They proclaim that the Incarnation was from the first an integral part of the scheme of creation. Christ was to be the crown and glory of the Father’s creation. Sin did not, then, occasion the Incarnation; it merely determined the manner. Christ, because of man’s sin, would now come in a body that would suffer the Passion and death to redeem man. The Scotists argue that all men exist for Christ, not Christ because of them.

Thomists do not deny the primacy of Christ in creation and all the other benefits that have come from the Incarnation. But they insist on the basically remedial purpose of His coming as the only adequate interpretation of the abundant scriptural passages attesting it. The Scotistic position has been that God could give a purely human person such gifts of grace that he would be able to give condign satisfaction for man's sin.

In the 14th century John WYCLIF, in accordance with a more general principle of necessity that he held, maintained that for the Incarnation there was an absolute necessity. Later philosophers like Leibniz, in accordance with the optimism that they maintained, and along with them some theologians, said that God either was forced by some internal necessity to create the best possible world (a world, therefore, in which the Divine Son would be incarnate) or was constrained by some kind of fittingness, once He had decreed the creation, to decree also the Incarnation.

The whole discussion of the necessity of the Incarnation has, historically, been intimately bound up with the theological notion of satisfaction. In the 20th-century renewal of Scripture studies and of Biblical theology, with keener interest in the nature of man's elevation and relationship to Christ, other elements of man's salvation are receiving more emphasis than previously. The discussion has broadened, with the consequence that theologians do not find the limited framework of satisfaction-necessity as useful as they once did. Nevertheless, as a concept solidly based on Scripture and as a word sanctified by conciliar usage (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum 1529), satisfaction will always be theologically illuminating.

See Also: REDEMPTION, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: J. F. BONNEFOY, "Il primato di Cristo nella teologia contemporanea," in Problemi e Orientamenti di Teologia Dogmatica. (Milano, 1957). L. CERFAUX, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (New York 1959). L. LERCHER, Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae, v.3 (5th ed. Barcelona 1951). S. LYONNET, Sin, Redemption and Sacrifice: A Biblical and Patristic Study tr. L. SABOURIN (Rome 1970). I. SOLANO, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. FATHERS OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS, PROFESSORS OF THE THEOLOGICAL FACULTIES IN SPAIN (Madrid 1962) 3.1. B. M. XIBERTA Y ROQUETA, Enchiridion de Verbo Incarnato (Madrid 1957).

[E. A. WEIS/J. J. WALSH/EDS.]

INCENSE

Material that, when burned, produces a fragrant smoke. The term is applied also to the fragrant smoke. Various substances, such as aromatic wood, bark, seed, etc., but especially certain resins and gum resins, were used as incense in ancient times.

In the Bible. In the East the burning of incense as perfume was an ancient practice. From its use for secular purposes it was introduced into the religious worship of both the pagans and the Israelites, since it was a natural and beautiful symbol of prayer and sacrifice. But there was a difference between ordinary "profane" incense (Ex 30.9) and "sacred" incense that was used solely in Israelite worship. The latter was a finely ground powder (Lv 16.12) made up of a special blend, half frankincense (lebōnā) and half storax (nātāp), onycha (šēhelet), and galbanum (helbenā), to which salt was added as a preservative (Ex 30.34–38). When these resinous materials were burned they produced "fragrant smoke," which is the original meaning of the Hebrew word qetōret. However, the word came to be used much more often of the resins themselves.

When the legitimate worship of Yahweh is described in the OT and the verb hiqfir [to burn up (something) into fragrant smoke] is employed, the object of the verb is not necessarily incense. In fact, the common use of incense in the sacred rites was to burn it together with sacrificial victims, such as HOLOCAUSTS (Ex 29.18), the fat of other offerings (Ex 29.13), cereal offerings (Lv 6.8), and token offerings (Nm 5.26). It thus served as a secondary offering to Yahweh.

At times, however, incense was burned by itself as an independent offering in divine worship. In these cases it was consumed in the fire on a special altar, the altar of incense (Ex 30.1–10) or golden altar (Nm 4.11), or in a CENSER. (See ALTAR, 2.) Although this practice was carried on already in preexilic times, the references to it are mostly in postexilic documents, e.g., the so-called priestly code, which restricts this offering to the Aaronic priests (Nm 17.1–5).

In the NT the only reference to the burning of incense in the Temple worship is in Lk 1.8–12, where the Evangelist recounts the story of Zachary offering incense in the Temple and seeing the angel Gabriel at the right hand of the altar of incense. But in the heavenly liturgy of the Apocalypse "the golden bowls full of incense" symbolize "the prayers of the saints" (Rv 5.8; see also 8.3–4). In Ap 18.13 fragrant resins used as incense (θυμιάματα) are listed among the luxury imports of 1st-century Rome.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963). 1056–57. R. DE VAUX Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961). 423, 430–432. B. KÖTTING, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65). 6:1571.

[J. J. MCGARRAGHY]

In Christian Liturgy. Incense was used copiously in pagan cult, and without it sacrifice was considered hardly complete. The emperor himself was often honored as a deity by means of incense. During persecutions Christians were frequently required to offer incense before an image of the emperor or a god as a test of their loyalty; those who did so were regarded as apostates by their fellow Christians. Although the use of incense was retained at funerals, since it had become a normal civil ceremony, protective in origin, Christianity rejected it as a form of worship because of antipathy toward paganism.

Once paganism had been vanquished, the Church slowly began to introduce the use of incense. The earliest witness in the East seems to have been Pseudo-Dionysius (Eccl. hierarchia 3.2; Quasten MonE 294), who reported that the bishop began the celebration of Mass with an incensation of altar and sanctuary. In the West, incense was first used by carrying it before the pope (Andrieu OR 2:82; cf. 88), for the pope was considered on a par with civil rulers who were so honored. An incensation of the oblation at Mass was first recorded in the 11th century (Bernold, Micrologus 9; PL 151:983). In time incense came to be used also in the Roman rite during Lauds and Vespers (8th century) and as a mark of respect for the altar, the ministers, and the faithful. In the 13th century, Innocent III saw an exorcistic significance in its use (De sacro altaris mysterio 2.17; PL 217:808). This notion can still be found in some blessings (e.g., when incense is blessed for use in the erection of a new cross: Rituale Romanum 9.9.14).

During the 17th and 18th centuries the natural materials burned as incense were replaced with substances borrowed from the perfume industry. But the fragrant resins prescribed for incense in Ex 30.34–35 (see above) are still the most satisfactory ingredients for liturgical use because the odor given off when they are burned is in no way reminiscent of the secular perfume industry. The resulting smoke is visible without excessive clouding.

Bibliography: E. G. ATCHLEY, A History of the Use of Incense in Divine Worship (New York 1909). E. FEHRENBACH, Dictionnaire d'archéologie Chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53). 5.1:2–21. J. H. MILLER, Fundamentals of the Liturgy (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960). 203–204. P. MORRISROE, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al, 16 v. (New York 1907–14). 7:716–717. O. BÖCHER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65). 6:1571. K. HOFMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38). 10:783–785.

[M. MCCANCE]

INCEST

Incest is a term derived from the Latin incestus, meaning unchaste, and applied to sexual relationship, complete or incomplete, between persons so related by blood or affinity that legal marriage cannot take place between them. In common with all other abuses of sex, it is an offense against the sixth commandment of God, but an added specific deformity exists in the case of incest by reason of the special affection and reverence that should exist between persons united in a close bond of family relationship.

Archbishop Iakovos spreading incense during a special celebration at New York's Central Park. (Photograph by Mark Cardwell; Archive Photos)

Moral theology, for the most part, ignores the genetic considerations that are popularly thought to underlie the incest taboo. These, in any case, would be inapplicable to incest in which the relationship is one of affinity. St. Thomas finds three reasons why incest should be regarded as specially prohibited. (1) A violation of chastity committed between close relatives is contrary to the reverence owed in piety by the sinning parties to their parents or common ancestor. (2) The maintenance of chastity in family life requires that sexual intimacy between its members not united to each other by marriage should be made especially unthinkable in order that the close proximity in which they live should not provide too great an occasion for sin. (3) The special prohibition teaches people to take no sexual interest in those within the family circle, and this causes them to look outside of it for marriage partners. There is great advantage in this to those who marry, for marriage multiplies for them the number of those to whom they are amicably related, and it also helps build up a social unity between men on a broader basis than that of blood relationship.

The closer the relationship, the more grievous is the specific guilt of the sin of incest. Most grievous is incest of those related in the direct line, between parent and offspring. There is an essential indecency in such a case that is not found in transgressions involving other degrees of relationship. The prohibition of sexual union between those related by affinity is one of ecclesiastical law. One can also apply the term incest to the sin of people who are related by legal adoption, or who are spiritually related because of sponsorship in Baptism, and thus impeded from marriage. Strictly speaking, however, the term is used in this connection only by way of analogy. St. Thomas prefers to identify such sin between those spiritually related as sacrilege having the appearance of incest.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 154.9. E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 7.2:1539–55.

