The Index of Prohibited Books compiled by Leo XIII underwent several later editions, the latest being in 1948, by which time there were more than 5,000 titles on the index. It gradually became the policy of the Church to restrict the number of books explicitly condemned and to depend on the general principles regarding the prohibition of books to guide the faithful in this matter. The growing scandal of the Index of Prohibited Books is indicated by the breath and quality of the books and authors proscribed: Descartes, Pascal, Bacon, Becqnel, Voltaire, Gibbon, Renan, Laménais, Hugo, Dumas père and fils, Comte, Zola, Loisy, Laberthonniere, Bergson, and Chenu. In the aftermath of the Modernist crisis, the bitter controversy that arose from the intensified effort to suppress open investigation and inquiry in theology, biblical studies, and philosophy drew attention to the appropriateness of the Index of Prohibited Books as part of the Church's apostolic mission within modernity. The use of, and the threat of the use of, the Index of Prohibited Books played a key role in the "silencing" of such theological figures as Marie-Dominique Chenu, Yves Congar, Henri de Lubac, Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, and Henri Bouillard that followed the publication of Humani Generis in 1950.

The Second Vatican Council reversed the "silencing" of these theologians. It is now known that Pope JOHN XXIII and Pope Paul VI were disturbed by the effort at theological retrogression. In 1959 Jean Steinmann's La Vie de Jesus had the dubious distinction of being the last work placed on the Index of Prohibited Books. As much later as spring of 1962, however, there was an attempt to place on the index Henri de Lubac's The Religious Thought of Teilhard. Pope John XXIII personally vetoed this attempt.

The purpose and effectiveness of the Index of Prohibited Books was re-evaluated at the time of Vatican II as part of a review of the role of the Holy Office. Cardinal Frings, archbishop of Cologne, intervened eloquently in the aula of Saint Peter's, pleading for a reform of the Holy Office that would include the Index of Prohibited Books. For his written draft, Frings was assisted by Fr. Joseph Ratzinger. Finally, in 1966, Cardinal Alfredo Ottaviani, the head of the newly named Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith, declared that there would be no more editions of the index; as such it remains only as a historical document.

Present Status. The 1983 Code of CANON LAW attempts to balance Vatican II's principle of freedom of inquiry (in Gaudium et spes, 62) and the Church's legitimate concern to protect its faithful from dangerous writings. Canons 822 to 832 in Book III of the 1983 Code (The Teaching Function of the Church, Title IV, Instruments of Social Communication and Books in Particular) deal with the prior censorship of a very narrow range of official or semi-official publications to which the imprimatur is now limited. These canons are subordinate to canons 211, and especially to 212, which states that "according to the knowledge, competence, and prestige which they possess, they [the faithful] have the right and at times the duty to manifest to the sacred pastors their opinion on matters which pertain to the good of the Church and to make their opinion known to the rest of the Christian faithful, without prejudice to the integrity of faith and morals, with reverence toward their pastors, and attentive to common advantage and the dignity of persons."

[D. DEE/D. P. SHERIDAN]

INDIA, CHRISTIANITY IN

After a brief overview of the history and culture of India, this entry surveys the history and present status of Christianity in that country, covering the three principal Christian communities: (1) the indigenous St. Thomas Christians, (2) the Latin Christians (Roman Catholics), and (3) the Protestant Christians.

Capital: New Delhi.

Size: 1,195,063 sq. miles.

Population: Over one billion in 2000. Indo-Aryans constitute approximately 70%, and Dravidians approx. 25%.

Languages: 325 spoken languages and 700 dialects; Hindi is the official national language, while English remains the second language recognized officially as the authoritative, legislative and juridical language. The Indian Constitution recognizes 18 regional languages: Assamese, Bengali, Gujarati, Hindi, Kannada, Kashmiri, Malayalam, Marathi, Oriya, Punjabi, Sanskrit, Tamil, Telugu, Urdu, Sindhi, Konkani, Manipuri and Nepali.

Religions: About 80% of Indians are adherents of Hinduism, 14% are Muslims, 2.5% are Christians, 2% Sikh, 0.7% are Buddhist, 0.5% are Jain, and 0.3% are tribal religionists, Baha'i, Ahmadiyyahs, Jews, and others. Roman Catholics constitute about 65% of Indian Christians, and slightly over 1% of India's total population. St. Thomas Christians (both Catholic and non-Catholic) comprise approximately 30% of Indian Christians, and slightly less than 1% of the population of India. The St. Thomas Christians are based mostly in Kerala, although there are growing diaspora communities in other parts of India. The remaining 5% of India's Christian population are mostly members of the two principal Protestant Churches—the Church of North India and the Church of South India, and the many small but active independent pentecostal churches. About 50% of Indian Christians belong to the lower classes, scheduled castes and scheduled tribes.

THE LAND, ITS PEOPLES AND RELIGIONS

Located in South Asia, the Indian subcontinent is surrounded by the Arabian Sea (west), the Bay of Bengal (east), the Indian Ocean (south) and the Himalayan mountains (north). It is home to the Indus Valley civilization (c. 2,500 B.C.), one of the oldest civilizations in the world. Aryan tribes from central Asia invaded the northwestern region of India around 1500 B.C., pushing the original inhabitants, the Dravidians, to the south. The invading Aryans and native Dravidians gradually intermingled, forming a composite culture and ethnicity. Arabs and Turkish Muslims came to India in the 8th and 12th century respectively. Muslim rulers governed a significant portion of India until the arrival of the European powers. Vasco da Gama led the first Portuguese expedition to India in 1498, paving the way for the colonization by the Portuguese, the Dutch, the French, and the British. The struggle for national independence gained momentum in the 20th century under the pacifist resistance movement of Mahatma Gandhi. The Indian subcontinent gained independence from Britain in 1947, but was partitioned into the secular nation of India and the Muslim nation of Pakistan. Present-day India is a federal republic with a Westminster-style parliamentary democracy within the British Commonwealth. The Indian Federation comprises 28 states and 6 union territories.

India is the birthplace of several world religions: HINDUISM, BUDDHISM, JAINISM and SIKHISM. It has welcomed other major religions, e.g., Christianity, Islam, Judaism and Zoroastrianism. Hinduism was originally the Vedic religion of the Aryans, but it absorbed many of the beliefs and practices of the native Dravidians. Buddhism and Jainism emerged in the 6th and 5th centuries B.C. respectively. Islam came to India with the Arab and Turkish invaders between the 8th and 12th centuries.

THE ST. THOMAS CHRISTIANS

This section describes the origins, history and present situation of the St. Thomas Christians in India, who trace the foundation of their community to St. THOMAS THE APOSTLE (Mar Thoma in Syriac).

Origins. According to an ancient South Indian oral tradition, St. Thomas, one of the 12 apostles, sailed to India and landed at Cranganore (Kodungalloor) on the coast of ancient Malabar (present-day Kerala) in the year 52 A.D. There he converted many high caste Hindus and established several Christian communities. He made his way to the Coromandel Coast on the eastern part of India and converted many before heading for China. After preaching the Gospel in China, he returned to Kerala and organized the Christian communities there and proceeded again to the Coromandel Coast where he was martyred. The Apostle of India was buried in Mylapore, close to Chennai (Madras). The early Christians built a pilgrimage shrine at his tomb.

No primary evidence of this ancient tradition exist today. Some scholars speculate that this ancient oral tradition was later recorded in the local languages and in Syriac, the ancient liturgical language of the Malabar Christians, before the manuscripts were lost or destroyed during the period of Portuguese rule. Some of these traditions are found in the ancient odes of Malabar, e.g., Rabban Pattu, Veeradiyan Pattu, and Margam Kali Pattu. The oldest written texts of these odes and other surviving accounts can only be traced back to the 17th century. The travel narratives of Cosmas Indicopleustes, an Egyptian who visited Arabia, East Africa and India around the year 530, as well as those of John of Monte Corvino (1292), and Jordan Catalani (1319) all record the mission of St. Thomas and early presence of Christians in India. The 16th and 17th century Portuguese documents are important sources of information on St. Thomas' mission to India, and the early history of the St. Thomas Christians. The Portuguese also visited the tomb of St. Thomas and made some excavations and recovered some relics in 1523.

Many church historians, including L. W. Brown, E. Tisserant, Placid Podipara, E. R. Hambye, and Mathias

Metropolitan Sees		Suffragans
Latin:
Agra	Ajmer-Jaipur, Allahabad, Bareilly, Jhansi, Lucknow, Meerut, Udaipur, Varanasi
Bangalore	Belgaum, Bellary, Chikmagalur, Karwar, Mangalore, Mysore, Shimoga
Bhopal	Ambikapur, Gwalior, Indore, Jabalpur, Khandwa, Raigarh, Raipur
Bombay	Ahmedabad, Baroda, Nashik, Poona, Vasai
Calcutta	Asansol, Bagdogra, Baruiপুর, Darjeeling, Jalpaiguri, Krishnagar, Raiganj
Cuttack-Bhubaneswar	Balasore, Berhampur, Rourkela, Sambalpur
Delhi	Jammu-Srinagar, Jullundur, Simla and Chandigarh
Guwahati	Bongaigaon, Dibrugarh, Diphu, Tezpur
Hyderabad	Cuddapah, Eluru, Guntur, Khammam, Kurnool, Nalgonda, Nellore, Srikakulam, Vijayawada, Visakhapatnam, Warangal
Imphal	Kohima
Madras and Mylapore	Coimbatore, Ootacamund, Vellore
Madurai	Kottar, Palayamkottai, Sivagangai, Tiruchirapalli, Tuticorin
Nagpur	Amravati, Aurangabad
Patna	Bettiah, Bhagalpur, Muzaffarpur, Purnea
Pondicherry and Cuddalore	Dharmapuri, Kumbakonam, Salem, Tanjore
Ranchi	Daltonganj, Dumka, Gumla, Hazaribag, Jamshedpur, Khunti, Port Blair, Simdega
Shillong	Agartala, Aizawl, Tura
Verapoly	Alleppey, Calicut, Cochin, Kannur, Kottapuram, Neyyattinkara, Punalur, Quilon, Trivandrum of the Latins, Vijayapuram
Goa and Damão are directly subject to the Holy See.
Syro-Malabar suffragans of Latin Metropolitan Sees:		Syro-Malabar Sees and Suffragans:
Archdioceses	Suffragans	Archdioceses	Suffragans
Agra	Bijnor, Gorakhpur	Changanacherry	Kanjirapally, Kottayam, Palai, Thuckalay
Bhopal	Jagdalpur, Sagar, Satna, Ujjain	Ernakulam-Angamaly	Kothamangalam
Bombay	Kalyan, Rajkot	Tellicherry	Belthangady, Mananthavady, Thamarasserry
Hyderabad	Adilabad	Trichur	Irinjalakuda, Palghat
Nagpur	Chanda
The Syro-Malankara Metropolitan See of Trivandrum has suffragans Battery, Marthandom, and Tiruvalla.

Mundadan, point out that although the Malabar traditions are replete with the stories and legends from the Apocryphal Acts of Judas Thomas, St. Thomas's mission in south India is not only a possibility, it has a firm historical foundation on the basis of the unbroken South Indian Christian tradition, the sustained consciousness of the Malabar Christians of their apostolic origin, the presence of the tomb of St. Thomas in Mylapore and other associated monuments, and on the basis of references of early Christian witnesses.

Morning prayers at a village Catholic school, India. (©Liba Taylor/CORBIS)

The historical relationship between the St. Thomas Christians and the East Syrian (Chaldean) Church in Persia from the earliest times is based on two historical events. The first event was the arrival in Cranganore (Kodungalloor) of a group of East-Syrian Christians led by a certain Knai Thomman (Thomas Kinayi) around the fourth century. It remains unclear whether he was a merchant, a traveler or a pilgrim, whether he came to assist the St. Thomas Christians who were facing a leadership crisis, or whether he was leading a group of Christians who fled their homeland to escape from persecution. The second event was the arrival of another such group of Christians from Persia along with their two Church leaders, Mar Sapor and Mar Prot, around the 9th century.

Though various stories and traditions exist around these two events, a few points are undisputed. First, the Persian Christians brought new vigor, leadership, and a new liturgical tradition, i.e., the East Syrian (Chaldean) tradition to the fledging St. Thomas Christian community. Second, the St. Thomas Christians warmly welcomed these Persian Christians and, according to the received tradition, the Kings of Kerala bestowed land and royal honors on them. Third, until the arrival of the Portuguese missionaries, the Persian Church exercised jurisdiction and oversight over the St. Thomas Christians. There is no evidence of any resistance or resentment against Persian ecclesiastical rule on the part of the St. Thomas Christians. On the contrary, during the Portuguese padroado rule (see PATRONATO REAL), the St. Thomas Christians appeared to yearn for Persian oversight. Fourth, there is an endogamous group among the St. Thomas Christians known as Southists (Thekkumbhagar) or the Knanaya community. Northists (Vadakkumbhagar) are said to be the ethnic St. Thomas Christian Indians, while the Southists are descendants of the emigrants from Persia led by Knai Thomman, who probably settled in the southern part of the Christian settlement.

The Church of Saint Sebastian, Kerala, southern India.
(©Charles & Josette Lenars/CORBIS)

Practices of the Early St. Thomas Christians.

Much of what is known about the lifestyle and practices of the early St. Thomas Christians comes from written Portuguese accounts from the 16th to the 18th centuries, in addition to the living oral tradition that has been handed down through successive generations. From these sources, the following picture emerges: The St. Thomas Christians appeared to have their own unique lifestyle and practices from the earliest days. They were able to integrate their Christian faith to the wider socio-cultural customs and practices which they shared with their Hindu neighbors. Historically, the St. Thomas Christians enjoyed high social status and many social, political and royal privileges in Kerala along with their upper-caste Hindu counterparts. They followed the customs of the nobility such as feeding a newborn with powdered gold mixed with honey, teaching children to write the letters of the alphabet for the first time with rice, ceremonial baths and other purification rituals, the marriage ritual of tying the tali (a gold ornament in the Hindu style, but with the marking of a cross on it) on the bride's neck and giving her a mantrakodi (bridal veil), as well as upper-caste funerary and death customs and rituals. During this period, the men of the St. Thomas Christian community pierced their ear-lobes, wore ornaments and styled their hair akin to the Hindus, but wore a cross on the tuft of hair. The St. Thomas Christians also practiced the rules of untouchability and pollution, with women living in separate quarters where they were specially protected. Churches were constructed according to the model of Hindu temples. While accepting and practicing Christian faith, they did not break away from their ancestral social-cultural traditions. Historians have described the pre-Portuguese St. Thomas Christians as "Hindu in culture, Christian in religion and Oriental in worship" (Placid Podipara).

Ecclesial structure and administration. The leadership and administration of the St. Thomas Christians combined East-Syrian ecclesial elements with indigenous Dravidian customs. The title of the Metropolitan was "Metropolitan and the Gate of All India," the word "gate" signifying sublime authority. The Metropolitans enjoyed quasi-Patriarchal authority. As Persian emissaries from the Chaldean Church, they were spiritual leaders who exercised the powers of holy orders, performing ordinations, blessings, and consecration of Churches as representatives of the Chaldean Patriarch. As the Metropolitans were foreigners who often did not speak the local dialects, the actual administration of the community lay in the hands of the archdeacon, who was always a native Dravidian. The position post of the archdeacon was also hereditary. Historically, the archdeacon was called the "Prince and Head of the Christian Community" and he was responsible for the whole community before the local king.

Another indigenous institution was the yogam or malankara yogam, which was the national assembly or synod of the whole Church and had the ultimate authority in dealing with all the matters of the Church. Lay and clerical representatives from all parishes were members of the yogam, presided over by the archdeacon. Similarly, all parishes had parish assemblies or palliyogams, which consisted of all the clergy and the heads of all of the families of the parish. The oldest priest in the parish presided over the palliyogam. The palliyogam has survived in present-day St. Thomas Christian communities. Both the yogam and palliyogam had real decision-making authority within the St. Thomas Christian community. On this basis, some historians regard the pre-Portuguese Church of St. Thomas in India as a Christian republic.

Christian-Hindu Relations. Before the arrival of the Portuguese missionaries, this ancient Church adopted a positive understanding of Hinduism, cultivating good relations with its Hindu neighbors in a spirit of communal harmony. The St. Thomas Christians held the view that “each one can be saved in his own law, all laws are right,” the term “law” referring to other religions. The Synod of DIAMPER condemned this idea as one of the many egregious errors of St. Thomas Christians. The same synod also condemned another view held by the St. Thomas Christians that they were following “the Law of Thomas” whereas the Portuguese were following “the Law of Peter.” What the St. Thomas Christians meant was not that they had two different faiths, but that each ecclesial community has its own ancient customs and sacred traditions which the other communities should respect. The Portuguese missionaries who came into contact with the St. Thomas Christians neither understood nor respected their customs and traditions. This resulted in conflict and schism within the St. Thomas Christian community.

An inauguration service at St. George's Cathedral marking the formation of the South India United Church, Oct. 6, 1947. (©Hulton Getty/Liaison Agency)

The Advent of Portuguese Missionaries. India had some contacts with Latin Christianity in the 13th and 14th centuries through European travelers: JOHN OF MONTE CORVINO visited in 1292, and Jordan Catalani visited in 1319. However, Latin Christianity was established in India only with the arrival of the Portuguese in the 15th century. Vasco da Gama, the Portuguese navigator, landed in Kozhikode, South India, in 1498. The local St. Thomas Christians gave an enthusiastic welcome to the powerful Portuguese fleet and the padroado missionaries who accompanied them.

As Portuguese missionaries came in greater numbers, they began to interfere in the affairs of the St. Thomas Christians. Attempts to control and latinize them began mainly with the establishment of a seminary in Metropolitan See of Cranganore (Kodungalloor) around 1550 by the Franciscan friar Vicente de Lagos during the episcopacy of Bishop Mar Jacob. All those who were trained in the seminary were formed in the Latin tradition and European cultural practices. With the death of Mar Jacob around 1552, Portuguese missionaries in collusion with the Portuguese political authorities began to block the arrival of Persian Metropolitans, seeking to bring the St. Thomas Christians completely under the jurisdiction of Portuguese Metropolitan of GOA. Occasionally, a few Persian bishops managed to undermine the Portuguese blockade: Mar Joseph and Mar Elias came in 1555, and Mar Abraham slipped into India on two occasions. In 1569 Mar Abraham took up residency in Angamaly, the metropolitan seat of the St. Thomas Christians, and ruled the St. Thomas Christians until his death in 1597. During his episcopacy, Jesuit missionaries introduced Latin ecclesial usages among the St. Thomas Christians, including priestly celibacy, confession before communion, burying the dead near the churches, and some feasts of the Latin calendar. In 1585, at the third Provincial Council of Goa, it was decreed that the Roman Pontifical and Sacramentary be translated into Syriac for the use of the St. Thomas Christians.

Church of Our Lady of the Assumption, St. Xavier's College, Palayakottai, Tirunelveli-2, India.

The death of Mar Abraham in 1597 marked a turning point in the history of the St. Thomas Christians. The Portuguese archbishop Alexis de Menezes of Goa arrived in Kerala, seeking to bring the St. Thomas Christians completely under the padroado jurisdiction. Mar Abraham had been already accused of heresy as he became estranged with the Jesuit missionaries. Archbishop Alexis de Menezes visited churches and ordained several priests in the Latin Rite. Despite fierce opposition from the archdeacon and the St. Thomas Christian community, Archbishop Menezes summoned a synod, which became known as the Synod of Diamper.

The Synod of Diamper. The Synod of Diamper was held in the parish church of Diamper (Udayamperoor) near Ernakulam, Kerala, in June of 1599. A total of 153 priests and 660 lay representatives attended the synod, as it was the custom of the yogam of the Malabar Church to include the laity. Many clergy refused to attend the synod as a mark of displeasure and protest against Menezes's interference. The official acts of the synod comprised the profession of faith and decrees on the sacraments, especially the Eucharist, corrections of "errors" in liturgical books, the reduction of the juridical status of the ancient metropolitan see of Angamaly to that of a Latin suffragan see under the padroado Metropolitan of Goa, and the expurgation of supposed errors in the customs and traditions of the St. Thomas Christians.

Menezes had prepared the decrees in Portuguese; they were translated into the vernacular and all attendees of the synod were forced to sign under duress and pain of excommunication. After the synod ended, Menezes stayed behind for several months, visiting parishes and implementing the synodal decrees. He also promulgated a decree that all who possessed Syriac books and manuscripts should hand over them to him on his visit under the threat of excommunication. Some of the books were corrected but many of them were burned by Menezes personally.

Many contemporary historians argue that the synod was invalid on the grounds that it was convoked without authority, it was not conducted in accordance with ecclesial canons, and it was never explicitly approved by Rome, which had merely authorized Archbishop Menezes to appoint a successor to Mar Abraham. Menezes never received authorization from Rome to convoke a synod to reform the ecclesial life and traditions of the St. Thomas Christians. The Portuguese Jesuit Francis Ros, Menezes's assistant who later became the first Latin bishop of Angamaly conceded that Menezes modified the synodal acts and unilaterally added new ones. In any event, the Synod of Diamper resulted in the latinization of the St. Thomas Christian communities. The synodal decrees condemned many of the ancient indigenous customs and traditions and latinized their Chaldean liturgy, prayers and devotions. It also resulted in the destruction of a significant number of valuable Syriac manuscripts and books on the suspicion of heresy. Historians are unanimous in concluding that the Synod of Diamper almost destroyed the identity of a unique and ancient church in India.

The Koonen Cross Oath. Resentment and violent reactions followed the Synod of Diamper. An outright rebellion occurred in 1653 during the episcopacy of the Jesuit archbishop of Goa, Francis Garcia. Bishop Attallah, a Syrian, was sent to Malabar by the Coptic Catholic Patriarch of Cairo at the request of the archdeacon of the St. Thomas Christians. Bishop Atallah reached Mylapore in 1653. But the Portuguese took him by force and shipped him to Goa. When the news spread that Atallah had arrived in the port city of Cochin on his way to Goa, many of the St. Thomas Christians gathered there. But they were denied permission to meet him, and a rumor soon spread that he had been drowned in the sea by the Portuguese. The angry and desperate Christians assembled before a cross (the "Koonen Cross") and swore that they would never submit to the authority of the Jesuit missionaries and never obey the archbishop of Goa. A few months later, many leading priests from among the St. Thomas Christians gathered at Alangad and consecrated Archdeacon Thomas as their bishop. This revolt of 1653 caused the tragic division among the St. Thomas Christians into two communities, those who maintained communion with bishop Garcia and the dissident group led by the archdeacon. Later in 1665 the dissident group received Mar Gregorios, a bishop from the Syrian (Jacobite) Patriarch of Antioch. As a result of their affiliation with the Syrian patriarchate, they became popularly known as the Jacobites.

Conflict and Confusion. Having realized the seriousness of the situation, the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF FAITH sent several Discalced Carmelites, with Joseph Sebastiani as the Apostolic Commissary, to Malabar to study the situation. They arrived in Malabar in 1657 and returned to Rome in 1658, and Sebastiani came back to Malabar in 1661 as the Vicar Apostolic. In 1663 the Dutch captured the area and expelled Sebastiani. Before leaving, Sebastiani managed to consecrate a local Indian priest, Chandy Parampil (Alexander de Campo) as the Vicar Apostolic. Things were starting to look better for the St. Thomas Christians, when the death of bishop Chandy plunged the situation back to chaos. The long period of 200 years from the death of bishop Chandy in 1687 until the establishment of separate dioceses for the St. Thomas Christians in 1887 was one of utter confusion and conflict in the history of the St. Thomas Christians. During this period several heads of the Jacobite communities expressed interest in entering into a communion with the Church of Rome. But the padroado missionaries and the bishops vehemently opposed all such endeavors. Around 1773, Joseph Cariattil and Thomas Paremakkal, two eminent priests and representatives of the St. Thomas Christian community, set out for Rome and Lisbon to inform Church authorities of the problems of their Church, to plead for steps to be taken toward the reunion of the Catholic and Jacobite wings of the St. Thomas Christians, and the restoration of the ancient Oriental ecclesial and liturgical traditions for the St. Thomas Christians. Their mission to Lisbon was somewhat successful. Cariattil was consecrated as the Archbishop of Cranganore (Kodungalloor) with the approval of Rome. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith vested Cariattil with the authority to receive Mar Thomas VI and the Jacobite community into communion with the Catholic Church. Upon returning, Archbishop Cariattil fell ill in Goa and died prematurely, scuttling all efforts at effecting a reunion.

Memoranda went to Rome and Lisbon from the St. Thomas Christians with repeated requests for their own bishops and permission to restore their ancient ecclesial and liturgical heritage. The most significant of these was the Angamaly Padiyola of 1787, drawn up by representatives from 84 St. Thomas Christian parishes and addressed to Rome, demanding their own bishops and listing the abuses of padroado clergy and foreign missionaries. But both the padroado ecclesial leadership and the Carmelite missionaries assigned to that region repeatedly overruled all their efforts to procure indigenous bishops or restore their ancient usages. Finally the St. Thomas Christians once again turned to the East Syrian Patriarchs for assistance. The Chaldean Catholic Patriarch Joseph Audo sent a bishop Thomas Rockos. Upon arrival in Cochin in 1861, he was ordered to leave immediately. He refused to do so, and was excommunicated by the Vicar Apostolic of Varapuzha. From 1861 until his return to Baghdad in 1862, his presence caused yet another schism. The same fate befell a second Catholic Chaldean bishop, Mar Elias Mellus, whom Patriarch Audo sent in 1874. As Rome took strong action against the patriarch, Mellus was recalled home. The Syrian Christians of the Assyrian Church of India, popularly known as the Surais, who are in communion with the ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST, are the descendants of those St. Thomas Christians in the Trichur (Thrissur) region who broke away and rallied around Mar Mellus.

Restoration of Autonomy. The Chaldean Catholic Patriarch's interventions alerted Rome to the long-simmering dissatisfaction of the St. Thomas Christians. In 1887 Pope LEO XIII agreed to remove the St. Thomas Christians from the jurisdiction of the Latin bishops. Two Syro-Malabar vicariates in Trichur (Thrissur) and Kottayam were erected. To the disappointment of the St. Thomas Christians, the two vicars apostolic who were appointed—Adolf Medlycott and Charles LeVigne—were foreigners. The struggles of the St. Thomas Christians for autonomy came to fruition in 1896, when Rome established three vicariates apostolic with local Indian bishops: Thrissur, with bishop John Menacherry, Ernakulam, with bishop Louis Pazheparampil, and Changanacherry with bishop Mathew Makil. In 1911, a fourth vicariate apostolic at Kottayam was erected for the endogamous Knanaya community.

Today, the St. Thomas Christians no longer form one church, but are found within the Catholic, Syrian Oriental Orthodox, East Syrian (Assyrian) and reformed traditions, in eight separate ecclesial entities:

1. The Syro-Malabar Catholic Church. The largest St. Thomas Christian community which is in communion with the Church of Rome, with an ecclesial heritage that combines aspects of Indian, Syrian and Latin Christian traditions and customs. It is based mainly in Kerala, India, but has large diasporic communities in India and throughout the world, especially in the United States. It has a flourishing church life, with many clerical and religious vocations, and numerous missionaries working in the Latin dioceses of India and other parts of the world, especially in Africa, Europe and the Americas. In 1911 a new diocese was erected for the Knanaya community Kottayam. In 1923 Pope PIUS XI established a full-fledged Syro-Malabar hierarchy for the St. Thomas Christians. On Dec. 16, 1992, by the decree Quae maiori, Pope JOHN PAUL II elevated the Syro-Malabar Church to a sui juris Major Archiepiscopal Church. As a major archiepiscopal church, the yogam of the Syro-Malabar Church has full and independent powers in all matters including the election of its leader, the major archbishop, an appointment which merely requires papal confirmation. A petition is pending before the Holy See for the elevation of the Syro-Malabar Church to patriarchal status. For specific aspects of the history, present situation and liturgy of the Syro-Malabar Church see SYRO-MALABAR CHURCH and SYRO-MALABAR LITURGY.

2. The Malankara (Indian) Orthodox Syrian Church (Methran Kakshi).

3. The Syrian Orthodox Jacobite Church (Bava Kakshi). The descendants of the first wave of St. Thomas Christians who broke away as a result of the Koonen Cross Revolt of 1653. Subsequently, they accepted the oversight of the Syrian (Jacobite) Patriarch of Antioch who required that they embrace West Syrian (Antiochene) customs and usages. As a result of their allegiance to the Syrian Jacobite Patriarch of Antioch, they are popularly known as Jacobites. After a prolonged period of factional fighting, internal conflicts and lawsuits on the question of allegiance to the Syrian Patriarch and control of church property which had erupted at the beginning of the 20th century and went all the way to the Indian Supreme Court, the Jacobite community permanently splintered into two: the Syrian Orthodox Jacobite Church (Bava Kakshi, i.e., the patriarch's party) and the Malankara (Indian) Orthodox Syrian Church (Methran Kakshi, i.e., the bishop's party). Historically, the patriarch's party supported the attempts of the Syrian (Jacobite) Patriarch of Antioch to assert greater control over the Jacobite community, while the bishop's party pressed the case for autocephaly. Repeated attempts to effect a union between these two churches have been inconclusive.

4. The Syro-Malankara Catholic Church (Reeth Sabha). The Syro-Malankara Catholic Church was formed in 1930 when a faction of the Jacobite community led by Mar Ivanios and Theophilus entered into communion with the See of Rome. They continue to practice all the liturgical usages and ecclesial traditions of the West Syrian (Antiochene) Church. For specific aspects of its history, present situation and liturgy, see SYRO-MALANKARA CHURCH and SYRO-MALANKARA LITURGY.

5. The Assyrian Church of India (Surais). This is another group of St. Thomas Christians that has had an independent existence from the days of Mar Mellus, who managed to gather a small group of St. Thomas Christians in Trichur (Thrissur). In 1952, they received a bishop from the Assyrian Church of the East (Persian), thereby restoring ancient ties to the Persian Patriarch. Since 1968, all their bishops have been ethnic Indians.

6. Malabar Independent Syrian Church of Thozhiyur. A very small group of independent St. Thomas Christians found mainly in Thozhiyur (Thozhiyoor) or Anjur. In 1772, Bishop Mar Kurilose Kattumangatt fled to Thozhiyur with his supporters when his episcopal consecration by a foreign prelate was not approved by Mar Dionysius I of the Jacobite community. Although it has maintained a sister-church relationship with the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar (see below) since 1948, it has not accepted the reformed (evangelical) theology of the Mar Thoma Church. Since 1989, it has cultivated close ecumenical ties with, and extended intercommunion to the Anglican communion.

7. The Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar (Marthomites). In the early 19th century, evangelical Anglican missionaries from the UK-based Church Missionary Society (CMS) came to the aid of the Jacobite community. Over time, the work of these missionaries led to conflicts, with detractors alleging that the Anglican missionaries wanted to implement a radical reform of ancient church traditions and practices. By the Synod of Mavelikkara in 1836, Metropolitan Chepat Mar Dionysius IV severed all the connections of the Jacobite community with the Anglican missionaries. However, a small reformist group led by Mar Abraham Malpan attempted to undertake radical reform within the Jacobite community. Excommunicated by Mar Dionysius, this reformist group reorganized itself as a distinct church that is the via media between the Oriental Orthodox and Reformed traditions. In full communion with the Church of South India since 1958, the Church of North India since 1972, and a full-fledged member of the worldwide Anglican communion, the Mar Thoma Church combines aspects of the St. Thomas Christian traditions and practices with the evangelical theology introduced by the CMS missionaries. The Mar Thoma Church believes that it is the true representative of the ancient Apostolic Church of St. Thomas and that the reform was only a purification of the Church.

8. St. Thomas Evangelical Church of India. This church originated as a splinter group from the Mar Thoma Church in 1961. Due to internal strife, members of this splinter group claimed that the evangelical principles of reform advocated by Mar Abraham Malpan could no longer be safeguarded in the Mar Thoma Church, and hence the need for a new Church.

LATIN CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA

Beginnings. The present Latin Christian (Roman Catholic) community in India had its origin in the work of the Portuguese padroado missionaries. The Franciscans comprised the first wave of missionaries. They arrived circa 1518 and worked in Goa, Bassein, Cochin, Quilon, and parts of Tamil Nadu, converting many Indians. Jesuit, Dominican and Augustinian missionaries followed the Franciscans, coming principally from Portugal, Spain and Italy. The early fruits of their labor resulted in the erection of the first Latin bishopric in Goa in 1534.

Around 1536, civil war broke out between the paravas (fisherfolk) and the Muslims in the Pearl Fishery coast region. The Portuguese came to the rescue of the paravas, resulting in a large number of paravas embracing Latin Christianity. The most successful missionary endeavor remains that of the Jesuit missionary St. Francis XAVIER, who arrived in Goa in 1542. Regarded as the "Apostle of Latin Christianity in India," Francis Xavier and his companions worked tirelessly in the regions of the Pearl Fishery coast, Coromandel coast, Goa, Bassein, and Bombay. He established seminaries in Quilon and Cochin and opened Jesuit houses in Cochin, Bassein, and Mylapore; schools were then opened in and around the main Portuguese settlements.

From the many Portuguese enclaves that dotted the coastal areas, the padroado missionaries gradually worked their way into the hinterland: Madurai (Robert De Nobili 1606), Trichinapoly, Dindigal, Tanjore, Hooghly, and parts of Bengal, Masulipatanam, Vizhakupatanam, and Golconda. At the invitation of the Moghul emperor Akbar, a few groups of Jesuits from Goa visited his court and were instrumental in establishing small Christian communities in Agra, Delhi, Lahore, Patna, Jaipur and Narwar. In 1558 Goa became an Archdiocese with Cochin and Melaka (in present-day Malaysia) as suffragans. Other suffragans were subsequently added: MACAU in China (1576), Funei in Japan (1588), Angamaly (1600, which was later moved to Kodungalloor in 1605), and Mylapore (1606). The Provincial Councils of Goa (1567, 1575, 1585, 1592, 1606 and 1894) played a significant role in the mission and life of the Latin Church during this period. The Portuguese crown and the rights given to them and their missionaries in Goa under the padroado system played a vital role in the success of the mission. The latter part of the 16th century witnessed the decline of the Portuguese mission in tandem with the decline of the Portuguese military power. The never-ending wars on land and sea between the Portuguese and the hostile Muslim rulers of India hindered the spread of the Gospel. The situation worsened in the 17th century when the rival Dutch and English colonial powers systematically wiped out the Portuguese presence, forcing the padroado missionaries to return to Portugal.

De Nobili and the Indian Rites Controversy. The 16th-century Portuguese missionary efforts succeeded only among the lower castes of the Hindu society. Following the same approach used in their Latin American mission colonies, the Portuguese missionaries required the newly baptized Indian neophytes to dress, eat, and behave like the Portuguese Christians, including taking Portuguese surnames. High caste Indians objected to these demands, labelling the neophytes “parangis” (detested foreigners) and treating them as outcasts. Realizing the need to attract the Brahmins, who comprised the high-caste Hindus, the Italian Jesuit missionary Robert de NOBILI established his mission in Madurai, a Brahmin stronghold. De Nobili made a distinction between Christian faith and European civic and cultural customs. He himself adopted the customs of the Brahmins, dressed, behaved and lived like a Brahmin monk. De Nobili’s approach was successful. He attracted many Brahmins of Madurai and its environs, and many embraced Christianity. But from the very beginning opinions regarding de Nobili’s approach were sharply divided among Nobili’s fellow Jesuits on one hand and the padroado authorities and Rome on the other. In many ways, de Nobili and his confrere in China, Matteo RICCI, were too advanced for their time. The debate continued for several years as opposition to de Nobili and his Jesuit colleagues mounted. Pope Benedict XIV, who had earlier condemned Ricci’s Chinese approach in 1742, also condemned de Nobili’s practices in 1744. As in China, missionaries to India were required to take an oath denouncing the practices that de Nobili had promoted. Such official disapproval negatively affected missionary outreach to high-caste Indians for a long time and led to the INDIAN RITES CONTROVERSY.

Tensions between Rome and Portugal. With the decline of Portuguese colonial power and its inability to protect its missionaries in the face of Dutch and English invaders, the Holy See began sending missionaries under the aegis of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Several vicariates apostolic were erected in India under the congregation: Bijapur (1637, which was shifted to Bombay in 1832), Verapoly (1659), Tibet-Hindustan (1808, later known as Agra), Calcutta, Madras, Colombo and Pondicherry (between 1834 and 1836). These vicariates were later divided, resulting in the creation of 14 new vicariates by 1882. These vicariates were normally outside the Portuguese territories, leading to a longstanding conflict and intense rivalry between the clergy of the padroado and the congregation. This conflict reached its climax during the Portuguese Revolution of 1834 with its resulting wave of anti-clericalism and severance of diplomatic relations with the Holy See. Responding to this crisis, in 1838 Pope GREGORY XVI withdrew Goa’s jurisdiction over its suffragan sees of Cochin, Kodungallor and Mylapore. This resulted in the so-called Goan or Indo-Portuguese Schism during which many padroado clergy disobeyed Rome. In 1886, a new concordat restored Goa’s jurisdiction over Cochin and Mylapore. The Latin Catholic hierarchy for India and Ceylon (now Sri Lanka) was also established in 1886 with eight ecclesiastical provinces, with 19 dioceses and 3 vicariates as the suffragan. After India regained its independence in 1947, the Indian government signed a concordat limiting the padroado jurisdiction to the Portuguese territory. Finally, the occupation of Goa by the Indian Government in 1961 terminated practically the last remnant of the padroado system.

Tribal and Dalit Communities. Two great assets of Latin Christianity in India are the dynamic and flourishing tribal and dalit Christian communities. Many of these communities, except the early Tamil Christians, embraced Christianity in the 19th and 20th centuries. They are found mostly in Bihar, Orissa, Andhra and Tamil Nadu. Among them, the Bettiah community of the Bihar is one of the oldest. It originated as the Capuchin mission in Bihar in 1703. In 1745, the Capuchin missionaries came at the invitation of the king of Bettiah and established a Christian community. The Jesuit mission in Bengal penetrated Bihar and Orissa. In 1880s there was a mass movement of conversions in Chotanagpur (Jharkhand) due to the work of Belgian Jesuit missionaries, particularly of Constant Lievens in the district of Ranchi. Christian tribals in the northeast region of India are another strong force. The Portuguese Jesuit missionaries reached Assam in 1626, and the mission in Assam was under the Vicariate of Calcutta from its establishment in 1834. The mission in the northeast flourished due to the work of several missionary groups, namely, the PARIS FOREIGN MISSION SOCIETY (1850), the Foreign Mission Society of Milan (1870), the German SALVATORIANS (1890), the JESUITS (1915–1922), and from 1922 onwards, the SALESIANS. The Latin Christian mission among the tribals, the dalits, and the lower classes of India was pivotal in their increasing political awareness and willingness to fight for justice. This has threatened the status quo and the power of the upper-caste Hindus and the landlords, resulting in increasing opposition to Christian mission activities from the latter part of the 20th century.

PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA

The Arrival of Protestant Missionaries. The first Protestant missionaries to India were two German Lutherans, Bartholomew Ziegenbalg and Henry Pleutschau, who were sent by King Frederick of Denmark in 1706. They landed in the Danish colony of Tranquebar, in the southeastern part of India. From Tranquebar, Protestant missionaries made their way to Madras, Trichy, Cuddalore, Tanjore and Tirunelveli. In 1806, the London Mission Society (LMS) of the Congregational Church sent a German Missionary, W. T. Ringeltaube, to work in the southern part of Travancore or South Kerala. Another pioneer was the English missionary of the Baptist Church, William Carey, who came to Calcutta in 1793 with Joshua Marshman and William Ward, settling in the Dutch colony of Serampore. The Serampore missionaries are well known for their educational, literary and social work. The Church Missionary Society (CMS) of the Anglicans began to send missionaries from 1813 onwards into the different parts of India. Benjamin Bailey, Henry Baker and Joseph Fenn were well-known CMS missionaries who worked in Kerala, especially for the reform of the Jacobite Christians. The Basel Mission Society, an ecumenical endeavor among Lutherans, the Calvinists, and the Anglicans began to send missionaries to India from 1834 onwards. Hermann Gundert and Samuel Hebrich were two of their outstanding missionaries.

Growth of Protestant Religions. The northeast tribal region of India where the large majority is now Christian is the great success story of the Protestant missions. The British Baptists from Serampore reached northeast India in 1813. The American Baptists began their mission in Assam 1836. The Welsh Presbyterians started in Cherapunji in 1841. Anglican missionaries of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL (SPG) came in the 1870s. Lutherans started to work in Tezpur in 1860. American Presbyterians arrived in and around Allahabad in 1832. American Methodists came to Lucknow and Allahabad in 1857. German Lutherans started their mission in Chotanagpur in the 1840s. Beginning in the 20th century, many independent reformed, evangelical and pentecostal churches came to India, including the SEVENTH DAY ADVENTISTS, SALVATION ARMY, and the Disciples of Christ.

Ecumenism, Consolidation and Union. The 20th century also witnessed the great ecumenical movement among the Protestant Churches in India. Realizing the enormity of the scandal of a divided Christianity, the missionaries and leaders of the Indian churches realized that unity was essential for the success of evangelization, and that the Indian people should not be divided by denominations which had originated in Europe's fractured history. Motivated by this ecumenical spirit, four Protestant denominations in southern India—the Anglicans, the Presbyterians, the Congregational Churches and the Methodists—united to form the Church of South India (CSI) in 1947. The Church of South India has an epis-pal system of governance as well as a common constitution and liturgy. In northern India, seven Protestant denominations—the Anglicans, the Presbyterians, the Congregational Churches, the Methodists, the Baptists, the Disciples of Christ, and the Brethren—united to form the Church of North India (CNI) in 1970. However, the powerful American Baptist Churches in the northeast and in Andhra, the American Methodist Churches in the north and south, and the Lutheran Churches in India did not join in the union. The Lutheran Churches in India have united under the umbrella of the United Evangelical Lutheran Churches in India.

Contributions. Protestant missionaries in India made tremendous contributions in the areas of education, health care, social transformation and literature. In the past, the Protestant Churches in India were conservative and remained visibly foreign as they were controlled by the overseas mission boards. During the latter part of the 20th century, most of the Protestant Churches in India became fully independent with their own personnel, structures and programs of inculturation.

PRESENT-DAY SITUATION OF CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA

Relations between Latin and Eastern Catholic Churches. The Catholic Church in India is a communion of three particular churches: (1) the Latin Church, (2) the Syro-Malabar Church, and (3) the Syro-Malankara Church. The Catholic Bishops Conference of India (CBCI) was established as the assembly of all the Catholic bishops of India in 1944. In view of the juridical status which VATICAN COUNCIL II gave to bishops conferences (Christus Dominus, 37), the CBCI revised its statutes in 1966 in accordance with the conciliar documents. With the promulgation of the new Codes of Canon Law for the Latins (1983) and the Orientals (1990), sui juris Catholic Churches are legally entitled to separate episcopal bodies and synods. In compliance with Pope John Paul II's 1987 letter to the Indian Catholic bishops, three separate episcopal bodies for the three particular Catholic Churches were created in 1988. However, the CBCI continues to exist and function as an umbrella organization for all three particular churches.

Relations between the three particular Catholic churches are by and large cordial, although two problematic areas remain. The first concerns the pastoral care of the emigrants from the Syro-Malabar and Syro-Malankara churches who are in the Latin territories. The directive of Vatican II that bishops and clergy from their own churches should be responsible for the pastoral care of these emigrants (Christus Dominus, 23) have not been implemented in India. Second, the two Oriental Catholic churches in India are restricted to their ancient historical territory of Kerala and cannot undertake evangelization in Latin territories outside that state. However, the Latin church is not bound to such jurisdictional limitation; Latin missionaries can work freely in Kerala. The Oriental churches resent this jurisdictional limitation and have petitioned to the Holy See for the freedom to undertake evangelization and pastoral care of emigrants outside of Kerala. As an interim solution, Rome entrusted recently created dioceses in central and north India to the Syro-Malabar Church. This does not fully satisfy the demands of the Oriental Catholic churches who are requesting removal of all restrictions on their evangelizing mission in India.

Protestant Christianity. The Protestant churches in India have a common ecumenical forum called the National Council of Churches in India (NCCI), which had its origin in 1914. The NCCI brings together most of the Protestant churches and organizations in India for mutual consultation, assistance and action in all matters related to the life and witness of the churches. Since 1979, its headquarters is located at Nagpur.

Ecumenical Ties. Although the three particular Catholic churches in India are not members of the NCCI, there is some collaboration between the NCCI and CBCI, especially on national and social issues. Together, they have organized common consultations and programs. After the year 2000, new initiatives were undertaken to explore the possibility for the Catholic Churches to join the NCCI or to create an alternative ecumenical structure that would encompass both the NCCI and CBCI. The Commission for Ecumenism of the CBCI contributed to the discussion with its Guidelines for Ecumenism: Towards an Ecumenical Life-Style (2000), which incorporates the doctrinal and theological insights of Vatican II and the Directory on Ecumenism.

Catholic Religious Orders and Congregations. Many European-based religious orders came and established communities in the different parts of India. The Franciscans, the Dominicans, the Jesuits, the Capuchins and the Carmelites were among the early wave, arriving in India during the Portuguese period. There are many indigenous Indian religious congregations, of which the first was the Carmelites of Mary Immaculate (CMI) founded by Kuriakose Elias CHAVARA in 1831. The two largest congregations for women are the Congregation of the Mother of Carmel (CMC), also founded by Chavara, and the Franciscan Clarist Congregation (FCC). Many of these religious congregations are engaged in education, running elementary and high schools, colleges, universities and theological institutes, technical schools and vocational institutes, and adult education and literacy centers for women and other marginalized and underprivileged groups. Other religious orders operate healthcare facilities such as hospitals and clinics, orphanages, hospices, halfway houses and nursing homes, and media and communication.

Indian Christian Theological Trends. In Indian Christian theological thinking three different approaches or trends can be identified. The first is the classical philosophical-theological approach where attempts are made to articulate and interpret Christian faith in the classical Indian cultural, philosophical and religious categories of the Vedas, Upanishads, Puranas and their underlying philosophical systems. The second trend focuses on the socio-political realities and problems and responds to them in the light of the Gospel. The third trend is a spiritual-contemplative approach, which emphasizes the Indian spirituality and interiority. Indian theologians have tread new paths in the areas of christology, missiology, interreligious dialogue, and theology of religions. This has borne fruit in the articulation of christologies in the Vedanta and Advaita traditions, missiologies that are centered on the Kingdom of God, and theologies of religions which focus on the Harmony and Mystery of God. While many Indian theologians are gaining wide recognition for their insightful analyses and theological explorations, a few have become targets of criticism and even censure for the radical nature of their theologizing.

The Indian Christian Ashram movement and the emergence of numerous Dialogue Centers in the different parts of the country in the 20th century may be associated with the third trend, although not exclusively. The word “ashram” comes from the Sanskrit root “a + srama” which means total dedication, total pursuit, or ardent striving. The ashram is a place of work and pursuit, physical, mental and spiritual. It is a community of spiritual seekers who are gathered around an enlightened person known as a guru. Some of the pioneers of the Christian Ashram movement were S. Jesudasan (Thiruppattur), Murray Rogers (Bareilly), Monchanin and Bede Griffiths (Kulithalai), Francis Acharya (Kurisumala), Sr. Vandana (Rishikesh), and Amalorpavadass (Mysore).

Inculturation. Vatican II’s call to all Christian communities to inculturate the faith in their actual socio-cultural milieu (Lumen Gentium 10, Ad Gentes 22), and to enter into dialogue with people of all faiths (Nostra Aetate) encouraged the Indian Catholic bishops to explore new avenues of inculturation and dialogue. In 1969, Rome gave permission for Indian Catholics to adopt certain Indian cultural elements and ritual gestures in the celebration of the Eucharist in the “12-Point Statement.” The Catholic bishops established the National Biblical, Catechetical, and Liturgical Center (NBCLC) in Bangalore to supervise and coordinate efforts at inculturation. Various attempts were made for the inculturation of liturgy and prayers at the National Center and at other theological centers like Dharmaram College, Bangalore, and at various Indian Christian Ashrams. An Indian Order of Mass and an Indian Anaphora were prepared by the NBCLC. The CBCI approved the Order of the Mass. The Indian Anaphora underwent several rounds of experimentation and revision before the Latin Bishops Conference (CCBI-Latin Rite) approved it in 1992 and forwarded it to the Holy See for approval.

Christian-Hindu Dialogue. Early Christian missionaries never had a genuine encounter with Hinduism and other Indian religions. What they did at the most was to translate the Christian faith into the various Indian languages. The emergence of a national consciousness and the cultural awakening as a result of the 19th-century Indian Renaissance movement led several missionaries and Indian Christian thinkers to engage in a serious dialogue with the Indian religions, cultures and philosophies, and to explore new paths of Indian theology. In 1875, K. M. Banerjee argued that Christianity, far from being a foreign religion, was the fulfillment of Hinduism (Arian Witness 8). For Brahmabandhav Upadhyaya (1861–1907), one could be Hindu and Christian at the same time, Hindu by cultural and religious traditions and Christian by faith in Christ. Sadhu Sunder Singh (1889–1929) was a great Christian mystic who eschewed all Christian denominations, proposing a Church of the sadhu ideal. Other pioneers of indigenous Christianity and Indian theology were K. C. Sen (1838–1884), who proposed the Navavidhan, the Church of New Dispensation; Nehemiah Goreh (1825–1895), who saw Hinduism as preparatio evangelica; A. J. Appasamy (1891–1976), who propounded the idea of Bhakti Marga and Yogic vision; P. Chenchaiiah (1886–1959), who is known for his theology of New Creation; V. Chakkarai (1880–1958) who articulated an Indian Christology of the Spirit; and P. D. Devanandan (1901–1962) and M. M. Thomas (1916–1995) who both advocated a renewed Christian humanism in India and a servant church task with transforming the Indian society.

While most the pioneers of the 19th century were Protestants, some of the outstanding 20th-century theologians and thinkers were Catholics. Among them, Bede GRIFFITHS (1906–1993) held the idea of Christian Advaita; D.S. Amalorpavadas (1932–1990) emphasized a new evangelization and inculturation; Sebastian Kappen (1924–1993), articulated an Indian theology of liberation; Raimundo Panikkar (1918– ) contributed to a cosmotheandric vision of reality, cross-cultural theologizing and to a theology of religions and dialogue; and Felix Wilfred and Michael Amaladoss (1936–), both of whom have articulated new theological paths for mission and liberation in India, inculturation, religious pluralism and interreligious dialogue.

THE IMPACT OF CHRISTIANITY ON INDIAN SOCIETY AND CULTURE

Some of the best dictionaries and grammars in many Indian languages were written by missionaries who were great scholars as well. Many Indian tribal languages were oral languages devoid of alphabets and script. It was the missionaries who mastered these languages and provided them script and grammar. The Serampore missionaries were well known for their study of tribal and popular cultures and languages, which became instrumental for their modernization and dynamic growth. Some of the best studies on Indian history, religions, philosophy, culture, art, architecture and music were written by the foreign missionaries.

It was the western education introduced by the Christian missionaries and later by the British administration that laid the foundation for the modern Indian society and culture. Alexander Duff, a Presbyterian pastor, was the first person to introduce the British system of higher education in India in 1835. Education was the basis for all the other changes. Modern scientific education gradually eliminated the superstitious and mythical worldviews and paved the way for rapid scientific, technological and material progress. It also resulted in new interpretations of the religious traditions, scriptures and myths. Through schools and colleges, Christian missionaries contributed substantially to the awakening of the Indian masses who were mostly uneducated, poor, exploited, and oppressed by the caste system. Opposition to the Christian mission in India in the latter part of the 20th and early 21st centuries came about not just because of religious differences, but also because the Christian missionaries' promotion of education threatened the economic, social and political power of the upper castes and the established dominant groups.

It was in constant encounter with Christianity that the Hindu Renaissance movement led by Ram Mohan Roy, Swami Vivekananda, Rabindranath Tagore, Mahatma Gandhi, and Radhakrishnan sought to integrate into Hinduism and Indian culture the values of human person, sound moral and ethical principles, community solidarity irrespective of caste and sex, a sense of history as a project for human action and creativity, and social transformation of Indian society to embrace the ideals of freedom, justice and equality. These Hindu reformers rejected the traditional understanding of human history in terms of inevitable fate or as the consequence of the past karma and condemned social evils like child marriage, sati (the custom of forcing widows to immolate themselves on the funeral pyre of their husbands) and the caste system as inhuman.

SAINTS AND SAGES

India is known as a land of Sages, Saints and Gurus. Sanyasa or religious life both in communities and as solitary monks is part of India's ancient tradition. Christian priestly and religious life is very much esteemed in India, and the Indian Church is blessed with an abundance of priestly and religious vocations. The saints and sages of the Indian churches are numerous, beginning with the Apostle St. Thomas and St. Francis Xavier. St. Gonsalo Garcia (1557–1597), born in Vasai, became a Franciscan and a missionary to Japan, where he was martyred in 1597. He was declared a saint in 1862 by Pius IX. St. John de Britto (1647–1693), born in Lisbon, became a Jesuit and went to India in 1673. He was martyred near Madurai, and was canonized by Pius XII in 1947. Kuriakose Elias Chavara, the founder of the Congregation of Mary Immaculate (CMI) for men and the Congregation of the Mother of Carmel (CMC) for women, was a Kerala native who became a great leader and reformer of the Syro-Malabar Church, a preacher, poet and educator. He was declared blessed in 1986 by John Paul II. Sister Alphonsa (1910–1946), born in Kerala, became a Franciscan Clarist nun but died young after a prolonged period of suffering and illness. She was beatified along with Kuriakose Elias Chavara by Pope John Paul II in 1986 during his visit to Kerala. Joseph Vaz (1651–1711), born in Goa, became a priest and went to Sri Lanka as a missionary and died there. He was beatified in 1997. Rudolf ACQUAVIVA (1550–1583), born in Italy, became a Jesuit priest, came to India in 1578, was invited as a scholar to the Mugal Emperor Akbar's court, was martyred in Goa along with four others, and was beatified in 1893.

Among those who were declared venerable are one bishop, two sisters and two priests: Bishop Hartmann Anastasius (1803–1866), Sr. Mary of the Passion (1839–1904), Sr. Mariam Thresia (1876–1926), Fr. Aurelian OCD (1887–1963), and Fr. Agnel D'Souza (1869–1927). There are many other clergy and religious whose sanctity have been publicly acclaimed, even if they have not been officially canonized or beatified: Bishop Melchior de Marion Bresillac (1813–1859), Sr. Mary Veronica (1823–1906), Fr. Mathew Kadalikkattil (1872–1935), Bishop Thomas Kurialacherry (1873–1925), Sr. Euphrasia CMC (1877–1952), Fr. Zacharias OCD (1887–1957), Fr. Augustine Thevarparampil (1891–1973), Bishop Stephen Fernando SDB (1895–1978), Fr. Francis Convertini SDB (1898–1976), Bishop Mathew Kavukatt (1904–1969), and the world-renowned MOTHER TERESA (1910–1997), the apostle of the poor and the unwanted. Three laymen were noted for their holiness: Devasagayam Pillai (1712–1752), Thommachan Puthenparampil (1836–1908) and Joseph Thambay (1882–1945).

It is not possible to list here all the names of the saints and sages from the other churches in India. Five holy metropolitans from the Syrian Orthodox churches may be mentioned: St. Baselius Yeldho (1593–1685), St. Ignatius Elias III (1867–1932), St. Mar Gregorios of Parumala (1848–1902), Sleebea Mar Osthathiose (1854–1930), and Mar Gregoriose Abdul Jaleel (d. 1681).

Bibliography: J. AERTHAYIL, The Spiritual Heritage of St. Thomas Christians (Bangalore 2001). D.S. AMALORPAVADASS, ed., The Indian Church in the Struggle for a New Society (Bangalore 1981). R. BOYD, An Introduction to Indian Christian Theology (Delhi 1991). L. BROWN, The Indian Christians of St. Thomas (Cambridge, England 1982). CBCI Commission for Ecumenism. Guidelines for Ecumenism: Towards a New Ecumenical Lifestyle (New Delhi 2000). CBCI Evaluation Committee. CBCI Evaluation Report: The Catholic Bishops Conference of India—Retrospect and Prospectus (New Delhi 1995). J.C. ENGLAND, The Hidden History of Christianity in Asia (Delhi 1996). History of Christianity in India, 5 v. (Bangalore 1982–97) K. KUNNUMPURAM, et al., eds., The Church in India in Search of a New Identity (Bangalore 1997). S.H. MOFFETT, A History of Christianity in Asia, v1, Beginnings to 1500, 2d rev. ed. (Maryknoll, NY 1998). A. MOOKENTHOTTAM, Indian Theological Tendencies (Frankfurt 1978). A. M. MUNDADAN, Indian Christians: Search for Identity and Struggle for Autonomy (Bangalore 1984); Paths of Indian Theology (Bangalore 1998). J. PANTHAPLAMTHOTTIYIL, ed., Indian Christian Directory (Kottayam 2000). K. PATHIL, Indian Churches at the Crossroads (Bangalore 1995). K. PATHIL, ed., Mission in India Today: The Task of St. Thomas Christians (Bangalore 1988); Religious Pluralism: An Indian Christian Perspective (Delhi 1991). T.V. PHILIP, East of the Euphrates: Early Christianity in Asia (Delhi 1998). P. PUTHANANGADY, ed., Towards an Indian Theology of Liberation (Bangalore 1986). J. PUTHENKALAM, and A. MAMPRA, Sanctity in India (Yercaud 2000). S. J. SAMARTHA, One Christ, Many Religions: Towards a Revised Christology (Maryknoll, NY 1994). J. THALIATH, The Synod of Diamper (Bangalore 1999). M. M. THOMAS, The Acknowledged Christ of Indian Renaissance (Madras 1976). B. VADAKKEKARA, Origin of India's St. Thomas Christians: A Historiographical Critique (Delhi 1995). G. VAN LEEUWEN, Searching for an Indian Ecclesiology (Bangalore 1984). F. WILFRED, Beyond Settled Foundations: The Journey of Indian Theology (Madras 1993).

[K. PATHIL]

INDIAN PHILOSOPHY

Philosophy in India consists not only in an understanding of the meaning of ultimate reality but also in the actual realization of this truth in one's life and conduct. Indian philosophy is concerned with what it considers the highest of human values, that is, the realization of liberation from the cycle of rebirths. The various philosophical daranas (visions of truth) are different paths that lead to the mystical life in order to bring about this liberation. Thus philosophy in India is an integral part of religion. The systems of Indian philosophy are classified into two groups: the orthodox (astika), which accepts the authority of the VEDAS, and the heterodox (nāstika), which does not. To the first group belong the six systems (see below), whereas the schools of the Cārvākas (materialists), the Buddhists, and the Jains belong to the heterodox group. Of the orthodox schools only the Vedānta survives in contemporary Indian philosophy.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

The essential growth of the philosophy of India occurred in four major phases known as the Vedic period, the Upanishads, the period of the Epic, and that of the six systems. After this, variations of the last of the six systems, the Vedānta, concludes the development.

Vedic Period (1500–1000 B.C.). The Vedas, the earliest source of Indian philosophy, inculcated a naturalistic polytheism and a sacrificial ritualism. Later hymns show the beginnings of a metaphysical quest for the One and Ultimate Reality. At first, the new names for the One Supreme, though more abstract, were still personal: Prajāpati, Viśvakarma, etc. In the Brāhmaṇas a philosophical monism traced the world to a single dynamic and self-evolving primordial principal, aditi, (the Infinite), kāla (Time), and particularly tat ekam (That One).

Upanishads (700–600 B.C.). The prevailing view of the Upanishads alternated between an undefined pantheism and a pure monism. Brahman was considered the ultimate principle that spontaneously manifests itself as the Universe. This single reality was conceived to be spiritual in nature and all else was explained as existing in and through it. Ātman was regarded as the inner essence of man or the true self that knows but can never be known; although it can be intuitively realized, it cannot be made an object of thought. The identification of these two concepts of Ātman and Brahman constitutes the essential teaching of the Upanishads, represented by the expressions Tat tvam asi (That thou art) and Aham Brahmāsmi (I am Brahman). The spiritual and unitary character of this absolute reality is itself expressed as saccidananda (Being-Consciousness-Bliss). Several passages of the Upanishads teach that the world is but an appearance and that it has no actual place in ultimate reality; several others grant reality to the world, though not conceiving it as apart from Brahman. The goal of life is to overcome the congenital ignorance of the nature of true self and of the ultimate reality by attaining jñāna (full enlightenment); the enlightened state is called mokṣa (release), which consists of attaining one's true self-identity with Brahman.

Epic Period (200 B.C.–200 A.D.). In this period not only did the different currents of Vedic thought flourish but new and important schools of philosophy and religion, such as Jainism and Buddhism, emerged. The Bha- gavad Gītā (Song of the Adorable) is monotheistic; Kṛṣṇa, the eternal Lord, is a personal God. His transcendent personality commands the whole religious orientation of the poem, as does his universal immanence; on both of which are founded the doctrine of avatāra (incarnation) and the personal relations between Kṛṣṇa and his devotees. At the same time, the Gītā, heir to the Upanishads, reflected difficulty in reconciling theistic religion with philosophy; on this account it is semipanthistic.

Six Systems (A.D. 100–400). The six systems are comprised of (1) the Nyāya founded by Gotama; (2) the Vaiśeṣika, by Kanāda; (3) the Śāṅkhya, by Kapila; (4) the Yoga, by Pantañjali; (5) the Mīmāṃsā by Jaimini; and (6) the Vedānta by Bādarāyaṇa.

Nyāya and Vaiśeṣika (A.D. 100–300). The Nyāya, an analytical inquiry into all the objects of human knowledge, uses the canons of formal logic. It accepts the metaphysics of the Vaiśeṣika (discrimination), which classifies the objects of experience under logical categories and attributes the origin of the world to atoms. This combined system is dualistic because it posits the existence of eternal atoms, together with eternal souls or with the Supreme Soul of the universe.

Śāṅkhya (A.D. 350). The Śāṅkhya (synthetic enumeration) is dualistic, for it argues that impure matter can never originate from pure spirit and that something cannot be produced from nothing. Prakṛiti is the original primordial tattva (eternally existing substance), which is made up of three constituent guṇas (qualities/principles): satva (purity and goodness), rajas (activity and passion) and tamas (inertia and darkness). These make up the whole world of the senses, evolved from prakṛiti in varying proportions. In the case of man, they make him divine and noble, human and selfish, or bestial and ignorant, respectively, according to the predominance of the corresponding guṇas. The 24 entities (tattvas), all evolving from primordial prakṛiti as cream out of milk, are distinguished from a 25th, puruṣa, the spirit that is by itself destitute of the guṇas of prakṛiti but liable to be bound by them.

Prakṛiti evolves only for the sake of the puruṣa and comes into union with puruṣa like a crystal vase with a flower, entrapping the soul, which is “spirit” in its nature within the framework of the body, which is like material. This “unnatural association” of the soul with the body is the state of bondage in Śāṅkhya leading to the continued entrapment of soul in an apparently never ending cycle of birth-death-rebirth (samsāra). The goal of Śāṅkhya, like the other six systems of philosophy, is to gain freedom from samsāra and this consists in gaining the knowledge of the 24 principles of prakṛiti, and rightly discriminating the domains of puruṣa and prakṛiti, which are totally different from, and opposed to one another. It is through such discriminate knowledge that one attains the ultimate state of freedom (mokṣa).

Obviously, the pure Śāṅkhya is more atheistic than the pure Nyāya for if the creation produced by prakṛiti has an independent existence of its own, without any connection with the particular puruṣa to which it is joined, there can be no need of an intelligent creator of the world or even of a superintending power.

Yoga (A.D. 300). The Yoga (union) aims at proposing the means by which the human soul may attain complete union with the universal soul. This union can be effected even in the body by the constant habit of keeping the mind in its unmodified state and by the practice of complete suppression of passions. The last condition of suppression of all action is to be achieved only by meditation on the supreme Being, who is a spirit unaffected by works, having for one of his appellations the mystical monosyllable "Om." Indeed, the repetition of "Om" is supposed to be efficacious in giving knowledge of the Supreme and in preventing obstacles to Yoga.

Mīmāṃsā (A.D. 150–200). The Mīmāṃsā (reflection) attempts to solve the doubts regarding Vedic texts caused by the discordant explanations of opposite schools. Its topics are arranged according to particular categories such as authoritativeness, indirect precept, etc., and are treated according to a logical method. It does not deny a god, but the tendency of its teaching is to grant authority neither to reason nor to God. The Veda is practically the only God. The whole aim of philosophy is to know dharma (duty), which consists in the performance of the rites and sacrifices prescribed by the Veda without reference to the will of a personal God; dharma is itself regarded as the bestower of rewards.

Vedānta (A.D. 600–650). The Vedānta (end of Veda) conforms more closely than any other system to the teachings of the Upanishads.

The short aphorisms of the Vedānta (Vedānta Sūtra) are unintelligible by themselves and for this reason have given rise to many different systems, both nondualistic and dualistic, that served to interpret its thought. We will look at the systems Śāṅkara, Rāmānuja, and Madhva, and the bhedābheda schools of Bhāskara and Nimbārka.

Advaita (A.D. 788–820). The nature of Śāṅkara's advaita (nondualism) is stated in the well-known formula: ekam evādvītiyam (one essence alone, without a second). The idea of God is associated with the concept of personality, which implies limitation and consequently plurality. Thus Śāṅkara regards the Absolute as impersonal and without attributes. He makes a distinction between nirguṇa Brahman (Brahman without attributes) and saguṇa Brahman (Brahman with attributes); these are not two Brahman but the same reality from different points of view, the higher and the lower. In the nirguṇa Brahman there is no distinction between substance and attributes: sat (being), cit (consciousness) and ānanda (bliss) constitute the essence of the Absolute and are not its attributes. Their purpose is to indicate that Brahman is not the mutable world, which is ultimately non-real, inert, and of the nature of misery. Because the Absolute is not an object as opposed to a subject, the Upanishads characterize it as "not this, nor that." This does not mean that Brahman is nonbeing; it is the very essence of the knower, self-revealed and self-established.

Īśvaratva (the appearance of being God) is superimposed on Brahman by māyā and thus Brahman becomes īśvara (a personal God). Māyā is the principle of self-determination or cosmic illusion; it hides the real and manifests the non-real. It accounts for the conception of Brahman as the material as well as the efficient cause of the creation, the preservation and the destruction of the world. But Brahman's causality consists not in parināma (transformation), but in vivarta (transfiguration); Brahman is immutable and eternal and so cannot change itself into the world. It is through māyā which is his inscrutable power, that God becomes the cause of the world. The universe emerges from īśvara and exists within God.

The world of plurality then is the product of māyā or avidyā (ignorance). Hence the world is not non-existent although it is not real. That is to say, the world is only empirically real, whereas Brahman is absolutely real and delusions and dreams are only apparently real. The delusion of taking for a snake what is only a rope is given as an example to illustrate world-appearance. Just as darkness leads one to suppose that a rope is a snake, avidyā is responsible for the superimposition of the world on Brahman. Deluded by the avidyā the jīva (individual soul) identifies itself with the mind-body composite and considers itself to belong to the world of rebirth. The truth, however, is that the soul is not different from Brahman. This is declared by the famous text: "That thou art." The souls seem to be many because of different adjuncts, such as the body and the senses. In reality they are one; Brahman and the souls appear different because of avidyā. When this is removed through jñāna (intuitive knowledge), the soul is freed from its individuality and realizes its Brahmanhood.

Coming after the time of Śāṅkara, the Bhedābheda ("Difference and non-difference") or Dvaitādvaita (Two and One) school of Bhāskara (c. ninth century) makes a transition from Śāṅkara's Advaita to Rāmānuja's Viśiṣṭadvaita. Bhāskara was very critical of Śāṅkara's view that the manifold world is ultimately illusory (māyā). For Bhāskara it is the one ultimate reality (Brahman) that becomes many, and therefore, multiplicity is real. For Bhāskara, Brahman is on the one hand, “the unconditioned, beyond the categories of time, space and causality” and on the other, it is the same Brahman, by its infinite power finitises itself into three forms of kāraṇa (cause), kārya (effect) and jīva (Individual self). Jīva, a part (amśa) of Brahman is neither totally different from Brahman or is identical with Brahman. From Bhāskara’s view, the jīva is the amśa or element of the absolute that subjects itself to metaphysical and moral imperfections (upādhis) and gets implicated in endless cycle of birth-death-rebirth. When it is free, it becomes one with Brahman. The finite self is atomic and monadic; it is a separate and “independent” being. In this state of separation it is subject to the law of karma, and when the association with karma is dissolved in the mokṣa (salvational) state the “separated self” is reunited with the “unconditional” Brahman.

The religious discipline for Bhāskara includes the coordination of knowledge and duty, jñāna-karma-samuccaya. Unlike Śāṅkara’s Advaita, for Bhedābheda, the discipline of karma (karmayoga), which is performance of ritualistic duties, is not simply a preliminary step that can be dispensed with while practicing the discipline of knowledge (jñānayoga). In all stages of life, a person must perform the deeds enjoined by the scriptures. However, Bhāskara admits that simple performance of ritualistic duties cannot lead one to final liberation (mokṣa); it is knowledge combined with duties that can enable one to the realization of Brahman, where one realizes that he or she is indeed the amśa, or part of the Supreme reality.

The school of Nimbarka (11th–12th century), which also falls under the broad category of Dvaitādvaita (Bhedābheda) has been largely influential in the development of Bengal Vaiṣṇavism, with Caitanya as its leading figure. Nimbarka, like Bhāskara, was also critical of the Advaita vedānta of Śāṅkara. The Absolute, Brahman or Kṛṣṇa is Unity-in-difference. This Absolute manifests itself through the numberless jīvas and manifold material forms without losing itself in them. It is the very nature of Brahman to be different from and identical with the world of selves and matter at the same time. The individual selves are infinite in number and atomic in size. The “beginningless” association with karma provides these selves (jīvas) with bodies and traps them into a cycle of birth-death-rebirth (samsāra). Redemption is possible only through the grace of Kṛṣṇa. In the state of liberation (mokṣa) one realizes one’s unity with Kṛṣṇa and abides in Kṛṣṇa as part of his energy.

The Vedāntic school of Viśiṣṭādvaita (Qualified non-dualism) is built on teachings of Rāmānuja (1050–1137), who was critical of Śāṅkara’s non-dualistic understanding of the nature of Brahman, establishing that there are three eternal principles, Brahman, ātman and prakṛti, the Absolute, the principle of subjectivity (Self) and primal matter, respectively. These three principles are related to one another in the following manner: ātman and prakṛti are inseparably related to Brahman as its modes, as body and soul. Rāmānuja asserted that ātman and prakṛti constitute the body (sarīra) of Brahman (God/Viṣṇu), and Brahman in turn becomes their indweller (sarīrin). From the point of view of Brahman being the sole controlling principle, what is real is One; but from the fact there are three ontological principles (tattvas) this Oneness is qualified, and not absolute as in the case of Śāṅkara’s nondualistic Vedānta. According to Rāmānuja, the world that we experience is not ultimately illusory (māyā). Creation is real; it is a process by which primal matter becomes the manifold universe, and ātman becomes the manifold jīvas (individual selves) with physical and subtle bodies. God is the instrumental cause for creation, although creation is not purposive in the sense that it is intended to accomplish anything. It is an expression of divine playfulness (līlī). In such a play, the jīva is invited to behold the glory of God and take part in divine play.

It is the failure of the individual to participate in this playful world with a playful frame of mind, that transforms the līlī world into samsaric, karma-bound world. In this “fallen state,” the playful God assumes the role of a redeemer/savior. It is in this role that several of the divine manifestations take place including the ten major incarnations (avatāras), such as Rāmā and Kṛṣṇa. All these manifestations highlight “accessibility” (saulabhya) and closeness of the divine to the jīvas in bondage (samsāra), so that the jīva can benefit spiritually and be redeemed by the presence of the divine in the samsaric world. Redemption is to be gained through knowledge, the knowledge that the jīva truly belongs to God as his body (sarīra). This knowledge is to be gained by divine grace and through the practices of the disciplines (yoga) of karma, jñāna and bhakti, action, knowledge, and devotion. Through disinterested action one’s mind becomes purified; through knowledge, one realizes the nature of the self as different from the body; and through bhakti or loving devotion one realizes the relationship of the self with the divine, and the released soul enjoys the highest bliss in the presence of God, beholding and serving God.

Dvaita Madhva (1197–1276) provides a dualistic interpretation to the text of the Brahmasūtras, and hence his system of Vedānta is called Dvaita (Dualism). He reads the Upanisadic statement tatvamasi as a-tvamasi, “Thou are not That.” He makes an absolute distinction between God, who is the only independent (svatantra) reality, and all other things, both animate and inanimate, which are dependent (paratantra) realities. God is omnipotent and transcendent and is the author of creation, maintenance and destruction of the cosmos. There are five-fold differences among these three principles, according to Madhva. Difference between God (Brahman) and souls (jīvas), between souls themselves, among inanimate objects (prakṛti) themselves, between inanimate objects and God, between inanimate matter and souls; all these differences are eternal. Since the distinction between God and the world is absolute and unqualified, for Madhva, the world is not the body of God. Therefore Madhva's Dvaita Vedānta is different from Śāṅkara and Rāmānuja, though it has many points common with Rāmānuja such as salvation through grace and equation of Brahman with Viṣṇu.

SYSTEMATIC NOTIONS

Basic Ideas. Recurrent themes in Indian philosophy deal with the soul, the matter of the universe, the union of body and soul, and the nature of God.

The ātman (soul) is eternal from the viewpoint of both its beginning and its end. It is of two kinds: the supreme universal Soul (Brahman, Paramātman) and the personal individual soul of living beings (jīvātman).

The matter or substance out of which the universe has been evolved is eternal. Evolution takes place from gross particles of matter, according to some materialists, or, as taught in the Vedānta, from the soul itself when this is overspread by māyā. This supposes the common doctrine of the Hindus that nothing can be produced out of nothing (nāvastuno vastusiddhiḥ).

Although the soul is abstract knowledge, it can exercise thought, consciousness, sensation and volition only when connected with external objects of sensation, invested with some bodily form and joined to manas (mind). The union of soul and body is productive of bondage and, in the case of human souls, misery. All karma, whether good or bad, leads to bondage because it entails a consequence: good actions must be rewarded and bad ones punished. Souls have to transmigrate in order to work out the consequence of action. True knowledge of God and loving devotion to Him, obtained through His prasāda (grace), liberates the soul from this bondage.

The religious belief in many gods, reflected in the early Vedic hymns gives way to MONOTHEISM, with Prajāpati (Father-God) dominating all other gods. The theism of the epics Mahābhārata and Rāmāyana takes a more personal form in the conceptions of the two deities Śiva and Viṣṇu (Vishnu) as Supreme Gods, by the Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava communities respectively. Indian MONISM traces the world not to a Creator but to a primordial principle that unfolds itself as the Universe in all its diversity. Brahman is the ultimate ground of all differentiated reality, identical with the ātman of every individual soul. Indian PANTHEISM conceives all existence as the parts of one Being who pervades the whole world, yet is not exhausted thereby.

Critique. As a system of religious thought and as an expression of faith and life in God, Hindu philosophy represents a high-water mark of India's deeply religious intuition. The way in which Hindu religion permeates one's entire life, as opposed to the idea that religion is a separate compartment occupying only a small portion thereof, is close to the Catholic ideal. The supreme transcendence and perfect simplicity of the Absolute in Śāṅkara's philosophy, as well as the infinite loveliness and inexhaustible compassion of God in Rāmānuja's philosophy, are expressed in terms that are deeply moving for the Christian soul. The constant belief in the divine governance of the world and in the utter dependence of the "creature" on God is no less remarkable. The same may be said for the divine immanence and indwelling in all things. In this sense, Indian philosophy testifies to the untiring efforts by human beings to reach and worship the true God and to find rest in God alone.

See Also: BUDDHISM; HINDUISM; JAINISM; PANENTHEISM.

Bibliography: M. HIRYANNA, The Essentials of Indian Philosophy (London 1949). S. CHATTERJEE and D. DATTA, An Introduction to Indian Philosophy (5th ed. Calcutta 1954). S. N. DASGUPTA, A History of Indian Philosophy, 5 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1922–55). P. DEUSSEN, The System of the Vedānta, tr. C. JOHNSTON (Chicago 1912). K. K. KLOSTERMAIER, A Survey of Hinduism, 2d ed. (Albany 1994). V. S. GHATE, The Vedānta (Poona 1960). S. RADHAKRISHNAN, Indian Philosophy (London 1948). S. RADHAKRISHNAN and C. A. MOORE, A Source Book in Indian Philosophy (Princeton, NJ 1957). D. RIEPE, The Philosophy of India and Its Impact on American Thought (Springfield, IL 1970). P. T. RAJU, The Philosophical Traditions of India (London 1971).

[M. DHAVAMONY/K.R. SUNDARARAJAN]

INDIAN RITES CONTROVERSY

The term "Indian Rites" designates certain customs that Jesuit missionaries, notably Roberto de NOBILI and others, permitted to their neophytes in South India until their practice was forbidden by the Holy See. The region comprises the former kingdoms of Madura, Mysore, and the Carnatic.

Nobili's Approach to Inculturation. According to the missionary method in use in India in the sixteenth century, neophytes were expected to dress, eat, and behave as did their Portuguese colonists, and they were also required to take Portuguese surnames. These demands were considered intolerable by most Hindus, who termed the neophytes parangis (detested foreigners) and treated them as outcasts. At the beginning of the seventeenth century, Roberto de Nobili, SJ, introduced to the Madura mission a method of inculturation that had been successfully applied in China by the Italian Jesuit, Matteo RICCI, and encouraged by the Jesuit superior of the Far East Mission, Alessandro VALIGNANO. De Nobili's approach to inculturation, which then seemed radical and downright revolutionary, consisted in adapting Christianity to the Indian context by adopting indigenous rites and customs as far as possible without conceding any fundamental Christian truth or principle. Instead of forcing Indians to become Europeans, the missionaries would try to adjust their own way of life and preaching to existing Indian cultural heritage and social conventions.

Nobili took the saffron dress of a sannyasi (ascetic), lived and ate as an Indian, and studied the nondualistic Vedanta as a means of gaining entrance to the Brahmin intelligentsia in Madura, at whom his apostolate was aimed. After probing the history of Brahmin and Hindu practices, Nobili permitted his disciples and new converts the following usages that he considered primarily civil, not religious: (1) the kudumi (tuft), a distinctive sign of the Brahmin caste; (2) the thread, also a sign of the Brahmin caste; (3) the santal (mark on the brow); (4) the usual ablutions practiced by upper castes and virtually indispensable in a country with a climate as hot as India's.

Suspicion and Controversy. The Brahmins of Madura welcomed Nobili's method and under its conditions some became Christians. But Nobili's Portuguese colleagues were suspicious. They declared Nobili overtolerant, and apparently they feared that he was placing in jeopardy the Portuguese position as masters of India. Nobili defended himself by appealing to texts from St. Paul, St. Thomas Aquinas, and such later theologians as Juan Azor (1536–1603) and Domingo Bañez (1528–1604). At the bidding of Pope Paul V, Christopher de Sa, archbishop of Goa, summoned Nobili before the Inquisition of Goa. The archbishop, the Dominicans, the Franciscans, and the secular priests voted against Nobili, while the Inquisitor D'Almeida, Francisco Ros, SJ (archbishop of Cranganore), and all the Jesuits voted in his favor. Thus from the beginning there were sharply divided views. Nobili had made a distinction between religious rites and civil customs; he justified the latter where necessary by eliminating superstitious elements and directing the intention. For example, Indians often marked their brow with a mixture of ashes and sandal-paste; therefore, said Nobili, let us hallow this mixture with a Christian blessing and impose it not once a year, on Ash Wednesday, but more frequently. His opponents argued that the Hindus were noted for their absence of logic. Therefore, in permitting them to retain certain rites one risked, despite all precautions, leaving them with the idea that Christianity did not exclude their earlier ways of religious thinking and behavior.

The dispute was submitted to Rome and to the grand inquisitor of Portugal. Martins de Mascarenhas (in 1621) and Gregory XV (in 1623, in his constitution Romanae Sedis) pronounced in favor of Nobili. For the moment, de Nobili's approach had triumphed and the Jesuits adopted it, dividing themselves into two groups: sannyasis to evangelize the higher castes and pandara swamis for the backward castes. In Madura, Mysore, and Trichinopoly good results were obtained; by 1704 the Christians of the Madura district numbered 90,000. In the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries new concessions had been added to those originally adopted by Nobili.

In 1687 French Jesuits arrived to work alongside the Capuchins in the recently founded French colony of Pondicherry. They collaborated with Jesuits in Madura and created a special mission in the Carnatic following Nobili's method. Soon accusations against the Jesuits were being sent to Rome, and in order to uphold them the Capuchin François Marie de Tours returned there in 1703. He submitted 36 questions relating to the usages of the Indian Rites to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.

Arrival of Charles de Tournon. Meanwhile Clement XI had appointed the Piedmontese prelate Charles Thomas Maillard de Tournon as his legatus a later to examine the vexed question of Chinese rites, which was dividing not only missionaries but European thinkers (see CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY). In view of the new complaints, he now instructed Tournon to interrupt his journey in order to examine the rites and customs of South India. Tournon, who knew neither Hindi nor the Portuguese language, and was forced to seek his information second hand, arrived in Pondicherry on Nov. 6, 1703, and remained until July of 1704. Sickness prevented him from visiting any part of the inland mission, but he gathered data on the usages in question, notably from the Jesuits Jean Bouchet (1655–1732) and Charles Bertoldi (1659–1720). On June 23, 1704, Tournon signed a decree condemning in 16 points several usages permitted to the Jesuits. His decree was confirmed by the Holy Office on Jan. 7, 1706, and at the same time a consultor was named to examine the question further. The Jesuits Boucher and Francisco Laynez (1656–1715), the former French, the latter Portuguese, came to Rome to defend their method in South India. In 1707 Laynez published Defensio Indi- carum Missionum Madurensis to show that the missionaries had tolerated nothing superstitious, and he distributed copies in India after his appointment as bishop of Mylapore in 1708. By an oraculum vivae vocis granted to the procurator of the Madura mission, Clement XI declared the missionaries obliged to observe Tournon's decree "insofar as the Divine glory and the salvation of souls would permit." Appealing to this clause of the oraculum, the Jesuits continued to tolerate the usages condemned by Tournon. On Sept. 1, 1712, Clement renewed the Holy Office's decree of 1706, and in a brief of Sept. 17, 1712, reprimanded Laynez for failing to take action to carry out Tournon's decree. On July 24, 1715, the cardinal prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith sent this brief and the decree of 1706 to Pondicherry, where they were promulgated on Jan. 11, 1716, Laynez having died meanwhile. In protest, the Jesuits sent Pierre Martin (1665–1716) and Broglia Brandolini (d. 1747) to Rome to secure further examination of the Indian Rites. Innocent XIII appointed a special Congregation for this purpose, with Prospero Lambertini, the future Pope Benedict XIV, as secretary. Brandolini published a justification of the rites, to which Luigi Lucino, OP, replied on behalf of the Holy Office.

The Oath of 16 Points. The special congregation's examination of the rites continued under Benedict XIII (1724–30) and Clement XII (1730–40). In a brief dated Dec. 12, 1727, Benedict XIII confirmed Tournon's decree. In 1733 the decisions of Tournon's decree, formulated in 16 points, were again examined by the Holy Office, and confirmed in 1734 by Clement XII's brief Compertum exploratumque. This, however, did not end the matter, for some missionaries tried to evade the injunctions of the brief. Finally with the bull Omnium sollicitudinum of Sept. 12, 1744, Benedict XIV decided the question of the Indian rites in accordance with the brief of 1734 and obliged all missionaries working in Madura, Mysore, and the Carnatic to swear a 16-point oath relating to the rites.

The oath bound the missionaries as follows: (1) They were obliged in the administration of Baptism to use sacramentals, notably saliva (which Hindus regarded with abhorrence) and insufflation; (2) a candidate for Baptism was obliged to take the name of a saint in the Roman Martyrology, and Indian names, formerly acceptable, were now forbidden; (3) in all ceremonies Latin or Latin translated into an Indian language was to be used; in the latter case exact equivalents must be found for the holy cross, saints, and holy things; (4) missionaries were obliged to baptize newborn babies with haste; (5) marriage before puberty was forbidden, as well as the custom whereby the bridegroom hangs on the bride's neck a nuptial jewel called tali; (6) Christian wives were forbidden to wear the tali; (7) Christians were forbidden to wear the girdle composed of 108 threads dyed red used by Hindus for hanging the tali; (8) the supposed "superstitious" ceremonies of Hindu marriages were forbidden, such as cutting the hair of bride and groom and use of the branch called arasciomara; (9) the matrimonial rite of breaking a coconut in order to foretell the future was prohibited; (10) it was the custom for South Indian women to remain at home during their menstrual periods until they had been ritually purified; henceforth Christian women were not to be kept from the Sacraments for this reason; (11) celebrations in honor of a young girl at her first menstruation were forbidden; (12) missionaries were commanded to administer the Sacraments to sick backward-caste Christians in their dwellings, publicly; (13) Christian singers and musicians were forbidden to take part in ceremonies in Hindu temples; (14) baths were permitted, provided they were not linked with superstition either in timing or in any other way; missionaries were allowed to wash only as a measure of hygiene, not with the intention of passing as sannyasis or Brahmins; (15) marking the brow with ashes of cow-dung or with red-and-white paste in accordance with Hindu customs was forbidden, and Christians were obliged to keep to the sign of the Cross and the use of palm ashes duly blessed; and (16) Christians were forbidden to read Hindu scriptures and other classical and devotional texts under penalty of excommunication.

All the Jesuits in the designated missions took the prescribed oath and observed its various points. They were, however, allowed to designate some missionaries for the exclusive service of the backward castes. This dispensation disappeared with the suppression of the Society of Jesus in 1773. Pius XII (1939–58) revisited the Indian rites controversy as part of an overall review of the Chinese rites controversy. On Dec. 8, 1939, the oath relating to Chinese rites was abolished and on April 9, 1940, the missionaries of India were dispensed from the oath relating to the Indian rites.

Bibliography: For bibliography: see NOBILI, ROBERTO DE.

[V. CRONIN/EDS.]

INDIANA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A state in north central U.S., in the Middle West, bounded on the north by Lake Michigan and Michigan state, on the east by Ohio, on the south by the Ohio River, and on the west by Illinois and the Wabash River. The capital and largest city is Indianapolis. Agriculture predominates in the central part of the state, with some industries in its smaller cities. Since 1905, after U.S. Steel and other corporations built mills in and near Gary and East Chicago, the heaviest industries have centered in the northwestern counties. In 2001 Catholics were about 13 percent of the state's population—759,239 in a total population of 5,908,407. They were served by five dioceses that constituted the ecclesiastical province of Indianapolis, namely, the Archdiocese of Indianapolis, Fort Wayne-South Bend, Evansville, Lafayette, and Gary.

History. It is not known just what tribes inhabited the region before the pioneer explorations, but shortly after the French explorers and missionaries reached the western Great Lakes, Algonquian tribes had moved south of the Great Lakes. From the northwest came the Miami, Potawatomi, Kickapoo, and Ojibwa; and from the east came remnants of the Delaware and Shawnee. During the French period (c. 1680–1763), water routes through the area connected French Canada with Louisiana, and centers for fur trading were established at Fort St. Joseph, Fort Wayne (then Fort Miami), and Ouiatenon, near the site of the present Lafayette; Vincennes, at the site of the present city of that name, was the most important center. By the Treaty of Paris of 1763, the region east of the Mississippi was ceded to England by France and was then ruled as part of Quebec under Gov. Thomas Gage. Although English traders and pioneers had begun to infiltrate the region, the inhabitants were predominantly French at the outbreak of the American Revolution. George Rogers Clark captured Vincennes assisted by Pierre GIBAULT, the Canadian missionary who served the Illinois missions. Indiana was part of the Northwest Territory established by the Ordinance of 1787. In the war of 1812 the power of the native tribes in the area was destroyed. After Ohio, Illinois, and Michigan were cut off as separate states, the territory of Indiana was reduced to its present dimensions and received into the Union as the 19th state on Dec. 11, 1816.

Missionary Activity. The northern region of what was to become the state of Indiana fell under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Quebec from 1674 to 1789. The earliest missionaries to travel to the area, visited near South Bend, on the St. Joseph River, in 1679, and was attended later by Jesuits from the old St. Joseph mission near what is now Niles, Michigan. After the suppression of the Society caused the Jesuits to withdraw from the missions along the St. Joseph River, priests based in Vincennes where the French had established a fort, visited the area, including Gibault, who signed the St. Joseph baptismal register; Louis Payet, who conducted Christmas services at Fort Miami in 1789; and Jean Rivet, who visited Indians in the area. After the American War of Independence, the state-to-be fell under the jurisdiction of Bishop John Carroll of Baltimore from 1789 until 1810 when the Diocese of Bardstown, Ky., was established. After 1808,

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of Indianapolis	1944
Diocese of Evansville	1944
Diocese of Fort Wayne-South Bend	1857
Diocese of Gary	1956
Diocese of Lafayette in Indiana	1944

missionaries from Bardstown and Louisiana served Vincennes where John Leo Champomier, resident pastor from 1823 to 1831, constructed St. Francis Xavier Church, which became the cathedral when Vincennes was established as a diocese in 1834. It was there that Simon BRUTÉ, was installed as the first bishop, Nov. 5, 1834.

Diocese of Vincennes. Bruté's new diocese embraced all of Indiana and the eastern third of Illinois until the Diocese of Chicago was created in 1843. For his scattered flock he had only one church, an academy founded by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, Ky., and one priest. Although several missionaries were laboring in the diocese, only Simon Lalumière was permanently attached to it. After making a visitation of his diocese, Bruté went to Europe for aid and returned with 18 missionaries, including several Eudists. Before his death in 1839, Bruté established a college and seminary and continued the local academy, staffing it with the Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md.

Bishop Bruté was succeeded by his vicar-general, Celestine de la Hailandière, who was consecrated in Paris on Aug. 18, 1839. The new bishop returned to Vincennes with additional clerical recruits and the promise of foundations by the Sisters of Providence and the Congregation of Holy Cross, both of the Diocese of Le Mans, France. The sisters, under Mother Theodore GUERIN founded the convent of St. Mary-of-the-Woods, Ind., in 1840; opened an academy; and established a number of schools. The Eudists opened St. Gabriel College in Vincennes, and the seminary was reorganized and expanded. In 1844, Hailandière summoned the first diocesan synod. Despite his vigilance in checking tendencies toward TRUSTEEISM, he experienced many other difficulties, including that of Roman Weinzoepfel (a local aspect of American NATIVISM 1842–44), the departure of the Eudists, and the closing of their college. He resigned in 1847 and returned to France (where he died in 1882). His successor was also French-born, Stephen Bazin of Mobile, Ala., but his episcopate lasted less than a year (Oct. 24, 1847–April 23, 1848).

Bishop Bazin was succeeded in January 1849 by his vicar-general Maurice de St. Palais, who was a major figure in the Church of Indiana for the next 28 years. During St. Palais' long tenure, the Catholic population, swelled by German immigrants, increased rapidly. St. Palais went to Europe (1851–52) and secured the establishment by the Benedictine Abbey of Maria Einsiedeln, Switzerland, of St. Meinrad (1854) in Spencer County, Ind., which became an independent abbey in 1870. The monks opened a college and seminary. In 1867 Benedictine sisters from Covington, Ky., established Immaculate Conception Convent and eventually an academy in nearby Ferdinand. Through the instrumentality of Francis Joseph Rudolf similar developments occurred in Oldenburg, Franklin County, where in 1851 Sister Teresa of Vienna founded a convent of Franciscan sisters who also opened an academy. In 1866, the Franciscan friars of the Cincinnati, Ohio, province took the first steps toward establishing a monastery that served as a house of studies until 1958, when the institution became a brothers' training school. In the same district, Brothers of Christian Instruction from France conducted St. Maurice Institute from 1857 to 1862. In Vincennes he established an orphanage for girls (1849) and one for boys (1850). In 1860 the latter was moved to Highland, Ind., and in 1876 the girls were sent to St. Ann Orphanage in Terre Haute, Ind. St. Charles Seminary, which the bishop reorganized in 1853, was abandoned, when in 1860 he sent the college students to St. Thomas, Ky., and in 1866, the seminarians to St. Meinrad.

Bell tower of the Basilica of the Sacred Heart, South Bend, Indiana. (©Layne Kennedy/CORBIS)

In the period following the Civil War, large churches were erected in the growing cities, notably St. John in Indianapolis and Assumption in Evansville. In Indianapolis the Sisters of Providence, who had managed a hospital during the war, conducted St. John Infirmary for some time, while in Evansville, the Sisters of Charity of Emmitsburg opened St. Mary Hospital (1872). The Conventual Franciscans in 1872 were placed in charge of two parishes in Terre Haute where for a few years they conducted St. Bonaventure Lyceum. On property that they later acquired at Floyd Knobs in the southern part of the state, they established a training school for brothers and, in 1910, Mt. St. Francis College, a minor seminary. In 1873 the Little Sisters of the Poor and the Sisters of the Good Shepherd established their foundations, and in 1875 the Franciscan friars of the St. Louis Province established a monastery and Sacred Heart parish. Also in 1875 a diocesan weekly, the Indiana Catholic and Record, was begun.

Meanwhile, missionary activity in northern Indiana had begun in earnest with the arrival at St. Joseph mission of Father Stephen Theodore BADIN in September 1830. From there, Badin visited the Native Americans at Twin Lakes, near the present Plymouth, Ind., and the German and Irish Catholic workers on the canals between Fort Wayne and Terre Haute, Ind. On Feb. 2, 1833, Badin secured a charter for the St. Joseph Orphan Asylum from the Indiana state Legislature. In Kentucky he obtained two Sisters of Charity for this asylum, which he built in 1834 on the site of the future University of NOTRE DAME. The sisters did not stay long and the orphan asylum was soon abandoned. After 1839 St. Joseph mission was attended by priests from the Diocese of Detroit, Mich., until the arrival of Edward Sorin, CSC, who founded the University of Notre Dame on Nov. 26, 1842. The eastern part of the region was being cared for by Rev. Louis Mueller in Fort Wayne and the western part by Rev. Irenaeus Saint Cyr from Chicago. Augustus Martin and Claude François made Logansport the center of their missionary activity, with other missions established at Lagro, Peru, Lafayette, St. John's, and Huntington.

In 1857, in response to a petition of the first provincial council of Cincinnati (the Diocese of Vincennes since 1850 had been a suffragan see in the Province of Cincinnati), the Diocese of Fort Wayne was erected, confining the Diocese of Vincennes to the southern half of the state. The first bishop of the new diocese, German-born John Henry Luers, was ordained in 1846 and did pastoral work in Cincinnati, Ohio, until his consecration on Jan. 10, 1858. Arriving in his diocese, the new bishop found 26 churches and 20 priests. The Catholics were mostly Irish laborers and some German immigrants who settled along the Indiana-Ohio state line. Notre Dame was a boarding school for boys and St. Mary's an academy for girls. Besides the priests, brothers, and sisters of Holy Cross at Notre Dame, there were the Sisters of Providence of Terre Haute, who conducted parish schools, and the Poor Handmaids of Jesus Christ, who immigrated from Germany to Hessen Cassel in 1863 and later went to Fort Wayne and Donaldson, conducting orphanages, hospitals, and schools.

Luers died suddenly on June 29, 1871, and was succeeded by Joseph DWENGER, CPPS, who was consecrated in Cincinnati on April 14, 1872. During his administration, he established a diocesan school board and added many parish schools. A new orphanage for boys was established near Lafayette in 1875 and one for girls in Fort Wayne in 1886. In 1891, at his invitation, the Fathers of the Precious Blood began St. Joseph's College near Rensselaer. Dwenger died on Jan. 22, 1893, and Bp. Joseph Rademacher of Nashville, Tenn., was transferred to Fort Wayne on July 13. His brief episcopate was characterized by an increase in the number of churches, missions, and schools. He also remodeled the cathedral before his health became impaired in 1898. His death on Jan. 12, 1900, ended a long illness during which his vicar-general, J. H. Guendling, was administrator of the diocese.

Move to Indianapolis. Chatard. In 1878 Francis Silas CHATARD was named as the successor of St. Palais, who died the previous year. Chatard established the episcopal residence in Indianapolis, while the cathedral and the title of the see were continued at Vincennes. Synods were held in 1878, 1880, 1886, and 1891. Although the bishop adopted a rather rigorous attitude toward secret societies, he encouraged Catholic societies of national character. A mutual insurance company for church property in the diocese was formed in 1883 and functioned until its liquidation in 1950. Chatard's most progressive efforts affected the clergy: he sent a number of seminarians to European institutions; established irremovable rectors, diocesan courts, and deanery conferences; ordered an annual collection for aged and infirm priests; encouraged a Clergy Relief Union, organized in 1894; and founded a St. Michael Society to ensure Masses for deceased clerics. He secured permission for the use in the diocese of the Calendar of the city of Rome, necessitating a special Ordo that developed into a Year Book.

In 1889, after a fire at St. Meinrad, the commercial department of the college was transferred to Jasper, where it became Jasper Academy (later in 1933 it was re-established in Aurora, Ill., as Marmion Academy). In 1909 the high school and the college were distinctly separated at St. Mary-of-the-Woods. The Sisters of Charity of Emmitsburg founded St. Vincent Hospital, Indianapolis, in 1881, and the Poor Sisters of St. Francis Seraph of Perpetual Adoration from Lafayette opened hospitals in Terre Haute (1882), New Albany (1901), and Beech Grove (1913). In Evansville the Little Sisters of the Poor established a house in 1882 and the Poor Clares a convent in 1897.

By an Apostolic Brief dated March 28, 1898 the title of the diocese changed to Diocese of Indianapolis, making it the episcopal see. In 1906 SS. Peter and Paul Cathedral was built in Indianapolis, complete except for the façade, which was added in 1936.

Chartrand. Joseph Chartrand, who had been appointed coadjutor in 1910, succeeded to the see when Chatard died in 1918. The new bishop applied the decrees of Pius X regarding Holy Communion with enthusiasm and success and zealously promoted vocations to the priesthood. In 1921 the Daughters of Isabella opened St. Elizabeth Home in Indianapolis for working girls, and the Knights of Columbus of Indiana founded Gibault Home for delinquent boys near Terre Haute. Conducted at first by diocesan priests, this last institution was given to the charge of the Brothers of Holy Cross in 1934. In 1926 the Sisters of Providence opened Ladywood School in Indianapolis, which superseded the academy at St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Several high schools were built throughout the diocese, including Reitz Memorial High School, Evansville, and Cathedral High School, Indianapolis.

Margaret Mary Hospital, conducted by the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis of Hartwell, Ohio, was opened in Batesville, Ind., in 1932. The Carmelite Monastery of the Resurrection, founded in New Albany, Ind., in 1922, was reestablished in Indianapolis in 1932, and members of this monastery founded the Carmel of St. Joseph in Terre Haute in 1947.

Noll. John Francis NOLL, then editor of the Sunday Visitor and pastor in Huntington, Ind., was consecrated by Cardinal G. W. Mundelein on June 30, 1925. Noll established seminary burses for the education of poor boys of the diocese; built a new orphanage for boys at Fort Wayne to replace St. Joseph Orphanage in Lafayette; created a diocesan Catholic Charities Board with centers in Fort Wayne, South Bend, Gary, and Hammond; and established a diocesan Council of Catholic Women and a Catholic Youth Organization. He set up Bishop Noll High School in Hammond and St. Joseph High School in South Bend, and combined the high schools in Fort Wayne into one Central Catholic High School.

Noll was honored with the title of archbishop ad personam on Sept. 2, 1953, but suffered a stroke shortly after.

Pursley. Bishop Leo A. Pursley, who had been named auxiliary to Noll on July 22, 1950, became apostolic administrator of Fort Wayne on Feb. 21, 1955. After Noll's death on July 31, 1956, Pursley was appointed to the see and installed as its sixth bishop on Feb. 26, 1957.

Ritter. A native of New Albany, Ind., Joseph E. Ritter, was named auxiliary bishop in 1933 and upon Chart-rand's death a year later succeeded him as ordinary. Ritter became the first archbishop of Indianapolis when, by decree of Pope Pius XII in December 1944, Indianapolis was made a metropolitan see.

Despite the economic depression of the 1930s, Ritter enlarged the diocesan curia, instituted three new deaneries, and created a number of new offices and committees, including a superintendent of schools, a Church music commission, and a rural life board, and reorganized Catholic Charities in the diocese. In 1934 the Jesuits established West Baden College for the scholastics of the Chicago province, and in 1937 the Franciscan Sisters of Oldenburg opened Marian College for Women in Indianapolis. Under Ritter's direction 14 new parishes and missions were established, but the action for which he gained national attention was the initiative he took in integrating the Catholic schools. In 1946 Ritter was transferred to the Archdiocese of St. Louis and named a cardinal in 1961.

The same decree that elevated Indianapolis to arch-bishopric status created the Dioceses of Evansville and Lafayette. To form the Diocese of Evansville 12 counties in the southwestern part of the state bordering on Illinois were carved out of the Archdiocese of Indianapolis. The first bishop, Henry J. Grimmelman served until he retired in 1965 (he died June 26, 1972) and was succeeded by Bishop Paul F. Leibold (1966–1972). Four counties in the southern part of the Diocese of Fort Wayne were detached to form the Diocese of Lafayette. The first bishop, John G. Bennett who had been pastor in Garrett, Ind., was appointed the first bishop (1945–1957). A year before he died, Bishop John Carberry was appointed coadjutor with right of succession. Carberry was transferred to the diocese of Columbus (1965–1968) and later became cardinal and archbishop of St. Louis (he died June 17, 1998). In 1956 the western part of the Diocese of Fort Wayne was separated to form the new See of Gary, with Andrew G. Grutka as first bishop. Bishop Grutka retired in 1984 and was succeeded by the auxiliary bishop of Greensburg, Pa., Norbert F. Gaughan who retired in 1996. (Bishop Grutka died Nov. 11, 1993; Bishop Gaughan, Oct. 1, 1999.)

Catholic Institutions of Higher Education. Indiana is home to the University of Notre Dame du Lac (established, 1842, sponsored by the Congregation of the Holy Cross), the nation's premier Catholic university, and Saint-Mary-of-the-Woods College (established 1840, sponsored by the Sisters of Providence), the nation's oldest Catholic liberal arts college for women, and Saint Mary's College in Notre Dame (an all-women college sponsored by the Sisters of the Holy Cross, MADELEVA [Wolff], Mary). Other Catholic institutions of higher learning in the state include the University of Saint Francis in Fort Wayne (sponsored by the Sisters of St. Francis of Perpetual Adoration), Saint Joseph's College, Rensselaer (sponsored by the Society of the Precious Blood) and Marian College in Indianapolis (sponsored by the Sisters of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis).

Bibliography: H. A. ALERDING, A History of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Vincennes (Indianapolis 1883). C. BLANCHARD, History of the Catholic Church in Indiana, 2 v. (Logansport, Ind. 1898). T. T. MCAVOY, The Catholic Church in Indiana, 1789–1834 (New York 1940). J. H. SCHAUNGER, Cathedrals in the Wilderness (Milwaukee 1952). M. C. SCHROEDER, The Catholic Church in the Diocese of Vincennes, 1847–1877 (Washington, D.C. 1946). J. P. DONNELLY, Pierre Gibault, Missionary, 1737–1802 (Chicago 1971).

[T. T. MCAVOY/R. GORMAN/EDS.]

INDIANAPOLIS, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Established originally as the Diocese of Vincennes in 1834, the see was transferred to Indianapolis (Indianapolitana) in 1898 and became an archdiocese in 1944. In the year 2001 it comprised 38 counties and the township of Harrison, Spencer County (13,757 square miles), in the southern part of Indiana. There were 227,501 Catholics, about ten percent of the total population (2,359,104). The ecclesiastical Province of Indianapolis includes the other Indiana dioceses: Evansville, Fort Wayne-South Bend, Gary, and Lafayette.

From 1834, when Vincennes was established as a separate diocese, it was governed by the following prelates: Simon Gabriel Brute, S.S. 1834–d. 1839; Celestine de la Hailandiere, 1839–r. 1847 [d. France, 1882]; John S. Bazin, 1847–d. 1848; Maurice de St. Palais, 1849–d. 1877; Francis Silas Chatard, 1878–d. 1918; Joseph Chart-rand, 1918–d. 1933; John Elmer Ritter, 1934–1946 [St Louis, d. 1967]; Paul G. Schulte, 1946–r. 1970 [d. Feb. 17, 1984]; George J. Biskup, 1970–r. 1979, [d. Oct. 17, 1979]; Edward O'Meara, 1979–1992; Daniel M. Buechlein, OSB, 1992—.

Diocese of Vincennes. French traders established a fort at Vincennes in 1752 and subsequently it became a the residence of French missionaries. In 1789, after the American Revolution it became part of the newly created Diocese of Baltimore. Later it was transferred to the see of Bardstown, Ky., when that diocese was established in 1808. John Leo Champomier, resident pastor from 1823 to 1831, constructed St. Francis Xavier Church, which became the cathedral when Vincennes was established as a diocese in 1834, and it was there that Simon BRUTÉ, was installed as the first bishop, Nov. 5, 1834. Work on the cathedral was completed in 1841.

In the beginning the Diocese of Vincennes included all of Indiana and, before Chicago was made a separate diocese in 1843, the eastern part of Illinois. Although several missionaries were laboring in the diocese, only one priest was permanently attached to it. Bruté made a trip to Europe where he was able to recruit 18 missionaries, including a number of Eudists that enabled him to establish a college and seminary. Bruté died June 26, 1839.

Hailandière. Celestine de la Hailandière, who had been vicar-general, succeeded Bruté as the second bishop of Vincennes. The apostolic brief that appointed Hailandière, gave him the option of establishing his residence either in Vincennes, Madison, Lafayette, or Indianapolis, but the See city was to remain Vincennes. He was consecrated in Paris on Aug. 18, 1839, returning to Vincennes with additional clerical help and promises by the Sisters of Providence and the Congregation of Holy Cross, both of the Diocese of Le Mans, France, to send sisters to Indiana. In 1844, Hailandière summoned a diocesan synod, and three years later in 1847, and returned to France (where he died in 1882).

St. Palais. The third bishop of Vincennes was Stephen Bazin of Mobile, Ala., but he died after less than a year in office (Oct. 24, 1847–April 23, 1848), and was succeeded by Maurice de St. Palais. At the time of his appointment in 1849, St. Palais, who had been vicar-general by Apostolic Brief, was allowed to establish the episcopal residence at Vincennes, Madison, or Indianapolis (Lafayette was not an option) as long the See city remained Vincennes. During St. Palais' long tenure (1849–1877) the Catholic population, swelled by German immigrants, increased rapidly. Early in his episcopate St. Palais went to Europe (1851–52) and secured an agreement by the Benedictine Abbey of Maria Einsiedeln, Switzerland, to establish a foundation at St. Meinrad (1854) in Spencer County. In 1867 Benedictine sisters from Covington, Ky., established Immaculate Conception Convent and later an academy in nearby Ferdinand.

When Cincinnati was elevated to the status of an archdiocese in 1850, Vincennes became a suffragan see in the newly constituted the Province of Cincinnati. In 1857, in response to a petition of the first provincial council of Cincinnati, the Holy See established the Diocese of Fort Wayne to include the counties across northern tier of the state, thereby, confining the Diocese of Vincennes to the southern part.

The period after the Civil War saw the growth of Terre Haute, Evansville, and Indianapolis. The Church of St. John was built in Indianapolis and the Church of the Assumption in Evansville. Railroads contributed to the development of Terre Haute where in 1872 the Conventual Franciscans were placed in charge of the parishes of St. Joseph and St. Benedict. Also in 1872 the Sisters of Charity of Emmitsburg opened St. Mary Hospital in Evansville (1872). The Sisters of Providence, who had managed a hospital during the war, conducted St. John Infirmary in Indianapolis, and in 1873 the Little Sisters of the Poor and the Sisters of the Good Shepherd established their foundations. In 1875 the Franciscan friars of the St. Louis Province established a monastery and Sacred Heart parish in Indianapolis. Also in 1875 a diocesan weekly, the Indiana Catholic and Record, was begun.

Chatard. When Francis Silas CHATARD, St. Palais' successor, was appointed the fifth bishop of Vincennes in 1878, he was directed to fix his episcopal residence in Indianapolis, while the cathedral and the title of the see continued at Vincennes. Later, by an Apostolic Brief dated March 28, 1898 the title of the diocese changed to Diocese of Indianapolis, making it the episcopal see. The same brief directed that St. Francis Xavier, the patron of the old cathedral in Vincennes, was to remain as the patron of the Diocese of Indianapolis. In 1906 SS. Peter and Paul Cathedral was built in Indianapolis, complete except for the façade, which was added in 1936.

During Chatard's tenure in office, diocesan synods were held in 1878, 1880, 1886, and 1891, and many of the measures affected the clergy. Chatard sent a number of seminarians to Europe for study, established irremovable rectors, diocesan courts, and deanery conferences; ordered an annual collection for aged and infirm priests; encouraged a Clergy Relief Union, organized in 1894; and founded a St. Michael Society to ensure Masses for deceased clerics. He secured permission for the use in the diocese of the Calendar of the city of Rome, necessitating a special Ordo that developed into a Year Book.

Chartrand. Chatard was bishop for four decades, but in 1910 Joseph Chartrand, was appointed coadjutor. Chartrand became Bishop of Indianapolis when Chatard died in 1918. Chartrand promulgated the decrees of Pius X regarding Holy Communion with enthusiasm and success. He was zealous in promoting vocations to the priesthood. In 1921 the Daughters of Isabella opened St.

Elizabeth Home in Indianapolis for working girls, and the Knights of Columbus of Indiana founded Gibault Home for delinquent boys near Terre Haute. Conducted at first by diocesan priests, this last institution was given to the charge of the Brothers of Holy Cross in 1934. In 1926 the Sisters of Providence opened Ladywood School in Indianapolis, which superseded the academy at St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Several high schools were built throughout the diocese, including Reitz Memorial High School, Evansville, and Cathedral High School, Indianapolis.

Margaret Mary Hospital, conducted by the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis of Hartwell, Ohio, was opened in Batesville, Ind., in 1932. The Carmelite Monastery of the Resurrection, founded in New Albany, Ind., in 1922, was reestablished in Indianapolis in 1932, and members of this monastery founded the Carmel of St. Joseph in Terre Haute in 1947.

Ritter. New Albany-born Joseph E. Ritter, was named auxiliary bishop in Indianapolis and upon Chart-rand's death a year later succeeded him as ordinary. Ritter became the first archbishop of Indianapolis when, by decree of Pope Pius XII in December 1944, Indianapolis was made a metropolitan see. Despite the economic depression of the 1930s, Ritter enlarged the diocesan curia, instituted three new deaneries, and several new offices and committees, including a superintendent of schools, a Church music commission, and a rural life board, and reorganized Catholic Charities in the diocese. He also established a number of new parishes and missions, but the action for which he gained national attention was the initiative he took in integrating the Catholic schools.

Schulte. When Ritter was transferred to the Archdiocese of St. Louis in 1946, he was succeeded by the Paul C. Schulte who had been Bishop of Leavenworth, Kansas. Among the most pressing local problems that Schulte faced was the rapid increase of population, largely an urban phenomenon, coupled with the growing need of vocations. In 1951, 11 priests of the archdiocese were in the armed forces. More than half of the new parishes he founded were located in Indianapolis and environs; he re-drew parish lines, eliminating most of the national parishes; and directed that all parish records be microfilmed. Building plans included the erection and enlargement of schools, but the relative shortage of religious required the assistance of many lay teachers and the diocesan clergy. As a result, he supported the graduate education of clergy so that they could teach in the growing Catholic secondary schools.

Biskup. Archbishop Schulte attended the sessions of Vatican II and after the Council began implementing its directives. Reaching 80 in 1970, he resigned leaving the completion of the task to his successor Most Reverend George J. Biskup who had been appointed as coadjutor in 1967. Before coming to Indianapolis Biskup was auxiliary bishop in Des Moines after serving in the Congregation for Oriental Rites.

O'Meara. Archbishop Biskup resigned in March 1979 (he died a few months later, October 17) to be succeeded by Bishop Edward O'Meara, an auxiliary in St. Louis and, since 1967, National Director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. He remodeled Cathedral Grade School and turned it into the Catholic Center housing archdiocesan offices. Archbishop O'Meara gave priority to the development of priestly spirituality. He died Jan. 10, 1992.

Buechlein. The Most Reverend Daniel M. Buechlein, OSB, a monk of St. Meinrad Archabbey and rector of St. Meinrad School of Theology until he was consecrated bishop of Memphis, Tenn., in 1987, was installed as Archbishop of Indianapolis in July 1992. He immediately confronted the task of insuring the financial stability of the archdiocese, and finding a way to staff the parishes and schools in the face of the dwindling number of priests and religious. The first he accomplished by cutting staff and urging increased giving; there was no ready solution for the latter. He has continued the support and development of priestly spirituality and the continuing education of priestly spirituality and the continuing education of the clergy begun by his predecessors.

Bibliography: H. A. ALERDING, A History of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Vincennes (Indianapolis 1883). C. BLANCHARD, History of the Catholic Church in Indiana, 2 v. (Logansport, Ind. 1898). T. T. MCAVOY, The Catholic Church in Indiana, 1789-1834 (New York 1940). J. H. SCHAUNGER, Cathedrals in the Wilderness (Milwaukee 1952).

[R. GORMAN/EDS.]

INDICTION

A chronological term used to denote a measure of time, and, in the BYZANTINE CHURCH, a liturgical feast.

CHRONOLOGY.

The indiction (Lat. indictio: Gr. ἡ ἰνδικτιων, ἡ ἐπιπέμνηστις) was a 15-year cycle or period used as a point of referral in determining the dates of acts, inscriptions, and chronicles. The word can refer either to the period itself or to the individual years of which it is composed, each one then designated by a number ranking it in the series. Each period forms an independent whole, not requiring a series number referring it to past series, except rarely, in several medieval charters.

The indiction was originally used to determine the land tax. The word came to denote a fiscal year when the annual tax was periodically fixed for a predetermined number of years. Its use in this context dates back to the time of DIOCLETIAN, who established an indiction of five years, beginning in 297–298, which was apparently concerned only with Egypt. Licinius later increased the indiction to 15 years, beginning in 312–313. First set up for Licinius's own eastern part of the empire, the indiction was later extended to the West. Indicating the year within a particular series quickly became a useful means of determining dates, even during the time when the five-year indiction was used. However, the 15-year series was regarded as much more convenient. St. ATHANASIUS used it in his festal letter, the first of which dates from 329 (indiction 2).

Several kinds of indictions were in use, distinguished from each other by the month of the year marking the beginning of the indictional year.

1. The Egyptian indiction was characterized by the dependence of its opening on the time of harvest, varying, from one year to another, between May and August.
2. The Byzantine indiction, known also as the Constantinopolitan or Constantinian indiction, was the only indiction used throughout the ROMAN EMPIRE, with the exception of Egypt. When this indiction was first instituted, the beginning of the indiction year fell on the day already designated the first day of the official year for the major part of the Orient since the time of AUGUSTUS, viz, September 23, the Natalis Augusti. It was later moved to September 1 during the latter half of the 5th century—most probably September 1, 462–463 (first year of the series). JUSTINIAN I made dating by indiction mandatory for all legal documents (CorpJurCivNov 47.2). The Byzantine indiction was used in the papal chancellery from the 5th century until 1087; it was used also in southern Italy in the states or principalities under Byzantine influence or control.
3. The Indiction of BEDE, called the Caesarean or Western indiction, was introduced by Bede, and began September 24.
4. The Papal indiction, appearing in the 11th century, began on December 25 and was in vogue up to the time of GREGORY XIII, when New Year's Day became January 1.
5. Local indictions were used at Genoa, Florence, Pisa, Siena, and Cologne.

To compute the Byzantine indiction for any year of the Christian era, the following rules apply: (1) for any date from January 1 to August 31, add 3 to the year date and divide by 15; the remainder is the year of the indiction; if there is no remainder, the indiction is 15; (2) for any date from September 1 to December 31, add 4 instead of 3. Dates in the non-Byzantine indictions, which have different beginnings, can be computed in a similar manner.

THE FEAST OF THE INFLICTION.

September 23, the beginning of the indiction and the first day of the civil year, became also the first day of the ecclesiastical year. It was also the feast of the Conception of JOHN THE BAPTIST, chronologically the first of the evangelical mysteries. This feast was retained even after the indiction had been moved back to September 1. This new date, primarily the opening of the civil year, was given also a religious character by the celebration of a feast commemorating the first preaching of Christ, recalled in Lk 4.16–22. When this feast was instituted is not known, but it already existed in the 8th century (found in the so-called Evangelary of Theodosius and in the Calendar of Morcelli) and had by that time supplanted September 23 as the beginning of the ecclesiastical year. The latter date was still called νέον ἔτος (novoe leto among the Slavs) up to the 12th century in several MSS, even though by that time the year began on September 1. A sermon by Philip Kerameus (12th century) on the indiction is extant (Patrologia Graeca 132:136–161), and a miniature representing the Gospel scene is found in the menology of Basil II.

In Constantinople, the feast was celebrated at HAGIA SOPHIA and included a procession to the Form of Constantine where prayers and hymns were offered (ps. Codinus, 13th century, Patrologia Graeca 157:96). The actual form, established by Joachim III, was as follows: following the celebration of the liturgy in the patriarchal church, the patriarch and his metropolitans, members of the Holy Synod, were led into a great meeting hall. There, after appropriate prayers and liturgical hymns, the patriarch, having announced the year of the indiction and the world year according to the Byzantine era, gave general absolution to all the faithful of his patriarchate. He then signed the praxis, to which all the metropolitans added their signatures.

Bibliography: Chronology. L. IDELER, Handbuch der mathematischen und technischen Chronologie, 2 v. (Berlin 1825–26) 2:347–364. V. GARDTHAUSEN, Griechische Palaeographie, 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1911–13) 2:454–467. F. K. GINZEL, Handbuch der mathematischen und technischen Chronologie, 3 v. (Leipzig 1906–14; repr. 1958) 3:148–155. Paulys Realencyklopädie der Klassischen Altertumswissenschaft (Stuttgart 1893) 9.2 (1916) 1327–32. H. LECLEERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 7.1:530–535. G. MAY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:652–653. Various editions of Μηναιον (Menaion) under Sept. 1. Τητικόν, Typikon, (Athens 1862; Constantinople 1888). v. GRUMEL, La Chronologie (Paris 1958) 192–306.

[V. GRUMEL]

INDIFFERENT ACTS

The acts of a human being extend from hidden choices of the WILL to manifest physical operations. Of these acts some are completely involuntary since they are beyond the rational control of man. Acts such as digestion and respiration, for example, are not within the domain of choice, and accordingly they are morally indifferent. Many actions, however, are performed with conscious advertence and choice, and as a result man is responsible for them; the individual has it within his power to do them or omit them. Acts of the first kind are called acts of man; the latter, those with knowledge and from a deliberate will, are properly called HUMAN ACTS. With regard to the latter category, the question arises whether there can be a voluntary act that is morally indifferent, namely, an act that is neither morally good nor bad, an act that is therefore amoral.

Determinants of Morality. The morality of a human act is determined by three aspects of the action. First, there is the object about which the choice is concerned. This object, even when the choice remains purely internal, can be considered the substance of the act. Second, the circumstances of time, place, status of the person, means, and manner qualify the object of the act and are concomitant determinants of the morality of the act. Third, the circumstance of purpose or reason for the act deserves special attention because the end colors the entire choice as qualified by the other circumstances. For a human act to be morally good, all three of these moral determinants must be good; that is, they must conform to objective norms of morality. Subjectively, the individual must follow his certain conscience dictating that all three elements are moral. If any of the three moral determinants is evil, then the entire act is morally evil. To choose something good, but for an evil purpose, vitiates the entire act. To choose something good for a good purpose but at a wrong time can make the whole act evil.

Positions. The possibility of a morally indifferent act was sharply disputed by the theologians of the Middle Ages. Abelard proposed the extreme position that every human act is objectively indifferent, and only receives its goodness or sinfulness from the intention or purpose of the agent. This position, condemned by the Council of Sens, was strongly attacked by Peter Lombard, whose Sentences were a standard theological text for three centuries (see 2 Sentences 40). The notion that at least some acts possess an intrinsic goodness or badness was generally accepted by Catholic thinkers, who could reflect on the centuries-old aphorism of St. Jerome: “Continen- ce is good, lust is evil; between the two, to walk is indifferent” (Epist. 112.16; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 55.2:386). In succeeding centuries, however, many nominalists, and to some extent Scotus, tended toward EXTRINSICISM. For them, all or nearly all human acts are good or evil because of the positive will of God commanding or forbidding them rather than because of the nature of the acts themselves. This position, although it enjoyed favor at the end of the medieval period, attracts few today.

In the early Franciscan school the question of the moral quality of acts was not clearly distinguished from the problem of supernatural MERIT. Despite minor differences within the school, it held that some individual human acts are morally indifferent. St. Bonaventure, for example, held that some acts are positively ordered to God; others are not. The first are good; but not all of the second are evil. He insisted that there can be acts that are not made meritorious by charity, nor are they sinful, since they are not of obligation. With regard to these acts, God does not reward men, nor does He judge men to be sinners.

St. Thomas Aquinas commenting on Lombard (In 2 sent. 40) and even more explicitly in the Summa theologiae (1a2ae, 18.8–9) proposed the doctrine now commonly accepted by Catholic theologians. He distinguished between an act in its general nature—this kind of human activity, as praying, cursing, walking—and an act in the concrete conditions of its existence. In the first way, he remarks, an act can be indifferent, for some acts according to their nature neither imply something pertaining to the order of reason nor something contrary to this order. In the second sense, however, every human act is morally good or bad. Every individual deliberate act takes its goodness not only from the object, but also from the end or purpose of the agent and from the other circumstances. These individuating elements stand in the same relation to the object of the act as the individuating accidents to the essence of a thing. Thus even though the act considered in itself (i.e., from its object) is indifferent, it is either good or evil from the end and circumstances; for no act is performed except for some end or reason, and this is either good or evil. Hence no individual human act is indifferent. Note also that this morality belongs to the act precisely as human or ethical and does not, as such, express a relation to the SUPERNATURAL ORDER or to supernatural merit.

Two additional points should be noted. Does moral indifference constitute a distinct species of morality so that human acts are divided into three species: good, bad, and indifferent? Theologians are not in agreement. Many deny this and argue that moral indifference is not a true species of morality. This is the position of the Salmanticenses and J. Gonet among classic authors, A. Tanquerey and T. Bouquillon among more modern authors. Other theologians (e.g., John of St. Thomas, D. Prümmer, R. Garrigou-Lagrange) insist that moral indifference is a true, but incomplete, species of morality.

The second difficulty concerns the relation of moral acts to man's supernatural DESTINY. Although every individual human act is good or evil ethically, some may be, as it were, supernaturally indifferent. Some human actions can be ethically good but not supernaturally meritorious, nor even ordered to SALVATION; for they are the acts of one estranged from God by serious sin, and may even be done without actual grace. Aquinas reflects a common theological position when he teaches that these acts are not sinful, for man's nature is not so corrupted by sin that he is incapable of all good actions (cf. Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 85.2; 109.2). This same truth, that every act of the sinner is not a sin, has received confirmation from the teaching authority of the Church [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 1481–82, 1539, 1557, 1575].

See Also: GOOD WORKS; MORALITY; SALUTARY ACTS.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, De malo 2.5. SALMANTICENSES, Cursus theologicus, tr. 11, disp. 1, dub. 1, 2; tr. 11, disp. 7 (v. 6:53–62, 165–81). O. LOTTIN, Psychologie et morale aux XII<sup>e</sup> et XIII<sup>e</sup> siècles, 6 v. in 8 (Louvain 1942–60) 2:469–89. P. PALAZZINI, ed., Dictionarium morale et canonicum, v.2 (Vatican City 1965) 676–79.

[J. A. BURROUGHS; J. HENNESSEY]

INDIFFERENTISM

A doctrinal system that exalts the attitude (internal) that all philosophical opinions, all religions, and all ethical doctrines regarding life are equally true and valuable. Accordingly, no one religion contains certain truth. It differs from religious tolerance (in which a religion—considered false—is permitted to exist), from irreligion (in which all religions are judged to be false), from civil religious freedom of conscience (in which the state makes no judgment about the value of various forms of worship), and from religious neutrality (in which the state does not become involved in religious controversy). It also differs from practical religious indifference, which is the neglect of religious practice arising from contempt of religion or from psychological, sociological, and environmental factors. Syncretism, or the fusion of various creeds by surrendering certain dogmatic or moral teachings, is the outgrowth of religious indifferentism.

PIUS IX, in his Syllabus of Errors, condemned certain propositions under the heading of indifferentism, such as that man has a right to absolute freedom of religion and that one can come to salvation through any religion whatever. VATICAN COUNCIL II, employing a pastoral approach, reappraised the topics of communicatio in sacris, irreligious indifferentism, irenicism, and religious freedom.

Communicatio in sacris. This means common worship (i.e., sharing in the official, public prayer of a Church). The Decree on Ecumenism replaced the strict attitude of Canon Law (e.g., 1917 CIC cc. 732; 1258; 2319), which prohibited active participation on the grounds that other Christian communities lacked the character of a Church. Reversing this position, the Decree recommended a discriminating (not general) participation in the worship and Sacraments of other Churches (Unitatis redintegratio 8), particularly of the separated Eastern Churches (cf. Orientalium Ecclesiarum 26–29; Ecumenical Directory of the Secretariat for Unity, Part I, 39–54). The Decree provided two principles for avoiding religious indifferentism: first, liturgical worship and the Sacraments signify an already existing—even if not perfect—unity of the Church and thus general participation cannot be applied in most cases; second, as a means of grace for the faithful, liturgical worship and the Sacraments also contribute to the growth of unity.

Irreligious Indifferentism. Such indifferentism was divided into postulatory atheism of the West and atheistic communism of the East. The pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World places atheism in its treatment on the question of man: that is, atheism is not considered from a metaphysical or epistemological perspective but is viewed in terms of an authentic desire for true humanism (Gaudium et spes 19–21). Postulatory atheism stresses the absence of God and the value of man alone on the existential level. Disregarding the economic and political aspects of atheistic communism of the East, the Decree refers to previous repudiations of communism; it then urges the Church to reflect on its own defective humanism and its role in the growth of Marxism. Irreligious indifferentism thus has its roots more in man's attempt to become truly human than in any positive act against God or religious institutions. Since Vatican II, LIBERATION THEOLOGY has attempted to develop humanistic principles (based on the dignity of man and his freedom as a Christian) that seek to avoid both postulatory atheism and atheistic communism (see ATHEISM).

Irenicism. As a conciliatory approach to doctrine, irenicism may be true or false. The Decree on Ecumenism rejects false irenicism, or the partial disclosure or diluting of tenets on either side of a dialogue to achieve peaceful union; it is contrary to the spirit of ecumenism and leads to mutual deception. On the contrary, the Decree encourages true irenicism, which avoids polemics, practices brotherly love, recognizes goodness and truth wherever found and emphasizes common aspects and presents Catholic doctrine more profoundly, more precisely, and more fully in a mutually understandable language (Unitatis redintegratio 11).

Religious Freedom. The Declaration on Religious Freedom, basing its position on the dignity of the human person (fully known only in the light of Revelation), insisted on two negatively stated rights: (1) no man may be compelled in the religious sphere to act in a manner contrary to his conscience; (2) within due limits no one may be prevented from acting in accordance with his conscience (Dignitatis humanae 2). The document considers only the moral dimensions of religious freedom—rights whose object is freedom from coercion but not the content of religious faith—and thus does not pass judgment on the problems of the true or the erroneous conscience. Regardless of former practices, a person today, whether believer or nonbeliever, has the right not to be prevented from practicing his religion, whether privately or publicly. Religious freedom thus leads to religious pluralism which, however, is not to be confused with religious indifference; religious pluralism is based on the right to profess and practice one's religion and makes no value judgment on truth and error; religious indifference, however, suggests that all religions equally possess truth and thus have equal value.

Bibliography: W. G. TOPMOELLER, The Problem of Dogmatic Indifferentism according to John Henry Cardinal Newman (Rome 1956). J. FEINER, "Decree on Ecumenism," Vorgrimler 2: 57–164. H. HOECK, "Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches," ibid. 1: 307–331. N. MOLINSKI, "Indifferentism," Sacramentum Mundi 3: 120–121. P. PAVAN, "Declaration on Human Freedom," Vorgrimler 4: 49–86. J. RATZINGER, "Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World," Part One, Introd. and ch. 1, "Dignity of the Human Person," ibid. 5: 115–163. Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, Directorium. . . de re oecumenica, Pars I, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 59 (1967) 574–592, tr. Directory for the Application of the Decisions of the Second Vatican Council concerning Ecumenical Matters, Part I (USCC Publ. Office, Washington, D.C. 1967).

[T. F. MCMAHON/EDS.]

INDIVIDUALITY

An abstract word, individuality is a philosophical term for what constitutes the individual. Individual itself is the translation of the Greek term ἄτομον and designates what is not divided. In the strictest sense of the word, an individual is a being distinct from every other being and undivided in itself. It is, then, an ontological UNITY that is not identical with anything else.

Individual and Individuation. An individual is a concrete and substantial being. One cannot speak of an ACCIDENT, e.g., a color or a sound, as an individual. But man, this living man, is an individual, i.e., a BEING who subsists, who persists in existence by himself. An individual, then, is also a singular being, one among many, a being in a multitude or a SPECIES. It is not a species, not even the most determinate among all species; rather it is a being in which the species is fulfilled under a singular form by individuation.

This relation between the individual and the species gives rise to the logical intention associated with the term individual. Like the genus, the species is a being of reason, a being of second or logical intention. This logical intention presupposes a real intention that directly attains the thing formally called an individual, when focusing precisely on its inclusion in a species. (See INTENTIONALITY; LOGIC.)

The individual is therefore the singular, substantial, concrete being considered in its undivided unity and as separated from every other being. An angel is an individual, as also is a man, an animal, a particular plant, a concrete thing. The character of individual unity is easy to recognize in manifestly living things. On the borderline between the vegetal world and inorganic matter, individuality becomes more difficult to discern; yet molecules and atoms seem recognizable from their characteristics in some experimental situations as individual realities.

The notion of individuality transcends the world of matter. Within the material world, however, the individual comes to exist by a process known as individuation. Although there is much philosophical discussion about how individuation is accomplished, the most common answer proposes that, in material species, the specific form is individuated by reason of its relation to the matter that receives it. The latter, called primary matter, exists under conditions that imply an ordination to such or such a quantity, this quantity being what determines the individual material being when the substantial form is educed from the primary matter (see MATTER AND FORM; SUBSTANTIAL CHANGE). At least on the basis of a radical title, however, individuation does not result from quantity itself, even within material species. Corporeal substance is individuated and an individual by the mutual causality of the essential elements constituting a material being; the unity and individuality of this substance belong to the ontological order. Yet it is true that quantity, an accident, intervenes in individuation by an extrinsic title, and that the individuated substance is affected with a determinate quantity that makes it "one" in the order of number, i.e., in the world of numerical unities. In the human species, a man is one individual among many; but this man exists as an individual by reason of something other than mere quantitative unity.

The scholastic teaching on the human soul sheds light on this doctrine of the individuation of forms substantially united to this or that matter. Specifically identical, human souls exist only as this or that soul, i.e., as individuated in proportionate matter. Yet, when the human soul is separated from matter through death, it retains its character as a distinct soul, one in its essence and individualized by reason of the proportions that marked it. Obviously its individuality then does not essentially imply the presence of material quantity. (See SOUL, HUMAN.)

Meanings of Individuality. An ontological consideration of individuality is necessary to explain how individuality is common to both material and immaterial entities. One must first distinguish between individuality and individuation. Individuation is what results from the proportion between form and matter, and thus pertains to the physical order. Individuality, on the other hand, is what terminates an individual nature so that it receives existence for itself. Since this involves the consideration of the relation between an individual nature and its existence, abstracting from whether that nature is material or not, individuality pertains properly to the metaphysical or ontological order. (See INDIVIDUATION.)

In reference to man, the notion of individuality is closely related to that of PERSONALITY. An individual endowed with a rational nature is a person. [See PERSON (IN PHILOSOPHY).] The person is incommunicable, he is a whole within himself, by reason of his individuality. But the existing irrational individual is also incommunicable, with a similar type of individuality. To indicate the difference between the person and the irrational individual, the term personality is generally used to refer to the former, the term individuality to refer to the latter.

By reason of his rationality, however, the human person must be further considered under a moral aspect. Now this aspect is twofold, since the human person has one moral relation to his own perfection and another in his order to SOCIETY. Some authors use the term person to indicate the former aspect, the term individual to indicate the latter; and, consequently, they make corresponding moral predications respectively of personality and individuality. In this context they say that society is at the service of the person, although, considered as an individual, this same person is at the service of temporal society. They further claim that the individual (according to his moral definition) has only human values of the same order as those that belong to society, and that these values of the individual should be ordered to society as parts to a whole, while the person (again according to this moral definition), by reason of his value, transcends all properly so-called sociological values.

This position is presented here only to clarify a common moral usage of the term individuality. If individuality, in its moral sense, means the order of the individual human nature to society, then it implies the order of the individual's conduct to the COMMON GOOD of society. It does not signify, then, uniqueness in the sense of conduct that is completely dissonant from the order to the true social good. Nor does it signify originality in the current meaning of this word. However, in other contexts, it is possible to make a moral use of the term individuality in the pejorative sense of that which makes a person antisocial.

Multitude and Number. In the realm of separated forms, such as angels, individuation is accomplished without any relation to matter. The angel is this angel precisely as individuated by his form, by his very essence. (See ANGELS, 2.) Furthermore, as is commonly true in the realm of forms, even the least variation changes the species; thus the individual angel is a species to himself. The multitude of angels is composed of individuals who have nothing at all to do with matter or with number, in the quantitative sense of this term. By himself, by his being and definition, each angel is an individual or person. The term MULTITUDE designates the assembly, or, in a metaphorical sense, the great number of these angels.

If, however, one takes the word number in its proper meaning, it implies very many unities resulting from species and time. In this sense, number is a kind of QUANTITY, namely, discrete quantity. Each of the individuals included in this number, then, is deemed to belong to the realm of enumerable beings by its own quantity, which makes it numerically one, by reason of a certain homogeneity made visible by quantity and the accidents related to it.

See Also: INDIVIDUATION; PERSONALITY; UNITY.

Bibliography: J. MARITAIN, "Personne et individu," Acta Pontificiae Academiae Romanae S. Thomae Aquinatis (1946); The Person and the Common Good, tr. J. J. FITZGERALD (New York 1947). A. WALTERS and K. O'HARA, Persons and Personality (New York 1953). T. HÉBERT, "Notre connaissance intellectuelle du singulier matériel," Laval Théologique et Philosophique 5 (1949) 33-65. L. DE BROGLIE, "Sur la complémentarité des idées d'individu et de système," Dialectica 2 (1948) 351-382. P. DESCOQS, "Individu et personne," Archivio di Filosofia 8 (1938) 235-292. G. MORRA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1364-70. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927-30) 1:732-741.

[L. M. CORVEZ]

St. Thomas Aquinas. (Archive Photos)

INDIVIDUATION

The constitution of a being whereby it is “undivided in itself and divided from all other beings” (Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 3a, 77.2; 1a, 29.4) or the constitution of a being “in such manner that it is not, according to the ratio by which it is called ‘one,’ communicable to many as to inferiors that would be subject to it or would, according to that ratio, be many” (F. Suárez, Disp. meta. 5.1.2). This article presents a philosophical analysis of this notion as it has been developed in the scholastic tradition. It consists of the following: (1) a clarification of the term “individuation”; (2) a historical survey of ancient and medieval views concerning it; (3) a summary of the teaching found in the writings of Thomas Aquinas and some of the most important Thomistic commentators; (4) a summary of the teaching of John Duns Scotus; and (5) a summary of the teaching of Francisco Suárez. (For other meanings of individuation, see INDIVIDUALITY.).

Meaning of term. As is evident from the definitions cited above, two elements are involved in individuation, namely, indivision in self and DIVISION from every other individual. The negation of division involved in individuation is not, however, merely that which is found in UNITY in general. The negation of division proper to individuation involves denial of division of an entity into many, each of which would be the same as the entire entity divided. Thus, the undividedness of the individual or of a singular unity involves incommunicability; that is, whatever is an individual cannot be common either in the sense of actually existing in various things or in the sense of being predicable of many in the same manner.

Individuation may be considered in three ways: metaphysically, physically, and logically. These three ways of viewing individuation are distinguished by JOHN OF ST. THOMAS in the following manner. Considered metaphysically, individuation means the last degree in the series of all predicaments or categories in the same way as the supreme GENUS means the first degree. This lowest degree is due to the ultimate difference by which a SPECIES is contracted to an individual. Considered physically, individuation means numerical unity, by means of which something is one in such manner that it is undivided in itself and divided from everything else. Considered logically, individuation means to be subjectable to all superior predicates and to be predicable of only one thing, that is, itself (Curs. phil. Nat. phil. 2.9.3).

The expression “principle of individuation” may be understood in various ways. The epistemological or manifestive principle of individuation is that by which one knows or recognizes an individual. This consists of the empirical signs of individuality, otherwise known as the individuating notes. The extrinsic principle of individuation is the efficient cause that produces the individual. The intrinsic principle of individuation is whatever entity it is within the individual that accounts for the individual’s being this individual and no other. This intrinsic principle may be viewed, moreover, either as a formal principle or as a radical or constitutive principle. Accordingly, it may refer to that which formally constitutes the intrinsic completeness and extrinsic definiteness of every individual being; or it may refer to that from which arises, or by which is constituted, this individual—undivided in itself, incommunicable, and separated from all others.

Also, the principle of individuation may be viewed with reference to either absolute or relative individuality. Individuality is regarded absolutely when a thing is considered merely in itself, with no advertence as to whether or not there are or can be other members in the same species. Thus, every being may be considered individual in the absolute sense. Individuality is regarded relatively when a thing is considered in relation to an actual or at least possible multitude of things of the same species. Hence, only being that does not exclude the possibility of a plurality of beings of the same species may be considered individual in the relative sense.

Ancient and medieval views. The solution to the problem of the principle of individuation has importance not only in itself, but also for its consequences in many fields, such as metaphysics, epistemology, psychology, ethics, and philosophy of value. Hence, as would be expected, philosophers in all ages have been interested in this problem. However, since various philosophers have adverted to different aspects of this problem and, further, have based their solutions on different metaphysical and epistemological principles, the solutions that have been proposed are numerous and widely diverse.

Aristotle. ARISTOTLE proposed MATTER as the principle of individuation (Meta. 1034a 5–8, 1074a 33). From his Platonic legacy, he accepted the principle that scientific knowledge is immutable and eternally valid knowledge and that, therefore, the object of such knowledge must also be immutable and eternal. Holding both that scientific knowledge is knowledge of the essences of things and that things receive their essences from their forms, Aristotle concluded that the forms of things cannot be the basis for the multiplicity and change connected with individuals. Every difference of form would effect a specific difference (ibid. 1058b 1–2). However, matter, which the individual includes in addition to its form, is apt to function as the basis for multiplicity and change, for matter is potential and undetermined. Thus, there is nothing on the part of matter that prohibits the connection of the same form with various parts of the matter and thereby a multiplicity of individuals originating as the result of the divisibility of matter.

Boethius, Gilbert, and the Arabs. BOETHIUS asserted that “numerical difference is caused by a variety of accidents” (De Trin. 1). Thus, instead of explaining the individuation of an essence by completely undetermined matter, Boethius taught that an essence is individualized in virtue of its being determined by place, time, and other accidents. GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE maintained that the individual is constituted of various forms that are not themselves singular; yet in each individual there is something unique. This uniqueness he explained as arising from the uniqueness of the collection of forms composing the individual. Thus, though the forms themselves are common, that is, shared by other individuals in the same species or genus, the particular combination of forms in the individual is never duplicated in any other being (In librum de duabus naturis; Patrologia Latina 64: 1372D). The Arabian philosophers, such as ALFARABI, AVICENNA, and AVERROËS, followed in general the Aristotelian doctrine that forms, universal in themselves, are individuated through matter.

Thirteenth- and fourteenth-century thinkers. Particularly during the thirteenth century there arose tremendous interest in the problem of individuation. In fact, solutions to this problem developed into programs distinctive of the various schools and consequently caused serious controversy. ROGER BACON placed great stress on the nobility and importance of the individual. In his youth, while lecturing on Aristotle’s Metaphysics and writing his Quaestiones, Bacon did propose that individuation was derived principally from matter. In his later works, however, he presented an entirely different view, maintaining that there is no intrinsic cause of individuation since nothing can be added to a universal to make it an individual. It is God, he asserted, who causes individuals and therefore is ultimately responsible for individuation.

St. BONAVENTURE, following the teaching of ALEXANDER OF HALES, maintained that there is no form without matter. According to St. Bonaventure, however, matter may be either corporeal or spiritual, depending on the FORM it receives. Since matter is common to all beings, St. Bonaventure asserted that matter cannot be the source of individuation. Instead, he held that it is the union of the matter and form that is the true principle of individuation (In 2 sent. 3.1.2.3).

HENRY OF GHENT denied that individuality adds any real element to the existing specific ESSENCE. It is simply because individual things exist actually and extramentally that they differ from one another. Therefore, Henry asserted that individuation is explained by negation, namely, negation of intrinsic division and negation of identity with another being (Quodl. 5.8).

Most of the Franciscan thinkers of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, such as WILLIAM DE LA MARE, JOHN PECKHAM, Étienne TEMPIER, RICHARD OF MIDDLETON, and John Duns Scotus, rejected, at times quite forcefully, the theory of matter as the principle of individuation. There were also, of course, many defenders of the Aristotelian theory, among whom may be enumerated ALBERT THE GREAT, SIGER OF BRABANT, GILES OF ROME, and Thomas Aquinas.

For still other medieval philosophers, such as DURANDUS OF SAINT-POURÇAIN, PETER AUREOLI, HENRY OF HARCLAY, and WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, individuation presented no problem whatever. These philosophers, asserting that every being by reason of its actual existence is individual, found no meaning at all in the search for something whereby an extramental object is rendered individual.

Thomistic school. By far the most important of the defenders of the position that matter is the principle of individuation were St. THOMAS AQUINAS and his Dominican commentators, particularly Cajetan, John of St. Thomas, and Ferrariensis.

Aquinas’s teaching. In accord with Aristotle, St. Thomas maintained that the form, which is the basis of the substantial essence, cannot be the basis of individuality; for form in itself is universal and can be received into one or more substrata. Also, accidents cannot account for individuality, for the individual belongs to the category of SUBSTANCE. Since the principle of individuation must then be substantial, but cannot be the form, which is a principle of specification, it follows that the principle of individuation must be matter. However, recognizing that primary matter, just as form, is by nature common and can be determined by many forms, St. Thomas introduced into his doctrine the notion of QUANTITY. He proposed signate matter, matter related to quantity, as the principle of individuation (De ente 2). (See MATTER AND FORM.)

This necessitated, however, an explanation of the precise relation of matter to quantity. In investigating the texts of St. Thomas with regard to this problem, one must consider these in their chronological order, for St. Thomas's thought on this subject underwent gradual evolution. In a very early work, influenced perhaps by Avicenna, he explained the diversity in matter by the forma corporeitatis (In 1 sent. 8.5.2). He quickly abandoned this position, however, and substituted in its place the notion of matter subject to indeterminate dimensions (In Boeth. de Trin. 4.2). Later, rejecting also this position, he maintained that matter with determined dimensions is the principle of individuation (De nat. mat. 3).

The individuation of human souls is explained by St. Thomas also by matter. He asserted that diversity and distinction of grades in souls is caused by diversity of bodies (In 2 sent. 3.2.2.3). Since the soul is according to its substance the form of a body, the soul necessarily retains its relation to the body, even after its separation from the body in death. It is by this relation to the body that St. Thomas explained the individuation of the separated soul. Further, since numerical difference comes about only by matter, it follows that where there is no matter beings cannot be multiplied within their kinds. Thus St. Thomas maintained that angels, in virtue of their having no matter, are infinite in the order of essence and therefore must differ specifically one from another (De spir. creat. 8).

Cajetan. Because St. Thomas did not clearly indicate in his writings the precise relation that matter bears to quantity in its role of principle of individuation, there arose considerable disagreement among his commentators. Tommaso de Vio CAJETAN, one of the principal interpreters of the thought of St. Thomas, rejected the opinion that the aggregate of matter and quantity is the principle of individuation. Rather, he maintained that matter itself is the proper root of individuation. In his commentary on De ente et essentia (5.37), Cajetan explained signate matter as matter capable of "this" quantity, so that it is not capable of "that." However, in his commentary on the Summa Theologiae (29.1), Cajetan modified his view slightly and explained signate matter as matter that is the source, the cause quasi-productive of the quantity. He argued that if quantity is able to accomplish its effect in things that receive it, surely the production of the same result should not be impossible to the fundamental source of quantity. Therefore, Cajetan asserted that matter is as capable as quantity of distinguishing numerically.

John of St. Thomas. John of St. Thomas held a similar opinion regarding the meaning of signate matter. He stated that the signation of matter is not accomplished by quantity as by an inherent form of matter affecting it, but by the intrinsic ordination of matter to quantity as to a dividing and separating form (Curs. phil. Phil. nat. 2.9.4). Just as matter implies an ordination to accidents as to dispositions by which the potentiality of matter is determined to this form rather than to that, so matter implies an ordination to quantity as to one of the dispositions. However, quantity has not only the function of informing the subject in which it is, thereby bestowing the formal effect of EXTENSION; but quantity is also related to its subject as dividing one part of matter from another part. Nonetheless, it is matter and not quantity that is the cause of incommunicability and substantial distinction.

Ferrariensis. An interpretation of signate matter that is very different from that presented by Cajetan and John of St. Thomas is found in the work of FERRARIENSIS (FRANCESCO SILVESTRI). According to him, signate matter is matter actually informed by quantity (Commentary on the Contra Gentiles 1.21). The fundamental reason on which he based his argument is that ACT is what distinguishes anything. Now signate matter is nothing other than matter so appropriated to a certain individual as to be capable of underlying that individual's quantity and no other. This appropriation, however, is either due to a form or not. If it is due to some form, either substantial or accidental, then the appropriated and signate matter does not imply only primary matter, but matter together with a form by which it is said to be appropriated and signate. If there is no form, then this situation must be reconciled with the fact that no potency whatever receives limitation and appropriation except by means of some act that it receives. Since primary matter is simply potency, it receives determination only from some form. Hence, if it is necessary that matter be signate in order that the form be individuated in virtue of this signation, then there must be in the matter some act that is really distinct from the matter.

Scotistic teaching. John Duns Scotus held that the principle of individuation must be a proper positive entity that is added to the nature and constitutes the individual. To determine the principle of individuation, Scotus considered two questions: (1) How is it that the individual is not divisible into subordinated parts? (2) How is it that the individual is really distinct from other individuals? His answer to the first question was based on the principle unum et ens convertuntur. He argued that an entity must correspond to every unity; and further, a different entity must correspond to a different unity. Since individuation is a special unity, there must be within the individual a corresponding entity. In answering the second question, Scotus asserted that the real distinction of individuals presupposes that there are contained in them realities that differ. Thus within the individual there must be, in addition to the common nature, a positive entity that corresponds to the singular unity and accounts for the distinctness of the individual. This positive entity, the haecceitas, which is formally distinct from the common nature, was likened by Scotus to the specific difference. He asserted that as the specific difference effects by its accession to the genus the indivisibility into further species and the distinctness of one species from all others, so the haecceitas effects by its accession to the species the indivisibility of the individual and the distinctness of one individual from all others (Op. oxon. 3.6.9).

Suárezian teaching. A position very different from both that of St. Thomas and that of Scotus is found in the work of Francisco SUÁREZ. Admitting nothing in reality that is not actually singular, Suárez found no need for a principle of individuation for an individual substance other than the entity of the substance itself. Thus he writes that “every entity is by itself the principle of its individuation” (Disp. meta. 5.6.1). Although Suárez admitted that individual unity does add something to the common nature, he insisted that what the individual unity adds is only mentally distinct from the nature (5.2.16). The individuation of all finite being, whether spiritual or material, is explained in the same way by Suárez. Further, with this explanation of individuation, it does not follow necessarily that purely spiritual creatures are specifically different; for similarity does not exclude distinctness.

See Also: ESSENCE.

Bibliography: J. R. ROSENBERG, The Principle of Individuation: A Comparative Study of St. Thomas, Scotus and Suárez (Washington 1950). A. GAZZANO, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1360–1363. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:732–741. T. N. HARPER, The Metaphysics of the School, 3 v. (New York 1879–84; repr. New York 1940). H. MEYER, The Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, tr. F. C. ECKHOFF (St. Louis 1948). G. M. MANSER, Das Wesen des Thomismus (Thomistische Studien 5; 3d ed. Freiburg 1949). J. ASSENMACHER, Die Geschichte des Individuationsprinzips in der Scholastik (Leipzig 1926). L. FUETSCHER, Akt und Potenz (Philosophie und Grenzwissenschaften 4.4–6; Innsbruck 1933) 168–243. R. MESSNER, “Das Individuationsprinzip in skotischer Schau,” Wissenschaft und Weisheit 1 (1934) 8–27. JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, Cursus philosophicus thomisticus, ed. B. REISER, 3 v. (new ed. Turin 1930–37).

[J. R. ROSENBERG]

INDIVISIBLE

Literally, indivisible is that which cannot be divided. One may distinguish mathematical from physical indivisibles and their uses in philosophy and mathematics. Since DIVISION follows upon distinction, in turn dependent upon OPPOSITION, the term is understood with reference to material (quantitative) or to formal opposition. Material indivisibles are either absolute—points and numerical units; or relative—that which de facto is not divided or would be destroyed by division, e.g., an electron. Formally, indivisibles have, or are considered to have, simple intelligibility, e.g., a GENUS or a specific NATURE. Because a DEFINITION, being complex, cannot be formed of them, absolute formal indivisibles are often known only negatively or in relation to composites.

In the physical universe, perhaps exclusively, there are relative quantitative indivisibles. The discrete particles that, as a result of experimental and theoretical physics, are thought to constitute physical reality—e.g., atoms, subatomic particles, and photons—are destroyed when divided, although the matter-energy balance is thought to be preserved. Such indivisibles are not always individuals, though true individuals are always indivisibles.

Linear EXTENSION, along with MOTION and TIME, are considered instances of continua within which indivisibles are distinguished. The INSTANT of time and the moment of motion are compared analogously to the geometric point, and the question has been debated concerning their actual continuing and/or terminating function. Granted that they terminate, there is still question of their precise nature. The general view is that terminating indivisibles, e.g., points at the ends of lines, are positive and really but only modally distinct from that which they terminate. Concerning indivisibles in mathematics, see BOYER.

See Also: CONTINUUM.

Bibliography: J. GREDT, Elementa philosophiae Aristotelico-Thomisticae, ed. E. ZENZEN, 2 v. (13th ed. Freiburg 1961). R. P. PHILLIPS, Modern Thomistic Philosophy, 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1934; repr. 1945). C. B. BOYER, The History of the Calculus and Its Conceptual Development (pa. New York 1959).

[C. F. WEIHER]

Capital: Jakarta.
Size: 779,675 sq. miles.
Population: 228,437,870; the majority are Javanese, with significant communities of Sundanese, Madurese, Minang, Lampong, Macassarese, Banten, Bugese and others. There is a very small but economically significant Chinese community.
Languages: Bahasa Indonesia (official), English, Dutch, local dialects, the most widely spoken of which is Javanese.
Religions: Muslim 88%, Protestant 5%, Roman Catholic 3%, Hindu 2%, Buddhist 1%, other 1%.

INDONESIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Indonesia is located in Southeast Asia, straddling the equator along 5,110 kilometers between the coast of Southeast Asia and Australia, extending from 6 to 11 degrees northern latitude and from 95 to 141 degrees eastern longitude. Indonesia is the world's largest archipelago comprising over 13,000 islands (6,000 inhabited). Previously known as the Dutch East Indies, Indonesia proclaimed its independence in 1945 and was acknowledged as an independent republic by international treaty in 1949. Indonesia is also the fourth most populous country in the world, with a population exceeding 225 million. The official motto, "bhinneka tunggal ika" ("unity in diversity"), reflects a nation with some 350 languages and over 30 major cultural domains.

Early Christian Missions. Archaeological excavations in the 1990s confirm seafarers' accounts of a Christian community at Baros on the west coast of northern Sumatra in the 7th century. There is evidence of small Christian communities in Southeast Sumatra and East Java during the 9th to the 13th centuries. Franciscans traveling to China also visited Indonesian ports. J. de Monte Corvino visited the east coast of Sumatra in 1291, Odoric of Pordenone spent some months in Sumatra, Java and Kalimantan (1312), and John de Marignolli also remained for a time in Palembang, Sumatra, in 1347. These small enclaves died out. Present day Christian churches date back to the early Catholic and Protestant missions of the 16th and 17th centuries and more particularly to the mission outreach of the 19th and 20th centuries.

Jesuit and Dominican Missions. The Portuguese sailed through Indonesian waters in 1511 seeking sandalwood from Timor and spices from the Moluccas. The first baptisms were carried out by a lay Portuguese trader, Gonzalo Veloso, in Mamuia, Halmahera in 1534. Catholic communities were established in the Moluccas, Amboina and Ternate. From 1546 to 1547, the Jesuit missionary St. Francis XAVIER spent 14 months in Indonesia, visiting North Sulawesi and Ternate Island and founding a minor seminary. From their base at Ternate, the Jesuits worked in the Moluccas and Sulawesi until the Dutch expelled them in 1605. In the 1550s, Joao Soares, a layman formed a Catholic mission in Nusa Tenggara (comprising Timor, Alor, Flores, and Solor islands). In 1562, the DOMINICANS from Malacca settled in Solor, the hub of the sandalwood trade, establishing a minor seminary in 1596. By 1599, there were more than 22,000 Catholics. As Dutch control expanded, the Dominicans moved from Solor to Larantuka in east Flores in 1613, then to Lifao c.1650 on the coast of west Timor, and finally to Dili on the coast of east Timor c.1771. At the beginning of the 17th century, there were some 50,000 Catholics in both the Moluccas and Nusa Tenggara.

From the 16th to the 18th centuries, the Portuguese directed their missions from Goa and Cochin in India, from Malacca on the Malay peninsula, and from Macao in China. Portuguese claim to east Nusa Tenggara was not made until 1702. Before that date, the Dominicans administered the territory, paying for military protection themselves. From 1581 to 1719, some 27 Dominicans were killed together with numerous Indonesian Catholics. Some were clearly martyrs for their faith (e.g., Agostinho da Magdalena, Joao Bautista and Simao de Madre Dos on Solor in 1621). Others were killed for commercial and political motives, because they were on the losing side of a trade war between the Catholic Portuguese and the Protestant Dutch, the latter supported by Muslim Sultanates such as that of Macassar. Often, the Dominicans led battles in Flores and Timor against the encroaching Dutch and Macassarese. In Aceh, on the northern tip of Sumatra, the Discalced Carmelites Bionysius and Redemptus were killed in 1638.

In 1605 the Dutch East India Company (VOC) suppressed the Catholic mission because of their support of Portuguese trading rivals. Defeated in war, many Catholics either converted to Protestantism (as in the Moluccas and Timor), or to Islam (as along the coast of Solor and Flores). In 1605, the first Protestant Church was established in Ambon. The Portuguese mission survived in east Timor and east Flores. However it was almost totally neglected during the 18th century. During this period, a fascinating symbiosis developed between local culture and popular Catholicism. Annual Holy Week Processions were organized by the Confreria Reinha Rosario, a group of powerful laymen in Larantuka who placed themselves under the protection of Renha Rosari, the Queen of the Rosary. These traditions maintained a Catholic identity until Dutch Catholic priests arrived in 1860. A Marian vision on the eve of a battle for Larantuka led to the defeat of a band of marauding Macassarese in 1641.

Missionary Revival. In 1800, the VOC was suppressed and Indonesia became a Dutch colony. In 1808 the first Dutch Catholic priests landed in Java to minister to Dutch expatriates, Eurasians and later the urban Chinese-Indonesians. In 1841 the Vicariate Apostolic of Batavia was erected for the whole archipelago. Dutch JESUITS arrived in 1858, and were gradually entrusted with the care of Catholics throughout the colony. Frequent conflicts erupted between the clergy and the colonial authorities because the Dutch governor general reserved to himself authority to appoint and transfer Protestant and Catholic clergy. Government regulations of 1853 (renewed in 1922)—the so-called “dubbele zending”—prohibited Protestant and Catholic missionaries from working in the same district. Thus, Flores became Catholic and north Sumatra Protestant. As a result, even today, denominational allegiance largely follows ethnic and territorial lines. Missioners were also barred from regions considered strongly Muslim. Thus, there were no missions in west Java among the Sundanese and Banten people, or in Aceh on the north tip of Sumatra, or among the Malay and Lampong communities of Minangkabau in west Sumatra, or among the Macassarese and Bugese people of south Sulawesi, or indeed among the Hindus of Bali (where missionaries first entered in the 1930s).

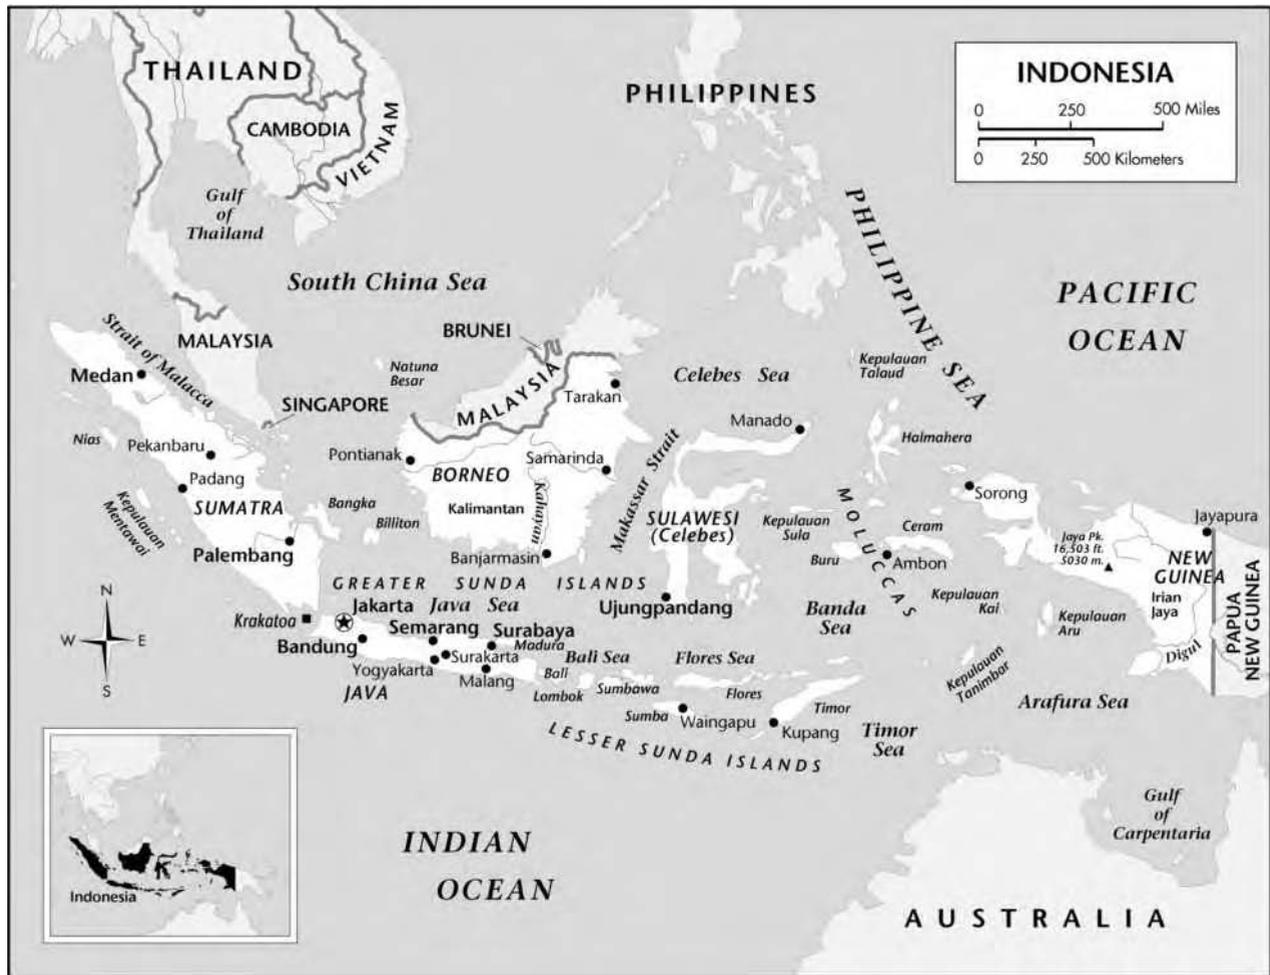

Francis van Lith SJ (1863–1926) came to Indonesia in 1896 and re-founded the Catholic Church in central Java among the indigenous population. The birth of the Catholic Church in Central Java can be dated to the baptism of four village heads on May 20, 1904, and more particularly to the baptism of 168 Javanese at the sacred spring of Sendangsono on December 15 by van Lith himself. Sendangsono eventually became the main pilgrimage centre for Javanese Catholics. F. van Lith lived in the villages, learned the Javanese language, and then established farming cooperatives. He founded a suburban high school at Muntilan and educated the first generation of Javanese clergy and nationalist politicians.

The 1859 Portuguese-Dutch treaty acceded Flores to the Dutch while the Portuguese retained the eastern half of Timor. A Dutch diocesan priest arrived in Flores a year later but was replaced by Jesuits in 1863. The latter began the long process of re-incorporating the popular Catholicism of Larantuka into the official Catholic Church. Growth was modest; by 1900 there were just 20,000 Catholics in east and central Flores. By 1914 the Jesuits had developed the two ancient Florenese communities of Larantuka and Sikka into flourishing congregations of about 30,000 adherents. In the 20th century, the Jesuits were complemented by other religious congregations—the CAPUCHINS in Kalimantan (1905) and Sumatra (1911), the Society of the Divine Word in Nusa Tenggara (1913), the Sacred Heart Missionaries in north Sulawesi

Metropolitan Sees	Suffragans
Ende	Denpasar, Larantuka, Ruteng
Jakarta	Bandung, Bogor
Kupang	Atambua, Weetebula
Medan	Padang, Palembang, Pangkal-Pinang, Sibolga, Tanjungkarang
Merauke	Agats, Jayapura, Manokwari-Sorong
Pontianak	Banjarmasin, Ketapang, Palangkaraya, Samarinda, Sanggau, Sintang
Semarang	Malang, Purwokerto, Surabaya
Ujung Pandang	Amboina, Manado

(1919). The Jesuits remained in central Java (from Yogyakarta to Semarang) and Batavia (present-day Jakarta). Most religious instruction in the villages was carried out by village catechists, the unsung heroes of the mass conversion of Flores from 1920 to 1950. In 1950 some 60 percent of Catholics lived in Nusa Tenggara; 50 years later, after growth elsewhere, over 30 percent still live in this region, the area with the most number of Catholics. In Central Java, Nusa Tenggara, the Moluccas and West Papua, missionary linguists wrote dictionaries and ethnologists recorded the cultures. A Catholic school system was established throughout the archipelago and all schools in Nusa Tenggara were entrusted to the church in 1913. Many of the first generation of national leaders were educated at these schools. Until Muslim revitalisation of the 1980s, many students became Christian while exposed to the dedication and example of teachers, both religious and lay. However, by the end of the 20th century, Catholic schools had largely lost this role and Muslims had developed their own educational system.

World War II. In March 1942 Japan invaded Indonesia and occupied the archipelago until August 1945. During this occupation most clergy were interned (the Germans in 1939, the Dutch in 1942). For both Catholics and Protestants the three-year occupation marked a short, sharp transition to adulthood. While the Protestant Churches already had indigenous elders and local synods in place, the Catholic Church was heavily dependent on European missionaries and its activities were severely inhibited when these missionaries were interned. During this period, village catechists and school teachers were entrusted with the running of parishes.

Independence. During the war of independence (1945–49), key nationalist figures were Christians: the Protestant Simatupang led the revolutionary army, the Catholic Adisucipto was in the top echelons of the air force while the provisional government was led for a time by the Protestant prime minister Sjarifoeddin. The Catholic Party was founded in 1923 and led for 32 years by Ignatius Josep Kasimo (1900–1986), a student of van Lith, with the firm support of the first Indonesian bishop, Albert Soegijapranata SJ of Semarang (1940–1963), another student of van Lith. Owing to the pivotal role of Catholics and Protestants during the independence struggle, both the Catholic and Protestant communities were accepted as an integral part of the independent state. The Catholic Church’s slogan was “Pro Ecclesia et Patria,” “100% Catholic, 100% Indonesian.” The Indonesian hierarchy was established by JOHN XXIII in 1961. The first plenary session of the Indonesian hierarchy took place in 1964. Since 1970 the conference has met regularly once a year in Jakarta.

Vatican II. VATICAN COUNCIL II was a turning point for the Indonesian Catholic Church. The use of the vernacular in the Mass and the liturgical reforms were enthusiastically implemented. Liturgical texts were quickly translated into local languages, and liturgical INCULTURATION was promoted at the grassroots level in an ongoing effort to contextualize the Catholic Church in Indonesian soil. In 1974, the Catholic Church collaborated with Protestant churches to produce an ecumenical translation of the Bible in the national language, Bahasa Indonesia. The Indonesian Catholic Bishops’ Conference enjoys good working relations with the Communion of Churches in Indonesia (PGI), an umbrella organization of 70 Protestant Churches in Indonesia that was founded in 1960.

Education and Media. The Catholic Church has enjoyed high prestige in the Indonesian society for its educational and social contributions. There are ten Catholic Universities in Jakarta, Bandung, Semarang, Yogyakarta, Surabaya and Malang (Java); in Medan (Sumatra); in Makassar (Sulawesi) and Kupang (Timor). Both Catholics and Protestants play an important role in the mass media. The Catholic-owned Kompas-Gramedia group publishes Kompas, the largest daily newspaper in Jakarta, in addition to producing books, journals and videos. The afternoon daily Suara Pembaruan is Protestant-owned, as is the English language Jakarta Post.

Continued Growth. The Indonesian Catholic Church has been blessed with many vocations. To accommodate them, there are nine major seminaries in Jakarta, Bandung, Yogyakarta and Malang (Java); Pematang Siantar (Sumatra), Manado (Sulawesi), Ledalero (Flores), Kupang (Timor) and Abepura (Papua). The national seminary is in Yogyakarta, while one of the largest seminaries in the world is that of Ledalero in Flores. Over 200 Indonesian DIVINE WORD missionaries are working in over 30 countries overseas. Locally, the continued heroic efforts of indigenous catechists and missionaries has resulted in a continuous growth, especially among the Dayaks (Kalimantan), Torajas (Sulawesi), Bataks (Sumatra) and Sumbanese (Sumba) as well as among the urban Chinese-Indonesians of Jakarta, Semarang and Surabaya. In 1923 the Catholic population came to just 275,000, half of whom were European or Eurasian. By 2000 the Catholic population had risen to almost 8 million.

The first National Catholic Congress was held in Yogyakarta in 1949 when bishops and lay people resolved to work for the newly independent state. Other lay-led National Congresses have been held in Semarang (1954) and Jakarta (1972, 1984, 1995). The 1984 Congress celebrated 450 years of the Catholic Church in Indonesia while the 1995 Congress celebrated the 50th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence. A Jubilee Congress was held in Caringin-Bogor, west Java in 2000 on the theme "Empowerment of Base Communities in a New Indonesia."

Wanita Katolik, a member of the World Union for Catholic Women's Organisations was founded for women by Mrs. Suyadi Darmoseputro Sasraningrat in 1924. PMKRI, the Indonesian Catholic Student Association founded in 1947, has joined with other student movements, Protestant (GMKI - Student Christian Movement) and Muslim (HMI - Muslim Students of Indonesia), in the fight for political reform, justice and human rights. Emasculated during the Soeharto regime, PMKRI struggled to regain its historical charism in the years after Soeharto's downfall.