[L. G. MILLER]

INCEST (IN THE BIBLE)

The subject of incest in the Bible will be treated under three headings: incest in the patriarchal age, in the Mosaic Law, and in the New Testament.

Patriarchal Age. Instances are recorded during this period of intercourse between near relatives. Lot's daughters, motivated by a desire for children in a manless world, conceived Moab and Ammon by their father (Gn 19.30–38). The story, which is etiological in as far as it gives a folk etymology to the names of these peoples, was used to insult the Ammonites and Moabites because they refused to help Israel in time of need (Dt 23.3–5). Ruben was deprived of his birthright because of incest (Gn 35.22; 49.3–4). Judah had intercourse with Tamar, his daughter-in-law, but was not blamed for it, since he thereby raised up children for his dead sons. See LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (IN THE BIBLE).

Mosaic Law. God forbade the Israelites to imitate the incestuous customs of Egypt where marriage between brothers and sisters was sometimes practiced (Lv 18.3, 6). The incestuous unions prohibited in the Law (some were legitimate at an earlier age in Israel) are those of son and mother, of a man with the wife of his father (Lv 18.8; Dt 27.20) and with the mother of his wife (Dt 27.23), of a man with his granddaughter or his wife's daughter or granddaughter (Lv 18.10, 17), of a man with his sister or half-sister (Lv 18.9; Dt 27.22; see, however, Gn 20.12), of a nephew with his aunt (Lv 18.12–14; cf. Ex 6.20), of a man with his daughter-in-law or with his sister-in-law (Lv 18.15, 16; 20.21); levirate marriage is an exception (Dt 25.5–10). Also forbidden was marriage to two sisters at the same time (Lv 18.18), although formerly it had been allowed (Gn 29.27–28). Penalties for incest were death (Lv 20.11–17), excommunication (Lv 18.29), and being cursed (Dt 27.20, 22–23), e.g., by being childless (Lv 20.21).

Other instances of incest are found in the Old Testament. Ammon, son of David, raped Tamar, his half-sister, for which Tamar's brother Absalom murdered him (2 Sm 13.1–32). Absalom committed incest with his father's concubines, to show that he now was king (2 Sm 16.21–22). David's son Adoniyah asked for Abishag, his father's concubine, a request that Solomon considered rebellion, although David had not "known" her (1 Kgs 2.13–23; 1.4). In Ez 22.10–11, among the crimes of Jerusalem, incest is listed (see also Am 2.7).

In the New Testament. There are only two instances of incest in the New Testament. Herod Antipas married Herodias, his niece, and the wife of his brother Philip who was still living. John the Baptist was imprisoned because of his condemnation of Herod for marrying his brother's wife (Mk 6.17–18).

In 1 Cor 5.1–12, St. Paul excommunicates and delivers to Satan a man sexually linked to his father's wife, no doubt his stepmother. Paul condemns such a sin as an "immorality . . . not found even among the Gentiles," and a corrupting influence on the sacred community. He also blames the Corinthian church for not having already excluded the man.

Neither in the Old Testament nor New Testament does incest seem to be condemned for eugenic reasons, although these may have been the basis for the moral prohibition.

Bibliography: H. LESÈTRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VI-GOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 3.1:864–867. W. CORSWANT, A Dictionary of Life in Bible Times, tr. A. HEATHCOTE (New York 1960) R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 31–32, 42, 158–159.

[J. J. DAVIS]

INCOMMUNICABILITY

In scholastic philosophy and theology, incommunicability is that property which, together with SUBSISTENCE, characterizes the PERSON and, less properly, the irrational supposit; it indicates the person's individuality, distinctness, and independence.

Historical Aspects. The Vulgate of Wis 14.21 used incommunicabile nomen to designate what is the prerogative of God alone (cf. St. Augustine, In evang. Ioh. 79.2; Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 36:527). Boethius used incommunicabilis proprietas or qualitas of what is proper to a single individual (Herm. sec. 2; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1878–90) 64:462–64; ed. C. Meiser, Lipsiae, 1877–80, 137–41). Fulgentius of Ruspe came closer to medieval speculations on personality when he said of the Trinity: “. . . se illa una veraque divinitas in singulis personis voluit incommunicabiliter nominari . . .” (Epist. 14.8; Patrologia Latina 65:399). But it was not till the Middle Ages that incommunicabilitas was used more technically and frequently for what is characteristic of the person. Boethius's definition of person as naturae rationalis individua substantia (C. Eut. 3, ed. H. Stewart and E. Rand, 84) was the basic point of departure. Richard of Saint-Victor sought to replace this formula as applied to God with naturae divinae incommunicabilis existentia (De Trinitate 4.21–24; ed. G. Salet, Sources Chrétiennes, ed. H. de Lubac et al. (Paris 1941– ) 63:278–86; cf. pp. 487–89). Boethius's formula survived, however, although today it yields primacy to distinctum subsistens in natura intellectuali (St. Thomas, In 1 sent. 23.1.4). While incommunicabilitas did not appear in these two classic definitions, it was commonly used in their analysis, as the equivalent or refinement of individua and distinctum. In Alexander of Hales (Summa theologiae 3a; Quaracchi 4.2:78–79), followed by St. Bonaventure (In 3 sent. 5.2.2 ad 1; Quaracchi 3:133b), incommunicabilitas designated only one of three aspects of the individuality proper to the person. Such was not the case in St. Thomas's usage, which designated all three aspects as incommunicabilitas (In 3 sent. 5.2.1 ad 2); this usage has subsequently prevailed (see below).

Analysis. Each existent (ens simpliciter) as a unity is “undivided in itself, divided from every other.” What this classic description seeks to convey is that every being as one: (1) is a totality, identical with itself, completely constituted in itself, an individual; and (2) precisely as such stands over against every other being. “Undivided in itself” regards the being's self-referent aspect, its self-identity, totality, completeness; “divided from every other” situates the being in the universe of distinct existents. The notion of supposit is a more technical designation of existent being in its unity. In the definition of the supposit as the distinct or incommunicable subsistent, subsistence represents the self-referent aspect of the supposit, while incommunicability represents its other-referent aspect. Following St. Thomas, scholastics speak of a threefold commonness or indistinctness as excluded from the supposit as incommunicable: (1) the commonness of a universal (for the supposit is subsistent, individual) or quasiuniversal (to allow for the commonness had by the divine NATURE in the TRINITY); (2) the commonness of a part (for the supposit is complete); (3) the commonness had by “assumption” by another supposit, as in the INCARNATION (see below). Incommunicability does not, however, exclude that the Divine Person of the Son draw His human nature to share in His divine subsistence.

Applications. (1) Irrational suppositis possess incommunicability only by a very extended analogy, since their self-identity is minimal. (2) The human (and angelic) person, constituted as such because of its intellectuality and freedom exercised by a created ultimate subject of existence, is characterized by a lofty, though still imperfect, self-possession, and hence by incommunicability. The moral and juridical sacredness of the person has its roots in this ontological inviolability; it is because the person exists in itself and for itself that it cannot be treated as a mere means. (3) In the unique instance of the humanity of Christ, an individual created nature, rational and free, is not the ultimate subject of incommunicable existence; rather the WORD, divinely incommunicable from eternity, is now, in this individual assumed nature, humanly incommunicable. How a reality fully individual as nature can lack the individuality or incommunicability proper to person is the essential problem arising from the mystery of the Incarnation (see JESUS CHRIST IN THEOLOGY). (4) In the Trinity the divine nature, though subsistent, lacks strict incommunicability because of being common to the three Persons; the same is true of the subsistent relation of active SPIRATION, common to Father and Son. It is rather in the three Divine Persons, each a distinct, subsistent relation, that one finds the strict incommunicability of which there is question here (see RELATIONS, TRINITARIAN). From the Christological and Trinitarian applications it is clear that the philosophical analysis of incommunicability is strongly dependent on the two central Christian mysteries; it is doubtful, at the very least, that unaided reason would have perceived any distinction between the singularity or individuality of an existing nature and the further individuality or incommunicability that specifies the person.

Incommunicability and Personal Communication. Modern personalist and existentialist philosophy emphasizes interpersonal communication as essential to the person (see PERSONALISM; EXISTENTIALISM); man attains self-realization only in meaningful encounter with the other. Superficially this notion might seem to conflict with the notion of the person as incommunicable. In fact the two notions are not only compatible but require one another. Only as unique, distinct, and incommunicable can the person enter into a communion that is not a depersonalizing self-abdication; only as open to communion can the person retain a self-possession that is not solipsistic. The Trinitarian mystery, where each incommunicable Person is constituted by a distinct, subsistent relation, is for the Christian the model and guarantee of this necessary complementarity.