An Uncertain Future. Indonesia was a democracy from 1950 to 1959, when Soekarno, the founding president, declared a Guiding Democracy, the first step towards authoritarian rule. In 1965 a failed coup attempt destabilized the government and Soeharto, a general in the Indonesian army, was placed in control. The Soeharto dictatorship lasted for 32 years. In 1973 the government reduced the number of political parties to three, all of which were strictly government-controlled. Thus after 50 years the Catholic Party was dissolved. Nevertheless, Catholics were prominent in both Soeharto's economic think tank (CSIS) and in the cabinets of the 1970s and 1980s, in both financial and military portfolios. By 1997 systemic corruption and the centralization of both finance and political power was shaken by a monetary crisis. A popular student uprising forced Soeharto from power in May 1998. Many lay Catholics, supported by Catholic religious, were active in grassroots movements which led to the downfall of Soeharto. Inter-faith collaboration with Muslim activists, working for justice, democracy, and fact-finding on human rights abuses, augurs well for the future. However, the de facto collusion of many Catholics with the regime and the cooption of Catholic teachers and civil servants into Soeharto's Golkar Party has caused problems for the Church as an unstable Indonesia shuffles toward democracy. Regions that were exploited economically in the past have been either demanding independence (e.g. Aceh and Irian Jaya) or racked by inter-ethnic and interreligious conflict (as in Ambon, where prolonged Christian-Muslim enmity shows no signs of abating). In the midst of social turmoil and religious extremism with no light at the end of the tunnel, Indonesian Catholics face the challenge of witnessing bravely to reconciliation and bridgebuilding.

Church in old Batavia, Java, Indonesia. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Catholic Church, Flores, Indonesia. (©Jeremy Horner/CORBIS)

Bibliography: J. BANK, Katholieken en de Indonesische Revolutie (Uitgeverij 1983), with extensive bibliography. TH. VAN DEN END and J. WEITJENS, Ragi Carita: Sejarah Gereja di Indonesia (The Leaven of Love: History of the Church in Indonesia) 2 v. (Jakarta 1993–1996). A. HEUKEN, SJ, Ensiklopedi Gereja (Encyclopaedia of the Church) 5 v. (Jakarta 1991–94). M. MUSKENS, ed., Sejarah Gereja Katolik Indonesia (History of the Catholic Church in Indonesia) 4 v. (Ende 1972–74). K. STEENBRINK, Catholics in Indonesia, 1808–1942: A Documented History, 2 v. (Leiden 2001–02), includes extensive primary sources.

[J. M. PRIOR]

INDRECHTACH, ST.

Martyr; d. 854. According to the Irish annals, he was an abbot of IONA who was martyred by Saxons while on his way to Rome. In the 12th century WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY wrote the life of a certain St. Indract (d. c.

710), the son of an Irish king, who was murdered along with some companions near Glastonbury while returning from Rome. J. F. Kenney is of the opinion that these two are to be identified. C. H. Slover, on the other hand, has rejected this opinion on the grounds that Indract was a secular prince whose relics were translated during the reign of INE, that he is not mentioned in the Irish MARTYROLOGIES, and that there is no Irish vita. Kenney was obviously aware of all these difficulties and rightly considered that they were not convincing, but even so his identification is a mere possibility, and the question still remains open. A marginal note in the Martyrology of Tal-laght places the feast of Indract of Glastonbury on May 8.

Feast: Feb. 5.

Bibliography: Sources. For WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY'S vita (which has never been published) and the abridgement in the Sanc-tilogium of JOHN OF TYNEMOUTH, see J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: 446. For trs. of the vita, see G. H. DOBLE, Saint Indract and Saint Dominic (Cornish Saints Ser. 48; Long Compton 1944). C. PLATTS, "Martyrdom of St. Indract" in Notes and Queries for Somerset and Dorset 17 (1921–23) 17–23. Literature. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929). C. H. SLOVER, "Glastonbury Abbey and the Fusing of English Literary Culture," Speculum 10 (1935) 147–160, esp. 152–153.

[C. MCGRATH]

INDUCTION

A method or activity by which one proceeds from observation to generalization. Although some regard it as the counterpart of DEDUCTION, it should more properly be seen as the counterpart of DEMONSTRATION, since its use leads to the acceptance of principles from which conclusions can be demonstrated. This article sketches the historical genesis of the notion and various views concerning the ground on which it is based.

Historical Genesis. Inductive method seems to have had its origin in the philosophizing of SOCRATES. "For two things may be fairly ascribed to Socrates: inductive arguments and universal definition, both of which are concerned with the starting point of science" (Aristotle, Metaphysics 1078b 27). In Western philosophy, this Socratic attribution is later confirmed by CICERO: "This form of argument which attains the desired proof by citing several parallels is called induction, in Greek ἐπαγωγή; Socrates frequently used this in his dialogue" (Topica 10.42; Loeb Classical Library 413).

For Aristotle, the sciences are distinguished by their methodological differences; thus the manner of demonstrating and the type of certitude in the speculative sciences are other than in the technical sciences (De Partibus Animalium 639b 30). Again, in the natural sciences a uniform method does not apply, since one must always seek whether demonstration or classification or some other procedure is best suited (De Anima 402a 11). Moreover, Aristotle forbids the transfer of a method from one science to another, for example, in proving geometrical truths by the methods of arithmetic (Analytica Posteriora 75a 38–75b 7). He further points out that the sciences are differentiated by their degree of exactness and that this degree depends on the object and the method chosen (Ethica Nicomachea 1094b 12, 23, 1098a 26; Metaphysics 982a 25, 1078a 9).

Inductive Procedure. Aristotle also distinguishes formally between two opposed procedures, the process from principles and the process to principles; in so doing, he recalls that Plato sought to determine which of the two is more advantageous (Ethica Nicomachea 1095a 30). In the Republic (510–511), Plato maintains that geometry and similar sciences start from accepted hypotheses and argue from these to conclusions, whereas dialectic first searches out the principles and then proceeds to conclusions. Just as Plato prefers the dialectical method, so too does Aristotle recommend the process leading from experience to principles, i.e., the process of generalization or ABSTRACTION by which man goes from what is more evident to him to what is more evident by nature (Physica 184a 17–21).

At a much later period in the history of philosophy, Francis BACON would wish to proceed from sensations to axioms (Novum Organum 1.19), and René DESCARTES would insist on beginning with objects that are “the easiest to know” (Discourse 2). Yet the naturalness of this procedure had long before been noted by Plato and Aristotle. All animals have sensations that, for some, are retained through memory; in man, memories form the basis of experience, and experience provides the basis of science (Analytica Posteriora 99b 15–100b 17; Metaphysics 980a 22–982a 1). Aristotle, however, insists on the experiential starting point more than does Plato. In the Aristotelian view, sciences, whether inductive or deductive, cannot overlook sensations (Analytica Posteriora 81a 37–81b 9); physicists, astronomers, and zoologists must reckon with phenomena (De Partibus Animalium 639a 2–642b 4; Cael. 306a 16). Aristotle is quick to blame those who, lacking sufficient experience, would explain nature (De Generatione et Corruptione 316a 5); even in morals, he says, one must begin with phenomena (Ethica Nicomachea 1145b 2). In some places he even indicates a preference for experience over reasoning. Speaking of the multiplication of bees, for example, he affirms that observation is more reliable than speculation (Generatione Animalium 760b 30); elsewhere he regards as empty a general or logical explanation of the sterility of mules (ibid., 747b 28; De Generatione et Corruptione 316a 10; De Anima 403a 29). For Aristotle, observation must be continuous and complete; he explains that if one, being on the Moon, would observe once that Earth faces the Sun and that an eclipse is taking place, he would not know its cause, but he would come to know it after numerous observations (Analytica Posteriora 87b 39–88a 4). On this score, he takes Democritus to task for his poor explanation of dentition based on limited observation of some animals alone (De Generatione Animalium 788b 9–19). Surely, the originality of Descartes is not to be found in this rule: “make everywhere divisions so complete and revisions so general [as to be] certain to omit nothing” (Discourse 2).

Scene of an angel appearing to the Virgin Mary, carved wooden church doors, Bali, Indonesia. The image has strong Indonesian motifs, including typically Indonesian clothing and jewelry. (©Lindsay Hebbard/CORBIS)

Nature of Induction. It is this method or procedure—from observation to generalization—that Aristotle usually calls induction. H. Maier has suggested that perhaps he is the first one to have used the word in this technical sense (Die Syllogistik des Aristoteles [3 v. Tübingen 1896–1900] 2.1:374). Aristotle specifies that the basis of induction is the resemblance or SIMILARITY among particular objects (Topica 108b 7; De Rhetorica 1356b 12). In relating induction to the syllogistic form, he also prescribes a completeness that includes all particular cases (Analytica Priora 68b 8–29). This prescription was challenged by Bacon (Novum Organum 1:105) and by all those who have failed to notice that the Aristotelian “particular” refers to the SPECIES and not to the individual. Other logicians have objected to Aristotle’s limiting of induction to the observation of facts and his assigning of causal explanation to demonstration (Analytica Posteriora 92a 34). In fact, it seems that induction is justified by the very existence and recognition of causal relations (see CAUSALITY).

A variant of Aristotelian induction is the paradigm, or the exemplary model. As in induction, its basis is similarity or resemblance. But contrary to induction, it does not lead to the universal; rather, it concludes to the particular from the particular. The following is an example: If a war between two neighboring countries ends up as a liability for the aggressor, another war of the same type will likewise be fateful for the new assailant (Analytica Priora 68b 38–69a 19; De Rhetorica 1355b 26–1358a 35, 1393a 22–1394a 18). Example itself was considered by Aristotle as an instrument proper to rhetoric but improper to scientific logic (Analytica Posteriora 71a 1–10; De Rhetorica 1356b 5). Actually, it involves an analogical judgment (ἀναλογίσιζεσθαί) identical with that of induction.

Ground of Induction. The precise formulation of the ground of inductive reasoning has long been seen in the regula philosophandi of Sir Isaac Newton: “Effectuum generalium ejusdem generis eadem sunt causae” (General effects of the same kind have the same causes). This ground, for Newton, is nothing more than an application of the principle of causality (see CAUSALITY, PRINCIPLE OF).

The attack on causality launched by David HUME is also an attack on induction or, at least, an attempt to seek its foundation elsewhere. Indeed the author of the Treatise of Human Nature and of the Philosophical Essays maintains that induction is based on habit or on a personal disposition that has nothing to do with truth or with the nature of things. “Having observed the constant relation between two things, for example heat with flame or solidity with weight, we are determined only by force of habit to conclude from the existence of one to the existence of the other. Otherwise, it is impossible to explain why we conclude from a thousand cases that which we could not conclude from a single case” (Philosophical Essays 5).

Yet another ground is proposed by Thomas REID and the SCOTTISH SCHOOL OF COMMON SENSE. “In the phenomena of nature, what is to be will probably be like to what has been in similar circumstances” (Essays on the Intellectual Powers of the Human Mind, 6, ch. 5, 12); this is to say that “nature is governed by invariable laws.” For P. P. Royer-Collard (1763–1843), these laws are of two types, stable and general. Royer-Collard’s first principle of induction is that “the universe is governed by stable laws,” so that once known at one moment, they are known at all times. His second principle is that “the universe is governed by general laws,” so that once known for a single case, they are alike for all cases. The later developments of Reid and of Royer-Collard seem reducible to a simpler Newtonian formulation: nature is governed by laws. The character of a law, or the sign that reveals its existence, is that it applies equally well to all cases covered by the law. Stated somewhat differently, the same cause, in the same circumstances, will produce the same effect. (See UNIFORMITY.)

Jean Nicod (1893–1924), basing his analysis on John Maynard Keynes’s Treatise on Probability (1921), has come to the following conclusions: (1) induction by simple enumeration is a type of basic proof that cannot be dispensed with without resorting to sophistry; (2) this type of reasoning retains its value even without a prior postulate of determinism; (3) inductive proof can increase the probability of a hypothesis even if newly observed facts are merely repetitions without variation of facts already known; (4) if causes are eliminated as a ground of induction, the most that can be attained by this type of argument is a moderate degree of probability; and (5) it has yet to be demonstrated that inductive reasoning can raise the degree of probability of a law to that of absolute certitude (Le Problème logique de l’induction, Paris 1961).

Recent Theories. Recent attempts at solving the problem of induction have moved in two main directions. First, many thinkers basically accept Hume’s criticism and take it as starting point in their investigation of the topic; they try to offer some kind of “vindication” or “validation” as a substitute for a definitive justification. Within this philosophical literature, induction has been examined mostly from a logical perspective; sometimes presumably an “exclusively” logical one. The post-Humean tendency has been to reduce the issue of induction to the process whereby a general proposition is obtained from several particular instances. There has also been a complementary effort to explain that process as the fulfillment of a psychological need of human beings. To date, these viewpoints sprung from a common source have been seen as different and very much unrelated.

Other authors, moving in the second direction, examine and reject the presuppositions on which Hume's famous attack is based. They prefer to unravel the confusions that cloud the issue. Noting that many of the approaches that accept Hume's criticism seem to presuppose some inductive procedures at any rate, they try to use the reduction ad absurdum against Hume's criticism. Hume's dilemma is thus interpreted as an indirect proof that the presuppositions on which it is based are at fault. In general, philosophers working along these lines find nothing wrong with a conclusion that in some way "says more than its premises." This approach has received some valuable support from nonpositivistic philosophers of science. William Kneale and Henry B. Veatch, among others, have criticized the attempt to reduce all necessity to logical necessity, a doctrine clearly formulated in Wittgenstein's Tractatus (6.37).

Other philosophical traditions have also tried to clarify the riddle of induction from their own viewpoints. Within a Thomistic framework, Lonergan has explained inductive conclusions as based on the principle that "similar are similarly understood" (Insight: A Study of Human Understanding 288). The real problem of induction is the problem of criteria of relevant similarity. There cannot be a difference in understanding the data unless there is a difference in the data themselves. In a further elaboration of Lonergan's theories, Philip McShane's Randomness, Statistics and Emergence provides an analysis of statistical science as a type of general knowledge of random aggregates.

Another group of philosophers has dealt with induction from a phenomenological perspective. Phenomenologists reject the empiricist principle upon which many of the investigations on induction depend: when such a principle is abandoned, it becomes questionable whether there still is a "problem of induction." The phenomenological notion of eidetic intuition is frequently mentioned in connection with induction, as the factor that guarantees the validity and certainty of inductive generalizations. In this sense, eidetic intuition is a necessary though not sufficient condition for the validity of inductive conclusions. Its peculiar role is to provide an insight into the contents of inductive generalizations, thereby providing the universality and necessity that cannot be found in simple repetition (cf. Joseph Kockelmans, The World in Science and Philosophy 123).

During the mid-20th century much thought was given to the origin and evolution of science. These investigations indirectly affected the discussions on induction, mostly in the sense of establishing the limits of its extent without, however, denying its existence as a valid way of knowledge. Thomas Kuhn's notion of paradigm (The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, Chicago 1962) and Norwood R. Hanson's analysis of seeing as "seeing that x" (Patterns of Discovery) emphasize the importance of formulating imaginative hypotheses in order to account for the facts that, for the most part, do not appear to be in a "pure" form, just ready for public inspection. The evolution and growth of science is not explained as a process of accumulation, but as dependent on the formulation, development, and eventual substitution of paradigms. Within the perspective of these approaches, induction may play a role in the origin of theories and may give some indications about their possible explanatory and predictive power. In this way, even though induction does exist, its role is by no means as decisive and primary as Baconian inductivism would want it to be.

As a result of long discussions on the topic, inductive inferences enjoyed an increasingly secure though less extended place in the world of science.

See Also: METHODOLOGY (PHILOSOPHY).

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952); v. 2, 3 of Great Books of the Western World 1:805–815. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:741–745. R. HOUDE, "The Logic of Induction," The Logic of Science, ed. V. E. SMITH (New York 1963) 17–34. P. CONWAY, "Induction in Aristotle and St. Thomas," Thomist 22 (1959) 336–365. O. HAMELIN, Le Système d'Aristote (Paris 1920; 2d ed. 1931). For induction in the philosophy of science, see E. H. MADDEN, ed., The Structure of Scientific Thought (Boston 1960). For induction in comparative logic and Indian philosophy, see P. MASSON-OURSSEL, La Philosophie comparée (Paris 1923). T. SHCHERBATS'KY, Buddhist Logic, 2 v. (pa. New York 1962). P. EDWARDS, "Russell's Doubt about Induction," Mind 58 (1949) 141–163. I. P. CREED, "The Justification of the Habit of Induction," Journal of Philosophy 37 (1940) 85–97. F. L. WILL, "Is There a Problem of Induction?" ibid. 39 (1942) 505–513. W. H. V. READE, The Problem of Inference (Oxford 1938). A. J. AYER, Language, Truth and Logic (New York 1952). S. BARKER, Induction and Hypothesis (Ithaca, NY 1957). M. BLACK, Problems of Analysis (London 1954); "The Justification of Induction," Language and Philosophy (Ithaca, NY 1949). C. D. BROAD, Induction, Probability and Causation (Dordrecht, the Netherlands; New York 1968). M. BUNGE, Causality (Cleveland, New York 1963). R. CARNAP, Foundation of Logic and Mathematics (Chicago 1939). N. R. HANSON, Patterns of Discovery (Cambridge, Eng. 1965). R. HARRE, Theories and Things (London, New York 1961); An Introduction to the Logic of the Sciences (New York 1967); The Principles of Scientific Thinking (Chicago 1970). J. KATZ, The Problem of Induction and Its Solution (Chicago 1962). J. KOCKELMANS, The World in Science and Philosophy (Milwaukee 1969). J. KOCKELMANS and T. KISIEL, Phenomenology and the Natural Sciences (Evanston, IL 1970). W. KNEALE, Probability and Induction (Oxford 1949). H. E. KYBURG and E. NAGEL, eds., Induction: Some Current Issues (Middletown, CT 1963). C. I. LEWIS, An Analysis of Knowledge and Valuation (La Salle, IL 1946). B. LONERGAN, Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (New York 1957). E. H. MADDEN, ed., The Structure of Scientific Thought (Boston 1960). P. MCSHANE, Randomness, Statistics, and Emergence (Notre Dame 1970). J. PIAGET, The Psychology of Intelligence (New York 1950); The Construction of Reality in the Child (New York 1954); Genetic Epistemology (New York 1970). K. R. POPPER, The Logic of Scientific Discovery (New York 1951); Conjectures and Refutations (London 1963). H. REICHENBACH, Experience and Prediction (Chicago 1938). D. WILLIAMS, The Ground of Induction (Cambridge, MA 1947).

[R. HOUDE/L. CAMACHO]

INDULGENCES

Actions accompanied by prayer that have been specified by the Church as an acceptable "remission before God" of the debt of "temporal punishment for sins" that remains due after forgiveness has been pronounced in the sacrament of penance (see Codex iuris canonici, c. 992). The practice of indulgences came to be fully developed by the eleventh century in the West. It has, however, a more remote historical origin in the system of confession and penance that was in use in the first centuries of the Church and its theological justification can find support in the New Testament.

Principle of Solidarity. On the basis of his experience of Christ St. PAUL was convinced that the members of his (mystical) Body are so closely related to one another that each contributes to the well-being of all, and especially of their ailing brothers and sisters. He so rejoiced in the sufferings that he bore for the Christians at Colossus that he formulated the paradox "What is lacking of the sufferings of Christ I fill up in my flesh for his body which is the Church" (Colossians 1:24). Nothing of course is missing in the salvific work of the Word Incarnate. Those, however, who by faith have been made part of his Body share in the mystery of salvation.

In keeping with this teaching CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA noted a traditional report that the Apostle John when he was in Ephesus not only made "supplications with a wealth of prayers" for the chief of a robber gang, but that he also "vied with him in protracted fasts" (Quis dives salvetur 42, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, 190). In the ensuing centuries the social character of public penance gave evidence that penitents were not left to their own resources for expiation of their public sins. The local Church in which they confessed their sin and waited for the bishop to pronounce their reconciliation with the community contributed to this. Tertullian underlined this corporate character of penance: "The body cannot rejoice over the misery of one of its members; rather the whole body must suffer and work together for a cure" (De Paenitentia 10.5, Florilegium Patristicum, 10:25). Special efficacy in this process came to be attached to the intercession of martyrs who had survived their torture during the persecutions. For the weak who had apostasized under threat, a martyr's letter of recommendation could in some Churches win a more speedy reconciliation and, in consequence, a shortening of their assigned time of penance. Thus, even when he denounced abuses of the "martyr's privilege," St. CYPRIAN did not wish to abolish the privilege altogether (Letter 15.4, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3:516). At the close of the fifth century, CAESARIUS OF ARLES (d. 542) acknowledged the validity of vicarious satisfaction when he described repentant sinners asking for the prayers of the community in the ritual of public penance: "I believe that, before the number of his sins, he (the sinner) sees that he cannot by himself suffice for such grave evils; and so he wishes to seek the assistance of the whole people" (Sermon 261, Patrologia Latina, 39:2227). While the term indulgentia existed in Roman civil law, the Church used the words redemptio and remissio to designate the shortening of the time of penance between the absolution of a grave sin and the readmission of a penitent to communion.

Commutations of Penance. Taking the monastic practice of taxing faults against the Rule with specific penances as its model, the Celtic Church in the British Isles adopted a principle of strict correspondence between a specific sin and the appropriate penance. Each sin was assigned a penitential tariff that was specified in handbooks used by confessors. When the Anglo-Saxon Church in Britain inherited this system, however, it tended, following the practice of the archbishop of Canterbury Theodore (d. 690), to assign such long penances for grave public sins that many a penitent died before the penance could be fulfilled. It was to meet this problem that subsequent generations modified the system. The heavy penances prescribed in penitential books could then be replaced, in part or in whole, by prayers and other pious works, such as fasting or almsgiving. To the extent that these commutations relaxed penances that would otherwise have been imposed by the confessor, they functioned as indulgences in the broad sense of the term. They were substitute penances rather than conditions for gaining an indulgence in the later meaning of the term.

Absolution Grants. Beginning in the ninth century popes and bishops frequently concluded their letters with a petition (suffragium) asking God through the intercession of Christ and the saints to absolve the sinner of all remaining penalties due to sin. At times this prayer was made in favor of the deceased as well as the living. Confessors began to add a similar prayer to the formula of sacramental reconciliation. Although this has been called an absolution grant, it was not a remission of debt in the strict sense since it was offered per modum suffragii, and therefore with no guarantee that the temporal punishment due to sin was actually canceled by God. Though they frequently invoked the power of the keys and were often introduced by the affirmative formula “I absolve,” these prayers remained too indefinite or general to be regarded as indulgence grants in the strict sense. They did not promise a relaxation or easing of the penance imposed by the confessor or a remission of the temporal debt due to sin that was to be paid in this life or in purgatory.

Indulgence Grants. Indulgence grants in the strict sense first appeared in southern France in the early eleventh century. They were closely related to penances imposed by confessors in the sacrament of reconciliation. Thus according to the indulgence granted to those who would contribute to the support of the monastic church of San Pedro de Portella in Spain (1035), a penance of three days of fasting during Lent could be reduced to two. In this case the support of a monastic church was a condition for gaining a relaxation of penance. In the course of time other occasions were introduced for gaining similar indulgences, such as contributions to the building or upkeep of churches, schools, hospitals and bridges. Pilgrims praying at the great shrines of Christendom, particularly ST. PETER in Rome, SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELLA and JERUSALEM, could gain indulgences attached to each specific pilgrimage. In 1300, the first proclamation of a Jubilee year by Boniface VIII included the promulgation of indulgences for the pilgrims who went to Rome and also of substitute indulgences for those who for a good reason were unable to travel that far. Since that time all Jubilee years, including the Great Jubilee of the year 2000, have included the proclamation of specific indulgences that pilgrims could obtain by meeting the conditions specified in the relevant decree. Before Paul VI’s reform the indulgence grants symbolized their effectiveness in terms of time—days, months, years—a practice that originated in a perceived analogy with the reduction of the long penances that used to be given for serious crimes in the sacrament of reconciliation.

Crusade Indulgences. In 1095 at the Council of CLERMONT, held under the auspices of URBAN II, the following canon was enacted: “Whoever from devotion alone, and not for the purpose of gaining honors and wealth, shall set out for the liberation of the Church of God at Jerusalem, that journey will be reckoned in place of all penance” (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 20:816). This indulgence was granted to those who had already confessed their sins, a condition that recurred in every indulgence grant of the medieval period. The crusades, which entailed the possibility of giving up one’s life in combat for the faith and the Church, provided the context for the idea of a plenary indulgence, an indulgence that abolishes the entire penalty due to sin. It presupposes perfect charity in the recipient. In the course of time the crusade indulgence was extended to others than the crusaders, notably to all who contributed to the support of the crusades against the Moors in Spain, the Albigensians in Southern France and the Turks when their political and military pressure on Europe was believed to threaten the very existence of the Church.

The indulgence of the Portiuncula, granted by HONORIUS III at the request of FRANCIS OF ASSISI to those who, properly disposed, prayed at the chapel that he and his first followers had restored, was the first plenary indulgence that could be gained outside of the crusades.

Theology of Indulgences. That the bishops and the pope are able to grant indulgences to the faithful needed to be supported theologically. The theology of indulgences, however, came to be elaborated more than a century after the practice was well established. There was in fact considerable resistance. Abelard denied that such a power existed. Neither PETER LOMBARD in the Sentences, nor Gratian in the Decretum, mentioned the topic. It was HUGH OF SAINT-CHER who first based indulgences on the Church’s “treasury” of the merits that have been stored up by Christ, the Blessed Virgin Mary and the saints. This insight reflected the principle of Christian solidarity in the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST; and it implied a notion of vicarious satisfaction, which the great scholastics developed in the thirteenth century.

Both BONAVENTURE and THOMAS AQUINAS understood an indulgence to be the payment (solutio) or commutation (commutatio) of a debt rather than a remission of it. Bonaventure based his conclusions on the necessity of justice, for God is no less just than merciful. The penance for sin that is assigned in the sacrament should be both satisfactory to God in justice and medicinal for the repenting sinner. The penitent must shoulder medicinal punishment personally. Expiatory punishment, however, can also be assumed by another person on the basis of his “union of charity” with the penitent. In order to be acceptable in justice, however, vicarious satisfaction should be greater than the penance that is incumbent on the guilty person (CS IV, d. 20, p. 2, q. 1).

Thomas based vicarious satisfaction and indulgences more directly on the power of the keys entrusted to Peter in Matthew 16:19. He also found them justified by “the unity of the Mystical Body” (Sth III suppl., q. 25, a. 1). Thanks to this unity the merit that has been accumulated by Christ and his saints can be applied to the members of the Body who are properly disposed. This merit far exceeds what would be needed for the expiation of all pains due to sin, Christ’s merit alone being “infinitely higher than the efficacy of the sacraments.” With Pope CLEMENT VI the Jubilee bull of 1343, Unigenitus Dei Filius, explicitly included the justification of an indulgence as a vicarious satisfaction that is made possible by “the Church’s treasury” (DS 1025 1027).

Indulgences For The Dead. Devotion to the Holy Souls was developed largely under the influence of the monastery of CLUNY. The rapid spread of this devotion provided the occasion for the promulgation of indulgences applicable to the souls in purgatory. SIXTUS IV did this for the first time in the form of a plenary indulgence, in 1476. In the bull Salvator noster (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1398), Sixtus specified that this indulgence is applicable by way of petition (per modum suffragii). By excluding the way of absolution, Sixtus IV implied that there is no guarantee that the power of the keys has any effect beyond the present life. This view remained standard in regard to indulgences offered for the dead. It was confirmed in the nineteenth century when the Congregation on Indulgences and Holy Relics stated, on July 28, 1840, that the efficacy of a plenary indulgence attached to a privileged altar “corresponds to the good pleasure and acceptance of the divine mercy” (DS 2750). In other words, the indulgence offered for the dead is not a sentence of absolution pronounced by the Church; it is a prayer for a repenting sinner.

Abuses. The popularity of indulgences contributed no small part to the welfare of medieval society. Thanks to indulgences in the form of material and monetary gifts, great cathedrals and monastic establishments were built and kept in repair, schools and universities were founded and endowed, hospitals were maintained and bridges were built. And there were spiritual effects that cannot be measured. Not only were the people reminded of their solidarity with the whole family of God which is the Church, triumphant as well as militant, but the preaching of an indulgence was often the occasion of spiritual revivals when preachers exhorted the faithful to true repentance and confession.

In spite of this, abuses in the granting and preaching of indulgences were not slow to appear. Bishops multiplied indulgences, and preachers exaggerated their efficacy. When indulgences were granted for monetary gifts, as for the upkeep of churches or the building of new ones, the collectors (quaestores) often received more money than was due, thus paying themselves for their work. In addition, not all the money was used for the purpose for which the indulgence was preached. Already in 1215 the Fourth Lateran Council condemned “abuses in the granting of indulgences” (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 22:1050–56; DS 819). Moreover, there occasionally spread among the people rumors of indulgences that were entirely spurious. Such abuses and the “trafficking” in indulgences multiplied in the late Middle ages and above all during the Renaissance. In 1515 Emperor CHARLES V obtained from Pope LEO X a plenary indulgence for those who would contribute to the repair of the dikes in the Netherlands. In 1517 King Francis I of France was granted a similar indulgence for financing a crusade that he had no intention of launching.

The Reformation. In 1517 it was precisely the scandal associated in Germany with the preaching of an indulgence offered for the rebuilding of St. Peter’s at the Vatican that led the Augustinian friar Martin LUTHER to criticize the actual preaching of indulgences and eventually to reject the underlying doctrine. He took issue with the preaching in the Ninety-Five Theses that he made public at Wittenberg in 1517. In these theses, however, Luther formulated what seem to be contradictory propositions. On the one hand he declared: “The treasury of indulgences is most acceptable, for it makes the last to be first” (thesis 64), and also: “Let him be anathema and accursed who denies the apostolic character of indulgences” (thesis 71). On the other hand he asserted: “The pope has neither the will nor the power to remit any penalties beyond those imposed either at his own discretion or by canon law” (thesis 5), and also: “The true treasure of the Church is the holy gospel of the glory and grace of God” (thesis 62). The commentary that Luther sent to the archbishop of Mainz on Oct. 31, 1517 (Disputatio pro declaratione virtutis indulgentiarum) was in fact moderate. It admitted the basic principles of a temporal penalty due to sin, of purgatory, and of the treasury of the Church. It also drew attention to the greater importance of interior conversion than of the remission of exterior penalties; and it inferred from the traditional teaching that an indulgence applied to the dead by way of petition is logically no more than a prayer. Only later, as he reflected on the implications of justification by faith alone without the works of the Law and as he gave up any hope of seeing the papacy reform itself did Luther reach the conclusion that indulgences are incompatible with the total trust in divine forgiveness propter Christum, “for the sake of Christ,” that is essential to the Christian faith.

The Counter-Reformation. In the decree Cum postquam (Nov. 9, 1519), Pope Leo X condemned Luther’s doctrine on indulgences. In the bull Exsurge Domine (June 15, 1520) he condemned Luther himself. While he regretted that abuses had occurred in the preaching of indulgences, Leo reaffirmed that the temporal penalty due to sin can be partially or fully remitted, in this world or the next, by application of the merits accumulated in the treasury of the Church by Christ and the saints. CLEMENT VII, however, took account of criticisms and attached no specific monetary contribution to the Jubilee indulgence of 1525. Few pilgrims, in fact, made the journey, partly because the streets of Rome were troubled by a violent conflict between the COLONNA and ORSINI families and partly because of the brewing struggle between the pope and the emperor, which brought about the sack of Rome in 1527. In 1550 JULIUS III restored the solemnity of the Jubilee celebration, but few pilgrims came. In 1563 a short decree of the last session of the Council of TRENT endorsed the right of the Church to grant indulgences (COD 772–773). In the same decree the council deplored the abuses that had taken place and ordered the bishops to correct them and to fight the superstitious use of indulgences. In 1567, however, PIUS V found that the TRIDENTINE regulations had so far been ineffective, and he abrogated “every indulgence . . . which contains in any way whatsoever permission to make collections” (Bullarium Romanum, 7:536). Furthermore, The Catechism of the Council of Trent, edited under Pius V, did not mention indulgences in its long chapter on the sacrament of penance, even though it explained that the Lord does not always remove “the remains of sin and the pain, measured in terms of time, that is due to sins” (The Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 2, c. 5, n. 65), and it also affirmed such solidarity of all in the communion of saints that “the tasks (officia) of satisfaction are common among us” (n. 76). The theologians of the COUNTER-REFORMATION, however, generally defended the doctrine and practice of indulgences as being both traditional and pastorally useful. PETER CANISIUS related the indulgences to the action of the Holy Spirit. In his commentary of the Tertia pars of the Summa theologica (Disp. 49 57) SUAREZ saw them as rooted in the infinite redemptive merits of Christ.

In order to keep a tighter control on the use of indulgences, CLEMENT IX in 1669 entrusted their supervision to a new dicastery, the Congregation for Indulgences and Relics. In 1908 Pius X abolished this Congregation and assigned the regulation of indulgences to the Holy Office. From time to time a Raccolta, or Enchiridion indulgentiarum: Normae et concessiones, is published in the Vatican by the Apostolic Penitentiary; it contains the authentic list of currently available indulgences with the relevant conditions.

Paul VI. On July 24, 1963 Pope PAUL VI instructed Cardinal Fernando Cento to form a commission of periti that would recommend a new approach to indulgences. The ensuing study Positio de sacrarum indulgentiarum recognitione was presented to the council fathers of Vatican II on Nov. 9, 1965, shortly before the end of the last session. The bishops were invited to send their remarks to the commission. Having received a number of comments, and taking account of the beginning of ecumenical dialogues with the Churches of the Reformation, the pope issued the apostolic constitution Indulgentiarum doctrina (Jan. 1, 1967). In this document four short chapters explain the doctrine, and a fifth enunciates twenty practical norms. Paul VI recalls that true teaching is done through “pastoral practice” as well as “doctrinal documents,” that both as “disobedience to divine law” and as “contempt for the friendship of God” sin deserves punishment, that the full remission of sins therefore includes the restoration of friendship with God through forgiveness and the repair, through expiation, of the damage done by sin to “the universal order” of creation. Forgiveness is received sacramentally. Expiation takes place in purgatory unless it has already been done in this life (Ch. 1, nn. 1–3). The expiation of the temporal penalty due to sin is precisely the domain of indulgences.

Ch. 2, nn. 4–5, describes the “solidarity” that unites all the faithful in Christ, the communion of saints and “the supernatural unity of the Mystical Body of Christ.” As a result of this unity one may say that, “as it were, a single mystical person is formed.” In the process “an abundant exchange” takes place among all the faithful, whether these be in heaven, in purgatory, or on earth. Ch. 3, n. 6, evokes the “very ancient usage” of praying for sinners, the traditional practice of penance and the belief that satisfaction for sin is done by “the entire Church united to Christ” rather than by individual believers. It was in this spirit that bishops eventually “permitted canonical penances to be replaced by easier works.” In ch. 4 Paul VI esteems that the usage of indulgences, when it came, was under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit and constituted a “progression” in doctrine and discipline rather than a “change” (n. 7). As the Council of Trent maintained that indulgences are “salutary for the Christian people” (n. 8), likewise the faithful today are invited to “ponder and meditate” on the benefits that can accrue from them to “all Christian society” (n. 9). Indulgences contribute to the Church’s holiness (n. 10). They confirm “the preeminence of charity in Christian life” inasmuch as they require “a sincere conversion of mentality (metanoia)” (n. 11).

The norms present three notable aspects. First, partial indulgences are no longer to be assessed in function of time (days, months, years). Instead, the value of an indulgence depends on “the action itself of the faithful who perform a work to which an indulgence is attached” (n. 12). Two elements specify the value of such an action, “the charity of the one performing the act” and “the degree to which the act itself is performed in a more perfect way.” Second, in keeping with this principle, Paul VI further defines a partial indulgence as “a remission of punishment through the intervention of the Church,” that equals the value of the action as performed by the person (norm n. 5). In other words, as it grants an indulgence the Church promises to match the “merit” that accrues to the person who seeks the indulgence and performs the required work. Third, it follows that indulgences are not tied to places or objects but to actions that are performed “at least with a contrite heart” (n. 5). Regarding plenary indulgences, their number is reduced considerably, and the customary conditions are maintained: sacramental confession, Eucharistic communion and prayer for the intentions of the Supreme Pontiff (n. 7). Furthermore, they presuppose that “all attachment to sin, even to venial sin, be absent,” that is, perfect charity. Following upon this reform of the theory and practice of indulgences, the Apostolic Penitentiary issued an Enchiridion indulgentiarum on June 28, 1969. Much shorter than the previous Raccolta (1957), it emphasized the prayers and dispositions of the faithful who seek an indulgence (opus operantis) rather than the works of piety (visits to churches with recitation of assigned prayers) for which the indulgence is granted (opus operatum).

The implementation of Paul VI’s constitution was confirmed in the Code of CANON LAW of 1983, cc. 992 997, which replaced the provisions of the code of 1917, cc. 911 936. The canonical definition is the following:

Indulgentia est remissio coram Deo poenae temporalis pro peccatis, ad culpam quod attinet jam deletis, quam christifidelis, apte dispositus et certis ac definitis condicionibus, consequitur ope Ecclesiae quae, ut ministra redemptionis, thesaurum satisfactionum Christi et sanctorum auctoritative dispensat et applicat (Can. 992). (An indulgence is a remission before God of the temporal pain due to sins that have already been forgiven as to guilt, which a Christian faithful, properly disposed and under clear and definite conditions, performs by virtue of the Church, which, as minister of Redemption, authoritatively dispenses and applies the treasure of the satisfactions of Christ and the saints.)

The first part of the definition (to “jam deletis”) is taken from the code of 1917, Can. 911. The second part differs in emphasis. The code of 1917 cited “the treasure of the Church” as the source of indulgences, the “ecclesiastical authority” as the agent, “the living” and “the dead” as the addressees, “absolution” and “prayer” (suffragium) as the respective “modes” or forms of the grant. By contrast, the code of 1983 emphasizes the connection of indulgence with the role of the Church in applying the fruits of Redemption to the faithful. The description implies four doctrinal propositions: (1) the Church is minister of Redemption; (2) sin has two consequences, moral guilt and a debt of temporal punishment proportional to the gravity of the sin; (3) forgiveness effaces moral guilt but not temporal punishment; (4) the temporal punishment can be partially or fully remitted through the Church’s recourse to the satisfactions of Christ and the saints.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church, published in 1992 under JOHN PAUL II includes a moderate treatment of the question of indulgences in the context of the Communion of Saints (nn. 1471 1479), along the lines of Paul VI’s Indulgentiarum doctrina. In keeping with the traditional recurrence of Holy Years the preparation for the third millennium after Christ occasioned the promulgation of a Jubilee for the year 2000. The bull of indiction of the Great Jubilee, Incarnationis mysterium, issued Nov. 29, 1999, included a summary of the doctrine on indulgences of Paul VI (nn. 9 10). An appendix contained a decree of the Apostolic Penitentiary on the indulgences of the year 2000. In keeping with these decrees the Apostolic Penitentiary issued an updated and much abridged version of Enchiridion indulgentiarum: Normae et concessioniones (Vatican City 1999). In the meantime, however, the extremely sensitive nature of the question of indulgences in the contemporary ecumenical context was underlined by the decision of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches to withdraw its fraternal delegate from the Central Committee for the Great Jubilee 2000 (letter to Cardinal Cassidy, March 8, 1999), precisely because of the discussion of “the controversial concept of indulgences” in Incarnationis mysterium.

Remaining Questions. After VATICAN COUNCIL II a number of theologians reflected on the tradition regarding indulgences, notably Karl RAHNER [Theological Investigations 10 (1973)] and Charles JOURNET [Nova et vetera (April–June 1966)]. They generally wished to emphasize the inner dispositions of the recipient of the indulgence more than had been done in the past. Two orientations may be discerned in their writings. First, there is a greater insistence than in the past on modus suffragii, that is, on the Church’s prayer as constituting the essence of the indulgence. Second, there is also a desire to maintain the authority and jurisdiction of the Church and the successor of Peter in the process of sanctification. The very fact that indulgences have remained unknown in the penitential practice of the Oriental Churches as was stressed by the response of Patriarch Maximos to the Positio, raises questions as to their necessity and their origin. They are clearly not a necessary part of authentic Christian life.

Given the fact that the beginning of the third millennium coincides with a general interest in problems that relate to the inculturation of the gospel in many lands, peoples, languages and cultures, one may expect a further reappraisal of the advisability of the practice of indulgences in the future. The ecumenical context of the twenty-first century, and notably the growing relations between Catholics and Orthodox and the dialogues that have been engaged since 1965 between Catholics and the major Churches issued from the Reformation, call for such a reappraisal. However, not one of the bilateral dialogues has so far taken indulgences (or purgatory) as a topic of discussion. Until this happens it is hardly possible to assess the ecumenical impact, if any, of the reform initiated by Paul VI, whose lasting merit it is to have perceived the necessity of a reform in the Catholic practice of indulgences.

Bibliography: N. PAULUS, Geschichte des Ablasses im Mittelalter, 3 vol. (Paderborn 1922/23); Indulgences as a Social Factor in the Middle Ages (New York 1922). J. E. CAMPBELL, Indulgences. The Ordinary Power of Prelates Inferior to the Pope to Grant Indulgences: An Historical Synopsis and a Canonical Commentary (Ottawa 1953). W. HERBST, Indulgences (Milwaukee 1955). B. POSCHMANN, Penance and the Anointing of the Sick (New York 1964). J. WICKS, "Martin Luther's Treaty on Indulgences," Theological Studies, 8 (1967): 481–510. E. M. JUNG-INGLESSIS, The Holy Year in Rome: Past and Present (Vatican City 1997). B. DE MARGERIE, Le mystere des indulgences (Paris 1998). PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN UNITY, "The Ecumenical Problem of Indulgences" [Information Bulletin, n.102 (1999/IV), p. 241–245]. Codex iuris canonici (Rome 1918; repr. Graz 1955). Florilegium Patristicum, ed. J. ZELLINGER et al., (Bonn 1904—). Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (Leipzig 1897—). Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum (Vienna 1866—). Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90). J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98). H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖNMETZER (32d ed. Freiburg 1963). Bullarium Romanum (Magnum) ed. H. MAINARDI and C. COCQUELINES, 18 folio v. (Rome 1733–62). The Catechism of the Council of Trent (The Roman Catechism), tr. J. A. MCHUGH and C. A. CALLAN (New York 1923).

[P. F. PALMER/G. A. TAVARD]

INDWELLING, DIVINE

In the commonly accepted meaning of the phrase, the divine indwelling designates the special permanent presence of God in the just, a presence different from God's OMNIPRESENCE by virtue of creation. The revealed doctrine on the life of GRACE, as attested in Scripture and the Fathers of the Church, states the fact of this special presence without explaining how it takes place. Theology endeavors to explain the manner of this presence.

Revealed Doctrine

We shall first of all briefly state the fact of the divine indwelling as taught in Sacred Scripture, the Fathers, and the documents of the Church.

Holy Scripture. We see, with Y. M. J. Congar (The Mystery of the Temple), the mystery of the divine indwelling gradually revealed in the message of SALVATION and of the economy of God's presence with His chosen people, first in the Old and then in the New Testament; it evolves from an external and social presence with the community to an interior and personal presence with each one. In the Old Testament Yahweh's dwelling with His people, both before and after the building of the Temple, is but a figure of the divine indwelling in the just.

In the New Testament the fulfillment of the messianic times, the same presence of God among the people of God is realized in a new way with the very coming of Christ and the advent of the kingdom of God (Mt 3.2; 4.17), and after Christ's glorification, with the sending of the Spirit, who dwells in His Church (1 Cor 3.16; 2 Cor 6.16). Already here there is a difference: Christ insists on the interiority of the kingdom of God (ch. 5 and 6 of Matthew) and on the newly revealed communion with the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Mt 23.9; Lk 10.22) begun in Baptism (cf. Mt 28.19). He promises His permanent presence in the Church (cf. Mt 28.20). This interiorization of God's presence leads up to the mystery of the divine indwelling in each of Christ's followers. St. John is explicit on this new communion with the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit: "If anyone love me . . . we [the Father and I] will come to him and make our abode with him" (Jn 14.23), and "the Advocate, the Holy Spirit . . . the Father will send in my name" (Jn 14.26; cf. 1 Jn 1.3; 2.23; 3.24). St. Paul speaks of the proper role of each of the three Persons in the sanctification of Christ's members: We are "sons of God [the Father]," by the "Spirit of God" who "dwells" in us, the "Spirit of Christ" by which Christ is "in" us and we are His, having received the "spirit of adoption as sons, by virtue of which we cry: 'Abba! Father!'" (cf. Rom 8.9–16; also 1 Cor 3.16; 6.19; 8.6; Gal 2.20; Phil 1.21; Eph 3.14–19). Hence, as F. Prat explains, there originates a relation of sonship with the Father, of consecration to the Holy Spirit, of mystical identity with Jesus Christ. Thus the New Testament states the fact of the special presence of God and the special role of the three Divine Persons with or in the just.

Fathers of the Church. The Fathers echo the Biblical message about God-in-us. The Greek Fathers are even more explicit on Uncreated Grace, or God dwelling in us, than on created grace. By indwelling in us the Spirit or the Word or the Trinity divinizes us. These Fathers draw a proof for the divinity of the Spirit or the Word from the fact that, by dwelling in us, they divinize us. Thus, after SS. Athanasius and Basil, St. Cyril of Alexandria says of the Spirit, ". . . we already have God dwelling in us permanently . . ." (In loan. com. 1.9; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne 73:157). Of the Word St. Athanasius says, "We are made sons and gods because of the Word we have in us" (Adv. Arian. 3.25; Patrologia Graeca, 26:376). St. John Chrysostom says of the indwelling Trinity, "Where one Person of the Trinity is present, there is the whole Trinity" (In ep. ad Rom. 13.8; Patrologia Graeca, 60:519). As St. Cyril of Alexandria specifies, "from the Father who through the Son causes the Holy Spirit to dwell in them" (In loan. com. 11.10; Patrologia Graeca, 74:540), such is the order of our sanctification. The Spirit sanctifies us by imprinting the seal of the Son and so making us sons of the Father.

With the Latin Fathers the teaching on the divine indwelling is less explicit and frequent; they speak more of created grace, more of the renewal of our being by grace, than of the divine presence. Yet they also witness to the faith in this mystery; thus Tertullian; thus also St. Hilary, who says, “We are all spiritual, if the Spirit of God is in us. But the Spirit of God is also the Spirit of Christ” (De Trin. 8.21; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 10:252); thus above all St. Augustine, the Latin Doctor on the Trinity (Trin. 15.17–19; Patrologia Latina, 42:1079–87).

The mystery of the divine indwelling, in the mind of the Fathers, pertains to the message of salvation.

Church Documents. Actually, the doctrine was never called into question within the Church, and so there is only passing reference to it in the documents on divine grace. At the time of Pelagianism (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM) and SEMI-PELAGIANISM, there is such a mention of the guidance and infusion of the Holy Spirit (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 243, 376). The Council of Trent, in its teaching on justification, stressed the objective change worked in us by grace, i.e., the reality of created grace; yet it did not omit to mention our anointing by the Holy Spirit (Enchiridion symbolorum 1529), our insertion into Christ (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1530), the intervention of the three Persons in our sanctification (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1525, 1529–31). At the beginning of the 20th century, Leo XIII illustrated the divine indwelling in his encyclical DIVINUM ILLUD MUNUS on the gifts of the Holy Spirit (cf. Enchiridion symbolorum, 3329–31). Pius XII, later, in MYSTICI CORPORIS spoke of the Holy Spirit as the SOUL OF THE CHURCH (Enchiridion symbolorum, 3807) and of His indwelling in each soul in grace (Enchiridion symbolorum, 3814–15).

Theology of the Divine Indwelling

We may next take up the twofold theological problem concerning the manner of the divine presence by grace and the special relationships to the Divine Persons that originate in the divine indwelling.

Manner of the Divine Presence. The first theological question about the divine indwelling is this: in what way does this presence differ from God’s omnipresence in all things, not excluding sinners? Various explanations were and are proposed. Some theologians appeal to divine EFFICIENT CAUSALITY: God is present in the just because He produces grace (G. Vázquez). This presence is in addition to His omnipresence (John of St. Thomas, R. Garrigou-Lagrange, H. Lange); or, as P. Galtier explains, it is a special presence because God produces grace by a special efficiency proper to grace. Others speak of EXEMPLAR CAUSALITY: grace makes us like unto God, whether under the aspect of deity (Garrigou-Lagrange), or that of Trinity (Galtier), or that of the divine nature as principle of divine activity (Galtier). Such explanations apparently fail to show what is specific to the presence of divine indwelling; they merely assert it. Efficient causality as such does not entail any other presence of God than that belonging to the order of creation. If this efficiency is said to be special, it should be shown what is special in it. As for exemplary causality, this entails a likeness with the exemplar; it does not involve the presence of the exemplar, unless again it be special EXEMPLARITY OF GOD.

St. Thomas. The explanation of St. Thomas Aquinas is well known (Summa theologiae 1a, 43.3): God is in the just “as the known is in the knower and the loved in the lover.” Various commentators have tried to show how here a real and not only “intentional” presence is involved (see INTENTIONALITY): not only an IMAGE OF GOD or imprint of God, but God Himself is in the just soul. Knowledge and love, in the context, do not mean only acts, for God’s presence persists in the absence of acts; it ought to mean habitual knowledge and love and to result from the habitual principles of that knowledge and love. Why do these principles (FAITH and CHARITY, and the gifts of the Holy Spirit) bring about a new presence of God? Because they are principles not of any knowledge and love, but of a special, namely, SUPERNATURAL and theological, knowledge and love. This “special” requires further explanation.

De la Taille. This explanation may be derived from the divine causality that is proper to the SUPERNATURAL ORDER, such as is suggested in M. DE LA TAILLE’s concept of the supernatural. What is proper to supernatural reality is God’s self-gift: the Uncreated Act actuating, or communicating Himself as act to, the OBEDIENTIAL potency of spiritual creatures. Every spirit is open to the Infinite; not that he could of himself “conquer” the Infinite, but he can “receive” Him as the Act of his potency, if and when the Infinite deigns to give Himself. In so doing, God is not changed; all the change or newness is on the side of the creature, namely, the created actuation, or created grace. This is a link of immediate union with God, for it is what makes God’s self-gift real. Thus grace, of its very essence, involves a new presence of God such as is nowhere found in the order of nature. This presence by actuation or self-communication of the Act has been called by some (e.g., K. Rahner) “quasi-formal” causality; the phrase means that God unites Himself to the soul after the manner of a form uniting itself to matter, although not in a univocal but in an analogical way (“quasi”): God cannot be the form of any creature but only (in the supernatural order) its quasi-form, changing the soul, but without in any way being affects Himself or entering into composition with the soul. In this context, the divine indwelling is not just one of the formal effects of sanctifying grace: Uncreated Grace and created grace are correlatives, two inseparable aspects of grace-life.

This idea of the divine indwelling is apt to show why the habitual presence of God as “the known is in the knower and the loved in the lover” is a real presence of God: God’s self-gift, permanent as the gift of grace to which it is correlated, constitutes the presence. This presence is real or ontological, yet refers to the intentional order: it enables the just to know and love God in Himself, as personal, and definitely as tripersonal. Thus the divine indwelling originates a new relationship to the Trinity (see CREATED ACTUATION BY UNCREATED ACT).

Trinitarian Relationship. Here the theological question is the following: is our new relationship particular or proper to each of the Divine Persons, or is it the same for the three and diversified only by APPROPRIATION or by a (legitimate and significant) way of speaking? The reason for asking the question lies in the traditional teaching based on the councils [cf. Lateran IV (Enchiridion symbolorum, 800) and Florence (Enchiridion symbolorum, 1330)], and recalled by Pius XII: in all things where divine efficient causality is concerned, its effect must be said to be common to the three Persons, and not proper to any one of them, because of their unity in nature (Enchiridion symbolorum, 3814). None of them has a separate or distinct efficient causality. It may be that Holy Scripture seems to assign to each of the three Persons a distinct role in our sanctification or in the indwelling. This, however, cannot be an efficient causality.

More Common Teaching. The difficulty has been solved by theologians mainly in two ways. The more common teaching of the School, with St. Thomas (Summa theologiae 3a, 23.2), explains our relationships to the three Divine Persons by appropriation. That relationship, it is said, is one and the same, common to the three, because it refers to divine efficient causality; and the one effect of this causality is created grace: one foundation for our relationship to the Triune God. But because of the resemblance between some aspect of grace and a Person’s proper way of existing within the Trinity, grace may be “attributed” to one Person (though it be the effect of the three as one God). Thus grace and the indwelling being the effect of God’s love can be ascribed in a special way to the Holy Spirit, whose procession and manner of existing in the Trinity are by way of love. Accordingly, in this explanation, there are no proper or distinct relationships of the just souls to each of the Divine Persons except in our subjective or psychological approach to each of them. This approach is different for the Father, whose adopted sons we are, for the Son, our elder Brother, and for the Holy Spirit, our indwelling Guest. In reality, none of the three does anything that is not done equally by or conjointly with the other two.

Proprium Theory. In recent years the appropriation theory has been losing ground: it apparently minimizes the sayings of Holy Scripture and, some say, savors nominalism. Another, more recent explanation, the proprium theory, is being proposed and spreading. It may point to antecedents in D. Petau, T. de Régnon, M. Scheeben, G. Waffelaert, who, however, may exaggerate by, as it were, restricting the indwelling to the Holy Spirit alone. Today the proprium theory seeks to assign to each of the three Persons a proper manner of indwelling. It distinguishes in the divine indwelling two really distinct aspects (the distinction is evident in the theory of De la Taille): an aspect of efficient causality, i.e., the production of created grace (or of the created actuation), which is common to the three Persons (cf. Enchiridion symbolorum, 3814), and the aspect of union or the relationship proper, which as such does not “produce” a created effect, since it only “unites” the just souls with the Triune God. This union being immediate, i.e., with God as personal (and not merely as Creator and Lord), is tripersonal, i.e., diversified for each of the three Persons. (Perhaps the distinction is implied in, certainly it is allowed by, the quatenus of the text of Pius XII, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3814.) It is so independently of our subjective approach. This distinction between efficiency and union is a prerequisite for the possibility of proper or distinct relationships to each of the Divine Persons: these would be unthinkable if the divine indwelling meant only divine efficient causality. In the proprium theory, the diversity in our attitude toward the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is based on the ontological reality of the triune relationship that objectively brings us face to face (in the darkness of faith) with Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The foundation of this triune relationship, both threefold and one, is one, the created grace, whose function is to draw us into a personal relationship with God as personal or as three Persons. Thus the divine indwelling relates or unites us in a real manner with each of the Persons; it includes a triune relationship, because it means personal presence of the tripersonal God. The divine indwelling is Trinitarian.

This second approach, more realistic and closer to scriptural and patristic teaching, seems to be gaining in appeal in our day. However, it is well to note that in the appropriation theory also, the doctrine of the divine indwelling means the presence in us of the three Divine Persons. Whichever way one conceives theologically the mystery of God-in-us, as a doctrine of the faith it is meant to have a bearing on the Christian life. Nor should the appropriation theory be said to impair the vital import of the doctrine—perhaps it shows deeper reverence for the mystery. It remains true, however, that a more real theology of the divine indwelling holds a greater appeal to the contemporary mind.

Practical Considerations

We may finally indicate briefly the spiritual (or pastoral) and ecumenical import of the doctrine.

Spiritual Theology. The doctrine and theology of the divine indwelling bring out the exalting and personal aspect of the life of grace. The change worked in us by God's transforming presence, for all its importance as the condition of the reality of that presence, is incomparably less important than the divine indwelling itself. This stands out better still when, as suggested above, God's presence in us is conceived, not as a formal effect, but as the constituent of the state of grace. What the divine indwelling means for the pastoral teaching on grace may be best exemplified in the message of the apostle of the divine indwelling, ELIZABETH OF THE TRINITY. Her Reminiscences (Westminster, MD 1952) are an object lesson in living by the mystery of the indwelling Trinity. Her message also points to the personal and Trinitarian aspect of the life of grace. The awareness of the indwelling Guests makes for a fruitful living by the life of grace. Here a theology of our relationships with the Divine Persons built on the proprium theory enhances the vital significance of the doctrine of divine indwelling.

Ecumenical Implications. The doctrine on the divine indwelling, when placed at the heart of our teaching on the life of grace, is apt to reveal a kinship with Oriental theology, heir to the tradition of the Greek Fathers, which the Latin stress on created grace may well have obscured. By stressing Uncreated Grace or the indwelling Spirit or Trinity, the more or less dimmed unity in doctrine, if not in theology, between the separated East and ourselves may be brought to the light of day. On the other hand, for the Christians of the Protestant communities, the personal relationships with Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which the doctrine on the divine indwelling involves, should place in proper focus the ontological reality of grace—a stumbling block for them because it is “unscriptural.” With them we may agree to say that it is our personal relationship with the Divine Persons that comes first, indeed, that it is the all of the life of grace, created grace being necessary only for these relations to be real.

See Also: GRACE, ARTICLES ON; GRACE, CREATED AND UNCREATED; HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF; PRESENCE OF GOD, PRACTICE OF; JESUS CHRIST (IN THEOLOGY).

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 15.2:1841–55. H. SCHAUF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:769–772. J. AUER, H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 1:548–562. Y. M. J. CONGAR, The Mystery of the Temple, tr. R. F. TREVETT (Westminster, MD 1962). F. L. B. CUNNINGHAM, The Indwelling of the Trinity (Dubuque 1955). P. GALTIER, L'Habitation en nous des trois personnes divines (rev. ed. Rome 1949). L. CIAPPI, “The Presence, Mission, and Indwelling of the Divine Persons in the Just,” Thomist 17 (1954) 131–144. P. DE LETTER, “Sanctifying Grace and Our Union with the Holy Trinity,” Theological Studies 13 (1952) 33–58; 14 (1953) 242–272, current theology; 19 (1958) 1–31, incorporation and inhabitation; 24 (1963) 402–422, God's self-gift.

[P. DE LETTER]

INDY, VINCENT D'

Romanticist composer, teacher, writer; b. Paris, March 27, 1851; d. Paris, Dec. 2, 1931. D'Indy (christened Paul Marie Théodore Vincent) was reared and dominated by a music-loving grandmother; he received most of his musical instruction privately before studying under C. FRANCK at the Paris Conservatory, where he later taught. In 1896 he devoted his fortune to founding, with Bordes and F. Guilmant, the (Paris) SCHOLA CANTORUM (now the École César Franck), whose curriculum was mainly based on the best Catholic church music of all periods. D'Indy's chief literary works are biographies of Franck (1906) and BEETHOVEN (1911) and the five-volume Cours de composition musicale (1903, 1909, 1933), a rigorous course that is valuable despite its musical inexactnesses. Although he was active in virtually every musical form, he is best known today for his orchestral works, especially the early Symphony on a French Mountain Air and the Istar variations. As a faithful Catholic, he wrote much organ and sacred choral music, his most monumental being the opera La Légende de Saint Christophe (1918), for which he also wrote the libretto. From both musical and textual standpoints it is an extremely moving work; because of its staging difficulties it is most effective in concert performance. His mature music is characterized by luxuriant harmony, counterpoint, and instrumentation, a craftsmanship that is often intricate but seldom unclear, and melodic ideas informed by plainchant and French folk song. As conductor (chiefly of his own works), d'Indy visited Russia, Spain, and the U.S. His valorous record in the Franco-Prussian War later brought him the appointment of Commander of the Legion of Honor by the French government.

Bibliography: N. DEMUTH, Vincent d'Indy (London 1951). L. VALLAS, Vincent d'Indy, 2 v. (Paris 1946–50); Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 4:467–477. G. FERCHAULT, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 6:1199–1210. T. DAVIDI-

AN, "Debussy, d'Indy, and the Société Nationale." Journal of Musicological Research, 11 (1991) 285–301. W. E. GRIM, "(Paul-Marie-Théodore-) Vincent d'Indy," in International Dictionary of Opera, ed. C. S. LARUE, 2 v. (Detroit 1993) 343–344. S. KEYM, "'L'unité dans la variété': Vincent d'Indy und das zyklische Prinzip," Musiktheorie, 13 (1998) 223–241. R. ORLEDGE, "(Paul Marie Théodore) Vincent d'Indy," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 9 (New York 1980) 220–225. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 823–825.

[R. M. LONGYEAR]

INE, KING OF WESSEX

Reigned 688 to 726. He succeeded a distant cousin, Ceadwalla, on the latter's abdication and retirement to Rome. His own father was still living and apparently enjoyed some authority in the kingdom; Ine, however, had the title of king and the chief authority. He was the first West Saxon king to issue a written code of law. He was following Kentish example here but his laws show some original features. They are preserved only because ALFRED, his more famous descendant, quoted them extensively in his own code. The laws show great respect for the Church. Slaves may not work on Sundays, and the payment of church dues is enforced. The position of Ine's conquered Welsh subjects was fixed, by contemporary standards, in very lenient terms. The association of the great Abbey of GLASTONBURY and the West Saxon royal house began probably in this period. After a long reign Ine abdicated and went on pilgrimage to Rome. He is said to have founded the first English school in that city.

Bibliography: F. LIEBERMANN, ed., Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen, 3 v. (Halle 1898–1916; reprint 1960) 3:63–82. Acta Sanctorum Feb. 1:913–923. F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947). R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 5:1636–37.

[E. JOHN]

INEFFABILITY OF GOD

The ineffability of God designates his incomprehensibility. While human beings can come to some knowledge of God through reason and even more so through God's revelation, yet he continues to be incomprehensible.

Biblical Basis. Through his immanent actions within the world of time and history God reveals that he is completely other than the created order and so transcends it. As such God reveals himself as an ineffable mystery. God is known as the one who cannot be known. The name he gives to Moses, "I Am Who Am" (Ex 3:14), is a revelation, but it is also ineffable and incomprehen-

ble. God "dwells in unapproachable light, whom no man has every seen or can see" (1 Tm 16). The ineffable mystery of God is testified in the prohibition against making images of him (Ex 20:4, Acts 17:29). Nonetheless, the marvels of creation manifest the unspeakable and ineffable grandeur of God (Job 38, Wis 13, Rom 1:19–20). When we speak about God "though we speak much we cannot reach the end, and the sum of our words is 'He is the All'" (Sir 43:27). The Psalmist declares that the mystery of how God knows is "too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain it" (Ps 138/139:6). "His understanding is unsearchable" (Is 40:28). Before the mystery of God praise is the only proper response. "O the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgements and how inscrutable his ways! For who has known the mind of the Lord, who has been his counselor?" (Rom 11:33–34). God is an ineffable mystery, yet that mystery is made known, though not comprehended, through God's actions, especially through the Incarnation of the Son (Jn 1:18; Mt 11:27). While the mystery of God remains, humankind comes to know the mystery of God by faith through the light of the Holy Spirit (Jn 14:26; 1 Cor 1:11–16).

Christian Tradition. Clement of Alexandria stated that we may advance in our understanding of God, yet "knowing not what he is, but what he is not" (Strom., 5.73.5). Against the Eunomians, who held that the very nature of God could be known, Gregory of Nyssa wrote that our inability to give expression to the nature of God, "while it reflects upon the poverty of our own nature, affords an evidence of God's glory, teaching us as it does, in the words of the Apostle, that the only name naturally appropriate to God is to believe him to be 'above every name.' That he transcends every effort of thought, and is far beyond any circumscribing by a name, constitutes a proof to man of his ineffable majesty" (C. Eun. 2). Augustine echoes this (In Ev. Joh., 13.5; Serm. 117.5). Dionysius is the first to use the term "apophatic [negating] theology" as opposed to "cataphatic [affirming] theology" (Mystical Theology 3). All images and concepts of God are rejected and the soul enters into "the darkness with the Ineffable" (ibid.). This is why Christian mystics, especially within the Orthodox tradition, often speak of entering into the darkness of God's ineffable light. Aquinas teaches that "we cannot know what God is, but rather what he is not" and therefore "we have no means for considering how God is, but rather how he is not" (Summa theologiae I.3. preface). Thus we predicate of God such attributes as being infinite (not finite), immutable (does not change), impassible (does not possess emotional changes of state). Nonetheless, Aquinas, somewhat in contrast to the Eastern tradition, allowed that, founded upon human experience, we can truly affirm, by way of analogy, positive perfections to God such as being omniscient, good, wise, and loving. However, since these attributes concur with God's simple essence as being itself (ipsum esse) and so pure act (actus purus), we do not comprehend what it means for God to possess all knowledge fully in act or to be possess perfect love fully in act. For Aquinas, even in heaven, when we see the very essence of God, we will not comprehend him (Summa theologiae I, 12, 7).

The ineffability of God pertains to man's inability to comprehend him not only by reason alone, but also by revelation. The more God reveals himself (and so the more we come to know him) the more ineffable he becomes (and so the less we actually comprehend him). For example, God has revealed himself to be a trinity of persons. We know that God is the mystery of the Trinity, but we cannot comprehend the mystery of the Trinity. As Aquinas intimated above, in the beatific vision we will see clearly the mystery of the Trinity in all its glory, but in that vision we will simultaneously become aware of the complete ineffability of that mystery. Lateran Council IV expressly stated that God is ineffable [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 800; cf. 3001].

Some contemporary theologians have argued on the basis of God's ineffability that all that is said of God is relative to our historical and cultural symbolic understanding and expression. Appealing to the notion of apophatic theology, they maintain that the Church's teachings concerning such doctrines as the Trinity or the Incarnation are not objectively true statements about what God has revealed but symbolic approximations, and so can be changed. Such an approach misconstrues apophatic theology and the nature of God's ineffability. It is one thing to say that God is ineffable and it is another thing to say that we do not know the manner in which he is ineffable. The doctrines of the faith, such as that God is a trinity of persons or that Jesus is the Son of God existing as man, define what the ineffable mysteries of God and his actions are and so protect them from fully rational comprehension.

See Also: GOD, INTUITION OF; INFINITY OF GOD.

Bibliography: T. AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, I, 12–13. D. BURRELL, Knowing the Unknowable God (Notre Dame 1986). B. DAVIES, The Thought of Thomas Aquinas (Oxford 1992). R. HAIGHT, Jesus Symbol of God (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1999). C. M. LACUGNA, God for Us (San Francisco 1992). A. LOUTH, Denys the Areopagite (London 1989). E. L. MASCALL, Existence and Analogy (London 1966). JOHN PAUL II, Fides et ratio (1998). J. PIEPER, The Silence of St. Thomas (London 1957). Pseudo-Dionysius: The Complete Works, trans. C. LUIBHEID and P. ROREM (New York 1987). D. TURNER, The Darkness of God: Negativity in Christian Mysticism (Cambridge 1995). T. J. VAN BAVEL, "God in between Affirmation and Negation according to Augustine," Collectanea

Augustiniana, v. 2, eds. J. T. LIENHARD, E. C. MULLER, and R. J. TESKE (New York 1993) 73–97.

[T. G. WEINANDY]

INERRANCY, BIBLICAL

If God is the author of Sacred Scripture, the truth of Scripture follows as a necessary consequence. Since all the judgments of the sacred writers are fortified by the divine light, they must necessarily be clothed with divine truth.

Inerrancy of Scripture. Negatively, this quality of Scripture is known as inerrancy. The inerrancy of Scripture has been the constant teaching of the Fathers, theologians, and recent popes in their encyclicals on Biblical studies (Leo XIII, Enchiridion biblicum 124–131; Benedict XV, Enchiridion biblicum 453–461; Pius XII, Enchiridion biblicum 560). It is nonetheless obvious that many Biblical statements are simply not true when judged according to modern knowledge of science and history. The Earth is not stationary (cf. Eccl 1.4); Darius the Mede did not succeed Belsassar (cf. Dn 5.30–6.1). Even in religious matters, the Old Testament testifies to an imperfect knowledge of morality and life after death (cf. Dt 24.1; Ps 6.6). LEO XIII, appealing to St. Augustine, explained that it was not the purpose of the Biblical writers to teach us the intimate nature of the physical universe, for this knowledge was in no way profitable for salvation. Consequently, they spoke of the physical universe as it appeared to their senses, according to the custom of their day (Enchiridion biblicum 120–121). The pope asserted also that similar principles might be applied to matters of history (Enchiridion biblicum 1123).

Following the directive of Leo XIII, some exegetes hastily sought to resolve particular difficulties by proposing theories that postulated implicit citations not approved by the author, history according to appearances, and a relative character for Biblical truth. These solutions failed to go to the root of the problem of Biblical inerrancy and hence occasioned new interventions of the magisterium. The truths of history are more intimately associated with our salvation than are the truths of science. The historical truth of Israel's history and of the life of Christ are an integral part of God's supernatural revelation. There is no doubt that the sacred writers have used sources without citing them, but it must be presumed that they have made this material their own, unless the contrary is quite clearly demonstrated (decree of the Pontifical Biblical Commission, Feb. 13, 1905; Enchiridion biblicum 160; on the force of such decrees. (See PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION).

Similarly, all narrative is not necessarily historical, but if a historical event is an integral part of the author's argument, it must correspond in substance to the facts; nonetheless, it may be presented according to those forms in which ancient peoples remembered their past (decree of the Pontifical Biblical Commission, June 23, 1905; Enchiridion biblicum 161; Benedict XV, Spiritus Paraclitus Enchiridion biblicum 456; Pius XII, Divino afflante Spiritu, Enchiridion biblicum 559). Moreover, profane matters are certainly treated in the Bible in the light of their religious significance, but positive affirmations in their regard cannot be excluded from the privilege of Biblical inerrancy. Nor is Biblical truth simply relative to its time and culture; its expression is conditioned by the culture of the time, but whatever is affirmed is thereby clothed with the truth of God (see SPIRITUS PARACLITUS Enchiridion biblicum 454–455).

The total truth of the Scriptures can be appreciated only by trying to recapture the mind of the Biblical writers and to see the relationship of each part of Scripture to the whole. We must know the intention of the sacred author and the literary form that he is using if we are to determine what he intended to teach and what role he assigned to the various elements in his writing. This basic principle of all literary criticism is valid also for Sacred Scripture, once we recognize that God in His condescension deigned to entrust His revelation to the frail vessel of human language. When PIUS XII encouraged Catholic scholars to investigate Biblical literary genres or forms, he assured us that no ancient mode of expression need be excluded from the Scriptures, provided it does not contradict the holiness and truth of God (Enchiridion biblicum 559). These literary forms may be determined only by a careful and comparative study of ancient Near Eastern literature.

The investigation of literary forms has already provided a solution for many difficulties of the past, e.g., those connected with the PRIMEVAL AGE IN THE BIBLE and with the books of JUDITH and JONAH, but such studies alone will not remove all obscurities from the message of Scripture. For besides being far removed from us in time and culture, the sacred writers are trying to express in human language the fruit of their own personal encounter with God and the mystery of His saving plan, or to record what others have taught them of this ineffable mystery. Their affirmations are true insofar as they affirm; but they may also hesitate, grope, doubt, opine, or suspend judgment entirely (decree of the Pontifical Biblical Commission, June 18, 1915; Enchiridion biblicum 415). They may reflect the common opinions of their day without making them the object of their teaching. The exegete must, as a consequence, be sensitive to these varying degrees of human assertion and to the common psychology of human communication, if he is to evaluate correctly the teaching purpose of the sacred writers and to avoid taxing them with error in matters that are not the object of their teaching. (See FORM CRITICISM, BIBLICAL; MIDRASH).

Role of Scripture in the Church. Inerrancy, however, is not the only consequence of Biblical inspiration. Preoccupation with the so-called “Biblical question” has led to the neglect of other aspects of the Bible’s role in the life of the Church. Theologians are now beginning to look more closely at these other effects of Biblical inspiration. In the first place, the Bible provides the Church with a written record of God’s self-manifestation to men, which is itself a history of divine pedagogy. God did not reveal Himself completely in the beginning; He adapted His revelation to the cultural and religious condition of the men He visited; He tolerated their moral imperfections until such a time as He was able to educate their consciences; He led men by historical and moral experience to realize their need of His saving grace, which was fully revealed in Jesus Christ. The Apostles in turn used this record of Old Testament revelation to explain the full significance of the mystery of Christ. The knowledge of this divine pedagogy is itself a revelation of the mercy and gentleness of God from which the Church may profit.

Secondly, the Bible contains so manifold an expression of the word of God that all Christians may find in its pages spiritual nourishment adapted to their needs. In the Bible the chosen mediators of God’s revelation teach us little by little what they have learned of the mystery of God. The written word of God thus mediates to us the personal experience of the Prophets and Apostles. Through them we may come in contact with God Himself. A privileged place of this mediation is the Church’s liturgy of the word.

Finally, the Church is committed to continuing the work of Christ in the world. She must, therefore, preserve, explain, and safeguard the faith of the Apostles, for they were the privileged witnesses of the mystery of Christ. In the New Testament the Church finds the written record of Apostolic faith to which she always refers in fulfilling her divine mission. These other finalities of Sacred Scripture are the object of modern Biblical study. The Scriptures are not simply a code of dogmatic truths, but an integral part of God’s self-communication to men. This self-communication was complete in the living person of Jesus Christ; it will be complete for the individual only in the beatific vision.

Bibliography: J. T. FORESTELL, “The Limitation of Inerrancy,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 20 (1958) 9–18.

[J. T. FORESTELL]

INFALLIBILITY

The term “infallibility” means an incapability of error or erring. While in an absolute sense, infallibility belongs to God alone, in a derivative sense, infallibility can be viewed as a gift of the Holy Spirit assisting the post-apostolic Church in knowing and teaching Christ’s revelation without error. This divine assistance is indicated in the New Testament by Christ’s promise to send the Spirit to lead His disciples to all truth and to enable them to remain in the truth. Infallibility is more than a simple, de facto absence of ERROR. It is a positive perfection, ruling out the possibility of error and entailing necessarily a central fidelity to the Christian revelation in the doctrine taught and accepted by the Church.

Infallibility is to be distinguished from both revelation, God’s communication to man, and scriptural inspiration, God’s guidance of the writers of the Bible. Like the term “inerrancy,” which indicates that the scriptures teach “firmly, faithfully, and without error that truth which God wanted put into the sacred writings for the sake of our salvation” (Vatican II, Constitution on Revelation 11), “infallibility” indicates that the Church continues to believe and teach without error those truths that are necessary for salvation.

Doctrinal Formulation. While the Church from its beginning has been characterized by a continual concern for the truth of the Gospel, the relationship between revelatory truth and ecclesial teaching has been formulated in various ways depending on particular historical circumstances and theological perspectives. While the term infallibility first emerged in medieval theology, Christians eventually ascribed some type of infallibility to the Church, though with considerable divergence about its implications and implementation.

A definite teaching on the “infallible magisterium of the Roman Pontiff” was formulated by VATICAN COUNCIL I (Pastor Aeternus, July 18, 1870): “The Roman Pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra, that is, when discharging the office of pastor and teacher of all Christians, and defines with his supreme apostolic authority a doctrine concerning faith or morals that is to be held by the universal Church, through the divine assistance promised him in St. Peter, exercises that infallibility which the divine Redeemer wished to endow his Church for defining doctrine concerning faith or morals” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum 3074). Given the complexity of this statement, it is not surprising that considerable misunderstanding occurs in its interpretation, particularly concerning the following: (1) The Council, while speaking of doctrinal infallibility as an endowment of the Church, did not explain the meaning of infallibility nor indicate whether there are other types of infallibility (e.g., infallibility in believing, as well as in teaching). (2) The Council did not state that “the pope is infallible,” rather that the pope “exercises” infallibility. Thus infallibility is not a personal quality, but an ecclesial endowment which the pope on specific occasions exercises on behalf of and in communion with the Church. In addition, Vatican I left undecided the question whether others in the Church can also exercise infallibility. (3) The “object” of such an exercise of infallibility was ambiguously described as “doctrine that is to be held,” thus leaving open to further consideration what can or cannot be defined. While theologians generally agree that revelatory truths are a “primary object” of infallibility, there is considerable difference of opinion regarding the inclusion of “secondary objects” (matters of natural law, canonizations, etc.) under the aegis of infallibility.

Finally, the Council concluded that such “definitions of the Roman Pontiff are, of themselves, not by the consent of the Church, irreformable.” This rejected the position adopted at a 1682 assembly of French bishops, the so-called Gallican Articles which postulated further appeal or ratification in order for definitions to be binding. Definitions, then, are “irreformable” in a juridical sense, but are not said to be “infallible” (in a philosophical sense), as if they were absolutely incapable of further development.

The topic of infallibility reappeared in VATICAN II’s Lumen gentium (Nov. 21, 1964), which emphasized that the exercise of infallibility must be “in accord with revelation” and “extends as far as the deposit of revelation extends” (25). While reiterating Vatican I’s teaching on the papal exercise of infallibility, Vatican II taught that “the infallibility promised to the Church also resides in the body of bishops.” This episcopal exercise of infallibility may assume two possible forms: (1) when the bishops are “gathered together in an ecumenical council” or (2) “even when they are dispersed around the world, provided that while maintaining the bond of unity among themselves and with Peter’s successor, and while teaching authentically on a matter of faith or morals, they concur in a single viewpoint as the one which must be held conclusively” (25).

The Object of Infallibility. The object of infallibility is limited, according to Vatican II, to those truths which form a part of the deposit of faith (LG 25). In a generic sense, the object of infallibility may be said to include doctrines of “faith and morals,” a traditional couplet that was first used in a major Church document by the Council of TRENT.

Studies of the word “morals,” or mores in Latin, show that at the Council of Trent the word was employed in both a moral and a religious sense, that is, to refer to teachings about how people should conduct their relationships with one another (mores, in the plural, was regularly used in this instance) and to refer to teachings about religious practices and ceremonial rites (mos, in the singular, used typically in this sense). Thus at Trent, disciplina morum included more than teaching about morals; it included as well matters of custom and ecclesiastical and liturgical discipline.

When at the First Vatican Council the bishops attempted to define papal infallibility in matters of “faith and morals,” they encountered considerable difficulty in agreeing on what precisely was to be included in “morals.” At the Council, Bishop GASSER explained, in the name of the Deputation of the Faith, that infallibility had both a direct and an indirect object: the direct object included those truths which are revealed, and the indirect object those which are not directly revealed but which are necessarily connected to revelation. Some bishops, however, wanted to broaden the secondary object to include “those things connected with the deposit of revelation.” The bishops finally agreed, however, to a more restricted view, concluding that the secondary object included only those truths necessarily connected to revelation. They never reached agreement, however, as to just which truths were necessarily connected.

The Second Vatican Council did not attempt any clarification of the content of the secondary object of infallibility, except to say that infallibility “extends as far as the deposit of revelation extends” (LG 25). The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith’s Mysterium ecclesiae (1973) restated the secondary object of infallibility in slightly different terms: “things without which the deposit cannot be properly safeguarded and explained.” This teaching is echoed in the Catechism of the Catholic Church (2035).

The Subject of Infallibility. The Church. An unflawed Christian faith is an unflinching dowry of “those who are one family in the faith” (Gal 6.10), i.e., the whole Church, comprising all the faithful, lay and clerical alike, who constitute one Body in their one faith (see Eph 4.4–5). This unerring faith of the believing Church (see Mt 16.18b; Jn 14.16–17) is a basic created bond (see Denzinger 871) of the true and indissoluble community of life between the Lord Christ and His bride the Church (see Denzinger 3020). The Church returns a luminous pledge of faith and fidelity to Christ, “the holy one and true” (Rv 3.7), “full of grace and of truth” (Jn 1.14), who has “made known everything which I have heard from my Father” (Jn 15.15). The whole Church of all time is the destined hearer of the Word and of His message, the appointed bearer in the sanctity of its heart of the mystery of Christ’s KINGDOM, the steadfast confessor of the truth of Christ’s mystery. The Church’s faith is a total faith, i.e., one destined under the Spirit to an ever true realization, homogeneous to its apostolic origin (see Acts 2.42) and open to its final fullness (see Eph 4.13), precisely because the Spirit of Christ always holds the Church’s faith in an integral fidelity to Christ. This indefectible faith is an incarnational grace, inward-outward in its radical purity, held holily in the heart and confessed unswervingly on the tongue (see Rom 10.10). It is an infallibility of sanctity in life, proper to the Church as the COMMUNION OF THE SAINTS, distinct from and served by the infallibility of the hierarchical ministry of teaching.

If the individual believer is to keep his faith from being adulterated by “strange varieties of teaching” (Heb 13.9), he must live his faith as a true part of the whole company of believers; his faith must be congruent with the faith of the Church. But the sense of faith of the whole Church infallibly adheres to the integral Christian revelation because the Spirit of Truth, residing in the heartland of the holy believers, moves the whole Church to a discerning obedience of faith in the apostolic revelation infallibly presented by those whom Christ has appointed to be His authoritative WITNESSES and to whom He has pledged the aid of His Spirit to fulfill their teaching mission. Christ’s Spirit, the only interior teacher mandated by Christ to guide the whole Church, ensures the vital correspondence between the infallible communication of the message by the Church’s TEACHING AUTHORITY and the infallible adherence to it on the side of the whole Christian people.

The welcome acceptance that the believing Church gives to the faith taught by those accredited as the successors of the APOSTLES is not to be misconstrued as a monotonous repetition or a mechanical playback of what has been received. “The eyes of the heart illumined” (Eph 1.18) by faith vitally penetrate into and assimilate the riches of the apostolic message and transpose them into gestures of prayer, worship, and Christian living. The teaching Church is critically regulative of the sense of faith of the whole Church; it directs, fosters, and finally sanctions the consensus in faith of the whole Church. Whenever there is a maturation of faith in the total mind of the Church, it is always under the prime tutelage, interior and exterior, of the Spirit, and under the ministerial leadership in the sociojuridic sphere of the teaching Church.

The College of Bishops. When the corporate episcopate defines a doctrine, it can in practice follow two procedures, not essentially different one from another. (1) It can act solemnly in ecumenical councils: Denzinger 2923; Lumen gentium 25, 22 [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 29–31, 25–27]. Or (2) it can also act with what Vatican I called its “ordinary and universal magisterium”: Denzinger 3011; see Denzinger 2879; Lumen gentium 25.2 [ Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 30]. In ecumenical councils the episcopal college, or a competent representation of it, is assembled in one place for common counsel and for joint decision; hence its collegial act of teaching acquires an especial clarity and efficacy. In their ordinary and universal magisterium, however, the same bishops, without coming together in one assembly, and with each remaining at his post, exercise consciously a collegial act of teaching, definitively setting forth some doctrine for the absolute acceptance of the entire Church. In practice it is not always easy to ascertain whether or not the magisterium in a given case is exercising its infallibility through this second procedure. In both procedures, however, the episcopal body stands fundamentally in the same vicarial relation to Christ, in the same ministerial service of Christ’s revealed word in His Body the Church, and under the same protecting aid of Christ’s Spirit. There can be no supreme collegial act of teaching, and hence no infallibility, unless the pope, the head of the college, contributes his specific role to the collegial act; see Lumen gentium 22.2 [ Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 26]; “Nota explicativa praevia” 3–4 (ibid. 74–75); Codex iuris canonical c. 227.

The Pope. The Church’s teaching office finds a special and eminent realization in the mission of the Roman pontiff, “true Vicar of Christ and head of the whole Church and father and teacher of all Christians” (Denzinger 3059). When the Roman pontiff, “in discharge of his office as shepherd and teacher of all Christians, in accord with his supreme apostolic authority, defines a doctrine concerning faith or morals to be held by the whole Church” (Denzinger 3074), he teaches infallibly by reason of the Spirit’s aid proper to his special role as “the center of ecclesiastical unity (V. Gasser; Mansi 52:1213B). In order to give further precision to the ambit of papal infallibility—over and beyond affirming generically that its competence extends to “doctrine concerning faith and morals”—Vatican I compared the infallibility of the pope with that of the Church, understanding thereby that the scope of papal infallibility is exactly the same as that of the corporate episcopate in its definitions (see V. Gasser; Mansi 52:1225D–28A).

In its concern to dissipate any residue of doctrinal GALLICANISM, Vatican I decisively rejected any effort to make the collaboration or consent of the episcopate (or of the whole Church) an indispensable juridic condition either of the pope’s infallibility (see V. Gasser; Mansi 52:1208C; 1317A–B) or of the pertinent information needed by the pope in order prudently to go forward to a definition (see V. Gasser; Mansi 52: 1217B–C). Nonetheless the Council did not look on the pope in the exercise of his infallible magisterium as withdrawn from the common life either of the episcopate or of the whole Church (see V. Gasser; Mansi 52:1213B–14A; 1228C). The pope’s juridic autonomy does not entail discommunity or isolation; his juridic independence is never a solitary independence. He always acts as part of the Body, in the sense that he acts from within a metajuridic community of life, based on the fact that the Spirit assures a continuum of faith both lived and taught between the Roman pontiff and his fellow believers in the Church and his fellow bishops in the episcopate. This community of living faith is a fundamental Christian reality, always there and always to be there, incapable of any fundamental dislocation, even though the precisions of the object of faith that the pope is privileged to make are not always at the moment of definition explicitly shared by many members of that community. This symbiosis of faith is a great datum of Church life about which the Roman pontiff, while remaining juridically independent in his plenary act of definition, cannot be incurious as an irrelevancy, but which he must acknowledge and honor as capable under the Spirit of significantly enriching the religious worth of his act of definition.

In a similar way the pope should be duly attentive to the common mission that as chief bishop he has with the rest of the bishops, particularly in the matter of faith. The episcopate is an indispensable part of the Church’s life and order, not obtrusive or competitive, but complementary and contributory, capable of giving a measure of light and strength, not available elsewhere, to the total religious excellence of the pope’s act of definition, even though not constituting an essential component of the papal pronouncement as infallible. It remains within the pope’s discretion how and in what measure to use these helps that the Church’s communion of life affords him in the discharge of his office.

Contemporary Discussions. In the decade or so following Vatican II, three studies prompted special interest in the debate on papal infallibility in the U.S.: Hans KÜNG’s Infallible? An Inquiry (New York 1971), Brian Tierney’s The Origins of Papal Infallibility: 1150–1350 (New York 1972), and August Hasler’s Pius IX (1846–1878), päpstliche Unfehlbarkeit und 1 Vatikanisches Konzil: Dogmatisierung und Durchsetzung ether Ideologie (Stuttgart 1977).

Küng argued that indefectibility rather than infallibility is sufficient for the life of the Church; that is, the whole Church will continue to abide in the truth of Christ despite the errors contained in the official teachings of popes and councils. According to Küng, there have been too many errors in papal teaching—the most recent being the papal teaching on birth control, Humanae vitae—to allow for a doctrine of papal infallibility, a doctrine which mistakenly presumes that it is possible to formulate propositions that are a priori infallible.

Critics of Küng have pointed out numerous historical errors in his study, not the least of which is his assumption that Humanae vitae is an infallible teaching. Moreover, many critics have noted that although indefectibility assures that the Church will exist until the end of time, it alone does not assure that the Church will have the capacity to witness to the truth of the gospel message. Finally, most critics agree that Küng is mistaken to identify infallibility with propositions, which are a priori infallible. The infallibility of popes and councils is based upon the infallibility which, as Vatican I states explicitly, the Lord intended the Church to have, and in that sense is actually a posteriori rather than a priori.

Küng welcomed Brian Tierney's 1972 study on the origins of papal infallibility as an important contribution that filled in gaps in his own argument. Tierney, a historian of medieval canon law, argued that before the 14th century no one defended a doctrine of papal infallibility. Before that time, canonists argued, sometimes in extravagant terms, for papal sovereignty, but never for papal infallibility. Popes, they taught, could be either sovereign, that is, free to revoke the decrees of their predecessors, or infallible, that is, capable of making irrevocable decrees and therefore binding on their successors; they could not be both. For Tierney, papal infallibility consists in the power to create new non-Scriptural articles of faith.

Where then did the modern doctrine of papal infallibility come from? Tierney explained that it can be found first in the writings of the enigmatic Franciscan theologian PETER JOHN OLIVI (d. 1298) who in 1280 wrote up a question about the infallibility of the pope. Olivi was interested in investing the pope with the authority to make irrevocable decisions precisely in order to protect the particular notion of poverty approved in 1277 by Pope Nicholas III which was dear to the Spiritual Franciscans, but still under attack by the rest of the Order. In 1323, relying on his canonical sovereignty and, says Tierney, rejecting any notion of the irrevocability of papal decrees, Pope John XXII condemned that doctrine of poverty and revoked the decree (Exiit) of Nicholas III. Shortly thereafter, however, John began to defend himself against charges of heresy by claiming that he had not revoked a decree of faith and morals. John's claim, according to Tierney, left the door open to the idea that a pope could in such matters make irrevocable decisions. Papal theologians soon rushed through that open door and created the modern idea of papal infallibility to strengthen the hand of the pope against conciliarists. Tierney concluded that papal infallibility does not belong to the "ancient and constant faith of the Church," but is rather "the sudden creation . . . of a novel doctrine at the end of the 13th century" (273).

Tierney's study forced theologians to take the history of the doctrine more seriously. Tierney criticizes the idea of papal infallibility defended today by ecumenically minded theologians as "Pickwickian," that is, one so highly qualified that it ends up unreal in any practical and meaningful sense. Most scholars recognize that Tierney correctly located in the late 13th and early 14th centuries the first discussions of papal infallibility. Many, however, have criticized his work for overstating the opposition between SOVEREIGNTY and infallibility, for not attending to the relationship between ecclesial infallibility and papal infallibility, and for overlooking the ways in which many of the elements of doctrine were present earlier than 1300, as, for example, may be found, in Yves CONGAR's judgment, in the writings of Thomas Aquinas. Finally, it has been pointed out that throughout his study, Tierney writes a history of a highly ultramontane idea of papal infallibility, that is, one that emphasizes the power of the pope to define apart from the faith of the Church and without grounding in Scripture. Tierney responded to the criticisms of his work and the discussion continues.

The bitterest attack on the validity of papal infallibility was launched by August Hasler who from 1966 to 1971 worked for the Vatican Secretariat of Christian Unity. His two-volume work, published in 1977, was followed in 1979 by a shorter English version under the title of How the Pope Became Infallible: Pius IX and the Politics of Persuasion (New York 1981). Hans Küng contributed a provocative introduction to the English version. Hasler contended that the standard histories of Vatican I were written from the viewpoint of the "victors," those who supported the definition. Hasler's intention was to write a more comprehensive history of the Council, one that featured the viewpoint of the minority.

Hasler divides his work into two sections. The first section deals with history, which, in his opinion, shows clearly that the only reason for the passage of the definition of papal infallibility was Pius IX's manipulation and intimidation of minority bishops before, during, and after the Council. Moreover, according to Hasler, Pius was the victim of epilepsy, given to supernatural visions, and chronically manifested psychological imbalances. So much did Pius IX control the proceedings of the Council that, in Hasler's view, the Council lacked due freedom and therefore was not valid. In the second section of the book, the theological argument, Hasler could find no Biblical or theological basis for the doctrine, and concluded that the definition dethroned history by ideology.

Most critics appreciate the extensive new material which Hasler provides, such as the private notes of Archbishop Darboy of Paris and of Bishop Maret, rector of the Sorbonne. But his orchestration of his sources betrays a double standard: he subjects to relentless criticism those who supported the definition, often ascribing to them the worst of motives, including psychopathology, and presents without any critical comment the views of those who opposed the definition. As one Vatican I scholar put it, "Hasler's presentation is repeatedly flawed by partisan allegation, unsubstantiated conjecture, and biased analysis" (J. T. Ford). Küng, Tierney and Hasler, have each been criticized in different degrees for over-stating the intent and extent of the definition formulated at the First Vatican Council; and for denying, a priori, a legitimate development of the doctrine through history.

Bibliography: M. J. SCHEEBEN, "Theologische Erkenntnislehre," in Handbuch der katholischen Dogmatik, v.1 (2d ed. Freiburg 1948) pars. 11–14, p. 80–108. C. DILLENCHNEIDER, Le Sens de la foi et la progrès dogmatique du mystère marial (Rome 1954). O. ROUSSEAU et al., L'Infaillibilité de l'Église (Chevetogne 1963). G. THILS, L'Infaillibilité du peuple chrétien "in credendo" (Louvain 1963); "L'Infaillibilité de l'Église in credendo et in docendo," Salesianum 24 (1962) 298–336. M. GOULDER et al., Infallibility in the Church (London 1968). E. CASTELLI, ed., L'Infaillibilité (Paris 1970). H. KÜNG, Infallible? An Inquiry (Garden City, N.Y. 1971). J. KIRVAN, ed., The Infallibility Debate (New York; Paramus, N.J.; Toronto 1971). J. FORD, "Infallibility—From Vatican I to the Present," Journal of Ecumenical Studies 8 (1971) 768–791. E. SCHILLENBEECKX and B. VAN IERSEL, eds., "Truth and Certainty," Concilium 83 (New York 1973). G. THILS, L'Infaillibilité pontificale (Gembloux 1969). U. BETTI, La Costituzione Dogmatica "Pastor Aeternus" del Concilio Vaticano I (Rome 1961). P. CHIRICO, Infallibility: The Crossroads of Doctrine (1985). J. L. HEFT, John XXII and Papal Teaching Authority (1986). U. HORST, Unfehlbarkeit und Geschichte (Mainz 1982). G. LINDBECK, The Nature of Doctrine (Westminster Press 1984). J. MAHONEY, The Making of Moral Theology (Oxford 1987). F. SULLIVAN, Magisterium (Mahwah, N.J. 1983). R. R. GAILLARDEZ, Witnesses to the Faith: Community, Infallibility, and the Ordinary Magisterium of Bishops (New York 1992).

[F. X. LAWLOR/J. T. FORD/J. L. HEFT]

INFANCY NARRATIVES

Term applied to the accounts of the birth and early life of Jesus as given in Mt 1.1–2.23 and Lk 1.5–2.52.

Composition and Themes. Although infancy narratives open two of our gospels, biblical criticism assigns them last in the order of composition. The passion story was composed first, reflecting the community's effort to make sense of the crucifixion of their Messiah. Next were added accounts of Jesus' ministry, and only afterwards did the infancy accounts evolve, answering to human curiosity about Jesus' origins.

A comparison with Mark, which was composed first gospel of the four gospels, illustrates the theological significance of this compositional chronology. Mark's gospel, which lacks an infancy narrative, begins with Jesus' baptism. Although the holy spirit designates Jesus as the "beloved son" sent to preach a "baptism of repentance and forgiveness of sins" (Mk 1.4, 11), it is not until the crucifixion that people unequivocally recognize and acknowledge Jesus' divine stature; a Gentile centurion announces "Truly this man was the son of God" (15.39).

By contrast, the infancy narratives take for granted Jesus' divine and Messianic stature. Matthew's genealogy titles Jesus "Messiah" (Mt 1.16); an angel announces to Joseph that Jesus will be a savior who embodies the divine presence (Mt 1.21, 23). The ensuing episodes amount to a gospel in miniature that epitomizes the evangelist's christology and anticipates Jesus' double-edged destiny. Gentiles will honor Jesus' divinity and status as Davidic Messiah, just as the magi, in the infancy narrative, worship him at birth. The religious leaders of his day will persecute him and plot his death, just as the Jewish ruler Herod does at the start of Jesus' life.

Luke's infancy account also announces Jesus' divinity and his saving role in history. Like Matthew, who represents Jesus as the fulfillment of Old Testament scripture and Jewish hopes, Luke highlights the continuity of the Christian gospel with Judaism. The literary design of Luke's account draws a parallel between John the Baptist's story and that of Jesus. John the Baptist may be viewed as a transitional figure between the story of Israel and the story of Jesus (R. Brown, H. Conzelmann's). Zechariah and Elizabeth (the parents of John the Baptist), and Anna and Simeon (prophetic models of Jewish piety), set the stage for the savior's arrival. Jesus' Davidic stature (Lk 1.32; 2:11), together with his destiny as one who will incur opposition (Lk 2.34), are equally clear. Distinctively Lukan themes appear in this narrative, particularly his accent on social justice and the vindication of the oppressed (see, e.g., the Magnificat Lk 1.46–56).

Literary Relationship. Points of agreement between the two accounts must be balanced against their divergences in order to ascertain their literary relationship. The hypothesis that Matthew and Luke drew independently from oral tradition accounts better for the commonalities between the two accounts than does the hypothesis of direct dependence. The points of agreement include some of the principal characters, the Davidic descent and conception of Jesus by the holy spirit, the angelic annunciation, Jesus' birthplace at Bethlehem and residence in Nazareth, and the dating of his birth to the reign of Herod the Great.

While both accounts are concerned with showing the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecies in the Christ event, Matthew does so principally by explicit formulaic scriptural citations, which punctuate his infancy story five times (1.22–23; 2.5b–6, 15b, 17–18, 23b), whereas Luke weaves single words or phrases from the Old Testament into his sentences (e.g., Lk 1.35, where the Greek verb ἑπισκιάζω (overshadow) is the same as that used in the Septuagint translation of Ex 40.35: “the cloud overshadowed it [the TENT OF MEETING].” One may detect Luke’s theological emphases by such linguistic clues.

The divergences between the two accounts are obvious, including differences between their genealogies, and in overall plot and themes. Matthew 2, including the visit of the magi, the star, and Herod’s plot, is not found in Luke, while most of Luke 1–2, including the birth of John the Baptist, the canticles, the shepherds, and the presentation of Jesus at the Temple, are not found in Matthew. These differences often remain obscure to popular audiences who are accustomed to seasonal adaptations and liturgical recreations of the Christmas story that harmonize the two accounts.

Matthew’s Structure. A number of different proposals have been suggested for the structure of Matthew’s account. K. Stendahl divides the story into four parts (1.1–17, 18–25; 2.1–12, 13–23), dealing respectively with the questions of who Jesus is, how he came to be, where he was born, and whence his destiny. Others organize the story with reference to three dreams of Joseph that occur 1.18–25, 2.13–15, and 2.19–23. A structure that comprises a genealogy (1.1–17), followed by three episodes (1.18–25; 2.1–12; 2.13–2) is presented here and focuses on Exodus themes in Matthew’s account.

The genealogy shows Jesus’ descent from Abraham and David and form a unit with the second episode, demonstrating that the promises of God to Abraham and David are fulfilled in Jesus, the Messiah. Although He is born of a virgin, Jesus belongs to the family of David, since Joseph is a “son of David” and (1.20) has accepted Mary, Jesus’ mother, as his wife.

The second episode (2.1–12) shows that the Gentiles, represented by the magi, have sought out and done homage to the Messiah of Israel, whereas His own people (Herod, “all Jerusalem,” the high priests, and the Scribes) have been disturbed by the news of His birth (2.3) and have either ignored or sought to kill Him (See MAGI).

Jesus the New Israel. A Jesus-Israel typology is the dominant theme of the following section (2.13–23); Jesus is presented as the true Israel who goes down to Egypt like the ancient people of God and is brought out of Egypt in a new Exodus (2.15). The words of Jer 31.15 that are cited in Mt 2.18 belong to a context that deals with the “Purification in the Temple,” by Hans Memling, showing the Virgin presenting the Christ Child to a priest inside a Gothic church, c. 1470. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

Exile and the return of Israel and Judah. Through the application of that text to Herod’s slaughter of the children of Bethlehem, that massacre is seen not merely as an attempt to destroy the Messiah, but as the concomitant of the exile of Jesus, the new Israel. The midrashic account of the persecution of Jacob-Israel by Laban, because of which the patriarch was compelled (“by the word of God”) to take refuge in Egypt, may have been influential in the formation of Matthew’s narrative. That MIDRASH, based on Dt 26.5–8, is found in the Passover HAGGADAH, the liturgy for the eve of Passover, and probably dates from the second century B.C. Its use in Matthew suggests the Passover celebration of the Jewish Christians as the Sitz im Leben (life situation) of this episode. It is possible that the magi episode was originally not concerned with those that follow, and it may even be the conflation of two distinct stories, but in the arrangement of Matthew, the magi’s inquiry (2.2) is the point of departure for the entire flight and massacre complex; consequently, the Jesus-

Israel theme dominates the narrative as a whole, although it is not present in the first episode 1.18–25.

Jesus the New Moses. A Jesus-Moses typology also can be discerned, although it is subordinate. The clearest indication is in Mt 2.20, where Herod's death is announced to Joseph in terms that are taken from Ex 4.19. There Moses is told to go back to Egypt "for all the men who sought your life are dead"; in Matthew, Joseph is told that "those who sought the child's life are dead." The plural in Matthew is explicable only because the verse is a free quotation of Ex 4.19. There are also similarities to midrashic stories about the birth of Moses. The two points of closest correspondence are (1) the dream in which Amram, Moses' father, is told what his unborn child's mission will be (cf. Mt 1.20–21) and (2) the terror of the Egyptians at the prediction of Moses' birth (cf. Mt 2.3). Although the rabbinic sources containing the Moses legend are relatively late, most of its elements are found in Josephus, which shows that the possible influence of the legend on Matthew cannot be excluded on chronological grounds.

Luke's Account. Luke's narrative draws a parallel between the infancy of John the Baptist and that of Jesus, in which are noted similarities such as Gabriel's announcement to Zachary and to Mary, Zachary's canticle and Mary's, and also striking contrasts, e.g. while the Baptist, like other great Biblical figures, is born of a previously sterile woman (e.g. Sarah, Hannah), Jesus is born to a virgin who conceives out of wedlock by the holy spirit. Luke's design illustrates his theology of salvation history whereby Jesus stands as a prophet at once continuous and discontinuous with the prophets of Israel.

Fulfillment of the Old Testament. In a different manner from Matthew, Luke presents the Christ-event as the fulfillment of the Old Testament. The Baptist is the new Elijah, the precursor of the DAY OF THE LORD, who is to prepare the people for the coming of Yahweh (Lk 1.16; cf. Mal 3.1, 23); Jesus is the Messiah of Israel who will receive the throne of David his father (Lk 1.32–33). By anticipation, the newborn child is announced as Lord and Messiah (2.11), although those titles belong to Jesus properly only when He is raised from the dead (Acts 2.36). The prediction in Dn 9.21–24 of the eschatological consecration of the "most holy" and that in Mal 3.1 of Yahweh's coming to the Temple have influenced Luke's narrative. The angel Gabriel, who appears in the Old Testament only in Dn 8.16 and 9.21, is the one who announces ("at the hour of the incense offering"; cf. Dn 9.22) the conception of the Baptist and, later, that of Jesus (see GABRIEL, ARCHANGEL).

Jesus' coming to the Temple, where He is acknowledged by Simeon as the "glory" of Israel, is the sign that the final age has been inaugurated; in Him the eschatological dwelling of God in the midst of His people is accomplished. Other Old Testament texts to which it has been suggested that Luke alludes are: So 3.14–17 (Lk 1.28–33), 2 Sm 6.2–11, 16 (Lk 1.39–44, 56), Ex 40.35 (Lk 1.35), and Mi 4.7–10; 5.1–5 (Luke ch. 2 passim). The MAGNIFICAT (Lk 1.46–55) and the BENEDICTUS (1.68–79) are filled with Old Testament citations and are the most striking examples of the so-called anthological composition that is common to the rest of the narrative. The annunciations to Zachary and Mary (see ANNUNCIATION) correspond to the format of similar Old Testament announcements (cf. Gn ch. 17–18; Jgs 6.11–23); Mary's pondering and keeping "all these things" in her heart (Lk 2.19, 51) has its parallel in Gn 37.11 and Dn 7.28. The presence of these Old Testament references may be questioned in particular cases. Some that have been suggested give the appearance of being too subtle to be probable, but in estimating the probability account must be taken both of Luke's allusive method of citation and of the fact that he does not use the Old Testament in the manner of a scientific exegete.

See Also: LUKE, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO; MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.

Bibliography: P. BENOIT, "L'Enfance de Jean-Baptiste selon Luc I," New Testament Studies 3 (1956–57) 169–194. R. BLOCH, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 5: 1263–81. M. M. BOURKE, "The Literary Genus of Matthew 1–2," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 22 (1960) 160–175. E. BURROWS, The Gospel of the Infancy and Other Biblical Essays (The Bellarmine Ser. 6; London 1940) 1–58. D. DAUBE, "The Earliest Structure of the Gospels," New Testament Studies 5 (1958–59) 174–187. W. D. DAVIES, The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount (Cambridge, Eng. 1964) 61–83. R. LAURENTIN, Structure et théologie de Luc I–II (Études bibliques Paris 1957). S. MUÑOZ IGLESIAS, "El Evangelio de la infancia en San Lucas y las infancias de los héroes bíblicos," Estudios bíblicos 16 (1957) 329–382; "El género literario del Evangelio de la infancia en San Mateo," ibid. 17 (1958) 243–273. J. RACETTE, "L'Évangile de l'enfance selon saint Matthieu," Sciences ecclésiastiques 9 (1957) 77–85. W. L. KNOX, The Sources of the Synoptic Gospels, ed. H. CHADWICK, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1953–57) 2:39–44, 121–128. K. STENDAHL, "Quis et Unde? An Analysis of Matthew 1–2," Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche, ed. W. ELTESTER (Berlin 1960) 94–105. A. VÖGTLE, "Die Genealogie Mt 1.2–16 und die matthäische Kindheitsgeschichte," Biblische Zeitschrift 8 (1964) 45–58, 239–262; 9 (1965) 32–49; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 6:162–163. P. WINTER, "Some Observations on the Language in the Birth and Infancy Stories of the Third Gospel," New Testament Studies 1 (1954–55) 111–121; "The Cultural Background of the Narrative in Luke I–II," Jewish Quarterly Review 45 (1954–55) 159–167, 230–242. R. E. BROWN, The Birth of the Messiah (Garden City, NY 1977).

[M. M. BOURKE/M. STEVENSON]

INFANT JESUS OF PRAGUE

A statue of the Christ Child King that has been preserved since 1628 in the church of Our Lady of Victory in Prague. Carved of wood and covered with wax, it stands 18 inches in height and rests on a broad pedestal. Its left hand encircles a miniature globe surmounted by a cross, and its right hand is extended in the manner of pontifical blessing. The figure appears to represent in symbolical synthesis the idea of the Kingship of Christ and that of the Holy Childhood. The origin of the figure is shrouded in legend. It was brought from Spain to Prague in the 16th century, and in 1628 was presented to the Discalced Carmelites. It became an object of popular devotion that received ecclesiastical approval through its coronation by the bishop of Prague on April 4, 1655, and through generous grants of indulgences.

Bibliography: EMMERICH OF ST. STEPHEN, Great and Little One of Prague, ed. L. NEMEC (Philadelphia 1959). A. M. MEYER, The Infant King (St. Meinrad, Ind. 1951). L. NEMEC, The Infant of Prague: The Story of the Holy Image and the History of the Devotion. (New York 1958).

[L. NEMEC]

INFIDEL

In the strict sense, not including apostates from the faith and those who have lost the faith either through formal heresy or in any other way, one who does not have true faith in the Christian revelation; this may be either through his own fault, because he formally refused to accept the faith when offered, or without any fault of his own, merely because he never sufficiently heard of the gospel. In the first case he is called a positive infidel, who gravely sinned when refusing the faith. In the second, he is called a negative infidel, who never rejected the faith but happens not to have the faith because he was never given the opportunity to accept it. It may also be that one who knew about the faith and came to doubt about his own religious conviction neglected further inquiry and through guilty neglect failed to come to the faith: such a one is at times called a privative infidel. In all three cases there is question of unbaptized persons.

It may happen, however, that negative infidels come to have, not without the help of GRACE, implicit FAITH in (Christian) revelation. Such will be the case of an unbaptized person who, following his conscience in all that he knows to be the will of God in his regard, comes to have the implicit desire of Baptism (baptism of desire). For one to have the implicit desire of Baptism and through it to live a life of grace, an act of charity, or love of God above all things, is necessary, and this is not possible without (SUPERNATURAL) faith in God. Such a person, baptized in desire, is no longer an infidel in the eyes of God while continuing to be so reckoned in the eyes of men. Another example of negative infidel in appearance only is that of an unbaptized person who, when offered the interior grace of faith, assents and believes in God but does not follow His will in all things, e.g., does not give up an immoral way of life. Such a half-hearted response to the grace of faith is insufficient for him to have the (implicit) desire of Baptism and receive the life of grace; but according to some theological opinion it may be sufficient for him to be given the habit of faith. Such a negative infidel would be an unbaptized but believing sinner.

Negative infidels who have a "natural belief" in God and were never given the grace of faith or never heard of the gospel may, theoretically speaking, be living a naturally good life or, more likely, a life of alternating sin and repentance. But contemporary theological understanding of God's universal salvific will holds that sooner or later, if not permanently, they are offered the grace of faith and are faced with the alternative of saying yes or no to God and Christ. If they say yes, they are no longer infidels except in appearance; if they say no, they become positive infidels, or sinners.

The case of atheists who reject all belief in God is different from that of infidels; they not only are without divine faith, but also without natural belief in God.

See Also: FAITHFUL.

Bibliography: S. HARENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 7.2:1726–1930. N. KRAUTWIG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:930–931. H. BACHT, ibid. 949–951. S. PINCKAERS, Catholicisme 5:1587–88.

[P. DE LETTER]

INFINITY

Infinity is derived etymologically from the Latin, in-finitas, which is a combination of in (meaning not) and finis (meaning end, boundary, limit, termination, etc.). In general, the word signifies the state or condition arising from an entity's not having some sort of end, limit, termination, or determining factor. It is predicated both of extramental, actually existing things (such as God, the visible universe, and matter) and of intramental entities (such as logical concepts and mathematical constructs). The condition it signifies in these can connote either perfection or imperfection, depending upon whether the termination, which is thereby stated to be absent, is itself a perfection and whether the entity in question should possess it. For example, when predicated of God, infinity denotes perfection. This is so because it reveals the absence in God of matter and of other intrinsic factors suggesting mere POTENCY, as well as the absence of extrinsic limits such as time, place, or comprehension by a created intellect—all of which can be linked with imperfection and none of which is proper to God. On the other hand, when applied to MATTER, infinity signifies a state of indigence, since it manifests that matter of itself lacks FORM and ACT; these are perfective factors that matter must receive if it is to exist within the real universe, and is to be even indirectly intelligible and describable.

This article traces the history of the concept of infinity, which falls into five main sections: (1) that of the ancient Greeks, (2) Neoplatonism, (3) that of the Fathers of the Church, (4) medieval scholasticism, and (5) the period since 1600. The following account treats the first two periods as representative of Greek and Neoplatonic thought, and the last three as representative of Christian and modern thought.

Greek and Neoplatonic Thought

The first period begins in ancient Greece with Anaximander of Miletus (c. 610–546 B.C.), who affirmed that “the first principle of existing things is the unlimited” (Fragment 1). It is “eternal and ageless” (Frag. 2), “deathless and indestructible” (Frag. 3), and, most likely, is some basic natural body that is unlimited because quantitatively inexhaustible. The Pythagoreans, as Aristotle reports (Meta. 987a 15–19), “thought that finitude and infinity were not attributes of certain other things, e.g., of fire or earth or anything else of this kind, but that infinity itself and unity itself were the substance of the things of which they are predicated.” Under their influence PLATO also made infinity one of the constitutive factors of reality: “All things that are ever said to be consist [so the men of old say] of a one and a many, and have in their nature a conjunction of Limit and Unlimitedness” (Philebus 16C; also see 23C). But Aristotle dominates this first period, as well as most subsequent periods, with respect to quantitative infinity. (See GREEK PHILOSOPHY.)

Aristotelian Teaching. According to ARISTOTLE (see Phys. 202b 30–208a 27), QUANTITY, MOTION, and TIME are all infinite (apeiron or, less frequently, aoriston), but infinity (apeiria or aoristia) belongs to the last two only because of their relationship with the former: motion is infinite if the magnitude covered is somehow infinite, and time is so only as a measure of an infinite motion. What, then, is apeiria as found in quantity? Basically it has to do with certain conditions of a line.

Quantitative Infinity. Let AO be an actual line of definite length. Point A terminates it at the beginning and point O at the end; thus, such a line is finite. Because of its definite dimensions, it can be measured, known, and described. Accordingly, its status of finiteness makes it knowable and describable. In it, extension is related to the terminating points in somewhat the same way as matter with respect to form; and it is itself a composite, so to speak, of matter and form (see MATTER AND FORM). Since perfection and actuality, no less than intelligibility, arise from the presence of form, AO is not only knowable but is perfect and actual as well. Consequently, the condition of finiteness in AO arises from its possession of definite dimensions and is aligned with perfection, actuality, and knowledge.

But how is AO infinite? If AO is finite inasmuch as it has definite dimensions because of its initial and final terminating points, it is infinite inasmuch as it can be conceived without one or other of those terminations. Thus AO is infinite with respect to increase, since no matter what its actual length may be, one can always imagine it as without its final point and thus as extending further. (The same applies to number, which is similarly infinite, since no matter what actual sum is suggested, one can always think of a larger one). AO is also infinite with respect to decrease under certain conditions. Thus, no matter how small it actually becomes by its initial point’s receding toward its final one, one can always conceive it as smaller, provided that the recession through subtraction of parts takes place according to a fixed ratio. Thus, let AO be divided at B, C, D, etc., so that  $AB = \frac{1}{2} AO$ ,  $BC = \frac{1}{2} BO$ ,  $CD = \frac{1}{2} CO$ , and so on. The subtraction of AB, BC, etc., from AO can go on forever, and some of AO will always be left. No matter how small the remaining part becomes, one can conceive of it as still smaller because it, too, is similarly divisible. Consequently, AO is infinite with respect to decrease, when viewed without the initial point it actually has.

Characteristics. What are the characteristics of such infinity? Finitude is, as previously seen, linked with intelligibility, actuality, and perfection, because extension in a finite line is related to its terminal points (and consequent definite dimensions) as matter to form. On the other hand, a line is infinite when its extension is viewed as lacking either its initial or final points and, thus, infinity indicates that a line in such a condition is like matter without form. But form is the source of knowableness, actuality, and perfection. Accordingly, infinity is linked with a state of unintelligibility, mere potentiality, and imperfection. An infinite line, precisely as infinite, is unknowable because it lacks definite dimensions and thus cannot be measured or described. Its infinity, however, is merely a potential condition: every line is actually finite because of its definite length, though it can be considered as subjected to an endless process of addition or of division because of the very nature of quantity, just as primary matter can receive an endless series of substantial forms. An infinite line is imperfect because it is viewed as lacking the determinate dimensions it should and actually does have.

Imperfection of the Infinite. Aristotle frequently stresses this characteristic of imperfection. What is infinite, he explains in an important passage (Phys. 206b 32–207a 2), “turns out to be the contrary of what it is said to be. It is not what has nothing outside it that is infinite, but what always has something outside it.” Why so? Because in quantity there is always some part beyond the point one has reached in dividing it, or in building it up by addition. Quantity is infinite because one can always take a part outside what has already been taken. Since, then, that which is infinite always has something outside and beyond, there is always something absent or lacking from it. Thus it is not complete or perfect. In fact, infinity itself is, Aristotle concludes, the very PRIVATION of wholeness and perfection, the subject of which is the sensible continuum (ibid., 207b 35–208a 4).

Implications. For Aristotle, then, infinity basically is associated with quantity and is synonymous with imperfection. This synonymy has two important consequences. The Greek philosopher cannot predicate it directly of God Himself (for him, the First Mover and primal Separate Intelligence) but only of His power, and this through an extrinsic predication. That is, His power is so perfect as to be the cause of an infinite effect, viz, the endlessly recurring circular motion of the heavenly bodies through an infinity of time; it is this alone to which infinity directly belongs and through which divine power receives the predication (Meta. 1073a 6–10). Secondly, the material universe cannot be actually infinite in extent, nor is it merely one of an infinite number of universes, since such sorts of actual infinities are contradictory and impossible. Moreover, it is finite in virtue of the fact that as “uni-verse” it is whole, all-inclusive, complete, and perfect; and whatever is whole, complete, and perfect has an end, which is its limit and termination (Phys. 207a).

Neoplatonism and Plotinus. The second period in the history of infinity, that of NEOPLATONISM, was initiated by PLOTINUS (204–270 A.D.). As Aristotle had done before him, Plotinus affirmed that the power of God (the One-Good, the highest hypostasis) is infinite. “He who is capable of making all things, what greatness would He have? He is infinite and, if so, would have no physical magnitude. . . . The Principle would be great in this sense that nothing is more powerful than He or even equally so” (Enn. 6.7.32.14). “The One is the greatest of all things not in physical magnitude but in power, for that which is without extension is great through power. . . . We must also insist that It is not infinite as though intraversable either in extension or in number but by the unboundedness of Its power” (6.9.6.1–13; also see 2.4.5.17–20; 5.5.10.20–24). This affirmation is apparently made through extrinsic denomination: the divine power is so great as to be the source of infinite effects—material existents that are infinitely numerous because they ceaselessly deploy in endlessly recurring world-cycles (5.7.1.9–27; 5.7.3.15; 6.2.22.11).

Infinity as Perfection. Unlike Aristotle, though, Plotinus developed a theory of infinity that is synonymous with perfection and that is applicable to God Himself. This theory rests on the insight that form and BEING are determining and terminating factors wherever found (5.1.7.19–26). If something is without form and being, then it is without their determination and, thus, is indeterminate or infinite. If it should possess them but does not, that status of indetermination is coterminous with imperfection. Thus, matter of itself is below form and entity and, accordingly, is indeterminate and simultaneously imperfect (1.8.4.14; 2.4.6.17; 2.4.10.1; 2.4.13.26; 2.4.15.16). On the other hand (and of this Aristotle shows no explicit awareness), God rises above the being and form proper only to lower levels of reality, viz, the intelligible, psychological, and sensible universes, and thereby also transcends any formal determination. By this TRANSCENDENCE He is infinite, and such infinity is aligned with absolute perfection and actual excellence. “Do not remark that [the Good] is in such and such a way because such language would determine It and make It become a particular thing. He who beholds It cannot say that It either is or is not such and such, for thereby he would say that It is one of those beings which can rightly be termed such and such, whereas It really is other than all such beings. Having seen that It is indeterminate, he can enumerate all the beings which come after It and then say that It is nothing of all of them but that It is Total Power which is really master of Itself” (6.8.9.37; see also 6.7.17.12–18; 5.1.7.19–26; 5.5.6.1–15; 5.5.11.16–37).

Infinity and Nonbeing. In thus showing that infinity can be coextensive with perfection and thereby predicatable of the divine reality itself, Plotinus made a major contribution to the development of the concept of infinity. But one must remember that this predication is only implicit in Plotinus’s text. He explicitly links infinity with NONBEING: the One is stated to be infinite because It transcends being and form. Granted that this infinity of nonbeing can imply that the One Itself is infinite, still this is only an implication.

Christian and Modern Thought

The third period in the history of infinity is occupied by the Fathers of the Church—SS. Hilary of Poitiers and Augustine in the West; Clement of Alexandria, John Chrysostom, Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, Pseudo-Dionysius, and John Damascene in the East. These were all influenced by Sacred Scripture, as well as by Neoplatonism.

Scriptural Teaching. The Bible has only a few and (at best) indirect texts on infinity itself. An example would be the Vulgate's Ps 144.3: "Magnus Dominus et laudabilis nimis et magnitudinis eius non est finis" (the last clause is even less strong in modern translation: ". . . neque explorari potest magnitudo eius"). Still the Scriptures emphasize the awesome power of God (e.g., Gn 17.1; Ps 33.9; Ps 135.6; Jn 1.3), His eternity (Dt 32.40; Gn 21.33), His omnipresence (Dt 4.39; Ps 139.7–12) coupled with transcendence of any definite place (1 Kgs 8.27; Jb 11.8; Bar 3.25), His otherness from all else (Is 46.9), and the inability of any created intellect to know Him adequately (Rom 11.33; Eph 3.8). The result was that Latin and Greek Fathers of the Church speak of God as infinite in the sense that He is all-powerful, eternal, immense, incomprehensible, and, when under the influence also of Neoplatonism, nonbeing.

Latin and Greek Fathers. St. AUGUSTINE offers an example of the teaching of the Latin Fathers: "It is evident that the orderly disposition of the universe comes about through a mind [God], and that it can appropriately be called infinite, not in spatial relations, but in power which cannot be understood by human thought. . . . That which is incorporeal . . . can be called both complete and infinite: complete because of its wholeness, infinite because it is not confined by spatial boundaries" (Epist. 118, Fathers of Church ed., 284–285). Again: "What is in your mind and heart when you think of a certain substance which is living, perpetual, omnipotent, infinite, everywhere present, everywhere complete, nowhere enclosed? When you think of That, you have a conception of God in your heart" (In evang. Ioh. 1.8 see also Nat. boni 3).

St. JOHN DAMASCENE similarly speaks for the Greek Fathers: "[God] is not to be found among beings—not that He is not but, rather, because He is above all beings and even above being itself. For if knowledge has beings as its objects, then what transcends knowledge also transcends essence and, conversely, what is beyond essence also is beyond knowledge. Therefore, the Divinity is both infinite and incomprehensible, and this alone is comprehensible about Him—His very infinity and incomprehensibility" (De fide orth. 1.4). "We believe in one God: one principle, without beginning, uncreated, unbegotten, indestructible and immortal, eternal, unlimited, uncircumscribed, unbounded, infinite in power, simple, uncompounded, incorporeal" (ibid. 1.8). "Of all the names given to God, the more proper one seems to be that of He Who is . . . . For, like some infinite and indeterminate sea of essence, He has and contains in Himself all beings" (ibid. 1.9).

Another author deeply influenced by the Old Testament (in the Septuagint version), who antedates the Fathers and, for that matter, Plotinus too, is PHILO JUDAEUS of Alexandria, the Jewish theologian and philosopher. For him God is infinite in a threefold way: as incomprehensible, since we can know that He exists but not what He is; as omnipotent, since God freely created the world out of nothing; and as all-good, since He is freely and lovingly provident even over individuals (see H. A. Wolfson, Religious Philosophy [Cambridge, Mass. 1961] 5–11).

Medieval Scholasticism. The fourth period is that of medieval SCHOLASTICISM. Although JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA held a doctrine on divine infinity that seems almost wholly Neoplatonic (see De divisione naturae, 1.56; Patrologia Latina 122; 499D), still from the 10th to the middle of the 13th century Christian authors appear to pay little or no attention to divine infinity. Generally, the term fails even to be listed by theologians among the divine attributes (for example, the Abelardian Ysagoge in theologiam, Robert of Melun's Sententiae, Stephen Langton's Commentarius in sententias, Peter of Poitiers's Sententiae). Occasionally, infinity is applied to divine power or is made synonymous with eternity or with God's incomprehensibility (e.g., Peter of Lombard's Libri IV sententiarum, Hugh of Saint-Victor's De sacramentis christianae fidei, Hugh of Saint-Cher's In sententiarum, Alexander of Hales's Glossa in sent., Albert the Great's In sent.). But nowhere is it itself discussed at any length.

Bonaventure and Aquinas. After this period of silence, though, the topic is given explicit and detailed attention by Christian authors, two of whom made important contributions to its development and whose position still influences many contemporary scholastics—SS. BONAVENTURE (see his In 1 sent. 19.2.3 ad 4; 43.1.1 and ad 3; 43.1.2, written c. 1250) and THOMAS AQUINAS (see his In 1 sent., 43.1.1; written c. 1254; ST 1a, 7.1–2, written c. 1267). Their contribution directly concerns divine infinity, for with their contemporaries they accepted Aristotle's conception of quantitative infinity with reference to lines and numbers and, moreover, agreed that the world is finite in extent and is numerically one. But they broke with Aristotle by predicating infinity of God Himself, as Plotinus also had. Yet their position significantly differs from the Neoplatonist's because it rests upon an obviously different metaphysics.

Aquinas—whose doctrine is considered here for the sake of convenience, although in this matter Bonaventure's position does not differ from Thomas's and, in fact, chronologically anticipates it—agreed with Plotinus that forms, and, in general, every sort of act, are determining factors for whatever receives them. Accordingly, a recipient such as matter is indeterminate and infinite (and also imperfect) when considered in itself and as lacking form. But in contrast to Plotinus, Thomas taught also that matter and all other types of potencies are not mere negations, privations, or mental constructs, but are genuinely real and actually existing components within existents, and cause their own sort of determination. Accordingly, a subsistent form or act is without the limiting determination of matter or of potency and, thus, is infinite and infinitely perfect.

Infinity of God. God is such an existent. The divine essence contains no matter or potentiality of any sort and, as such, is totally free from their limitations. Consequently, infinity is a perfection of His very being (see PERFECTION, ONTOLOGICAL). Whereas each creature is a FINITE BEING because it is a composite of act(s) received and determined by potency, God is infinite Being because He is an entirely subsistent, PURE ACT and so without any recipient potency. Perfect Being because He is subsistent existence, God is infinite Being as free from the limiting determination of matter and all potency. (See INFINITY OF GOD.)

Such a clearly presented and solidly established doctrine was one force that helped focus the attention of Thomas's and Bonaventure's contemporaries and their successors upon infinity as an important topic for discussion. Few if any subsequent scholastic philosophers or theologians failed to investigate "Whether infinity may be attributed as a perfection to the divine being itself," and to give basically the same answer (on DUNS SCOTUS, see Bettoni, 132–159).

Modern Thinkers. Non-scholastic authors in the fifth period, which begins toward the end of the 16th century and continues to the present day, are greatly concerned with infinity too, but the doctrines they elaborate differ greatly from those of preceding eras. With regard to divine infinity they begin with a doctrine that is much the same in content as that of their scholastic predecessors, differing mainly in terminology. For example, R. DESCARTES thought that only God should be called "infinite," whereas quantitative items should be termed "indefinite" (see Reply to Obj. 1, Haldane-Ross transl., 2:17; Principles of Philosophy, 1.24, 26, 27, 1:229–230).

God and Infinity. B. SPINOZA, however, introduced quite a different doctrine, which was demanded by his MONISM (and, one may add, retained without radical modification by G. W. F. HEGEL and subsequent monists). Only God is truly real, individual things being mere modes or manifestations of the divine substance. Precisely as individual, as determinate, as this, as finite, they are unreal, since individuality and finitude are mere negations. But God is infinity because He is total reality and sheer affirmation: ("By God I understand Being absolutely infinite. . . . To the essence of that which is absolutely infinite pertains whatever expresses essence and involves no negation" (Ethics, 1.6, ed. J. Wild, 94–95).

In an effort to safeguard the reality of individual things while simultaneously retaining God, some subsequent philosophers went to the opposite extreme and made God finite—J. S. MILL, W. JAMES, A. N. WHITEHEAD (see Collins, 285–324).

Revolution in Cosmology. The main difference between this period and earlier ones, however, is seen in its cosmology. The Aristotelian notion of the universe as finite in extent and numerically one has been replaced, mainly through the discovery and use of the telescope, by a quite divergent conception. For example, the galaxy seen in the Milky Way, of which the solar system is a tiny part, is simply one among almost innumerable other galaxies. Add this to the fact that the galaxies seem to be receding from one another at enormous speeds, and the inference can easily be drawn that the UNIVERSE is somehow infinite in extent.

Such a doctrine was anticipated by Giordano BRUNO and others. Their theorizing has usually been accompanied by a tendency to speak of divine infinity in terms of OMNIPRESENCE and immensity. God is infinite insofar as He is everywhere present in this infinite universe, which in no way limits, contains, or terminates Him. Unfortunately, in the minds of some, divine infinity is so closely aligned with the infinity of absolute space as almost to seem identical (see PANTHEISM; PANENTHEISM).

Modern Mathematics. Coupled with this new cosmology is modern mathematics, including non-Euclidean geometry, which was initiated in the 17th century and came to offer a new approach to mathematical infinity. As developed by Georg CANTOR, this approach begins with such theorems as, "There are as many negative integers as there are positive integers; there are as many points on a line segment one unit in length as on a line segment two units long . . . , etc." It terminates by defining an infinite set as one that has this property: a proper subset of the set can be put into 1-to-1 reciprocal correspondence with the whole set. In brief, a set is infinite if a part of the set is equal to the whole (see Hausmann, 76–89).

Where previously it was assumed that the essence of mathematical infinity lay in quantity and variability, now the concepts of order and multiplicity are regarded as basic. Cantor marked the change by introducing the concept of transfinite numbers. What is a transfinite number? "In general, if we consider any class of sets of elements which are such that they can be put into a one-to-one reciprocal correspondence, we define the property common to every member of the class to be the cardinal number of each set in the class. If we now consider the class of all infinite sets which can be put into a one-to-one reciprocal correspondence, we may define that property of this class to be a transfinite cardinal number" (ibid., 86).

Concluding Summary. Throughout its history infinity has been predicated mainly of quantitative items and of God; in each case it has undergone an evolution of meaning.

With respect to quantity that evolution was postponed until the most recent period. Before that Aristotle's conception held sway. Yet even now his conception is not entirely set aside. True enough, mathematical infinity is newly conceived and interpreted, and the common consensus is that the universe is not the simply bounded system it once was conceived to be. But when one says that the material world is infinite in extent, does he not mean that no matter how large it now actually is, it can still be conceived as (and perhaps will expand to be) of greater extent? If so, this meaning of infinity is still basically Aristotelian.

The evolution with respect to the infinity of God suffered no postponement. Lacking an explicit basis in Sacred Scripture, and linked with imperfection by the ancient Greeks, infinity was first predicated of God only through extrinsic denomination, viz, His power was regarded as infinite because it was capable of producing an infinite number of effects. Plotinus severed this link with imperfection, and infinity became a divine attribute, although explicitly aligned with nonbeing. Utilizing a different metaphysics, Bonaventure and Thomas Aquinas identified infinity with subsistent and all-perfect being. Resorting to a still different metaphysics, Spinoza and other monists made infinity synonymous with reality itself, and tended to reduce all existents other than God to nonentities. In reaction, still others pretended to save individual things by reducing God to their finite and imperfect level.

Bibliography: L. SWEENEY, "Infinity in Plotinus," Gregorianum 38 (1957) 515–535, 713–732; "Divine Infinity: 1150–1250," The Modern Schoolman 35 (1957–58) 38–51; "Another Interpretation of Enneads, VI, 7, 32," ibid. 38 (1960–61) 289–303; "L'Infini quantitatif chez Aristote," Revue philosophique de Louvain 58 (1960) 504–528; "Some Mediaeval Opponents of Divine Infinity," Mediaeval Studies 19 (1957) 233–245; "Lombard, Augustine and Infinity," Manuscripta 2 (1958) 24–40. J. D. COLLINS, God in Modern Philosophy (Chicago 1959) 285–324. E. BETTONI, Duns Scotus: The Basic Principles of His Philosophy, tr.

and ed. B. BONANSEA (Washington 1961) 132–159. C. VOLLERT, "Origin and Age of the Universe Appraised by Science," Theological Studies 18 (1957) 137–168. B. A. HAUSMANN, From an Ivory Tower: A Discussion of Philosophical Problems Originating in Modern Mathematics (Milwaukee 1960) 76–89. G. GAMOW, One, Two, Three . . . Infinity (rev. ed. New York 1961). G. CANTOR, Contributions to the Founding of the Theory of Transfinite Numbers, tr. P. E. B. JOURDAIN (La Salle, Ill. 1941). A. KOYRÉ, From the Closed World to the Infinite Universe (Baltimore 1957).

[L. SWEENEY]

INFINITY OF GOD

The infinity of God has to do with God's perfection. The primary notion of God's infinity is that of denying that which would place him within the finite realm and so make him less than perfect. To say that God is infinite is simply to say that he is not finite. More positively God's infinity enhances those attributes which denote his perfection, such as, He is infinite in goodness, infinite in power, infinite in wisdom and love. There are no limits, bounds, or constraints, whether external or internal, imposed on his perfect being.

Biblical Basis. There is no explicit biblical teaching on God's infinity. However, it is implied within some of the other attributes predicated of God within the Bible. From the beauty, greatness, and power seen within the created order "comes a corresponding perception of their Creator" (Wis 13:3–5). God "knows all that may be known . . . no thought escapes him. He is from everlasting to everlasting. Nothing can be added or taken away . . . Though we speak much we cannot reach the end, and the sum of our words is: 'He is the all'" (Sir 42:15–43:35). God's "greatness is unsearchable" (Ps 144–145:3). There is none like God for he orders all time from beginning to end (Is 46:9–10). God is "exalted in his power" (Jb 36:22). God alone possesses immortality and exists in unapproachable light (1 Tm 6:15). It is in the perception of the grandeur and glory of God's perfection that his infinity is discerned.

Christian Tradition. While some Greek philosophical schools, such as the Stoics, conceived matter to be infinite, Christian theologians consistently attributed infinity to God in the absolute sense. The universe may be relatively infinite in that we do not know its bounds, limits, and ends nor do we know the infinite array of all that it contains, yet it is finite in that it was created and so is bound by time, space, and its own limited finite ability to be actualized (Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae, I.7.2–4). However, as Creator, God is not a member of the finite created order, and so is wholly other than all else. Therefore, God does not belong to any finite genus, that is, he cannot be named within or numbered among any genus of the created order and therefore does not partake of the limitations of that order (Summa theologiae, I.3.5). As God he belongs to an entirely different ontological order and as such is absolutely infinite. Moreover, Aquinas argues that because God's very nature is to be (ipsum esse) and so pure act (actus purus) he is absolutely "infinite and perfect" in that all the attributes that are predicated of him are fully and perfectly in act and thus infinitely in act (Summa theologiae, I.7.1). For example, because God is infinite as pure act "it is necessary that the active power of God should be infinite . . . Whence, since the divine essence, through which God acts, is infinite it follows that his power likewise is infinite" (Summa theologiae, I.25.2). All of God's perfections then are infinite in that they possess no limitations as in creatures but are fully and perfectly actualized within his divine being.

Theologians have treated the infinity of God, both philosophically and theologically, primarily from within his being the one God. However, the Trinity is equally infinite since the one God is a trinity of persons. The persons are infinite in their giving of themselves entirely to one another for they subsist only in relation to one another. They are all also infinitely perfect in their love, goodness, wisdom, power, and knowledge. The Father is infinitely perfect, the Son is infinitely perfect, the Holy Spirit is infinitely perfect, but there are not three separate infinite perfections but one infinite perfection that each person wholly and completely possesses in accordance with that person's distinct subjectivity. The Father possesses the one infinite perfection as Father, the Son as Son, and the Holy Spirit as Holy Spirit (Augustine, De Trin. 7; Summa theologiae, I.39). The Church has consistently taught that God as a trinity of persons is infinite in their various perfections: Quicumque (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 75), the Nicene Creed (Denz., 125–6), Lateran IV (ibid., 800), Vatican I (ibid., 3001).

Bibliography: T. AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae I.7. A. H. ARMSTRONG and R. A. MARKUS, "God's Transcendence and Infinity," in Christian Faith and Greek Philosophy (London 1960) 8–15. L. SWEENEY, Divine Infinity in Greek and Medieval Thought (New York 1992).

[T. G. WEINANDY]

INFRALAPSARIANS (SUBLAPSARIANS)

From Lat. infra, within, and lapsus, fall, originally 16th century Calvinists who held that God permitted the Fall of Adam and then elected some men out of the mass of the fallen to be saved and rejected others, leaving them to the just consequences of their sins. The Infralapsarians opposed those Calvinists who held a SUPRALAPSARIAN view of predestination. Both parties claimed John CALVIN as favoring their view. Although some statements of Calvin, especially in his work De aeterna predestinatione Dei (1551), seem to indicate a Supralapsarian doctrine, the Genevan Reformer was neither Supralapsarian nor Infralapsarian. His desire was to place emphasis on the election or reprobation of man by divine decree, not to indicate when it was done. The view of the Infralapsarians concerned the order of God's decrees. They held that first God created man, then He permitted the Fall, and only then He elected some of the fallen to be saved, "passing over" (Westminster Confession, 1648) the others. God then provided a redeemer for the elect and, finally, sent the Holy Spirit to bring redemption to them. Infralapsarianism was condemned by the Dutch Synod of Dort (1618–19), but the triumph of the Supralapsarian view was short-lived; today no Reformed Church holds it, although a number teach Infralapsarianism.

See Also: CALVINISM; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, PROTESTANT; PREDESTINATION (IN NON-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY).

[R. MATZERATH]

INGE, HUGH

Archbishop of Dublin and chancellor of Ireland; b. Shepton Mallet, Somerset, England, date unknown; d. Dublin, Aug. 3, 1528. He appears in history first as a scholar in Winchester (1480), and he became a fellow of New College, Oxford (1484), after which he went to the Continent to take his degree. He served in the Diocese of Bath and Wells, and visited Rome with his bishop in 1504 on a mission for Henry VIII. His appointments include the prebendaries of Cudworth (1501) and of East Harptree (1503), succentor of Wells Cathedral (1503), and vicar of West Zoyland (1508) and of Doulting (1509). He also held benefices in the Dioceses of Worcester and Lincoln. Inge attracted Cardinal Thomas WOLSEY's attention as a possibly tractable agent, and through Wolsey's influence, without which he would have had "small comfort in this world," he became bishop of Meath (1512). In 1520 he gave the archdeaconry of Meath to the king's physician. Dissatisfied, he had appealed to Wolsey, asking that he not be cast aside, and he was rewarded with the chancellorship in 1522 and the See of Dublin in the same year. He pursued Wolsey's policy of hostility to Gerald, Earl of Kildare; he was credited with a reputation for justice and probity, and the rebuilding of St. Sepulchre's, the archbishop's residence. He died of the sweating sickness.

Bibliography: B. H. BLACKER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 10:431–432 F. E. BALL, William Ralph Inge, portrait by A. Norris. (National Portrait Gallery, London)

The Judges in Ireland, 2 v. (London 1926) 1:194–195, passim. J. D'ALTON, The Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin (Dublin 1838) 182–184.

[J. J. MEAGHER]

INGE, WILLIAM RALPH

Anglican clergyman and author; b. Crayke, Yorkshire, England, June 6, 1860; d. Wallingford, Berkshire, England, Feb. 26, 1954. Educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, he became assistant master at Eton (1884), fellow at King's College (1886), fellow and tutor at Hertford College, Oxford (1889), vicar of All Saints', Knights-bridge (1905), and Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge (1907). When he was dean of St. Paul's, London (1911–34), his criticisms of the spirit of secular optimism earned him the sobriquet "The Gloomy Dean." He was named knight commander of the Victorian Order in 1930.

Inge's advocacy of Christian PLATONISM, with its tradition of "mysticism based on a foundation of reason," found expression in many widely read works, among them Christian Mysticism (1899), Faith and Knowledge (1905), Personal Idealism and Mysticism (1907), Studies of English Mystics (1906), Faith and Its Psychology (1919), The Philosophy of Plotinus (1918), and The Platonic Tradition in English Religious Thought (1926).

His critical treatments of contemporary thought include major works such as God and the Astronomers (1933). Two series of Outspoken Essays (1919, 1922) deal with a variety of subjects. Christian Ethics and Modern Problems (1930) is an examination of 20th-century personal and social morality. Inge's provocative views and brilliance of style made him one of the outstanding clerical and literary figures of his day.

Bibliography: A. FOX, Dean Inge (London 1960). R. M. HELM, The Gloomy Dean: The Thought of William Ralph Inge (Winston-Salem, NC 1962).

[R. M. HELM]

INGENUIN, ST.

Bishop; also known as Genuinus or Geminus; d. c. 605. PAUL THE DEACON in his History of the Langobards (3.26) mentions Ingenuin as partaking in the pseudosynod of Maran (Patriarchate of AQUILEIA) and he criticizes him sharply for defending in that synod (590) the schismatic position in the THREE CHAPTERS controversy. In 591 Ingenuin subscribed to the schismatic letter to Emperor MAURICE; there is ample evidence of his later conversion, however. In the 10th century the See of Säben was transferred to Brixen. The relics of Ingenuin were likewise transferred from Säben to Brixen, but at a later time.

Feast: Feb. 5.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 1:675–681. J. KRÖSS, Die Heiligen und Seligen Tirols (Austria Sancta 1; Vienna 1910) 67–78. R. HEUBERGER, in Festschrift Albert Brackmann (Weimar 1931) 17–39.

[W. A. JURGENS]

INGLEBY, FRANCIS, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1551 at Ripley, Yorkshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered June 3, 1586 (old calendar) at York. The fourth son of Sir William Ingleby and his wife Lady Anne Malory, Ingleby studied at Brasenose College, Oxford (before 1565), and was a student of the Inner Temple in 1576. He began seminary studies at Rheims in 1582 and was ordained priest at Laon in 1583. About three months later he left France to join the English Mission, where he labored in Yorkshire until he was arrested in the spring of 1586. Upon hearing his sentence of execution, Ingleby exclaimed, “Credo videre bona Domini in terra viventium” (“I believe that I shall see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living.”). He was one of the priests to whom St. Margaret CLITHEROW offered refuge in her home. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

INGLIS, CHARLES

Anglican bishop; b. Glencolumbkille, Donegal, Ireland, 1734; d. Nova Scotia, Canada, Feb. 24, 1816. After being educated in Ireland, he came to the U.S. in 1757 to teach at a church school in Lancaster, Pa. The following year he went to London, where he was ordained and assigned to a missionary post at Dover, Del. In 1765 Inglis became assistant rector at Trinity Church in New York City. During the Revolutionary War, his church was burned and his congregation scattered after he refused to omit the prayer for the king from his services. He left for Nova Scotia with other Loyalists, and in 1787 he was consecrated as the first Anglican bishop in Canada. With his see at Halifax, Nova Scotia, his diocese comprised all eastern Canada and the island of Bermuda. As bishop, he founded (1789) King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia, one of the first English colleges in Canada.

Bibliography: J. C. H. MOCKRIDGE, Bishops of the Church of England in Canada and Newfoundland (Toronto 1896). O. W. ROWLEY, Anglican Episcopate of Canada and Newfoundland (Milwaukee 1928).

[F. REED]

INGRAM, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Stoke Edith, Herefordshire, England, 1565; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Gatehead, Newcastle-on-Tyne, July 26, 1594. John, probably the son of Anthony Ingram of Wolford (Warwickshire) and Lady Dorothy Hungerford, was educated first in Worcestershire, then at the New College (Oxford), English College (Rheims), Jesuit College (Pont-a-Mousson), and English College (Rome). He was ordained in Rome (1589) before entering the mission field in Scotland (1592) where he was frequently in the company of Lords Huntly, Angus, and Erroll, the abbot of Dumbries, and Sir Walter Lindsay of Balgavies. Following his arrest on the Tyne, Nov. 25, 1593, Fr. Ingram was imprisoned successively at Berwick, Durgam, York, and in the Tower of London, where he was tortured. During his imprisonment he wrote twenty Latin epigrams which have survived. Later he was again sent north to prisons at York, Newcastle, and Durham. He was tried at Durham with St. John BOSTE and Bl. George Swallowell, a converted minister. Ingram was found guilty of having been ordained abroad under 27 Eliz. c. 2, although there was no evidence that he had ever exercised his priestly faculties in England. It appears that an unnamed Scotsman vainly offered the English Government a thousand crowns for his life. Ingram was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

INHERITANCE (IN THE BIBLE)

The juridical notion of inheritance or heritage, designating the transmission or possession of goods not acquired personally but given by a previous possessor, is attested in the Bible rather frequently in its literal sense; but since it naturally lends itself to express the idea of the gratuitous gift of salvation, its theological usage in a figurative sense in the Bible is still more abundantly documented and more important. This article, after treating of the terminology, will first consider inheritance in the literal sense, and then in the figurative sense, and this for both the OT and the NT.

Terminology. The principal Hebrew equivalents for the English words, inherit, inheritance, heritage, and heir, are based on the verbal roots yrš, nḥl, and ḥlq, to which may be added the nouns gôrāl (lot), ḥebel (allotted portion), and perhaps also segullâ (private fortune). The root yrš, which occurs about 256 times in the Masoretic Text (MT), denotes specifically succession in possession, whether by conquest or by inheritance, and it is used almost always of immovables, such as a country, city, or house. The root nḥl, which is used about 282 times in the MT, designates precisely possession held by title of patrimony and is employed almost always of immovables. The root ḥlq refers to a heritage as a portion of a larger unit.

This orientation of the Hebrew roots toward the sense of stable possession forced the Septuagint translators at times to use Greek words in a sense broader than they had in the classical language. In adopting the Greek words κληρονομέω, (inherit), κληρονόμος (heir), and κληρονομία (inheritance, heritage) to express the notions contained in the Hebrew terms, the translators often went beyond the classical meaning of transmission of property by last will and testament or by other legal disposition and gave the Greek terms the meaning of stable, lasting possession. The same extension of sense is found in the NT also.

Literal Sense. In Israel the transmission of patrimonial goods was fixed by custom or by law; it was not determined by last will and testament (2 Sm 17.23; 2 Kgs 20.1; Sir 14.15). There are but few passages in the Bible that treat directly of the laws of inheritance (Dt 21.15–17; Nm 27.1–11; 36.6–9). It is known, however, from these and other passages, that the oldest son had a right to a double share of his father's possessions (Dt 21.17; see also Lk 15.12), that the sons of so-called concubines (see CONCUBINE [IN THE BIBLE]) received no inheritance, unless they were adopted as sons of full right (Gn 25.5–6), and that illegitimate sons were excluded from the inheritance (Jgs 11.1–2). Daughters did not inherit, unless there were no male heirs and the daughters married within the same clan (Nm 27.1–8; 36.1–9). A widow did not inherit; she could, however, be the guardian of her deceased husband's property until their sons came to full age (Ru 4.9; 2 Kgs 8.3–6); if she had no male descendant, the property of her deceased husband passed to his brothers or nearest male relatives, and she returned to her father's house (Gn 38.11; Lv 22.13), or she remained attached to her husband's family by a LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (Dt 25.5–10; Ru 2.20; 3.12). Toward the end of the OT period, however, a childless widow could apparently inherit the property of her deceased husband (Jdt 8.7).

Theological Usage in the Old Testament. Near the beginning of the Pentateuch, in the account of God's promise to Abraham (Genesis 15), the concept of inheritance already appears four times (in v. 3, 4, 7, and 8). This promise of a future inheritance was the point of departure for a line of theological thought continuing to the NT (Gn 12.7; 13.14–17; 15.18; 24.7; 26.3–5). The same promise of a land to be received as an inheritance is found in the ancient Mosaic traditions concerning the COVENANT (Ex 3.8, 17; 23.20–33); in later texts this possession is regarded as a fulfillment of the promise made to Abraham (Ex 6.8; 13.5; 32.13).

Canaan, the Inheritance of the Tribes of Israel. After the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt, the land of Canaan was considered their inheritance (Gn 48.6; Nm 26.52–56; 33.50–54; 34.14–18). Deuteronomy returns time and time again to this idea (Dt 1.7, 8, 21, 35, 38; 2.12, 29; 3.18, 20, 28; etc.). If Israel succeeded in gaining possession (yrš) of the Promised Land, it was only because this land had been given to it as a patrimony (nāhālā) by Yahweh (Jos 1.6; 3.10; 13.1, 7). The same idea recurs in the books of Samuel, Kings, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles (e.g., 1 Kgs 8.36; 9.7; 2 Kgs 21.8; Neh 9.8, 15, 23, 35, 36; 1 Chr 28.8; etc.), and the same is true of the Psalms (Ps 36[37].18; 46[47].5; 68[69].37; 104[105].11; 134[135].12; 135[136].21–22). In certain passages the land of Canaan is called "Yahweh's heritage" (1 Sm 26.19; 2 Sm 21.3; 1 Kgs 8.36).

Israel, Yahweh's Heritage. At the same time, however, Israel is regarded as the heritage of Yahweh (2 Sm 14.16; 20:19; 1 Sm 10.1; Dt 4.20; 9.26, 29; 1 Kgs 8.51, 53; 2 Kgs 21.14), and in the Oracles of Moses this assigning of Israel to Yahweh is said to go back to an early division of the various peoples among "the sons of God": "The Most High assigned the nations their heritage . . . after the number of the sons of God, while the Lord's own portion was Jacob, His hereditary share was Israel" (Dt 32.8–9; see also Ex 34.9). Thus, the fact that Yahweh holds Israel as His heritage implies that He governs it, not through any intermediary, such as an angel, but personally, by dwelling in the midst of His people (Ex 33.14–16).

In the Prophets. The inheritance idea plays practically no role in the Prophets of the 8th and 7th centuries B.C. (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah). With Jeremiah, however, it again becomes a central idea: the gift of the Promised Land as Israel's inheritance constitutes, with the Exodus, the preamble to the covenant and forms the basis for the expectation that Yahweh would be faithful to Israel (Jer 3.19; 7.7; 11.4–5; 12.7–10; etc.). Similar ideas are found in Ezekiel (Ez 33.24; 35.15; 37.25; 38.16; 47.14), Deutero-Isaiah (Is 47.6; 49.8), Trito-Isaiah (Is 60.21; 63.17), and Zechariah (Zec 2.16; 8.12). In the last two of these the perspective of the heritage has already become eschatological.

Development of the Concept. In the course of the OT the inheritance theology evolved in such a way that gradually the two originally distinct concepts of Canaan as Israel's heritage and Israel as Yahweh's heritage were integrated into each other, the former concept gradually disappearing in the latter. This was in germ in the theology of the covenant (Dt 4.25–28; 28.15–68; 29.21–27; see also Ex 19.5; Dt 7.6; 14.2; 26.18), and Israel would always be Yahweh's heritage, even in the state of the faithful "remnant" (Dt 30.5). When the Exile would have made the hopes of a terrestrial heritage unrealizable, the inheritance concept would be taken up in more universalist terms (Is 57.13; 60.21; 65.8–9; Ps 36[37].9, 11, 18, 22, 29, 34).

In the Maccabean period the inheritance concept became eschatological and personal (Wis 3.14; 5.5; 2 Mc 7.36; see also Dn 12.13). In this spiritualization of the inheritance concept the importance of a certain Israelite institution should be pointed out: the special situation of the tribe of Levi, whose heritage was Yahweh Himself (Dt 18.1–2; Nm 18.20; Jos 13.14, 33; 18.7; Ez 44.28). This situation was gradually transformed into a purely spiritual and personal hope (Ps 15[16].5–6; 72[73].25–26).

Theological Usage in the New Testament. The inheritance concept is developed theologically in the NT along two lines of thought: eschatological hope, and the fulfillment of the inheritance promises in Christ.

Eschatological Hope. As in Judaism of the last few pre-Christian centuries, so also in the NT the hope of the inheritances is transformed to an eschatological plane (Mk 10.17 and parallels; Mt 5.5; 25.34; 1 Cor 6.9–10; 15.50; Gal 5.21; Eph 5.5). In this perspective the possession of the KINGDOM OF GOD is now the inheritance of the believers (Rom 4.13–16; Eph 1.18; Heb 9.15; 1 Pt 1.4), of which the pledge is given with the Holy Spirit received in baptism (Eph 1.14).

Fulfillment of the Inheritance Promises in Christ. In the NT the promises of the inheritance made to Abraham are considered as fulfilled in Christ. This line of thought is well expressed in the parable of the vine dressers (Mk 12.1–12 and parallels). Christ is the heir who inherits the vineyard of Israel (Is 5.1–7) and who therefore receives the inheritance promised to Abraham (Gal 3.15–18), and this promised inheritance He shares with the believers (Gal 3.29) in the Church (Eph 3.6).

The inheritance concept has thus attained its full development: starting with the promise of a land in which Israel could live here on Earth, it now designates the blessings of salvation, the sharing in the divine sonship in the kingdom of the Father (Mt 25.34).

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 53–55. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1062–64. W. FOERSTER and G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935– ) 3:757–786. F. MUSSNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:962–963. P. KOSCHAKER, Reallexikon der Vorgeschichte, ed. M. EBERT 15 v. (Berlin 1924–32) 3:114–119. X. LÉON-DUFOUR, ed., Vocabulaire de théologie biblique (Paris 1962) 435–439. J. B. BAUER, ed., Bibeltheologisches Wörterbuch, 2 v. (2d ed. Graz 1962) 1:267–272. J. HEMPEL, Das Ethos des Alten Testaments (Beibefje zur Zeitschrift für die Alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 67; Berlin 1938) 71–72, 119–120. F. DREYFUS, “Le Thème de l’héritage dans l’Ancien Testament,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 42 (1958) 3–49. H. WILDBERGER, Jahwehs Eigentumsvolk (Zurich 1960).

[J. HARVEY]

INJURY, MORAL

As understood in moral theology, injury is a violation of right, or an act opposed to the virtue of justice. This was the earliest sense of the term, and in ordinary usage this sense is still discernible, although the word is used often in reference to harm suffered without injustice, such as might be sustained in an accident. The word, in its verbal form, may be used in an active sense to signify the doing of a wrong to another; as a substantive it is more commonly applied in the correlative passive sense to signify the result of such an act, i.e., the harm suffered by the person wronged. If the injustice is intended, the injury is said to be formal; if it is done without advertence or intent, it is merely material and is not sinful unless the lack of advertence is itself culpable. An injury is direct if it is intended as such; it is indirect if it is not intended but is foreseen as a consequence of something one does intend. It may be inflicted by a positive act, such as theft, or by the omission of an act one is bound to perform. A further precision is made by moralists who distinguish injustice as injurious, and injustice as injurious and damaging. Any violation of justice is injurious, but it is also damaging if the victim sustains loss (damnum, or damage) on its account. The obligation to RESTITUTION in the strict sense of the word arises from injuries of the latter kind.

There are as many kinds of injury as there are species of injustice. Since injustice is ex genere suo gravely sinful, every act that is injurious in the proper sense is a mortal sin unless one or another of the conditions necessary for full subjective responsibility is wanting, or unless the harm done is too small to be taken seriously.

It is a rule of law that no injury is done to one who consents to the transgression of his right: scienti et consentienti non fit iniuria et dolus (Liber Sextus, rule 27). In such a case one cedes his right. However, this rule is applicable only if the party consenting is free to yield his right, which is not the case, for example, in a sin of adultery with a woman whose husband does not object, or in the taking of the life of another who wants to be released from the burden of living. The rule supposes also that the consent of the one whose right is violated is given freely, i.e., that he does not yield his right under the influence of error, fraud, fear, or violence.

The injustices done to those who, following the counsel of Christ (Mt 5.40), offer no resistance to evil, or who long for martyrdom, or rejoice over the injuries done to them (Heb 10.34) are in no way condoned by the willingness of the victims to submit to unjust treatment. The intention of the victims is not precisely to surrender their rights to the unjust, or to approve the wickedness, but to bear the trial patiently for the sake of Christ.

The sinful gravity of an injury is measured not only by the seriousness of the actual injustice that is done, but also by the harm to the social order, for the peace and security of the community may be threatened by an injury done to a private individual who feels little loss at the violation of his right. Nevertheless, the degree of the victim's unwillingness to suffer the injury should in some cases be taken into consideration, because if it can be assumed that he is not seriously unwilling and would not urge his strict right, the act would not be a grave violation of justice, on the principle consentienti non fit iniuria. But, on the other hand, a marked and emphatic unwillingness of a person to have his right disregarded in some trifling matter by which he happens to set great store would not aggravate a petty injustice to the extent of making it a grave sin against justice, for his excessive unwillingness would be unreasonable. Still, though a venial sin from the point of view of justice, such an act could involve a grave transgression of the law of charity.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae 72:1–4. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI, Theologia moralis, ed. L. GAUDÉ, 4 v. (new ed. Rome 1905–12; repr. 1953) 3:966, 984–990. A. THOUVENIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 7.2:1936–39. J. A. MCHUGH and C. J. CALLAN, Moral Theology, 2 v. (New York 1930) 2:46–50. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology, rev. and enl. ed. by L. W. GEDDES (New York 1958) 2:265–268.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

INNATISM

Innatism teaches that man is born with ideas. It is a psychological explanation of the origin of human thought, not to be confused with IDEALISM, which contends that thought generates its own content. Historically, innatism has taken two main forms, the Platonic and the Cartesian.

Plato's innatism is a psychological corollary to his theory of being and knowledge. Influenced by Parmenides's insistence that the mind knows being and that being as such precludes change, PLATO denied that the mind could abstract meaning from the material world experienced by the senses. Pure meaning, for him, was expressed in the judgment of identity (A is A), and this kind of judgment looked directly to the intelligible content that the mind found within itself. Man's advance from ignorance to knowledge was not the fruit of experience but of remembrance. It followed from this that the soul had lived in the world of forms before it was united to the body.

The innatism proposed by R. DESCARTES was less central to his philosophy; some Cartesians, such as L.

BRUNSCHVICG, maintain that Descartes's doctrine could have prescindend from it. The Cartesian clear and distinct idea is not measured by reality but is reality's measure. Things are true to the extent to which they conform to the idea expressing their nature. The mind must purge itself of the disturbing influence of the imagination and of the senses, draw within itself, and thus—by a supreme effort of concentration—intuit ideas that are reducible to their clearest and most distinct components. Once convinced that the mind does, in fact, possess an intuitive knowledge of clear and distinct ideas by withdrawing from experience, Descartes was forced to reject Aristotle's notion of ABSTRACTION and to conclude that human ideas are born with man.

A realist and Aristotelian theory of knowledge objects to innatism because the doctrine is based on an a priori metaphysics rather than on an analysis of human experience. Factually, men learn through experience. Intelligibility is first grasped in sensible "examples" (to use St. Thomas Aquinas's word) presented to the mind by way of experience. Distilling meanings from the material instances in which they are found, the intelligence predicates such meanings of things. The human INTELLECT thus depends upon sensation in two ways: (1) it abstracts meaning from things, and (2) reflecting upon the sensorial context in which these things are presented to it, it refers this meaning to the things themselves in judgment. Moreover, a phenomenological study of knowledge reveals no data supporting the innatist contention that man is born with ideas.

In some psychological and psychiatric theories, especially those of S. FREUD and C. G. JUNG, innatism can mean that man's sensorial equipment is predisposed at birth—through racial, biological, historical, and other circumstances—to a subsequent determination of his intellectual life. A similar kind of innatism is advocated by St. THOMAS AQUINAS, who taught that man's intellectual capacity and, to an extent, his achievement, is dependent upon the sensorial equipment with which he is born.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; IDEA; ONTOLOGISM.

Bibliography: A. CARLINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 2:1422–28. P. FOULQUIÉ and R. SAINT-JEAN, Citonnnaire de la langue philosophique (Paris 1962) 364. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:49–51.

[F. D. WILHELMSSEN]

INNITZER, THEODOR

Cardinal archbishop of Vienna; b. Vejprty (Weipert), Bohemia, Dec. 25, 1875; d. Vienna, Oct. 9, 1955. Theodor, son of a lacemaker, studied at Vienna and was ordained in 1902. From 1913 until 1932 he was professor of the New Testament at the University of Vienna and general secretary of a Catholic cultural society, the Leo-Gesellschaft. In the Schober cabinet (1929–30) he served as minister of social welfare. He became archbishop of Vienna (Sept. 20, 1932) and cardinal (March 1933). Innitzer was a strong supporter of the authoritarian regime of Engelbert Dollfuss and Kurt von Schuschnigg. He and the other Austrian bishops declared their support for the Anschluss in the faint hope of preserving Austria's Church liberties and tradition. Pope Pius XI and the German hierarchy did not approve of this optimistic policy, which was soon rendered meaningless by the Nazi refusal to honor agreements and by the attack on the archiepiscopal palace by members of Nazi youth organizations (Oct. 8, 1938). Promises made by Hitler to Innitzer in the course of two interviews were intended merely to win Catholic support in the plebiscite. In his last years Innitzer devoted himself to rebuilding the Church in Austria, especially to restoring the Stefansdom, damaged in the last days of World War II. He also remained more aloof from Austrian politics. Long a pioneer in providing advanced theological training for the laity, he established for this purpose the Vienna Catholic Academy (1945). Innitzer was outstanding for his love of his fellow men and for his awareness of social problems. Much less impressive was his political sense, which had developed in the tradition of JOSEPHINISM and under the influence of German national feeling in Bohemia.

Bibliography: Geschichte der Republik Österreich, ed. H. BENEDIKT (Munich 1954). J. WODKA, Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1959). J. KOSNETTER, Theodor Kardinal Innitzer zum Gedächtnis (Vienna 1957); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5:685.

[W. B. SLOTTMAN]

INNOCENT, ST.

Bishop of Tortona c. 322–350; d. 350. Although his vita is legendary, Innocent did exist and fragments of the legend are true. His family lived in Tortona in northern Italy, and were, by imperial license, exempt from persecution. However, when his father and mother died, Innocent was summoned to court. He refused to sacrifice to the gods, was tortured, and was condemned to burn at the stake. The night before his execution he dreamed that his father directed him to go to Rome; waking, he found his guards asleep and succeeded in making his escape. In Rome, he was received by Pope MILTIADES, and later he was raised to the diaconate by Pope SYLVESTER. Sent to Tortona as bishop, for 28 years he zealously spread the faith and built many churches.

Feast: April 17.

Pope Innocent I, effigy from 9th-century series of papal portraits, formerly at the basilica of St. Paul, Rome, Italy.

Bibliography: A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:113. Acta Sanctorum April 2:478–482. F. SAVIO, Analecta Bollandiana 15 (1896) 377–384.

[E. D. CARTER]

INNOCENT I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Dec. 22, 401 to March 12, 417. Innocent was most probably a Roman deacon, who succeeded ANASTASIUS I in December 401. In 410 he undertook a journey to Ravenna to arrange a truce between the Emperor HONORIUS and Alaric the Goth, and was therefore absent from Rome when the city was taken and pillaged by the Gothic king (August 24). He returned to Rome in 412, subsequently died there, and was buried like Anastasius in the cemetery called Ad Ursum Pileatum.

Correspondence. Of the correspondence of Innocent, 36 letters are preserved in the ancient canonical collections. Disregarding chronology, the letters can be classified according to the three areas in which Innocent tried to exercise his authority.

To Western Bishops. In writing to Victricius of Rouen (Epist. 2), EXUPERIUS OF TOULOUSE (Epist. 6), and the bishops of the Council of Toledo in 400 (Epist. 3), Innocent settled their questions regarding discipline and the liturgy. In his letter to Decentius of Gubbio (Epist. 25, March 19, 411) he deals with the Canon of the Roman Mass and speaks of Confirmation as reserved to bishops only, of Penance, and of Extreme Unction. On several occasions, Innocent reiterated the prohibition against marriage for bishops, priests, and deacons and the obligation of continence for those already married before entering the clergy; and he sanctioned the vow of chastity for consecrated virgins (Epist. 2). The letter to Exuperius contains also a list of the canon of the Bible and excludes several apocryphal books.

Innocent frequently asserted the authority of the Apostolic See, stating (rather ahistorically) that as all the Western churches owed their origin to Peter and to his successors in the See at Rome, it is according to Roman usage that liturgical worship should be observed everywhere (Epist. 25.1.2). Citing the erroneous canons of Nicaea and Sardica, he ruled that ecclesiastical affairs should be adjudicated by the provincial bishops, “without prejudice, however, to the Roman church, respect for which should, in all cases, be maintained,” and to which major problems should be submitted (Epist. 2.5, 6).

To Eastern Bishops. Innocent formalized the policy of popes Siricius and Anastasius I entrusting to Anysius of Thessalonica surveillance over the churches in Eastern Illyricum and, probably following the civil practice of instituting imperial vicars, made Rufus, the successor to Anysius, his vicar for the ten provinces in the civil dioceses of Macedonia and Dacia. Innocent’s primary intention was to curtail the claims of the patriarchate of Constantinople which, with the encouragement of the Eastern emperor, was attempting to extend its jurisdiction in that direction.

He likewise intervened in the difficulties that followed the deposition of St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM at the Synod of the OAK in 403. After he had been informed of the matter by THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA and by John himself, he refused to exclude John from communion with Rome since the matter had not been decided by a legitimately constituted council in conformity with the canons of Nicaea (Epist. 5). He wrote several letters of encouragement to John, refused to recognize Arsacius as John’s successor and finally, after John’s death in exile, broke communion with Theophilus of Alexandria and the Eastern bishops who had removed John’s name from the Diptychs. Communion with Antioch was restored in 414 when its bishop, Alexander, received from the pope an assurance concerning the ancient rights of his see; and an end was put to the MELETIAN SCHISM. Only after the death of Innocent was full communion with the East restored (Epist. 19, 20).

To African Bishops. Innocent intervened in the dispute over Pelagianism (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM). Pelagius had been condemned originally by a Council of Carthage in 411, but had received a pardon at a synod at Diospolis in Palestine in 415. Following this action, councils in Carthage and Milevis reaffirmed the excommunication of 411 and forwarded their decisions to Rome in 416 (Epist. 26, 27). Five bishops, including Aurelius of Carthage and St. AUGUSTINE, sent a Pelagian dossier to the pope (Epist. 28), demanding the intervention of the Apostolic See and requesting the pope to summon Pelagius to Rome and anathematize his errors. They asked Innocent if “their small stream of doctrine flowed from the same source” as his own (Epist. 28.17).

Innocent replied to these letters on Jan. 27, 417 (Epist. 29, 30, 31) and boldly thanked the Africans for referring the matter to him, which they had not done. He denounced perverse doctrines concerning grace but did not condemn anyone or disavow the Council of Diospolis, fearing to create conflict between the African and Palestinian bishops. On receipt of these letters Augustine pronounced the famous words: “On this matter two councils have been sent to the Apostolic See and rescripts have been received in reply. The case is closed (causa finita est)—would that the error were likewise ended” (Sept. 23, 417; Serm. 131.10). Yet Innocent had little impact on the government’s treatment of Donatism in Africa, which was probably for the best since no transmarine emperor or bishop ever understood Donatism.

Roman Primacy. In these matters Innocent consciously conducted himself with the authority of a successor of St. Peter. The African bishops acknowledged this fact in principle, declaring that they understood “what was due to the Apostolic See; since at Rome, it was desirable to follow the Apostle from whom the episcopate stemmed and obey the authority which was attached to his name.” They agreed that while questions could be solved in distant provinces, it was not necessary to reach a decision before referring matters to the Holy See; and that a just decision should be confirmed by its authority in order that other churches might learn from it how to conduct themselves (Epist. 29.1). Innocent concurred, advising them that “Each time a problem has to do with a question of doctrine I consider that the bishops, our brothers, should refer it to Peter, the founder of the episcopate, to provide for the common good of all the churches throughout the whole world” (Epist. 30.2).

The authority of the bishop of Rome is that of the Apostle Peter himself, who was, in Christ, the first (exordium) of the Apostles and in the episcopate. The pope is to be referred to “as the head and the summit of the episcopate.” Innocent thus attempts one of the first treatises on the Roman primacy. In this role, he played a decisive part in the Apostolic See’s understanding of itself.

Feast: July 28.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 20:457–640. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab

condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD et al., 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88, repr. Graz 1956) 44–49. Collectio Avellana, ed. O. GUENTHER, 2 v. (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 35; 1895–98). Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 1:220–224 (Paris 1886–92). É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 7.2:1940–50. B. CAPELLE, “Innocent I<sup>er</sup> et le canon de la messe,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 19: 5–16. A. DIBERARDINO, Patrology (Westminster, Md. 1986), 4:582–584. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 1:573–574. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:256–259. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford History of Popes (New York 1986) 37–38. J. MERDINGER, Rome and the African Church (New Haven 1997) 88–110. C. PIETRI, Roma Christiana (Rome 1976) 1166–1201. O. WERM-LINGER, Rom und Pelagius (Stuttgart 1975). R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, 25 (Paris 1995). C. H. PIETRI, “L’aristocratie chrétienne entre Jean de Constantinople et Augustin d’Hippone,” Christiana Respublica. Éléments d’une enquête sur le christianisme antique (Rome 1997) 789–305. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (3d ed. Freiburg 1996).

[P. T. CAMELOT]

INNOCENT II, POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 14, 1130 to Sept. 24, 1143. Born Gregory Parareschi, Rome. As cardinal deacon of Sant’Angelo, he was one of three, including Cardinal Lambert, bishop of Ostia, who preceded him as Pope Honorius II, who negotiated the Concordat of WORMS in 1122, which brought an end to the Investiture Controversy. However, Worms was not without controversy itself. At the papal election of 1124, the papal chancellor, Cardinal Aimeric, played a leading role in securing the election of Cardinal Lambert as HONORIUS II. When Honorius died in 1130, he moved quickly, along with his FRANGIPANI supporters in Rome, to ensure the election of Cardinal Gregory. In doing so, he ignored the commission that had been established after the election of 1124 to prevent internal divisions from breaking out. A slight minority of the cardinals, which included six of the seven cardinal bishops, chose Gregory, while a small majority favored Cardinal Peter Pierleone, member of a distinguished Roman family and a strong supporter of the papal reform movement, as ANACLETUS II. Since numerical majority was not a determining factor in medieval electoral decisions, but had to be balanced by such considerations as the weightiness and merit of each side, the decision as to which candidate was pope remained unclear in the minds of many.