See Also: ASSUMPTUS-HOMO THEOLOGY; CONSUBSTANTIALITY; CREATED ACTUATION BY UNCREATED ACT; HOMOCOUSIOS; HYPOSTASIS; KENOSIS; PERSON, DIVINE.

Bibliography: L. DE RAEYMAEKER, The Philosophy of Being, tr. E. H. ZIEGELMEYER (St. Louis 1954) 240–47. L. BILLOT, De Verbo Incarnato (9th ed. Rome 1949) 61–78; De Deo uno et trino (7th ed. Rome 1935) 460–74. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 7.1:407–29.

[T. E. CLARKE]

INCORPORATION IN CHRIST

For St. Paul the essential eschatological reality is the risen Christ in His glorified Body (Col 2.17). In Biblical thought “body” stands for the whole human being in one’s concrete reality as a living person. Sinful human beings are freed from “the body of sin” and “death” (Rom 6.6; 7.24) through the Lord Jesus, who in His own Body-person has destroyed the body of sin (Rom 8.3; 2 Cor 5.21; Col 1.22) and who, risen to new life in the Spirit (Rom 1.4), is in His “spiritual body” (1 Cor 15.44–49) the bearer of new life to human beings (Eph 2.5–6; 1 Cor 15.20–23; 45–49; Col 2.12–3.4; Rom 8.11). It is through Baptism in faith (Col 2.11–12; Rom 6.3–14; 1 Cor 12.13; Eph 5.26) that the sinner, delivered from his own sin-and-death body, is attached to Christ and to the work wrought by Christ in His own Body, and is made one Body with Christ living now as “spiritual body” and “life-giving Spirit” (1 Cor 15.44–45). It is into Christ’s Body that Christians are incorporated as members and made His Church-Body; for once embodied into Christ, they become “fellow-members of the same body” (Eph 3.6) and “members of one another” (4.25).

According to Pius XII in the encyclical MYSTICI CORPORIS, incorporation into Christ is realized only in and through the Church, His social Body (see encycl., pars. 11, 40, 67, 73, 81). Christ’s “social Body” (44, 51, 58, 67, etc.) is so “conjoined” (1, 5, 11, 55, 67, etc.) and so “made like” (46, 51, 54) to its Head, who shares with it His most “intimately personal goods” (53), that He is become a quasi-person sustaining His Church-Body (51–53, 56, 77). “The divine Savior with His social Body constitutes only one mystical person” (67; see 56, 78). At the same time, however, the social Body of the Church is itself personified, and given not a detached but a distinct collective existence (78, 53, 85, 5, 12, etc.). Vatican II’s Lumen Gentium (7–8) continues the line of thought put forth in Mystici Corporis, though it broadens significantly the ecumenical outreach found already in that encyclical.

Baptism in water and the Spirit (18, 21, 26, 29) incorporates the whole human being into Christ in His social Body, qualifying the baptized to live in the total inward-outward life (60) of the company of those who in Christ’s one Spirit (54–5) are one with Christ and with each other in faith, hope, and love (70–74).

The grace of incorporation invests the whole social Body, inwardly and outwardly (61, 68–69, 63), and all its single members similarly. It is an embodied grace.

Among the points elaborated by theologians are the following: (1) the precise nature of the Headship of Christ; (2) the role of Christ’s Spirit—merely appropriated or also proper? (see APPROPRIATION)—in uniting the Body to the Head; (3) the grace of incorporation, as an inward-outward grace, sacramental and social; (4) the Eucharist and incorporation; (5) the nature of the unity—merely dynamic or also entitative?—between Head and Body; and (6) the meaning of incorporation in relation to the growing realization of the real though imperfect communion among various Christian denominations and the Catholic Church (see MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH).

See Also: MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: R. SCHNACKENBURG, Das Heilsgeschehen bei der Taufe nach dem Apostel Paulus (Münchener theologische Studien 1; Munich 1950). A. WIKENHAUSER, Pauline Mysticism, tr. J. CUNNINGHAM (New York 1960). S. TROMP, De Spiritu Christi Anima, v.3 of Corpus Christi Quod est Ecclesia, 3 v. (Rome 1960). V. BRANICK, The House Church in the Writings of Paul (Wilmington, Del., 1989). M. ROOT and R. SAARINEN, eds., Baptism and the Unity of the Church (Geneva 1998).

[F. X. LAWLOR/D. M. DOYLE]

INCORPORATION INTO THE CHURCH (MEMBERSHIP)

In any contemporary discussion on “belonging to the Church” the first point to be stressed is that VATICAN COUNCIL II’s Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium) advisedly dropped the terms “member” and “membership.” The first schema of the Consti- tutio de Ecclesia had, in keeping with Pius XII's 1943 encyclical, Mystici Corporis Christi, employed the terms. But in its final form Lumen gentium used instead "incorporation," a notion at once more precise and more flexible. The deliberate substitution is clear from a comparison of Lumen gentium, art. 14 with the 1962 schema, art. 9, and the 1963 schema, art. 8. Likewise, the idea of votum Ecclesiae (intention of the Church—Abbott) did not keep the meaning given to it (in line with the thought of St. Robert Bellarmine) during the discussions of Vatican Council I (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. [Florence-Venice 1757–98] reprinted and continued by L. Petit and J. B. Martin, 53 v. in 60 [Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960–] 53:311–312), in Mystici Corporis Christi, and in the Holy Office's letter to the archbishop of Boston regarding the "Feeney Case" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 3870). The expression votum Ecclesiae retained that "classical" meaning only in the passage on catechumens (Lumen gentium 14.3). The application of votum Ecclesiae to non-Catholics reflects an entirely different viewpoint (Lumen gentium 15.2; 8.2—ad unitatem catholicam impellunt, "these elements or gifts properly belonging to the Church of Christ possess an inner dynamism toward Catholic unity"[Abbott]).

The setting aside of the idea of membership in favor of that of incorporation has called for the development of a carefully nuanced vocabulary, consistent with Vatican II ECCLESIOLOGY. With regard to Catholics, Lumen gentium uses "being incorporated" (incorporatio), qualifying the term with the adverb "fully" (plene) and emphasizing that full incorporation requires the presence of the Holy Spirit (Lumen gentium 14.2). For non-Catholics and catechumens, the constitution speaks of their being linked (conjunctio) to the Church, again carefully stressing the role of the Holy Spirit in each case (Lumen gentium 14.3; 15.2). As for non-Christians the constitution uses "being related" (ordinantur), a term that suggests a dynamic relationship, an orientation toward the Church (Lumen gentium 16). Every shade of difference in meaning among these terms is important. But the terms acquire their full force only in the light of the most authoritative commentaries on them, the Decree on Ecumenism and the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions. Then, supposing the nuances indicated, the richness of such expressions as the following becomes clear: "Churches and ecclesial communities" (Unitatis redintegratio 3.3; cf. Lumen gentium 15.1); "separated brethren" (brothers divided; Unitatis redintegratio 3.4); "separated Churches and ecclesial communities" (Unitatis redintegratio 3.4); "full communion"—"imperfect communion" (ibid. 3.1).

The Force of "Incorporation." Commentators on the conciliar texts have perhaps not paid enough attention to the fact that, although tightly linked, the terms "incorporation" (Lumen gentium) and communio (Unitatis redintegratio) are not synonymous. The main focus of "incorporation" is on individuals as such and although Lumen gentium (15) does make passing reference to the ecclesial standing of groups as such, that is not its primary emphasis. The main bearing of "communion," on the contrary, is on groups as such, in their relation to the Catholic Church and to each other. It is of some interest to point out that Lumen gentium (14.2; 14.1) uses the term communio to indicate union ("unity of communion"—Abbott) with the successor of St. Peter, but that in Unitatis redintegratio the term "communion" takes on the traditional sense of the koinonia, the fellowship, of the Churches (Unitatis redintegratio 3.4). In this respect, the Decree on Ecumenism is richer than the Constitution on the Church: it acknowledges a genuine salvific value in Churches and ecclesial communities as such (i.e., not merely in the ecclesial elements or vestiges existing in them).

Every ecclesial tradition affirms that incorporation in Christ involves a core element, known only by God, which consists in the presence within a person of the love of God poured forth by the Holy Spirit (Rom 5.5). This element is so important that without it there exists no full and complete incorporation, possessing every guarantee of authenticity (see Lumen gentium 14.2, a capital text on the point). This spiritual, interior incorporation often occurs before baptism (see St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 3, 66.11 and 13 on baptism of desire and of blood) and at times even without any explicit knowledge of the mystery of Christ (Lumen gentium 16).