Behind this disputed election lay important differences within the reform party. Disappointment over the compromises made at Worms to secure an agreement was important, but so, too, was the reversal of the papal alliance with the NORMANS. Perhaps even more important was the worry shared by both sides as to the future security of the patrimony of St. Peter, viewed as the guarantee of papal liberty. The party of Aimeric should not, therefore, be regarded as villains, nor should the party of Peter be labeled as extremists. How to protect the settlement reached at Worms was a divisive question, but it was more a strategic one than a matter of principle. As one might suspect, support for Peter was chiefly in Italy, while Innocent received the support of northern European reformers such as NORBERT OF XANTEN, SUGER OF ST. DENIS, PETER OF CLUNY, and BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX. Since Archbishop Walter of Ravenna and the Pisans cast in their lot on his side, he clearly had the support of the emperor. Anacletus turned to the Normans in the person of Roger II, count of Sicily and duke of Apulia, whose quest for a royal title he recognized. This act, sometimes viewed as a crass bid for support, conferred legitimacy on his major supporter, raising him to the level of those secular rulers who embraced Innocent II. Bernard of Clairvaux was only one voice, although certainly among the most influential, among those who criticized the alliance with Roger II, the tyrant king, and used his crimes to attack Anacletus.

Pope Innocent II and St. Lawrence, detail of the 12th-century mosaic in the apse of the Basilica of S. Maria in Trastevere, Rome.

This support was not enough. Deserted by the Frangipani and facing the opposition of the Romans, Innocent had to flee Rome and seek refuge in Pisa. He was not crowned until 1133, when the emperor, Lothar, led Innocent back to Rome, but he was unable to keep him there. Lothar returned in 1136, but was unable to restore Innocent. In fact, he and Innocent quarreled, as he began to reassert imperial claims in northern Italy. The fragility of the papal position was revealed when Anacletus II died on Jan. 25, 1138 and Roger II recognized his successor, Victor IV. Although Victor soon made peace with Innocent, Roger II remained in the field. When Innocent led an army, composed in part of disaffected Normans, against him, he captured the pope, and in a scene reminiscent of Pope Leo IX and Robert Guiscard, negotiated an agreement that recognized him as king with the marvelously ambiguous title, "Rex Sicilie, ducatus Apulie, et Principatus Capue." It was interpreted by the papacy as confining the monarchy to Sicily, and by Roger and his successors as confirming their royal rule in southern Italy as well.

Innocent's major achievement was the Second LAT-ERAN COUNCIL, which marked the end of the schism, but also reconfirmed his commitment to reform. The issues that had brought about the schism, however, remained alive, even as the circumstances changed, to create an aura of ambivalence in the relations between the papacy and secular powers.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed., Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92) 2:379–85. L. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 (Leipzig 1881–88) 1:840–911; Patrologia Latina 179:21–732. F. J. SCHMALE, Studien zum Schisma des Jahres 1130 (Cologne 1961). H. W. KLEWITZ, "Das Ende des Reformpapsttums," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 3 (1939) 371–412. E. MÜHLBACHER, Die streitige Papstwahl des Jahres 1130 (Innsbruck 1876). P. F. PALUMBO, Lo scisma del MCXXX (Rome 1942). E. VACANDARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAURILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 2:1408–1419. H. V. WHITE, The Conflict of Papal Leadership Ideals from Gregory VII to Bernard of Clairvaux with Special reference to the Schism of 1130 (Ph.D. Diss., U. of Mich., Ann Arbor 1957). J. R. SOMMERFELDT, Consistency of Thought in the works of Bernard of Clairvaux (Ph.D. Diss., U. of Mich., Ann Arbor 1960). C. MORRIS, The Papal Monarchy: The Western Church from 1050 to 1250 (Oxford 1989) 182–185. W. MALECZEK, "Das Kardinalskollegium unter Innocenz II und Anacletus II", Archivum historiae pontificiae 19, 1981, 27–78. T. REUTER, "Zur Anerkennung Papst Innocenz II" Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 39 (1983) 395–416. D. MATTHEW, The Norman Kingdom of Sicily (Cambridge 1992) 34–54. W. MALECZEK, Lexikon des Mittelalters 5:433–4.

[J. M. POWELL]

INNOCENT III, POPE

Pontificate: Jan. 8, 1198 to July 16, 1216; b. Lothar, son of Transmundus, of the family of the Lombard counts of Segni, and Clarissa, from the Roman family of Scotti (or Scorta), probably about 1160 or 1161. d. Perugia. He pursued his studies in Rome, Paris, and Bologna. In Rome, he studied at the monastery of St. Andrew with Peter Ismael, whom he later named bishop of Sutri. In Paris, his teacher was Peter of Corbeil, whom he designated bishop of Cambrai and later as archbishop of Sens. Although there is a tradition that he studied with the canonist, Huguccio, in Bologna and later appointed him bishop of Ferrara, there is no contemporary evidence to support this view. In fact, the failure of the author of the Gesta Innocentii III, a contemporary, to mention Huguccio is sufficient to raise doubt since he mentions both Peters as teachers of the pope.

Prior to his election, Lothar wrote a number of treatises, the most popular of which was the De miseria humane conditionis (On the Misery of the Human Condition), which was widely circulated throughout the Middle Ages. Although modern scholars have often been dismissive of the work, it belonged to a genre that touched deep chords in an age when human suffering was commonplace. He also authored the De missarum mysteriis (1195), and the De quadripartita specie nuptiarum prior to his election. These works were important in gaining him the respect of his fellow cardinals. The author of the Gesta, possibly the canonist and later cardinal Petrus Beneventanus, singled out the oposcula, which he drafted and dictated at various times, as evidence that he surpassed his contemporaries both in philosophy and theology. Recent scholarship has suggested that Innocent's theological work is fundamental to the understanding of his pontificate.

Innocent's pontificate came at a critical moment in the history of the Western Church and of western European societies. Indeed, his personal name as well as his papal designation reminded his contemporaries of the internal conflicts of the 1120s and 1130s in the college of cardinals and the alliance of Pope Innocent II with the Emperor Lothar III. Politically, his reign was marked by consolidation at all levels from communes and counties to grand estates and kingdoms. The European economy was creating new forms of wealth from industry and trade. Europeans were also more conscious of the world beyond their own. The crusades had captured widespread attention with their aim of recovering the Holy Places in the East from Muslims. At the same time, higher education, literature, art, and religious life were all helping in the creation of a pan-European culture. Innocent himself was a product of this changing society. He was elected pope on Jan. 8, 1198, the same day that Celestine III died, and was ordained to the priesthood on Feb. 21, 1198. He was consecrated bishop and crowned as pope on the following day.

His pontificate reflects the manner in which this changing background helped to shape his policies. It may be conveniently divided into two periods, with the dividing point sometime around 1209 or 1210. In the first period, the influence of the schools seems to have been paramount. The pope not only presented his arguments in strong scholastic terms, as is evidenced in the decretal Per venerabilem, for example, but he embraced such reform groups as the HUMILIATI, the Order of the Holy Spirit, the TRINITARIANS, and finally, the followers of St. FRANCIS and St. DOMINIC. He canonized St. Homobonus, the humble tailor of Cremona, who had devoted himself to the poor and who, in his close ties to the clergy, represented a kind of counter image to Peter Waldo (Valdes), of Lyons, the founder of the Waldensians. To this period, also, belonged his bitterest disappointment: the failure of the Fourth Crusade. Although he had decreed a tax of a fortieth on all ecclesiastics to support the crusade, he had left its organization and direction in the hands of secular leaders like Boniface of Montferrat and the Venetian Doge. Its diversion, first against the Dalmatian city of Zara, claimed by the Venetians, and then against Constantinople, to restore the deposed Byzantine emperor, Isaac II and his son, Alexis IV, ran counter not merely to the principle that the crusades should not attack Christians, but also to the pope's goal that the Byzantine Emperor, Alexis III, brother of the deposed emperor, might be persuaded to participate in the crusade in a significant way.

To this period also belonged the disputed imperial election following the death of Henry VI in 1197. Ever since the eleventh century, the papacy had pursued a complex relationship with the German king-emperors. Although historians, as well as some contemporaries, have tended to personalize the grounds for disagreement in particular rulers, especially in the Hohenstaufen house in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, in fact, the seeds of most of the disagreement reached back much further. They were based on such factors as imperial interests in Italy and the growing concern of the reform papacy in the second half of the eleventh century that the papacy would become merely an office of State. Increasingly, the popes wanted a territorial jurisdiction that would protect the Patrimony of St. Peter, on which the Roman Church largely depended for economic support. Innocent found himself at a point where the disputed imperial election provided an opportunity to get better terms from the new Emperor. Yet he was reluctant to interfere directly. He took the position that the pope, who crowned the emperor, could judge the merits of the candidates. He vacillated between Philip of Swabia and Otto of Brunswick, only fully supporting the latter after Philip's assassination in a private quarrel in 1208.

"The Dream of Pope Innocent III," detail from the fresco cycle on the Life of St. Francis of Assisi by Giotto, 1297–1299. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

At the same time, he pursued an aggressive policy of strengthening the papal position in central Italy. He appointed rectors throughout the area and often used members of his own family to create a network of local powers that would support the papacy. He especially worked to strengthen his position in Rome, which had long been a thorn in the side of papal policy. When the Emperor Otto began to push an aggressive imperial agenda in central Italy and the Kingdom of Sicily, Innocent, who was the guardian of Frederick, the son of Henry VI and Constance, opposed him. By 1212, he had joined Philip II Augustus of France in supporting the young Frederick for the German kingship and the imperial throne.

This early period was also marked by the manner in which Innocent attempted to define his views in his important decretals. Many of these found a place in Compilatio tertia, which was compiled by Petrus Beneventanus, a member of his curial family, and approved by the pope for use by the law professors in Bologna. It was the first time that a pope took a direct role in the compilation of canon law, and his example would be followed by his successors, Honorius III and Gregory IX. The latter promulgated the Liber extra which was compiled by Raymond of Peñafort in 1234, and which became the foundation of Canon Law in the Latin Church along with the Decretum of Gratian. Innocent's decretals (judicial decisions) reveal that he was decisive, but cautious. In ecclesiastical matters, he promoted the interests of the papacy over the that of the local church, using the famous Leonine term plenitudo potestatis (fullness of power) with reference to the papal role in the church, while the local bishops had merely a partem sollicitudinis (a sharing in the care of churches).

In secular affairs, Innocent's views were much more complex, depending on the particular circumstances with which he was dealing. Thus, in Per venerabilem (1202), Innocent refused to legitimate the sons of Count William of Montpellier so that they could enter the ranks of the clergy, but he defended the power of the pope to legitimize in the secular field. He argued that he would not use this power where there was a superior secular power with that same authority. He was, however, claiming a superior jurisdiction for the papacy. That Innocent was essentially asserting the position of Pope Gelasius I, though in rather extravagant language, is shown by the argument he advanced in Novit ille (1204). It was addressed to the French bishops and defended the right of the pope to act in a secular dispute where sin was involved (ratione peccati). It clearly followed the Gelasian principle that bishops are superior to secular rulers because they are responsible to God for the souls of kings. In Venerabilem (1202) and Solita (late 1200 or early 1201), it is impossible to separate secular from ecclesiastic concerns.

There is no doubt, however, that these decretals helped to create an image of the papacy moving strongly into the secular sphere. But historians have become increasingly reluctant to view Innocent III as ambitious to wield temporal power. Indeed, there is a kind of ambivalence that separates Innocent from some of his successors, notably Innocent IV. Recent scholarship has put much more emphasis on the pastoral and theological aspects of Innocent's pontificate. Indeed, theological imagery is central in his writings, not merely in the opuscula and sermons but in his letters as well. In dealing with heresy, the decretal Vergentis (1200), promulgated against heretics in Viterbo at the beginning of his pontificate, taken by itself, creates a somewhat false impression of the manner in which Innocent dealt with heresy. His approach was more pastoral than juridical. Taken together, the efforts of these years provided a foundational experience for the efforts of the pope during the second part of his pontificate.

Two endeavors denote the character of this second period. They are summarized by Innocent himself under the terms reform and crusade. The first culminated in the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL, and the second in the planning and preparations for the Fifth CRUSADE. But much remained unresolved from the previous period, and both France and England occupied a great deal of his time. In England he was involved in the conflict over the election of the archbishop of Canterbury. In France he refused to allow Philip II Augustus to reject Ingeborg of Denmark as his wife and queen and to marry Agnes of Meran, whose father had supported Philip of Swabia. Ultimately, the resolution of conflicts between France and England also threatened his plan for the crusade. Yet, the assassination in 1208 of the papal legate, Peter of Castelnau, who was directing missionary efforts against the Cathars in the Midi, triggered his summons of military support against them, the Albigensian Crusade.

The Fourth Lateran Council was the greatest achievement of Innocent's pontificate. It brought together more than 400 bishops as well as some representatives from the East and as many more abbots from the West. The agenda, based at least in part on responses from local churches, attempted a major overhaul of numerous aspects of religious practice, from annual confession to preaching. The doctrinal decrees condemned the views of Aimery of Bene and David of Dinant, as well as the position of Joachim of Fiore on the Trinity. It also accepted the term transubstantiation to describe the change that occurred in the consecration of bread and wine in the mass. It prohibited the proliferation of new religious rules and forbade the clergy's participation in the judicial ordeal. In Ad liberandam, appended to the seventy constitutions approved by the council and pope, the council wrote a detailed plan for the newly summoned crusade, responding to many of the criticisms and failings aimed at previous crusades. Among the most controversial of the decrees was that requiring a distinctive mode of dress by Jews and Saracens and restricting their external activities during the Christian observances of Lent and Easter. As Robert Chazan has observed, these measures resulted in an intensification of traditional anxiety among the Jews. The decrees of the Fourth Lateran Council were not merely the product of Innocent III's will, nor were the decisions of the council that touched secular affairs always in line with his desires. The French bishops, who probably played the most active role in the council, opposed the pope's position regarding a settlement in the Midi. Innocent favored the rights of the count of Toulouse against Simon de Montfort, the leader of the Albigensian Crusade. In fact, recent scholarship has shown that Innocent compromised on other issues, such as the prohibition of new religious rules, most probably to secure support for his plan for the crusade, especially the tax on the clergy. Rather than viewing the Fourth Lateran Council as the culmination of Innocent's pontificate, though it did in fact turn out that way, it would probably be more accurate to see it as his plan for the future of the church. It combined much of the new spirit of reform with practical measures to meet problems, but it also left many issues, such as the relationship between Christians and non-Christians, in a largely unsatisfactory state from the point of view of all parties.

What especially marked the pontificate of Innocent III was his willingness to deal with the most difficult issues. Though some of his decisions have struck many as too rigid, a careful reading of his letters reveals that even in his strongest decretals, he tempered firmness with a willingness to act as a good shepherd. Indeed, the author of the Gesta makes this point on numerous occasions but never more forcefully than in the case of the attempted self-promotion of the bishop of Würzburg. Innocent exercised both patience and mercy in his role as judge. If history has not attached the word "great" to Innocent, it may well be a result of the complexity of the problems that he faced and that he himself recognized in his dealing with the world.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina v. 214–217; Die Register Papst Innocenz III (Graz, 1965–). De Miseria Conditionis Humanae (Athens, Ga. 1978). De quadripartita specie nuptiarum in Patrologia Latina; De missarum mysteriis in Patrologia Latina; Regestum super negotio Romani imperii, ed. F. KEMPF (Miscellanea historiae pontificiae 12; Rome 1947). C. R. CHENEY and W. H. SEMPLE, eds., Selected Letters of Pope Innocent III concerning England (New York 1953). H. TILLMANN, Pope Innocent III (Amsterdam 1980; tr. from the German edition, Bonn 1954). D. WALEY, The Papal State in the Thirteenth Century (London 1961). J. M. POWELL, Innocent III: Vicar of Christ or Lord of the World? (Boston 1961; revised and enlarged edition, Washington, D.C. 1994). C. R. CHENEY, Innocent III and England (Stuttgart 1976). M. LAUFS, Politik und Recht bei Innocenz III (Cologne 1980). W. IMKAMP, Das Kirchenbild Innocenz III (Stuttgart 1983). K. PENNINGTON, Pope and Bishops: The Papal Monarchy in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries (Philadelphia 1984). J. M. POWELL, Anatomy of a Crusade (Philadelphia 1986). R. FOREVILLE, Innocent III et la France (Stuttgart 1992). M. MACCARONE, Nuovi studi su Innocenzo III ed. R. LAMBERTINI (Rome 1995). C. EGGER, "Papst Innocenz als Theologe. Beiträge zur Kenntnis seines Denkens im Rahmen der Frühcholastik," Archivum historiae pontificiae 30:55–123. W. P. MÜLLER, Huguccio: The Life, Works, and Thought of a Twelfth Century Jurist (Washington, D. C. 1994). B. BOLTON, Studies on Papal Authority and Pastoral Care (Aldershot 1995). Pope Innocent III and His World, ed. J. C. MOORE (Aldershot 1999).

[J. M. POWELL]

INNOCENT III, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: Sept. 29, 1179 to Jan. 1180. Known as Lando of Sezze (also Landus Sinitus), he was born into a Lombard family and became cardinal deacon of St. Angelo under antipope VICTOR IV (1159–64), the first of three imperial antipopes backed by FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA (1152–90) during the schism of 1159–78 (cf. Paschal III, 1164–68 and Callistus III, 1168–78). Lando was proclaimed antipope and took the name Innocent III some 13 months after Callistus had submitted to Pope Alexander III (1159–81). Since he was elected by only a few schismatic cardinals, and without the consent of the emperor, his reign is generally not considered so much a part of the schism as an anomalous episode following it.

Prominent among Innocent's supporters were relatives of Victor IV, including the latter's brother, a knight who provided protection for Innocent in a fortified castle near Palombara. Alexander sent Cardinal Hugo of the powerful and wealthy Pierleoni family to negotiate with the knight, who exchanged Innocent for a handsome fee. The antipope was seized and imprisoned in the Holy Trinity monastery at La Cava (near Salerno), a favored place in which to confine 12th-century antipopes (cf. Theodoric, 1100, and Gregory VII 1118–21). It is assumed that he remained there until his death, but no more is known of him.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.450. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 2.431. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts (Munich 1954–59) 3.272, 608ff. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York, 1986) 180. C. MORRIS, The Papal Monarchy: The Western Church from 1050–1250 (Oxford 1989). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon des Mittelalters (Munich 1991) 5.434. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1995) 25.1259.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

INNOCENT IV, POPE

Pontificate: June 25, 1243 to Dec. 7, 1254; b. Sinibaldo dei Fieschi in Genoa, c. 1200; d. Naples. He was born into one of the most powerful noble families in northwestern Italy. His father Hugh, Count of Lavagna, was the first to carry the name Fieschi, which was bestowed on him because he held the imperial office that controlled the fiscal affairs of the emperor. Pope Adrian V was Sinibaldo's nephew and had exercised much influence in the Roman curia before he became pope (Cardinal Ottobono Fieschi). Innocent studied law at Parma where Obizo, his uncle, was bishop. Obizo made his nephew a canon in the cathedral chapter of Parma. By 1213 he was in Bologna where he continued his studies. He is called a master (magister) and a papal subdeacon in a letter of Pope Honorius III of 1223. The title would indicate that he had earned a degree in law. There is no evidence that Sinibaldo taught at Bologna, but a short teaching career cannot be completely excluded. His expansive commentary on the Decretals of Gregory IX (see below) might have begun as lectures in Bologna. He left the schools permanently in 1226 when he became an auditor of the papal Curia. When Ugolino of Ostia was elected pope and took the name Gregory IX, the new pope recognized Sinibaldo's talents. He appointed him vice chancellor of the Roman church in 1227 and immediately elevated him to the cardinalate as cardinal priest of San Lorenzo in Lucina. In 1234 Gregory appointed him the governor of the March, a region of the Papal States. Since he continued to sign many papal letters with the other cardinals, he must have remained in Rome during most of his governorship.

Tomb of Pope Innocent IV, by Tommaso Malvito. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

The relationship between the pope and the Emperor FREDERICK II deteriorated dramatically during the time that Innocent worked in the Curia. From 1238 Frederick began to claim sovereignty over central Italy and Rome itself. Gregory called a general council to meet in Rome. Its purpose was to deal with the emperor and arrange a peace. Any chance of reconciliation between Gregory and the Frederick was dealt a severe blow when on May 3, 1241 Frederick captured a large number of prelates, including two cardinals, sailing from Genoa to Rome to participate in a council. Afterwards the emperor held them captive on the island of Giglio off the coast of Tuscany. When Gregory died in August 1241, the College of Cardinals elected a new pope immediately, but the ailing pope, Celestine IV, died after a pontificate of only 15 days. The political situation was perilous. Not only was Emperor Frederick excommunicated, but the two cardinals were still imperial prisoners, and the college of cardinals itself was deeply divided over how to deal with the emperor. A vacancy of almost 18 months ensued. Finally in June 1243 the cardinals elected Sinibaldo pope. He took the name Innocent IV.

Although Sinibaldo's decision to name himself after the most dominating pope of the thirteenth century (Innocent III) might have given Frederick pause, the emperor greeted Innocent's election with enthusiasm. He immediately began negotiations to conclude peace with the Roman church. A treaty was drafted in 1244 in which Frederick agreed to abandon the Papal States. Frederick and Innocent met in the Lateran Palace during Holy Week to confirm the agreement publicly. Innocent, however, did not trust the emperor and fled Italy to Lyon, a French city just within the borders of the empire. He never returned to Italy until after Frederick's death.

The First Ecumenical Council of Lyon 1245.

When Innocent arrived in LYON he called for a general council. Lyon was subject to the Empire. Nonetheless, Innocent was secure there and could deal with Frederick without being threatened by his military power. He depended upon King Louis IX of France to protect him. The prelates of the northern European countries would have free entry into the city without the danger of imperial capture or detention. The council was convoked on June 26, 1245 and remained convened until July 17. One hundred and fifty prelates came from France, Italy, and Spain. The Latin emperor of Constantinople and other laymen were also in attendance. In his opening sermon Innocent announced an agenda that went far beyond his conflict with the emperor. He described the vices of the clergy in detail and spoke of the "insolence of the Muslims." The dangerous situation in the Eastern Mediterranean concerned him. He lamented the schism with the Greek Church in the East and the successes of the Greek schismatics who were intent on regaining control of Constantinople. He noted ferocity of the Tatars in Eastern Europe. Finally he expressed his grief that the emperor was a persecutor of the church.

The political situation in Eastern Europe and Asia had concerned Innocent for some time. He viewed the expansion of the Mongol empire and the invasion of Eastern Europe by the Tartars with interest and misgiving. In April 1245 the pope sent Giovanni Da Pian Del Carpini on an extraordinary mission. He was to travel into the Mongol empire and seek out the great khan. Carpini's long journey was the first papal attempt to contact distant non-Christian rulers and fit in well with Innocent's convictions. In his great legal commentary he had established that the pope had jurisdiction over non-Christians and could punish them for violating the law of nature. He also believed that if non-Christians did not permit Christian missionaries into their lands and permitted them to preach, the pope could call for a just war against them. Innocent established the intellectual framework for Christian missionary efforts for centuries to come.

When Innocent convened the Council, he also summoned Frederick II to stand trial, although he had excommunicated him once again just before the Council opened. The emperor did not attend but sent his legate Thaddeus of Suessa. The Council charged Frederick with a variety of crimes. Thaddeus put up an effective defense of his lord but could not prevent the Council from deposing the emperor. Innocent called upon the German princes to elect a new emperor and some of them responded by electing Henry Raspe, Landgrave of Thuringia. Unfortunately, Henry died on Feb. 17, 1247. The princes then selected William, the Count of Holland in his place. King LOUIS IX of France tried to mediate this scandalous spectacle, but Innocent responded by renewing Frederick's excommunication in April 1248. This unseemly and disastrous situation was resolved on Dec. 13, 1250 when Frederick died. Innocent was able to reassert papal authority in central Italy. Although he died before he could bestow the crown of the Kingdom of Sicily on a secular ruler who would not endanger the Papal States, his successors negotiated with many different candidates. Finally Pope URBAN IV (1261–1264) granted the crown to the brother of Louis IX of France, Charles of Anjou. The French ruled southern Italy until the fifteenth century. Never again did the empire seriously threaten the papacy and papal power in central Italy. The ultimate result was the political fragmentation of central and southern Europe that would last until the nineteenth century.

In spite of Innocent's announced agenda for reform, the Council of Lyon enacted no major legislation that dealt with the pastoral life of the church or the reform of the clergy. For the first time in the conciliar history of the medieval Christian church, political affairs completely overwhelmed spiritual concerns. The new canons did contain much that was important for the regulation of the church's judicial system. Innocent immediately published the 22 conciliar canons promulgated at Lyon on Aug. 25, 1245 and sent them to the schools in Bologna and Paris. He expanded this small collection of canons in 1246 and further in 1253 with other decretals. The last version of the collection was known as the Novels (Novellae). All these canons and decretals dealt with legal procedure and ecclesiastical administration.

Jurist Innocent was one of the most influential jurists of the Middle Ages. He wrote a massive commentary on the Decretals of Gregory IX, Commentaria super libros quinque decretalium, that was cited by every jurist from his immediate contemporaries to Hugo Grotius in the seventeenth century. He probably began writing his commentary long before he became pope and continued revising it up to the time of his death. He also wrote a commentary on the constitutions of the First Council of Lyon and on the additional decretals that were added to the constitutions in 1246 and 1253. The work was widely distributed in manuscripts and printed in a number of editions between 1477 and 1570.

Innocent emphasized papal authority and power in his commentary. His great predecessor, Pope Innocent III, had established the foundations of papal authority within the church and over secular affairs. Innocent IV expanded and refined Innocent III's legislation in significant ways. He claimed that the pope could choose between two imperial candidates, could depose the emperor (a power he exercised at Lyon), and could exercise imperial jurisdiction when the imperial throne was vacant. Although he granted non-Christian princes the right to hold legitimate political power, he tempered that right by asserting that they must permit Christian missionaries to preach in their realms (see above). In his commentary on the bull of deposition that he had promulgated at the Council of Lyon (Ad apostolicae dignitatis apicem Liber sextus 2.14.2), Innocent made remarkable claims for papal authority. The pope did not need the council to make the deposition of the emperor valid, because only the pope, not the council, has fullness of power. Innocent asserted that Christ had the power and authority to depose or condemn emperors by natural right (ius naturale). He concluded that the pope had the same authority since he held the office of the vicar of Christ, and it would be absurd if after the death of St. Peter human beings were left without the governance of one person (regimen unius personae). Few popes in the Middle Ages made a more powerful argument for the legitimacy and justness of papal monarchy.

Bibliography: Sources. INNOCENT IV, Commentaria super libros quinque decretalium (Frankfurt 1570; repr. Frankfurt 1968); Les Registres d'Innocent IV, ed. É. BERGER, 4 v. (Paris 1884–1920). N. P. TANNER, S.J. ed. and trans., "First Council of Lyons—1245," Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils (Washington, D.C. 1990): 275–301 [English and Latin Text]. A selection of Innocent's letters can be found in Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae, saeculi XIII, ed. K. RODENBERG, v.2, 3 (Berlin 1826–). NICHOLAS DE CALVI [CARBIO or CURBIO], Vita Innocentii, L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500 (Milan 1723–51) 3.1:592–592. F. PAGNOTTI, ed., "Vita Innocentii IV scripta a Fr. Nicolao de Carbio," Archivio della Società romana di storia patria 21:76–120. "Vita Innocentii IV scripta a fr. Nicolao de Carbio," ed. A. MELLONI, Innocenzo IV (see below): 259–293. Literature. J. A. CANTINI and C. LEFEBVRE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 7:1029–62. É. BERGER, St. Louis et In- nocent IV (Paris 1893). M. PACAUT, "L'Autorité pontificale selon Innocent IV," Moyen âge 66:85–119. J. A. CANTINI, "De autonomia iudicis saecularis et de Romani Pontificis plenitudine potestatis in temporalibus secundum Innocentium IV.," Salesianum 23: 407–480. D. P. WALEY, The Papal State in the Thirteenth Century (New York 1961). J. A. WATT, The Theory of Papal Monarchy in the Thirteenth Century: The Contribution of the Canonists (London 1965). V. PIERGIOVANNI, "Sinibaldo Fieschi decretista," Annali della Facoltà di Giurisprudenza dell'Università di Genova 6: 415–442 and reprinted in Studia Gratiana 14 (1969) 125–154. B. Z. KEDAR, Crusade and Mission: European Approaches toward the Muslims (Princeton 1984). M. BERTRAM, "Angebliche Originale des Dekretalenapparats Innocenz IV.," Proceedings of the Sixth International Congress of Medieval Canon Law, Berkeley (Monumenta iuris canonici, Series C, 7) 41–47. E. VODOLA, Dictionary of the Middle Ages 6 (New York 1985): 465–467. D. ABULAFIA, Frederick II: A Medieval Emperor (London 1988). A. MELLONI, Innocenzo IV: La concezione e l'esperienza della cristianità come regimen unius personae (Testi e ricerche di scienze religiose, 4). O. CAPITANI, "Problemi di giurisdizione nella ecclesiologia di Innocenzo IV nel conflitto con Federico II," Friedrich II: Tagung des Deutschen Historischen Instituts in Rom im Gedenkjahr 1994, eds. A. ESCH and N. KAMP (Tübingen 1996) 150–1162. M. BERTRAM, "Gregorio IX, Innocenzo IV e Federico II: Tre legislatori a confronto," . . . colendo iustitiam et iura condendo . . . Federico III legislatore del Regno di Sicilia nell'Europa del Duecento: Per una storia comparata delle codificazione europee, ed. A. Romano (Atti di convegni, 1; Rome 1997) 11–28. M. BERTRAM, "Zweivorläufige Textstufen des Dekretalenapparats Papst Innocenz IV.," Juristische Buchproduktion im Mittelalter, ed. V. COLLI (Frankfurt am Main 2001).

[K. PENNINGTON]

INNOCENT V, POPE, BL.

Pontificate: Jan. 21 to June 22, 1276; b. Peter of Tarentaise, in Tarentaise (probably the one in Savoy or, less likely, the one near Lyons), c. 1224. Peter entered the DOMINICANS c. 1240, became master in theology at Paris in 1259, and taught there from 1259 to 1264, and from 1267 to 1269. He wrote a widely used commentary on the SENTENCES, scriptural commentaries, several treatises, questions, and sermons. In 1259 he helped prepare statutes organizing Dominican studies. Twice provincial of France (1264–67, 1269–72), he became archbishop of Lyons in 1272 and cardinal bishop of Ostia in 1273. Prominent at the Second Council of LYONS (1274), where he also furthered union with the Greeks (see EASTERN SCHISM), he became a leading candidate for the papacy, but as pope his favoring Charles of Anjou made relations with Emperor MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS of Byzantium difficult; it also hindered reorganization of the Crusades and added to tensions with Rudolph I of Hapsburg. Innocent had some political success in pacifying northern Italian cities and in aiding peace between Charles and Genoa. In 1898 Leo XIII approved the veneration long paid this devoted master and administrator. He was beatified on Mar. 13, 1898.

Feast: June 22.

Bibliography: H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 16:1–22. Beatus Innocentius PP. V (Petrus de Tarantasia O.P.): Studia et documenta (Rome 1943), writings studied by H. D. SIMONIN, 163–335. M. H. LAURENT, Le Bx. Innocent V (Pierre de Tarentaise) et son temps (Studi e Testi 129; 1947), writings studied by L. B. GILLON, 361–390. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1956) 3:535–537, 620. P. A. AMARGIER, Catholicisme 5:166:1–64. R. C. DALE, ed., Medieval Latin Texts on the Eternity of the World (Leiden 1991). A. FRANCHI, "Innocenzo V et la 'questione dei mendicanti,'" L'Osservatore Romano (Vatican City 1976) 6. A. P. FRUTAZ, "Maestro di teologia difeso da S. Tommaso, arcivescovo, cardinale, papa: Innocenzo V" L'Osservatore Romano (Vatican City 1976) 6. J. GARDENER, "The Tomb of Cardinal Annibaldi by Arnolfo di Cambio," Burlington Magazine (London 1972), 136–141. H. RIGUET, Printemps en Chré, l'aventure spirituelle de Saint-Pierre de Tarentaise (Tamié 1967). L. VONES, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5 (3d ed. Freiburg 1996). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 198.

[W. H. PRINCIPE]

INNOCENT VI, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 18, 1352 to Sept. 12, 1362; b. Stephen Aubert, date uncertain; d. Avignon. A professor of civil law at Toulouse, he became bishop of Noyons in 1338, of Clermont in 1340, and was made cardinal in 1342. In the conclave in Avignon the cardinals agreed that whoever was elected should divide the papal authority and revenues with the College of Cardinals. In 1353 Innocent declared the preelection CAPITULATIONS invalid. He corrected numerous abuses in the Papal Curia, condemned plurality of benefices, and ordered all prelates who had no business at Avignon to return to their benefices. He was unable to restrain the cruelties of Pedro I of Castile or to restore peace between Aragon and Castile; but in 1360 he effected the Peace of Brétigny between England and France. When Charles IV published his Golden Bull, Innocent did not protest against its disregard of papal rights. Using the military skill of Cardinal Gil ALBORNOS, he defeated the usurpers who had seized the STATES OF THE CHURCH. A Greek proposal for reunion of the Churches ended when it became clear that Innocent could not raise an army to fight the Turks. Though tainted with NEPOTISM and enfeebled by old age, Innocent was otherwise a good pope. The religious decline throughout Europe was not his fault; it had begun a century earlier and was aggravated by the Hundred Years' War and the Black Death. Despite his rigid economies, the war to regain the Papal States bankrupted him. In desperation, he increased the taxation of various countries, thereby provoking greater hostility against the papacy. Death thwarted his plan to return to Rome;

he was buried in the Charterhouse of Villeneuve--les-Avignon, built by him.

Bibliography: INNOCENT VI, Lettres, ed. E. DÉPREZ (Paris 1909). Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:492–493. É. BALUZE, and Vitae paparum Avenionensium, ed. G. MOLLAT, 4 v. (Paris 1914–27) 1:309–348; 2:433–491. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 1:93–95, 283. G. MOLLAT, The Popes at Avignon, tr. J. LOVE (New York 1963) 44–51, 119–142, 152–154; Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7: 1997–2001; G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:690–691. M. J. HAREN, “Bishop Gynwell of Lincoln, Two Avignonesse Statues and Archbishop FrizRalph of Armagh’s Suit at the Roman Curia Against the Friars,” Archivum Historiae Pontificiae (Rome 1993) 275–92. H. HOLD, “Leben in einer Welt der Ansehens: Das spätmittelalterliche Pontifikalien-Rect der Klosterneuburger Präpöste,” Jahrbuch des Stiftes Klosterneuburg (1997) 57–65. M. JONES, Recueil des Actes de Charles de Blois et Jeanne de Penthièvre, duc et duchesse de Bretagne (1341–1364), suivi des Actes de Jeanne de Penthièvre (1364–1384) (Rennes 1996). F. KERN, “Karls IV. ‘Kaiserlager’ von Rom,” in Historische Aufsätze Karl Zeumer zum sechzigsten Geburtstag als Festgabe dargebracht von Freunden und Schülern (Frankfurt 1987) 385–95. F. LOPES, Chronique du roi D. Pedro I. (Paris 1985). A. MATTONE and R. MAZEIKA, “Some Remarks upon Acta Innocentii PP. VI,” Archivum Historicum Societatis Iesu (1985) 367–72. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 221.

[W. R. BONNIWELL]

INNOCENT VII, POPE

Pontificate: Oct. 17, 1404 to Nov. 6, 1406; b. Cosimo de’ Migliorati, Sulmona, Italy, c. 1336; d. Rome. After juridical studies at Bologna under Giovanni di Lignano he was professor of law at Perugia and Padua. He was sent by URBAN VI to England where he acted as papal collector for ten years. In 1387 he was made archbishop of Ravenna, was transferred to Bologna in 1389, and in the same year was created cardinal; in 1390 he was appointed legate for northern Italy. Upon his election as pope he was confronted with a Church rent by the WESTERN SCHISM. With the other cardinals in conclave he had made a pre-election promise to resign, if necessary, to restore unity to the Church (see CAPITULATIONS). In trying to keep his promise he made overtures to Benedict XIII and summoned a council. However, the obstinacy of Benedict, the rebellion of the Romans against his nephew Ludovico, and the pope’s subsequent flight, the invasion of the Papal States by King Ladislaus of Naples, and above all, the shortness of Innocent’s reign frustrated all his efforts. Upon his return to Rome (March 1406), he planned the reorganization of the University of Rome but was interrupted by death.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE 2:508–510, 531–533, 552–554. L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, “Pope Innocent V,” 13th-century sculpture located in the Basilica of St. John Lateran, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

500–1500 3.2:832–835. H. DENIFLE, Die Universitäten des Mittelalters bis 1400 (Berlin 1885). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 1:165–166, 169–171. E. VANSTENBERGHE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 14.1:1468–92. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1957) 4:480–484. J. GROHE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (3d ed. Freiburg 1996). H. HEIMPEL, Studien zur Kirchen- und Reichsreform des 15. Jahrhunderts. II.: Zu zwei Kirchenreform-Trakaten des beginnenden 15. Jahrhunderts (Heidelberg 1974). M. MAILLARD-LUYPAERT, Lettres d’Innocent VII (1404–1406). (Brussels-Rome 1987). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 234.

[W. R. BONNIWELL]

INNOCENT VIII, POPE

Pontificate: Aug. 29, 1484 to July 25, 1492; b. Giovanni Battista Cibo, Genoa, 1432; d. Rome. After a profligate youth at the Neapolitan court, where he fathered

Pope Innocent VIII. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

three illegitimate children, he reformed and entered the priesthood. He studied at Rome and Padua. His affability won him many friends and led to his becoming bishop of Savona (1467); in 1472 he was transferred to Molfetta. Through the influence of Cardinal Giuliano Della Rovere (JULIUS II), whom he ardently admired, he was made cardinal in 1473. When SIXTUS IV died, Della Rovere, aware that he himself would not be elected, chose his weak-willed admirer as a candidate and by shameless bribery effected Cibo's election. The moral and political disorders of the time called for a pontiff of character and ability; Innocent possessed neither. A tool of Della Rovere, he was constantly embroiled in disputes and wars with various Italian states, especially Naples. The wars plunged the papacy into debt; to raise money, Innocent created numerous new posts, which he sold to the highest bidders. Hoping to check threatened Turkish attacks, he assembled Christian princes to discuss a crusade; nothing came of the meeting (1490). However, after the fall of Granada he secured some concessions from the Sultan Bajazet II (d. 1512), who in 1492 presented him with the HOLY LANCE.

In 1486 Innocent censured the theses of PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA; tried repeatedly but ineffectually to improve ecclesiastical morals; condemned WITCHCRAFT which was spreading in Germany (Summis desiderantes, 1484); and punished with death two ecclesiastics who had forged and sold papal documents—one of which permitted Norwegian priests to say Mass without using wine. Innocent's vacillations and incompetence nullified his efforts at reform. When dying, he implored the cardinals to elect as successor a pope better than himself—a plea that proved as futile as his reign.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 5:229–357; 375–378. E. ARMSTRONG and L. THORNDIKE, Cambridge Medieval History (London-New York 1911–36) 8:197–200, 685–686. F. A. GREGOROVIVUS, Geschichte der Stadt Rom, ed. W. KAMPF, 3 v. (Tübingen 1953–57). P. PASCHINI, Roma nel Rinascimento (Bologna 1940). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1957) 4:369–376. F. MERZBACHER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:692. O. BALDACCI, Roma e Cristoforo Colombo (Firenze 1992). C. COLOMBO, Relazioni e lettere sul secondo, terzo e quarto viaggio (Roma 1992). C. S. L. DAVIES, "Bishop John Morton, the Holy See, and the Accession of Henry VII," The English Historical Review (1987) 2–30. R. MARINO, "Cristoforo Colombo e Innocenzo VIII," in Actas del Simposio Internacional. La evangelización del Nuevo Mundo (Roma 1992) 299–307. G. RACHET, Catherine Sforza. La dame de Forli (Paris 1987). E. SORDINI, "Barnadino da Feltre a Trevi per la riforma socio-religiosa dei costumi (1487)," Bollettino Storico di Foligno 10 (Foligno 1986) 167–90. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 251.

[W. R. BONNIWELL]

INNOCENT IX, POPE

Pontificate: Oct. 29 to Dec. 30, 1591; b. Giovanni Antonio Fachinetti, Bologna, Italy, July 20, 1519. His Veronese family had transferred to Bologna. There he studied law, and after receiving his doctorate at 25 went to Rome in the service of Cardinal Alessandro FARNESE. He represented Farnese at Avignon for four years, and later served as governor of Parma. PAUL IV made him re-fendary of the Segnatura di Grazia e Giustizia. In 1560 Pius IV made him bishop of Nicastro, and as bishop he took an active part in the Council of Trent in 1562. PIUS V made him nuncio to Venice in 1566, and he continued to hold that post under Gregory XIII until 1575. At Venice he was instrumental in the formation of the league against the Turks, which he led to the naval victory at Lepanto (1571). For health reasons, he resigned his diocese in 1575 and was named patriarch of Jerusalem by Gregory XIII, Nov. 12, 1576. He was employed by Gregory in the Consulta, Inquisition, and the Segnatura and on Dec. 12, 1583, was named by the same pope, Cardinal of the Four Crowned Martyrs. During the reign of the infirm Gregory XIV much of the burden of government fell upon him. Upon the death of Gregory XIV he was elected as a stop-gap pope, a choice that was expected because he had been a popular candidate at the previous conclave and because of his favor with the Spanish party, which procured his election. Realizing his indebtedness to PHILIP II, he supported Spain against Henry IV of France.

Innocent was active in repressing bandits in the vicinity of Rome, in improving the morals of the city, in regulating the course of the Tiber and the sanitation of the Borgo, in restoring the port of Ancona, and in completing the dome of St. Peter's. He gave his attention to the reform of the clergy and the manner of papal elections. On Nov. 4, 1591, he confirmed the bull of Pius V forbidding the sale of ecclesiastical property, imposing severe penalties for violations. One of his most important works was the distribution of responsibility within the Secretariate of State, dividing the work into three sections: one for France and Poland, one for Italy and Spain, and one for Germany. He established the German Congregation, and intended to revive the economic system of Sixtus V, being concerned with an orderly administration of finance. He appointed his great-nephew, Antonio Fachinetti to the Sacred College, in accordance with custom, and shortly afterward (Dec. 18, 1591) he fell ill but nevertheless made the pilgrimage to the Seven Churches, which gave him a cold and made him take to bed. On Dec. 29, 1591, he made his nephew Cesare Fachinetti general of the Church and commander in chief of the fleet. He died the next day after receiving the Last Sacraments. Considered an authority on Plato and Aristotle, and he wrote a work on the "Politics," and a treatise on ethics, and one against Macchiavelli, none of which have been published. He was justly esteemed for his piety and knowledge of public affairs. The Romans venerated him as a saint.

Bibliography: A. CICCARELLI, "Vita Innocentii IX," in B. Sacchi de Platina, Historia . . . de vitis Pontificum Romanorum (Cologne 1626). P. PECCHIAI, Roma nel Cinquecento (Bologna 1948). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 22:409–427 and passim. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:692, bibliog. M.R. O'CONNELL, The Counter Reformation, 1559–1610 (New York 1974). J. DULUMEAU, Catholicism between Luther and Voltaire (London 1977).

[R. L. FOLEY]

Pope Innocent X. (Archive Photos)

INNOCENT X, POPE

Pontificate: Sept. 15, 1644, to Jan. 1, 1655; b. Giovanni Battista Pamfili, Rome, March 7, 1572; d. Rome. His family, originally from Gubbio, had been settled in Rome from the fifteenth century. His uncle, Girolamo, helped him with his education, and he earned a doctorate in both civil and Canon Law at the University of Rome. In 1597 he was ordained. Entering the papal service, he became a consistorial advocate (1601); and on the elevation of his uncle to the cardinalate, he succeeded him as auditor of the rota. For 25 years Pamfili efficiently carried out his work at this court. He was made nuncio to Naples and then sent to France and Spain as assistant to Urban VIII's nephew, Francesco. Urban then made Pamfili nuncio to Spain and titular patriarch of Antioch.

Although of 72 when elected, Innocent was in good health. He needed all his vigor because his pontificate was troubled by several crises. The dreary Thirty Years' War finally dragged to a conclusion in 1648, but the peace of Westphalia was far from pleasing to the Pope. Through his nuncio, Fabio Chigi (later ALEXANDER VII), Innocent protested against the injustices done to Catholics.

During the 1640s Ireland was engaged in a struggle for basic rights and Innocent sent help to the embattled Gaels. His nuncio, Battista Rinuccini, was a clear-sighted statesman who did his best to unravel the tangled situation in Ireland and unite the Catholics against the common foe. That he ultimately failed was the fault of neither Pope nor nuncio.

Nearer home Innocent maintained a cautious attitude on the troubles caused by Massaniello's rebellion in Naples. He also showed prudence in the vexing problem of Portuguese independence. Innocent was generous to the Venetians, who were engaged in a desperate struggle to defend Crete from the Ottoman Turks.

Innocent had to face not only external enemies of Catholicism, like the English, the Swedes and the Turks, but also the recalcitrant Jansenists, who were even more vexing. In 1642 Urban VIII had condemned AUGUSTINUS, the masterpiece of Cornelius Otto JANSEN, but the Jansenists ignored the condemnation and continued to make headway, especially in France. Cornet, a syndic of the University of Paris, extracted five propositions from the Augustinus and a number of French bishops sent them to Rome for condemnation. Since other French bishops pleaded against a condemnation, Innocent did not act hastily. He turned the matter over to a congregation of cardinals and gave this congregation a group of experts. This group included most of the best theologians available and represented quite diverse schools of theology and different religious orders. There was ample time and opportunity for study and for dialogue before this matter was settled. Indeed the Pope took a great deal of interest in the work of the congregation and urged it on. It is to Innocent's credit that at last, after two years, the congregation finished its work. The Pope then condemned the five propositions on June 9, 1653.

Innocent handled a dispute between Juan Palafox y Mendoza, Bishop of la Puebla de los Angeles in Mexico, and the Jesuits with his customary prudence. He suppressed a number of monasteries and religious communities in Italy that had so declined in numbers as to be unable to continue the work for which they had been founded. At the same time he strongly supported the missions in non-Christian countries and bolstered the Congregation of Propaganda. He proclaimed the jubilee of 1650 and had the satisfaction of seeing it to a successful conclusion.

Innocent was a man of piety, prudence, and moderation. But he was overly fond of his relatives. He raised two of his nephews to the purple and showered favors on other relatives. Of all his family members, the most dominant was a woman, Donna Olimpia, the wife of the Pope's deceased older brother, Pamfilio. Olimpia had great influence with the aged Pontiff. Aspirants for papal favors were quick to recognize this; and Olimpia, who was as greedy as she was powerful, exploited her position. Although she fell into eclipse in 1650, two years later she was back in favor and she continued to exercise undue influence over Innocent until his death. Innocent's nepotism did not interfere with his charity. He was good to his people and helped them, especially during the bad years (1646–47) when flood and famine afflicted the Papal States. He can be considered a pioneer in a movement toward a better prison system. He reorganized the prisons of the Papal States and for the first time installed the cell system. After his death Innocent's body was treated shabbily. Olimpia refused to pay for solemn obsequies, and the body was kept a few days in the sacristy of St. Peter's and then buried quite simply.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v. 30. N. J. ABERCROMBIE, The Origins of Jansenism (Oxford 1936). I. CIAMPI, Innocenzo X Pamfili e la sua corte (Rome 1878). H. COVILLE, Étude sur Mazarin et ses démêlés avec le pape Innocent X, 1644–1648 (Paris 1914). J. ORCIBAL, Les Origines du jansénisme, 5 v. (Louvain 1947–62). B. SUTTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:692–693. J. PAQUIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 7.2:2005–06. F. MASTROIANNI, Inchiesta di Innocenzo X sui conventi cappuccini italiani (Rome 1985). M. CALVESI, et al. Innocenzo X. Arte e potere a Roma nell'eta barocca (Rome 1990).

[J. S. BRUSHER]

INNOCENT XI, POPE, BL.

Pontificate: Sept. 21, 1676, to Aug. 12, 1689; b. Benedetto Odescalchi, Como, May 19, 1611. The scion of an ancient Lombard family with a reputation for piety, he received his early education at the Jesuit college in Como. At 15 he became an apprentice in the family bank in Genoa. He attended first the University of Rome followed by the University of Naples, where he obtained a doctorate in civil and Canon Law in 1639. Less than a year later, on the advice of Cardinal de la Cueva, he received the tonsure with the intention of fulfilling his inclination to prayer, study, and works of charity. He was appointed apostolic prothonotary by Pope Urban VIII and sent as financial commissary to the province of the Marches. During the conclave following the death of Pope Urban, he acted as governor of Macerata. He was named cardinal in 1645 by Innocent X, but not at the recommendation of Donna Olimpia Maidalchini as has been alleged. In 1648 he was cardinal legate to Ferrara, where his great charity won him the title "Father of the Poor." Two years later he was ordained to the priesthood (1650) and consecrated bishop of Novara in 1651. In 1656 he resigned his see and returned to Rome to work in the Curia. Although he was favored in the conclave of 1670, the influence of Louis XIV delayed his election until the next conclave in 1676. He assumed the name Innocent in memory of Innocent X, who had made him a cardinal.

Before accepting the tiara, Innocent requested the cardinals to approve the "Summary Agreement" consisting of 12 articles of ecclesiastical reform. This formed his program of action to achieve three objectives: the completion of the work of the Council of TRENT, the defense of the freedom and rights of the Church, and the assurance of the safety of Christian Europe against the Muslim Turks. From 1683 to 1689 he inspired a long and eventually successful campaign against the Turks.

In defense of ecclesiastical liberty Innocent's greatest and constant struggle was against the absolutist pretensions of Louis XIV of France. The king was encouraged by professors of the Sorbonne and personal advisers to claim the right to the revenues of vacant benefices and the control of appointment to future offices in Languedoc, Provence, Dauphiné, and Guyenne. Because a decision of the Council of Lyons (1274) and a concordat between the pope and the French king restricted such extension of the régale (royal right to revenues of vacant sees), Innocent resisted. Louis called an ASSEMBLY OF THE FRENCH CLERGY, which adopted the celebrated four Gallican articles on March 19, 1682 (see GALLICANISM). In a rescript (April 11, 1682) Innocent denounced these articles and refused papal approval to all episcopal candidates who had participated in the assembly. In 1685, as a move of conciliation, Louis revoked the Edict of NANTES, but the inhuman persecution of Protestants that followed brought expressions of disapproval from the Pope and a continued firm stand on the régale. Further conflict came from the papal decree of May 7, 1685, denying the widely abused "privilege of diplomatic residence," which offered haven to criminals in Rome as long as they remained within the neighborhood of the French embassy. Innocent refused to receive the new French ambassador, the Marquis de Lavardin, who insisted on this right and with a small military force took possession of his palace. Innocent in turn placed the French church of St. Louis in Rome under interdict on Dec. 24, 1687. Relations were again strained the next year when Innocent appointed Joseph Clement to the archiepiscopal and electoral see of Cologne over Cardinal Wilhelm FÜRSTENBERG, the candidate of Louis. In retaliation, the king seized the papal territory of Avignon, imprisoned the papal nuncio, and threatened a general council.

Innocent worked tirelessly to unite the Christian princes, both Catholic and Protestant, against the growing threat of Turkish invasion. The victory of the forces of Emperor Leopold, King JOHN III SOBIESKI OF POLAND, and Duke Charles of Lorraine on Sept. 11, 1683, which destroyed Turkish hopes at the gates of Vienna, was attributed, even at the time, to the prayers and great financial help of the pope.

During his pontificate Innocent issued decrees on frequent Communion (Feb. 12, 1679), confession (Nov. 18, 1682), and aspects of morality (March 4, 1679; June 26, 1680; and Aug. 28, 1687). In these later decrees he condemned LAXISM in moral theology and defended the PROBABILIORISM of Thyrsus Gonzalez, SJ, thus giving rise to a controversy whether the pope was condemning PROBABILISM. He also condemned the extension of human slavery (March 20, 1686) and the doctrines of Miguel de MOLINOS (Nov. 20, 1687). (See QUIETISM).

Immediately following Innocent's 13-year pontificate steps were taken toward his beatification, but the process was suspended by Benedict XIV in 1744 through pressure from the French court. The cause was again encouraged in 1889 and 1895 by Leo XIII, in 1934 by Pius XI, and effectively in 1942 by Pius XII, who beatified Innocent XI in October 1956.

Feast: Aug. 13.

Bibliography: J. J. BERTHIER, ed. Innocentii PP. XI epistolae ad principes, 2 v. (Rome 1891–95). F. DE BOJANI, Innocent XI: sa correspondance avec ses nonces, 1676–84, 3 v. (Rome 1910–12). Bullarium Romanum (Magnum), ed. H. MAINARDI and C. COCQUELINES, 18 folio v. (Rome 1733–62) v.19. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 32:1–524. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20 Jh., (Leipzig 1931–41) 5.2:346–371, 534–537. C. MICCINELLI, Il grande Pontefice Innocenzo XI (Rome 1956). G. PAPASOGLI, Il beato Innocenzo XI (2d ed. Como 1957); last two works contain fine bibliographies. W. DE VRIES, "Der selige Papst Innozenz XI und die Christen des Nahen Ostens," Orientalia Christiana periodica 23 (Rome 1957) 33–57. D. W. R. BAHLMANN, The Moral Revolution of 1688 (New Haven 1957). J. PAQUIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 7.2: 2006–13. J. ORCIBAL, Louis XIV contre Innocent XI (Paris 1949). L. O'BRIEN, Innocent XI and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes (Berkeley 1930). S. MONTI, Bibliografia di Papa Innocenzo XI . . . fino al 1927, ed. M. ZECCHINELLI (Como 1957). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:693–695. E. DE SYRMIA, At the Head of Nations (New York 1978). R. J. MARAS, Innocent XI: Pope of Christian Unity (Notre Dame 1984). I. MARZOLA, Pastorale liturgica di b. Innocenzo XI, (Rovigo 1973). P. GINI, ed., Epistolario Innozeniano (Como 1977).

[S. V. RAMGE]

INNOCENT XII, POPE

Pontificate: July 12, 1691, to Sept. 27, 1700; b. Antonio Pignatelli, near Spinazzola (Puglia), Italy, March 13, 1615. This Neapolitan noble studied at the Collegio Romano, entered the Roman Curia under Urban VIII, and was appointed vice-legate of Urbino. Innocent X nominated him Inquisitor to Malta (1646–49). He served as governor of Viterbo, nuncio to Tuscany (1652), to Poland (1660), and to Vienna (1668). He fell into disfavor with Clement X, who removed him from Rome by giving him the bishopric of Lecce. He was recalled to Rome (1673) and named secretary of the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, and then maestro di camera. Pope Innocent XI created him a cardinal (September 1, 1681), bishop of Faenza, legate of Bologna, and archbishop of Naples (1687). He was elected to the papacy as a compromise candidate on July 12, 1691. This exceptionally holy and charitable priest developed the Hospital of St. Michele for poor youths, opened the Lateran Palace to the unemployed, curtailed the sale of offices, and reduced court expenses. He reorganized the administration in the Curia Innocenziana. By the Romanum decet pontificem (June 22, 1692) he forbade NEPOTISM, decreeing that only one of the pope's relatives should be eligible for the cardinalate. He founded the Congregation for the Discipline and Reform of Regulars (1694). He also prohibited the electoral chapters in Germany from nominating to bishoprics and monasteries (1695). Innocent likewise promoted the development of the Propaganda in America, Persia, and China.

Monument of Pope Innocent XII, with Innocent XII seated between Charity and Faith, by the 18th-century Florentine sculptor Filippo Valle, in the basilica of St. Peter, Vatican City. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Innocent avoided a schism with the Gallican Church by inducing Louis XIV to revoke "THE DECLARATION OF THE FRENCH CLERGY," which obliged the bishops to sign the Four Gallican Articles. The bishops sent letters of retraction. Concerning JANSENISM, he prohibited the bishops' adding to the formulary of ALEXANDER VII, which he reconfirmed, and forbade the discussion of the Five Propositions. The question of French QUIETISM was decided by Innocent's Cum alias (1699), which condemned the 23 propositions contained in Fénelon's Maximes.

Through Innocent, Louis XIV placed in the Peace of Ryswick (1697) the clause that in all the restored countries the Catholic religion was to remain in the state in which it was found at the moment of the signing. Innocent approved the first constitution of the King of Spain, and his preference for Philip of Anjou as heir to the Spanish throne helped bring about the war of the Spanish succession.

Bibliography: INNOCENT XII, Collectio Bullarum . . . (Rome 1697). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 32:414, 526, 563, 567–573. J. PAQUIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 7.2: 2013–15. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:695. B. PELLEGRINO, Reforme, religione, e politica durante il pontificato di Innocenzo XII, (Galatina 1994). M. FATICA, "La reclusione dei poveri a Roma durante il pontificato di Innocenzo XII (1692–1700)," Ricerche per la storia religiosa di Roma 3 (1979) 133–80. A. D. WRIGHT, The Early Modern Papacy: From the Council of Trent to the French Revolution, 1564–1789 (London 2000).

[I. J. CALICCHIO]

INNOCENT XIII, POPE

Pontificate: May 8, 1721, to March 7, 1724; b. Michelangelo de' Conti, Poli, Papal States, May 13, 1655. Son of the Duke of Poli, his family was illustrious for its three thirteenth-century popes: Innocent III, Gregory IX, and Alexander IV. Michelangelo studied first at Ancona, then with the Jesuits at Rome. He chose the Church for his career and rose steadily in the papal service. He became a monsignor under Alexander VIII and was appointed governor of three Papal States in succession: Ascoli, Frosinone, and Viterbo. In 1695 Innocent XII sent him as nuncio to Switzerland and made him titular archbishop of Tarsus. Three years later he went as internuncio to Lisbon, where he remained until 1710. Clement XI raised him to the purple in 1706 as cardinal-priest of Santi Quirico e Giulitta. He became bishop of Osimo (1709–12), and then of Viterbo (1712–19), which he relinquished because of ill health. In the conclave that followed the death of Clement XI (1721), the early favorite was Clement's secretary of state, Cardinal Fabrizio Paolucci, but when his election seemed near, he was excluded by the veto of Emperor Charles VI. The vote then swung to Conti (May 8, 1721), who was noted for his prudence and diplomacy. His missions to Switzerland and Portugal had not caused him to fall into the bad graces of any of the great powers. He assumed the name of Innocent in memory of Innocent III, from whose family he descended.

Innocent XIII met the stubborn Jansenists with firmness, insisting on submission to Clement XI's constitution UNIGENITUS (1713). He also took a firm stand in the vexed controversy over the so-called Chinese rites and forbade the Jesuits to receive novices if within three years they did not satisfy him as to their obedience. Innocent also set up a commission to study ecclesiastical problems in Spain caused by the upheaval of the Spanish Succession War. He recognized James as king of England, promising subsidies contingent upon the re-establishment of Roman Catholicism in England.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 34:1–97. A. F. ARTAUD DE MONTOR, The Lives and Times of the Popes, 10 v. (New York 1910–11) 6.1:218–229. Bullarium Romanum (Magnum), ed. H. MAINARDI and C. COCQUELINES, 18 folio v. (Rome 1733–62) 21:867–958. M. MAYER, Die Papstwahl Innocenz XIII (Vienna 1874). J. PAQUIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 7.2:2015–16. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 2 5:695–696. H. GROSS, Rome in the Age of the Enlightenment (Cambridge 1990). J. DULUMEAU, Catholicism between Luther and Voltaire (London 1977).

[J. S. BRUSHER]

INNOCENT OF LE MANS, ST.

Bishop; b. second half of the fifth century; d. MONTE CASSINO, Italy, March 30, 542. He was consecrated bishop of Le Mans, France, in 496, three years after the death of his predecessor, Principius. He completed and dedicated the cathedral at Le Mans and was active in the foundation of monasteries and convents. He worked to introduce BENEDICTINE monks into his diocese, and to this end he made his last journey to Monte Cassino, the motherhouse of the order. Innocent was present at the synods of Orléans (533 and 541), and at the latter session he was the fourth to subscribe to the decrees. After his death there was a 15-year vacancy in the bishopric before DOMNOLUS, abbot of Saint-Laurent, Paris (d. 581), was nominated by King Clotaire I (d. 561). Innocent was buried beside his predecessors in his cathedral, and as his cult became popular quite early, his relics were enshrined during the eighth century.

The martyrdom of the Holy Innocents, detail of mid 5th-century mosaic on the arch of the apse of the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore, Rome.

Feast: March 30; June 19 (episcopal consecration).

Bibliography: Gallia Christiana, v.1–13 (Paris 1715–85), v.14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 14:338, 418, 542. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1907–15) 2:337. Acta Sanctorum June 4:712–719. Monumenta Germaniae Concilia (Berlin 1825–) 65, 97. E. GRIFFE, Catholicisme 5:1673.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

INNOCENTS, HOLY

The baby boys of BETHLEHEM who were put to death by King HEROD the Great after the Magi's visit to the Infant Jesus (Mt 2:16–18). Study of the Innocents has often been more poetical and imaginative than factual. The interest of the past has been chiefly to amass greater detail about the Innocents. Attempts have been made to date the episode accurately, but these have been of little value, since the date of Christ's birth is itself a matter of speculation. Various efforts have been made, based on the probable population of Bethlehem at Our Lord's birth, to determine the number of children involved. Estimates range from 10 or 12 (A. Bisping, P. Shegg) to an obviously exaggerated 64,000 (Syrian Liturgy) to a fantastic 144,000 (based on Rv 14:1–5, part of the Epistle of their feast).

The slaughter described in Mt 2:16–18 is not mentioned in any other source; it is notably absent in the works of Josephus. D. F. STRAUSS and other scholars have, therefore, questioned the historicity of the episode. The argument from silence is, at best, unconvincing. The very character of Herod suggests a reason for the silence. In the records of a king responsible for many deaths, including those of his beloved wife and his own sons, the slaughter of the Innocents (if estimates are kept within reason) would be relatively insignificant.

On the other hand, attempts, such as E. Stauffer's, to prove the historicity of the event are likewise unconvincing. A growing number of modern scholars question the historical character of the Innocents' story because of its relation to such midrashic elements as the star of Bethlehem and the Magi [see MAGI]. If, for example, one considers the visit of the Magi a legendary amplification, one would almost be forced to judge the story of the Innocents in the same way.

Modern scholars are inclined to regard the entire INFANCY GOSPEL as a literary form related to MIDRASH. Emphasis is placed, not so much on the isolated individual elements, as on their theological significance in the Christ story. It seems strongly probable that Matthew wished to present three basic themes in his Infancy narrative: Jesus is the new Moses; Jesus is true wisdom; Jesus is the new Israel. The last theme seems dominant. If this is true, a striking case can be made that, in the story of the Innocents, Matthew has been inspired by a midrash on Dt 26:5–8. According to the midrash, Laban the Aramaean sought to destroy Jacob (Israel) and his entire family; this attempt was later considered an effort to prevent the coming of the Messiah. Herod the Idumean, in his slaughter of the Innocents, represents Laban's oppression of Jacob-Israel and renews the attempt to prevent the coming of the Messiah. This comparison of Laban and Herod that is brought about by attributing to Herod a slaughter of the Innocents invites a comparison between Christ and Jacob. Implicitly, Christ is presented as the new Jacob-Israel, the bearer of messianic hope. Once the Jesus-Israel theme is established, Jacob's wife Rachel becomes an apt mourner and serves to underline the comparison once again. Especially is this true when one realizes that the prophecy of Jeremiah (Jer 31:15) to which Matthew refers opens with reference to the tragedy of the Exile (originally that of the Northern Kingdom and then extended to that of the Southern Kingdom) but continues with a description of restoration that is realized fully only in the coming of the Messiah. Seen in this setting, the episode of the Innocents, whether historical or not, contributes to the unfolding of the Jesus-Israel theme and helps one understand the role of Jesus, the new Israel, who will definitively establish the new people of God.

The Feast of the Holy Innocents was celebrated in the West as early as the 5th century. It was placed on December 28 in order to bring it close to Christmas. In Christian iconography the earliest representatives of the massacre of the Holy Innocents date from the 5th century, such as on the mosaic arch in the basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore, Rome, and on an ivory Gospel cover now in the cathedral of Milan. In the Middle Ages representations of the scene were common, especially as miniatures in illuminated Gospels.

Bibliography: M. M. BOURKE, "The Literary Genus of Matthew 1–2," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 22 (1960) 160–175. D. DAUBE, "The Earliest Structure of the Gospels," New Testament Studies 5 (1958–59) 174–187. A. DURAND, The Gospel according to Matthew (Milwaukee 1957) 18–20. U. HOLZMEISTER, "Quot pueros urbis Bethlehem Herodes rex occiderit," Verbum Domini 15 (1935) 373–379. J. MICHL, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, (Freiburg, 1957–66) 2:313. K. HOFMANN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, (Freiburg, 1930–38) 10:415–416. F. G. HOLWECK, CE 7:419. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien (Paris 1955–59) 2.2:267–270.

[E. J. JOYCE]

INNOCENZO OF BERZO, BL.

Italian Capuchin priest; b. Niardo, near Brescia, March 19, 1844; d. Bergamo, March 3, 1890. When Pietro Scalvinoni, his father, died a month after the birth of the boy, Francesca, his mother, moved to Berzo and there raised her only child. After studying at the diocesan seminary in Brescia, Giovanni (his name in baptism) was ordained (1867). He worked as assistant to the pastor of Berzo and then as vice rector of the Brescia seminary, where the seminarians referred to him as "the saint." In 1874 he joined the Capuchins and took the name Innocenzo (see FRANCISCANS, CAPUCHIN). He pronounced his final vows (1878) and was appointed assistant master of novices. His remaining years were devoted also to preaching and hearing confessions. Soon after his death, his remains were transferred by popular request to Berzo. He was beatified Nov. 12, 1961.

Feast: March 3.

Bibliography: G. DA NADRO, L'Ombra sua torna (2d ed. Milan 1950). Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 820. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 53 (1961) 803–808. B. BURKEY, "In Silence and Shadows," The Cord 12 (1962) 200–207.

[T. MACVICAR]

Galileo Galilei before the Inquisition, painting by Robert-Fleury. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

INQUISITION

A form of legal procedure best known for its adoption by papally appointed inquisitors “of heretical depravity” in the thirteenth century and institutionalized in Spain and elsewhere in the late fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Much caricatured and misrepresented between the sixteenth and the twenty-first centuries.

The Origins: The Problem of Clerical Discipline.

Originally inquisitio was a form of legal procedure in classical Roman law in which a single magistrate supervised an entire case, from investigation to judgment. The procedure increased in use during the later Roman empire, when the law, both civil and criminal, became largely administrative, although it fell into disuse in the early folk-kingsdoms and the Carolingian empire between the fourth and ninth centuries, when other legal procedures, notably those of accusation, denunciation, and ordeal, were more commonly used, except for some matters that touched directly the ruler’s person and property.

In a decretal letter, Licet Heli, of Dec. 10, 1199, however, INNOCENT III (1198–1216) addressed the problems of both clerical misbehavior and prelatal negligence in imposing discipline on criminous clerks, “against whom, so that notorious excesses shall cease, there are three kinds of procedure possible: accusation, denunciation, and inquisition about them.” Accusation was the older procedure, also grounded in Roman law and therefore ancient, but it required that an accuser willing to lay a formal charge, pay the court expenses, and risk a penalty if the accusation failed. Denunciation was justified by the exegesis of Mt 18:15–17, which required first, fraternal admonition and was aimed primarily at the rehabilitation of the offender rather than punishment. Inquisition, initially only into the reputation of the suspect and the degree of notoriety of the offense, proved to be more efficient and controllable than either of these procedures and was now added to denunciation when the offense was so notorious that it created a scandal in the Christian community. Notoriety of the offense and the reputation of the accused were widely discussed by twelfth-century jurists, and several argued that under such circumstances ecclesiastical judges might dispense with formal procedural rules of written charges and taking evidence, although jurists also tended to restrict the number of offenses that could be classed as notorious. In identifying inquisition as a legitimate procedure in cases of notoriety, Innocent III cited God's response to the outcry against Sodom and Gomorrah in Gn 18:21: "I must go down and see whether they have done altogether according to the outcry that has come to me; and if not, I will know," and Lk 16:1–7, the case of the rich man who heard that his steward had squandered his property and demanded an accounting. Any prelate, Innocent says, who hears a public outcry or repeated complaints about a clerical offender, "ought to go and see, that is, send and inquire, whether the outcry indicates the truth." That is, all prelates have the right and responsibility to conduct an inquiry into charges of clerical misconduct within their jurisdictions that come to their attention.

Tribunal of the Inquisition. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Innocent III was acutely sensitive to the responsibilities of prelates, and in a slightly earlier letter to the archbishop of Naples and the papal legate Cinthio he had also cited the biblical case of the priest Eli (1 Sm 1, 3–4, 18) who refused to restrain his sons from wrongdoing and suffered the wrath of God because of it. Episcopal responsibilities included formal visitations of institutions within their dioceses, and Innocent reminded them that they could use inquisition ex officio. In canon 8, Qualiter et quando, of the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL of 1215, Innocent went further. He identified inquisitio as the standard procedure for use in ecclesiastical courts. He supported canon 8 with two further canons. In canon 18, Innocent prohibited clergy from participating in ordeals, and in canon 38 he required ecclesiastical judges to keep a scribe whose written record of every trial could be accurately reviewed upon appeal. In effect, by introducing, then standardizing inquisitorial procedure in criminal cases involving clergy, Innocent III had begun a revolution in criminal legal procedure that later went far beyond the disciplining of criminous clergy.

The problem of clerical misconduct was one of the main themes of the vast movement for ecclesiastical reform associated with the name of GREGORY VII in the late eleventh century. In an attempt to distinguish clerical from lay status and prevent the pollution of clerical status, the reformers prohibited clergy from marrying or engaging in sexual activity (Nicolaitism) and from accepting any ecclesiastical office from a layman (Simony). Through the twelfth century, clerical discipline for these and other offenses remained prominent on the agenda of popes, reform-minded prelates, and church councils. Innocent's rulings between 1199 and 1215 offered an efficient and authoritative legal procedure that could be controlled by appellate review and thus reflect juridically the ecclesiological hierarchy in the Church.

Inquisitorial Procedure in Canon Law. Innocent's rulings in these matters extended far beyond the immediate recipients of his letters and judicial decisions. In 1210 Innocent instructed PETRUS BENEVENTANUS to make a selection of the decretal letters of the first 12 years of his pontificate, the Compilatio Tertia, which was to be sent to the masters and students of the law school at BOLOGNA and taught as canon law for all of Christendom.

The classical age of canon law had begun (as is now known) with the two successive versions of the Concordance of discordant canons, or Decretum, attributed to Master GRATIAN and taught and commented on at Bologna, then in Paris, the Rhineland, and England since shortly after the middle of the twelfth century. The Decretum was supplemented by two informal collections of papal letters subsequent to Gratian, the Breviarium extravagantium, or Compilatio prima, by BERNARD OF PAVIA, typically divided into five books and each book subdivided into titles and chapters—the standard form for subsequent collections of canon law—and a later collection called the Compilatio secunda.

After the Compilatio tertia two later informal collections circulated until the authoritative Liber Extra issued by GREGORY IX (1227–1241) in 1234 made obsolete all five collections subsequent to Gratian. Book V of the Liber Extra was devoted to crimes and procedures against their perpetrators, and it is from there that Innocent III's reforms were taught, commented upon, and learned by canon lawyers.

The Problem of Heterodoxy. By the early twelfth century the Latin Christian Church had constructed a firm basis for the definition of orthodox belief, based on an increasingly standardized interpretation of scripture, the concept of authoritative apostolic tradition handed down through bishops, councils, and popes, and a standardized creed. The laws of the Christian Roman emperors included sanctions against heterodox beliefs and those who held them. Writings by the Church Fathers, particularly St. Augustine and Isidore of Seville, described and catalogued early heretical movements, and these were read for centuries and recapitulated in the popular Sermons on the Song of Songs by St. Bernard of Clairvaux in the early twelfth century. Until the eleventh century, however, debates concerning heretical beliefs were usually conducted among the learned.

Ecclesiastical reformers in the later eleventh century defined SIMONY as a HERESY, and twelfth-century churchmen used the term to designate other dissenting movements as well, followers of popular teachers whose doctrines were perceived to deviate from the more and more sharply defined content of orthodoxy. By the early thirteenth century the definition attributed to ROBERT GROSSETESTE, bishop of Lincoln, may serve as a working definition: "Heresy is an opinion chosen by human faculties, contrary to Holy Scripture, openly taught, and pertinaciously defended." That is, heresy was heterodox religious doctrine discovered by purely human error, contrary to orthodox authoritative teaching, but also openly taught (not secretly held) and persisted in after authoritative correction (and therefore pertinacious, a willful and public denial of the teaching authority of the Church). In the thirteenth century heresy was also described by churchmen as contumacious—openly contemptuous of ecclesiastical authority.

Responses to Heresy: Persuasio and Coercitio. Some eleventh and twelfth-century churchmen advocated patient, instructive toleration of heterodox belief. Others urged extensive magisterial preaching to teach people true doctrine. This pastoral effort continued during the pontificate of Innocent III and led to Innocent's approval of a number of formerly dissenting evangelical groups, notably the HUMILIATI, and his approval of the new MENDICANT ORDERS, the DOMINICANS and FRANCISCANS. Individual twelfth-century bishops, lacking a reliable, authoritative guide in law, usually resorted to the excommunication and exile of convicted heretics. In some eleventh- and twelfth-century instances local mob rule, possibly influenced by local authorities, took justice into its own hands. Gratian included a number of authoritative earlier texts on heresy in the second part of his Decretum, but it took several decades for a consistent corpus of teaching doctrine to be assembled and deployed throughout Europe.

Several twelfth-century church councils also issued legislation concerning heresy. The Second LATERAN COUNCIL of 1139 required secular rulers to prosecute heresy. Pope ALEXANDER III (1159–1181) was also vigorous in his attempts to impose suitable penalties for heresy. The Third Lateran Council of 1179 identified several heretical groups by name and urged the use of excommunication and denial of Christian burial to those found to be heretics. At the same time, bishops were also urged to use synodal witnesses, men of good local reputation who could issue a denunciatio of suspected heretics without incurring the liabilities of formal accusers. In 1184 Pope

LUCIUS III (1181–1185) issued the decretal letter Ad abolendam, which condemned the “insolence” of heretics and “their attempts to promote falsehood.” Here are the grounds for the second part of Grosseteste’s definition—public teaching and contumacious refusal to be taught and corrected. Lucius also insisted upon two annual episcopal visitations to any part of a diocese where heresy has been reported and that lay authorities are required to cooperate with ecclesiastical authorities.

In 1199 Innocent III issued the decretal Vergentis in senium, which incorporated much of Ad abolendam, but also identified heresy with the doctrine of treason in Roman law. If treason against the Roman emperor were such a great crime, argued Innocent, how much greater a crime was treason to God? In the decretal Cum ex officii nostri of 1207, Innocent stated that convicted heretics should be turned over to secular authority for punishment, that their property should be confiscated and sold, their houses should be levelled to the ground, and that even sympathizers of heretics should be fined one-fourth of their property.

In 1208, following the murder of the papal legate PETER OF CASTELNAU, Innocent launched his next response to the dangers of heresy in a local population, when he invoked the recently-formulated doctrine of crusade privileges and commissioned an army to extirpate heresy in southern France—the so-called Albigensian Crusade (1208–1229).

The Council of Toulouse in 1229 and the rulers of France and Sicily in the next few years urged the active seeking out and punishing of heretics by royal officials. Roffredus Beneventanus, a jurist in the service of Frederick II of Sicily, argued that inquisitorial procedure had been invented in classical Roman law and therefore could be employed by secular, especially imperial, courts. The Constitutions of Melfi, issued by Frederick II in 1231, also vigorously attacked the treason of heretics and established inquisition as an extraordinary procedure to be used in the detection of serious crimes, although for heresy the judges must be churchmen. From here, such doctrines also were adopted by the increasingly independent city-republics of northern Italy and in other territories and eventually established as part of the Romano-Canonical procedures of ius commune throughout continental Europe.

In inquisitorial procedure, jurists stated that the bad reputation of the accused acted in place of the formal accuser, that the accused could be legally summoned and questioned under oath, and the testimony of sworn witnesses as to both reputation and fact was acceptable against him. Normally the accused had the right to know the names of witnesses against him, but as early as 1229 the fear of local reprisals led a judge to conceal the names of witnesses, a procedure that survived in many inquisitorial courts that tried heresy.

The system of acceptable proofs in the ius commune procedure required either the identical testimony of two eyewitnesses or confession in order to convict. Without either of these, the judge had only partial evidence, no amount of which was sufficient to convict. Such evidence, however, could be weighed as indicia of different degrees of value, and when the judge was convinced that the indicia indicated guilt, he could order that the accused be tortured, but only to secure a confession. With the adoption of inquisitorial procedure in secular courts, torture also was adopted, along with rules of evidence and due process. In 1252 Pope INNOCENT IV (1243–1254) issued the decretal Ad extirpanda, which classified heretics as thieves of spiritual things and murderers of the soul, and he authorized secular courts in Italy to employ judicial torture in order to secure confessions in heresy trials, just as they already could in other criminal cases.

Inquisitors of Heretical Depravity. One of the most important institutional products of the late eleventh-century movement of ecclesiastical reform was the increasing office of the papal judge-delegate, a clerical official who was given papal authority to decide a particular case, work for a particular period of time, or in a specific area. Papal judges-delegate might also in some cases commission judges sub-delegate. The institution took some of the burdens of litigation off the shoulders of the Pope, while making it clear that the judge-delegate’s jurisdiction was papally authorized. Between 1227 and 1233 GREGORY IX (1227–1241) appointed judges-delegate the Rhineland and in Burgundy whose irregular and uncontrolled activities brought heavy criticism. In 1231 Gregory reissued much earlier legislation against heretics and laid down the rule that repentant heretics were to be imprisoned for life, while unrepentant heretics were to be turned over to the secular arm for capital punishment. Gregory also charged specific judges-delegate to preach in areas where heresy was known to exist, inquire and discover heretics, their helpers, and defenders, and either reconcile them with the Church or turn them over to the secular arm for secular punishment. Gregory also indicated that other members of the mendicant orders were not to participate in these activities, since they were specialized and required particular skills.

In 1233 Gregory took a further step. He established papal judges-delegate in southern France in the wake of the recent crusade, pointing out to local bishops that the Dominicans appointed were to supplement the bishops’ own inquiries. Eventually, inquisitors in particular places assumed more and more of this formerly episcopal function. By 1235 the procedures in inquisitions of heretical depravity in southern France began to be regularized: inquisitors delivered a public sermon and call for confessions, established a “period of grace” in which voluntary confessions would receive lighter penalties, and the names of suspected heretics would be gathered. Testimony, confessions, and sentences were recorded in special registers. Although local resistance to these procedures delayed the development of the process, the growing papal concerns and increasing cooperation of secular authorities continued to develop what has been called a unique “technology of power.”

The most extensive inquisitorial investigation of heretical depravity occurred in the area around Toulouse during two hundred and one days between May 1245 and August 1246, when two inquisitors interrogated 5471 men and women and issued two hundred and seven sentences against convicted heretics, of which 23 consisted of perpetual imprisonment and 184 required the convicted to wear distinctive yellow crosses on their clothing. The sentences included no confiscation of property, nor was anyone sentenced to death. The inquisitors at Toulouse also produced a specialized manual of instruction for other inquisitors in 1248 or 1249, the first example of what became an important genre of legal literature. The manual gave sample forms of the citation of witnesses, the period of grace, formulas for interrogation, forms of summons, and instructions for reconciliation and punishment. By 1250 the office of inquisitor of heretical depravity was becoming a specialized function, especially among trained members of the mendicant Orders whose work distinguished them from other members of the Orders. The development of punitive and penitential imprisonment was an innovation of the inquisitors, the ancestor of the modern prison system, since it was taken up at the end of the thirteenth century by a number of Italian city-republics and later spread to northern Europe.

During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, both the inquisitorial judicial procedure and the appointment of inquisitors of heretical depravity spread rapidly, as learned Romano-canon law, the ius commune, spread northward in Europe, and popes (and occasionally bishops) undertook inquisitions against heresy in different parts of Christendom. One of the best-known instances was the episcopal inquisition carried out by Jacques Fournier, bishop of Pamiers (1318–1325). Inquisitorial archives provided a record and a history of heresy in particular places; manuals for inquisitors grew more specialized and longer, from the manual by Bernard Gui in 1324 to the immense manual, the Directorium Inquisitorum of Nicholau Eymeric in 1376, the first manual to be printed and the most influential inquisitor’s manual in history. Popes and other authorities insisted that inquisitors of he-retical depravity observe due process, allow all legal defenses, withhold the names of witnesses only when revealing them would place the witnesses in real danger, and permit legal counsel except in the cases of convicted heretics. Appeals were allowed. But testimony was also accepted from witnesses who would be otherwise disqualified, a practice that was also followed in secular courts for so-called excepted crimes, particularly treason. And a number of inquisitorial tribunals dealing with heresy tended increasingly to require that the defendant know something about the law, because the judge recognized no obligation to inform defendants of their rights. The trial of Joan of Arc in 1431 is the best known example of a (in this case highly irregular and politically dominated) court violating generally recognized inquisitorial procedures. In Joan’s second inquisitorial trial, that of 1456, which followed proper inquisitorial procedures, the earlier verdict was reversed.

The Inquisitions of Spain and Portugal. Inquisitors of heretical depravity technically had little jurisdiction over Jews and Muslims, except in cases where members of these groups had converted to Christianity and then returned to their original faiths and in a few other instances, mostly concerning their relations with Christians. In the Iberian Peninsula, however, a series of pogroms beginning in 1391 had led to an extraordinary number of Jewish conversions to Christianity and to the creation of a group of converted Jews known as conversos or New Christians, nuevos cristianos. The prominence of conversos in fifteenth-century Iberian society, with increasing anti-semitism, led Isabella of Castile and Ferdinand of Aragon to request from the Pope the establishment of an inquisitorial tribunal in Spain. The bull of Sixtus IV (1471–1484), issued in November 1478, permitted the Crown to appoint two inquisitors, primarily to deal with the problem of relapsed conversos. In 1482 another bull permitted the appointment of a further seven inquisitors, among whom was Tomás de TORQUEMADA, a diligent, but hardly fanatic inquisitor. Ferdinand and Isabella had already established four Councils of State as institutional branches of royal government, and in 1483 they established a fifth: Consejo de la Suprema y General Inquisición, “The Council of the Supreme and General Inquisition,” the first institutional inquisition, with Torquemada as President, and later with the title Inquisitor-General.

From 1478 to 1530, and again from 1650 to 1720, the Spanish Inquisition concentrated on the problem of Judaizing. Between 1530 to 1650, however, it focused more on other problems: some aspects of Erasmian humanism in religious matters, deviations in piety among the alumbrados, and PROTESTANTISM, which it and others characterized as a form of heresy, in this case, Luteranis- mo. It also dealt with other issues of disciplining the clergy, particularly that of sexual solicitation in the confessional.

The Council of the Supreme and General Inquisition developed its institutional form and its procedures early and maintained them until its abolition in 1834. It consisted of an Inquisitor-General and an unspecified number of other members. By the mid-sixteenth century it assumed operational and jurisdictional authority over all inquisitorial tribunals, requiring regular reports from them and periodically inspecting and supervising their activities. By the early seventeenth century there were nearly 20 regional tribunals directed by the Suprema as well as a group of tribunals in the Spanish Americas. Each of these operated according to the written instructions, Instrucciones, issued by the Suprema, the first of which was issued by Torquemada in 1484 and later supplemented by his successors. Each tribunal was to consist of two inquisitors, a legal adviser, a constable, and a fiscal, or prosecutor. Tribunals also had a network of familiars, privileged lay assistants who provided general staff support.

The bureaucratic features of the system governed by the Suprema were the systematic recruitment, appointment, and replacement of officials, the powerful and regular structure of command and supervision, the issuing of operational instructions enhanced by periodic visitations and reports from below, the preservation, use, and continuous supplementation of archives, the establishment of clearly defined rank and status, and internal financial management.

The procedures followed by the tribunals were essentially continuations of those developed from the late thirteenth century on. The general sermon, the period of grace, the collection of names and evidence during the period of grace, and the recording and summarizing of information. Such evidence was then assessed by one or more theological consultants. When an indictment was forthcoming, the prosecutor drew up charges, issued an arrest warrant, and took the accused into custody. At that moment, the accused's goods were sequestered, inventoried, and from that point until conviction or acquittal maintained by officers of the Inquisition. The accused was imprisoned until the hearing was completed. Inquisition officials were permitted to use most of the criminal procedures of the ius commune, including torture, although records indicate that torture was used far less than in comparable secular jurisdictions. Meticulous records were kept of all procedures, and these vast archives constitute a remarkable body of sources for both inquisitorial and social history.

At the end of all hearings, the local tribunal, with theological advisers and a representative of the bishop, decided upon guilt or innocence in a group of cases. During the seventeenth century the Suprema itself took over this task. The sentences were read publicly at a ceremony known as the auto-de-fé, "the Act of Faith," which consisted of processions of penitents, including the names of those posthumously condemned, public prayers, and sermons. These elaborate ceremonies were intended to serve as a means of reinforcing the faith of the public as much as a means of celebrating the repentance of those who had confessed and the condemnation of those who had not. The auto-de-fé is comparable to other manifestations of public ritual in early modern Europe. In the case of those convicted of capital offenses, the Suprema was obliged to turn them over to the secular arm for execution.

Antisemitic sentiments increased in Portugal during the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, particularly following the large influx of Spanish conversos who left Spain after 1478 to 1483 and after the expulsion of all unbaptized Jews from Spain in 1492. In 1496 King João II ordered the expulsion of all Jews from Portugal and a year later commanded the forced conversion of all who remained. Thus, the absence of an unconverted Jewish community living side by side with cristãos novos made the Portuguese situation different from that of Spain between 1391 and 1492. But the rulers of Portugal eventually did request a local inquisition, and between 1534 and 1540 an Inquisition similar to that of Spain was established, although the Portuguese Inquisition continued to concern itself more with Judaizing than did the Spanish. In 1561 the Portuguese Inquisition established a tribunal at Goa, in India, parallel to the Spanish tribunals in Mexico, Lima, Cartagena, and Manila.

The Inquisitions of Spain and Portugal survived, but in much weakened form, until the nineteenth century. The Spanish Inquisition was finally abolished by the regent Maria Cristina, acting in the name of the Infanta Isabella II in July 1834. The Portuguese Inquisition was abolished in 1821.

The Inquisitions in Italy and Northern Europe. In 1542 Pope Paul III (1534–1549) established an institutional Inquisition in Rome with six inquisitors general for the Papal States and other parts of Italy, but claiming powers over all of Europe. When Sixtus V (1585–1590) restructured papal government into 15 secretariats, or congregations, in 1588, the Roman Inquisition was erected into one of these, the Congregation of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition, or Holy Office. The Roman Inquisition also established bodies of instructions for subordinate tribunals and extensive archives, most of which have been scattered or lost. The chief focus for the Roman Inquisition was originally Protestantism, although by the seventeenth century most trials were held for problems of clerical discipline and superstitious magic. Both the Spanish and Roman Inquisitions were the first institutional tribunals to express great scepticism about the problem of diabolical witchcraft, which troubled many other tribunals, ecclesiastical and lay, during the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The occasions for sentencing in the procedure of the Roman Inquisition were secret—there were no Roman equivalents of the Spanish auto-de-fé. The powers of the Roman Inquisition were also limited by local control and resistance. The city of Lucca never admitted its officials, and in other territories, notably Genoa, Savoy, and Tuscany, city and territorial governments insisted on some degree of lay intervention. In 1908, Pius X changed the name of the institution to the Congregation of the Holy Office, merging its function with that of the Congregation of the Index, which had been established in 1571. In 1965 Paul VI changed the name once again to The Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, its present name, and in 1966 abolished the Index entirely.

In 1547 the government of Venice, which had included very stringent laws against heresy in its municipal legal code, instituted a tribunal, initially composed entirely of laymen, the Tre Savii sopra eresia, “The Three Wise Magistrates Concerned with Heresy,” although by 1551 these lay officials were reduced to the role of consulting officials and witnesses, while the real work was done under a clerical Inquisitor-General. By the mid-sixteenth century the once-independent Venetian Inquisition was consulting regularly and cooperatively with the Roman Inquisition, as the trial records of Giordano BRUNO in 1600 and Galileo GALILEI in 1633 indicate. The Inquisition of Venice was abolished when Napoleon conquered the city in 1797. As governments became increasingly secularized and nonconfessionally based in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the various surviving inquisitorial tribunals lost public power and legitimacy and functioned only internally in Roman Catholic affairs.

Myths of the Inquisition. The secrecy and power of inquisitorial tribunals had always generated criticism and opposition since the thirteenth century, most spectacularly in the case of the fourteenth-century Franciscan, Bernard Délicieux. But the great confessional divisions of the sixteenth century and later generated for the first time a mythology of the Inquisition, initially in Protestant histories of the Church and Protestant martyrologies, and then in the Low Countries, in the sixteenth century ruled by Spain, which resisted the importing of the Spanish Inquisition into their region. As Low Country political resistance to Spain was drawn during the Dutch Revolt after 1566 to the general conflict between Protestantism and Catholicism, anti-Spanish propaganda promulgated what was later called “The Black Legend,” a polemical demonization of Spain that identified the Inquisition with the most hated features of Roman Catholicism and Spanish autocracy.

During the debates on religious toleration of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the inquisitions became popular targets as examples of religious fanaticism, most impressively in the great History of the Inquisition by the Dutch theologian Philip van Limborch (1633–1712), the original recipient of John Locke’s Letter on Toleration. In the eighteenth century, enlightenment critics, most conspicuously Voltaire, satirized the inquisitions, and the Italian penal reformer Cesare Beccaria denounced them in his widely circulating treatise On Crimes and Punishments. The Gothic novel in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries often used on imaginary inquisitorial settings and characters like the fantastic institution described in Edgar Allan Poe’s “The Pit and the Pendulum,” and by other writers of imaginative and polemical fiction. With the proliferation of illustrated books, both official and imaginary pictorial representations of scenes of inquisitorial torture, imprisonment, and executions appeared more and more frequently, sometimes in great art like that of Goya, but more often in crude or satirical book-illustrations. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the topic attracted great a number of great musical and literary artists—Schiller, Verdi, Dostoevsky, and Stefan Andres. Only in the late nineteenth century, with the imposition of modern standards of scholarship, did a reliable and document-based history of the Inquisition become possible. It has attracted historians ever since.

The modern historian John Lukacs once observed that “The purpose of history is the reduction of untruth.” The problem of dismantling the long and often firmly-held mythology of the Inquisition is a case in point.

Bibliography: E. PETERS, Inquisition (New York 1988). E. VAN DER VEKENÉ, Bibliotheca Bibliographica Historiae Sanctae Inquisitionis 2 v. (Vaduz, 1982–83). W. TRUSEN, “Der Inquisitionsprozess. Seine historischen Grundlagen und frühen Formen,” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte. Kanonistische Abteilung 105 (1988) 168–230; “Das Verbot der Gottesurteile und der Inquisitionsprozess. Zum Wandel des Strafverfahrens unter dem Einfluss des gelehrten Rechts im Spätmittelalter,” Sozialer Wandel im Mittelalter. Wahrnehmungsformen, Erklärungsmuster, Regelungsmechanismen, ed. J. MIETHKE and K. SCHREINER (Sigmaringen: Jan Thorbecke Verlag, 1994) 235–247. M. BELLOMO, The Common Legal Past of Europe 1000–1800 (Washington, D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 1995). R. KIECKHEFER, “The Office of Inquisition and Medieval Heresy: The Transition from Personal to Institutional Jurisdiction,” Journal of Ecclesiastical History 46 (1995) 36–61. R. FRAHER, “IV Lateran’s Revolution in Criminal Procedure: The Birth of Inquisitio, the End of Ordeals, and Innocent III’s Vision of Ecclesiastical Politics,” Studia in Honorem Eminentissimi Cardinalis, A. M. STICKLER, ed. R. I. CARD, Castillo Lara (Rome: Las 1992) 97–111. W. L. WAKEFIELD, Heresy, Crusade, and Inquisition in Southern France, 1100–1250 (Berkeley and Los Angeles 1974).

H. MAISONNEUVE, Études sur les origines de l'inquisition (Paris 1960). E. PETERS, Heresy and Authority in Medieval Europe (Philadelphia 1980). M. ZERNER, ed., Inventer l'hérésie? Discours polémiques e pouvoirs avant l'Inquisition (Nice 1998). M. G. PEGG, The Corruption of Angels: The Great Inquisition of 1246–1246 (Princeton 2001). J. B. GIVEN, Inquisition and Medieval Society: Power, Discipline, and Resistance in Languedoc (Ithaca and London 1997). R. KIECKHEFER, Repression of Heresy in Medieval Germany (Philadelphia 1979). A. PATSCHOVSKY, Die Anfänge einer ständigen Inquisition in Böhmen (Berlin-New York: De Gruyter 1975). A. DONDAINE, Les hérésies et l'Inquisition, XIIe-XIIIe siècles, ed. Y. DOSSAT (Aldershot 1990), especially "Le manuel de l'inquisiteur (1230–1330)," II. A. FRIEDLANDER, The Hammer of Inquisitors: Brother Bernard Délicieux and the Struggle Against the Inquisition in Fourteenth-Century France (Leiden-Boston-Cologne 2000). Bernard Gui et son monde, Cahiers de Fanjeaux 16 (Toulouse 1981). H. ANSKAR KELLY, Inquisitions and Other Trial Procedures in the Medieval West (Aldershot-Brookfield 2001). H. C. LEA, A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages, 3 v. (New York 1888). R. I. MOORE, The Formation of a Persecuting Society: Power and Deviance in Western Europe, 950–1250 (Oxford 1987). Historia de la Inquisición en España y América, ed. J. PÉREZ VILLANUEVA and B. ESCANDELL BONET, 3 v. (Madrid 1984–2000). J. EDWARDS, The Spanish Inquisition (Charleston 1999). M. ESCAMILLA-COLIN, Crimes et chatiments dans l'Espagne inquisitoriale, 2 v. (Paris 1992). S. HALICZER, Inquisition and Society in the Kingdom of Valencia 1478–1834 (Berkeley-Los Angeles-Oxford 1990). H. C. LEA, A History of the Inquisition of Spain, 4 v. (New York 1906–1907). H. KAMEN, The Spanish Inquisition: A Historical Revision (New Haven and London 1998). A. ALCALÁ, ed., The Spanish Inquisition and the Inquisitorial Mind (New York 1987). M. E. PERRY and A. J. CRUZ, ed., Cultural Encounters: The Impact of the Inquisition in Spain and the New World (Berkeley and Los Angeles 1991). G. HENNINGSEN, The Witches' Advocate: Basque Witchcraft and the Spanish Inquisition (Reno 1980). L'Inquisition de Goa, ed. C. AMIEL and A. LIMA (Paris 1997). A. J. SARAIVA, The Marrano Factory: The Portuguese Inquisition and Its New Christians, 1536–1765, trans. H. P. SALOMON and I. S. D. SASSOON (Boston-Leiden-Cologne 2001). H. C. LEA, A History of the Inquisition of Spain, v. 3: 239–290. F. M. GILBERT, La abolición de la Inquisición en España (Pamplona 1975). The Inquisition in Early Modern Europe: Studies on Sources and Methods, ed. G. HENNINGSEN and J. TEDESCHI, with C. AMIEL (Dekalb, Illinois 1986). F. BETHENCOURT, L'Inquisition à l'époque moderne: Espagne, Portugal, Italie Xve–XIXe siècle (Paris 1995). J. TEDESCHI, The Prosecution of Heresy: Collected Studies on the Inquisition in Early Modern Italy (Binghamton 1991). B. PULLAN, The Jews of Europe and the Inquisition of Venice, 1550–1670 (Oxford 1983). G. DALL'OLIO, Eretici e Inquisitori nella Bologna del Cinquecento (Bologna 1999).

[E. PETERS]

INSIGHT

The term is used improperly by some (e.g., W. Köhler) for animal "solutions" to animal "problems" but has acquired a technical meaning, corresponding to its ordinary use for acumen or INTELLIGENCE, in the works of B. J. F. Lonergan. For him, it is the specifically human act of UNDERSTANDING. It is limited: "By insight we have not meant a pure understanding but an understanding of something" (Insight 343); and this limitation derives from presentations, or images, or experience (again a technical word for the materials to be understood, ibid. 357), which determine a specific object for human understanding. Thus one does not speak of divine insight, though one may speak of divine understanding.

The chief value of the word lies in the fact that it expresses the act of understanding familiar to everyone, without carrying the philosophical connotations of the term INTUITION. It also indicates the direct relationship of human understanding to materials to be understood, in contrast to the REFLECTION that is involved in judging. But "sight" is used only analogously of intellectual operations, which are properly to be studied in themselves (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae, 1a, 88.2 ad 3). Since intuitionist philosophers may read their peculiar meanings into "insight" and justify them by its root meaning, it seems better to give preference to the term understanding, whose root meaning is more obscure and requires one to attend to the actual meaning assigned by the user.

See Also: UNDERSTANDING (INTELLECTUS); APPREHENSION, SIMPLE.

Bibliography: B. J. F. LONERGAN, "The Concept of Verbum in the Writings of St. Thomas Aquinas," Theological Studies 7 (1946) 349–392; 8 (1947) 35–79, 404–444; 10 (1949) 3–40, 359–393; Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (New York 1957). W. KÖHLER, The Mentality of Apes, tr. E. WINTER from 2d ed. (New York repr. 1959).

[F. E. CROWE]

INSPIRATION, BIBLICAL

By inspiration of the Bible is meant a unique divine influence in virtue of which the people responsible for the OT and NT were so moved and enlightened by God that their work may truly be called the Word of God. It has been the constant belief of the people of God both before and after the time of Christ that their Sacred Scriptures have been divinely inspired. Testimony to this fact, together with information concerning the nature of the inspired character of the Scriptures, is found in the OT, in Jewish writers, in the NT, as well as in the tradition of the Church.

Existence of Inspiration. Old Testament and Jewish Writers. Toward the end of the 2nd century B.C., the translator of Sirach recognized the normative character of the Law, the Prophets, and other writings for the Jewish people (Foreword to Sirach; see also 1 Mc 1:9–60; 7:16–17; 12:9; 2 Mc 2:13; Dan 9:2). The prophetic origin of this literature accounted for its authority. Moses and the great prophets of Israel were themselves conscious of speaking to the people in the name of God Himself (e.g., Ex 4:15–16; 19:7–8; Jer 1:9; 20:7–9; Ez 38:1). The phenomenon of prophecy was attributed to the spirit of God that filled the prophet (Nm 11:25–26; 1 Sm 10:6; Hos 9:7). Occasional mention is made of the same spirit of God at work in the priest (2 Chr 24:20) and the psalmist (2 Sm 23:2).

The Prophets of Israel were primarily moved by God to speak the word of God to their contemporaries. Others recorded their words at a later date. Some prophetic oracles, however, were originally given in writing (Hb 2:2; Is 30:8); Jeremiah was instructed to record all his oracles for posterity (Jer 30.1–3; 36.1–3). At the time of Christ the Jews sought the word of the Lord in this threefold collection of the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings (cf. Jn 5:39; 10:35). The rabbis so venerated the letter of the text that they saw a divine meaning in the very flourishes of the script (cf. Mt 5:18).

In the Diaspora the Jewish philosopher Philo wrote of the inspired character of the Hebrew Scriptures in their Greek translation. He explained the phenomenon of inspiration in terms of Greek religious ecstasy: the prophet was deprived of personal consciousness and possessed by God whenever he spoke or wrote (ἐνθουσιασμός: Quis rerum divinarum heres 53.265; Loeb Classical Library 4.418). According to the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus, the prophets wrote by inspiration received from God (κατὰ τὴν ἐπίπνοιαν τὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ: Contra Apionem 1.7.37; Loeb Classical Library 1.179). The Jews were more concerned with the divine character and authority of their sacred writings than with their human origins.

New Testament. The countless NT references and allusions to the Jewish Scriptures testify to the veneration that Christ and the apostles had for the Law, the Prophets, and the other writings (Lk 24:27, 44; Acts 3:22; 4:25; 28:25; Gal 3:8; Mk 7:10, 13; 12:36). In fact, the person, work, and teaching of Christ are presented in the NT as the supreme fulfillment of all that is written in the OT (Heb 1:1–2; Mt 5:17–19; 1 Cor 15:3–4; Rom 3:21, 31).

In 2 Pt 1:19–21 the OT prophetic texts are clearly attributed to the special influence of the Holy Spirit. To confirm the confidence that may be placed in OT prophecy, the author says that “no prophecy of Scripture is made by private interpretation. For not by human will was prophecy brought at any time; rather, holy men of God spoke as they were moved [φερόμενοι] by the Holy Spirit.” The permanent value of the OT is insisted on in 2 Tm 3:15–16 by explaining that “all Scripture is inspired by God [θεόπνευστος] and useful for teaching, for reproving, for correcting, for instructing in justice; that the man of God may be perfect, equipped for every good work.” For these reasons the OT was retained as authoritative and useful in the Church (1 Cor 10:11).

Among the NT writings the Book of Revelation testifies to its own divine origin (1:1–3), and in 2 Pt 3:16 the epistles of Paul are treated as Scripture. Moreover, the Apostles claim for themselves and their teaching an authority superior to their predecessors (2 Cor 3:7–8; Eph 3:5; Col 1:26; 1 Thes 2:13; 2 Thes 2:15).

Church Tradition. By the middle of the 2nd Christian century there is evidence that the NT writings were being treated on a par with the OT [Justin Martyr, Apologia 1.66, 67; Dialogues c. Trypho 119; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 3.1.1–2; Theophilus of Antioch, Ad Autolycum 3.12; Hippolytus, In Cant. 2.8 (XI); Muratorian Fragment, Enchiridion biblicum 1–7].

Christian antiquity, in its prayer, preaching, and theological writing, universally recognized that the writings of the OT and NT were the work of the Holy Spirit and were all equally the word of God. It was the unanimous teaching of the Fathers that the Sacred Scriptures were free from error and from all contradiction. Even though other ecclesiastical writers were considered to be inspired by God (Clement of Rome says this of himself, 1 Clem 63.2; Gregory Nazianus, of Basil, In Hex. Proem., Patrologia Graeca 44:61; Augustine, of Jerome, Epist. 82.2; Gregory the Great, of himself, In I Reg. Proem. 5, Patrologia Latina 79:21), the canonical Scriptures were always considered to be in a class apart. Athenagoras (c. 177) spoke of the prophets as the organa or instruments of God, writing in ecstasy as the flutes of the Holy Spirit (Legatio pro Christianis 7, 9). About A.D. 250 the Co-hortatio ad Graecos (8) called them the harps or lyres of the Holy Spirit (see also Theophilus of Antioch, Ad Autolycum 2.9; Hippolytus, De Antichristo 2). The metaphor of the musical instrument is common among the Fathers but tends to minimize the role of the human author. Nevertheless, at the time of the Montanist heresy, Catholic writers rejected the notion that the sacred writers wrote in ecstasy, deprived of their senses and intellectual awareness (see Epiphanius, Adv. Haer. 48; Jerome, In Is. Prol., Corpus Christianorum 73.2–3; In Nah. et Hab. Prol., Patrologia Latina 25:1232, 1274).

The Fathers inherited from the rabbis the notion of divine dictation (ὕπαγορεύειν, dictare; see John Chrysostom, In illud: Salutate Priscillam et Aquilam, Patrologia Graeca 51: 187; Augustine, Cons. Evang. 1.35, 54), but it must be remembered that, when used by the magisterium, this Latin word has a wider sense than mechanical and verbal dictation. It expresses origin, causality, and responsibility; the Council of Trent used it of oral traditions (Enchiridion biblicum 57). It remains true, however, that the Fathers investigated primarily the divine meaning of the Scriptures in the full light of Christian faith, and little attention was actually paid to a historical investigation of the human writer's work (see Gregory the Great, Moralia in Job Praef. 1.2, Patrologia Latina 75:517). Indeed, the tools for such a study were lacking to the Fathers. At the same time, however, men such as the Antiochenes, Jerome, and Augustine, recognized the importance of investigating the character, style, and work of the human writers (Jerome, In Am. Prol., Patrologia Latina 25:990; Augustine, In evang. Ioh. 1.1; Civ. 17.6.2; Cons. Evang. 2.12.27–29). Augustine (Doctr. christ. 2.5) wrote: “In reading it [i.e., Sacred Scripture], men are desirous only of discovering the thoughts and intentions of those by whom it was written. Through these in turn they discover the will of God, according to which we believe such men spoke” (The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation 4.64). Again in Epist. 82. 1.3: “If I do find anything in these books which seems contrary to truth, I decide that either the text is corrupt, or the translator did not follow what was really said, or that I failed to understand it” (The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation 9.392).

Although the Fathers treated the Scriptures as letters addressed by God to his people (John Chrysostom, In Gn. Hom. 2.2, Patrologia Graeca 53:28; Augustine, In psalm. 90 serm. 2.1), the term auctor (author) is not explicitly applied to God until the time of Gregory the Great (Moralia in Job Praef. 1.2, Patrologia Latina 75:517). In defending the faith against Marcion, the Gnostics, and the Manichees, Catholic writers and the magisterium insisted that one and the same God was at the origin of both the OT and the NT. In this context the Latin word auctor may simply mean principle or originator of both dispensations, although literary authorship cannot be excluded. The Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua (c. 600) refer to God as “the author [auctor] of the OT and the NT, i.e., of the Law and the Prophets and [the writings of] the Apostles” (Enchiridion biblicum 30). The Decree for the Jacobites issued at the Council of Florence (1441) suggests literary authorship more explicitly: “The holy Roman Church acknowledges [profitetur] one and the same God as author of the OT and the NT, i.e., of the Law and the Prophets and the Gospel, because the holy men of both Testaments, whose books it receives and venerates, spoke under the inspiration of the same Holy Spirit” (Enchiridion biblicum 47). The same formula appears in the teaching of the Council of Trent (1546), although the Council itself was concerned primarily with maintaining equal reverence and authority (pari pietatis affectu ac reverentia) for oral traditions, in view of Protestant insistence on Scripture alone (Enchiridion biblicum 57). [See TRADITION (IN THEOLOGY).]

Providentissimus Deus. In the 18th and 19th centuries, with the rise of rationalism and positivism, the inspiration and divine authority of Sacred Scripture were seriously questioned. Textual, literary, and historical criticism discovered many imperfections, apparent errors, and seeming contradictions in the sacred texts. The human origins of the Bible appeared to be irreconcilable with divine inspiration. Outside the Church the notion of inspiration was reduced to religious and poetic genius. Within the Church some Catholics taught that the Church made certain books into Sacred Scripture by giving her approval to outstanding human works (D. Haneberg). Others taught that God merely protected the human authors from error in matters of faith and morals (M. Jahn). Vatican Council I (1870) defended the traditional teaching against contemporary errors by a solemn and infallible expression of Catholic faith: “The Church holds them [the books of the OT and the NT] as sacred and canonical, not because, having been composed by human industry alone, they were afterwards approved by her authority; nor only because they contain revelation without error; but because, having been written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, they have God as their author and, as such, have been handed over to the Church” (Enchiridion biblicum 77).

In view of new attempts to restrict unduly Biblical inspiration and inerrancy, Leo XIII, in his encyclical Providentissimus Deus (1893), repeated the teaching of Trent and Vatican Council I, and further explained the Catholic doctrine of inspiration: “Hence, because the Holy Spirit employed men as His instruments, we cannot therefore say that it was these inspired instruments who, perchance, have fallen into error, and not the primary Author. For, by supernatural power, He so moved and impelled them to write—He was so present to them—that the things that He ordered, and those only, they, first, rightly understood, then willed faithfully to write down, and finally expressed in apt words and with infallible truth. Otherwise it could not be said that He was the author of the entire Scripture” (Enchiridion biblicum 125). It is therefore of divine and Catholic faith that the entire extent of Scripture is inspired by God in such a way that He may be truly called its author.

Leo XIII, reflecting Christian tradition, spoke of the sacred writers as instruments of the Holy Spirit. It is necessary to conceive this divine and human cooperation in such a way as to preserve the free and responsible character of the human author, for modern study has made us acutely aware of the complex historical process that produced the literature of the Bible. The inspiration of the Bible must, however, be seen as one aspect of that divine providence which is leading men to salvation through Jesus Christ. God's supernatural revelation took place in the history of Israel and in the life of Christ before it was recorded in the pages of Scripture. The Bible then is the record of a progressive revelation, written according to the modes of writing prevalent in the ancient Near East at the time. Consequently, it is the fruit of a long oral and written tradition in which early texts were reinterpreted, glossed, and reorganized before reaching the state in which we read them today. Many have played a role in this process, but the work of all had a common social character; it was ordered to the service of a religious community. The prophets and the Apostles were the spiritual guides of Israel and the early Church, but they did not always write. Others recorded their teaching for posterity or sought to inculcate it by a literary presentation peculiar to themselves (see Lk 1.1–4; 2 Mc 2.27–32; 15.39). By His special providence God guided this entire process, whether it involved action, speech, or writing. Such divine guidance may fittingly be called inspiration, since inspiration is simply any impulse brought to bear upon an intelligent creature from without (see Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 68.1).

Human Authors as God's Instruments. The inspiration by which God moves his free creatures is distinguished according to the various effects produced. Biblical inspiration produces a book of which God is the author. In order to provide the Church with Sacred Scripture, the Holy Spirit elevated all the human activity required for its production in such a way that the books produced were entirely the work of God, the principal cause, and entirely the work of the human authors as instrumental causes (Contra gentiles 3.70). The notion of an instrumental cause is a fruitful one, provided it is not applied too rigidly to the inspired authors. St. Thomas developed the notion in treating the Sacraments (Summa theologiae 3a, 62.1 ad 2). An instrument, such as a saw or a trumpet, cannot produce any effect unless it is used by a carpenter or a musician. When so used, it produces an effect proper to its own nature; a saw is designed to cut wood, a trumpet to make music. The effect, however, surpasses the proper causality of the instrument even though the latter receives and conditions the action of the principal agent.

On occasion St. Thomas spoke of the prophet or sacred writer as an instrument (e.g., Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 173.4; 172.4 ad 1; In Heb. 11.1.7; Quodl. 7.6.1 ad 5). These, however, were free instruments and responsible agents. They understood what they had to speak or write and went about their work as conscious and free authors, working according to the methods proper to their own culture. Their work surpasses their human powers only insofar as it has divine authority and efficacy, and insofar as they may not have fully understood all that God intended in the events of which they treated and in the words they used. They are at the same time true authors in their own right, even though they act only when moved by the Holy Spirit. Only in this wider sense (see De ver. 24.1 ad 5) may we speak of the sacred writers as instruments of the Holy Spirit. It is not necessary that they be conscious of this divine activity, but it seems fitting that they be consciously aware of undertaking a work of religious significance for the people of God. The manner in which God efficaciously moves a free agent, respecting his liberty and proper mode of action, is treated in the theology of GRACE.

The intellect plays a central role in any truly human work. St. Thomas's study of prophetic revelation (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 171–174) contains valuable principles for Biblical inspiration when wisely and prudently applied. By the natural light of the human intellect a man judges the ideas or species that have been received through the channels of the senses, the imagination, and the agent intellect. In prophetic revelation God may disclose new ideas or species to the mind of the prophet by direct action upon the senses or the imagination, or by re-ordering existing ideas or species in an original way, or by direct action upon the intellect. When such action is accompanied by an infusion of the divine light, thereby ensuring the truth of the human judgment, one may speak of revelation in the strict sense; for God has disclosed to men truths that surpass their natural powers of reason or which they are naturally unable to attain in their peculiar circumstances. But God may also be satisfied to fortify the judgment of the prophet concerning truths that he has acquired in a normal human manner from tradition, instruction, experience, or investigation. St. Thomas considered this case as an imperfect mode of prophetic revelation (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 173.2; 175.2 ad 4); some writers prefer to call it inspiration without revelation. The important consequence of this distinction is the realization that everything in Sacred Scripture need not be directly revealed by God, but everything in Scripture is inspired inasmuch as the judgment of the sacred writers is always fortified with the divine light. [See REVELATION, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE)].

St. Thomas was interested primarily in the communication of divine truth to the prophet's intellect and in the action of God upon his speculative judgments. To communicate this truth to others in speech or writing necessitates many practical judgments if the message is to be suitably presented and to achieve the desired result in the audience for which it is intended. A speaker or writer does not merely instruct the intellect; he may also want to act upon the emotions and move the will to conviction, repentance, enthusiasm, or action (see 2 Tm 3.15–16). These practical judgments also benefit from the charism of inspiration, but now the proper effect of inspiration is to assure the most suitable execution of the desired purpose in view of the peculiar circumstances of both the author and his audience. Formal truth and error are no longer at stake, for these are the concern only of the speculative judgment. Hence, in order to evaluate the truth of Scripture, one must consider the purpose of the whole work, the specific intention of the author concerned, and his method of composition. One must allow for the total psychology of human authors in the ancient Near East. If God has chosen to speak to us through such instruments, His intention can be discovered only by the investigating of the intentions of these human authors. In his encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu (1943) Pius XII invited Catholic exegetes to this study (Enchiridion biblicum 557–560).

Analogous Notion of Inspiration. Biblical inspiration, however, is not restricted to the illumination of the intellect; it elevates all the faculties of the sacred authors for the limited work they have to perform. Such an analogous notion of inspiration is supple enough to embrace all those who contributed in any way to giving the Bible in its present form to the Church. It may also be extended to the Septuagint translators, if it can be established that their work positively contributed to the progress of revelation [see P. Auvray, “Comment se pose le problème de l’inspiration des Septante,” Revue biblique 59 (1952) 321–336]. The suppleness of this concept may also resolve the problem of verbal inspiration. No one today would hold that God dictated the words of Scripture in an audible manner to the ear of the sacred writer. Cardinal Franzelin taught that God could be the author of Sacred Scripture provided He inspired all the ideas, but the choice of words could be left to the human authors. This theory applied a human notion of authorship univocally to God and violated the psychological integrity of the human instrument; for in man ideas are inseparable from the words in which they are expressed. A proper application of the notion of an instrument to a free agent and the analogous notion of inspiration suffice to explain how God may be considered responsible even for the words without violating the personal integrity and human freedom of the instruments He uses. In this way God may truly, though analogously, be called the author of the entire Bible.

Second Vatican Council. The Second Vatican Council while drafting the text of its Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum) spent a good deal of time on the subject of inspiration. The Constitution’s third chapter, “The Divine Inspiration and the Interpretation of Sacred Scripture,” was clearly intended to reaffirm the Church’s traditional position. It cited the classic texts, taking special care to include 2 Tm 3:16–17 so that there could be no mistake as to how the council fathers understood biblical inspiration and what they considered its purpose to be. The Catechism of the Catholic Church, quoting the third chapter of the Constitution verbatim and at length, recapitulates the Church’s traditional teaching:

Since therefore all that the inspired authors or sacred writers affirm should be regarded as affirmed by the Holy Spirit, we must acknowledge that the books of Scripture firmly, faithfully, and without error teach that truth which God, for the sake of our salvation, wished to see confided to the Sacred Scriptures (par. 107).

This quotation from the Constitution on Divine Revelation corresponds to the view of Christians of many traditions who regard 2 Tm 3:16–17 and 2 Pt 1:19–21 as the key texts in providing a correct understanding of biblical inspiration.

Bibliography: G. COURTADE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et. al. 4:482–559, with bibliog. Historical. G. M. PERRELLA, “La nozione dell’ispirazione scritturale secondo i primitivi documenti cristiani,” Angelicum 20 (1943) 32–52. A. BEA, “Deus auctor sacrae scripturae: Herkunft und Bedeutung der Formel,” Angelicum 20 (1943) 16–31. N. I. WEYNS, “De notione inspirationis biblicae iuxta Concilium Vaticanum,” ibid. 30 (1953) 315–336. Theological. P. SYNAVE and P. BENOIT, Prophecy and Inspiration, tr. A. DULLES and T. L. SHERIDAN (New York 1961). A. ROBERT and A. TRICOT, Guide to the Bible, tr. E. P. ARBEZ and M. P. MCGUIRE 1:9–59. P. BENOIT, “Les Analogies de l’inspiration,” Sacra Pagina, ed. J. COPPENS et al., 2 v. (Gembloux 1959) 1:86–99. “Révélation et inspiration,” Revue biblique 70 (1963) 321–370. A. DESROCHES, Jugement pratique et jugement spéculatif chez l’écrivain inspiré (Ottawa 1958). J. T. FORESTELL, “The Limitation of Inerrancy,” The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 20 (1958) 9–18. R. A. F. MCKENZIE, “Some Problems in the Field of Inspiration,” ibid. 1–8. J. L. MCKENZIE, “The Social Character of Inspiration,” ibid. 24 (1962) 115–124. K. RAHNER, Inspiration in the Bible, tr. C. H. HENKEY (Quaestiones disputatae 1; New York 1961). D. M. STANLEY, “The Concept of Biblical Inspiration,” Catholic Theological Society of America. Proceedings 13 (1958) 65–95. P. GRELOT, “Études sur la théologie du Livre Saint,” Nouvelle revue théologique 85 (1963) 785–806, 897–925; “L’inspiration scripturaire,” Recherches de science religieuse 51 (1963) 337–382. D. M. BEEGLE, The Inspiration of Scripture (Philadelphia 1963). P. J. ACHTEMEIER, The Inspiration of Scripture: Problems and Proposals (Philadelphia, 1980). R. F. COLLINS, “Inspiration” in The New Jerusalem Biblical Commentary, (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1990), pp.1023–1033.

[J. T. FORESTELL/EDS]

INSTANT

Instant, the indivisible formal factor in TIME that measures SUBSTANTIAL change. The partless instant continues and divides the parts of time; were it divisible into sub-instants, no distinction could be made between past and future. Moreover, because no two instants can be continuous or contiguous, a stretch of time must intervene between them. Yet the instant is in and of time: in time, as its term and measure; of time, since pluralized instants furnish its number. Furthermore, only the instant can measure substantial change. If substantial change occurred in a span of time, either primary matter devoid of act would actually exist for an interval, or an individual would be both dead and alive at one and the same time. At the limiting instant a thing is neither dying nor living—it has ceased to exist. Yet the instant of corruption is the starting-point for a new existent, since primary matter is never unactualized (see MATTER AND FORM). In other words, there is no last instant of LIFE, and there is no next instant following the instant of DEATH, for between any two instants another instant is discernible. Thus as the limit of time, the instant measures substantial change, for a durationless change demands the durationless point of time.

[J. M. QUINN]

INSTINCT

Descriptive Analysis. The term instinct has been used, both in the scholastic philosophical tradition and by some scientific students of animal behavior, to refer to certain complex animal behavior patterns, e.g., hunting, nest building, and the tending of offspring. In these and similar examples, the complexity of the action is thought to exceed that of a direct stimulus-response or sensation-appetition sequence, but to fall short of intelligent or rational foresight and planning. Rough criteria are as follows: instinctive behavior involves the entire organism, not merely an isolated receptor-effector mechanism; it is exhibited with some uniformity by all members of a species (or specific subgroup, e.g., worker bees), and its appearance may be distinctive of the species or group; its performance depends on the appropriate physical maturation, but does not require mimicry, trial-and-error activities, or other forms of learning. Such behavior is almost always adaptive, i.e., of positive advantage to the survival of the individual or its species.

Although these criteria have a rough value, their scientific precision and significance have been seriously questioned. To say that certain behavior patterns are unlearned, species-specific, and adaptive does not distinguish them from the more inclusive metabolic processes. To say that a behavior pattern is innate is to ignore the biological theory that genes, not characters, are transmitted from one generation to the next. The development of an organism's anatomic, metabolic, and behavioral traits involves the interaction of its genetic constitution and its environment; consequently, the distinction of innate and learned behavior patterns is softened to the point that some authors speak of genetically controlled propensities to learn rather than of innate behavior patterns. The prominent borderline phenomenon of "imprinting" is of similar significance. Imprinting is the tendency, e.g., of young birds, for a short, definite interval after hatching, to accept and follow a diverse variety of parent substitutes. Such performances are on the border between learning processes more extended in time and purely innate behavior.

Relation to Vis Aestimativa. In the philosophy of Saint THOMAS AQUINAS, the ESTIMATIVE POWER (vis aestimativa) is one of four interior sensory powers necessary for the life of a perfect animal. The others are the IMAGINATION, the CENTRAL SENSE, and the memory. Although references such as those to a "perfect" animal seem to give this position a deductive or rationalist tone, relevant factual materials are available for its inductive support: (1) The external sensation of at least some animals is quite like that of men. (2) Animals act with respect to objects that are neither gratifying nor unpleasant to the external senses, e.g., sight, touch, and smell. Birds are said to choose nesting materials that, though not attractive to sight or touch, are appropriate for nest construction, so that the choice serves the survival of that species of birds. (3) Such activities, as exhibited by the members of a particular species, exhibit a degree of uniformity. (4) But they also exhibit some plasticity or variability and are not altogether stereotyped. Consequently, what needs explanation is the order or pattern of the sequence of actions and not any mechanical repetition of identical behavioral elements. (5) The performance of these activities is likely to vary with the seasons and with the organic condition of the animal; it is not an automatic response to an external stimulus.

The interpretive principles employed in the analysis of these data include the following theses: (1) One knows, by observation and analogy, that such behavior flows from KNOWLEDGE and APPETITE. (2) In cases in which such behavior cannot be explained by the knowledge gained through the external senses, one may rightly infer the appropriate interior sense. (See SENSES.)

The various data are consequently explained by the existence of a distinct internal sense power (the estimative) capable of apprehending the concrete usefulness of particular sequences of actions. The power is said to be innately determined (diversely within various species) to recognize certain organism-environment groupings as desirable and others as undesirable. Inasmuch as the proper object of this sense power is the total organism-environment grouping, both plasticity and uniformity are accounted for. Similarly included within this proper object is the contemporary state of the organism itself, so that the dependence of instinctive activity upon seasonal and individual variations in metabolic state also is explained.

Critical Evaluation. The explanatory value of such statements as “the bird returned to its nest because of its homing instinct” and “the sheep flees the wolf because its estimative power is innately determined to recognize that particular organism-environment grouping as undesirable” have been called into question by students of scientific methodology. One important objection is that such explanations are really uninformative tautologies, i.e., they simply reformulate the data they pretend to explain. What is a homing instinct? If the philosopher can give no other answer than “the power by which the bird returns to its nest,” the criticism seems accurate.

Another way of putting this criticism is to ask for some additional means of confirming the presence of a “homing instinct,” or an “estimative power.” Philosophers who hold a generally Thomistic position tend to reply with a negative argument, viz, one showing that instinctive behavior cannot be explained in terms of tropisms or reflexes and thus must be accounted for by the estimative power or some analogue for it. The formal requirements for an argument of this sort are impressive; e.g., it must be shown that the alternatives considered exhaust all possible alternatives. Argumentative rigor of this level has not actually been sought in past discussions of this topic. However, a number of interesting points have been made in illustration of weaknesses of any “mechanistic” explanation of animal behavior: (1) Reflex behavior lacks spontaneity or autonomy; it is controlled by outside stimuli. Reflex action exhibits a mechanical, off-on, relation to outside stimulation, rather than the dependence on internal events characteristic of instinctive behavior. (2) Reflex action is stereotyped or invariable in form, and so incapable of explaining the adaptive plasticity of instinctive behavior. Reflex behavior shows no tendency to improve with repeated performance as do many forms of animal behavior. From this sort of evidence it is argued that animal behavior cannot be explained in terms of a concatenation of neuromuscular reflexes and therefore must be explained in terms of some cognitive or conscious awareness of the form and purpose of the animal’s activity, by the animal itself.

This last sort of argument seems to assume, however, that mechanistic theories are themselves invariable in form. In the third quarter of the 20th century, neurologists are not limited to summing the consequences of simple reflex acts, but have demonstrated a variety of facilitating, inhibiting, and correlating neural mechanisms whose activities, in ensemble, are not stereotyped and stimulus bound. At the same time, mechanism of a rigid and parochial sort is nowhere regarded as a philosophically viable explanation of animal behavior. Empiricist schools, which may be the nearest living relatives of past mechanist schools, are in fact critical of mechanism’s pretensions completely and dogmatically to solve the problems of animal behavior.

Perhaps the most commendable aspect of the Thomistic explanation of instinctive activity in terms of the functioning of an estimative power is its emphasis on the really novel complexity of the phenomena in question. Instinctive behavior is not a topic on which one expects much illumination from any form of MONISM or exaggerated DUALISM. It is not a topic that is emphasized in the philosophies of atomists or Cartesians. Its appearance among the problems considered in the Thomistic theory of knowledge is a tribute to the complexity and richness of this theory, which permits cross-level, nuanced analyses where simple reductionist alternatives would seem to ignore relevant detail and significant form.

See Also: INTELLIGENCE.

Bibliography: R. G. BUSNEL, ed., Acoustic Behavior of Animals (New York 1963). J. F. DONCEEL, Philosophical Psychology (2d ed. New York 1961). J. J. DREHER and W. E. EVANS, “Cetacean Communication” in Marine Bio-Acoustics, ed. W. N. TAVOLGA (New York 1964). G. P. KLUBERTANZ, The Discursive Power (Saint Louis 1952). W. KÖHLER, The Mentality of Apes, tr. E. WINTER from 2d ed. (New York 1926; repr. 1959). A. PORTMANN, Animals as Social Beings, tr. O. COBURN (New York 1961). A. ROE and G. G. SIMPSON, eds., Behavior and Evolution (New Haven 1958). E. WASMANN, Instinct and Intelligence in the Animal Kingdom, tr. from 2d. ed. (Saint Louis 1903).

[A. E. MANIER]

INSTITUTES OF CALVIN

The major theological treatise of John CALVIN and the most important exposition of the doctrines of early Protestantism, the first draft of which appeared in 1536 and the final, definitive form in 1559. Calvin called his Institutes of the Christian Religion “a summary of the principal truths of the Christian religion.” The original version, written in Latin in 1534 or early 1535 (Institutio religionis Christianae), was constantly revised and enlarged during Calvin’s life. Latin editions appeared in 1539, 1543, 1550, and 1559 and French translations by Calvin were published in 1541, 1545, 1551, and 1560. The first printing of the Institutes was done in March 1536 at Basel, where Calvin had taken refuge after his flight from France. Prefaced by a dedicatory letter to Francis I, King of France, whom Calvin bids to respect the new doctrines, it consists of six chapters and follows the order of Martin Luther’s Der grosse Catechismus (1529). The first four chapters treat the Ten Commandments, the Creed, the Lord’s Prayer, and the Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist. The fifth chapter discusses and rejects the other Sacraments, and the sixth chapter deals with Christian liberty.

The second edition, published in Strassburg in 1539, during Calvin's temporary banishment from Geneva, is three times as large and has more coherent and systematic organization. It contains an extended statement of his doctrine of predestination, a tenet whose elaboration was influenced by the Strassburg reformer Martin BUCER. This edition, translated by Calvin into French and published in Geneva in 1541, is an important landmark in French literary style as well as French religious thought. The final revision of 1559, followed by a French translation in 1560, is five times the size of the original draft, with 80 chapters, divided into four books. It is the expression of Calvin's mature Biblical theology presented under four main headings (corresponding to the four books): (1) the knowledge of God the Creator, (2) the knowledge of God the Redeemer in Christ, (3) the way in which we receive the grace of Christ, (4) the external means or aids. The famous statement on eternal election, or predestination, is found in bk. 3, ch. 21.

The Institutes remains a theological masterpiece, the summa of Reformed Protestantism and the most important single work of the Reformers. The final edition was soon translated into most of the languages of Europe. A Dutch version appeared in 1560, the first English translation in 1561, and a German version at Heidelberg in 1572. (See CALVINISM; PREDESTINATION.)

Bibliography: J. CALVIN, Institutes of the Christian Religion, ed. J. T. MCNEILL, tr. F. L. BATTLES, 2 v. (Philadelphia 1960), the best English ed.; Ioannis Calvini opera selecta, ed. P. BARTH and W. NIESEL, 5 v. (Munich 1926-36), contains critical eds. of the 1536 and 1559 Latin text.

[J. C. OLIN]

INSTRUMENTAL CAUSALITY

Instrumental causality in the wide acceptance of the term signifies any type of causal subordination. More properly it applies to a special type of efficient cause that is itself moved and elevated by the power of a principal efficient cause to produce an effect proportionate to the nature and power of the principal cause. This article considers briefly the various types of instrument to which this causality is ascribed and then examines the notion of efficient instrumentality, the nature of instrumental power, and the proper action of the instrument. It concludes with a discussion of an important application of instrumental causality in the area of sacramental theology and a brief summary.

Kinds of Instrument. In a general way instrumental causality can be applied to any series of causes wherein one is subordinated to another. This usage includes the subordination that exists between the motion of God as primary principal cause and man as secondary principal cause in human actions. Although a secondary principal cause must be moved from first to second act in order to operate, the motion of God is only a CONDITION for the operation of man and not its formal constitutive, as it is in the stricter meaning of instrumental causality.

In a more limited sense, the term instrumental cause is applied to three particular types of instrumental causality, designated as moral, logical, and efficient.

Moral Instrument. A moral instrument is whatever moves a principal efficient cause by way of inducement, as a consciously sought END. The classical example of such causality is paper currency, which, though it has no intrinsic value itself, has, by the decree of the treasury, an extrinsic value. This value, itself presupposed to any financial transaction, gives the currency the status of an instrumental cause.

Logical Instrument. The logical instrument is the SIGN, and, as such, leads the one observing it to a knowledge of the object for which the sign stands, as in the case of a traffic signal. The sign consequently exercises the same type of causality as any other knowable object, namely, that of an extrinsic formal cause.

Efficient Instrument. An efficient instrument is that from which an effect flows by reason of the subordination of the instrument to a principal efficient cause, to which the instrument ministers and by which it is moved. An example would be the use of a pencil to write. Since this type of instrument exercises its ministerial activity through activity or motion, it alone can be properly termed an efficient instrument.

Notion of Efficient Instrumentality. An efficient instrument attains an effect beyond its own power. Whether the instrumental cause attains to the ultimate perfection of the form produced by the principal agent, or only disposes the appropriate matter for the reception of the form, the efficient instrument acts beyond its proper power. If the instrument did not attain an effect beyond this power, the effect could be attributed to the instrument as to a principal cause, and movement from another cause would not be required to produce the effect.

Yet this aspect of instrumentality does not furnish an adequate basis for distinguishing an instrumental cause from a principal cause. There are cases where the principal agent attains an effect beyond its proper nature without being an efficient instrument. Man, for example, is the principal agent in the production of supernatural acts, and yet these acts proceed from divinely infused virtues. The fact that an instrument attains an effect superior to its own nature, while a necessary condition of true instrumentality, is not its essential characteristic.

To understand the formal constitutive of efficient instrumentality, one must focus on the fact that an instrument, properly so called, performs a function to which it is directed by the principal cause while itself not possessing the permanent or proper power to perform that function. For this reason an instrument is most accurately defined as an agent that is moved and elevated by the action of the principal efficient cause to produce an effect that is proper to the nature and power of the principal cause. The formal aspect of instrumental causality consists in its operating precisely as moved by the principal agent. It is this dependence of the instrument on the principal cause that is emphasized in the definition proposed by St. THOMAS AQUINAS: "The precise formality of an instrument, insofar as it is an instrument, is that it moves precisely as already moved" (C. gent. 2.21).

Instrumental Power. From this concept of instrumental causality it follows that the instrument receives, after the manner of a MOTION, a power derived from the principal cause. This transiently received power enables the instrument to attain the effect of the principal cause, which itself exceeds, of course, the natural power of the instrument.

The instrumental power received from the principal agent is a transitory entity that begins and ends with the action for which it is given, and is received intrinsically by the instrument it perfects. Being thus intrinsically received, the power affects the nature of the instrument; and so it is said to be a physical entity, as opposed to a moral entity that acts from without. Further, such a physical power, being essentially a transitory and passing assistance communicated to the instrument by the principal cause to effect an action, is called a motion; since it is presupposed to the action of the instrument, it is also called a premotion (see PREMOTION, PHYSICAL).

The general doctrine of Thomists is that the ability of the instrument to be used by a principal efficient cause is a passive obediencial POTENCY, i.e., that it does not consist in a positive ordination of the instrument to the effect of the principal cause, but only in a nonrepugnance to its use by the principal cause. As opposed to this, F. Suárez teaches (Disp. meta. 42.4.9) that there is an active obediencial potency in such an instrument. This active potency places the instrument in first act with respect to the effect of a principal agent, and does so in such a way that the instrument remains in potency to the effect whether it is in use or not.

For true instrumental subordination it is necessary that the instrumental activity depend upon the activity of the principal cause, and that the action of the principal cause be received intrinsically into the instrument and so influence its action from within. In contradistinction to coordinated causes, each of which is responsible for part of the effect, both the principal and instrumental cause are responsible for the entire effect.

Proper Action of the Instrument. It is essential also that the instrument retain its proper power in its subordination to the principal cause, for otherwise it would cease to be an instrument, and become a mere medium for the passage of the power of the principal cause. Creatures use instruments because they need their help. A sculptor is incapable of producing a statue in marble unless he employs instruments that assist him in overcoming the resistant quality of the marble. "Because an instrument is not sought for its own sake but for the sake of the end, it is a better instrument not for being larger, but for being more adapted to the end" (St. Thomas, ST 2a3ae, 188.7 ad 1). Even in cases where God uses an instrument to produce a supernatural effect, as in the Sacraments, the instrument has its own proper activity. All that is required of the instrument used by God is that it limit in some way His mode of operation. God adapts His activity to the operation of the created instrument for the production of an effect, while not being limited, in attaining that effect, by the particular form of the instrument. He can use any instrument to attain any effect, so long as this use does not involve a contradiction.

The proper action of the instrumental form produces a MODE in the effect produced. An efficient instrument employed by a created agent limits the efficiency of such an agent to the proper operation of the instrumental form. An artist cannot produce violin music on a piano. In receiving the influx of the principal agent, the instrument exercises a determining causality upon the principal agent, placing a commensuration to its own form in the power it receives from the agent. The modification produced necessarily varies according to the form of the instrument. Since the mode reflects such modifications placed on the principal efficient cause, different instruments produce different modes in the ensuing effects, and these modes are commensurate with the corresponding instrumental forms.

Instrumental Causality in Theology. This notion of instrumental causality has a particular application in the doctrine of theologians who attribute a true instrumentality to the sacred humanity of Christ and to the Sacraments. The basic problem posed by those objecting to the predication of true efficient instrumentality in these cases is one of explaining how a supernatural power can inhere in a corporeal instrument. Theologians who hold for true instrumentality reply that this objection can be answered in terms of the transient nature of the instrumental power. To understand transient to mean merely of short duration is, for them, to consider only an accidental consideration; the power should rather be conceived as transient and incomplete by reason of the special task it accomplishes. A permanent and complete power constitutes a subject as a principal agent, whereas a transient and incomplete power subordinates one subject to another, the one serving the other in the attainment of its effect. Such a transient power, even though ordained to a supernatural effect, can be subjected in a corporeal instrument, not absolutely, but only insofar as that instrument is capable of being used by a spiritual power for the attainment of a spiritual effect.

Created instruments used by God in the production of supernatural effects, while diversifying the mode of His action through their proper operations and thus fulfilling the essential conditions for true efficient instrumentality, are not capable of producing in the supernatural effect any mode that is commensurate to their natural form. God is not limited by their proper operation, and furthermore there is no proportion between the natural form of such an instrument and the effect produced through its ministerial activity. If, then, there is to be an instrument that introduces a mode in a supernatural effect, the form of that instrument must be proportioned to the effect. Since the supernatural effect can be produced only by a supernatural agent, the form of the instrument proportioned to such an effect must likewise be received from a supernatural agent. And if the created instrument must modify not only the divine activity by its proper operation, but also the divine power communicated to it to make the effect produced commensurate with the signification imposed by the divine agent, it is necessary that the form of the instrument itself be supernatural.

It is in this way, according to many theologians, that the Sacraments differ from other forms of divine activity. In confecting the sacramental artifact, Christ gave these unique instruments a supernatural signification that bears a true proportion to the effect produced through their instrumentality. And in employing various Sacraments to sanctify men, God has freely limited His power to that signification.

Summary. An instrument is thus an efficient cause that is moved and elevated by the power of the principal agent to produce an effect proper to the power of the principal cause. It differs from the principal cause in that its effect is of an order higher than itself; that it operates by the power of another. According to Thomistic doctrine the instrumental power is a transient physical premotion. Through its proper operation an instrument used by a created principal cause produces in the effect some modality commensurate to this operation. While creatureal instruments require a proper action that is accommodated to the effect produced, this is not so when God uses instruments for certain effects. Only when such instruments have a supernatural form do they produce in the effect a modality that is proper to the instrument itself.

See Also: CAUSALITY; CAUSALITY, DIVINE; EFFICIENT CAUSALITY; INSPIRATION, BIBLICAL.

Bibliography: R. P. PHILLIPS, Modern Thomistic Philosophy, 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1934; reprint 1946). R. R. MASTERSON, "Sacramental Graces: Modes of Sanctifying Grace," Thomist 18 (1955) 311–372. J. GREDT, Elementa philosophiae Aristotelico-Thomisticae, ed. E. ZENZEN, 2 v. (13th ed. Freiburg 1961). F. X. MARQUART, Elementa philosophiae, 3 v. in 4 (Paris 1937–38). JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, Cursus philosophicus thomisticus, ed. B. REISER, 3 v. (Turin 1930–37).

[R. R. MASTERSON]

INSTRUMENTALISM

Instrumentalism is the name given to the pragmatic philosophy of John DEWEY. In his book The Quest for Certainty (New York 1929) Dewey defines his system thus: "the essence of pragmatic instrumentalism is to conceive of both knowledge and practice as means of making goods—excellencies of all kinds—secure in experienced existence" (37 n.). The instrumental character of knowledge is clearly indicated in Dewey's earlier work How We Think (Boston 1910), where he teaches that thinking is stimulated by a problem presented to a man by his environment. In Dewey's terms, an indeterminate situation becomes problematic and creates a search for some solution that will solve the problem and resolve the situation. The problematic situation instills a "felt need" into the troubled human being. As a result hypothetical solutions are proposed and tested.

By reflective intelligence the individual tries to search for solutions that have worked in the past and may work in the present. According to Dewey, one of the advantages of intellectual knowledge is that solutions proposed in the past may be applied to a present problem, and either be improved upon or rejected before being tried out in actual experience. On this account his system is sometimes called experimentalism. It is true that he considered the scientific method to be a paradigm for philosophers. He did not, however, hold that any inquiry should be judged by being stretched on the Procrustean bed of the positive sciences.

Dewey is obviously concerned with the adaptability of traditional solutions to current problems. He warns, however, that so far as any problem is really new it cannot be seen as a mere repetition of something previous.

Therefore the old solution must be adjusted to meet the demands of the new situation. Traditional theory is then always in tension with precisely those novel problems that were not known as problems when it itself was being formed. Dewey recognizes that the only intellectual equipment available for solving a new problem is knowledge already possessed, and he is convinced that one must make the most of the past solution in the present need. But to the extent that the past solution is inadequate it must be modified. One must, therefore, be always ready to add new truths to the tradition already possessed.

An important feature of Dewey's instrumentalism is his conviction of the reality of novelty and his appreciation of the risks involved in the interaction of an organism with its environment. This dialectic of interaction between developing man and reality in process shows the influence of G. W. F. HEGEL. Reflective intelligence seeks to avoid the risks or gain the rewards in the indeterminate situation. Out of the opposition of the felt need and the reflection of the thinker comes a new solution.

Another aspect of Dewey's instrumentalism is his theory of the "warranted assertion." Whereas William JAMES is content to grant truth to assertions that, when acted upon, make a difference to the individual, Dewey demands that a true statement be warranted by evidence that can be "public" in some suitable way. He is more interested in the problems of men than in those of any one man. In his instrumentalism he seems to focus on human problems in economics, art, ethics, education, and politics, all of which have a direct urgency and relevance for the present situation.

Dewey's instrumentalism is a useful account of practical knowledge. Like the other pragmatists, he over-stresses the role of practical knowledge in human living and leaves little room for contemplation. As a system of practical philosophy his instrumentalism has far greater coherence than that of James, though it leaves room for less objectivity than the pragmatism of Peirce.

See Also: PRAGMATISM; NATURALISM.

Bibliography: P. A. SCHILPP, ed., The Philosophy of John Dewey (Evanston 1939). M. G. WHITE, The Origin of Dewey's Instrumentalism (New York 1943). N. J. FLECKENSTEIN, A Critique of John Dewey's Theory of the Nature and the Knowledge of Reality in the Light of the Principles of Thomism (Washington 1954). J. A. MANN, "The Role of Reflective Intelligence According to the American Pragmatists," American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 35 (1961) 117-124.

[J. A. MANN]

INSULT

Insult, or railing (convicium), as a sin refers to an offense, contrary to both charity and commutative justice, against the honor and dignity of another. It is closely related to CONTUMELY, or reviling, and to upbraiding or taunting speech (improperium). Many theologians (e.g., Cajetan, Soto, Sylvius) held that these pertain to the same species of sin, since all put dishonor and indignity into social relations that should be ruled by friendship and fairness. As Aquinas noted (Summa theologiae, 2a2ae 72.1 ad 3), the terms insult (convicium) and upbraiding (improperium) are frequently used interchangeably.

Insult may, however, be distinguished from contumely. Contumely refers to words and gestures of reproach for some moral defect involving sinfulness or guilt, whereas insult refers generically to all defects whether they are moral faults or not. To dishonor another by speaking spitefully to him of some physical defect, such as lameness or blindness, would be insult but not contumely. To dishonor him by calling him a drunkard or a thief would be both insult and contumely.

Although of its nature grave because it strikes at the decencies of human association, the sin of insult allows for slightness of matter. Insulting speech for correction or punishment may frequently not be seriously sinful, and allowances have to be made for a sort of insulting humor that is well accepted and may be used sometimes without any moral fault. However, great discretion should be employed when one is using terms that could dishonor another, even if dishonor is not intended.

The intention to dishonor need not always be explicit for the sin of insult. If one sufficiently perceives that his words or actions will have this effect, even though they are prompted by hatred, anger, envy, etc., rather than the deliberate will to dishonor the other, then the sin of insult is present.

The unfair treatment of minority groups frequently involves the sin of insult. The denial of civil rights by public authority can be an offense against distributive justice if it introduces disorder in the equitable sharing of the goods and honors of the community. But the offenses of private citizens against the dignity of someone because of racial differences, national origin, etc., are opposed to commutative justice and to charity as well, for everyone has rights to the honor and signs of respect commonly extended in the community. Since the motive for the offensive conduct is some natural quality (e.g., race, national origin) rather than a moral defect, such an offense would be insult rather than contumely in its narrower sense.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 72, esp. art. 1 ad 3. P. PALAZZINI, ed., Dictionarium morale et canonicum, v. 1 (Vatican City 1962) 956-961.

[J. HENNESSEY]

INTEGRALISM

This term, which is sometimes used in a broad, vaguely defined sense, refers here to a tendency and also to a movement that arose about the time of the papal condemnation of Modernism (1907). Intégrisme developed an organization, secret in many of its operations, in order to carry out PIUS X's recommendations for vigilance against doctrinal deviations. Both the mentality and the methods of the "integral Catholics" were themselves the objects of widespread criticism.

Leo XIII's encyclical AETERNI PATRIS (1879) gave a strong impulse to a Catholic scholarly revival, but conservatives began before long to express alarm at some of the results of this activity. At the International Congress of Catholic Scholars in Brussels (1894) Maurice d' Hulst, a rector of the Institut Catholique in Paris, warned of a tendency among some Catholics who feared that employment of new scientific methods might endanger their faith and who reacted by casting suspicions of heterodoxy on those who differed with their outlook, even in matters that did not involve faith. He urged that scholars not be denounced as long as they were sincerely pursuing scientific knowledge about questions on which the Church had not decided authoritatively. During the controversy in the French Catholic press over AMERICANISM at the close of the 19th century, Abbé Charles Maignen and other conservative theologians attacked men whom they believed to be minimizing Catholic teachings.

Development of Integralism. After the condemnation of Modernism, the integralism that had appeared on occasion as a tendency gained a permanent organization. In his encyclical Pascendi (1907), Pius X urged bishops to supervise closely seminary teaching and writings by priests and to establish in each diocese vigilance committees. In 1910 the pope imposed an oath against Modernism (see MODERNISM, OATH AGAINST). Vigilance was needed in this tense period, but the type of vigilance exercised by integralists was often excessive and indefensible. In their zeal to defend the faith in all its purity, the integralists caused unnecessarily bitter polemics among Catholics, injured the reputations of orthodox Catholic scholars, and hampered the progress of Catholic scholarship.

Among the best-known integralists was the Italian priest and publicist Umberto BENIGNI, who in 1909 founded the sodalium pianum, the principal organization engaged in anti-Modernist activities throughout Europe. The Sodalitium, or Sapinière, adopted the Modernist practices of using secrecy, pseudonyms, and codes. In France, which was the chief center of Modernism, the Sapinière was particularly strong. It numbered among its most eager workers priests who had led the opposition to Americanism, such as Maignen, Canon H. Delessus, and two former Jesuits, Bernard Gaudeau, who edited La Foi Catholique in Toulouse, and J. Fontaine, his collaborator. Other priests who cooperated with Benigni were Paul Boulin, who edited Vigie under the pseudonym Roger Duguet; Monsignors Jouin and Delmont, Jacques Rocafort; the Eudist Father Le Doré; the Capuchin Father Pie de Langogne; and the Assumptionist Fathers Salvien and Ricard. Active in Rome was the Capuchin Father Le Floch, who was superior of the French seminary in Rome and a consultor of several Roman congregations. He, as well as other French integralists, supported ACTION FRANÇAISE, which used these zealots for political purposes. Emmanuel Barbier, a skillful controversialist, was one of the more accomplished theologians in this group that numbered few outstanding theologians. After leaving the Jesuits, Barbier published two attacks on Leo XIII's policies in France that were placed on the Index in 1908. As an integralist he was one of the most active in denunciations. Cardinal BILLOT was not an integralist, but he used his influence in Rome to help this group. Cardinal MERRY DEL VAL, the conservative secretary of state, was an acquaintance of Benigni. Pius X was aware of the existence of the Sodalitium but did not know the full extent of its operations or methods.

Because of the secrecy surrounding the Sodalitium, much remains unknown concerning its membership, aims, and methods. Great resentment was roused by its use of anonymous attacks on specific persons and by its common tactic of basing accusations on extracts from writings or talks, sometimes cited inaccurately or out of context to give them an unorthodox significance. Proponents of Catholic liberalism, social Catholicism, Christian democracy, and ecumenism were among those upon whom aspersions of heresy were cast. Accusations were disseminated through a European network of Catholic newspapers and periodicals to bring them to the attention of ecclesiastical authorities. Although these accusations did not always result in condemnations, they did envelop many distinguished scholars in an atmosphere of suspicion.

Among the objects of integralist attacks in France were Cardinal AMETTE of Paris; Archbishop MIGNOT, who had been deceived by LOISY; Bishop Chapon of Nice; Bishop Dadolle of Dijon; and Bishop du Vauroux of Agen. BAUDRILLART, GOYAU, De GRANDMAISON, LAGRANGE, and SERTILLANGES were among the most prominent scholars whose orthodoxy was attacked. Integralist pressures were believed responsible for the condemnation of Louis DUCHESNE's Histoire ancienne de l'Église (3 v. 1906–10), which was placed on the Index (Jan. 22, 1912) after the appearance of its Italian translation. The resignations of Ferdinand Prat in 1907 from an enlarged Pontifical Biblical Commission and of Pierre BATIFFOL in 1908 as rector of the Institut Catholique of Toulouse were credited also to integralist influences. The same forces assailed the Catholic leaders in social reform, Léon HARMEL and Albert de Mun, Semaines Sociales de France and similar associations, Catholic youth organizations, and the Jesuit periodicals Études and Action Populaire.

Outside of France, Cardinals Ferrari of Milan, MERCIER of Mechelin, PIFFL of Vienna, and Von Rossum of the Roman Curia were denounced, as were many bishops. The Dominicans of the University of Fribourg, Switzerland, and some Jesuits connected with the periodicals La Civiltà Cattolica and Stimmen aus Maria Laach (later Stimmen der Zeit) suffered bitter denunciations. In Germany much of the integralist animosity was aimed at the section of the CENTER PARTY that favored social reforms.

Reaction against Integralism. Protests against the integralists were made during Pius X's pontificate, notably by Cardinal Ferrari and Bishop Cazzani in Italy and by Stimmen aus Maria Laach and the Kölnische Volkszeitung in Germany. In 1914 De Grandmaison deplored in Études (138:5–25, 272–273, 494–497) the integralist custom of dismissing their critics as “enemies of God, hypocrites, and false brethren” and of attempting to discredit loyal Catholics by associating them with known Modernists. After Pius X's death, Mignot addressed to the papal secretary of state a memoir on the integralist campaign in which he warned against hidden powers that acted irresponsibly, clandestinely, calumniously, and without hierarchical supervision. Mignot deplored the resultant disaffection, discouragement, and even retirement from intellectual pursuits of Catholic scholars. Meanwhile Cardinal Merry del Val had caused Benigni's La Correspondance de Rome to be suppressed. Benedict XV's first encyclical, Ad beatissimi Apostolorum (Nov. 1, 1914), pleaded for an end to dissensions among Catholics. It declared that in matters that the Church left open to discussion, moderation should reign and not unbaised suspicions about the orthodoxy of opponents. The pope also pointed out that it was neither right nor fitting for Catholic writers to usurp the functions of the ecclesiastical magisterium. The pope further noted that the term “Catholic” does not require the qualification integral, but he did not mention the integralists specifically. The Sodalitium Pianum disbanded for a while after Pius X's death, but then it renewed its operations until in 1921 the Holy See suppressed it permanently.

Integralism was intellectually and tactically dangerous to the Church. It threatened to substitute routine for genuine tradition and to hamper the development of Catholic thought by refusing to disengage living traditions from attitudes or procedures dictated by the needs of the moment. With their connections in high ecclesiastical circles, the integralists attempted to safeguard Catholics by enclosing them in a ghetto inaccessible to the outside world, where a few would make all decisions and the mass of the faithful would do no more than comply with them.

Organized integralism disappeared, possibly not completely, with the dissolution of the Sodalitium, but the integralist mentality still exists.

Bibliography: N. FONTAINE, Saint-Siège: Action française et catholiques intégraux (Paris 1928). J. BRUGERETTE, Le Prêtre français et la société contemporaine, 3 v. (Paris 1933–38). E. SUHARD, Growth or Decline? The Church Today, tr. from Fr. by J. A. CORBETT (South Bend, Ind. 1948). A. DANSETTE, Religious History of Modern France, tr. J. DINGLE, 2 v. (New York 1961), v. 2. Y. M. J. CONGAR, Vraie et fausse réforme dans l'Église (Paris 1950). “Qu'est-ce que l'Intégrisme?,” La Vie intellectuelle et la revue des jeunes 24 (1952) 136–152. R. DULAC, “Éloge de l'Intégrisme,” Pensée catholique 21 (1952) 7–35; 23 (1954), for documents. R. BERTRAND-SERRET, “‘L'Intégrisme’ étudié dans un esprit non partisan,” ibid. 39 (1955) 22–49; 40 (1955) 51–92. L. DAVALLON, “‘La Sapinière’ ou brève histoire de l'organisation intégriste,” Chronique sociale de France 3 (May 1955) 241–261. P. BOULIN, La Critique du Libéralisme religieux, politique, social, 4 v. (Paris 1909–10), by a leading integralist. E. BARBIER, Histoire du catholicisme libéral et du catholicisme social en France, 5 v. (Bordeaux 1923), by a leading integralist. C. LEDRÉ, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947– ) 5:1822–34. O. B. ROEGELE, Staatslexikon, ed. Görres-Gesellschaft, 8 v. (6th, new and enl. ed. Freiburg 1957–63) 4:338–341. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) Tables générales 2294–2303. O. VON NELL-BREUNING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:717–718.

[G. J. O'BRIEN]

INTEGRITY, GIFT OF

Throughout its history the teaching Church has maintained that Adam and Eve were created not in a state of pure nature but rather were richly endowed with free gifts from God, among which was sanctifying GRACE. Possession of a nature fully in tune with the perfection of its grace could be had only were there to be granted an exemption from the inherent weaknesses of human nature. Such exemption was the “negative” side of a preternatural harmony between nature and supernature and has been called the gift of integrity.

Generally the gift of integrity is said to be immunity from CONCUPISCENCE, where concupiscence means an appetite for a sensible good contrary to the dictates of reason. This may cause confusion in the face of the modern understanding of concupiscence as the natural, indeliber-ate desire arising in the sense faculty when confronted with its object. Integrity simply is the subjection of body to soul and lower powers to reason.

Such a harmonious unity could not come from man's natural principles, for the objects of his powers being varied and disparate, it is natural that what is pleasing to one faculty may be opposed to the perfection of the whole man. Reason, having only political control over the sense appetite, would sometimes be uppermost; at other times the sense appetites would be. Hence, in the primeval state God bestowed a perfect order of subjection.

Not created in a state of pure nature, man was not endowed with just natural rectitude. He was predestined to a SUPERNATURAL end, a destiny attainable only by means of a gift utterly surpassing all exigencies and powers of nature (see DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL). This gift was sanctifying grace, and the common teaching of theologians, following St. Thomas Aquinas, is that Adam was created in sanctifying grace. Yet, if the body and the sensible nature were to be left in their own natural condition, they would (as seen previously) be a hindrance, in some sense, to the principal activity of the soul. Because of his composite nature, man could be gifted with another supernatural help, viz, the proper subjection of his powers one to the other.

Given to Adam as head of the human race, sanctifying grace, integrity, and the other gifts would have been the treasure of all men born of his seed. In committing ORIGINAL SIN, Adam lost grace and integrity both for himself and his posterity. In the present state, because of the redemptive sacrifice of the God-Man, Christ, man may again be granted sanctifying grace, but now only as a personal gift and without integrity. The latter will be perfectly restored only at the resurrection of the body although, as grace and the infused virtues grow during life, along with their corresponding natural virtues, the power of man's rectified will gains more and more control over the disordered powers, which gradually lose their harmful effects.

See Also: ELEVATION OF MAN; ORIGINAL JUSTICE; PRETERNATURAL; PURE NATURE, STATE OF.

Bibliography: A. THOUVENIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 7.2:1939–40, 2266. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 8.2:2027–28. J. B. METZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:718–720. H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 1:843–851. T. AQUINAS, Comp. theol. tr. C. VOLLERT (St. Louis 1947) 192, 195–196, 198–200, 226–227, 236, 239, 241; Summa theologiae 1a, 61, 94–95, 97, 100; 1a2ae, 17, 91, 81–82; 3a, 68–69. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Grace (St. Louis 1952) 20–33. J. TIXERONT, History of Dogmas, tr. from 5th Fr. ed. H. L. B. 3 v. (St. Louis 1910–16). W. A. VAN ROO, Grace and Original Justice according to St. Thomas (Analecta Gregoriana 75; Rome 1955) 7–89, 140–147, 202. P. DE LETTER, “If Adam Had Not Sinned,” Irish Theological Quarterly 28 (1961) 115–125; “The Reparation of Our Fallen Nature,” Thomist 23 (1960) 564–583. E. V. MCCLEAR, “The Fall of Man and Original Sin in the Theology of Gregory of Nyssa,” Theological Studies 9 (1948) 175–212. J. F. SWEENEY, “Recent Developments in Dogmatic Theology,” Theological Studies 17 (1956) 368–413. C. VOLLERT, “The Two Senses of Original Justice in Medieval Theology,” Theological Studies 5 (1944) 3–23.

[M. M. SCHANEN]

INTELLECT

The intellect is an immaterial or spiritual cognitive faculty. A faculty is that by means of which man performs mental or conscious operations, and a cognitive faculty is concerned with the mental operation of knowing (see FACULTIES OF THE SOUL). Immaterial or spiritual signifies something not intrinsically dependent on matter, not requiring matter as an auxiliary cause for its existence or for its operation. Vision requires material organs, the eyes, as an auxiliary cause; without them the soul cannot see. Thinking does not require a material cause, but is caused directly by the soul, through the intellect. And since thinking is an immaterial or spiritual operation, the faculty by means of which it occurs, the intellect, is itself immaterial. (See IMMATERIALITY.)

Intellect is sometimes considered to be synonymous with INTELLIGENCE. Yet it is better to distinguish between the two. The term “intelligence” is being used more and more to designate the mind of animals, in addition to that of man. Since the animal mind is a material power, intrinsically dependent on matter, it is essentially different from the human intellect.

Existence of the intellect. No one denies that man knows. But some philosophers—usually materialists, sensists, or positivists—deny that man possesses immaterial knowledge that is essentially different from SENSE KNOWLEDGE. Hence they deny also the existence of the intellect as defined above. Their principal argument invokes the fact that the human brain is required for thinking, since any serious impairment of man's brain makes thought impossible. This fact is undeniable and shows that the brain is somehow involved in thought. But Thomists maintain that the brain is a necessary CONDITION, not a cause, of thinking. A necessary condition is one that enables a cause to produce its effect, without actually contributing toward the production itself. A cause, on the other hand, contributes in a positive manner toward the production of the effect. For example, electricity is the cause of light in a bulb, while closure of the switch is a necessary condition (see CAUSALITY).

Brain and Immateriality. That the brain is not a cause of thinking can be explained through the principle: As a being acts, so it is (agere sequitur esse). The brain is a material substance, concrete, visible, tangible, singular, extended, existing in space and time, contingent, and not necessary; its effects must exhibit these characteristics also. And indeed, a brain tumor and a brain wave do. But man's intellectual operations show different characteristics. His ideas are universal, not limited to space and time, not extended, not concrete. Many of man's judgments are necessary, true at all times, in all places, in all circumstances; for example, whatever is, is; everything that comes to be has a cause; two plus two make four. Even ordinary judgments contain an element of necessity. Thus, if one says "It is raining," this proposition is not itself necessary; but, having affirmed that it is raining, he also has implicitly affirmed: "If it is raining, it cannot be not raining." The universality of man's ideas and the necessity (at least hypothetical) of his judgments cannot derive from a material organ such as the brain. They require a power that is, to some extent, beyond time and space, free from the contingency of matter. This immaterial, spiritual power is called the intellect.

Another proof for the immateriality of the intellect is derived from man's capability for REFLECTION. When man knows, he also knows that he knows. In his awareness of being aware, subject and object coincide. This cannot occur in a purely material being. The luminous self-presence of man's act of reflection is thus proof that he possesses an immaterial, spiritual power of thinking.

Image and Concept. A source of objection against this doctrine is the confusion that frequently arises between image and CONCEPT. This received classical expression from George BERKELEY: "Whether others have this wonderful faculty of abstracting their ideas, they best can tell; for myself, I find indeed I have a faculty of imagining, or representing to myself, the ideas of those particular things I have perceived . . . whatever hand or eye I imagine, it must have some particular shape and colour. Likewise, the idea of man that I frame to myself must be either of a white, or a black, or a tawny, a straight or a crooked, a tall or a low, or a middle-sized man" (Principles of Human Knowledge, Introd., § 10). Bishop Berkeley here confuses the image with the IDEA. It is true that every man one imagines must be a determinate individual, but it is not true that every man one thinks of must be such. This is apparent in the quotation itself, where mention is made of "whatever hand or eye." These words have meaning—some thought or concept corresponds to them in the objector's mind—yet they apply to all possible hands and eyes, each of which must indeed have "some particular shape and colour," without the intellect's making explicit reference to such shape and color.

Object of the intellect. To know a faculty well one must know its OBJECT, what it can know, and from what point of view it knows. This requires that the material and formal objects of the human intellect be ascertained. A further distinction has traditionally been made between its proper and adequate objects. The proper object of the intellect refers to the things it knows naturally and easily—the material objects in man's environment: other men, animals, plants, houses, and the like. Accordingly, the proper material object of man's intellect comprises all objects that can be perceived by the senses. The senses, however, perceive the color, sound, shape, distance, and the like, of these objects, while the intellect recognizes them for what they are. The eyes note the color of a dog and the ears hear its bark, but the intellect knows that this is a living being, an animal, a dog. This "whatness" or QUIDDITY of material objects is the proper formal object of the human intellect.

Being and Truth. Yet the scope of the human intellect extends beyond the realm of material objects. The fact that one speaks of material objects implies that he knows of other objects that are not material. What is required in any object, in order for it to be knowable by the human intellect, is that it be, or, at least, that it be able to be. Hence the total or adequate object of the intellect is BEING in all its extension, whether material or immaterial. Now the intellect knows such being from the viewpoint of its TRUTH or intelligibility. Accordingly, while the adequate material object of the intellect is being, its adequate formal object is truth or intelligibility.

Of every reality man knows he can affirm that it is. Yet, although being is its object, what his intellect continually meets is not being, but rather beings. In other words, in the repeated affirmation, "This is, that is," the predicate "is" happens always to be too wide for the subject to which it is applied. This explains why man continues to look for new things to know. No object of experience fills the full capacity of his intellect. Man is always in search of an object that will entirely exhaust his power of affirmation. He strives, albeit unconsciously, for the knowledge of a reality of which he can simply say: This is, without any restriction or limitation. In other words, his intellect strives toward knowledge of the unlimited being, of God.

Knowledge of God. Left to his own devices, however, man can reach only a deficient and imperfect knowledge of God. He knows Him, through analogy with creatures, as the all-perfect came that must possess eminently all perfections found in finite realities. This analogical, inadequate knowledge of God is the highest knowledge of Him that reason can offer to man.

Revelation, however, promises infinitely more—a knowledge of God as He is in Himself, in His inner essence, in the ineffable mystery of His triune inner life. Such knowledge is clearly beyond the powers, and even beyond the expectations, of the human intellect. It requires a transformation of that intellect, raising it above its natural state and supernaturalizing it. Sanctifying GRACE produces this transformation. It gives to the baptized person the supernatural gift of faith, which is the power of knowing, although darkly, God as He is in Himself. In the elect, during the next life, this gift of faith gives way to the BEATIFIC VISION; as St. THOMAS AQUINAS explains it, the human intellect sees the divine essence “through the divine essence itself; so that in this vision the divine essence is both that which is seen and that by means of which it is seen” (C. gent. 3.51).

Operation of the intellect. Since the intellect is an immaterial faculty, it cannot be influenced directly by material reality. The problem arises then as to how intellectual knowledge originates in man. One answer is that, as material objects affect the sense organs, so sense knowledge influences the intellect. But this answer implies that the intellect is a material power. The senses can be influenced by extramental reality because, like that reality, they are material. But how can the intellect, an immaterial power, be influenced by the senses and receive from them a material content?

The intellect, of course, may be influenced by immaterial causes. This is why some have held that its ideas come directly from God; such, with various modifications, was the teaching of PLATO, St. AUGUSTINE, DESCARTES, and MALEBRANCHE. But this theory contradicts human experience and leads to consequences that are unacceptable (see KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF).

If ideas cannot come from the senses and do not come directly from God, the intellect must receive them from itself. The intellect, therefore, acts upon itself and receives from itself. Thus we distinguish in it two faculties, an agent intellect and a passive or possible intellect. The agent intellect impresses ideas upon the possible intellect.

Agent intellect. Where does the agent intellect find these ideas? St. Thomas holds that it derives them from sense experience. The agent intellect actively abstracts the species from the PHANTASM and impresses it upon the possible intellect (see ABSTRACTION; SPECIES, INTENTIONAL). Phantasms are the highest products of the combined senses. In modern terminology they correspond to perceptions, or images; as material forms of knowledge, they represent single, concrete, material objects.

The passage from this concrete, singular phantasm to the abstract, universal concept is sometimes explained as follows: Viewing the phantasm of a particular tree, the intellect leaves aside all the individualizing, concrete features (e.g., the tree’s size and color) and considers only the general, universal features. But how can the agent intellect distinguish between general and individual features, keeping the former and dropping the latter, unless it knows all of them? This seems to suppose that the intellect directly knows the material phantasm, a position that Thomists generally deny. Again, how can a material phantasm affect an immaterial intellect? It is often maintained that the agent intellect, acting as the principal efficient cause, uses the phantasm as an instrumental cause to impress the abstracted universal idea upon the possible intellect (see INSTRUMENTAL CAUSALITY). But it would seem that a material tool can produce only material effects, even when used by an immaterial agent. How then can it affect an immaterial reality?

An alternative, and possibly more acceptable, explanation of ideogenesis focuses on Aquinas’s teaching that man never uses ideas without turning to the corresponding phantasm. Man knows ideas (or rather, what they represent) only in the phantasm. This seems to imply no actual extraction of the idea from the phantasm. Otherwise it would be difficult to see why, once man has separated the two, he cannot use the idea independently of the phantasm.

The substantial unity of man, in fact, implies not only the unity of body and soul but also that of sense and intellect (see SOUL-BODY RELATIONSHIP). As the soul is to the body, so the intellect is to the senses. The soul does not hover over the body, but rather is in the body. Likewise the intellect does not stand above the senses; it is in them. To speak of a “passage” from sense to intellectual knowledge is to fall into Cartesian DUALISM and admit that both the body and the soul have their own representations of the object. Actually there is only one knowing subject, composed of both body and soul. As the body never acts without being animated by the soul, so the senses never act without being animated by the intellect. This means that the intellect is already at work in the formation of the phantasm (see COGITATIVE POWER). It animates the formation of the phantasm, and this activity produces the universal idea. The impressed species of the intellect is this dynamic relationship between the intellect and the phantasm.

Expressed species. The agent intellect is like a powerful searchlight, of which St. Thomas says that it is always “in act.” By itself it does not give knowledge. As soon as sense knowledge crosses its beam, however, the corresponding idea is generated. In this sense the phantasm is truly an instrumental cause—it gives the light of the intellect something to illuminate.

When an object comes within reach of the agent intellect, that object is seen as something, a being, a reality.

The intellect then consciously expresses the relation it has attained unconsciously in the impressed species. This is the expressed species, the WORD, the verbum. In such an expressed species the object is grasped intellectually. Most Thomists hold that this expressed species is the CONCEPT, attained by simple APPREHENSION. Others maintain that it is an "affirmed concept," a concept embedded in a JUDGMENT, although often only an elementary judgment. According to this view, being is given in judgments, possibles in concepts. Hence the expressed species of the intellect, through which man gets his first intellectual contact with reality, is the elementary judgment that the intellect utters to itself (thus, the word) whenever it knows reality.

Acts of the Intellect. The first two acts of the intellect have already been mentioned, that is, simple apprehension and judgment. Once man possesses a certain number of concepts and judgments, he can then explicitly compare them, discover their relationships, derive one from the other, associate them with each other, and the like. This work constitutes the third act of the intellect, known as REASONING.

In explaining how knowledge perfects the knower, St. Thomas notes: ". . . knowing beings are distinguished from non-knowing beings in that the latter possess only their own form; whereas the knowing being is naturally adapted to have also the form of some other thing, for the species of the thing known is in the knower" (Summa theologiae 1a, 14.1). As explained above, this does not mean that the species is a self-sufficient picture of the object, for St. Thomas also teaches that man cannot know the object without reverting to the phantasm (Summa theologiae 1a, 84.7). Yet knowing things means to some extent becoming these things, since man has in him, for every object he knows, a phantasm and a species, the latter being understood as a dynamic relation of the intellect to the former. By animating the phantasm of the object, the intellect intentionally becomes that object. In this sense, the acts of conceiving and of judging perfect the human intellect.

In addition, reasoning perfects the intellect in other ways. First, by discovering connections between realities, it makes man aware of the structure, the order, and the harmony of the universe. This allows him also to direct his activities in the right way, according to the order of importance of goals and purposes. Again, having detected an underlying order and hierarchy in the universe, he discovers also its basic orientation and finality, and thus is led to acknowledge its Designer and Creator.

Differences in intellectual ability. The nature and operation of the human intellect has been the main concern here. Above the human intellect there are, however, higher and more perfect intellects. From revelation one knows of the existence of angels (see ANGELS, 2. THEOLOGY OF). Philosophically these are conceived to be pure forms, in no way dependent on matter (although they do have some relationship to the material universe). They are, therefore, basically intellects and wills. Whatever they know has been communicated to them at their creation. Angels know through infused species, which, coming directly from the Maker of all, give them certain and clear knowledge of reality. Thus their knowledge is more perfect than man's. Since angels differ from each other in ontological PERFECTION, each constituting an original, unique grade of being, their intellects too differ in acuity, penetration, and extension of knowledge.

Above all created intellects stands the Uncreated Intellect, God. God does not "have" an intellect. He "is" Intellect, as He is every other pure perfection substantially. As the Self-Subsistent Intellect, God knows Himself perfectly and comprehensively. He also knows in Himself, as they are in themselves, all existing and possible creatures.

Differences in intellectual abilities among men seem to be due not to the spiritual intellect itself, but to its relation to the body. Hence they are differences of intelligence, more than of intellect.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF; UNDERSTANDING (INTELLECTUS); INTUITION.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 1a, 14, 79, 84–87. J. F. DONCEEL, Philosophical Psychology (2d ed., rev. and enl. New York 1961). R. E. BRENNAN, Thomistic Psychology (New York 1952). B. LONERGAN, Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (New York 1957). J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite, or the Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN from 4th French ed. (New York 1959). A. MARC, Psychologie réflexive (Brussels 1948). J. MARÉCHAL, Le Point de départ de la métaphysique, 5 v. (2d ed. Paris 1949). K. RAHNER, Geist in Welt (2d ed. Munich 1957).

[J. F. DONCEEL]

INTELLECT, UNITY OF

Is there one intellect for all men, or does each man have his own intellect? This problem involves two questions often discussed by Christians of the Middle Ages: (1) Is the agent intellect one for all men? (2) Is the possible intellect, as well as the agent intellect, one for all men? (See INTELLECT.) Of the two questions, the second presented the more serious difficulty and was the subject of a vigorous polemic in the 13th century. The meaning and implications of both questions can best be understood in the light of their historical background.

History of the problem. The story begins with Aristotle's De anima. Noting that in nature as a whole we find two factors, a potential factor and an active one, ARISTOTLE says that “these distinct elements must likewise be found within the soul” (430a, 13). He then continues:

"Triumph of St Thomas Aquinas over Averroes," fresco by Francesco Traini in the Church of Santa Caterina, Pisa, Italy.

And in fact mind as we have described it is what it is by virtue of becoming all things, while there is another which is what it is by virtue of making all things. . . . Mind in this sense is separable, impassible, unmixed, since it is in its essential nature activity. . . . When mind is set free from its present conditions it appears as just what it is and nothing more; this alone, is immortal and eternal. . . . While mind in this sense is impassible, mind as passive is destructible, and without it nothing thinks. [430a, 14–25.]

The fact that Aristotle distinguished an active intellect that makes things actually intelligible from a passive intellect that receives these intelligibles was clear, but precisely what he held about the natures of these intellects and their relationship to man was not. Although these words were to be examined and reexamined and compared with other of his statements, commentators could not agree on what he really meant. The reference to active mind as separable, impassible, unmixed, immortal and eternal, for example, gave rise to the question: Is active mind a power of the human soul or a substance separate and distinct from man?

Among the Greek commentators, Theophrastus (c. 370–285 B.C.) and Themistius (c. A.D. 387) interpreted Aristotle as holding that both active and passive intellects were parts or powers of each human soul. But Alexander of Aphrodisias (c. A.D. 200), though placing the passive or material intellect within the individual soul, which was for him perishable, taught that the active intellect is a separately existing divine intelligence.

Among Arabian thinkers, too, the active or agent intellect was held to be a separated substance and one for all men. For AVICENNA (980–1037), the last of the separate spiritual intelligences emanating from the one necessary Being was the agent intellect or Intelligence (Meta. 9.4). From this intellect, intelligible forms or species were infused into possible intellects belonging to individual human souls. Each human soul had to consider and compare the images coming to it from the senses. These movements prepared it to receive from the separated agent intellect an “abstraction,” which in this context meant an emanation of intelligible forms. But the intelligibles so received were not retained. Each time a man wished to have intellectual knowledge, his soul again had to be united with the separate agent intellect (De anima 5.5–6).

For Avicenna, although there was one agent intellect for all men, each man had his own possible intellect. But for AVERROËS (1126–98), the individual man had neither; the possible as well as the agent intellect was a separated substance and one for all men. Reacting against the materialism of Alexander of Aphrodisias, Averroës held that the possible or “material” intellect must be a simple, impassible, separated substance dwelling wholly apart from matter. This was necessary to insure its power of knowing universals (In 3 anim. comm. 4,5,19,32). But since this view left the individual without a spiritual intellect, Averroës still had to explain how man can have intellectual knowledge. Therefore man’s highest powers, the cogitative power, imagination, and memory, were given the task of preparing sensory data for the separated intellects to utilize (ibid., comm. 6,20,33). The separated agent intellect then makes actually intelligible the intelligible species potentially present within the phantasms provided by these powers. The separated possible intellect can thereupon be actuated and become the subject in which knowledge exists (ibid., comm. 4,5,18). Unless such data were provided by man, the separated possible intellect would know nothing (ibid., comm. 33). Because of man’s indispensable role in this process, he himself somehow shares in intellectual knowledge.

This may not completely explain how the individual man knows. But Averroës could not concede that the intellect was “numbered to the number of individuals,” and still have that intellect sufficiently free of matter to preserve its power of knowing. He had no awareness of a spiritual intellectual soul that could be the form of a body without being itself immersed in matter (see SOUL, HUMAN).

Christian thought. These views that gradually became known to the Christians of western Europe as the works of Aristotle, accompanied by commentaries of Arabian thinkers, became available in Latin translation during the 12th and 13th centuries. While Aristotle’s logical works had previously been known and admired, Christians now had access to his other treatises, including that on the soul. Avicenna’s De anima and Averroës’ Commentary were also available as aids in understanding his complex thought.

This new literature was viewed by some authorities as a possible source of error. In 1210 the provincial council of Paris prohibited the teaching of Aristotle’s works on natural philosophy or their commentaries. In 1215 the statutes of the University of Paris promulgated by ROBERT OF COURÇON, the papal legate, forbade the reading of the physical and metaphysical treatises of Aristotle and expositions based on them (Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, 1:70, 78–79). But the prohibitions were not effective.

Avicenna’s doctrine of a separated agent intellect had already been accepted, in a modified form, by a 12th century Christian, DOMINIC GUNDISALVI. He, ROGER BACON (b. c. 1214) and JOHN PECKHAM (d. 1292) all identified this agent intelligence with the Christian God. Étienne Gilson has seen in the work of these and others a fusion of the Avicennian doctrine on the agent intellect with an Augustinian doctrine of ILLUMINATION (Gilson, "Pourquoi saint Thomas a critiqué saint Augustin," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge, 1:5–127).

The unity of the agent intellect in the human species met further opposition in the 13th century. Along with the unity of the possible intellect, it was included in the condemnation of 1270 whereby Étienne TEMPIER, Bishop of Paris, anathematized 13 propositions bearing the stamp of Arabian authorship, and again in the list of 219 propositions condemned in 1277 (Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, 1:486–487, 543–548).

It was also opposed in the writings of St. THOMAS AQUINAS (1225–74). According to St. Thomas, Aristotle taught that the agent intellect was not a separate substance but a power of the human soul with the function of making the potentially intelligible natures of sensible things actually intelligible, by abstracting them from individual matter (C. gent. 2.78). This view is confirmed, for St. Thomas, by man's experience in abstracting universal forms from their particular conditions. If the power that is the principle of this action were not something within man's soul, human nature would be a deficient nature, lacking the principle of an activity proper to it (C. gent. 2.76; ST 1a, 79.4; In 2 sent. 17.2.1; De anim. 5; In 3 de anim. 10.734). Wishing to save the efficacy of secondary causes, St. Thomas held that a being cannot be incapable of accomplishing an operation proper to its nature. Yet this need not rule out the dependence of man's intellectual soul upon a higher cause. "The separate intellect, according to the teaching of our faith, is God Himself. . . . Therefore the human soul derives its intellectual light from Him," St. Thomas said. He went on: "That true light illumines as a universal cause, from which the human soul derives a particular power" (ST 1a, 79.4 and ad 1). There may then be some reason for holding that there is one agent intellect for all men, when this is understood not as a denial but as an explanation of the personal agent intellect that each man possesses. But, in St. Thomas's view, to say that the possible intellect is one for all men is wholly inadmissible (De anim. 5; De unit. intell. 4).

Before the emergence of a definite Averroistic school, St. ALBERT THE GREAT (c. 1200–80) had already dealt with this doctrine at the request of Pope Alexander IV. In 1256, in his De unitate intellectus contra Averroem, he presented 30 arguments for the unity of the human intellect and 36 arguments against it.

But the Averroist movement grew in strength (see AVERROISM, LATIN). As more Christian thinkers read Aristotle and Averroës in Latin translation, the Philosopher and philosophy were seen through the works of the Commentator. These Latin Averroists regarded the doctrine of one possible intellect for all men as a necessary conclusion of human reason, although as Christians they refrained from saying that this doctrine was true. Without explicitly teaching a theory of double truth, such a leading Averroist as SIGER OF BRABANT (fl. 1277) nevertheless conveyed the impression of a conflict between faith and reason. For those concerned with the unity of Christian wisdom, this challenge could not be ignored (see DOUBLE TRUTH, THEORY OF).

St. BONAVENTURE (1221–74) referred to the doctrine of one possible intellect for the whole human race as being against the Christian religion, against right reason and against sensible experience (In 2 sent. 18.2.1). The same doctrine was censured in the condemnations of 1270 and 1277. It was listed as an error by GILES OF ROME (c. 1247–1316, Errores philosophorum, c.4) and opposed in a treatise he wrote on the problem (De plurificatione intellectus possibilis).

Thomistic doctrine. The most thorough philosophical examination and refutation of the Averroist doctrine of the possible intellect was made by St. Thomas Aquinas. He discussed it in many places and composed the polemical treatise, De unitate intellectus contra Averroistas, specifically to deal with this problem. Written in 1270 against the Paris Averroists and especially against Siger of Brabant, it may have been an answer to a work of Siger's that is no longer extant but is known to us through the Quodlibeta of JOHN BACONTHORP, a 14th century Carmelite.

St. Thomas regards it as evident that Averroës' view of one possible and one agent intellect for all men is contrary to the truth of Christian faith. Since this would leave man without any incorruptible part of the soul, there could be no personal immortality and thus no reward and punishment in the afterlife. He concentrates on showing that the position of the Averroists is against both Aristotle and sound philosophy. On neither ground can they maintain that the possible intellect is (1) a substance separate in its being from man, or (2) one for all men (De unit. intell. proem.).

St. Thomas analyzes the relevant and often ambiguous texts of Aristotle and also cites the Greek and Arabian peripatetics, to show that all support the view that each man has his own possible intellect. His arguments include stress on the fact that "this individual man knows" and that Averroës' doctrine, which treats man as an object of knowledge for the separated possible intellect, fails to explain this. Man's proper operation as man is to understand. Therefore the principle that gives him his specific nature, the principle by which he understands, must be his own and not a separated substance (ibid. 3).

St. Thomas also deals with the chief difficulty of the Averroists. They thought that if the intellect is a power of a soul that is itself the substantial form of a body, then it would become immersed in matter and so be incapable of intellectual knowledge. St. Thomas answered that a proper understanding of the relation of the human soul to the matter it informs removes this difficulty. The human soul is not a material form existing with only the being of the composite; rather, it exists with its own being, and through that being the composite exists. Since this form is a substance communicating its being to matter, nothing prevents it from having an immaterial operation or power (ibid. 1.3).

For St. Thomas this error on the intellect pointed to an even greater error on the relation of faith and reason (see FAITH AND REASON). He was deeply disturbed that anyone could say: "By reason I necessarily conclude that the intellect is one in number, but I firmly hold the opposite by faith." Such a person, Siger for example, seemed to imply that faith is concerned with what is false and impossible (ibid. 5). Departing from his usual dispassionate style, St. Thomas concludes his treatise with a challenge to his adversary: "Let him not speak in corners nor before boys who do not know how to judge of such difficult matters, but let him write an answer to this if he dares. He will find not only me, least of all, but many others who are zealous for truth, through whom his error may be resisted or his ignorance remedied" (ibid. 5).

Because of the difficulty of establishing the authenticity and chronology of writings attributed to Siger of Brabant, it cannot be said for certain that this challenge was accepted by Siger. He may have replied in De intellectu, a treatise mentioned by JOHN OF JANDUN (d. 1328) and Agostino NIFO (1473–c. 1538). His De anima intellectiva seems to reflect a knowledge of some of St. Thomas's comments, and its doctrine of the intellective soul as united to the body "intrinsically" for its operation may represent a change or clarification of an earlier position (De anim. intell. 3). But unless the authenticity of such a work as the Quaestiones in libros Aristotelis de anima can be established, it cannot be said that Siger was converted to a Thomistic position.

The controversy over the intellect was to continue into the 16th century. Pietro POMPONAZZI (d. 1525), like John of Jandun before him, did not doubt that St. Thomas's conclusions were in agreement with faith, but could not see them as philosophical conclusions in accord with Aristotle's position. Those who identified philosophy with the historical Aristotle were thus reluctant to accept an Aristotle transformed by the creative insight of St. Thomas. Yet, regardless of such interpretations, there is no dearth of philosophical argument in support of the conclusion that each man has his own possible, as well as his own agent, intellect.

See Also: ARISTOTELIANISM; SCHOLASTICISM; THOMISM; ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY; ABSTRACTION; ILLUMINATION; NEOPLATONISM.

Bibliography: E. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy, 181–225, 387–410. F. VAN STEENBERGHEN, Aristotle in the West, tr., L. JOHNSTON (Louvain 1955). P. F. MANDONNET, Siger de Brabant et L'averroïsme latin au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle, 2 v. (2d ed. Louvain 1908–11). É. H. GILSON, "Les Sources gréco-arabes de l'Augustinisme avicennisant," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge, 4 (1929–30) 5–149. Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, ed., D. DENIFLE and E. CHATELAIN, 4 v. (Paris 1889–97).

[B. H. ZEDLER]

INTELLECTUAL LIFE

The intellectual life of man may be considered from the point of view of revelation or of reason. The first way is proper to THEOLOGY and the second to PHILOSOPHY. In the theological approach there are some practical applications that are not found in the merely speculative approach of philosophy. Though the two approaches are formally distinct, it is impossible to grasp satisfactorily the significance of the intellectual life without both the planes on which man lives, the SUPERNATURAL as well as the natural, being considered. Thus it is impossible to separate in fact a theological from a philosophical study of the intellectual life.

Early Greek Views on the Intellectual Life. Contrary to a view that is often held, the early Greeks were not merely investigators of nature but were also theologians. In their philosophizing about nature the most important consideration for them was the attainment of WISDOM. By attaining wisdom man was thought to participate in the divine life. The search for wisdom, therefore, was more than an investigation of nature—it was a way of life. It was the only way of life according to which man could be defined properly, since the goal or perfection of human existence consisted in the possession of wisdom.

Most of the pre-Socratic philosophers, even those thought to be materialists, made a sharp distinction between the kind of knowledge most easily reached by man, namely, that of sense experience, and the kind of knowledge esteemed by them as a participation in divine wisdom. Contrary to the view of F. Engels in his reference to the pre-Socratics as forerunners of dialectical materialism (Herr Eugen Dühring's Revolution in Science, tr. E. Burns [New York 1939] 26–27), these philosophers were deeply concerned with theological as well as philosophical questions. For example, there are in Heraclitus, whose philosophy Engels regarded as the most perfect primitive expression of the dialectics of nature, various phraseologies, admittedly metaphorical, that are consistent with the Christian notion of the LOGOS. Against the teaching of Xenophanes and Pythagoras, who had separated God from the universe of men, animals, plants, and inanimate things, Heraclitus affirmed the identity of the divinity with all that is. Though his thought appears pantheistic because of the kinds of metaphor he employs, he differentiated divinity (the pure form of Fire) from all those things that originated in divinity, which constitute the world of phenomena. He taught that the Logos (Mind) is prior to the downward movement of Fire. The Logos is present in all things, but most of all in man. Man should transcend the phenomena in order to seek wisdom (ἐπιστήμη), which is the knowledge of the eternal Logos. Logos is the purpose that steers all things. It is the Law (νόμος) with which man must agree. A person who wishes to speak with intelligence must base his knowledge on the eternal law that is common to all (K. Freeman, Ancilla to the Pre-Socratic Philosophers [Oxford 1948] 24).

In Parmenides is found the same teaching, with even greater stress on the priority of wisdom over sensory experience. Anaxagoras was, according to Aristotle, one of the greatest of philosophers because he pointed out the role that the divine Mind (νοῦς) played in the formation of the variety of things found in nature. Mind is infinite and self-ruling and mixed with no other thing; it is alone by itself. It has complete understanding of everything. All things are ruled by Mind, for it was Mind that took command of the universal revolution by which all things were, are now, and will come into existence (Freeman, 84–85).

The primacy of the intellectual life emerges most clearly in the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle. Their notions of the intellectual life are far more advanced than those of the pre-Socratics. The whole thrust of Aristotle's Metaphysics and of his Politics, etc., was toward the best life, the contemplative life; see, for instance, Eth. Nic. 1141a 20 and Meta. 1072b 14. In Plato and Aristotle the metaphysics of knowledge has been freed from the limitations of language of the earlier philosophers. According to Plato and Aristotle, the greatest perfection that man can reach on Earth is the possession of TRUTH, for in this he is assimilated to divinity (see C. N. R. McCoy, "The Political Life and the Contemplative Life," The Structure of Political Thought [New York 1963] 46–51).

Revelation and the Logos. However remarkable were the insights of the early Greeks into the nature of God and however great their esteem for the intellectual life, it was only a dim vision of the intellectual life of God. Through revelation man was permitted to peer into the transcendent intellectual life of the Triune God. As St. Thomas Aquinas pointed out in the beginning of his Summa theologiae, it was necessary that there be in addition to the light of human reason a special light of revelation about the existence and nature of God. The most intelligent men could achieve only the faintest knowledge of God through the use of reason, and even that struggle was marred by a great number of errors and carried through by very few men. The natural knowledge about God gained through speculation on natural causes is always cast in a negative mode, since the infinite perfection of God is the obverse of the limited perfections found in natural things. Without obtaining a direct knowledge of God, it was possible for man to rise to an essentially higher level of knowledge through revelation. The essence of knowledge through divine revelation is FAITH, the culmination of which for those who are both believers and doers of the word is the BEATIFIC VISION of God. This will be the absolute goal of man's intellectual life.

The doctrine of the Logos is found in the very earliest of Christian writings and is continued throughout the writings of the Fathers and Doctors of the Church. The Logos is the Second Person of the Holy Trinity. He is generated eternally in the understanding of the Father. The Logos is in turn, according to the prologue of St. John's Gospel, the intellectual life Who enlightens every man who comes into the world. All of creation is through the Logos, but in particular the creation of man, who is made to the image of the Trinity (see IMAGE OF GOD). Man alone, among visible creatures, has an intellect by which he can be identified in thought and be united in love with God (see MAN, 2, 3).

Considered in its totality, revelation through the Logos consists not only in the direct words that were spoken by Christ, the Word incarnate, during His lifetime on Earth, but also in the revelation made to man before the Incarnation and in the continuing unfolding of the meaning of the revealed truth through the magisterium of the Church.

The truth conferred through revelation was meant to be more than a mere speculative understanding of the nature of God—it was to be the practical basis for worship. In both the Old and New Testaments the notion of wisdom meant more than what is considered liberal or speculative knowledge, for as St. Paul told the early Christians, faith without charity and good works is useless. (See WISDOM [IN THE BIBLE].)

Anti-Intellectual Tendencies in the Church. Unfortunately, it has been greatly due to an exaggerated stress on the salvific aspect of revealed truth that from time to time in the history of the Church there have been anti-intellectual movements. The pragmatic view of revealed knowledge led to a disdain for all knowledge of the natural order that did not bear immediately on salvation. Frequently natural knowledge was held to be not only useless but in opposition to the pure teachings of Christ. The basis of this error was a failure to see the unity of all truth in the Logos. Taken out of context, the words of St. Paul might give credence to this view: "For it is written, 'I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and the prudence of the prudent I will reject'" (1 Cor 1.19). Particularly in the 17th and 18th centuries, certain writers of ascetical works, who had fallen under the influence of Jansenism, were very influential in the formation of an anti-intellectual movement in the Church; this anti-intellectualism, in one form or another, lasted until the mid-20th century.

Renewal of a Christian Intellectualism. Beginning in the late 19th century and growing rapidly in the 20th century was a countermovement in the Church toward the notion of an integral Christian intellectual life. Catholic scholars began to be accepted as peers in the centers of learning. Such men as Pope Leo XIII, Cardinal J. H. Newman, and Cardinal D. Mercier in the 19th century preceded the numerous Catholic intellectuals in the 20th century. Among them, to name some, were A. G. Sertillanges, P. Rousselot, G. K. Chesterton, and H. Belloc; and more recently, Pius XI, Pius XII, É. H. Gilson, J. Maritain, Cardinal E. Suhard, and P. Teilhard de Chardin.

Through the prodding of these men and others like them a new interest in the intellectual life was aroused among Catholics. The relationship of nature and grace came into better perspective (see GRACE AND NATURE). The obligation of all Christians to participate in and to contribute to the common fund of human knowledge was more widely acknowledged. As Cardinal Newman had said earlier in his University Sermons, the time had come to see that the pursuit of intellectual excellence is not the undoing of man's nature but the natural preparation for a higher life of grace.

See Also: FAITH AND REASON.

Bibliography: P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, The Divine Milieu, tr. B. WALL et al. (New York 1960). É. H. GILSON, Christianity and Philosophy, tr. R. MACDONALD (New York 1939). J. H. NEWMAN, The Scope and Nature of University Education (pa. New York 1958). P. ROUSSELOT, The Intellectualism of Saint Thomas, tr. J. E. O'MAHONY (New York 1935). A. G. SERTILLANGES, The Intellectual Life, tr. M. RYAN (Westminster, Md. 1956).

[H. R. REITH]

INTELLECTUALISM

The term intellectualism generally designates a philosophical or theological system in which INTELLECT or conceptualization is accorded primacy, as opposed to will or affectivity. It is sometimes used in a context of SCHOLASTICISM to characterize the Thomistic synthesis as differing from that of the Franciscan and Augustinian schools. It is also applied in a pejorative sense, mainly by modern thinkers, to those philosophies that stress abstract generalization and rationalism to the exclusion of subjective and existential concerns. The following is a brief historical survey of various nuances in this usage.

GREEK PHILOSOPHY is intellectualist in the sense that it teaches that the idea specifies and determines action. SOCRATES and PLATO seem not to have believed in freedom, inasmuch as some of their followers taught that, since every moral fault results from an error, no one does evil voluntarily. Such intellectualism similarly inspires the philosophy of ARISTOTLE. All reality is intelligible, and this tenet refers to the phenomena of nature as well as to ideas in the mind. Science is placed well above the useful because it has value in and of itself. Understanding is so sovereign that one cannot possibly remove oneself from its jurisdiction. Even a universal doubt implies certitude; every denial implies an affirmation. One can criticize reason only by reason. Even the person who pretends to do without it has recourse to it; even one who scorns it gives it homage. The most important thing, then, is to think and to think well.

Somewhat the same, intellectualism is characteristic of St. THOMAS AQUINAS. Faithful to Aristotle's tradition, he improves it by indicating that God is not only necessity, but also freedom; not only thought, but also love. This is one of the ways whereby he avoids rationalism and, while stressing the primary of the intellect, also teaches the ontological importance of the will, freedom, and mysticism.

Traces of this intellectualism are encountered also in the modern era. In the 17th century, philosophers are concerned especially about the truth and the means of attaining it. Some have recourse to a method of observation, others to a metaphysical method. As usually employed, however, both of these methods are ultimately reducible to the mathematical method, which, used in the context of physics, can possibly claim a necessity that, in fact, nature does not have. From this there arises a twofold intellectualistic current: that of EMPIRICISM, which becomes POSITIVISM in the 19th century—it is represented by F. BACON, J. LOCKE, D. HUME, A. COMTE, and H. SPENCER. The second is that of the IDEALISM—of R. DESCARTES, N. MALEBRANCHE, B. SPINOZA, G. W. LEIBNIZ, J. G. FICHTE, F. SCHELLING, and G. W. F. HEGEL. For both groups, man's value and power are specified by his non-subjective or objective knowledge, a necessitating knowledge that, by reason of inflexibility in method, suppresses freedom in almost every case.

What should one say in criticism of intellectualism? It is difficult not to recognize its importance and value. Blind action is impotent; a life whose meaning is not perceived becomes evil. The sage who discovers the laws of nature is a great benefactor, and He who reveals God to us is the Savior. But intellectualism exposes one to the danger of RATIONALISM and determinism; being is not only necessary and intelligible, but also dynamic. If thought is sovereign because it is immanent and can think itself, the will, too, can will itself and is, thereby, autonomous and free. One is first in the order of truth, the other in the order of the good; their correlation produces their mutual value.

See Also: EXISTENTIALISM; IRRATIONALISM; VOLUNTARISM.

Bibliography: J. W. MILLER, The Structure of Aristotelian Logic (London 1938). P. ROUSSELOT, The Intellectualism of Saint Thomas, tr. J. E. O'MAHONY (New York 1935). A. G. SERTILLANGES, St. Thomas Aquinas and His Work, tr. G. ANSTRUTHER (London 1933; repr. 1957). J. LAPORTE, Le Rationalisme de Descartes (Paris 1945). V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:1457-60 (Venice-Rome 1957). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 1:759 (4th ed. Berlin 1927-30).

[P. ORTEGAT]

INTELLIGIBILITY, PRINCIPLE OF

An immediate and necessary judgment or law, commonly enumerated among the FIRST PRINCIPLES, asserting that everything that is, in so far as it is, is intelligible; or that every being is capable of justifying itself, of explaining itself to the INTELLECT, of answering the question "Why?" The conviction that there is an answer to be known inspires the attempt to know. When, for example, one asks why stones sink while logs float, the asking implies that reality provides a knowable answer, even though this is not yet known. Such a conviction is an implicit acknowledgment of the principle of intelligibility.

Justification. Since the principle of intelligibility is a first principle, and hence cannot be deduced, it follows that it cannot be directly proved. Therefore the only justification this principle admits of is indirect, that is, by showing that the principle cannot be denied without contradiction.

If one could deny that being is intelligible, this negation would be a judgment, which one would intend to elicit as true. However, intending to elicit a judgment as true, one intends to exclude unconditionally its contradictory assertion. Hence one can intend to elicit a judgment as true only insofar as the act of judging affirms an objective norm, the norm of being, as justifying the unconditional exclusion of the contradictory judgment, that is, insofar as one affirms being itself as justifying the judgment one elicits.

One could, therefore, deny that being is intelligible only dependently on affirming being itself as justifying this judgment of the intellect. However, being as justifying the judgment is being as intelligible, since it is being as that to which the intellect is conformed. Hence one could deny that being is intelligible only dependently on affirming that being is intelligible. This means that the negation of the intelligibility of being contradicts and eliminates itself; or that the denial of the principle of intelligibility is impossible.

It is to be noted, however, that the contradiction does not appear by an inspection or analysis of the terms of the negation, as it does, for example, in the negation that a circle is round. Rather the contradiction is between the act itself of denying and the content denied. Hence, the necessity of the principle of intelligibility is not merely a necessity of idea, but is one of act, of being: the necessity is not merely logical, but it is primarily ontological.

Application. The principle of intelligibility implicitly affirms that every being, even before it is known, conforms to the exigencies or laws of the intellect. This principle, then, affirming that being is necessarily intelligible and cannot be absurd, affirms that the act of being is intelligibility, or affirmability, outside of which there is no intelligibility. Hence the act of being is the fullness of intelligibility (see BEING; EXISTENCE). Everything, therefore, is intelligible insofar as it is or verifies the act of being (St. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a, 16.3). Its act of being is its own light (In lib. de caus. 6), and by its act of being, it is synthesized with the totality of intelligibility. Hence, everything that is must be fully intelligible by reason of the act of being. It follows, therefore, that only that being that is fully identified with the act of being and hence is unlimited act of being, namely, GOD, is of Himself fully intelligible or is pure affirmability.

Every other being is of itself intelligible only in the measure in which it has the act of being, in the measure of its inadequate identity with the act of being. The measure in which it has the act of being is its ESSENCE. The properties of that being are intelligible by its essence. However, its essence itself is not intelligible by itself, but by the act of being. Since it is inadequately identified with the act of being, it has the act of being limitedly. The mind is therefore referred beyond this being itself for the complement of its intelligibility. Of itself alone such a being is not fully intelligible or affirmable, yet the conditions of full intelligibility by which it is affirmable must be given in being. This is to say that its intelligibility is completed by its relation to the cause of its being, God. It is not fully intelligible by the act of being precisely as found in this being, but rather as dependent upon the subsisting act of being. In this way the principle of intelligibility, when applied to finite being, evolves into another principle, namely, the principle of CAUSALITY.

Although God, the finally implied justification of the principle of intelligibility, is of Himself the most intelligible, He is not so for man, who first finds intelligibility in material reality. Hence the fullness of intelligibility affirmed in the principle of intelligibility remains beyond the grasp of the human intellect. However, the principle of intelligibility affirms a coherent totality of intelligibility, and urges man on in his quest for an ordered, unified explanation of the endless multiplicity and facets of the universe. It guides and governs his search for TRUTH and his rejection of ERROR, since it enables him to know that whatever is opposed to the intelligible is impossible and absurd.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE; FALSITY; ABSURDITY

Bibliography: R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, God: His Existence and His Nature, tr. B. ROSE, 2 v. (5th ed. St. Louis 1934–36) 1:15–25. J. MARITAIN, A Preface to Metaphysics: Seven Lectures on Being (New York 1939). J. OWENS, “The Intelligibility of Being,” Gregorianum 36 (1955) 169–193.

[F. P. O’FARRELL]

INTENTION, PURITY OF

Freedom from the mixture of less worthy with good intention in the performance of a good act. Such a mixture of motivation occurs when a man performs an act that is good, and his predominant reason for doing it is good and has of itself force enough to account for his acting, if he is influenced in the same act by a secondary motive or motives of a venially sinful kind. In any other case—if the act is evil in itself, or if the discreditable motive is predominant, or if it is gravely sinful—one would not speak of a mixture of good and bad motives, for the total motivation of the act would be substantially corrupt. The existence of a secondary and accessory motive of a venially sinful kind detracts from the excellence of what one does and makes the act partially evil; this becomes, in effect, a virtually multiple act: a good act insofar as it is directed to a good end; an evil act insofar as its motive is unworthy.

This kind of mixture of motivation is not uncommon in human life, and a person seriously intent upon growing in holiness will be concerned to free himself from the influence of less worthy motives. This is applicable not merely to a spiritual elite but to all Christians, for no one should set limits beyond which his charity should not aspire. Thus it seems objectionable to distinguish, as did Henry of Herp, between a right intention, which is appropriate to ordinary Christians, who in the substance of their actions and the general purposes of their hearts desire and seek God’s glory yet mix in less worthy designs that debase the spiritual value of what they do, and a pure intention, which is without such mixture of motive. A person with a right intention as described by Herp compromises in his heart between the love of God and one kind or another of self-love, and it seems a misuse of language to call such an intention right.

Purity of intention is sometimes identified with charity; it is active and fervent charity directing all that one does and suffers to the love and glory of God (D. A. Baker, Holy Wisdom 2.2.4). It is a proximate disposition to interior prayer, for it signifies an indivision and cleanness of heart—the clean heart being the undivided heart, as St. Augustine observed in commenting on the beatitudes—and it is the clean of heart who see God (Mt 5.8).

The want of purity of intention is sometimes hidden by self-deception, as when one averts his attention from the self-love that he permits to move him. Purity of intention, however, is not rendered impossible by urges or impulses rooted in the unconscious, for these are not motives in the sense understood in moral and ascetical theology (see MOTIVE, UNCONSCIOUS).

See Also: SIMPLICITY, VIRTUE OF; PERFECTION, SPIRITUAL; CHARITY.

Bibliography: See ch. 6 in Matthew. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis (Paris 1949) 1:148–151. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology (New York 1958) 1:57–60. A. THOUVENIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 7:2267–80. R. BARON, Catholicisme 5:1863–65.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

INTENTIONALITY

A term, modern in coinage but medieval in inspiration, used by Franz BRENTANO to designate what he took to be the distinctive feature of mental, as contrasted with physical, phenomena—the feature, namely, of being of or about an OBJECT. An IDEA, for example, would not be an idea unless it were an idea of something. And the same goes, Brentano thought, not merely for concepts, images, sensations, etc., but also for feelings and emotions, hopes, fears, desires, etc. Although intentionality is thus comparatively recent as a technical term in philosophy, its manifest derivation is from the ancient scholastic term intentio. Indeed, the sense of both terms is suggested by their etymology, which refers to something that by its very nature tends toward, or is aimed at, something else. As St. THOMAS AQUINAS defines it: “intention, as the name itself indicates, means to tend toward something” (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 12.1).

So understood, there is no reason why intentionality should not be manifested in any number of different contexts or domains: in that of ethics, insofar as moral agents intend or mean to do what they do; in that of logic or epistemology, insofar as images and concepts are necessarily always images and concepts of something, and statements, propositions and arguments are always about something; and despite Brentano, even in the physical realm, insofar as active potencies in things may be considered as tendencies toward something, or the causes of things as tending toward their effects.

The ordinary, as contrasted with the technical, use of intention is confined almost exclusively to ethical contexts. “Sir, hell is paved with good intentions!” Dr. Johnson remarked. And somewhat more technically, St. Thomas seems to understand an intention as any conscious aiming at a goal or an end (confer, ST 1a2ae, 12).

Avicenna and the Scholastics. In its less common logical use, the term intentio became current in scholastic philosophy after the translation of the works of AVICENNA into Latin (see Kneale, 229–230; Spiegelberg, “Begriff,” 77). ARISTOTLE in both the De anima and the De interpretatione had sought to explain cognition in terms of the reception of forms into the soul. Such forms—as, for example, the form of yellow or that of horse—once they were received into the soul, could then function as meanings or notions of yellow or of horse. The form in the soul, that is to say, was simply a meaning or a cognition or an intention of the same form in reality. Indeed, it was Avicenna’s Arabic term for such meanings and intentions that came to be tendered in Latin as intentio.

A further development, again traceable to Avicenna, was the distinction between first and second intentions. For even supposing that the forms received in the soul, for example, yellow and horse, are, as forms, indistinguishable from the forms of yellow or of horse as existing in things in the real world, still the conditions and circumstances of their existence in the soul are different from what they are in reality. As a CONCEPT in the mind, yellow can be a predicate of a proposition, a species of a genus, a universal, a middle term of a syllogism, etc.; but as it exists in particular things, yellow is certainly not a predicate or a middle term or a species of a genus or even a universal (though this last exclusion was hotly and variously debated between nominalists and realists).

Moreover, it was considerations of just this sort that provided the scholastics with the means for distinguishing LOGIC from other disciplines. For in sciences other than logic the concern is presumably with the natures and characters of things in the real world. Hence the intentions used in these sciences will be intentions such as yellow and horse, which signify or intend yellow and horse as real properties of real things. In logic, on the other hand, the concern is not with understanding the real world, but rather with understanding the logical means and instruments of such understanding. Hence the intentions used in logic will not be intentions of such things as yellow and horse, but rather intentions of intentions, or second intentions—that is, such intentions as yellow and horse, insofar as these function as subjects or predicates, as genera or species, as terms in a syllogism and generally as logical devices employed in acts of knowing. (For a comparison and contrast of this medieval conception of logic in terms of second intentions with the modern conception of logic in terms of so-called logical forms and formal truths, see Veatch).

However, it is not just the logician who concerns himself with forms in the soul; in addition, the very fact that such forms come to be or exist in the soul means that they become proper objects of investigation for both PSYCHOLOGY and what, in modern philosophy, has come to be known as EPISTEMOLOGY. Thus, for example, when the form yellow is received in a physical or material object, the object itself becomes yellow; however, when such a form is received intentionally in the soul, the soul does not become yellow. What, then, is the status and condition of such a form as it exists intentionally?

Thomas Aquinas. According to St. Thomas, such an intentionally received FORM is an intelligible species, in that through it the real form is rendered, as it were, perspicuous (see SPECIES, INTENTIONAL). So also, the form that is intentionally received may be considered to be a similitudo of the real form existing in the world. At the same time, this Thomistic doctrine of the likeness of the form in the soul to the form in the real world must not be construed in the manner of the various copy theories of modern epistemology.

For one thing, even if the form in the soul be a similitudo, or copy, of the form in reality, still, in the act of cognition, the human being does not first come to know the copy (the form in the soul) and then somehow infer the original (the form in reality). Rather it is through the intentionally received form, as a similitudo or an intentio of the real form, that the latter comes to be known. As St. Thomas put it, the likeness or the intelligible species in the intellect is the id quo, not the id quod, of knowledge (ST 1a, 85.2).

For another thing, St. Thomas, at least in one of his earlier works, the De ente et essentia, worked out an account of forms or essences of things according to which the form in the soul, in at least one fundamental respect (namely, formally or essentially, though not numerically), is the very form that is in things. This is possible, St. Thomas holds, because a form or an ESSENCE, or that in virtue of which things are what they are, is in and of itself neither universal and so a product of ABSTRACTION (as it is when it is a species or an intention in the intellect) nor particular and individual (as it is when existing in many different individual things in the real world). Consequently, when one says, “Peter is a man,” Peter is certainly an individual, and the predicate concept “man” is certainly a universal. Yet in saying that what Peter is is a man, one is not saying that he is a universal. True, one uses the universal concept of intention in the intellect in order to know what Peter is; but what one thus comes to know him to be is not anything universal.

And so likewise, in saying of Peter just what he, the individual, is, one does not thereby restrict his human nature or essence, or what he is, to Peter alone. On the contrary, it is still through and only through a universal predicate concept—that is, through an intention or likeness or species in the soul, which is nonetheless universal—that one comes to know what Peter, the individual, is. In other words, in saying that what Peter is, is a man, one no more turns human nature into an individual than he turns Peter into a universal.

And all this is made possible by the fact that what Peter is, and more generally the forms or essences through which things are what they are, are in themselves neither universal nor particular, neither one nor many. So it is that the same form, which happens to be a universal intention or likeness or species of man in the mind, can come to be recognized as being the very form or essence of Peter in the real world, as being what the individual Peter is, in short.

Ockham. It is hardly surprising that both before and after St. Thomas, and in both scholastic and modern philosophy, the very puzzling notion of the form in the soul, of the form as an intentio or similitudo or species of the real form, should have occasioned no little discussion. WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, for example, seems to have moved from an earlier position in which he regarded forms existing intentionally in the soul as in some sense fictive or “objective” beings, to a position in which he repudiated all such purely intentional beings, or beings that exist as mere objects before the mind and that function simply as means through which real forms come to be known. Instead, his final doctrine seems to have been that the psychological act of understanding itself suffices for a direct and immediate signifying or intending of the real forms in things (see Boehner, 146–147).

Brentano, Meinong, and Husserl. In contrast, in modern times and with respect to much the same issue, Brentano seems to have taken a stand that could be interpreted as almost the opposite of that of Ockham. Impressed as all modern thinkers have been by epistemological problems, Brentano—if one were to formulate his position not in his own, but in scholastic, terms—insists that there are intentions in the soul and that all intentions are necessarily intentions of objects. But such objects of intentions, considered as such, are not the real forms of things, but only forms in the mind. Or, put in another way, every intention has an object, but considered simply as an object of an intention, such an object does not have to be anything extramental. Accordingly, Brentano can speak of “the intentional (and also mental) inexistence (Inexistenz) of an object (Gegenstand), and what we could call, although in not entirely unambiguous terms, the reference to a content, a direction upon an object (by which we are not to understand a reality in this case), or an immanent objectivity” (Psychologie vom empirischen Standpunkt; see Chisholm, 50).

This same stress upon the merely objective being of intentions is found in both A. Meinong and E. HUSSERL. Meinong, indeed, proliferates a vast realm of such objects of intention, peopling it with golden mountains, round squares, et al. And Husserl, in order to bring his method of phenomenological description properly to bear on the objects of intentions, insists that one must, as he puts it, simply “bracket” the question of the existence or nonexistence of such objects in the real world. Nevertheless, with Husserl there does seem to be a marked shift in emphasis from what one finds in Brentano. Rather than with the object of intention and the peculiar kind of existence or “inexistence” that such objects have, Husserl occupied himself more with intentional acts and with how such acts do not merely aim at their objects, but actually bring about the construction and constitution of their objects (see Spiegelberg, “Begriff,” 81–32, 87–89).

Comparisons. But how are these more modern views regarding intentionality to be compared with St. Thomas’s? Clearly, a comparison with Husserl is rendered difficult, if not impossible, to the extent that Husserl tends to regard intentional acts of the mind, such as thinking and perceiving, as actually constituting and building up their objects. Such a way of conceiving intentionality is so radically at variance with St. Thomas’s basic REALISM, and is so thoroughly Kantian and post-Kantian in its inspiration, that one can scarcely imagine how St. Thomas might make rejoinder of it, short of a rebuttal of the entire Critique of Pure Reason.

On the other hand, with Brentano, one might imagine that, from St. Thomas's point of view, he is to be commended for insisting that in knowledge there is something on the order of a form actually present in the soul. Yet, at the same time, St. Thomas would surely insist that by making this received form the actual object of the intentio, Brentano and his followers had in effect confused the id quo of intentional reference with the id quod.

To be sure, St. Thomas seems not to have concerned himself particularly with the sort of epistemological consideration that is paramount with thinkers such as Brentano and Meinong. This is the consideration that the mere fact that one has intentions, and that intentions must and do have objects, does not as such give any warrant for inferring that such objects of intentions are either the same as, or similar to, objects existing in the real world. Nevertheless, St. Thomas's comparative indifference to this sort of epistemological problem may not have been a result of mere inadvertence. Instead, it needs always to be remembered that for him such things as forms or natures or essences are not, as such, either universal or particular, either mental or physical, either immanent or transcendent. Hence why suppose that, such forms or essences being upon occasion objects of intentions, they may therefore be no more than "immanent objects" and may possibly enjoy no more than an "intentional inexistence"? To suppose this would surely be, from St. Thomas's point of view, to create a problem where no problem exists. For on his account, a nature or form, even when it is a received form, does not have what the phenomenologists would call immanence attaching to it as an essential feature. But if the form be not essentially immanent, then the problem of its transcendence is not a problem, or at least is not the same problem as it was for Brentano and Meinong.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE; KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; IMMATERIALITY.

Bibliography: H. B. VEATCH, Intentional Logic (New Haven 1952). W. and M. KNEALE, The Development of Logic (Oxford 1962), ch. IV, sec. 3. P. BOEHNER, Collected Articles on Ockham, ed., E. M. BUYTAERT (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1958). E. A. MOODY, The Logic of William of Ockham (New York 1935). H. SPIEGELBERG, The Phenomenological Movement, 2 v. (The Hague 1960); "Der Begriff der Intentionalität in der Scholastik, bei Brentano und bei Husserl," Philosophische Hefte, ed., M. BECK, 5 v. (Berlin 1928–36) 5:72–91. Realism and the Background of Phenomenology, ed., R. M. CHISHOLM, (Glentoe, Ill. 1961).

[H. B. VEATCH]

INTERCESSION

Derived from the Latin inter (between) and cedere (to go or pass), intercession is the act of reconciling the differences between two parties. This article considers: (1) the theological notion of intercession; (2) the intercession of Christ; (3) the intercession of Our Lady, the angels, and saints; and (4) the intercession of a wayfarer.

Theological Notion. From the theological viewpoint, intercession is the act of pleading by one who in God's sight has a right to do so in order to obtain mercy for one in need. In this definition the term "pleading" is used because intercession is a species of prayer—in the strict sense of the word, excluding adoration, thanksgiving, and propitiation. Prayer so considered is the act of the practical intellect seeking divine benefits (cf. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83). Intercession, however, differs from all other species of prayer because the benefit sought is for another. Further, the intercessor must have standing before God, just as defense attorneys must have standing before the court in which they are pleading. The intercessor is taking the position of an advocate for another with God and consequently must have some claim upon the divine benefaction. Christ's right to plead is based on the Hypostatic Union and His Sacrifice on the cross; Mary's right is that of the divine maternity and her association with Christ's sacrifice; the angels and saints have a basis in their participation in the divine life through the beatific vision; a wayfarer can intercede by reason of his FRIENDSHIP with God produced by sanctifying grace and charity. The definition's "one in need" should not be restricted to those in mortal sin, for those in the state of grace need divine mercy since they bear the effects of original sin and forgiven actual sins, and are capable of future sins.

Intercession of Christ. Christ's intercession is part of His MEDIATION. First, the Scriptures explicitly affirm that Christ actually prays for us in heaven (Rom 8.34; Heb 7.25; Jn 2.1). Second, Christ acts as intercessor according to His human nature, for only thus can He stand between God and man.

Intercession of Mary, the Angels, and Saints. A Catholic may entertain no doubts about the fact of their intercession, since the Council of Trent clearly defined this dogma—"the saints, reigning together with Christ, offer their prayers to God for men" (Enchiridion symbolorum 1821). Further, this dogma is contained in both the Old and New Testaments (2 Mc 15.11–16; Tb 12.12; Rv 5.8, 8.3). Our Lady's intercession differs from that of the angels and saints because the basis of her intercession, besides her participation in glory, is the divine maternity and her unique cooperation in Christ's sacrifice; moreover, the result of her pleading brings all graces to all men—a point affirmed by many modern popes.

About the nature of the intercession of the blessed two questions arise: (1) How do they know man's needs?

and (2) Are their requests always fulfilled? The angels know man's needs through concepts infused in their minds by God and through the supernatural gift of the beatific vision, in which they see the divine decrees dealing with man. The blessed souls have no natural means of knowing those still in via (until the general resurrection), but as in the case of the angels they have knowledge through the beatific vision. In regard to the second question, it can be affirmed that their prayers are always fulfilled in this sense: knowing perfectly the divine decrees, they never request that which God does not intend to give, since their wills always conform to the divine will.

Intercession of Wayfarers. Those in this life are able to pray for others and, indeed, are obliged to do so because of fraternal charity. Although one is not obliged to pray explicitly for a particular individual, unless he is in extreme spiritual need, one may never exclude anyone from his prayers for all. It is useless to pray for the damned in hell and unnecessary to pray for the blessed in heaven. All others, those in the state of grace or not, should be the object of prayer.

Some Christians may object to the doctrine here described, because they see in it a diminution of Christ's mediation. Uneasiness about the doctrine, however, can result from a failure to appreciate a fundamental principle of the divine governance: in the execution of the divine providence God makes use of creatures to produce desired effects. This notion permeates the Scriptures: the role of the Jewish race before the Messiah's coming, Christ's redemptive activity, the Apostles' mission, the writings of the Evangelists, each is an application of the principle. In the same vein the blessed in heaven have a role to play in the sanctification of men; they participate in the divine causality through their intercession. Catholic doctrine in this matter does not diminish the role of Christ the Mediator, for the prayers of each member of His Mystical Body are channeled through the Head.

See Also: SAINTS, INTERCESSION OF.

Bibliography: F. L. B. CUNNINGHAM, The Christian Life (Dubuque, Iowa 1959). J. DOUILLET, What Is a Saint?, tr. D. ATTWATER (New York 1958). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 3a Suppl., 72. R. GUARDINI, Prayer in Practice, tr. PRINCE LEOPOLD OF LOEWENSTEIN-WERTHEIM (New York 1957) 184–199. J. DE BACIOCCHI, Catholicism. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947– ) 5:1870–73. P. SÉJOURNÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 14.1:870–978.

[P. J. MAHONEY]

INTERIMS

The doctrinal formulas agreed upon by a commission of theologians and adopted as a temporary (ad inter- im) solution for the religious disunity within the Empire of Charles V.

REGENSBURG (1541)

This enactment resulted from the failure of the Diet of Regensburg, which had opened on April 7, 1541, with high hopes of a religious settlement. From April 27 to May 22 an imperial committee of three Catholics (Johann ECK, Julius von PFLUG, and Johann Gropper) and three Protestants (Philipp MELANCHTHON, Martin BUCER, and Johannes Pistorius) deliberated on a schema drawn up probably by Gropper. In spite of genuine effort to reach unanimity and the conciliatory manner of the papal legate, Gasparo CONTARINI, the conference collapsed. This was attributable to the political interests of Johann Friedrich of Saxony and Francis I, King of France, who feared the power of a united Hapsburg Empire, and also to the influence of the conservative Lutheran Nikolaus von AMSDORF, who opposed any acceptance of transubstantiation or auricular confession. As a result, the Interim of Regensburg was published on July 29, 1541, postponing religious settlement until the next diet, suspending juridical processes in religious matters, forbidding Protestants to widen their political influence, upholding the provisions of the Peace of Nuremberg (1532) and the Confession of AUGSBURG (1530), and exhorting ecclesiastical reforms. It legislated further, on the one hand, that monasteries and prelates who had accepted the Confession of Augsburg were not to be deprived of their property; nor, on the other hand, were Protestants to force Catholic subjects to embrace their faith.

AUGSBURG (1548)

This Interim of 26 chapters appeared at the end of the Diet of Augsburg, June 30, 1548, and was called "A Declaration of His Imperial Majesty on how things are to be managed in the Holy Roman Empire, touching the question of religion, until the General Council can be held." Johann von Pflug, Michael Helling, suffragan bishop of Mainz, Eberhard Billick, Pedro de Soto, and Johannes Agricola worked out a formula that phrased Catholic theology in terms as indefinite as possible, often employing Protestant modes of expression, and conceded Communion under both species as well as permission for married Protestant clergy to retain their wives. Though looked upon by Charles as an ingenious solution, it pleased few others. Elector Joachim of Brandenburg (called "Father of the Interim"), Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg-Culmbach, and the Elector of Mainz accepted it; but the princes of other Catholic Estates, even after assurance that the Interim was directed to the Protestants, submitted without enthusiasm. It was not endorsed by Paul III until August 1549. Among the Protestants who opposed it were Duke Johann Frederick of Saxony, Margrave Hans von Cüstrin, Count Palatine Wolfgang Johann Zweibrücken, Duke Ulrich of Württemberg, Elector Maurice of Saxony, and Landgrave Philip of Hesse, who as a captive of Charles later signed it to hasten his release. The center of Protestant opposition was Magdeburg, where Matthias FLACIUS ILLYRICUS and Nikolaus von Amsdorf fought its adoption (see GNESIOLUTHERANISM). In general the Catholic clergy refused to become Interim priests and distribute the Sacrament under both species; the Protestant clergy looked upon the formula as “revived papistry.” A Frankfort delegate to the Diet reported that the Interim was regarded as interitum (disaster).

LEIPZIG (1548)

In an attempt to make the reintroduction of Catholic ceremonial acceptable to Protestants, Maurice of Saxony, Melancthon, and George III of Anhalt-Dessau met at Alt-Zella in November 1548. There a new document was drawn up, declaring that Catholic ceremonials, images of saints, etc., were neither good nor bad but indifferent things (adiaphora) and therefore not in opposition to Scripture. This was accepted by Saxony at the Diet of Leipzig in December, but elsewhere it led to renewed controversy.

See Also: PHILIPPISM; CRYPTO-CALVINISM; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography: B. J. KIDD, ed., Documents Illustrative of the Continental Reformation (Oxford 1911) 340–346 (on Regensburg), 359–362 (on Augsburg). P. SCHAFF, Bibliotheca symbolica ecclesiae universalis: The Creeds of Christendom, 3 v. (6th ed. New York 1919) v.3. Janssen-Pastor 6:395–420. H. HOLBORN, A History of Modern Germany, 3 v. (New York 1959) v.1 The Reformation. K. BRANDI, The Emperor Charles V: The Growth and Destiny of a Man and of a World Empire, tr. C. V. WEDGWOOD (New York 1939). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 12:409–439.

[E. D. MC SHANE]

INTERNATIONAL CATHOLIC DEAF ASSOCIATION

The International Catholic Deaf Association (ICDA) was founded in 1949 in Toronto, Canada, by deaf people from Buffalo, Detroit, and Toronto at the first Congress of the Catholic Deaf. They worked with ten priests to lay plans for an international organization. James Cardinal McGuigan, then archbishop of Toronto, gave the project his approval. From these initial efforts came the ICDA. It has constituent memberships in the United States, France, Ireland, and elsewhere. The United States affiliate began in 1987 at Hartford, Connecticut, but officers were not elected until 1989 at the business convention in Portland, Oregon. A constitution was adopted for the United States in July 1991, in Cleveland, Ohio.

The purpose of the ICDA is to promote cultural, spiritual, and social union among deaf and hard-of-hearing Catholics through the teachings and principles of the Catholic faith. The ICDA engages in work relative to the educational, social, and moral advancement of deaf people and acts as a means for public advocacy on behalf of the deaf. Since 1986, the ICDA has had biennial “Workshop Conventions” to further the deaf apostolate. These have been designed to incorporate more fully those deaf people called to ministry and leadership in various ecclesial contexts.

The membership of the ICDA-U.S. comprises local chapters and individual members. Each chapter is self-governing and operates under the constitution and by-laws of the ICDA-U.S. In 2001 there were 108 local chapters scattered among six regions. ICDA-U.S. is governed by the membership and a six-member elected Board of Directors consisting of the President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, Chaplain, and immediate Past President. With the possible exception of the Chaplain, all officers are deaf. The worldwide organization has an official English publication, The Deaf Catholic. Membership in the ICDA-U.S. is open to all Catholic deaf people and to hearing people who are interested in working with deaf Catholics.

Bibliography: The DeSales Project Report, Eye Centered: A Study of the Spirituality of Deaf People with Implications for Pastoral Ministry (Silver Spring, Maryland 1992). C. PADDEN and T. HUMPHRIES, Deaf in America: Voices from a Culture (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1988). An uncatalogued archive of materials related to the deaf, including the ICDA and its United States affiliate, is located at the College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Massachusetts.

[P. J. HAYES]

INTERNATIONAL CATHOLIC MIGRATION COMMISSION

In response to the need for coordination of Catholic migration and refugee services on a worldwide basis, the International Catholic Migration Commission (ICMC) was established in 1951 with headquarters in Geneva. The lessons of the Second World War with respect to displaced persons and later the mass migrations in Eastern Europe beginning in 1949, prompted Catholic laity and clergy from Germany, Italy, and the United States to form the ICMC. Then Substitute Secretary of State, Archbishop Montini (the future Pope Paul VI), and Cardinal Joseph Frings of Germany, were instrumental in the foundation. The following year, Pope Pius XII, in his Apostolic Constitution Exsul familia, focused the attention of Catholics on the needs of migrants and refugees, and formally introduced the ICMC to the world. The first president of the ICMC was Mr. James J. Norris (1907 to 1976) of the National Catholic Welfare Conference's office of War Relief Services. He served as president for 23 years and retired in 1976.

Throughout the 1960s, the ICMC worked primarily in Europe, but by mid-decade their presence could be found in 42 countries worldwide. Much of this work involved the dispensing of loans to facilitate the movement of immigrants. These funds benefited over 40,000 from 1952 to 1962. By the early 1970s, the migration phenomenon had become more complex and international, where warring parties often made national borders arbitrary and aid to the displaced that much more difficult. The end of the war in Vietnam, the attempted genocide in Cambodia, and other hot spots forced the ICMC to begin resettlement work in Southeast Asia, among other places. With forced migration come the related problems of health, hunger, human smuggling, and often the peculiar horror of "ethnic cleansing." By the end of 1977, the ICMC had granted travel loans in the amount of approximately 50 million dollars, helping hundreds of thousands to find a country of permanent resettlement.

In 1999, the ICMC provided services to over 100,000 people, including protection for 63,000 of the most vulnerable refugees (elderly, widowed, mentally and physically disabled) in 11 countries. It also helped 2,600 refugees in Bosnia and Kosovo, primarily women and internally displaced people, move towards economic self-sufficiency through microcredit loans. About 42,000 were resettled in the United States that year. Wherever possible, the ICMC works in partnership with the local Church. In 2001, ICMC had around 30 international and almost 400 national staff members who work in 21 countries on all continents. It is also one of the chief collaborators in the Holy See's World Day of Migration, which calls attention to the needs of those affected by migration issues. It cooperates with the Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Itinerant Peoples. The ICMC was actively involved in the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance (WCAR) in Durban, South Africa (2001), precisely because of the impact of racism on refugees.

The ICMC cooperates especially with two intergovernmental organizations, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration (ICEM) and claims consultative status with the Council of Europe and, since 1952, the UN Economic and Social Council. Funding comes through a combination of grants from the United States government and the United Nations organization, among other sources.

Membership of the ICMC is open to all Catholic national episcopal conferences and their relevant organizations working with migrant and refugee populations. In 2001 the ICMC had 95 members and affiliate members from 82 countries. The ICMC is made up of a Council, Governing Committee, and General Secretariat. Council members are nominees of Catholic bishops conferences and national Catholic organizations working with refugees and migrants. The whole Council elects the President of the Commission, subject to approval of the Holy See, who convenes and chairs both the Council and Governing Committee meetings. Voting for the other members of the 12-person Governing Committee is regionally based. The ICMC Council meets once a year to determine the priorities of the organization. Every three years the Council elects the President and other officers of the Governing Committee.

Bibliography: The papers of James J. Norris are archived at the University of Notre Dame. The ICMC's 50-year history was in press in 2001.

[P. J. HAYES]

INTERNATIONAL CATHOLIC STEWARDSHIP COUNCIL

The International Catholic Stewardship Council (ICSC) had its origin in a 1962 meeting in St. Louis, organized by Reverend Paul Kaletta, of diocesan directors of development on their concerns. The group first called itself the National Association Council of Diocesan Financing, then the National Council of Diocesan Support Programs, then the National Catholic Stewardship Council (NCSC), and adopted the present name in 1999. The formulation of a constitution and by-laws and the election of the first officers occurred in 1967. The episcopal moderators have been Bishops Albert Zuroweste (Belleville) 1967 to 1974, from 1971 to 1974, co-moderator with Edward E. Swanstrom (auxiliary, New York); and William G. Connare (Greenburg) 1974 to the present. Reverend Robert Deming (Kansas City-St. Joseph) was first executive secretary and the Kansas City chancery the first, temporary headquarters. Father Kaletta (d. 1974) served as the Council's first chairman.

Early progress included the Publications Committee's Parish Stewardship Educational Program, known as the "red kit" because of its red cover. It furnished parishes with a variety of instructional materials on stewardship including a three-weekend stewardship program whereby parishioners received a biblical and spiritual concept of stewardship (first week), introduction of stewardship of time and talent (second week—after which they were invited to carry out an apostolate of their choice), and to stewardship of money (third week—after which they were asked to sign a pledge to contribute a certain amount of money to their church each week).

During his chairmanship of the NCSC, 1972 to 1974, Monsignor Charles Grahmann (San Antonio) became aware of three needs: (1) to expand the NCSC operation by giving more emphasis to stewardship of time and talent; (2) to move the office to Washington, D.C. in order to form a relationship with the USCC-NCCB; and (3) to find a full-time executive director to carry out the Executive Board's policies in a professional manner. At the tenth annual conference in Tucson in October 1973, participants voted to support all three areas.

On Feb. 4, 1974, Francis A. Novak, CSSR, then engaged in stewardship work in the Diocese of Grand Rapids, was elected NCSC's first full-time executive director. His mandate was to develop catechetical and pastoral programs on the total concept of stewardship.

In 1975, the NCSC published its first major program, Stewardship of Money, A Manual for Parishes, as an answer to requests from Ordinaries, development directors, pastors, and lay persons on parish and pastoral councils for assistance to solve parochial and diocesan fundraising problems. It used the biblical teaching of returning to God a proportion of his material gifts, together with Vatican II's doctrine of co-responsibility, to explore the deeper meaning of the gifts of Eucharist. NCSC's second major program was published in 1976, Stewardship of Time and Talent, A Parish Manual for Lay Ministries. It fostered the development of lay ministries using some of the theological insights on ministry emerging from Vatican II. It has participated in the development of the NCCB Principles and Guidelines for Fund Raising (1977).

The ICSC is a member organization covering 18 regions throughout the world, with most found in North America, including all 13 United States episcopal regions. It serves arch-dioceses, parishes, professional firms, religious congregations, and Catholic associations through its seminars, publications, and annual conference. A number of committees attend to the mission of the ICSC, including those that focus on economic concerns, parish stewardship education, diocesan programs, and communications. Its primary concern continues to be to promote a biblical concept of Christian stewardship in which generosity of time, talent, and treasure are construed as God-given gifts. Its mission is to foster an environment in which stewardship is understood, accepted, and practiced throughout the Catholic Church. The Council promotes the concept that stewardship is not simply an appeal for funds; it is a way of life. ICSC publishes a journal, Resource, and facilitates a bilingual diocesan and parish exchange program on various facets of stewardship. ICSC has also sponsored the Comprehensive Diocesan Development Survey, an instrument that reports and analyzes information on annual appeal programs provided by arch/diocesan offices of stewardship and development. The Center of Applied Research in the Apostolate (CARA) conducts the research and writes the report for ICSC, which has been prepared almost yearly since 1992.

ICSC has hosted two international, multilingual Stewardship Seminars, held in Rome in 1973 and 1998. The First Annual Institute for Stewardship and Development, which provided a comprehensive introduction to the basic principles and techniques of stewardship and development, was held in Marriottsville, Maryland in 1993. Subsequent institutes have been held in Danville, California, and Mundelein, Illinois. ICSC's Board of Directors accepted a proposal in October 1993 from The National Planned Giving Institute at the College of William and Mary in Williamsburg, Virginia, to train diocesan executives and others in the area of planned giving.

Bibliography: NCSC Publications: Stewardship of Time and Talent, A Parish Manual for Lay Ministries (1976); Stewardship of Money, A Manual for Parishes (1975); Money as an Offertory Gift (1977); Stewardship: Symbolic Presence of the Christ Event for the Church Today (1976). M. R. MADDEN, Gladly Will I Spend and Be Spent: A Brief History of the National Catholic Stewardship Council, 1962–1997 (Washington, D.C. 1998); NCCB, Stewardship: A Disciples Response (Washington, D.C., 1992); Resource (1993–), ICSC, Stewardship and Development Guidelines for a Diocesan Office (Washington, D.C., n.d.).

[P. J. HAYES]

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY (ICEL)

In 1962 during the first session of Vatican Council II, a small group of English and American bishops, realizing that the use of the vernacular in the liturgy was about to be sanctioned to some degree, informally discussed the possibility of providing common texts for all English-speaking Catholics. Further discussion of this possibility continued among a widening group of English-speaking bishops during 1963. In October of that year bishops representing ten episcopal conferences met in the English College at Rome under the chairmanship of Archbishop Francis Grimshaw of England to lay plans for the work of the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL). The following conferences were represented at that meeting: Australia, Canada, England and Wales, India, Ireland, New Zealand, Pakistan, Scotland, South Africa, and the United States. In 1967 an 11th member, the conference of bishops of the Philippines, joined the original group. In addition to the member conferences there are also 15 associate-member conferences of ICEL.

Founding of ICEL. The International Commission on English in the Liturgy originating in Rome at the heart of the Council was the first response of a number of conferences sharing the same language to the directive of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy: "it is for the competent territorial ecclesiastical authority . . . , to decide whether, and to what extent, the vernacular is to be used. Their decrees are to be approved, that is, confirmed, by the APOSTOLIC SEE. And whenever it seems called for, this authority is to consult with bishops of neighboring regions that have the same language (Sacrosanctum Concilium 36.3)." The Council's wish that countries sharing the same language should work together was more forcefully underscored in a letter dated Oct. 16, 1964 of Cardinal Giacomo Lercaro, president of the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, to the presidents of conferences of bishops. In that letter Cardinal Lercaro stated that international commissions should be established by conferences of bishops sharing the same language to make one text for all. The pioneering work of ICEL became the inspiration for the several other language commissions which were established at the direction of the HOLY SEE.

In 1964 the bishops of ICEL prepared a formal mandate for the work to be undertaken as a common effort. This mandate, already anticipating the creation of a committee of experts to oversee the ICEL program, was addressed to the International Advisory Committee on English in the Liturgy. The mandate was submitted to each of the constituent conferences of bishops and was ratified by all of them in 1964. A formal constitution was adopted in the same year. The principal element in the constitution was the structured plan to relate the International Episcopal Committee on English in the Liturgy and the International Advisory Committee on English in the Liturgy as two distinct entities within the single organizations.

It was also in 1964 that the bishops of ICEL invited various experts, priests and lay people, to join them in their deliberations as they began to make definite plans towards the production of English vernacular texts which, it was hoped, would be acceptable to each of the member conferences. These experts who constituted the original advisory committee met for the first time in London during January 1965 and again, with the bishops, in Rome in November 1965. They represented the various specializations which would be necessary in developing a vernacular liturgy: liturgists, classical scholars, patrologists, English scholars, musicians. At a later stage biblical experts were also consulted. The work of ICEL was depended heavily on the talents of numerous English-speaking people, representative of these several areas of scholarship. It was the function of the advisory committee to oversee the work of ICEL and to advise the bishops after a careful review of the proposed translations and projects.

Structure and Work. The episcopal board (originally, committee) is the governing body of ICEL. Each conference designates one bishop as its representative on the board. All projects and translations, having been endorsed by the advisory committee, must be submitted to the episcopal board for final approval. When a text has been approved by a two-thirds majority vote of the episcopal board it is then submitted to the separate conferences for the vote of their individual members. In addition to presenting the texts to their conferences, the members of the Episcopal Board regularly report to their conferences on the continuing work of ICEL as well as on proposals for future work. The 11 members of the Episcopal Board also serve as the board of trustees of the civil corporation, the International Committee on English in the Liturgy, Inc., which was established under Canadian law in 1967 to protect the copyright of the ICEL texts.

The daily activities of ICEL are carried on through a secretariat which was established in Washington, D.C. in 1965. The work of the secretariat is directed by an executive secretary who is immediately responsible to the advisory committee and ultimately to the episcopal board.

The episcopal board and advisory committee issued two booklets, English for the Mass (1966) and English for the Mass: Part II (1967), which gave various sample translations of the Order of the Mass and the proper parts of the Mass. In order to assist them in the pioneering work of translating the Latin liturgy into English, the bishops and specialists invited comments from "all who are interested in the liturgy, not only Roman Catholics, but also members of other Christian bodies."

The first liturgical text issued by ICEL was the translation of the Roman Canon (Eucharistic Prayer I) which was presented to the conferences of bishops in 1967. This work was the product of many draft proposals and careful deliberation by the advisory committee and episcopal board. In the process of reaching the final draft hundreds of consultants, specialists in the various disciplines represented on the Advisory Committee, were asked to submit comments. In addition, all of the bishops of the English-speaking world were invited to give their comments after studying the draft. Since ICEL's beginnings consultation has played a major part in the ICEL process. The generous participation of these many bishops, priests, religious, and lay people served to make the work more representative of the individual conferences and has ensured that the texts will be acceptable in each of the separate countries. The publication of the Roman Canon has been followed by 21 translations of the rites revised at the direction of Vatican II. Although each of these works involved wide consultation and the reworking of a number of drafts, the texts which stand out, in terms of the magnitude of work involved, as the principal accomplishments of ICEL are the Roman Missal (1974) and The Liturgy of the Hours (1975–76). For all of these translations, ICEL adopted the norms of translation set down in the Instruction on Translation of Liturgical Texts (Comme le prévoit) issued by the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Notitiae 5 [1969] 3–12).

With major portions of its work of translation completed, ICEL implemented the second phase of its program. This second phase, endorsed by its episcopal board, was primarily directed to three general services: (1) the provision of music for the revised rites; (2) the provision of original texts, composed in the vernacular, in accord with the norms laid down in the revised Roman books; and (3) the reordering of the revised Roman books to make them more pastorally effective for the celebration of the rites in the English-speaking countries. The work of providing commentaries on the individual rites and other pastoral aids was also begun by ICEL as part of the second phase of its program. The procedure that ICEL adopted was as follows. First, the advisory committee determined which rites needed to be revised and what prayers were needed to supplement the editio typica. Next it assigned the task of revision to four standing subcommittees: (1) translation and revision, (2) original texts, (3) presentation of texts (layout/rubrics), and (4) music. The advisory committee was responsible for reviewing the work of these four subcommittees, before forwarding the final text to the Episcopal Board for its vote.

In the 1990s, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments (CDWDS) adopted a critical stance toward ICEL, expressing its strong disapproval over several of ICEL's translation projects, especially the inclusive psalter project, ICEL's proposed translation of the second edition of Rite of Ordination (1992) and the proposed revision of the Sacramentary. This tension culminated in the demand of Cardinal Jorge Medina, Prefect of CDWDS, in 1999 that ICEL reorganize its structure and place itself under the direct control of the CDWDS.

As a result of this restructuring, the four standing subcommittees and advisory committee ceased to exist on Jan. 1, 2001. They were replaced by a consultants' committee, chaired by the chairman of the episcopal board (or his designate). As part of the restructuring, the actual work of preparing texts for the English-speaking world would now fall on an ad hoc committee appointed for each project by the episcopal board. Under the proposed new constitution of ICEL which is awaiting the approval of Rome, all draft translations were to be presented to the various bishop conferences in a three-column format comprising 1) the Latin text, 2) a literal translation and 3) the text as intended for proclamation. Once the bishop conferences approve the texts, they were to be submitted to the CDWDS for its recognitio.

Bibliography: J. M. KEMPER, Behind the Text: A Study of the Principles and Procedures of Translation, Adaptation, and Composition of Original Texts by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (Ph.D. dissertation, University of Notre Dame, 1992). J. R. PAGE, "ICEL through Twenty-five Years," in Disciples at the Crossroads, ed. E. BERNSTEIN (Collegeville, Minn 1993) 63–80. J. R. PAGE, "ICEL, 1966–1989: Weaving the Words of Our Common Christian Prayer," in Shaping English Liturgy, eds. P. C. FINN and J. M. SCHELLMAN (Washington, D.C. 1990) 473–489. G. B. HARRISON and P. JONES, "Personal Reminiscences of the Early Years of ICEL," ibid., 461–472. F. R. MCMANUS, "ICEL: The First Years," ibid., 433–459. A. TEGELS, "On Englishing the Liturgy," Worship 58 (1984) 441–445. M. COLLINS, "Glorious Praise: the ICEL Liturgical Psalter," Worship 66 (1992) 290–310. N. MITCHELL, "The ICEL Psalter," Worship 69 (1995) 361–370, 447–456, 556–565 (3 pts.). G. OSTDIEK, "Crafting English Prayer Texts: The ICEL Revision of the Sacramentary," Studia Liturgica 26:1 (1996) 128–139.

[J. R. PAGE/EDS.]

INTERNATIONAL CONSULTATION ON ENGLISH TEXTS (ICET)

Established in 1969, ICET was an independent, ecumenical organization distinct from the Roman Catholic body, INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY (ICEL) which sought to produce common liturgical texts for ecumenical use. The need for ICET arose from two causes. First, the Roman Catholic Church, putting its liturgies officially into English for the first time, did not feel bound by the texts of the Anglican BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, which other non-Anglican churches had largely followed. Second, the churches which had long used these Anglican texts, felt the need to modernize them. It seemed sensible that the churches should collaborate for parts of the liturgy they have in common.

In 1970, ICET published Prayers We Have in Common, containing texts in two categories. Category A consists of the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, the Gloria (Glory to God), the Sanctus (Holy, Holy, Holy), and the Glory Be to the Father. These texts had been under discussion for some considerable time, and the ICET had reached agreement about them. They were therefore presented to the churches for adoption. Category B comprises the experimental texts for the Sursum Corda (Preface Dialogue), the Agnus Dei (Lamb of God), and the Te Deum. Both sets of texts had brief explanatory commentaries. In 1971 the booklet appeared in an enlarged and revised edition. All the texts were now in one category. The only major changes were to items formerly in Category B, with corresponding changes in the commentary. The Lukan canticles (Magnificat, Benedictus, and Nunc Dimittis) were added. The American edition (1972) further altered two lines in the Te Deum. In 1974, ICET met again, to consider what improvements had been suggested by the actual use of the texts. The result of this meeting was a second revised edition of Prayers We Have in Common in 1975, which now included the kyrie eleison (Lord Have Mercy), and a new commentary on changes necessary in musical settings. The commentary, though containing much of its original material, defended the changes made in the 1975 edition. Most of the major churches adopted ICET's recommendations, with the exception of the Lord's Prayer, on which it is difficult to reach agreement.

Its work completed, ICET was disbanded in 1975, shortly after the publication of Prayers We Have in Common. In 1985, a successor organization, the ENGLISH LANGUAGE LITURGICAL CONSULTATION (ELLC) was established.

Bibliography: ICET, Prayers We Have In Common (London and Philadelphia 1970; enlarged and rev. ed. London 1971, Philadelphia 1972, 2nd rev. ed. London and Philadelphia 1975). M. A. O'CONNOR, The NPM Reference for Prayers We Have in Common: A Catalog, Collection, and Evaluation of the ICET Texts (Washington, D.C. 1990). H. R. ALLEN, JR., "Common Texts Revisited," Worship 60 (1986) 172–175.

[A.R. GEORGE/EDS.]

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL FOR CATECHESIS (COINCAT)

The International Council for Catechesis (COINCAT) was established by Pope PAUL VI on June 7, 1973 as a consultative body within the Congregation for the Clergy. The general purpose of COINCAT as explained in the Annuario Pontificio is "to study the more important catechetical themes for the service of the Apostolic See and the episcopal conferences and to present proposals and suggestions." Specifically, it investigates concrete themes and important catechetical problems for the universal Church, suggesting solutions and proposals for pastoral action; it provides information on the necessity of catechesis and new approaches being taken in various parts of the world; and it facilitates the exchange of catechetical experiences between the Holy See and the diverse areas in the Church and among the members themselves.

Since its inception COINCAT has provided valuable service both to the Apostolic See and episcopal conferences, especially through its biannual plenary sessions. In the past it has studied such issues as catechesis as an ecclesial act (1976), the settings for catechesis (1977), catechesis and youth (1978), the formation of catechists for the 1980s (1979), catechesis and reconciliation (1983), adult catechesis in the Christian community (1988), catechesis for life in a pluralistic and secularized world (1990), and inculturation of faith and the language of catechesis (1992). The 1988 session resulted in the publication of Adult Catechesis in the Christian Community, a document that became a landmark within the body of the Holy See's catechetical works.

From the beginning COINCAT has been an international group. The first 24 permanent members appointed for five-year terms in 1976 included the patriarch of the Melkites and archbishops, bishops, priests, sisters, and lay people from Asia, Europe, Africa, Australia, and North, Central, and South America. Among the initial appointees were two from the United States, Bishop John B. McDowell of Pittsburgh and Sister Maria de la Cruz Aymes of San Francisco. McDowell was succeeded by Msgr. Wilfrid H. Paradis, then of the United States Catholic Conference Department of Education, who in turn was succeeded by Msgr. Francis Kelly of the National Catholic Education Association. Sister Maria de la Cruz was reappointed twice and for a time served as president of COINCAT. By 1992 the membership had grown to 30.

In 1994 the International Council was reorganized. The cardinal prefect of the Congregation for the Clergy became the president, and the secretary of the congregation served as vice-president. The number of permanent members, appointed to six-year terms, was set at ten. The new structure allows for the appointment of periti whose areas of expertise are suited to a particular project. These periti further enhance COINCAT's international character and competence. The newly constituted COINCAT met for the first time in Rome in September of 1994. The members and periti formulated general principles and drew up an outline for the revised edition of the General Directory for Catechesis published in 1997.

Bibliography: Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 2000 (Vatican City 2000). W. H. PARADIS, "Report on the Fifth Meeting of the International Catechetical Council, Rome, April 11–17, 1983,” The Living Light 20 (1984) 159–70.

[J. POLLARD]

INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL

The Council, established in 1921, was the cooperative missionary organization of Protestant churches through which the missionary movement found ecumenical expression. In 1961, it merged with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC), becoming the Division of World Mission and Evangelism (DWME) of the WCC. In 1971, the DWME became known as the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME). This entry describes the historical development, influence, and main emphases of the International Missionary Council from 1921–1961.

The International Missionary Council (IMC) early became a focus of the emerging ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT. From 1939 its association with the WCC, while that council was in process of formation, continued to be close until 1961, when the IMC became the DWME. The World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh (1910), at which delegates from the churches studied the central place of missions in the life of the church, laid the foundation of missionary cooperation on which the IMC was formed. The process continued as the membership of the council increased with the formation of new national and regional councils in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. These in turn were recognized as the bodies representing the churches of their areas. Two main principles governed the council’s work: (1) the only bodies entitled to determine policy were the churches themselves and their mission boards; (2) the successful working of the IMC was dependent on God’s gift of fellowship and the desire to cooperate.

Through study, consultation, and programs of mutual assistance, the council served its member bodies. Questions were considered as they arose. Missionary freedom, general and theological education, opium addiction, labor, slavery, racial discrimination, the church in rural and industrial society, home and family life, and literature were the main emphases. IMC officers, staff, and committees consulted, stimulated, and advised an increasing number of local and regional church bodies. German missions, “orphaned” by World War II, were enabled to continue their work through extensive inter-church aid. At the meeting in Ghana (1958) a theological education fund was established, providing substantial aid for buildings, faculties, and libraries of institutions in which churches were united in training for the ministry.

While the council adhered to the principle that no decision would be taken on ecclesiastical or doctrinal questions in which the member bodies differed among themselves, it concentrated attention on the Christian message for evangelism. The meeting at Jerusalem (1928) made the message its first consideration, especially in relation to modern secularism. At the Madras meeting (1938) the study of the message in a non-Christian world influenced missionary thinking and evoked intensive discussion for years after the meeting. Evangelism was ever a central concern as the council focused attention on the Christian witness in the world. At Whitby, Ontario (1947), the IMC set itself to discover the relevance of the Gospel to the world recovering from war and to call the faith again to its central task of evangelism. Church union movements among the younger churches were inspired by concern for evangelism as the churches sought for a united Christian witness. At the IMC meeting in Willingen, Germany (1952), delegates of younger churches stated their belief in church unity as an essential condition of effective witness and advance. Parallel with the decision of the IMC and the WCC to integrate, the two councils assisted in the formation of regional councils in Asia and Africa.

Bibliography: INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL, The Jerusalem Meeting of the International Missionary Council, 8 v. (New York 1928); The Madras Series, 7 v. (New York 1939). W. R. HOGG, Ecumenical Foundations (New York 1952). The International Review of Missions (Edinburgh 1912– ).

[R. W. SCOTT/EDS.]

INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION

Pope PAUL VI, in response to a recommendation made during VATICAN COUNCIL II and the specific proposal of the 1967 SYNOD OF BISHOPS, established the International Theological Commission, April 28, 1969 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 61 [1969] 431–432; cf. 713–716). The function of the ITC is “to study doctrinal questions of major importance in order to offer advisory assistance to the Holy See and, in particular, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith” (Statutes, ibid. 540–541). It has only a consultative and not a deliberative voice in the functioning of the ordinary magisterium of the Church.

Format. The commission consists of 30 members chosen by the pope from names recommended by the cardinal prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith after consultation with the national episcopal conferences. The members, representing various nations and diverse schools of theology, are chosen for their proficiency in one or another of the theological disciplines and for their fidelity to the magisterium. The initial appointment is for five years and may be renewed for another quinquennium. The cardinal prefect of the CDF presides over the commission and is assisted in the administration by a secretary general.

When the commission was first established in 1969, it had among its members many of the most prestigious Catholic theologians of the time. Several had been periti at the Second Vatican Council: Hans Urs von BALTHASAR, Louis Bouyer, Yves CONGAR, O.P., Philippe Delhaye, André Feuillet, P.S.S., Henri de LUBAC, S.J., Gerard Philips, Karl RAHNER, S.J., Joseph Ratzinger, and Rudolf Schnackenburg. The English-speaking theological community was represented by Barnabas AHERN, C.P., Walter Burghardt, S.J., and Bernard LONERGAN, S.J. Several of these were reappointed for the second quinquennium (1974), and they were joined by Edouard Hamel, S.J., and Jean-Marie TILLARD, O.P., of Canada, and John Mahoney, S.J., from Great Britain. Half the appointees named to the commission in 1980 by Pope John Paul II were holdovers; new members included Michael Ledwith of Ireland, Carl PETER of the U.S., Walter Principe, C.S.B., of Canada, John Thornhill, S.M., of Australia, and Christophe von Schönborn of Switzerland.

In 1986 a new term of the commission began. Among the members were the distinguished theologians Hans Urs von Balthasar and Georges Cottier, O.P., of Switzerland, Giuseppe Colombo (Italy), Jean Corbon (Lebanon), Philippe Delhaye and Jan Walgrave, O.P., of Belgium, and Joachim Gnilka and Walter Kasper of West Germany. At the time of their appointment in 1986, Bonaventura Kloppenburg, O.F.M. (Brazil), and Franc Perko (Yugoslavia) were auxiliary bishops. The English-speaking world was represented by John Finnis of England, Gilles Langevin of Canada, Michael Ledwith of Ireland, Carl Peter and William May of the U.S., Francis Moloney, S.D.B., of Australia, and Felix Wilfred of India. Professors Finnis (Oxford University) and May (The Catholic University of America) were the first laymen to be appointed to the commission. By the end of the quinquennium in 1991 several members had been named diocesan bishops and were no longer eligible to serve on the commission, whose function is to offer informed advice to the magisterium. By reason of their position as residential bishops Walter Kasper, André-Jean Léonard (who had been appointed to the commission to replace the deceased Walgrave), Jorge Medina Estevez of Chile, a member from the beginning, and Franc Perko belonged to the magisterium.

Among internationally significant theologians appointed to the commission in 1992, Colombo, Corbon, and Gnilka continued to give their prestigious service. They were joined by Joseph Doré, S.S. (France), Adolphe Gesché (Belgium), Hermann Pottmeyer (Germany), and Max Thurian (Switzerland-Italy). Langevin, Ledwith, May, and Moloney, joined by Avery Dulles, S.J., of the U.S., Charles Acton of England, Sebastian Karotempel, S.D.B., of India, Joseph Osei-Bonsu of Ghana, represented the English-speaking theological community. A long-standing member of the Commission, Christoph von Schönborn, O.P., and three first-time members, Joseph Doré, S.S., Norbert Strotmann Hoppe, M.S.C. (Peru), and Joseph Osei-Bonsu were appointed bishops during the course of the quinquennium. Professor Gösta Hallonsten of Sweden was a new lay member of the commission, replacing Professor Finnis. During the course of the quinquennium, Max Thurian passed away and was not replaced.

Appointees in 1997 for a new quinquennium included holdovers Pottmeyer and Gesché, as well as three-termers Francis Moloney, S.D.B., Jean-Louis Bruguès, O.P., and Henrique Noronha Galvão. They were joined by new members: Roland Minnerath (France), Bruno Forte (Italy), Gerhard Müller (Germany), and several lesser known theologians. The Anglophone world was represented by Charles ACTON (England), Christopher Begg (USA), Joseph Di Noia, OP (USA), George Karakunnel (India), Sebastian Karotempel, S.D.B. (India), Thomas Norris (Ireland), Anthony Ojo (Nigeria), and Luis Tagle (Philippines). An obvious effort was made to internationalize the commission further with appointment Tanios Bou Mansour, O.L.M., of Lebanon, Fadel Sidarouss, S.J., of Egypt, and Rafael Salzar Cardenas, M.Sp.S., of Mexico. The increased internationalization of the commission has had the unintended result of a diminution of the representation of the European centers of theological learning and to some extent a lessening of the expertise of the group as a whole. It has also made communication more difficult, especially in the subcommissions where instantaneous translation is not generally available.

In the first 30 years the commission had only two presidents. Cardinal Franjo Seper, prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith during the latter part of Pope Paul VI's pontificate, presided 1969–81. Cardinal Josef Ratzinger became president in 1981 when Pope John Paul II appointed him as prefect of the CDF. Monsignor Philippe Delhaye of Belgium served as secretary general of the commission from 1972 until ill health forced him to resign in 1989. Cardinal Ratzinger appointed Georges Cottier, O.P., of Switzerland to replace him in 1990.

Procedures and Themes. The commission begins each quinquennium with a wide-ranging discussion of a number of theological issues that the members regard as worthy of the Holy See's attention. The themes that are chosen for examination become the focal points of the commission in the following four years. In its early years the commission examined and published documents dealing with sacerdotal ministry (1971); the unity of faith and theological pluralism (1972); the apostolicity of the Church and apostolic succession (1973); criteria for the knowledge of Christian morality (1974); the relation between the magisterium and theologians (1975); Christian salvation and human progress (1976); and the sacrament of marriage (1977). These were followed by published statements dealing with the selected questions in christology (1979); theology, christology, and anthropology (1981); reconciliation and penance (1982); and the dignity and rights of the human person (1983). In commemoration of the 20th anniversary of the close of Vatican II, the commission published a document on selected items in ecclesiology (1984); and in 1985, it published a commentary on four propositions dealing with Jesus' self-consciousness and His awareness of His mission.

The four themes selected by the commission for study during the quinquennium beginning in 1986 were: faith and inculturation; interpretation of dogma; fundamental moral theology; and current questions in eschatology. The commission established in 1992 devoted itself to an examination of contemporary soteriology; Christianity in relation to other religions; a contemporary presentation of the mystery of God; and the Eucharist. The commission established in 1997 directed its attention to the Church and the sins of the past; the permanent diaconate; the inculturation of revelation; and the theology of creation.

The procedures of the commission follow a routine. After the selection of the themes to be studied during the quinquennium, the president of the ITC appoints sub-commissions to examine them and draft a working paper, the instrumentum laboris, that serves as the basis for discussion and debate by the commission as a whole. When the members agree upon and approve a final text, the document is submitted to a plenary session of the commission for formal approval. The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith receives the finished documents, and decides how best to use the work of the Theological Commission. Some documents have been used as a resource for the CDF and others have been published. The commission's study that resulted in the document Memory and Reconciliation: The Church and the Sins of the Past (2000) took on a particular significance. On the Second Sunday of Lent 2000, Pope John Paul II made the presentation of the document a highlight with his own memorable comments at an event marking the celebration of the Jubilee Year.

Bibliography: International Theological Commission, International Theological Commission: Texts and Documents 1969–1985, ed. M. SHARKEY, (San Francisco 1989). A collection of the Commission's documents from 1985–1996, most of which have appeared in a number of languages in various international scholarly journals, is in preparation.

[B. M. AHERN/W. E. MAY/F. J. MOLONEY]

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF SUPERIORS GENERAL (WOMEN)

The International Union of Superiors General (UISG) is an organization of pontifical right, established by the Congregation for Religious on Dec. 8, 1965 to respond to Vatican Council II, Perfectae caritatis 23, and to efforts of superiors general of women's congregations to create an association for mutual collaboration, sharing, and support, centered in Rome but with two-way communication with religious sisters throughout the world. UISG aims to foster at the international level the continuous renewal of the life and mission of religious sisters in the Church through their superiors general by research and reflection, by collaboration with the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes (SCRSI), by representation on ecclesial and international bodies, and by appropriate communication and evaluation. It represents approximately 2,400 superiors general of women's congregations of apostolic life. Since the first general assembly in 1967 (statutes revised 1973), the UISG has operated through triennial assemblies of approximately 100 locally elected delegates across the world, annual meetings of an intercontinental council of 28 members (19 elected by the assembly, 9 appointed by the SCRSI), regular meetings of an executive committee of eight based in Rome, and a permanent secretariat. It is juridically recognized by the Italian state (Decree 1296. Dec. 10, 1971).

The Union sponsors annual international meetings in Rome. It participates in many ecclesial initiatives involving women religious and is their representative on the Council for Relations with the SCRSI. In a style that is prayerful, effective and sisterly, UISG tries to combine three main thrusts of service: primarily, up-to-date world awareness, through its councillors, of trends in the evolution of sisters' religious life; conjointly, reflection on these through permanent or ad hoc commissions, larger meetings, and a quarterly bulletin; complementarily, enrichment of input through relations with ecclesial and national bodies and with national conferences of religious. It maintains ongoing collaboration with the Union of Superiors General (Men).

Bibliography: UISG, Bulletin 30 (1973) 29.

[M. LINSKOTT]

INTERVENTION, DIVINE

The activity of God in a miraculous event. This does not mean that He enters a place in which He was absent, for He is always present in the whole of creation. A universe of self-sufficient laws being violated by an external, intervening power is, therefore, a mistaken conception of miracles.

Better understanding of scientific law and increased understanding of scriptural and patristic notions of miracle clarifies the meaning of divine intervention. God, whose presence makes possible the continuing miracle of CREATION, at times produces in a religious context an extraordinary event that acts as a sign inviting belief. To admit a Sovereign Creator is to admit the possibility of such intervention, although determining where it has actually occurred requires careful investigation pursued in a spirit of openness.

See Also: MIRACLES (IN THE BIBLE); MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF).

[G. MORAN]

INTORCETTA, PROSPERO

Jesuit missionary in China; b. Piazza, Sicily, Aug. 28, 1625; d. Hangchow, Oct. 3, 1696. He arrived in China in 1657. His work in Kiangsi was interrupted by persecution. He was arrested in 1665, sent to Peking and then to Canton. In 1670 a Jesuit took his place in prison, and he left for Rome in 1672 to defend the Jesuits in the CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY. He returned to China in 1674 and was appointed visitor to the missions of China and Japan (1676–84). In 1679 and in 1688 he experienced persecution. He translated the Exercises of St. Ignatius and the Rules of the Society of Jesus into Chinese. With several other Jesuits he published in Latin one of the first Western studies of Confucius' life and thought. His main work, on Chinese politics and ethics (Goa 1667), is in Chinese and Latin.

Bibliography: L. PFISTER, Notices biographiques et bibliographiques, 2 v. (Shanghai 1932–34). A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico 2:461. J. SCHÜTTE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5:737.

[B. LAHIFF]

INTROIT

The word "Introit," which comes from introitus, "entrance," designates the ANTIPHON, with Psalm or Psalm verse, and (usually) the doxology, "Glory be to the Father . . .," that was historically sung at the beginning of the Roman Rite of the Mass.

Extant evidence from the writings of the Church Fathers suggests the absence of an entrance chant at the beginning of the Eucharist in the first 500 years. References by both St. John Chrysostom (In epistolam ad Colossos, Homily 3:4) and St. Augustine (De civitate Dei, 20:8) point to a Eucharist that began immediately with the readings after a brief salutation from the celebrant. Indeed, Augustine described a crowded Easter Sunday morning Eucharist as follows: "I greeted the throng, and when all had become silent there was solemn reading from the Holy Scriptures." It is not possible to date precisely when the Introit chant was first used in the Church of Rome. An earlier hypothesis that a passage in the Liber pontificalis describing the introduction by Pope Celestine I (d. 432) described an antiphonal Introit psalm "Constituit ut psalmi David CL ante sacrificium psalli antiphonatum ex omnibus, quod ante non fiebat, nisi tantum epistula beati Pauli recitabatur et sanctum Evangelium," is untenable. Recently scholarship has established that the phrase "antiphonatum ex omnibus" was inserted in the second quarter of the 6th century to reflect the then practice, and it referred to the responsorial psalm (Gradual) rather than to the Introit.

In all likelihood, the Introit came into use with the rise of stational liturgy, as witnessed in the 7th-century Ordo Romanus I (M. Andrieu, Les "Ordines Romani" du haut moyen-âge [Rome 1938–41] 2:83). The Introit emerged as a processional chant to accompany the movement of the papal entourage from the sacristy (located near the street entrance) to the altar. The psalmody, performed antiphonally (by alternating choirs), soon came to be introduced by a suitable verse, called Antiphon, which eventually proved to be the most enduring factor. For the psalmody, although originally important (as can be gauged by the richness of the chant and by the choice of a Psalm whose meaning is made clear only when the whole is sung), generally lost its significance due to the shortening of the psalm in monastic circles (where the clergy had already assembled for Terce) or where the procession was discarded (when the sacristy was relocated near the sanctuary). But the Antiphon, in turn, became more prominent. In the medieval period, the entire Mass formulary, and frequently the day itself, received its name from the first word(s) of the Introit antiphon, e.g., Requiem, Rorate, Gaudete, Quasimodo.

The antiphonal nature of the Introit was well suited as a musical accompaniment to the entrance procession making its way to the stational church for the Eucharist. The older manuscripts of the Mass chants indicated the use of an Antiphon, usually an appropriate verse of the Psalm being sung, but sometimes from another part of the Bible (e.g., Populus Sion, from Is), or even a free creation Words and musical notes of Introit for Feast of Ascension, Italian, ca. 1309.

(e.g., Gaudeamus for St. Agatha; or Sedulius's Salve, sancta parens for Masses of the Blessed Virgin).

In Carolingian times the Antiphon was often repeated after each verse of the Psalm (perhaps a Frankish usage), or a second verse from another Psalm was sung (a phenomenon that has puzzled researchers). Later the psalmody was reduced to one verse, or the chant was lengthened by repeating the antiphon before the Doxology. Already in the 8th century the psalmody was so curtailed that by the medieval period, eventually only one verse (plus the Doxology) remained.

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55) 1:320–333. W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Ind. 1958). T. MATHEWS, “An Early Roman Chancel Arrangement and Its Liturgical Significance,” Rivista di archeologia cristiana, xxxviii (1962) 71–95. A. ZWINGGI, “Der Wortgottesdienst bei Augustinus,” Liturgisches Jahrbuch 20 (1970) 92–113, 129–40, 250–53. T. CONNOLLY, “Introits and Archetypes: Some Archaisms of the Old Roman Chant,” Journal of the American Musicological Society 25 (1972) 157–74.

H. VAN DER WERF, The Emergence of Gregorian Chant: A Comparative Study of Ambrosian, Roman, and Gregorian Chant (Rochester, NY 1983). A. CHAVASSE, “Cantatorium et antiphonale missarum,” Ecclesia orans 1 (1984) 15–55. P. JEFFERY, “The Introduction of Psalmody into the Roman Mass by Pope Celestine I, 422–32,” Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 26 (1984) 147–65. J. BALDOVIN, The Urban Character of Christian Worship: The Origins, Development, and Meaning of Stational Liturgy (Rome 1987). D. HILEY, Western Plainchant: A Handbook (Oxford, 1993). J. W. MCKINNON, “Antoine Chavasse and the Dating of Early Chant,” Plainsong and Medieval Music 1 (1992) 123–47.

[F. A. BRUNNER/EDS.]

INTROSPECTION

The careful observation of one's CONSCIOUSNESS to ascertain its states and activities. It is one of the methods used in the science of psychology to study the facts of psychic life. Such facts can be studied from different points of view and are accessible to different methods of investigation. But of all methods, introspection alone is capable of reaching psychic facts in their immanent character. Without it, the psychologist would know psychic life only analogically—through relationships between mental states and their bodily resonances—much as a blind man might be said to know colors. Yet introspection as a method also has its limitations, and for this reason is not relied upon exclusively by most contemporary psychologists.

Uses. Some kind of introspection has always been used in psychological investigation. ARISTOTLE, regarded by many as the founder of psychology, dealt mainly with sensory perceptions, images, dreams, intellectual operations, and affective states. The first of these, for instance the perception of colors or of tones, would be impossible without the direct experience of certain sensitive qualities, e.g., the blue of the sky and the tone of a flute. It was precisely by means of such introspection that Aristotle collected the extensive material on which his psychology was based. Yet, for him, introspection was not a method for solving psychological problems, but rather a technique for acquiring psychical facts. E. B. Titchener has referred to this as an “information introspection,” a type of introspection that has always been used in human medicine. The veterinarian, lacking this, is comparatively handicapped, for his patients are not able to tell him when they feel sick, where they feel pain, etc.

MAINE DE BIRAN in France and the British associationists made extensive use of introspection in their psychological investigations. Their method, however, was logical rather than observational (see ASSOCIATIONISM). Careful observation of consciousness was first developed in the 19th century by W. Wundt, who may rightly be considered the founder of modern psychology. Titchener, one of his disciples, brought the Wundtian tradition to the U.S.

For Wundt, the principal aim of psychology was to analyze the contents of mind. This analysis was to be effected not by ordinary reflection, but in a systematic, objective, and fully scientific manner. Because such a task was difficult, Wundtian introspectionists were given considerable laboratory training in special methods of observation. The subject matter studied by this “trained introspection” included sensations, images, and feelings. The introspectionist had to describe accurately what these looked like and how they were interrelated or combined; because of this Wundt’s psychology was sometimes referred to as mental chemistry.

According to Wundt, the higher mental processes, thinking and willing, could not be studied by introspection because they were too abstract, the attention paid to them could hardly be controlled, the conditions under which they appeared could not be varied easily, and they could not be repeated. But many psychologists, among them several of Wundt’s disciples, did not accept these strictures.

Oswald Külpe, for example, presented a “stimulus word” to his subjects with instructions to respond verbally to what the association of ideas suggested, and then to report what went through their minds while performing this intellectual operation. Again, he asked them to make judgments, e.g., determining which of two weights was the heavier, and then to give full introspective reports of the process. Others who did active work in this field include: R. S. Woodworth, K. Marbe, N. Ach, K. Bühler, K. Koffka, J. Lindworsky, and A. Willwoll.

Such introspective methods have considerably enriched man’s knowledge of mental life, and many of their results have been incorporated into contemporary psychology. They furnish information not only about sensations, images, and feelings, but also to some degree about the higher psychic functions such as understanding, abstraction, reasoning, judgment, and choice.

Limitations. Yet introspective methods were vigorously attacked by many psychologists, particularly those with materialistic tendencies, and also Gestalt psychologists, psychoanalysts, and behaviorists. While some of their objections expressed simple prejudices, others had a real foundation in fact.

The limitations of introspective analysis as a “subjective” technique were brought out in the controversy among introspectionists on the theory of imageless thought. Observers trained by Wundt and Titchener found sensations in their thoughts, or, at least, images of sensations; subjects working in the laboratories of Külpe, Binet, and Woodworth, on the other hand, asserted that their thought was not made up of images or sensations, although they admitted that these accompanied thought processes.

Again, introspective methods have intrinsic limitations. They cannot be applied to children, to psychotics, or to animals. In addition, the question of unconscious or automatic psychic processes cannot be answered by introspection. The same applies to feelings, for as soon as one fixes his attention on these in order to observe them carefully, they lose their natural character or even disappear completely.

For these reasons, the exclusive use of introspectionist methods has long been abandoned by psychologists in favor of the more “objective” methods. Yet subjective and objective methods, when properly used, are complementary and capable of supplying useful information for psychological analysis.

Bibliography: P. SIWEK, Experimental Psychology (New York 1959). J. P. CHAPLIN and T. S. KRAWIEC, Systems and Theories of Psychology (New York 1960). T. G. ANDREWS, ed., Methods of Psychology (New York 1948). E. G. BORING, "A History of Introspection," Psychological Bulletin 50 (1953) 169–186; A History of Experimental Psychology (2d ed. New York 1950). A. GEMELLI and G. ZUNINI, Introduzione alla psicologia (4th ed. Milan 1954).

[P. SIWEK]

INTUITION

In common use, intuition may mean something like an intellectual counterpart of instinct (feminine intuition); in philosophy it can mean an immediate grasp by intelligence without conscious reasoning (intellectus as opposed to ratio); but in the strict sense it means an intellectual apprehension of reality in an act corresponding to ocular vision, so that man sees reality spiritually as he sees colors sensitively.

Historical Conspectus. The debate whether the human mind has the power of intuition is a modern one, but a few samples of relevant doctrine may be noted in earlier times. PLATO mentions souls carried to the summit of the celestial world and on the back of the heavens contemplating with the gods what is outside, namely, true being, the colorless, shapeless, intangible essences visible only to the mind (Phaedrus 247). Among Platonists the Christian form of this doctrine in St. AUGUSTINE is noteworthy: the Platonic ideas reside as rationes aeternae in the mind of God; man contemplates them in the exercise of his higher reason and finds in the incommutabilis veritas the source, measure, and guarantee of all his particular truth (various references with THOMAS AQUINAS's commentary in Summa theologiae Ia, 84.5; C. gent. 3.47).

Thomistic Teaching. Discussion of St. Thomas Aquinas must consider his use of the term intuit and the implications of his general cognitional theory. Intueri is used for God's "view" of the whole course of time at once (Summa theologiae Ia, 14.9; 86.4; etc.), for the simple act of intellectus in contrast to the discourse of ratio (Summa theologiae Ia, 59.1 ad 1), for the artist's inspection of the model from which he works (Summa theologiae Ia, 44.3), etc. Applied to intellectual operations it does not seem to have a technical sense, but merely to be a metaphor; thus St. Thomas compares God's view of all time to that which a man on a height has of the whole road (Summa theologiae Ia, 14.13 ad 3) and associates intueri with inspicere (Summa theologiae Ia, 19.5; 44.3; 58.3), which is clearly only a metaphor for intellectual grasp. His general cognitional theory is consonant. The natural object of intellect is indeed ens (C. gent. 2.83), but the way man knows being does not suggest a spiritual "vision" of an object confronting intellect; rather, the emphasis on ABSTRACTION for grasp of QUIDDITY [B. Lonergan, Theological Studies 10 (1949) 13–28], the doctrine of REFLECTION on sense for knowledge of the material singular (ibid. 20–22, 28–35), the campaign against Platonic views of knowing (confrontation=contactus; ibid. 359–360), and the roundabout way the human soul comes to know itself [ibid. 8 (1947) 62], all suggest just the opposite. However, later scholastics clearly teach an intuitive intellectual cognition of material and singular existents [S. DAY, Intuitive Cognition. . . , St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1947, on DUNS SCOTUS and WILLIAM OF OCKHAM; H. Guthrie, American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 14 (1938) 144–151, on St. BONAVENTURE].

Modern Theories. The modern period can be summed up as the affirmation of intuition by R. DESCARTES, the denial of it by I. KANT, and subsequent efforts to overcome Kant either in his principles or in his facts.

Descartes reduces all certain knowledge to two sources, intuition and DEDUCTION, with the former primary, for deduction is valid only when it is a chain of successive intuitions. Intuition is "the undoubting conception of a pure and attentive mind," e.g., of the fact that I exist or that a triangle is bounded by three lines only (Regulae, 3). In proper evidence, the object is simple and is known without falsity; one can compound simple natures, but then error is possible (ibid. 12). For a century, views on intuition followed in the wake of Descartes (with varying degrees of departure: e.g., B. SPINOZA regards intuition of the divine attributes as a source for understanding modal realities, and J. LOCKE denies that intuition of self has a privileged position), but Kant started a new trend.

For Kant, intuition means immediate, direct reference to the proper object (Critique of Pure Reason, A 19, B 33); in man it is found in sense alone (ibid.), though in God it may be intellectual (ibid. B 145). Sensibility and understanding are both necessary to knowledge: "The understanding can intuit nothing, the senses can think nothing. Only through their union can knowledge arise" (ibid. A 51, B 75). Kant's successors find in his doctrine elements to support the very intuition he denied (apperception of self, the categorical imperative). For J. G. FICHTE there is immediate consciousness of one's act and of what one does. In the realm of the subject, various attempts are made to reach the ABSOLUTE by way of intuitive immediacy, moral in Fichte, aesthetic in F. W. J. SCHELLING, rational in G. W. F. HEGEL. A. SCHOPENHAUER makes understanding intuitive in contrast to abstractive reason and asserts a metaphysical intuition of the noumenal SELF as a striving agent. As the 20th century began, E. HUSSERL defended an intuition of essences that are given to essential vision as the individual object is given to individual vision, and H. BERGSON makes much of the contrast between practical, analytic intelligence and a speculative, metaphysical intuition whose primary object is duration.

Recent Scholasticism. The prominence given intuition in these philosophies led inevitably to a reexamination of Thomist doctrine; and since St. Thomas did not treat the question explicitly, the result has been a great divergence as different writers develop his principles in different ways (see G. Van Riet, L'Épistémologie thomiste, Louvain 1946). There is disagreement on the word itself, whether to give it a broad sense and extend its use to wide areas of human cognition or to give it a strict sense and severely limit its use, whether to accept the Kantian definition as does A. Lalande's Vocabulaire . . . de la Philosophie (8th ed. Paris 1960) or to reinterpret the word on Thomist principles. Those who admit intuition divide in various ways. Some hold that it regards the simple APPREHENSION of essences; abstract and universal, it includes being, but not the singular concrete existent reached only indirectly by reflection. Others say this does not meet the problem; there must be an intuition of the concrete existent in its very act of EXISTENCE, and this intuition in turn is abstractive for some, concrete for others. (Abstractive intuition, at first sight seemingly a contradiction in terms, is explained as only analogous to the abstraction of essences.) Another division regards the material objects of the alleged intuition; some give a privileged role to the ego and its acts, others extend intuition to external objects in the human world. [Some articles appearing after Van Riet's book: J. H. Nicolas, Revue thomiste 47 (1947) 113–134; F. Grégoire, Revue philisophique de Louvain 44 (1946) 401–415; N. Balthasar, ibid. 47 (1949) 351–365; R. Allers, Franciscan Studies 8 (1948) 47–68; N. Losskii, Review of Metaphysics 2 (June 1949) 47–96; J. Caussiman, Revue de métaphysique et de morale 55 (1950) 392–407; L. Geiger, Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 34 (1950) 315–357; G. Esser, The American Catholic Philosophical Associations. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 31 (1957) 165–177; B. Lonergan, ibid. 32 (1958) 71–81, Gregorianum 44 (1963) 307–318; G. McCool, Thought 37 (1962) 57–73.]

Systematic Analysis. The position of this article is that intuition, understood as a “look” corresponding to sensitive confrontation, is found in neither man's understanding of quiddity nor his knowledge of the existent. It is not even useful as an analogy for the direct relationship to data found in understanding of quiddity (as “insight” may be), for it is too loaded with philosophical connotations. In any case, one is not at the mercy of ANALOGY here, but may study the activity of understanding in itself (cf. Summa theologiae Ia, 88.2 ad 3), when it turns out to be no more a looking at data than is the WONDER that it answers. Neither is man's judgment of the real existent based on intuition. The flat assertion of such an intuition is not enough, nor is the argument that it is necessary if one is to save metaphysical REALISM, nor has the analogy of a sensitive look any scientific validity in determining the nature of human JUDGMENT (in fact, it is doubly misleading here where activity is reflective); the proper procedure is rather to study the process of judgment in itself and learn what actually happens there.

Newman's View. Pioneering work in this field was done by J. H. NEWMAN in his An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (London 1930). What struck Newman was the unconditional character of judgment (assent); his problem was to discover how one reaches this absolute in concrete judgments, and his solution was described in the pages devoted to what he called the illative sense and to its processes. It reaches the unconditional neither by intuitions nor by inference from invincible syllogisms, but “by objections overcome, by adverse theories neutralized, by difficulties gradually clearing up . . . , by all these ways, and many others,” as a polygon tends to coincidence with a circle as its sides increase in number and diminish in length (320–321).

Lonergan's Development. Newman's path was followed by B. Lonergan [Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (New York 1957)], with such advances as these. First, Lonergan defines the structure of human cognition, which has three levels determined by the two basic questions, quid sit and an sit. Quid sit effects the ascent from data to understanding (a step as necessary for “internal” data of consciousness as for “external”); an sit effects the emergence of truth and of knowledge of the real from mere ideas or argument (a step as valid for “external” data as for “internal”). Second, he generalizes; the question an sit discloses the essentially hypothetical character of understanding: not only Newman's inference, but every human idea is, as such, just a possible explanation. Further, since every true judgment is about the really existent, an operation like that of the illative sense is always called for in the reduction to ultimates. Every act of human understanding must be rendered invulnerable for the absolute of judgment, errors excluded, imagined elements sifted from sensed, implications noted and checked experimentally, and the various conditions reflectively studied, until one reaches the virtually unconditioned (“virtually proved,” Newman said, p. 323, but his technical term was “proved interpretative”). Third, Lonergan takes up the question of immediacy. Intellect in man is by nature an anticipation of being, an orientation to being through the structured series, inquiry (quid), understanding, reflection (an), the act of judgment in which he knows the real; and this orientation assures immediacy. The relationship of man's cognitional activities to real objects "is immediate in the intention of being; it is mediate . . . in understanding and thought and judgment, because these activities stand to the originating intention of being as answers stand to questions" [Continuum 2 (1964) 540].

This view of judgment squares with scientific procedures in which hypotheses are verified not by an intuition of being, but by a checking process and experiment. It is in harmony with the familiar facts that man judges as readily of the existence of God, of the guilt of the accused, and of the events of last year, as he does of the reality of objects present to sense; that he makes mistakes about present objects as well as about absent; that philosophers have difficulty assigning the foundations not only of man's judgments about God, but of all his judgments. The view has anticipations at least in the Thomist statements that assent does not mean "the movement of the intellect to the thing, but rather to its conception of the thing . . . , to which the intellect assents when it judges the conception to be true" (De malo 6.1 ad 14), and that man's knowledge of God's existence is just his knowledge of the truth of the proposition that God is (Summa theologiae Ia, 3.4 ad 2). Such a doctrine offers nothing, of course, to those who wish to prove that man knows, and the infinite versatility of the reflective power it finds basic lacks the apparent solidity of a "look" or a premise, but it accords well with the self-correcting process by which Newman held man does in fact learn (Grammar 377).

See Also: TRUTH; UNDERSTANDING (INTELLECTUS).

Bibliography: P. ORTEGAT, Religion et intuition, 2 v. (Gembloux 1948). B. AYBAR, El realismo intuitivo (Tucumán, Argen. 1954). A. MASULLO, Intuizione e discorso (Naples 1955). P. MASLOW, Intuition versus Intellect (Valley Stream, N.Y. 1957). A. J. BAHM, Types of Intuition (Albuquerque 1961). M. A. BUNGE, Intuition and Science (pa. Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1962).

[F. E. CROWE]

INVESTITURE

Investiture (Lat. vestitura, investitura; Fr. investiture; Germ. Lehnung) is a ceremony comprising the symbolic surrender of the fief by the lord to his vassal. Its effect was to put the vassal in possession of his fief (see FEUDALISM). The Libri feudorum (2.2, pref.) call investiture in the strict sense possession or taking possession, i.e., the physical assumption of ownership of the fief (cf. investitura in the sense of possessio in Leges Langobardorum 2.52.17). The Libri consider the use of the word investitura, as designating a symbolic transfer of the right to the fief, to be an impermissible extension of the meaning. But this second sense of the word is the more usual in the Middle Ages.

King Dagobert investing St. Omer with crozier, 10th century.

Investiture must be distinguished from homage (homagium, hominium), by which the vassal declared himself to be the "man" of his overlord. He thereby assumed the responsibility of furnishing him with the services, especially military and court service, incurred as a result of the ownership of a fief. Homage, like fidelity (fidelitas), but in a stricter fashion, created a personal bond between vassal and lord. Investiture was concerned with the "material" aspect of the feudal contract, but obviously there was a close tie between the two concepts, and it is debated whether the personal relationship (homage) took precedence over the material relationship (freehold contract) or vice versa.

Investiture normally followed the rendering of homage (except in Italy, cf. Libri feudorum, 2.4), since the feudal lord did not hand over the fief until the vassal had acknowledged himself to be his man. Originally the personal engagement (homage) and the handing over of the fief (investiture) were not connected. There were vassals without a fief and fiefs granted to men who were not vassals. But by the 13th century the bond between homage and investiture was normal, and homage was sworn in order to obtain a fief (Établissements de Saint Louis, ed. Viollet 2:19).

The origin of the investiture ritual must be sought in the procedures for transfer of goods practiced in the Frankish period. The new owner was given possession by having placed in his hands an object symbolic of the real estate to be transferred (a clod of earth, a branch of a tree, a stalk of grain, a knife, a staff, or a glove). The symbols used for investiture were quite varied (C. Du Cange, Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae latinitatis, ed. L. Favre, 4:410–18, s.v. investitura, shows 98 of them in the charters of the 11th and 12th centuries). The most frequent were the rod or staff, the glove, the ring, the sword, and the oriflamme (M. Bloch, op. cit., 1:267 and plate V). For ecclesiastical fiefs, feudal lords used the cross and ring, symbols of episcopal or abbatial authority; the use of these symbols gave rise to violent conflicts (see INVESTITURE STRUGGLE).

Investiture took place in the presence of two witnesses drawn for the most part from among the peers of the new vassal. It was accompanied by the payment of a fee to the suzerain: the seisin fee, or the chamberlain fee paid to the chamberlain if the suzerain were a great feudal lord [cf. its limitation by Philip the Bold in the Ordinance of Aug. 1272 (Isambert, Recueil des anciennes lois 2:648; Loysel, Institutes coutumières, 4:3, 11)].

The new vassal could not take possession of his fief before the investiture on pain of forfeiture (Beaumanoir, Coutumes de Beauvaisis, ed. Salmon, nos 861 and 1398). After the investiture ceremony, an official document known as an enfeoffment or an instrument of enfeoffment was drawn up. This document was given to the vassal and served him as proof of possession. In time the drawing up and handing over of this document replaced the symbolic investiture.

Bibliography: M. BLOCH, Feudal Society, tr. L. A. MANYON (Chicago 1961). C. E. PERRIN, "La Société féodale," Revue historique 194 (1944) 23–41, 114–131. F. L. GANSHOF, Qu'est-ce que la féodalité (3d ed. Brussels 1957); Feudalism, tr. P. GRIERSON (New York 1952). H. MITTEIS, Lehnrecht und Staatsgewalt (Weimar 1933; new ed. Darmstadt 1958). R. BOUTRUCHE, Seigneurie et féodalité (Paris 1959–). For further bibliography, see INVESTITURE STRUGGLE.

[J. GAUDEMET]

INVESTITURE STRUGGLE

The conflict in which the Church, during the second half of the 11th and the first decades of the 12th century, opposed the power of lay feudal lords. It was settled in principle by the Concordat of WORMS (1122), but the long struggle between the PAPACY and the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE down to the middle of the 13th century was in fact its continuation.

The Issue. The investiture struggle originated in the dispute occasioned by the manner in which bishops were granted possession of ecclesiastical property by their overlords (see FEUDALISM). Being a feudal lord himself, the bishop received his temporal property by investiture, but the symbols used for this investiture, the crosier and ring, were equivocal. They could be understood to represent also the prelate's power of jurisdiction. While it was legitimate for the overlord to confer the temporalities (the fief) upon his vassal, the bishop, the Church could not admit the lord's pretensions to confer ecclesiastical power, the potestas jurisdictionis. A clear distinction between the two powers and an exact interpretation of the meaning of the symbols should have sufficed to avert any difficulties. In France IVO OF CHARTRES had contributed to a calmer climate by just such precise distinctions and interpretations; but in the Empire juridical controversy was the pretext for a political conflict of the gravest sort.

During the first half of the 11th century, princes and feudal lords had, in fact, laid hands upon bishoprics, abbeys, local churches, and ecclesiastical revenues. By appropriating to themselves the revenues derived from land and TITHES and by the appointment of bishops and pastors, they had become the masters of the Church. The 10th-century papacy (JOHN X) had tolerated such lay pretensions, and at the beginning of the 11th century THIETMAR OF MERSEBURG justified royal interference by pointing out that the sovereign was God's representative on earth (Chron. 1:26). At about the same time, however, the CLUNIAC reformers were planning to free the Church from the tutelage of the laity, and their ideas were adopted in Rome after the middle of the 11th century. The Roman See itself had been freed from lay ascendancy as a result of the Election decree of 1059, and the papacy under GREGORY VII (1073–85) reacted vigorously. The Roman synod of February 1075 forbade clerics to receive investiture from the hands of a layman. This head-on counterthrust against practices that were abuses unleashed the struggle, which would vary in intensity according to country.

The conflict assumed little importance in Italy, except insofar as some bishops involved themselves in the struggle between pope and emperor. In England and Germany, it was of immediate interest to the ruling houses, which, having generously endowed their bishoprics, had every intention of continuing to control the recruiting of the episcopate. In France also, the king was engaged in the struggle, but the problem was of equal concern for many feudal lords having bishops as vassals.

The Policy of Gregory VII. The Gregorian reformers had denounced lay investiture as a usurpation. For HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA (Adversus simoniacos 1057 or 1058; Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite 1), it was the “episcopal function” that was conferred by ring and staff, and such an investiture could not possibly be performed by laymen. It seemed also that the reform of the clergy, the struggle against SIMONY and clerical immorality begun in the middle of the 11th century, could succeed in reaching its goal only if the recruiting of the clergy were removed from the control of the laity. NICHOLAS II, in the Roman synod of April 1059, had forbidden “any cleric to receive in any way a church from the hands of laymen” (can. 6). This was, indeed, an early condemnation of lay investiture, but it was couched in very general terms, and no sanctions were attached. In the first years of his pontificate (1073–74), Gregory VII attacked only simony and clerical marriage (Nicolaitism). He put no bar on lay investitures either in France or in the Empire. But when his measures against clerical incontinence proved ineffective, Gregory VII proceeded in the Council of Rome of February 1075 to condemn lay investiture. The exact wording of the 1075 Decree is not known. The text advanced by Hugh of Flavigny (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 8:412) is too similar to that of the decree on investiture promulgated at the Council of 1080 to warrant much credence (Histoire de l’église depuis les origines jusqu’à nos jours, ed. A. Fliche and V. Martin). A letter of the pope to HUGH OF DIE (May 12, 1077) alluded to the 1075 decree: the intention was to repeat and render more precise canon 6 of the Lateran Synod of 1059 and to forbid bishops to receive their charges from the hands of laymen. But this text is also vague. Although it forbade laymen to presume to grant episcopal jurisdiction, it is questionable whether the pope did not tolerate the conferring by the lay feudal lord of the temporalities of the bishopric [on the immediacy with which this text was published, cf. G. B. Borino, Studi gregoriani 6 (1959–61) 329–348]. The ban on lay investiture in these general and therefore imprecise terms was renewed at the Roman synods of Nov. 19, 1078, and the spring of 1080. But the pope remained ready for compromise. The essential thing for him was to have higher clergy of quality. Wherever the prince was selecting good bishops, as in England and Normandy, the pope did not interfere. Consequently, there was no investiture struggle, properly speaking, either in England or in Spain.

In France, the decree, published after some hesitation and delay, was not strictly applied. Gregory was especially desirous of ending the traffic in bishoprics by which PHILIP I was giving a scandalous example. Hugh of Die, the papal legate, was ruthless with simonists, but tolerated lay intervention when it favored neither simony nor clerical marriage.

In the Empire, bishoprics were in the hands of HENRY IV. The king’s appointment of an archbishop for Milan, followed by his selection of mediocre candidates for Bamberg, Fermo, Spoleto, and Cologne (1075), provoked an explosion. But, in condemning the lay investiture of bishops, Gregory VII, as the successor of Peter, included a claim to a general supervision of the rule of princes. “In Germany, the investiture struggle was to be nothing more than one aspect of the struggle between the Sacerdotium and the Imperium” (Fliche). In an assembly held at Worms (Jan. 14, 1076), the German episcopate backed Henry, attacked Gregory VII, and refused any longer to consider him Pope. Gregory’s reply was Henry’s excommunication (Feb. 14, 1076). Abandoned by a part of the episcopate and threatened with condemnation by an assembly convoked at Augsburg, at which the pope was to preside on Feb. 2, 1077, Henry submitted at Canossa (Jan. 25–28, 1077). But the conflict soon broke out again. Henry was once more excommunicated at the council of March 7, 1080; his subjects were absolved from their oath of fidelity; and Gregory recognized Rudolph of Swabia as king. Henry convened an assembly at Brixen (June 25, 1080) that in turn deposed Gregory and elected in his stead Abp. GUIBERT OF RAVENNA who took the name of Clement III. The antipope, however, was not recognized by any country in Christendom, and Henry tried to impose him upon Rome by force of arms. Gregory VII was expelled from Rome, went into exile (1084), and died May 25, 1085.

Doctrinal Approaches. Doctrinal controversies concerning investiture were not, at the time of Gregory VII, as prominent as the political struggle itself. Rare indeed were the authors who would grapple with the problem, whether to support the king (letter of WENRICH OF TRIER, November 1080; the anonymous De investitura regali collectanea), or expound the papal thesis [Liber ad Gebhardum, of MANEGOLD OF LAUTENBACH (1084); Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite 1]. A compromise had to be found. It was outlined, from a doctrinal point of view, by Guido of Ferrara [De scismate Hildebrando (1086); Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite 1], who distinguished between the spiritual and the secular functions of the bishop. As a man of God, the bishop is the subject of the pope, but as the tenant of temporal goods, he is subject to lay power. Guido granted further that the prince might nominate the bishop. Forgeries of almost contemporary date were used to back up this claim. Thus the distinction between the two aspects of a bishop had not as yet provided an acceptable solution of the conflict. It was, nevertheless, the formula that, 30 years later, would make it possible to resolve the dilemma.

Under Urban II. After the pontificate of VICTOR III, URBAN II (1088–99) did not become master of Rome until 1094. The antipope Clement III returned to Ravenna and no longer challenged the authority of the legitimate pope. Urban's policy was flexible, and he sought to reestablish peace through indulgence and by making use of the theory of dispensation from the canons that the contemporary BERNOLD OF CONSTANCE was developing in his De excommunicatis vitandis. Such conciliatory policy ran counter to the theories expounded by Cardinal Deusdedit (see DEUSDEDIT, COLLECTION OF), who was most anxious to root out lay investiture. His doctrinal position as well as the excesses of such rulers as WILLIAM II OF ENGLAND and Philip I in France led the Pope to assert anew the Gregorian doctrine [Councils of Piacenza and Clermont (1095), Nîmes (1096), Bari (1098)]. Not only was lay investiture forbidden (Clermont can. 15–16), but so also was—and this was something new—any oath of loyalty by a bishop to a layman (ibid. can. 17). With the stiffening of the papal stand, concomitant though it was with the first attempts of Ivo of Chartres to find a solution of the conflict, the investiture struggle erupted more violently than ever. In France and England, however, a way to peace was to be found by Ivo and Hugh of Fleury, each taking a slightly different approach, but both operating via a more exact analysis of investiture and a sharp and clear distinction between the grant of ecclesiastical jurisdiction and the concession of temporal holdings. Hugh likewise permitted “investiture with things secular” by the lay lord, but even though a protagonist of the royal prerogative, he reserved to the archbishop the granting of ring and crosier.

The English Settlement. In England, LANFRANC OF CANTERBURY and the ANONYMOUS OF YORK (at least in the De Romano pontifice, c. 1104) likewise limited lay investiture to the granting “of power over the people and of the ownership of things temporal.” Shortly after, negotiations were initiated between HENRY I and ANSELM OF CANTERBURY. They led to an accord (1107) that eliminated lay investiture with ring and staff but admitted that the bishop owed the oath of vassalage to his suzerain in return for his fiefs. This meant sanctioning the theories of Hugh of Fleury; and the pope, who had been party to this compromise, showed himself less intransigent than the Councils of Clermont (1095) or Rome (1099) that had formally forbidden bishops to take the feudal oath. Consequently, there were scarcely any difficulties between the Holy See and Henry I (1100–35).

The French Solution. In France, the difficulties created by the designation of Stephen of Garland to Beauvais (1100) envenomed still further the conflict between Philip I and the papacy caused by the king's illicit relations with Bertrada de Montfort. However, in 1104, the sovereign was absolved from his excommunication, and the Beauvais affair was ably settled by the intervention of Ivo of Chartres. PASCHAL II, who had hoped for an accord with France, negotiated a settlement of the investiture question in 1107. Unfortunately, neither the form that the settlement took nor its precise terms are known. Canon 1 of the Council of Troyes (May 1107) formally forbade the investiture of a bishop, and during the reign of LOUIS VI, bishops were not invested by the King, although they did swear fealty to him. Here again, without benefit of an actual concordat, the ideas of Ivo of Chartres triumphed.

Germany in the Early 12th Century. Only in Germany, under Henry IV (d. 1106) and his successor HENRY V, who was determined to safeguard his right of investiture, did the struggle become violent. Veritable war ensued, with the king proceeding to the appointment of bishops and the pope again forbidding lay investiture (Lateran Council, 1100). The opposing themes were the object of two important treatises: the Tractatus de investitura episcoporum (1109; Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite 2), written by a cleric of Liège at the request of Henry V, and the Liber de anulo et baculo by Rangerius of Lucca (1100; ibid.). However, a radical solution was suggested by the legates of Paschal II, who, in order to outlaw lay investiture, declared that the pope was ready to abandon in the name of the bishops all their temporal holdings. This solution was the Concordate of Sutri (1111; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Constitutiones 1:140). But Henry V made its implementation contingent upon ratification by the German Episcopate. As was expected, the bishops, whom the concordate exposed to the risk of losing their fortune, refused to ratify. But Paschal II, prisoner of Henry V and as such, subjected to grave pressure, was constrained to grant the king the investiture of bishops and abbots, provided their election had not been simoniacal (April 1111). His promise (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Constitutiones 1:144), extorted by violence, was not considered binding by the Italian and French clergy. A Council held in the Lateran (March 1112) annulled the privilegium extorted by Henry V and restored the Gregorian principles. Without submitting to the urgings of those prelates who were pressing him to break with Henry V and to excommunicate him, Paschal II reaffirmed the condemnation of lay investiture during the last years of his pontificate. At his death (1118), Henry V set up the antipope Gregory VIII to oppose GELASIVS II, chosen by the cardinals and the Roman clergy. The conflict broke out again. Gelasius excommunicated the Emperor and his antipope. But the pope wanted peace and knew that it would come only through arbitration. He hoped, perhaps, that Louis VI would provide mediation, but Gelasius died at Cluny

(Jan. 29, 1119) on his way to meet the king at Vézelay. His successor, Guy of Vienne, who took the name CALLISTUS II, showed himself an intransigent adversary of lay investiture, even though he was a relative of the emperor. But he wanted peace and sought the path of compromise in the doctrines of Chartres whose success he assured. He thus showed himself more moderate than his former partner in intransigence, GEOFFREY OF VENDÔME, who in 1118–19 published his Tractatus de ordinatione episcoporum et de investitura laicorum. Geoffrey held investiture to be a “sacrament” and declared that receiving it from lay hands meant “casting that which is holy to the dogs.”

Concordat of Worms. In 1119, Callistus II commissioned the abbot of Cluny and WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX, Bishop of Chalons, two Frenchmen who were familiar with the compromise solution that had been adopted in France, to explain its advantages to Henry V (Strasbourg colloquy). After fruitless negotiation at Mouzon (October 1119), an accord was reached that was articulated in two declarations comprising the Concordat of WORMS (Sept. 23, 1122; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Constitutiones 1:159). The emperor renounced investiture with ring and staff and guaranteed freedom of elections. The pope consented to elections held “in the presence of the emperor” and to his granting the regalia to the newly elected prelate by investiture with the scepter. Thus the Chartres distinction between the spiritual and the temporal in the bishopric, complemented by the distinction of dual investiture, by ring and staff for the spiritual, and by scepter for the temporal—a distinction clearly made by an anonymous French treatise, the Defensio Paschalis papae, c. 1122, (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite)—finally triumphed in the Empire as it had 15 years previously in England and France.

Bibliography: E. BERNHEIM, Quellen zur Geschichte des Investiturstreites, 2 v. (Leipzig 1913). Z. N. BROOKE, The English Church and the Papacy from the Conquest to the Reign of John (Cambridge 1931); Lay Investiture and Its Relation to the Conflict of Empire and Papacy (London 1940). G. TELLENBACH, Church, State, and Christian Society at the Time of the Investiturestreites, tr. R. F. BENNETT (Oxford 1959). A. FLICHE, La Querelle des Investitures (Paris 1946); “Grégoire VII à Canossa, a-t-il réintégré Henri IV dans sa fonction royale?” Studi gregoriani (1947) 373–386. A. BRACKMANN, “Gregor VII und die kirchliche Reformbewegung in Deutschland,” ibid. 2 (1947) 7–30. A. GWYNN, “Gregory VII and the Irish Church,” ibid. 3 (1948) 105–128. H. L. MIKOLETZKY, “Bemerkungen zu einer Vorgeschichte des Investiturstreites,” ibid. 3 (1948) 233–285. G. B. BORINO, “L’investitura laica dal decreto di Nicolò II al decreto di Gregorio VII,” ibid. 5 (1956) 345–359. H. X. ARQUILLIÈRE, “Le Sens juridique de l’absolution de Canossa,” Actes du Congrès de droit canonique (Paris 1950) 157–164. A. BECKER, Studien zum Investiturstreit in Frankreich (Saarbrücken 1955). N. F. CANTOR, Church, Kingship, and Lay Investiture in England, 1089–1135 (Princeton 1958). H. HOFFMANN, “Ivo von Chartres und die Lösung des Investiturstreites,” Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 15 (1959) 393–440. H. G. KRAUSE, Das Papstwahldekret von 1059 und seine Rolle im Investiturstreit (Studi gregoriani 7; 1960). A. HOFMEISTER, Das Wormser Konkordat. Zum Streit um seine Bedeutung, mit einer textkritischen Beilage, new edition with foreword by R. SCHMIDT (Darmstadt 1962). T. SCHIEFFER, “Cluny et la querelle des Investitures,” Revue historique 225 (1961) 47–72. R. SPRANDEL, Ivo von Chartres (Stuttgart 1962). J. FLECKENSTEIN, ed., Investiturstreit und Reichsverfassung (Sigmaringen 1973). R. SCHIEFFER, Die Entstehung des päpstlichen Investiturstreites für den deutschen König, (Stuttgart 1981). U.-R. BLUMENTHAL, The Investiture Controversy: Church and Monarchy from the Ninth to the Twelfth Century (Philadelphia 1988). H. E. J. COWDREY, Pope Gregory VII, 1073–1085 (Oxford 1998).

[J. GAUDEMET]

INVOLUNTARITY

Involuntarity is the privation of VOLUNTARITY; a characteristic of acts performed through ignorance of the circumstances or under compulsion. The voluntary act is one performed with an adequate knowledge of the circumstances and without external restraint or force. Any deficiency in the relevant knowledge, any compulsion from outside forces, thus deprives an act of its voluntariness.

The act done under compulsion may be defined as one whose source is outside the agent and to which the agent contributes nothing. One who is seized and borne away against his wishes, who is compelled to go where his captors take him, is not held responsible for such activity. Acts done in FEAR present more difficulties. The captain who, out of fear of sinking, orders his cargo to be thrown overboard cannot be said to be doing what he wants to do, at least not without qualification. He certainly does not want to lose his cargo. He does, however, want to save ship, self, and crew; and if the jettisoning of the cargo is the sole means of securing the ship, then in these precise circumstances he does voluntarily jettison his cargo. ARISTOTLE speaks of such acts as mixing voluntariness and involuntariness; he suggests that, considered concretely, acts done out of fear are voluntary. [See FORCE AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY; FORCE AND FEAR (CANNON LAW)].

Not every IGNORANCE deprives an act of its voluntariness. St. THOMAS AQUINAS distinguishes three kinds of ignorance: concomitant, consequent, and antecedent (Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 6.8). (1) Concomitant ignorance does not necessarily render an act involuntary, as in the case of a man who wants to kill his enemy and does kill him while mistakenly thinking he is shooting a bear. Since the result, when he discovers it, does not go contrary to his desires, he can hardly be said to have acted involuntarily. (2) One can desire ignorance in order to escape responsibility. For example, one who has difficulty with purity may choose not to inform himself of his obligations lest the knowledge hamper his activities. So too one whose disordered appetites prevent him from thinking of what he knows he should do ignores the moral dimensions of his situation. In both these cases, ignorance is consequent upon freedom and does not make the acts done in such ignorance involuntary. (3) The kind of ignorance that makes acts involuntary is antecedent and innocent; when one is unaware, for example, that his target is not an enemy but a comrade. A sign that he has acted contrary to his wishes is the sorrow and anguish that follow upon the shock of recognition.

Iona Abbey. (©Kevin Schafer/CORBIS)

(For bibliog. see VOLUNTARITY; HUMAN ACT.)

[R. M. MCINERNY]

IONA (HY), ABBEY OF

Former monastery on the island of Iona, part of the Inner Hebrides, Argyllshire, Scotland (Latin, Insula Iova, of which Iona is a misreading). This Celtic island monastery, which was founded in 563 by COLUMBA OF IONA and was ruled by priest-abbots, was the most distinguished center of Irish religious life up to the end of the 7th century. Its phenomenal growth was attributable in part to the fact that Columba and his successors (usually his kinsmen) were closely related to Irish kings. Iona was regarded as the head of the Irish Church and of the Christian Scots in North Britain. From it the Picts received the faith and Columba's successors converted the English of Northumbria (c. 637) in less than half a century. Controversy about the acceptance of Roman customs after the decision of Whitby in 664 split its monks and precipitated its decline. However, until the Scandinavian raids of the 9th century (see NORMANS), Iona remained the primatial church in the paruchia (which consisted of at least 42 churches in Ireland and 57 in Scotland). Then the primacy passed to abbots in Ireland, usually to KELLS. Iona had a brief period of resurgence c. 844, when Kenneth mac Alpin succeeded to the Pictish throne. There were CULDEES at Iona in the 12th century, and it remained Celtic to c. 1204, when the BENEDICTINES took over. Iona was dissolved and dismantled during the Reformation in Scotland.

Bibliography: Adamnan's Life of Columba, ed. and tr. A. O. and M. O. ANDERSON (New York 1962). A. O. ANDERSON, ed. and tr., Early Sources of Scottish History, A.D. 500–1286, 2 v. (Edinburgh 1922) 1:17–71. W. REEVES, ed., The Life of St. Columba . . . by Adamnan (Dublin 1857). A. BELLESHEIM, History of the Catholic Church of Scotland, tr. D. O. HUNTER-BLAIR, 4 v. (Edinburgh 1887–90) 1:55–148. R. A. S. MACALISTER, "An Inventory of the Ancient Monuments . . . of Iona," in Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland 48 (1913–14) 421–430. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 7.2:1425–61. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 1:422–448, 629–630. A. K. PORTER, The Crosses and Culture of Ireland (New Haven 1931) 38–62. W. BONSER, An Anglo-Saxon and Celtic Bibliography, 450–1087, 2 v. (Berkeley 1957). F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 699–700. D. E. EASSON, Medieval Religious Houses: Scotland (London 1957).

[C. MCGRATH]

IOWA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in the north central part of the U.S., Iowa is bounded on the north by Minnesota, on the east by Wisconsin and Illinois, on the south by Missouri, and on the west by Nebraska and South Dakota. The Mississippi River forms the east border; the Missouri and Big Sioux the west. It was the 29th state admitted to the Union (Dec. 28, 1846). Des Moines is its capital and largest city. The Catholic population was 526,635 in 2001, about 19 percent of the total population of 2.7 million.

History. Half a dozen prehistoric cultures preceded the score of tribes that are connected with Iowa history since the coming of European settlers. The later tribes included three linguistic stocks: Iroquoian, Algonquian, and Dakotan or Siouan (to which the Ioways belonged). As far as is known, the first whites to see Iowa were the French, specifically the men of the Jolliet-Marquette expedition, who went down the Mississippi in 1673. More than a century passed with only occasional visits from trappers, explorers, and the military before Julien Dubuque (d. 1810) from French Canada made the first settlement (1788) in the area that bears his name. When Napoleon sold Louisiana to the United States in 1803, Iowa became a part of the United States but was not organized as a separate Iowa Territory until 1838. In 1846 a constitution set the boundaries, and in the same year Iowa became the 29th state. The capital, originally at Iowa City, was moved to Des Moines (1857).

When the Black Hawk purchase (1832) opened eastern Iowa for claims, the movement of settlers began and with it the establishment of the Catholic Church in Iowa. The first missionary was C. F. VAN QUICKENBORNE, SJ, in southeast Iowa (1832). Others followed quickly, the most famous being S. MAZZUCHELLI, OP, who, in the years after 1835, helped to found most of the early churches from Dubuque south to the Missouri border (see DAVENPORT, DIOCESE OF). Church foundations in central and western Iowa were delayed until after 1850; in 1860 the only places in western Iowa with permanent pastors were Des Moines, Council Bluffs, and Fort Dodge.

In 1837 Mathias LORAS became bishop of the new Diocese of Dubuque, an area that included all of Iowa and reached north to Canada. Eventually, three more dioceses were created in Iowa, and in 1893 Dubuque became an archbishopric. The present Province of Dubuque is coextensive with the state of Iowa. The suffragans include the Dioceses of Davenport, established (1881) in the southern half of the state; Sioux City, formed (1902) from the western part of the Dubuque archdiocese; and Des Moines, fashioned (1911) from the western part of the Davenport diocese. In 1986 the Roman Catholic Bishops of the four dioceses established the Iowa Catholic Conference that enables them to collaborate in matters of interdiocesan and statewide interest. It is structured to include representation of the clergy, religious, and laity. Its headquarters are located in Des Moines.

Beginning with the Western Star of Dubuque in 1858, Iowa has had a number of Catholic papers, owned and edited by laymen, including the Daily American Tribune of Dubuque (1920–42). In 2001 each diocese owned its own weekly diocesan paper: the Dubuque Witness (1921), the Davenport Catholic Messenger (1882), the

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of Dubuque	1893
Diocese of Davenport	1881
Diocese of Des Moines	1911
Diocese of Sioux City	1902

Sioux City Globe (1949), and the Des Moines Catholic Mirror (formerly, Catholic Messenger, 1937).

Immigrant Ancestry. Although the earliest European influences in what became the state of Iowa were decidedly Catholic—French Jesuit missionaries, adventurers and trappers—Catholics have been a minority since the state was admitted to the Union in 1846. Iowa's early Catholic population included Irish and German immigrants in northeastern Iowa, in and around the city of Dubuque, seat of the first bishop, Mathias Loras, who himself was a French immigrant.

Settlers from Europe and other American states in the nineteenth century increased the state's Catholic population, but their numbers were dwarfed by Protestant migrants from both the North and South in the U.S. and by German and Scandinavian immigrants. German Catholics settled as farmers and helped to establish numerous parishes in rural Iowa. One of the most prominent outposts of rural German Catholics, was Carroll County in west central Iowa, named for Charles Carroll, the only Catholic to sign the Declaration of Independence. In addition to their presence in Dubuque, Davenport, Sioux City, and other urban areas, rural Iowa was also home to many Catholics of Irish ancestry. Emmetsburg, in northwest Iowa's Palo Alto County, was named for the Irish patriot Robert Emmet. Other ethnic groups that were well represented among Iowa's Catholic population were the Bohemians and Czechs, who migrated in the late nineteenth century to Cedar Rapids and Iowa City in eastern Iowa.

In the realm of public affairs and politics, Catholic voters in Iowa had long been identified with the Democratic Party, dating back to the period before the Civil War. As with Catholics in other states, their partisan allegiances was in part a result of their sense of themselves as a distinct cultural minority was vulnerable to the ambitions of a Protestant majority determined to define moral behavior and social values for all. During the Civil War, Dennis Mahoney of Dubuque, a Democratic politician and newspaper editor who was also one of the state's most prominent Catholics, was arrested and imprisoned for his criticism of the Lincoln Administration. Although many Iowa Catholics were less than enthusiastic, at least initially, about the prospect of fighting a war to free the slaves, many Iowa Catholics did serve in the U.S. army and Bishop Clement Smyth of Dubuque was a strong and outspoken supporter of the cause of the union.

St. Ambrose Cathedral, Des Moines, Iowa. (©Richard Cummins/CORBIS)

Nativist Opposition. Iowa Catholics were the target of prejudice and nativism that flared up from time to time. In the 1880s, a group of Iowans, led by Henry F. Bowers, established the American Protective Association in Clinton. The men had become alarmed when a local Catholic priest had apparently tried to influence the votes of his parishioners in an election, although local political and economic factors also played a role in the APA's origins. The group distributed its own newspaper, named the Menace, as it tried to revive long held suspicions that Catholics could not be considered fully American because of their religious connections to Rome. The APA was an active organization for nearly a decade, as it sponsored lectures by former priests and nuns, or those claiming to be such, who described the horrors of life inside church and convent walls. One APA speaker incited a crowd in Keokuk, Iowa, to violence in 1892, although no one was killed in the chaos. Several Iowa Catholics were outspoken critics of the APA, notably Father Joseph Nugent of Des Moines.

The KU KLUX KLAN, an important cultural force in the Midwest in the 1920s, was active in Davenport and Des Moines, among other cities in Iowa. In rural areas of the state, the Klan succeeded in pressuring local school boards not to hire Catholic teachers in the public schools. When Al Smith ran for President in 1928, the first Catholic to be nominated by a major party, he was the target of anti-Catholic rhetoric and imagery, including materials published in some of the state's leading newspapers. John F. Kennedy did not meet with the same overt religious hostility in 1960 that Smith had in 1928. This apparent increase in tolerance can be attributed in part to the way Catholics proved themselves loyal patriots in World War II. One prominent example that gained a good deal of notoriety, both locally and nationally, was the heroism of the five Sullivan brothers, scions of a Catholic family from Waterloo, Iowa, who lost their lives when their ship, the USS Juneau, was sunk in the Pacific in 1942.

Social Activism. In contrast to the nineteenth century when the Catholic Church in the United States remained silent on major socio-economic issues such as slavery, in the twentieth century Catholics, both clergy and laity, began to move into the public sphere and engage pressing issues. The National Catholic Rural Life Conference, founded in 1923, moved its headquarters to Des Moines in 1941. The conference has sought to strengthen the presence of the Catholic Church in the countryside. The NCRLC has become a vocal advocate for family farmers and a critic of economic conditions and practices that have forced many people in Iowa and other farming states off the land. The Catholic Church has had a high profile in many parts of rural Iowa. One Catholic community that was recognized for the strong faith of its parishioners and the distinctive gothic architecture of their parish church is in rural Dyersville, Dubuque County. In 1956 Pope Pius XII elevated the church of St. Francis to the rank of a Minor Basilica,

In the 1950s a group of socially concerned Catholics formed the Davenport League for Social Justice. It worked to counter racial discrimination and to make affordable housing accessible to the poor. In the early 1960s, the Quad Cities—Davenport and Bettendorf in Iowa, Moline and Rock Island in Illinois—were home to a Catholic Interracial Conference. The Conference undertook a study of racially based discrimination and organized civil rights rallies. In 1982 Catholic Worker houses were established in Waterloo and Cedar Rapids. Their ministry to the urban poor is modeled on the work done by Dorothy DAY at the original Catholic Workers House in New York City.

Early in the 1970s Catholics, both clergy and laity, were active in successfully lobbying the Iowa legislature against changing state laws prohibiting abortion. After the Supreme Court handed down the Roe vs. Wade decision in 1973 that essentially legalized abortion across the United States, Iowa Catholics became increasingly active in the Pro-life movement. Priests have spoken firmly against the practice of abortion from the pulpit, and priests and laity alike have joined in prayer meetings and Pro-life rallies demonstrating against abortion. One political consequence of the Church's stance on the abortion issue was that monolithic Catholic support for the Democratic Party in Iowa began to break up in the final decades of the twentieth century. The change in Iowa politics was reflected in the election of the state's first Catholic governor, Republican Terry Branstad, in 1982. After serving for four terms (sixteen years), Branstad was succeeded in the governor's office by another Catholic, Democrat Tom Vilsack.

Changing Patterns. The Catholic population of Iowa, long identified with German, Irish, Czech, and Bohemian immigrants and their descendants, became more diversified in the final decades of the twentieth century. Hispanic communities, largely consisting of Mexicans, established themselves in towns such as Columbus Junction, West Liberty and Muscatine, Storm Lake and Marshalltown, among others. Much of this migration was driven by economic factors, as these immigrants, most of whom are Catholic, came to Iowa in search of work in meatpacking plants and related industries. In addition, since the 1970s, there have been significant influxes of Vietnamese Catholic immigrants to cities such as Des Moines and Iowa City.

In October of 1979, Iowa garnered international attention when Pope John Paul II visited the state. Although Iowa had a lower percentage of Catholics in its population than did neighboring states, the Pope wanted to visit a rural setting and emphasize the important values involved in stewardship over the land and the connections between rural people and God. While in Iowa, John Paul II celebrated an outdoor Mass at Living History Farm Site near Des Moines, drawing a crowd estimated at 350,000, the biggest crowd to gather for any event in the state's history. The pontiff also visited St. Patrick's Church, a rural parish near Cumming in central Iowa, as he emphasized the theme of the taking proper care of the land as "God's stewards" in a place where agriculture loomed so large in Iowans understanding of their state's history and culture. The Pope's visit was named by readers of the Des Moines Register, the state's most influential newspaper, as the most important event in Iowa's history.

Capital: Teheran.
Size: 636,372 sq. miles.
Population: 65,619,636 in 2000.
Languages: Farsi (Persian); Turkic, Kurdish, Luri, Balochi, Arabic, and Turkish are spoken in various regions.
Religions: Shi'a Muslim 58,401,476 (89%), Sunni Muslim 6,561,900 (10%), Jewish 196,859 (.3%), Catholic (various rites) 393,714 (.6%), Baha'i and Zoroastrian 65,687 (.1%).

Bibliography: W. J. PETERSEN, The Story of Iowa, 4 v. (New York 1952); comp., Iowa History Reference Guide (Iowa City 1942; repr. 1952). C. COLE, Iowa Through the Years (Iowa City 1940). J. F. KEMPKER, History of the Catholic Church in Iowa (Iowa City 1887). M. M. HOFFMANN, ed., Centennial History of the Archdiocese of Dubuque (Dubuque 1938). M. K. GALLAGHER, ed., Seed Harvest: A History of the Archdiocese of Dubuque. (Dubuque 1987). M. M. SCHMIDT, Seasons of Growth: History of the Diocese of Davenport, 1881-1981 (Davenport, Iowa 1981).

[R. J. WELCH/J. K. DUNCAN]

IRAN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located on a plateau in western Asia, Iran is bordered on the north by the Caspian Sea, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Turkmenistan, on the east by Afghanistan and Pakistan, on the south by the Persian Gulf and the Gulf of Oman, and on the west by Iraq and Turkey. Although rich in petroleum, natural gas, and other minerals, Iran is plagued by droughts, floods, and dust storms, and its climate combines with its rugged terrain to leave only 30 percent of the country available for farming. While sales of oil and other raw materials have created wealth within the country, half Iran's population live below the poverty line. An Islamic republic since 1979, Iran was known as PERSIA until 1935.

Three branches of the Catholic Church operate within Iran. CHALDEAN rite Catholics belong to the Archdiocese of Urmya, whose suffragan see, Salmas (erected in 1847), is united to it ad personam, an archeparchy located at Ahwaz, and an eparchy, or diocese, at Ispahan. The LATIN RITE Church has an archdiocese located in Ispahan, immediately subject to the Holy See. The Armenian Rite Church has an eparchy created in 1850 and located, as well, in Ispahan.

Early Church History. As a part of what then constituted Asia Minor, Persia fell under the domination of Alexander the Great in 327 B.C. Coming from a tradition of pantheism established within their own culture and influenced by the Hellenic traditions promoted under Alexander, few Persians were attracted to Christianity. Although by the end of the 1st century the earliest Christian communities outside the Roman Empire were located in Persia, Christianity was still primarily the religion of minority ethnic groups, predominately Syrians. Because of its presentation as a universal cult demanding adherence, the new religion quickly encountered opposition from the official pagan cult. When Constantine I became Roman emperor early in the 4th century, he had a vision of a flaming cross; realizing this to be a Christian symbol, he was prompted to extend special privileges to the growing number of Christians living in his vast empire. Such preferential treatment by a neighboring Roman ruler caused Persian authorities to question the loyalty of Persian Christians. This nascent discrimination—a result of the continuing political hostility between Greeks and Romans—led to the long series of bloody persecutions begun in 340 under Shapur II (309–379). By the end of Shapur’s reign, the Church in Persia was almost wholly cut off from Western contacts and developed in its own fashion. In 424 the Synod of Markabta effectively declared its autonomy. Late in the 5th century, while Zoroastrianism had established itself as the state religion, NESTORIANISM became predominant among Persia’s Christians. After the Arab invasion in 642 Islam was adopted by most of the populace. After this point Christians declined in numbers, although they engaged in missionary activity during the Middle Ages and even flourished for a time after the Mongol invasion (1220).

Catholic missionaries from the West labored in Persia with only slight success following the Middle Ages. Dominicans were active from the 14th to the 18th century. Augustinians, Carmelites, Capuchins, and Jesuits arrived in the 17th century; Vincentians, in 1839. The most sizeable increment to Christianity in Persia came from the immigration of Armenians, followers of MONOPHY-SITISM, especially at the beginning of the 17th century, when large numbers of them were deported from their homeland. Armenian Rite Monophysites continued to constitute the largest group of Christians in Iran through the 20th century. While religious liberty was granted in 1834, Christians were massacred in Persia as late as 1918.

The Church under Islamic Fundamentalism. By the mid-1960s there were 28,000 Latin rite Catholics, 100,000 Armenian Catholics, and 13,000 Chaldean Catholics present in Iran. The Holy See maintained an internuncio at Teheran, and Iran had an ambassador at the Vatican. However, Catholics still represented only a small segment of Iran's population, and the rise of Muslim activism in the coming years would mark them more strongly as outcasts within Iranian society.

In 1979 increasing political instability—the result of rising interference by Western businesses eager to profit from the nation's vast oil reserves—forced Iran's ruling shah into exile. On April 1, 1979, shortly after imposing martial law, Islamic fundamentalist Ruhollah Khomeini (1900–89) pronounced Iran an Islamic republic and began enforcement of strict Islamic traditions. Together with Zoroastrians and Jews, Christians were recognized as a "minority religion" under the new Iranian constitution of 1980; they were "free to act within their own canon" in religious matters, were extended protection of life and property, and were allowed representation in the republic's new parliament. However, the activities of non-Farsi-speaking religions such as Armenian Catholics were deemed "detrimental to the fundamental health of Islam" and as such were singled out for discriminatory treatment, including the prohibition of the importation of bibles into Iran. Over 70 Catholic missionaries left the country following the government's nationalization of church-run organizations, and the ability of Catholics to travel across Iran's borders was closely monitored.

While the government has become slightly more accepting of Western traditions since Khomeini's death in 1989, Iran continues to be plagued by religious intolerance, particularly against followers of the outlawed Baha'i faith, who were declared to have committed "crimes against God." Iran's actions against religious minorities prompted statements of concern from the U.S. State Department as late as 2000. In addition, in March 1999 Pope John Paul II received Iranian President Mohammed Khatami at the Vatican to discuss means of improving relations between Muslims and Christians.

Bibliography: D. ATTWATER, The Christian Churches of the East, 2 v. (rev. ed. Milwaukee 1961–62). R. ETTELDORF, The Catholic Church in the Middle East (New York 1959). N. R. KEDDIE, Iran: Religion, Politics, and Society, (London 1990). R. MAYER and W. DE

Capital: Baghdad.

Size: 252,116 sq. miles.

Population: 22,675,620 in 2000.

Languages: Arabic, Kurdish, Assyrian, Armenian.

Religions: 470,000 Catholics (2%), 7,811,320 Sunni Muslims (34%), 14,060,300 Shi'a Muslims (62%), 334,000 Protestants (2%).

Ecclesiastical organizations: Iraq has a Latin-rite archdiocese in Baghdad, but Eastern Catholic churches predominate.

The Chaldean Catholic Church had a patriarchate at Babylon with suffragans Alquoch, Amadiyah, Aqra, Baghdad, (the patriarchal see), Sulaimaniya, and Zakho; an archdiocese at Kirkul, and archeparchies at Arbil, Basra, and Mosul. The Armenian Catholic Church has an archeparchy at Baghdad. The Syrian Catholic Church has archeparchies at Baghdad and Mosul.

VRIES, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:283–287. Bilan du Monde. Encyclopédie catholique du monde chrétien, 2 v. (2d ed. Tournai 1964) 2:490–495.

[T. P. JOYCE/EDS.]

IRAQ, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Iraq, located in the Middle East, is bordered by on the north by Turkey, on the east by Iran, on the southeast by Kuwait, on the south and southwest by Saudi Arabia, and on the west by Jordan and Syria. Predominately a desert, the region rises to mountains and desert plateau in the north and falls to grassy wetlands in the south. The Tigris and Euphrates rivers cross the region from north to south, although the water, highly saline, is no natural aid to agriculture. Winters are mild, with melting snows causing flooding in the south, while summers are hot and dry. Sandstorms and dust storms are common in the central region. The greater part of Iraq's economy is derived from its petroleum reserves, while other natural resources include natural gas, phosphates and sulphur. Agriculture, which employs most of the nation's work force, includes such crops as wheat, barley, rice, dates, cotton, vegetables and livestock.

The heart of Iraq, the "cradle of civilization," is the Tigris-Euphrates basin, ancient MESOPOTAMIA, which was ruled successively by Babylonians, Assyrians, Achaemenid Persians, Seleucid Greeks, Parthian and Sassanid Persians, Arabs, Mongols, Safawid Persians and Ottoman Turks. A British mandate from 1920 to 1932 and a constitutional monarchy beginning in 1921, Iraq became a republic in 1958 under a series of military governments. In July of 1979 Saddam Hussein gained control, and began a series of aggressive maneuvers in the Middle East that ultimately resulted in the involvement of U.S. troops to repel Iraq's invasion of neighboring Kuwait in 1991. Hussein's acquisition of long-range missiles and his support of terrorist activities caused him to remain a threat to world peace. An international trade embargo was levied against the region in 1991, although an oil-for-food program initiated by the United Nations in 1996 helped to counter the economic hardship to the region's civilian population.

History. Iraq was invaded by Arab forces in the 7th century, and was incorporated as part of the Ottoman Empire in 1534. Islam remained the predominate influence, despite the occupation of British forces during World War I. A British-backed monarchy lasted from 1921 to 1958, during which time Catholic and other Christian faiths gained strength in the region. Although Islam was the state religion, religious liberty was guaranteed by the constitution of 1921 and maintained by the monarchy.

Iraqi Christians during New Year's Day Mass, Boutros Church, Baghdad. (©AP/Wide World Photos)

Most Iraqi Catholics were of the Chaldean RITE, while non-Catholic Christian communities included GREEK ORTHODOX, JACOBITES, NESTORIANS and Protestants. The majority of Catholics lived in the north of Iraq, as well as in Baghdad. Reflective of the concerns of the period, a Chaldean synod of 1957 dealt with administration, discipline, liturgy and Catholic Action. Iraq established diplomatic relations with the Holy See in 1966.

The monarchy of King Faisal I fell in 1958, and a coup ten years later brought a militaristic government to power. Quashing sporadic struggles for independence by the region's Kurdish population in the north teamed with the government's ongoing repression of Iraq's Shi'a Muslim leadership and militaristic foreign policy to create a climate of intolerance, the government acted against criticism of its policies by outspoken religious leaders and others. Sunni Muslims, although a minority of the population, continued to act as the country's elite, with an influential role in both government and business.

Their brutal repressions against Shi'a Muslims, as well as against other faiths, resulted in violence to both Church members and Church property. Assyrian Catholics came under increasing fire during the late 1980s when the government suspected them of aiding Kurdish rebels in the north, and in 1988 many Assyrian churches were destroyed by the military. In addition, increasing Islamic fundamentalism during the 1990s resulted in a number of incidences of mob violence against Catholics and other Christians living in the north. Neither the Chaldean nor the Syrian rites were recognized by the government as religions, although they were known to be the descendants of Iraq's first Christian communities, their services performed in the Syriac language.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 82 parishes of various Catholic rites, tended by a total of 104 diocesan and 26 religious priests. Other religious in the country included approximately 20 brothers and 350 sisters, many of whom tended to the humanitarian concerns of the region. Chaldean Patriarch Raphael I. Bidawid and his bishops in particular used their influence as the largest Catholic community—Chaldeans numbered approximately 400,000 by 2000—to loudly protest both the continued international embargo of the country and the repeated bombings by U.S. troops from 1998 through 2000. Church leaders claimed that the true victims were the poor and infirm, as well as the very young. Pope John Paul II also spoke out forcefully and repeatedly against the embargo as a cause of poverty, disease and death. The pope's advocacy of peace and his public statements, such as his entreaty in April of 2001 that "innocent people should not be made to pay the consequences of a destructive war whose effects are still being felt by those who are weakest and most vulnerable" earned him the thanks of Saddam Hussein as well as the acknowledgment of U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan. In 1996 a U.S. Catholic group called Voices in the Wilderness defied a ban against travel to Iraq and began a continued program of bringing medicine and other aid to the region. A proposed visit to Iraq by Pope John Paul II in December of 1999 was ultimately suspended following concerns about the mixed impact the pontiff's visit would have.

Bibliography: Église vivante, 5–16 (1953–64). Bilan du Monde, 2: 486–490. Oriente Cattolico.

[J. A. DEVENNY/EDS.]

IRELAND, CHURCH OF

The Anglican church in Ireland, in communion with the Church of England, claims succession from the Roman Catholic Church established in Ireland in the 5th century by St. PATRICK and others. Henry VIII demanded from his subjects in Ireland, as he had from those in England, the recognition of himself as supreme head of the Church, and by parliamentary enactments he declared illegal the jurisdiction of the pope (1536). These changes were made possible through the reconquest of the English Pale in Ireland after the Geraldine rebellion (1534). The same changes were formally accepted by the clergy in this area but they obstructed George BROWN, who was nominated by Henry VIII as archbishop of Dublin. Contacts were maintained with the Holy See in the Gaelic independent lordships. The Anglo-Irish showed greater hostility toward Protestantism under Edward VI and quickly reverted to Catholicism under Mary I. As in England, the church was reconciled to Rome by Cardinal Reginald Pole. Accordingly only those clergy who had married were deprived, and Protestantism was permitted privately to the few English officials.

Elizabeth I to the 19th Century. The Elizabethan religious settlement finally handed over the fabric of the church to the Protestant clergy, who, however, lost the great majority of the people to the Counter Reformation missionaries. Adam Loftus, as archbishop of Dublin, maintained a more puritanical movement than would be permitted in England by Queen ELIZABETH I. As first provost of Trinity College, Dublin, he imported Cambridge Puritan divines. A more Calvinistic element became strengthened by the Scottish infiltration into early 17th-century Ulster. Substantial endowments were given to the church in the plantations. Under Charles I's viceroy, Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, working with the Laudian Bp. John Bramhall of Derry, pressure was imposed on landed proprietors to increase diocesan and parochial property while Calvinistic tendencies, particularly in the north, were discouraged. Ulster Scots sympathized with the anti-Laudian Bishop's War in Scotland (1638). After the Irish Catholics rebelled in 1641, the Church of Ireland lost ground. It was treated as disestablished by Oliver Cromwell, and the victorious parliamentarians, who substituted independent Congregationalism, tolerated PRESBYTERIANISM but persecuted Episcopalianism (ANGLICANISM) as well as Catholicism. After the restoration of Charles II, this reestablished church, while secure in the support of the army and the landed classes, had only one-eleventh of the population of 1,100,000 (there being twice as many Presbyterians) and did not improve its situation further despite penal laws against Catholic and Protestant conformists (see SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF).

Few Episcopalians (Anglicans) favored James II, but after the war in Ireland, only a small minority led by Charles Lesley refused to abjure the exiled monarch and became known as nonjurors. The declaration against transubstantiation, imposed on officeholders after 1689, strengthened the Calvinistic trend of Anglicanism. Presbyterianism, however, did not improve its public situation after the revolution, unlike that in Scotland, where it replaced Episcopalianism as the established Christian denomination. Thus the Irish Protestant episcopal clergy such as Archbishop William King of Dublin and Dean Jonathan Swift, while mainly Tories in church questions, were Whigs in other political issues. Their secular influence was maintained throughout the 18th century by the promotion to the highest church offices of Englishmen such as Primates Hugh Boulter and George Stone; but their useful government contacts were counterbalanced by the increasing resentment of Irish-born clerics who helped to foster colonial antipathy to British paternalism in administration and trade. Only a small fraction favored the United Irish revolutionary movement at the end of the century, and with the rise of the Presbyterian and Catholic middle classes to challenge their monopoly of power, the Episcopalians came to regard as a protection the act of union which amalgamated the Anglican churches as well as the parliaments (1801).

Catholic Emancipation. Catholic emancipation (1829) inaugurated the breakdown of Protestant ascendancy that attempted to arrest its own decline by improved relations with the Presbyterians, led by Henry Cooke; by a more aggressive missionary policy among impoverished Catholics; and by a more exact insistence on its rights to tithes from all occupiers of agricultural lands without reference to their religion. The OXFORD MOVEMENT had few Irish supporters except for people like William Maziere BRADY. The repeal of the union movement had even fewer, so that when disestablishment was urged it gained the support of many nationalists. Although the majority of the clergy opposed William Gladstone's Act of Disestablishment (1869–71), the establishment of the Church Representative Body and the organization of an annual synod in which a majority of participants were lay proved highly successful. Inevitably, as most of the Catholic clergy supported the home rule movement, the Protestants generally were among the Unionists. Episcopalian clergy were prominently identified with the Covenant against home rule in 1912, but since 1920, though not supporting political moves to end Irish partition, the Church of Ireland, like the Presbyterian and Catholic churches, continues to stress the essential national character of its organization. While their numbers in the Republic of Ireland are small—being less than 5 percent of the whole—in Northern Ireland, where 60 percent of the population is Protestant, they claim nearly 30 percent.

Bibliography: Catalogue of Manuscripts in Possession of the Representative Church Body (Dublin 1938). W. M. BRADY, The Irish Reformation, or the Alleged Conversion of the Irish Bishops at the Accession of Queen Elizabeth (London 1866). Journal of the Session of the General Synod of the Church of Ireland (1870–). R. D. EDWARDS, Church and State in Tudor Ireland (London 1935). T. J. JOHNSTON et al., A History of the Church of Ireland (Dublin 1953). H. J. LAWLOR, The Reformation and the Irish Episcopate (2d ed. London 1932). W. D. KILLEN, Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, 2 v. (London 1875). R. MANT, History of the Church of Ireland, from the Reformation to the Union of the Churches of England and Ireland, 1801, 2 v. (London 1840). W. A. PHILLIPS, ed., History of the Church of Ireland, 3 v. (London 1933–34). J. S. REID, History of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, ed. W. D. KILLEN, 3 v. (Belfast 1867). J. H. TODD, St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland (Dublin 1864).

[R. D. EDWARDS/EDS.]

IRELAND, JOHN

First archbishop of St. Paul, Minn.; b. Burnchurch, County Kilkenny, Ireland, exact date unknown, but baptismal date is Sept. 11, 1838; d. St. Paul, Sept. 25, 1918. His parents, Richard and Judith (Naughton) Ireland, immigrated with their six children to the U.S. (1848), settling in Burlington, Vt. In 1851 they moved to Chicago, Ill., and a year later to the frontier town of St. Paul, Minnesota Territory.

John Ireland.

Early Career

Joseph Cretin, first bishop of St. Paul, selected Ireland to study for the priesthood (1853) and enrolled him in his own alma mater in France, the preparatory seminary of Meximieux in the Diocese of Belley. Ireland completed the course in classics (1857) with academic honors in several fields, especially in French and in oratory. His exceptional fluency in French was a valuable asset in his later career. After theological studies at the French Marist seminary at Montbel, near Toulon, he was ordained (Dec. 22, 1861) in St. Paul by Cretin's successor, Bp. Thomas Langdon Grace, and served for a few months as a curate in the cathedral parish. Ireland then joined the Fifth Minnesota Infantry Regiment as its chaplain, serving with distinction until his uncertain health and his bishop's need for his services forced his resignation on March 19, 1863. Despite the brevity of his Civil War career, Ireland savored all his life the taste of action he had had at the Battle of Corinth, and he always maintained close bonds with other veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic.

In 1867 Ireland was appointed rector of St. Paul's Cathedral. He represented Bishop Grace at Vatican Council I (1869–70), although he could neither speak nor vote at the Council sessions. When Pius IX named Ireland titular bishop of Maronea and vicar apostolic of Nebraska (April 12, 1875), Grace went immediately to Rome and successfully petitioned the pope to revoke the appointment so that Ireland might continue to work for the Church in Minnesota. Later the same year, Pius IX confirmed Ireland's titular bishopric and appointed him coadjutor, with the right of succession, to the bishop of St. Paul; Ireland was consecrated by Grace on Dec. 21, 1875.

As an ardent spokesman for the Catholic Total Abstinence Society, Ireland was featured regularly at their meetings, and he soon earned a leading place in that movement as well as a wider, even national, reputation as an orator of force and eloquence. Disturbed by reports that Catholic immigrants in eastern cities were suffering from social and economic handicaps, he organized and directed in Minnesota (1876–81) the most successful rural colonization program ever sponsored by the Catholic Church in the U.S. (see IRISH CATHOLIC COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION OF THE U.S.). Working with the western railroads and with the state government, he brought more than 4,000 Catholic families from the slums of eastern urban areas and settled them on more than 400,000 acres of farmland in western Minnesota.

Ordinary of St. Paul

On July 31, 1884, ill health led Grace to resign as bishop of St. Paul in favor of his coadjutor. Two years later, at the Provincial Council of Milwaukee, Ireland joined the other bishops of the province in petitioning the Holy See to erect a new archdiocese west of Milwaukee to accommodate the growth of the Church in that region. On May 4, 1888, St. Paul was raised to the rank of an archdiocese, and Ireland was named its first archbishop. The next year five new dioceses (Winona, Duluth, and St. Cloud in Minnesota and Sioux Falls and Jamestown in Dakota Territory) were established and attached as suffragan sees to the new Archdiocese of St. Paul. The proliferation of dioceses in the Northwest prompted the New York Times to speculate that "another cardinal's hat was soon to be bestowed by Pope Leo on an American prelate . . . John Ireland," a rumor that was to follow the archbishop for the rest of his life.

At the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884) Ireland delivered his famous address, "The Catholic Church and Civil Society," which remains the most eloquent statement of his lifelong concern to encourage mutual understanding and respect between the Catholic Church and the pluralistic democratic society of the U.S. The thesis of this address has since been often cited as a fundamental tenet of the progressive position in Church-State discussions. In ringing phrases Ireland confronted his fellow bishops with the challenge: "I do not, I think, mistake my fellow countrymen when I ascribe to them on the occasion of the Plenary Council holding session in Baltimore the wish that a statement be made as to the attitude of the Catholic Church in her teachings and in her history toward civil society and, in a special manner, toward the form of civil society which obtains in the United States of America."

In spite of growing administrative burdens, Ireland retained a scholarly interest and discipline throughout his life. He wrote regularly for learned reviews. His collected essays, significantly entitled The Church and Modern Society (1896), present his thoughtful and literate statement of the problems that confront the Church in a pluralistic and democratic society.

Ireland's last great project was the construction of a new cathedral commensurate with the growth and dignity of his archdiocese. Nine years (1906–15) were required for the work, and the result was the present Cathedral of St. Paul, recognized as one of the most impressive church buildings in North America.

Church Leader

In the last decade of the 19th century, Ireland joined Cardinal James GIBBONS as an acknowledged leader of the American hierarchy. On questions of national and ecclesiastical policy, the archbishop was an eloquent speaker and a tireless writer. His forthright positions on questions of the day often drew him into controversy with Church and State leaders who did not share his views, and he was often criticized by two opposite groups for precisely opposite reasons. Many of his fellow Catholics, especially in France, considered him too American and not sufficiently Catholic; it was chiefly French journalists and theologians who accused him of the "heresy of AMERICANISM." At the other end of the spectrum, some of his own countrymen who did not share his faith accused him of being too Catholic and not sufficiently American. In 1892 Ireland was commissioned to represent the Holy See in France when Leo XIII sought to convince the French hierarchy and Catholic lay leaders that the future of the Church lay with the people and not with the restoration of the monarchy. On the occasion of his public address to an elite Parisian audience on June 18, 1892, Ireland's elegant French, his tactful diplomacy, and his command of his subject won new respect in France for the position advocated by the Pope, a position Ireland considered to be best exemplified by the successful record of the Catholic Church in the U.S.

Immigrant Problem

In the years of the great Atlantic migration, Ireland was anxious that Catholic settlers in America should give generous and patriotic allegiance to their adopted land. He often spoke on patriotism and urged his people to accept the ways and the language of their new country. In this effort he earned the opposition of a zealous and religious German lay leader, Peter Paul CAHENSLEY, who protested to Leo XIII that the insistence on "Americanizing" the immigrants was resulting in mass defections of German-born Catholics from the American Church. The solution proposed by Cahensly was the establishment of dioceses in the U.S. staffed exclusively by German bishops and priests. Whatever the justice of Cahensly's complaints against the Irish-dominated clergy, it is clear that the creation of German-speaking enclaves would have seriously impaired the unity of the Church in the U.S. Thanks largely to the promptings of Gibbons and Ireland, Leo XIII refused to support Cahensly.