Here it should be stressed that when they speak formally of incorporation into the Church, most ecclesial traditions—even those that do not give prominence to the Sacraments—acknowledge that its accomplishment is normally through baptism. The gift of the Holy Spirit that is the inner mark of belonging to the Body of Christ is made ordinarily to those who seal their faith in Jesus Christ by baptism. Admittedly some Christian bodies born during or after the Reformation are silent on the point. The more ancient Christian traditions, however, are unanimous here, even though they may explain differently the connection between the sacramental rite and the inner incorporation or may not all recognize the validity of baptism administered in ways other than their own.

Every person baptized in a true BAPTISM belongs to the Body of Christ and therefore to the Church. One of the most important consequences of Vatican II ecclesiology is the break with Bellarmine's viewpoint, repeated in Mystici Corporis Christi, which in fact limited true belonging to the Church to those baptized within the Catholic community. For Vatican II every genuine baptism truly brings incorporation into Christ and the Church. Even though divided, the Church is single (Unica Christi Ecclesia, Lumen gentium 8.1) and baptism brings entrance into the single (though divided) Church. This is the profound implication of the expression “the one single Baptism of the one single Church.” Lumen gentium refrains from stating that the Church is the Catholic Church; it chooses rather to affirm that the “Church subsists in the Catholic Church” (subsistit in; Lumen gentium 8). The precise reason of this choice is to give recognition to the presence of genuinely ecclesial elements in the non-Catholic bodies that the document, further on, designates as “Churches or ecclesial Communities.” (The 1964 schema of the Constitutio de Ecclesia has this: “loco ‘est’ 1.21, dicitur ‘subsistit in’ ut expressio melius concordet cum affirmatione de elementis ecclesialibus quae alibi adsunt.”) The implication is that in these “Churches and ecclesial Communities” the Church (the single Church) is present. Therefore those who by baptism belong to these bodies and within them live in faithfulness to the Spirit, relying on the elements of genuinely evangelical life they find there (Lumen gentium 8.2; 15.1 & 2; Unitatis redintegratio 3), by that same belonging also belong to the single Church.

Given the viewpoint of the conciliar documents (which in their own way mark a return to Thomas Aquinas’s insistence on the interiority of incorporation into Christ—Summa theologiae 3a, 8.3), it is extremely important to keep in mind that belonging to the single Church comes about in and through belonging to the “Churches and ecclesial Communities.” These bear within them elements of sanctification and of truth that make it possible for the baptized to live according to the Gospel. Therefore the value of each “Church or ecclesial Community” as such is not set aside—treated, that is, as meaningless or purely incidental. Moreover, the council refuses to conceive the incorporation as though it were an unmediated action of the Holy Spirit, between the Spirit and each individual alone. However far from being what the Catholic Church regards as the true form of the Church, every ecclesial community is the locus of a genuine incorporation into the single Church. Acknowledgment of that fact is an implication of the idea of “incomplete communion”; the accent falls on “communion,” the noun, rather than on “incomplete,” the adjective, and clearly the term “communion” should not be taken to mean anything other than the “communion” that incorporation in Christ brings about (see Bertrams; Hamer; Kasper; Lanne; McDonnell; McGovern).

Incorporation through baptism means, then, incorporation into the single Church. The Church, however, exists now as divided, disunited. Lumen gentium and the other conciliar documents that explicate its ecclesiology, affirm that incorporation, while real, does not have the same completeness in all Churches and ecclesial communities. The documents add that incorporation has this fullness only in the Catholic Church (Lumen gentium 8.2 [subsistit in passage]; Unitatis redintegratio 3.5). To illustrate let us give an image: a graft can be made onto a living body, yet for some reason not receive all the vigor and strength of the body because of some defect or lack in the way the grafting onto the whole organism is done. In the belief of the Catholic Church the baptized person fully (plene) incorporated into the Church is the one who shares truly in the Eucharist (i.e., as one having charity), within a community whose bishop, ordained in the apostolic succession, is in communion with the bishop of Rome (except for the last part the Catholic Church is at one with the Orthodox Churches in this understanding).

Two Views of the Church. To grasp the meaning of this Catholic position, it is important to recall the difference between two views of the Church, the “Catholic” view—that of Roman Catholics, the Orthodox, and some Anglicans—and the Protestant one. The Protestant view considers the Church essentially in its invisible reality (its res in the Scholastics’ vocabulary). It looks immediately at what God works in the heart “of all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and whose names are known only to God” (Moss 2, 41). Thus, the focus is on the effect of grace and the mysterious bond existing here and now between the glorified Christ and each sincere believer. Such a reading of the reality of the Church, therefore, centers on realized sanctification, that is on the invisible communion of all who are in grace. Outward signs—the Sacraments, the institutional Church—have a value of mere instrumentality, no more. All those who confess Christ—and thereby may possibly be sanctified—have the possibility of existing within the ecclesial plenitude to the degree that charity is alive in them. It is impossible, therefore, to take institutional elements as the index of degrees of ecclesiology.

The Catholic view is altogether different. The reality of the Church must be seen as consisting at once and inseparably of what Christ works here and now within the faithful and of the institutional elements established from the outset by the apostolic community, the interpreter of Christ’s will. From the day of Christ’s resurrection to the day of his second coming the Church, taken in its total reality, is the Sacramentum salutis, i.e., the expression of all that salvation implies—not only the inner presence of grace, but also the channels of grace. These instruments also are saving gifts of God and constitutives of the manifestation of his grace. The Church received its identity at once from its inner, mysterious reality (its res) and from the visible means (the sacramentum) of which it is the bearer. For the Church is, in the present world, the Body of Christ, to be seen always as tightly bound to the Jesus of the Incarnation—the eternal Son of the Father, but also the One Sent to give to human beings along with the event of salvation the means for entering into that salvation.

Full Incorporation. This makes clear the meaning of the important statement of the Constitution on the Church: “They are fully incorporated into the society of the Church who, possessing the Spirit of Christ, accept her entire system and all the means of salvation given to her” (Lumen gentium 14.2). Full incorporation comes about where the spiritual reality (the possession of the Spirit of Christ) and the entirety of visible, essential elements are present. To be joined only to the visible institution without charity is not to be “in the heart of the Church” (ibid.); to possess charity without holding fast to the outward, institutional, and essential elements is not to belong totally to the reality of the Sacrament that the Church is. The two aspects of incorporation into the Church, the spiritual and the visible, are, as it were, inter-fused. Among the factors that together give the Church its outward manifestation, the institutional aspect is inseparable from the communal profession of faith and from sharing in the Sacraments, above all in the Eucharistic synaxis. The Eucharist is the unifying center in which come together, within the communio of the Body of Christ, the communion of the profession of faith and the communion with the apostolic ministry, whose centrum unitatis is the bishop of Rome. Incorporation achieves in the Eucharist its full measure.

This understanding of the incorporation in Christ and the Church allows for breaking away from the Counter-Reformation positions maintaining that there is no genuine belonging to the Church other than within the Catholic community, bound fast to the pope (Bellarmine, De conciliis 3, 2 [ed. Fevre 1870] v. 2. 316–318). That conception remained in the thought of Mystici Corporis; use of the term “membership” made difficult any sort of nuancing. But thanks to its ecclesiology—prepared by the renewal of patristic studies and the ecumenical dialogue—Vatican II was able to affirm at the same time that Churches or ecclesial communities separated from the Catholic Church are part of the single Church, and that nevertheless incorporation in Christ and His Church possesses within the Catholic Church the fullness that it does not have elsewhere.

Bibliography: W. BERTRAMS, “De gradibus communionis in doctrina Concilii Vaticani II,” Gregorianum 47 (1966) 286–305. Y.-M. CONGAR, “What Belonging to the Church Has Come to Mean,” Communio 4 (1977) 146–160. J. HAMER, “La terminologie écclesiologique de Vatican II et les ministères protestants,” La Documentation Catholique 53 (1971) 625–628. W. KASPER, “Der ekklesiologische Charakter der nichtkatholischen Kirchen,” Theologische Quartalschrift 145 (1965) 42–62. E. LANNE, “Le Mystère de l’Église et de son unité,” Irénikon 46 (1973) 298–342. K. MCDONNELL, “The Concept of Church in the Documents of Vatican II as Applied to Protestant Denominations,” Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue—IV, Eucharist and Ministry (Minneapolis 1970) 307–324. J. O. MCGOVERN, The Church in the Churches (Washington, D.C. 1968). C. B. MOSS, What Do We Mean by Reunion (London 1953).

[J. M. R. TILLARD/EDS.]

INCULTURATION, LITURGICAL

A hallmark of Pope JOHN PAUL II’S pontificate has been his extensive travels to the local churches on nearly every continent. Central to these visits are major liturgical celebrations that draw upon local culture to express the genius of the local churches. At the opening and closing of the special assemblies of the Synod of Bishops, the Eucharistic liturgies took up the particular cultural expressions, at the pope’s expressed wishes (Ecclesia in Africa, no. 25). At the opening of the Holy Door to commence the Jubilee Year, African horns and signs of reverence from Asia and Oceania emphasized the universality of the salvation and the mission of the Church to the whole world.