Education

In the history of American education Ireland is often cited for his design of the so-called FARIBAULT SCHOOL PLAN, which he inaugurated in the Minnesota cities of Faribault and Stillwater. Under this plan the parochial school could be rented to the local public school board for use during the school day but retained as a center for religious instruction before and after the public school hours. His American critics charged him with violating the principle of separation of Church and State and also accused him of weakening the strong position of Catholic education recommended by the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore. So heated did the controversy on this subject become that the archbishop felt it necessary to go to Rome to explain his position. Investigation revealed that the plan he advocated was already operating successfully in ten American dioceses. Rome decided to allow the program to continue, but criticism of it did not subside. It is noteworthy that the Faribault Plan bears striking resemblance to the Shared Time plan, which has since been advanced by Catholic and public school administrators in many American communities.

When the hierarchy of the U.S. decided at the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884) to establish a Catholic university for the U.S., Bps. John Lancaster SPALDING of Peoria, Ill., and John Joseph KEANE of Richmond, Va., became the leaders in subsequent efforts to build and staff the institution that eventually came to be called The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, Washington, D.C. In their zealous efforts to this end Spalding and Keane were ably assisted by Ireland, who was convinced that such a national Catholic center was both necessary and possible. Approval of the Holy See for this new institution was finally granted on Easter Sunday, April 10, 1887, largely through the persuasive efforts of Ireland and Keane, who had gone to Rome in 1886 as the representatives of the American hierarchy to seek such approval. Throughout his life Ireland retained a strong active interest in the Catholic University.

In his own archdiocese his efforts on behalf of Catholic education were equally vigorous. In 1885 he founded the College of St. Thomas. In 1894 he opened the St. Paul Seminary, built and endowed by James J. Hill, the famous empire builder. Ireland personally supervised the selection of a distinguished faculty for the new seminary, as well as the selection of its library collection. In his private letters, Ireland often recorded his conviction that a holy and learned clergy was essential for the advance of the Church. This explains his tireless efforts to secure for his seminary the best faculty he could assemble from Europe and the U.S. A corollary of his interest in priests was his strong desire to create new dioceses in the upper Middle West and to recommend holy and able priests as bishops in these new jurisdictions. Still unsurpassed in American history is the event of May 19, 1910, when Ireland acted as the chief consecrator for six bishops in the chapel of the St. Paul Seminary.

Labor and Racial Questions

The closing decades of the 19th century marked the difficult beginnings of the American labor movement. One prominent association of workmen was known as the KNIGHTS OF LABOR. In 1884, at the request of the archbishop of Quebec, the Holy See included the Knights among those conspiratorial and ritualistic secret societies prohibited to Catholics. At first most American prelates, aware that Catholics counted heavily in the leadership and the rank and file of the Knights of Labor and convinced that the condemnation was ill-advised, took the position that the decision applied to Canada and not the U.S. Then, foreseeing a possibly disastrous alienation of Catholic workingmen, the archbishops of the U.S., at their meeting in October 1886, decided to try to secure from the Holy See a formal statement of toleration of the Knights. This delicate mission was entrusted to Ireland, who was in Rome on other business. The outcome of the negotiations remained uncertain until a memorial, drawn up and signed by Cardinal Gibbons, was presented Feb.

20, 1887 by Ireland to the prefect of the Congregazione de Propaganda Fide and was favorably received. There is little doubt that Ireland had much to do with the framing of this decisive document and therefore deserves to share with Gibbons the credit for this vitally important step in the Catholic Church's largely successful efforts to retain the allegiance of the laboring class in the U.S. Writing in the North American Review of October 1901, Ireland gave a definitive statement of his views of the rights of labor to organize for its own protection at the same time that he reminded labor of the corresponding rights of management and of owners of private property.

On the subject of racial equality, Ireland was consistent and unequivocal. In 1890 he stated:

There is but one solution of the problem, and it is to obliterate absolutely all color line. . . . Open up to the Negro as to the white man, the political offices of the country, making but one test, that of mental and moral fitness. Throw down at once the barriers which close out the Negro merely on account of his color from hotel, theater, and railway carriage. Meet your Negro brother as your equal at banquets and in social gatherings. Give him, in one word, and in full meaning of the terms, equal rights and equal privileges, political, civil, and social. . . . I know no color line, I will acknowledge none. . . . The time is not distant when Americans and Christians will wonder that there ever was a race prejudice.

Other Contributions

Although Ireland's allegiance to the Republican party and his defense of its policies on occasion drew criticism, the results also earned him the friendship and favor of many political leaders. In 1898 the Holy See asked him to intercede with Pres. William McKinley to try to avert the impending Spanish-American War. Although his diplomatic negotiations with McKinley were not successful, Ireland was recognized both by Rome and by the president as the spokesman for the Church in these discussions. At the end of the war the archbishop was appointed by Pres. Theodore Roosevelt to serve on the commission that negotiated between the U.S. and the Vatican a settlement for the friars' lands in the Philippine Islands. Among the many occasions on both sides of the Atlantic, when Ireland's presence added prestige to an already important event, was that of May 8, 1899, when, as the official guest of the French government, he preached the sermon in the cathedral of Orléans honoring the 470th anniversary of the raising of the siege of that city by St. JOAN OF ARC. A year later he returned to France at the request of President McKinley and presented to the French people, in the name of the U.S., a statue of the Marquis de Lafayette. In return Ireland was invested with the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

Although Ireland's vigorous administration of the affairs of the Church earned for him many critics at home and abroad, a careful review of his pronouncements on such varied topics as nationalism, education, race relations, labor, science, technology, temperance, the missions, Church and State, liberal arts, patriotism, international affairs, citizenship, and social work lead to the conclusion that events subsequent to his death have for the most part confirmed his opinions and validated his predictions. Moreover, his courageous and farsighted leadership in the metropolitan Province of St. Paul helped to make it a recognized center of Catholic culture and influence.

Bibliography: J. IRELAND, "The Catholic Church and the Saloon," North American Review 159 (1894) 498-505; "Personal Liberty and Labor Strikes," ibid. 173 (1901) 445-453. J. H. MOYNIHAN, The Life of Archbishop John Ireland (New York 1953). T. O'GORMAN, "The Educational Policy of Archbishop Ireland," Educational Review 3 (1892) 462-471. J. P. SHANNON, "Archbishop Ireland's Experiences as a Civil War Chaplain," American Catholic Historical Review 39 (1953) 298-305; Catholic Colonization on the Western Frontier (New Haven 1957). T. T. MCAVOY, "Americanism, Fact and Fiction," American Catholic Historical Review 31 (1945) 133-153. J. M. REARDON, The Catholic Church in the Diocese of St. Paul (St. Paul 1952). F. J. ZWIERLEIN, Life and Letters of Bishop McQuaid, 3 v. (Rochester 1925-27). P. H. AHERN, The Catholic University of America, 1887-1896 (Washington 1949). C. J. BARRY, The Catholic Church and German Americans (Milwaukee 1953). H. J. BROWNE, The Catholic Church and the Knights of Labor (Studies in American Church History 38; Washington 1949). J. T. ELLIS, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons 2 v. (Milwaukee 1952). J. IRELAND, The Church and Modern Society (St. Paul 1896).

[J. P. SHANNON]

IRELAND, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), March 7, 1544. Little is known of this seminary priest. He was chaplain of the Roper Chantry annexed to St. Dunstan's, in Canterbury (1535-36) before becoming vicar of Eltham, Kent, and thus the parish priest of St. Thomas More's daughter Margaret Roper of West Hall. For refusing to acknowledge the royal supremacy in spiritual matters, Ireland was indicted (Feb. 15, 1543) with BB. John LARKE, German GARDINER, and John HEYWOOD (who recanted on the hurdle). The bodies of the martyrs were buried under the gallows. Ireland was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England)

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

IRELAND, SERAPHINE, MOTHER

Religious superior, educator; b. Kilkenny, Ireland, July 1842; d. St. Paul, Minn., June 20, 1930. Ellen came with her parents to Minnesota at the age of ten and was educated at St. Joseph's Academy, St. Paul, Minn. She entered the novitiate of the Sisters of St. Joseph in 1858, taking the name Sister Seraphine. She acquired teaching and administrative experience in elementary and secondary schools, and profited vicariously from the broad American and European experiences of her brother, Abp. John IRELAND of St. Paul. She was named provincial superior in 1882, at which time her order numbered 116 sisters in eight educational and nursing institutions in and near the Twin Cities. Mother Seraphine prepared novices to qualify as teachers and nurses in accredited schools and hospitals. From 1887 to 1904, she devoted her efforts to securing staff, endowment, and buildings for the College of St. Catherine in St. Paul. When she retired in 1921, the St. Paul Province extended into North and South Dakota and contained 913 sisters, five hospitals, two orphanages, an infant's home, 45 parochial grade schools, 15 high schools, and a college.

See Also: MCHUGH, ANTONIA, SISTER.

[A. GLEASON]

IRELAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Ireland (Eire) encompasses five-sixths of the island of Ireland. It is located west of Great Britain, from which it is separated by the North Channel, the Irish Sea and St. George's Channel. Under English control for centuries, the island was split into two political divisions during the early 20th century. Following a rebellion that resulted in the severing of political ties to Great Britain, the Republic of Ireland achieved political independence in 1949. The six counties in the north of the island were established as Northern Ireland in 1920 and are now a part of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland. Comprising a rolling plain rising to low mountains and dotted with numerous lakes, Ireland has a number of good harbors. Formerly an agricultural economy, Ireland's exports of machinery and other equipment, computers, pharmaceuticals and animal products accounted for most of its gross domestic product by 2000. Ireland is a member of the European Monetary Union.

Capital: Dublin.  Size: 26,600 sq. miles.  Population: 3,797,255 in 2000.  Languages: English; Gaelic is spoken along the western coast.  Religions: 3,455,504 Roman Catholics (91%), 75,945 Anglicans (Church of Ireland; 2%), 221,560 other (6%), 41,250 without religious affiliation.
---

The Republic of Ireland is divided into 26 counties, with six additional counties in Northern Ireland.

The article that follows is divided into two parts. Part I is concerned primarily with the growth and development of the Catholic Church in the island, beginning with its Christianization in the 5th century, while part II covers the Church in the Republic of Ireland. For information on the Church in Northern Ireland, see NORTHERN IRELAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

EARLY CHURCH IN IRELAND

Goidelic Celts occupied the island of Ireland as early as the 6th century B.C. They were eventually joined by Bretonic Celts and Picts. Remaining beyond the borders of the vast Roman Empire, Ireland had established trade connections with Roman-occupied Britain and Gaul. By the 5th century A.D. missionaries entered Ireland, among them PATRICK, son of Calpurnius, who evangelized the north and west in the mid-5th century. Paganism still survived among ruling families, particularly in the south, into the 7th century.

Development of Monasticism and Missionary Activity. Early missionaries established an episcopal system, but the rapid emergence of monastic centers of learning led to the subordination of the bishops in a monastic system, dominated by great rival foundations. Gaelic expansion to the Scottish highlands led Irish Christians to the same area. Among them was St. Columcille (Columba) from whose foundation at Iona, missionaries converted the Picts of Scotland and the Anglo-Saxons in northern England. Conflict with Roman missionaries over such peculiarities of Christian tradition, as the date of Easter and the tonsure, culminated at Whitby (664). While the Irish missionaries were expelled from Northumbria after Whitby, their greatest achievement in the history of Christianity was the conversion of the Picts and the inauguration of the mission to the Anglo-Saxons, whose bad relations with British Christianity are noted by the Venerable Bede, who also acknowledges a lasting tribute to the work of the Irish, and to the value of their schools (see MONASTICISM, EARLY IRISH).

Meanwhile other missionaries from Ireland entered the former Roman Empire to the west. St. COLUMBAN es-

Archdioceses	Suffragans
Armagh	Ardagh, Clogher, Derry, Down and Connor, Dromore, Kilmore, Meath, Raphoe
Cashel	Cloyne, Cork and Ross, Kerry, Killaloe, Limerick, Waterford and Lismore
Dublin	Ferns, Kildare and Leighlin, Ossory
Tuam	Achonry, Clonfert, Elphin, Galway and Kilmacduagh, Killala

The Archdiocese of Armagh, which covers the north and west regions of the island, oversees all of Northern Ireland.

tablished foundations at Luxeuil (590) and Bobbio, and helped introduce the PENITENTIALS and the system of frequent private confessions. However Irish Catholics' insistence on monastic immunity from episcopal jurisdiction led to the same struggle between Celtic and Roman traditions that had been addressed at Whitby, and it again brought about their eclipse. By the mid-8th century the victory of the Roman tradition in Ireland was complete.

Unification and the Viking Invasion. The emergence of the Uí Néill high kings coincided with the unification of the allied groupings of minor kingdoms (mórthuaithe). While there was no absolute central monarchy, the Uí Néill maintained a northern hegemony for some five centuries before power passed to Munster and then to Connaught. The first Scandinavian raids in the late 8th century led to the emergence of more warlike rulers who were able to resist the Viking invaders.

The Viking incursions resulted in the decline of monasticism, as many church buildings were robbed of their treasures. By the 10th century, the Scandinavians had settled along the coast, and organized trading communities linked to their northern homelands and to other Scandinavian communities in Britain. Although by the early 11th century a Danish dynasty dominated England, similar efforts failed in Ireland. After the Battle of Clontarf (1014) saw victory at the hands of high king Brian Boru, the Scandinavian communities of Dublin, Waterford, Cork and Limerick were made subordinate to their neighboring Irish rulers. While many Scandinavians had by now converted to Christianity, they snubbed their Irish neighbors by sending their higher clergy to the archbishop of Canterbury for consecration.

Repeated threats from Viking invaders prompted a reorganization of the monasteries to preserve them from attack, conserve their resources and increase their prestige. In such fashion the influence of ARMAGH, Derry, Kildare and Clonmacnoise increased. However, a rivalry eventually developed that led to political strife: by the 11th century many of these communities were dominated by lay heads, recognized as the successors (comharbai), or coarbs, of the founders. Bishops were maintained by the Church for the purposes of ordaining clergy but remained subordinate to the coarbs. Attempts to reform this system occurred intermittently but had little success at first, as they concentrated on poverty and austerity in rivalry with the rich and powerful institutions of the old regime. By the 11th century a move to reestablish episcopal jurisdiction had gathered some force. Associated with the political centralization policy of the O'Briens and the Uí Néill of the north, it resulted in an alliance between St. MALACHY and the reformed Cistercians of Clairvaux, particularly with St. BERNARD. While Malachy tried to break the control of the hereditary Uí Sinaich family of Armagh, his efforts proved unsuccessful; however his enterprise succeeded in the next generation.

For over a century following Clontarf, provincial kings tried to dominate Ireland, and ecclesiastical synods were held. A synod at Rath Breasail (1111) sought to divide the country between the metropolitans of Armagh and Cashel until the Synod of Kells (1154) gave an additional archbishopric to Tuam and to Dublin, in the chief Hiberno-Scandinavian community in the east.

Norman Conquest to the Death of Henry VIII: 1172–1547. The succession of the Plantagenet Angevin dynasty to the Norman kingdom of England in 1154, extended its king's ambitions to Wales, Scotland and Ireland. In 1166 high king Rory O'Conor (1116?–98) ejected Dermot MacMurrough from his Leinster Kingdom, who sought the support of several Cambro-Norman lords and knights to support him in returning to Ireland. English King HENRY II, encouraged by Pope ADRIAN IV (Nicholas Breakspear; the only English pope) to secure the rights of the Church in Ireland, supported MacMurrough in the invasion of Leinster and Meath, and then visited Ireland in 1171 to secure his power there. Henry confirmed Richard de Clare, second Earl of Pembroke and Strigul (known as Strongbow; d. 1176), as lord of Leinster and Hugh de Lacy (d. 1186) as lord of Meath, while retaining Dublin and the other Scandinavian towns in his own control. Most of the independent Irish kings accepted Henry II as lord of Ireland, as did Rory O'Conor who by the Treaty of Windsor in 1175, restricted his own claims to Connaught and to preeminence over Irish kings outside the Anglo-Norman lands of southeast Ireland given him by Henry.

Ecclesiastically the new Angevin Lord of Ireland was reinforced by letters from Pope ALEXANDER III, Adrian IV's successor, to Henry, to the clergy and to the lords and people of Ireland, according full papal recognition of Henry's new leadership. Ecclesiastical pronouncements attributed the invasion to divine displeasure with the Irish, for purchasing slaves from the English. Thereafter the chief ecclesiastics in the east of Ireland followed the Anglo-Norman custom of church contributions made by payment of tithes, although in the rest of Ireland the older system of voluntary gifts reinforced the wealth secured from ecclesiastical lands.

The Anglo-Norman conquest failed to extend over the whole country and Gaelic influence remained, mainly in the northwest, the west and the southwest. By the late 13th century independent Irish kingships were controlled by the families of O'Neill and O'Donnell, O'Connor, O'Brien, MacCarthy and MacMurrough. An ethnic war soon waged with the realization that the Anglo-Norman colony of the east had not merely been arrested but was shrinking into decay. After the assertion of Scottish independence by Robert Bruce (1274–1329) at the Battle of Bannockburn, his brother Edward invaded Ireland and, until his defeat and death in 1318, devastated the greater part of the English colony from the northeast to the southwest. Thereafter, a policy of sharp separation was adopted by the leading Anglo-Norman lords, and the Pale—an area around Dublin formally ruled by England—was formally established.

Within Irish parliaments Anglo-Norman institutions had been established on a small scale, and futile attempts were made to both exclude persons of Irish race and assuage conflicts between recently arrived and already-established English immigrants. To the Church this meant dealing with two wholly dissimilar ways of life. Within the English Pale conditions were similar to those in contemporary England and France: under the administration of bishoprics dispensed by the English king as rewards for faithful service a parochial system existed, while military orders such as the Templars were located at strategic points in Ireland to restrict attempts at Gaelic ascendancy. While some degree of civilized life was possible within walled towns, military conditions prevailed in the Gaelic spheres. The poorer civilization that inevitably resulted required a different kind of Church participation. Indeed, the glory of the Island of Saints and Scholars had ended.

During the 15th century the English Pale shrank to a small area, nowhere more than 30 miles distant from Dublin. Great Anglo-Irish lordships existed, notably the Fitzgeralds of Kildare, the Butlers of Kilkenny, the Talbots of Wexford, the Fitzgeralds of Desmond and the Burkes of Connaught. Between these lords a perennial condition of war existed. No longer a war of English versus Irish, it now became a struggle for high kingship and culminated in the hegemony of the Earls of Kildare, who dominated the Pale and were made the English king's lieutenants. This situation prevailed until 1534, when HENRY VIII broke with Rome and was obliged to enter Ireland to defeat a Fitzgerald crusade against him.

Coming of the Reformation. In contrast to England, where papal power had long been under monarchic control, the appointments of the Holy See in Ireland were regarded with reverence. In part the papacy acted as umpire in the strife between Gaelic and Anglo-Norman administration, and it also aided in the Gaelic takeover of decayed English areas as immigrant populations dwindled. While the English government occasionally enforced statutes of PROVISORS and PRAEMUNIRE, these proved unsuccessful for most purposes, and by the time of Henry VIII's break with Rome the influence wielded by the Holy See was not easily eradicated. Despite this loyalty, after Henry conquered the Kildare lordship and reestablished his power in Dublin, he was able to nominally enforce recognition of his claim to be head of the church.

Children making their First Communion, Ireland. (©Annie Griffiths Belt/CORBIS)

At the Dublin Parliament of 1536–37, Henry's viceroy Lord Leonard Grey spearheaded the extinction of the Kildare order and abolished Papal authority. The claim of Henry VIII as head of the church was then asserted, as well as the English king's right to regulate and confiscate monasteries. This proved disastrous. While the diocesan clergy in the now-enlarged Pale acquiesced, other regular clergy withdrew to the independent Gaelic areas, which maintained contact with Rome. This tradition made it impossible to secure the same State dominance over the Church that was achieved in England. The conquest of Ireland continued to involve Tudor monarchs through the 16th century. While the Tudors eradicated the independent lordships, a tradition of resistance in Church matters was established; the forces of the Counter-Reformation secured sufficient foothold to enable the Irish to build an effective independent Catholic Church in the succeeding centuries.

As early as 1538 Irish resistance made pessimists of Henry VIII's reformers in Ireland, such as George Brown, Archbishop of Dublin and Edward Staples, Bishop of Meath. At first they credited such resistance to the alleged treason of Lord Leonard Grey, but Grey's removal (1540) and execution changed nothing. His successor, Sir Anthony St. Leger, accelerated the dissolution of the monasteries within the Pale and used confiscated monastic wealth to enlarge his administration. In 1542, under St. Leger's influence, Henry VIII was made King of Ireland, abandoning the title "Dominus Hiberniae" as being tainted with Papal concessions. Throughout the country a policy of surrender and regrant was instituted, whereby various lords were induced to submit to the king, to secure from him the conversion of their elective chieftainships into hereditary peerages, and, theoretically, to extend Anglicanism. Bishops were similarly dealt with. The policy of surrender and regrant, which abandoned Irish Law in favor of English Common Law, was paralleled by the episcopal surrender of papal bulls and the regrant of their offices to the bishops under English law from the new Supreme Head. While Henry lived there was thus a nominal consent to his pretensions, the more distant from Dublin, the more nominal: but even within the Pale Church policy was subordinated to State necessity in marked contrast to contemporary England. Ultimately, ecclesiastical faculties were delegated to a commission [see REFORMATION, PROTESTANT (IN BRITISH ISLES)].

Under Edward VI many of the extreme penalties of Henry VIII were repealed, although his administration of Ireland was severe. Just as England took up arms against Scotland to compel the Scots to agree to the marriage of their queen with the English boy king, so the military policy of intimidating the Irish chiefs and extending royal authority, particularly in the Counties of Leix and Offaly, was carried out. The religious changes occurring in England—the abrogation of the Mass and the substitution of a communion service as incorporated in the Book of Common Prayer—were extended to Ireland, but reactions in the Pale against reformers preaching against transubstantiation made it clear that England would have to proceed slowly to gain even a nominal acquiescence. The Second Prayer Book, incorporating the Ordinal for consecrating clergy without making them sacrificial priests, was not specifically extended to Ireland.

On the accession of the Catholic Mary I (see MARY TUDOR, QUEEN OF ENGLAND), the speed with which the Mass was restored illustrated how even in the most English areas, Protestantism had gained no foothold. At the cost of good relations, the Protectorate had successfully intimidated the more independent Irish lords from becoming involved in the war with Scotland and France. Efforts to secure an Irish alliance with England's enemies also proved abortive: even the papal agents could not remain in Ireland due to lack of support and the fear that Dublin's military might strike down the northern chiefs among whom the papal negotiators had taken refuge.

Mary's reign exposed the similarity between the methods of each of the Tudor sovereigns in Ireland, Catholic and Protestant alike. In dealing with Parliament, coercive methods were used to secure an acquiescent majority. A policy of colonizing the midlands was planned and given statutory approval. King's County and Queen's County were established in place of Offaly and Leix in honor of Mary and her husband PHILIP II of Spain, and the independent Irish were driven from these areas as a prelude to the plantation which commenced under Elizabeth I. As in England, Cardinal Reginald POLE issued a bull of reconciliation with the Holy See that was incorporated in an act of parliament, reestablishing papal jurisdiction and guaranteeing absolution for the alienation of Church lands. While there was no persecution of Protestants in Ireland, the Tudor Irish continued to subordinate Church interests to those of the English State; specific key Englishmen were given immunity from persecution and granted permission to hold services in their homes.

On the accession of the Protestant ELIZABETH I those same officials who had presided over Parliament under Mary returned to the policy of Edward VI and the Book of Common Prayer. As before, there was no nationwide enforcement of the new law. A few bishops near Dublin were compelled to acquiesce, and two who refused were deposed. For the rest, the queen was careful to avoid any situation that might fuel a conspiracy appealing to the Catholic population. Such a policy was successful; no general rebellion broke out until the end of Elizabeth's reign, even though she was excommunicated (1570) by PIUS V in 1570. Papal efforts to maintain an Armagh archbishop and a nuncio were thwarted by the arrest and incarceration of Richard Creagh (1525?–85) and David Wolfe (d. 1578?) whom the pope appointed to these offices. They were not proceeded against to the point of execution, and ultimately they both escaped from prison, though Creagh was rearrested and died in the Tower of London.

During the mid-1500s various unsuccessful efforts were made to interest France and Spain, as well as the papacy, in a Catholic rebellion in Ireland, and Pope GREGORY XIII finally decided to sanction such an expedition. It secured little support from Spain and none elsewhere. English influence in Ireland was sufficiently strong to intimidate sympathizers and by 1583 the movement had collapsed. Elizabeth commenced the second plantation scheme on the extensive Munster lands, thus transferring a substantial number of titles to English colonists, who failed, however, to bring over a sufficient number of supporters to alter the complexion of the southern population as a whole.

Muiredach's Cross, 10th century, Monasterboice, County Louth, Ireland. Each panel depicts a biblical story, and was intended to educate a largely illiterate public. (©Michael St. Maur Sheil/CORBIS)

In the last decade of Elizabeth's reign, a formidable rebellion by Hugh O'Neill (1550?–1616) and Hugh Roe O'DONNELL (1571?–1602) secured substantial support from the Church. For the first time it was openly involved in the struggle against Elizabeth in Ireland, perhaps in consequence of the 1584 execution under martial law of Archbishop Dermot O'HURLEY, whose arrest soon after his return from Rome did not reveal his complicity in any anti-English conspiracy. Northern bishops supported the rebels, even going so far as to operate the decrees of the Council of Trent. In this situation, Elizabeth was obliged to acquiesce in the direction of her viceroy to terminate Catholic persecution. Spain intervened momentarily but unsuccessfully, and in 1601 Elizabeth's forces defeated the Irish outside Kinsale, which was then occupied by

The Archbishop of Tuam celebrates High Mass on a mountaintop, County Mayo, Ireland, 1947. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

Don Juan del Aquila. In 1603, during the last days of Tudor reign, the war ended, and James VI, on his accession as James I, agreed to pardon and ennoble the leading Irish rebels.

The Rise of the Stuarts. The accession of the Stuarts in 1603 created serious problems in integration and ultimately led to civil war in the three kingdoms (1638–53). James I, was easily intimidated by his English ministers, despite his goodwill toward certain Irish lords; successive viceroys in Ireland reestablished the colonial and Protestant policies of Elizabeth. The Ulster chiefs, fearful of being imprisoned for conspiracy, fled to mainland Europe, and a project for colonizing six of the Ulster counties was approved and carried out. The only successful colonization project, this effort involved the lowland Scots and border English, who, by the end of the 1600s, had transformed the greater part of the northern province into Presbyterian and Anglican communities. Simultaneously, power passed finally from the old English and Irish upper classes to new colonists and landowners who secured grants on successive confiscations under James I, Oliver CROMWELL and William III. In addition, considerable property changed hands through the effect of economic erosion, as a more primitive order of society gave way before the more expansive demands of a more sophisticated society. Only in religious matters were the Stuarts obviously unsuccessful. Gaelic culture and traditional English medieval patterns were subordinated to the more cosmopolitan Protestant society, but the mass of the people continued to give allegiance to the Holy See. Ecclesiastics such as the Protestant archbishop Adam Loftus were great believers in coercion and, after the accession of James I, the justification for such a policy was reiterated. Government, however, was slightly unnerved at the restoration of Catholic worship in many of the Anglo-Irish towns on Elizabeth's death and, while this was abrogated, there was slowness to go with the ecclesiastics along the lines of coercion. With the Guy Fawkes conspiracy in England, a renewal of coercion was approved, but the policy of expelling the Catholic clergy and compelling local officials to conform did not prove successful. By the end of James' reign the government reluctantly agreed to informal toleration.

Era of Political Upheaval: 1600–1660. The reign of Charles I witnessed a great increase in power among the new colonists, and paralleling this, the Catholic Church was able to build itself up extensively throughout the country. Imitating the Scots, who took up arms against attempts to extend Anglicanism over their Calvinistic kingdom, Catholic Ireland attempted unsuccessfully to take over the whole kingdom and reestablish its religion. After the English Parliament and the king became involved in war, many Anglo-Irish attempted to reconcile with their monarch by allowing him to use their resources against Dublin. The Catholics in support of war were divided; centuries of history made it clear that a papal policy denying the legitimacy of English Protestant monarchical rule would find no success. The split was revealed after Irish and Anglo-Irish were brought together in a quasi-parliament at Kilkenny. Successive papal representatives Pier Francesco SCARAMPI and Giovanni Battista RINUCCINI (1592–1653) attempted to secure royal acquiescence in the public restoration of Catholicism. While initial negotiations were not ratified, a later peace secured ratification despite the continued opposition of Rinuccini, who ultimately withdrew in protest on the eve of Cromwell's conquest. The nuncio's own explanation was that the Anglo-Irish feared losing estates founded on the plunder of the monasteries as well as a Gaelic Irish resurgence.

The defeat and execution of the king at Cromwell's hands led all opponents of Parliamentarianism to combine in Ireland in support of his son CHARLES II, though almost inevitably this committed Charles to incompatible Calvinist concessions in Scotland and Catholic concessions in Ireland. The Cromwellian war in Ireland led to the defeat of the Royalist allies. There were no pitched battles, except the Battle of Baggot Rath (Rathmines) in 1649. A number of towns were stormed, including Drogheda and Wexford, and the garrisons put to the sword, together with any clergy found in the fortresses. The excuse was that these had been involved in the massacre of innocent Protestants in 1641 or subsequently. Strategically, these methods prompted surrenders at a number of other points, but the war as a whole did not end until 1653, after Cromwell had been replaced by his son-in-law Henry Ireton (1611–51) and after an Irish army led by Bishop Heber McMahon had been defeated in the north.

St. Patrick's Cathedral, built between 1838 and 1873, modernized by Liam McCormick in 1981. (©Michael St. Maur Sheil/CORBIS)

The civil war in Ireland was followed by a decree of the Commonwealth classifying the people of Ireland into categories determined by their relative disloyalty to the state. In the first category, certain specified persons were guilty of treason and declared to have forfeited their lives and property. All Catholics were to lose their lands, but those proving constant good affection to England would be permitted to enjoy property valued at two-thirds of what they had held previously. Catholics, however, would be permitted to hold land only in Connaught; land in the three remaining provinces was divided among loyal Protestants, land speculators who had advanced money to the government to fund the Irish war, and soldiers to whom the Parliamentarians owed wages. So far as the rest of the Catholics were concerned, if they could prove their non-involvement both in the murder of Protestants and of taking up arms against the Parliamentarians, they could remain in Ireland. Those implicated in the murder of Protestants were in danger of being executed. Those who fought the Parliamentarians were permitted to transport themselves beyond the seas. All Catholic clergy were deemed to be enemies of the state and, by a special indulgence, if not convicted of complicity in the Protestant massacres, might be transported abroad.

During the seven-year period before the restoration of the Stuart monarchy, no toleration was accorded to the Catholic clergy. The saying of Mass became a treasonable offense, according to the oppressive measures Parliamentarians extended to Irish Catholicism. In reality, however, after the war few of the clergy suffered an extreme penalty for celebrating their priestly functions, although many suffered imprisonment, deportation to the West Indies, or exile to the European mainland. So far as the Catholic laity was concerned, the Elizabethan recusancy penalties against those failing to attend Protestant Sunday services were not enforced. In fact, the Commonwealth prohibited interfering with any man's conscience, except where idolatry was concerned, and by 1658 reports indicated an increase in instances where Catholics met for religious purposes. Despite such personal freedoms, the organization of the Church was severely obstructed: few among the regular or higher clergy dared to remain within Ireland.

The Restoration and Further War: 1660–91.

After the Restoration Charles II became king, and the Anglican Church, which had been dispossessed, came back. Concessions were made to Catholicism due to the private toleration accorded by the new king, though such toleration was contrary to current laws regarding religious. While Catholics were rarely persecuted for the exercise of their religion, some higher clergy were not permitted to return. An attempt was made to allow innocent Catholics to make a remonstrance or declaration of loyalty to the king, denying absolutely the right to withdraw allegiance in terms regarded as offensive by the Holy See. This remonstrance originated with Peter WALSH (1618?–88), a Franciscan who secured the patronage of Irish nobleman James Ormonde, and whose opponents were exposed to persecution and banishment while Ormonde ruled Ireland. General conditions, however, were not unsatisfactory, and the Treaty of Limerick (1691) attempted to secure for Catholics the same immunities they had enjoyed under Charles II. So far as political power and landed property were concerned, however, Catholics were reduced to a very insignificant position. In any attempt to reverse this situation Protestants unified in opposition, and Cromwellian supporters finally forced Ormonde into abandoning the restoration of Catholics loyal to Charles II, and into passing the Act of Explanation to provide a legislative bar to them in the future. In the 1670s secret negotiations with LOUIS XIV provided Charles with adequate means to maintain himself without the Parliament, while also enabling him to issue a Declaration of Indulgence for Catholics and Dissenters. The resulting outcry in England caused the indulgence to be withdrawn. At the end of the decade, the allegations of Titus Oates (1649–1705) regarding a Catholic plot (see OATES PLOT) to bring in a French army of occupation resulted in the judicial murder of Oliver PLUNKET, Archbishop of ARMAGH on July 1, 1681, the death of Peter Talbot, Archbishop of DUBLIN while in prison and the execution of several others on perjured testimony. The Church again became dislocated, but reestablished its position through royal connivance in the last years of Charles' reign.

Under JAMES II Catholicism obtained great favors and the Church's position improved. An attempt was made to financially endow the Catholic hierarchy by keeping a number of Protestant bishoprics unfilled. Official positions became open to Catholics, particularly in the army. The land question was again under consideration. Many Protestants fled to England in fear of their Catholic neighbors. But an alliance of Anglicans and Nonconformists invited James's son-in-law, William III of Orange, to "restore order," and James fled to France (1688). James was then invited to Ireland, where the Catholic Richard Talbot (1630–91), first Earl of Tyrconnell, had been appointed viceroy; in 1689 a Parliament in Dublin attainted absentee Protestant landowners, decreed the restoration of deprived Catholics, asserted the independence of Ireland from English Parliamentary legislation and affirmed a general toleration in religion.

James, however, failed to win the support of more than a handful of Irish Anglicans, and when his troops were excluded from Ulster towns he was unable to storm them. On the arrival of William III's army they rallied to his standard. William defeated James at the Battle of the Boyne, and thereafter James retired to France, while a Franco-Irish army waged a series of pitched battles before being advised to surrender following a campaign lasting more than two years. Unlike Cromwell, William III was prepared to make some Catholic concessions if only to end the war in Ireland and allow him to concentrate on his main objective: Louis XIV on the European mainland. In the articles agreed upon at Galway and Limerick (1691) Catholics willing to accept William's regime were guaranteed their lands, but provisions to tolerate Catholicism were not ratified by subsequent Irish Parliaments, from which Catholics were excluded by an act of the English Parliament.

The position of the clergy was somewhat different. The Holy See had accorded James II the right to nominate the higher prelates, a right indirectly accorded to his brother Charles II on at least one occasion. As James II still claimed to be king, and set up his court at St. Germain in France, he continued to exercise these claims, which the Church continued to accord to him. Catholic Europe recognized the exiled Stuarts until the death (1766) of "James III."

Irish Catholic clergy hoped, in the event of a second Stuart Restoration, to get back to the situation visualized in Rinuccini's time. At the same time the Catholic clergy sympathized with the Anglican doctrine of divine hereditary right. Certainly the refusal to take an oath in Ireland, abjuring the Stuarts, affected the vast majority of priests tolerated by Penal Statute, while only a small minority of Irish Anglicans became nonjurors. This was the Protestant justification for the later Penal Laws against the Catholic clergy, just as the laws against the laity were justified by fear that they would become strong enough to secure or compel the restoration of their forfeited lands.

1691–1848. From the English standpoint, after the Glorious Revolution of 1688, a fear existed that the Protestants in Ireland might become too independent. The same restrictions were put on the Irish Parliament's powers as were imposed upon colonial legislatures in the New World. In place was the same discrimination against Ireland in commercial export rivalry with Britain as existed in the colonies. In consolation for these restrictions, Irish Protestants were permitted to pass statutes discriminating against Catholics. Beginning with the war between William III and Louis XIV and extending until the end of the reign of George I in 1727, a series of acts were passed bringing Irish laws into line with British anti-Catholic legislation. Acts against the clergy decreed the banishment of all regulars and prelates. Parochial clergy, restricted to one per parish, were obliged to swear allegiance to the Protestant sovereign. When the oath of abjuration was imposed in 1709, the system broke down, as only some 30 out of more than 1,000 obeyed the law. The extreme penalties could no longer be applied, as Protestant sovereigns were constantly pressured by their Catholic allies, such as the Holy Roman Emperor. Returned exiled clergy, therefore, might be imprisoned but were not executed.

A declaration against transubstantiation imposed on all office holders proved to be effective in excluding the Catholic laity from political power. Similar restrictions were employed by municipal corporations and by professional guilds. Succession to Catholic estates operated under a discriminatory law that directed their division between all male children (gavelkind). Social discrimination deprived Catholics of the right to carry swords customarily conceded to all gentlemen. In local areas levies were imposed on Catholics to pay damages for Catholic invading forces in time of war. By the end of the 18th century, Catholic land holdings, which had dropped to 15 percent by 1704, had fallen to about eight percent. Although few nonpropertied people conformed to the Established Church, some 4,000 upper-class Catholics conformed during the century.

During the 18th century the Church was severely handicapped in its organization. By 1750, however, imprisonment of clergy was a thing of the past. In 1745, despite the Stuart invasion of Scotland, Philip Dormer Stanhope (1694–1773), fourth Earl of Chesterfield and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, refused to close the Catholic chapels. He insisted that there was no danger from the Irish clergy and that the only dangerous papist in the kingdom was the reigning beauty Miss Eleanor Ambrose (1720?–1818). Catholic lay addresses of loyalty were privately accepted by the Hanoverians throughout the reign of George II (1727–60). After the accession of George III, the Dublin clergy offered prayers for the Hanoverian royal family, and the first steps to repeal the penal laws were taken in the 1770s.

By the time George III took the throne Parliamentary opposition to self-government had increased. The Protestant ascendancy organized volunteer corps to maintain order and defend England against possible invasion from France, since most regular troops were in service in North America. Among the Protestants seeking self-government there were few supporters of Catholic relief; Henry Grattan (1746–1820) was noteworthy. Government supported relief bills to remind Irish Protestants of their continued dependence upon England, if only due to the growing strength of Catholicism. By 1782, however, Protestant support of further concessions for Catholics had increased, and when the volunteers took up the question of reform, they were induced to pass resolutions favoring further Catholic relief.

The outbreak of the French Revolution revived the question of Parliamentary reform, and the Catholic Committee, which had played a substantial part in securing the first relief acts, demonstrated some sympathy toward the reformers. The bishops, however, largely influenced by the few upper-class Catholics, discouraged any alliance; ultimately French Revolutionary excesses led the bishops to accept government patronage for the establishment of Maynooth and even created some favor for the Union in 1800. The condemnation of the United Irishmen's Rebellion in 1798 was very general among the bishops, most of whom were prepared to accept the situation of a second-class establishment if the right to sit in Parliament were conceded to the Catholic laity at the time of the Union. However, democratic developments under Daniel O'CONNELL led bishops to reconsider a close association with the Protestant British government. A rising tide of nationalism opposed such an association, and the Irish hierarchy ultimately realigned its attitudes with the climate of Irish national opinion. When EMANCIPATION was finally conceded in 1829, several bishops resented the inflated property-ownership qualification imposed on those Catholics wishing to exercise the voting franchise.

Rising poverty among many rural Irish Catholics became an issue during the early 1800s, and in a property-dominated legislature, agricultural poverty was inconsequential. At the other end of the scale, Catholic wealth overall was increasing due to the rise in Irish exports and the superior initiative and resourcefulness of Catholic merchants. After the Battle of Waterloo in 1815, agricultural rents began to fall; nevertheless there was a substantial degree of church building in the years following Catholic emancipation (1829). From 1824, with the establishment of the Protestant New Light (New Reformation) movement, relations between Anglican and Catholic churches began to deteriorate. Protests from the farming community against tithe payments to the Protestant established clergy gained a sympathetic ear from Catholic clergy.

Break with Vatican over Education Question. A nondenominational primary school system was organized under a national education board set up in 1830 that included Archbishop Daniel MURRAY of Dublin among its members. The Protestant Episcopalian clergy resented this, since they considered education endowed by the state to be a monopoly of the Established Church. The Archbishop of Tuam, John MACHALE, broke with the board's policy of subsidizing schools, contending that the government connived to send Protestant missions to the pauper Catholics at Killlala, and set about organizing Catholic schools with the help of teaching brothers.

The education question became the most significant issue for Church-State relations during the next 75 years. MacHale's objections to the primary school system secured an increasing number of supporters among the bishops, as the National Education Board weakened before a Presbyterian onslaught that secured the exclusion of Catholic priests from schools under Presbyterian management. Moreover, in the west of Ireland, the Protestant missionary activities were sufficiently successful among the poverty-stricken Killlala peasants to make MacHale suspicious of all Protestant-dominated organizations, and ultimately of the government. On the other hand, Murray believed it to be in the Church's interest to cooperate with the government; he took an active part in the activities of the National Education Board whose policy, he felt satisfied, did not favor proselytism. Most bishops initially agreed with Murray, who resented MacHale's attacks upon the Board and stated that the Tuam prelate did not object until after the Board rejected the application for recognition of a school under MacHale's own patronage. However, MacHale gradually won over a number of bishops to his viewpoint, particularly after the refusal of the Board to dismiss a Connaught teacher who had become a Protestant. Both sides appealed to Rome, which after lengthy consideration recommended that bishops settle the matter individually. But Rome's simultaneous condemnation of clerical interference in politics aggravated the situation.

The MacHale party justified its adherence to Repeal of the Union on the basis of religion rather than politics, holding that British treachery in failing to implement Catholic emancipation fully necessitated its action. The people, alienated from the colonial ascendancy, had turned to it for leadership. O'Connell's organization of the Repeal movement in the last days of the government of William Lamb, led Viscount Melbourne (1779–1848) to incorporate inducements to the clergy, particularly to MacHale as the most popular ecclesiastic in Ireland. It is a moot point whether O'Connell could have revived general interest in Repeal had it not been for MacHale.

With the return of Sir Robert Peel (1788–1850) and the Tory party to power in 1841, the cold war condition worsened. While Melbourne had resented the Repeal movement, the Tories were determined to defeat it. For ten years Peel had quietly resisted the extremists in his own party who loudly advocated repeal of the emancipation and parliamentary reform acts. Now in office, he felt strong enough not merely to ignore these extremists. Repealers would not be countenanced; while the O'Connellites continued to cite Tory bigotry in confirmation of their oft-expressed fear of a renewal of Protestant tyranny, Peel set out to develop a Catholic policy that would divert the clergy from O'Connell.

Peel proposed to increase the endowment of Maynooth, provide a public organization for Catholic charities, and establish a system of university colleges for the education of the middle classes. While Murray considered this satisfactory evidence that the government could be trusted, MacHale condemned the successive Parliamentary measures introduced to implement this policy (except for the increased endowment of Maynooth) and described the Tory policy as a conspiracy to enslave and destroy the Church. He won the support of the majority of the bishops on the Colleges bill, and the result of his appeal to Rome was that for the next 60 years nondenominational education in Ireland was linked with the Anglican system of Trinity College, Dublin, in condemnation by the Church.

The Land League and the Rise of Irish Nationalism. A new era began in Ireland after the appointment of Paul Cullen as archbishop and apostolic delegate in 1849. The 1848 rebellion of the Young Irelanders had proved abortive, largely because of the catastrophe of the great famine (1845–50) but also through the discouragement of the clergy. Cullen, having experienced revolution in Rome, was determined to oppose it in Ireland and endeavored to keep the clergy out of politics. Economic issues dominated the famine-haunted people, and the next national party was organized for Tenant Right. Its failure in the early 1850s was attributed by its supporters to Cullen; they overlooked their own inability to provide leadership like O'Connell's or to resist the attractiveness of office under favorable British governments.

The Irish hierarchy's organization of a Catholic university attracted considerable attention during this same period, particularly through the appointment of John Henry NEWMAN as rector (1854–58) and the publication of his lectures on the idea of a university in Dublin. However, the Catholic University, like the Tenant Right movement, failed through public apathy and ecclesiastical dissensions and Newman soon retired. MacHale's interest weakened as Cullen's power grew, and denominationalism was accepted by the state in primary education about 1860. Disillusioned by British government partiality toward the Piedmontese attack on the Papal States, Cullen meanwhile revised his views on staying out of politics. The 1860s saw a revival of international interest in military activity in the wake of the Crimean War and the unification of Italy. The U.S. Civil War had involved many Irish exiles, who thereafter turned their minds toward supporting the Fenian movement for establishing an Irish Republic. Under Cullen's influence this movement and its organization, the Irish Republican Brotherhood, were condemned by Rome, although some clerics continued to give it secret support. Cullen organized the National Association to pressure Parliament to improve the middle class tenantry, secure disestablishment of the Protestant Episcopal Church and win government endowment for an acceptable university system. He deserted Benjamin Disraeli (1804–81) and the Conservative party for W. E. GLADSTONE (1809–98) and the Liberals. The Liberals successfully negotiated the first two points in the program but failed on the third; they blamed Cullen and the Irish hierarchy for allegedly misleading them on the minimum requirements for Catholic recognition. The defeat of Gladstone (1874) by Irish votes permanently weakened the clergy's influence in politics. While Cullen disapproved of the Home Rule movement inaugurated by Isaac Butt (1813–79) to secure self-government for Ireland through a Parliament subordinate to that of the United Kingdom, he failed to prevent Butt's heading a party of some 60 of the 105 members representing Ireland at Westminster. Constitutional Fenians reinforced Butt. Cullen's National Association withered despite the efforts to revive the memory of O'Connell as a Catholic leader, which only resulted in the substantial diminution of O'Connell's stature in nationalist recollection. Butt was successful in only one measure—the reorganization of the Peel university plan into Royal University Act which permitted indirect endowment of Catholic university colleges and the conceding of university degrees by examination and without attendance. It was a disappointing achievement. The bishops closed the Catholic University and transferred the buildings to University College, Dublin, under the supervision of the Society of Jesus (1880). It was reconstituted as a chartered state college in 1911.

Butt's failure to secure Home Rule weakened that movement seriously. After the threatened famine of 1879, the position of the tenantry again dominated Ireland. Parnell, leader of the Land League, secured clerical support in the south and west against Cullen's successor in Dublin. In the election of 1880 advocates of Home Rule opposed one another on the land issue, with Parnell gaining a decided majority following. The following year Gladstone, having replaced Disraeli in 1880, introduced a new Land Act which only secured endorsement by the House of Lords through the intimidating tactics of Parnell's Land League. The revival of the Home Rule movement, supported by an increasing nationalist element (formerly Fenian) and by Irish- and other Americans, created serious difficulties in England. Efforts were made to renew diplomatic pressures in Rome. Ecclesiastical condemnations of political extremism and of a land policy aiming at the destruction of landlordism (partly accentuated by Irish ecclesiastical investment in land) widened the breach between nationalism and Catholicism. Even Home Rule was in danger of condemnation but for the conversion of Gladstone and the majority of the Liberal party; anti-Irish sentiment in England defeated the prime minister's first Home Rule Bill (1886) and led to his replacement for virtually 20 years by a Unionist government dominated by the Tories.

The Unionist experiment, "Kill Home Rule by kindness," was a repetition of the anti-Repeal policy of the 1840s. As on that occasion, a group of Irish bishops led by William WALSH of Dublin indicated their acquiescence in the government policy of improving the Catholic position with regard to education. On this, however, Walsh was quickly disillusioned, and the question was not settled until the Liberals passed the Irish Universities Act in 1908. Other Unionist aspects of Irish policy were more successful. Buying out the landlord interests in the Land Purchase Acts settled what was probably the second most contended issue in Victorian Ireland. The Local Government Act of 1898 permitted democracy to operate at county level and swept away most of the remaining local political powers of the landlords. The Unionists were nonetheless unsuccessful in reducing the Irish desire for self-government.

During the brief restoration of Liberal government (1892–95) Gladstone again failed with his second Home Rule Bill. Meanwhile Parnell had died; his party was divided, and the bishops were somewhat uncertain of their position after the reactions to clerical interference in his fall. Thereafter the hierarchy largely withdrew from politics, and the nationalist-leaning Irish Parliamentary party's influence declined. Irish attention was beginning to be attracted by more radical forms of nationalism, in part a reaction to the British imperialism of the Boer War years (1899–1902). After the Unionist electoral defeat in 1906, Protestant Ulster's organization against Home Rule developed. By 1912 Ireland was divided on the issue, largely on a sectarian basis, with Anglicans and Presbyterians overwhelmingly pro-Unionist. The third Home Rule Bill (1912–14) was passed after the veto power of the House of Lords had been virtually abrogated.

The Easter Rebellion. The provisions of the 1914 Home Rule Bill were suspended as a consequence of the outbreak of World War I, but they foreshadowed the partition of Ireland into two separate political areas. In a sense, this had already been foreshadowed in the academic sphere by the provisions of the University Act establishing the Queen's University of Belfast separately from the National University of Ireland, whose constituent colleges lay in the three southern provinces. Only in the field of political labor did there appear to be substantial unity in the prewar years, and even here, the covenant against Home Rule broke down the good relations of a few years earlier.

At the outbreak of war, both the nationalist Irish Parliamentary party, led by John E. Redmond (1856–1918), and the Irish Unionist Party, led by Sir Edward Carson (1854–1935), pledged their support in the struggle against German imperialism. On this issue, nationalist opinion in Ireland was divided. A minority, holding that Redmond had abandoned the traditional Irish national position, organized themselves into the Irish Volunteers and split from Redmond's National Volunteers, many of whom joined the British Army against Germany. Carson and other Irish Unionists joined the war cabinet. Irish nationalist opinion of the moderates resented the decision of Secretary for War Herbert Earl Kitchener (1850–1916) to deny separate organization for Irish troops. A minority of the Irish Volunteers, in contact with U.S. and German sympathizers, rebelled in 1916. This second, or rather third, attempt to establish an Irish Republic was quickly defeated. One of the most conservative bishops, Edward Thomas O'Dwyer (1842–1917) of Limerick, expressed the general resentment at British severity after the rebellion.

Public opinion quickly moved toward the Republican party (Sinn Féin); the hierarchy identified itself with this feeling in 1918 in the expression of disapproval of the proposed conscription of Irishmen to fight in the war. At the general election after the Armistice, Sinn Féin won an overwhelming victory, except in the northeast. The members decided not to enter the United Kingdom Parliament and established themselves as an Irish unicameral legislature (Dáil Éireann) in Dublin in early 1919.

During the next two years a state of war developed between the Republicans and the British government, which made unsuccessful efforts to induce the bishops to condemn the insurgents. A Government of Ireland Act was passed in 1920, under which the six northeastern counties were established as Northern Ireland, with a subordinate legislature under the United Kingdom.

Bibliography: Bibliographies. J. CARTY, Bibliography of Irish History, 1870–1921, 2 v. (Dublin 1936–40). Bibliography of British History: Tudor Period, 1485–1603, ed. C. READ (2d ed. Oxford 1959). Bibliography of British History: Stuart Period, 1603–1714, ed. O. DAVIES (Oxford 1928). Bibliography of British History: The 18th Century, 1714–1789, eds., S. M. PARGELLIS and D. J. MEDLEY (Oxford 1951). A. R. EAGER, A Guide to Irish Bibliographical Material (London 1964). Irish Historical Studies (Dublin 1938—) has annual bibliogs. Literature. Ireland: A Documentary Record, ed. J. CARTY, 3 v. (v.1–2 3d v.3 2d ed.; Dublin 1957–58). A. BELLESHEIM, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Irland, 3 v. (Mainz 1890–91). History of the Church of Ireland, ed. W. A. PHILLIPS, 3 v (London 1933–34). T. J. JOHNSTON et al., A History of the Church of Ireland (Dublin 1953). W. DELIUS, Geschichte der irischen Kirche (Munich 1954). L. BIELER, Ireland, Harbinger of the Middle Ages (New York 1963). E. CURTIS, A History of Ireland (6th ed. London 1950). M. T. HAYDEN and G. MOONAN, A Short History of the Irish People, 2 v. (Dublin 1960). R. D. EDWARDS, Church and State in Tudor Ireland (New York 1935). M. V. ROMAN, The Reformation in Dublin, 1536–1558 (New York 1926); The Reformation in Ireland under Elizabeth, 1558–1580 (New York 1930). T. L. COONAN, The Irish Catholic Confederacy and the Puritan Revolution (New York 1954). J. G. SIMMS, The Williamite Confiscation in Ireland, 1690–1703 (London 1956). J. C. BECKETT, Protestant Dissent in Ireland, 1687–1780 (London 1948). W. E. H. LECKY, A History of Ireland in the 18th Century, 5 v. (new ed. New York 1893). P. S. O'HEGARTY, A History of Ireland under the Union, 1801–1922 (London 1952). D. R. GWYNN, The Struggle for Catholic Emancipation, 1750–1829 (New York 1928); The History of Partition 1912–1925 (Dublin 1950). J. A. REYNOLDS, The Catholic Emancipation Crisis in Ireland, 1823–1829 (New Haven 1954). J. F. BRODERICK, The Holy See and the Irish Movement for the Repeal of the Union with England, 1829–1847 (Analecta Gregoriana, 55; 1951). F. MCGRATH, Newman's University: Idea and Reality (New York 1951). D. MCARDLE, The Irish Republic: A Documented Chronicle of the Anglo-Irish Conflict and the Partitioning of Ireland (4th ed. Dublin 1951). E. R. NORMAN, The Catholic Church in Ireland in the Age of Rebellion, 1859–1873 (Ithaca, NY 1965). Handbook of British Chronology, eds., F. M. POWICKE and E. B. FRYDE (2d ed. London 1961). R. N. HADCOCK, Map of Monastic Ireland (Dublin 1959). Bilan du Monde, 2:495–512. Irish Catholic Directory (Dublin) annual. K. B. NOWLAN, The Politics of Repeal: A Study in the Relations between Great Britain and Ireland, 1841–1850 (Toronto 1964). Annuario Pontificio has data on all dioceses.

[R. D. EDWARDS]

THE CHURCH IN THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

After 1921 Ireland remained partitioned into two political entities. Northern Ireland was now a partially self-governing area within the United Kingdom, with a local parliament exercising limited jurisdiction. The remainder of the country attained its independence as the Irish Free State, a Commonwealth dominion, in 1922. The Free State gradually relinquished Commonwealth associations, abandoning the name "Free State" in 1937, and in 1949 left the Commonwealth to become the Republic of Ireland.

Establishes Commonwealth Government. A Republican majority, led by Sinn Féin activist Éamon De Valera (1882–1975), established the Fianna Fáil party in 1926, and became the main opposition party in 1927. In 1931 the minority Republican party Saor Éire was condemned by the hierarchy in what was regarded as a move against Fianna Fáil. In the following year, however, De Valera became head of the government, holding office for the next 16 years.

A new constitution enacted in 1938 maintained the independence of the country but permitted external association with the king of Great Britain as head of the British Commonwealth. The constitution admitted that civil authority comes from God, the form of government being decided by the people. It maintained the parliamentary system set up under the Irish Free State Act, recognized the special position of the Catholic Church as the Church of the majority of the people and established religious toleration for Anglicans, Presbyterians and other denominations.

The neutrality of the Republic of Ireland during World War II accentuated the resentment respecting the partition of the island. While a small minority remained hopeful that a German victory would result in the reunification of Ireland, most people thought otherwise. The attitude of the state was one of benevolent neutrality toward the Atlantic powers, particularly after the entry of the United States against the Axis Powers. While some communications were established between extremist Republican organizations and Germany, any plans for a German invasion proved abortive. Maria Duce, a small extremist Catholic element under the leadership of Denis Fahey, CSSp, favored Germany, largely because of suspicions of the alliance with Russia and because of objections to Zionism. It also organized a campaign against article 44 of the Constitution, which affirmed toleration for Jews and Protestants.

At the end of World War II Ireland was temporarily excluded from the United Nations, partly because of its wartime neutrality and partly because of Soviet resentment at Ireland's refusal to exchange diplomatic missions. Following the proclamation of the state as the Republic of Ireland in 1949 relations with Britain deteriorated; the British Labour government gave guarantees not to end formal Partition without the approval of Northern Ireland.

The Costello government collided with vested interests when it introduced a moderate form of the legislation of the British welfare state, and its subsequent defeat was in part attributed to what was generally regarded, notably by De Valera and his followers, as unwarrantable clerical interference. On its return to power in 1951 Fianna Fáil introduced a revised Health Act that secured many of the benefits of the earlier act but avoided ecclesiastical consultation.

Ireland Enters International Sphere. After 1955 Ireland took an increasing part in external affairs. Its historic opposition to imperialism led to requests for the loan of Irish troops by the United Nations, particularly in Lebanon, the Congo and Cyprus. In regard to the Cold War with Communist Europe, Ireland remained closer to the position of the United States than to that of Great Britain. The 1960s and 1970s brought about marked changes in Irish society and in the life of the Irish Church. The protectionist policies of the government gave way to free trade with Britain in the 1960s and with the European Economic Community in 1973. A growth in industry and skilled service jobs resulted in a decline in agriculture and an increased level of urbanization. By the 1980s one third of the people lived in the greater Dublin area.

Neither the Catholic Church nor the major Protestant churches, organized on an all-Ireland basis, took account of partition in their administrative structures. In both the Catholic and Church of Ireland (Anglican) churches, Armagh remained the primatial see of all Ireland, having been founded by Saint Patrick. After Vatican II the hierarchy adopted the modern form of an episcopal conference, consisting of all the bishops of Ireland, including coadjutors and auxiliaries as well as diocesan bishops, under the ex-officio presidency of the archbishop of Armagh. This represented little change from the existing structures for consultation, and joint action evolved from the principles formulated by the Synod of Thurles (1850).

Effects of Vatican II. The bishops who returned from the Second Vatican Council found an Ireland alerted to Church affairs in a manner never known in the past. The traditional loyalty of Irish Catholics to their faith was as strong as ever, but to this was now added an awareness of change: new emphases in doctrine, in the perception of other churches and in attitudes towards the laity. The people had acquired this conciliar vision partly through homilies and widely reported public lectures sponsored by the religious orders and partly from the secular press, radio and television, that by the final session of the Council were carrying extended daily reports from their own correspondents sent to cover developments in Rome first hand. The result was an emerging recognition of the Church as a human as well as a divine institution in which conflicts of opinion and personality played a part, in which teaching was arrived at through an exhaustively argued variety of viewpoints, and in which the exercise of authority was viewed as a service rather than as an imposition of legalistic dictates. The concern of some bishops that this novel image of the Church would distress Catholics imbued with an older ethos was reflected in the message of Archbishop John Charles MCQUAID (d. April 7, 1973) of Dublin at the conclusion of the Council in which he promised his people that “no change will worry the tranquility of your Christian lives.” Such reassurance was in fact unnecessary. Although conciliar change provoked little resistance or disparagement at first, the Irish thought of change as a phenomenon to be initiated by authority, a service to be provided by an authority now perceived to be service-oriented.

The first result of authority-led reform was the enthusiastic acceptance of a revised liturgy following extensive pastoral preparation; another was in the field of ecumenism as Anglican, Presbyterian and Methodist believers joined Catholics in praying together for Christian unity. Annual ecumenical conferences were organized in County Louth, at Greenhills and another—specifically for theologians and church leaders—at Ballymascanlon, that built on the annual ecumenical conference hosted by the Benedictines of Glenstal Abbey, County Limerick, since the early 1960s. Of more immediate interest to most Catholics, and widely welcomed, was the lifting of prohibitions against attendance at Protestant weddings, funerals and worship services. The “ban” forbidding Catholics to attend Trinity College, Dublin, because of the allegedly Protestant character of Dublin University was rescinded in 1970. In that same year the enthusiasm of Jesuit scholar Michael Hurley resulted in the establishment of the Irish School of Ecumenics, where postgraduate students from all Christian traditions studied theology and related subjects and participated in one another’s pastorate.

Led by the Archbishop of Armagh, William Cardinal CONWAY, ecumenical themes and the concept of a servant-church took root among Irish Catholics in the immediate postconciliar years without engendering antagonism or serious division. The responsibility of the local church toward the universal Church prompted the dispatch of Irish diocesan priests to assist the hard-pressed clergy in Peru and other parts of Latin America. Religious orders adopted new objectives in line with the conciliar spirit, often choosing an OPTION FOR THE POOR such as setting up schools for the children of nomadic “itinerants” (the scrap-dealing “travellers” who wandered the roads of Ireland). In the early 1970s the Conference of Major Religious Superiors drew on the insights of the individual orders to create “Focus for Action,” a program ensuring that the religious remained the most dynamic element within the Irish Church despite a chronic lack of vocations. Vocations to the priesthood in Ireland fell from 1,375 in 1965 to 322 in 1989. By 2000 the number of Masses were reduced due to a shortage of priests and the Holy Ghost Fathers were forced to relinquish management of their schools to secular educators due to a lack of religious. Catholic leaders predicted that the Irish Church would soon require priests from South America and Africa to immigrate as missionaries to the British Isles.

Encouraged by these developments, a thinking laity had begun to emerge, the leaders of which spoke from their own experience about subjects of social and moral significance. Intellectual Catholic journals had a much greater influence than their relatively small circulations would suggest since they addressed themselves to an audience that was theologically aware and conciliar by inclination, including the religious correspondents of the secular media.

Educational Reform. The postconciliar era also saw extensive State-initiated changes in the Irish educational system, despite the fact that the Catholic Church controlled a large number of schools in the Republic. Prior to Vatican II primary or first-level schools—called national schools—received most of their funding, including teacher’s salaries, from the Ministry of Education. While the Ministry prescribed the basic curriculum, national schools were effectively denominational due to their management by local Catholic parish priests or Protestant pastors. Most second-level schools, on the other hand, were run by religious orders and charged whatever tuition was required to cover costs not able to be borne by the orders. Paralleling these Church schools were vocational schools owned and run by the state that provided technical, practical or commercial curriculums. The system favored the higher economic classes of Irish society, as the laboring classes could little afford to send their children to second-level schools.

During the mid-1960s government set about improving the opportunities for access to education and at the same time expanding the curriculum. In some cases it meant merging smaller schools within the same community into larger units to achieve the benefits of pooled resources. The state also combined secondary and vocational schools into “comprehensive schools” that taught the humanities, sciences and technical subjects. In 1966 the state assumed the total cost of secondary school administration in return for the abolition of fees, and by the end of the decade most Church-run schools elected to enter the "state scheme" on this basis. Despite the state's involvement, the religious remained at the heart of the system. In 1973 the Church leadership endorsed the state initiatives, and encouraged the continued cooperation and mergers between local schools. In 2000 the Ministry of Education continued to fund all schools, regardless of religious affiliation.

The reform of education continued with much analysis and a sometimes heated exchange of viewpoints on the content of the curriculum, on class sizes, on the career prospects for lay teachers in Church schools. By the 1980s questions involving career prospects were beginning to resolve themselves as the vocations crisis meant that fewer priests, brothers and sisters were available for teaching. By the end of the decade lay staff predominated in all schools, and the appointment of lay principals (headmasters or headmistresses) was increasingly becoming the norm. As trustees, the religious continued to wield control through the management boards but their position was becoming precarious with the hardening of proposals for the state to assume ownership of the schools for which it was bearing the cost. With the bishops, both Anglican and Catholic, opposed to relinquishing ownership, the debate continued.

The Church was also central to some of the radical reforms of third-level education undertaken in the post-conciliar years. Its removal of the prohibition on Catholics attending Trinity College, Dublin, resulted in a major influx of Catholic students to that ancient institution, the establishment of a Catholic chaplaincy, and the provision of daily Mass in the college chapel. By the 1980s most Trinity College students were either Catholics or of Catholic background. The university's divinity school, which had been Anglican, became an interdenominational department of Hebrew, biblical and theological studies in 1980. Other universities in Ireland burgeoned in the decades after 1965, and two new universities were founded in the Republic in 1989: the University of Limerick and Dublin City University.

Missionary Efforts. Vatican II's emphasis on respect for local culture and the promotion of indigenous clergy and sisterhoods coincided with the attainment of independence by Third World countries and the fall-off in Irish vocations. Missionary work took on a new character in response to these stimuli. Long-established missionary activity in Africa and Asia by Irish religious had ensured that several generations of Irish Catholics were informed about the work of evangelization, education and medical help. The participation of lay helpers now became a characteristic of most missions, with doctors, nurses and other qualified personnel volunteering for a term of service in association with the missionaries. The principal concentration of Irish endeavor shifted to the relief of famine caused by drought, warfare or destitution. Special agencies were founded, including Trócaire (an Irish word meaning "mercy"), set up by the bishops in 1973. Together with some Irish secular agencies, these organizations became globally respected both for their provision of immediate assistance to the starving and their encouragement of improved methods of husbandry to prevent famine in the future.

Church Addresses Poverty. Through their Justice and Peace Commission, pastoral letters and other statements, Irish bishops took a leading role in protesting against an economic system that failed to address the problem of poverty in Ireland. They pointed to deficiencies in political planning, the criteria of the EUROPEAN UNION, and relations between workers and employers that contributed to what they saw as major injustices in Irish society, the greatest of which they identified as an unnecessarily high level of unemployment. An even more trenchant and sustained campaign for radical change was mounted by the Conference of Religious of Ireland (CRI), which presented plans, analyses, submissions and protests urging the government to break out of traditional patterns of economic thinking. During the 1990s the CRI became one of the more influential voices affecting the forward planning of successive administrations, and saw some of its proposals being accepted. Following the presidential elections two years later, the Conference again spoke out, noting that "Decisions taken in the past 20 years have resulted in the emergence of a two-tier society" wherein 34 percent of Irish lived below the poverty line. Showing similar resolve, a 1994 initiative by the government to encourage employment in the depressed regions of western Ireland was a direct result of the efforts of local bishops.

Social welfare agencies promoted through Church effort included the Catholic Communications Institute of Ireland, which advised bishops on media matters and maintained a number of book stores, a publishing firm (Veritas Publications), and a video production unit. CURA, an advice and counseling service for women with unwanted pregnancies, operated a confidential telephone contact system throughout the country. The Catholic Marriage Advisory Council provided a confidential service, operated by trained personnel, to help sustain and enrich marriage and family relationships.

Modern Church Confronts Social Issues. In Ireland as elsewhere, the first severe jolt for the postconciliar Church came with the publication of the encyclical HUMANAE VITAE in 1968. While the condemnation of artificial birth control drew protests from a number of the newly articulate laity, Irish bishops stressed the obligation on Catholics to make “a religious submission of mind and will” to authentic papal teaching. Although controversy continued, because the sale of contraceptives was prohibited by civil law in Ireland, the crisis did not at first assume the same proportions as it did elsewhere. However, when the government proposed to modify the legal restriction against contraceptives, the church-state clash that followed revealed a major cleavage within the local church. While bishops accepted legislative authority to determine civil law, they added that the introduction of contraception would undermine the common good and would ultimately lead to the advocacy of abortion. Contraception was finally legalized in the 1980s, in careful stages by a parliament as cautious as the people it represented, and, prophetically, by 1999 a referendum was requested on the legalization of abortion.

The early stages of the contraception controversy coincided with a noticeable alienation of young people from the Church, an increase in resignations from the ministry, a sharp decrease in vocations and a growing criticism of Church affairs by the media. Corresponding to these negative factors was a new fervor among traditionalists opposed to innovative thinking and to all efforts aimed at persuading the Church to conform its teaching to meet and serve the needs of contemporary society.

Unique to this set of common circumstances among Irish Catholics was that polarization occurred within a community shaped by the Catholic ethos. Most advocates of social change were themselves practicing Catholics: theologians such as Maynooth professor Enda McDonagh and the Augustinian Gabriel Daly, and the political observers Garret FitzGerald (soon to be prime minister) and Mary Robinson (later to be president of Ireland). Historian Margaret MacCurtain, OP, and anti-poverty campaigner Stanislaus Kennedy, were religious sisters. Some liberals became antagonistic to the Church itself, certain extremists even resorted to antagonistic rhetoric that further hardened the traditionalist resistance to change. In general the greater part of the criticism directed against conservative Church attitudes in Ireland came from believing Catholics.

Genuine concerns existed over the encroachment of materialism to the detriment of the Christian family and the destruction of religious values and traditions. This stance, reflected by Pope John Paul II's address during a pastoral visit to Ireland in 1979, inspired the formation of lay groups dedicated to the defense of the family. Seeing their Church in jeopardy, groups formed to battle parliament's “liberalizing” civil legislation regarding abortion and divorce. Successful in the referendum on divorce in 1983 and the referendum on abortion in 1986, these groups eventually found their positions undermined. With regard to abortion, a clause banning the constitution from addressing abortion was so convoluted that the Supreme Court found that it actually permitted abortion in certain cases. Meanwhile, in 1993 a law was passed that provided an end-run around the abortion controversy by allowing Irish women to obtain abortions by traveling to Great Britain, where they were legal. And a campaign to scuttle a proposal to facilitate the introduction of divorce left many separated couples in a legal limbo; when the proposal was revived, it was passed and divorce became legal in February of 1997. Meanwhile, government legislation began to erode the traditional arena of the church. Passage of the Family Law Act of 1995 compromised canon law by raising the minimum age for marriage from 14 to 18. Church leaders protested the new law as a breach of human rights and a breach of the Church's right to determine the requirements of the holy state of matrimony.

The charge that the Catholic Church determined the laws of the Republic could not readily be countered as long as statute and constitutional law on matters of morality conspicuously conformed to Catholic teaching. The attitude of the bishops, who equated this conformity with the common good regardless of the wishes of citizens who disagreed with the Church, was felt by some to be at variance with the Vatican Council's advocacy of ecumenism and religious freedom. The hierarchical backing given to conservatives in the abortion and divorce controversies further exacerbated Liberal Catholic distress. The perceived non-conciliar stance of the Holy See on internal issues—clerical celibacy, the position of women within the Church and the disciplining of theologians—also increased the progressive discontent and deepened the gulf between Irish Catholic factions. Opinion surveys in the 1990s showed substantial support in Ireland not only for the ordination of women but also for the abolition of compulsory priestly celibacy. A consequent concern throughout this period was the appointment of bishops, which in the case of some nominations to prominent Irish dioceses undoubtedly ignored the wishes of the local church.

Overt factionalism surfaced in 1994 when it came to light that the Irish Church had harbored the same problems related to pedophilia and homosexual clergy, and to priests in illicit relationships with women, that assailed the Church elsewhere in the world. While slow to criticize the human weaknesses exposed in a succession of scandals, Irish Catholics expressed shock over the incompetence of Church authorities in dealing with the problems, especially in the case of clerics accused of pedophilia.

Situation in Northern Ireland. The “Troubles”—the guerilla-style violence in Northern Ireland that characterized that region throughout the second half of the 20th century—posed serious questions for the Church throughout the entire island. While society in the Republic was homogenous—there was little ethnic diversity and 91 percent of the population identified itself as Roman Catholic in 2000—loyalties to nationalist (Republican) or unionist causes sometimes influenced political attitudes and affiliations. This was not the case in the north, however. There only one third of the population identified itself as Catholic, and this minority looked forward to the eventual reunification of the island. The Protestant majority, with political and cultural ties to Great Britain, viewed their Catholics neighbors with suspicion. A local parliament with powers delegated from the British parliament had allowed Northern Ireland to enjoy what was effectively single-party rule until 1972 when that parliament was abolished.

In 1968 police violence in responding to activities of a group fighting discrimination against Catholics in housing, employment and electoral practices rekindled hostilities between the two factions. Over the next few years the conflict hardened into deadly guerrilla warfare as the nationalist Irish Republican Army (IRA)—a body illegal in the Republic as well as in the North—directed violent attacks on extremist groups on the loyalist side. Members of the British army, the police and many innocent civilians died in the bombings, shootings and other acts of violence that followed.

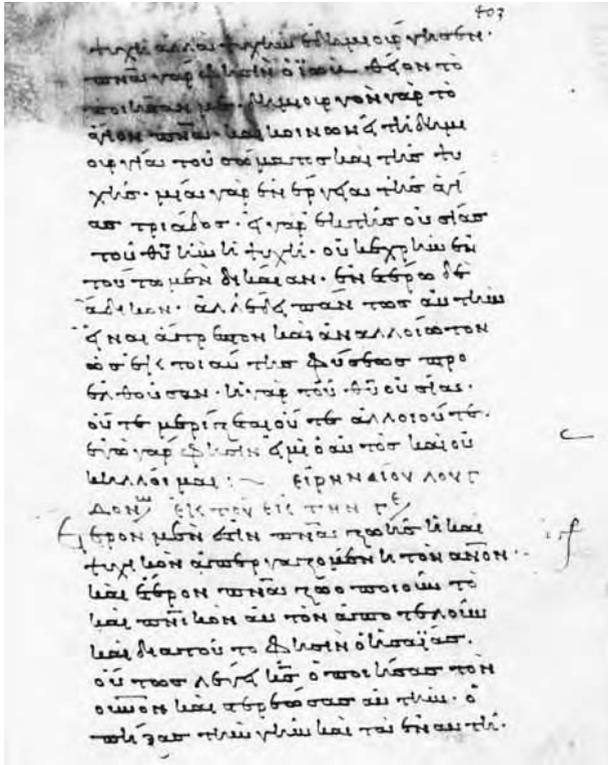

The dilemma for Church authorities was that while they shared the grievance of the Catholic people with regard to civil rights issues, they could not approve the violent tactics of the IRA. Northern bishops led by Armagh’s Cardinal Conway vehemently denounced the violence. While they spoke for most of their fellow Catholics they alienated some who saw the IRA as protectors. They also upset others who, while disapproving of the IRA, also disliked their Church’s giving comfort to unionists. And when the bishops condemned loyalist and military excesses pro-British commentators saw them as Janus-faced. Conway and his supporters resisted demands to excommunicate members of the IRA as they realized such an exercise would be pointless: Irish nationalists traditionally distinguished between their faith and their Church, believing that the Church in these circumstances acted out of its own interest rather than from ethical considerations. The bishops did, however, forbid the use of military symbolism within church buildings during the funerals of IRA members. Cardinal Conway’s successors, Cardinals Tomás Ó Fiaich and Cahal Daly, reiterated the condemnations of all violence, including that from the nationalist side, and increasingly joined with Protestant church leaders to plead for peace, but with little evident effect.

While individual Catholic leaders rallied many to the cause of peace, the hierarchy took a much more subtle position. The Northern tensions were rooted in an historic antipathy between Catholics and Protestants, making ecumenical approaches obvious. However, a virtual halt in ecumenical progress accompanied the polarization of opinion among Catholics in the Republic. No Irish enthusiasm was officially voiced for the active pursuit of Anglican-Roman Catholic reunion. In the North, where thoughtful people felt that a major contribution towards the long-term elimination of communal tension could be made by the education of Catholic and Protestant children together in the same schools, official Catholic support was withheld. A few “integrated” schools of this kind were founded but without overt Church approval. In fairness to the Catholic authorities, it must be added that Protestant approval was equally difficult to generate.

The Downing Street Declaration, a joint statement outlining a proposed peace process made by Irish Prime Minister John Bruton and British Prime Minister John Major in December of 1993, led to an IRA and loyalist cease fire the following year. While hostilities erupted again in 1996, they were reduced to intermittent flare-ups as negotiations continued. On Good Friday, 1998, a peace settlement was reached by the IRA and loyalist factions that would create a 108-seat Assembly in Northern Ireland capable of protecting the political rights of the region’s Catholic minority. While voters in both sections of the island approved the proposal, by 2001 it had yet to be implemented. Blessing the agreement, Pope John Paul II saw it as an affirmation that a “new era of hope” had begun for the region.

Bibliography: J. B. BELL, The Irish Troubles: A Generation of Violence 1967–1992 (Dublin 1993). J. COONEY, The Crozier and the Dail: Church and State 1922–1986 (Cork 1986). J. DUNN, No Lions in the Hierarchy (Dublin 1994). Freedom to Hope: The Catholic Church in Ireland 20 Years after Vatican II, eds., A. FALCONER, E. MCDONAGH and S. MACRÉAMOINN (Dublin 1985). B. FARRELL, De Valera: His Constitution and Ours (Dublin 1988). G. FITZGERALD, All in a Life: An Autobiography (Dublin 1992). M. FOGARTY, L. RYAN and J. LEE, Irish Values and Attitudes: The Irish Report of the European Value Systems Study (Dublin 1984). P. HANNON, Church, State, Morality, and Law (Dublin 1992). T. HESKETH, The Second Partitioning of Ireland: The Abortion Referendum of 1983 (Dublin 1990). J. HICKEY, Religion and the Northern Ireland Problem (Dublin 1984). Beyond Tolerance, ed. M. HURLEY (London 1975). IRISH EPISCOPAL CONFERENCE, Justice, Love, and Peace: Pastoral Letters of the Irish Bishops 1969–1979 (Dublin 1979); Love Is for Life (Dublin 1985); Work Is the Key: Toward an Economy That Needs Everyone (Dublin 1992); The Pope in Ireland: Ad- dresses and Homilies (Dublin 1979). D. KEOGH, Twentieth-Century Ireland: Nation and State (Dublin 1994). P. KIRBY, Is Irish Catholicism Dying? (Cork 1984). D. A. LANE, Foundations for a Social Theology (Dublin 1984). J. LEE, Ireland 1912–1985: Politics and Society (Cambridge 1989). Women in Irish Society: The Historical Dimension, eds., M. MACCARTAIN and D. Ó CORRÁIN (Dublin 1978). E. MCDONAGH, The Making of Disciples (Dublin 1982); Between Chaos and the New Creation (Dublin 1986); Irish Challenges to Theology (Dublin 1986). G. MCELROY, The Catholic Church and Northern Ireland Crisis 1968–1986 (Dublin 1991). K. MCNAMARA, Pluralism (Dublin 1986). J. NEWMAN, Ireland Must Choose (Dublin 1983). Values and Social Change in Ireland, ed. C. T. WHELAN (Dublin 1994). J. WHYTE, Church and State in Modern Ireland 1923–1979 (Dublin 1984); Interpreting Northern Ireland (Oxford 1990).

Manuscript folio from "Adversus haereses," 10th century, by St. Irenaeus (Cod. Vat. Grec. 423, fol. 403), from Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana.

[L. MCREDMOND/EDS.]

IRENAEUS, ST.

Early Church Father and perhaps a martyr; b. Asia Minor c. 140–160; d. Lyons? c. 202. Although of crucial importance in the development of the Church's theology, Irenaeus presents problems of considerable difficulty in regard to details of his life, writings, and teaching.

Life. Irenaeus, a disciple of St. POLYCARP of Smyrna, migrated to Gaul, where he became a presbyter of the Church of Lyons during the reign of Marcus Aurelius. During the Montanist (see MONTANISM) controversy he was sent as an envoy to Rome by the Church of Lyons and upon his return was chosen to succeed the martyr Pothinus as bishop. In this capacity he strenuously opposed the teachings of Gnosticism and in the Easter Controversy advised Pope VICTOR I to preserve peace with the churches of Asia Minor.

Christianity was most probably brought to many parts of eastern Gaul by Irenaeus. Of the last years of his life practically nothing is known and only in the late 6th century does GREGORY OF TOURS (Hist. Francorum 1.27) refer to Irenaeus as a martyr.

Writings. Only two complete works of Irenaeus, originally written in Greek, are extant.

The Detection and Overthrow of the False Gnosis. In five books, usually cited as Adversus haereses, this work is preserved in a Latin translation made probably c. 200. Fragments of the original Greek are found in the writings of HIPPLYTUS OF ROME, EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, EPIPHANIUS, and THEODORET OF CYR; in catenae; and in papyri. Books 4 and 5 are also extant in an Armenian translation, and 23 fragments are found in Syriac. Book 1 deals chiefly with the detection of the false Gnosis and serves as a valuable history of Gnosticism. The next three books contain the refutation of Gnostic teachings with arguments drawn from reason (book 2), from the teaching and tradition of the Apostles (book 3), and from the sayings of the Lord (book 4). Book 5 treats of the "last things," especially the resurrection of the body, and concludes with some remarks on MILLENARIANISM.

Demonstration of the Apostolic Teaching. Until 1904, when a complete Armenian translation of the Demonstration (Ἐπίδειξις) was discovered, it was known only through a reference in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 5.26). The treatise is an apologetic work dealing with fundamental Christian teachings and presents the prophecies of the Old Testament as proofs for the truth of Christian revelation.

Other Writings. Excerpts from the letter to Victor I relative to the Easter controversy are quoted by Eusebius (ibid., 5.23.3; 5.24.11–17). There is also a Syriac fragment of another letter to the same pope. The four fragments of letters published by C. M. Pfaff have been shown to be forgeries.

Known only through notices in Eusebius are: (1) a letter to Irenaeus's friend Florinus, On the Sole Sovereignty, or That God Is Not the Author of Evil, and a treatise written for the same friend, On the Ogdoad (Eusebius, 5.20.1); (2) a letter to Blastus, On Schism (Eusebius, ibid.); (3) a work titled Concerning Knowledge (Eusebius, 5.26). Without giving a specific title, Eusebius also mentions a small book of various discourses.

Teaching. In opposition to Gnostic dualism Irenaeus teaches that there is but one God, who is the creator of the world and the father of Jesus Christ; one divine economy of salvation; and one revelation. He develops the Pauline doctrine of the ἀνακεφαλαίωσις, or RECAPITULATION IN CHRIST of all things: Christ as the new Adam renews all creation and leads it back to its author through the Incarnation and the Redemption. Mary, the Mother of God, is the new Eve. Visible creation is good, not evil, and the body will rise again. The Eucharist is both a Sacrament containing the real body of Christ and the true sacrifice of the New Law. As a witness to Apostolic tradition and a champion of the inspiration of both the OT and the NT, Irenaeus is one of the most important writers of the early Church.

Potentior Principalitas. One of the most frequently quoted passages of Irenaeus is a statement in Adv. haer. 3.3.3: “Ad hanc enim ecclesiam, propter potentior[em] [potior] principalitatem, necesse est omnem convenire ecclesiam—hoc est eos qui sunt undique fideles—in qua semper ab his qui sunt undique conservata est ea quae est ab apostolis traditio.” There is no settled translation of this passage and the difficulties are compounded by the lack of the original Greek text. Some think that the translation should read: “For with this Church on account of its more effective leadership every Church must agree, that is, the faithful throughout the world, in which the apostolic tradition has always been preserved by the [faithful] everywhere.”

Some scholars take “this Church” to mean the Church of Rome. Nautin’s philological study of the text, however, indicates that this meaning is not certain and suggests that the phrase refers to the universal Church. K. Baus thinks that the church referred to is any Church founded by an apostle in which the Apostolic tradition is preserved by an unbroken succession of bishops teaching the same doctrine.

The meaning of potentior [potior] principalitas is likewise disputed. Some translate it as “more effective leadership,” “superior origin,” “priority of time,” with reference either to the Church of Rome or to any Apostolic Church. Others, however, maintain that the words do not refer to any Church, but to the unique social and political importance of the city of Rome.

Most probably the words necesse est convenire—“must agree with”—are not to be understood as a juridical obligation, because the context does not deal with the ecclesiastical constitution. Irenaeus rejects the Gnostic teachings because they are completely at variance with the teaching of any Apostolic Church; apostolicity is a proof of orthodoxy of doctrine.

On the basis of studies in early Christian Latin, C. Mohrmann suggests that ab his qui sunt undique contains the idea of a comparison and consequently the translation should read: “in this Church [its identity cannot be established beyond all doubt] the Apostolic tradition has always been preserved and better than in other Churches formed by the faithful living in all parts of the world.”

In spite of uncertainties as to the correct translation of the passage, one point seems clear from the context: Irenaeus is primarily concerned with establishing the correct teaching handed down from the Twelve Apostles.

Irenaeus was buried in the crypt of St. John (now St.-Irenée) in Lyons, which was destroyed by Calvinists in 1562.

Feast: June 28 (West); Aug. 23 (East).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 5:335–49. F. L. BATTLES, ed., Irenaeus, against Heresies . . . (Allison Park, Pa. 1993). F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 7.2:2394–2533. P. T. CAMELOT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:773–775. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 150–158. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–86) 1:287–313. G. WINGREN, Man and the Incarnation, tr. R. MACKENZIE (Philadelphia 1959). C. MOHRMANN, Vigiliae christianae 3 (1949) 57–61. P. NAUTIN, Revue de l’histoire des religions 151 (1957) 37–78. R. P. C. HANSON, “Potentior principalitatem in Irenaeus,” Studia Patristica (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 78; Berlin 1961) 366–369. K. BAUS and H. JEDIN, Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, 6 v. (Freiburg 1962– ): v. 1, K. BAUS, ed., Von der Urgemeinde zur frühchristlichen Grosskirche, with “Einleitung zur Kirchengeschichte” by H. JEDIN; Eng. tr. from 3d, rev. ed., H. JEDIN and J. DOLAN, eds., Handbook of Church History (New York 1965): v. 1, From the Apostolic Community to Constantine, tr. K. BAUS, with a “General Introduction to Church History” by H. JEDIN 1:399–400. R. and B. HEMMERDINGER, “Trois nouveaux fragments grecs de l’Adversus haereses de saint Irenée,” Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 53 (1962) 252–255. H. LASSIAT, Promotion de l’homme en Jésus-Christ: d’après Irenée de Lyon, témoin de la tradition des apôtres (Paris 1974); L’Actualité de la catéchèse apostolique (Saint-Vincent-sur-Jabron 1979). M. BALWIERZ, The Holy Spirit and the Church as a Subject of Evangelization according to St. Irenaeus (Warsaw 1985). L. MENVIELLE, Marie, mère de vie: approche du mystère marial à partir d’Irenée de Lyon (Venasque 1986). A. ORBE, Parábolas evangélicas en San Ireneo, 2 v. (Madrid 1972); Espiritualidad de San Ireneo (Rome 1989). M. J. OLSON, Irenaeus, the Valentinian Gnostics, and the Kingdom of God (Lewiston, N.Y. 1992). M. HAUKE, Heilsverlust in Adam: Stationen griechischer Erbsündenlehre: Irenäus, Origenes, Kappadozier (Paderborn 1993). T. L. TIESSEN, Irenaeus on the Salvation of the Unevangelized (Metuchen, N.J. 1993). D. MINNS, Irenaeus (London 1994). R. M. GRANT, Irenaeus of Lyons (London 1997). M. A. DONOVANN, One Right Reading? A Guide to Irenaeus (Collegeville, Minn. 1997). T. SCHERRER, La gloire de Dieu dans l’oeuvre de Saint Irenée (Rome 1997). D. J.

BINGHAM, Irenaeus' Use of Matthew's Gospel in Adversus haereses (Leuven 1998). J. BEHR, Asceticism and Anthropology in Irenaeus and Clement (Oxford 2000). D. WANKE, Das Kreuz Christi bei Irenäus von Lyon (Berlin 2000), extensive bibliography.

[H. DRESSLER]

IRENE, BYZANTINE EMPRESS

Coregnant 780–797, sole ruler from 797 to Oct. 31, 802; b. Athens, c. 752; d. Lesbos, Aug. 9, 803. Although married to Leo IV, “the Khazar,” one of the more moderate iconoclastic emperors, Irene herself strongly supported the veneration of images. At Leo’s death she became regent and coruler with her ten-year-old son, Constantine VI, and from this date moved with caution to reverse the iconoclastic policies of the late Emperor’s Isaurian administration. In 784 she replaced Patriarch PAUL IV with the moderate, politic TARASIVS, and in 787 the seventh Ecumenical Council met in NICAEA (II) under her auspices to condemn ICONOCLASM. Tarasius was the author of the decree proclaiming the efficacy of icon veneration. In 790 Irene failed in her attempt to remove Constantine, and, opposed by the higher levels of the bureaucracy and by the Asiatic regiments of the army, she herself was briefly removed from power. She regained her position as coruler in 792. In 797, aided by the antagonism Constantine had aroused through his tyrannical pretensions and poor military leadership, she finally overthrew her son and had him blinded and deposed.

The chief event affecting the Eastern Empire during her reign was the coronation of CHARLEMAGNE in Rome in 800. Although Irene and the anti-iconoclastic party had effected a rapprochement with ADRIAN I in the period of the Council, the creation of a second empire completely confounded the political ideals of the Byzantines. Irene was willing to compromise with the Frankish ruler and may even have offered herself in marriage to him to reunite the two worlds. But official Byzantine recognition of Charlemagne (as Emperor, but not as Emperor of the Romans) did not come until 814.

As emperor (i.e., Basileus, for Basilissa or Empress was not a recognized title at this time), Irene was not effective. She was unable to halt the incursions of the Bulgars, and her generous financial policies, especially friendly to monastic establishments, resulted in a severe loss of revenue. She was deposed in 802 by a conspiracy of high palace officials, one of whom succeeded her as Nicephorus I. Irene is venerated as a saint in the Eastern Church.

Feast: Aug. 9.

Bibliography: F. DÖLGER, Corpus der griechischen Urkunden des Mittelalters und der neueren Zeit 1:335–360. G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State, 156–165.

[D. A. MILLER]

IRENE OF PORTUGAL, ST.

Date and place of birth and death unknown; listed in the Antiphony of León (10th? century) as virgo in Scallabi Castro. In vitae (all after 1100), notably in Breviaries of Braga and Évora, she is described as a beautiful nun of noble birth in THOMAR(?). After dissuading a noble from his desire, she had to reject her spiritual director, who, in revenge, gave her a potion that made her appear pregnant. The jealous noble had her murdered. Her body floated down the Nabão and the Zêzere to be miraculously entombed in a pool at Scallabis on the Tagus in 653. The town of Scallabis, it is said, then changed its name to Santarem (Santa Irene, Ira, Eriã). Irene was added to the Roman martyrology in 1586.

Feast: Oct. 20.

Bibliography: H. FLÓREZ et al., España sagrada, 54 v. (Madrid 1747–1957) 14:389–391. B. DE GAIFFIER, Analecta Bollandiana 57 (1939) 440; 58 (1940) 85; 66 (1948) 307.

[E. P. COLBERT]

IRENICISM

A term used to describe peaceful or conciliatory means in dealing with Church matters, particularly in the field of Christian unity, as distinct from polemics or controversy. It does not imply a dilution or diminution of the truth in order to secure a solution to thorny problems. The Decree on Ecumenism of Vatican II warned that “Nothing is so foreign to the spirit of ecumenism as a false conciliatory approach [irenicism] which harms the purity of Catholic doctrine and obscures its assured genuine meaning” (UR 11). At the same time, “the manner and order in which Catholic belief is expressed should in no way become an obstacle to dialogue with our brethren” (ibid.).

A true irenicism involves kindness and respect for the attitude and opinion of others who are not members of the Church and seeks to create a spirit of mutual understanding, but in no way does it attempt to compromise with truth or charity. It seeks to promote the principles of unity in the spirit of the Good Shepherd.

See Also: INDIFFERENTISM; ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT; TRIUMPHALISM.

Bibliography: B. LAMBERT, Le Problème oecuménique, 2 v. (Paris 1961). G. THILS, Histoire doctrinale du mouvement oecu- ménique (Louvain 1955). M. J. LE GUILLOU, Mission et Unité, 2 v. (Paris 1960). C. J. DUMONT, Les Voices de l'unité chrétienne (Paris 1954).

[T. CRANNY/EDS.]

IRISH CATHOLIC COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION OF THE U.S.

Originated at a meeting in Chicago, Ill., on Jan. 20, 1879, when William J. Onahan, acting for the principal organizations then promoting Irish colonization, planned a national conference for March 17. Despite earlier colonization projects, conditions among the Irish in crowded eastern cities continued to be distressing from moral, political, and economic viewpoints. Attempts for a national society had proved unproductive in 1856, 1869, and 1873; yet Bp. John Ireland's flourishing Irish Catholic settlements of the late 1870s in Minnesota made him, along with Dillon O'Brien, the greatest colonizing layman in Minnesota, think the time was opportune to try again.

Ireland could count on support from Bps. John Lancaster Spalding, of Peoria, and James O'Connor, of Omaha, who was then negotiating with the Burlington-Missouri Railroad for land for a Catholic colony. At the organization meeting on April 18, 1879, Spalding was elected president of the board of directors (a position he held through 1891), consisting of 13 laymen and six bishops. The association was legally incorporated under Illinois law as a stock company with capital of $100,000 in shares of $100 each. Their aim was to assist people who had saved $250 to $300, which, with association help, would enable a family to become established. They judged it unwise to settle absolute destitutes and discouraged further emigration from Ireland. From June 1879, Ireland and Spalding gave numerous lectures throughout eastern dioceses, including mass meetings in Cooper Union, New York City. Despite outward public approval and assurance that this was a safe business venture, less than $10,000 was subscribed. Even after a second strenuous lecture campaign, only $83,000 was actually paid in.

The association bought 10,000 acres of railroad land in Nobles County, Minn., and 25,000 in Greeley County, Nebr., to sell at $1.25 to $5.00 per acre. The price was advanced 25 percent an acre over purchase in order to erect a church, rectory, school, and immigrant depot for the temporary convenience of settlers. Since Bp. Edward Fitzgerald of Little Rock, Ark., had several flourishing colonies, an association committee in 1881 "reserved" lands along the railroad there for eight years; but few Irish families came. Perhaps this was due to lack of assistance from association funds or antipathy to Negro labor there. When the lease expired the Arkansas venture was closed. In 1884 the association was able to establish a helpful immigration bureau at Castle Garden, New York City. As soon as prosperity was assured for its colonies in Minnesota and Nebraska, the association began redemption at par of its stock and in 1891 closed all accounts.

Brother M. P. Riordan, second superior general of the Irish Christian Brothers.

Bibliography: M. E. HENTHORNE, The Irish Catholic Colonization Association of the United States (Champaign 1932). J. P. SHANNON, Catholic Colonization on the Western Frontier (New Haven 1957). J. L. SPALDING, The Religious Mission of the Irish People and Catholic Colonization (New York 1880).

[M. G. KELLY]

IRISH CHRISTIAN BROTHERS

Irish Christian Brothers is the popular name for the Congregation of Christian Brothers, also known as Christian Brothers Institute (CFC), a teaching congregation founded in 1802 in Waterford, Ireland, by Edmund Ignatius RICE, a merchant of that city.

The need to educate the youth of his native land, where religious persecution had reduced the majority of Catholics to poverty and ignorance, led Rice to dispose of his prosperous business affairs. In 1802, he began to instruct the neglected youth of Waterford; others joined him, the work prospered, and schools were opened in neighboring towns. In August 1808, with six companions, Rice made his vows and received the name Brother Ignatius. When papal approval was granted in 1820, Brother Rice was elected the first superior general.

The spread of the congregation to distant countries was occasioned largely by the need of Irish-born prelates for help in educating the youth of their dioceses. Four brothers were sent to Australia in 1868. In 1876, the brothers were sent to Newfoundland, Canada. The congregation was introduced to the British colony of Gibraltar in 1877 and soon enjoyed a respected place in an education system long dominated by "regimental" academies and non-Catholic schools. In 1886 at the request of the Holy See, schools were opened in India. In 1906 Msgr. James W. Power invited the brothers to open a school at All Saints parish, New York City. This was the cradle of the North American province, which, with the incorporation of the Newfoundland schools, was formally established in 1916. The generalate is in Rome.

[J. H. VAUGHAN/EDS.]

IRISH COLLEGES ON THE CONTINENT

On the eve of the Reformation the clergy of Ireland were ill-equipped to meet the coming onslaught on the traditional faith. Two centuries earlier the University of St. Patrick's, Dublin, authorized by Clement V, proved to be stillborn. There was thus no studium generale in the country to maintain a good academic standard in the education of ecclesiastics whose training, acquired in the monasteries of the older religious orders or in a few cathedral schools, was adapted solely to the pastoral ministry among a people whose beliefs had hitherto been unchallenged. The authorization, accorded in 1564 by the Holy See to Archbishop Creagh of Armagh and David Woulfe, the papal commissary, to found a studium generale arrived too late. The Act of Supremacy and Uniformity was already in force in Ireland, and the Catholic faith was already in jeopardy.

Contemporary sources for the history of the period portray an Ireland that was likely to be susceptible to Protestantism. The Irish hierarchy had shown itself, with very few exceptions, weak and temporizing. Indeed the first ray of hope that worthy men would be appointed to rule the dioceses of the country appeared only after 1564 when the Holy See began to act on the recommendations furnished by the papal commissary. And though the problem of manning Irish parishes with worthy clergy was pressing, there was to be no solution of this problem for another generation. It was the good fortune of the Catholic Church in Ireland to have enjoyed borrowed years until the first priests from the seminaries abroad returned to fortify their people against error. The early Elizabethan Protestant clergy in Ireland were themselves badly instructed and more anxious to possess parish revenues than to spread their doctrines, while their hierarchy steered an uncertain course between Anglicanism and Calvinism. Also Trinity College, Dublin, which was intended to be an intellectual center for the education of Irish Protestant clergy, was not established until the year before the opening of the Irish College, Salamanca. It was fortunate for the Church that the older religious orders, especially the Franciscans, were at home to man vacant parishes until the return of the first priests who had attended the Irish Colleges.

For more than 40 years before the establishment of the first Irish College abroad, Irish students for the priesthood were already an accepted phenomenon in the university centers of Flanders, Spain, Portugal, Italy, and France. There is no way of knowing, however, how many of these students returned as missionary priests to Ireland. There was, as yet, no organization to canalize for the spiritual benefit of Ireland what was evidently a fair potential source of priestly vocations.

To a few secular priests and Jesuits is due the credit for acting solely on their own individual initiative in bringing into being the Irish Colleges whose raison d'être was to educate Irishmen in the spirit of the Tridentine decrees for missionary service throughout Ireland.

THE IBERIAN PENINSULA

Salamanca College opened its doors in 1592 because of the efforts of a secular priest, Thomas WHITE, who for some years had been supporting a few poor Irish students out of his own means. He was eventually able to gain the approval and financial support of Philip II for the continuance of his work. Shortly after he became rector, White became a Jesuit. He devoted the rest of his life to the education of Irish clerical students. His collaborator at Salamanca and elsewhere was Richard Conway, a Jesuit. In 1593 another Irish Jesuit, John Howling, opened the Irish College of Lisbon.

The number of students rarely exceeded ten in each of these colleges; yet within 25 years Lisbon alone had sent forth 124 priests. Later establishments were the Irish Colleges of Compostella and Seville, founded by secular priests but subsequently entrusted to the Jesuits. The college at Compostella was ancillary to that of Salamanca, the former providing courses in arts and philosophy, the latter in theology. These peninsular foundations passed under the government of the secular clergy after the banishment of the Jesuits from Spain and Portugal. The Irish College of Salamanca continued to function until it was closed in 1955 by the Irish hierarchy.

FLANDERS

Christopher Cusack, another zealous and resourceful secular priest, long at work among Irish students, was enabled, by help from the Spanish Crown, to establish four centers for the education of Irish missionary priests. These were the Pastoral College (1594) of DOUAI with, later, the ancillary colleges of Antwerp, Tournai, and Lille. The last, due to the help of the Capuchin, Francis Nugent, became virtually a juvenate for the Capuchin order. The Pastoral College of Douai admitted lay as well as clerical students in its earlier years. By 1613, 148 Irish priests had been ordained from Douai.

Apparently, the only college founded through the initiative of a member of the Irish hierarchy was the Pastoral College of LOUVAIN established in 1623 by Urban VIII at the instance of Eugene MacMahon, Archbishop of Dublin. The College was affiliated with the University, which, since 1548, had witnessed the enrollment of Irish students in ever increasing numbers. The most notable of Irish alumni of the University was Dermot O'HURLEY, the martyred Archbishop of Cashel. All these Irish Colleges in the Low Countries disappeared in the troubled years of the French Revolution.

FRANCE

The Irish College in Paris does not seem to have been formally established until 1605, but its first rector, John Lee, a secular priest long settled in Paris, had already been engaged in seeking alms for the support of Irish students of the university. This college became numerically the largest of all the Irish seminaries and, when the National Seminary of Maynooth was founded, was training 180 students. It is still an Irish seminary, entrusted by the Irish hierarchy since 1858 to the supervision of the Irish Vincentians, but in recent years it has been on loan for the education of refugee clerical students from Poland.

In 1603 another Irish secular priest Dermot MacCarthy, founded the Irish College of Bordeaux for the education of priests for the south of Ireland. This seminary was later named the Collège de Ste. Anne la Royale to commemorate its chief benefactress Anne of Austria. In its early years it housed only about a dozen students, but at the time of the French Revolution it counted 40. The Irish College of Toulouse, also later named Collège de Ste. Anne la Royale, was established by MacCarthy in 1611 to meet the demands for admission at Bordeaux. Ancillary centers to Bordeaux and Toulouse were also set up by MacCarthy. After 1654 the Irish students at Bordeaux and Toulouse were automatically granted French citizenship, and after ordination many settled permanently in France.

The Irish College of Nantes was founded during the Titus Oates Plot, and eventually became the second largest of all the Irish Colleges, with its enrollment of 80. It had its own professorial staff unlike the other Irish seminaries whose students attended lectures either in the universities or at Jesuit establishments. The Irish Colleges of Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Nantes lasted until the French Revolution.

The Irish College of Poitiers was never a seminary but rather a Jesuit boarding school for Irish boys, founded in 1674 through the munificence of Catherine, wife of Charles II. The College maintained its lay character to the end, although five burses for the education of students for the priesthood were available in the College in the 1730s. On the suppression of the Society of Jesus in France in 1762 these burses were acquired by the Irish College in Paris. What was saved from the royal foundation by the Jesuits helped later to purchase Clongowes Wood when the Society was restored.

ITALY

Although one of the smallest of the Irish seminaries in exile, the Irish College in Rome, the Collegium Episcoporum, became one of the most celebrated. It owed its existence to the munificence of Cardinal Ludovico Ludovisi (1595–1632), Protector of Ireland. By 1625 a small group of Irish students was being supported by the Cardinal at the English College, which was under Jesuit management. However, disputes between the Irish and English students necessitated the withdrawal of the former for whom Luke Wadding, the celebrated Franciscan, found a home near St. Isidore's. Thus the Irish College came into being on Jan. 1, 1628. Its first rector was a secular priest, and the students attended lectures in St. Isidore's with the young Franciscan scholastics. The government of the College was under the supervision of the Franciscan Order. Cardinal Ludovisi continued to support the students, but in his will, drawn up 16 months later, he entrusted the College to the Jesuits. This was disputed after his death, but a decree of the Rota in 1635 upheld the Cardinal's will.

The Irish College remained under the supervision of the Jesuits until 1772 when it was transferred to the management of the secular clergy. Suppressed by Napoleon in 1798, the College was restored in 1826. St. Oliver PLUNKET was an alumnus of this college.

IRISH HOUSES OF RELIGIOUS ORDERS

The most notable Irish houses of the religious orders abroad were those of the Franciscans at Louvain (1606), Prague (1629), and St. Isidore's, Rome (1625); of the Dominicans at Lisbon (1615), Louvain (1624), and San Clemente, Rome (1677); and of the Capuchins at Charleville (1615). The Franciscan College of St. Anthony and the Dominican College of Holy Cross were both affiliated to the University of Louvain. Both were closed and their property sequestered in 1796. St. Anthony's was celebrated as the home of John Colgan, the hagiographer, and the collaborators of Michael O'Clery, compiler of the Annals of the Four Masters. The buildings of St. Anthony's were recovered by the Irish Franciscans in 1925, and serve once again as an Irish Franciscan house of studies. St. Isidore's and San Clemente in Rome are still held by the Franciscans and Dominicans respectively. The Irish Dominicans still serve the Church of Corpo Santo, Lisbon, on the site of the College, which was closed early in the 19th century.

It is universally admitted that the Irish Colleges in Europe were eminently successful in arresting the onrush of the Protestant Reformation in Ireland and in maintaining the Irish people in their allegiance to Rome. But the success of these colleges was conceived, born, and nurtured in trials and difficulties. There was the ever-present problem of finance. The income from foundations decreased alarmingly with the passing years and the declining value of money. The fact that many students after ordination chose to remain in Europe throws into greater relief the heroism of the majority who preferred to return and labor among their oppressed countrymen. The charge that too many students joined religious orders need not give rise to complaint. The religious orders were not permitted to maintain novitiates in Ireland, and it was inevitable that some students should choose the religious life abroad. In any event these Irishmen returned in due course to work in the Irish mission. The authorities in the Colleges had the ever-present problem of guarding their students against the pervasive doctrines of Jansenism and Gallicanism and, later, the arid philosophy of the 18th century. But it was Ireland's fortune that her priests brought back from the Irish Colleges what was best and most ennobling of European thought. Through these colleges Ireland maintained her place in the living stream of Catholic culture.

Bibliography: Archivum Hibernicum, Toulouse, 1 (1912) 122–147; Salamanca, 2 (1913) 1–36; 3 (1914) 87–112; 4 (1915) 1–58; 6 (1917) 1–26. Prague, 9 (1942) 173–294. Douai, 10 (1943) 163–210. Boulay, 11 (1944) 118–153. Douai and Antwerp, 13 (1947) 45–66. Low Countries, 14 (1949) 66–91. Bordeaux, 15 (1950) 92–141, Low Countries, 16 (1951) 1–39. Louvain, ibid. 40–61. San Clemente, Rome, 18 (1955) 145–149. Seville, 24 (1961) 103–147. J. MACERLEAN, “Richard Conway, S.J., 1573–1626,” serialized in Irish Monthly 51–52 (1923–24). J. O'HEYN, The Irish Dominicans of the Seventeenth Century, tr. and ed. A. COLEMAN (Dundalk, Ire. 1902). P. BOYLE, The Irish College in Paris from 1578 to 1901 (New York 1901).

[F. FINEGAN]

IRISH CONFESSORS AND MARTYRS

The history of the penal laws against Catholicism in Ireland may be said to date from 1536 when the parliament at Dublin, under pressure from HENRY VIII, passed legislation recognizing him as supreme head of the Church and, among other measures, ordered the suppression of the monasteries. In the following year the same parliament enacted further legislation, particularly an act that required an oath of clerics, degree candidates, and public officials stating they would “utterly renounce, refuse, relinquish, and forsake the Bishop of Rome and his authority, power, and jurisdiction.” Such an oath, of course, was incompatible with membership in the Catholic Church. Contumacy, or the repeated refusal to take the oath when offered, could be punished by death. It became treasonable for the clergy and holders of public office to recognize the supremacy of the pope in spiritual matters.

Under Henry VIII. It has been much debated whether during the remainder of Henry's reign there was a religious persecution in Ireland, whether anyone suffered loss of fortune or liberty or life solely for acknowledging papal jurisdiction. The Annals of the Four Masters, under the year 1537, have the following well-known entry:

They [i.e., the English schismatics] broke down the monasteries and sold their roofs and bells, so that from Aran of the Saints to the Iccian Sea [the English Channel] there was not one monastery that was not broken and shattered with the exception of a few in Ireland, of which the English took no notice or heed. They afterwards burned the images shrines and relics of the Saints of Ireland and England; they likewise burned the celebrated image of Mary at Trim, which was used to perform wonders and miracles, which used to heal the blind, the deaf and the crippled, and persons affected with all kinds of diseases; and [they also burned] the Staff of Jesus, which was in Dublin performing miracles from the time of St Patrick down to that time, and had been in the hands of Christ while he was among men. They also appointed archbishops and sub-bishops for themselves; and, though great was the persecution of the Roman emperors against the Church, scarcely had there ever come so great a persecution from Rome as this; so that it is impossible to narrate or tell its description, unless it should be narrated by one who saw it.

From the foregoing account it is evident that the religious susceptibilities of Catholic Ireland were deeply outraged by the destruction of the monasteries and the profanation of long-venerated relics. And it can be safely surmised that the destruction of the monasteries caused great suffering, hardship, and social dislocation for expelled religious and for the country as well. The monasteries were not simply abodes of study and prayer of the religious. They were schools, hospitals, and inns for wayfarers in remote areas. But the Four Masters, neither in the entry for 1537 nor in those for the rest of Henry's reign, makes any mention of persons who suffered imprisonment, loss of fortune, or death for refusing to recognize the royal supremacy.

The legislative machinery for persecution was certainly set in position by Henry and his subservient parliament in Dublin, but historical research has not hitherto established that such machinery was actually set in motion. It should be remembered that, at that time, the king's writ affected only one-third of Irish territory and that the old English settlers of the Pale and adjoining districts, whom Henry needed desperately to win over to his policy of conquest, proved thoroughly hostile to his religious innovation and unmistakably loyal to traditional obedience to Rome.

With the exception of the Spanish Trinitarian Domingo Lopez, historians of the penal times in Ireland have not attempted to portray the so-called Henrician persecution. Lopez's book, a laudatory account of the Trinitarian Order in the British Isles (Madrid 1714), has long been rejected by historians. According to Lopez, some 200 Trinitarians were put to death in Ireland during the period from 1539 to 1550, under circumstances of such publicity and revolting cruelty as could never have escaped the notice of the earlier Catholic annalists. In his earlier researches on the history of the religious persecutions in Ireland, Cardinal Moran all too uncritically accepted for truth the mischievous inventions of Lopez. But it is noteworthy that the cause of the Irish Trinitarians fabricated by Lopez was not submitted to Rome in 1907 when the causes of the Irish martyrs and confessors were forwarded by the Irish hierarchy for examination.

So far, only two causes of the Henrician period in Ireland are under consideration at the Holy See: (1) Ven. John Travers, Chancellor of St. Patrick's, Dublin, executed in 1535, during the rebellion of Silken Thomas. His cause has been presented with those of the English martyrs because it was believed, until recent times, that he was executed in London and not, as in fact he was, at Oxmanstown, Dublin. (2) The guardian and community of the Franciscan convent, Monaghan, beheaded by English soldiers in 1540. Their cause is discussed in the list below under the year 1589.

Under Edward VI. The Council of Regency, who were the real rulers during the reign of Henry's son and successor EDWARD VI, altered still further the doctrinal structure of the Church in England by superimposing Protestant doctrines on the schism of Henry. The Mass was rejected and the number of sacraments reduced from seven to two. Orders were transmitted to Ireland to conduct all future services as laid down in the Book of Common Prayer. Most of those in Ireland who had embraced Henry's schism—their numbers were quite insignificant—rejected outright the doctrinal errors being exported from England. For the next six years the Mass continued to be celebrated openly in the wide territories of the Irish chiefs. In the Pale and some towns of the English settlers a few priests preached the royal supremacy but otherwise continued in the old faith. Edward's successor, Mary Tudor, reconciled her dominions to the traditional obedience to the Apostolic See.

Under Elizabeth I. In 1560 Elizabeth exacted from the parliament at Dublin the enactment of legislation which reasserted the royal supremacy as claimed by Henry VIII. In addition, an Act of Uniformity was passed that obliged Irish Catholics to assist, under penalty of a fine, at the new heretical worship on Sundays and holy days.

ELIZABETH possessed little genuinely religious zeal, but she was anxious for the Protestantizing of Ireland as part of her plan to extirpate any national identity that the country had. Ireland, she decided, was to become English, culturally as well as politically subjugated to her own kingdom. After a generation of English control, the change in religion would be complete. So the religious legislation was not strictly enforced against the laity throughout her reign. Officials were advised not to provoke the resentment of the old English settlers, for without their good will it would have been almost impossible for her to maintain any grip on Ireland. That the Act of Uniformity stood little chance of being obeyed may be gauged from the fact that, even at the end of Elizabeth's reign, many officeholders had been able to discharge their duties without having taken the supremacy oath. By 1603 four-fifths of the peerage of Ireland were still Catholic.

After Elizabeth's excommunication (1570), the persecution of the faith in Ireland, which continued to the end of the reign, was directly aimed against the clergy. Many priests and bishops suffered the extreme penalty, yet the laity are also represented in the roll of honor for the period from 1572 to 1600. The martyrs and confessors who suffered at this time may be enumerated: eight bishops; 18 secular priests; 45 priests, lay brothers, and scholastics of the religious orders; and 26 lay persons, including one woman.

Under James I. The accession of JAMES I in 1603 bolstered the hopes of Catholic Ireland. In many of the populous centers public worship of the Church was once more set up but the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity remained on the Statute Books. Throughout James's reign, the anti-Catholic laws were not strictly enforced against the laity but were sporadically set in motion, with considerable severity, against the clergy. King James was personally not inclined to enforce edicts against the priests, but the sovereign of England had really ceased to be the effectual master in his own house. For reasons of state, therefore, he had from time to time to order proclamations to be issued from Dublin Castle for the banishment of bishops and priests. But officials were instructed at the same time that while the priests, when discovered, might be transported, they should not be sought out or hunted down. The number of the clergy and laity who suffered during this reign amounts to hardly a quarter of the victims of Elizabeth: one bishop; six secular priests; nine religious; and seven laymen.

Under Charles I. Although some 34 persons died in prison or on the scaffold during the reign of Charles I, it should be noted that they were victims not of Charles himself but of the Parliamentarians. Early in the reign, Charles, a convinced Protestant, refused any relaxation of the Act of Uniformity but through "graces" granted in exchange for large monetary contributions to the royal treasury replaced the oath required by the Act of Supremacy with an oath of simple allegiance to the crown. This royal indulgence, as well as another concerning fixity of land tenure for those with undisturbed occupancy of 60 years, was purely unofficial and therefore revocable at the royal will. Officially the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity remained the law of the land.

Under the Commonwealth. The persecution of the Church in Ireland under the Commonwealth (1649–60) far surpassed in ferocity that of Elizabethan days. In four years the number of its victims almost equaled that of Elizabeth's entire reign. Catholic worship was effectively outlawed. Apart from the clergy who suffered the extreme penalty, many died of hardship at home or on the high seas while being transported to exile or slavery to which they were condemned in the West Indies or American colonies. Countless thousands of nameless Catholic children and young people kidnaped throughout the Cromwellian regime for slave labor in the above-mentioned places were among the victims.

Restoration to 1714. From the Restoration (1660) to the death of Queen Anne (1714) no one, with the exception of St. Oliver PLUNKETT, was executed for the faith, but this period can point to its list of notable confessors.

Sources. While some information concerning the Irish martyrs and confessors is forthcoming from the State Papers, naturally distorted by the English anti-Catholic viewpoint, the main source of knowledge of the sufferers for the faith is derived from the various "martyrologies" drawn up from 1590 to 1629 and from 1659 to 1669. The Irish Jesuit John Howling (1539–99), founder of the Irish College in Lisbon, is the pioneer writer in this genre of history. His treatise compiled about 1590 was added to successively by Bl. Bp. Cornelius O'DEVANY (1611), Bp. David Rothe (1619), and two priests from Cork but living on the Continent, John Coppingier (1620) and John Molan (1629). At the end of the Commonwealth era, the Franciscan, Maurice Morison, published Threnodia-Hiberno-Catholica, and a decade later his colleague, Antony Bruodin, published Propugnaculum at Prague. Both Franciscan writers had had the experience of the mission in Ireland before they retired to the Continent. Bruodin, however, is not always to be regarded as a critical authority, perhaps because of the remoteness of his later place of residence.

The above-mentioned sources for the martyrology of Ireland during the penal times (1535–1714) are further amplified by the archives of various religious orders. A fairly full list of published works and MS sources is in the introduction to Father Denis Murphy's well-known work Our Martyrs.

The active persecution of the Catholic religion in Ireland ended with the death of Anne, although most of the penal laws remained unrepealed until the end of the 18th century. Throughout the century an appeal to Rome for recognition with public cult of the heroism of the Irish martyrs was thought inopportune. Indeed, until Catholic Emancipation in 1829, any move on the part of the Holy See to beatify the Irish who had suffered for the Catholic religion could have had only the result of inviting further penal legislation against the already heavily oppressed Catholics in Ireland.

Nearly a generation elapsed after Catholic EMANCIPATION before anything was done to revive interest in the cause of the Irish sufferers for the faith. However, Ireland, from 1830 to 1860 had many and immediate preoccupations: the Tithe War, the Repeal campaign of O'Connell and Young Ireland, the Great Famine, and the resulting exhaustion of the country in the 1850s. Also, throughout this period Catholic Ireland, after the disappearance of penal disabilities, was faced with the heavy task of building churches and schools.

Submission of Causes. The year 1861 saw the remote beginnings of the movement to present the cause of the Irish martyrs at Rome. In that year Dr. Moran (later cardinal) published his life of St. Oliver Plunket, a work designed to advance the cause of the martyr archbishop of Armagh. A few years later O'Reilly's Memorials of Those Who Suffered for the Catholic Faith in Ireland appeared. This work especially, together with Moran's reissue of the works of Bishop Rothe, focused attention widely on the desirability of submitting the cause of the Irish martyrs to the judgment of the Holy See. The Irish hierarchy soon afterward commissioned Denis Murphy, SJ, to prepare the necessary evidence for the processus ordinarius informativus; the result of his research, Our Martyrs, appeared posthumously in 1896. At the request of the Irish hierarchy, the archbishop of Dublin undertook the investigation of all the causes from every diocese in Ireland. The tribunal of investigation presided over by Abp. William Walsh held many sessions from 1903 to 1907. Its dossier, when dispatched to Rome on 16 March 1915, comprised some 292 causes (a few of them multiple). Of these, 11 were later rejected at Rome (mainly cases of confused identity) and 22 were deferred (for want of clearer evidence to show that imprisonment or death was inflicted principally for the profession of the faith) and are not included in the following lists. The lists reproduce those appearing in the Irish Ecclesiastical Record, 1918 (312–321), but, in some instances, changes with regard to year of death or other particulars established or cogently indicated by later research have been made.

Within the 20th century several Irishmen were raised to the honors of the altar. Only Oliver Plunket, beatified by Benedict XV, has been canonized (Oct. 17, 1975 by Paul VI). In 1929 Pope Pius XI beatified John Roche, John Cornelius (O'Mahony), John Carey, Patrick Salmon, and Ralph Corby with some of the English martyrs because they worked and were martyred in England.

A representative group of seventeen, known as Dermot O'Hurley and 16 Companions, were beatified Sept. 27, 1992 by Pope John Paul II. Blesseds in this group are indicated below by a †.

Chronological List of Confessors and Martyrs.

This list covers the periods from Henry VIII to the death of Elizabeth I (1534–1603), the reign of James I (1603–25), the reign of Charles I, the Parliamentarians (1625–49), the Commonwealth (1649–60), and the Restoration to the death of Queen Anne (1660–1714).

1572 Edmund O'DONNELL (Daniel), Jesuit, first definitely recorded sufferer for the faith in Ireland under Elizabeth I; hanged, drawn, and quartered, Cork, October 25.

1575 Conor Macuarta (MacCourt), Rory MacConnell, and Fergal Ward, guardian, Franciscans; put to death at Armagh (c. 1575).

1576 Edmund Fitzsimon, Donough O'Rourke, and John O'Lochran, Franciscans; hanged at Down (c. 1576).

1577 William WALSH, bishop of Meath; d. in exile, Alcalá. Thady O'Daly, Franciscan; hanged at Limerick. John O'Dowd, Franciscan of Moyne convent; put to death (or 1579).

1579 Bl. †Patrick O'HEALY, Franciscan, bishop of Mayo; hanged, Killmallock. Bl. †Cornelius O'Rourke, Franciscan; suffered with Bishop O'Healy. Abbot and brethren of Manisternenay, County Limerick, Cistercians; slain (probably 1579).

1580 Eugene Cronin, secular priest; executed, Dublin. Laurence O'Moore, secular priest; executed, Smerwick. John Kieran, of Tuam, Premonstratensian; hanged. Gelasius O'Cullenan, Cistercian, abbot of Boyle; hanged, Dublin. Daniel O'Neilan, Franciscan; slain at Youghal. William Walsh (Willick, etc.) and Oliver Plunket, laymen; executed with O'Moore.

1581 Richard French, secular priest; d. in prison, Wexford. Nicholas Fitzgerald, Cistercian; hanged, Dublin. Daniel (David) Sutton, his brother John, Robert Sherlock, Robert Fitzgerald, and William Wogan, laymen; executed, Dublin, May 26. Bl. †Matthew Lamport (Lambert), of Wexford, layman; arrested for harboring a Jesuit priest, hanged, July 5. [Lamport is sometimes described as a parish priest (pastor) of the Dublin Diocese, but was more probably a baker (pistor).] The "Wexford Martyrs": Bl. †Robert Meyler (Myler), Bl. †Edward Cheevers, John O'Lahy, and Bl. †Patrick Canavan (Cavanagh), all of Wexford, laymen and sailors; hanged for conveying priests and laymen to safety in France, July 5. Patrick Hayes, of Wexford, layman; d. on release from prison, Dublin. Maurice EUSTACE, nobleman and Jesuit novice in Flanders; hanged. Walter Aylmer and Thomas Eustace, with his son Christopher and brother Walter, laymen; hanged, Dublin.

1582 Aeneas Penny, secular priest; slain, Killagh. Philip O'Shea (O'Lea), Maurice O'Scanlon, and Daniel O'Hanrahan, Franciscans; slain at Lislacatin. Charles MacGoran, Rory O'Donnellan, Peter O'Quillan, Patrick O'Kenna, James (John) Pillan, and Rory O'Hanlon, Franciscans; d. in prison, Dublin (c. 1582). Phelim O'Hara, Franciscan lay brother; strangled before the altar, Moyne convent (or 1578). Henry Delahoyde, Franciscan lay brother; said to have suffered with O'Hara. Thady O'Meran, Franciscan, guardian of Enniscorthy; d. under torture.

1584 Bl. † Dermot O'HURLEY, bishop of Cashel; tortured and hanged, Dublin. John O'Grady, secular priest; executed. Prior and brethren of Graiguenamanagh, Cistercians; slain. John O'Daly, Franciscan; d. under torture. Thady Clancy, of Ballyrobert, layman; beheaded, Limerick. Bl. † Eleonora Birmingham Ball, laywoman, only recorded woman sufferer for the faith in the Henrician and Elizabethan period; d. in prison, Dublin, July 5.

1585 Bl. † Maurice MacKenraghty (O'Kenraghty), secular priest; hanged, Clonmel, April 20. Patrick O'Connor and Malachy O'Kelly, Cistercians of the monastery of Boyle; hanged and quartered.

1586 Richard Creagh, bishop of Armagh; d. Tower of London. Donough O'Hurley, Franciscan, sacristan of Muckross convent; d. under torture.

1587 Maurice O'Brien, bishop of Emlý; d. in prison, Dublin. John Cornelius, Franciscan of Askeaton convent; killed by English soldiers.

1588 Dermot O'Mulroney, Franciscan, guardian at Galbally, and two others, probably lay brothers; beheaded (or 1570; Rothe lists O'Mulroney among those who suffered in or after 1607). John O'Molloy, Cornelius O'Dogherty, and Geoffrey O'Farrell, Franciscans; hanged at Abbeyleix. Thady O'Boyle, Franciscan, guardian at Donegal convent; killed by English soldiers. Peter Meyler, layman; executed, Galway or Wexford, on his return from Spain.

1589 Patrick O'Brady (or Ward), Franciscan, guardian of Monaghan convent, and brethren; beheaded. [This is one of the most controverted of all the causes of the Irish martyrs. The Annals of Lough Cé, the Annals of Connaught, and the Four Masters all mention the massacre of the Monaghan community as of 1540. It is very unlikely that the alleged occurrence of 1589 could have escaped the notice of Howling, O'Devany, and Rothe. The last in his early priestly life was intimately associated with the neighboring (to Monaghan) Archdiocese of Armagh. The Four Masters, written some 15 years after the first mention by Coppinger and Ward of this 1589 massacre, make no allusion to it. No annalist could have failed to draw attention to a double massacre, i.e., in 1540 and 1589. The date 1540 vouched for by the Four Masters, who were Franciscans, seems to be the only acceptable one. There is the important consideration also that in that year the English forces penetrated to O'Neill's territory after their victorious rout of the Irish troops at Bellahoe.]

1590 Matthew O'Leyn, Franciscan, of Kilcrea convent, Muskerry; killed by English soldiers. Christopher Roche, of Wexford, layman; executed, London.

1591 Terence Magennis, Loughlin Mac O'Cagha, and Manus O'Fury, Franciscans; d. in prison. Michael Fitzsimon, of Fingall, layman; put to death.

1593 Edmund MacGauran, bishop of Armagh; slain at Tulske.

1594 Andrew Stritch, secular priest; d. in prison, Dublin (c. 1594).

1596 Bernard Moriarty, secular priest, vicar-general; d. in prison, Dublin.

1597 John Stephens, secular priest, County Wicklow; hanged. Walter Fernan, secular priest, Diocese of Leighlin; d. under torture, Dublin.

1599 George Power, secular priest, vicar-general of Ossory; d. in prison, Dublin.

1600 John Walsh, secular priest, vicar-general of Dublin; d. in prison, Chester. Nicholas Young, of Trim, secular priest; d. in prison, Dublin. Thomas MacGreith (MacGrath), layman; beheaded.

1601 Redmund Gallagher, bishop of Derry; slain. Daniel Moloney, secular priest, vicar-general of Killaloe; d. under torture, Dublin. Donough Cronin, secular priest, cleric; hanged, Cork. John O'Kelly, of Connaught, secular priest; d. in prison, Dublin. Brian Murchertagh, secular priest, archdeacon of Clonfert; d. in prison, Dublin. Donough O'Falvey, secular priest; hanged, Cork.

1602 Bl. † Dominic COLLINS, Jesuit lay brother; hanged, Cork, October 31.

1603 Eugene MacEgan, bishop of Ross; slain. Patrick Browne, convert, alderman of Dublin; d. after suffering in prison (c. 1603).

The communities at Coleraine (21 members) and Derry (32 members), Dominicans; put to death at an unknown date in the reign of Elizabeth I.

1606 Bernard O'Carolan, secular priest, Diocese of Leighlin; hanged, Dublin. Eugene O'Gallagher, abbot of Assaroe, Donegal, and Bernard O'Treivir, Cistercians; slain by English soldiers. John Burke, lord of Brittas, layman; hanged, Limerick.

1607 John O'Luin (O'Lynn), Dominican; hanged.

1608 Donough O'Luin (O'Lynn), Dominican, prior of Derry convent, brother of John O'Luin (1607); hanged.

1609 Donough MacCreid, secular priest; hanged, Coleraine.

1610 John Lune (Lyng), of Wexford, secular priest; hanged.

1612 Bl. † Cornelius O'DEVANEY, bishop of Down and Connor; hanged, Dublin, February 1.

Bl. † Patrick O'Loughran (O'Loughbrain, O'Lochran), secular priest from County Tyrone (some mention him as a Franciscan); hanged with Bishop O'Devaney.

1614 William MacGollen (Mac Giolla Choinne), of Coleraine, Dominican; d. of ill treatment by heretics.

1615 Laughlin O'Laverty, secular priest; hanged, Derry. Brian O'Neill, Art O'Neill, Rory O'Kane, Godfrey O'Kane, and Alexander MacSorley, laymen; hanged with O'Laverty, Derry.

1617 Thomas FitzGerald, Franciscan, commissary and visitor of the Irish province; d. in prison, Dublin. John Honan (MacConnan), of Connaught, Franciscan; hanged, Dublin (or 1618).

1618 Patrick O'Deery, secular priest; hanged, Derry.

1620 James Eustace, Cistercian; killed.

1621 Bl. † Francis Taylor (Tailler), mayor of Dublin, died of wounds from torture, January 30.

1622 John O'Cathan, Franciscan of Buttevant convent; d. in prison, Limerick.

1628 Edmund Dungan, bishop of Down and Connor; d. in prison, Dublin.

1642 Philip Cleray, of Raphoe(?), secular priest; slain. Malachy Shiel, Cistercian; hanged, Newry. Bl. † Peter Higgins (O'Higgin), Dominican, prior of Naas; hanged, Dublin, March 24. Cormac MacEgan, Dominican lay brother; hanged. Raymond Keogh, Dominican of Roscommon priory; hanged (or 1643). Stephen Petit, Dominican, sub-prior, Mullingar; shot (c. 1642). Hilary Conroy, Franciscan of Elphin convent; hanged Castlecoote. Fulgentius Jordan, Augustinian; hanged. Friar Thomas, Carmelite; hanged, Drogheda. Friar Angelus, Carmelite; killed, Drogheda.

1643 Edmund Mulligan, Cistercian; killed by soldiers, near Clones. Francis O'Mahony, Franciscan, guardian at Cork; hanged, before July 17. Peter, Carmelite lay brother; hanged, Dublin.

1644 Cornelius O'Connor and Eugene O'Daly, Trinitarians, returning from France; drowned at sea by Puritans. Hugh MacMahon, Ulster noble, layman; executed, Tyburn, November 22.

1645 Malachy O'Queely, archbishop of Tuam; killed by Parliamentarians, near Sligo. Augustine O'Higgin and Tadhg O'Connell, Augustinians; killed with O'Queely, October 26. Henry White, secular priest, aged 80; hanged, Racconnell, Westmeath. Christopher Dunlevy, Franciscan; d. Newgate, London. Conor Maguire, baron of Enniskillen, layman; hanged, drawn, and quartered, Tyburn, February 20.

1647 Theobald Stapleton, secular priest, chancellor of church of Cashel, Theobald (misnamed Edward) Stapleton, and Thomas Morrissey, secular priests, vicars choral; killed in Cashel massacre, September 13. Richard Barry, Dominican, prior; killed in Cashel massacre. John O'Flaverty, Dominican; killed, Coleraine. Richard Butler, Franciscan, and James Saul, lay brother; killed in Cashel massacre. William Hickey, Franciscan of Adare convent; slain. Nicholas Wogan, Franciscan; hanged, Dublin. William Boyton, Jesuit; killed in Cashel massacre. Elizabeth Kearney and Margaret of Cashel, laywomen; killed in Cashel massacre.

1648 Gerald Fitzgibbon, Dominican cleric and David Fox, lay brother; killed at Kilmallock. Donall O'Neaghtan, Dominican lay brother, Roscommon priory; killed. James Reilly, Dominican priest and poet; killed, near Clonmel.

1649 Thomas Bath, secular priest; killed in Drogheda massacre. John Bath, Jesuit; killed with his brother Thomas in Drogheda massacre. Dominic Dillon and Richard Oveton, Dominicans; killed in Drogheda massacre. Peter Costelloe, Dominican, of Straid; killed. Brian O'Gormley, Franciscan; hanged, Drogheda. Richard Synnot, John Esmond, Paul Synnot, Raymond Stafford, and Peter Stafford, Franciscans, and James Cheevers and Joseph Rochford, lay brothers; killed in Wexford massacre, October 11. Eugene O'Teevan (O'Leman), Franciscan; killed in Donegal convent (or 1650). Peter Taaffe, Augustinian; killed; in Drogheda massacre. Robert Netterville, Jesuit; killed in Drogheda.

1650 Ever (Heber) MACMAHON, bishop of Clogher; hanged, Enniskillen, September 17. Boetius Egan, Franciscan, bishop of Ross; hanged, Carrigadrohid. Francis FitzGerald, Franciscan; d. in prison, Cork (c. 1650). Anthony Hussey, Franciscan; hanged, Mullingar. Neilan Loughran, Franciscan; killed, Ulster (after 1650).

1651 Bl. † Terence Albert O'Brien, Dominican, bishop of Emly; hanged after siege of Limerick, October 31. Roger Normoyle (Ormilius), secular priest, of Brentire, County Clare; hanged. Hugh Carrighy, secular priest; hanged with Normoyle, 12 October. Myler MacGrath, Dominican; hanged, Clonmel. Laurence and Bernard O'Farrell, Dominicans; killed, Longford. Ambrose Aeneas O'Cahill, Dominican; killed, Cork. Edmund O'Beirne, Dominican; hanged, Jamestown. James Woulfe, Dominican; hanged after siege of Limerick. Gerard Dillon, Dominican; d. in prison, York. James Moran and Donough Niger, Dominican lay brothers; killed. William O'Connor, Dominican; killed, Clonmel. Thomas O'Higgin, Dominican; hanged, Clonmel. John O'Cullen, Dominican of Atherry convent; hanged, Limerick. Denis O'Neilan, Franciscan; hanged, Inchicronan. Tadhg O'Caraghy, Franciscan; hanged, Ennis. Jeremiah MacInerny and Daniel MacClanchy, Franciscan lay brothers; hanged, Quin. Roger MacNamara, Franciscan; killed, near Quin. Anthony O' Bruadair, Franciscan cleric; hanged, Turlevachan, County Galway. Donough Serenen, Augustinian, hanged. Raymond O'Malley and Thomas Tully, Augustinians, and Thomas Deir, lay brother; hanged (or 1652). Dominic Fanning, alderman and or of Limerick; Daniel O'Higgin, physician; Thomas Stritch, a former mayor; Major General Patrick Purcell; Geoffrey Galway, Member of Parliament for Limerick in 1634; Geoffrey Barron, nephew of Luke Wadding, OFM, and a member of the Supreme Council and agent of the Irish Confederation to France; all laymen; hanged after siege of Limerick, October 29–30. Donough O'Brien, nobleman, layman; burned alive by Parliamentarians, County Clare. James, Bernard, and Daniel O'Brien (brothers), laymen; hanged, Nenagh. Louis O'Ferral, layman; d. in prison, Athlone.

1652 Brian Fitzpatrick, secular priest, of Ossory; suffered for the faith. Philip Flatisbury, Franciscan; hanged, New Ross. Francis O'Sullivan, Franciscan provincial; shot, near Derrynane, June 23. Anthony O'Ferral, Franciscan; killed, County Roscommon. Eugene O'Cahan, Franciscan, guardian of Askeaton; hanged, County Cork. John Ferall, Franciscan; killed. Bonaventure de Burgo, Franciscan; hanged. Walter Walsh, Franciscan; d. in prison, Dublin. Donough O'Kennedy, Augustinian; hanged. Tadhg O'Connor-Sligo, layman; hanged, Boyle. John O'Connor-Kerry, layman; hanged, Tralee. Bernard MacBriody, layman; hanged. Edward Butler, layman, son of Lord Mount-Garret; hanged, Dublin. Brigid D'Arcy, wife of Florence Fitzpatrick, laywoman; burned at stake, October, according to the more authoritative account of Ludlow. (She was victim of mendacious depositions taken in connection with the supposed Ulster massacre, 1641.)

1653 Daniel Delaney, secular priest, of Arklow; hanged, Gorey. Daniel O'Brien, secular priest, dean of Ferns; suffered with Delaney. Luke Bergin, Cistercian, of Baltinglass; hanged with Delaney and O'Brien. David Roche, Dominican, of Glenworth; d. in captivity, St. Kitt's. Brian O'Kelly, Dominican lay brother; hanged, Galway. Tadhg Moriarty, Dominican, prior of Tralee; hanged, Killarney. Hugh MacGoill, Dominican; executed, Waterford. Bl. † John Kearney, Franciscan; hanged, Clonmel, May 13. Theobald de Burgo, third viscount Mayo, layman; shot, Galway. Sir Phelim O'Neill, layman; hanged, drawn, and quartered, Dublin. Honoria Magan and Honoria de Burgo, Dominican tertiaries; d. of hardships while in flight from Puritan soldiers.

1654 Bl. † William TIRRY, Augustinian; hanged, Clonmel, May 12.

1655 William Lynch, Dominican, of Straid; hanged (before 1655).

1656 Fiacre Tobin, Capuchin; d. in captivity, Kinsale.

1659 Hugh MacKeon, Franciscan; d. on release from jail (after 1659).

1661 Brian Mac Giolla Choinne, Franciscan; d. in captivity(?), Galway.

1669 Raymond O'Moore, Dominican; d. in prison, Dublin.

1680 Peter Talbot, archbishop of Dublin; d. in prison (see TALBOT, PETER AND RICHARD).

1686 Felix O'Connor, Dominican; d. Sligo jail(?), c. 1686.

1703 John Keating, Dominican; d. in prison, Dublin.

1704 Clement MacColgan, Dominican; d. in Derry jail.

1707 Daniel MacDonnell, Dominican; d. Galway jail.

1708 Felix MacDonnell, Dominican; d. in prison, Dublin.

1710 John Baptist Dowdall, Capuchin, d. in prison, London.

1711 Father O'Hegarty (baptismal name unknown), secular priest; killed, according to tradition, by heretics, near Buncrana.

1713 Dominic Egan, Dominican; d. in prison.

Bibliography: D. MURPHY, Our Martyrs (Dublin 1896) excellent bibliog. xxiii–xxviii; there has been no major work on the subject since the publication of Father Murphy's book. Congregatio Sacrorum Rituum, Positio super introductione causae . . . pro fide, uti fertur in Hibernia interfectorum (Rome 1914). R. BAGWELL, Dictionary of National Biography, 14:773–74. BOURCHIER, De Martyrio Fratrum Ord. Min. (Ingolstadt 1583). W. M. BRADY, The Episcopal Succession in England, Scotland, and Ireland, A.D. 1400 to 1875, 3 v. (Rome 1876–77). A. BRUODIN, Propugnaculum Catholicae Veritatis (Prague 1669). T. DE BURGO, Hibernia Dominicana (Cologne 1762). J. S. CRONE, Concise Dictionary of Irish Biography, rev. ed. (Dublin 1937). M. R. D'ARCY, The Saints of Ireland (St. Paul, Minn. 1985), 190–209. M. J. DORCY, Saint Dominic's Family (Dubuque, Iowa 1964), 412–14. J. T. GILBERT, Dictionary of National Biography, 14:864–65. GONZAGA, De Origine Seraphic Religionis (Rome 1587). M. B. HACKETT, "The Tirry Documents in the Augustinian General Archives," Archivum Hibernicum 20 (1957): 98–122. M. J. HYNES, The Mission of Rinuccini . . . (Dublin 1932). W. J. LOCKINGTON, The Soul of Ireland (New York 1920), 123–36. F. X. MARTIN, "The Tirry Documents in the Archives of France, Paris," Archivum Hibernicum 20 (1957): 69–97. M. MCALEESE, The Irish Martyrs (Ravensgate 1995). S. MC-MANUS, Story of the Irish Race (New York 1944). H. P. MONTAGUE, The Saints and Martyrs of Ireland (Gerrards Cross, Ireland 1981):

78–88. CARDINAL MORAN, Spicilegium Ossoriense (Dublin 1874). S. Ó MURTHUILE, A Martyred Archbishop of Cashel (Dublin 1935). J. O'HEYN and A. COLEMAN, Irish Dominicans of the 17th Century (Dundalh 1902). M. O'REILLY, Memorials of Those Who Suffered for the Catholic Faith (London 1868); Memoires of the Irish Martyrs (New York 1869). O'SULLEVAN BEARR, Patriciana Decas (Madrid 1629). A. F. POLLARD, Dictionary of National Biography, 14:959. J. N. TYLEND, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 357–59. A. J. WEBB, Compendium of Irish Biography (Dublin 1878).

[F. FINEGAN]

IRISH CROSSES

The sculptured standing stones and crosses of Early Christian Ireland form an impressive archeological and art-historical corpus. Some 50 survive from the period up to about A.D. 800. No single sequence of development stands out. Types are too varied, and contributing influences—from the eastern Mediterranean, Gaul, Pictish Scotland, and elsewhere in the British Isles—are too diverse and persistent. The earliest examples are rough stones incised with simple crosses and Celtic ornament in the primitive but elastic curvilinear style of the initials of the Cathach of St. Columba and date probably from the end of the 6th century. Examples are the Reask and Kilfountain pillars (both County Kerry). The simple 7-foot-high stele at Kilnasaggart (County Armagh) has a long-stemmed cross incised above, a longish Latin text in uneven rounded script incised in the middle, and an equal-armed cross with double-spiraled ends within a circle incised below. It can be dated around A.D. 700 by its inscription. In the 8th and 9th centuries more sophisticated monuments appeared. One type, paralleled in the Pictish areas of Scotland, is the tall slab, usually sculptured on both faces, with large interlace-filled crosses and animal or hunting scenes, or riding figures. Examples are the Carndonagh and Fahan Mura crosses (both County Donegal), and the panels from Banagher and CLONMACNOIS (both County Offaly). A Pictish-looking hunting scene occurs on the cross at Baelin (Westmeath). The high cross first appears in the late 8th century. Typically, it has a four-sided vertical shaft rising from a pyramidal base with a distinctive ringhead and a heavy stone circle, like a halo, surrounding the intersection of arms and vertical shaft. One of the finest, at Moone (County Kildare), is an elegant granite monument, over 16 feet high. It is carved with scenes that include the Twelve Apostles, the Flight into Egypt, the Crucifixion, the Temptation of St. Anthony, St. Paul and St. Anthony in the desert, the Three Hebrews in the Fiery Furnace, and a scene perhaps representing Christ in Majesty. The style is clear and assured, but the figures are no more than flat, doll-like narrative symbols. The styles of the figure carving vary, but a flat profile rendering is usual. Stone-carving seems to have continued relatively unchanged through the period of Viking raids and settlement. A fine group of great crosses of the 10th century employs a wide range of scriptural subjects, as well as animal and other themes; a chief example is the Cross of Muiredach, nearly 18 feet high, at Monasterboice (County Louth). Another late group of 12th-century date shows large-scale figures of bishops and crucifixions. The crosses were set up as preaching stations in the countryside and were also regularly erected in and around monasteries. A monastic plan drawn in the Book of Mulling shows no less than ten.

Muiredach's Cross, Monasterboice. (©Michael St. Maur Sheil/CORBIS)

Bibliography: H. S. CRAWFORD, Handbook of Carved Ornament from Irish Monuments of the Christian Period (Dublin 1926). A. K. PORTER, The Crosses and Culture of Ireland (New Haven 1931). E. H. L. SEXTON, A Descriptive and Bibliographical List of Irish Figure Sculpture of the Early Christian Period (Portland, ME 1947). M. and L. DE PAOR, Early Christian Ireland (2d ed. New York 1960). F. HENRY, La Sculpture Irlandaise, 2 v. (Paris 1933);

IRMENGARD, BL.

Irish Art in the Early Christian Period (to 800 A.D.) (Ithaca, N.Y. 1965).

[R. L. S. BRUCE-MITFORD]

IRMENGARD, BL.

Abbess; b. Munich, Germany, c. 832; d. Chiemsee, July 16, 866. She was the granddaughter of Louis I the Pious, and the daughter of Louis the German and Hemma. Her father appointed her as abbess first of the Benedictine convent of Buchau and later of the royal Abbey of Chiemsee in Upper Bavaria. In the practice of the monastic life, Irmengard was a model of virtue and an example of penance. Her life was devoted to the care of the women under her tutelage. She was buried in the monastery church at Chiemsee. In 1004, Gerhard of Seon wrote her epitaph (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae 5:327). Her cult was confirmed in 1928.

Feast: July 16 or 17.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 21 (1929) 24–26. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 3:119. R. BAUERREISS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:758. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 6:100.

[A. CABANISS]

IRMGARDIS OF COLOGNE, ST.

Countess of Aspel; d. last quarter of the 11th century. Irmgardis expended her inheritance in founding churches, a cloister, and charitable institutions. According to a highly legendary vita, she resided as an ANCHORITE at Süchteln, where a chapel erected to her honor has stood since c. 1500. She moved to Cologne, where she lived the rest of her life, dedicating herself to works of charity. Three times she went on pilgrimage to Rome, and during the last she died. Her body was returned to Cologne, where it rests in a stone sarcophagus (dating from the first half of the 14th century) in the chapel of St. Agnes of the Cologne cathedral. The historical personality of Irmgardis is disputed. According to Oediger, Irmentrud of Aspel and Irmgardis of Cologne are the same person, to be distinguished from Irmgardis of Süchteln. Others claim that Irmgardis of Süchteln is Irmgardis of Cologne, a daughter of Irmentrud.

Feast: Sept. 4.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 2:270–278. Die Regesten der Erzbischöfe von Köln im Mittelalter, ed. F. W. OEDIGER (Bonn 1954–) 1:1047, 1188. Lexikon der deutschen Hellenen. . . , ed. J. TORSY (Cologne 1959) 254.

[C. R. BYERLY]

IRMHART, ÖSER

Theologian; d. Augsburg, latter half of the 14th century. After studying law in Bologna (1335), he became pastor in Sankt Marein (southern Steiermark), Austria, and (c. 1340) in Strassgang near Graz. In 1358 he was promoted to a canonry at Augsburg Cathedral. He translated the works of the Spanish Dominican ALFONSUS BONIHOMINIS into Latin (1339). He also translated from Arabic into German a treatise concerning the true Messiah and His Second Coming, the work of Rabbi Samuel, a convert from Judaism who had lived in Morocco in the mid-11th century. Approximately 30 manuscripts of the works of Irmhart, mostly those from around the middle of the 15th century, are extant.

Bibliography: W. STAMMLER, Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters, 1:671–673. H. MASCHKE, “Zur deutschen & Übersetzungsliteratur des 14. Jahrhunderts,” Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 60 (1936) 320–325. F. ZOEPFL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5:758.

[M. CSÁKY]

IRMINA, ST.

Benedictine abbess; d. Dec. 24, 710. Irmina's biography, written by THIOFRID OF ECHTERNACH 400 years after her death is today recognized as unreliable. He depicts her as the daughter of Dagobert I and affianced to a Count Herman, who was killed before their wedding day. Irmina is believed to be the foundress of the monastery of Öhren (ad Horreum) at TRIER, which she ruled as abbess in the last years of her life. A great benefactress of Irish and English monks, Irmina donated to WILLIBRORD and his monks the land for their monastery at ECHTERNACH. Despite Thiofrid's account, she may have been the mother of St. ADELA. Irmina was adopted as the patroness of the Diocese of Trier in the 14th century.

Feast: Dec. 30.

Bibliography: A. PONCELET, “De fontibus vitae sanctae Irminae,” Analecta Bollandiana 8 (1889) 285–286. M. WERNER, Adelsfamilien im Umkreis der frühen Karolinger: die Verwandtschaft Irminas von Oeren und Adelas von Pfalzel (Sigmaringen 1982). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3: 450–452. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, 5 v. (9th ed. Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 1:280, n. 1. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 12:638–639.

[L. MEAGHER]

IRNERIUS

(Or Guarnerius), jurist and founder of a school of glossators; b. Bologna, c. 1050; d. there, c. 1130. Little is known about this famous jurist's life and works. At the turn of the century his influence on medieval jurisprudence received attention justly deserved. At about age 20 he taught didactics and rhetoric at Bologna; and, encouraged by Countess Matilda of Tuscany, he devoted himself to the study of jurisprudence, principally through private studies. In 1084 he founded a school of jurisprudence at Bologna that gave great impulse to juridical studies throughout Europe. He was the first to introduce marginal glosses to expound Roman law, a custom that many followed. He defended the rights of Henry V in a papal election and the election of antipope Gregory VIII. Most of his works are not extant. His principal work, Summa codicis, is the first medieval system of Roman jurisprudence. This work was edited by Fitting (Berlin 1894). Quaestiones de juris subtilitatibus is generally ascribed to him. It, too, was edited by Fitting (Berlin 1894).

Bibliography: E. BESTA, L'opera d'Irnerio: Contributo alla storia del diritto italiano, 2 v. (Turin 1896). H. H. FITTING, Die Anfänge der Rechtsschule zu Bologna (Berlin 1888); "Die Summa Codicis und die Quaestiones des I.," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Romanistische Abteilung 17 (1896) 1–96. F. K. V. SAVIGNY, Geschichte des römischen Rechts im Mittelalter 4:9–67, 447–470. F. SCHUPFER, La scuola di Roma e la questione irneriana (Rome 1898). F. PATETTA, La Summa Codicis e la quaestiones falsamente attribite ad Irnerio (Turin 1897). L. CHIAPPELLI, "I. secondo la nuova critica storica," Rivista storica italiana 11 (1894) 607–628. Ius romanum medii aevi (Milan 1961–) pt. 1. A. BERGER, Encyclopedic Dictionary of Roman Law (Trans. Amer. Philos. Soc. NS 43.2; Philadelphia 1953) 516. H. KANTOROWICZ and W. W. BUCKLAND, Studies in the Glossators of the Roman Law (Cambridge, Eng. 1938).

[T. D. DOUGHERTY]

IRRATIONALISM

An emphasis or overemphasis on that which is either opposed or alien to reason or on that which transcends reason. As a mental attitude, irrationalism distrusts reason and relies for certitude on feelings, emotions, instinct, intuition, will, desires, and experience. The basis of irrationalism is something encountered in experience that is refractory to logical reasoning and scientific systematization. Particular kinds of irrationalism are determined by their object, by the limitations of the knowing subject, and especially by what is meant by the term reason (Lat. ratio).

Kinds. In traditional terminology, reason or ratio may refer to the basis either of knowledge or of being, or it may refer to an intellectual process known as REASONING. When used in the first sense, its negative, the irrational, is the ontological abyssal; in the second sense, the irrational is the transintelligible that transcends and lies beyond rational knowability. The rational is thus not identical with the logical, nor the irrational with the alogical. The logical sphere is indeed the most rational, but since some regions of the real are transintelligible, the logical, too, can embrace elements that are irrational, for example, the concept of irrational number in mathematics. To the extent that the rational is characterized by its intelligibility and logical structure, the irrational can occur either as the transintelligible, as the alogical irrational, or as a combination of both—the "eminent irrational" of Nicolai Hartmann.

Philosophical irrationalism is based on the principle that being presents its paradoxes to understanding, that it has limitations for possible objectification, beyond which it becomes unintelligible for the knowing subject. The adherents of philosophical irrationalism maintain that it is impossible to comprehend the essence of individuals or of the world; that the world's origin, etc., will always remain a mystery. Thus any philosophy dealing with such objects must be ultimately irrational.

The irrational element is in the foreground also in the history of MYSTICISM. Mysticism does not attempt to penetrate mysteries by reason. It accepts the transintelligibility of its object and at the same time admits the limitations of the human subject. Although some mystics' profound knowledge made them utter Cognosco unum Deo, thus stating their version of the Credo, their insight resulted from experience rather than from reasoning—from intuition, ecstatic vision and the amor dei intellectualis rather than from ratiocination. Theirs was an intellectio sine comprehensione.

Early Forms. The history of philosophical irrationalism began with the history of ideas. Early Greek thinkers encountered the problem of the irrational in dealing with MATTER, for matter is knowable only through form. SOCRATES spoke of the mysterious δαίμόνιον, the nonobjectifiable remnant of the irrational in man that can occur at any moment in life; it does not give clarity, and does not speak as the Logos does. This Socratic teaching was directed against Protagoras, who held that "man is the measure of all things," a criterion purely subjective, hence to a marked degree irrational.

PARMENIDES and the Stoics shunned the irrational, but Poseidonius (c. 135–50 B.C.), himself a Stoic, reacted against their theory and admitted irrational elements. He spoke of an unconscious region in the soul and held that not all psychic events, experiences, and functions are rational. The great variety and complexity of the affective life in man seemed to him incomprehensible; such irrational forces and functions he regarded as rooted in man's nature. PLOTINUS saw in his highest form a transintelligibility that reaches beyond objectivity and subjectivity; in his view a finite spirit is not able to apprehend the living unity of the One.

The Aristotelian influence on St. THOMAS AQUINAS manifested itself in a negative attitude toward the irrational; the unformed and the unlimited, for Aquinas, belong in the realm of mere potency. The human soul, in contrast to the soul of the animals, is rational even in its hidden vital functions. "The sensible soul in man is not irrational; it is at once sensible and rational" (De anim. 9 ad 15).

Reaction to Rationalism. The period of the ENLIGHTENMENT, characterized by efforts to proclaim reason the absolute ruler of man, was initiated in Germany by G. W. LEIBNIZ and reached its peak in the Critiques of I. KANT. Such radical RATIONALISM gave rise to strong opposition. In Kant's own system the avenues to God are open only to faith. The thing-in-itself is unknowable; PHENOMENA alone reveal it. Later some of the phenomena—human emotions, desires and experiences, historical events, the essence and the importance of the individual, religious belief and its impact on reason—became objects of doubt. The neglect of such aspects of reality provoked a strong reaction from the metacriticism of Hamann and Jacobi, from Herder and from their followers.

J. G. HAMANN (1730–88) emphasized feeling, experience, and faith. Reason had caused the Kantian split of knowledge into sensuality and intellectuality; but such disunity is not seen in the real order, where all opposites coincide. Consequently, truth is found in man's experience of reality rather than in speculative analysis. The firm conviction of the subject suffices as the criterion of truth.

J. G. HERDER (1744–1803) saw all of creation in a state of strife as well as in continuous renaissance and increasing harmony. Reason is the aggregate of the educative process of the human race. There is no "pure" reason; it is the same soul that "thinks and wills, that understands and senses, that reasons and wants."

F. H. JACOBI (1743–1819) defied the systematic philosophical thinking of Kant and defended the right of faith and its simultaneously given certainty. He distinguished between the knowing of the intellect and the immediate insight of faith. The proper essence of man is spirit, present in man's deepest consciousness. Analogously, God is present in the heart of man. For Jacobi the strength of the impressions of sensible, relative beings is greatly surpassed by those of the immaterial, absolute object. "But whenever I want to express what I know through the heart, the divine light extinguishes."

Reaction to Idealism. The absolute IDEALISM of G. W. F. HEGEL, in which "the world spirit carries on a conversation with itself in pure philosophy," provoked another irrationalist trend as represented in the teachings of Schopenhauer, Maine de Biran, and Kierkegaard.

A. SCHOPENHAUER (1788–1860) took the "experience of the will as experience of the world." Man's will awakens to self-consciousness; this is transformed into the idea that it is everlasting desire. The will is the world will; since this is blind, the whole world becomes irrational.

MAINE DE BIRAN (1766–1824) concentrated on an analysis of thinking and knowing. He maintained that the primary evidence of consciousness is the voluntary effort of the will and the resistance it encounters. In this resistance, the SELF experiences its limitations and thereby comes to an awareness of the irrational.

S. A. KIERKEGAARD (1813–55) opposed speculative philosophy and abstract thought, especially that of Hegel. He taught that all existence is in process, but that only individuals exist. Hence cognition can aim to know the individual only in his temporary setting; thought must originate in the nucleus of personality. Mathematical, speculative and historical reasoning do not show such a capability. Existence is always unfinished; therefore, existential thinking can never be systematized. Man has to face the paradoxes of the irrational, but he strives with great passion, nonetheless, to discover something that thought cannot think.

Later Variations. In addition to these reactions to rationalism and idealism, other forms of irrationalism manifested themselves in the 19th and 20th centuries. Among these, mention should be made of evolutionary historicism, individualism, philosophies of life and spirit and metaphysical irrationalism, as well as of existentialism.

Evolutionary Historicism. Evolutionary HISTORICISM considers understanding possible only from the viewpoint of historical existence. Historicity is the determining trait of the real, appearing as the highest level of the union of idea and extramental reality. Both idealism and irrationalism contribute to this current, developed by W. Dilthey, E. TROELTSCH, G. Misch; B. Groethuysen, E. Spranger, M. Frischeisen-Köhler, H. Freyer and E. Rothacker.

Individualism. Individualism places stress upon the particular and the unique. Some of its forms are the aesthetic, cultural and humanitarian individualism taught by F. SCHLEGEL and F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER; the enthusiastic individualism of Shaftesbury (1671–1713) that led to the individualism of genius, with the irrational factor explaining the uniqueness of effects; and finally, the dynamism of the period of Sturm und Drang (c. 1760–85) in the German cultural movement.

Philosophies of Life and Spirit. F. W. NIETZSCHE and H. BERGSON are exponents of LIFE PHILOSOPHIES that place emphasis on vital process, experience and intuition. Bergson sees the innermost metaphysical unity of the world, of man and of life in terms of his distinction between entendement (understanding) and conscience (awareness). Categorizing the intellect, in his view, falsifies insight; thus, to understand the inner unity of reality of life, intellection must be cut off. The intellect does not see the true world, but grasps only the material and the spatial—the world in its decay. Hence, the intellect deceives; that reality is life and movement is grasped by intuition alone.

B. CROCE, combining Vico's and Hegel's philosophies of the spirit, aimed at a cosmopolitical theory. He elevated aesthetical experience to the basic function of the spirit, and joined historicism with aestheticism to give new scope to irrationalist insights. Following Croce, G. GENTILE offered a theory of actual idealism that considered the individual as endowed with ineffable properties traceable to spontaneity and activity in vital and spiritual realms (see SPIRIT, MODERN PHILOSOPHIES OF).

Metaphysical Irrationalism. Metaphysical irrationalism maintains that some areas of reality remain inaccessible to reason. Knowledge in its essence, progress, and goal is rational; but it results from an "irrational given" that directs the process of rationalization and constantly limits it, especially in the realm of value, NOUMENA and eschatological truth. The perception of the irrational given in its manifoldness and transintelligibility may be called "irrational knowledge," in the terminology of R. Müller-Freienfels (1882–1949). As soon as order, coherence, meaning and significance touch the "web," logos is present. The criterion of the rationality of the real is then precisely that reality is (or becomes) ordered, coherent, meaningful, and purposive.

Nicolai HARTMANN (1882–1950) considered the irrational to be transintelligible, the APORIA in the classical Greek sense. Although the irrational exists for man, nothing irrational exists as such. The transintelligible realm, with its perennial questions, is the true field of metaphysics; it proves inexhaustible. Dealing with these problems, human reason discovers its own limits, thereby demonstrating that the world is not adapted to man's cognitive endowment. The latter, however, is adaptable to the world, and must be so—for noetic orientation is one of man's vital functions.

Existentialism. The existentialists (for example, M. Heidegger, K. Jaspers, and J. P. Sartre) returned in some form to Protagoras's SUBJECTIVISM; the understanding and interpreting of existence and existents is relative to man, who is again "the measure of all things." Jaspers speaks of "philosophical faith" that obtains access to God, whereas Max SCHELER assigns to religious knowledge a special domain that is inaccessible to philosophical reasoning.

Somewhat related is the sensus numinis of Rudolf OTTO, a feeling or experience of something mysterious and holy. It is the mysterium tremendum that lies beyond reason, beyond the good and the beautiful and is the object of the sensus numinis; this a priori category signifies an absolutely unique state of mind, that of the genuinely religious person experiencing the bliss of heaven (see EXISTENTIALISM; PHENOMENOLOGY).

Influence. The rationalism of the 18th and 19th centuries found its countermovements in the irrational trends of PIETISM, spiritual positivism, SENTIMENTALISM and ROMANTICISM. It was opposed by the metacriticism of Jacobi and Hamann, and by the different kinds of mysticism and occultism. Their influence, although strong, was not strong enough to overcome rationalism. Thus the modern era remains rationalist in inspiration; the purest form of this is science and the latter's application in technology and education. Rationalism rather than irrationalism will dominate Western culture as long as science influences education, public life, its economy and politics, its progress and movements and branches out into all the cells of its modern society.

See Also: ABSURDITY; NONBEING; PESSIMISM.

Bibliography: J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). J. HIRSCHBERGER, The History of Philosophy, tr., A. N. FUERST, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1958–59). F. C. COLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md 1946–). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:780–783. R. CRAWSHAY-WILLIAMS, The Comforts of Unreason (London 1947). H. LÄUBIN, Studien zum Irrationalitätsproblem (Halle 1941). R. MÜLLER-FREIENFELS, Irrationalismus (Leipzig 1922); Metaphysik des Irrationalen (Leipzig 1927). J. VÖLKELT, "Der Begriff des Irrationalen," Jahrbuch der Schopenhauer-Gesellschaft, 8 (1919) 55–93. N. HARTMANN, Grundzüge einer Metaphysik der Erkenntnis (4th ed. Berlin 1949).

[C. E. SCHÜTZINGER]

IRVING, EDWARD

Founder of the CATHOLIC APOSTOLIC CHURCH; b. Annan, Scotland, Aug. 4, 1792; d. Glasgow, Dec. 7, 1834. After receiving his M.A. in 1809 from Edinburgh University, he taught school at Haddington while studying Presbyterian theology part time. In 1819 he became assistant at St. John's parish, Glasgow, and in 1822 he accepted a call to London's Caledonian Chapel. His dramatic sermons filled the chapel, and later a new church was built for him in Regent Square. Several sources molded Irving's theology: the views of Samuel Taylor COLERIDGE on the Holy Spirit and the restoration of "apostolic gifts," as well as the writings of Lacunza, a Spanish ex-Jesuit, directed him toward MILLENARIANISM, and Irving joined the Albury Circle, which stressed the signs of Christ's Second Coming. When the Presbyterian General Assembly censured his writings on Christ's human nature, Irving and his followers prayed for the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which they claimed soon appeared. In 1832 Irving was dismissed by the London presbytery, but he established another congregation. The following year he was unfrocked by the Annan presbytery, but his congregation readmitted him as a deacon, lowest order in the emerging Catholic Apostolic Church. He died disillusioned with that group's hierarchy. Five volumes of his Collected Writings appeared from 1864 to 1865.

Bibliography: A. L. DRUMMOND, Edward Irving and His Circle (London 1937), T. CARLYLE, Reminiscences, ed. C. E. NORTON (New York 1932).

[E. E. BEAUREGARD]

ISAAC BEN ABRAHAM

Eminent Karaite physician, apologist, and polemical writer, and powerful opponent and disputant of the doctrines and dogmas of Christianity whose work in defense of Judaism titled Hizzuk Emunah (Strengthening of the Faith) gave rise to violent controversies within Christian circles; b. Troki, Province of Vilna, Lithuania, 1533; d. Troki, 1594 (or 8 years earlier in both cases; see Mann, 726, 1475). From the name of his native town he is commonly known as Troki.

As a student of the Karaite Ḥazzan and Ḥakham Zephaniah ben Mordecai, he became highly competent in Biblical studies and Hebrew literature. For his knowledge of Polish and Latin he was indebted to Christian scholars. Through them he gained access to the Christian community and was able to count Christians of all faiths and sects among his closest associates. Soon Troki found himself enveloped in religious controversy and challenged to participate in heated debates. He therefore studied Christian theology in general and read the NT extensively. He became familiar with the religious writings of his contemporaries and with the tenets of the various Christian sects. Troki felt that he must make manifest the truths of Israel's faith. In the preface to his famous apology he stated:

I refer my coreligionist to the attentive perusal of Hizzuk Emunah, wherein he will find an ample supply of arguments and proofs in favor and support of our venerable creed. . . . I have endeavored to arraign before the tribunal of common sense the assertions made by Christians which tend to throw discredit on the truths of the Jewish Faith. For this purpose, I found it advisable to subdivide this work into two parts. The first portion is devoted to an examination of the objections raised by Christians against our religion, and to the proofs cited by them for the corroboration of their own doctrines. The refutation I have given it is, in many cases, based on the contradictory nature of their own statements. The second portion comprises a careful review and refutation of the glaring inconsistencies that are discoverable in the New Testament.

Death had summoned Troki before the completion of his work. On his deathbed, however, he had commissioned his favorite disciple, Joseph ben Mordecai Malinovski, to supply the missing preface and index and prepare the work for publication. Spanish authors of a previous period (e.g., Profiat DURAN) had contributed equally significant books in defense of Judaism, but none could compare with the extensive popularity of the Hizzuk Emunah. For years it remained in manuscript, and interested readers and copyists felt inclined to modify, amplify, or change the text in accordance with their own views and beliefs. One such corrupted manuscript that had been written by a rabbinite who had substituted Talmudical concepts for Troki's philosophical arguments came into the possession of the Hebraist Johann Christoph Wagenseil (1633–1705). Wagenseil published it (Altdorf 1681) with a Latin translation under the startling title of Tela Ignea Satanae (The Fiery Darts of Satan). Thus he helped to publicize it and to propagate its contents, although this may not have been his desire; and the extensive and violent refutations that he had supplied with his edition served only to fan the flames of controversy and cause passionate debates among Christians. Eventually, the free-thinkers and anticlerical philosophers of the 18th century quoted freely from Troki's writings in their campaign against Christianity. To VOLTAIRE, for example, the Hizzuk was "a masterpiece in the treatment of its subject." In addition to Wagenseil's Latin edition, the book was translated into Judeo-German (Amsterdam 1717), into English by Moses Mocatta (London 1851), and into German by David Deutsch (Sohran 1865, 2d ed. Breslau 1873).

Bibliography: J. MANN, Texts and Studies in Jewish History and Literature, v.2 (Philadelphia 1935) 714–720, 726, 1475. I. BROYDÉ, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–06) 12:265–266. L. NEMOY, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, 10 v. (New York 1939–44) 10:311. S. M. DUBNOW, Weltgeschichte des jüdischen Volkes, 10 v. (Berlin 1925–29). A. M. GOLDBERG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:773.

[N. J. COHEN]

ISAAC ISRAELI

Son of Solomon, Jewish physician and philosopher, also known as Isaac Judaeus; d. c. 932. Isaac was a native of Egypt who emigrated to Qayrawān (in modern Tunisia) about 907 and became a physician to the Fatimid Caliph 'Ubayd Allah al-Mahdi. According to some authorities he died shortly before 932, but other accounts (of doubtful authority) imply that he was alive at later dates. His medical treatises, e.g., the Book of Fevers, the Book of Urine, the Book of Foodstuffs and Drugs, all written in Arabic, were long considered classics, and translated into Hebrew and Latin, giving their author fame among Muslims, Jews, and Christians. His medical reputation was somewhat overshadowed in the West by his Latin translator, CONSTANTINE THE AFRICAN. Constantine's work, completed by 1087, best described as a paraphrase of Isaac's writings, received wide currency in medieval schools of medicine, as attested by surviving MSS.

As a philosopher, Isaac's inspiration was mainly Neoplatonic. The writings of the Muslim philosopher al-KINDĪ ABŪ YŪSUF and a Neoplatonic treatise ascribed to Aristotle (Ibn Hasday's Neoplatonist) were the main influences on his philosophy. His writings in this field assumed the form of short treatises in Arabic: the Book of Definitions (Latin translation by Gerard of Cremona, two Hebrew translations); the Book of Substances, extant in fragmentary form; the Book on Spirit and Soul, in which Neoplatonic psychology is given Biblical foundation; a text known as Chapter on the Elements (in Hebrew translation only); and a somewhat longer treatise, Book of the Elements (extant in a Latin version by Gerard of Cremona, and two Hebrew versions). Whereas among the Muslim philosophers Israeli had no influence, his work seems to have been generally known among the Jewish Neoplatonists of Spain, although a more strictly Aristotelian philosopher of the rank of MAIMONIDES had naturally little sympathy with Israeli's somewhat primitive Neoplatonism. The texts available in Latin were used by schoolmen such as DOMINIC GUNDISALVI, ALBERT THE GREAT, and THOMAS AQUINAS.

Bibliography: Omnia Opera Ysaac (Lyons 1515). M. STEIN-SCHNEIDER, Die hebräischen Übersetzungen des Mittelalters (Berlin 1893); Die arabische Literatur der Juden (Frankfurt A. M. 1902). C. BROCKELMANN, Geschichte der arabischen Literatur, 3 v. (Leiden 1937–42). G. SARTON, Introduction to the History of Science (Baltimore 1927–48) v.1. A. ALTMANN and S. M. STERN, Isaac Israeli: A Neoplatonic Philosopher of the Early Tenth Century (London 1958). J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:773.

[S. M. STERN]

ISAAC OF MONTE LUCO, ST.

Also known as Isaac of Spoleto, hermit; d. after mid-sixth century. He was a native of Syria who fled the Monophysite persecution and became a recluse for about 50 years in the caves of Monte Luco outside Spoleto, Italy. He was much honored by the Spoletans, in whose behalf he reputedly worked certain wonders. After spending some years in the eremitical life, he had a vision of Our Lady, who bade him to gather followers and to train them in asceticism. He never actually founded a monastery, but directed a kind of LAURA, or colony of hermits. Little is known of him except from the third book of the Dialogues (3.14) of St. GREGORY THE GREAT (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 77:244–248).

Feast: April 11; April 15 (Spoleto).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 2:27–30, contains also the pertinent section from Gregorianum, Dialogi. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:4475.

[W. A. JURGENS]

ISAAC OF STELLA

Cistercian abbot, philosopher, theologian; b. England c. 1100; d. Étoile (Stella), near Chauvigny c. 1169. Isaac provides many details of his life in his works [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 194:1689–1893]. It is likely he began his ecclesiastical career in the curia of Theobald of Canterbury, and he probably studied theology at Paris (cf. Sermon 48; 1853D). A love of solitude (Sermon 14; 1737B) drew him to Cîteaux, where he may have been received in 1145. Isaac was probably already a priest, for in 1147 he was chosen abbot of Stella, an abbey that had joined the Cistercian reform, under Pontigny, only two years before. Many of Isaac's sermons or conferences as abbot contain references to a sojourn on a solitary island, Ré, about two miles from La Rochelle, where he had led a group of hardy monks to establish a new foundation. The most striking of his sermons is a series given at Ré during the week of Sexagesima. In them Isaac sought to provide better spiritual food for Lent by setting before his monks a course of theology comparable to the Proslogion of St. Anselm of Canterbury and deeply influenced by St. Augustine and Pseudo-Dionysius. For Isaac, monastic life was based on the Incarnation, the KENOSIS, the Mystical Body, Divine Sonship—themes to which he constantly returns.