Throughout the history of Christian worship, liturgy and culture have always been intricately entwined: the culture of a given group of people yielded great influence on the forms, symbols, language, time and place of their worship. With the documents of the Second VATICAN COUNCIL, the imperative of liturgical inculturation gained unparalleled impetus and theological articulation. This entry first takes up the issue of terminology surrounding the notion of liturgical inculturation. After considering historical evidence of the interaction of liturgy and culture, it presents the documents of Vatican II and the instruction on inculturation and liturgy. Then, it examines recent attempts at liturgical adaptation throughout the world.

Problem of Terminology. The term “inculturation” is an ambiguous neologism that arose in the 1960s. When one examines conciliar texts, one observes that the terms aptatio (“adaptation”) and accomodatio (“accommodation”) are used interchangeably to refer to the Church’s task of aggiornamento and the whole process of liturgical change. After the council, the term aptatio came to refer to the task of the local bishops, part of the revitalization envisioned by the council, and accomodatio came to refer to the provisions in the typical editions of the Roman liturgical books for the minister to select alternatives in the local celebration of the liturgy.

Following A. Chupungco, adaptation is a culturally neutral term that refers to the Church's whole renewal. Different terms have been coined to speak of the methods of that renewal. The term "inculturation" was coined to refer to the need to keep the Christian message intact through the process of cultural exchange. In 1975 at the Thirty-second General Congregation of the Society of Jesus, the Latin word inculturatio was adopted in the discussions, probably the equivalent of the English "enculturation" (Roest-Crollius 1978). As A. Shorter explains, "enculturation" is a technical anthropological term for the socialization of a person, the way that the person is inserted into her or his culture (1988). "Inculturation" soon replaced "enculturation" in missiological, theological, and liturgical discourse and took on an entirely different meaning. Pope John Paul II introduced the term into Church documents in a 1979 address to the Pontifical Biblical Commission and later that year elaborated on it in Catechesi tradendae, no. 53.

In current liturgical discourse, the following principle terms are used to name the levels of interaction of liturgy and culture: acculturation, inculturation and creativity. The term "acculturation" refers to the interaction that ensues from the juxtaposition of two cultures (Shorter 1988; Chupungco 1989). Acculturation names the initial stage of the encounter of the Roman liturgy with the local culture. The liturgy of the Roman Latin typical editions is placed side by side with elements from the culture where they interact but neither the liturgy nor the culture is assimilated into the other. The initial interaction of the liturgy and the local culture could then lead to inculturation, that is, the liturgy is so inserted into the culture that it would absorb the genius of the culture and the culture would be affected by the liturgy. Yet, the liturgy would not become the culture nor the culture the liturgy; rather, both would undergo a process of internal transformation to shape something new (Chupungco 1993). Neither the liturgy nor the culture would lose their identities, but they would no longer be what they were before. The liturgy would be so inserted into the cultural frame that it might speak, sing and move according to the people's language, thought, rites, symbols, gestures and arts. Liturgy would thus ritualize according to the local cultural pattern. Some scholars go on to name a third phase, that of creativity. Here, the liturgical rites are fashioned independent of the Roman ordo and euchology. At this stage, the Christian faith might be embodied in the local culture in such a way that new forms of expressing it emerge and so enrich the Church universal. The task of inculturation is ongoing: in the process of mutual assimilation, dimensions of the culture will undergo transformation in light of the memories, values and hopes negotiated by the liturgy ordered in the typical editions and by the proclamation of the Gospel. Likewise, the culture will more authentically embody the Christian faith.

Liturgy and Local Church in History. Christian WORSHIP has always interacted with cultures, adapting cultural elements, transforming them and even rejecting them. Christian worship originated in the culturally plural matrix of Palestinian Judaism, Hellenism and Roman imperialism. As Christianity quickly spread through the Mediterranean basin into Asia Minor, Africa and east to Syria, the regional styles of worship, already influenced by Jewish forms, developed according to the cultural genius of the local churches. The local churches of Alexandria, Antioch, Edessa, Milan, Jerusalem, Rome and Constantinople generated distinctive liturgical usages that could be classified as families of rites. The content and rhetoric of euchology, the anaphoral structure, the order of worship at eucharist and initiation, the times and seasons of prayer each varied according to the different churches.

The Roman rite itself bears the marks of cultural adaptation. While the locus of imperial power shifted to Constantinople, the influence of pagan Roman culture on Christian worship and ministry in the church at Rome was considerable. With the invasion of the northern peoples, Rome was obliged to open itself to their cultures. At the same time, the liturgy of Rome came to hold a pre-eminent, if not idealized, position namely other legitimate and integral usages in the northern territories. Roman liturgical books were exported to the Germanic and Gallican churches in the interest of unifying liturgical praxis. The editors charged with preparing the books found themselves confronted with the daunting task of conforming local usage to distinctly Roman practices that were celebrated in the geographical coordinates of the Urbs and suppressing that which did not conform. However, the hallmarks of Roman liturgy—its terse prayers, its sober ritual, and its juridical reserve—were foreign to the Germano-Gallican spirit. Thus, significant adaptations were required and the Franco-Germanic culture was intertwined with the Roman liturgy. The popes adopted this liturgy after systematic abbreviation, and it was passed throughout Europe.

Tridentine Uniformity. With the Council of TRENT, the liturgy of the Roman church became carefully regulated. The Missal of PIUS V (1570) was binding on all churches of the west except those that could trace their usages back two hundred years. The use of the vernacular, called for by the reformers, was rejected and the Latin language required. Trent sought to preserve and guarantee the venerable Roman tradition, as it was then perceived. The printing press made the dissemination of the uniform and codified liturgical books in Latin, or edi- tiones typicae, facile. It is important to note that while the codified and uniform Roman liturgy became hegemonic, the relationship between cultic praxis of Christian faith and local culture survived and in many instances flourished on the “unofficial” level of popular devotions, pious practices, pilgrimages and the myriad local feasts and observances.

Missionary encounters with non-western European cultures prompted a reconsideration of the obligation to use the Tridentine forms. The CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY (1603–1742), erupting around Matteo RICCI’s (1552–1610) efforts of looking within the culture for authentic ways of expressing Christian faith, marks a significant point for the relationship of Roman liturgy and culture. Ricci made allowances for the Chinese Christians to participate in ancestral and Confucian rites. Rome became concerned and in 1742 definitively condemned these usages. The Chinese Rites controversy revealed two crucial developments: first, the imperative of discerning what is essential within the dominant socio-cultural matrix and endeavoring to accommodate it in the Christian tradition. Second, it demonstrated how a thoroughly western, classicist perspective misapprehends the difference of an eastern approach to religion and culture (Luttio 1994).

In the nineteenth century, the issue of the relationship between local usages, the prevailing cultural scene and the codified Roman liturgy arose. In the instance of the revival of “neo-Gallican” usages in France, liturgists, like P. GUÉRANGER, argued that diversion from the pure Roman liturgy was aberrant and needed to be suppressed. The Roman liturgy, which had the approbation of papal authority, was a means to reckon with the prevailing cultural forces: nationalism, liberal bourgeois culture and the irrationality of romanticism. With the stirrings of the liturgical movement, the study of Christian liturgy and concern for participation in worship gave impetus to explore how to make the liturgy an authentic celebration of the people. The discussions at the Assisi Congress of Pastoral Liturgy in 1956 witnessed missionary interest in the relationship between liturgy and culture.

Vatican II. The interaction of the movements in the decades preceding prevailed upon the formulations of Vatican II. As K. RAHNER observed, Vatican II promised the actualization of the Church as a world Church, not a western European Church. The relationship between the Church and world is reciprocal: the Church acts on the world and the world on the Church. It is this spirit that permeates the documents of Vatican II. The first document issued by the council, Sacrosanctum concilium (SC), is a watershed moment for the relationship between liturgy and culture, but it must also be read in the context of later conciliar decrees.

Sacrosanctum concilium no. 21 states that there are both “unchangeable elements” and “elements subject to change” in the liturgy. Nos. 22–23 take up issues of authority and method. Sacrosanctum concilium posits the authority for change with the Apostolic See and local bishops and insists on the preservation of “sound tradition.” Careful investigation through theological, historical and pastoral study must guide revision. Most significantly, if the good of the Church requires, “new forms adopted should in some way grow organically (organice crescant) from forms already existing” (no. 23). Sacrosanctum concilium nos. 37–40 have been called the “Magna Carta” of liturgical flexibility (Chupungco 1982). In this section, a Eurocentric perspective is attenuated: “Even in liturgy the Church has no wish to impose a rigid uniformity in matters which do not involve faith or the good of the whole community. Rather, she respects and fosters the spiritual adornments and gifts of the various races and peoples.” In no. 38, given that “the substantial unity of the Roman rite is maintained,” provision is made for legitimate local variations, and adaptations (aptationes) may be made even for the structuring of rites. No. 39 specifies that it is the task of the territorial ecclesiastical authority (that is, the bishops) and that the “limits of the typical editions of the liturgical books” are to be observed. However, no. 40 provides for an “even more radical adaptation (profundior aptatio)” that, developed by competent local authorities, will need the approbation of the Apostolic See.

These texts need to be read in light of other later conciliar documents. Gaudium et spes acknowledges the plurality of cultures (no. 53) and the fact that culture is a human product (no. 55). Most importantly, no. 58 states that the Church and the transmission of the Gospel are not tied exclusively to any one culture or any one way of life, but rather the Church can “enter into communion with various cultural modes, to her own enrichment and theirs, too.” While Western culture has been the mediating form of evangelization, other cultures might be capable of handing on the Gospel as well. Lumen gentium no. 26 presents the understanding of the local realization of the universal Church. Ad gentes no. 15 calls for the assemblies of the faithful, “endowed with the riches of its own nation’s culture,” to be “deeply rooted in the people.” No. 19 speaks of the phases of building a community of the faithful and no. 22 relates the nascent churches to the incarnation.

Recent Roman Documents. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) speaks of the context and need for inculturation, echoing contemporary theological and liturgical discourse on the relationship and between faith, liturgy and culture. The theme of diversity and the need for the Church to engage the variety of human cultures peppers the Catechism of the Catholic Church. For example, no. 814, in the context of Church unity, affirms that the Church “from the beginning” has been marked by “a great diversity,” different gifts and “multiplicity of peoples and cultures.” No. 1075 explains that the Church “aims to serve the whole Church in all the diversity of her rites and cultures.” It acknowledges that sacramental signs and symbols are rooted in creation and human culture (no. 1145) and the Church is able to integrate “all the authentic riches of cultures” (no. 1202). “Liturgy requires,” it emphasizes, “adaptation to the genius and culture of different people” (no. 1204). In its sensitivity to diversity, the Catechism of the Catholic Church states, “each Church proposes . . . according to its historic, social and cultural context, a language of prayer: words, melodies, gestures, iconography” (no. 2663). The need for critique and conversion is also noted (no. 1206; 2820).

In the midst of pastoral initiative and critical theological discourse, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments issued the fourth instruction on the implementation of Sacrosanctum Concilium, “Inculturation of the Liturgy within the Roman Rite,” (ILRR). The instruction sets down norms regarding the interpretation and implementation of Sacrosanctum Concilium, nos. 37–40. “Inculturation of the Liturgy within the Roman Rite,” has five sections: an introduction with preliminary observations; part one on the process of inculturation throughout salvation history; part two, theological and ecclesiological bases and preliminary conditions for inculturation; part three, principles and practical norms with regard to the Roman rite; and part four, areas open to adaptation in the Roman rite.

In the introduction the document notes the use and meaning of the term “inculturation,” explaining that it has a double movement of the Church’s introducing the Gospel in the culture and at the same time assimilating the culture’s values (no. 4). In number 7, “Inculturation of the Liturgy within the Roman Rite” acknowledges the coexistence of many cultures in the western churches of which the Church must take account, in addition to missionary churches on other continents. After discussing the encounter of Christian faith with various cultures, the instruction offers several theological and ecclesiological precepts concerning relationship between liturgy and the local churches. “Inculturation of the Liturgy within the Roman Rite” emphasizes the need for the proclamation of the scriptures in the local language as the first step of inculturation (no. 28). Only then, after study by scholars, by “wise people” who live the culture, and by pastors of the area, can any adaptations be made (no. 29–30). In the third section “Inculturation of the Liturgy within the Roman Rite” explains that the governing principle of liturgical inculturation is the maintenance of “the substantial unity of the Roman rite. This is currently expressed in the typical editions of liturgical books published by the authority of the supreme pontiff and in the liturgical books approved by the Episcopal conferences for their areas and confirmed by the Apostolic See” (no. 36). It posits the authority for adaptations of the Roman rite first “to the Apostolic See, which exercises it through the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments” (no. 37). In the fourth section, after elaborating areas for legitimate adaptation in the liturgy of the sacraments, blessings and liturgical year, “Inculturation of the Liturgy within the Roman Rite” lays down the procedure for the bishops’ conferences to ask for the Apostolic See’s approval. With regard to the “more profound adaptations” mentioned by Sacrosanctum Concilium no. 40, “Inculturation of the Liturgy within the Roman Rite” indicates that “adaptations of this kind do not envisage a transformation of the Roman rite” and “are made within the context of the Roman rite” (no. 63).

Contemporary Attempts. Since the promulgation of the typical editions of the Roman liturgical books, there have been several attempts at inculturating the Roman liturgy. India was one of the first countries to move on the program of cultural adaptation of the Roman liturgy. The task was daunting: India is an extremely culturally diverse country and Christians are a minority. As soon as 1965, a national liturgical center was set up. First, elements of Indian culture were juxtaposed with the Roman liturgical setting. Then, the liturgical books were not only translated into the vernacular, but new texts were composed. Third, non-Christian scriptures were introduced into the liturgy. On April 15, 1969 they enumerated twelve points of liturgical inculturation, concerning gestures and postures, forms of homage and objects and elements used in worship [see Notitiae, 5 (1969): 365–374]. Later, a new order for the Eucharist, new Eucharistic prayers and Catholic celebrations of Indian festivals were introduced. While only one revised Eucharistic prayer later received local approval, the task of liturgical adaptation continues, more so in the north than in the south. Also, it seems to be more evident on the “unofficial level” of popular devotion than in the official Latin rite liturgy (Chengalikavil 1993). Critical reflection by scholars and authorities continues.

The impetus toward indigenous liturgical expressions of the faith has marked the Catholic Church in Africa, Oceania and Asia. Relatively successful examples have taken place on an official level in the dioceses of the former Zaire, Malawi, Cameroon, Kenya and Ghana. In Polynesia, Melanesia and Oceania the local churches have sought to wed traditional island culture with liturgical celebration. Progress is also being made in the churches of Asia. Among liturgical scholars these local celebrations have raised questions concerning the methods and agency of the process of inculturation. Foreign authorities face thousands of cultures and languages and the fact that the very symbols of western Christian liturgy are foreign to non-western cultures. The people in the local churches, experts in their own culture, grapple with the forms and content of Christian faith. For example, debate has taken place with regard to the use of imported wheat bread and grape wine for the Eucharist in African and Asian cultures where rice, millet or palm wine are indigenous.

United States. The whole project of liturgical adaptation of the Roman liturgy heralded by the council touches not only Africa and Asia, but North and South America and Europe as well. With regard to contemporary western, Euro-American culture, some liturgists have questioned the premise of adapting the Roman liturgy to what they perceive as a dominant culture that cannot authentically incarnate the Christian gospel. Less pessimistic critics speak of the need to attenuate the counter-cultural notion of liturgy and stress the imperative of mutual interaction and critique so that the liturgy can most authentically express the given community's faith. In many ways, the liturgy is a cultural event because the liturgy is western European, so that the issues faced in Africa and Asia of foreign symbols, gestures and language are not so pronounced.

But many cultures make the face of the American church quite complex. Liturgical books have been translated into some of the Native American languages and Asian-American assemblies have begun to explore the question of the relationship between their cultures and liturgy. The question of inculturation is also alive for African-American and Hispanic assemblies and their desire to develop adequate forms for liturgical worship. Yet, even the terms "African-American," "Hispanic" or "Asian-American" cannot be used monolithically as if uniform African-American, Hispanic or Asian-American cultures existed. Hispanic liturgy is making great strides with regard to weaving the religious experience of Hispanic communities, popular religiosity and the liturgy. Hispanic liturgists have realized that it is through study of the particular values and practices of Hispanic pieties and popular devotions that the liturgy can be incarnated in the various assemblies. Hispanic composers have fashioned diverse liturgical music, and official liturgical texts have been translated into Spanish. The efforts of the Mexican American Cultural Center, the Hispanic subcommittee of the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy and the Instituto de Liturgia Hispana have greatly aided the assimilation of Hispanic culture and liturgy. Much work has also been done with regard to African-American communities. Through the publication of In Spirit and Truth (1987) and Plenty Good Room (1990), liturgical acculturation has taken root in most predominately African-American assemblies. These documents explore the ways that elements of the African-American religious experience and spirituality can be assimilated into the Roman Liturgy. The publication of Lead Me, Guide Me (Chicago 1987) offers a corpus of music for African-American Catholic assemblies.

The acculturation of Asian, Hispanic and African-American liturgy affords the Church in the United States a means of transforming its received notions of spirituality and worship. The work in these communities enables the rest of the Church to be aware of its own cultural patterns and see the Christian faith embodied in a plurality of ways. The mutual transformation enriches the Church's catholicity.