In 1162 Isaac wrote his epistle on the soul at the request of ALCHER OF CLAIRVAUX (Patrologia Latina, 194:1875–90). This work was indirectly influential through its use in the famous De spiritu et anima (Patrologia Latina, 40:779–832), once attributed to Augustine but now considered, without great reason, as the work of Alcher. The epistle follows the Cistercian tradition, wherein a writer usually accompanied his spiritual works with a tract on man or the soul to provide the psychological basis for his mysticism. Isaac situates the soul midway between God and corporeal things in the hierarchy of being. He treats of the simplicity of the soul and the relation of the soul to its powers; enumerates the five cognitive powers as sense, imagination, reason, intellect, and intelligence; and explains their use as steps to wisdom (Patrologia Latina, 194: 1880B; cf. Sermon 4, 1702A). He also considers the union of soul and body, and says it takes place in the imagination, the phantasticum animae (Patrologia Latina, 194: 1881C) (see SOUL, HUMAN).

Isaac may also have written commentaries on Ruth and on the Canticle of Canticles, but the only other published work is the De officio missae, written about 1167 [Patrologia Latina, 194:1889–93; Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 4 (1932) 135–37].

Bibliography: F. P. BLIEMETZRIEDER, “Isaak von Stella. I: Beiträge zur Lebensbeschreibung,” Jahrbuch für Philosophie und spekulative Theologie 18 (1904) 1–34, and “Isaac de Stella: Sa spéculation théologique,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 4 (1932) 134–159. L. BOUYER, The Cistercian Heritage, tr. E. A. LIVINGSTONE (Westminster, Md. 1958). G. B. BURCH, Early Medieval Philosophy (New York 1951). B. MCGINN, Golden Chain: A Study in the Theological Anthropology of Isaac of Stella (Washington, D.C. 1972).

[I. C. BRADY]

ISAAC THE GOOD OF LANGRES, ST.

Bishop; b. first half of the ninth century; d. Langres, France, 880. Isaac was a contemporary of Charles the Bald (840–877), who assigned to him the reconstruction of the monastery of Saint-Bénigne in Dijon, which the Normans had destroyed. Charles gave Isaac the right to mint coins for Dijon and Langres. Isaac took part in the Councils of Soissons and TROYES. He composed a collection of diocesan statutes in 11 titles (Canones seu selecta capitula), taken from the capitulary of BENEDICT THE LEVITE. Isaac was bishop of Langres from 859 until his death. He is interred in Saint-Bénigne.

Feast: July 18.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 124:1075–1110. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98); reprinted and continued by L. PETIT and J. B. MARTIN, 53 v. in 60 (Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960–) 17B:1233–82. Histoire Littéraire de la France (Paris 1733–68) 5:528–. P. FOURNIER and G. LEBRAS, Histoire des collections canoniques en occident depuis les fausses décrétales jusqu'au Décret de Gratien, 2 v. (Paris 1931–32) 1:206. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I, v.1–5 (Mechlin 1928–); v.1, Prolegomena (2d ed. 1945) 1:185. A. WERMINGHOFF, “Verzeichnis der Akten fränkischer Synoden von 843–918,” Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 26 (1900) 670.

[M. CSÁKY]

ISAAC THE GREAT, ARMENIAN CATHOLICOS, ST.

C. 388 to 439; b. Cappadocia, c. 345; d. Belrotzatz, Sept. 7, 439. The son of NERSES THE GREAT (d. 373) and a relative of GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR, Isaac was educated in the Hellenistic culture at Caesarea in Cappadocia and at Constantinople. He married and had a daughter named Sahaganush, whose son became the military captain Vardan Mamikonian. Isaac embraced the religious life, probably after the death of his wife, became catholicos of Armenia, and gave great impulse to the development of monasticism in that country. He turned the patriarchal palace into a monastery and is said to have frequently retired to a wilderness with his disciples to spend time in solitary prayer. He set about reforming clerical discipline and selected as his auxiliary bishop the monk MESROP MASHTOTZ (391), who is alleged to have aided him in the formation of a native liturgy and ritual, as well as in the translation of the Scriptures into Armenian (435–436).

In a synod, apparently at Ashtishat in 435, Isaac condemned as heretical the teaching of THEODORE OF MOP-SUESTIA and Diodore of Tarsus. Despite his sympathy for the Hellenistic culture of the West, Isaac managed to get along with the Persian rulers of Armenia and won many privileges for his Catholic subjects. He resigned his see rather than become involved in the political activities of the Armenian princes (428 to 432). Tradition credits him (probably unjustifiably) with the composition of the liturgical hymns for Thursday and Friday of Holy Week, the translation of the Pentateuch and Isaiah, and the formation of ecclesiastical canons, as well as an epistolary exchange with the Byzantine Emperor and the patriarch of Constantinople. He was buried at Ashtishat. Three of his letters are preserved in Moses of Khoren, History of Armenia Major (3.57); other letters, ed. J. Izmiveantz, Book of Letters (Tiflis, 1901), in Armenian.

Feast: Thursday after the third Sunday after Assumption; in Orthodox church, Sept. 9; Nov. 25 (St. Sahak).

Bibliography: MOÏSE DE KHOREN, Histoire de l'Arménie, tr. V. LANGLOIS (Paris 1869) 153, 160–173. R. GROUSSET, Histoire de l'Arménie (Paris 1947) 171. J. DE MORGAN, Histoire du peuple ar-

“Virgo Prudentissima,” two folios from manuscript by Heinrich Isaak (Magliab, XIX, 58-11.1232, fols. 1 v. and 2 r.).

ménien (Paris 1919) 175, 312. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 5:195–197. B. ALTANER, Patrology, 409–410. V. INGLISIAN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 5:774; A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 2:361–417. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, 703. S. LYONNET, Recherches de science religieuse, 25 (1935) 170–187; Les Origines de la version arménienne de la Bible et le Diatessaron (Rome 1950). A. VÖÖBUS, Recherches de science religieuse, (1950) 581–586. C. TOUMANOFF, Traditio 10 (1954) 109–189.

[N. M. SETIAN]

ISAAK, HEINRICH

International polyphonic composer, b. Brabant, North Flanders c. 1450; d. Florence, Italy, 1517. Isaak is generally recognized to be of Netherlandish origin, although earlier biographers held him to be German or even Bohemian. His lineage is attested by the typically Flemish style of his sacred music, but even more irrefutably by his self-designation as filius Ugonis de Flandria in his will. Nothing is known of his early years; he first emerged in 1484 as a guest at the Innsbruck court, possibly while en route to Florence for service at the court of Lorenzo de' Medici (“the Magnificent”). His departure from Flanders at about this time was perhaps occasioned by the dispersion of the Burgundian musical establishment, following the death of Mary of Burgundy in 1482. Since Archduke Maximilian (later Holy Roman Emperor) resided in Flanders for some 12 years after his marriage to Mary of Burgundy in 1477, he undoubtedly knew Isaak's talents; this accounts for Isaak's quick employment by the emperor in 1494, while encamped before Pisa, after the death of Lorenzo. Isaak remained nominally in the emperor's service until his death, although he was apparently permitted to spend long periods away from court. New evidence from Italian documents would indicate that he spent most of his time after 1508 in Italy (see D'Accone in bibliography).

Isaak was a skilled and versatile composer, equally at home with sacred and secular music. Undoubtedly his magnum opus was the unfinished Choralis Constantinus, which was planned to furnish polyphonic settings of certain items of the Proper of the Mass for the entire liturgical year. These were designed for alternatim performance, since only alternate lines or verses were composed. The MS was completed and prepared for publication (3 v. Nürnberg 1550–55) by his greatest student, Ludwig SENFL, who did not see his task fulfilled, since he died in 1543. An important feature of the Choralis Constantinus is the polyphonic setting of 47 sequences, which makes this the most comprehensive single source for the early 16th-century sequence-motet.

Bibliography: Works. Choralis Constantinus, Book I, ed. E. BEZECNY and W. RABL (Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich 10; Graz 1959), Book II, ed. A. VON WEBERN (ibid., 32; 1959), Book III, ed. L. E. CUYLER (Ann Arbor 1950); Weltliche Werke, ed. J. WOLF (Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich 28; Graz 1959); Five Polyphonic Masses, ed. L. E. CUYLER (Ann Arbor 1956). Literature. P. BLASCHKE, "H. Isaak's Choralis Constantinus," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch, 26 (1931) 32–50. L. E. CUYLER, "The Sequences of Isaac's Choralis Constantinus," Journal of the American Musicological Society 3 (1950) 3–16. F. A. D'ACCONNE, "H. Isaac in Florence: New and Unpublished Documents," Musical Quarterly 49 (1963) 464–483. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). E. C. KEMPSON, The Motets of Henricus Isaac (c. 1450–1517), Transmission, Structure and Function (Ph.D. diss. King's College, University of London 1998). E. LERNER, "Choralis Constantinus van Heinrich Isaac," Musica Antiqua 14 (1997) 117–125. J. A. OWENS, "An Isaac Autograph," in Music in the German Renaissance: Sources, Styles, and Contexts, ed. J. KMETZ (Cambridge, Eng. 1994) 27–53. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 407–408. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 828. M. STAEHELIN, "Heinrich Isaac," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 9 (New York 1980) 329–337.

[L. E. CUYLER]

ISABELLA I, QUEEN OF CASTILE

Reigned Dec. 11, 1474, to Nov. 26, 1504; b. Madrigal, Spain, April 22, 1451; d. Medina del Campo. She was devoted to the religious and political unity of Spain, the modern history of which begins with her reign. Daughter of John II of Castile, she gained the throne after the death of her brother Henry IV (1454–74) and united Castile with Aragon when Ferdinand V, whom she had married in 1469, succeeded to the throne of Aragon in 1479. Together the reyes católicos suppressed civil war and banditry; reformed the law, the judiciary, and the administration; encouraged sheepbreeding and trade; built a regular army; reconquered Granada (1481–92); and strengthened the monarchy vis-à-vis the nobles, the cities, and the Church. They thus acquired the right to administer the MILITARY ORDERS of CALATRAVA (1487), Santiago (1493), and Alcántara (1494); and to appoint all prelates in Granada (1486) and, in practice, all bishops in Spain. They chose excellent men, such as XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS and F. de Talavera. They reformed the secular and regular clergy, anticipating the COUNTER REFORMATION, and founded universities to encourage the revival of learning. In 1480 the INQUISITION was established for all of Spain, and under Tomás de TORQUEMADA (1483–98) it investigated MARRANOS, whose conversion to Christianity was suspect. In 1492 Jews were required to become Christian or leave Castile and Aragon, and in 1502 Moslems had to make the same choice. Isabella personally commissioned COLUMBUS's voyages and the settlement and evangelization of America. Of her five children, Joan the Mad, her successor, was the mother of CHARLES V, and Catherine married HENRY VIII OF ENGLAND. Isabella is buried in Granada.

Isabella I, Queen of Castile, engraving. (Archive Photos/Popperfoto)

Bibliography: W. T. WALSH, Isabella of Spain (New York 1930). H. DEL PULGAR, Crónica de los reyes católicos, ed. J. DEMATA CARRIAZO, 2 v. (Madrid 1943). B. LLORCA, La Inquisición en España (3d ed. Barcelona 1954). T. DE AZCONA, La elección y reforma del episcopado español en tiempo de los reyes católicos (Madrid 1960). R. GARCÍA Y GARCÍA DE CASTRO, Virtudes de la Reina Católica (Madrid 1961). T. MILLER, The Castles and the Crown (New York 1963). J. H. ELLIOTT, Imperial Spain, 1469–1716 (London 1963). T. DE AZCONA, Isabel la Católica (Madrid 1964).

[D. W. LOMAX]

ISABELLE OF FRANCE, BL.

Daughter of Louis VIII and Blanche of Castile, sister of LOUIS IX; b. March 1225; d. Longchamp (Paris), Feb. 23, 1270. Among her suitors, all of whom she rejected, was Conrad, son and heir to Frederick II; notwithstanding INNOCENT IV's insistence, she resisted the political advantage of this marriage. Eventually the pope praised her decision. Throughout her life she exhibited a constant concern for charitable and hospital work that was channeled increasingly by her fondness for the Friars Minor. Innocent IV allowed Isabelle to retain Franciscans as her special confessors, and with the king's support she founded a convent for the POOR CLARES at Longchamps in Paris, which opened in 1260. Although she led a penitential life, she refused to become abbess of the convent or even to take vows. Her continued interest in this convent was reflected in its constitution; the rule she drafted with the advice of five Franciscan theologians was approved by ALEXANDER IV on February 10, 1259; a mitigated revision was submitted to URBAN IV and approved July 27, 1263. The sisters were called Sorores minores inclusae. Agnes of Harcourt, third abbess of Longchamps (d. 1289), composed Isabelle's vita in French; it was later put into Latin. Isabelle's cultus was approved in 1521 by LEO X.

Feast: Feb. 26 (formerly June 8).

Bibliography: B. GRATIEN, Histoire de la fondation et de l'évolution de l'Ordre des Frères Mineurs au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1928) 609–617. A. GARREAU, Bse. Isabelle de France, soeur de Saint-Louis (Paris 1955). AGNES OF HARCOURT, Vita b. Elisabethae seu Isabellae, Acta Sanctorum August 6 (1863) 798–808; cf. Commentarius praevius, ibid. 787–798.

[E. W. MCDONNELL]

ISAIAH

Isaiah (Heb. yēša'-yahu, "Yahweh is salvation" or "salvation of Yahweh") was born probably c. 760 B.C. His father's name, Amos, (Amoz, Heb. 'āmôš) was not the same name as that of the Prophet Amos (Heb. 'āmôš). Isaiah's birthplace is unknown. Since he appears only in Jerusalem and all his authentic oracles have a Jerusalem background, presumably he spent his entire career in that city. He was called to the prophetic office in the year King Uzziah of Judah died (c. 742 B.C.; Is 6.1). His easy access to the court as adviser to kings may suggest noble birth; his majestic poetic oracles reveal a man of profound intelligence, great literary genius, and broad education. He was married (Is 8.3, where he calls his wife "the prophetess") and had at least two sons, both of whom bore prophetic names (7.3; 8.3). His career covered half a century (c. 742 to c. 688) under Kings Jotham, Ahaz, and HEZEKIAH (1.1). He was a contemporary of the Prophets HOSEA, AMOS, and MICAH.

Isaiah was active in Jerusalem during a critical period of Israelite history, when Judah was in serious danger of becoming involved in the anti-Assyrian intrigues of the Syro-Ephraimite coalition (735–734; Is 7.1–25) that occasioned the Assyrian conquest of Damascus (732) and Samaria (722), when Sargon II captured Azotus (712–711; Is 20.1), and when Sennacherib besieged Jerusalem (701 and perhaps again c. 689; Is 36.1–37, 38).

The prophet Isaiah holding a scroll on which is written his prophecy, "The Virgin shall be with Child, and bear a Son. . ." (Is 7.14), in the basilica of S. Maria in Trastevere, Rome.

Isaiah, who was an energetic leader in the cause of the Holy One of Israel (a favorite Isaian title), urged total confidence in the strength of Yahweh (Is 36.1), in opposition to religiously compromising and useless alliances with pagan nations (14.24–19.25). His inspired guidance in the political, religious, and social life in Jerusalem won him later acclaim (Sir 48.22). Vacillating Judah was suffering a growing moral decay, a sinful lack of faith; luxury, greed, oppression of the poor were rampant (1.4–8; 3.1; 5.8); the court and the leaders, even the priests, were filled with bribery, injustice, and graft (10.1)—sins "covered up" by a temple worship, grandiose, lavish, and scandalously insincere (1.10–17). All this the Prophet courageously and vividly (20.1) denounced, often alone. He was apparently most active and influential under Hezekiah, and he was largely responsible for the religious reform, all too short-lived, initiated by this good king (2 Kings ch. 18–20; 2 Chronicles ch. 29–31).

Overwhelmed by the majesty of God in his inaugural vision (Is 6.1), Isaiah preached the awesome transcendence of the God of Israel. His oracles show a profound concept of the one true God, the holy, powerful, mighty divine King, which is set forth in clear, concise, and majestic language, vivid imagery, and religious grandeur. He had a deep consciousness of the national sin (6.8–13); divine justice is inescapable. God punishes and destroys His enemies, even beloved Israel if necessary (3.1). Assyria is the rod of God's anger (10.5). Yet, Isaiah preached also a message of hope and promise. God will forgive, protect, and love Israel, if only His people remain faithful. Isaiah's visions presented the horizon of the glorious, ideal king and kingdom (ch. 9–11) that the Lord God would raise up for the faithful remnant of His people (10.20). The Prophet reaffirmed the promise to David (11.6), which afforded the messianic hope a classical prophetic form. His great message was that the Lord God alone is Israel's salvation: trust in Him alone. Yet Isaiah's hope was repeatedly frustrated during his day (22.1–4; 6.9–13).

The Prophet gathered disciples (8.16), who collected his oracles and presumably continued his work, perhaps in a so-called school of Isaiah that endured for a long time. His literary genius may have given a classic form to an Isaiahan-type of prophetic oracle (much like a "Davidic" psalm or a "Mosaic" law) that continued to be preached and composed for a long time; hence the late editing of the extremely diverse book that bears his name. (The biblical concept of "author" is much broader than the modern one).

Nothing is known of his career after 701 (or 689). A highly questionable and late tradition holds that he was martyred by being sawed asunder at the time of King Manasseh of Judah (c. 687 to c. 642). He is mentioned in the Roman Martyrology on July 6.

According to 2 Chr 26.22, Isaiah wrote also a history of the reign of Uzziah, of which nothing more is known. (The writing of royal annals was traditionally attributed to prophets). Several works among the Apocrypha are referred to him: the (Jewish) Martyrium Isaiae, the (Christian) Ascensio Isaiae, and the Visio Isaiae (a Christian addition to the Martyrium).

Christian iconography includes several scenes connected with the canonical Book of Isaiah and the apocryphal works attributed to him, such as his vision of the Seraphim (Is 6.1–31), the miracles he worked for King Hezekiah (the cure of the king and the receding shadow of the sun: 38.1–8), and the Prophet's martyrdom. The 2d-century fresco in the catacomb of Priscilla at Rome showing a man holding a scroll and standing beside a seated woman with a baby in her lap is commonly, though not with certainty, explained as Isaiah proclaiming his prophecy that "the virgin shall be with child, and bear a son, and shall name him Emmanuel" (7.14).

Bibliography: J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959) 251–287. B. VAWTER, The Conscience of Israel (New York 1961) 162–207. C. STUHLMUELLER, The Prophets and the Word of God (Notre Dame 1964) 139–202. F. L. MORIARTY, Introducing the Old Testament (Milwaukee 1960) 120–138. N. W. PORTEOUS, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, (Tübingen 1957–65) 3:600–601. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1074–77. For additional bibliography, see ISAIAH, BOOK OF. Iconography. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien (Paris 1955–59) 2.1:365–369. E. LUCCHESI-PALLI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:782. A. SCHOORS, "Historical Information in Isaiah 1–39," in Studies in the Book of Isaiah, ed. J. VAN RUITEN and M. VERVENNE (BETL 132; Leuven 1997) 73–93. J. JENSEN, "Weal and Woe in Isaiah: Consistency and Continuity," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 43 (1981) 167–87.

[W. HILL]

ISAIAH, BOOK OF

The first of the Major Prophets in the canon of the OT. It bears the name of the great Prophet Isaiah of the 8th century B.C., whose oracles occupy most of the first half of the book. The longest and greatest of the prophetic books, it contains the sublime prophetic message embracing the progress of God's plan for salvation from the middle of the monarchical period of Judah (c. 750 B.C.) to the postexilic restoration (c. 500 B.C.). It is characterized by its profound religious teaching as well as its elegant literary style, perhaps the best in the OT. After certain general remarks about the book as a whole, this article presents a separate analysis of each of its main parts.

GENERAL REMARKS

Because of the rather complicated nature of this long book, some preliminary remarks about its contents, multiple authorship, and text will prove useful.

Contents. The Book of Isaiah is neither a continuous narrative nor a literary unit, but an amalgam of religious literature of various genres and a collection of prophetic oracles from several historical periods. There is some prose (ch. 36–39), but the book is made up mainly of poems of varying length. They range from short proverb-like statements (29.9–10) to rather lengthy poems of several stanzas each (e.g., 9.7–10.4), which contain summaries of the prophetic message in poetry of various types, such as lyric and hymn (11.1–9; 42.10–25), allegory (5.1–7), parable (28.23–29), diatribe (48.1–11), satire (14.1–23; 47.1–15), lament (53.1–9), and psalm (12.1–6). These poems deal with a variety of subjects, including religious (40.12–31), political (19.1–5), and social life (13.1–26); personal moral conduct (5.8–25); autobiography (6.1–13); threats and warnings (28.1–22); promises and assurances (35.1–10); meditation and prayer (51.1–16; 60.7–19); and thanksgiving, praise, and worship (54.1–17; 60.1–22). The book thus preserves in a rich variety of form the sublime message of Isaiah, his disciples, and later prophets in an attractive, vivid, and highly imaginative style.

Multiple authorship. Although the book was always known under the title of Isaiah, despite the absence of any reference to him in its second section (ch. 40–66), it gives evidence of containing originally independent oracle collections (1.1; 2.1; 5.8; oracles against the nations, 13.1; book of consolation, 40.1) and suggests several hands in compilation (8.16). The interposition of a prose narrative (ch. 36–39) between two large poetic sections that are thematically and literarily diverse also implies a certain amount of collecting and compiling in the composition of the book.

Until the 19th century, the Prophet Isaiah was accepted uncritically as the author of the entire book for problems of literary form and composition are of rather recent interest in biblical science. Yet the second section (ch. 40–66), which is addressed to the exiles in Babylon or to those who returned from the Exile, has always been recognized as fundamentally different from the first section (ch. 1–39). Modern critical studies initiated by J. G. Eichhorn (d. 1827) and B. Duhm (d. 1928) gradually revealed the true nature of the book. It is a rich composite of poetic oracles composed over a long period of time (from c. 740 to c. 300 B.C.) by various authors (prophets and preachers) centered on the core message of the great Prophet Isaiah. Such a process of composition and editing is now known to be quite usual in gathering biblical literature, as, for example, in the PENTATEUCH, the Book of PSALMS, and even to some extent the Gospel according to St. JOHN.

Though admittedly it is difficult to say exactly how the book reached its present form, a plausible explanation is this: the Prophet Isaiah preached from 740 to 690; his message was preserved in poetic oracles gathered by his disciples (Is 8.16), who continued to preach the message and compose oracles, adding them to the original ones of Isaiah. This so-called school of Isaiah continued even after the destruction of Jerusalem (587 B.C.) and during the Exile. During the Babylonian Exile there arose a great

(now anonymous) poet-prophet, a genius in his own right (now called Deutero-Isaiah or Second Isaiah) who continued Isaiah's message in the magnificent poems of ch. 40 to 55, developing it and applying it to the situation of the Exile and the return (537 B.C.). He was followed by another or other great literary prophets, also anonymous (now called Trito-Isaiah or Third Isaiah), during the restoration in Jerusalem (520 B.C.), who composed further oracles that developed the message in light of the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the Temple, stressing further aspects of God's message that had become clear in the new situation of Israel. Some scholars such as J. Bright, hold that Third Isaiah was written by the same author who wrote Second Isaiah, but in the rebuilt Jerusalem. Finally, at some time between 400 and 200 B.C., when the biblical books in general were being edited into their present form (it is impossible at present to be more specific), these various collections of the Isaiah message and school, with some late APOCALYPTIC additions (ch. 24–27; ch. 34–35), were gathered together on one scroll for careful and safe preservation. Perhaps by this time the School of Isaiah was dying out; indeed, the office of prophet seems to have disappeared after c. 400 B.C. until the coming of John the Baptist. Sirach (190 B.C.) knew the book in something like its present form (see Sir 48.22–25), and the NT authors cite all sections of the book as Isaiah. (The citing of OT books in the NT follows popular acceptance at the time and does not involve settlement of any questions of authorship.) Isaiah proper is sometimes called Proto-Isaiah, to distinguish him from Deutero-Isaiah and Trito-Isaiah.

The theory just outlined on the composition of the book can be found with various specific refinements in the studies of S. Mowinckel, A. Bentzen, A. Condamin, P. Auvray and J. Steinmann, A. Feuillet, A. Gelin, and others, and it is widely accepted, though some few critics, Protestant and Jewish as well as Catholic, still defend the unity of authorship by Isaiah for the entire book. Nor does it contradict the carefully worded decree of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION of June 29, 1908, warning against hasty, ill-founded theories that were then inadequately substantiated. Since then scientific study, supported by growing literary and archeological evidence from ancient times, has made the theory of the multiple authorship of the book into a carefully considered, well-substantiated understanding of its true nature. Evidence will be indicated in the survey of the book below.

Text. The present text of the book, formerly based on medieval MSS of the accepted Masoretic text (MT) has been remarkably supported by the discovery in 1947 among the Qumran DEAD SEA SCROLLS of two scrolls of Isaiah, one complete (1QIs<sup>a</sup>) and one almost complete (1QIs<sup>b</sup>), along with many fragments of the book from about the 1st century B.C. Textual corruptions, however, are apparent from the comparison of the Qumran scrolls with the MT and the Septuagint (LXX) and from the comparison of the Qumran scrolls with each other; these are sufficiently diverse to suggest different textual traditions. Yet the overall text is in a good state of preservation. Translation is at times uncertain because of the involved Hebrew poetry, the 400-year span of language represented, and limitations of present knowledge of Hebrew. Moreover, the exact delimitation of the various poetic oracles is often uncertain, and at least in ch. 1 to 35 the oracles are not in chronological order. Thus variations will be found in the arrangement of the book, in the dating of some oracles, and in the translation of some passages.

For best understanding of the book, an edition that prints the poetry in poetic form and separates the individual poems (even though this is at times somewhat uncertain), preferably with explanatory titles, should be used, such as is done in volume four (Paterson, N.J. 1961) of the four-volume Confraternity of Christian Doctrine translation of the OT, in the Revised Standard Version, the Smith-Goodspeed Bible (Chicago 1951), the French Bible de Jerusalem (Paris 1951), and others.

ANALYSIS

The book divides itself easily into four main sections approximately dated as follows: (1) ch. 1 to 35, oracles connected chiefly with the pre-exilic preaching of (Proto-) Isaiah (740–690); (2) ch. 36 to 39, a historical appendix (705–690); (3) ch. 40 to 55 (Deutero-Isaiah), oracles of the Exile (550–538); and (4) ch. 56 to 66 (Trito-Isaiah), oracles of the restoration (520–500). For practical reasons, Deutero-Isaiah and Trito-Isaiah are treated here together.

Proto-Isaiah. According to the first verse of the book (a late editorial addition), the oracles of ch. 1 to 35 were delivered during the reigns of Uzziah (783–742), Jotham (750–735), Ahaz (735–715), and Hezekiah (715–687) in Judah probably between 740 and 690 B.C.

Historical Background. It was a critical period in the history of Israel. Assyria dominated the Near East, but the subdued nations were restless. King Achaz of Judah found himself under pressure from the anti-Assyrian forces with whom he did not sympathize. Syria and Israel (Ephraim) attacked Judah (735–734) to force her cooperation against Assyria. In spite of Isaiah's opposition (Is 7.1), Ahaz appealed to Assyria for aid, which he received at heavy cost of tribute and religious compromise. Later the Assyrians under Sargon II marched with devastation, destroying Damascus (Syria) in 732; Samaria and the Northern Kingdom (Israel) in 722; Ashdod and the Philistine-Egyptian coalition in 711. Judah, sorely pressed, barely escaped. Under Hezekiah, who steered a perilous course of neutrality, comparative peace prevailed in Judah, though heavy tribute was paid to Assyria. Encouraged by Isaiah, Hezekiah undertook a rather extensive religious reform, which re-established the covenant and purified the worship of Yahweh. During this time Isaiah's preaching changed from the threats and warnings of the earlier period to the optimistic oracles of deliverance and blessing, partially, no doubt, in praise of the good efforts of Hezekiah, who became the historical figure behind the messianic imagery and expectation (ch. 9; ch. 11–12; ch. 32–33). The reform was short lived; when Sargon II was murdered in 705, the subject peoples again rebelled. Hezekiah resisted for a time, again no doubt influenced by Isaiah, but eventually he gave in to pressure from Mero-dach-Baladan of Babylon (ch. 39) and from Egypt and revolted. The result was almost complete disaster: in 701 the new king of Assyria, Sennacherib, devastated Judah and besieged Jerusalem (ch. 36). After this event, nothing further is heard of Isaiah. It is against this historical background that ch. 1 to 35 should be read.

Analysis of Chapters 1 to 35. Though the oracles in ch. 1 to 35 are not always in chronological order, most of them are authentic oracles of Proto-Isaiah. Chapters 1 to 12 are Isaiahan oracles concerning Judah and Jerusalem, mostly from the period of the Syro-Ephraimite war (735–734) in the reign of Ahaz. After an introduction (Is 1.1–8) there are various oracles on the moral degeneration of the people and their religious hypocrisy, with warnings of punishment and destruction (1.9–5.30), including the beautiful parable of the desolate vineyard of Israel (5.1–7).

Chapters 6 to 12 form the so-called Book of EMMANUEL, which begins with the autobiographical oracle of Isaiah's vision and call (6.1–13) and continues with the Emmanuel oracles delivered to Ahaz assuring deliverance from the Syro-Ephraim coalition (7.1–8.20). The oracle of the Prince of Peace (9.1–6), the warning drawn from the fall of Damascus and Israel (9.7–20), the condemnation of social injustice (10.1–4), and the designation of Assyria as the rod of God's anger (10.5–34) are followed by the optimistic view of the rule of Emmanuel and the eventual reunion of all Israel (11.1–6). The collection ends with a joyful psalm of thanksgiving (12.1–6).

Chapters 13 to 23 collect the oracles against the nations (God's judgment will fall upon them also) mostly from Isaiah, though some of them, especially those against Babylon (ch. 13; ch. 14; ch. 21) are probably of later (exilic) origin. Chapters 24 to 27 contain the late so-called Apocalypse of Isaiah (see below), logically placed here to show, following the judgment of the individual nations, the inevitable universal judgment and triumph of Yahweh and of His plan.

Chapters 28 to 33 contain Isaiahan oracles of various dates developing the theme of Yahweh's vengeance on Judah and Israel, with flashes of promise and hope of eventual restoration. Here, also, some of the oracles (29.17–24; ch. 33) may be of later date. Chapters 34 to 35 contain the late so-called Little Apocalypse of Isaiah (see below).

Doctrine of Proto-Isaiah. The dominant theme of ch. 1 to 35 is that of warning and threats of punishment against Judah and Jerusalem, especially for their infidelity to Yahweh and His covenant. Such infidelity led to the destruction of Samaria; Judah herself awaits a similar fate if there is no reform. The Holy One of Israel is a just God who punishes the misdeeds and crimes with which Judah is filled. He is Lord of all—not a mere nationalist god—before whom all men, Judah included, are unworthy to appear. He is powerful and majestic; His people must offer him profound reverence. He is holy and perfect; His people must be holy for Yahweh is holy. God's work in history, shown in His covenant with Israel, will eventually be accomplished even though His own people, Judah, becomes an obstacle. Unless there is repentance, change of ways, restoration of the covenant in sincerity and justice, even Judah must suffer the fate of all God's enemies. God's people must have faith; they must trust in His promises and have confidence in His holy will, which involves an orientation toward God of all aspects of man's existence. Without such faith there can be no stability.

Still, there is hope. Israel is the chosen of God. Yet not all will participate in God's plan. Isaiah is the great prophet of the Remnant of Israel—a small, distinctive group in the general body of Israel that will remain faithful, and through it God will fulfill His promise. (The so-called remnant theology receives greater refinement in ch. 40 to 66, where the returning exiles are regarded as the remnant.) Yahweh's promise is sure, and Isaiah is filled with an optimistic picture of the future of Emmanuel, the Prince of Peace, who will reign from Jerusalem, but only after the threats and warnings have been carried out. It is possible (according to Gelin) that the group of disciples who carried on Isaiah's work thought of themselves as this remnant keeping alive Israel's hope in Yahweh.

Historical appendix. Chapters 36 to 39 contain a historical appendix duplicating 2 Kgs 18.23–20.19, but also containing several Isaiahan oracles together with some biographical material and background detail. It has something of an apologetic aim: history bears out Isaiah's warnings. The events are not in chronological order: the embassy from Merodach-Baladan occurred most likely before the invasion of Sennacherib. Many (e.g., W. F. Albright, J. Bright, and E. Dhorme) think that the mention in Is 37.9 of Tharaca (Terhakah), who became king of Ethiopia in 690, and the repetitions and confusion of details indicate that there is a conflation in the biblical account of two Assyrian campaigns, one in 701 and one in 690. If so, Isaiah's ministry extended to the latter date.

Deutero-Isaiah and Trito-Isaiah. Beginning with ch. 40, the Book of Isaiah is transformed. Isaiah is never mentioned. The dominant theme is consolation, encouragement, hope, and promise of restoration. Jerusalem (Is 52.2, 9; 62.1–4) and the Temple (63.18; 64.10) are in ruins; the people are in Babylon, but deliverance is at hand. The situation is obviously that of the Exile. CYRUS, king of Persia (550–530 B.C.), who allowed the Jews to return to Judah in 538 B.C., is mentioned by name (44.28; 45.1) as the deliverer raised up by Yahweh. The oracles are now long, meditative, discourse-type poems, lyrical and sustained in mood, that stress not so much moral instruction as a profound religious reflection on God, His nature, His attributes, and a theological explanation of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple in light of God's plan for His people. The theme of forgiveness of sin replaces that of punishment; hope of restoration, that of destruction. There are marked changes in language and style and a more varied and technical vocabulary; the Hebrew is a later Hebrew. No longer is there the narrow vision of Judah and Jerusalem, but the broad vision of the nations and a universalism that would be strange in the first part of the book.

All these factors make it abundantly clear that ch. 40 to 66 contain the exilic and postexilic preaching of a prophet (or prophets) who, continuing the work and message of Isaiah and the Isaiahan school, spoke to the exiles (ch. 40–55) and to the first returnees to Jerusalem (ch. 56–66) in the spirit and tone of EZEKIEL, ZECHARIAH, MALACHI, and HAGGAI. Babylon, not Assyria, is now the enemy. There is a remarkable polemic against idolatry and the pagan gods that seems to presuppose the Jewish people living in the midst of paganism and far from Jerusalem and its Temple. The authors (or author) of these poems remain anonymous; one can designate them only as Second and Third Isaiah.

Message of Faith and Hope. The year 587 marked an appalling catastrophe for Israel: Jerusalem and the Temple were destroyed by the Babylonians; all Judah was a shambles, and the chief people were deported to Babylon. Yet Israel, unlike countless other nations similarly destroyed, in spite of its poor, desperate situation, did endure—a testimony to the divine mercy and the indestructibility of the divine plan. Even in exile Israel kept alive its faith, its law, and its identity because of the work of such men as Deutero-Isaiah. He offered a theological explanation for the national disaster and kept alive the spark of hope. Yahweh's righteous judgment was purifying Israel; it was not a contradiction but a vindication of Israel's historic faith. The prophet preached also of the inevitable, glorious triumph of Yahweh and the resurrection of Israel. It was this faith and hope that enabled Israel to survive, and Isaiah ch. 40 to 66 is a testament of such faith. Moreover, the original message of Proto-Isaiah was now more pertinent and meaningful than ever. His warnings had been realized and his message vindicated. Hence, the original oracles were studied and gathered religiously during the Exile, and the message was carried on in the preaching of his disciples. It is against this background that ch. 40 to 55 should be read.

Analysis of Deutero-Isaiah. The so-called Isaiahan Book of Consolation (ch. 40–55) includes a brief introduction (40.1–11), the body of the work setting forth the promise of release (40.12–55.9), and a conclusion of joy and thanks for the release and return (55.10–13). The first part (ch. 40–48) is centered on the exiles in Babylon; the second (ch. 49–55) on Zion (Jerusalem) and its impending restoration. In Deutero-Isaiah are the five famous songs of the SUFFERING SERVANT, 42.1–4; 49.1–6; 50.5–9; 52.13–53.12; 51.9–16. God, the creator (40.12–31) and liberator (41.1–29) of Zion is a gracious and loving savior. The period of trial is over; redemption is a reality (43.1–44.5); Yahweh has triumphed over the false gods, who are no-gods (44.6–23; 46.1–13). Cyrus is the Lord's anointed, freeing His people for a new exodus to the promised land (44.24–45.25). Proud Babylon has fallen ignominiously, an event described with masterful irony (47.1–15; c.f. 13.1–14.23; 21.1–10); the exiles can now rejoice in clear assurance of salvation (48.1–21).

Shifting his vision to Zion soon to be restored, the author proclaims that Israel's sins have been expiated (49.1–50.11); the Lord's goodness to Abraham and to Moses and to His people is re-established (51.1–16), as the cup of wrath is removed (51.17–23), and Zion rejoices at being reinhabited by the chosen remnant of God's people (52.1–12). The hope of the new Zion is brilliantly described (54.1–55.9).

Analysis of Trito-Isaiah. The scene shifts to Jerusalem. Hope of the restoration had been bright; but the actuality of the return and the first few years (538–500 B.C.) was bleak, difficult, and bitterly disappointing. Trito-Isaiah (Isaiah ch. 56–66) continued to speak of lofty hopes, but they were still in the future. Courage, determination, energetic building, unremitting toil, and prayer for Zion were the program of the present. The returnees were suffering the inevitable birth pangs of the new creation about to appear (65.17–25). Severe opposition to the restoration came even in Jerusalem itself from the doubters (59.9–11), from economic tensions, from the people who had remained behind and had now developed a somewhat syncretistic religion (57.3–10; 65.1–7), and from the callousness of some people behind a façade of piety (58.1–12; 59.1–8). The question of unity or religious separation between the returnees and those who had remained was perplexing (65.8–16; 66.15–17). Failure to make progress on the reconstruction of the Temple—not completed for some 20 years after the return—was no trivial thing; as a focal point, the Temple was desperately needed. Chapters 56 to 66 should be read in connection with the Books of EZRA and NEHEMIAH and the postexilic Prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi.

In such a situation, Trito-Isaiah (Isaiah ch. 56–66) speaks to the first returnees to Jerusalem. The Mosaic Law is being re-established and the Sabbath restored (56.1–8). The leaders must be purified and the faithless people restored to faith (56.9–57.13) in spite of the discouraging situation. Yahweh alone is His people's comfort (57.14–21). Fasting, reparation, and good works must characterize the new spiritual people, the returnees (58.1–14). Let them confess their sins and proceed with confidence to the task at hand, for Zion is restored (59.1–21). In a magnificent piece of poetry, the prophet describes the glory Yahweh has planned for His restored people when salvation for all men will come forth from Zion, the new bride and spouse of Yahweh, the Holy One of Israel (60.1–62.12). God's favor is returned; the necessary punishment is expiated; the good and the bad will be separated, and true worship will be re-established in the Lord's Temple (63.1–66.6). Mother Zion, the new Jerusalem, will rejoice as all nations gather to celebrate and enjoy the salvation of the Lord that will endure forever.

Isaiahan Apocalypse and Little Apocalypse. Here a word should be added on ch. 24 to 27, known as the Apocalypse of Isaiah, and ch. 34 to 35, the so-called Little Apocalypse. These chapters are more in the style of Second and Third Isaiah rather than that of Proto-Isaiah. They contain, moreover, the world vision and the literary characteristics of the apocalyptic form of literature of the late postexilic age. Yahweh will execute His vengeance on the rebellious and stubborn nations in the great DAY OF THE LORD, which will bring an eschatological judgment on the whole world and a definitive establishment of God's kingdom. Yahweh's victory will be final, over all celestial and terrestrial forces; salvation and the ultimate reassembly of Judah in the circumstance of a universal catastrophe will be effected; finally, there will be the resurrection of the pious ones and the triumph—re-echoing like a refrain—of the city of God over the city of evil. These are standard apocalyptic themes in the manner of the Books of DANIEL and Zechariah and other apocalyptic books and probably are to be dated around c. 300 B.C., which would thus make them the latest parts of the book and of the Isaiahan message.

Universal Redemption. Besides the doctrinal points mentioned in the analyses, the great theme of Isaiah ch. 40 to 66 is that of universal redemption. Israel is a nation and a people with a world mission, a nation founded on Abraham, Moses, and David, but with a vocation to bring the redemption and salvation of Yahweh to all mankind. Showing the divine control of history, the prophet preaches of the power of righteous suffering (cf. Job) and the role of Israel as witness and mediator between Yahweh and the nations of the world, a witness to the one true God who redeems and intends all men to share in His plan.

Yahweh, the Holy One of Israel, is Lord of all. Explicit and dynamic monotheism is nowhere more vigorously stated. Yahweh's cry, "I am God; there is no other!" (45.22) is the constant refrain, accompanied by a strong ironic and satiric polemic against idolatry. Yahweh is the God of all nations; there can be no other allegiance, not only for Israel, but for all nations. The creative and salvific activities of Yahweh are made clear: the creation of the world and the destiny of Israel are the two great divine works (cf. Gn ch. 1–11, where there is a development of the same themes, which probably attained their present form about the same time). The prophet daringly glimpses the day when all the nations will share the faith of Israel. He opens vistas unimagined by any previous prophet. The re-establishment of God's people is the beginning of the conversion of the nations.

Such universalism is not, indeed, that of Jesus or St. Paul, for it regards salvation as dependent upon Israel and under its dominance. But never was it so markedly clear that the covenant is for the service of all men. The theological development of Isaiah ch. 40 to 66 is remarkable; it is the climax of OT prophecy and epitomizes the whole prophetic tradition. The Israel that bears this vocation is not the great nation ruled by King David, but defined in religious terms, it is the "remnant"—the "poor" ('ānāwîm) of Yahweh—who have remained faithful despite crushing obstacles and have been constant in suffering; those who keep the Law in their hearts, who serve Yahweh and Him alone and hope only in Him (cf. the Sermon on the Mount), the race of Israel-Jacob in its full religious sense (cf. Gal and Rom). It is an Israel transformed through which Yahweh will re-enter the promised land and return to Jerusalem as king. This accomplishment is such that all the nations will be converted and incorporate themselves into the people of God.

Salvation will be marked by pardon of sin, of which the return from exile is the sign. It is a redemption: Yahweh is the gō'ēn (redeemer) in His land, its capital, and its reconstructed Temple; He will reign and begin building the New Israel and the New Jerusalem that are the objects of His promise. It will be a new alliance of peace and knowledge of the one true God served by all the nations. Christian faith has seen the vivid realization of these glorious promises and of the vocation of Israel in the establishment of God's reign through Jesus Christ and His Church; this is one reason why Isaiah ch. 40 to 66 is often quoted and alluded to in the NT.

Bibliography: Commentaries. B. DUHM, 4 v. (Göttingen 1892; 4th ed. 1922). K. MARTI (Tübingen 1900). A. CONDAMIN (Paris 1905). J. SKINNER, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1918; 2d ed. 1925). J. KNABENBAUER and F. ZORELL, 2 v. (Paris 1922–23). F. FELDMANN, 2 v. (Münster 1925–26). E. KÖNIG (Gütersloh 1926). A. VAN HOONACKER (Bruges 1932). J. FISCHER, 2 v. (Bonn 1937–39). H. W. HERTZBERG, 2 v. (Leipzig 1936–39). E. J. KISSANE, 2 v. (Dublin 1941–43; v. 1 repr. 1960). G. GIROTTI (Turin 1942). A. BENTZEN, 2 v. (Copenhagen 1943–44). P. AUVRAY and J. STEINMANN (2d ed. 1955). R. B. Y. SCOTT, The Interpreter's Bible 5, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (New York 1956). V. HERNTRICH (Göttingen 1957). J. ZIEGLER (Würzburg 1958). A. PENNA (Turin 1958). G. B. GRAY, Isaiah ch. 1–27 (London 1912; International Critical Commentary, Edinburgh–New York 1947). O. PROCKSCH, Isaiah Ch. 1–39 (Leipzig 1930). K. F. R. BUDDÉ, Isaiah ch. 40–66 (Tübingen 1909). C. C. TORREY, Isaiah Ch. 40–66 (International Critical Commentary; Edinburgh–New York 1928). P. VOLZ, Isaiah Ch. 40–66 (Leipzig 1932). Studies. A. FEUILLET, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT (Paris 1928—) 4:647–729. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible (New York 1963) 1077–84. J. ZIEGLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER 5:779–782. O. KAISER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 3:601–611. J. STEINMANN, Le Prophète Isaïe: Sa vie, son oeuvre et son temps (2d ed. Paris 1955). J. H. EATON, "The Origin of the Book of Isaiah," Vetus Testamentum 9 (1959) 138–157. R. T. MURPHY, "Second Isaiahs," Catholic Bible Quarterly 9 (1947) 170–178, 262–274. W. BRUEGGEMANN, Isaiah 1–39 (Westminster Bible Companion; Louisville 1998). C. C. BROYLES and C. A. EVANS, eds., Writing and Reading the Scroll of Isaiah: Studies on an Interpretive Tradition (Vetus Testamentum Sup 70, 1 and 2; Formation and Interpretation of Old Testament Literature 1, 1 and 2; Leiden 1997). J. JENSEN, Isaiah 1–39 (Old Testament Message 8; Wilmington, Del. 1984).

[W. HILL]

ISAIAS BONER OF CRACOW, BL.

Augustinian friar; b. Cracow, Poland, c. 1400; d. there, Feb. 8, 1471. Having joined the AUGUSTINIANS at Kazimierz in Poland, he was sent in 1419 to study at the University of Padua, where he taught in the order's house of studies after 1422 and was appointed lector in theology in 1424. In 1438 he served as visitor of his province in Poland, and in May 1452 he presided at Regensburg as vicar general over the chapter of the Bavarian province. Meanwhile he had enrolled in 1443 at the University of Cracow, and he taught there as master of theology in

ISFRIED, ST.

1460 as well as in 1463. He is thought to have written a commentary on the Sentences. His sincere piety, great love of neighbor, life of mortification, zeal for souls, and reputed miracles won him popular veneration even during his lifetime. Pope URBAN VIII authorized the transfer of his body to a distinct chapel, and at that time work began toward his formal beatification, which has not been realized. He is honored with the title “blessed” in Augustinian MARTYROLOGIES.

Feast: Feb. 8.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum February 2:213–217. F. JAROSZEWICZ, Matka Świętych Polska (Cracow 1767; repr. in 4 pts. Poznań 1893) 1:143–147. A. ZAHORSKA, Ilustrowane Żywoty Świętych Polskich (Potulice, Poland 1937) 232–242. T. GIEMMA, in Polski słownik: biograficzny, v.2 (Cracow 1936) 296. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:282–283. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 2:194. M. T. DISDIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 9:841. W. HÜMPFNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:782.

[L. SIEKANIEC]

ISFRIED, ST.

Premonstratensian bishop; d. 1204, probably June 15. He was canon of Cappenberg and from 1159 provost of Jerichow; he was consecrated bishop of Ratzeburg (Regensburg, Germany) in 1180. Isfried, the “soul” of the PREMONSTRATIENSIS in North Germany, worked tirelessly for the consolidation of his own recently erected diocese and for the Christianization and German colonization of all the lands east of the Elbe. To the west his influence was felt as far away as FLOREFFE. He was Henry the Lion’s confessor and attended him on his deathbed. He practiced heroic patience and self-denial, and miracles were credited to him within his lifetime. He is traditionally venerated in the Diocese of Osnabrück, and his cult was papally approved for the Premonstratensian Order c. 1725.

Feast: June 15.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 3:564–565. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 12:519; 16:231, 348, 354, 625; 21:131, 241. G. M. C. MASCH, Geschichte des Bisthums Ratzeburg (Lübeck 1835). F. WINTER, Die Prämonstratenser des 12. Jahrhunderts u. ihre Bedeutung für das nordöstliche Deutschland (Berlin 1865). P. GAMS, Series epicoporum ecclesiae catholicae (Regensburg 1873) 304. C. EUBEL et al., Hierarchia Catholica medii (et recentioris) aevi: v.1, 1198–1431 (2d ed. Münster 1913) 1:414. A. L. GOOVAERTS, Écrivains, artistes, et savants de l'ordre de Prémontré, 4 v. (Brussels 1899–1920) v.4.2. A. ZAK, “Episcopatus ordinis Praemonstratensis,” Analecta Praemonstratensia 4

(1928) 406–413. G. WENTZ, ed., Das Bistum Havelberg Germania Sacra 1.2 (Berlin 1933) 201. N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense, 3 v. (Straubing 1949–56) 1:226, 242.

[J. J. JOHN]

ĪSHŌ‘DĀD OF MERV

Nestorian bishop and outstanding exegete. Beyond the facts that he was born at Marū or Merv (Merw) in Khurasan (northeastern Persia) and that he became bishop of Ĥēdhatha on the Tigris, practically nothing is known of his life. That he was active around the middle of the 9th century is known from the statements of the Arab historians Māri ibn Sulaymān and ‘Amr ibn Mattā, who report that at the death of Catholicos Abraham II, on Sept. 16, 850 (or 852 according to ‘Amr ibn Mattā), Īshō‘dād, as the most famous sage of the time, was proposed to Caliph Mutawakkil (847–861) as the best candidate for the patriarchal see. However, because of the machinations of the influential physician BUKHTĪSHŪ‘ IBN JIBRĪL (d. 870), he lost the election in favor of Theodosius, Bishop of ‘Anbar.

Fortunately, the exegetical works of Īshō‘dād have been preserved. He shows in them that he was a continuer of the great reform movement that was initiated in the 6th century by Ḥanānā of Ĥēdhayabh and lasted into the 9th century. In his exegesis Īshō‘dād endeavored to join the allegorical method of the Monophysite (Jacobite) school with the historical-grammatical method of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, which was followed by the Nestorians. This explains why his works were well received and preserved by the Monophysite exegetes of the Middle Ages. In all his commentaries on the books of the OT and the NT, he used the form of questions and answers.

Bibliography: G. DIETRICH, Išo‘dadhs Stellung in der Auslegungsgeschichte des Alten Testaments (Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die Alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 6; 1902). J. M. VOSTÉ and C. VAN DEN EYNDE, Commentaire d’Išo‘dad de Merv sur l’ancien testament, 1, Genèse [Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalis 126 (text), 156 (tr.); 1950, 1955], 2, Exode-Deutéronome [ibid. 176 (text), 179 (tr.); 1958]. E. HAMMERSCHMIDT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5: 783–784.

[J. M. SOLA-SOLE]

ISIDORE OF KIEV

Humanist, Greek cardinal, and promoter of union of Florence; b. Monembasia, Greece, c. 1385; d. Rome, May 27, 1464. After being educated in Constantinople, Isidore became a monk in Monembasia and later abbot of the convent of Demetrius, Constantinople. Sent as envoy of the Emperor John VIII to the Council of Basel in 1434 to arrange for a council of union, he returned to Constantinople in the summer of 1435, and in 1436 was consecrated metropolitan of Kiev and all Russia. He arrived in Moscow on April 2, 1437, and almost immediately started on his way to the Council of Ferrara-Florence. He reached Ferrara only in mid-August 1438 and was elected one of the six Greek spokesmen in the Council. He had little occasion to speak, though he was throughout a force for union. In the months after the dogmatic sessions of March 1439 he was particularly active with BESSARION and others, and he had the confidence of both Emperor and Pope. He signed the decree of union, acting also as procurator for Antioch, and was nominated Apostolic Legate on August 17 for the Russias, and created cardinal on December 18. He issued an encyclical from Buda stressing the equality of the Churches; he was at first well received in Kiev and promulgated the union in Moscow (March 1441), but he was imprisoned on a charge of heresy by the Great Prince. Having escaped and been reimprisoned in Tver, he spent a year in Galizia, working for union; he then returned to Italy. After serving as legate on a mission to Greece (1444–48), he went to Constantinople in 1452 as papal legate and promulgated (Dec. 12) the union of Florence. He was wounded in the fall of the city and taken prisoner, but he escaped. Invested with the temporalities of the Latin patriarchate of Constantinople in 1452, he was appointed Greek patriarch on April 20, 1459, after resigning all his offices except the bishopric of Moscow (1458).

He was a notable humanist, interested in philosophy, mathematics, astronomy, and other branches of learning. Of his writings there remain a discourse in reply to Cardinal Cesarini at Basel, the unfinished drafts of several speeches prepared at Florence, a valuable report on the Eastern Church of c. 1448, and a treatise on the Procession of the Holy Spirit, as well as letters in Greek and Latin; the first of these items and many of the letters have been published.

Bibliography: G. MERCATI, Scritti d'Isidoro il cardinale ru-teno (Studi e Testi 46; 1926). G. HOFMANN, "Quellen zu Isidor von Kiev," Orientalia Christiana periodica 18 (1952) 143–157. A. ZIEGLER, Die Union des Konzils von Florenz in der russischen Kirche (Würzburg 1938). J. GILL, "Isidore, Metropolitan of Kiev," Personalities of the Council of Florence (New York 1964) 65–78.

[J. GILL]

ISIDORE OF PELUSIUM, ST.

Monk and theologian; b. probably Alexandria, c. 360; d. c. 435–49. Ephraem of Antioch cites Alexandria as the birthplace of Isidore (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne 103:964) and indicates that he received a solid theological formation. He became a monk, retiring to a monastery on a hill not far from Pelusium, Egypt. FACUNDUS OF HERMIANE calls him a priest (Patrologia Latina, J. P. Migne 67:573–574; cf. Synodicon, Patrologia Graeca 84:587). Isidore took part in the ecclesiastical controversies of the early fifth century; he supported JOHN CHRYSOSTOM and insisted that his name be restored to the DIPTYCHS. He cautioned CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA to moderation in dealing with Nestorius, telling him explicitly not to imitate the harsh example of his uncle Theophilus (Epist. 1.310).

Some 2,000 letters of Isidore have been preserved in five books. Usually brief but conforming to the epistolary fashion of the age, they reveal the author's literary formation and his ability to cite Homer, Demosthenes, PLATO, and ARISTOTLE, as well as the early Fathers of the Church, such as CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA. Of John Chrysostom he said, "If Saint Paul had desired to supply his own interpretation, he could not have done otherwise than this celebrated master of the Attic language" (Epist. 5.32). He cautioned against the abuses connected with the allegorical methods of Alexandrian exegesis and favored the Antiochene approach in theology. He refused to see a reference to Christ in every sentence of the Old Testament and maintained that while it was both historical and prophetic, it was necessary to distinguish carefully between the literal and the typical senses in interpreting that document (Epist. 2.95; 4.203).

Isidore followed the teaching of ATHANASIUS OF ALEXANDRIA in Christology and taught that Christ was "of two natures" in the Incarnation (Epist. 1.323). He repudiated a mixture or indwelling of one nature in the other (Epist. 4.99) and appears to have anticipated the terminology of CHALCEDON. He held that the Holy Spirit was consubstantial with the Father and the Son (Epist. 1.109). In the moral and ascetical sphere Isidore advised that entrance to the kingdom of God is based upon poverty and abstinence (Epist. 1.129), but that these virtues required the keeping of the Commandments (1.287) and the practice of a spiritual outlook on the things of the world (1.162). Virginity is better than marriage (4.192), but unavailing if practiced without humility (1.286). Among the recipients of his letters was the Emperor Theodosius II, whom he advised against allowing imperial officials to interfere in matters of faith (1.311).

The Migne edition of the letters in five books is arbitrary but based on an old tradition. Forty-nine of the letters were translated into Latin by the deacon Rusticus and appended to the acts of the Council of EPHESUS. Two lost works are mentioned: Against the Greeks and On the Non-Existence of Fate.

Feast: Feb. 4.

St. Isidore of Seville. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: Lettres, ed. and tr. P. EVIEUX (Paris 1997–) Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) v.78. C. H. TURNER, Journal of Theological Studies 6 (1905) 70–85. K. LAKE, ibid. 270–282. P. EVIEUX, Isidore de Péluse (Paris 1995). A. MOREL, Synodicon adversus Tragoediam Irenaei, ed. R. AIGRAIN (Paris 1911). E. SCHWARTZ, Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum (Berlin 1914–) 1.4:9–25. G. BAREILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 8.1:84–98. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from the 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 308–309. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, MD 1950–) 3:180–185. A. SCHMID, Die Christologie Isidors von Pelusium (Fribourg 1948). P. T. CAMELOT, Catholicisme 6:153–154. M. SMITH, Harvard Theological Review 47 (1954) 205–210, Manuscripts.

[F. X. MURPHY]

ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, ST.

Archbishop, theologian, encyclopedist, and Doctor of the Church; b. Spain, c. 560; d. Seville, April 4, 636.

Reckoned as the last of the Latin Fathers, Isidore of Seville was one of the most influential Church Fathers in the West from the early Middle Ages well into the modern period. His fame derived not only from encyclopedic works such as the Etymologiae and De Natura Rerum, but also from his synthesis of patristic and classical thought, his exegetical and devotional writings, his collections of Church Councils and Canons, his theories of kingship, and his historical writings.

Apart from a brief notice in Braulio of Saragossa's additions to De Viris Illustribus (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 81:15–17), no contemporary biography of Isidore has survived, and Isidore is known principally through his written works, through his letters, and through his reported actions at Spanish church councils. Isidore and his family were displaced Hispano-Romans who migrated from Carthage in southeastern Spain to Seville sometime around 560, either fleeing the constant warfare between Byzantines and Goths that characterized the province of Carthaginiensis, or perhaps forcibly resettled there by the Goths. Isidore may have been born after the family migration. Although the fate of his father, Severianus, is unknown, Isidore's brothers LEANDER and Fulgentius, as well as his sister Faustina, all entered the Church. His mother, whose name appears to have been Turtur, may also have entered the Church in her later years. The youngest of four children, Isidore was raised and educated by his elder brother Leander (c. 540–600), who was Archbishop of Seville (584–600). Isidore was well-versed in the Latin fathers, particularly Ambrose of Milan, Athanasius, Augustine of Hippo, Caesarius of Arles, Fulgentius of Ruspe, Gregory the Great, Jerome, John Chrysostom, and many other Gallic and North African writers. Isidore's knowledge of classical authors was also extensive, although in some cases through late antique anthologies, commentaries, and scholia. He appears to have had some knowledge of the Mishna or other rabbinic writings. Isidore's ancient fame as a master of the Greek and Hebrew languages has been called into question by modern scholars, and his knowledge of the Greek fathers stems largely from Latin translations.

Isidore succeeded his brother Leander as Archbishop of Seville, probably in the year 600, and had an episcopate of some 36 years, during which time he was one of the most prominent intellectual and spiritual leaders of the realm. His promotion of scholarship and education had long-reaching consequences for the realm, and the results of these endeavors have been termed an "Isidorian" or Visigothic Renaissance. He was confidant and advisor, although not always successfully, to several Visigothic kings, including Sisebut (612–620), Suintila (621–631), and Sisenand (631–636). He was present in Toledo at the court of King Gundemar in 610, and assisted in transferring the metropolitan see of Carthaginiensis from Cartagena to Toledo. In addition to his activities as archbishop of Seville, Isidore participated in several provincial and kingdom-wide Church councils between 610 and 633. He played a prominent role in the second council of Seville (619), where his summation of the Catholic faith so impressed contemporaries that it was included in the canons of the council (ibid. 84:593–608). Isidore's greatest conciliar imprint, however, was in 633 at the fourth council of TOLEDO, over which he presided. The canons of this famous and influential council (ibid. 84:363–390) reveal his influence at almost every turn. Sensing the approach of death in 636, Isidore resigned his episcopal office and performed public penance for his sins. He was canonized in 1589, and declared a Doctor of the Church in 1722.

When one considers the entire corpus of Isidore's writings, more than 20 books composed between 598 and 633, his earliest works tend to be very straightforward lexical or expository texts, whereas his later and more analytical or encyclopedic writings are characterized by an increasing complexity of thought, subtlety of meaning, and clarity of expression. Yet throughout his writings, several larger themes emerge, topics of such importance that Isidore frequently returns to them. These themes include the Church, the monarchy, heresy, the Jews, scriptural exegesis, and history.

Isidore worked to establish and maintain a strong and centralized church in the Visigothic realm, to preserve and transmit the treasury of faith, to promote Catholic orthodoxy, to refute heresy and religious error, and to facilitate cure of souls. In both his writings and his actions at regional and kingdom-wide synods and Church councils he promoted liturgical uniformity, monastic discipline, and the maintenance of diocesan schools. His De Ecclesiasticis Officiis (ibid. 83:736–826) takes a descriptive approach to the offices of the church, as well as the proper functions of clerics, and to various aspects of the liturgical year. This text may have been intended as a guide to uniformity of practice throughout the Visigothic realm. In his Regula Monachorum (ibid. 83:867–894) Isidore takes a regulative approach, establishing norms of discipline and practice for communities of religious, suggesting a regimen that is considerably less harsh than either the Benedictine or Columban rules. The precise nature of his many liturgical writings is difficult to ascertain because they have been incorporated anonymously into the great collection of Spanish liturgical texts known as the Liturgica Mozarabica (ibid. 85, 86), whose basic structure has been traditionally attributed to Isidore. Through the canons of the fourth council of Toledo (ibid. 84:593–608), especially canons 2 through 56, Isidore extended his legislative approach to ecclesiastical discipline and liturgical practice throughout the entire Gothic realm, stressing not only discipline but also the importance of learning and of uniform liturgical practice. Always emphasizing that the Church in Spain was a true and faithful successor to the Church of the great councils, Isidore assembled a great collection of Greek, African, Gallic and Spanish church councils, canons, and creeds, a collection known to us in its later form as the HISPANA (ibid. 84:93–626), which made available to Isidore's contemporaries and successors the canonical heritage of the universal Church.

Isidore supported a strong and centralized monarchy in the Visigothic realm to protect the Church, to control the violence endemic to the society, and to enhance the stability of the realm. He emphasized a kingdom-wide unity of purpose, but celebrated the uniqueness and primacy of the Visigoths as a ruling and military elite. Kings, he believed, had a responsibility to provide justice in the realm, to be exemplars of piety and mercy, and to promote an environment that would facilitate cure of souls. He insisted that kings would have to render an account to God for how well they ruled their realms. Although Isidore wrote much concerning kingship and governance in his Sententiae (ibid. 83:718–723) and Etymologiae (ibid. 82:341–345), his best known writings on monarchy appear in canon 75 of the fourth council of Toledo (ibid. 84:383–386), where Isidore emphasized the obligation of the king to rule well, and asserted the obligation of the king's subjects to be obedient to him as "the Lord's anointed one." Less is known about Isidore's attitude towards caesaropapism in the Gothic realm. The Visigothic kingdom was the most romanized of the seventh-century barbarian kingdoms, and the Visigothic kings thought of themselves as the head of the Church in their realms, much as had Roman Emperors such as Constantine, Justinian, and Heraclius. Recent scholarship has suggested that Isidore and his fellow Spanish and Gallic bishops were often expected to submit to royal authority as functionaries of the Visigothic realm, and that they may have acted with great hesitation on such troublesome issues such as anti-Jewish legislation and other affairs of state.

Isidore was an active opponent of the Arian, Macedonian, and Acephalite heresies throughout his lifetime, and in many of his exegetical and theological writings he asserted positions that implicitly refuted these heresies. His De Haeresibus (Patrologiae cursus completus, series latina; ed. A. Hamman 4.2, 1815–1820) and the sections on heresy in the Etymologiae (Patrologia Latina 82:296–305) are descriptive rather than analytical, but at the second council of Seville in 619 Isidore actively and analytically refuted an Acephalite heretic through an extensive combination of scriptural exegesis and citations of the Church Fathers, references to Church councils and appeals to the Christian tradition. Additionally, he thought heresy and heresiarchs sufficiently important to the historical record that he listed them in his historical chronicles in much the same spirit that he mentioned other enemies and persecutors of the Church.

Several of Isidore's writings, especially De Fide Catholica Adversus Judaeos (ibid. 83:449–538), reflected Isidore's interest in refuting rabbinic calumnies against Christianity, but Isidore opposed the increasingly harsh anti-Jewish legislation that characterized the Visigothic realm. He denounced forced conversions under Sisebut (ibid. 83:1073), and in the canons of the fourth council of Toledo again condemned forced baptisms (ibid. 84:379–380). Although Isidore's stern counsel seems to have restrained the rising tide of anti-Jewish actions and legislation in the Visigothic realm, following his death in 636 the Visigothic kings imposed an increasingly harsh regimen on their non-Christian subjects.

Scriptural exegesis is an important foundation of Isidore's epistemology, and most of his writings are characterized by extensive references to the Bible. His exegetical works are numerous, and include introductions to individual books of scripture (ibid. 83:155–180), a commentary on Isaiah (Patrologiae cursus completus, series latina; 4.2, 1822–1839), as well as extensive allegorical and typological exegesis in Quaestiones in Vetus Testamentum (Patrologia Latina 83:207–424), in Allegoriae Quaedam Sacrae Scripturae (ibid. 83:97–130), and in Liber Numerorum (ibid. 83:179–200). In Synonyma (ibid. 83:825–868), a devotional work, Isidore demonstrates how reason can lead the despairing sinner to hope for divine pardon, and then he guides the remorseful soul through an intense and elaborate series of penitential devotions. These devotions make extensive use of synonyms and parallelisms in ways that allow the penitent sinner thoroughly to examine his conscience, to confess his sins, and to seek reconciliation with God.

Incorporating both sacred and secular events, Isidore's historical Chronicon (ibid. 83:1017–1058), emphasizes the rise and fall of empires and the course of God's revelations to and interactions with mankind from the creation through the early seventh century, but it also emphasizes innovations in thought and letters, as well as other contributions to the liberal arts. In his Historia Regibus Gothorum (ibid. 83:1057–1082), Isidore examines the origin and history of the Goths from their supposed Biblical origins through the early seventh century, incorporating them into the narrative salvation history. Isidore described the Goths as a great and noble people who had been poisoned by the Arian heresy and driven from their homeland centuries earlier, yet God brought a remnant of them to Spain, where they finally converted to the true Catholic faith under the guidance of Isidore's elder brother er Leander, and where as kings of Spain the Goths had become the defenders of God's holy and Catholic Church in the uttermost west of Christendom. This Isidorian theme of Spain and its Catholic kings being the great champions and defenders of Catholic orthodoxy exercised a profound influence on Spanish historiography from the early Middle Ages to the present day.

Isidore was best known to medieval scholars as an encyclopedist, and he composed several works that were encyclopedic in nature. His De Natura Rerum (ibid. 83:963–1018) was composed at the request of King Sisebut, and focused on a great variety of terrestrial and celestial phenomena. Topical in organization, it deals with subjects as diverse as solar eclipses, the movements of the stars, and the course of the Nile River. His Sententiae (ibid. 83:537–738), the first medieval "book of sentences," presents a summary of patristic teachings on theological, moral, and social topics, and draws extensively on the writings of Gregory the Great and Augustine of Hippo. Also organized topically, the first book focuses on theological and dogmatic issues, the second book on ethical and moral problems, and the third book is concerned with the challenges and norms of maintaining the right social order in a Christian society. One of his earliest writings, De Differentiis (ibid. 83:1–98), reflects Isidore's lifelong interest in linguistic theory. More lexical than encyclopedic, this work presents topically organized list of words, defines them in terms of their meaning and their etymology, and relates them to their homonyms, synonyms, and antonyms.

The 20-volume Etymologiae (ibid. 82:73–928) was his most substantial and influential work. It remained the most comprehensive and important encyclopedia in the west until the publication of Diderot's Encyclopedia in the eighteenth century, and over 1,000 medieval and early modern manuscripts of the Etymologiae have survived. Organized topically, the encyclopedia presents descriptive and occasionally analytical accounts concerning thousands of sacred and secular topics, including cautious but open treatment of topics condemned by other Christian writers. Individual items are frequently explained in terms of their etymological origins, reflecting Isidore's belief that to understand the origins of a word is to understand its broader meaning and its relationship to other words. The Etymologiae took years of effort on Isidore's part, and his friends occasionally complained to him that he was taking far too long to complete it, demanding of him "render what you owe." The work is organized into 20 volumes, and each volume itself is hierarchically organized, wherein topics that are related to one another are gathered together in individual chapters. Other early medieval writers such as Nennius may have lamented that they had "made a heap" of all that was before them, but Isidore took what was before him and preserved it in an organized, topical, and hierarchical fashion, noting the connections between words and ideas as well as words and physical realities. Some recent scholars have over-enthusiastically referred to the Etymologiae as a “database,” and it is perhaps Isidore’s organized approach to the preservation and presentation of information, with its emphasis on hierarchical structure and the inter-relatedness of knowledge, that has inspired Isidore’s popular veneration in the twenty-first century as the unofficial patron saint of computers and the Internet.

Feast: April 4.

Bibliography: Editions and Translations: Sancti Isidori Hispalensis Opera Omnia, ed. FAUSTINO ARÉVALO, 7 vols. (Rome 1797–1803), reprinted in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, vols. 81–84 (Paris 1850–62). De Differentiis, Liber I, ed. and tr. into Spanish, C. CODONER. Isidoro de Sevilla, Diferencias Libro I, Auteurs Latins du Moyen Âge (Paris 1992). De Ecclesiasticis Officiis, ed. C. M. LAWSON, Corpus Christianorum Series Latina. Vol. 113 (Turnholt 1989). Etymologiarum sive Originum Libri xx, ed. W. M. LINDSAY. Isidori Hispalensis episcopi etymologiarum sive originum libri xx, 2 vols., Oxford Classical Texts (Oxford 1911). De Haeresibus, ed. A. C. VEGA. S. Isidori Hispalensis Episcopi, De Haeresibus liber, Scriptores Ecclesiastici Hispano-Latini Veteris et Medii Aevi, vol. 5 (Madrid 1940). Reprinted in Patrologiae cursus completus, series latina; ed. A. HAMMAN 4.2, 1815–1820. Historia Regibus Gothorum, Sueborum, et Wandalorum, ed. and tr. into Spanish, C. RODRIGUEZ ALONSO. Las Historias de los Godos, Vandalos, Y Suevos de Isidore de Sevilla: Estudio, Edición Crítica Y Traducción, Fuentes Y Estudios de Historia Leonesa, No. 13. (León: 1975). History of the Kings of the Goths, tr. K. B. WOLF. Conquerors and Chroniclers of Early Medieval Spain, translated Texts for Historians, vol. 9, 81–110 (Liverpool 1990). The Letters of St. Isidore of Seville, ed. and tr., G. FORD JR., (Amsterdam 1970). The Medical Writings: An English Translation with an Introduction and Commentary, tr. W. D. SHARPE, Transactions of the American Philological Society, New Series, vol. 54, Pt. 2 (1964), 1–75. De Natura Rerum, ed. and tr. into French, J. FONTAINE. Isidore de Seville: Traité de la Nature, Bibliothèque de L’École des Hautes Études Hispaniques. Fascicule XXVIII (Bordeaux 1960). De Ortu et Obitu Patrum, ed. and tr. into Spanish, C. CHAPARRO GÓMEZ, Auteurs Latins du Moyen Âge (Paris 1985). “The Rule of Isidore,” tr., A. W. GODFREY, Monastic Studies 18 (1988), 7–29. De Viris Illustribus, ed. C. CODONER MERINO, El “De Viris Illustribus” de Isidore de Sevilla: Estudio Y Edición Crítica (Salamanca 1964). Sententiae, ed. P. CAZIER, Corpus Christianorum Series Latina, vol. 111 (Turnholt 1998). Versus, ed. J. M. SÁNCHEZ MARTÍN, Corpus Christianorum Series Latina, vol. 113a (Turnholt 2000). Studies: J. FONTAINE, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l’Espagne wisigothique, 3 v. (Paris 1959, 1983); Isidore de Séville, Genèse et originalité de la culture hispanique au temps des Wisigoths (Turnhout 2000). P. CAZIER, “Isidore de Séville et la naissance de l’Espagne Catholique,” Théologie Historique 96 (1994). P. J. MULLINS, The Spiritual Life According to St. Isidore of Seville (Washington, D.C. 1940). R. L. STOCKING, Bishops, Councils, and Consensus in the Visigothic Kingdom, 589–633 (Ann Arbor 2000).

[J. T. CROUCH]

ISIDORE THE FARMER, ST.

Patron of Madrid and of farmers; b. Madrid, 1070; d. there May 15, 1130. Isidore entered the service of the wealthy Juan de Vergas, in whose employ he spent the remainder of his life. Isidore’s wife, a saint also, María de la Cabeza (Torribia) (d. c. 1175; feast: Sept. 9), bore him one son who died at an early age. Isidore won the respect and admiration of all, especially his employer, by reason of his unusually devout life. Miracles were associated with him even during his lifetime, e.g., angels doing his farmwork when he lingered overlong in the local church. After his death his reputation for sanctity grew, culminating in his canonization on March 12, 1622, by Pope GREGORY XV. His tomb is in the church of St. Andrew, Madrid. Isidore is also the patron of the U.S. National Catholic Rural Life Conference.

Feast: May 15.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 3:509–546. Z. GARCÍA-VILLADA, “San Isidro Labrador en la historia y en la literatura,” Razón y Fe 62 (1922) 36–46, 167–176, 323–335, 454–468. F. MORENO CHICARRO, San Isidro Labrador (Madrid 1992), extensive bibliography. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:323–324.

[A. O’MALLEY]

ISIS AND OSIRIS

Egyptian god and goddess whose cult goes back to the 2d millennium B.C. and was adopted, with some modifications, by the Greeks after the conquest of Alexander the Great. The chief Greek innovation was the introduction of the god Sarapis, or Serapis, into the worship of Isis. The cult spread throughout the Mediterranean world, and along with the cults of Cybele and Mithras, it became one of the most common and popular pagan religions in the early centuries of the Christian era. The Egyptian god Horus often appears in the cult, frequently as the pudgy child Harpocrates and sometimes the hawk-headed Egyptian deity, Anubis, as well. The mysteries of Isis are described in Apuleius’s The Golden Ass, and in Plutarch’s Concerning Isis and Osiris. Both Isis and Sarapis are heralded in several long hymns, usually called aretologies because they extol the wondrous powers and miracles of these divinities. Many of their temples are known in both East and West, the best preserved being those that have been excavated at Delos in the Aegean and at Pompeii in Italy.

Bibliography: T. A. BRADY, 308–309, 459–460, 793. J. G. MILNE, 6:374–384.

[T. A. BRADY]

Isis Omnia of Egypt, illustration. (Archive Photos)

ISLAM

The religion that God set forth for Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and MUHAMMAD proclaimed by the latter in Arabia in the 7th century, which enjoys the allegiance of approximately 1.2 billion persons, about one-sixth of the total estimated population of Earth. The name Islam, invariably preferred by its adherents to Muhammadanism (one of the archaic Western designations for the religion), is an Arabic word signifying “surrender,” and its believers call themselves Muslims, “those who have surrendered to God.” The world’s Muslims are centered chiefly in the northern and eastern parts of Africa and the western and southern parts of Asia. The largest national representations are those of Pakistan and Indonesia, but Islam’s traditional cultural centers have been the Arab world and Iran. Considered the fastest-growing religion in the world, Islam is expanding southward in both East and West Africa, as well as in the West, notably in the United States, where, ever since the conversion of the son of the founder of the Black Muslims to Sunnite Islam in the 1970s, the majority of African American Muslims have been “orthodox” Muslims. The subject will be treated in five parts: the origins of Islam; the Islamic creed; “The Five Pillars” and Islamic religious practice; Islamic law, theology, and mysticism; and modern trends in Islam.

Origins of Islam. Islam can never be disengaged from the life of the man Muḥammad. Born at MECCA in Arabia about A.D. 570, he belonged to a cadet branch of the Quraysh tribe, then prominent in Mecca, and in young manhood married the widow of a wealthy merchant. When he was about 40, he began to make a series of remarkable claims. He maintained that he was the bearer of a “recitation” (Arabic QUR’ĀN) transmitted to him by the Angel Gabriel and “the Spirit.” This Qur’ān, he claimed, was the final redaction of what Allāh, “the God of Abraham, Ismael, Isaac, and Jacob, and the Tribes [of Israel] . . . and Jesus” (Qur’ān 2.136) wished to communicate to the human race. It carried in itself, as he was ultimately compelled to insist, the power of invalidating the former Scriptures whenever they disagreed with it, although he readily allowed that those Scriptures (presumably including the whole of the Bible) represented divine revelation “in its original form” no less than the Qur’ān. He further regarded himself as a prophet, indeed as the last of the series of prophets or “messengers” whom God had sent to restore the purity of His religion; for not only had it been deformed by Jews and Christians, in his view, but it had also remained unknown to others, notably the Arabs. These claims enjoyed no striking success at Mecca, though Muḥammad steadily enlisted small numbers. In 622 he and his followers fled to MEDINA, a city some distance north of Mecca, an “emigration” (Arabic HIJRA), from which Muslims date their era. At Medina, Muḥammad added to the number of his followers and welded them together into a vital community and a military power, which was nearly ready, at the time of his death in 632, to extend itself by rapid conquests to mastery over much of Asia and Africa.

Various questions concerning Islam’s origins and, more particularly, concerning the sources of the material contained in the Qur’ān, arise naturally. The orthodox Muslim position is a flat denial that such sources could possibly exist. The Muslims do not deny that Muḥammad knew Jews and Christians; what they deny is that Muḥammad was, in any sense, the author of the Qur’ān. Although God’s revelations through Muḥammad are considered the ultimate authority in Islam, Muḥammad’s deeds and sayings (collected in the bulky Islamic traditions or Ḥadīth literature) are considered to exemplify the ideal way of life for the Muslim. There are variations in orthodox Muslim thought as to how the balance should be drawn between patterning one’s life after Muḥammad and following one’s own interpretation of Qur’ānic injunctions. Many Muslims do not deny that there were slight variants in the earliest versions of the Qur'ān or that the arrangement of the chapters according to length is an arbitrary one, but they hold that the present form, which was soon established, corresponds to a heavenly archetype of "the Book." The Islamic concept of revelation is thus considerably more rigid than is the Catholic, the Protestant Christian, or even the orthodox Jewish; for it excludes the notion of human, though divinely inspired, authorship of Scripture.

Jewish and Christian Influence. Non-Muslim scholarship has taken a different view of the matter. It has nearly always held that the major influences on Muḥammad must have been principally, but not exclusively, Jewish and Christian, and that those influences were colored by Muḥammad's own character and made over to conform to aspects and needs of the pre-Islamic Arabian mind. Within this broad framework, however, opinions have clashed. The prize dissertations of Abraham Geiger, the Jewish reformist, stimulated much of the modern scholarly discussion; in it he argued for a dominant Jewish influence on the Qur'ān. An opposing view, holding that influence to have been chiefly Gnostic, won the powerful support of Julius Wellhausen. The latter view was followed by many scholars until more recent studies, for example those by Charles Torrey and Abraham Katsh, persuasively argued again for a greater Jewish influence. It must also be noted that at the beginning of the 21st century, greater attention was paid to Muḥammad's reactions to the traditional religions of South Arabia.

Although pre-Islamic Arabia was still distinctly pagan and, by comparison to Mediterranean lands, relatively uncivilized, it harbored numerous Jews and Christians. There is no difficulty in accounting for the presence of Christians there (see ARABIA, 5) or in explaining why those Christians tended to be Nestorians. The foremost Christian community was Najrān, under the Nestorian influence of the king of Hira. There were Jewish trading settlements at Teima, Khaybar, Medina, and cities farther south. They are occasionally mentioned in rabbinical literature and may have dated back to the 7th century B.C. There is evidence, too, of considerable numbers of Jewish proselytes among the Arabs. They do not appear to have possessed any higher learning, however, and it has been suggested that they had been affected by forms of heterodox thought in which both Christian and pagan notions had been incorporated.

Development of Muḥammad's Ideas. For those coming from a scholarly tradition that puts a heavy emphasis upon the written word, it is difficult to sift the Qur'ān and the tradition literature for historical information. It is certain that as a boy and young man Muḥammad knew, and was on friendly terms with, both Jews and Christians. He is reported to have heard the bishop of Najrān preach and to have met on a caravan a monk "well versed in the knowledge of the Christians" (Ibn-Ishāq, Sīrat Rasūl Allāh [The Life of Mohammad], tr. A. Guillaume [London 1955] 79–81). (See BAHIRA LEGEND.) The first encouragement he received after his prophetic call, if one excepts that of his wife, came from her cousin Waraqah, "who had become a Christian and read the scriptures and learned from those that followed the Torah and the Gospel" (ibid. 107). At the same time he was familiar with various classes of Jewish scholars, whom he could name accurately, and there is reason to believe that many Jews, expecting the imminent advent of a messiah in Arabia, showed special interest in him. Finally, he was associated with a mysterious group that called itself the Hanifs (Arabic ḥunafā', "the pure ones"), whose members, disgusted with idol worship, favored a monotheism incorporating elements from both Judaism and Christianity.

After Muḥammad began his preaching, he had constant and close contacts with Jews and Christians, but it is hard to say whether or in what manner he profited by them. His adversaries, among whom were many Jews and Christians, watched eagerly for indications of fraud; and Muḥammad was able successfully to assume a remarkably self-assured attitude toward any accusations of that sort. In the early Meccan period, to be sure, he was given to appealing, though somewhat vaguely, to Jewish and Christian authority for his teachings on the unity of God and on divine judgment: "All this is written in earlier scriptures, the scriptures of Abraham and Moses" (Qur'ān 87.18). The only respect in which he then admitted differing from those Scriptures was that his own revelation was in the Arabic language: "Before [the Qur'ān] the Book of Moses was revealed, a guide and a blessing to all men. This book confirms it. It is revealed in the Arabic tongue" (Qur'ān 46.12). The late Meccan and early Medinese periods saw the greatest readiness on Muḥammad's part to absorb Jewish elements into Islam, for at that time his special aim was to win Jewish converts, especially among the Jews of Medina.

Changed Attitude toward Jews and Christians. For a time Muḥammad went out of his way to model Islam on the Bible, but later he assumed a sharply different attitude. That attitude stemmed, one suspects, from the unwillingness of Jews and Christians to accept his teaching. The Qur'ānic chapters of that later period clearly demonstrate Muḥammad's wish to disassociate Islam from Jewish and Christian "orthodoxy" and to establish the supremacy of his own religion by vigorous disputation and the use of force. Unsuccessful in his attempt to convince the Jews and Christians, he began to attack them intellectually and physically. Only the Jews offered organized opposition. In the beginning they seem to have provided Islam with a number of false disciples. Nevertheless, they were incapable of prolonged or effective resistance to the growing Islamic power, and within a few years Khaybar and the other Jewish colonies in North Arabia had been vanquished.

Very probably Muḥammad had heard improvised translations of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. It is quite possible, too, that information concerning one group may have come from the other and that wherever Scripture is misrepresented or distorted, Muḥammad followed homiletical embellishments. Julian Obermann summed up the problem of Islamic origins very well:

What with the vast overlapping of Jewish and Christian lore, especially in the period and area involved [the general impression of greater Jewish influence on Islam], may be illusory or at least inexact, unless it be borne out by detailed evidence for each element under discussion. Obviously, Old Testament and even rabbinical materials might have been transmitted to Arabia by Christian channels; while seemingly New Testament matter might easily have been derived from rabbinical homilies. Indeed, the situation is of a kind that in a considerable number of instances we can go only as far as to demonstrate a given element in Islam as of Judaeo-Christian origin, but no further. (The Arab Heritage, ed. N. A. Faris [New York 1963] 59–60)

Islamic Creed. Islam has carefully maintained its distinction between faith (imān) and practice (ʿibādāt or iḥsān). Faith, usually defined as “assent to that which comes from God, and confession to it,” has been formulated in a creed considerably more complicated than the shahādah, the simple profession of faith: “There is no god but God [Allāh], and Muḥammad is His messenger.” There are six classic articles in the otherwise varying Muslim creeds: concerning God, angels, the Holy Scriptures, prophets and “messengers,” resurrection and judgment, and predestination. Muḥammad’s monotheism began, no doubt, as a rejection of paganism; yet it was highly positive. It was, as he never ceased repeating, the monotheism of Israel. The God of Islam was Yahweh, without those truths about Him revealed by Christ. It is fairly certain that there were various interpretations of the Trinity in various Christian circles during Muḥammad’s lifetime, some of which may have included the Virgin Mary. The Qur’ān denies the Incarnation: “God is one, eternal. He did not beget and was not begotten” (Qur’ān 112.3). For Muḥammad there was no redeemer, no need for redemption, no original sin. Otherwise Allah is invested with nearly the same general attributes of Yahweh. The angels and archangels, even to their names, are those of the Bible. Satan also figures, as do the “genies” (Arabic jinn) and other spirits similar to but not precisely identical with lesser devils.

The references to earlier Scriptures in the Qur’ān are sufficiently vague to render their exact identification difficult. Only a few OT books are mentioned by name, and the Gospel (in the singular) is treated as though it were a book revealed to Christ. At first Muḥammad appealed to the authority of these books to uphold his own prophethood and religion, but later seemed to suggest that they had been hopelessly corrupted and falsified. Muslims have never felt obliged, therefore, to justify the inconsistencies and discrepancies (which exist in considerable numbers) between the Qur’ān and the earlier Scriptures in the forms in which they have come down to us. There is only one indisputable quotation from the Bible in the Qur’ān (that of Ps 36 [37].29 in 21.105), but scores of OT stories are repeated, in the main accurately, with many reminiscences of their Hebrew wording. There are also Talmudic stories, such as the lowering of Aaron’s calf (7.146) and Abraham’s trial by fire, a rabbinic play on Ur and the Hebrew ʾūr, “fire” (21.68–70).

Muslims also distinguish prophets from “messengers”; the latter are believed to be holy men sent by God to teach specific peoples. Muḥammad is thus regarded both as the “seal” of the prophets and as the messenger to the Arabs. The Qur’ān mentions 8 messengers and 24 prophets, 4 of them Arabs and the rest Hebrews. The prophets include most of the major figures in the early history of the Hebrews, but exclude Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and all of the minor prophets but Jonah. Despite the honor in which Abraham is held, the predominant figure in the Qur’ān is Moses. If one follows Theodor Nöldeke’s chronology of the chapters, Moses is mentioned more than 100 times in the chapters from the Meccan period alone. The angels refer to the Qur’ān in one passage as “a Scripture revealed since the time of Moses, confirming previous Scriptures” (46.30).

Christ, by contrast, is mentioned in only two chapters of the Meccan period, and references to Him throughout the Qur’ān are sparse. Many of Christ’s utterances as found in the canonical Gospels and elsewhere in the New Testament are not mentioned in the Qur’ān, and those that are mentioned frequently deviate from the text of the NT. Christ appears as a messenger born (by Virgin Birth) of the Virgin Mary. Indeed, he is often referred to as the “Son of Mary.” Some of the stories of His infancy, such as His speaking in the cradle (19.30–34; 5.109) and fashioning a live bird out of clay (3.43; 5.110), echo apocryphal writings known to have existed in Coptic, Syriac, and even Arabic versions. Muḥammad granted that Christ worked miracles, but denied that He was crucified.

That position, commonly taken by some Gnostics and Docetists, was expressed in the Qur'ān: "They [the Jews] declared: 'We have put to death the Messiah Jesus, the son of Mary, the apostle of Allāh.' They did not kill him, nor did they crucify him, but they thought they did" (4.156). It has been argued from what is missing in the Qur'ānic narratives that much of Muḥammad's information about Christ must have come from Jewish informants. It is a widespread later Islamic belief, still current and not without Qur'ānic support, that Christ will return at the end of the world to slay the Antichrist. He is often called the "Word" of God and His "Spirit" in the Qur'ān, and "Messiah" is usually added to His name.

The Qur'ān bears strong witness to the resurrection of the flesh and the Last Judgment. Only heaven and hell are everlasting, although it appears that hell serves as a kind of purgatory for some Muslims and that Muḥammad (and, according to some theologians, other prophets as well) has intercessory powers with God for them. The Islamic belief in predestination is not as rigid as some commentators have made it to be. It has always been a live issue in Islamic theology, and the matter of working out an acceptable formulation has been left to the devices of the exegete and the ordinary believer. The Qur'ān says, for example, "God causes whom He wills to err, and whom He wills He guides; and you shall assuredly be called to account for your doings" (16.93).

The "Five Pillars" and Islamic Religious Practice. By the time of its conquests outside Arabia, Islam regarded itself as a universal religion for all mankind; so there has never been any perfect ethnic or linguistic tie among Muslims, though Arabic (in a special way, over a wider area and for a longer time), Persian, Turkish, and Urdu have come to be the principal languages of its expression. Islamic practice is a complex realm, ranging from the obligatory Five Pillars through the "necessary but not obligatory" on to the "voluntary" acts of the Muslim. The Five Pillars are as follows: the profession of faith in Islam, prayer, fasting, almsgiving, and pilgrimage.

Orthodoxy. The profession of faith consists of the simple statement: "There is no god but God, and Muḥammad is His messenger." The believing recitation of this formula, preferably before witnesses, is sufficient in itself to make one a Muslim. Islam has no church, no priesthood, no sacramental system, and almost no liturgy. The pattern of belief and practice of the SUNNITES enjoys the adherence of all but a small percentage of Muslims. The SHĪ'ITES comprise the second-largest grouping of Muslims. Deriving from the political "partisans" of 'ALĪ and his heirs, they have developed distinct doctrinal, legal and ritualistic features. Sectarianism in Islam has never had quite the same connotations as heresy in the Christian church, allowing for the acceptance of numerous religio-legal entities within the community of Islam.

Prayer. One of the most attractive aspects of Islam for the Christian is its steadfast devotion to prayer. There is a set form of ritual prayer, prefaced by ablutions and accompanied by "bowings" (Arabic rak'ah), for the five daily prayers prescribed by Islamic tradition and law. Muslims are called to public prayer by the muezzin (Arabic mu'adhdhin) from the minaret of a MOSQUE. Many Muslims pray in the mosque only at noon on Fridays, when there is a sermon (Arabic khuṭba), although more devout believers may perform all of the prescribed prayers there. Formal prayer must be performed facing toward Mecca. There is a tradition also of private and contemplative prayer, largely associated with SUFISM.

Fasting. Muslims are obliged to fast during the entire month of RAMADAN, which, because of the lunar reckoning from the Hijra, may fall at any time of the year. It is a total fast, but only from daybreak to sunset. It is a community exercise. Those who are ill or on a journey during that time are exempted from it, but must fast an equal number of days later on. Muslim spiritual writers such as al-Ghazzālī emphasize that Ramadan implies more than mere fasting and is a time for repentance and drawing the heart nearer to God. Voluntary fasting during other times of the year, especially in expiation for sins, is recommended and practiced.

Almsgiving. Muslims are enjoined also to give alms (Arabic zakāt). In the early days of Islam free-will offerings were regarded as satisfying this obligation. Later, however, a formal tax of one-tenth or one-fifth of the income (according to circumstances) was imposed upon Muslims. A contribution of one-fortieth of the income was considered adequate by many later legists. In modern times almsgiving has generally reverted to a matter of free-will offerings. The Qur'ān distinguished the worthy objects of free-will offerings (relatives, orphans, travelers, and the poor; 2.211) from those upon whom the revenue of zakāt was to be expended (slaves and prisoners, debtors, tax collectors, those to be conciliated by the Islamic community, and those fighting in a holy war; 9.60).

Pilgrimage to Mecca. The fifth of the Five Pillars is the pilgrimage to Mecca (Arabic ḤAJJ). Every Muslim is expected to journey there once in his lifetime if he possesses the means. There are two types of pilgrimage: the lesser pilgrimage, which can be performed at any time of the year with an abbreviated ritual, and the greater pilgrimage, which must be performed on specific days during the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah. When the pilgrim dons his simple white robes and enters into the state of iḥrām, he must abstain from all violence, sensual pleasures, and adornment for the duration of the pilgrimage. When he reaches Mecca, he goes immediately to the Ka'bah, the black-draped cuboidal "holy house" in the central square. This is the shrine, important in pre-Islamic religion, that Muslims believe was built in its original form by Abraham. It was only fairly late in his career that Muḥammad unequivocally incorporated the shrine and pilgrimage into Islam. The first Muslims had prayed facing Jerusalem. After kissing the Black Stone, the Muslim circumambulates the Ka'bah, marches seven times between the hills of al-Safā and al-Marwah, and then journeys the 14 miles to Mount 'Arafāt for the ceremony of wuqūf, "standing before God," for which lengthy prayers are prescribed. On the return to Mecca he prays at Muzdalifah, casts stones at certain pillars believed to represent the sites of temptations of Ismael, and offers a blood sacrifice commemorating Abraham's sacrifice in Gn 22.13. After ceremonial tonsure and a second circumambulation of the Ka'bah, the pilgrimage proper is ended, although most pilgrims go on to Medina to visit Muḥammad's grave and other sites associated with his life.

Other Religious Customs. According to some Muslim opinion, the jihād, or holy war, is to be considered a sixth "pillar" of Islam. This obligation was formulated in quite general terms in the Qur'ān 2.190, 193: "Fight in the way of God against those who fight against you, but do not commit aggression. . . . Fight against them until sedition is no more and allegiance is rendered to God alone; but if they make an end, then no aggression save against the evildoers." Although holy war has lost much of its persuasive force after the period of Islamic expansion (the consensus amongst orthodox Muslims has been that holy war should not be waged when it appeared as though the Muslims might lose), there have been modern attempts to revive it, especially amongst "radical" groups as a means of protesting Western, particularly American, global hegemony.

Besides these major matters of practice, the Qur'ān and Islamic tradition have supplied many others. Circumcision, for instance, is universally practiced among Muslims as a matter of religious observance, although the Qur'ān does not mention it. Wine, pork, gambling, and usury are forbidden. So, too, strictly speaking, are the making of images, the veneration of saints, and the use of devotional objects. Since the Qur'ān envisioned a close-knit community of true believers, it also contained many regulations concerning guardianship, dowries, divorce, and inheritance, as well as a complete punitive system against theft, fraud, perjury, and murder.

Festivals. Muslims celebrate many festivals. The most popular of them are the greater and lesser festivals that mark the end of Ramadan, the month of fasting. The greater festival, begun while fellow Muslims are sacrificing animals on the way back to Mecca, is celebrated with somewhat less enthusiasm than the lesser festival, which begins as soon as the new moon is visible after Ramadan. On that occasion there is great feasting and cheer, with exchanging of gifts. Paradoxically, it is also a favorite occasion for visiting the graves of one's departed relatives and friends. The birthday of Muḥammad (Arabic mawlid al-nabī) is marked with some solemnity, though rather less than one might have expected. Among the Shī'ites, the largest minority sect, the 10th day of the month of Muḥarram is the principal festival of the year. Shī'ism added two significant items to the Sunnite creed: first, a belief in a continuing divine "manifestation," particularly valuable with respect to Qur'ānic interpretation, in the descendants of 'Alī; second, a veneration for "the passion," for voluntary and innocent self-sacrifice to the point of martyrdom by the merits of which believers attain salvation and eternal life. These items, whose Christian parallels are obvious, are united in the liturgy of the 10th of Muḥarram, when Shī'ites commemorate the death of 'Alī's son Ḥusayn on Oct. 10, 680. Ḥusayn was killed in a skirmish between government troops and a small body of sympathetic supporters who were accompanying him to al-Kūfah in Iraq, where he intended to organize a revolt against the Umayyad caliphs of Damascus. The fate of Ḥusayn became a prototype and pattern for Shī'ite martyrdom and a symbol of the Shī'ite cause. In areas where Shī'ites are in a majority or at least represented in considerable numbers, this anniversary is preceded by nine days of rigorous religious discipline and culminates in a wild procession through the streets in which a catafalque for Ḥusayn is accompanied by horses, blood-smeared attendants, and numbers of naked young men flagellating themselves with chains and swords. The veneration of 'Alī and his sons has extended, it is interesting to note, to many of the Sunnite Muslims.

Islamic Law, Theology, and Mysticism. Islam is nothing if not the religion of the Qur'ān. The Qur'ān is believed by Muslims to constitute God's final and consequently singular revelation to mankind. There has never been any universally or even widely accepted ultimate authority in Islam except the Qur'ān. Questions of its interpretation have always been, therefore, of fundamental and crucial importance. Necessarily the Qur'ān had to be supplemented in several ways. It was supplemented first of all by the custom (Arabic sunnah, hence the name Sunnite) of Muḥammad himself, established principally by means of the tradition literature concerning him and his companions, based in turn upon chains of more or less authentic transmitting authorities (Arabic isnād), subsequently evaluated by an intricately developed science. It was obvious that traditions often conflicted; a man named Ibn-abī-al-ʿAwja was executed in al-Kūfah in 772 after confessing that he had forged several thousand traditions complete with chains of authority that would be regarded as genuine.

Law. The weakness of this supplement soon became obvious and a more efficacious supplement, designed to counteract that weakness and to serve the needs of a rapidly expanding state, was provided by the employment of certain principles, such as consensus of opinion (ijmaʿ), analogical deduction (qiyās), independent reasoning (ijtihād), and private opinion (raʿy) in the creation of an Islamic law (see ISLAMIC LAW). Four recognized schools of legal interpretation (Arabic sharīʿah), namely the Ḥanafite, Malikiite, Shafiʿite, and Ḥanbalite schools, all eponymous, were inaugurated during the 8th and 9th centuries and have remained in force until modern times. Today, while the impact of the sharīʿah has been abridged by the encroachment of modern civil law in certain areas of jurisprudence, there is at the same time a revival of the strict interpretation of the sharīʿah in many parts of the Islamic world. Throughout the medieval and early modern periods, however, owing to the virtually unique identification of the religion of Islam with the government of any Islamic state, the sharīʿah totally regulated the lives of Muslims. It extended to almost every detail of private life, comprehending all its religious, social, political, and domestic behavior. The offices of qāḍī (judge), muftī (legal expert), and ʿālim (lawyer, though very often used simply for “learned man”) rose to and maintained for many centuries positions that were of capital importance in Islamic life. In those places of the world where extensive Islamification of society is being attempted (such as the Sudan and Indonesia), as well as in those countries where the ruling factions have appropriated Islamic terminology to shore up their regimes (such as Saudi Arabia and Afghanistan), the sharīʿah and the concomitant penal code (e.g., the amputation of the hand of the thief) is the law of the land.

Systematic Theology. Distinct from the sciences of the traditions and of legal interpretation, systematic theology (see KALĀM) began later in the 9th century, partially in response to quarrels between the traditionalists and the incipient legists and to the influx of late Hellenistic philosophical notions, but most evidently in opposition to a group of rationalistic Muslims in Basra and Baghdad called the MUʿTAZILITES. This group asserted a series of unpopular positions on current issues such as the “creation” of the Qurʾān, the unity and justice of God, the nature of salvation, and free will. Although their aim seems to have been to protect Islamic dogma from what they regarded as corruptions to which it was open, they made use of a naive and rudimentary philosophical procedure that associated them with the target of their own attacks. When they converted the caliph al-Maʾmūn to their viewpoints and instituted an inquisition (Arabic mihnah), they generated a serious ideological crisis within the Islamic community and a powerful reaction that began with the apostasy of Abū al-Ḥasan ʿALĪ al-ASHʿARĪ (873?–935). Al-Ashʿarī, concerned mainly with the preservation of the pure transcendence of God, disenchanted with his Muʿtazilite masters, and influenced by the thinking of Ibn-Hanbal, the founder of the legal school already mentioned, set about systematically to refute the Muʿtazilite propositions. Few of his works have survived; but from those that have, it is clear that he himself so far advanced the methodology of treatment of these questions that his enduring reputation as the founder of Islamic theology and symbol of its orthodoxy appears justified. He was responsible for the disengagement of philosophy from this realm, enabling Islamic philosophers to go their independent ways, and for the close connection that developed between theology and the legal schools of the sharīʿah.

Al-Ashʿarī was the founder of the most influential school of Islamic theology; yet Ashʿarism differs considerably from the teaching of al-Ashʿarī himself. In the immediately succeeding centuries the work of al-Baqillani, al-Juwayni, and others continued and advanced the science. Later al-Ghazzālī, al-Rāzī, al-Ījī, and al-Jurjāni let their thought be formed by it. Eventually, however, it came to an intellectual standstill in stereotyped manuals for students. Its commanding position was not, of course, achieved at once. Its choice as an official system of the Seljuk sultanate and, later, of the Ottoman sultanate was doubtless instrumental toward that end. Still, it must be recognized that in the earlier period Ashʿarism had a powerful rival in the school of al-Maturidi of Samarqand. The basic impulses of the two schools seem to have been very similar and the differences between them relatively slight. Maturidism died out for reasons principally political. At any rate, by the 12th century the most potent challenges to Islamic theology were those emanating from outside the discipline, from the philosophers, notably Ibn Sīnā (AVICENNA), and from the Sufis.

Mysticism. Sufism (Arabic ṣūf, “wool”) is the name ascribed in general to the entire ascetical and mystical movement within Islam, as well as to its manifestations in the eremetical and regular religious life from the 8th century to the present. Questions concerning the origins of Sufism remain extremely difficult to solve, and there are still some matters on which scholarly opinion has differed with unusual sharpness. Louis Massignon sought to prove that the origins of Sufism lie wholly within the Islamic tradition of the Qurʾān and the sunnah, despite the surface facts that the Qurʾān says little that could be interpreted as a justification for the ascetic life as lived and loved by the Sufis and that the ḥadīth literature contains a number of explicit injunctions against it, for example: "There is to be no monasticism in Islam." Other scholars have adduced origins in the remnants of Christian asceticism within Islam after its conquests, in Zoroastrianism (see ZOROASTER [ZARATHUSHTRA]), and even in direct and indirect Hindu and Buddhist influences, although these scholars have fallen to quarreling among themselves. In any case, it cannot be denied that from the 8th century onward there was an increasingly influential movement, to be classified in the realm of popular religion, which produced more and more individuals willing to retire from the world in order to pursue an ascetic and contemplative life. That they may have done so partly in response to social and political instabilities and current theological controversies pales before the simple fact that they did so and, in doing so, greatly affected the course of Islamic intellectual history. The convention of periodizing the history of Sufism is largely the result of Sufi hagiography itself. Certainly there were early Muslim ascetics, many of them with Shī'ite leanings, who eventually grouped themselves together, were nourished by an esoteric reading of the Qur'ān and later by the writings of such mystics as al-Rabā'ah and al-Ḥallāj, and who, increasingly as the decades wore on, sought a communal life based on common conviction and intention.

Influence of Ghazzālī. From the ranks of the early Sufis came popular preachers and original thinkers who firmly founded Sufism and so disturbed the orthodox legal-theological institution of Islam that they were regarded not only as disruptive, but as bad Muslims. Into this situation was born, in the 11th century, Abū-Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī (see ALGAZEL [GHAZZĀLĪ, AL-]). Influenced by Sufism in his youth, he nevertheless turned to the traditional sciences and to philosophy in his education and brilliant academic career. This prize student of al-Juwayni soon became a leading professor in Baghdad. As suddenly as he turned against philosophy because of the works of Avicenna, which he refuted in a book entitled The Incoherence of Philosophy, he turned against the whole orthodox system and toward Sufism. He resigned his professorship at Baghdad and began a radical reconsideration of Islam that resulted in the nearest thing to a reformation that Islam has ever experienced. By combining and indeed harmonizing the Islam of the Qur'ān, the theologians, the legists, and the Sufis against the philosophers, he created, in his greatest work, The Revivification of Religious Sciences, a sensitive, well-structured, and comprehensive summa of Islamic religious thought. His achievements, like al-Ash'arī's, became an integral part of Islamic orthodoxy and transformed it by opening an entire new universe of thought. Through al-Ghazzālī's reforming efforts kalām gained a new vision and Sufism a new respectability. For many centuries philosophical, theological, and mystical writings in Islam bore the stamp of al-Ghazzālī's thought.

The directions and extent of the development of that thought cannot be said to have fulfilled the plan or spirit of al-Ghazzālī himself. The marriage of Sufism with kalām was intellectual rather than practical. In practice the two went their separate ways. Philosophy, as has been noted above, had always gone its separate way. As a result, there was never again to be such a unified system of Islam as al-Ghazzālī's, though each of the areas of thought mentioned deepened as a consequence of his system. Sufism, in particular, enjoyed an immense popularity during the succeeding centuries. As its theory continued to develop, however, a multiplicity of religious folk practices and heterodox notions were kneaded into it. The speculative aspects of later Sufism were combined in a new eclectic system by IBN 'ARABĪ of Murcia (d. Damascus, 1240), who turned the movement in a more pantheistic direction and toward closer circles of initiates. The loose mosque communities of early Sufism gave way to larger confraternities and finally to religious orders (see ISLAMIC CONFRATERNITIES). Elements of the monastic, the eremetical, and the mendicant states were combined in various proportions in these orders. Normally, however, a postulant came to a monastery, became a novice, led a communal life under the direction of a shaykh or pīr, whose position was either elective or hereditary. Later he might go out preaching or on to another community, but the characteristic ritual of dhikr and his manner of life readily identified him as a Sufi (Arabic faqīr, Persian darvīsh).

One of the greatest of the Sufi summarizers was Jalāl al-Dīn al-Rūmī, whose monumental Masnawī did more than other such compilations to inspire later Sufism and arrest its decline. Decline it did, however. The number of orders multiplied; observance was lax; and finally there was little left in the numerous popular lodges and clubs to suggest the grand origins of Sufism. Although Sufism still exists and is very influential on the modern frontiers of Islam, it enjoys nothing like its former glory.

Philosophy, too, responded to al-Ghazzālī's challenge. Al-Rāzī (RHAZES) speaking for himself, set the field on a more clearly rationalistic basis in vindication of Ibn Sīnā. It was in Muslim Spain, however, shrinking in the face of the Christian Reconquista, which had begun in the 11th century, that the last truly great philosophical work was done in Islam. There, in the Almohad court of Abū-Ya'qūb Yūsūf, Abū Bakr ibn Ṭufail wrote his Ḥayy ibn-Yaqqān, a philosophical romance owing a great deal both to Neoplatonic compendia and to Sufism. There, too, one of the greatest Islamic philosophers, Ibn Rushd (AVERROËS), received his training. Rising quite literally to al-Ghazzālī's challenge in his work The Incoherence of the Incoherence [of Philosophy], he rose to it even more profoundly and immortally in his series of commentaries upon the works of Aristotle, works that were very soon, in translation, to find a more appreciative audience in the new universities of Christian Europe and to influence very substantially the development of SCHOLASTICISM.

Islamic theology, on the other hand, grew more and more implacably hostile to what it regarded as the continuing innovations of Sufism and philosophy. As it did so, it strengthened its ties to the sharī'ah. In the work of Ibn-Taymīyah (1263–1328) the orthodox reaction was confidently and powerfully asserted in a return to fundamentalism. Thereafter, until modern times, the traditional disciplines and fundamental doctrines and principles of Islam engaged the energies of the orthodox thinkers completely. Though recent scholarship has discovered enough independent thought on the part of some Muslims to force a revision of the notion that the whole of the Ottoman period was one of intellectual sterility, it remains true that a basic unquestioning orthodoxy held the Islamic community fast together in a rigid system for centuries.

Modern Trends in Islam. The modern Muslim is true to these beliefs and practices and to this intellectual tradition, in his fashion. However thick may be the gloss of elements of "folk" Islam, the basic items in the creed and the Five Pillars are common, with only the slightest modifications, to all Muslims. In recent times there have been such stirrings within Islam, in response to various challenges from within and without, that the modern Muslim is by no means as fully complacent about the omniresponsive nature of his religion as his ancestors were. Few modern Muslims remain unaffected, in fact, by one or another of the more recent trends in Islam.

It is significant that the first impulse toward radical change in modern times came from Arabia. The low ebb to which Islam had sunk in the Arabian Peninsula by the 17th century, which apparently was virtually a return to primitive religion, gave rise to the movement called Wahhābism, founded by Muḥammad 'Abd-al-Wahhāb (1703–92), calling for a return to Islam's first principles and attacking laxity of morals and those innovations attributable, over the centuries, to Sufism and philosophy. It championed the severe Hanbalite legal code and the uncompromising interpretations of Ibn-Taymīyah. Having enjoyed the patronage of the Saudi tribal chieftains, whose descendants came to power over the entire peninsula after World War I, Wahhābism is now general within the kingdom of Saudi Arabia. It was followed by a daring vindication of al-Ghazzālī by a Yemenite scholar, Muḥammad al-Murtaḍā (d. 1790). The introduction of Arabic printing into Egypt in 1828 led to the wide dissemination of standard theological works and evoked new controversy and thought. In northwest Africa Ahmad al-Tijāni founded in 1781 a new Sufi order. Later a new type of reforming congregation was organized along Sufi lines by Aḥmad ibn-Idrīs (d. 1837), whose disciples went on to establish other congregations in Libya and East Africa. A more revolutionary group was that of the al-MAHDĪ (Muḥammad Aḥmad; 1844–85) in the Sudan.

All of these movements, true to the inherent identification of the two within Islam, had political as well as religious aspects and goals. After Napoleon's invasion of Egypt and the subjection of various portions of the Islamic world to non-Muslim colonial powers, the issues were sharpened. The differences separating Muslims were stressed, in an attempt to unite them under a caliphate in defense of Islam. Such a pan-Islamism was advocated by Jamāl-al-Dīn al-Afghāni (1839–97), who traveled widely throughout the eastern Islamic countries propagating his theories and influencing other movements. He inspired revolutions in Egypt and Iran and laid the basis for more recent popular movements combining Islamic fundamentalism with a political program. The uncompromising attitude of the Muslim Brotherhood, for example, retained many of al-Afghāni's ideas. A different movement, a syncretism not unlike or unrelated to Unitarianism and the Ramakrishna mission in Hinduism, led the Bābis and Bahais out of Islam completely (see BABISM; BAHĀ'ISM). An apostolic group of a related tenor, called the AḤMADIYYAH, is viewed with considerable suspicion by both Sunnite and Shī'ite Muslims.

One of al-Afghāni's disciples, the Egyptian shaykh Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905), instituted a more interesting though ultimately less influential line of thought by separating the political from the religious side of the question. 'Abduh was the first great Islamic modernist, a man of enormous ability who attempted to reformulate Islamic doctrine in the light of advances, especially in the sciences, achieved in the West, confident that his efforts would only confirm the truth of Islam. The scene of his work was al-Azhar in Cairo, and it was published in the traditional form of a commentary on the Qur'ān. As carried on by his pupil Rashīd Ridā (1865–1935), however, the attempt came some way back toward Ibn-Taymīyah and a new doctrinal rigidity. More successful, perhaps, was the effort of the Indian Muslim Muḥammad Iqbāl (1876–1938), whose attempts at harmonizing Islam with the thought of Western writers on philosophy and mysticism, in his poetry and a prose work entitled The Recon- struction of Religious Thought in Islam, closely resemble that of al-Ghazzālī.

The role of Islam in recent history has been such as to mingle and cloud such elements. Modernization, in particular industrialization, has started in the Muslim world with such force and momentum that nothing could possibly remove its effects or call a halt to it. Basic religious and social institutions are changing. Increased mobility, opportunities for livelihood, education, and political responsibility have accelerated the process. What further forms Islam's response to them might take is unclear. Certainly the secularism of Turkey and some of the Arab countries has not met with wide acceptance, but there is still little clarification of issues among modern Muslims. Israel's expansion beyond its 1948 borders resulted in an Islamic "revival," with many Muslim Palestinians returning to traditional religious practices. Various "radical" groups in the Middle East and elsewhere that have advocated violence as a legitimate means of overthrowing illegitimate political leaders, or subverting an undesirable social order, have a strong religious rhetoric. Especially since the fall of the Berlin Wall, certain elements in the Islamic world have increasingly seen the West, especially the United States, as a threat to Islamic society and traditional values. It remains to be seen how the relationship between Islam and the West, and Islam and Christianity will be negotiated in the 21st century.

Bibliography: D. B. MACDONALD, The Development of Muslim Theology, Jurisprudence and Constitutional Theory (New York 1903). T. W. ARNOLD and A. GUILLAUME, eds., The Legacy of Islam (Oxford 1931). A. GUILLAUME, Islam (Baltimore 1954). A. J. WENSINCK, The Muslim Creed (New York 1932). J. W. SWEETMAN, Islam and Christian Theology (London 1945). H. A. R. GIBB, Modern Trends in Islam (Chicago 1947). H. A. R. GIBB and J. H. KRAMERS, eds., The Shorter Encyclopedia of Islam (Leiden 1953). W. C. SMITH, Islam in Modern History (Princeton 1957). J. KRITZECK and R. B. WINDER, eds., The World of Islam (New York 1960). J. A. WILLIAMS, Islam (New York 1961). J. BURTON, The Collection of the Quran (Cambridge 1977). J. VAN ESS, Theologie und Gesellschaft im 2. und 3. Jahrhundert Hidschra. Eine Geschichte des religiösen Denkens imfrühen Islam, 6 v. (Berlin, New York 1991–97). W. A. GRAHAM, Beyond the Written Word: Oral Aspects of Scripture in the History of Religion (New York 1989). G. R. HAWTING, The Idea of Idolatry and the Emergence of Islam: From Polemic to History (Cambridge 1999). J. HOROVITZ, Koranische Untersuchungen (Berlin, Leipzig 1926). T. NOLDEKE, Geschichte des Qorans, new ed. by F. SCHWALLY, G. BERGSTRASSER, and O. PRETZL, 3 v. (Leipzig 1909–38). R. PARET, Der Koran. Übersetzung (Stuttgart 1962). A. RIPPIN, ed., Approaches to the History of the Interpretation of the Quran (Oxford 1988).

[J. KRITZECK/C. WILDE]

ISLAMIC ART

Islam, among the world's major religions, is usually thought to have avoided significant aesthetic expressions of its major spiritual tenets. One will not find in Islamic art the artistic equivalents of Gothic cathedrals with their sophisticated reflection of Thomist thought, of Byzantine icons with their spiritual effectiveness, or of Buddhist sculptures with their involved iconographic programs and their pietistic quietness. And yet the artistic creation of Islamic civilization could not, any more than the creation of any culture, escape the needs and ideals of its faith. In this context of the relationship of the faith of ISLAM to Islamic art a brief presentation will be made here of the monuments that were erected between the 7th and the 17th centuries in the vast area that stretches from the Atlantic Ocean to the Gulf of Bengal. Since it will not be possible to mention either all monuments or all problems, this article will concentrate on three topics: it will first define the features of the faith that had a direct influence on the arts, then proceed to explain the major elements of Islamic religious architecture, and finally show that the faith had an influence on representational and decorative arts as well.

The Faith of Islam and Art. There is, first of all, one major area in which the faith of Islam requires some sort of monumental expression. This is the MOSQUE, from Arabic masjid, "a place to prostrate one's self [in front of God]," as in prayer. In a strict sense, the individual act of prayer, the main purely religious obligation of the Muslim, could be accomplished any place. But Islam is also a communitarian social order and, at least once a week, prayer is meant to be a congregational experience as well as a private one: "O ye who believe, when the call is heard for the Friday prayer, haste unto remembrance of God and leave your trading" (Qur'an 62.9). In the early years of the Muslim community the private house of the Prophet in MEDINA (a simple courtyard with rows of columns on its southern and northern sides and private rooms to the east) became almost accidentally the place of gathering of the small band of faithful, and it was only later that it acquired the sacred value of being the first mosque. As the Muslim world grew and conquered, the mosque maintained its function as the place where the community assembled, learned, fulfilled some of its financial obligations, and proclaimed its allegiance to temporal rulers.

Liturgy and the Mosque. The mosque, in short, meant to serve all activities of the community, thereby emphasizing the key Muslim point of the inseparability of social order from allegiance to certain beliefs. Its main physical requirement was space, as large a space as would accommodate the body of believers available in any one community. From the very beginning it acquired three further needs: an orientation (the qiblah), since prayer is to be directed toward MECCA, the first and unique sanctuary of God; a device for calling the faithful, eventually to become, in most instances, the tall tower known as the minaret; and a place of honor for the IMĀM, or leader of prayer, usually the head of the Muslim community or his representative; it was a sort of throne, known as the minbar, and it is only little by little that it has become the multisteped structure found today in most mosques. Some place for ablutions must have been available, but it played no known part in early architecture. In the 7th and 8th centuries two other features were added: the mihrab (a concave niche in the back of the mosque, usually supposed to indicate the direction of prayer, but more likely to have been originally a memorial to the place where the Prophet stood when leading prayers); and, in some mosques only, a maqsūrah, a screen identifying the place of the prince. Space commensurate to the population, plus orientation, minaret, minbar, mihrab, and, secondarily, a place for ablutions and a maqsūrah were then the major features that, to speak liturgically, identified the purposes and requirements of the main Islamic religious building and the only ones needed almost at the very beginning of the new faith.

Islam and Images. The second area of Islam's impact on the arts concerns the representational arts. It is usually assumed that, from the very beginning, Islam asserted its opposition to any kind of representation of living forms. This is simply not so, and the whole problem can best be understood if put into its proper historical context. In 7th century Arabia, images of any kind played a very minor part in the life and culture of either nomads or city dwellers. In the Qur'ān there is no statement opposing or justifying images. The only references, in fact, to any kind of representation are either to prohibited idols (e.g., 6.75) or to one case of a miracle attributed to Jesus (3.49). However, two basic thoughts run throughout the Qur'ān: the absolute opposition to idolatry, and the total power of a single God (for instance, 39.62–63 or the celebrated passage, 2.255). After the conquest of Christian and other lands, Muslims with these ideas encountered a world in which holy images played a considerable part and in which the great crisis of iconoclasm and of the place of holy images within the faith was already brewing (to explode a century later). The Muslims clearly interpreted Christian, and later Buddhist, views on images as idolatry and as challenges to God's exclusive power; and since their lack of artistic background did not permit them to develop alternate ideas, they little by little formulated a theory of opposition to images in general because of the character of images in the 7th and 8th centuries in Christianity. In its extreme and absolute form, this antagonism was limited to religious circles only and there were several degrees of it, the most moderate of which merely prohibited the representation of God. But the general mood of orthodox Islam remained throughout one of reluctance to deal with images for fear of their magical powers and, as a result, Muslim secular art tended to be most inventive in the formation of a characteristically Islamic imagery.

Sculptured colonette of the Qutab Minar. (©Arthur Théuerart/CORBIS)

Architectural Development of the Mosque. The first four or five centuries of Islamic history were characterized by the creation in every Muslim city of large congregational mosques.

Regional Styles. Their type varied from province to province according to local circumstances and architectural traditions. In Syria the mosque of Damascus used the ancient Roman temple area and classical or Byzantine columns for an original composition of a courtyard surrounded by porticoes, with a three-aisled portico indicating the direction of prayer. In Iraq, Egypt, and the Muslim West the same basic plan was modified by the transformation of the qiblah area into a vast hypostyle hall of columns or piers. The most superb remaining instance of this type is the mosque of CORDOBA, where the double tier of arches introduced a particularly original solution to the problem of light in a large hall (see Umayyads). A different solution was eventually found in Iran, where there had not been a major columnar tradition. The solution, as seen in Isfahan, was to keep the courtyard but to surround it with a screen of high vaults and arcades behind which vaults and domes covered variable interior arrangements. After the conquest of Constantinople in 1453, a highly original, centrally planned mosque evolved from the indigenous Christian tradition. In all instances the most significant feature was that local and extremely diverse architectural techniques were modified into new compositions, which succeeded in providing the main need of the Islamic mosque: large space. In almost all instances the court framed by covered halls remained as a constant memory of the Prophet's house in Medina.

Islamic Ceramic with the tomb of Muḥammad. (©Archive Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Mosque and Palace. While the single large mosque remained for centuries the characteristic example of religious architecture in Islam, it was not the only one, and it underwent many internal changes. The history and significance of other architectural types as well as of changes within the mosque are complex matters, whose details are often still improperly investigated; only two points of wider interest will be considered here. The first is that the architecture of the mosque was constantly influenced by the architecture of the palace, about which, unfortunately, very little is known, except in the palaces of the first two Muslim centuries and in the Alhambra, at Granada, of the 14th Christian century. Yet it seems clear that the slow development in mosque architecture of wide central naves, of domes in front of mīhrabs, and of outer monumental gates was a direct result of the taste created by princes in their palaces.

Special-Purpose Mosques; Endowed Institutions. The other change that occurred within Islamic religious architecture is perhaps of greater interest to the study of religious architectures in general. Although none of its basic tenets were modified, Islam as a whole changed considerably over the centuries. As its cities grew and its social order became more complex, the religious institution also developed in intricacy. Large congregational mosques still fulfilled their purpose as the main magnets of a city's life, but the very rich or groups of people tied together by a variety of bonds (guilds, tribal or family allegiances, city quarters) began to prefer to worship in smaller, less crowded surroundings. Many smaller mosques were therefore created, often on the same plans as the large ones but more intimate in character, like small havens of peace in the crowded and turbulent cities.

Another phenomenon of medieval Islam was the growth of heresies; to counter them the various orthodox princes instituted from the 11th century on a sort of educational institution, the madrasah, where principles of orthodox theology and jurisprudence were taught. Several types existed, but at its most monumental, as in the case of the madrasah of Sultan Hassan in Cairo (14th century), it had a large central court with several vaulted halls opening on it and quarters for students between these large halls. The tomb of the founder was often added to the composition.

Related to the madrasah were the ribat and the khanqah, institutions of uncertain origins that were the Muslim equivalents of the monastic orders of Christianity. All these institutions, to which must be added the more purely philanthropic hospitals, were usually founded by princes or wealthy merchants, who endowed them by developing business enterprises, hostleries, baths, warehouses, and bazaars, whose revenues were exclusively earmarked for holy institutions and therefore inalienable. Thus from about 1100 the whole Muslim world became literally covered with a large number of closely related philanthropic, religious, and business enterprises, whose remains can still be found in Cairo or Aleppo or Jerusalem. All of them received a monumentality commensurate with the wealth and prestige of the endowers; and all of them tended to use approximately the same basic forms: high gates, open courts, long vaulted halls, domed tomb chambers. Although comparable institutions existed in other systems of faith as well, it is peculiar to Islam that, quite early in the Middle Ages, they were all executed in monumental form.

Memorial Edifices. A phenomenon related to the preceding one is that of the monumental mausoleum. Early Islam was quite opposed to any form of visible commemoration of the dead. The earliest known memorial building, the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem, did not acquire its precise memorial quality of a monument to the Ascension of the Prophet until later. But in the 10th century two separate movements became strong enough to initiate a complete reversal of earlier practices. One was purely secular and involved attempts by princes to proclaim their glory or that of their dynasties beyond death. The other was religious; the main Muslim heterodoxy, Shi'ism (see SHĪ'ITES), laid particular stress on the descendants of the Prophet and appealed to emotional and personal aspects of early Islamic history rather than to the strict and rather dry legalism of orthodoxy. This was often achieved by building up the sacred martyria to 'Alī, Husayn, and other descendants of the Prophet. As an answer to this development, the orthodox began to develop cults of holy men, from ancient Hebrew Prophets to contemporary heroes. Mystical orders also worshipped by the tombs of their founders. Thus the Muslim world became covered with mausoleums, from humble ones dedicated to obscure saints to the magically secular Taj Mahal. Their shapes varied considerably, but almost all of them were variants on the traditional classical mausoleum, i.e., the central plan, circle, square, polygon, always covered with a dome. These domes became characteristic focal points for popular piety or mere illustrations of princely vanity. As monuments of architecture such buildings as those of the Cairo cemeteries, of the Shah Sindh in Samarkand, and of Agra in India are among the most impressive creations of Islamic art and, together with the congregational mosques and the monuments of philanthropy, best identify the various facets of Muslim religious feeling.

Architecture and Decoration. It would not be proper to omit, in a discussion of Islamic architecture, those elements of construction or decoration that have given it its originality. From Spain to India, vaults and domes were the characteristic parts of construction on which most effort was exercised. The problem was to build high domes and vaults that would still manage to create wide interior spaces and to give light. Although solutions were numerous, it is in Ottoman architecture in Turkey that the most superb engineering effects were achieved, while Spain and Iran provided the most impressively original effects, in which decoration—stucco compositions of various three-dimensional shapes known as muqarnas or stalactites, and colored tiles—played a notable part. And, in a sense, the ultimate quality of Islamic architecture resides in the stunning fashion in which a wide variety of decorative devices tending to cover the totality of the wall struck a generally successful balance with more properly architectural values of mass and spaces. Neither the specific aesthetic characteristics of these developments nor their historical contexts have yet been sufficiently studied to hazard a judgment on the causes of this phenomenon. And yet, as one contemplates the brilliant domes and minarets of Isfahan or the intensely logical mosques of Istanbul or the rich and solid monuments of Cairo, they express varying aspects of the Muslim faith: its order, its total involvement of all human activities, and the colorful poetry of its emotional fringes.

Thirteenth-century Islamic Candlestick. (©Archive Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Decorative and Pictorial Art. The main emphasis of this article has been architecture, because in this, quite clearly, an art was created that was closely bound to the Islamic faith. But this is not to say that the faith of Islam did not affect, positively or negatively, other aspects of artistic creation. Three points of particular significance are here considered.

First, there is no doubt that the great development of calligraphy was related to Muslim veneration of the holy text of the Qur'ān. Qur'ānic passages served the purpose of images in Christian art in identifying and explaining the purpose of monuments. But the importance of this veneration of writing went much beyond this simple level. The smallest object or the largest building acquired a decoration of letters, words, or quotations and formulas that gave them quality. It is for this reason that the calligrapher became the artist par excellence, so that even today his product is prized much above that of any other creator. It is curious to note that the first purely Islamic development of a new artistic form, that of a magnificent ceramic in the 9th century in eastern Iran, uses beautiful writing as its most characteristic decorative effect, although the content of the inscriptions is only remotely connected with the faith as such.

The Dome of the Rock, Jerusalem. (©Christine Osborne/CORBIS)

A second impact of the faith is perhaps more debatable but should be mentioned because it has often been discussed. It has always been agreed that some of the most typical values of Islamic art were decorative. One of the peculiarities of this decoration was that it usually abandoned natural elements and, instead, broke up visible forms and recombined them according to new and different abstract patterns. It has been suggested that this characteristic derived from an attempt to reflect the Muslim theological position that creation is a continuous divine miracle, whose individual elements are not automatically in the same relationship to each other. The artist, in other words, felt free to recombine the atoms of the universe and to create new and unknown shapes.

Finally, while it is clear that the main source of inspiration of Islamic painting—in books or on ceramics—was secular, certain peculiarities of iconography and style may be related to the mystical ideas of late medieval Islam. Thus, for instance, it can be argued that the tendency of Persian painters after the 14th century to create artificial settings in which man and nature seem to blend in superb masses of color reflected the pantheistic tendencies of some mystical groups that saw all things as equal symbols of the divine. It has also been argued that many images, especially those of love, had in fact a possible esoteric meaning, since love, like banqueting or drinking, particularly favorite subjects for representations, could be interpreted symbolically as well as literally.

Taj Mahal, Agra, India. (Archive Photos)

All these points still deserve considerable investigation, and it would be hazardous to accept them entirely at face value. They would, however, illustrate a fact of importance: beneath its superficial veneer of glamour and brilliance, Islamic art did try to reflect the more profound aspects of the faith of Islam. It was hampered, no doubt, by the fact that official orthodoxy was reluctant to rely on artistic creation for the expression of its beliefs; but the faith played too important a part in the lives of men not to have influenced their arts.

Bibliography: K. A. C. CRESWELL, Early Muslim Architecture, 2 v. (Oxford 1932–41); A Short Account of Early Muslim Architecture (Baltimore 1958); Muslim Architecture of Egypt, 2 v. (Oxford 1952–59). A. U. POPE and P. ACKERMAN, eds., A Survey of Persian Art, 7 v. (New York 1939), uneven. B. GRAY Persian Painting (New York 1961). R. ETTINGHAUSEN, Arab Painting (New York 1962). Articles in Ars Islamica and Ars Orientalis. For relations between art and faith see L. MASSIGNON, “Les Méthodes de réalisation artistique des peuples de l’Islam,” Syria 2: 47–53 and B. FARÈS, Essai sur l’esprit de la décoration islamique (Cairo 1952). R. H. PINDERWILSON, ed., Studies in Islamic Art (London 1985). O. GRABAR, The Formation of Islamic Art (New Haven, CT 1987). A. KHATIBI and M. SIJELMASSI, The Splendor of Islamic Calligraphy (New York 1996). K. OTTO-DORN, The Art and Architecture of the Islamic World (Berkeley 1996). R. IRWIN, Islamic Art in Context: Art, Architecture, and the Literary World (New York 1997). R. HILLENBRAND, Islamic Art and Architecture (New York 1999). J. BLOOM,

Early Islamic Art and Architecture (Burlington, VT 2000). O. GRABAR and C. ROBINSON, Islamic Art and Arabic Literature: Textuality and Visuality in the Islamic World (Princeton NJ 2000). R. ETTINGHAUSEN, O. GRABAR and M. JENKINS, The Art and Architecture of Islam 650–1250 (New Haven, CT 2001). Y. TABBAA, The Transformation of Islamic Art during the Sunni Revival (Seattle 2001).

[O. GRABAR]

ISLAMIC CONFRATERNITIES

Islamic organizations that have some similarities with religious orders in Christianity. Since the 12th century more than 30 such Muslim confraternities, often with widespread influence, have risen and fallen in ISLAM, from the Qādiri fraternal order, named after a Persian mystic, ‘Abd-al-Qādir al-Jīlāni, who died in Baghdad in 1166, to the Sanūsi order, founded in 1837 by an Algerian warrior shaykh, al-Sanūsi. Members of these confraternities are commonly known as DERSHES. Normally an applicant or novice (murīd) enters upon an initial stage (‘ahd, covenant), passes through a course of instruction and discipline (tarīqah, path), and is then advanced into various stations (maqāmāt) of the spiritual life.

Practices and Beliefs. In these the fraternal orders differ widely. The members of an early and still popular one, al-Rifā'i, named after an Iraqi mystic Ahmad al-Rifā'i (d. 1183), are commonly known as howling dervishes. They are distinguished by ability to perform strange feats, such as swallowing live coals and glass, holding red-hot irons, or passing knives through their bodies. Another fraternal order, al-Mawlawi, founded by a Persian, Jalāl al-Dīn al-Rūmi (d. 1273 in Qūniyah, Konia), is commonly known as the whirling dervishes, because of the movements they practice to stimulate ecstasy. Their ritual includes music—frowned on by Islam—and monotonous chants, with a slow whirling circular movement while the arms are extended and eyes closed. The dance ends in the fall of one after the other of the exhausted participants.

All orders join in a common ritual, dhikr ("remembering," mentioning God's name, Qur'ān 33.41), which constitutes the main devotional exercise in the fraternities' quarters. The worshipers sit on the floor with legs folded in the Oriental pattern, turn their faces toward Mecca, close their eyes, and repeat the word Allah or such formulas as lā ilāha illa Hū (no God but He), while moving their heads from right to left. The dhikr is the only elaborate ritual in Islam.

The dervish orders' quarters (takīyah, zāwīyah) are often called monasteries but in their social and educational functions they correspond more nearly to Protestant places of worship. In fact the corporate bodies behind them may be said to have assumed the position of the separate church organizations in Protestant Christendom. In addition to the few regular members, cloistered or wandering, the orders have numerous laymen attached to them. These continue to live in the world, observe daily prayers, and occasionally attend the dhikr ceremony. They are comparable to Franciscan and Dominican tertiaries. In pre-Kemalist Turkey most men had some such affiliation with one order or another. The most popular and influential of these was the Bektāshi, dating from the early 16th century and once connected with the redoubtable Janissaries. Bektāshis share excessive SHĪ'ITE reverence for 'ALĪ ('ALĪ IBN ABĪ TĀLIB) and manifest Christian theological influence. A Bektāshi branch, termed Qalandari, enjoins a life of unceasing wandering. Another dervish order called Khalwīyah (seclusion practitioners) requires of all members a stated period of retreat, with fasting to the utmost capacity of the individual and continuous repetition of religious formulas.

Position within Islam. It is clear from the above that dervish fraternities have developed practices in violation of the spirit and letter of Islam. A tradition ascribes to Muḥammad the saying, "No rahbānīyah (monasticism) in Islam." Šūfī orders, as a rule, exalt their respective founders and surround them with halos of sanctity. (See ŠŪFĪSM.) Miracles (karāmāt) are often ascribed even to the successive superiors. This power was denied Muḥammad himself in the Qur'ān. Despite orthodox Islam's disapproval, orders have always flourished. They seemed to fill the gap between the finite worshiper and the infinite worshiped. The great theologian ALGAZEL (Ghazzālī, al-, d. 1111), who himself practiced for a time Šūfīn wandering in quest of spiritual satisfaction, contributed to making mysticism palatable. But those extremists who ended in pantheism or antinomianism were accorded no toleration. A Persian mystic, al-Hallāj, who went so far as to declare, "I am the Truth," was in 922 flogged, exposed on a gibbet, decapitated, and burned by an 'Abbāsīd inquisition. To the Šūfīs al-Hallāj became the first great martyr.

Besides introducing a form of monasticism and a ritual, dervish orders have contributed and popularized the cult of saints. Their sainthood did not preclude women. Female hagiology is headed by Rābi'ah al-'Adawīyah (d. 801) of Bašra, who lived a life of celibacy, asceticism, and otherworldliness, instructing and guiding disciples in the "mystic way." When the Prophet appeared in a dream and asked her whether she loved him, her reply was: "My love of God has so possessed me that no place remains for hating ought or loving any save Him." Dervishes were evidently also responsible for introducing, or at least diffusing, the rosary beads (subḥah) as an instrument of Muslim devotion. They borrowed them from Eastern Christians, who had received them from Hindu sources. Only the austere WAHHĀBIS today reject the beads, as they do the cult of saints.

A fundamental difference between Šūfī and Christian monastic organizations stems from the fact that Islam, according to the learned system, is a lay religion, with no centralized authority, no hierarchy, no sacraments, no apostolic succession. This fact accounts for the self-development of the dervish orders, each in its own way, ending in a state bordering on chaos. It makes of the ulema, especially among the Sunnites, nothing but men learned in theology and canon law.

Bibliography: R. A. NICHOLSON, Studies in Islamic Mysticism (Cambridge, Eng. 1921). M. SMITH, comp., Readings from the Mystics of Islām (London 1950). D. B. MACDONALD, Development of Muslim Theology, Jurisprudence and Constitutional Theory (New York 1903). H. LAMMENS, Islām: Beliefs and Institutions, tr. E. D. ROSS (London 1929), ch. 6. C. H. A. FIELD, Mystics and Saints of Islam (London 1910). A. J. ARBERRY, Šūfīsm: An Account of the Mystics of Islam (New York 1952).

[P.K. HITT/EDS.]

ISLAMIC LAW

Islamic law is designated in Arabic by the term sharī'a, the original sense of which is a place resorted to for drinking, and by extension, a way of conduct leading to eternal life. ISLAM is a lay theocracy. God is head of the Islamic community. God alone legislates, and His will is carried out by the community of believers. The law is what God has made known to the community of believers through revelation to the Prophets (among whom are Moses and Jesus), the last of whom is MUHAMMAD, “seal of the Prophets.” The prophets are the obedient instruments of the revelation, passing it on intact to the believing community. In its broadest sense, the law encompasses articles of belief, regulating man’s relation to God (religion), as well as rights and obligations regulating man’s relation to his fellow man (law). Thus religion and law, in the modern sense of the words, are found included, though distinct one from the other, under God’s law.

Foundations of the Law. The law is found in scripture and tradition; i.e., in the QUR’ĀN, which is the sacred book of Islam, and in the Tradition of the Prophet Muḥammad. God’s revelation ceased with the death of the Prophet. The Qur’ān was soon thereafter committed to writing and the traditions were codified. The science of jurisprudence (fiqh) came into being, including the auxiliary sciences of the Qur’ān and of tradition.

A Muslim submits to the law as a precept of faith (the literal meaning of Islām is “submission”); in so doing he fulfills his duty toward God. He also obeys the law as a social duty imposed by God, and in so doing he fulfills his duty toward man. Disobedience to the law is a sin committed against God, not only an infringement of the legal order.

While the Qur’ān contains the stories of many biblical prophets, Islam considers both Judaism and Christianity as suffering from their followers’ having tampered with the divine revelations they received through the Prophets. The purest form of the divine revelation is to be found in its last manifestation through Muḥammad. God’s creation is to be enjoyed by man, whose weakness is taken into consideration by the law. Man is not to be burdened beyond his capacity. The fundamental rule of law is liberty (al-aṣl fī ’lumūr al-ibāḥa).

Liberty is the starting point of the law. This is illustrated by the five categories under which the actions and omissions of men are classified: (1) obligatory, (2) recommended, (3) permissible, (4) disapproved, (5) forbidden. Between the absolutes of obligatory and forbidden, there are three categories under which actions and omissions may be classified in order to lessen the rigor of the law. All of the schools of law agree as to the definition of each of these categories but differ greatly as to the classification of actions and omissions therein. The tendency, however, of the four orthodox schools of law which have survived to the present day is to make frequent use of the three intermediate categories. The Zāhirite school, no longer in existence, gave more leeway to the absolutes, going against the spirit of the law. But liberty cannot be absolute, lest it destroy itself. So the function of the law is to set limits on this liberty so as to guide it towards the benefit of the individual and society. Good and evil are defined by the law, that is, by God. It is divine voluntarism that characterizes Islamic law; there is no question of natural law as a “supreme reason existing in God,” inscribed in the very nature of things. In Islam, there is no question of positive law subordinating itself to divine law and respecting its dictates; they are both the same: Islamic positive law is a divine positive law.

Sources of the Law. To scripture and tradition, the doctors of the law add two more sources: the consensus of the community (ijmā’) and the analogical method (qiyās); this was called for by the developing needs of the community as it expanded after the great conquests following the death of Muḥammad.

The Qur’ān is believed to be the uncreated word of God as it was literally revealed to Muḥammad in MECCA and MEDINA, the two holy cities of Islam. It is the most important single document for the study of Islam, not only in the fields of religion and law, but also in those of language and literature. The Sunna of the Prophet Muḥammad are his words, actions and tacit approval retained in the memory of his companions and later fixed in writing. The vehicle of the Sunna is the ḥadīth (tradition), which is composed of two parts: (1) a chain of transmission (isnād) containing the names of persons who transmitted the text of the tradition and upon whom rests its authenticity, and (2) the text (matn) itself, usually a terse statement. [See ISLAMIC TRADITIONS (HADITH)]. The importance of the Sunna gave rise to the science of tradition (transmission of traditions, their falsification, criticism, codification, and commentaries). The authority of the consensus (ijmā’) of the community of believers is based on the Qur’ān (4:115; 2:137; 3:98; 4:85); and it in turn guarantees the authenticity of the other sources.

The consensus, like the Sunna, appears under three forms: word, action, and tacit approval. This source is an extremely important one in the history of jurisprudence. It made possible the adoption and the elimination, as the need arose, of many elements of various provenance (Greek, Roman, Jewish, Persian, and Arab) in Islamic law. The fourth source, analogy, differs from the three cited above in that, unlike them, it is not in any way infallible. This source gave rise to bitter struggles in the Islamic community before it became adopted. The one school of law that failed to adopt it, the Zāhirite school, ceased to exist as a juridical school in the Middle Ages. Other schools, characterized by staunch traditionalism, accept the analogical method in the legal realm, but oppose this rational element in theology on the basis that the Sacred Book does not omit anything that must be known for salvation. Besides these four principal sources of the law, juridical methodology has recourse to subsidiary principles as developed by the various schools of law.

Science of Jurisprudence. Knowledge of scripture and tradition, highly desirable in itself, was not sufficient in order to arrive at a knowledge of the law. The law was not plainly written in the sacred texts, but had to be arrived at by painstaking study. This gave rise to the science of jurisprudence (fiqh) and to the science of the principles of jurisprudence (uṣūl al-fiqh).

The principal figure in the development of the law was the jurisconsult or interpreter of the law (faqīh). The study of the law became the most respected of all endeavors, assuming a position commensurate with its object: it enabled the community to fulfill the divine precept (Qur'ān 3:106) that it "promote the good and repress evil." Endowed chairs in the colleges (madrassa) in the 11th century were given to professors of jurisprudence (mudarris) and scholarships, including room and board, were given to students of the law (mutafaqqiha). Fiqh had first developed in close connection with the study of the Qur'ān and tradition; by now, it had become an independent study, the pursuit of which led to important official positions in the state. There being no clergy in Islam, the jurisconsult took on the highly important position of minister and interpreter of the law. By exerting himself to the utmost degree (ijtihād) to arrive at a legal decision in a case or concerning a rule of law, he was considered to be a mujtahid, capable of making his own decisions, as opposed to a muqallid who practiced taqlīd, that is, the imitation or following of the decision of another.

Not all jurisconsults were capable of the same degree of ijtihād, and they were ranked accordingly. As for the layman, he was understandably an "imitator." For the solution of a legal problem or a clarification of some point of law, anyone could approach a jurisconsult for a legal opinion, or fatwā, and the jurisconsult acting in this capacity is referred to as a muftī. Many of these legal opinions were collected and published under the designation of Fatāwā (pl. of fatwā). These legal sources contain a mine of information on the actual social, political, and religious life of their respective periods, for they dealt with questions that arose out of the need of the times, rather than with theoretical problems.

Law Books and Modern Practice. In time there came into being an extremely rich literature in the field of law, the Islamic science par excellence. The flourishing of this literature took place under the 'ABBĀSIDS (750–1258). Soon books on the law became standardized as to their content. These works are divided into two parts: the first dealing with ritual duties, i.e., the believer's relations with God; and the second, with prescriptions concerning the believer's relations with his fellow man. The ritual duties are five in number: ritual purity, prayer, alms, fasting, and pilgrimage. These are called the "pillars of faith." The other parts of the book include prescriptions concerning marriage, inheritance, contracts, and public and penal law.

In modern times, however, Islamic law is no longer operative in all of these fields in many Islamic countries. Its influence is limited to the spheres of dogma and ritual, and to the field of law concerning personal status, in the life of the Muslim family as well as in the relation of Muslims with non-Muslims (see DHIMMI). Certain Islamic states have adopted European civil codes, now operative side by side with Islamic law, each in its own sphere of action; but there have also been extreme solutions attempted. On the one hand, Turkey has abolished the caliphate and the whole notion of the Muslim community. On the other, Saudi Arabia under the WAHHĀBIS has maintained Islamic law as the only law of the land. The moderate solution between these two extremes has been to adopt Western-inspired or Western-derived codes of law except in matters of personal status. It was in Egypt that the modernist movement (Salafīya) took place, which advocated the maintenance of the supremacy of Islamic law, but urged a new era of interpretation (ijtihād) capable of meeting the changing needs of the community. This movement drew its inspiration from the Ḥanbalite school of law, especially from its foremost representative Ibn Taimīya (d. 1328).

By the end of the third century after the HĪJRA (9th century) several schools of law had developed, of which four orthodox schools remain to this day. They are named after their founders as follows: the Ḥanafite school (named after Abū Ḥanīfa, d. 767), the Mālikite (Mālik, d. 795), the Shāfi'ite (Shāfi'ī, d. 820) and the Ḥanbalite (Ibn Ḥanbal, d. 855). All these schools (which are neither sects nor rites) are orthodox (SUNNITES) distinguishing themselves from the sectarian SHĪ'ITES, whom they consider to be heterodox. They represent 90 percent of Islam (as against 9 percent for the Shī'ite and one percent for the Khārijites, other heterodox sects whose origins date from a few decades after the death of Muḥammad).

Their geographical distribution is as follows: (1) Ḥanafites: Tatarstan, North Caucasus and Daghestan, Georgia and Kinghizia, China (Gansu, Kunming), India, Afghanistan, Turkey, Iraq, Syria, Jordan, Egypt, Libya, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Albania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Romania; (2) Mālikites: Saudi Arabia, Oman, and Qatar, Iraq, Syria, Algeria, Tunisia, Morocco, Libya, Sudan, Togo, Chad, and Ethiopia; (3) Shāfi'ites: Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Azerbaijan, China (Xinjiang), Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand, Pakistan, India, Turkey, Iraq, Syria, Jordan, Chad, Madagascar, Tanzania, Somalia, Ethiopia; (4) Ḥanbalites: Saudi Arabia, Oman, Trucial Oman, Iraq, Jordan, and Egypt.

Bibliography: D. SANTILLANA, Istituzioni di diritto Musulmano Malikita, 2 v. (Rome 1926–33) 1:1–119; “Law and Society,” in The Legacy of Islam, ed. T. W. ARNOLD (Oxford 1931). H. LAOUST, Essai sur les doctrines sociales et politiques de Takī-d-Dīn Aḥad b. Taimīya (Cairo 1939). J. SCHACHT, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence (Oxford 1950). L. MASSIGNON, ed., Annuaire du monde Musulman (Paris 1955). J. N. D. ANDERSON, Islamic Law in the Modern World (New York 1959), and the bibliographies cited in these works.

[G. MAKDISI/EDS.]

ISLAMIC TRADITIONS (ḤADĪTH)

Ḥadīth, the general term for news or narrative, has a technical religious meaning for Muslims, usually rendered by “tradition.” More accurately it signifies either an account of a saying or action of Muḥammad or his early companions handed down by a chain of competent relators, or the total collection of these narrations found in the six canonical books of the Sunni Orthodox (see SUNNITES). The relation and criticism of these traditions is called 'ilm 'an-hadith (the science of tradition).

Nature and Importance. These traditions, containing legal, ritual, religious, or moral matter, are cast in a particular form comprising a chain of relators ideally extending back unbroken to the Prophet Muḥammad and referred to as the isnād (support); the content of the tradition is called the matn (text).

The normative value of hadith for the Muslim is derived from the fact that it contains, though not exclusively, the sunna (practice) of the Prophet. In pre-Islamic Arabia the sunna of the ancestors set the pattern for society. Muḥammad, breaking from the tradition, established a new sunna. But in the early development of ISLAM the sunna followed was that of the community comprising the teaching and prescriptions of Muḥammad along with local customs and adaptations.

Given the basic Muslim outlook that man's incapacity requires revelations through the prophets, it was natural that religious logic should halt this rather free development of Muslim society and recast it on a religious base. This attitude appeared in two forms and gave rise to a wealth of traditions attributed to the Prophet and his companions. First, the pious opposition to the Umayy-

YADS (661–750) based its objections on the practice of the early community. This in turn prompted some traditions in support of the ruling faction and others justifying a middle position. Secondly, the divergences in the schools of law in Iraq, Syria, and Medina, stemming from local customs and personal opinions, caused some friction. Medina, as the center of Muḥammad's activity and the capital of the first four CALIPHS, made claims to traditional practice that finally crystallized in al-Shāfi'ī (d. 820). He established the sunna of the Prophet, not the sunna of the community or the living tradition of the law schools, as the primary source of law alongside the QUR'ĀN.

The emphasis on tradition, spurred by these conflicts, and the political concern that the 'ABBĀSIDS (750–1258) professed for religion and law had produced many traditions of a conflicting nature. Further, al-Shāfi'ī's insistence on traditions going back to the Prophet forced traditionalists to lengthen their chain of authorities and to put the traditions on the lips of the Prophet. Inventions were patent and recognized as such; the discrimination of the orthodox community was never dormant.

Authoritative Collections. In the 3d Islamic century, the appearance of the two Ṣaḥīḥ's (the “correct” ones) by al-Bukhārī (d. 870) and Muslim (d. 875) marked the culmination of the critical religious spirit and established the foundation of the science of tradition. The title of the two collections, “The Sound Traditions,” indicated their critical nature. It is related that al-Bukhārī chose less than 3,000 traditions out of some 600,000. Traditions were now criticized mainly on the basis of their isnād. To pass criticism, all the relators of the tradition had to be reliable witnesses extending back in an unbroken chain to the companions of the Prophet. In addition, the isnād had to have internal consistency, that is, the possibility of any one relator's having heard the tradition from his predecessor had to be established. This criteriology has been criticized as formalistic, since the concentration on the isnād led to the acceptance of traditions whose matn were in clear conflict. However, the consensus of the community was instrumental both in establishing the reliability of the witnesses and in allowing otherwise weakly supported traditions to be accepted; thus the apparent formalism was tempered.

The two Ṣaḥīḥ's were early accepted as authoritative precisely because they reflected this consensus. Four other collections were ultimately received as canonical. They are referred to as the four Sunan of Abū Dāwūd (d. 888), al-Tirmidhī (d. 892), Ibn Māja (d. 896) and al-Nasā'ī (d. 915). In these a more liberal critique led to the acceptance of many traditions discarded by the two Ṣaḥīḥ's.

The studied criticism of hadith gave rise to the genre of biographical literature known as the Book of Classes (Kitāb al-ṭabaqāt). From these works came a detailed classification of men in technical terminology, indicating their reliability, and a parallel technical classification of traditions. The custom of traveling to hear and collect traditions died out only slowly, but the six canonical books remained at the base of the later collections, abridgments, and commentaries.

The SHĪ'ITES have their separate collections of traditions in which ALI, Muḥammad's son-in-law and cousin, is the main focus of attention.

Bibliography: A. GUILLAUME, The Traditions of Islam: An Introduction to the Study of Hadith Literature (Oxford 1924). I. GOLDZIEHER, Muhammadanische Studien (Halle 1888) v.2., Fr. tr. by L. BERCHER, Études sur la tradition Islamique (Paris 1952). J. SCHACHT, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence (Oxford 1953). H. A. R. GIBB, Mohammedanism (2d ed. New York 1962). O. HOU-DAS and W. MARÇAIS, Les Traditions Islamiques, 4 v. (Paris 1903–14). M. MUHAMMAD ALI, A Manual of Hadith (Lahore 1958). M. IBN 'ABD ALLĀH, Mischat al-Masabih, Or a Collection of the Most Authentic Traditions Regarding the Actions and Sayings of Muhammed, tr. A. N. MATTHEWS, 2 v. (Calcutta 1809–10).

[J. J. DONOHUE/EDS.]

ISMĀ'ĪLĪS

Ismā'īlīs, also known as Ismā'īliyya, is an Islamic sect, comprised of many subsects, and commonly identified with SHĪ'ITE Islam. Ismā'īl, the son of Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, the sixth Shī'ite IMĀM, died before his father in about 762. Upon the latter's death one group of Shī'ites refused allegiance to his son Mūsā and chose instead Ismā'īl's son Muḥammad as imām. After Muḥammad's death a further split divided the Ismā'īlīs. Some accepted the belief that this Muḥammad had been the last imām who would return to the earth at the end of the world; this group came to be known as the "Seveners" (sab'iyya, i.e., those accepting only seven imāms, in later distinction to the "Twelver" or ithnā 'ashariyya, i.e., those Shī'a Muslims whose line of imāms ended with the 12th in succession from Ali through Mūsā). It was this group that established the Qarmatian Empire of Arabia toward the end of the 9th century. The Sevens Qarmatians proper disappeared after about two centuries. The other group, which came to be known as the Fatimids (after Fāṭimah, Muḥammad's daughter and Ali's wife), chose a son of Muhammad ibn Ismā'īl as imām and accepted the imāmate of his successors. Parties of both of these groups, Qarmatians and Fatimids, were also called Baṭīnites and Ta'limites.

The Fatimid Ismā'īli movement gained a considerable following throughout the Islamic world and organized itself according to a secret discipline. From 902 to 904 an unsuccessful attempt was made to conquer Syria. The imām 'Ubaydullāh (known as al-MAHDĪ) fled to North Africa to lead a far more rewarding campaign. Within 70 years the Fatimids ruled, from the newly founded capital city of Cairo, an empire that included most of Muslim Africa and Palestine. The body of the population was not converted to Ismailism, however, and rivalries within the ruling group led to schisms and the gradual diminishing of Fatimid power. The first important schism was that of the Ḥākimiyyah or DRUZES, who worshipped Caliph al-Ḥākīm (d. 1021), who was responsible for the destruction of the Holy SEPULCHER.

Thereafter the Ismā'īlīs remained split between the so-called Musta'li and Nizari branches. The Musta'lis were for a long time centered in Yemen, but enjoyed such missionary successes in India that their headquarters were transferred there in the 17th century. There they subdivided into the Da'ūdīs and the Sulaymānis, the latter a Yemenite party. The NIZĀRĪS, who have had a more illustrious history, later split into two subsects, the Qāsim-shahis, who survive in large numbers under the leadership of the Aga Khan, and the Muḥammad-shahis, who became almost extinct in the 17th century. The majority of the Muḥammad-shahis, mostly Syrians, subsequently united with the Qāsim-shahis. Nizari Ismailism has prospered especially in Persia, India, and (owing to the migrations from India) East Africa. Missionaries from Persia had already opened centers in India in the 14th century. They presented an Ismaili doctrine, tinged with SUFISM, that showed itself willing to absorb Hindu elements. The vitality of the Khoja Ismā'īlīs in India is a noteworthy result of that initiative.

It is exceedingly difficult to form a complete and coherent picture of Ismaili doctrine. For the earlier period of Ismaili history the sources of information on doctrine are few; for the later periods they are ambiguous and polemical. Ismailism seems always to have insisted upon the transmission of an esoteric knowledge centered mainly but not exclusively upon a hidden or "inner" meaning (Arabic bātin) of the QUR'ĀN. The guidance of the imāms, for all the difference of opinion on their identity, was regarded as essential since, even in its less extreme manifestations, Ismailism generally accorded them semi-divine reverence. The imāms were in fact at the pinnacle of a hierarchy of "emanations" of God, the structural theory for which, it is widely supposed, was derived principally from Neoplatonic works. The Ismaili Epistles (ed. K. Al-Zirikili, Cairo 1928) of the Ikhwān al-Ṣafā (Brethren of Purity) demonstrate how great was Ismailism's debt to Neoplatonism and remain one of the chief sources of modern knowledge of Ismaili doctrine.

Bibliography: S. M. STERN, Studies in Early Isma'ilism (Leiden 1983). A. MEHERALLY, Understanding Ismailism: A unique Tariqah of Islam (Burnaby, B.C., Canada 1988). F. DAFTARY, The Isma'ilis: Their History and Doctrines (Cambridge, Eng. 1990). F. DAFTARY, Mediaeval Isma'ili History and Thought (Cambridge, Eng. 1996). F. DAFTARY, A Short History of the Ismailis: Traditions of a Muslim Community (Edinburgh 1998).

[J. KRITZECK/EDS.]

ISNARD OF CHIAMPO, BL.

Preacher, spiritual director; b. Chiampo (Vicenza, Italy); d. Pavia, Mar. 19, 1244. Isnard was perhaps of the noble Nardi family. He received the Dominican habit from St. DOMINIC c. 1219 at Bologna or Padua and studied at Bologna and Milan. He founded the Pavia priory (1231) at the church of S. Maria di Nazareth. As prior at Pavia until his death, Isnard became noted as a preacher and director of souls, winning many from vice and heresy. Contemporaries esteemed him for his power of miracles, spirit of prayer and penance, fidelity to the rule, and constant study of the sacred sciences. Isnard, whose body lies in SS. Gervase and Protase, Pavia, was venerated immediately upon his death. His cult was approved in 1912 (decree published in 1919).

Feast: March 22.

Bibliography: Analecta Sacri Ordinis Praedicatorum 6 (1908) 650–651, 652; 10 (1911–12) 722; 11 (1913–14) 294, 475–477; 14 (1919) 81–85; 14 (1920) 6–11, 65. R. MAIIOCCHI, Il b. Isnardo da Vicenza (2d ed. Foligno 1920). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 13:31–32. A. DUVAL, Catholicisme 6:187–188.

[W. A. HINNEBUSCH]

ISORÉ, REMI, ST.

Martyr, Jesuit priest; b. Jan. 22, 1852, Bambeque, northern France; d. July 19, 1900, Wuyi, Hopeh (Hebei) Province, China. Remi (Remigius) Isoré was the eldest child of an elementary school teacher and his wife who produced another priest and a daughter who joined the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul. Remi began studying Latin in childhood in preparation for the priesthood, then entered the minor seminary at 13 and the diocesan seminary at Cambrai (1871). Before being ordained, he taught elementary school at Roubaix. In the meantime he felt drawn to the Society of Jesus and entered the novitiate at Saint-Acheul, Nov. 20, 1875.

After his novitiate (1876) and before being sent to China, Isoré taught secondary school and studied Theology in Jersey. He had asked to be sent to Zambia, but accepted the opportunity to evangelize in China, arriving in Xian in 1882. He spent the next year studying Chinese, completed his theological studies, and was ordained in Xian cathedral on July 31, 1886 together with León Ignace Mangin. His assignments in China were varied: He was teacher at Zhangjiazhuang (Wei County, Zhili District, Tianjin), dean of Guangpingfu, and then parish priest of Zhoujiazhuang.

On June 18, 1900, Fr. Isoré arrived in Wuyi after a retreat to visit Fr. Modeste ANDLAUER. The Boxers had already arrived at the village to obtain the release of some of their fellows who had been imprisoned the previous winter. They delayed their departure upon hearing that a foreign priest was resident.

Realizing that probable martyrdom was at hand, the priests spent that night in prayer. About six o'clock PM the following afternoon the Boxers broke into the chapel where the priests were praying. The two were stabbed with swords and lances before being decapitated. Their heads were posted at the village gate as a warning to others. They were beatified by Pius XII (April 17, 1956) and canonized (Oct. 1, 2000) by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: July 20; Feb. 4 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: P. X. MERTENS, Du sang chrétien sur le fleuve jaune. Actes de martyrs dans la Chine contemporaine (Paris 1937). J. SIMON, Sous le sabre des Boxers (Lille 1955). C. TESTORE, Sangue e palme sul fiume giallo. I beati martiri cinesi nella persecuzione della Boxe Celi Sud-Est, 1900 (Rome 1955). J. N. TYLENDA, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998), 173–75. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 40 (2000): 1–2, 10.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ISRAEL

The Biblical name of the people of God and of its eponymous ancestor who was also called Jacob. By way of introduction, this article first explains the origin, meaning, and usage of the name; then in the following sections it treats of the religion of ancient Israel and the biblical history of Israel. For information on the Catholic Church in the modern state of Israel, see the separate essay following.

1. Introduction

The Bible insists that the name Israel was conferred on the Patriarch JACOB by God, yet there are divergent accounts of its bestowal on him and various theories regarding its meaning. Besides being used to designate the Patriarch, it is more frequently employed as a collective title for his blood or spiritual descendants, the “children of Israel,” the “house of Israel.”

Satellite image of Sea of Galilee, Israel. (©CORBIS)

Origin and Meaning of the Name. There were two different traditions in Israel regarding the origin of its name. That they were ancient can be seen in the fact that they are already combined in Hosea 12.4–5. According to one account (Gn 32.22–31) the name Israel was bestowed on Jacob at Phaniel, near the Jaboc, east of the Jordan; according to the other account (Gn 35.9–15) God changed Jacob's name to Israel after the Patriarch had left Phaniel and returned to BETHEL. The first account ventures a folk etymology, whereas the second offers no conjecture on the origin or meaning of the name. The first account is boldly anthropomorphic; it depicts Jacob wrestling with God or the ANGEL OF THE LORD and stresses the Patriarch's victory (as also in Hos 12.5).

Traditionally this mysterious passage has been interpreted as signifying the conversion of Jacob, a spiritual victory over his natural tendency to self-reliance rooted in his native cunning and great strength (cf. Gn 29.2–3, 10), and the birth of his trust in God, grounded in the omniscience and omnipotence of God. It has been suggested that Israelite tradition used a pre-Israelite myth of a struggle between a river spirit and a man to dramatize the inner conflict that raged within the Patriarch. Although there is little probability to this theory, inspiration would not forbid the use or adaptation of such a pagan myth to dramatize the interior struggle between exuberant self-reliance and humble, trustful submission to God's plan, a contest between a man who represents his nation and God.

The actual derivation and meaning of yisrā'ēl (Israel) is still uncertain. It is clear that the name is theophoric, a compound of a verb and the proper noun 'ēl [See EL (GOD)]. If the verbal component is the root śry, the name means "God contends," or perhaps (from a related root) "God is strong, sovereign, He rules." If the verbal root is śrr or yśr (both of which occur in Arabic but not in Hebrew), the name would mean, respectively, "God shines forth" or "God heals."

Use of the Name. The name Israel is often used as a mere substitute for the personal name Jacob. It is frequent also in the phrase, "the sons [or children] of Israel" (benē yisrā'ēl), which is used of the immediate sons of Jacob in Ex 1.1, but which, along with such terms as the "seed of Israel," the "house of Israel," and the "assembly of Israel," is used very frequently of the more distant descendants of Jacob also.

The name Israel (alone) is applied to the immediate family of Jacob in Gn 34.7. Prior to the secession of the northern tribes and again after the restoration of the people of the southern kingdom, Israel designated the entire people of God. But during the period of the existence of the Northern Kingdom, Israel signified that kingdom in contradistinction to the Southern Kingdom, which was called Judah. In postexilic times, Israel was occasionally used to designate the laity in contrast to the priests, the levitical orders, and the Temple servants (1 Chr 9.2; Ezr 6.16; Neh 11.3). As used by St. Paul, the term is complex. It may signify the elect of the new dispensation, the "Israel of God" (Gal 6.19), or the unconverted Jews, "Israel according to the flesh" (1 Cor 10.18).

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:730–31. Encyclopedia Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1086–87.

[J. A. PIERCE]

2. Religion of Ancient Israel

An investigation will be made here of Israel's convictions and practice with respect to God. Of the many possible approaches to this consideration, this section will adopt the historical. Accordingly, Israelite religion will first be seen as it is described in the earliest literary sources that treat it as a contemporary phenomenon. Second, an examination will be made of the formative history of this religion according to the available sources. In turn, its subsequent development within Israelite history will be pursued; and finally, with a consideration of the influence of the Exile, the changes effected in the emergence of JUDAISM will be noted.

Early Israelite Religion. As can be seen in the references of the classical PROPHETS of the 8th century B.C., the external forms of Israelite worship differed little from the native Canaanite forms from which they had doubtless been principally drawn. Animal sacrifice was normative (Is 1.11; Am 5.4); there was also the offering of incense and cereal sacrifices (Is 1.13; Am 5.22). Festivals were kept at ancient shrines such as Gialgal and Bethel (Hos 4.15; Am 4.4; 5.4–5) on the occasion of Sabbaths, feast days, and new moons (Is 1.13–14; Hos 2.13; Am 8.4–5). Tithes were paid for the support of these sanctuaries (Am 5.4), and sacred banquets were eaten there (Am 2.8).

Natural hot pool at base of Mount Gilboa, Israel. (©Hanan Isachar/CORBIS)

The motivation of this cult, however, differed sharply from that of the natural religions of the Gentiles, whose cult practices reflected and sought to control the annual cycle of nature and its seasons. Israel's God could not be controlled; rather, it was He who controlled the destiny of all peoples (Am 1.3–2.6; 9.7) as Creator of all things (Am 4.13; 5.8–9; 9.5–6) and as present, not immanent, in nature as its Lord and Master (Am 9.2–4). This God had revealed Himself and His moral will to Israel through

His saving deeds (literally “justices”: Mi 6.5). He revealed Himself as a loving God by calling Israel out of the slavery of Egypt (Hos 11.5; Am 3.1) and by settling it in the land of Canaan; this, the donation of the land of promise as Israel's inheritance, rather than the chthonic deities of paganism, was the source of the fertility of the soil (Hos 2.10; Am 2.9–10), which in turn was subject to YAHWEH's continual historical intervention (Am 4.6–10). Above all, Yahweh had given to Israel the gift of Himself, a continuing closeness revealed through prophecy (Hos 6.5; Am 2.11), whereby He might be known as He is, a God of righteousness and justice and love (Hos 2.20–21; 4.1–2) who truly spoke to Israel. True Israelite religion, therefore, was to “know” this God by living His law (torah, “instruction”) as He had made it known in salvation history (Hos 4.6). Yahweh's holiness was thus a constant challenge to the emulation of His people; His kingship implied a way of life to be pursued and a constant rebuke to moral shortcomings (Is 6.5).

City of Hebron and pools, 1870. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

The prophetic minimizing of the cultic expression of religion never (even in Am 5.25–27) amounted to an outright rejection of it in principle, but displayed a concern for the distinctively moral and social character of Israelite religion (Hos 6.6). The Prophets rebuked the priesthood, not for offering sacrifice, but for dereliction in their duty to inculcate Yahweh’s moral torah (Hos 4.4–6; 5.1–2; Mi 3.11). Without this, no cult could ever be truly Israelite, directed to the God who had gratuitously chosen Israel to this end. It then became no different from the Gentile rites that it resembled and, in popular practice, all too frequently imitated: sacrifice on high places and under sacred trees (Is 1.29; Hos 4.13), the use of idols [Is 2.8; Hos 2.15; 8.5; 10.5; Mi 1.7; see IDOLATRY (IN THE BIBLE)], fertility rites (Hos 2.7; 3.1; 4.14; 7.14), DIVINATION (Is 2.6; Hos 4.12; Mi 3.5–8), and the like.

The “ethical monotheism” of the Prophets of the 8th century was no new discovery of theirs superimposed on a folk religion of ritual and sacrifice. It was, rather, the most primitive tradition of Israelite religion, a tradition, however, that had become clouded through lack of instruction and guidance on the part of Israel’s civil and religious leadership (Is 1.26; 5.13; 10.1; Hos 4.4–6). The election by Yahweh (see ELECTION, DIVINE), in which Israel so passionately believed and which it could abuse as a false guarantee of security, was accepted by the Prophets implicitly; they found in it all the moral imperatives that they preached (Am 3.2). The moral God of the Prophets was the Yahweh of Israel’s cult, whose living presence ISAIAH experienced in the Jerusalem Temple (Is 6.1–13). Prophetic teaching nowhere opposes any of the priestly torah of the Mosaic Law; Hos 4.1–6 implies a systematic summary of the moral code like that of the Decalogue, and Hos 8.12 refers even to a written torah (see COMMANDMENTS, TEN).

Formative History of Israelite Religion. The Prophets themselves ascribe the origins of Israelite religion to the Mosaic age and make frequent reference to the Exodus traditions (Hos 9.10; 11.1, 5; Am 2.9–11; 3.1; 4.10). They presume a knowledge of the kerygmatic interpretation (see KERYGMA) of Israel's history that both the PENTATEUCH and the DEUTERONOMISTS record.

Mount Hermon and the town of Metulla, Israel. (©Shai Ginott/CORBIS)

Covenant Relationship. The basis of this traditional faith was Israel's experience of divine election and covenant. See COVENANT (IN THE BIBLE). Contrary to the Canaanite conception of covenant (see Jgs 8.33; 9.46: cult in exchange for the protection of a chosen deity) and to the patriarchal conception faithfully represented by Gns 28.20–22, the Mosaic covenant signified an act of grace by which Yahweh chose Israel out of love (Dt 7.7–8), imposing on it a law of reciprocal love (Dt 6.5) as the condition of His continued protection and beneficence (Dt 7.9–16). Though it is the Deuteronomic theologians, following the Prophets, who have evolved the theological language of the covenant, the distinctive concept itself (law founded on history; covenant an act of beneficence; reciprocal fealty) has been convincingly related, in the studies of G. Mendenhall (and after him W. Baltzer, W. Beyerlin), to the treaty forms of the ancient Near East current in the time of MOSES. The covenant explains Israelite Law, but the covenant relation itself is less legal than familial; its guiding norm is not legal justice but recipcal loyalty (hesed, "steadfast love," pietas: the norm of the brotherbond between David and Jonathan, 1 Sm 20.8; see also 18.3). Through the covenant, Israel was constituted Yahweh's family (Am 3.1); Yahweh became the father (Dt 32.6; Hos 11.1; Jer 3.19) of many brethren. Hence the duty of loving God above all (Dt 6.5) is only the vertical dimension of a covenant love that is familial: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lv 19.18). The prescriptions of the Law spelled out the obligations of hesed to God and neighbor (see Hos 6.6; 3.4, where "knowledge of God" and "fidelity" parallel hesed; see also Mi 6.8). Yahweh is the "faithful God who keeps covenant and hesed with those who love him and keep his commandments" (Dt 7.8).

Mosaic Law. The Law of Moses, as presented in the kerygma, has the formality of covenant duty and disregards specific origins or earlier intents of the individual prescriptions. The ancient feasts and observances of the past, whatever their original meaning, have been related to the covenantal history of Israel. Similarly, the ancient dietary customs and purificatory practices have been interpreted as outward manifestations of the holiness that must characterize a people consecrated to God. It would be impossible to isolate the oldest Mosaic nucleus of the Law from the unities discernible in the Pentateuch and Deuteronomy, since all of these presuppose progressive development and more recent formulation and collection. The form-critical studies of the Mosaic Law by A. Alt and M. Noth, among others, however, have perhaps made a more decisive contribution toward establishing its earliest dimensions. Israel's apodictic Law is substantially without parallel in the ancient Near East. This distinctively Israelitic form itself argues for the prophetic origin (and succession; see Dt 18.15–18) that Biblical tradition ascribes to Moses (Ex 33.7–11; etc.). The casuistic law, which had its origin in judicial decisions, often parallels other ancient Near Eastern law codes; however, this is the result of an independent application of common legal principles that owes little if anything to the influence of the legislations of the more advanced cultures that surrounded Israel (see LAW, ANCIENT NEAR-EASTERN; LAW, MOSAIC; HOLINESS, LAW OF).

Solomon. (©Archive Photos)

Israel, the Product of its Religion. It is less correct to say that Israelite religion came out of Israel than that Israel itself was the product of its religion. It was a common religion with its central sanctuary at SHECHEM (possibly a proto-Israelite center from patriarchal times; see Gn 34; 48.22; Jos 24) or Shiloh (1 Sm 1.3; Jer 7.12) that provided the first unity of the federation of tribes whose historical and ethnic complexity can still be perceived behind the traditions that have combined to make up the united history of Israel. Acceptance of the common covenant-God in rites such as the one described in Joshua 24.1–28 continually introduced new elements into the religious federation and assured the preservation and recasting of the Mosaic traditions. Israel's wars were religious wars, as is attested alike by the historical narratives and the ancient poetry preserved in them (e.g., Gn 49.22–26; Ex 15.21; Dt 33.26–29; Jgs 5.1–31). Israel's religion, with its unique conception of God and His relation to man, made this people unassimilable to either Canaanite or Philistine, and thus eventually brought it to nationhood. Even then, the constitutive influence of its religion continued to prevent Israel from ever becoming in reality "like all the nations" (1 Sm 8.5).

Relationship to Patriarchal Religion. The relation of Mosaic Yahwism to the religion of the Patriarchs is not easy to determine (see PATRIARCHS, BIBLICAL). While the patriarchal stories preserved in the Pentateuch have retained a remarkably accurate historical contact with the social and cultural milieu they presuppose, their continuity is artificial; popular tradition had inevitably assimilated patriarchal theology to that of the later Israel. The Prophets knew the patriarchal stories (see Is 1.10; Hos 11.8; 12.2–14; Am 5.11), but they made no effort to find Israelite origins in the Patriarchs; for them, as for the Deuteronomic historians, Israel's history began with the Mosaic age. The Pentateuchal traditions, however, saw in the patriarchal history partly a remote preparation for the Mosaic covenant, partly an additional proof of Yahweh's goodness in giving Israel a land in which its earliest ancestors had dwelt merely as pilgrims and strangers (Gn 23.3; etc.). The tradition of the patriarchal "covenant" [in reality, as represented in Gn 15.7–11, 17–21 (J), etc., an unconditioned promise on the part of God] has not been simply imagined after the analogy of the covenant of Sinai. It is a distinct tradition whose omission by the preexilic Prophets may well have been calculated; with its character of unconditioned promise it was hardly the emphasis needed in dealing with a people all too prone to take election for granted and to ignore covenant duties. Historically, covenant with the tribal God, "the God of the Fathers" (cf. God of Abraham, God of Isaac: Gn 28.13; 31.53; Shield of Abraham: Gn 15.1; Mighty One of Jacob, Shepherd, Rock of Israel; Gn 49.24; etc.), corresponds to the cultural background predicated of the Patriarchs; and their worship of the Deity under the name of EL (El Shaddai: Gn 17.1; 35.11, etc.; El Elyon: Gn 14.19–20; El Bethel: Gn 35.7; El Ro'i: Gn 16.13; El Olam: Gn 21.33; etc.) authentically reflects the Canaan of patriarchal times, as has been confirmed by the Ugaritic tablets, which contain some of the same titles (see UGARIT; UGARITIC-CANAANITE RELIGION). Though Israelite religion and Law have their proper beginnings with Moses, there must have been some real continuity with the patriarchal religion. A new religious movement rarely emerges that has not taken account of and built on prior beliefs.

Tel Aviv. (©Annie Griffiths Belt/CORBIS)

Subsequent Development. The religion of Israel that began in historical events was also strongly affected by them in its subsequent development. There was a progressive revelation and an unfolding of doctrine that produced various theologies.

In the Period of the Kingdom. With the coming of Israel to nationhood and its adoption of kingship, the equilibrium between religion and people was disturbed and new postures were called forth. The covenant idea itself with its law was now challenged by the existence of a state possessed of a royal bureaucracy and ruled by kingly decrees; in any case, some of the ancient law was now manifestly inadequate in the face of changes that time had brought in culture and polity. Israelite religion responded to this threat to its existence through prophecy, which not only spoke with its own voice, but also influenced other currents of religious thought that offered partly alternative responses. The mixed reaction to monarchy discernible in the source material of the book of Samuel [1 Sm 8.4–22; 10.17–24; 12.1–25 with 9.1–10.16; see SAMUEL, BOOK(S) OF] found echoes throughout Israelite history (contrast the idealized picture of the age of the Judges in the book of Ruth with the pro-monarchical supplement to the book of Judges in Judges ch. 17–21; see JUDGES, BOOK OF; RUTH, BOOK OF). On both sides the reaction was a religious one: on the one hand a reluctance to abandon a distinctive theocratic polity and to incur the concomitant danger of assimilation to the ways of “all the nations” from which Israel had been called, and on the other a discernment of Yahweh’s guiding hand and will in the inevitable course of human events, a progressivism equally clear in the Israelitic tradition.

Work of the Prophets. Prophecy with its living word of God provided a religious direction for monarchic Israel that is unparalleled in any other ancient people and maintained the covenant ideal imperturbably in the face of institutions that should otherwise have brought about its eventual extinction. It remained always, however, a religious force that adopted no programmatic approach to Israelite society. It stood aloof from such reactionary movements as that of the Rechabites (see 2 Kgs 10.15–16; Jer 35.1–19); its frequent evocation of the

Pope John Paul II stands at Western Wall, Judaism's holiest site in Jerusalem's Old City on final day of pilgrimage to Holy Land.
(AP/Wide World Photos)

(partly idealized) nomadic past (Jer 2.2–3; Hos 2.16; etc.) was not to support a movement of return to a more primitive economy, but like the prophetic references to paradisaic peace (Is 11.6–9; Hos 2.20), it held up the image of a vanished age of Israelitic purity (Jer 2.21; Hos 2.17; Am 6.25; a viewpoint not shared by Ezekiel ch. 16 and 20). Prophecy was always harsh in its criticism of the monarchy, but it did not seek its abolition. In general, prophetic religion was indifferent, even serenely indifferent, to human institutions and spoke beyond these institutions to the popular conscience.

Development of Older Laws. Another manifestation of the vitality of Israelite religion can be seen in the development and adaptation of its legal tradition. The Deuteronomic law code (Dt 12–26), which also shows evidence of prophetic influence, was elaborated probably in a circle of Levitical priests (a Deuteronomic term) and probably in northern Israel sometime before the capture of Samaria by the Assyrians in 721 B.C. It is in part a recasting of earlier laws (cf. Ex 21.2–11 with Dt 15.12–18) and in part legislation peculiar to itself; the latter too, however, may contain ancient legal formulations. It is noteworthy for its law of the single sanctuary (Dt 12.13–14), supporting the ancient amphictyonic principle, a law that influenced the reforms of the Judahite Kings Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18.3–7) and especially Josiah (2 Kgs 22.3–23.27; the “book of the law” featured in this narrative is usually taken to have been Deuteronomy). Deuteronomy’s humanitarian tone and provisions (e.g., Dt 14.27–29; 15.7–11) and its theme of covenant love as the spirit of observance of law thoroughly wedded the best in the prophetic and the legal traditions and also inspired the postexilic Deuteronomic history with its prophetic judgment on Israel’s history under the covenant and the kings. A parallel legal development was the legislation of the Pentateuchal Priestly writers, which was codified and elaborated during the Exile by a school of

A model of the Temple of Jerusalem, as it appeared in the time of Herod the Great, part of a model of Jerusalem at the Holyland Hotel, in Jerusalem. (©Richard T. Nowitz/CORBIS)

Sadocite priests that had some relationship to the prophetic activity of EZEKIEL. Like the Deuteronomic, this priestly school also redacted the Mosaic traditions of the covenantal history and brought the Pentateuch to substantially its final form.

Influence of the Liturgy. Another dimension of priestly religion in which many Israelites found their most satisfying relation to God and to one another was the liturgy. The truly spiritual and productive influence of the liturgy is reflected in many ancient Psalms (see PSALMS, BOOK OF), and modern scholarship tends to detect liturgical influence in many other parts of the Old Testament, including the prophetic (Is 6.1–4; Hab 2.20; Zep 1.7; Zec 2.17). The liturgy became one of the mainstays of the postexilic religion. It obviously meant much to Ezekiel and the postexilic Prophets. It was central in the thought of the Biblical CHRONICLER, and for a pious Jew such as the late writer Ben Sirach (see SIRACH, BOOK

OF), it concretized all of Israel's religious heritage (Sirach 45.23–25; 50.1–21).

Development of Eschatological Ideas. Israelite religion likewise developed with respect to its doctrine on the destiny of the nation. Doubtless an eschatology of some kind was a part of Israelite religion from the beginning [see ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)]; election itself, when taken in the context of a total divine purpose (cf. Am 3.7), implies an eschatological idea. The cult undoubtedly made its contribution to the development of the idea, dwelling on such themes as that of the glorification of Jerusalem [Is 2.2–3; 4.2–6; Mi 4.1–4; Ps 47(48).2–4] and the universal kingship of Yahweh [Ps 92(93); 96(97); 98(99); etc.]. The early Prophets actually exploited this eschatological idea when they insisted that Israel stood under the coming judgment of God. However, whereas the preexilic Prophets had to oppose an uncritical expectation of divine intervention for good, the Prophets of the Exile and postexilic period could indulge Israel's hopes of salvation, especially in view of the doctrine of redemption through suffering, first enunciated by preexilic Prophets (e.g., Hos 2.16–22) and applied to the exilic situation especially by Deutero-Isaiah (Is ch. 41–55; see ISAIAH, BOOK OF). Never, however, did prophetic eschatology become an unqualified assurance of salvation as it did in some of the post-Biblical apocalyptic writings. The restoration of Israel would still be a deed of God's grace, done for His own name's sake (Ez 36.32). By it Israel would be made a sign to the nations (Ez 34.29–31; 37.28) and a means whereby they might find the God of their own salvation (Is 45.6, 14; 49.22–23).

Development of Royal Messianism. One aspect of this salvation expectation, though by no means its only or exclusive aspect, is the Old Testament doctrine of royal MESSIANISM, the belief that Yahweh's universal domination would be effected through a Davidic king, the Lord's anointed (Heb. māšīah; Aramaic mešīhā; hence English Messiah). This belief, rising from the promise given to David through prophecy [2 Sm 7.4–16; Ps 88(89).3–5, 19–37], strongly influenced the authors of the royal Psalms [Ps 2; 71(72); 88(89); 109(110)] and some of the Prophets, notably Isaiah (Is 7.10–17; 9.2–7, etc.; see also such passages as Mi 4.14–5.3 and the additions to Hos 3.5; Am 9.11–12; etc.). It affected in varying degrees the thinking also of the Deuteronomist writers, the Chronicler, and other theologians of the Old Testament. It may be questioned whether in any part of the Old Testament the concept of a Messiah ever became, as it did in later Judaism, applied to a once-for-all ideal king in the pattern of David; generally speaking, the messianic hope of the Old Testament is fixed on the promise of the perpetuity of a dynasty. After the Exile royal messianism inspired the thoughts of the Prophets Haggai (Hg 2.21–23) and Zechariah (Zec 6.9–14), but with the passing away of the monarchy and the increasing authority of the high priesthood, it tended to disappear, though it was later revived in Judaism under apocalyptic influence. The same apocalyptic influence contributed to a rethinking of eschatology, placing it in an end time beyond history and reinterpreting in these terms other soteriological figures such as the Servant of Yahweh (see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF THE) and the SON OF MAN.

Postexilic Judaism. The Babylonian Exile was the final formative event of magnitude in the history of pre-Christian Israel. Not only did it shatter the unity of land, people, and religion that had characterized the preexilic faith; it also altered the direction of personal religion by focusing attention on new unities that had to be as operative outside Palestine as within the land of promise. Though exilic Prophets had looked for a restoration of Israel and Judah as a single nation (Ez 37.15–23, etc.), this hope was never realized as a political fact; nor did the exiles who returned from Babylon (probably relatively few in number) assimilate with the remnants of the Israelite population that had not passed through the experience of the Exile (Ezr 4.1–5). The Israelite religion that reemerged in Palestine was that which had been formed by Judean exiles in Babylonia. It became the normative, shared by the far greater number of Jews who henceforth would make up the DIASPORA.

Development of Personal Religion. This religion evidenced a new personalism, dictated by the changed conditions of the Exile and its aftermath, and already anticipated by JEREMIAH (Jer 31.29–30) and Ezekiel (Ez 18.2–30). It is not true that personal religion had been impossible before the Exile or that the individual had simply been submerged in the people; the evidence of innumerable Psalms and other records of personal piety (e.g., the “confessions” of Jer 11.18–12.6; 15.10–21, etc.) disproves this. Nevertheless, the new emphases in Judaism gave rise to a different kind of personal religion. The SYNAGOGUE replaced the TEMPLE for the great majority of Jews; assemblies for the reading of the Law with instruction by the scribe [see SCRIBES (IN THE BIBLE)], and the later RABBI, like that described in Nehemiah chapter 9, became the norm of Jewish observance rather than the cultic rites that could be attended by the few in Jerusalem. The prophetic doctrine of the remnant of Israel, the true Israel of faith that was expected to be the residue of Yahweh's destructive judgment (Is 1.24–27; 10.17–23), such as Jeremiah had hoped to find in the return from the Exile (Jer 24.1–7), was now applied to the postexilic community by Trito-Isaiah (Is ch. 56–66) and the other postexilic Prophets to distinguish the faithful from the faithless by the standard of obedience to the Law. The faithful were seen as the ‘ānāwīm of the Prophets, that is, the “poor,” the “humble,” originally the economically dispossessed, who could rely on Yahweh alone (Am 2.6–7, etc.), now simply those who were wholeheartedly devoted to Yahweh as evidenced by their adherence to His Law, and thus separated from the unrighteous who ignored the Law (the “fools” of the later Wisdom literature) [see WISDOM (IN THE BIBLE)].

Emphasis on the Law. The disappearance of prophecy contributed to the establishment of the Law as God's final and definitive revelation to Israel. As time drew on, the lack of prophecy was still keenly felt, but more and more the era of revelation was recognized as closed, and the reappearance of prophecy itself was expected merely as a means of solving problems of interpretation of law and custom (1 Mc 4.46). The covenant norm of ḥesed itself became synonymous with obedience to the Law; hence the HASIDAEANS (Hebrew ḥāsīdīm, the pious), the strict observers of the Law (1 Mc 2.42), who were the forerunners of the PHARISEES (the separated). As the late Biblical literature can testify, this legal religion could be a truly spiritual experience far removed from a soulless legalism.

Development of Doctrine. The tradition of Judaism, like that of the earlier Israel, laid far greater stress on moral performance and ethical conviction than on doctrinal formulation. It was a religion lived in the heart rather than the head, a fact not always appreciated by Christians, who are apt to find its attitude to doctrine vague and inadequate. Faith was first and foremost a complete reliance on God rather than the source of specific affirmations about the divine nature. Nevertheless, doctrine also developed in the postexilic Judaism. The Pharisees maintained a progressive attitude toward both law and doctrine, mitigating and adjusting the former in consideration of changed conditions and supplying for inadequacies in the latter, even with the help of non-Israelite forms of thought. Thus by recourse to the Greek idea of the immortality of the soul, an attempt is made in Wis 3.1–9 to solve the problem of the future life, which was never really faced before in the Old Testament, and a parallel solution is offered in 2 Mc 12.39–45 by testifying to a developing doctrine of personal resurrection (an idea foreshadowed in Ez 37.1–14 and Dn 12.1–3). The book of Daniel likewise shows the increasing interest of postexilic Judaism in angels and the spirit world (see ANGELS, 1). These works are Pharisal in spirit; by contrast, the Sadducean Sirach (see SADDUCEES) ignores all such ideas and is content to stand on the earlier content of Old Testament revelation (Sir 24.23–29). Characteristically, too, it is in Wis 13.1–9; 14.12–21 that such doctrinal themes are continued and developed as the “theoretical” monotheism of the Deutero-Isaiah (Is 44.9–20, etc.), which considerably influenced the doctrine of the Priestly creation narrative (Gn 1.1–2.4a).

Development of Wisdom Literature. The Wisdom literature, which in substance is postexilic, is instructive in showing how varied were the currents of Jewish thought and in warning against a tendency to oversimplify the complex vitality of Judaism as it extended down into New Testament times. The Wisdom literature, moreover, is a valuable source of information on the religion of Israel as a way of life lived by its contemporaries. Laws that may be harsh in formulation may also be mild as interpreted in life. A wife who, theoretically, was the chattel of her husband might also be, in reality, his cherished partner in life (Prv 31.10–31; Eccl 9.9; Sir 26.1–4, 13–18; etc.). From this literature and from the entire Old Testament as the record of Israel’s religion, there emerges a history of faith and progress that is Israel’s heritage to the New Testament and to the world. Not chiefly in its inadequacies, but rather in its ability to provide a fruitful and positive interpretation of life, has the religion of Israel found a fulfillment in the New Testament.

See Also: FEASTS, RELIGIOUS; GOD; PROPHECY (IN THE BIBLE); SACRIFICE, III (IN ISRAEL); WORSHIP (IN THE BIBLE)

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961), especially 271–517. J. P. E. PEDERSEN, Israel: Its Life and Culture, 4 v. in 2 (New York 1926–40; repr. 1959). W. F. ALBRIGHT, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (Baltimore 1946; 4th ed. 1956); From the Stone Age to Christianity (2d ed. New York 1957). W. EICHRODT, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. J. A. BAKER (London 1961) v.1. G. VON RAD, Old Testament Theology, tr. D. M. G. STALKER, 2 v. (New York 1962–) v.1. G. E. MENDENHALL, “Covenant Forms in Israelite Tradition,” The Biblical Archaeologist 17 (1954) 50–76. A. ALT, “Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts,” Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel (Munich 1953–) 1:278–332; “Der Gott der Väter,” ibid. 1:1–78. M. NOTH, Die Gesetze im Pentateuch (Halle 1940). S. O. MOWINCKEL, The Psalms in Israel’s Worship, tr. D. R. AP-THOMAS, 2 v. (Nashville 1962). J. W. GASPAR, Social Ideas in the Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament (Washington 1947).

[B. VAWTER]

3. History of Israel

Israel as a nation with its own government and its own territory is considered to have existed from c. 1200 B.C. to A.D. 70. The brief historical summation that follows will cover this period, although, at the beginning, some historical evaluation of the Israelite traditions that extended Israel’s history back to its origins in Abraham’s migration into Palestine (c. 19th century B.C.) must be given also. After the formative periods of the Exodus from Egypt and the conquest and settlement of the land of Canaan, Israel’s history may be reviewed during the following main periods: the united monarchy (c. 1000 to c. 922 B.C.), the separate kingdoms of Israel and Judah (c. 922 to 587), and the postexilic period (538 B.C. to A.D. 70).

EMERGENCE OF ISRAEL

The ancient oral and liturgical traditions of the Israelite people were the foundations upon which they built the theologically centered summation of their origins, as it is now extant in the first seven books of the Bible. It was a popular, religious summation, not a history of Israel’s origin in the modern sense. It was a unique type of literature that combined authentic, historical memories with profound theological insights into God’s activity in bringing Israel into existence, an activity not subject to the historian’s judgment. It was therefore SALVATION HISTORY (HEILSGESCHICHTE). Recent archeological discoveries have established, however, that the theological interpretation found in this sacred history did not nullify a basically accurate sketch of the Patriarchal age, the period of the Exodus from Egypt, and the settlement of the Israelite tribes in PALESTINE.

Patriarchal Age. The Book of GENESIS relates episodes from the lives of the three Patriarchs, ABRAHAM, ISAAC, and JACOB, the ancestors from whom the Israelites and some of their neighboring nations originated. At the beginning of the 20th century, historical critics had almost completely discounted that any authentic historical memories were reported in these Patriarchal narratives. They held that the earliest document, the YAHWIST, at the basis of these narratives, was not written down until almost 1,000 years after the events it described. It could not have given any accurate account of the events through which the Patriarchs lived and by which the Israelite people were formed and their faith awakened.

Such a negative attitude has recently been shown to have been wholly erroneous. An extensive comparison between names in Genesis and Northern Mesopotamian names, now known from extra-Biblical sources of the 1st half of the 2d millennium B.C., has established that the names Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Haran, Nahor, Serug, Benjamin, etc., were common, or of a common form, during the general period ascribed by Genesis to the Patriarch's wanderings and in the general area whence Abraham and his seminomadic group migrated, a fact not true of the later period in Palestine when the Yahwistic traditions were definitively written down. The Genesis description of Patriarchal life and wanderings, including the places where they temporarily settled on the central Palestinian ridge, fits accurately into what is now known about the tribes of ass nomads, which were in the process of becoming sedentary during the major part of the 2d millennium B.C. Even journeys of such nomads to Egypt and their quasi settlement there on the fringe of the "sown" are well exemplified during this period from non-Biblical sources. Finally, many of the customs and institutions found in Genesis are now known not to have been those of Israel and JUDAH in the later monarchical period but ones found in sources from the mid-2d millennium B.C. from Nuzi and Mari, sources that were themselves records of more ancient customs that were prevalent in the general northern Mesopotamian region.

The honest historian should therefore conclude that Israel's remembrances of its origins, although not to be classified as history by intent and plan, were nevertheless rooted in history. Israel's traditions evoked a response of faith from those who believed in the God who chose the Patriarchs, which is not contradicted by what is now known of Near-Eastern history during the Middle Bronze (c. 2250 to c. 1500 B.C.) and Late Bronze Ages (c. 1500 to c. 1200 B.C.).

The Exodus. Israel's remembrance of its originally happy and then bitter sojourn in Egypt was so strong that it could not possibly have been legend. There would have been no reason to emphasize an inglorious period of servitude in a saga of a nation's origins. Probably not all the tribes descended to Egypt or remained there for such a long period as is ordinarily thought. The Rachel tribes, Joseph and BENJAMIN, elements of the Levi tribe, and sections of Judah and SIMEON, probably entered Egypt during the Hyksos period and dwelt for a long period on the northeastern fringe of the Egyptian Delta, "in the land of Gesen." There they were able to continue their traditional raising of sheep and goats (Gn 47.3-4).

Once this minority group began to be numerous and after Egyptian nationalism had reasserted itself against the Hyksos dynasty, as happens so often in human history, the nationalists began to persecute and enslave the growing minority group and eventually forced them to leave. The memory of this escape from Egyptian oppression remained throughout Israelite history the foremost example of God's saving protection for Israel, a theological conception that goes beyond mere human history [see EXODUS, BOOK OF].

Desert Wandering. The exact details of the desert journey of the Israelites and its stages have been lost in the liturgical and religious accounts of God's great saving act found in the Bible. The ancient traditional site of Mt. HOREB or SINAI has recently been called into doubt, so that some scholars map out a completely different route than the commonly accepted one; but the reasons for identifying Mt. Sinai with a mountain in the southern part of the Sinai peninsula still remain credible. The quasi settlement of the exiting Israelite tribes around Kadesh in southern Palestine is of more certain historicity. Here the nomadic tribes took a long step forward in their process of settlement. They learned more advanced social customs from the Madianites (Exodus ch. 18) and made some attempts to move more deeply into the ridge land of Palestine from the south, joining forces with neighboring tribes such as the sons of Caleb and the Kenites. Their experience with Yahweh at the time of their pilgrimage to Sinai became, however, the central magnet, the centripetal force, that made tribes of varying background cling together until they finally established a theocratic nation.

This process was directed by God's spokesmen and representatives, such as MOSES, JOSHUA (Son of Nun), the JUDGES, and King DAVID. Recently, historical criticism has returned to a more positive view concerning the historicity of Moses and has rescued him from being a legendary figure. There are no strong reasons for doubting that he was the leader of the Exodus, the organizer of Israel's basic religio-civil laws, and the inspired teacher of their faith.

Date of Exodus. When the formative egress from Egypt took place is still a disputed question. The arguments for dating the Exodus in the 15th century B.C. are being more and more discounted, while those indicating the 13th century are gaining probability and adherents. Some of the reasons for the latter theory are: the pharaohs of the Nineteenth Dynasty (13th century B.C.) resided in the Delta, where they carried on extensive building programs (cf. Ex 1.11–14); the kingdoms of the EDOMITES, MOABITES, and Ammonites are now known not to have existed before the 13th century, yet Israel's journey in the Transjordan supposes their existence; archeology shows a distinct retrogression in arts and crafts in Palestine at the beginning of the iron age in the last half of the 13th century, which would indicate the displacement of a higher civilization by nomadic tribes, such as were the Israelites; excavations at Bethel and Lachish date a destruction of these cities in the last half of the 13th century, and, finally, the STELE of Mer-ne-Ptah (1223 to 1211 B.C.) names Israel as a defeated foe but classifies them as a people and not as a country, i.e., they were not yet sedentary. The Exodus took place, then, about the mid-13th century B.C. during the latter part of the reign of Ramses II.

The Conquest and Settlement. The Book of JOSHUA simplified drastically the details of Israel's complex and slow conquest and settlement of the land later known by its name. The Book of JUDGES indicates that the tribes of Judah and Simeon, along with allied, non-Israelite tribes, gradually conquered southern Palestine from the south and perhaps also from the east, over a rather long period that was not completed until David took JERUSALEM and some upland Philistine cities in the beginning of the 10th century B.C. The Book of NUMBERS and the Book of JOSHUA recount that the main body of the Rachel tribes led by Moses and Joshua followed the Transjordanian pastoral route past Edom, Moab, and Ammon to penetrate Palestine from the east through the valley of the JORDAN, a constant gateway throughout history to Palestinian agricultural regions for invading Bedouin.

Time of Joshua. Although religious tradition attributed to the great hero Joshua, the successor of Moses as God's charismatic leader, many of Israel's victories that were not his or that took place after his time, he still remains the predominant leader in the conquest of central Palestine and not a mere creation of etiological legends [see ETIOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)]. An initial victory at JERICHO followed by that at Bethel would have opened up for the Israelite tribes the main central ridge, which was sparsely settled at this time by seminomadic tribes similar, and probably related, to the main body of the Israelites. Other Israelite tribes, of long residence in the pastoral regions of northern Palestine, would have joined with their brothers, just arrived from the desert and their experience with Yahweh, to form at Shechem a greater Israelite federation by the acceptance of the Sinaitic covenant. This seems to be the historical background of Joshua's renewal of the covenant with Yahweh described in Jos 8.30–35 and chapter 24. Such a strong federation of nomadic tribes would have led some smaller enclaves, such as the Horites of Gibeon, to join with them in peaceful alliance (Joshua chapter 9), while the Canaanite city-states became alarmed and tried unsuccessfully to impede the growth of the Israelite federation at the battles of Gibeon (Joshua chapter 10) and the waters of Merom (Joshua chapter 11). Yet, at Joshua's death the Israelite amphictyony had really gained a strong foothold only in the hill region of Palestine. Much remained to be conquered from the three centers of strength, Judah and Simeon in the south, the Joseph tribes in the central region on both sides of the Jordan, and the northern tribes in Galilee. These Israelite islands were cut off from each other by Canaanite strongholds, such as Jerusalem and Beth-Shan, along with other cities of the Plain of Jezreel. Another, and eventually more serious, obstacle to Israelite expansion than the Canaanite population was the PHILISTINES, who had settled along the southern and central Palestinian coast shortly after the Israelites had established control of their pastures and vineyards located in the highlands.

Time of the Judges. The period that followed the original partial conquest saw Israel fighting constantly, now in one region, now in another, to maintain and expand its hold on the hill territory against three archenemies, the settled Canaanites, the aggressive and iron-armed Philistines, and the raiding camel nomads, called Midianites and Amalekites, who envied Israel's advance toward better food and stability. The repeated battles for existence brought leaders to the fore, who throughout the 12th and 11th centuries B.C. were scarcely able to maintain Israel's hold on the land given to it by Yahweh but who gradually strengthened Israel's sense of national unity. The main victory was the one at Taanach, by which control of the valley of Jezreel was won and a bridge was formed uniting the Joseph tribes with those of Galilee. Judah and Simeon remained in a somewhat cut-off position in the south, a division that was one of the causes for the later schism between the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Near the end of this period of the Judges the Philistines won a great victory over Israel at Aphek (c. 1050). The central symbol of Israel's religious and national unity, the ARK OF THE COVENANT, was captured, and its sanctuary at Shiloh was destroyed. The Israelites had come to a crossroads: to maintain their very existence they had to have a central leader around whom all the tribes could rally against the Philistines. Israel had to have a king.

UNITED MONARCHY

The forces threatening Israel's existence led to a popular demand for a nāgîd, a martial, charismatic leader who would direct Israel's army against its foes. This desire was reluctantly implemented by SAMUEL when he anointed Saul as nāgîd (c. 1020 B.C.) and eventually led to the union of all the Israelite tribes under one melek, king, during the reigns of kings David and SOLOMON.

Institution. Two varying accounts of the institution of the monarchy are juxtaposed in the First Book of SAMUEL. The first account (1 Sm 9.1–10.16; 11.1–15) describes how Yahweh Himself guided the secret election of Saul as king of Israel, how Saul defeated the Ammonites, and how the people acclaimed him as king. The other account (1 Sm 8.1–22; 10.17–27; 12.1–25) shows Samuel first resisting the popular demand for a king and acceding to it only because of a divine command (8.7, 22). After Saul's election by lot, Samuel proclaimed the dire consequences of government by a human king (8.11–18) and in a menacing farewell discourse gave up his judgeship in the very act of exercising his role as prophet, i.e., spokesman for God (ch. 12). Both traditions are ancient, and from different points of view (to which all history is invariably subject in varying degrees) they transmit the essential facts—the need for centralized political and military control to defend against outside pressure and a nostalgic reluctance to give up the freedom of amphictyonic rule with its closer, more intimate ties with the ultimate nāgîd, God.

The type of kingship Saul exercised very likely resembled that of the kings of the recently established kingdoms of Ammon, Moab, and Edom rather than the allied tyrannies of the Philistines and the princelings of the Canaanite city-states. It was a national monarchy joining together under one warlord previously federated tribes. Much of the king's hold over these clans depended upon his success in battle and his loyalty to the basic religious elan that united Israel's disparate tribal loyalties. Thus, after Saul's initial victories over the Ammonites, the Amalekites, and the Philistines in the hill country and his repulse of Philistine attempts to invade Israelite highland strongholds via the narrow valleys leading eastward from the coast, he inevitably lost popular favor for his dynasty by the disastrous confrontation of Philistine chariots on the plain below Mt. Gilboa c. 1000 B.C. There he and his oldest sons died. Israel's collapse before Philistia seemed irremediable. Only another nāgîd, wiser and more popular than Saul, more loyal to the Yahwistic religion, and better versed in Philistine warfare could save Israel. Such a man was already upon the scene, and he gradually won over to himself the loyalty of all Israel—David, son of Jesse, of the tribe of Judah.

Reign of David. The ancient traditions recount the rise of David (r. c. 1000–c. 961) to prominence as a valiant warrior in Saul's militia, the jealousy of Saul that eventually led to David's life as the exiled leader of an outlaw band, and David's adventures as the prince of Ziklag in the employ of the Philistine ruler of Gath. These traditions have the form of popular sagas and are of different and variant origin, but they agree essentially in their picture of David as a very talented warrior and troubadour who could so charm the populace as to create violent jealousy in the unstable Saul. The loyalty he inspired in his small band of marauders and his partial friendship with certain Philistines gave him freedom to develop his power in the south, where he protected the established towns by his raids against pillaging nomads.

After Saul's death, David reigned as king in Hebron for about seven years and emerged, after Abner and Ishbaal were killed, as the only hero who could possibly save Israel from Philistine oppression. When the elders of the northern tribes had submitted to him and accepted him as the king of Israel, he wisely moved the capital to JERUSALEM, which had been conquered by his own army of loyal mercenaries, was not connected with tribal traditions, and was centrally located on the border between the southern and northern tribes. It became his own city, David's city, and he soon made it the central sanctuary for all Israel by bringing to it the ark of the covenant. He thus established a strong focus of unity for the northern and southern elements of Israel, although his reign always remained a divided one. He was separately the king of Israel (the north) and the king of Judah (the south) but never the king of a completely unified nation that had loyalties only to him.

By his victories over the Philistines, of which very little is known, and by his subjection of the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, and ARAMAEANS of central Syria and the Damascus area, David secured Israel from all its surrounding enemies. He thereby established a small empire whose extent was never matched under any other Israelite king. He organized the liturgy around the ark by favoring the survivors of the high-priestly clan of ELI, which Saul had almost exterminated.

One problem he never solved was the dynastic succession to his throne. His sons were at odds with him and each other. Absalom rebelled against him with the aid of some of David's formerly strongest supporters and of the Benjaminites who were in favor of Saul's line. After this revolt was suppressed by his loyal mercenaries, David had to deal with another rebellion by the Benjaminites. When he was near death, his oldest remaining son, Adonijah, attempted to overthrow his favored son Solomon by claiming the kingship. David was finally forced to have Solomon anointed king while he was still alive.

The history of David in the Bible is mainly that of Jerusalem and his own family's vicissitudes. It is not a chronicle of his political and military achievements. But from the point of view of salvation history it laid down a theme that would be almost as strong throughout the remainder of Israelite history as the original Mosaic covenant and legislation, God's new covenant with Zion and the Davidic dynasty. Henceforth Yahweh would never completely desert Jerusalem or David's house. He would correct and punish, but He would never entirely reject His chosen and anointed leader, His MESSIAH. This theme was to control the national perspectives and hopes of Israel especially after the absorption of the northern tribes by Assyria in the last quarter of the 8th century.

Reign of Solomon. The successes of David were consolidated and organized by Solomon (c. 961–c. 922 B.C.), who was fortunate to reign in a period when the great powers, Egypt and Assyria, were at their weakest, when the Sidonians were interested in maritime expansion and trade, and when the Aramaeans had not completely recovered from David's victories. Solomon and his kingdom were thus at peace, a peace ensured by the chariot army and garrisons that he established at great expense throughout his kingdom, of which the excavations at Megiddo have provided noteworthy evidence. He freely engaged in all kinds of commercial endeavors with the surrounding countries, allying himself with Hiram of Tyre in the production of metals and other trade and taking advantage of and exploiting the newly established camel trade over the vast wastelands of Arabia.

His building program included, besides the Jerusalem temple and royal palace, many fortified cities such as Gezer and Hazor, a fact confirmed by recent excavations. The PHOENICIANS aided him with artisans and material, but the main body of his workers were enslaved Canaanites and other neighboring peoples, and even Israelites themselves were drafted into forced labor battalions in alarming numbers.

Solomon continued his father's attempts to break down tribal barriers in order to concentrate Israel around the throne. Twelve governmental units were established over which the king appointed prefects whose main duty was to collect enough tribute from each unit to provide for the royal court for a month each year. From even a rough estimate of this tribute the magnitude of Solomon's court and the terrible burden of taxation on the people are clearly apparent. The seeds of rebellion had been sown by such extravagance and economic imbalance.

Yet the 70 years during which David and Solomon ruled the united kingdoms were prosperous and fruitful for the Israelite people. They increased immensely, perhaps even doubled in the period. New towns and cities were founded. Arts and crafts were perfected. Literacy and literature became no longer an extreme rarity relegated only to a few scribes. The HEBREW LANGUAGE, so glorious already in its oral transmission, entered its golden age as a written language in both prose and poetry. The economic oppression and draining of the still tribally oriented people, especially of the north, however, were factors too explosive to allow for a peaceful transmission of power to the next Davidic king. Add to the burden of maintaining the royal court the weakening of the pristine, centralizing Yahwism by syncretistic religious practices encouraged by Solomon's foreign harem and by his commerce with neighboring nations and one can easily see why the northerners shouted in the adamant face of Rehoboam, King of Judah (c. 922–c. 915), "What portion have we in David?" (1 Kgs 12.16).

ISRAEL AND JUDAH

Jeroboam I, King of Israel (c. 922–c. 901), led the northern tribes into a political and religious schism that lasted until the Assyrian destruction and colonization of the Northern Kingdom in the last quarter of the 8th century. After that, for another century and a half, the less important Southern Kingdom (Judah) carried on Israelite history until its destruction by the Babylonians in 587 B.C.

The Separate Kingdoms. Under the influence of PROPHECY (1 Kgs 12.21–24), hostilities between the two kingdoms were kept minimal, but Israel's enemies, especially the resurgent Egypt and Aram (Damascus), took military advantage of the breakup of the Solomonic empire. Early in Rehoboam's reign Shishak I, the founder of the 22nd Egyptian Dynasty (c. 935–c. 725), drastically reduced Judah's boundaries to its highland region and levied a heavy tribute that emptied Jerusalem's coffers. He must also have secured freedom for his commercial enterprises along the caravan route that led through Israel's western territory. (A stele of Shishak has been unearthed at Mageddo, the city guarding the main north-south caravan route over Mt. CARMEL.) Hostilities between Israel and Judah continued during the short reign of Rehoboam's son Abijah (c. 915–c. 913). In the reign of Asa, King of Judah (c. 913–c. 873), Baasha (c. 900–c. 877) of Israel conquered Rama in a part of Benjamin previously occupied by Judah as a buffer region just north of Jerusalem and caused Asa to appeal to Damascus for aid. Henceforth Israel would have to contend constantly with Damascene incursions in Galilee and Gilead.

The Northern Kingdom in the meantime had already given evidence of a problem that would sap its strength throughout its existence—its dynastic instability. Baasha had usurped the throne by murdering Jeroboam's son Nadab in the second year of his reign (c. 901–c. 900); but Baasha's dynasty lasted only into the second year of the reign of his son Elah (c. 877–c. 876), who was murdered by Zimri. Zimri in turn was killed within a week. A civil war then broke out in Israel, and only after four years did one of the strongest of Israel's kings, Omri, secure his throne (1 Kgs 16.22).

Omri. King Omri (c. 876–c. 869) changed Israel's capital from Tirzah to the city of Samaria, thus orientating his economic outlook toward the prosperous land of the Phoenicians. He cemented relations with Phoenicia by marrying his son Ahab to a Sidonian, Princess Jezebel, and thereby gained an important ally against the continuing harassment of the Aramaeans. In Transjordan Omri retook Medeba and won tribute from the Moabites, as attested by the MESHAN INSCRIPTION. He made such an impact among the neighboring nations by strengthening Israel that even after his dynasty's violent end the Assyrians continued to refer to Israel as the House of Omri.

Ahab. Omri's son Ahab (c. 869–c. 850) continued to follow a policy of useful alliances by concluding a pact with Asa's son Jehoshaphat of Judah (c. 873–c. 849) and by the marriage of his daughter (or sister) Athalia to Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram (r. c. 849–c. 842). Continued commercial ties with Phoenicia aided the economy, and the Moabite tribute remained a source of income. Only the Damascenes caused trouble, but they were eventually defeated by Ahab near the Sea of Galilee (1 Kgs 20.22–34). An alliance was made between the two states to confront the Assyrian advance under Shalmaneser III into Syria. At the battle of Karkor (853 B.C.) Shalmaneser won a victory against a coalition of 11 kings, among whom were numbered those of Israel and Damascus; but it was so indecisive that he withdrew to Assyria. After the Assyrian threat was over, Israel, in league with Judah, again tried to win back from Damascus the former Israelite territory around Ramoth in Gilead, but it was defeated when Ahab was killed in battle.

The gravest threat to Yahwism arose at this time as a consequence of Jezebel's propaganda for Baal worship. The details of prophetic reaction to the resulting syncretism are found in the sagas of ELIJAH and ELISHA recorded in the Books of KINGS.

Ahab's son Joram of Israel (c. 849–c. 842), brother and successor of the short-lived Ahaziah (c. 850–c. 849), allied his kingdom with Judah and Edom in an attempt to reconquer the rebellious King Mesha of Moab, but the coalition, after an initial victory, was repelled, and Moab remained independent. Relations with the Aramaeans remained fluid: Israel was allied with them against the threat of Assyria, but whenever the Assyrians retreated, the two countries renewed their rivalry. Judah during this period was very much involved with Israel's campaigns and lost control of much of its southern sphere of influence after the disastrous defeat by Mesha.

Jehu Dynasty. The Omri dynasty and its Queen Mother Jezebel, an ardent devotee of Baal, were slaughtered by a military uprising led by a certain Jehu (2 Kgs 9.1–10.11) and abetted by Elisha and his brother Prophets, who were reacting to the favoritism shown to Baal worship under the Omrides. Jehu (c. 842–c. 815) became the founder of the last strong dynasty of Israel. He tried, it seems, to destroy the Davidic dynasty and take control of Judah, for, when he wiped out the Omrides, he killed also Jehoshaphat's grandson Ahaziah, who was king of Judah for only one year (c. 842). But he never succeeded in this, either because soon after his usurpation he was hardpressed by Hazael of Damascus (2 Kgs 10.32–33), who conquered Transjordan as far as the Arnon, or because Athalia, the Queen Mother of Ahaziah of Judah, quickly seized power by murdering all his sons except an infant one. The pressure from Damascus became even more intense under Jehu's son Joahaz (c. 815–c. 801), and Israel lost much of its territory and most of its army (2 Kgs 13.7). However, Damascus' strength was greatly curtailed by an Assyrian siege of that city in 802, and Joahaz's son Jehoash (c. 801–c. 786) was able to win back the Israelite territories taken by Hazael, a reconquest brought to completion under Jehoash's son, the great King Jeroboam II (2 Kgs 14.25–27).

Jehoash and Amaziah of Judah. In Judah, after Athalia's short reign (c. 842–c. 837), the only remaining son of Ahaziah, Jehoash, enjoyed a long but rather disastrous rule (c. 837–c. 800), which was plagued by Aramaean invasions and was ended by his assassination when he was still in his forties. He fostered, however, a popular reaction to the Baal worship that had been introduced in Jerusalem by Athalia. He reformed the appropriation of temple revenues to insure that the priests would not become rich to the detriment of the necessary repairs of the temple's buildings and furniture (2 Kgs 12.5–17).

The son of Jehoash of Judah, Amaziah (c. 800–c. 783), began his reign well by a victory over the Edomites, which reopened for him the lucrative commerce with ARABIA; but he antagonized Jehoash of Israel, who conquered the Judean army at Beth-Shemesh and sacked Jerusalem, thus disturbing the long peace between the fraternal kingdoms. The crisis led to Amaziah's murder, the result of a palace rebellion (2 Kgs 14.19).

Jeroboam II of Israel and Azariah of Judah. A period of peaceful prosperity followed for both kingdoms during the long reigns of Jeroboam II (c. 786–c. 746) in Israel and of Azariah (known also as Ozia or Uzziah; c. 783–c. 742) in Judah. Since Damascus and Assyria were impotent at the time, Jeroboam was able to regain the fullest expanse of Israel and to enrich his country by commercial enterprises. Not all the populace benefited by this prosperity; the Books of AMOS and HOSEA bear witness to the extravagant luxury of the rich and the miserable poverty of the poor during Jeroboam's rule.

The prosperity in Judah was more evenly distributed but not so equitably as to prevent the recriminations against the rich, as described in the Books of ISAIAH and MICAH, dating from shortly after this period. Azariah continued his father's policy of controlling and exploiting the southern caravan routes from Arabia and may even have dominated the commercial routes passing through Philistia (2 Chr 26.6–8). After having become a leper (2 Kgs 15.5) he ruled for eight years (c. 750–c. 742) through his son Joatham (who reigned c. 750–c. 735) before he died. Extra-Biblical evidence (see J.B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 282–83) attests that a Syrian coalition was led by Azariah (c. 743) against the reawakening power of Assyria under Tiglath-Pileser III. The Jehu dynasty had passed from history with the assassination of Jeroboam's son Zechariah (c. 746–c. 745) by the usurper Shallum only six months after he had ascended the throne. Assyria was on the march, and the whole Palestinian and Syrian coastland was threatened.

The Fall of Samaria. Tiglath-Pileser III (called also Pul, the name he took when he became King of Babylon), by victories over Urartu, had freed his armies for campaigns in Syria. Menahem of Israel (c. 745–c. 738), who had killed Shallum a month after the latter's seizure of the throne, was forced to pay tribute to Tiglath-Pileser in 738.

Aramaean-Israelite Revolt. After Menahem's son Pekahiah (c. 738–c. 737) was killed by an anti-Assyrian faction led by Pekah (c. 737–c. 732), it was not long before Pul reacted to the Israelite revolt that, in the meantime, Pekah had strengthened by making an alliance with Rezin, King of Damascus. While Israel and Damascus were trying to force Judah, now ruled by Ahaz (c. 735–c. 715), into their anti-Assyrian coalition by threatening to replace him by Ben Tabeel, the Assyrians were busy in the north, giving the final blows to Urartu. It was in these circumstances (c. 735) that the Prophet Isaiah encouraged Ahaz to trust in Yahweh alone (Is 7.1–16), but Ahaz appealed to Tiglath-Pileser for help and sent him a vassal's tribute. In 734 the Assyrians marched on Philistia to cut off any aid that might come to the coalition from Egypt, conquering a good part of Galilee as they passed through it. They then turned on Damascus, took it in 732, and in the same thrust captured Israel's possessions in the Transjordan. The kingdom of Israel was thus reduced to the small highland area around Samaria, while a large part of the Israelite population of the occupied territories was deported and their land given to colonists from other regions of the Assyrian Empire. The Assyrians had found a practical plan for deterring the repetition of a vassal's rebellion [see DEPORTATION (IN THE BIBLE).]

Last Days of Samaria. Israel's misfortune led to another palace revolution. Hosea assassinated Pekah, quickly sent tribute to the Assyrians, and was thus allowed to reign (c. 732–724) as a vassal king over a very reduced kingdom. Ahaz made his vassalage official by submitting to the Assyrians at Damascus and thus rendered any move that Judah might attempt against Assyria an act of rebellion. At the same time the Assyrian religious cult was forced upon Judah, and Yahwism was endangered (2 Kgs 16.3–4, 10–18).

The next Assyrian King, Shalmaneser V, in the course of a campaign against Tyre (725), invaded Samaria and laid siege to its capital. King Hosea, who had vainly hoped to receive military aid from the King of Sais in the Egyptian Delta and had refused to give his annual tax to Assyria, was taken prisoner by Shalmaneser. But the city of Samaria withstood the siege for almost three years. A few months before Shalmaneser died (Dec. 721) it fell to the Assyrians and was destroyed. Sargon II of Assyria, who boasted of this conquest in his inscriptions because it took place in his accession year, deported most of the remaining inhabitants of the Northern Kingdom to northern Mesopotamia. Thus Israel disappeared from history. Its deported people lost their identity in foreign lands. The people who remained in the land were mixed with the new colonists, and many of them succumbed to the new religions formed by the amalgamation of various pagan creeds with an already watered-down Yahwism. Those who remained true to Yahweh were the ancestors of the later SAMARITANS. The history of the Israelite people and their religion was henceforth to continue in Judah alone.

Judah until Its Fall. Since the invasion of Judah by Sennacherib, King of Assyria, is certainly to be dated in 701, and since it occurred in the 14th year of Ahaz's son Hezekiah, King of Judah (2 Kgs 18.13), the date c. 715 for the beginning of Hezekiah's reign seems better than that indicated by the synchronism afforded by 2 Kgs 18.1–2, 9–10. Hezekiah had a long reign (until c. 687) in a period that saw the greatest extent (even into Egypt) of the Assyrian empire. That the tiny kingdom of Judah was not completely absorbed by the mammoth empire, as Israel had been absorbed, remains one of history's tantalizing problems. Sacred history has given an answer that transcends the historian's purview: Judah was saved because of a religious and, hence, also a national revival that procured for it Yahweh's protection. Whatever his judgment of this theological interpretation, the historian must admit that Judah could not have had a national renewal without a preceding religious renewal.

Hezekiah. During the first half of Hezekiah's reign the times were generally propitious for his reform. Assyria had temporary troubles at home, and except for the campaign of the Assyrian army against Ashdod in 712 (Is 20.1), Palestine was left in peace until Sennacherib's invasion of Judah in 701. The reform, which wiped away the Assyrian cultic importations, was motivated by the pure Yahwism preached by Isaiah and Micah. It then, apparently for the first time, attempted to destroy all local sanctuaries, even those dedicated to Yahweh, and to make the temple in Jerusalem the sole focus of the orthodox cult. The vital school of religious thinkers behind the attempt, probably never successful in Hezekiah's reign, remained dormant under the long and idolatrous reign of the weak Manasseh, to reappear in its full vigor under King Josiah of Judah.

The campaign of Sennacherib (705–683) as recounted in the Bible may be a telescoping to two separate Assyrian expeditions, one in 701, the other quite some time later. This would explain the appearance on the scene of the Egyptian King Taharqo (the Thera of 2 Kgs 19.9), who did not begin his reign until c. 685. Another possible explanation is that in 701, after Sennacherib had quickly reduced to rubble most of Judah and while he was just about to crush some stubborn fortified cities (Lachish and Libna) more essential to his coastal campaign than Jerusalem, an Egyptian army, anachronistically said to have been under the command of Taharqo (who was only nine years old at the time), advanced from the south. It was in these circumstances that a plague broke out in the Assyrian army, and Sennacherib was forced to return home, leaving Judah devastated and Jerusalem "like a shed in a melon patch" (Is 1.8). The silence in the Assyrian royal records about such a setback is understandable, given the general success of the campaign and the relative unimportance of Jerusalem as an obstacle to an Assyrian invasion of Egypt.

Manasseh, Amon, and Josiah. Under Hezekiah's son Manasseh (c. 687–c. 642) a ravaged Judah returned to its vassal status, paying tribute to Esarhaddon in 673 and to Ashurbanipal in 668. The religious reform was suppressed and God's spokesmen, the Prophets, lay hidden. The next king, Amon (c. 642–c. 640), was murdered by his own officials, but another group started a counterrevolution and gained control of the small kingdom for Amon's son JOSIAH when he was still a boy. Josiah reigned (c. 640–609) until his tragic death in the battle of Mageddo, when he vainly tried to prevent the Egyptian army under Neco from invading Syria.

Under Josiah a religious reform, with which the Bible is almost exclusively concerned, accompanied and abetted a national resurgence that was possible because of Assyria's entrance into a fatal decline. As the Judean political and military reorganization progressed, the reform expelled from the land all foreign influences, religious and cultural. The discovery in Josiah's 18th year of at least the legislative parts of the Book of DEUTERONOMY (2 Kgs 22.3–23.24) gave added impetus and purpose to the renewal and led to the suppression of local sanctuaries and the concentration of priests in Jerusalem. Although the reform was shortlived, it expressed a religious fervor that was to survive the ruin of Jerusalem and the Exile and be developed and formulated in the homiletical sections of Deuteronomy and the doctrines of the Book of JEREMIAH.

When the cities of Asshur and NINEVEH were destroyed in quick succession (614 and 612) by the MEDES and CHALDEANS, the Judeans rejoiced to see their old archenemy Assyria humbled. Josiah was so eager to hasten the total destruction of the remaining Assyrian forces that he tried to impede the Egyptian pharaoh Neco from marching to their aid, and he was killed in 609 at the pass of Mageddo (2 Kgs 23.29–30).

Last Kings of Judah. After the death of Josiah the anti-Egyptian faction in Judah set his second-oldest son Shallum on the throne under the name of Jehoahaz. But after a reign of only three months he was deposed by the Egyptians and taken a prisoner into Egypt.

The Egyptians then installed, as their puppet king of Judah, Josiah's oldest son Eliakim, who took the throne name of Jehoiakim. Despite the enormous tribute that Judah had to pay Pharaoh Neco, Jehoiakim received no substantial military aid from Egypt when the Chaldean King of Babylon, NEBUCHADNEZZAR, invaded Palestine in 603, and he was forced to become a vassal of Babylon. But three years later, egged on by Egypt, he threw off the Babylonian yoke. In 598 Nebuchadnezzar set out to punish his rebellious vassal in Judah. Jehoiakim, however, died on Dec. 8, 598 B.C., shortly before the Babylonian army encamped before Jerusalem.

As the only way to save the city, his son and successor, Jehoiachin, known previously as Coniah, after a reign of only three months and ten days, offered himself, his family, his whole court, and most of the nobles as prisoners (March 16, 597 B.C.). This was the first deportation of Judeans to Babylon.

On the shaky throne of Jerusalem Nebuchadnezzar set Jehoiakim's younger brother Mattaniah, who took the throne name of Zedekiah. Although his nephew Jehoiachin received a somewhat liberal captivity in Babylon, so that he survived to carry on the Davidic line, Zedekiah ultimately brought a tragic end both to himself and to his kingdom. Against the pleadings of Jeremiah, who continually counseled him to submit to Babylon, Zedekiah followed the popular, stubborn nationalism in more than once seeking help from Egypt to start a rebellion. In 589 Nebuchadnezzar marched. He laid siege to Jerusalem in January 588, sent detachments to storm other Judean strongholds, and at the approach of the Egyptian king Apries (588–568) stirred up the false hopes of the fanatic defenders by sending most of his sieging forces against the Egyptians. But Egypt proved false once more: they withdrew across the sands, and Jerusalem remained alone the focus of Babylonian fury. In August 587 a breach was made from the north, and Zedekiah fled southward down the Kidron Valley; but he was captured, blinded, and imprisoned. Jerusalem was laid waste by fire, and most of the people of Judah who escaped the sword were deported as slaves.

With their temple destroyed, their last two kings held captive, their towns and country smoldering ruins, the people of God bitterly faced exile and oblivion. Yahweh had rejected His own. Yet already in Babylon a man of visions, EZEKIEL, had seen God's glory coming from His Temple to hover over His faithful and purified remnant, to give them new hope, and to lead them back to their home.

POSTEXILIC PERIOD

With the reduction of the kingdom of Judah to a province of the Babylonian empire, the history of what was left of God's holy people Israel reached a crisis. A thorough break with Israel's past, spelling the end of the theocratic amphictyony and monarchy, was mysteriously and sacrally changed into a renewal of the past and a resurgence of the sole rule of the one God over the Judean remnant of Israel. This dynamic rejuvenation germinated among the higher classes of the people who had been deported to Babylon, and it kept on developing after its most fervent devotees had returned to Palestine. During the Persian period it emerged as the social reality now known as Judaism, a reality so durable that it was to defy every attempt to exterminate it in the periods of Greek and Roman hegemony and, in fact, in every period up to the present day.

The Exile. First of all, it is clear that much of Judah's population remained in Palestine even after a third deportation in 582, but they were a disheartened lot, leaderless, harassed by the Edomites who occupied southern Judah, still plagued by religious syncretism, and only capable of lamenting bitterly over the ruins of Jerusalem. The sole hopeful note in their situation was that Babylon had not mongrelized them by settling foreign colonists in their midst, as Assyria had done to Samaria. However, the future of Yahwism rested rather with those exiles in Babylon who would rather have forgotten their right hand than Jerusalem and all it meant for them [Ps 136(137).5]. In a quite liberal captivity the deportees kept a semblance of their traditional social structure ruled by the elders, priests, and Levites. Even more importantly, however, their Prophets were allowed free reign to preach their gospel of a new Israel, a new Jerusalem, and a new covenant and law written in the hearts of Yahweh's people (Ez 36.26–27; Is ch. 40–55). The religious revival borrowed almost nothing from the Babylonian culture and cult. It was a revival that defies rational explanation. God had chastized His people, had led them out into the desert again, had spoken tenderly to them through His Prophets (Hos 2.16), and had raised up for them a new school of holy men, the SCRIBES, who kept rehearsing for them the sacred lessons of their past. When CYRUS, King of Persia, gave the most enthusiastic of them leave to go to Palestine in 538, it was truly "a holy nation" and "a kingdom of priests" (Ex 19.6) who lifted their packs and followed the Lord Himself as He led them toward ZION.

Persian Period. The literary and chronological problems arising from the disarranged and lacunary sources for this era (see EZRA, BOOK OF; NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF) make it difficult to give an accurate account of its various phases. The summary that follows, therefore, claims merely plausibility for the sequence of events and their dates.

Restoration of the Temple. The exiles did not return in one great caravan; they kept coming back after 538 in separate groups and at various times. Sheshbazzar, apparently a son of Jehoiachin, the king of Judah who had been deported in 598, led the first group. Their hopes of rebuilding the temple were soon frustrated by the necessity of providing food and lodging for themselves in a depopulated and desolate land and by the opposition of the Samaritans, who considered Jerusalem under their control. The first resettlers succeeded only in leveling the temple area and arranging the foundations of the temple.

Another Davidic prince, Zerubbabel, succeeded where his uncle had failed. Encouraged by the prophetic utterances recorded in the Books of HAGGAI and Zechariah and, perhaps, by the loosening of Persian control of Palestine while the king of Persia, DARIUS I, was securing his throne, the Judeans, under the leadership of Zerubbabel and the high priest Joshua, son of Josedec, began again in 520 to rebuild the temple. Against the Samaritans' objections, they were allowed, by an appeal to the original edict of Cyrus, to continue until they completed the reconstruction in 515. It was more than 20 years since the first group of the deported had returned. The glorious hopes of Deutero-Isaiah (Is ch. 40–55) had not materialized, but at least the temple had been restored. More than half a century would pass before a new religious reform led by EZRA would pave the way for a political renewal under NEHEMIAH that would culminate in the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls.

Reform of Ezra. According to the literary analysis of R. de Vaux (Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. Pirot et al., 4:764–65), the collation or telescoping of Ezra's record of his religious reform with Nehemiah's memoirs by the Chronicler (who was not Ezra) is the basis for the confusion presently recognized in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. (For opposing opinions, see A. van Hoonacker and W. F. Albright in bibliography.) This opinion holds that in the 7th year of Artaxerxes I (458), Ezra, a secretary in charge of Jewish affairs in the Persian court, came, armed with a royal decree, to reorganize the Judean community in accordance with the law of Israel's God, in which he was an expert. He read the Law of Moses (not the whole PENTATEUCH, of course, but more than just the Priestly code) to the assembled people, which they accepted by celebrating the rites of the feast of BOOTHES (Tabernacles). The law thus became the official constitution for the hieratic society. The outcome of Ezra's severe strictures on marriages with non-Jews is unknown, for his report ends abruptly. These strictures certainly caused a great commotion among the faithful and in all probability were not very effective, as is evidenced by Nehemiah's grappling with the same problem. Ezra's commission was temporary, and he probably returned to his duties in Babylon when it expired.

Reform of Nehemiah. Ezra's religious reform gave birth to a national resurgence that had as its primary object the rebuilding of Jerusalem's fortified walls. A first attempt was thwarted by the Samaritans (Ez 4.8–22), who, by going beyond Artaxerxes' command that the work of fortification should merely be interrupted until a further decision be made, destroyed what had been accomplished (Neh 1.3; 2.3). Nehemiah, a high official in the Persian court, heard of these events and won from Artaxerxes a commission to repair Jerusalem's battlements. Soon after he arrived in Judea (445), he received a further commission as temporary governor of the Judean enclave (Neh 5.14). He stood firm against the threats and connivances of the Samaritans and their Judean collaborators and completed the basic fortifications within a few months. He then proceeded to populate the city (Neh 11.1) and regulate its social institutions (Neh ch. 5). He returned to the Persian court in 433 but was again present in Judea some years later, when he was forced to reconfirm his reform by having the community solemnly accept the obligations of God's law (Neh ch. 10).

After Nehemiah's time until the Greek conquest, i.e., for about a century (until 333), hardly anything is known of the Judean ethnarchy. Thanks to the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, Judea had become a land ruled by its own sacred law and thus enjoyed a certain autonomy and even the power to coin its own money.

The Greek Period. Before the victory of Alexander the Great at Issus (333), Greek influences had already spread into Palestine, but soon after it the whole of the Near East began to take on a Hellenistic appearance.

Domination by the Ptolemies. After the confusion following Alexander's death, Judea became a liberally controlled border land of the kingdom of the Ptolemies until they lost control of Palestine in 198 at the battle of Paneion. Under this rule during the 3d century B.C. the Jewish DIASPORA grew, especially in ALEXANDRIA, to whose Greek-speaking Jews the translation of the Hebrew Bible called the SEPTUAGINT is usually attributed. In Palestine Jerusalem was allowed to retain its ethnarchic autonomy throughout the conflicts between the Seleucid Dynasty and the Ptolemies, which are alluded to in Daniel ch. 11. When Antiochus III finally succeeded in winning control of Palestine it was not long before the relatively peaceful existence in Jerusalem was disturbed by Seleucus IV and his brother ANTIOCHUS IV EPIPHANES.

Maccabean Period. The history of the MACCABEES recorded in the Books of the Maccabees recounts the direst threat to the existence of God's people since the Babylonian deportation. Antiochus IV attempted to strengthen his hold on Palestine by destroying the core of Jewish unity, dedication to Yahweh's laws, by a thorough process of Hellenization. He attacked Judaism by forbidding the practice of fundamental Jewish customs, such as their DIETARY LAWS and CIRCUMCISION, and by forcing them to idolatry.

The reaction was noble in its loyalty to Yahweh and its fierce bravery. Judas Maccabee led a guerrilla war that succeeded in repelling the Greek forces sent against his rebellion and in gaining enough victories to cleanse and rededicate the temple in 165 B.C., which had been desecrated by Antiochus in 168. After the death of Judas, his brothers Jonathan and Simon continued hostilities against the Seleucids, who were involved in a dynastic struggle. By playing one claimant for the Antiochean throne against the other, the Judean leaders were successful in winning Jewish independence. The HASMONAEANS (the dynasty begun by Simon's son, John Hyrcanus) thenceforth ruled in Jerusalem until the Romans conquered Palestine.

The Roman Period. The Jewish sects of PHARISEES and SADDUCEES, as well as the ESSENES and the QUMRAN COMMUNITY, originated in the troubled Maccabean period and continued their bitter rivalry during the 1st century B.C. It was a land divided and ravaged by civil war between the two claimants to the royal high-priesthood of the Hasmonaean dynasty, Aristobulus and Hyrcanus, supported, respectively, by the Sadducees and the Pharisees, that the Roman General Pompey found when he marched on Jerusalem in 63. He demanded tribute from Judea and took from the rule of Hyrcanus, whom he allowed to serve as high priest, all the coastland conquered by the Hasmonaeans. An Idumean, Antipater, who had been continually aiding Hyrcanus's cause, during the civil wars that followed Caesar's rise to power and his assassination was quite adroit at staying in the favor of whoever gained control of the Roman Empire. His son HEROD THE GREAT finally succeeded in having the Roman Senate recognize him as King of Judea. In 37 Herod laid siege and took Jerusalem with Roman aid, killed Antigonus, the last Hasmonaean, and began his long rule, which was to last until 4 B.C.

Herod, like his father, cleverly changed policies to fit the changes in Roman politics. After the battle of Actium (31 B.C.) he submitted to Augustus and won a good deal of independence for the internal control of his kingdom, which was expanded to almost the extent it had under the most powerful Hasmonaean, Alexander Jannaeus. Of all his building programs, that of the reconstruction of the temple was the most important in Jewish eyes; but this half-Jew never won the support of his people, because of his fostering of emperor worship, his cruelty to his own family, and the opposition of the Pharisees.

After his death the Romans disregarded his disposition of his kingdom by dividing it between three of his sons, the Tetrarchs HEROD ANTIPAS, Archelaus, and Philip. In A.D. 6 Archelaus was deposed by the Romans on a complaint from the Jews, and the regions of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea were placed under the direct control of Roman procurators except for the period from 41 to 44, when Herod Agrippa (see AGRIPPA I AND II) was allowed an internal control of Samaria and Judea. The increasing tyranny of the procurators, e.g., of Pontius PILATE, despite the benign rule of Porcius FESTUS, finally led to a Jewish rebellion in 66. It was put down with merciless efficiency in the campaigns of Vespasian and Titus between 67 and 70. Jerusalem with its holy temple was captured and destroyed in April of the year 70, and thus the political history of Israel ended. Its sacred history continued in that of Christianity and in the post-Biblical history of the JEWS.

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:729–77; “Les Patriarches hébreux et l’histoire,” Revue biblique 72 (1965) 5–28. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) F. SCHMIDTKE, Lexikon für theologie, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:803–09. A. ALT and E. KUTSCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:936–44. W. F. ALBRIGHT, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2d ed. Baltimore 1957); Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (Baltimore 1946; 4th ed. 1956); The Biblical Period from Abraham to Ezra (New York 1963). M. NOTH, The History of Israel, tr. P. R. ACKROYD (2d ed. New York 1960). A. VAN HOONACKER, “La Succession chronologique: Néhémie-Esdras,” Revue biblique 32 (1923) 481–94; 33 (1924) 33–64. J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959). F. F. BRUCE, Israel and the Nations: From the Exodus to the Fall of the Second Temple (Grand Rapids 1963). L. JOHNSTON, A History of Israel (New York 1964). W. FOERSTER, From the Exile to Christ: A Historical Introduction to Palestinian Judaism, tr. G. E. HARRIS (Philadelphia 1964).

[J. E. FALLON/ L. F. HARTMAN]

ISRAEL (STATE), THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The modern independent republic of Israel occupies GALILEE, the Plain of Esdraelon, the Mount CARMEL range, the coastal plain and the Shephelah (the foothills of ancient Judah) from Carmel south to the Gaza Strip, including a “corridor” to Jerusalem, and finally the Negeb reaching south to a point at the northern end of the Gulf of Aqaba. It is, therefore, an irregular, generally narrow strip about 265 miles in length with disproportionately long borders—590 miles on land and 158 on water. It is bordered on the north by Lebanon, on the northeast by Syria and the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights, on the east by Jordan, and on the southwest by the Gaza Strip and the Sinai Desert of Egypt. Modern Israel includes but little of the heartland of ancient Israel—the highlands of Samaria and Judea. The region is predominately desert in the south, rising to mountains in the central region and low plains along the coast. Natural resources include copper, phosphates, bromide, clay, sulphur, manganese, and small natural gas and petroleum reserves. Agricultural products consist of citrus, vegetables, and cotton, as well as livestock and dairy.

History. The State of Israel grew out of the Zionist concept of a Jewish National Home. The Balfour Declaration of Nov. 2, 1917 established a Jewish national homeland in Palestine, which home was secured by the attribution to Great Britain of the Mandate on Palestine dated July 22, 1922. The working of the mandate—and the increase in the area's Jewish population—was increasingly hindered by the continuous friction between Arabs and Jews. Major riots occurred in 1921, 1929, and 1936, and in 1937 the Peel Commission recommended dividing the region into Arab and Jewish states. Matters came to a head after World War II, when the British refused to allow the immigration to Palestine of many thousands of Jews who had been victims of the Nazi persecution. Finally, Great Britain resigned her mandate, Capital: Jerusalem; Tel Aviv is recognized by some nations.

Size: 7,993 sq. miles.
Population: 5,842,455 in 2000.
Languages: Hebrew, Arabic, English.
Religions: 117,000 Catholics (2%), 818,050 Muslims (14%), 116,580 Protestants (2%), 4,790,825 Jews (82%).
Ecclesiastical divisions: the Melkite Greek Catholic Church in Israel has a patriarchal exarchate in Jerusalem and an archeparchy in Akko; the Latin Catholic Church has a patriarchate in Jerusalem; and the Maronite Catholic Church has an archeparchy in Haifa (created 1996).

and the Second General Assembly of the United Nations (UN) recommended the partitioning of Palestine into Jewish and Arab states and the creation of a separate enclave embracing Jerusalem and its surroundings under UN supervision. The Arabs rejected outright the Nov. 29, 1947 UN resolution, and the mandatory administration refused to allow the special commission charged with its implementation to come to Palestine. On May 14, 1948, the day before the mandate was to expire, the Jewish National Council and the General Zionist Council at Tel Aviv proclaimed establishment of a Jewish state, to be called Israel. A provisional government was set up and promptly recognized by the United States, the USSR, and a score of other nations. Israel was admitted to the UN on May 11, 1949.

While the Arab-Jewish war had actually started many months before the proclamation of Israel's independence, only "irregulars" were engaged in warfare. Now the troops of five Arab countries—Lebanon, Syria, Transjordan, Iraq, and Egypt—invaded the region that had previously been under British mandate. After four weeks of fighting, the invaders were defeated, and Israel succeeded in occupying a larger part of Palestine than that stipulated by the UN partition plan. Active hostilities continued until early 1949. Following protracted negotiations held in Rhodes that spring and summer, armistice agreements were signed between Israel and the Arab countries (except Iraq and Saudi Arabia) that fixed the provisional boundaries of the State of Israel according to the territory held at the end of the hostilities. Jerusalem was divided into two parts: the Old City under Jordan's rule, and the New City under Israeli administration. In 1950 Jerusalem was proclaimed the capital of Israel. On Oct. 29, 1956, Israel launched the so-called Sinai Campaign and occupied the Sinai Desert and the Gaza Strip in what became known as the Suez War. In compliance with the resolutions of the UN General Assembly, Israel later withdrew its contingents from the occupied areas.

Successive wars with its Arab neighbors occurred in 1967 and again in 1973, during which time further territories were occupied by Israeli troops, among them the Sinai desert, the Golan Heights, and the West Bank. Despite granting Palestinians autonomy in the Gaza Strip and areas of the West Bank after 1993, disputes with Palestinian leaders continued the fighting into 2000. Some West Bank territories were re-occupied by Israeli troops in 2001 in response to continued Palestinian insurrection.

Religion. Israel's Proclamation of Independence guarantees social and political equality as well as freedom of religion, language, education, and culture to all its citizens. The proclamation also promises that it will safeguard the holy places of all faiths within its domain. The most important of the Christian holy places in Israel are the CENACLE and the Church of the Dormition of the Virgin on "Mount Zion" (southwest of the walls of Old Jerusalem), the traditional home of Elizabeth and Zechariah in Ain Karim, and the sanctuaries in NAZARETH and on the shore of the Lake of Tiberias in Galilee. Although a secular democracy in principle, Israel maintains the Ottoman provision, according to which matters of personal status—marriage, divorce, alimony, maintenance, succession, etc.—are under the exclusive, or in some cases, concurrent jurisdiction of the religious courts of the recognized communities. These communities are the Muslim, with a special privileged status inherited from Ottoman times; the Jewish, whose prerogatives were precisely defined by the Rabbinical-Courts-Jurisdiction Law of 1953; the Christian communities; and the Druze community, which obtained legal status in 1957. According to the Day-of-Rest Ordinance of 1948, the official holidays were the Sabbath and the Jewish holy days, but non-Jews had the right to observe their own holy days.

Throughout much of Israel's history, the Vatican has worked toward an international recognition of Jerusalem as a sacred spot for all three of the world's major faiths, and has noted that despite the importance of other locations in Israel, Jerusalem remains of primary significance. Concerned that the historic and religious integrity of the city be preserved, Pope John Paul II, Latin Patriarch Michel Sabbah, and leaders of the other Catholic churches joined in encouraging all involved political leaders to work for the establishment of Jerusalem as a politically neutral, international city, its holy places open to Christians, Jews, and Muslims alike. However, by 1997 Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was adamant that Jerusalem stay united; freedom of travel to the city's sacred sites would be allowed, but a united Jerusalem would not be relinquished, even in the pursuit of peace. Although not acknowledged by many world powers, Israel proclaimed Jerusalem as its capital; Palestinians also intended the eastern half of the city for their capital. Incidents such as damage to a 5th-century Christian church in eastern Jerusalem caused by a bulldozer during Israeli efforts, in 1997, to construct a new housing project exacerbated the problem and heightened the Vatican's concern.

Plains of Esdraelon and Hills of Galilee, mid 20th century, Israel. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

By 2000, among the three Catholic rites—Latin, Greek MELKITE, and MARONITE—there were 97 parishes tended by 76 diocesan and 308 religious priests. Other religious included 160 brothers and 1,050 sisters. The Greek Orthodox Church also had communities of believers in the country, led by a patriarch in Jerusalem, and its ownership of large amounts of land in Jerusalem gave it some influence over the Israeli government. In 1994 full diplomatic relations were established between Israel and the Holy See, reflecting an improvement in the relationship between the two faiths. In an agreement ratified by the Knesset, the Catholic Church gained full legal status in 1997, its many entities gaining juridical status under Israeli law for the first time. In 1998 a Vatican study of the Holocaust was released that detailed the mistaken anti-Semitism existing in aspects of the Church's teachings as well as the moral failures of some Catholics, during the persecution of the Jews by the Nazis during World War II, either to prevent the genocide or to speak out more forcefully against it. This public atonement for past failings on the part of the Church was appreciated by many Jews, particularly Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who in 2001 credited the pope with leading all Christians in working against hatred and violence in the region.

In March 2000 Pope John Paul II made an historic journey to the Holy Land that was supported by the Israeli government and which, as part of the Jubilee 2000 celebrations, served as a pilgrimage to rediscover the roots of the Bible. Calling his trip “a return to the origins, the roots of the faith and of the Church,” the pope began his journey at Mount Nebo, moving from there to the Jordan River, Bethlehem, and Calvary, while also visiting a Palestinian refugee camp located near the city of the Nativity.

Bibliography: D. PERETZ, Israel and the Palestine Arabs (Washington, DC 1958). J. B. GLUBB, A Soldier with the Arabs (New York 1957). W. EYTAN, The First Ten Years: A Diplomatic History of Israel (New York 1958). R. PATAI, Israel between East and West (Philadelphia 1953). D. BEN-GURION, Rebirth and Destiny of Israel, ed. and tr. M. NUROCK (New York 1954). C. WEIZMANN, Trial and Error (New York 1949). G. E. IRANI, The Papacy and the Middle East: The Role of the Holy See in the Arab- Israeli Conflict, 1962–1984 (Notre Dame, IN 1996). L. ROKACH, The Catholic Church and the Question of Palestine (Atlantic Highlands, NJ 1987). A. J. KENNY, Catholics, Jews, and the State of Israel (Mahwah, NY 1993). A. KREUTZ, Vatican Policy on the Palestinian-Israeli Conflict (Westport, CT 1990). J. RATZINGER, Many Religions, One Covenant: Israel, the Church, and the World (San Francisco 1999). Bilan du Monde Encyclopédie catholique du monde chrétien, 2 v. (2d ed. Tournai 1964). 2:504–511.

[M. J. STIASSNY/EDS.]

ISTE CONFESSOR DOMINI COLENTES

Office hymn that was traditionally sung at Vespers and Matins in the Common of confessors, bishops, and non-bishops. It is written in four-line stanzas, three sapphics and one adonic. It is of unknown authorship and is found in many MSS dating back to the tenth century, although it is conjectured to have been composed in the eighth century or earlier. The hymn extols the virtues of the saint, recounts cures wrought through his intercession, and asks for his continued assistance. The text was altered considerably in the Roman Breviary of 1632, only four lines remaining unchanged.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 51:134–135, text. J. CONNELLY, ed. and tr., Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, Md. 1957), tr. and commentary. G. M. DREVES, Ein Jahrtausend lateinischer Hymnendichtung, 2 v. (Leipzig 1909). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953).

[M. A. MALONE]

ITA OF KILLEEDY, ST.

Also known as Deidre, Ida, Meda, Mida, or Ytha of Killeedy (from “Cell Ite” meaning Church of Ita); called also Clúain Credail, virgin, patron of the Úi Chonail Gabra (a people inhabiting the western part of the plain of Limerick); b. Drum, County Waterford; d. 570 or 577. According to her genealogies (apparently later than the Lives), Ita was the daughter of Cenn-fáelad of the Déissi. Although the four accounts of her life probably go back to a very early original, no satisfactory information can be gleaned from them until they are critically examined and interpreted. The annals state that the Corcu Óche were defeated through her prayers in 553. Dedications in Cornwall and reference to her in a poem of ALCUIN show that her fame extended far beyond the plain of Limerick. The beautiful poem Ísucán (“Jesukin”) traditionally attributed to her was rather inspired by her legend c. 900.

Feast: Jan. 15.

Bibliography: Sources. Annals of Inisfallen, ed. and tr. SEÁN MAC AIRT (Dublin 1951), under years 553, 570, with additions from the legend of Brendan of Clonfert. Genealogies. Analecta Bollandiana 46 (1928) 121. M. Ó. CLÉRIGH, Genealogiae regum et sanctorum Hiberniae, ed. P. WALSH (Archivium Hibernicum 5; Dublin 1918). C. PLUMMER, comp., Vitae sanctorum Hiberniae, 2 v. (Oxford 1910) 1:1xxii, n.6. G. MURPHY, ed., Early Irish Lyrics: Eighth to Twelfth Century (Oxford 1956) 26–29, 183–184, “Ísucán.” Literature. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 389–390, 779. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:96–97.

[C. MCGRATH]

ITALO-ALBANIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (EASTERN CATHOLIC)

The Italo-Albanian Catholic Church comprises the faithful of the Albanian colonies in Italy, grouped into the Eparchies of Lungro (Cosenza) and Piana degli Albanesi (Palermo). This is a remnant of a once widespread Italo-Greek Church throughout southern Italy, with numerous parish churches and Greek monasteries, formed from the refugees from the Byzantine Empire when it fell under Turkish domination in 1453.

At the end of the 20th century, the only remaining example of the once vibrant Italo-Greek Church was the Basilian monastery of GROTTAFERRATA, founded by Saint Nilo of Rossano in 1004, on the slopes of the Tusculan hills within the boundaries of the suburban Diocese of Frascati. The Holy See, after providing for the restoration of the ancient ecclesial and liturgical traditions of this Church in all its purity at the monastery, elevated it with the constitution Pervetustum Cryptaeferatae Coenobium (Sept. 26, 1937) to the rank of an exarchate, equivalent to a Latin territorial abbacy. However, in the pontifical documents and in ancient and modern accounts, no distinction is made between Italo-Greeks and Italo-Albanians.

Immigration to Italy. The first Albanian immigrations into Italy have not been precisely dated. The only certainty is that relatively large groups landed on the Italian shores between the middle of the 15th century and the 18th century. There were various reasons for the Albanian migrations, but two were particularly important: military service and the danger of falling under Turkish oppression.

In 1468 the Albanian hero Giorgio Castriota, known as Skanderbeg, died in Alessio. Later, Krujë, the stronghold of Albanian resistance against the repeated attacks of the Ottoman army, fell. These two losses extinguished the Albanians' hope of liberty and of reconquest. In the hope of fleeing Turkish oppression, many families preferred exile and migrated to the Italian peninsula.

It is impossible to determine the number of immigrations or the size of each group of immigrants. All we know is that the refugees settled in uninhabited areas or abandoned villages of Apulia, Abbruzzi e Molise, Lucania, Calabria, and Sicily. Historians do not agree as to the number of the Italo-Albanian colonies. Some put the figure at 62, others at 82, and still more recent estimates have gone as high as 120. This last figure seems closest to the truth inasmuch as it is confirmed by the most recent studies of the archives.

Most of the Albanians who sought refuge in Italy belonged to the Albanian Orthodox Church, as the great majority of them came from the south-central regions of Albania. Thus the Italo-Greek Church, already in complete decline, was restored to vigor by the new refugees from Albania.

Conflicting Jurisdiction. The presence of the Albanian Orthodox Christians on Italian soil, however, brought new difficulties concerning their relations with the local bishops and with the Latin population in the surrounding areas or in the same localities. These problems related to the provision of means for training the clergy who were to look after the needs of the Albanians according to the traditions and usages of the Christian East.

Evidently, when the Albanians settled in Latin territory, they automatically came under the jurisdiction of the Latin ordinaries. However, the latter were unacquainted with Greek ecclesial and liturgical traditions and did not hide a certain aversion and condescension toward them. For their part the Albanians, attached as they were to their Byzantine traditions and customs, had no intention of submitting to Latin practices that were alien to their own. Hence they more readily turned to prelates of their own Church.

The popes of the first half of the 16th century intervened several times in favor of the Italo-Greeks. The Al-banians benefited thereby, since they shared a common tradition with the Italo-Greeks and thus tended to be identified with them.

In his brief of May 18, 1521, Leo X ruled that the Greek liturgical rite was to be freely professed among the Latins; he conceded that the Greek prelates could celebrate pontifical functions in the Latin dioceses and commanded each Latin bishop to appoint a Greek vicar for the Greek faithful of his diocese; in areas where there were two bishops, a Greek and a Latin, each one was to exercise jurisdiction over the faithful according to their ecclesial traditions.

In the constitution of Dec. 23, 1534, Paul III confirmed all the concessions of Leo X and recognized as legitimate the ecclesial, disciplinary, liturgical customs of the Italo-Greek Catholic Church, e.g., the Byzantine formula of Baptism, the marriage of the clergy before receiving sacred orders, their wearing of beards, and the administration of triple sacraments of baptism, chrismation and the Eucharist to newly baptized infants. Two years later the same pontiff permitted Josaphat Lampos, Metropolitan of Rhodes who had taken refuge in Italy, to exercise jurisdiction over his Greek faithful residing on the peninsula.

In 1553 Julius III confirmed the same faculties for Italy and Sicily for Pafnuzio, who was consecrated archbishop of Agrigento by Prochoro, Archbishop of Ochrida. Other refugee bishops from the Eastern regions exercised an occasional ministry, administering the Sacraments and especially advancing candidates of the Greek Church to holy orders.

While the Catholic faith of many Greek prelates may have been open to question, the Italo-Albanians, confident in the possession of privileges granted them by the Roman pontiffs, addressed themselves in good faith to Bishops of the Albanian Orthodox Church for sacred ordinations, since they had no ordaining Byzantine Catholic bishop.

The occasional interference of the Greek prelates in the Italo-Albanian colonies and probably the aspirations of the latter to have their own bishop appeared to the ordinaries of the place as seriously prejudicial to their own jurisdictional powers. Thus the ancient aversion and distrust between Greeks and Latins soon revived. Appeals were made to the Holy See accusing the Italo-Albanians of heresies, errors, and lack of discipline. It was said that they did not admit the existence of purgatory or the primacy of the Roman pontiff, that they did not observe the feasts of the Blessed Virgin Mary, of the Holy Apostles, and of the other saints of the Roman Church; that they administered Communion to infants, etc.

The accusations so alarmed Pope Pius IV that he issued the constitution Romanus Pontifex (Feb. 16, 1564) revoking all concessions and privileges granted by his predecessors and subjecting all Greek institutions, clerics and faithful to the full and exclusive jurisdiction of the Latin ordinaries. Consequently, the authority to supervise Byzantine churches, to regulate the divine worship, and to administer the Sacraments devolved upon Latin bishops. These regulations notwithstanding, the pope declared that he did not intend to encourage the faithful to abandon their Byzantine heritage, not even when they were forbidden by their own Latin ordinaries or others from professing their rite freely.

But while this was the will of the Holy See, the bishops did not hold the same views. Therefore the Italo-Albanian Church, deprived of its own hierarchy, without its own seminary in which to educate new recruits for holy orders, unappreciated and misunderstood by the Latin prelates and clerics, lapsed into a decline in discipline and in the observance of its rite.

Attempts at Reform. Meanwhile the pastoral visitations, which became more frequent in accordance with the decrees of the Council of Trent, had turned the attention of the authorities to the Italo-Albanians. In answer to continued requests by the interested ordinaries, the Holy See entrusted the solution of these questions to a commission, which met in 1593. The results of its labors were summarized in the Instructio super ritibus Italo-graecorum transmitted by Clement VIII on Aug. 31, 1595, to the Latin bishops in whose territory resided the Italo-Albanians.

The Clementine instruction eliminated some of the more obvious abuses and established an ordaining bishop for the Greeks in Rome; unfortunately, it banned or modified several legitimate customs and traditions of the Greek church. Besides, it let it be known that its restrictive regulations were based on doubts regarding the orthodoxy of the Italo-Albanians, and it consequently gave a place of preeminence to the Latin rite.

The most significant regulations were: priests of the Byzantine rite were forbidden to administer Confirmation after Baptism, the use of the portable altar was recommended, and the use of antimensium tolerated. The indicative Latin form was to be used in sacramental formulae, rather than the indirect Byzantine form. A Latin husband did not have to observe the Greek rite of his wife; and a Latin wife did not have to observe the Greek rite of her husband. A Greek wife was encouraged to observe the rite of her Latin husband; the children followed the father's rite unless the Latin mother insisted otherwise. The use of meat was allowed on Saturday, and it was also permissible not to fast on the Saturdays of Lent.

It was stressed that it would be best if the Greeks were induced, without constraint, to observe the fasts and vigils of the Latin Church. In addition, they were required to observe the days of obligation of the Latin Church, and follow the Latin liturgical calendar.

The consequences of the Clementine regulations were highly detrimental to the Italo-Albanian community. Individuals, family groups, and entire regions turned to the Latin Church under duress from Latin prelates. The causes were varied, but the most compelling reason was to avoid finding themselves in a position of inferiority or ridicule, because they were Byzantines. Another contributing factor was the lack of Italo-Albanian clergy to replace those who died. The vacant posts were ultimately occupied by the Latin clergy, who looked upon the traditions and customs of Byzantine Christianity with disdain.

Growth in Calabria. To curb the fearful decline into extinction, to which the Italo-Albanian Church was headed, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, toward the end of 1625, began to consider the erection of an Italo-Albanian seminary at Reggio Calabria. Difficulties of every sort, raised by the civil and ecclesiastical authorities of the locality, delayed its realization for another century.

Finally, in 1732, Clement XII erected a seminary for the Italo-Albanians of the Kingdom of Naples at San Benedetto Ullano (Cosenza) and named it Collegio Corsini after his own ancestral name. In 1735 the pope named the ordaining bishop for the Italo-Albanians to the presidency of the college. However, mistrust still prevailed. The territorial jurisdiction of the new prelate was circumscribed by the walls of the college, extending neither to the ecclesiastics nor to the Italo-Albanian faithful. He was permitted to visit the Italo-Albanian churches only with the previous permission of the Latin ordinaries, who retained the authority to have the wishes of the Albanian bishop executed at their own discretion.

The series of ordaining bishops began with Felice Samuele Rodotà (1735–40); nine others succeeded practically without interruption until 1912. With a few laudable exceptions these prelates generally took little interest in the seminary and practically none at all in the Albanian colonies.

The pope had a twofold purpose in conferring the presidency of Collegio Corsini upon a bishop: (1) to take away from the Latin bishops the formation of the Italo-Albanian clergy, so that the latter might be educated according to Byzantine tradition, and (2) to give the Latin bishops an auxiliary for the government of the Albanian parishes within their boundaries. Unfortunately, the pope's expectations were frustrated either by the incompetence of men, by the defects of the institutions and the lack of support by suspicious Latin prelates.

The Collegio Corsini was opposed first of all by the episcopal curia of Bisignano. In 1794, since the building was no longer adequate, it was transferred to San Demetrio Corone (Cosenza), on the site of the Basilian monastery of Saint Adrian. The college had a brief moment of splendor, but the incompetence of some of the presidents and poor administration caused its decline, until finally, following the political events of 1860, it became the property of the Italian state.

On the one hand, the ordaining bishops were never looked upon favorably by the Latin prelates, and consequently were never given the authority and jurisdiction over the Italo-Albanian faithful that Clement XII had envisaged. On the other hand, it must be admitted that not all the blame lay with intransigent Latin bishops. The Italo-Albanian bishops themselves did not always prove themselves equal to the mission entrusted to them.

Sicily. Things were not much better in Sicily. Here too the Albanian colonies were threatened with decline. A holy priest, Father Giorgio Guzzetta (1682–1756), an Italo-Albanian from Piana and member of the Congregation of the Oratory, founded a house of the Oratory in his own region, where he gathered together some celibate Byzantine priests. Within a short time they were able to open a school for young boys. In 1734, as had happened in Calabria, an Italo-Albanian seminary was opened near the Greek parish of Saint Nicholas in order to assure the colonies the supply of Byzantine clergy. The institution proved very valuable to the colonies and proved itself a vital cultural center. Father Guzzetta was anxious also to obtain an ordaining bishop for the Albanians of Sicily and to this end initiated proceedings with the competent authorities. In 1784 Pius VI satisfied this noble aspiration by promulgating the bull Commissa nobis.

Papal Intervention. The initiatives taken both in Calabria and Sicily, while very good, never settled the Italo-Albanian problems in a definitive way. Moreover, the legislative intervention of Benedict XIV in Etsi pastoralis did not attain its purpose because it was not free from defects, including the failure to understand the mentality of the Italo-Albanians.

In the above-mentioned bull, published on May 26, 1742, Benedict XIV reworked the earlier legislation for the Italo-Albanians and presented a new and very precise statute whose purpose was to eliminate all jurisdictional controversies between Italo-Albanians and Latins arising from shared ecclesial jurisdiction, which in practice meant that legitimate Byzantine traditions and usages were overwhelmed by Latin ones.

The fundamental principle underlying the Benedictine constitution was the superiority of the Latin rite, as the rite of the Holy Roman Church, the mother and teacher of all the Churches. There was greater reason for this superiority in Italian regions where the Albanians were subject to Latin bishops. In the light of this principle, Etsi pastoralis not only maintained the restrictive regulations of the Clementine instruction, but introduced a few more restrictive regulations. It called for the continued use of the FILIOQUE in the recitation of the Creed wherever it was already in use, and in certain instances it imposed the use of the filioque where it was not used. Communion under both species was restricted to places where it was still the custom, but the Latin faithful attending the Eucharist at Italo-Albanian Churches were forbidden to receive Communion in the form of leavened bread. The Greek faithful were permitted to receive Communion in the form of unleavened bread where there was no Greek parish. They were authorized to erect altars or chapels in addition to the main altar, so that Mass could be celebrated in either the Latin or the Greek rite. It prohibited the return to the Greek rite without special authorization of the Holy See of anyone who had received the simple tonsure or other minor orders in the Latin rite without apostolic dispensation, etc.

It was certainly not the intention of Benedict XIV to harm the Italo-Albanian Church in Italy. On the contrary, he expressly declared that he wanted to preserve it, enjoined the Latin ordinaries and clergy not to oppose it, and finally urged the Italo-Albanians to be faithful to their own legitimate traditions and customs. However, an eventual rigorous application of any of the regulations could not have failed to produce deleterious effects. Sometimes this proved to be true, and conflict between the Latin hierarchy and the Italo-Albanian faithful revived. It was due to the tenaciousness of the Italo-Albanians and to the unsuccessful exequatur of the Neapolitan government for Sicily that the decisions of the constitution did not have more harmful effects for the wider Italo-Albanian community in Italy.

In the second half of the 19th century a new attitude developed, resulting from a better understanding of the problems involved. Etsi pastoralis was supplemented by the constitution Orientalium dignitas of 1894, in which Leo XIII recognized the equality and dignity of the Italo-Albanian Church. From that time until the present there has been an uninterrupted succession of pontifical interventions to safeguard its legitimate traditions, laws and liturgical rites.

Organization and Structure. As presently constituted, the Italo-Albanian Catholic Church comprises two eparchies of equal rank and dignity. The eparchy of Lun-

Capital: Rome.
Size: 116,313 sq. miles.
Population: 57,634,327 in 2000.
Languages: Italian; German, French, and Slovene are spoken in some regions.
Religions: 85% Catholic, with relatively small populations of Muslims (1,000,000), Protestants (400,000), and Jews (30,000).

gro (in Calabria) was created on Feb. 13, 1919, by the constitution Catholici fideles. It covers all of southern Italy and includes 27 parishes, having jurisdiction over the Italo-Albanian Church in continental Italy. The eparchy of Piana degli Albanesi, was created by the constitution Apostolica sedes of Oct. 26, 1937. It covers the island of Sicily and includes 15 parishes, including the five Albanian colonies of Sicily: Piana degli Albanesi, Mezzoiuso, Palazzo Adriano, Contessa Entellina, and Santa Cristina Gela.

Bibliography: E. BENEDETTI, "La S. Congregazione di Propaganda Fide e gli Italo-greci del Regno di Napoli," Roma e l'Oriente 17 (1919) 52–61; 18 (1919) 37–52; 19 (1920) 56–69; 20 (1921) 91–99. A. FORTESCUE, The Uniate Eastern Churches: The Byzantine Rite in Italy, Sicily, Syria and Egypt, ed. G. D. SMITH, (New York 1923). C. GATTI and C. KOROLEVSKII, Il rito bizantino e le Chiese bizantine, v.1 of I riti e le Chiese orientali (Genova 1942). Oriente Cattolico: Cenni storici e statistiche (Vatican City 1962). D. ZANGARI, Le colonie italo albanesi di Calabria: Storia e demografia secoli XV–XIX (Naples 1941). R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey (6th ed. Rome 1999).

[M. PETTA/EDS.]

ITALY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in southern Europe, the Italian Republic is a peninsular region, bordered on the north by Switzerland and Austria, on the northeast by Slovakia, on the east by the Adriatic Sea, on the south by the Ionian Sea, on the west by the Mediterranean Sea and on the northwest by France. Several islands, among them Sicily, Sardinia, Elba, Capri and Ischia, are scattered along its long coast. The region is traversed by the Apennines mountain range, and mountains also form its northern boundaries. Moving southward from greater Europe, the mountains level to a great plain cut by the Po River as well as several large lakes. The southern part of the country is hot and dry, while an alpine climate characterizes the far north. Natural resources include mercury, marble, some natural gas and petroleum and coal; agricultural products consist of fruits, vegetables, grapes, potatoes, sugar beets, soybeans, grains and olives.

The area that comprises the modern state of Italy never formed a political unit during the first 15 centuries of Christianity, and for many centuries the region was ruled by petty states. Napoleon formed the Kingdom of Italy in 1805, and by 1870 the region had attained its modern political boundaries. Following World War I, the fascist leader Benito Mussolini seized control, and the region entered World War II as an ally of Germany. In 1946 it became a republic, and joined NATO as a charter member in 1949. Italy has been a major force in the political and economic unification of Europe as part of the European Economic Community (EEC) and adopted the euro in 1999. Northern Italy is more industrialized, and hence more affluent, than the agricultural south, which is troubled by organized crime, corruption and unemployment, which reached 20 percent by 2000.

The following essay is divided into three parts: the beginnings of Christianity to 1500, from 1500 to 1789 and from 1789 to the present.

EARLY HISTORY TO 1500

Christianity penetrated Italy soon after the death of Christ. A Christian community existed in Rome before the middle of the 1st century and served as the principal center for the dissemination of the new faith in Italy under the ROMAN EMPIRE. Christianity faced greater obstacles in Italy than in lands to the east, for in the West both the government and the aristocracy, wedded to the state religion as part of the Roman way of life, regarded it as a debased superstition. The rural classes clung to local cults, some of which would survive as late as the 6th century, and the Oriental mystery religions rivaled Christianity in attractive power among those who sought spiritual salvation.

The primary area of diffusion for Christianity during the first two centuries was central and southern Italy, where it was irradiated from Rome and from other towns that had Eastern connections and contained Greek, Jewish or Syrian colonies. In Rome itself the Christian Church was for several generations an immigrant church, composed largely of people from the Greek-speaking Levant. In fact, Greek was the official language of the Church in Rome until the end of the 2d century, when Latin members gained predominance and the Latin language replaced Greek [see LATIN (IN THE CHURCH)]. While by 250 the Roman community probably exceeded 25,000 members, outside the city Christian communities were small. In northern Italy, as distinguished from peninsular Italy, Christianity spread much more slowly.

During the first two centuries Italian Christians encountered sporadic attacks from hostile Jews and pagans, but the Roman government was generally tolerant. The

Metropolitan Sees	Suffragan Sees
Ecclesiastical Region of Abruzzi-Molise
Campobasso-Bouiano	Isérmia-Venafroi, Termoli-Larino, Trivento
Chieto-Vaso	*Lanciano-Ortonay
L' Aquila	Avezzano, Sulmona-Valva
Pescara-Penne	Teramo-Atri
Ecclesiastical Region of Basilicata
Potenza-Muro Lucano-Marisco Nuovo	*Acerenza, *Matera-Irsinaans, Melfi-Rapolla-Venosa, Tricarico, Tursi-Lagonegro
Ecclesiastical Region of Calabria
Catanzaro-Squillace	*Crotone-Santa Severina, Lamezia Terme
Cosenza Bisignano	Cassano all'Jonio, *Rossano-Cariati, San Marco Argentano-Scalea
Reggio Calabria-Bova	Locri-Gerace, Mileto-Nicotera-Tropea, Oppido Mamertina-Palmi
Ecclesiastical Region of Campania
Benevento	Ariano Irpino-Lacedonia, Avellino, Cerreto Sannita-Telese-Sant'Agata de' Goti, *Angelo dei Lombardi-Conza-Nusco-Bisaccia
Napoli	Acerra, Alife-Caiazzo, Aversa, Ischia, Nola, Pozzuoli, Sessa Arunca, Teano-Calvi, *Caserta, *Sorrento-Castellamare di Stabia
Salerno-Campagna-Acerno	Nocera Inferiore-Sarno, Teggiano-Policastro, Vallo della Lucania, *Amalfi-Cava de' Tirreni
Ecclesiastical Region of Emilia-Romagna
Bologna	Faenza-Modigliana, Imola, *Ferrara-Comacchio
Modena-Nonantola	Carpi, Fidenza, Parma, Piacenza-Bobbio, Reggio Emilia-Guastalla
Ravenna-Cervia	Cesena-Sarsina, Forli-Bertinoro, Rimini, San Marino-Montefeltro
Ecclesiastical Region of Latium
Roma	Suburbicarian Churches: Frascati, Ostia, Palestrina, Porto-Santa Rufina, Sabina-Poggio Mirteto, Velletri-Segni Immediately subject to the Holy See: *Gaeta, Anagni-Alatri, Civita Castellana, Civitavecchia-Tarquini, Frosinone-Veroli-Ferentino, Latina-Terracina-Sezze-Priverno, Rieti, Sora-Aquino-Pontecorvo, Tivoli, Viterbo
Ecclesiastical Region of Liguria
Genova	Albenga-Imperia, Chiavari, La Spezia-Sarzana-Brugnato, Savona-Noli, Tortona, Ventimiglia-San Remo
Ecclesiastical Region of Lombardy
Milan	Bergamo, Brescia, Como, Crema, Cremona, Lodi, Mantova, Pavia, Vigevano
Ecclesiastical Region of the Marches
Ancona-Osimo	Fabriano-Matelica, Jesi, Senigallia
Fermo	Ascoli Piceno, *Camerino-San Severino Marche, Macerata-Tolentino-Recanati-Cingoli-Treia, San Benedetto del Tronto-Ripatransone-Montalto
Pesaro	Fano-Fossombrone-Cagli-Pergola, *Urbino-Urbania-Sant'Angelo in Vado
Ecclesiastical Region of Piedmont
Torino	Acqui, Alba, Aosta, Asti, Cuneo, Fossano, Ivrea, Mondovì, Pinerolo, Saluzzo, Susa
Vercelli	Alessandria, Biella, Casale Monferrato, Novara

earliest known persecution by the government—in Rome after the great fire in 64—was only temporary. From that time on the profession of Christianity was a criminal offense, the definition and prosecution of which was left to the magistrates. Not until the 3d century were persecutions instituted by the emperors. Then in the throes of a military crisis, the government tried to rally its subjects by demanding loyalty tests in the form of general sacri-

Metropolitan Sees	Suffragan Sees
Ecclesiastical Region of Puglia
Bari-Bitonto	Altamura-Gravina-Aquaviva delle Fonti, Andria, Conversano-Monopoli, Molfetta-Ruvo-Giovinazzo-Terlizzi, *Trani-Barletta-Bisceglie
Foggia-Bovino	Cerignola-Ascoli Satriano, Lucera-Troia, San Severo, *Manfredonia-Vieste
Lecce	Nardò-Gallipoli, Ugento-Santa Maria de Leuca, *Brindisi-Ostunia, *Otranto
Taranto	Castellaneta, Oria
Ecclesiastical Region of Sardinia
Cagliari	Iglesias, Lanusei, Nuoro
Oristano	Ales-Terralba
Sassari	Alghero-Bosa, Ozieri, Tempio-Ampurias
Ecclesiastical Region of Sicily
Agrigento	Caltanissetta, Piazza Armerina
Catania	Acireale, Caltagirone
Messina-Lipari-Santa Lucia del Mela	Nicosia, Patti
Palermo	Cefalù, Mazara del Vallo, *Monreale, Trapani
Siracusa	Noto, Ragusa
Ecclesiastical Region of Tuscany
Firenze	Arezzo-Cortona-Sansepolcro, Fiesole, Pistoia, Prato, San Miniato
Pisa	Livorni, Massa Carrara-Pontremoli, Pescia, Volterra
Siena-Colle di Val d'Elsa-Montalcino	Grosseto, Massa Marittima-Piombino, Montepulciano-Chiusi-Pienza, Pitigliano-Sovana-Orbetello
Lucca
Ecclesiastical Region of Triveneto
Gorizia	Trieste
Trento	Bolzano-Bressanone
Udine
Veneto (patriarchate)	Adria-Rovigo, Belluno-Feltre, Chioggia, Concordia-Pordenone, Padova, Treviso, Verona, Vicenza, Vittorio Veneto
Ecclesiastical Region of Umbria
Perugia-Città delle Pieve	Assisi-Nocera Umbra-Gualdo Tadino, Città di Castello, Foligno, Gubbio
Immediately subject to the Holy See:	*Spoleto-Norcia, Orvieto-Todi, Terni-Nardi-Amelia
*Suffragan archdiocese
The pope is the bishop of Rome. There are seven territorial abbeys in Italy and three prelatures, as well as a military ordinariate. The Italo-Albanian Church has eparchies at Lungro and at Piana on the island of Sicily, as well as a territorial abbey in Italy.

fices to the gods on behalf of the emperor. The refusal of Christians to comply led to a succession of empire-wide persecutions, the most violent being those under Emperors DECIUS (250–251), VALERIAN (257–259) and DIOCLETIAN (303–304). The Roman Church, as the leading Christian community in the West, suffered severely; a list of martyrs from the 5th century records 275 martyrs for peninsular Italy and the islands (Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica) and 30 for northern Italy. The failure of Diocletian's persecution prompted Emperor GALERIUS to issue an edict of toleration in 311. The more inclusive policy of toleration agreed upon by Emperor CONSTANTINE I and Licinius at Milan in 312 and generalized throughout the empire in 313 established the Peace of the Church [see MILAN, EDICT (AGREEMENT) OF]. Christianity now entered upon a period of rapid growth.

Creation of the Diocese. By the end of the 2d century the main outlines of episcopal diocesan organization in peninsular Italy had been clearly drawn, although in the north only three dioceses—Milan, AQUILEIA and RAVENNA—have been dated before 314, although others such as Parenzo (modern Poreč, Yugoslavia), Verona and Brescia may also have originated earlier. Because the northern bishoprics were much larger than those of central and southern Italy, when Italy's diocesan organization had been largely mapped out, c. 600, there were only 53 bishoprics in the entire north as contrasted with at least 197 in the south and center. The bishop of Rome was the metropolitan for peninsular Italy, but three metropolitan jurisdictions had been established in the north by the 5th century: Milan for Liguria, Aquileia for Venetia and Istria, and Ravenna for Emilia.

In accordance with ancient custom, Italian bishops were elected by the clergy and people of their dioceses, the rank and file of the laity participating through acclamation. In the disorders caused by the decay of the empire in the West and the influx of the Barbarian Nations, the bishops assumed a position of leadership in their region. They protected people against the barbarians, organized public services to aid the poor and helped ransom captives. Many public functions passed into their hands, and in 554 the Pragmatic Sanction issued by Emperor JUS-

“St. Justina” from “High Altar of St. Anthony” by Donatello, Basilica of Sant’Antonio, Padua, Italy. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

TINIAN I legalized the governmental functions that the Italian bishops had assumed.

Italy’s ecclesiastical organization was finished by the 8th century. With rural parishes now in existence, Christianity ceased to be primarily a city religion. The first parishes formed part of a closely regulated hierarchical structure subject to the bishops as their founders.

The Early Middle Ages: 500–1000. The main challenge of the medieval Church was to incorporate barbarian immigrants into the existing Church structure. The establishment of Germanic kingdoms in Italy during the 5th and 6th centuries created a heretical Arian church (see ARIANISM) alongside the older Catholic organization. Arian Ostrogoth king THEODORIC THE GREAT (493–526) regarded his rule as a continuation of the Roman Empire; he allowed the existing Catholic establishment to remain, thus causing a belated flowering of Romano-Christian literature through such Christian scholars as BOETHIUS, CASSIODORUS and ENNODIUS of Pavia. Under his successors the Gothic power in Italy was destroyed by Emperor Justinian in a long and devastating war (535–554). This Byzantine restoration proved ephemeral, however, for in 568 Italy was invaded by the Germanic LOMBARDS. Recent converts to Arianism, the Lombards treated Italians and their clergy harshly, destroying or exiling much of the Catholic hierarchy. They established a kingdom in northern Italy with its capital at Pavia, to which were connected the Lombard duchies of Spoleto and Benevento. The Duchy of Rome, including part of Tuscany and the Exarchate of Ravenna, together with the Duchy of Naples, the extreme south and Sicily, remained Byzantine.

Relations between the papacy and the Lombards improved under Lombard Queen Theudelinda. An anti-Catholic reaction followed, but in the course of the 7th century both the monarchy and people embraced Catholicism. Even after conversion the Lombard kings did not collaborate closely with the Church, nor did they include churchmen in their government. Furthermore, faced by the possibility of another Byzantine reconquest, the Lombards continually encroached upon the Exarchate of Ravenna and threatened Rome. The Byzantine government, absorbed in problems in the East, did not furnish adequate military protection, making the papacy under Gregory I and his successors the effective leaders of the Italo-Romans against any extension of Lombard power into the south.

The 8th century witnessed the culmination of long-standing tensions between the PAPACY and the Byzantine emperors (see BYZANTINE CHURCH), regarded as “Caesaropapists” who claimed the right to ratify papal elections and to intervene in doctrinal matters. Emperor Justinian had compelled Pope VIGILIUS to sanction the condemnation of the THREE CHAPTERS by the fifth ecumenical council, CONSTANTINOPLE II (553), thus precipitating a schism in Italy, where the measure was deemed heretical. Emperors HERACLIUS in 638 and CONSTANS II in 648 supported the heresy of MONOTHELITISM and Constans arrested and exiled Pope MARTIN I to the Crimea when he condemned the imperial decree TYPOS. The Isaurian emperors of the 8th century espoused ICONOCLASM, driving thousands of Greek monks to southern Italy and Rome. Popes GREGORY II (715–731) and GREGORY III (731–741) opposed the iconoclastic decrees of Emperor LEO III, who retaliated by confiscating papal estates in Calabria and Sicily. When Gregory III called a synod in Rome (731) that excluded image-breakers from the Church, he was supported by the people of central Italy.

The crisis came in 751, when Lombard King Aistulf captured Ravenna and threatened the Duchy of Rome. Byzantine military power in central Italy collapsed, and without protection against the Lombards the papacy turned to the rising power of the FRANKS in the north. In 754 Pope STEPHEN II crossed the Alps and made a personal appeal to Frankish King PEPIN III the Short, conferring upon him and his sons the title of PATRICIUS ROMANORUM, which carried the responsibility of defending Rome. In campaigns in 754–755 and 756 Pepin regained the territory of the exarchate, which he conferred upon the papacy, thus creating the STATES OF THE CHURCH.

The Franco-papal alliance was consummated in the reign of Pepin’s son CHARLEMAGNE. In 774 he intervened in Italy on an appeal from Pope ADRIAN I (772–795) against Lombard King DESIDERIUS. Defeating and dethroning Desiderius, Charlemagne conquered the Lombard kingdom and assumed the title of King of the Lombards, bestowing it upon his infant son in 781. His coronation as Roman emperor by Pope LEO III in 800 gave a firm basis to Carolingian protection of the Church and at the same time permanently liberated the papacy from Byzantine control. For the next five centuries the destinies of Italy were bound up with the Carolingian kings and their successors in Germany.

The courtyard of the Strozzi Palace in Florence, Italy, 1489–1497. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Carolingian Italy. The Frankish semitheocratic conception of royal power was now transplanted to Italy, where it transformed Church-State relations. The assembly at Pavia came to include bishops as well as lay magnates. The royal right to confirm any episcopal election in the Lombard kingdom was established, together with the principle that a bishopric was in part a royal office involving obligations to the State, and that the bishop-elect must be the king's faithful servitor (fidelis). By the Roman edict of 824, LOTHAIR I, co-emperor with Louis I the Pious, affirmed the right of the emperor to confirm papal elections as well.

Various Frankish reforms were also introduced by the Carolingians, such as the civil enforcement of ecclesiastical TITHES and their assignment to the parish churches. Some Italian bishops voluntarily adopted for their cathedral clergy the communal life that CHRODEGANG OF METZ had designed for his episcopal family and that had become the norm in Frankish cathedrals. A general capitulary issued by Louis the Pious in 817 made the Benedictine Rule binding upon all monasteries in his empire and demanded the observance of the vita canonica by all cathedral chapters.

Although by no means fruitless, these reforms would be largely negated by the growth of FEUDALISM, which together with a new wave of invasions contributed to the collapse of the empire after 850. Many bishoprics and abbeys benefited from royal grants of immunity, which freed them from the authority of local state officials and in their more positive form granted the churches judicial and taxing powers over their tenants and serfs. During the course of the 9th century the more destructive aspects of feudalism became visible. Bishops acquired bodies of vassals in order to fulfill their obligations to the State, and carved benefices for these vassals out of church property. By the close of the century even parish churches and tithes were being infeudated in this manner.

Christ crowning one of the Norman kings of Sicily (William II), 12th-century mosaic at Monreale, Sicily, Italy.

An art exhibition entitled "Michelangelo's Youth," Palazzo Vecchio, Florence, Italy, October 7, 1999. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Kingdom of Italy: 889–962. Family feuds and internecine wars caused the demise of the Carolingian Empire. In 888, following the deposition of Emperor Charles III the Fat, Italy was detached from the empire and formed a separate kingdom, but it was a kingdom devoid of national character. The large number of Frankish and Alemannian soldiers and officials who had immigrated to Italy during the 9th century had often been appointed counts, and some of them had become founders of principalities in Italy. The struggles of the kings of Italy from 889 to 962 were mere contests for personal power. Furthermore, the region's growing anarchy was intensified by Muslim and Hungarian invasions. Saracens conquered Sicily in the 9th century, and southern Italy was also threatened. A Saracen attack on the suburbs of Rome in 843 later prompted Pope LEO IV to build the Leonine Wall, and under his leadership the maritime towns of Naples, Gaeta and Amalfi combined their navies and inflicted a crushing defeat on the Saracens off Ostia (849). Emperor Louis II (d. 875) devoted his life to campaigning against the Saracens in the south. The Hungarian invasions (c. 899–950), reaching as far south as Otranto, were equally devastating. Without a central government capable of defending the country, Italy became increasingly fragmented and feudalized as bishops and abbots as well as lay magnates built castles or strengthened existing walls.

By the end of the 9th century the papacy had become an almost purely local institution, the tool of Roman factions who dominated the elections (see CRESCENTII; TUSCULANI). Attempts on the part of individual popes to secure foreign protection or to carry out needed reforms produced no lasting results, and the north Italian episcopate was increasingly immersed in political struggles. As royal nominees, the bishops were in effect assimilated to the status of royal vassals, although a few prelates, such as RATHERIUS of Verona and ATTO of Vercelli, still demanded the enforcement of canonical rules.

Pope John Paul II, under canopy, during the beatification ceremony of three Servants of God, St. Peter's Square, Vatican City. In the background hang tapestries of the beatified: Bishop Giovanni Battista Scalabrini (l), Bishop Vilmos Apor, and Sister Dorotea Chayez (r). (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Ottonian Period: German Intervention and Rule. The intervention of German King OTTO I (936–973) in Italian politics and his assumption of the Lombard crown in 951 after defeating King Berengar II meant that there was once again a strong Germanic power in Italy. In 962 Otto intervened in Rome to protect Pope JOHN XII against the continued encroachments of Berengar and was crowned Roman emperor by the pope, thus reviving the empire of Charlemagne and establishing the personal union between Germany and Italy later known as the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE.

Under Otto I, Italy was annexed to the German monarchy. The Ottonian (or Saxon) emperors used the Church as their principal instrument of government. Royal control of episcopal elections, already practiced in northern Italy, was now extended to the Romano-Ravennate territory. Otto forced Roman electors to recognize his right of approval and to choose two successive popes of his designation. He regularly nominated aristocratic bishops to Italian sees; some he made counts as well, thus conveying to them full political as well as spiritual authority over their cities and districts; from all he demanded the customary feudal services, including the furnishing of military contingents to his army. Similar measures were applied to the great Benedictine abbeys.

The reign of Emperor OTTO II (973–983) witnessed the growing power of the lesser feudatories (secundi milites or vavasors), many of whom were Church vassals. The emperor's efforts were devoted to resisting the Saracens, who defeated him at Cortona in 982.

The spiritual climate changed radically under Emperor OTTO III (983–1002). Influenced by Byzantine ideas, Otto wished to make Rome the capital of a Christian Roman Empire, a universal state ruled by an emperor who as “servant of the apostles” exercised priestly functions. Otto's ideals were shared and probably in part inspired by his teacher Gerbert of Aurillac, successively abbot of Bobbio, archbishop of Ravenna, and finally pope SYLVESTER II (999–1003). Otto was aided also by LEO of Vercelli, who received from him a strategic bishopric in northern Italy. Practical statesmen, these men realized that their goals could be realized only through German power and Church personnel. Unlike his predecessors, Otto appointed German bishops to Italian sees. In granting central Italian territory to the pope, he reserved rights assuring a firm line of military communication between Ravenna and Rome. He supported the pope in the program of practical Church reform suggested by Gerbert's experience at Bobbio. An imperial edict of 998 limited all leases of church property to the lifetime of the conceding bishop or abbot, thus striking a blow at the secundi milites. Otto's premature death was followed by an uprising of the secundi milites under Arduin of Ivrea, who briefly held the crown of Italy before being defeated by Emperor HENRY II of Germany with the help of Leo of Vercelli, a loyal "bishop of the empire." The last of the Saxon emperors, Henry presided in 1022 at a reforming council at Pavia that condemned marriage of the clergy (see CELIBACY, CLERICAL HISTORY OF).

Pazzi Chapel, courtyard of Sant Croce, 1429, designed by Filippo Brunelleschi, Florence, Italy. (©Angelo Hornak/CORBIS)

Revolution and the Cluniac Reform: 1000–1300.

The middle centuries of the medieval period witnessed a religious revolution that began in the monasteries but was soon communicated to all classes of society. The CLUNIAC REFORM movement gained ground late in the 10th century, and many monasteries came under its influence. But the strongest impulsion to reform came from Italian eremitical monasticism, represented by the three very different figures of ROMUALD from Ravenna, JOHN GUALBERT and PETER DAMIAN. Romuald founded groups of hermit communities at CAMALDOLI and elsewhere, from which he preached against the abuse of SIMONY. John Gualbert (d. 1073), while a young monk at San Miniato, went into the streets of Florence to incite the people against simoniac churchmen, and after becoming abbot of VALLOMBROSA in 1039 he mobilized his monks to campaign throughout Tuscany against simony and clerical concubinage. The noblest representative of monastic reform was Peter Damian (1007–72), who taught that the monastic ideal should be the model for all Christians and urged the secular clergy also to adopt the common life (vita communis). This early phase of the reforming movement, stressing the moral regeneration of the clergy, was favored by the second Franconian emperor, HENRY III (1039–56), under whom imperial power over the papacy reached its height. Between 1046 and 1054, when he set aside three rival popes, Henry designated four German popes, of whom the third in succession, LEO IX (1048–1054), assumed the leadership of the reform movement.

Pulpit in the cathedral at Ravello, Italy, by Niccolò di Bartolommeo da Foggia, signed and dated 1272. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

The 1054 marriage of Beatrice of Tuscany with Duke Godfrey of Lorraine created a strong power in central Italy that supported the reforming cause via Florence. The Lotharingian bishop of Florence was elected by the reformers in 1058 and installed in Rome by Godfrey of Lorraine as Pope NICHOLAS II (1058–61). The Roman synod held by Nicholas in 1059 called for the moral reformation of the clergy, condemned simony, and, by a significant innovation set forth in the PAPAL ELECTION DECREE (1059), vested control of papal elections in the cardinals with only a vague reference to the right of the young Henry IV.

The influence Hildebrand exercised even before he became pope was especially evident from 1057 to 1059. Northern resentment against the clergy had by then erupted into violence, particularly in the Lombard towns. In Milan in 1057 Hildebrand gave encouragement and support to the leaders of the PATARINES, a revolutionary religious group that demanded “free elections” of bishops and repudiated the married clergy. The wrath of the pata-tari (ragpickers, peddlers) was directed against the upper clergy of Milan, connected by marriage and economic interests with the lay aristocracy. In 1059 the archbishop of Milan was forced to submit to the papal legate and accept the decrees of the Roman synod.

When Hildebrand became pope as GREGORY VII (1073–85), measures were taken against the married clergy, but the focus of the GREGORIAN REFORM was on lay INVESTITURE. Prohibited by a Roman synodal decree of 1075, lay investiture had come to represent the close symbiosis of Church and State that had destroyed the autonomy of the Church and caused the moral evils by which she was afflicted. Emperor HENRY IV's defiance of the decree of 1075, his insistence upon appointing his own candidate to the See of Milan and the candidate being invested with the ring and the staff precipitated the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE, which divided Italy for half a century. The Concordat of WORMS (1122) ended the investiture struggle by providing that the consecration of a newly elected bishop or abbot must precede his investiture with temporalities by the emperor. A victory for the Church through its reestablishment of the principle of canonical election, this was in reality a victory for the towns which had bargained with the contending parties in order to establish their own independence under elected consuls.

Southern Italy and Sicily: The Norman Kingdom.

The south did not form part of the Carolingian Empire and therefore pursued an entirely different course of development from that of northern and central Italy. Disputed in the early Middle Ages between Lombards and Byzantines, ravaged by Saracen invasions and raids, the south had become a political vacuum that was conquered by Norman adventurers in the 11th century. Relations between the NORMANS and the papacy were at first hostile, but Pope Nicholas II recognized the Norman conquest as an accomplished fact and conceded Apulia, Calabria and Sicily as a fief to the Norman freebooter ROBERT GUISCARD in 1059. Robert rescued Gregory VII when Henry IV captured Rome in 1081, and Gregory died in exile at Salerno in the Norman kingdom. In 1091 Count ROGER OF Sicily, Guiscard's brother, completed the 30-year conquest of SICILY from the Muslims and in 1098 he received from Pope URBAN II a hereditary papal legateship over Sicily, later called the MONARCHIA SICULA, which gave him control over the religious establishment of the island. The Norman rulers favored the introduction of Latin monasticism into their dominions as a means of consolidating their power. While the Greek rite and Muslim religious practices were tolerated, most members of these groups gradually passed over to the Latin rite. The Norman monarchy attained its height under King Roger II of Sicily (1130–54), under whom Sicily and the mainland of southern Italy were united.

The Hohenstaufen Emperors. During the investiture struggle many imperial rights (REGALIA) had been taken over by the emergent communes in Italy. Hohenstaufen Emperor FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA (1152–90) determined to make imperial power preeminent in Italy. At the same time his exalted conception of his position involved him in a series of ideological conflicts with the papacy. Attempting to force his direct administration upon the north Italian communes, he met the military resistance of the LOMBARD LEAGUE in alliance with Pope ALEXANDER III. In the fifth of six campaigns in Italy, Frederick was defeated by the League at Legnano (1176). Reconciled with the pope at Venice a year later, he concluded the Peace of Constance (1183), conceding the communes de facto self-government but reserving extensive rights of overlordship. The marriage of his son and successor, Emperor HENRY VI (1190–97), with Constance of Sicily and his assumption of the Norman crown at Palermo (1194) created a Hohenstaufen empire in Italy that encircled the Papal States and again threatened the communes. A new crisis was averted only by Henry's death and the division of his empire between his brother, Philip of Swabia, and his infant son by Constance, Emperor FREDERICK II (1212–50), who ruled over only the Regno (southern Italy and Sicily) until his coronation as emperor in 1220.

Cathedral in Syracuse, Italy. (©Eye Ubiquitous/CORBIS)

In the papacy-empire conflict both sides drew ideological support from a revival of legal studies that was centered at the University of BOLOGNA. In the 12th century the renewed study of canon law succeeded in translating papal authority into legal terms. The Gregorian reformers had initially promoted such study, and c. 1140 at Bologna the Camaldolese monk Gratian published his magisterial Decretum (see GRATIAN, DECRETUM OF), which succeeded in placing canon law on a scientific basis. After 1150 the principles of the Decretum were applied and expanded by a succession of canonist popes, including Alexander III and INNOCENT III. By Innocent's time the structure of the Church had become monarchical and bureaucratic, operating through a staff of trained lawyers in the papal curia. Meanwhile, on the imperial side there was a similar but slower development. In 1158, for example, at the Diet of Roncaglia, Frederick I appealed to Bolognese experts in civil or Roman law to define the regalia. In 1224 Frederick II founded the University of Naples for the special purpose of providing himself with lawyers, and he consciously imitated the Code of Justinian in his Constitutions of Melfi, which he promulgated in 1231 as a code of law for the Regno.

The cathedral of Fermo, Italy, begun in the 13th century. The bell tower was restored in 1430 and completed in 1731.
(Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Under Frederick II the triangular struggle between papacy, Hohenstaufens and communes was renewed with unprecedented bitterness (see GUELFs AND GHIBELLINES). After establishing a bureaucratic secular state in the Regno, Frederick directed his activities toward two goals: the unification of Italy and its reentrance into the Holy Roman Empire. To achieve this policy he would have to crush the northern communes and reannex the Papal States. He defeated the army of the Lombard League at Cortenuova in 1237, though resistance continued, led by popes GREGORY IX (1227–41) and INNOCENT IV (1243–54). Innocent excommunicated and deposed Frederick at the Council of LYONS I (1245) and finally proclaimed a crusade against him. Frederick's fortunes subsequently crumbled, but the outcome of the struggle was still in doubt at his death in 1250.

The struggle continued against Frederick's heirs in Italy, namely Conrad IV, who died prematurely in 1254 and Manfred, who ruled as regent in southern Italy and from 1258 as king of Sicily and Naples. In 1263 the French Pope URBAN IV offered the crown of the Regno to the French Prince Charles of Anjou. Charles's army defeated and killed Manfred at Benevento (1266), and Charles established Angevin rule in Naples and Sicily, also receiving the title of imperial vicar in Tuscany, from Pope Clement IV. The support given by several popes to the Angevin domination aroused suspicion among the other powers of Europe, and the expulsion of the French from Sicily in 1282 by the popular uprising known as the Sicilian Vespers was a mortal blow to papal prestige.

The terms "Guelfs" and "Ghibellines" originated in the course of these struggles between the popes and Hohenstaufens to describe the adherents of papacy and empire, respectively. However, without entirely losing their original significance, these names soon tended to become masks for the internal conflicts of the communes and petty despots who were now the real powers in Italy.

The Communes and the Church. In the era of the Crusades (c. 1100–1300) the Italian maritime republics of Venice, Genoa and Pisa and the great inland cities of Lombardy and Tuscany were at the forefront of economic advances taking place in western Europe. The expansion of trade and industry was most marked in the larger centers, but it affected all Italy to some extent, leading to a more diversified social structure and conflicts of interest among the various groups.

During most of the 12th century the communes were governed by oligarchies composed of landowners and more prosperous merchants with the communal governments quietly absorbing most of the political powers formerly exercised by the bishops. Toward the end of the century guilds of artisans and small merchants began to gain power, and during the 13th century a federation of guilds and other local groups took over the government in many towns. In this period of middle-class rule there were open conflicts between Church and State (represented by the communes) caused by the efforts of the communal governments to curtail or abolish clerical privileges and immunities and to subject the clergy to municipal taxation and the jurisdiction of the municipal courts. The wealth and the worldly lives of the cathedral clergy were constant targets of criticism. The outbursts of anticlericalism that manifested themselves during these jurisdictional struggles were nourished by the religious unrest that flourished especially among the poorer classes of the population.

Heresy and Evangelical Movements. Heresy began to spread in Italy in the 11th century. About 1030 Mon-forte in Piedmont is known to have harbored an organized community of CATHARI, which was forcibly repressed by the local authorities. Temporarily extinguished, or perhaps absorbed by the PATARINES, Catharism revived after 1150, and a Catharistic church was organized in the north with branches in many Lombard towns (including Milan, Brescia, Verona and Vicenza) and in Florence. Moreover, Catharism was only one stream in a proliferation of heresies, e.g., the followers of ARNOLD of Brescia, the WALDENSES and the Poor Men of Lombardy, all difficult to distinguish clearly because the name "Patarene" (Patarinus, originally meaning a member of the Patarines) was often applied indiscriminately to any heretic. In 1184 Pope LUCIUS III and Frederick Barbarossa published an edict at Verona establishing an INQUISITION against Italian heretics, but it failed to accomplish its purpose. Cathari were widespread and held municipal offices in some towns. In 1215 Milan was known to be a "sink of heretics," and in 1250 there were still six Catharistic churches in Verona.

Side by side with the heresies, various evangelical movements arose, their followers drawing inspiration from the apostolic age of the Church and exalting poverty as a Christian ideal. This POVERTY MOVEMENT drew most of its adherents from the poorer urban classes, such as the wool workers of Lombardy who formed a sect called the HUMILIATI whose members accepted and idealized poverty as an ennobling virtue. The cult of poverty, central to such extremist movements, may have been, in part, a protest by the urban poor against a rudimentary capitalism, but in the spiritual climate of the 12th century the religious motive of the movement must be considered to have been the dominant one.

Monasticism and the Mendicant Orders. In the 4th century, monasticism entered Italy from the East (see MONASTICISM, 1). The ascetic life was preached and practiced in Rome by ATHANASIUS (c. 340) and by JEROME (c. 375–385). Both AMBROSE (d. 397) and EUSEBIUS OF VERCELLI (d. 371) lent their support to monastic institutions. But the most decisive influence came from St. BENEDICT (d. 543), first at SUBIACO and later at MONTE CASSINO, where he formulated the famous rule for a monastic community for his disciples (c. 529–534). The BENEDICTINE RULE provided a model not only for the spiritual life but also for the economic organization of all the great Benedictine monasteries [FARFA, NONANTOLA, Novalesa, LA CAVA (Saints Trinità) and others] that were founded in Italy after the 7th century. In Apulia c. 540 CASSIODORUS founded two monasteries at Vivarium, where Roman classical culture was fused with the monastic life. GREGORY I the Great, a disciple of Benedict, founded six monasteries on his Sicilian estates (c. 576) and another in Rome on the Caelian, from which he was drawn by popular acclamation to become pope (590). A little later, the Irish monk COLUMBAN, in flight from Gaul, was received in Italy by the Lombard King Agilulf, an Arian, and his Catholic wife, Theudelinda, and in 614 established the Abbey of BOBBIO in the Apennines. Sometimes called the Monte Cassino of the north, Bobbio was a center for the evangelization of northwestern Italy. Like other Celtic monasteries it soon adopted the Benedictine Rule.

"Madonna and Child" by Giovanni Battista Tiepolo, 18th century. (©Burstein Collection/CORBIS)

By the Middle Ages, traditional monasticism could no longer provide leadership for the spiritual crisis facing the urban communities. The newly founded CISTERCIANS began to expand throughout Italy after 1120, but their basic ideal called for withdrawal from society. The most influential of the Cistercians was the Calabrian Abbot JOACHIM of Fiore (d. 1202), who prophesied the coming of a new age to be heralded by the arrival of mendicant monks.

The ascetic spirit of monasticism was transformed and given social direction by the MENDICANT ORDERS, the Franciscans and Dominicans, early in the 13th century. The DOMINICANS, or Preaching Friars, recognized by Pope Innocent III in 1206, established their headquarters in Bologna, but the decisive influence lay with the FRANCISCANS. FRANCIS OF ASSISI (1182–1226) and his Friars

A Florentine-made silver and gilt silver chalice that was a gift from the Catholic people of Leopoli, Poland, to Pius IX in 1869. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

Minor were the bearers of a spiritual revolution that had far-reaching effects on Italian civilization. The Franciscan ideal incorporated the spiritual aspirations of the earlier evangelical movements—the appealing concept of the apostolic life and the cult of poverty—but with the imprint of Francis’s creative personality. The early Franciscans were a highly mobile group, replacing the hermit preachers and the wandering evangelists and addressing their message to town-dwellers. Their success was immediate and overwhelming; they filled the gap between the secular clergy and the people and guided back to the Church many who would have drifted into heresy. The controversy over the holding of property by the order, which divided the Franciscans into Conventual FRANCISCANS and FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS, and the emergence of the dissident heretical FRATICELLI, active chiefly in southern Italy, disrupted the unity of the order but did not really prevent the Franciscans from fulfilling their mission. By 1250 heresy in Italy had begun to diminish. Less than 100 years later it had become virtually extinct. The Franciscans, furthermore, brought a more personal religion to many who had never known it before, and through the Tertiaries, or Third Order, permitted laymen to share their ideal.

The Later Middle Ages: 1300–1500. The years coinciding with the lifetime of DANTE ALIGHIERI (1265–1321) constituted the close of the Middle Ages as a distinct cultural epoch. In the next two centuries medieval ideas and institutions merged imperceptibly with those of the Italian Renaissance.

After 1300 northern and central Italy still formed part of the Holy Roman Empire, but except for the futile expedition of Emperor HENRY VII (1310–13), the emperors made no attempt to assert effective control. In the south Pope BONIFACE VIII and Charles II of Anjou finally ended the 20-year war of the Sicilian Vespers in 1302, by recognizing a prince of the house of Aragon as ruler of Sicily. The Guelf-Ghibelline wars raging in northern Italy after the death of Emperor Frederick II had favored the rise of military leaders who seized every opportunity to establish themselves as city tyrants (signori). In the 14th century the more ruthless of these tyrants expanded their states through consolidation and conquest. Of the dozen or more principalities into which Italy was eventually divided, the most important were the Duchy of Milan, the republics of Venice and Florence, the States of the Church and the kingdom of Naples, all of whose shifting alliances and alignments in the 15th century were aimed at maintaining a balance of power.

For the papacy the later Middle Ages was a period of humiliation and division, as its very identification with Rome was broken during the 70-plus years of the AVIGNON PAPACY in France, and its prestige was shattered by the WESTERN SCHISM. The long residence of the popes at AVIGNON (1309–78) was due in part to the anarchical conditions that made Rome unsafe and the Papal States almost ungovernable, and the new fiscal system of the Avignon papacy was developed to meet the needs not only of an expensive court but also to restore the pope’s authority over the Papal States. Papal taxation came to rest very heavily upon the churches and monasteries, and papal control over the episcopate was tightened by increased use of reservations. Yet the economic condition of the Church in Italy steadily deteriorated. The northern Church had been impoverished by 1500 largely as a result of the passage of its property into the hands of land speculators and tenants whose rents had remained stationary despite general inflation. Nevertheless the great prelates, in true Renaissance style, carried out expensive building and artistic programs.

Historians no longer regard the Italian Renaissance as predominantly pagan and antireligious in character, although these elements certainly did exist within its structure. The 14th century especially was a great age of religion; the plague epidemics at mid-century were followed by a wave of religious feeling among all classes that was vividly reflected in the art of the time. Great religious leaders of the period included the Dominican James Passavanti (d. 1357) of S. Maria Novella in Florence, John dalle Celle of Vallombrosa (d. 1394–1400), JOHN COLOMBINI, the founder of a new lay congregation, the JESUATI and CATHERINE OF SIENA, a Dominican tertiary. In 1334 Franciscan Spiritual John della Valle founded the order of the Osservanti, or Observant Franciscans. In the following century ANTONINUS of Florence and BERNARDINE OF SIENA, vicar-general of the Observants, preached to rapt crowds. The SAVONAROLA episode is well known. The Florentine humanists of the Medici circle had a form of religion in NEOPLATONISM, by no means incompatible with the Christian tradition. Other noteworthy religious aspects of the Renaissance would include the turbulence of the Western Schism, the union of the Byzantine and Roman Churches temporarily achieved at the Council of FLORENCE in 1439, and the reorganization of the Italian BENEDICTINES into the Congregation of Santa Giustina of Padua by Pope EUGENE IV in 1432–35. Furthermore, accounts of the secular activities of the Renaissance popes as rulers of an Italian state, and of their patronage of humanists and artists do not constitute a full history of the Church; coexisting with the secular mood and style of the Renaissance was a profound religious consciousness. But any tendency toward the needed religious reformation in the 15th century was thwarted by the prevailing political disunity and lack of leadership. The French invasion of 1494 plunged Italy into an era of protracted warfare as a battleground for the monarchies of France and Spain. The seat of the most advanced civilization in Europe, Italy entered the modern age without having established her national identity.

“Virgin and Child with Saints” by Titian. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS.)

Bibliography: G. FORCHIELLI, La pieve rurale (Rome 1931). C. E. BOYD, Tithes and Parishes in Medieval Italy (Ithaca, NY 1952). Storia di Milano (Milan 1953–) v.1–8. G. PENCO, Storia del monachesimo in Italia dalle origini alla fine del medio evo (Rome 1961). W. ULLMANN, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (2d ed. New York 1962). G. LA PIANA, Foreign Groups in Rome during the First Centuries of the Empire (Cambridge, MA 1928). F. LANZONI, Le diocesi d'Italia dalle origini dal principio del secolo VII, 2 v. (2d ed. Faenza 1927). S. MOCHI-ONORY, Vescovi e città (Bologna 1933). O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941). T. HODGKIN, Italy and Her Invaders, 8 v. in 9 (Oxford 1892–99). C. G. MOR, L'età feudale, 2 v. (Milan 1952–53). C. MAGNI, Ricerche sopra le elezioni episcopali in Italia durante l'alto medio evo (Rome 1928). Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. BORINO (Rome 1947–). C. VIOLANTE, La pataria milanese e la riforma ecclesiastica (Rome 1955–) v.1 Le premesse, 1054–1057. L. T. WHITE, Latin Monasticism in Norman Sicily (Cambridge, MA 1938). L. SALVATORELLI, L'Italia comunale (Milan 1940). É. JORDAN, L'Allemagne et l'Italie aux XIIe et XIIIe siècles (Paris 1939). S. RUNCIMAN, The Sicilian Vespers (Cambridge, Eng. 1958). É. DELARUELLE et al., “Movimenti religiosi popolari ed eresie del medioevo,” Relazioni del X congresso internazionale di scienze storiche, v.3 (Florence 1955) 307–541. A. DONDAINE, “La Hiérarchie cathare en Italie,” Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum, 20 (1950) 234–324. H. GRUNDMANN, Religiöse Bewegungen im Mittelalter (2d ed. Hildesheim 1961). E. S. DAVISON, Forerunners of Saint Francis and Other Studies, ed. G. R. B. RICHARDS (Boston 1927). A. FRUGONI, Arnoldo da Brescia nelle fonti del secolo XII (Rome 1954). P. SABATIER, Vie de Saint François d'Assise (édition définitive; Paris 1931), Eng. tr. of 1st ed., The Life of Saint Francis of Assisi (New York 1920). GRATIEN DE PARIS (E. BADIN) Histoire de la fondation et de l'évolution de l'Ordre des Frères Mineurs au XIIIe siècle (Paris 1928). D. L. DOUIE, The Nature and the Effect of the Heresy of the Fraticelli (Manchester, Eng. 1932). E. R. LABANDE, L'Italie de la Renaissance: Duecento, Trecento, Quattrocento: Évolution d'une société (Paris 1954). G. MOLLAT, The Popes at Avignon, 1305–1378, tr. J. LOVE (New York 1963). C. ANGELERI, Il problema religioso del Rinascimento (Florence 1952). C. CIPOLLA, "Une Crise ignoré. Comment s'est perdue la propriété ecclésiastique dans l'Italie du nord entre le XIe et le XVIe siècle," Annales: Économies, sociétés, civilisations, 2 (1947) 317–327. R. FAWTIER, Saint Catherine de Sienne (Paris 1921). R. RIDOLFI, Life of Girolamo Savonarola, tr. C. GRAYSON (New York 1959).

Church of San Sepolcro, Santo Stefano Complex, Bologna, Italy.
(©Vanni Archive/CORBIS)

[C. E. BOYD]

1500 TO 1789

In the second half of the 15th century Italy was at the height of the RENAISSANCE and of her economic and commercial prosperity. While culturally she was exercising a profound influence on all of Western Europe, politically she was on the eve of disaster, and her regions—the major states of Venice, Milan, Florence, the STATES OF THE CHURCH and the kingdom of Naples, as well as the minor states of Ferrara, Mantua, Modena and Savoy—could hardly be less united. The city-states prided themselves on their individuality and independence, engaged in petty wars and played the dangerous game of balance of power politics, a game that inevitably led to appeals for help to outsiders only too willing to intervene. Even after the first great invasion, the Italian city-states could not perceive that the sun of their independence had set. For several centuries they were to become the victims of the rival political ambitions of powerful French, Spanish and Austrian monarchs.

The French in Italy: 1494–1559. In 1492 Florence and Naples made a secret alliance to attack Milan. As their intentions gradually became known, Ludovico SFORZA, Regent of Milan, who was faced with internal opposition to his rule, appealed to Charles VIII, King of France (1483–98). The young French ruler, motivated by a desire to enforce the Angevin claim on Naples, decided against his advisers to aid Ludovico, and he invaded Italy in 1494. Florence at first offered no resistance, then expelled Piero de' MEDICI for his support of the French king. Shortly thereafter, Charles entered Florence and was hailed as SAVONAROLA's man sent by God to regenerate Italy. From this time to 1512, Florence was practically a vassal state of France.

Early in 1495 Charles arrived at Rome, where he received permission to pass through papal territory on his march south. Alfonso of Naples could offer no effective opposition, and Charles entered the city on Feb. 22, 1495. The fury of the sacking of those areas that resisted and the redistribution of lands and offices to Frenchmen alienated support for Charles. Revolts broke out even before he was forced to leave Naples to meet the coalition—consisting of Milan, Venice, Emperor Maximilian, Pope ALEXANDER VI and Ferdinand V of Aragon, king of Castile—that had been rapidly formed against him. The army of the coalition, under the command of Francesco GONZAGA, fought well against Charles at the battle of Fornova (July 6, 1495) and captured his baggage train, but could not cut off his northward march and return to France. Naples recovered its independence, and the French lost practically all that they had won. However, the inclusion of Emperor Maximilian and King Ferdinand of Aragon in the coalition against the French was a clear sign that henceforth outsiders were going to play a decisive role in Italian affairs.

King Louis XII (1498–1515) of the house of Valois pressed the French claim to Milan, and the Venetians promised their support provided that they would get Cremona. Louis invaded Italy and pushed into Milan on Sept. 14, 1499. Regent Ludovico Sforza, who had escaped to Germany, returned the next year with an army of German mercenaries and drove out the French. But his forces disintegrated, the French reentered Milan, and Ludovico spent his remaining years as a prisoner in France.

By the Treaty of Granada (Nov. 11, 1500), Ferdinand of Aragon supported the French claim to Naples with the understanding that the French and Spaniards would divide that kingdom between them. In 1501–02, the allies took over Naples and then fell out over the division of the spoils. Spanish victories over the French at Cerignola in April of 1503 and at Garigliano eight months later were decisive, and the former kingdom of Naples became a Spanish possession. As the Spanish already had Sicily, they now became masters of southern Italy.

In December of 1508 a new coalition, the League of Cambrai, was formed to seize the mainland possessions of Venice. The original coalition of Louis XII and Emperor Maximilian was soon joined by Ferdinand of Aragon and Pope JULIUS II. Following the defeat of the Venetians at the battle of Agnadello in May 1509, there was a division of Venetian possessions between France and its allies. However, the Venetians soon recovered Padua, and Vicenza revolted against Maximilian. Julius II (1503–13) then decided to abandon the League of Cambrai and join the Venetians with the double purpose of driving the French from Italy and strengthening his own political position in the peninsula. In 1512 Ferdinand of Aragon, King HENRY VIII of England, Emperor Maximilian and the Swiss Confederation all joined the coalition against France, which suffered a heavy defeat at Novara the next year. The peace that followed, however, could hardly be more than temporary.

The new French king, Francis I (1515–47), resolved to invade Italy in force. He formed an alliance with Henry VIII of England and Venice against Emperor Maximilian (d. 1519), Pope LEO X (1513–21), Ferdinand of Aragon (d. 1516), Milan (under the restored Maximilian Sforza), Florence (under the restored Lorenzo de' Medici) and the Swiss Confederation. The French won a great victory at Marignano in a two-day battle in September 1516 that marked the end of the Swiss venture in Italian politics and also the end of the legend of the invincibility of the Swiss infantry. They recovered Milan, and the peace that followed favored their position in Italy, but again peace was to be of very short duration.

European politics entered a new epoch in 1516 with the accession of Charles I as king of Spain; three years later he became CHARLES V, Holy Roman Emperor, as successor to Emperor Maximilian and heir of the vast HAPSBURG dominions. It was inevitable that the rivalry between the Valois and Hapsburgs should have an Italian phase—and an important one.

Pope LEO X and Henry VIII supported Charles V against Francis I. In 1522 the French lost Milan, Parma, Piacenza and Genoa, but, returning in force in 1524, they recaptured Milan. On Feb. 24, 1525 the Spanish army under the command of Duke Charles de Bourbon (who had entered the Spanish service) and the Marquis de Pescara inflicted an overwhelming defeat on Francis I at Pavia. The French king was captured and taken as a prisoner to Madrid. Despite the Treaty of Madrid (January 1526) in which, among other things, he agreed to abandon all claims to Italy, Francis formed a new coalition, the League of Cognac, against Charles V a few months later. This coalition included Pope CLEMENT VII (1523–34), Milan, Venice and Florence. The pope's involvement in the League of Cognac, which failed to have any success, led to the terrible sack of Rome by the Spanish and German mercenaries of Emperor Charles in May of 1527. Clement himself for a time was a virtual prisoner in the CASTEL SANT' ANGELO. By the 1529 Treaty of Barcelona the emperor agreed that the Papal States should be restored to the pope and that the Medici should again rule Florence. Shortly thereafter the Treaty of Cambrai held that France again give up her claims to Italy, Venice had to return her conquests, Francesco Sforza received Milan and Alessandro de' Medici was confirmed as hereditary ruler for life. Charles V was solemnly crowned by the pope as emperor and king of Italy on Feb. 23, 1530.

A French invasion of Italy following the death of Sforza (1535) had very limited success, although the French captured Turin and retained two-thirds of Piedmont. By the Treaty of Crépy in September 1544, however, Piedmont and Savoy were returned to the Duke of Savoy, their traditional ruler. In 1556 Pope PAUL IV (1555–59), who wished to free Naples from Spanish rule, formed an alliance with King Henry II of France (1547–59), but the French had to withdraw from Italy after their defeat at Saint-Quentin in northern France in August 1557 by the Spanish under Philip II's general, Duke Emmanuel Philibert of Savoy. By the Treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis (1559), France agreed to give up all possessions in the peninsula except Turin, Saluzzo and Pinerolo. The new significance of Savoy at this time was reflected in the marriage of Duke Emmanuel Philibert to Margaret, the daughter of Francis I, in 1559.

A Disunited Italy: 1559–1701. By the mid-16th century large areas of Italy were directly under foreign control; states that had enjoyed nominal independence were reduced to a passive role in European politics, their fortunes often determined by battles fought by armies of great foreign powers on battlefields outside of Italy. Italy no longer played a major role in European trade and commerce, although the 18th century would see a resurgence of Italian intellectual life and achievement. The largest state in Italy during this period was that ruled by the popes; of the other states, which were at least nominally independent, the most important were Venice, Genoa and Savoy.

With the loss of most of her Far Eastern trade to the Portuguese, Dutch and English, Venice began a slow but steady decline. While domestically she adopted a policy of peace and neutrality, she continued to fight the OTTOMAN TURKS for her possessions in the eastern Mediterranean. Despite the brave defense of Famagusta on CYPRUS by Venetian Governor Marcantonio Bragadino, the city surrendered on Aug. 6, 1571, and Cyprus was lost. In violation of the terms of capitulation, Bragadino was flayed alive, his stuffed skin sent as a trophy to Constantinople. Two months later the Venetians had a major share in the great Christian naval victory over the Turks at LEPANTO. Further naval victories were won against them in the Candian War (1645–69). However, after a long and heroic defense of Candia (Herakleion), Francesco MOROSINI had to surrender both fortress and city, and the whole island of Candia (Crete) was lost. In 1684 Venice joined Austria and Poland in the Holy League against the Turks, and Morosini conquered the Peloponnesus (Morea, 1685–87). The Treaty of Karlowitz (Jan. 26, 1699) allowed Venice to keep the Morea, but the Turks recovered the area in 1716.

The Genoese Republic, likewise in decline, was constantly in fear of losing its independence to Savoy, France or Austria. Florence likewise declined rapidly. Cosimo de' Medici I (1519–74) became duke of Florence in 1537, and with the seizure and incorporation of Siena (1555), grand duke of Tuscany (1569). He was an energetic ruler, but absolutely ruthless and without scruple in attaining his ends—a living example of Machiavelli's Prince. The successors of Cosimo I, with the exception of Ferdinando I (1589–1609), were all relatively weak rulers, the line becoming extinct with Gian Gastone (1723–37). During this whole century and a half Naples and Milan were under Spanish rule.

With his reinstatement, Duke Emmanuel Philibert of Savoy (d. 1580) reorganized his duchy and made it into a prosperous and powerful state. His son and successor, Charles Emmanuel I (1580–1630), by his over ambitious attempts to seize territory and by his involvement in struggles with the French and Spanish, all but lost the duchy in his last years and left his territories in poor economic condition. His son Victor Amadeus I (1630–37), was able to recover most of his lost possessions through his wife, Christina, a daughter of King HENRY IV of France. Charles's second son and successor, Charles Emmanuel II (1638–75), was only a small child, and his mother, Christina, assumed the regency. A civil war broke out in Savoy in which Spain and France were invited to support the respective factions and in which Savoy suffered severely from the fighting in its territory, but Charles Emmanuel succeeded in taking over the government personally in 1648, although Christina continued to have a strong influence over his policy until her death in 1663. It was under his rule that harsh measures, including numerous executions, were taken against the WALDENSES; this occasioned vehement protests in Protestant Europe—as expressed, for example, in Milton's famous Sonnet 18, "On the Late Massacre in Piedmont."

Charles Emmanuel was succeeded by his son Victor Amadeus II (1675–1730), who because of his age could not assume control of the state until 1684. Meantime his mother, the ambitious Jeanne de Savoie-Nemours, was regent. He married Anne, daughter of Philip of Orléans and niece of King LOUIS XIV of France. Under pressure of the latter, he renewed the persecution of the Waldenses (1685). When Louis demanded that he surrender Turin and Verona, however, Victor joined the coalition of Austria, Spain and Venice against him (1690), but six years later, with some justification, he deserted his allies and made a peace with Louis that was confirmed a year later by the Treaty of Ryswick (Sept. 30, 1697).

The War of the Spanish Succession to Napoleon: 1701–96. The Wars of Succession produced major changes in foreign domination in Italy, and in the fortunes of the independent Italian states. Politically, there was no essential change in the Papal States, but on the religious side this was a difficult period in the internal history of the Church (see STATES OF THE CHURCH; JANSENISM; JOSEPHINISM; ENLIGHTENMENT; and the individual articles on the popes of this period).

Savoy. In keeping with his policy of supporting Louis XIV, Victor Amadeus, at the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession (1701–13), permitted the French to seize Milan and Mantua. But two years later, irked by the insolent attitude of Louis XIV toward him, Victor joined the Grand Alliance (1703). The French invaded Savoy, but the great general of the imperial forces, Prince Eugene of Savoy, drove them out in 1705 and again in 1706. Savoy and the imperial forces occupied Milan (Sept. 24, 1706), bringing the war in Italy to an end. By the Treaty of Utrecht (April 11, 1713), Victor Amadeus received Sicily and took the royal title. Following the seizure of Sicily and Sardinia by King Philip V of Spain (1717–18), a new peace was made whereby Victor Amadeus gave Sicily to Austria and received Sardinia in exchange, assuming the title king of Sardinia. His successor, Charles Emmanuel III (1730–73), joined France and Spain against Austria in the War of the Polish Succession (1733–38). The Austrians were not driven out of Italy, but his own possessions were left intact by the Treaty of Vienna (1735). In the War of the Austrian Succession (1740–48), however, he supported Maria Theresa of Austria, and by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (Oct. 1748) he received as his reward a part of the Duchy of Milan. Victor Amadeus III (1773–96), a very conservative ruler, supported Austria against France in 1792 in spite of the French promise of Lombardy, but with the coming of Napoleon in 1796, independent action on his part quickly ended.

Naples and Venice. By the Peace of Utrecht, Sicily passed from the Spanish to Victor Amadeus II of Savoy, then back to Spain (1718), and, two years later, to Austria. Following the War of the Polish Succession, Naples and Sicily were given to the Spanish Bourbons (1735). Don Carlos, son of Philip V of Spain, took over Naples and Sicily as Charles IV (1735–59), assuming the title of King of the Two Sicilies in 1738. With the help of the Tuscan Bernardo TANUCCI, he carried through a reorganization of his government in the spirit of the Enlightenment. Conflict with the Church over secularization of CHURCH property was settled by the Concordat of 1741 with Pope BENEDICT XIV. On his abdication to become Charles III of Spain (1759–88), Don Carlos was succeeded by his third son, Ferdinand I (1759–1825). Tanucci served as regent until Ferdinand attained his majority (1767). In the following year Ferdinand married the dominating Maria Carolina, daughter of Maria Theresa of Austria. Under her influence and that of the Englishman Sir John Acton, who replaced Tanucci after Tanucci's dismissal in 1771, as chief adviser, Ferdinand was led to adopt a pro-Austrian policy. The 18th century was a golden age of artistic and intellectual activity at Naples.

The Venetians, by the Treaty of Passarowitz (July 1718), lost the Morea, their last possession in the eastern Mediterranean, and they were left with only their possessions on the Dalmatian coast. The continuance of their archaic aristocratic constitution reflected their political stagnation. In the arts, however, Venice remained one of the chief centers of Europe.

Other States. Mantua became a part of the Duchy of Milan after the death of the last Gonzaga (1701), and, by the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), Milan itself passed to the Hapsburgs. Following the death of the last FARNESE (1731), Parma and Piacenza were given to Don Carlos, son of Philip V of Spain, and passed back and forth from Spanish to Hapsburg control twice more before the coming of Napoleon. Genoa succeeded in maintaining its independence, although it was gravely threatened in the War of the Austrian Succession. Genoa asked France for aid in quelling the revolt of Corsica, which began in 1730, and eventually ceded the island to the French (1768). After the death of Gian Gastone, the last Medici (1737), Tuscany passed to Francis of Lorraine, the husband of Maria Theresa of Austria. He gave up his ancestral Duchy of Lorraine to become grand duke of Tuscany. After his election as Francis I, Holy Roman Emperor (1745–65), his second son, Leopold I (1745–65), was made administrator and then, after his father's death, grand duke of Tuscany.

Under Austrian administration in the last half of the 18th century, Lombardy and Tuscany enjoyed a period of peace and prosperity and benefited from numerous reforms in agriculture, taxation, criminal law and education. However, in these areas, as in Savoy and elsewhere in Italy outside the Papal States, abolition of clerical privileges, suppression of monasteries, and secularization of other forms of Church property all revealed the spread of Enlightenment policy and its influence on government, especially after Emperor JOSEPH II (1780–90) replaced Maria Theresa on the throne of Austria. The ideas of the French philosophers also were spreading in Italy, and a national patriotism distinct from the local patriotism of the past was beginning to develop.

Bibliography: E. ROTA, Le origini del Risorgimento, 1700–1800, 2 v. (2d ed. Milan 1948). N. VALERI, L'Italia nell'età dei principati, dal 1343 al 1516 (Milan 1949). R. AUBENAS and R. RICHARD, L'Église et la renaissance, 1449–1517 (Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, eds., A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN. 15; 1951). H. S. LUCAS, The Renaissance and the Reformation (2d ed. New York 1960). A. VISCONTI, L'Italia nell'epoca della controriforma dal 1516 al 1713, rev. F. CURATO (Milan 1958).

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

MODERN ITALY: 1789 TO THE PRESENT

By 1789, when the FRENCH REVOLUTION began, the ENLIGHTENMENT had infiltrated from France into Italy by means of Freemasonry, whose lodges, during the first French domination of the peninsula (1796–99), were converted into Jacobin clubs favorable to the overthrow of the absolute regimes in the several Italian states and to the establishment of republics. The Church underwent a severe structural crisis during these years because many of its economic privileges were abolished, much of its property was seized, and its religious orders were suppressed. Fortunately the labors of St. ALPHONSUS DE LIGUORI, the Amicizie Cristiane of Nikolaus Diessbach, SJ (1732–98), Pio LANTERI and the St. Thomas academies checked JANSENISM, which seemed on the point of making greater advances, thanks to the Synod of PISTOIA convoked by Scipione de' RICCI. A reaction (Sept. 1798–Oct. 1799) caused anti-French uprisings, the most energetic being that of the SANFEDISTS led by Cardinal Fabrizio RUFFO. The second period of French domination (1800–14) saw groups of patriots, who favored conciliating Jacobinism with Catholicism, support of the first Italian republic, and also witnessed the negotiations for the Italian concordat of 1803, modeled on the French CONCORDAT OF 1801. Among the most important consequences of the French rule were the capture and exile of PIUS VI and PIUS VII and the suppression of the papal temporal power with the seizure of the STATES OF THE CHURCH (1797, 1808).

The Fall of Napoleon: 1815 to 1915. The Congress of VIENNA returned Italy substantially to the political conditions of the ancien régime. Papal temporal power and the Church's rights and privileges were restored, thanks to the diplomatic accomplishments of Cardinal Ercole CONSALVI. The Austrian HAPSBURGS, the real masters of the peninsula until the accession of NAPOLEON III (1852), smothered with bloodshed every ideal of constitutional and national liberty; they were faithful disciples of the jurisdictional principles of JOSEPHINISM and utilized for political purposes whatever benefits they conceded to the Church. To attenuate the results of the union of throne and altar, popes from Pius VII to Pius IX promoted with scant success a policy of concordats. Between 1818 and 1855 they concluded agreements with the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies (1818, 1834), the Kingdom of Sardinia (1836), the Duchy of Lucca (1841, 1846, 1856), the Grand Duchy of Tuscany (1848, 1851) and Austria (1855).

In this milieu developed the RISORGIMENTO, a movement working toward liberty, political independence and unity. It utilized the CARBONARI and other secret societies that organized revolutions (1820–21, 1830–31) to cast aside the yoke of absolutism and special privilege. Austria came to the rescue of the absolutist Italian states in the severe repressions of these revolts. Thereby it began the long catalogue of patriotic martyrs that included Silvio Pellico (1789–1854), Federico Confalonieri (1785–1846) and other citizens whose sentiments were sincerely Christian. Giuseppe Mazzini, a theist and a convinced patriot, joined the revolutionary movement and organized Young Italy, whose radical program for uniting Italy as a republic aimed to destroy the union of throne and altar as a preliminary to the liberation of all oppressed peoples.

In opposition to Mazzinian extremism Vincenzo GIOBERTI, Cesare Balbo, Massimo Taparelli d'Azeglio and others promoted NEO-GUELFISM, and advocated a federation of Italian states under a monarch and reforms enacted in legal fashion on state initiative, thus exalting the fatherland and religion as inseparable. For some time in 1848 this program appeared to unite all the patriotic groups whose common goal was independence and war against Austria. But the allocation of PIUS IX (Apr. 29, 1848) and the diplomatic and military failures of Piedmont ruined the neo-Guelf projects, causing a break in patriotic ranks over politics that had profound repercussions on the religious level. The Piedmontese champions of LIBERALISM, with Camillo Benso di CAVOUR at their head, now took charge of the national movement. Capitalizing on the antagonisms between European governments and aided by Giuseppe GARIBALDI and other patriots, annexations and plebiscites, they gradually succeeded in proclaiming a unified kingdom of Italy with a constitutional monarch under the house of Savoy (March 14, 1861). Rome was declared the capital and actually became so in the autumn of 1870 after its capture.

While VATICAN COUNCIL I (1869–70) defined the papal spiritual prerogatives of primacy and infallibility, the final loss of the States of the Church at this time terminated effectively the pope's political power. Pius IX sent the ZOUAVES to battle the Piedmontese troops in a vain attempt to defend Rome. When the Italian government proposed the Law of GUARANTEES (1871) as its solution of the ROMAN QUESTION, the pope rejected it as a unilateral agreement that failed to ensure independence for the pope as pastor of the universal Church. The pope also appealed to all Catholics not to recognize the new state of Italy. Successive Italian governments, whether rightist (to 1876) or leftist (1876–1914), refused to recognize a territorial political sovereignty of the Holy See within the confines of the Kingdom of Italy. Although Italy spurned such examples of 18th-century jurisdictionalism as the MONARCHIA SICULA and the exequatur and placet, it introduced separatism by a series of laws injurious to the Church's rights and privileges. In the economic area these enactments decreed seizures and taxation of ecclesiastical properties and secularizations of charitable organizations; in the jurisdictional field, the abrogation of concordats, dissolution of religious orders, abolition of the privilege of the forum, introduction of obligatory military service by clerics, prohibition of religious instruction in schools, suppression of theological faculties in state universities (1873) and inauguration of civil marriages. Influencing public opinion, the state tolerated and even urged attacks against religion and propaganda hostile to the papacy and the clergy (see ANTICLERICALISM). On the institutional level the government secularized education and public institutions and favored the views of the extreme left and of the Freemasons, especially in the schools and in the army.

Religious Congregations. In the face of the radical subversiveness of the 19th century, the Church demonstrated its vitality by resisting corrosive elements of a structural and doctrinal type, and by making adjustments to the changed situation. During the Risorgimento the two most outstanding developments in the Church were the remarkable growth of religious congregations and the development of the modern Catholic movement. More than 300 religious congregations of women were founded in Italy between 1815 and 1915, besides many institutes for men. Like the vast majority of modern congregations, most of these dedicated themselves to the active apostolate through education, charitable and social services or missionary endeavors. The most phenomenal growth was experienced by the SALESIANS, founded by St. John BOSCO, and the SALESIAN SISTERS, started by him in conjunction with St. Maria MAZZARELLO; together these two groups spread throughout the world.

Church Enters Social Sphere. Catholics were eager to end the strained relations between Church and State, but not all agreed on the same solution. Conciliation was favored by Gino Capponi, the writer; Cesare Cantù, the historian; Niccolò Tommaseo, the patriot; Giacomo Zanella, the poet; Antonio ROSMINI-SERBATI, the philosopher; Massimo d'Azeglio, the statesman; and above all by Luigi TOSTI, OSB, Cardinal Alfonso CAPECELATRO and Bishop Geremia BONOMELLI. To others conciliation seemed inopportune; they demanded the restoration of all the Church's rights and privileges, including the return of the papal temporal power.

A third group abided by the view of Pius IX, who was influenced by Cardinal Giacomo ANTONELLI and who condemned the usurpations as iniquitous. This group created organizations that rejected the political unification of Italy and the selection of Rome as capital. They also advocated active and passive abstention from parliamentary life. To these ends Giambattista Casoni (d. 1919) started an association for the defense of the Church (1865) in Bologna. Mario Fani (1845–69) and Giovanni Acquaderni (1838–1922) created the Society of Italian Catholic Youth (1867).

In conjunction with Giovanni Battista Paganuzzi (1841–1923), Acquaderni stabilized in 1875 the Opera dei Congressi e dei Comitati Cattolici in Italia as a lay association in order that Catholic laymen might combat the dechristianizing work of agnostics. The Opera dei Congressi, the principal organization of Italian Catholics, became also a hierarchal association because its Catholic leaders repulsed all democratic principles, and a papal one, since it was in the service of the Holy See. On religious questions the Opera was intransigent, in conformity with the rigid interpretations of QUANTA CURA and the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS (1864). In political matters also its outlook shared the intransigence of the Holy See as expressed in the NON EXPEDIT policy. The Opera dei Congressi promoted, among other things, national, regional and diocesan congresses, action committees, aggressive journals, protest petitions, pilgrimages to Rome and festivals in honor of the pope. The purpose behind these measures was to keep Catholics continually aware of the Roman Question.

Within the Catholic movement one group formulated its static intransigent outlook in the phrase, Nè eletti nè elettori (neither elected nor electors); another group coined the more dynamic but yet intransigent motto, Preparazione nell' astensione (preparation by abstention). Some Catholics urged their coreligionists to resist the state until it collapsed. Giuseppe TONIOLO and others preferred to exert their influence in the fields of education, public opinion, labor and provincial and communal administration. With others, Toniolo originated the Catholic social movement, resulting in the Union for Social Studies and the Rivista internazionale di scienze sociali e affini. Catholics in this circle accepted Thomistic ideas concerning property and the state as expressed by the Jesuits Carlo Curci (d. 1891), Matteo LIBERATORE and Luigi Taparelli d'Azeglio. Besides reforms in the corporative sense previous to Rerum novarum (1891), they developed a program of democratic syndicalism. In addition they established numerous economic institutions, such as Catholic banks, credit unions and cooperatives, as well as social and charitable associations. Their interest in education moved the intransigent Catholics to hold meetings and circulate petitions to limit the secularizing process in the school and to promote Catholic schools on the parochial and diocesan levels. In 1921 they saw the opening of a Catholic university in Milan. A federation of educational institutions dependent on ecclesiastical authority was created in 1945 to coordinate the work of Italy's Catholic schools. Sacred Heart University in Milan and the Pontifical Salesian Athenaeum became centers of Catholic thought.

MODERNISM had one of its main centers in Italy early in the 20th century. Political Modernism, led by Romola MURRI, organized the Lega democratica nazionale. Theological Modernism, whose chief representatives were Ernesto BUONAIUTI and Salvatore Minocchi (d. 1943), caused a check in the development of the democratic movement by eliciting the condemnations of Modernism by Pius X and the disciplinary action taken against high ecclesiastics such as Cardinals Andrea Ferrari of Milan, Pietro Maffi of Pisa and Giacomo della Chiesa of Bologna (later Pope Benedict XV). Pius X disbanded the Opera dei Congressi in 1904 and reorganized the Catholic social movement along the lines of the German Volksverein. Christian syndicalism revived on a nationwide scale in 1918 under the leadership of Achille Grande, Luigi STURZO and the Partito Popolare Italiano (1919). The Gentilone Pact (1913) provided Catholic conservatives and clerical moderates with a basic charter politically and socially; it also signified the triumph of the ideas of men such as Toniolo over those of Murri.

Upheavals of the 20th Century. During World War I the understanding between Church and State culminated in the Unione Sacra (1916), whereby the government instituted military chaplains and abandoned anticlerical polemics, while the hierarchy appealed for solidarity behind the endangered fatherland. After 1918, Catholic forces, organized in party and in syndicate, could not create an alternative of the right or left to the classes then directing the nation's life. Fascism ended all democratic liberties (1922–26), but it made peace with the Church and papacy in the LATERAN PACTS (1929), which established Catholicism as the state religion, and in later agreements (1931, 1939). Benito Mussolini, the Duce of Italy until 1943, conceded privileges and favors to the Church in order to have its leaders support his dictatorial and imperialistic policies, although among the laity dissension arose over problems of liberty and racism. After Mussolini's downfall in 1943 many Catholics participated in the resistance movement in committees of liberation and joined the Christian Democratic Party. Among these was Father Giuseppe Dossetti (d. 1996), who would serve in the country's first national assembly before going on to found the Small Family of the Annunciation in 1954.

In 1946 Italy, defeated in World War II, became a republic. Its new constitution, dated Jan. 1, 1948, declared that Church-State relations would continue to be regulated by the Lateran Pacts, which could be modified only by bilateral agreements. The Christian Democratic Party, which headed the new government, attempted reconstruction and education of the masses while battling political parties and syndicates ranging from the extreme right (Movimento Sociale Italiano) to the Communist extreme left. Under the new constitution, the state was prohibited from funding private schools. After the death of Alcide De GASPERI (1958) there arose the problem of agreements with leftist and rightist groups (dirigismo or liberalismo) to obtain agrarian, fiscal, and social reforms. The more liberal of these parties were increasingly influential during the 1970s and 1980s.

Influenced by the increasingly liberalized morals of the 20th century, Italians began to stray from Church doctrine in the late 20th century. 1971 saw the legalization of divorce. In 1978 the government passed legislation legalizing abortion, and a Church-led referendum on the new law three years later was unsuccessful in its efforts to preserve the sanctity of human life. Concerns over declining enrollments at Church-run schools became cause for concern beginning in the 1960s; by 2000 Catholic schools educated approximately a third of all Italian children, despite the government's repeated unwillingness to extend subsidies to parents.

In part because of the influence of a radicalized liberal party within the government, the role of the Church in the 1980s and 1990s became increasingly subdued relative to its former influential position within both society and politics. In 1984, while preserving the recognition of the state of Vatican City as an independent, sovereign entity extended under the Lateran Pacts, a secularized Italy and the Vatican updated several provisions of the 1929 accords, diminishing a number of privileges formerly granted to the church and ending the status of Roman Catholicism as the religion of the Italian state. Under an intesa, the state extended certain financial and other privileges to not just the Catholic Church but to each of Italy's recognized faiths, although it remained unwilling to help fund parochial education. The increasing secularization of the country resulted in the demand for the removal of crucifixes and other symbols that had been displayed in courtrooms, government offices and other public places for many years.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 25,806 parishes tended by 36,566 diocesan and 18,930 religious priests. Other religious included 4,100 brothers and 115,775 sisters. In response to the Church's shifting demographic, a new seminary, opened in September of 1999 in Salerno, was intended in part to provide a new home for some of the country's aging priests. Despite the many social, educational and humanitarian efforts that continued to occupy Church members, calls for drug legalization, euthanasia and stem cell research required vigilance and outspokenness on the part of Italian bishops, as well as the pope. Church leaders also aggressively spoke out against agitation on the part of the Lombard League for the secession of Northern Italy as a consequence of discontent over increasing crime and corruption in the south, as well as the economic burden caused by the influx of illegal immigrants such as Muslim refugees from Albania and North Africa. A push by the European Parliament to grant homosexual couples the same legal rights as married heterosexual couples sparked a vigorous opposition by Church leaders, who also viewed the steadily declining birthrate in Italy with alarm. The Church was more successful in its efforts to curtail artificial insemination, after a 1999 law banned cloning and restricted previously unconstrained fertility procedures in the country.

Bibliography: J. LEFLON, La Crise révolutionnaire, 1789–1846 (Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, eds., A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, 20; 1949). R. AUBERT, Le Pontificat de Pie IX, 1846–1878 (Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, eds., A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, 21; 2d ed. 1964). K. BHILMEYER and H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte, 3 v. G. F. H. and J. BERKELEY, Italy in the Making, 1815–1848, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1932–40). S. JACINI, La politica ecclesiastica italiana da Villafranca a Porta Pia (Bari 1938). R. ALBRECHT-CARRIÉ, Italy from Napoleon to Mussolini (New York 1950). D. MACK SMITH, Italy: A Modern History (Ann Arbor 1959). S. W. HALPERIN, Italy and the Vatican at War (Chicago 1939). K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 v. (New York 1958–62) v.1, 2, 4. G. MOLLAT, La Question romaine de Pie VI à Pie IX (2d ed. Paris 1932). A. C. JEMOLO, Chiesa e stato in Italia negli ultimi cento anni (Turin 1948); Church and State in Italy, 1850–1950, tr. from Italian by D. MOORE (Oxford 1960). G. SPADOLINI, L'opposizione cattolica da Porta Pia al '98 (4th ed. Florence 1961). F. FONZI, I cattolici e la società italiana dopo l'unità (2d ed. Rome 1960). E. ROTA "Gli svolgimenti storici di due forze costruttive: Liberalismo e nazionalità," in Questioni di storia contemporanea, v.2 (Milan 1955). P. SCOPPOLA, Dal neoguelfismo alla Democrazia cristiana (Rome 1958). R. F. ESPOSITO, La massoneria e l'Italia dal 1800 ai nostri giorni (2d ed. Rome 1959). Chiesa e stato nell'ottocento: Miscellanea in onore di P. Pirri, ed. R. AUBERT et al., 2 v. (Padua 1962). G. DE ROSA, Storia del movimento cattolico in Italia (Bari 1966) v.2. F. MAGRI, La democrazia cristiana in Italia, 2 v. (Rome 1956). A. GAMBASIN, Il movimento sociale nell'opera dei congressi cattolici in Italia, 1874–1904 (Rome 1958). T. ORTOLAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:118–242. A. PIOLANTI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) Tables générales 2338–67. J. MICHL et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:811–821. Bilan du Monde. Encyclopédie catholique du monde chrétien, 2 v. (2d ed. Tournai 1964). 2: 511–531. Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses. Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia has full annual bibliog.