Conclusion. Consideration of historical and contemporary attempts at the program of liturgical adaptation demonstrate the importance of taking the concrete local culture and situation of the churches seriously. The process of liturgical inculturation presupposes a proclamation of the Gospel within the culture itself in order that the ritual celebration might be an authentic celebration of the people's paschal faith. Liturgical inculturation is a complex issue that raises serious theological, ecclesiological, hermeneutical and liturgical questions. Yet, it remains a pivotal issue as the Church enters the next millennium.

Bibliography: The literature on liturgical inculturation is extensive. The reader is directed to: S. A. STAUFFER, "Bibliography on Worship and Culture," in Christian Worship: Unity and Cultural Diversity, LWF Studies 1 (Geneva, 1996) 113–142. In particular the work of Anscar Chupungco figures prominently. A bibliography of his work can be found in Liturgy for the New Millennium: A Commentary on the Revised Sacramentary. Essays in Honor of Anscar Chupungco, ed., M. FRANCIS and K. PECKLERS (Collegeville, Minn., 2000), 165–168. Also see: S. BEVANS, Models of Contextual Theology (Maryknoll 1992). M. FRANCIS, Shape a Circle Ever Wider: Liturgical Inculturation in the United States (Chicago, Ill., 2000). D. POWER, "Liturgy and Culture Revisited," Worship, 69 (1995): 225–243. A. SHORTER, Toward a Theology of Inculturation (Maryknoll 1988). R. SCHREITER, Constructing Local Theologies (Maryknoll 1985); The New Catholicity: Theology Between the Global and the Local (Maryknoll 1997). A. PEREZ, "The History of Hispanic Liturgy since 1965" in Hispanic Catholic Culture in the U.S.: Issues and Concerns, ed. J. P. DOLAN and A. F. DECK (Notre Dame 1994) 360–408. Articles cited here include: L. CHENGALIKAVIL, "Indigenous Liturgy: An Indian Perspective," in L'Adattamento culturale della liturgia: metodi e modelli, ed. I. SCICOLONE, Analecta Liturgica, 19 (Rome 1993) 205–221. CONGREGATION FOR DIVINE WORSHIP AND DISCIPLINE OF THE SACRAMENTS, "De Liturgia romana et inculturatione. Instructio quarta ad executionem Constitutionis Concilii Vaticani Secundi de Sacra Liturgia recte ordinandam (ad Const. art 37–40),” Notitiae, 30 (1994) 80–115. English trans. Inculturation of the Liturgy within the Roman Rite (Vatican City 1994). G. DE NAPOLI, “Inculturation as Communication,” Inculturation, 9 (1987) 71–98. M. D. LUTTIO, “The Chinese Rites Controversy (1603–1742): A Diachronic and Synchronic Approach,” Worship, 68 (1994) 290–312. K. RAHNER, “Toward a Fundamental Theological Interpretation of Vatican II,” Theological Studies, 40 (1979) 44–56. A. ROEST-CROLLIUS, “What’s So New About Inculturation? A Concept and its Implications,” Gregorianum, 59 (1978) 721–738. Lead Me, Guide Me: The African American Hymnal (Chicago 1987). In Spirit and Truth: Black Catholic Reflections on the Order of Mass, The Secretariat of the Bishop’s Committee on the Liturgy of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (Washington DC 1987). Plenty Good Room: The Spirit and Truth of African American Worship, statement of the Black Liturgy Subcommittee of the Committee on the Liturgy of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (Washington, D.C. 1990).

[R. E. MCCARRON]

INCULTURATION, THEOLOGY OF

The term “inculturation,” as applied to Christianity, denotes the presentation and re-expression of the Gospel in forms and terms proper to a culture. It results in the creative reinterpretation of both, without being unfaithful to either. Evangelization respects culture as part of the human phenomenon and as a human right. The manipulation or oppression of culture is, therefore, an abuse. Culture is a coherent system of meanings embodied in images and symbols that enables the individual to relate cognitively, emotionally, and behaviorally to the world and to communicate this understanding to others. It is the prism through which a human society views the whole of its experience, domestic, political, social, economic, and political. Culture is learned by the human being through socialization and is developed throughout life. It gives identity to a human group and controls its perception of reality. For the purposes of theology, it is at once more positive and more precise than the term “context.” Syncretism denotes an anomalous conflict of meaning when, in the process of evangelization, cultures “domesticate” the Gospel and distort its meaning. No culture is deemed to be unfaithfully Christian, since inculturation is a constant call to conversion and renewal.

Evangelization must enter into dialogue with cultures if it is to produce any effect on human beings. Cultures are empirically diverse; therefore, evangelization leads to culturally diverse ways of living the Gospel. Inculturation, opposed to uniformity, demands the legitimization of diversity. There can be no monopoly of cultural forms in a truly Catholic communion. This is true in spite of the mutual influence of evangelizing and evangelized cultures (“intercultural”) and of the accumulation by the Church of current, but contingent, cultural elements as an inherited patrimony. Until the realization in the 20th century that culture is a plural phenomenon, the Church took it for granted that there was a single, universal culture of humanity, the perfection of which was deemed to be Christianity in its western, Latin form. No allowance was made for factors of cultural diversity in theological controversy, and the Church was unable to accommodate the initiatives of early Jesuit missionaries, such as Mateo RICCI, Roberto de NOBILI, and Pedro Paez, when they tried to evangelize foreign cultures from within. In the 20th century, particularly at the Second VATICAN COUNCIL, and in the subsequent assemblies of the SYNOD OF BISHOPS, cultural pluralism has been accepted, together with inculturation as a demand of evangelization. However, an influential minority in the Church still claims that western culture possesses a universal significance for evangelization, in spite of its technocratic nature, its secularizing influence, and its tendency to undermine the religious values of indigenous cultures.

Christological Basis for Inculturation. Among the Christological bases for inculturation, the doctrine of the world-seeding LOGOS as God’s agent in creation goes back to JUSTIN MARTYR and the second century apologists, typified by CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA. It has reappeared in the missionary decree of the Second Vatican Council, Ad gentes, and in modern CREATION THEOLOGY. The Logos, the Divine Truth or Divine Reason, exists in disseminated form throughout creation, and every human tradition perceives it darkly, before it is enlightened for them by the proclamation of the Word incarnate. This proclamation does not outmode these traditions, but gladly recognizes the elements of truth they contain. Another Christological approach is the analogy with the incarnation of Jesus Christ and the parallel between his cultural education in Palestine and modern missionary evangelization. The parallel demonstrates that Christ is the subject of inculturation and that the incarnation inserted him into the intercultural dynamic of human history. However, it plays down the challenge that Christ offered to his own culture, and suggests that the Gospel, like the divine pre-existence, comes to a culture in a culturally disembodied form. The most fruitful Christological approach is to compare inculturation with the Paschal Mystery, to which it is linked causally as well as analogically. Through his passion, death and resurrection, Christ became universal Lord and made himself available to people of every culture. The Paschal Mystery also offers an analogy for the conversion of culture, which dies and rises under the impact of evangelization, thus becoming more authentic and more faithful to its underlying truth.

Ecclesiological Approaches to Inculturation. Ecclesiological approaches to inculturation include first the logic of the Church’s universal mission. That mission is the continuation of the missio Dei, God's loving dialogue with the world, and the fulfilment of the great commandment of universal love that is logically prior to the great commission to teach all nations. This love is a perfect communion of differences and, therefore, liberating. In this area the theology of inculturation encounters the theology of liberation. The second ecclesiological basis of inculturation is the authentic tradition of the Church and the role of the Church's magisterium. The primary reality of the Church is local: the particular church and the socio-cultural region within which its witness takes place. Its primary task is to reconcile local culture to the Church's tradition, which is centered on the interpretation of the Christ event. This interpretation is based on a trajectory of meaning that ascends to the outlooks of the New Testament. Sacred tradition, with its growth of insight, passes organically from culture to culture and from clarity to clarity throughout history. Although the Bible occupies a privileged position in this tradition, together with the sacramental and hierarchical ministry that derives from the actions and commands of Christ witnessed by the New Testament, and although the meaning of faith-statements made by the Church's magisterium is not open to contradiction, all these can only be understood today with reference to their historical and cultural contexts. Reformulation in accordance with the Church's lived cultural plurality is strictly necessary, if they are to be taken seriously.

The concept of inculturation seems to carry certain consequences for the shape of the Church to come, among them the abandonment of a preference for western culture and a greater diversification in Christian life and practice. The fields of inculturation include: theology, catechesis, liturgy, religious life, marriage and family life, health and healing, secondary ecclesial ministries and structures. Inculturation would therefore assume a relative pluralism in all these fields. Since inculturation cannot be imposed, but depends on the experience and initiatives of the local community, the concept seems to envisage ecclesial structures that favor increased participation and collaboration.

Bibliography: M. AMALADOSS, Beyond Inculturation: Can the Many Be One? (Delhi 1998). D.S. AMALORPAVADASS, "Theological reflections on inculturation" Studia Liturgica 20 (1990) 36–54 (Pt. I) and 116–136 (Pt. II). G. A. ARBUCKLE, Earthing the Gospel (London 1990). M. DHAVAMONY, Christian Theology of Inculturation (Rome 1997). A. E. SHORTER, Toward a Theology of Inculturation (New York 1992); Evangelization and Culture (London 1994). P.C. PHAN, "Contemporary Theology and Inculturation in the United States," in The Multicultural Church: A New Landscape in U.S. Theologies, ed. W. CENKNER (New York 1996) 109–130. J.A. SCHERER & S.B. BEVANS, eds., New Directions in Mission & Evangelization Vol 3: Faith and Culture (Maryknoll 1999).

[A. E. SHORTER]

INDEFECTIBILITY

The Church of Christ is like the house built upon rock that is able to withstand the storm and tempest (Mt 16.18; cf. 7.24–27). This is because Christ will be with His Apostles all days even to the end of the world (Mt 28.20). Their faith will not fail, and the Holy Spirit has been sent to them to lead them to all truth and to abide with them for ever (Jn 14.16, 26). The Church will remain until the end of time.

This indefectibility is a basic teaching of Scripture and is bound up with the notion of the Church as the new People of God and the final covenant between God and man. This does not mean that there will be no falling away from the Church on the part of individual members or even sections of the community. History witnesses to HERESY and SCHISM. At times these have reached alarming proportions, as was the case with Arianism and at the time of the Reformation. But despite these disasters the Church of Christ continued in existence. The scandal was that its presence was rendered less obvious to the unbelieving world. Neither is one to understand indefectibility as eliminating accidental change and REFORM. The Church lives in the world, and there is always need to speak to men in their own language; hence ACCOMMODATION as well as the progress of dogma. There is also need to eliminate abuse, which comes from the fact that members of the Church remain men, fallible and weak. But there can be no wholesale departure from the teaching of Christ: however much the future is veiled one does know that on the last day it will be the same Church that is finally taken up to heaven by Christ.

Since the rock on which the Church is built is PETER, indefectibility concerns the successor of Peter in a special way. It is the same indefectibility as that of the Church, but it resides in a special way in his successor, the bishop of Rome.

See Also: MIRACLE, MORAL (THE CHURCH); CHURCH, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church 8, 9, 12; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 11–14, 16–17; and passim. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–), Tables générales 1:1116. I. SALAVERRI, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. FATHERS OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS, PROFESSORS OF THE THEOLOGICAL FACULTIES IN SPAIN, 4 v. (Madrid), v. 1 (5th ed. 1962), v. 2 (3d ed. 1958), v. 3 (4th ed. 1961), v. 4 (4th ed. 1962); Bibliotheca de auctores cristianos 1.3:285–329.

[M. E. WILLIAMS]

INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS

The Index of Prohibited Books, Index Librorum Prohibitorum, established in 1557 by Pope PAUL IV, was a list of books that Catholics were prohibited from reading on pain of excommunication. The books were prohibited because they contained material considered dangerous or contrary to faith or morals. The Index of Prohibited Books was increasingly problematic from the time of the Enlightenment. It was the source of much criticism of the Church, both from within and outside the Church, and was abolished by Pope PAUL VI in 1966 because it was considered to be contrary to the teaching of VATICAN II concerning freedom of inquiry (Gaudium et spes, 62: “let it be recognized that all the faithful, clerical and lay, possess a lawful freedom of inquiry and thought.”).

History. The prohibition of books has a long history within the Church. The earliest instance is connected with the establishment of the canon of the Sacred Scriptures. The MURATORIAN CANON (c. A.D. 170) was an early determination of the authentic books of the New Testament that excluded others from liturgical usage. Theologically controversial books were also banned; for example, Pope Anastasius (d. 401) banned the works of ORIGEN. A decree issued by Pope Gelasius in 496 and published at a council in Rome has been called the first “Index of Prohibited Books.” The GELASIAN DECREE is divided into three parts: a list of authentic scriptural books, a number of recommended readings, and a list of apocryphal and heretical books.

From the fifth to the sixteenth century there were many specific decrees condemning individual works. The following are offered by way of example: in 548 Pope Vigilius condemned the “Three Chapters”; in 589 the Council of Toledo condemned books on Arianism; in 649 Pope Martin I forbade the writings of the Monothelites; in 745 Pope Zacharius condemned the books of Adalbertus and Clement; and in 869 Pope Adrian II burned the works of Photius. From this time until the reign of Pope Paul IV many particular books were condemned. The works of Scotus Erugina were proscribed in 855, those of the Joachim of Fiora in 1215, of Peter Jean Olivi in 1328, of John Wyclif and John Hus in 1415 and 1418. The invention of the printing press intensified concern for the censorship and prohibition of dangerous books. In 1469 Pope Innocent VIII decreed that all books were to be submitted to the local Church authorities for examination before being issued for general reading. Pope Leo X decreed similarly in 1515.

The Council of TRENT (1545–63) elaborated upon and codified the regulations of the Church concerning books. In the fourth session (April 8, 1546) the council drew up a decree in which, besides establishing the Vulgate as the authentic Bible to be used in public discussion, sermons, and so on, they prescribed that no books should be printed on religious matters without the approbation of the ecclesiastical authorities.

In 1557 Pope Paul IV entrusted the Congregation of the INQUISITION with the task of drawing up a complete catalog of forbidden books. This general index was ready in the same year but did not meet with the pope’s approval and was never published. The Congregation renewed its efforts and compiled a larger, more complete Index of Prohibited Books, which was published in January of 1559. This index of Pope Paul IV is the first general Roman Index ever published and the first list of forbidden books to carry the title “Index.”

The widespread dissatisfaction among Catholic leaders with Paul IV’s Index of Prohibited Books led the fathers of the Council of Trent to undertake its revision. The council was unable to accomplish this for lack of time and also because it would hinder Protestants from coming to the council. The revision of the index, therefore, was one of the council’s projects left to the Holy See for completion. The council fathers appointed a commission to revise the index. The labors of the commission came to fruition after the close of the council and were ratified by Pope Pius IV with a papal brief (March 24, 1564). This work is known as either the Tridentine Index or the Index of Pope Pius IV. It consisted of a list of forbidden books and included ten general norms that would regulate the censorship and reading of future books. The first nine of these regulations concerned published works that were automatically forbidden because they dealt with false or heretical teaching. The final rule restated previous norms for the examination and censorship of a work by local authorities prior to its formal publication.

By order of Pope SIXTUS V, an amended index was prepared and printed in 1590. In it the Tridentine rules were replaced by 22 new ones. This index was never published, however, because Pope Sixtus died before he could approve it, and his successors did not promulgate it.

A new index was ordered by Pope CLEMENT VII; it was completed in 1596 and promulgated by his Bull Sacrosanctum fidei. Pope ALEXANDER VII published another edition of the Index of Prohibited Books on March 5, 1664. This was the first papal index to list all books and authors alphabetically. From this time until the mid-eighteenth century, little of note occurred in Church legislation on book censorship and prohibition. Many books, especially Jansenistic ones, were forbidden, for example, the Provincial Letters of Pascal. The indexes published during this period were only new editions of the Tridentine Index with the addition of books condemned since the preceding editions.

Sollicita ac Provida, a major document in the Church’s legislation on forbidden books, was issued by Pope BENEDICT XIV on July 9, 1753. This constitution laid down detailed rules to be followed by the Congregation of the Holy Office and Index in the censorship and prohibition of books. Benedict XIV did not confine himself to laying down general rules; he also revised the index, freeing it from many typographical and other errors that had crept in over the centuries. On Dec. 23, 1757, he promulgated the revised index. From 1758 to 1897 all the indexes published were simply reprints of Benedict's edition, each adding works prohibited since the preceding edition.

Many of the fathers at the VATICAN COUNCIL I (1870) requested a revision of the entire index legislation. Unfortunately, the council adjourned before this matter could be discussed. Shortly thereafter, however, Pope LEO XIII took it upon himself to give the Church a new Index of Prohibited Books and legislation adapted to the changed and varied needs of the time. New general rules governing the censorship and prohibition of books were framed, and a revised and improved Index of Prohibited Books was published. The general norms were promulgated on Jan. 25, 1897, through the constitution Officiorum ac Munerum, and the new index was published through the brief Romani Pontificis on Sept. 17, 1900. The Leonine legislation on the censorship and prohibition of books suffered only slight changes as a result of the new general legislation of the 1917 Code of CANON LAW. Pope Leo's legislation was, in fact, embodied almost verbatim, though in a modified order, in canons 247.4, 1385 through 1405, and 2318 of the 1917 code.