[A. GAMBASIN/EDS.]

ITE, MISSA EST

The concluding formula of dismissal in the Latin Mass (see ROMAN RITE). Although mentioned for the first time in the Ordo Romanus I (PL 78:948), it presumably belonged to the most ancient Latin Mass of Rome. Similar dismissal calls were already customary in old Roman assembly practice: Ilicet (ire licet, it is permitted to leave; see Vergil, Aeneid 6.23; Dölger, 123): Discedite Quirites (depart, Roman citizens; Dölger, 122). Ite, missa est has the meaning "Go, it is the dismissal," to which the assembly responds Deo gratias, "Thanks be to God."

The Ite, missa est is used at all Latin Masses except the evening Mass of Holy Thursday, other Masses followed by a procession, and Masses for the Dead (see REQUIEM MASS; for its medieval liturgical use, see BENEDICAMUS DOMINO). The dismissal was to be proclaimed by the deacon in the name of the bishop (or celebrant), in a loud voice, and sung to a melody, probably similar to the one given for Mass XV (see Dölger, 119). Since Vatican Council II the concluding formula of dismissal in vernacular Masses in the English-speaking countries is "The Mass is ended; go in peace."

Bibliography: F. J. DÖLGER, in Antike und Christentum 6 (1940) 81–132. Graduale Romanum (New York 1961). J. A. JUNG-MANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55) v.2. C. MOHRMANN, "Missa," Vigilae Christianae

12 (1958) 67–92. W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington IN 1958).

[C. KELLY]

ITINERARIA

Ancient, mainly Roman descriptions of travel routes, usually with distances in Roman miles, and later, Gallic leagues, with indications of relay posts (mutationes) and hostels (stationes; mansiones). Under Caesar Augustus, in preparation for the census of the whole world mentioned by Luke (2.1–4), geographical maps and charts were prepared, giving the divisions of the Roman provinces, the regions of Italy, the principal roads connecting Rome with all the cities of the empire, the posting-stations, main inhabitations, and peoples. These charts served as a basis for the famous Orbis pictus of Agrippa, a map of the Roman world depicted in colors on a large rectangular portico by Agrippa's sister Paulla (Pliny, Hist. nat. 3.3.14). Suetonius speaks of maps used in school and by the military (Domitian 10); and AMBROSE of Milan says that a soldier sent on a journey followed the itinerarium given him by the emperor (Comm. ad Ps. 118), while Eumenius of Autun refers to the children in school becoming familiar with the whole world (omnes terras et cuncta maria) through the maps on the walls (Orat. pro restaur. scholis 20). Traces of these early maps are preserved in the so-called Tabula Peutingeriana, a 12-page, parchment manuscript containing colored maps of the entire Roman Empire. This document was copied in 1265 by a monk of Colmar (Annal. Colmar. 1.1); it was rediscovered in 1494 by C. Meissel, who willed it to his friend Conrad Peutinger of Würzburg; and it is known under the latter's name.

The Peutinger Table gives evidence of at least six revisions, beginning with the Orbis pictus of Agrippa. In the 4th century in particular, the routes, main cities of Rome, Constantinople, and Antioch, as imperial residences, were given greater relief; there is evidence of additions in accord with the so-called Theodosian Tables of 425 and the conquests of JUSTINIAN I (527–565). Travelers in the empire had little difficulty obtaining maps and understanding routes and distances from the public monuments in the greater cities.

For the older Roman itineraria, the four silver vases discovered at Vicarello, near Lake Bracciano, some 20 miles north of Rome, give the route from Cadiz, Spain, to Rome with the names of the stationes and distances between them in Roman miles; the vases apparently date from the reign of Trajan (98–117). At Autun and Allichamp in France and at Tongres in Belgium, fragments of stone wall maps have been discovered, as well as parts of monuments on which were engraved the routes and distances between, for example, Tongres and seven main cities in the empire, following seven different roadways. Fragments of similar travel guides are found in many excavation sites.

Palestinian Pilgrimages. The route of a pilgrimage to Palestine made in 333 is described in the Itinerarium Burdigalense by the so-called Pilgrim of Bordeaux, who departed from that city (ubi est fluvius Garonna), crossed southern Gaul, the Alps, northern Italy, Pannonia, Thrace, stopped briefly at Constantinople, then continued through Asia Minor and Syria to arrive at Beirut. He continued down the coast of Phoenicia, passing Sidon, Sarepta, and Caesarea in Palestine, and turned east at Mt. Sinai to visit all the sites mentioned in the Bible on the way to Jerusalem and its environs. He records the distances between these sites and includes a description of the monuments or their biblical significance. His return journey took him through Macedonia to Italy and the close of his journey at Milan.

The Peregrinatio ad loca sancta of Aetheria was written c. 400. It describes the journey of a woman of the upper class who visited the monks in Egypt, the Holy places in Palestine, and Mesopotamia, and who returned to Constantinople by way of Tarsus, Seleucia, and Chalcedon. She used the cursum publicum or imperial post facilities on the main routes of the empire; she traveled mostly by horse or mule and received protection of the military in places infested by armed thieves. She stopped frequently at the xenodochia, or hostels, connected with the monasteries. The first part of the MS is missing; it begins with a description of Mt. Sinai, details of the liturgical services in Jerusalem, and of her excursions to the land of Job (Idumea) and to Mt. Nebo. Most of the biblical information regarding the monuments is taken from the Bible and the Onomasticon of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA as edited and revised by St. JEROME. The latter provides further Palestinian information in several letters describing the travels of St. Paula (Epist. 46 and 108), in letters to Dardanus (Epist. 129), to Paulinus (58), Sabini-anus (147), and in his commentary on Ezekiel (47.15–20). A compilation of information taken from Jerome and Flavius Josephus was made c. 450 and has been preserved under the name of Eucherius of Lyons. The Itinerarium de situ terrae sanctae of the archdeacon Theodosius, written c. 525, and the Breviarium de Hierosolyma, written toward the end of the 5th century, are further examples of this travel literature as guides through the Holy Land.

The so-called Itinerarium Antonini describes the route from Milan, through Bergamo, Verona, Aquileia, Smyrna, Constantinople, Ancyra, Antioch, and Caesarea, to Jerusalem, and gives the distances and stations in a manner similar to that of the Itinerarium Burdigalense. The original document, now called the Anonymous of Piacenza, was the subject of several forgeries and legendary interpolations. In 670 ADAMNAN OF IONA wrote down the recital of the pilgrimage to the Holy Lands made by the Gallic Bishop Arculf, who had been shipwrecked on the west coast of Britain. The account is interesting for its reflections on the situation after the Arab conquest of Palestine. The De locis sanctis of BEDE is a compilation based largely on the work of Adamnan, while the recollections of St. WILLIBALD, nephew of St. Boniface, were written down by a nun of the monastery of Heidenheim (c. 727). A Commemoratorium de casis Dei was composed c. 808; the Frankish monk Bernard wrote an Itinerarium trium monachorum (c. 870), in which he notes the use of the holy fire in the Holy Saturday liturgy in Jerusalem.

In the Orient, the retired merchant Cosmas Indicopleustes wrote his Christianikē topographia (c. 550). He was probably a Nestorian who had traveled to East Africa and across Asia to Ceylon before settling as a monk in Alexandria; his work, which furnished much geographical and cultural information, opposed the biblical to the Ptolemaic conception of the universe. An Armenian Rituale and a Georgian calendar of the 7th century describe the processions to the various monuments in the Holy Land; and c. 660 an Armenian pilgrim wrote a Description of the Holy Places. The Greek monk Epiphanius Hagiopolites wrote his Hodoiporikon (c. 786), or traveler's guide, to Jerusalem and Palestine.

Rome. Caesar Augustus had a map of Rome engraved on the portico of the Campus Martius; in 177 Marcus Aurelius ordered a description of the city's monuments prepared in connection with the establishment of impost controls. Under Septimius Severus a Forma urbis Romae was prepared. Polemeus Silvius wrote Quae sint Romae, c. 449, and dedicated it to EUCHERIUS OF LYONS. It provides for pilgrims a description of the monuments dedicated to the Christian martyrs, and lists the hills, valleys, bridges, baths, and buildings of the Eternal City. The Syriac Breviarium of ZACHARY THE RHETOR (c. 540) is a compilation made from the Notitia urbis Romae with special attention to the monuments of the martyrs; it indicates that before 540 there existed a Notitia regionum urbis in which Rome's churches were described, along with their burial places.

For the pilgrims of the 7th to the 9th century, four Roman itineraria were in existence. The Notitia ecclesiarum orbis Romae, called the Salzburg Itinerary, dates from the reign of Pope HONORIUS I (625–638). The Vienna Itinerary, or the De locis sanctis martyrum quae sunt foris civitatem Romae, gives the locations of the bodies of the martyrs in the churches of Rome and appears to have been compiled under PELAGIUS II and revised under Honorius I. The Itinerary of William of Malmesbury, inserted in his Gesta regum Anglorum, describes the basilicas and suburban cemeteries before the translations of relics in the 8th century. The Itinerary of Einsiedeln was written by a monk who copied many of the pagan and Christian inscriptions and gave a description of the monuments and the ceremonies of Holy Week. The most exact of these itineraries—that of Salzburg—gives the location of the remains of the martyrs with considerable exactitude, describing them as “in the open,” “on the ground,” “in a crypt,” “on the right [or left] side of the church,” “near the entrance,” etc. Finally, the Mirabilia urbis Romae (c. 11th century) is a compilation following in good part the Liber pontificalis.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 7.2:1841–1922; 14.1:65–176. H. LAHRKAMP, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:822–824. E. DEKKERS, ed., Clavis Patrum latinorum (2d ed. Streenbrugge 1961) 519–522. Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 175 (1961). P. GEYER, ed., Itinera Hierosolymitana saeculi IV–VIII (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 39; 1898). O. CUNTZ, ed., Itineraria Romana I (Leipzig 1929). A. BAUMSTARK, Abendländische Palästina-pilger des I. Jahrtausends und ihre Berichte (Cologne 1906). T. TOBLER and A. MOLINIER, eds., Itinera Hierosolymitana et descriptiones Terra Sanctae bellis sacris anteriora, 2 pts. (Geneva 1877–79). A. MOLINIER and C. KOHLER, Itinerum bellis sacris anteriorum series chronologica (Geneva 1885). Palestine Pilgrims Text Society (London 1896–97). K. MILLER, Itineraria romana (Stuttgart 1916). B. KÖTTING, Peregrinatio religiosa (Münster 1950). F. STUMMER (Florilegium Patristicum, ed. J. ZELLINGER et al. 41; 1935), Jerome. H. PÉTRÉ, ed. and tr., Éthérie: Journal de voyage (Sources Chrétiennes 21; 1948). M. ANASTOS, Dumbarton Oaks Papers, Harvard Univ. 3 (1946) 73–80, Cosmas Indicopleustes.

[J. HAMROGUE]

ITURRATE ZUBERO, DOMINGO, BL.

Known in religion as Dominic of the Most Holy Sacrament, Trinitarian priest; b. May 11, 1901, Dima (Basque region), Spain; d. April 8, 1927, Belmonte, Spain. Domingo evidenced a religious vocation from an early age, joined the Trinitarians, and was ordained a priest. During his short life, he became known for the devotion with which he celebrated Mass and for his obedience. John Paul II praised Domingo, saying: “He strove to live according to two central principles of the spirituality of his order: the mystery of the Holy Trinity and the work of the Redemption, which lead to a life of intense charity” (beatification homily, Oct. 30, 1983).

Feast: April 7.

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 46 (1983): 6–7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

IUS PUBLICUM

Ius publicum are treatises on the “public law” of the Church have traditionally been divided into ius publicum internum, and externum. The former denotes that describe the internal constitution, structures, procedures, and power of the Church. The NCE treats these topics passim in articles pertinent to the Code of Canon Law and under such headings as Roman Curia, Pontifical Councils, and Synods. Ius publicum externum is the study of the external relationships between the Church and the civil legal systems which the Church encounters throughout the world.

See Also: CHURCH AND STATE (CANON LAW)

Bibliography: F. M. CAPPELLO, Summa Iuris Publici Ecclesiastici (Rome 1928). M. C. A. CORONATA, Ius Publicum Ecclesiasticum (Turin 1948). A. OTTAVIANI, Institutiones Iuris Publici Ecclesiastici, 2 v. (Vatican City 1947–1948). A. OTTAVIANI, Compendium Iuris Publici Ecclesiastici (Vatican City 1954). F. M. MARCHESI, Summula Iuris Publici Ecclesiastici (Naples 1960). J. C. MURRAY, We Hold These Truths: Catholic Reflections on the American Proposition (New York 1960); The Problem of Religious Freedom (Westminster, Md. 1965). P. PAVAN, Libertà religiosa e pubblici poteri (Milan 1965). Vatican II, declaration Dignitatis humanae (Dec. 7, 1965). C. CARDIA, Il governo della Chiesa (Bologna 1984). Pertinent topics are also treated in the standard commentaries, e.g. J. P. BEAL et al., New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York 2000); and L. CHIAPPETTA, Il Codice di Diritto Canonico: Commento giuridico-pastorale (Rome 1996).

[J. STAAB]

IVANIOS, MAR (GIVERGIS THOMAS PANIKERVIRTIS)

Malankarite rite archbishop, leader in reunion efforts; b. Mavelikkara, Kerala, India, Sept. 18, 1882; d. Trivandrum, India, July 15, 1953. Ivanios, member of a leading Syrian family belonging to the dissident group in the MALANKARITE rite, received his early education in Protestant and government schools. After studies in the seminary at Kottayam he was ordained deacon in 1898 and priest in 1909. He was the first Kerala cleric to graduate from Madras Christian College, where he obtained an M.A. in economics (1906). In 1908 he was named principal of a school in Kottayam. He was instrumental in establishing the autonomy of the Syro-Jacobite Church in India under a catholicos (1911–12). From 1913 to 1919 he was professor of Syriac and political economy at Serampore College, a Protestant institution near Calcutta. In 1919 he founded and acted as superior of the Order of the Imitation of Christ, the first religious communities in his Church for men and women. The MALINES CONVERSATIONS led him to inquire about reunion with Rome. As bishop (1925) with the name Mar Ivanios, and as metropolitan (1928), he received the approval of other Syrian Jacobite leaders to continue his correspondence with Rome. In 1930 Mar Ivanios entered into union with Rome, along with his suffragan, Mar Theophilos, the members of his religious communities, and a few laymen. As archbishop of Trivandrum (1932–53), a see belonging to the Malankar rite, he strove for reunion with other Christians and was zealous in erecting churches and schools throughout his jurisdiction. In 1950 he established a university college. He traveled widely in Europe, Australia, Canada, and the U.S., and published many periodical articles and booklets in English and Malayalam on the liturgy of his rite and on the Syriac language.

Bibliography: M. GIBBONS, Mar Ivanios (Dublin 1962). E. TISSERANT, Eastern Christianity in India, tr. E. R. HAMBYE (Westminster, Md. 1957) 157–162; Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 14.2:3143–49.

[E. R. HAMBYE]

Levi Silliman Ives.

IVES, LEVI SILLIMAN

Episcopal bishop, founder of the New York Catholic Protectory; b. Meriden, Conn., Sept. 16, 1797; d. New York City, Oct. 13, 1867. He was reared in Turin, N.Y., where he attended Lowville Academy, leaving to serve briefly in the War of 1812. After ill health interrupted his studies for the Presbyterian ministry at Hamilton College, Clinton, N.Y., he became an Episcopalian (1819) and studied theology in New York under Bp. John H. Hobart, former pastor and close friend of Mother Elizabeth Seton. He married Hobart's daughter, Rebecca, in 1822, and was ordained the following year. Ives advanced rapidly and, after serving at many parishes in Pennsylvania and New York, he became the first Episcopalian bishop of North Carolina (1831). Slavery was a vital issue in his episcopate, for he defended the institution as a field for Christian paternalism and wrote a catechism for the slaves. The Oxford Movement was also of concern and English Tractarian writings on Protestant origins and the early Church impressed Ives. At Valle Crucis, N.C., he founded the Brotherhood of the Holy Cross (1845), whose members were accused of adhering to monastic vows, auricular confession, the Real Presence, and other Catholic practices. After many diocesan quarrels he was arraigned in 1848 by an Episcopalian convention, which accepted his written assurances of his orthodoxy and dissolved the brotherhood. Ives soon regretted his recantation and issued a pastoral letter reaffirming his ideas. He was increasingly drawn to the Catholic Church by its means for achieving personal sanctity and its attachment to the poor in the U.S., and he finally journeyed to Rome and made a formal submission to Pius IX on Christmas Day 1852. Shortly after this his wife entered the Church. The story of his conversion was told in his Trials of a Mind in its Progress to Catholicism (1853).

Ives's return to New York in 1854 as a Catholic layman posed a problem for the American hierarchy. Since Rome directed that provision be made in such cases, a convert's fund was first attempted and then part-time lecturing in rhetoric was secured for him in New York City at St. Joseph's Seminary, St. John's College, and several convents. Eventually, Ives found a career for himself in Catholic charities. As president of New York's Superior Council, he urged the St. Vincent de Paul Society to expand its growing lay apostolate beyond parish activities to national organization. Ives had long opposed the system that sent destitute children to western farms or to state institutions essentially Protestant in character, and in 1863 he organized the New York Catholic Protectory and became its first president. He persuaded the Christian Brothers and the Sisters of Charity to join his venture and obtained public financial support for the protectory. His cottage in Manhattanville became a favorite meeting place for converts and a popular Catholic cultural center in New York.

Bibliography: J. O'GRADY, Levi Silliman Ives (New York 1933).

[E. F. LEONARD]

IVO, ST.

Legendary bishop and missionary to Britain in the sixth or seventh century. Goscelin (11th century) wrote his life, based on an account by Andrew Withman, abbot of RAMSEY, who collected his information on pilgrimage to Jerusalem. According to Goscelin, Ivo left his native Persia; visited Rome and Gaul; and proceeded to Britain, where with three companions he successfully preached the Christian faith and settled finally at Slepe, Huntingdonshire. Lack of documentation has caused some authorities to conclude that the story is a fabrication by Ramsey monks. Ivo's supposed relics were discovered (1001) at the present location of St. Ives, Huntingdonshire, where a priory dependent on Ramsey was established, the relics being translated to Ramsey itself. Ivo is unconnected with St. Ives, Cornwall.

Feast: April 24.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 2:284–289. T. D. HARDY, Descriptive Catalogue of Materials Relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, 3 v. in 4 (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 26; 1862–71) 1.1:184–186. C. HOLE, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, 4 v. (London 1877–87) 3:324–325. G. H. DOBLE, "St. Ivo, Bishop and Confessor, Patron of the Town of St. Ives," Laudate 12 (1934) 149–156.

[R. W. HAYS]

IVO HÉLORY, ST.

Priest and lawyer; b. Kermartin, near Tréguier, France, Oct. 17, 1253; d. Trédrez, France, May 19, 1303. On completion of his theology and law studies, he became officialis of Rennes in 1280 and of Tréguier in 1284, rector of Trédrez in 1284, and, finally, curé of Lo-uannec c. 1292. He resigned these offices in 1297–98 and retired to his native region, where he led a life of austerity and devoted himself to works of charity. To provide legal aid for the poor he created confraternities that have spread over France, Belgium, and Brazil and also to Rome. Proceedings for his canonization were opened in 1330, and he was canonized in 1347. His cult spread rapidly in Brittany, of which he is the second patron, and although his tomb was destroyed in the French Revolution, it was restored in 1890. He is the patron also of lawyers and of the University of Nantes. Each year on his feast day the famous pilgrimage procession of St. Ivo is held at Tréguier.

Feast: May 19.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 4:538–614. A. DE LA BORDERIE, Les Monuments originaux et l'histoire de saint Yves (Saint Briec 1885). A. DESJARDINS, St. Yves avocat des pauvres et patron des avocats (Paris 1897). U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Biobibliographie, 2 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1905–07) 1:2291–92. B. POCQUET DU HAUT-JUSSÉ, La Compagnie de St-Yves des Bretons à Rome (Rome 1919). C. DE LA RONCIERE, St. Yves (5th ed. Paris 1925). A. MASSERON, St. Yves (Paris 1952). P. LA HAYE, Saint Yves de Tréguier (Châteaulin 1973). F. SEMUR, Yves de Kermartin: magistrat et avocat du XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Bannalec, France 1983). A. RIECK, Der Heilige Ivo von Hélor: advocatus pauperum und Patron der Juristen (Frankfurt am Main 1998). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:351–353. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 4625–37.

[É. BROUETTE]

IVO OF CHARTRES, ST.

Bishop; b. Chartres, France, c. 1040; d. there Dec. 23, 1115. Ivo studied at Paris, then at the Abbey of Bec in Normandy. As a priest he was attached to the church of Nesle in Picardy, and later became provost of the monastery of Canons Regular of Saint-Quentin at Beauvais. He finally became bishop of Chartres, which see he occupied from November 1090 until his death. He traveled widely in France to attend numerous councils. His writings include 291 letters, 25 sermons, and two canonical collections (see IVO OF CHARTRES, COLLECTION OF).

He was a remarkable writer for his era, well informed on the scientific renaissance then in progress and imbued with ideals of friendship, humanity, and mercy. As a theologian, he contributed to the fixing of the number of Sacraments at seven. His reservations on the subject of the Crusades and his use of exclusively religious sanctions manifested his totally spiritual conception of the Church.

In his conflicts with secular rulers and in the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE, he defended the freedom of the bishop and protected the monasteries of monks and clerics regular, but he did not favor exemption or the centralization typified by papal legates. With a view to the reform of the Church, he brought about acceptance of the distinction between the election of bishops, which was to be free and clerical, and their investiture by the prince, which was to take place only afterward and to be of limited significance. This moderate reforming tendency bore fruit in the Concordat of Worms in 1122.

Feast: May 23.

Bibliography: IVO OF CHARTRES, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 162:11–296 (letters), 506–610 (sermons); Correspondance 1090–1098, ed. and tr. J. LECLERCQ (Paris 1949) contains letters 1–70. The Miracles of Saint James, tr. from Liber sancti Jacobi, tr. T. F. COFFEY, L. K. DAVIDSON and M. DUNN (New York 1996). R. SPRANDEL, Ivo von Chartres und seine Stellung in der Kirchengeschichte (Stuttgart 1962). F. LOT and R. FAWTIER, eds., Histoire des institutions françaises au moyen âge (Paris 1957–). M. GRANDJEAN, Laïcs dans l'Église (Paris 1994).

[J. LECLERCQ]

IVO OF CHARTRES, COLLECTION OF

Three canonical collections are attributed to Ivo of Chartres: the Tripartita, the Decretum, and the Panormia. There is considerable doubt about the sources, the dates, and the circumstances of the editing of these collections. These questions will be resolved definitively only when critical editions of these writings can be made and when the minor collections and the florilegia of the 11th century are better known.

As its name indicates, the Tripartita is composed of three parts. The first two parts, Collection A, are a group of 655 fragments of decretals, real or false, from Clement I to Urban II (Part 1), and 789 conciliar canons or patristic texts (Part 2). The third part, Collection B, is an abridgment in 29 titles (861 fragments) of the Decretum of Ivo. The Tripartita is unedited.

The Decretum (Patrologia Latina 161:59–1022) is a compilation of 3,760 chapters divided into 17 parts. Its immediate sources are: the Decretum of BURCHARD, taken over almost entirely; Collection A of the Tripartita; and a compilation of decretals related to the Britannica and, probably, to the Gregorian and French florilegia (schools of Laon, Bec, and Chartres). The composition of the collection leaves much to be desired: the series are transcribed without order or repeated; there are mistakes in the inscriptions. Theological questions form a great part of the work: I Pars, faith, Baptism, and Confirmation; II Pars, Eucharist; XVII Pars, theological virtues, and the four last things. One may also find in it almost 250 texts of Corpus iuris civilis, Codex Iustinianus, and 150 taken from authentic or apocryphal Carolingian legislation. Being too voluminous and inconvenient for a reference work, the Decretum was not very successful (list of MSS in Fournier-LeBras 2:67), but various abridgments were made of it until the 13th century.

The Panormia (Patrologia Latina 161:1045–1344) or Pannormia (collection of all the laws) contains 1038 chapters divided into eight books. 920 texts come from Ivo's own Decretum; the others are borrowed from the Collection of SEVENTY-FOUR TITLES, from Collection A of the Tripartita, and from a collection of decretals similar to the Britannica. The success of the Panormia, attested by the numerous preserved MSS of this collection, is due to its incontestable qualities of brevity, order, and the legal precision of the summaries (Gratian copied them by the hundred). In fact the work offers "a compendious encyclopedia of Canon Law at the end of the 11th century" (Fournier-LeBras 2:99).

If one accepts the conclusions of P. Fournier, one will have to admit that the three collections were composed in a fairly brief lapse of time (1093–95) by a group of copyists working under the direction of Ivo of Chartres, with the encouragement of Pope Urban II (Ep. 2, Patrologia Latina 162:13). Collection A of the Tripartita must have been prepared in 1093–94 from documents brought back from Rome (where Ivo had gone in 1090 and 1093), combined with traditional French Canon Law. The Decretum would date from 1094, as would the Tripartita, completed by the addition of Collection B; the Panormia, from 1095. The legal science displayed in the Summaries in the Panormia, the care taken in distinguishing the exact nature of juridical rules (precept, counsel, unchangeable and contingent laws), the space given to exemption, the rules given for reconciling conflicting texts (inspired partly by the works of BERNOLD OF CONSTANCE), reveal the guiding hand of the great canonist Ivo himself. The same tendencies run through the Prologus (Patrologia Latina 161:47–60 and 1041–46), of which it is difficult to say whether it was intended for the Decretum or the Panormia.

Bibliography: P. FOURNIER and G. LEBRAS, Histoire des collections canoniques en occident depuis les fausses décrétales jusqu'au Décret de Gratien, 2:55–114 (Paris 1931–32). É AMANN and L. GUIZARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 15.2:3625–40 (Paris 1903–50). A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I (Mechlin 1928) 1:331–332. IVO OF CHARTRES, Correspondance, ed. and tr. J. LECLERCQ (Les Classiques de l'histoire de France au moyen âge 22; Paris 1949) vii–xli. P. FOURNIER, "Les Collections canoniques attribuées à Yves de Chartres," Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes 57 (1896) 645–698; 58 (1897) 26–77, 293–326, 410–444, 624–676. J. DE GHHELLINCK, Le Mouvement théologique du XXI<sup>e</sup> siècle (2nd ed. Bruges 1948) 445–459. C. MUNIER, Les Sources patristiques du droit de l'église du VIII<sup>e</sup> au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Strasbourg 1957).

[C. MUNIER]

IVORY COAST, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in West Africa, Ivory Coast, or Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, is bordered on the south by the Atlantic Ocean, on the east by Ghana, on the north by Mali and Capital: Yamoussoukro; Abidjan is the political center.

Size: 124,550 sq. miles.
Population: 15,980,950 in 2000.
Languages: French; numerous native dialects are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 2,237,350 Catholics (14%), 9,588,570 Muslims (60%), 1,438,285 Protestants (9%), 2,716,745 practice indigenous faiths (17%).

Archdioceses	Suffragans
Abidjan	Grand-Bassam, Yopougon
Bouaké	Abengourou, Bondoukou, Yamoussoukro
Gagnoa	Daloa, Man, San Pedro-en-Côte d'Ivoire
Korhogo	Katiola, Odienné

Burkina Faso, and on the west by Liberia and Guinea. With its coastline bordered by lagoons, the region rises to plains before ascending to a plateau region inland. Hills in the west and northwest are crowned by Mt. Nimba, the highest peak. Rivers include the Bandama, Sassandra and upper tributaries of the Niger and Volta. The world's largest producer of coffee and cocoa beans, the region's agricultural products also include corn, pineapples and rubber, while among its natural resources are industrial diamonds, petroleum, manganese, cobalt, iron and copper. Once containing the largest forests in West Africa, deforestation by the timber industry is now a problem in most Ivorian woodlands. Tropical along the coast, the climate becomes semi-arid farther inland, and the rainy season occurs in the fall.

A former territory of French West Africa, Ivory Coast became an independent republic in the French Community in 1960. The population includes 60 native Ivory Coast ethnic groups, and at least as many foreign ethnic groups, with the Muslim population living predominately in the north and Christians residing in the south. Despite the discovery of offshore petroleum reserves, Ivory Coast relies on agriculture, which employs almost 70 percent of the population. The average life expectancy for an Ivorian is 45.5 years, in part due to AIDS, while less than half of all the country's adults can read.

History. Capuchins arrived in the region in 1637, a century after the Portuguese and other Europeans had established a flourishing slave trade along the coast. In 1701 a Dominican was appointed the first prefect apostolic of the Prefecture of the Guinea Coast. From 1842–45 the French signed treaties with the Agni and several other native tribes living along the coast, and four years after a battle with the king of the Mandingo tribe in 1889 Ivory Coast became a French colony. While the first priests of the Congregation of the Holy Heart of Mary arrived in the region as early as 1844, systematic evangelization did not begin until 1895 when the Prefecture Apostolic of the Ivory Coast was created, and missionaries from the Society of African Missions came. Growth of the mission was slow until 1918, but quite rapid thereafter, and a number of Catholic schools were established. The hierarchy was established in 1955, when the Archdiocese of Abidjan was created and made a metropolitan see for the country. The first African priest was ordained in 1934. Bernard Yago (d. 1998), the first native bishop in Ivory Coast, was ordained on May 8, 1960 as the archbishop of Abidjan, and was named a cardinal in 1983. In subsequent years, all new bishops were chosen from among the native population. When the last French bishop retired in 1975, the episcopacy of Ivory Coast became entirely indigenous.

The Modern Church. A territory of France after 1946, Ivory Coast gained autonomous status within the French Community in 1958, and declared its independence on Aug. 7, 1960. The new government permitted freedom of religion under its constitution, and traditionally favored the Church despite Catholicism's status as a minority faith. Félix Houphouët-Boigny (1905–93), a Catholic who led the independence movement, ruled as head of state in a one-party system until 1990, when a multiparty government system was introduced. Government funding of a cathedral in Abidjan—as well as a huge cathedral in Yamoussoukro, the birthplace of Houphouët-Boigny—sparked such ire within the Muslim community that the government extended similar support to other faiths. Interfaith relations were promoted by the government, which noted religious holidays and appeared at celebrations of all the country's major faiths. Although a military coup overthrew the existing government in December of 1999, the country returned to democratic elections in October of 2000.

The reforms following the Second Vatican Council in 1962–65 were well received in the region. While missionaries had previously rejected all local musical instruments that brought indigenous African religions to mind, following the council the Church encouraged the use of traditional African music and musical instruments in the liturgy. Many priests, catechists and lay people took up composing music using local tunes with lyrics either in French or in the local language. Traditional rites were introduced with numerous explanations that ensured their comprehension, although it was sometimes difficult to find gestures or symbolic objects common to all ethnic groups. In many dioceses the pastoral ministry began to focus on base communities that met regularly. The CHARISMATIC RENEWAL experienced rapid growth throughout the country. The Catholic Institute of West Africa opened a section for the formation of lay people that became a great success. Catholic radio stations in the dioceses of Grand-Bassam and Man attracted a wide audience, and in the early 1990s stations were also established in Abidjan and Yamoussoukro.

The Jesuit-run African Institute for Economic and Social Development (INADES) was located in Abidjan, and its library was considered among the most modern on the African Continent. There also existed a major seminary for theology, although it was considered too small to respond to the number of those seeking admission. The Benedictine monastery founded at Bouaké in 1959 was affiliated with Toumliline in Morocco. In 1990 the cathedral in Yamoussoukro became the largest religious structure on the continent. Controversial, it was consecrated during a visit by Pope John Paul II only after the Church also agreed to build a hospital and youth center nearby.

Even after gaining its independence at mid-century, Ivory Coast retained strong ties with France, and these ties allowed it to maintain stable economic policies, encourage foreign investment and become one of the most prosperous state in west Africa. Still, this prosperity was relative; while Ivory Coast required financial aid from industrialized nations, a liberal debt repayment plan allowed the government to keep current on loan payments similar to those crippling the economies of many of its neighbors. The country's relative prosperity did not prevent it from experiencing outbreaks of ethnic violence by the late 1990s, particularly in the wake of a heated election in October of 2000. Fortunately, an increasingly politicized Church leadership was willing to mediate the contested returns, although a temporary military government ultimately supplanted both Christian and Muslim candidates.

By 2000 Ivory Coast had 243 parishes, tended by 418 secular and 267 religious priests. Other religious included 248 brothers and 901 sisters who worked diligently on behalf of the Church, and oversaw the country's 279 primary and 41 secondary schools. Among the goals of the Church was finding a way to bring Christianity into dialogue with the African culture and traditions, as well as with followers of Islam, a majority subject to some discrimination by a more educated Christian elite. Religious conversion between Catholic and Muslim were discouraged out of respect for Islamic laws, and leaders of the two faiths continued to work together to avoid religious conflict. In 2000 both Abidjan Archbishop Agre and Muslim leaders encouraged their followers to aid efforts to rebuild churches and mosques destroyed during an outbreak of violence following the fall elections. Relations between Catholics and other faiths remained on good terms, and regular ecumenical meetings were held with Methodist leaders.

Bibliography: R. J. MUDT Historical Dictionary of Côte d'Ivoire (Metuchen, NJ 1995). Bilan du Monde, 2 (1964) 290–293. Annuario Pontificio has annual data on all dioceses.

[J. HUCHET/P. TRICHET/EDS.]

J

JABLONSKA, BERNARDINA, BL.

Known in religion as Maria Bernardina; virgin, co-foundress of the Congregation of the Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis of Assisi, Servants of the Poor (Albertines); b. Aug. 5, 1878, Pizuny-Lukawica, Poland; d. Sept. 23, 1940, Krakow.

Bernardina, the fourth child of the landed farmers Gregory Jablonski and Maria Romanow, received her education from private tutors and from books borrowed from her pastor's library. When she was eight years old she met and was impressed by Saint Albert Chmielowski. She assuaged her sorrow at her mother's death in 1893 by turning increasingly to prayer. On Sept. 13, 1896, she left home to begin her postulancy in the new congregation being founded by Chmielowski despite her father's opposition and without the approval of her pastor. The following year she was among the first seven Albertine sisters to receive the habit. Her initial decade of religious life was spent doing household chores and tending the sick, as her faith grew. In 1907, Chmielowski named her superior, a position she maintained until her death. Together with Saint Albert, she founded hospices for those who were sick and homeless as a result of war. Bernardina is remembered not only for her charity, but also for the way in which she helped the suffering regain their human dignity.

Mother Maria Bernardina was declared venerable on Dec. 17, 1996. On March 8, 1997, a miracle attributed to her intercession was approved, leading to her beatification by John Paul II, June 6, 1997, at Wielka Krokiew Arena, Zakopane, Poland. Patron of the poor and handicapped.

Feast: Sept. 23.

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, 25 (1997): 6-7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JACKSON, DIOCESE OF

The diocese of Jackson (Dioecesis Jacksoniensis), Mississippi was established July 28, 1837 as the Diocese of Natchez. In 1957, the name was changed to Natchez-Jackson, and finally in 1977 to Jackson. It is a suffragan see of the metropolitan see of New Orleans. From the time it was first erected in 1837 until 1977 when the Diocese of Biloxi was established, the territory of Natchez-Jackson was coextensive with the state of Mississippi, an area of 46,340 square miles.

The first bishop, John Joseph Chanche, arrived in Natchez May 18, 1841, and found only two priests and no churches within his vast jurisdiction. Natchez, Vicksburg, and some places along the Gulf Coast had small groups of Catholics, with a few more scattered throughout the state, but numbers of them had not seen a priest for many years. Chanche, traveling throughout his diocese by stagecoach, river steamer, and any other means available at that time, worked vigorously for 11 years. By the time of his death, July 22, 1852, the basic structure of the fine Gothic cathedral had been completed in Natchez, and churches had been erected in nine other places; there were ten priests, a girls' orphanage, and plans for several other churches. His successor, James O. Van de Velde, SJ, arrived Nov. 23, 1853, but about two years later an accident led to his death on Nov. 13, 1855.

The third bishop, William H. ELDER, arrived on May 30, 1857, to direct the see, which, despite the paucity in numbers and the poverty of the Catholics, made heartening progress in the years following the Civil War. When in 1880 Elder was transferred to Cincinnati, Ohio, as coadjutor archbishop, the diocese had 19 priests, 48 churches, 15 parochial schools, and a Catholic population of 12,500. During the episcopate of Francis Janssens, who was consecrated for Natchez May 1, 1881, St. Mary's Cathedral, Natchez, was completed and solemnly consecrated on Sept. 19, 1886; missionary work among the African Americans and Native Americans in the state was advanced; and the number of Catholics had increased to 15,000, with 30 priests, 60 churches, and 26 parochial schools to care for their needs. When Janssens was transferred to New Orleans in 1888, Thomas Heslin was consecrated fifth bishop on June 18, 1889, and served until his death Feb. 22, 1911. His administration was characterized by slow but healthy growth. The sixth bishop was John E. Gunn, SM (1911–24), an eloquent speaker and effective administrator, who directed the establishment of nine new parishes and many mission chapels throughout the state.

On Oct. 15, 1924, Richard Oliver Gerow was consecrated seventh bishop of Natchez. A steady growth has marked his administration, during which the number of parishes has doubled and the number of priests more than doubled, while three Catholic hospitals, a monastery of cloistered Carmelite nuns, a lay retreat house, and a seminary of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate have been established, and other religious works inaugurated. In 1948 new chancery offices at Jackson, including administrative offices and bishop's residence, were completed and on July 22 of that year the bishop transferred his residence from Natchez to Jackson. The name of the diocese was changed to Natchez-Jackson on March 7, 1957 and St. Peter's Church in Jackson was named as cocathedral. By the time of Bishop Gerow's retirement in 1964, the diocese numbered 88 parishes, 190 priests, 52 brothers, and more than 400 sisters. There were 48 elementary schools, 26 high schools, three hospitals, two schools for nurses, and two orphanages under Catholic auspices.

Gerow was succeeded by his auxiliary bishop, Joseph B. Brunini, in 1966. A native of Vicksburg, Brunini was educated at the North American College in Rome and also received a doctorate in canon law from the Catholic University of America. In many respects he was both a visionary and activist. It was during his time and at his urging that the division of the diocese into the diocese of Jackson and the diocese of Biloxi took place in 1977. Brunini led the Mississippi Catholic Church through a number of rather difficult crises, including the integration of the Catholic school system, the implementation of Vatican II changes, and the creation of the Mississippi Religious Leadership Conference. He also led the diocese into uncharted waters when he delved into the political-social programs of the 1960s and 1970s. Under his direction, the Mississippi Catholic Church participated in federal programs designed to help the elderly and lower income groups. Finally, he encouraged the Church to reach out to their fellow Christians in Mississippi through specifically Catholic endeavors such as Catholic hospitals, Catholic charities, and Catholic education.

Brunini was succeeded by his Auxiliary Bishop, William R. Houck. A native of Birmingham, Alabama, Houck had advanced through the educational system before coming to Mississippi in 1979. In 1984, he assumed the administration of the diocese of Jackson and began to focus on evangelization, planning, the empowering of the laity, and the ever-growing role of women in the Catholic Church. In 2001, Houck submitted his letter of retirement to Rome, and subsequently he was appointed as the new director of the American Catholic Church Extension Society.

Over the years the diocese of Jackson, blessed with far-sighted leaders, experienced consistent growth and adjusted well to its Protestant environment, and by the end of the 20th century Catholicism is generally well regarded in Mississippi. The diocese has 74 parishes, 29 missions, nearly 100 religious and diocesan priests, 12 brothers, 240 sisters, and 47,873 Catholics out of a total state population of nearly two million people.

Bibliography: R. O. GEROW, Catholicity in Mississippi (Natchez 1939). M. V. NAMORATO, The Catholic Church in Mississippi, 1911-1984 (Westport, CT, 1998).

[R. O. GEROW/M. V. NAMORATO]

JACOB, PATRIARCH

Jacob (Heb. ya'āqōb, meaning uncertain), also known as Israel, son of Isaac and twin of Esau. By popular etymology his name was associated with the Hebrew word 'āqēb, "heel" (Gn 25.26) and the denominative verb 'āqab, "to trip someone by seizing his heel, to supplant" (Gn 27.36 and Hos 12.4). Either the sacred writer did not know the true derivation and meaning of the name, or he deliberately set it aside to highlight the fact that, because of divine election, Jacob, and through him, the Israelites, were destined to supplant Esau, and his progeny, the Edomites. It is probable that the name Jacob was originally an abbreviated form of a theophoric name such as ya'āqōb-'el (M. Noth, Personennamen 179, 197, associates it with the South-Arabic root 'qb and suggests the meaning "God protects").

Ostensibly the biblical narratives concerning Jacob appear as straightforward records of the personal exploits of Israel's progenitor. Yet closer scrutiny reveals that these narratives are, in reality, quite complex. They are skillfully edited accounts of traditional material to teach the significance of the patriarch's life both in relation to God's salvific plan and the character of the chosen people. Archeological data has demonstrated the genuine historical milieu of these narratives, and we are assured that the sacred writers did not arbitrarily create these stories. Yet the narratives are given a function beyond that of mere biography. They are deliberately didactic and succinctly evaluate national tendencies observed in the nation's progenitor, e.g., Jacob's cunning, occasionally rather unscrupulous, and his ready recourse to physical strength are portrayed as national traits that tend to hinder the divine plan of salvation and lead to the brink of disaster. Consider, for example, Jacob's fraudulent acquisition of the blessing reserved to the firstborn and the consequent threat to his, and the nation's, life. There can be no doubt that the author intends to censure these national traits and appeal for a humble faith and compliance to the divine plan. At times the narrative presages what has come to pass at the time of the actual editing of the narratives. Thus, Israel supplanted Edom at the time of the establishment of the Davidic empire, yet the very name, Jacob, is interpreted in terms of this supplanting, and the early narratives highlight its initial steps. Again, the flight of Jacob to Padan-Aram is reinterpreted (Gn 27.46–28.5) to emphasize the patriarch's concern for racial purity and depict him as an initiator of the later policy against mixed marriages.

One should be mindful, therefore, of the didactic rather than strictly biographical bent of the narratives. Some of the main religious themes of the Jacob stories are as follows: the cultural and religious differences and the hostile relations between the two nations, Edom and Israel (Gn 25.27–34); Jacob's fraudulent acquisition of the blessing-of-the-firstborn (Gn 27.1–46) and, by contrast, God's free choice of unworthy Israel as His instrument for the establishment of His kingdom (Gn 27.46–28.22); the conversion of Jacob, and the imposition of the name ISRAEL (Gn 32.22–33); the establishment in SHECHEM (Gn 33.18–20); the pact between the Israelites and the AMORRITES, and the later conquest of Sichem by the Israelites, thus giving Israel a right to the Holy Land (Gn 34.1–31; 48.21–22); the cleansing of the nation from paganism and the renewal of the divine pledge of election (Gn 35.1–15).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1094–95. M. NOTH, Überglieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch (Stuttgart 1948) 86–111.

[J. A. PIERCE]

JACOB OF SARUG (SERUGH)

Bishop of the Syrian Church; b. c. 451; d. Nov. 29, 521. James was born in the village of Kurtam on the Euphrates, probably in the district of Sarug. When he was about 15 to 22 years old he received his theological schooling at the Persian School of Edessa, then under the influence of the Nestorian doctors, DIODORE, THEODORE, and THEODORET. In one of his letters, James avers that even as a student and on his own initiative he had denounced them as heretics. He lived most of his life in a monastery in Haura in Sarug where, at least by 502 or 503, he had been appointed periodeutes, or ecclesiastical visitor, of the district. In 519, then more than 67 years old, he was consecrated bishop of Batnan, an important commercial city and capital of the district of Serugh. He died at the age of 70 and is revered as a saint and doctor of the Syrian Church. The JACOBITES honor him on November 29, June 29, and July 29; the MARONITES, on January 27 and April 5; and the ARMENIANS, on September 25.

Writings. James was a very prolific poet, and while his compatriots honored him with the title "Flute of the Holy Spirit and Harp of the Orthodox Church," most Westerners find his style repetitious and tedious. He is primarily known for his metrical homilies (memre), written in verses of two lines of 12 syllables each (4 + 4 + 4). According to Bar Hebraeus, these numbered 760 (James of Edessa says 763), and more than 70 scribes worked for a year in transcribing them. About 300 homilies have survived. Between 1905 and 1910, Paul Bedjan edited and published in five volumes 195 of these homilies. Among his prose works are six homilies (turgame) and 43 letters. The letters were edited and published by G. Olinger in 1937. Various liturgical works have been attributed to James (hymns, anaphoras, and an ordo for Baptism and Confirmation), but their authenticity is problematical.

Theology. Perhaps the most frequently studied aspect of James's thought has been his orthodoxy. In 1716, E. Renaudot, in his Liturgiarum orientalium collectio, accused James of being a Monophysite. Three years later, J. S. Assemani began publishing his monumental Bibliotheca orientalis in which he argues strongly for the orthodoxy of James. With the publication in 1876 of several key letters, P. Martin seemed to many to have settled the issue: James was a Monophysite. Subsequent defenders of his orthodoxy tend to take one of two approaches: (1) to admit that he was a Monophysite through most of his life but that he died reconciled with the orthodox Church (e.g., Matagne); or (2) to attack the authenticity of Martin's letters, adding arguments of a historical nature. P. Peeters is an impassioned protagonist of this position. P. Krüger has questioned James' orthodoxy; and T. Jansma, in three masterful articles, has proved conclusively that James was a Monophysite of the Severian school and remained so all his life.

James was not a controversialist and took virtually no part in the theological disputes of his day; the only polemic he shows is directed precisely against those who were engaged in heated theological polemics. In this he is very much in the tradition of EPHREM, who argued so strongly adversus scrutatores and their “poison, Greek wisdom.” Also like Ephrem, James presents his theology in and through his poetry. His thought circles around, looking first at one facet, then at another of the mystery he is contemplating. At times his symbols combine contradictory elements which suggest things that cannot be fully said and which cannot be neatly systematized in conceptual language.

The subjects treated by James cover a wide spectrum, with most of his themes being drawn from the Bible (e.g., Old Testament—the Hexaemeron, the Patriarchs, Moses, Elijah, and so on; New Testament—the Incarnation of Jesus, His parables and miracles, His Passion, death, Resurrection, Ascension, etc.). He discusses virtues and vices, the last things, the Sacraments of Baptism and Eucharist, consolation for the bereaved, etc. F. Graf-fin notes three themes especially frequent in James: (1) a delight in finding figures, “types,” of Christ in the lives and deeds of the Patriarchs; (2) the theme of the Church as the Bride of Christ, a subject treated often and with great devotion and lyricism; and (3) the pressing invitation to his hearers to consider the Scriptures and the mysteries of the faith with great love and a true childlike spirit, as opposed to the so-called wise men who examine them minutely and argue about them. James’ spirituality is animated by charity, simplicity and poverty, and his homilies bear eloquent testimony to their author’s ardent pastoral zeal and dedication to the spiritual growth of his people.

Bibliography: A. BAUMSTARK, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1922, repr. 1968) 148–158. F. GRAFFIN, “Recherches sur le thème de l’église-épouse dans les liturgies et la littérature patristique de langue syriaque,” L’orient syrien 3 (1958) 315–336; “L’homélie de Jacques de Saroug: De visione Jacobi in Bethel,” L’orient syrien 5 (1960) 225–246; “Thème de la perle dans un lettre de Jacques de Saroug,” L’orient syrien 12 (1967) 355–370; “Jacques de Saroug,” Dictionnaire de Spiritualite, T. 8 unbd. fascicle LII–LIII (Paris 1972) 56–60, with extensive bibliography. T. JANSMA, “L’Hexaemeron de Jacques de Saroug,” L’orient syrien 4 (1959) 3–14, 129–162, 253–284; “The Credo of James of Saroug: A Return to Nicea and Constantinople,” Nederlandsch Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis 44 (1960) 18–36; “Die Christologie Jakobs von Serugh und ihre Abhängigkeit von der alexandrinischen Theologie und von der Frömmigkeit Ephraems des Syrers,” Muséon 78 (1965) 5–46; “Encore le Crédo de Jacques de Saroug,” L’orient syrien 10 (1965) 75–88, 193–236, 331–370, 474–510. E. KHALIFÉ-HACHEM, “Homélie métrique de Jacques de Saroug sur l’amour,” Parole de l’orient 1 (1970) 281–299. H. MATAGNE, Acta sanctorum Octobris Bollandiana 12 (Brussels 1884) 824–831, 927–929. J. VAN DER PLOEG, “Une homélie de Jacques de Saroug sur la reception de la sainte communion,” Mélange Eugene Tisserant 3 (Studi e Testi 233) 395–418.

[M. GUINAN]

JACOBazzi, DOMENICO

Cardinal and canonist; b. Rome, Italy, c. 1444; d. Rome, 1527. He became a consistorial lawyer at Rome in 1486 after studies in Roman and Canon Law at the University of BOLOGNA. In 1493 he became an auditor of the Roman Rota, of which he became dean in 1506. He was named vicarius urbis and bishop of Nocera dei Pagani in 1511 and a cardinal in 1517. His comprehensive work De concilio was written mainly during the Fifth LATERAN COUNCIL and published posthumously at Rome in 1538. Jacobazzi, a staunch defender of the papacy who held that the pope was not subordinate to a council or its decrees, nevertheless represented the view that in a state of emergency a council could be summoned without papal approval if the pope refused a formal request to convene one (see CONCILIARISM).

Bibliography: Sources. De concilio, repr. in MANSI Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio: Introductio: 1–580. Literature. J. KLOTZNER, Kardinal Dominikus Jacobazzi und sein Konzilswerk (Rome 1948). H. JEDIN, History of the Council of Trent v.1 (St. Louis 1957–60), passim. R. GILLET, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:75–77. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:831.

[W. S. BARRON]

JACOBI, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH

German philosopher of faith and feeling; b. Düsseldorf, Jan. 25, 1743; d. Munich, March 10, 1819, where he had become president of the Bavarian Academy of Science. Influenced by J. J. ROUSSEAU and Lord Shaftesbury, Jacobi opposed the RATIONALISM of the ENLIGHTENMENT. He was closely associated with many significant men of his day, among them Goethe; J. K. Lavater; C. M. Wieland; M. Claudius; the later bishop of Regensburg, J. M. Sailer; Prince A. von Gallitzin; and especially J. G. HERDER and J. G. HAMANN, who exerted a strong influence over him. Jacobi made a sharp distinction between knowledge and faith. Under the influence of I. Kant, he had come to regard the thing-in-itself as unknowable; consequently, knowledge leads ultimately to nihilism. It leads also to atheism in that the comprehension of the Absolute and of metaphysical principles is equally impossible. To him, B. Spinoza’s philosophy was a case in point. He also criticized the notion of the thing-in-itself in Kant’s philosophy, remarking that without this supposition one could not enter into Kant’s system and with it one could not remain there. He charged J. G. FICHTE and F. W. J. SCHELLING with being Spinoza in reverse. Jacobi himself built his thesis upon faith. For him the organ of faith is reason, which allows man to perceive the outer world as well as beauty and moral good, even the divine. The true essence of man consists in his spiritual nature, which stems immediately from God and finds its fullest expression in the heart. Jacobi thus termed himself “a heathen in the understanding and a Christian in feeling.” He accepted the great truths of Christianity—God, freedom, and immortality—but he was of the opinion that these could not be conceptualized. Yet Christianity embraces more truths than Jacobi would admit, and if those truths he did admit were accessible only to the heart, they would be purely subjective. Jacobi exerted considerable influence over J. C. F. Schiller, the romantics, F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER, and the Catholic school at Tübingen.

Bibliography: Works. Gesamtausgabe, 6 v. (Leipzig 1812–25). New critical ed. by the Bavarian Academy in preparation. Über die Lehre des Spinoza in Briefen an den Herrn M. Mendelssohn (Breslau 1785; enl. ed. 1789). D. Hume über den Glauben, oder Idealismus und Realismus (Breslau 1787). Sendschreiben an Fichte (Hamburg 1799). Über das Unternehmen des Kritizismus, die Vernunft zu Verstande zu bringen (Hamburg 1801). Von den göttlichen Dingen (Leipzig 1811). O. BOLLNOW, Die Lebensphilosophie F. H. Jacobis (Stuttgart 1933). A. HEBEISEN, F. H. Jacobi: Seine Auseinandersetzung mit Spinoza (Bern 1960). R. KNOLL, J. G. Hamann and F. H. Jacobi (Heidelberg 1963).

[J. HIRSCHBERGER]

JACOBINA OF PISA, BL.

Dominican tertiary; b. Pisa, c. 1280; d. Pisa, c. 1370. Her ancestry and early life are unknown. At about 20, she made a happy marriage with Peter Cascina, member of a prominent Pisan family. When he died (before 1366), Jacobina distributed her wealth to the poor and joined the Sisters of the Order of Penance of St. Dominic (Third Order). As prioress (from 1368) of the sisters attached to the Dominican priory of S. Caterina in Pisa, she was noted for fidelity to her religious life, prudent direction of the sisters, and tender care for the poor and sick. Jacobina was buried in the church of S. Chiara in Pisa, and her relics have been lost or indistinguishably mixed with others. Her cult has not been officially recognized but is immemorial.

Bibliography: S. BARSOTTI, Un nuovo fiore domenicano, la Beata Jacopina da Pisa (Pisa 1904), pamphlet, rev. in Année Dominicaine, Dec. 1 (Lyons 1909) 264–268.

[R. M. BEISSEL]

JACOBINI, LUDOVICO

Cardinal, secretary of state; b. Genzano (Latium), Italy, Jan. 6, 1832; d. Rome, Feb. 28, 1887. He came from a well-to-do family and pursued seminary studies at Albano and Rome. Entering the service of the Roman Curia, he worked in the Congregation of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. Pius IX named him secretary for Oriental affairs in the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH. At VATICAN COUNCIL I his post as undersecretary gained him a remarkable knowledge of bishops throughout the world. Consecrated titular archbishop of Thessalonica, he became nuncio to Vienna (March 24, 1874). Relations between Austria-Hungary and the Church were then strained, since the government had in 1870 denounced the concordat and had attempted by three laws voted in 1874 to submit the Church to State tutelage. In this difficult situation the new nuncio displayed outstanding diplomatic qualities. Jacobini also searched for a modus vivendi to end the KULTURKAMPF, meeting with Bismarck in 1879.

Raised to the cardinalate (Sept. 19, 1879), he became secretary of state (Dec. 16, 1880) to LEO XIII and retained the post until death. In the secretariate of state his perseverance and sound knowledge of issues impelled him to a definitive settlement of the differences between the Holy See and Germany. One of his most important statements was his note (April 13, 1885) to the nuncio at Madrid, RAMPOLLA. In it Jacobini contradicted a journalist, Ramon Nocedal, who attributed to bishops an authority superior to that of nuncios, claimed to be merely diplomats. His note affirmed the right of nuncios, as delegates of the Holy See, to intervene in diocesan affairs.

Bibliography: E. SODERINI, Il pontificato di Leone XIII, 3 v. (Milan 1932–33); tr. B. B. CARTER, v.1 The Pontificate of Leo XIII (London 1934), v.2 Leo XIII, Italy and France (1935), v.3 not tr. F. ENGEL-JANOSI, Österreich und der Vatikan, 1846–1918, 2 v. (Graz 1958–60) v.1.

[J. M. MAYEUR]

JACOBIS, GIUSTINO DE, ST.

Missionary bishop in ETHIOPIA; b. San Fele, Lucania, Italy, Oct. 9, 1800; d. Aligadé, Ethiopia, July 31, 1860. Reared in Naples, he entered the VINCENTIANS (1818) and was ordained (1824). He engaged in mission preaching and was superior of various Vincentian communities in central Italy. In 1839 he became prefect apostolic of his congregation's mission in Ethiopia and resided at Adau. At first contemptuously called “the Frank” by the Monophysite Copts, he later came to be respected and affectionately known as “Abuna Yacob” (Father James). In 1841 the Copts induced him to accompany a mission to the Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria seeking the election of an Ethiopian metropolitan. His presence disturbed the patriarch, but de Jacobis persuaded one of the party, GHEBRE MICHAEL, to continue to Rome and to visit Pope GREGORY XVI. In 1844 de Jacobis received Ghebre Michael into the Catholic Church and with his assistance established a seminary at Guala (1845). De Jacobis built a Catholic center on the Red Sea island of Massawa, where he was consecrated bishop by Guglielmo MASSAJA (1848). In 1855 he was imprisoned by the usurper Theodor and then banished. He spent the rest of his life ministering along the Red Sea coast. For befriending a French diplomatic mission he was again imprisoned in 1860. He was released, but the hardship of his captivity had worn him out, and he died while returning to his mission at Halai in Eritrea. He was beatified May 14, 1939 by Pius XII and canonized October 26, 1975 by Paul VI.

Feast: July 31.

Bibliography: A. DEVIN, L'Abyssinie et son apôtre (Paris 1866). S. ARATA, Vita del B. Giustino de Jacobis (Rome 1939). E. LUCATELLO, L'abuna Yaqob Mariàm (Rome 1975). K. O'MAHONEY, "The ebullient phoenix": A History of the Vicariate of Abyssinia, 1839–1860, 2 v. (Asmara, Ethiopia 1982–7). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 7:770–774. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:230–235.

[T. P. JOYCE]

JACOBITES (ENGLISH)

Adherents to the movement (Jacobitism) for the restoration of the Stuart dynasty following the flight of JAMES II after the fateful REVOLUTION OF 1688. Until his death (1701) James maintained the leadership of the movement principally from Saint-Germainen-Laye, France.

Stuart Pretenders. After James's death three descendants upheld their claim to rule England, Scotland, and Ireland; two actively, one passively. The first was James Francis Edward Stuart, "The Old Pretender" (b. London, June 20, 1688; d. Rome, Jan. 1, 1766). He was the son of James II by his second wife, Mary of Modena. He succeeded his father at age 13 and was recognized by France, Spain, and the papacy as legitimate ruler. For nearly four decades he actively sought to regain the Stuart inheritance, especially in 1708 when an invasion of Scotland with 5,000 French troops was foiled by severe storms and the English fleet, and in 1715 when he tried almost unaided to raise the Scots. For all practical purposes the leadership of the movement devolved in the 1740s upon his elder son by his wife Clementina Sobieska, Charles Edward Stuart, "The Young Pretender" (b. Rome, Dec. 31, 1720; d. there, Jan. 1, 1788). His active leadership was confined to the early 1740s and culminated in the disastrous defeat at Culloden (1746).

Subsequently he lived in exile chiefly in Italy. It is noteworthy that even the papacy did not recognize his claim to the throne upon his father's death in 1766. The last male Stuart pretender was his younger brother, Henry Stuart, Cardinal of York (b. Rome, March 6, 1725; d. Frascati, Italy, July 13, 1807). He was never active in prosecuting his own claims; neither was he officially recognized anywhere as king in succession to Charles. Any practical chance of his becoming king was eliminated by his position successively as priest, bishop, and finally cardinal. In his declining years he was a pensioner of George III and obviously no threat to the ruling Hanoverians. With his death the Stuart claim came to an end as a movement of historical interest.

Any discussion of Jacobitism is complicated by the separate national bases of the movement—English, Scottish, and Irish—and by the disparate characteristics of its supporters. In Ireland the movement was of least importance once James II had been defeated in the Battle of the Boyne (July 12, 1690) and most of his principal supporters had come to terms with William III by the Treaty of Limerick (Oct. 13, 1691). After that time the Stuarts had little support from the predominantly Protestant ruling class, while the support of the vast majority of Roman Catholic Irish was of no practical significance. What meaningful aid there was came largely from Irish refugees who enlisted in the French army.

Sources of Support. In England assistance came from diverse and uncoordinated sources: Tories who believed in strict hereditary succession unalterable by parliament; the nonjuring clergy of the Church of England who believed in nonresistance to divinely ordained royal authority as defined by hereditary succession (see NONJURORS, ENGLISH); and the small minority of Roman Catholics. The first two groups predicated their allegiance on recognition by the Stuarts of the established Church, its property, universities and schools, and generally favored position; indeed many would support the Stuarts only if they renounced their Roman Catholicism, persistent adherence to which cost many English, though few Scottish or Irish supporters.

Scotland, especially the Highland clans, formed the strongest and most persistent base for Stuart claims. The Stuarts were in origin a Scottish dynasty and thus had a strong claim on traditional loyalty and sentiments. The clergy of the Anglican Church of Scotland supported the Stuarts much more strongly than did their English coreligionists because they were a minority group whom the Stuarts would support together with Roman Catholics against the dominant Presbyterian Kirk. The largely Catholic Highlanders opposed the tendency toward encroachment on their economic and social customs, against the centralizing tendencies of the late 17th- and early 18th-century English governments.

In general Jacobitism may be divided chronologically, 1688 to 1715 and 1715 to 1746. In the first period there was some chance for Stuart reestablishment, especially from 1706 to 1714, based partly upon internal adherents in England and Scotland, partly on foreign arms, chiefly from France. During this time many Tory politicians, such as Bolingbroke, and the nonjuring Anglican clergy favored a Stuart restoration when Queen Anne should die, rather than import the foreign Hanoverian dynasty. After 1714, however, leadership in England was lacking, especially after 1722 when the leading Jacobite, Bishop Atterbury, was exiled to France. After the successful advent of the Hanoverians, the death of LOUIS XIV (1715), and the failure of the abortive revolt of 1715 (the '15) the Old and Young Pretenders were heavily dependent on foreign assistance to initiate invasions, which clearly would have to receive greatest military strength from Scotland. Thus Stuart fortunes fluctuated wildly as the diplomatic situation in Europe changed. During the ascendancy of Sir Robert Walpole in England and of Cardinal Fleury in France, roughly 1721 to 1742, the Jacobites had little hope of success since both men were committed to peace. Efforts to secure arms and money from Spain, Sweden, the papacy, and even Russia were largely unavailing.

Revolt and Defeat. Once England was at war with Spain (1739), later joined by France during the War of the Austrian Succession, large-scale support was again possible, but it gave the impression of imposing foreign rule, especially in England where France was the age-old enemy. In contrast France was Scotland's traditional ally (the Auld Alliance). The collapse of Jacobitism came after the Young Pretender's attempt to raise revolts in Scotland and England in 1745 to 1746 (the '45). In July 1745 Charles sailed to Scotland, where he received substantial, although not universal allegiance from the Highland clans, and also from the Lowlands, especially Edinburgh. In the fall he moved into northwest England and so toward London. Except for a few recruits in Lancashire, however, no Englishmen flocked to his standard, and at Derby, Dec. 5 to 6, 1745, the Young Pretender's military advisers forced a retreat since their men faced combat with overwhelming English armies. During the winter the Scots retreated through the Lowlands and up the east coast. Finally at Culloden, April 16, 1746, the Scottish Highlanders were slaughtered by the Hanoverian armies, which gave no quarter. After incredible hardships and romantic adventures in the western Highlands and Hebrides, Charles escaped in September to France. The Highlands were conquered by the building of military roads, through merciless devastation of the countryside, and the brutal handling and transportation of Scottish prisoners; the Stuarts' last manpower reserve was eliminated. Charles ended his days an alcoholic; his younger brother, Henry, was never a serious threat to George III. Perhaps the final touch was the Prince Regent's commissioning of Canova in 1819 to design a fine marble monument in St. Peter's, Rome, to the three pretenders. The Hanoverians could afford to be generous; their enemies had long since been vanquished.

Bibliography: C. A. PETRIE, The Jacobite Movement: The First Phase, 1688–1716 (London 1948). C. A. PETRIE, The Jacobite Movement: The Last Phase, 1716–1807 (London 1950). Britain after the Glorious Revolution, ed. G. HOLMES (New York 1969). B. LENMAN, The Jacobite Risings in Britain, 1689–1746 (London 1980). F. J. MCLYNN, The Jacobites (London 1985). P. KLEBER MONOD, Jacobitism and the English People, 1688–1788 (Cambridge Eng. 1989). D. SZECHI, The Jacobites, Britain and Europe, 1688–1788 (Manchester, Eng. 1994).

[H. S. REINMUTH, JR.]

JACOBITES (SYRIAN)

The title Jacobite, which appears after A.D. 575, comes from the name of James BARADAI, who organized a faction within the Syrian Orthodox Church. Consecrated bishop of Edessa (543) by the exiled patriarch of Alexandria at the instigation of Empress Theodora (1) and the Ghassanid Prince Harith, James Baradai ordained 30 bishops and thousands of priests and deacons during frequent trips through the Orient from Persia to Egypt.

The Syrian Jacobites trace their lineage to Sergius of Antioch (558–561), although the actual schism that gave rise to the name occurred during the patriarchate of Paul the Black (d. 581) and was healed after his death with the election of his successor, Peter of Callinicum (581–591). The name Jacobite was applied by the Byzantine Orthodox to differentiate the non-Chalcedonian Syrian Oriental Orthodox Church, which is not in communion with either Constantinople or Rome. Outstanding churchmen were Denis of Tellmahrē, James of Edessa, Michael of Antioch, and Gregorius ibn al-'Ibrī.

The Jacobites played an important role during the occupation of Syria by the Arabs, whom they received as liberators from the yoke of Byzantium. During the dynasty of the 'ABBĀSIDS, they were held in great esteem at the court of BAGHDAD.

While the Jacobite patriarch was never able to establish a firm residence in Antioch, he had his see successively in various monasteries and exercised jurisdiction over the churches located in the Sassanid Empire of Persia through a primate called Maphriān, who was a sort of universal delegate of the patriarch. In the 12th century the Jacobite patriarchate numbered 2 million faithful with 20 metropolitans and 103 eparchs, or bishops, in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Cyprus. Internal problems, including a schism (1364–94), gradually weakened the church's membership and integrity, and by the 17th century it was reduced to 20 bishoprics. Since 1293 the Jacobite Patriarch of Antioch has taken the name of Ignatius on election.

Bibliography: C. L. SPIESSENS, "Les Patriarches d'Antioche," L'Orient syrien 7 (1962) 389–434. Oriente Cattolico: Cenni storici e statistiche (Vatican City 1962). R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey (Rome 1999).

[E. EL HAYEK/EDS.]

JACOPONE DA TODI

Franciscan mystic and poet; b. Todi, Umbria, c.1230; d. c.1306. The available data on Jacopone's life are unreliable. He did pursue legal studies, probably at the University of Bologna, and exercised the profession of notary and legal procurator in Todi, the town of his birth. The hagiographic tradition surrounding him speaks of the tragic death of his wife, Vanna di Bernardino di Guidone, as the result of her fall from a balcony in a mansion where she was attending a party. Jacopone, who wasn't at the party, discovered his wife wearing a penitential hair shirt under her robes. This traumatic event provoked a psychological and spiritual crisis in Jacopone.

For some ten years (1268–1278), he lived the life of a wandering penitent or "bizzocone," as he refers to himself in one of his lauds. In 1278, he was admitted to the Order of the Friars Minor. He remained a lay brother and quickly became a zealous member of the Spiritual party. Regarded by many as its poet, he expounded the radical views of the FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS and excoriated what he saw as the laxity of the Community faction for their mitigation of the early Franciscan ideal of total poverty.

In 1294, at the beginning of the pontificate of CELESTINE V, he addressed one of his lauds to the former hermit warning him of the perils of his office. A few months after his election Celestine resigned and Jacopone, among others, highly suspected that his successor, BONIFACE VIII, had a hand in his demise. Boniface represented everything that Jacopone, who had known him in his youth, abhorred. Because of his intrigues and corruption, he conceived him, in one of his lauds, as "a new Lucifer on the papal throne." Along with the Colonna Cardinals and others opponents of Boniface, Jacopone, in May 1297, signed the Longhezzo Manifesto declaring Boniface's election illegitimate. Boniface retaliated by declaring the rebels excommunicated and defeating them in a battle over the town of Palestrina in 1298. Jacopone was tried and jailed in the cellar of a friary, possibly in Todi. During his five years imprisonment, Jacopone softened his view on Boniface and, in one of his lauds, begged him to at least to be absolved from his excommunication if not released from his imprisonment.

Jacopone had to wait for the election of BENEDICT XI in 1303 before being granted freedom and readmitted to communion in the church. Aged and tired, he lived out his last years in the convent of S. Lorenzo of Colazzone, near a Poor Clare monastery, between Perugia and Todi, where he died on Christmas night in 1306. Popularly venerated as "Blessed" and "Saint," he is inscribed in the Franciscan martyrology. His cult, however, has never been officially confirmed by the Church.

Jacopone was the most famous and prolific known writer of the medieval literary genre known as the lauda. These lauda were written in the Umbrian dialect and often in ballad form. They were meant to stir up popular penitential devotion. Contemporary criticism maintains that ninety or so of Jacopone's lauds are authentic. Interweaving poetry, politics, and mysticism, they astonish in their range and complexity of tone and message. For Jacopone, life "is an unremitting battle" and in his laudarium he wages a fierce assault on the "counterfeit" self, the compromises and hypocrisy that he perceives in himself, in the nascent Franciscan brotherhood, and in the church leaders of his time. Jacopone is considered the most powerful religious poet in Italy before Dante's time. He is among the first to express God's presence in poetic form and a vernacular one at that. Jacopone's mysticism belongs in the fool of God tradition, but his lauds reveal an extensive theological culture, especially of the writings of St. Bonaventure. It is in singing the supremacy of sacred over profane love that his poetry is the most enchanting. "Totally annihilated," the soul, under Jacopone's pen, soars to the highest stages of divine union, "one without division." In the boldness with which he expresses his mystical experience, he ranks among the greatest medieval mystics, alongside ANGELA OF FOLIGNO, his contemporary and a twin soul, the Beguines, HADEWIICH, Marguerite Porete, and MECHTHILD OF MAGDEBURG.

Aside from his lauds, Jacopone is also credited with a mystical tract entitled Tractatus utilissimus and various Dicta, or sayings. Even if it resembles in some respects Jacopone's widely acclaimed "Donna del Paradiso," his authorship of the Stabat Mater, one of the most famous Christian hymns, still has not been fully established.

Bibliography: F. MANCINI, ed., Laude (Bari 1974). E. MEMESTÒ, Atti del Convegno Storico Jacoponico (Florence 1981). S. and

E. HUGHES, Jacoponi da Todi, The Lauds (New York 1982). E. UNDERHILL, Jacopone da Todi: Poet and Mystic, 1228–1306 (London 1919). G. T. PECK, The Fool of God—Jacopone da Todi (Tuscaloosa, AL 1980). B. MCGINN, The Flowering of Mysticism: Men and Women in the New Mysticism (1200–1350), vol. III of the Presence of God: A History of Western Mysticism (New York, 1998), 125–131. V. L. KATAINEN, “Jacopone da Todi, Poet and Mystic: A Review of the History of Criticism,” Mystics Quarterly 22 (1996): 46–57.

[P. LACHANCE]

JACQUES DE MOLAY

The last grand master of the TEMPLARS; b. Molay (Haute-Saône), France, between 1243 and 1254; d. Paris, March 19, 1314. About 1265 he entered the order of Knights Templars at Beaune. Hardly anything is known about his life prior to his promotion to the rank of grand master in 1298. In 1307 he was called to France by CLEMENT V, who had decided to unite the Templars and the KNIGHTS OF MALTA under a common authority. Molay rejected this project, which he believed would be detrimental to the property and independence of his order. He obtained permission from Pope Clement V to conduct a study of the order's moral condition, but it is not known whether this study was made. It seems probable that Clement, by so acting, attempted to prevent King PHILIP IV the Fair's resolve to arrest De Molay, to institute proceedings against the order, and to seize its wealth. The menace became real on Sept. 22, 1307, when Nogaret, an enemy of the Templars, was put in charge of the royal chancellery. Lulled into a false sense of security, Molay was arrested on Oct. 13, 1307. During the trial, presided over by William of Paris, the inquisitor and confessor of the king, the grand master pleaded guilty and, in his own name and that of his confreres, begged those present to obtain for him papal absolution and royal pardon. He soon retracted, however, and at a national council assembled in Tours (May 1308) the Templars were condemned and declared deserving of death. Despite a rather weak intervention by Pope Clement V, whom the king visited in Poitiers, the trial reopened in Paris, on Aug. 8, 1309. The case dragged on, and five years later, on March 19, 1314, a commission of cardinals delivered the sentence of life imprisonment. At this point, Jacques de Molay again retracted violently. That same evening, without further reference to the commission, the king had him burned as a relapsed heretic together with his codefendant, William of Charni, on a small island near the Île-de-la-Cité. A violent man of little culture and subtlety, Jacques de Molay was overcome by events in the ruthless struggle of the French crown against the Catholic Church. Present evidence leaves no doubt that he was innocent of the charges brought against him.

Bibliography: P. DUGUEYST, Essai sur J. de Molay (Paris 1906). P. VIOLET, Les Interrogatoires de Molay (Paris 1909). A. TRUNZ, Zur Geschichte des letzten Templermeisters (Freiburg 1920). W. SCHWARZ, “Die Schuld des Jakob von Molay, des letzten Grossmeisters der Templer,” Die Welt als Geschichte 17 (1957) 259–277. A. POSCH, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:843–844. G. BORDONOVE, Les Templiers (Paris 1963).

[É. BROUETTE]

JACQUES DE VITRY

Historian, crusade preacher, hagiographer, bishop of Acre (1216–28), and cardinal bishop of Tusculum (1228); b. Reims region, c. 1170; d. Rome, 1240. Jacques studied at Paris and, as a canon regular, developed an abiding interest in the feminine religious movement that centered around MARY OF OIGNIES (d. 1213) in the Diocese of Liège. His Vita Mariae Oigniacensis (Acta Sanctorum, June 5:542–572) defines the prototype of the BEGUINES. In 1216 he secured papal recognition for them. In 1213 Jacques de Vitry preached against the ALBIGENSES. In seven extant letters [R. B. C. Huygens, Lettres de J. de V. (Leiden 1960)] that date from 1216 to 1221, he left an account of the Fifth CRUSADE. He was back in the West by 1225, and in his last years he associated with Pope GREGORY IX. His works offer invaluable insight into the contemporary scene. The first part of his Historia orientalis et occidentalis [ed. F. Moschus (Douai 1597)] describes conditions in the East, but it shows the influence of WILLIAM OF TYRE. The second part presents the monastic and quasi-monastic movements of Belgium and Italy, together with vignettes of John of Nivelles, FULK OF NEUILLY, and PETER CANTOR. In particular the Beguines, HUMILIATI, and FRANCISCANS, with their emphasis on the vita apostolica and the primitive Church, appealed to him. If clerical delinquency and worldliness caused concern, this multiplicity of religious life provided the answer to internal decay and the threat of sectarianism. As sermones ad status, his Sermones vulgares (Paris, Bib. Nat. lat. 1759) are a substantial contribution to estates literature, for several lay callings as well as the secular clergy and monastic orders are addressed. These sermons are seeded with exempla (see EXEMPLUM) derived from both literary sources and personal experience, a preaching style that he popularized. Two other collections of sermons include Sermones feriales et communes [the exempla, ed. J. Greven (Heidelberg 1914)] and Sermones in epistolas et evangelia dominicalia (Antwerp 1575).

See Also: PREACHING (HISTORY OF); LAITY IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

Bibliography: JACQUES DE VITRY, The Exempla, or Illustrative Sermons from the Sermones Vulgares, ed. T. F. CRANE (London 1890). P. FUNK, Jakob von Vitry: Leben und Werke (Leipzig 1909). D. BIRCH, "Jacques de Vitry and the Ideology of the Middle Ages" in Pilgrimage Explored (Woodbridge 1999). J. HAMMESSE et al., eds., Medieval Sermons and Society: Cloister, City, University—Proceedings of the International Symposia at Kalamazoo and New York (Louvain 1998).

[E. W. MCDONNELL]

JADOT, JEAN

Belgian prelate, papal diplomat; b. Brussels, Nov. 23, 1909; the eldest of eight children of Lambert and Gabrielle (Flanneau) Jadot. Educated in London, Brussels, Paris, and Louvain, Jadot was ordained a priest for the diocese of Malines on Feb. 11, 1934 and was assigned to the large urban parish of St. Gertrude in Etterbeek.

During World War II, Jadot dedicated his efforts to the pastoral care of youth as chaplain to an independent Catholic youth organization. In March 1945 he became a military chaplain at the state infantry school and later at the Royal Military School. In 1952 Jadot became chief chaplain for the 25,000 public forces in the Belgian Congo. In 1960 he was called back to his native Belgium to become the national director of the Pontifical Missionary Works. This missionary role gave him personal exposure to the Church throughout the world, particularly in Asia, which served him well when in 1967 he was appointed to the reorganized Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples (formerly the Congregation for Propagation of the Faith).

Diplomatic Career. Pope Paul VI brought Jadot, at the age of 59, into the diplomatic service of the Holy See. On May 1, 1968, Jadot was ordained a bishop in his parish church of Chant d'Oiseau in Brussels and was named titular archbishop of Zuri. His first diplomatic appointment was as apostolic delegate to Thailand, which included his representing the Holy See in Laos, Malaysia, and Singapore. His zest for interdisciplinary dialogue as a university student was rekindled by the challenge to engage Buddhist and other non-Christian religious communities.

After three years in Asia, Pope Paul VI appointed him pro-nuncio to Cameroon in West Africa and at the same time he served as pro-nuncio to Gabon and as apostolic delegate to Equatorial Guinea.

In the spring of 1973, Pope Paul VI appointed him apostolic delegate in the United States. His views on the need to prepare for a Church with declining numbers of priests, on racism, and on the role of Catholic laity in society received wide attention. Although formal diplomatic relations had not yet been established between the Holy See and the American government, Jadot's duties in Washington included his serving on behalf of the Vatican as permanent observer to the Organization of American States. In 1979 Jadot accompanied Pope John Paul II on his first pastoral visit to the United States. In June 1980, John Paul II named him pro-president of the Secretariat for Non-Christians. This appointment to the Roman Curia crowned Jean Jadot's more than fifty years of service to the Church. Upon retirement he returned to Brussels.

Bibliography: M. DELLICOUR, Un Prêtre Diplomate, 50 Ans au service de l'Eglise. Entretien avec Michel Dellicour (Paris and Louvain-la-Neuve 1992). For extracts of Jadot's letters and talks, see L. BOUYER, Dom Lambert Beauduin: un homme de l'Eglise (Tournai 1964). G. A. KELLY, The Battle for the American Church (Garden City NY 1979). S. QUITSLUND, Beauduin: A Prophet Vindicated (New York 1973).

[L. PURCELL]

JADWIGA OF POLAND, ST.

Duchess of Silesia; b. Andechs, Bavaria, Germany, c. 1174; d. convent of Trzebnica, Wroclaw Province, Poland, Oct. 15, 1243. The daughter of Berthold IV, Count of Andechs, she was educated at the monastery of Kitzingen and (c. 1186) married Henry I, who in 1202 became duke of Silesia. Hedwig played an influential part in governmental administration, displaying prudence, fortitude, and piety, and she strove particularly to keep peace between the nobles within her area of influence. Founding new monasteries and supporting old ones, she introduced the MENDICANT orders, the FRANCISCANS and the DOMINICANS, into her realm. By her encouragement, her husband founded (1202) the first convent for religious women in Silesia, that of the CISTERCIANS at Trzebnica. After the birth of their seventh child in 1208, the couple took a vow of chastity before the bishop of Wroclaw. In the war over the possession of Kraków in 1229, Henry I of Silesia defeated Conrad of Masovia but was captured by surprise while at a church service. Hedwig, hastening to the rescue, made such an impression on Conrad that he released her husband after some concessions. After her husband's death (1238), Hedwig retired to the convent at Trzebnica, but did not become a nun so that she could retain her right over her possessions for distribution to charities. She was buried in the church attached to this convent. A woman of piety and gentleness, she practiced mortification and had a rich interior life; she was considered a saint during her lifetime. Pope CLEMENT IV canonized her in 1267, and in 1706 her feast was added to the general calendar of the Latin rite. She is honored as the patroness of Silesia.

Feast: Oct. 16 (formerly Oct. 17).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 8:198–270. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 3766–68. Der Hedwigs-Codex von 1353: Sammlung Ludwig, ed. W. BRAUNFELS, tr. P. MORAW, 2 v. (Berlin 1972). Heilige Hedwig, ed. M. KACZMAREK, tr. J. RETZ (Berlin 1995), papers from the conference “Die heilige Hedwig: die Rolle der Frau in der Kirche im Mittelalter und Heute,” Trzebnica, Poland, June 1993. G. BAZIN, Sainte Hedwige, sa vie et ses oeuvres (Paris 1895). E. GRUNEWALD and N. GUSSONE, Das Bild der heiligen Hedwig in Mittelalter und Neuzeit (Munich 1996). O. HABSBERG, Die heilige Hedwig von Schlesien und unsere Zeit (Vienna 1975). W. NIGG, Hedwig von Schlesien (Würzburg 1991); Die Heiligen kommen wieder: Leitbilder christl. Existenz (Freiburg im Breisgau 1973). Podreczna encyklopedia Kościelna, v.17 (Warsaw 1909) 261–262. G. PRESSLER, Die Holzschnitte der deutschen Hedwigslegende (Breslau 1504) (Hürtgenwald 1997). É. PROMNITZ, Hedwig die Heilige, Gräfin von Andechs-Diessen (Breslau 1926). A. ZAHORSKA, Ilustrowane Żywoty Świętych Polskich (Potulice 1937) 93–102. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:192–195. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 10:532–537. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:124–125. M. BRARD, Catholicisme 5:559.

[L. SIEKANIEC]

JAEGEN, JEROME

German layman and mystical writer; b. Trier, Aug. 23, 1841; d. there, Jan. 26, 1919. In his youth he studied at Berlin and became an engineer. However, his long career in the business world was that of the director of a bank. He served also as deputy in the Prussian Landtag from 1899 until his retirement in 1906. Along with his business and political activities, he was very active in assisting various Catholic institutions and projects.

His writings on the spiritual life were the fruit of his own continual devotion and personal dedication to the Christian ideal and his experience of the high degrees of mystical union. He directed his writing largely to lay people and sought to refute the common assumption that the achievement of Christian perfection is incompatible with an active life in the world. He saw perfection to consist in love of God and abandonment to the divine will and believed that mystical union is the harmonious conclusion of the achievement of Christian virtue. Furthermore, he warned against various delusions associated with mysticism, such as false visions, and held that ecstasy is not a necessary phenomenon in any stage of the mystical life. His works have been widely read and have gone through repeated editions. They include Der Kampf um die Krone (Dülmen 1883; also pub. as Der Kampf um das höchste Gut, Trier 1903) and Das mystische Gnadenleben (Trier 1911). The process for Jaegen's canonization was introduced in 1939.

St. Jadwiga, fragment of a carved and polychromed wood predella, c. 1492, in the church at Schweidnitz, Germany. (Marburg-Art Reference, Art Resource, NY)

Bibliography: J. JAEGEN, Das mystische Gnadenleben, ed. and annot. I. BACKES (Heidelberg 1949). E. MOSSMAIER, Hieronymus Jaegen (Paderborn 1959).

[J. C. WILLKE]

JAEGER, LORENZ

German Cardinal, archbishop, and ecumenist; b. Halle, Sept. 23, 1892; d. Paderborn, Apr. 2, 1975. An ordinary soldier during World War I, Jaeger was ordained to the priesthood in 1922. After 19 years in teaching and other pastoral ministries, he was ordained bishop of Paderborn in 1941. In the consistory of Feb. 22, 1965, he became a cardinal.

Especially interested in ecumenism, Cardinal Jaeger, along with Cardinal BEA, was influential in the establishment of the SECRETARIAT FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN UNITY. He was also a member of the Preparatory Commission for VATICAN COUNCIL II and a frequent intervenor in conciliar discussions. Earlier (Jan. 18, 1957) in his own diocese, he founded the “Johann-Adam-Möhler-Institut für Konfessionen and Diasporakunde” (the Johann Adam Möhler Institute), one of the world’s foremost centers for ecumenical study, research, and publication. Its quarterly journal, Catholica, is one of the most authoritative in the Roman Catholic-Protestant (especially Lutheran and Calvinist) theological dialogue.

The institute’s goals reflect Cardinal Jaeger’s own interests and activities: scholarly research and description of the doctrine, worship, and life of those Christian churches separated from Rome, especially the Reformation Confessional Churches; the presentation of the Catholic faith in its fullness as the response to the questions posed by the Reformation; and the sharing of the results of these scholarly investigations with those engaged in other pastoral activity.

In addition to his episcopal and ecumenical activities, he was also a general spokesman for the German hierarchy on a wide range of other subjects, especially on pastoral care, on the status of women in civil and ecclesial society, on students, and on intellectuals. He played a significant role in the reconstruction of the German Church and nation after World War II. Jaeger’s ecumenical outlook and insight are well illustrated in his pre-Vatican II The Ecumenical Council, the Church and Christendom, tr. A. V. Littledale (New York 1961) and his commentary on Vatican II’s decree on ecumenism, A Stand On Ecumenism: The Council’s Decree, tr. H. Graef (New York 1965).

[R. KRESS]

JAGIEŁŁO (WŁADYSŁAW II)

King of Poland and grand duke of Lithuania; b. c. 1350; d. Grodno, June 1, 1434. At his death (1377), Olgierd, the grand duke of Lithuania, left the supreme authority to his son Jagiełło. His power threatened from within by his convert cousin Witold and from without by hostile neighbors, Jagiełło accepted Polish plans to marry the young Jadwiga of Anjou, technically the “king” of Poland since Oct. 15, 1384. On Aug. 14, 1385 he signed a charter in which he promised, in order to receive Jadwiga as wife and the Polish crown, to convert to Catholicism along with the whole of Lithuania. He was baptized on Feb. 15, 1386 under the name of Władysław II. On February 18 he married Jadwiga, who gave up her original fiancé for the sake of bringing the whole nation to Catholicism. On March 4 he was crowned head of the kingdom of Poland that then included Lithuania and Ruthenia. Jagiełło returned to Lithuania in February 1387 to introduce the Catholic faith there officially and to see to the establishment of the bishopric of VILNA. Jadwiga died in 1399, but none of Jagiełło’s three subsequent wives could obliterate her influence on Jagiełło. The next year, according to their plans, the University of Cracow was resuscitated and expanded. The TEUTONIC KNIGHTS challenged the sincerity of the Lithuanians’ conversion and kept up their inroads, until finally on July 15, 1410, at the Battle of Grunwald, Jagiełło’s forces broke the power and prestige of the order. The Polish kingdom gained much respect at the Council of CONSTANCE when the Poles arrived with Catholic delegates from hitherto pagan Lithuania and Samogitia, together with the Ruthenians headed by the metropolitan of Kiev. On Oct. 2, 1413 the Poles and Lithuanians signed the Union of Horodlo, which was uniquely and mystically Christian in that the elite of the two nations agreed to form a single, united family on the basis of the “Mystery of Charity,” which the Polish nobility composing the document stressed as the fundamental element of public life. After Witold’s death in 1430, relations between Poland and Lithuania deteriorated into a minor civil war. Jagiełło left two sons, Władysław III and Casimir, both of whom eventually came to the throne. Through the conversion of Lithuania, he was of outstanding service to the Church, and his reign saw Poland rise to the rank of a great power.

Bibliography: Podręczna encyklopedia Kościelna, v.17 (Warsaw 1909) 265–269. C. KELLOGG, Jadwiga, Poland’s Great Queen (New York 1931). L. KOLANKOWSKI, Polska Jagiellonów: Dzieje polityczne (Lvov 1936). O. HALECKI, A History of Poland (3d ed. New York 1961). The Cambridge History of Poland, ed. W. F. REDDAWAY et al., 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1941–50) 1:161, 195–234.

[L. SIEKANIEC]

JAINISM

Jainism is one of the religions born of the spiritual ferment that took place in India in the 6th century B.C. Its founder, Vardhamāna, called Mahāvīra (the Great Hero), a contemporary of the Buddha, was born c. 540 B.C. Like the Buddha he came of a princely family in the region of the Ganges valley and at 30 renounced his wife and family to lead the life of an ascetic. After 12 years he is said to have attained enlightenment or perfection (kevala) and to have become a “conqueror” (jina), from which his followers took the name of Jainism, the religion of the conquerors. At the beginning of his ascetic life Mahāvīra joined a group of ascetics called nirgranthas (free from bonds), who claimed that they had been founded by a certain Pārśva 250 years before. In the course of time Pārśva came to be regarded as the 23d Tīrthānkara (ford-maker) of the Jain religion and Mahāvīra as the 24th and last Tīrthaṅkara, much as the Buddha came to be regarded as the last in a succession of Buddhas. Thus the Jain religion is considered to be of immemorial antiquity and in fact to be eternal.

Mahāvīra. He taught for 30 years in the region of the Ganges valley and was patronized by the same kings who patronized the Buddha. In the course of time he gained a large following, which he organized into a community of monks and lay followers. He died at 72 (c. 468 B.C.) of self-starvation, soon after the Buddha. He lived a life of extreme asceticism, going from place to place, begging his bread, and subjecting his body to every hardship. At first he wore only one garment, which he never changed, but after a short time he discarded even this and went about for the rest of his life completely naked. This custom also became the rule for his disciples and led in time to a marked division among them. For two centuries they remained a small community of monks and laymen. However, according to an ancient tradition, the first Mauryan emperor, Chandragupta (c. 317–293 B.C.), was a patron of Jainism and became a Jain monk at the end of his life.

At the end of Chandragupta's reign there occurred a famine, which led many of the Jain monks to leave the Ganges valley and migrate to the Deccan. This was the occasion of the great division among the Jains. The leader of the community that moved south, Bhadrabāhu, insisted on retaining the custom of complete nudity, but the community that remained in the north adopted a white garment, from which they came to be known as Sśvetāmbaras (white-clad); those who kept the ancient rule were known as Digambaras (space-clad). Unfortunately, as a result of this division, the sacred teachings of the Jains, which had been handed down by word of mouth until that time, were lost. It was said that Bhadrabāhu was the last to know them accurately. At his death an attempt was made to reconstruct the canon at a great council held by the Sśvetāmbaras at Pātaliputra, in which the ancient texts, known as Pūrvas (former texts), were replaced by 11 (originally 12) Angas or "sections." To these, other writings were added at a later date until the canon was finally completed at a council which was convened at Valabhī in Kāthiāwār sometime during the 5th century A.D.

Doctrine. Unlike Buddhism, Jainism underwent very little development in doctrine, and its basic teachings reflect the ideas of a very early period, probably that of Mahāvīra himself. Like Buddhism, Jainism is regarded by Hindus as one of the "unorthodox" (nāstika) doctrines and is atheistic in the sense that it gives no place to any God. It holds that the universe is eternal and is governed by a universal law. It is composed of a multitude of souls (jīvas) that exist not only in living things but also in all the elements—earth, air, fire, and water. There is an infinite number of such souls in the universe, all of which are essentially equal, being by nature bright and pure, and enjoying perfect knowledge and bliss. Differences in souls are due to the adherence of matter, which is in its essence of a subtle nature, invisible to the human eye. It is this invisible matter that constitutes KARMA. Every action produces karma of some sort, although actions of a selfish nature produce more than others, and thus the soul by its actions becomes bound by matter and is involved in endless transmigration.

Adinath Temple, a large Jain temple in Ranakpur in northern India. (©Ric Ergenbright/CORBIS)

The purpose of life, according to Jain belief, is to rid the soul of this accumulation of karma and to prevent it from acquiring more, until it becomes perfectly purified and attains to liberation (moksha), after which it returns to its original state of pure knowledge and bliss. This purification of the soul can be accomplished only by means of rigid asceticism, i.e., by the restraint of all action, so that it is only monks who can be saved. The monks practiced fasting, even to the extent of starving themselves to death like Mahāvīra himself. They exposed themselves to the heat of the sun in summer and to the cold in winter. Nakedness was considered as essential to the abandonment of all worldly ties. Even in modern times Jainism remains extremely ascetic in character, and although nudity is no longer practiced as a rule even by the Digambaras, it is still regarded as a necessary step on the path to final release.

Monastic Life. The Jain monks took five vows, abjuring killing, stealing, lying, sexual intercourse, and property. However, it is the practice of nonviolence (ahimsā) that remains their most distinguishing characteristic. Every act of violence, even unintentional, is considered to cause an influx of karma. Eating meat was therefore forbidden to both monks and laymen. Even insect life might not be destroyed, so that a veil was used to cover the mouth lest living things in the air should enter it, and drinking water was carefully strained. The profession of agriculture was also forbidden, since it involved the destruction of plant life and of living things in the soil. As a result, the Jains have become a predominantly merchant community.

The strict rules of Jainism were to be followed only by the monks, but the lay followers were encouraged to observe them as far as possible and, if possible, to spend some time in a monastery. The Jains adopted religious customs of the Hindus—the rites of birth, marriage, and death—and worshipped the Tīrthaṅkaras in temples with offerings of flowers, fruit, and incense. Even some of the gods of the Hindus found their way into the temples of the Jains.

Cultural Significance. In spite of the archaic character of its doctrine, Jainism has survived to the present day. The Digambaras are found mostly in Mysore, where there is a famous temple at Śravana-Belgola with a statue of a naked Tīrthaṅkara 60 feet high. The Sśvetāmbaras are found in Gujarāt and Rājasthān, where they form a wealthy merchant community. There is no doubt that in the early centuries the Jains did much to spread the culture of the north in south India and were an influential community rivaling the Buddhists. One of their more attractive, and rather surprising, characteristics is that they took an active interest in secular literature and knowledge. Besides developing their own distinctive philosophy, they wrote treatises on politics and mathematics and produced some remarkable poets. But they are remembered especially for their preservation of ancient texts, both secular and religious, which they copied as an act of religious merit. Thus, in spite of the austerity of their doctrine, they have preserved a tradition of humanism, and it should not be forgotten that it was the example of holy Jain monks in his native Gujarāt that was one of the major influences on Mahatma Gandhi's philosophy of non-violence.

See Also: HINDUISM.

Bibliography: C. RÉGAMEY, in F. KÖNIG, ed. Christus und die Religionen der Erde: Handbuch der Religionsgeschichte, 3 v. (2d ed. Vienna 1961) 3:209–220. H. JACOBI, in J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 7:465–474. J. FINEGAN, The Archeology of World Religions (Princeton 1952) 182–233. H. VON GLASENAPP, Der Jainismus (Kultur und Weltanschauung 1; Berlin 1925). W. T. DE BARY, ed., Sources of Indian Tradition (Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies 56; New York 1958) A. L. BASHAM, The Wonder That Was India: A Survey of the Culture of the Indian Sub-Continent before the Coming of the Muslims (London 1954). H. JACOBI, tr., Gaina Sūtras (Sacred Books of the East, v.22 and 45; Oxford 1884–95). J. JAINĪ, Outlines of Jainism, ed. F. W. THOMAS (London 1940).

[B. GRIFFITHS]

JAMAICA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in the Caribbean Sea, south of Cuba, the West Indian island of Jamaica is a mountainous land edged by a narrow coastal plain. Its highest point, Blue Mt. Peak, located at the island's east stands at 7,388 ft. The climate is tropical, ranging to more temperate in the island's interior, and hurricanes are commonplace from July to November. Natural resources include bauxite, gypsum and limestone, while agricultural crops consist of sugarcane, banana, coffee, citrus fruits and vegetables.

A Spanish possession until the mid-17th century, Jamaica was under the control of the British as a colony until 1958. A flourishing slave trade existed at Port Royal until an earthquake demolished that city; Kingston became the capital and center for commerce in 1692. In 1958 Jamaica became a territory of the West Indies Federation and was granted independence four years later as part of the British Commonwealth. Ethnically, 90 percent of Jamaicans are of African heritage, with small groups of East Indians, Chinese and Europeans.

Early History. The region was originally inhabited by the Sub-Tainos, or Arawak people, aborigines who migrated from northern Venezuela by A.D. 700. As was the case with so many native cultures, these people would be all but exterminated with the introduction of European diseases, alcohol and violence. On May 5, 1494, Christopher Columbus anchored at St. Ann's Bay on his way to what is now known as Rio Bueno, and named the island Santiago. Mass was probably first celebrated by Columbus's chaplain, a Mercedarian priest, at Puerto Bueno between May 6 and May 9, 1494. In November of 1509, Spanish colonization began with the founding of New Seville. Although it is probable that a missionary accompanied the first colonizers, it is certain that Franciscans were in Jamaica by 1512, establishing themselves in New Seville and later in Santiago de la Vega, where they built a monastery and a church dedicated to St. James. By 1514 colonists numbered 500. The repartimiento system was instituted by royal decree on July 26, 1515. Christian influence spread along the coast wherever Spaniards settled to carve out plantations or cattle ranches. Too poor to support a bishop, Jamaica was given an abbot nullius diocese as ordinary with episcopal jurisdiction, suffragan to the archbishop of Santo Domingo and later to the bishop of Cuba.

New Seville remained the capital until 1534, when it was moved to the south side of the island and renamed Santiago de la Vega (now Spanish Town). Dominican missionaries, under the leadership of Miguel Ramírez, OP (1527–35), constructed a church under the patronage of Our Lady of Perpetual Help and a monastery dedicated to St. Dominic in Santiago de la Vega sometime after 1534. Franciscans and Dominicans labored there until British forces captured Jamaica on May 10, 1655.

From the advent of Cromwellian forces in 1655 to James II, Jamaica became a base for pirates; slaves were imported from Africa to work the flourishing sugar cane plantations and the Church was proscribed. James II appointed Thomas Churchill as chaplain to his majesty's subjects. Churchill arrived in January of 1687 (O.S.; 1688 N.S.), remained until August and established four parishes, out of which two are known: Spanish Town and Port Royal. During Churchill's pastorate the question of jurisdiction was raised by James Castillo, a Spanish layman, who claimed that Churchill had no faculties to work in Jamaica because ecclesiastically the island was still under the bishop of Cuba. This controversy terminated upon the accession to the English throne of William and Mary, when again the Church was proscribed.

Revival of Catholicism. In 1792 Spanish merchants residing in Kingston petitioned the government for a priest. Their petition was granted and the vicar apostolic of the London District, under whose jurisdiction the colony fell, sent Anthony Quigly, a Recollect. Quigly served in Kingston among the resident Spaniards and a few English Catholics, and in 1793 French refugees from Haiti augmented the tiny congregation. Upon Quigly's death in 1799 William LeCun, OP, a Haitian refugee, became pastor. At LeCun's death in 1807, the congregation was left without a single priest in all of Jamaica. Don Carlos Esteiro, a layman, persuaded Augustinian missionary Juan Jacinto Rodríguez de Araújo to emigrate from Veracruz, Mexico, whereupon he acted as pastor from 1808

Capital: Kingston.
Size: 4,471 sq. miles.
Population: 2,652,685 in 2000.
Languages: English, Creole.
Religions: 114,065 Catholics (4.3%), 4,200 Muslims (.1%), 1,618,140 Protestants (61%), 8,000 Hindus (.3%), 908,280 practice indigenous faiths or are involved in spiritual cults.
Archdiocese: Kingston, with suffragans Mandeville and Montego Bay.

to 1824. In 1820 Benito Fernández, OFM, a refugee from New Granada, sought asylum in Jamaica and, when Araújo departed for Lisbon in 1824, he was chosen pastor. In order to remain in the colony, Fernández was granted release from his religious vows in August of 1828.

On Jan. 10, 1837, Jamaica, which had by now been transferred from London to the jurisdiction of Trinidad, was raised to the status of a separate vicariate and Fernández was appointed the first vicar apostolic, with his area of influence comprising of Jamaica, British Honduras and the Bahamas. In 1838, during Fernández' pastorate, slavery was finally abolished from the island, allowing many Africans who had fled to the hills to enter Jamaican society. Unsatisfactory emigré priests, one of whom eventually created a schism, led Fernández to petition the Holy See for religious missionaries. Two Jesuits, William Cotham, an Englishman, and James E. Dupeyron, a Frenchman, arrived in December of 1837. Upon Fernández' death, Dupeyron became vicar apostolic, and the colony became a mission of the English Province of the Society of Jesus. For 22 years Dupeyron visited Catholics scattered throughout the island several times a year. Previous to this the Church had confined her activity to the Kingston area owing to a scarcity of priests.

In 1861 J. Sidney Woollett, SJ, replaced Dupeyron as missionary to the interior and in 1870 he acquired a residence near Montego Bay. Woollett served the Catholics of the interior for 33 years. Three other well-known missionaries labored in Jamaica at this time: Joseph Dupont, in whose memory a monument was erected in Kingston's public square (the Parade), in appreciation of 40 years of service to the needy of every creed; Frederick Hathaway, SJ, a convert who spent much of his missionary life teaching native children the elements of reading and writing; and Manuel Ignacio El Santa Cruz y Loydi, a secular priest of Carlist War fame, who spent 14 years in the difficult missions of the mountains. Three American missionaries were also notable: Joseph F. Ford, SJ, who pioneered in the rural areas; M. Oliver Semmes, SJ, whose work among the needy for more than 30 years identified the Church with the poor; and Leo T. Butler, SJ, who worked for 40 years in the field of education and in the conversion of the Chinese.

The Modern Church. On Feb. 29, 1956, the vicariate of Jamaica became the diocese of Kingston, and Vicar Apostolic John J. McEleney, SJ, became the first bishop. At this point the Church became involved with a number of social programs. A diocesan seminary, with excellent courses in the humanities and philosophy, was opened to foster vocations among native Jamaicans. Charitable Institutions included “Alpha,” named for the Kingston estate where Jessie Ripoll opened an orphanage in 1880. Beginning with only one child, by the mid-20th century this institution was home to over 400 children and was staffed by the Sisters of Mercy. The St. Vincent de Paul society, established in 1904, funded the Ozanam Home for the Aged. The Holy Trinity Cathedral Mens’ Sodality began the island’s first credit union in 1941, and the movement quickly spread to hundreds of credit unions, which built on the solid foundation of an intensive educational program in the principles and technique of operation. Kingston was made an archdiocese in 1967.

Jamaica remained an English possession until Aug. 6, 1962, when it became independent within the framework of the Commonwealth of Nations. Unfortunately, the region’s economy suffered under the new socialist government, sparking violence as the tourist traffic it relied on lessened. The 1980s ushered in a conservative government, but social instability continued. By the 1990s the island’s continued economic woes sparked outbreaks of violence, particularly during the 1994 elections. The continued violence and corruption prompted Church leaders to speak out against government economic policies that contained cutbacks in social services. The Church also attempted to increase food production by encouraging the use of government land for agriculture. Pope John Paul II visited the island in 1993.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 79 parishes tended by 55 diocesan and 45 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 12 brothers and 190 sisters, many of whom administered the island’s 50 primary and 20 secondary schools. The Church remained one of several minority churches in a predominately Protestant country that featured a proliferation of small sects. Relations among all faiths were amicable. In 1999 Jamaica’s bishops held a day of repentance on October 17, to publicly apologize for the Church’s toleration of slavery during the 16th and 17th century.

Bibliography: F. MORALES PADRON, Jamaica española (Seville 1952). Catholic Directory of the British Caribbean (Kingston, Jamaica 1958–).

[F. J. OSBORNE/EDS.]

JAMES (SON OF ALPHAEUS), ST.

One of the 12 Apostles. In all four lists of the Apostles (Mt 10.3; Mk 3.18; Lk 6.15; and Acts 1.13) he is mentioned in ninth place, before Thaddeus in Matthew and Mark, before Simon in Luke and Acts. An ancient tradition has identified this James with James the Less of Mk 15.40; 16.1; Mt 27.56; Lk 24.10. Thus the title ὁ μικρότερος (the less; literally, the little one) came to be transferred to James of Alphaeus. It should be noted that the expression ὁ μικρότερος refers either to size or to age rather than to relative importance.

Tradition has also continued the process of identification by making “Mary [the mother] of James” the same as “Mary [the wife] of Cleopas” in Jn 19.25. The difficulty arising from the identification of Alphaeus and Cleopas is ordinarily answered by saying that they are equivalents of the same Aramaic name or that they are simply two names belonging to the same person. In this case James of Alphaeus would be James the brother (i.e., relative) of the Lord, for Mary of Clopas is called the sister (relative) of Mary the mother of Jesus in Jn 19.25. This series of identifications has remained the more widespread opinion among Catholics.

However, a number of recent scholars prefer to stress the fact that the New Testament maintains a distinction between the Apostles and the brethren of the Lord (Mk 6.3; Mt 13.55). James the brother of the Lord is mentioned in Gal 1.19 and is to be identified with James of Jerusalem (Acts 12.17; 15.13; 21.18; Gal 2.9, 12; 1 Cor 15.7). According to the Gospels, the TWELVE had already been chosen when Jesus' brethren manifested their unbelief (Mk 3.21; Jn 7.3); in Mk 6.3 the latter were still living in Nazareth. In Acts 1.14 and 1 Cor 15.7 a distinction is drawn between the Twelve and the brethren.

The passage in Gal 2.9, where Paul lists "James and Cephas and John" as pillars of the Church, can be understood in the light of Gal 1.19; the Greek εἰ μὴ, which the Vulgate translates as nisi, can have also the adversative meaning of "but only." Given the position of James of Jerusalem in the early Church, he would not have had to be an Apostle in order to be considered a "pillar."

Both Flavius Josephus (Ant. 20.9.1) and Hegesippus (in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 2.23) tell of the martyrdom of James of Jerusalem, and thus perhaps of James of Alphaeus. According to Josephus he was stoned to death in A.D. 62; according to Hegesippus he was cast from the pinnacle of the Temple, c. A.D. 66, and when the fall did not kill him, he was clubbed to death. The canonical Epistle of James is to be attributed to James the brother of the Lord, whether or not he is identified with James of Alphaeus.

In the Byzantine rite, James of Jerusalem and James of Alphaeus have separate feasts: October 23 and 9 respectively. In the Roman rite they have long (but not always) been identified; the feast of St. James (along with St. Philip) occurs on May 1. It is common to both the Gelasian and the Gregorian Sacramentaries and can be traced back to c. A.D. 563. In ecclesiastical art St. James is represented with a club or a heavy staff, the instrument of his martyrdom.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 7.2:2109–16. J. BONSIRVEN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:783–795. F. MAIER, "Zur Apostolizität des Jakobus und Judas," Biblische Zeitschrift 4 (1906) 164–191, 255–266. A. MALVY, "S. Jacques de Jérusalem était-il un des douze?" Recherches de science religieuse 9 (1918) 122–131. F. HAASE, "Apostel und Evangelisten in den orientalischen Überlieferungen," Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen 9 (1922) 267–271. S. LYONNET, "Témoignages de S. Jean Chrysostome et de S. Jérôme sur Jacques le frère du Seigneur," Recherches de science religieuse 29 (1939) 335–351. L. CERFAUX, La Communauté apostolique (3d ed. Paris 1956) 90–99. A. CHARUE, Les Épîtres catholiques in La Sainte Bible, ed. L. PIROT and A. CLAMER, 12 v. (Paris 1935–61) 12:381–392.

[J. A. LEFRANÇOIS]

JAMES (SON OF ZEBEDEE), ST.

One of the 12 Apostles and the brother of the Apostle John (Mt 10.3; Mk 3.18; Lk 6.15; Acts 1.13; 12.2). His Greek name, Ἰάκωβος, represents the Hebrew ya'āqōb (Jacob). Originally he was a fisherman of Galilee, and the narrative of his and John's call to the apostleship indicates that the family must have been fairly well-to-do when it mentions hired men working along with them (Mt 4.21; Mk 1.19–20; Lk 5.10). James of Zebedee is commonly called "the Greater," as opposed to James of Alphaeus, traditionally known as James the Less, but the New Testament does not give him this title. [See JAMES (SON OF ALPHAEUS), ST.] By comparing Mt 27.56 with Mk 15.40 it is deduced that the mother of James and John was Salome (Mt 20.20–21). In Mk 3.17 these two Apostles are given the name Boanerges (Βοωνηργές), which the same verse translates as "sons of thunder." Whatever its precise meaning, the translation given may be explained by the impetuosity shown by these two brothers toward a certain Samaritan town (Lk 9.54). Along with Peter and John, James was a member of the special group of three mentioned in Mk 5.37; 13.3; Mt 17.1; 26.37. He was the first of the Apostles to die for Christ, being beheaded under Herod Agrippa in 44 (Acts 12. 1–2).

This might indicate that James was exceptionally active in Jerusalem. Tradition places James's journey to Spain sometime between the death of Jesus and the martyrdom of James, but the reality of such a visit is opposed to St. Paul's words in Rom 15.20–24. The apocryphal Greek Acts of James cannot be traced back earlier than the eighth century. The genuineness of the relics at SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA, his famous shrine in Spain, is seriously disputed despite the fact that Pope Leo XIII referred to them as authentic in his bull Omnipotens Deus in 1884. In ecclesiastical art he is ordinarily represented carrying a pilgrim's bell.

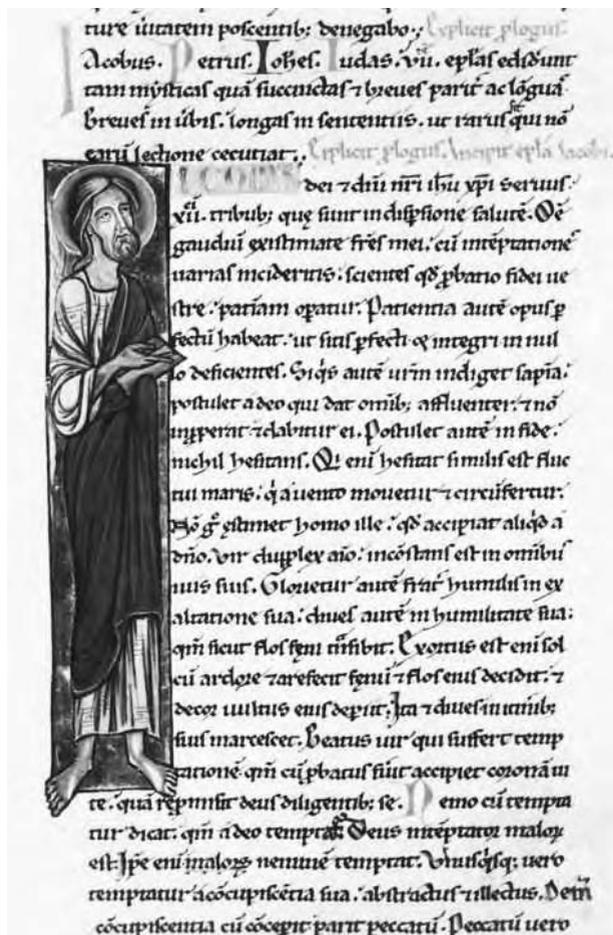

Feast: July 25 (Roman rite); April 30 (Byzantine rite).

Bibliography: V. ERMONI, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VI-GOUROUX (Paris 1895–1912) 3.2:1082–84. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 5.1:412–417; 7.2:2089–2109. A. WIKENHAUSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 5:833–834. F. HAASE, Apostel und Evangelisten in den orientalischen Ueberlieferungen (Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen 9; Münster 1922). P. JOÛON, "Notes de philologie évangélique," Recherches de science religieuse 15 (1925) 438–441.

[J. A. LEFRANÇOIS]

JAMES, EPISTLE OF

Place in the Canon. The epistle of James is one of a number of writings from the first two centuries attributed to James, the brother of Jesus. See also the Protevan- Manuscript page, beginning of Epistle of St. James, written in North of France ca. 1200.

gelium of James and the Nag Hammadi Apocryphon of James, the first and second Apocalypse of James. Because of the popularity of the name in the first century, a few modern scholars question this assumption. Recognition of authorship by James underlies the acceptance of the epistle into the canon. Evidence of its use is late and ambiguous. The first probable quotation (Jas 2.23) is by Irenaeus (AH 4.16.2) around A.D. 180. Circa 250 ORIGEN quotes from the epistle as if from scripture (Commentary on John fragment 6). Eusebius (HE 2.23.24–25) refers to James as the first of the General (Catholic) epistles, recognizing its questionable authenticity because “few of the ancients quote it.” It is not included in the canonical list of the Council of NICAEA in 325. Nevertheless, Athanasius lists it amongst canonical works in his 39th Festal letter (A.D. 367). His judgement was adopted in the West by Jerome and Augustine and from that time its canonical place was secure.

Date and Authorship. James’ canonical status was tied to its recognition as an epistle of the brother of the Lord. This position is defended by modern commentators (J. B. Mayor; J. B. Adamson; R. Bauckham) who argue that it emanates from the Jerusalem church before the death of James in A.D. 62. Other scholars recognise a duality in the epistle. There is evidence of a Palestinian socio-economic context (the problem of poverty and wealth) and significant contact with the teaching of Jesus in the sermon on the mount (Mt 5–7). The epistle also has an orientation to the diaspora (1.1) and a somewhat more polished use of Greek than might be expected from James and his Jewish mission in Jerusalem. This suggests the epistle was developed on the basis of tradition from James by a Jewish believer in the diaspora some time after the destruction of Jerusalem (R. P. Martin; P. Davids; J. Painter). A third group of scholars sees the epistle as pseudonymous and coming from the late first, or second century. Though without connection to James, the epistle was perhaps based on an earlier Palestinian tradition (M. Dibelius). In time the epistle came to be understood as addressed to the church in every place by James. In this way it entered the canon.

James and Jesus. Studies have shown a relationship between James and the teaching of Jesus through tradition unique to Matthew (M) and shared with Luke in the form found in Matthew (Q<sup>M</sup>), especially in the sermon on the mount. The teaching about the benevolence of God in creation (Mt 5.45; 6.26–32 and Jas 1.17) is linked to the demand for greater righteousness in law observance (Mt 5.17–48 and Jas 1.25; 2.8–12; 4.11). Both Matthew and James show a concentration on the inner moral demand of the law. The unique connection between the prohibition of oaths in Jas 5.12 and Mt 5.33–37 provides a basis for recognising more links between the teaching of Jesus in Matthew and the ethical teaching of James.

James and Paul. The teaching about faith and works in Jas 2.14–26 resonates with the theme in Paul, especially in Rom 3–4. James’ use of Gn 15.6 (in 2.23) seems to presuppose its use by Paul (Rom 4.3, 9, 22; Gal 3.6). Paul exploits the wording of Genesis which says that Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him for righteousness. James makes no use of the text, arguing that a person is justified by works as well as faith, not by faith only (2.24), denying the efficacy of faith apart from works (2.18, 26). Paul argues that a person is justified by faith apart from works of the law (Rom 3.28; 4.6). While Paul recognises the necessity of faith working through love, he rejects the notion that a person is justified by any work. The argument of James is directed against the language of Paul, but without actually addressing Paul’s point of view. James, affirming the graciousness of God in creation (1.17), does not feature the distinctive nature of grace in justification that is found in Paul.

Jewish Wisdom and Paranesis. It is a mistake to see James as a mere moralist. His call to moral action arises from his understanding of God who is without partiality. Love for ones neighbour has a cutting edge in relation to the rich and on behalf of the poor (Jas 2.5). In James' Jewish wisdom, tradition overlaps with Hellenistic paranesis. A major theme concerns control of the tongue, a theme common in Jewish wisdom (Jas 1.26; 3.5–8; Ps 34.13; 39.1). Affirming God's goodness (1.16–18), James attributes sin to human passion (1.12–15).

Bibliography: J. B. ADAMSON, James: The Man and His Message (Grand Rapids 1989). W. R. BAKER, Personal Speech: Ethics in the Epistle of James (Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2/68; Tübingen 1995). R. BAUCKHAM, James (London 1999). M. DIBELIUS, A Commentary on the Epistle of James, rev. H. GREEVEN, tr. M. A. WILLIAMS, ed. H. KÖSTER (Philadelphia 1976). J. H. ELLIOTT, "The Epistle of James in Rhetorical and Social Scientific Perspective: Holiness—Wholeness and Patterns of Replication," Biblical Theology Bulletin 23 (1993) 71–81. D. E. GOWAN, "Wisdom and Endurance in James," Horizons in Biblical Theology 15 (1993) 145–53. P. J. HARTIN, James and the Q Sayings of Jesus (Sheffield 1991). L. T. JOHNSON, The Letter of James (New York 1995). "The Letter of James" in New Interpreters Bible, v. 12 (Nashville 1998) 177–225. R. P. MARTIN, James (Waco 1988). J. PAINTER, Just James: The Brother of Jesus in History and Tradition (Columbia, SC 1997), especially 234–269. W. H. WACHOB, The Voice of Jesus in the Social Rhetoric of James (Cambridge, Eng. 2000).

[J. PAINTER]

JAMES, WILLIAM

American psychologist and philosopher; b. New York, N.Y., Jan. 11, 1842; d. Chocorua, N.Y., Aug. 26, 1910. He was the oldest of five children—his brother Henry, the novelist, was the most celebrated. His father was independently wealthy, and James's early education was provided by numerous private schools in America and Europe. His higher formal education began in 1861 at the Lawrence Scientific School. Two years later he entered the Harvard Medical School, and he received his medical degree in 1869. For the next several years, he served as an instructor in anatomy and physiology at Harvard. In 1876 he was attracted to the study of psychology and shortly thereafter was appointed assistant professor of psychology. By 1880 his interests had shifted to philosophy; in 1885 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Harvard, a position he held until his retirement in 1907.

Teaching. James, an original thinker and a brilliant writer, exerted a striking influence on contemporary philosophy as a whole. His interest in psychology resulted in his adoption of radical empiricism, which in turn led to PRAGMATISM and his characteristic analysis of religious experience.

William James. (Archive Photos)

Psychology. In The Principles of Psychology (2 v. New York 1890), James argued that CONSCIOUSNESS is a stream, rather than a set of states, of human "impressions," or of isolated sensations. In a word, he rejected the older mechanical and associationist psychology for a dynamic and functional psychology; with this he also abandoned the traditional dualism of mind and body, of "thought and thing." Mind as substance he rejected for the notion of mind or consciousness as activity, regarding such activity as a means of adaptation to the environment by the individual.

Radical Empiricism. This stems partly from revolutionary changes in psychology, partly from James's reaction to traditional EMPIRICISM, particularly its determinism. James was influenced by the argument of C. S. PEIRCE that experience is not necessarily continuous, that a genuine empiricism may reveal novelties in a continuously changing process. He was moved also by C. B. Renouvier's argument that freedom is revealed in empiricism. In The Will to Believe (New York 1897), James argued that the question of freedom is not to be decided on intellectual grounds, but by man's actions and beliefs and by what difference his decision will mean to him as an individual. James's belief in an empiricism divorced from much of its intellectual background was reinforced by the influence of H. BERGSON, particularly by the latter's contention that experience is one and that any attempt to conceptualize it distorts its true meaning. Finally, James rejected the monism of IDEALISM with its determinism and its conception of a "block universe" devoid of all novelty and chance. He held that external relations are real because they are experienced relations, relations that connect human experiences. F. H. Bradley's defense of the intellectualistic logic of internal relations he regarded as weird. In consequence, he vindicated a pluralistic universe, that "concatenated unity," which he maintained is rooted in a radical empiricism than in logic (A Pluralistic Universe, New York 1909).

Pragmatism. Although he attacked an excessive intellectualism, James did not deny the value of intellectual activity provided it was correctly guided. Conceptualization often falsifies reality, but concepts and ideas can be highly useful in the practical sense when they are grounded upon experience. James rejected both the correspondence and coherence theories of TRUTH and held that truth was pragmatic, that the true is that which is the practical and the best (Pragmatism, New York 1907). Truth is utilitarian; man's ideas are true insofar as they are useful and practical in resolving his problems. For James, truth is something relative, expedient, useful, and practical. James not only applied these criteria of truth to metaphysical problems, but he was also greatly concerned to show how such a pragmatic conception of truth could be used to justify religious ideas and confirm religious experience. For James, a religious belief is to be judged not on intellectual grounds but on the concrete differences it makes in the life of the individual. Modifying Pascal's wager, he declared there is no problem of an intellectual proof for the existence of God. the problem for the individual is this: if the question of God's existence is a real possibility to him, a "live hypothesis," as James termed it, then it is necessary for him to go beyond any purely intellectual evidence and decide for himself whether he should believe in God. He cannot suspend judgment; agnosticism is untenable, for it means one acts as though God does not exist. The issue is one of an existential decision, rather than a summing up of evidence, which James held can never be completely summed up.

Religious Experience. In The Varieties of Religious Experience (New York 1902), James was convinced that there is an empirical confirmation for the religious hypothesis. The religious experience and the needs of the individual demand an immediate answer to the question of God's existence. Such a requirement can be met only by a decision that stems from the "passional nature" of the individual—a decision that comes from the heart than the intellect. James's own views on religion were undoubtedly influenced by his father, who was extremely critical of the clergy but who in later life was strongly attracted to Swedenborgianism. Although James rejected all traditional religious beliefs, he felt that man's religious experience brought him in relation to a higher spiritual aspect of the universe. Such a higher or wider reality is a "something" greater than man. It may be identified with a finite God.

Influence and Critique. Although Peirce was the true founder of pragmatism, the name has been most often associated with James, for it was he who gave currency and popularity to many of its basic features and particularly to his own version of pragmatic truth. The influence of James was partly because of his person—he was a brilliant teacher and lecturer—and partly because his philosophy seemed to reflect so well the American culture and its tendency to determine truth and values by an appeal to the practical and the experiential. The philosophy of James had a considerable vogue down to the 1930s, but has since then been in large part absorbed by LOGICAL POSITIVISM and naturalism. As a philosophy its most serious deficiencies are its anti-intellectualism, its RELATIVISM, its appeal to the expedient in ethics, and its justification of religious belief solely upon the value of such beliefs to the individual.

See Also: RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY OF; VOLUNTARISM.

Bibliography: A. STOPPER, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1604–1611. R. B. PERRY, The Thought and Character of William James, 2 v. (Boston 1935). P. R. ANDERSON and M. H. FISCH, Philosophy in America from the Puritans to James (New York 1939). B. BLANSHARD and H. W. SCHNEIDER, eds., In Commemoration of William James, 1842–1942 (New York 1942). M. C. OTTO et al., William James, the Man and the Thinker (Madison 1942). H. V. KNOX, The Philosophy of William James (New York 1914).

[J. A. MOURANT]

JAMES II, KING OF ARAGON

Reigned 1291 to Nov. 2, 1327, king also of Sicily from 1286; b. 1267; d. Barcelona. James II "the Just" continued the expansionist policies of his predecessors (James I of Aragon, Peter III of Aragon). He invaded Castile, meanwhile annexing much of its Kingdom of Murcia (1291–1301); he seized Gibraltar briefly during a crusade against Granada (1309); conquered Sardinia against Pisan-Genoese resistance (1323–24); connived at the Catalan Company's seizure of Byzantine territory; held Moslem Tunis, Bugia, and Tlemecen as tributaries; and secured a protectorate over Christians in the Holy Land. A poet and literary patron, he also founded the University of Lérida (1300), replaced the suppressed TEMPLARS with his KNIGHTS OF MONTESEA (1317), and gained a specifically "Aragonese" metropolitanate. After surrendering Sicily to Anjou-papacy disposition (Anagni treaty, 1295), he connived at its retention by his brother Frederick III. Pope BONIFACE VIII slyly appointed James captain general of the Church, using as bait Corsica and Sardinia. But Ghibelline champion James merely waged a pseudowar against GUELF champion Frederick, thus marking the last phase of the Sicilian Vespers War (1297–1302).

Bibliography: The Chronicle of Muntaner, tr. A. GOEDENOUGH, 2 v. (London 1920–1921). J. E. MARTÍNEZ FERRANDO, Jaime II de Aragón, su vida familiar, 2 v. (Barcelona 1948); Els descendents de Pere el Gran (Barcelona 1954). R. I. BURNS, "The Catalan Company and the European Powers," Speculum 29 (1954) 751–771. V. SALAVERTE Y ROCA, Cerdeña y la expansión mediterránea de la Corona de Aragón, 1297–1314, 2 v. (Madrid 1956). S. RUNCIMAN, The Sicilian Vespers (Cambridge, Eng. 1958).

[R. I. BURNS]

JAMES I, KING OF ENGLAND

Reigned March 24, 1603 to March 27, 1625, of the royal house of Stuart, son of MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS, and her second husband, Henry, Lord Darnley; b. Edinburgh Castle, June 19, 1556; d. Theobalds, England. As a result of his Catholic mother's enforced abdication and imprisonment in England, he was crowned James VI of Scotland while still a child, on July 29, 1567. During his minority James was a pawn trapped in the power struggle among the Scottish nobility. He was raised a Presbyterian, and his education was particularly entrusted to George Buchanan, the noted Scottish humanist. James proved to be a precocious scholar and rapidly developed a command of Latin, French, and English. In constant personal danger, James was forced to thread a difficult course among various rival groups. He maintained a precarious balance between English, French, Catholic, and Presbyterian factions. James protested to Queen ELIZABETH I when his mother was sentenced to death, but the execution of Mary in 1587 caused him no personal loss, for he then became the logical heir to the throne of England. On Aug. 20, 1589, James married Anne, second daughter of Frederick II of Denmark. She later proved an embarrassment to James because of her conversion to Catholicism.

Upon the death of Elizabeth, James was proclaimed King of England. Here he found himself caught in a struggle between Anglican, Puritan, and Catholic factions. James became a firm supporter of the Church of England and fought off all attempts by the Puritans to purge it of popish practices. He also tended to take a more tolerant attitude toward Catholicism. He felt sympathy toward the Catholic laity, but remained hostile toward the clergy, especially the Jesuits. This sympathy, plus his correspondence with the papacy, led English Catholics to believe that he would grant toleration. His failure to act resulted in a conspiracy to blow up Parliament. The Gunpowder Plot was discovered in November 1605. James retaliated with harsh action against the Catholic clergy and complicated his position with his English subjects and with the papacy by his advocacy of divine right kingship. This involved him in a pamphlet war with Cardinal Robert BELLARMINE and developed in Parliament a suspicion of all his motives and actions that lasted throughout his reign. The divine right theory led him into conflict with his chief justice, the great advocate of the common law, Sir Edward Coke. His conflicts with Parliament were accentuated by his inability to judge men. James allowed himself to be guided by incompetent and self-seeking favorites, such as Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, and George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

James I, King of England. (Archive Photos)

James II, King of England.

On the whole James pursued a policy of peace and sought the friendship of Spain, which only antagonized his Protestant subjects. In his later years James gave himself up to personal comforts and an excessive fondness for his favorite Buckingham.

Bibliography: J. P. KENYON, Stuart England (Hammondsworth, Eng. 1985). C. RUSSELL, Parliaments and English Politics, 1621–1629 (Oxford 1979). B. COWARD, The Stuart Age (London 1980). D. HIRST, Authority and Conflict: England 1603–1658 (London 1986). M. LEE, Great Britain's Solomon: James I and VI in His Three Kingdoms (Urbana Ill. 1990). D. N. BERGERSON, Royal Family, Royal Lovers: King James of England and Scotland (Columbia Mo. 1991).

[A. M. SCHLEICH]

JAMES II, KING OF ENGLAND

B. London, Oct. 14, 1633; d. St. Germain, France, Sept. 6, 1701. James, second son of Charles I and the French princess Henrietta Maria, was baptized a Protestant; he spent most of the Civil War in Oxford as duke of York. The fall of Oxford in 1646 placed him in the hands of the parliamentary forces, from which he escaped to France in April 1648. He served with distinction and bravery in the French army under Turenne and later in the Spanish army. When the Restoration placed his brother Charles II on the English throne, James returned to England with him.

Two daughters, Mary and Anne, were born of his marriage to Anne Hyde; both were brought up Protestants. Despite valuable service as lord admiral, James's popularity declined rapidly because of his Catholic leanings. His unannounced but rumored conversion to Catholicism sometime after 1668, followed by his marriage to a Catholic, Mary of Modena, in 1672, offended the religious sensibilities of the English people. Charles's attempt to ameliorate the position of Catholics in 1672 was successfully opposed by Parliament, which followed up its advantage with passage of the Test Act of 1673, barring Catholics from positions of trust and specifically forcing James to retire from all his offices. In the aftermath of the fictional Popish Plot of Titus Oates, anti-Catholicism flared up, and resulted in serious attempts to exclude James from the line of succession by law. These attempts were thwarted only by Charles's skillful maneuvering. The last years of his reign were marked by a vigorous royal counterattack that assured James's peaceful accession at Charles's death (Feb. 6, 1685).

The primary issue of the reign of James II was religion, but with pronounced constitutional overtones. James's attempts to obtain equality for his fellow Catholics and ultimately to effect the conversion of England led Protestants to fear for their religious liberty. Through his dispensing power he permitted Catholics to serve in offices forbidden them by law. Through his supremacy in the Church he attempted to soften Anglican hostility toward Catholicism and to intrude those with Catholic sympathies into ecclesiastical offices. He attempted also to arrange the election to Parliament of those who would vote with him on the religious issue. Anglicans soon began to realize that the privileged position of their Church was in danger. In addition, many Dissenters, to whom freedom of public worship was offered in 1687, were suspicious of James's motives and ultimate intentions. His policies were opposed also by moderate Catholics who feared that anything more than mere toleration was foredoomed and would only make their position worse.

Rejecting the counsel of moderation, he surrounded himself with extremists like the Jesuit Edward Petre and time-servers like the Earl of Sunderland. Thus deprived of realistic advice, he maneuvered himself into a position where opponents of his religious, political, and foreign policies were able to join forces to overthrow him.

The early summer of 1688 brought three events that, taken together, meant the end for James. He completed the alienation of the traditionally royalist Church of England by ordering the reading in all parishes of the second Declaration of Indulgence, which suspended the penal laws and the Test Acts. Seven bishops who petitioned the crown on the point were tried and acquitted. At the same time, the queen gave birth to a son, who superseded James's Protestant daughter Mary as next in line to the throne, thereby making likely the establishment of a Catholic dynasty. Many who had been willing to accept the Catholic James pending the succession of the Protestant Mary had now to reassess their position. Finally, seven leaders of the opposition wrote to Mary's husband, William of Orange (who himself was vitally concerned with English affairs), inviting his intervention. The upshot of the letter was the "Glorious Revolution" and James's subsequent flight to France on Dec. 23, 1688.

The rest of his life was anticlimactic. An attempt to conquer Ireland led to his defeat at the Battle of the Boyne, July 11, 1690. Henceforth he lived peacefully and, although earlier a man of loose morals, he won for himself a reputation for holiness.

Bibliography: F. C. TURNER, James II (London 1950). J. MILLER, James II: A Study in Kingship (London 1978). M. ASHLEY, James II (London 1978). J. P. KENYON, Stuart England (London 1978). T. HARRIS, Politics under the Later Stuarts: Party Conflict in a Divided Society 1660–1715 (London 1993). M. MULLET, James II and English Politics, 1678–1688 (London 1994). J. MILLER, James II (New Haven, Conn. 2000).

[E. F. WALL]

JAMES CINTI DE CERQUETO, BL.

AUGUSTINIAN hermit and ascetic; baptized Giacomo Cinti; b. Cerqueto near Perugia, Italy, at the close of the 13th century; d. Perugia, Apr. 17, 1367. He was noted for his exemplary life of virtue; many miracles were attributed to him, e.g., frogs ceased croaking when he preached outdoors. His relics have been venerated for centuries at Perugia, and his remains were enshrined by Horatius, bishop of Perugia, in 1754. His cult was first publicly approved in 1895 by LEO XIII. The fact that the Augustinians are sometimes permitted to wear white habits is attributed to his prayers.

Feast: Apr. 17.

Bibliography: Analecta ecclesiastica 3 (1895) 253–254. A. ROTELLI, Il beato Giacomo da Cerqueto (Perugia 1895). F. VON S. DOYÉ, Heilige und Selige der römisch-katholischen Kirche, 2 v. (Leipzig 1930) 1:542. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:117. W. HÜMPFNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:838.

[K. NOLAN]

JAMES DE BENEFACTIS, BL.

Giacomo Benefatti, bishop, preacher; b. Mantua, Italy, mid-13th century; d. there Nov. 19, c. 1328–38. He entered the Dominicans at an early age and became famous as a preacher. He was an advisor and secretary to the Dominican Pope BENEDICT XI, who appointed him bishop of Mantua in c. 1304. He defended the faith against heresy and schism, and for his solicitous care of his flock earned the title Father of the Poor. His cult was approved by PIUS IX in 1859.

Feast: Nov. 26.

Bibliography: A. TOURON, Histoire des hommes illustres de l'ordre de S. Dominique, 6 v. (Paris 1743–49) 2:134. L. JADIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 7:1293–94. A. WALZ, Compendium historiae Ordinis Praedicatorum (new ed. Rome 1948) 203. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:837. A. AMARGIER, Catholicisme 6:267. I. TAURISANO, Catalogus hagiographicus ordinis praedicatorum 28.

[J. D. CAMPBELL]

JAMES GAETANI STEFANESCHI

Cardinal; b. Rome, c. 1270; d. Avignon, France, June 23, 1343. A member of the influential GAETANI FAMILY, he studied and later taught at the University of Paris. He was obliged to Pope CELESTINE V for his promotion to the office of auditor at the apostolic palace and to BONIFACE VIII for the cardinalate, with the title of San Giorgio in Velabro (Dec. 17, 1295). At the time of the Anagni outrage he remained close to the pope, and during the conclave assembled at Perugia in 1305, he was among the adversaries of the candidacy of Bertrand de Got, the future CLEMENT V, participating in his election only by way of accession. When action was brought against the memory of Boniface, he acted as the pope's defender, despite the protests of Guillaume de Nogaret. A convinced Ghibelline (see GUELFS AND Ghibellines), he constantly demonstrated his opposition to the line of political action followed by Clement V and JOHN XXII in Italy. Deprived of any influence because of his intransigence, he devoted himself to the production of a number of important liturgical and historical works. His Opus metricum, a rather obscure poem [ed. F. X. Seppelt, Monumenta Coelestini-ana (Paderborn 1921) 1–146], is divided into three parts: a life of Celestine V, composed before Dec. 17, 1295; an account of the election and coronation of Boniface VIII, completed after 1300; and an account of Celestine's canonization, written in 1314 and 1315. The cardinal revised the entire work and added a gloss and a dedication to the CELESTINES dated Jan. 28, 1319. His Liber de centesimo seu jubileo anno [ed. D. Quattrocchi, Bessarione 7 (1900)

299–317] concerned the JUBILEE YEAR. A Roman ceremonial by Stefaneschi (MS 1706 of the Bibliothèque d'Avignon) represents the first redaction in which notes during the pontificate of Clement V and John XXII, not transcribed after 1328, are collected. It is an important source for the study of the papal court in the period, but has been printed only in part. Stefaneschi wrote also a life of St. George the martyr (Capitular Archives of St. Peter's, Rome, MS 129C), and an account of a miracle that took place at Avignon in 1320 (in MS Paris, B.N. lat. 5931, fol. 95–102).

Bibliography: Works. Opus metricum, Acta Sanctorum May 4:437–484. De centesimo anno seu jubileo liber, tr. into Italian by A. FRUGONI, Il libro del guibileo del cardinale Stefaneschi (Brescia 1950). Extracts from the Roman ceremonial in F. EHRLE, "Zur Geschichte des päpstlichen Hofceremoniells im 14. Jahrhundert," H. DENIFLE and F. EHRLE, eds., Archiv für Literatur- und Kirchengeschichte des Mittelalters 5 (1889) 565–602. E. MÜLLER, Das Konzil von Vienne (Münster 1931) 671–678. L. H. LABANDE, "Le Cérémonial romain de Jacques Cajétan," Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes 54 (1893) 45–74. G. MOLLAT, "Miscellanea Avenionensia," Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 44 (1927) 1–5. J. MABILLON, Museum italicum, 2 v. (Paris 1687) 2:241–443. Literature. I. HÖSL, Kardinal Jacobus Gaietani Stefaneschi: Ein Beitrag zur Literatur und Kirchengeschichte des beginnenden 14. Jahrhunderts (Berlin 1908). Histoire Littéraire de la France 34 (1914) 61. R. MORGHEN, "Il cardinale Jacopo Gaetano Stefaneschi e l'edizione del suo Opus marticum," Bullettino dell'Istituto storico Italiano e Archivio Muratoriano 46 (1930) 1–35. M. ANDRIEU, "L'Ordinaire de la chapelle papale et le cardinal Jacques Stefaneschi," Ephemerides liturgicae 39 (1925) 230–260. A. FRUGONI, "La figura e l'opera del cardinale Jacopo Stefaneschi . . .," Atti dell'Accademia nazionale dei Lincei, 8th ser., 5 (1950) 397–424.

[G. MOLLAT]

JAMES GRIESINGER OF ULM, BL.

Dominican artist also known as James (Jakob) of Ulm; b. Ulm, Germany, 1407; d. Bologna, Oct. 11, 1491. He went to Rome when 24, served in the army of Alphonse of Aragon, and then became steward to a wealthy Italian jurist. When 34, he became a Dominican lay brother at Bologna. There he turned his talents to glass painting, an art he must have acquired before entering the Order. Manuscripts tell of his holiness but not of his artistic activities. Proof of his artistry is found in the works of his pupils, especially Fra Anastasio of Como and Fra Ambrogino of Soncino, and in S. Petronio in Bologna. Soon after his death the people of Bologna invoked him as the patron of glass painters and glaziers. In 1825, LEO XII officially confirmed his cult.

Feast: Oct. 11.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 5:790–803. I. TAURISANO, Catalogus hagiographicus ordinis praedicatorum (Rome 1918) 46–47. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10:368–372. J. WILMS, Lay Brother, Artist and Saint, tr. M. FULGENCE (London 1957).

[L. M. SCHIER]

JAMES OF ALBENGA

Decretalist; b. about 1190 in Albenga, Italy, where he appears as early as 1210 as an advocate; time and place of his death are unknown. HOSTIENSIS (Henry of Segusio) and Peter of Sampson were among his students when he was teaching in Bologna between 1220 and 1230. He composed glosses on the decretum of GRATIAN (contained in the Manuscript Vatican lat. 1367) and supplementary glosses on Tancred's disquisition to Compilatio Prima, and the famous commentary disquisition to the Compilatio Quinta. He was provost in his native city of Albenga. After Abbas Antiquus (BERNARD OF MONTMIRAT) he held an archdeaconry, but resigned during a vacancy of the bishopric of Albenga in the hope of becoming bishop of his native city. The hope was never fulfilled. William DURANTI the Elder's note that James had been bishop of Faenza, since it has not been authenticated by a single witness, could be an error on Duranti's part.

Bibliography: J. F. V. SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts 1:205–207. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik 76, 383–385. S. KUTTNER, "Bernardus Compostellanus antiquus," Traditio 1 (1943) 335. J. LIPS and H. WAGNON, Dictionnaire de droit canonique 6:77–78.

[R. WEIGAND]

JAMES OF BEVAGNA, BL.

Dominican preacher, founder, miracle worker also known as Giacomo (James) Bianconi of Mevania; b. Bevagna (Mevania), Umbria, Italy, March 7, 1220; d. Bevagna, Aug. 22, 1301. At 16, moved by the Lenten preaching of two DOMINICANS, he joined the order at Spoleto. He studied philosophy and theology and was ordained at Perugia. When assigned to preaching, he worked against Nicolaitanism (the defense of a married clergy); he confronted the heresiarch Ortinelli and succeeded in banning the heresy from Umbria. He founded the Dominican priory of St. George in his native Bevagna and directed the establishment of a convent of Benedictine nuns. Noteworthy in his life was the reputed vision accorded him while praying before a crucifix. Fearing the loss of his soul, he was comforted when he was bathed in the blood that spurted from the side of Christ. Warned by a vision on August 15, 1301, he prepared himself for death, which occurred eight days later. His intact remains are at Bevagna. BONIFACE IX sanctioned his cult on Jan. 7, 1400. PIUS V began a formal process that continued under PAUL V. In a bull of April 13, 1610, James is referred to as a saint. CLEMENT X authorized his feast on March 6, 1674.

Feast: Aug. 23.

Bibliography: I. TAURISANO, Catalogus hagiographicus ordinis praedicatorum (Rome 1918) 23. Année Dominicaine 23 v. (Lyons 1883–1909) August 2:779. Acta Sanctorum August 4:719–737. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:390–391.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

JAMES OF CERTALDO, BL.

Camaldolese monk and parish priest; b. Certaldo, near Florence, Italy; d. Apr. 13, 1292. James (Giacomo) Guidi was the son of a knight of Volterra. He became a CAMALDOLESE in 1230 at the Abbey of San Giusto at Volterra, where his relics still remain. Having twice refused to accept the office of abbot, James reluctantly acquiesced on a third occasion, but shortly thereafter he resigned this office to return to his work as parish priest at the monastery church. He served in this capacity for 40 years with a reputation as a great pastor of souls. His father and two brothers became lay brothers at San Giusto.

Feast: Apr. 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Apr. 2:153–156. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:838 Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 2:50, 52.

[K. J. EGAN]

JAMES OF METZ

Dominican theologian; fl. 1295–1309. Little is known with certainty about him. He is listed in the Stams Catalogue (1315) as author of a commentary on the Sentences. Presumably he belonged to the priory at Metz in the province of France. At Paris he lectured on the Sentences two times, but without becoming a master. The two versions of his commentary have been identified by J. Koch, who showed that the first exists as a reportatio, and that the second is a repetition with additional questions. Dating the second between 1295 and 1303, Koch maintained that he must have been the teacher of DURANDUS OF SAINT-POURÇAIN. R. Martin and P. Glorieux reject this in favor of a later dating (1308–09), in which case he could have been a disciple of Durandus. He was more restrained and cautious than Durandus, although many of their minor arguments are identical. Some debatable views were attacked by HARVEY NEDELLEC in his Correctorium fr. Jacobi, composed after 1302. James maintained a real distinction between nature and Persons in the Trinity; this view, defended by Durandus, was declared heretical by a theological commission of the Dominican Order in 1314.

James presented the arguments against the real distinction of ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE without replying to them; he identified mental concepts with the human act of thinking, and followed PETER OF AUVERGNE on INDIVIDUATION by “this” form. On all other important points in scholastic philosophy he followed THOMAS AQUINAS, whom he calls “our Doctor.” Although he did not always adhere to the teaching of Aquinas, he was neither anti-Thomist nor nominalist (see THOMISM).

Bibliography: É. H. GILSON, A History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) 773–774. J. KOCH, “Jakob von Metz, OP, der Lehrer des Durandus de S. Porciano, OP,” Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 4 (1929) 169–232. R. M. MARTIN, La Controverse sur le péché originel au début du XIV e siècle (Louvain 1930) 185–208.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

JAMES OF THE MARCHES, ST.

Papal nuncio, early leader of the Franciscan Observants; baptized Giacomo Gangala; also known as James (Giacomo) della Marca; b. Monteprandone, in the March of Ancona, 1393; d. Naples, Nov. 28, 1476. He was reared by a priest uncle at Offida, studied the humanities at Ascoli, and took civil and canon law at the University of Perugia. He was frequently sent on various missions in the interest of the Church and the Franciscan Order: in 1430 he went to Bohemia against the HUSSITES; in 1432 the Minister General William of Casale sent him to Bosnia to combat the BOGOMILS; and he was inquisitor against the FRATICELLI in 1441. He went back to Bosnia and Dalmatia in 1452, and replaced JOHN CAPISTRAN as nuncio to Hungary in 1456. With BERNARDINE OF SIENA and Capistran, James worked tirelessly throughout his life for the success of the Church and the Franciscan Order. These three “pillars of the Observance” (see FRANCISCANS) came together in a historic meeting near Lake Trasimeno in May 1444, shortly before Bernardine’s death. James’s efforts to effect Bernardine’s canonization met with success on Pentecost 1450. James received two saintly disciples into the order: Bernardine of Fossa in 1445 and BERNARDINE OF FELTRE in 1456. James failed in his efforts to implement CALLISTUS III’s Bulla concordiae (Feb. 2, 1456), designed to unite the St. James of the Marches, painting by Carlo Crivelli, 1477, in the Picture Gallery of the Vatican in Rome.

Franciscan Conventuals and the Observants. In 1458 James returned to Italy and spent the rest of his life evangelizing Italian towns and establishing the MONTES PIETATIS. In 1472 SIXTUS IV sent him to Naples to preach reform. James, whose body rests in S. Maria Nuova in Naples, was beatified in 1624 and canonized in 1726. His writings are largely unedited or lost.

Feast: Nov. 28.

Bibliography: San Giacomo della Marca nell'Europa del '400, International conference, September 7–10, 1994, ed. S. BRACCI (Padua 1997). A. GATTUCCI, "Frate Giacomo della Marca bibliofilo e un episodio librario del 1450," in: Miscellanea Augusto Campana, Mediaevalia e Umanistica, 44–45 (Padua, 1981), 313–353. M. SGATTONI, La vita di S. Giacomo della Marca per fra' Venanzio da Fabriano (Zara 1940). D. LASIĆ, De vita et operibus S. Iacobi de Marchia: studium et recensio quorundam textuum (Ancona 1974), includes text of "Miracula facta virtute sacri nominis Jesu." A. GHINATO, "Apostolato religioso e sociale di S. Giacomo della Marca in Terni," Archivum Franciscanum historicum, 49 (Quaracchi-Florence 1956) 106–142, 352–390. S. CANDELA, S. Giacomo della Marca nel V centenario della morte (Naples 1976);

S. Giacomo della Marca e Santa Maria la Nova di Napoli (Naples 1972). D. CAPONE, Iconografia di s. Giacomo della Marca nell'ambiente napoletano lungo i secoli (Naples 1976); ed., S. Giacomo della Marca nel rotole remissoriale della sua beatificazione (Naples 1972).

[F. ETZKORN]

JAMES OF VITERBO, BL.

Italian Augustinian theologian, known by the scholastic titles of Doctor gratiosus, Doctor inventivus, and Doctor speculativus; b. Viterbo, c. 1255; d. Naples, 1308. A member of the Capocci family, he joined the Hermits of St. Augustine when he was very young (c. 1270), and he acquired the elements of learning at the order's house in Viterbo. From 1275 to 1282 he studied philosophy and theology in Paris. After a few years in Italy, where he had various administrative responsibilities, he was again sent to Paris, this time to enroll in the university and to succeed GILES OF ROME, the order's first master in theology. In May 1288 James had the title of bachelor. In April 1293 he became a master and succeeded Giles as regent master from 1293 to 1300. During his first years of teaching he held quodlibetal discussions and many quaestiones disputatae, notably 32 De praedicamentis in divinis; seven De verbo; 50 De Spiritu Sancto; De animatione caelorum; and De angelorum compositione. Directed by the general chapter of Siena in 1295 to devote himself especially to the study of Sacred Scripture, he composed commentaries on Matthew, Luke, and Paul that are now lost. Returning to Italy as definitor to the general chapter of Naples in 1300, he was put in charge of the studium generale founded in that city. Between March and September 1302, he composed and dedicated to the pope the earliest known treatise on the Church, De regimine Christiano. On Sept. 3, 1302, BONIFACE VIII created him bishop of Benevento; and on Dec. 12, 1303, he appointed him archbishop of Naples. At the height of the struggle between Boniface VIII and PHILIP IV, King of France, James strongly defended the rights of the Holy See, keeping always on a theological level. As archbishop he was actively engaged in the reconstruction of his cathedral. He was beatified on June 4, 1914.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII siècle (Paris 1933–34) 2:309–312. D. GUTIÉRREZ, "De B. Jacobi Viterbiensis vita, operibus et doctrina theologica," Analecta Augustiniana (Rome 1939). P. GLORIEUX, La Littérature quodlibétique (Kain 1925) 1:214–217. T. OSBORNE, "James of Viterbo's Rejection of Giles of Rome's Arguments for the Natural Love of God over Self," Augustiniana 49 (1999) 235–249. M. GOSSIAUX, "James of Viterbo on the Relationship between Essence and Existence," Augustiniana 49 (1999) 73–107. E. YPMA, ed. "Jac. De Viterbo, Quaestiones de divinis praedicamentis.” Augustiniana 46 (1996) 339–369, 48 (1998) 131–163, 49 (1999) 323–366.

[P. GLORIEUX]

JAMES OF VORAGINE, BL.

Dominican archbishop, chronicler; b. Varazze, Italy, c. 1230; d. Genoa, July 13–14, 1298. After joining the DOMINICANS in 1244, he completed all ranks of the ratio studiorum by 1264. As provincial of Lombardy (1267–77, 1281–86) he traveled extensively in Italy and bordering countries to attend the annual provincial chapters and the triennial general chapters. Named archbishop of Genoa by NICHOLAS IV, he governed that see from 1292 until his death, devoted to pastoral care and clerical reform, to his writings, and to the restoration of peace between the GUELFs and Ghibellines.

The Legenda aurea [Legenda sanctorum, ed. T. Graesse (Dresden, Leipzig 1846); tr. G. Ryan and H. Ripperger (New York 1941)], because of its wide circulation during the later Middle Ages, is James’s best-known work. Although not a critical hagiographical piece, it was a stimulus for religious devotion in an age desirous of miracles. Its chief source is probably the Liber epilogorum in gesta sanctorum of BARTHOLOMEW OF TRENT [Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 65 (1957) 376–377], the oldest manuscript in Einsiedeln (1288), first printed in 1470. In his Chronicon Januense [ed. G. Monleone, Jacopo da Varagine e la sua cronaca di Genova (Rome 1941) 2:404–405], James lists as his own the following additional works: Sermones de omnibus sanctis, Sermones de omnibus evangelii quae in singulis feriis in Quadragesima leguntur, Sermones de omnibus evangelii dominicalibus, the Mariale, and the Chronica. Varying in importance are 11 other works that may be considered authentic.

His cult in Varazze and throughout Liguria, uninterrupted since the time of his death, was confirmed by PIUS VII in 1816.

Feast: July 13.

Bibliography: JAMES OF VORAGINE, Tractatus de libris a beato Augustino episcopo editis, ed. M. J. A. MCCORMICK (Washington 1964); Die altokzitanische Version B der “Legenda aurea,” ed. M. TAUSEND (Tübingen 1995). G. FARRIS, ed., Significati spirituali nei “Sermones” di Jacopo da Varazze (Savona 1996, rev. 1998). J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23) 1.1:454–459. G. AIRALDI, Jacopo da Varagine: tra santi e mercanti (Milan 1988). V. PELAZZA, Vita del beato Giacomo da Varazze (Genoa 1867). M. WARESQUIEL, Le Bienheureux Jacques de Voragine (Paris 1902). I. PASOTTI, Il beato Giacomo da Varazze (Cogoleto 1974). E. C. RICHARDSON, Materials for a Life of Jacopo da Varagine (New York 1935), lacks bibliog. J. BAUDOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 8.1:309–313. P. LORENZIN, Mariologia Iacobi a Varagine, O.P. (Rome 1951). P. MALLONE, Predicatori e frescanti: Jacopo da Varagine e la pitturaligurre-piemontese del Quattrocento (n.s. 1999), iconography.

[M. J. A. MCCORMICK]

JAMES SALOMONIUS, BL.

Dominican, known also as James of Venice; b. Venice, Italy, 1231; d. there May 31, 1314. His parents were Adam and Marchinina of the patrician Salomonius family. After his father’s death and his mother’s profession as a Cistercian nun, he was reared by his grandmother. At 17 he joined the DOMINICANS in the priory of SS. John and Paul, Venice, after distributing his patrimony to the poor. As his reputation for holiness grew, people became importunate, and at 21 he was sent to Forlì, but even there a grille had to be erected around his Mass-altar to restrain the devout. Except for periods when he was subprior at Faenza, San Severino, and Ravenna, he remained at Forlì until his death at 83 from a heart attack while in choir. A recollected and prayerful religious of a happy disposition, admired and respected by his brethren and by laymen alike, he showed a solicitous care for the poor, which won for him the title of “father of the poor.” He inspired men by his words and is said to have worked miracles. His cult, tacitly approved by JOHN XXII, was formally approved by CLEMENT VII, June 26, 1526; the observance of his feast was extended to the whole Dominican Order by GREGORY XI, 1622.

Feast: May 31 or June 5.

Bibliography: J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 1:763. Acta Sanctorum May 7:450–456. Année Dominicaine, May 2 (Lyons 1891) 815–824. Analecta Bollandiana 12:367–370. Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 10 (1940) 109. C. DESMOND, Blessed James Salomoni; Patron of Cancer Patients, Apostle of the Afflicted (Boston 1971).

[B. CAVANAUGH]

JAMET, PIERRE-FRANÇOIS, BL.

Priest, b. Sept. 13, 1762, Fresnes, France; d. Jan. 12, 1845, Caen, France. Following Jamet’s ordination (1787), he was assigned as chaplain to the Sisters of the Good Savior. He was forced into hiding in order to continue his ministry after refusing to take the oath of allegiance to civil authorities that was demanded by the revolutionaries. During this period, he wrote a sign-language dictionary for the deaf-mutes under his care. After the French Revolution, Jamet restored and expanded the Good Saviors, continued to devote himself to the care of the mentally and physically disabled, and served as rector of Caen University (1822–30). He was beatified by John Paul II, May 10, 1987. Patron of the deaf.

Leoš Janáček. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Feast: May 7.

Bibliography: G. A. SIMON, Une belle figure de prêtre et d'homme d'oeuvres a la fin du XVIIIe et au commencement du XIXe siecle. L'abbé Pierre-Francois Jamet, second fondateur de l'Institut du Bon-Sauveur, recteur de l'Academie de Caen (Caen 1935). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1987): 690. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, 21 (1987): 18–19.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JANÁČEK, LEOŠ

Composer, teacher, folk-music scholar; b. Hukvaldy, Moravia, Czechoslovakia, July 3, 1854; d. Moravská Ostravá, Aug. 12, 1928. His early education was with the Augustinian Friars of Old Brno Monastery, where he studied with Pavel Křížkovský whom he later succeeded as choirmaster. Despite extreme poverty, he studied further in Prague, Leipzig, and Vienna. After a brief period on the Teachers' Training Institute faculty in Brno, he founded the Brno Organ School in 1881 and taught there until its nationalization in 1920; thereafter he taught a master class at the state conservatory in Prague. He also conducted the Czech Philharmonic (1881–88). Janáček's music is nationalistic and individual, based upon old Slavonic modes and the speech rhythms of the Moravian peasant. His Glagolitic Mass (1926) for solos, mixed choir, and organ was written "to portray faith in the certainty of the nation . . . on the basis of moral strength which takes God for witness." Other important works include the operas Jenufa, Kát'a Kabanová, and The Makropulos Secret; a Concertino for piano and chamber orchestra; the song cycle The Diary of One Who Vanished; a Sinfonietta; the rhapsody Taras Bulba for orchestra; and many choral writings and folk-music transcriptions.

Bibliography: Leoš Janáček: Letters and Reminiscences, ed. S. BOHUMÍR, tr. G. THOMPSON (Prague 1955). M. BROD, Leoš Janáček: Leben und Werk (rev. and enl. Vienna 1956). H. HOLLANDER, Leoš Janáček: His Life and Work, tr. P. HAMBURGER (New York 1963). N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (5th ed. New York 1958) 773–774. Z. BLAZEK, "Polyphonie und Rhythmik in Janáček's Musiktheorie," Sborník Prací Filosofické Fakulty Brněnské University 4 (1969) 107–116. M. BECKERMAN, Janáček as Theorist (Hillsboro 1994). S. B. DORSEY, "Janáček's Cunning Little Vixen," Opera Journal 29/4 (1996) 28–41. L. JANÁČEK, Intimate Letters: Leoš Janáček to Kamila Stösslová, ed. and tr. J. TYRRELL (Boston 1994); Janáček's Uncollected Essays on Music, ed. and tr. M. ZEMANOVÁ (London 1989). G. MARTIN, "There's More to Janáček than Jenufa and The Makropulos Case," World of Opera 1/2 (1978) 1–18. F. PULCINI, Janáček: vita, opere, scritti (Florence 1993). B. STEDRON, "Precursors of Janáček's Opera Její pastorkyňa (Jenufa)," Sborník Prací Filosofické Fakulty Brněnské University 3 (1968) 43–74. J. VYSLOUZIL, "Leoš Janáček und Wien," Studien zur Musikwissenschaft 41 (1992) 257–285.

[H. STEVENS]

JANEQUIN, CLÉMENT

Renaissance composer who developed the polyphonic chanson; b. Châtellerault, France, c. 1480; d. Paris, c. 1560. During his productive career he lived in or near Bordeaux to c. 1531; Angers, to c. 1548; and Paris, from 1549; and at various times he held posts as curé, canon, and chaplain at Angers cathedral and the chapel of Francis of Guise. He also attended universities at Angers and Paris as an adult. He was a singer and choral director at Angers cathedral c. 1534, honorary singer to Francis I, 1531, and singer and official composer to Henry II from 1555. His musical works include two Masses, one motet, one motet-book (lost), one Italian madrigal, French psalms, spiritual songs, and some 286 surviving chansons of immense popularity (several quoted in fricassées). Janequin is best known for his programmatic chansons with their lively syllabic declamation and onomatopoeia, but he excelled also in more lyrical types and occasionally experimented with chromaticism.

Bibliography: F. LESURE and P. ROUDIÉ, “La Jeunesse bordelaise de Clément Janequin,” Revue de musicologie 49 (Paris 1963) 172–183. F. LESURE, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 6:1695–1701. J. LEVRON, Clément Janequin (Grenoble 1948). D. HEARTZ, “Les Goûts réunis . . .,” Chanson and Madrigal, 1480–1530, ed. J. HAAR (Cambridge, Mass. 1964) 88–138. Histoire de la musique, ed. ROLAND-MANUEL, v.1 (Paris 1960–63). G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). A complete edition of the chansons of Janequin is being prepared by T. MERRITT and F. LESURE. H. BROWN, “Clément Janequin” New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, 9, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 491–495. J.-P. OUVRARD, “Du narratif dans la polyphonie au 16th siècle, Martin menoît son pourceau au marché: Clément Marot, Clément Janequin, Claudin de Sermisy,” Analyse Musicale 9 (1987), 11–16. D. M. RANDEL, ed., Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music 416 (Cambridge 1996). N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker’s Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, 8th ed. (New York 1992) 842–843.

[I. CAZEAUX]

JANSEN, CORNELIUS (THE ELDER)

Bishop and exegete; b. Hulst, Flanders, 1510; d. Ghent, April 11, 1576. After his studies at Ghent and Louvain (S.T.L. 1534), he taught Sacred Scripture at the Premonstratensian Abbey of Tongerlo until 1542. After some pastoral activity, he was appointed dean of the school of theology at Louvain (1560). In 1563 he attended the last sessions of the Council of Trent as university delegate of PHILIP II, King of Spain. He became bishop of Ghent (1568) at the command of Pope ST. PIUS V and carried out the Tridentine decrees with the greatest exactness. His commentaries on the Scriptures, in which he insisted on the primacy of the literal over the so-called mystical sense, made him one of the most distinguished Catholic exegetes of the 16th century. Most valuable were his works on the Gospels, the Concordia evangelica (1549) and the Commentarius in concordiam et totam historiam evangelicam (1572). Among his other works were Commentarius in Proverbia Solomonis (1567), Commentarius in Ecclesiasticum (1569), Commetarius in omnes Psalmos Davidicos (1569), and Annotationes in librum Sapientia (1577). All were published at Louvain.

Bibliography: L. WILLAERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:869. P. SCHLAGER, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN, 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 8:284.

[J. J. MAHONEY]

JANSEN, CORNELIUS OTTO (JANSENIUS)

Flemish theologian noted for having given rise to the Jansenist controversies; b. at Accoi, near Leerdam, in southern Holland, Nov. 3, 1585; d. at Ypres, May 6, 1638. He belonged to a poor but solidly Catholic family; with the assistance of various protectors, it was possible for him to pursue his studies at Culenbourg, Utrecht, and the University of Louvain, where he was an outstanding student. After receiving his bachelor of theology degree in 1609, he went to Paris, for reasons of health, to continue his studies. There he met Jean DUVERGIER DE HAURANNE (1581–1643), future Abbot of Saint-Cyran, who was also a former student at Louvain. They formed a very close friendship and lived together almost continuously either in Paris or more often on the Duvergier estate at Camps-de-Prats near Bayonne. There they read in common the extensive works of the Fathers of the Church and the schoolmen, but without special attention to the question of grace. In the meantime, while staying at Pays-Bas, Jansen was ordained on Sept. 20, 1614. He received his doctorate in theology in October of 1617 and shortly afterward was named director of the Sainte-Pulchérie Seminary at Louvain and professor of exegesis at the university. There around 1619, in an atmosphere still strongly imbued with the ideas of BAIUS, he began to become interested in the problems of grace. He soon discovered the importance of St. Augustine’s ideas, decided to devote himself to their defense, and toward the end of 1621 found a strong ally in the person of Saint-Cyran. He became associated also with the Franciscan Florent Conry (Conrius), who held views similar to his own. He then decided to undertake the writing of an enormous work in which he would present the ideas of St. Augustine on grace in a systematic and continuous synthesis. After a meeting with Saint-Cyran at Péronne on May 10, 1623, he outlined the project and began to collate the documentation. His university duties, however, interrupted this work. In July of 1624 he went to Spain as a deputy for his colleagues to defend the privileges of the University of Louvain against the Jesuits, who wished to have the right of teaching those working for academic degrees. Jansen was successful at the court of Madrid. He also succeeded in winning the support of the universities of Alcalá and Salamanca. On his return to Louvain in May of 1625, he received warm congratulations from his colleagues and then proceeded to Paris to stay with Saint-Cyran until April of 1626. In May new complications in the affairs of the university obliged him to return to Madrid, where he took advantage of the occasion to circulate again among the Spanish universities and organize the resistance against what he considered the encroachments of the Jesuits. He returned to Louvain in April of 1627. In October of 1628, on the occasion of the reform of the Benedictines of Afflighem, he openly but prudently manifested his Augustinianism in delivering his famous Discours de la réformation de l'homme intérieur. In 1630 he was appointed to the regius chair of Sacred Scripture. In the 145 lessons he gave annually, he commented on the Pentateuch, Proverbs, some other passages from the Old Testament, and on the Gospels. His commentaries, which were published after his death, show a profound concern for literal exegesis, a relative discretion in the use of allegory, and at the same time a very extensive knowledge of patristics. On controversial questions, especially on those concerning grace, he was extremely prudent. In 1635 he distinguished himself in his resistance to the invasion of Louvain by French troops. He subsequently exposed to ridicule the politics of Cardinal Richelieu and his alliances with the Protestants by publishing his Mars gallicus, a heavy and virulent pamphlet that had considerable success and earned him the hatred of the cardinal-statesman. Beginning in 1630, he engaged in polemics against the Protestants and published his Alexipharmacum against the Protestant ministers of Bois-le-Duc. In August of 1635 he was named rector of the University of Louvain, a post in which he proved to be extremely active, particularly in establishing the library and the archives. However, his personal affairs, as well as those of his office, necessitated long sojourns in Brussels. In October of 1635 he was appointed to the See of Ypres, and he was consecrated at Brussels on Oct. 28, 1636. He was a very zealous bishop and a competent administrator, succeeding even in maintaining good relations with the Jesuits despite his previous hostility. Amidst these duties he did not forget his great work, which he had begun to write toward the end of 1627 and which he entitled simply AUGUSTINUS to emphasize his fidelity to the Doctor of Grace. Despite several interruptions, the work was sufficiently advanced at the beginning of Jansen's episcopate for him to think of having it printed under his supervision in his own palace. For some time already he had foreseen the controversies that it would engender, and he had sought supporters especially among the French and Belgian Oratorians and the Dominicans. Aided by his chaplain, Reginald Lamée, he terminated the retouching of the text in April of 1638. A few days later, a victim of the plague, he died quietly, leaving the remembrance of a pious and austere priest deeply attached to the Church, an indefatigable worker with a penetrating intelligence and a tenacious and somewhat cold character, but endowed with a highly professional sense of duty.

Cornelius (the Elder) Jansen, engraving from “Illustrium Galliae Belgicae.”

Cornelius Otto Jansen (Jansenius). (Archive Photos)

See Also: JANSENISM.

Bibliography: J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:319–330. L. WILLAERT, Lex- ikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:869–870. J. ORCIBAL, Correspondance de Jansénius, v. 1 of Les Origines du jansénisme (Paris 1947); Jansénius (Paris 1989).

[L. J. COGNET]

JANSENISM

A religious movement, named after Cornelius JANSEN, bishop of Ypres (1585–1638) which began in Spanish Flanders and in France as a reaction to MOLINISM. In their struggle to assert and defend their positions, its members exerted a deep influence over church, society, and politics until the end of the 18th century. The generic term suggests an ideological homogeneity that never existed. The movement developed and attempted to impose an extreme Augustinian conception of man's relationship with God; it attacked and was resisted by a more humanistic school fostered by the Society of Jesus, which continued the optimism of the Renaissance. The opposition between the two visions became a war between two parties, Jansenism and "anti-Jansenism," waged not only theologically, but also politically. In this dramatic process the features of a Jansenist mentality developed. Its characteristics and influence were constantly modeled and remodeled by its conflictual history.

History

Origins. Cornelius Jansen's AUGUSTINUS (published 1640), reflected a desire by Louvain University professors to counter Molinist theology with a decisive exposition of the teaching of Saint AUGUSTINE, the "Doctor of Grace," on matters that had not been resolved by the Church Magisterium. Though some of its positions could appear close to those of another Augustinian from Louvain, Michel de Bai (BAIUS), who had been censured in 1567 by Pius V, it soon was acknowledged as the most representative work of positive theology on the matter of grace, and for that reason its publication signaled the beginning of anti-Jansenist offensive.

In France. Reprinted in Paris (1641) and Rouen (1643), the work was well received in French religious circles for its strict Augustinianism and its appeal to patristic authority alone. A friend of Jansen, Jean DUVERGIER DE HAURANNE, abbot of Saint-Cyran, was instrumental in influencing post-Tridentine renewal with his insistence upon the model of the early Church. Under his spiritual direction, the Abbey of PORT-ROYAL, reformed by Angélique Arnauld, had become both a workshop and a showcase of this enterprise, attracting influential members of the nobility and the bourgeoisie; later a group of laymen, the solitaires, lived next to the nuns. In his defense of the rights of bishops to control religious communities (Petrus Aurelius) Saint-Cyran antagonized regulars; his attacks on moral laxism displeased members of the secular clergy as well, including Cardinal Richelieu. This religious opposition became political with the Parti dévot's resistance to Richelieu's alliance with Protestant countries.

Tower of Jansenius, Louvain, Belgium.

First condemnations. Augustinus was opposed in Louvain by members of the Society of Jesus, who had their students attack it in theological defenses, but both the book and Jesuit theses were condemned by the Holy Office (1641) for renewing controversies on GRACE (de auxiliis), twice forbidden by popes. Dated 1642, but only published in 1643, the bull In Eminentissimi developed this condemnation, albeit in general terms. As this decision could be interpreted as a Roman rebuttal of Augustinian theology, the University of Louvain sent a deputation to inquire about its precise meaning; it was given reassurance to the contrary by the pope himself.

In France, where since 1638 Saint-Cyran had been imprisoned upon Richelieu's orders, Augustinus was attacked by Isaac HABERT, the official theologian of the diocese, in three sermons preached at Notre Dame of Paris (1642–1643). He was acting on the Cardinal Richelieu’s command. Antoine ARNAULD, a disciple of Saint-Cyran, replied in 1644 with a defense of Jansenius, a polemical work, as well as solid evidence of historical scholarship. He also expanded the controversy on more practical planes by attacking the Jesuits on their laxism concerning the reception of the Eucharist (Fréquente communion, 1642) and moral theology (Théologie morale des Jésuites, 1643). At that time the Port-Royal group was perceived to be supporters of the Fronde, the upheaval against monarchical absolutism. To weaken them, Richelieu’s successor, Cardinal Mazarin, supported by the queen regent, Ann of Austria, wanted a stronger papal condemnation. The occasion was seized when students of the Faculty of Theology of Paris defended as orthodox some of the very same theses that Jesuit students had earlier denounced as Calvinist. The Syndic, or moderator of the Faculty, requested a formal condemnation of these seven “propositions” (July 1649), but he was unsuccessful, as was an attempt to obtain a condemnation from the General Assembly of the French Clergy (1650). However, Habert, now bishop of Vabres, was as a member of this assembly able to collect 85 episcopal signatures to a letter asking for papal intervention on the first “Five propositions” of the Sorbonne. As this referral to the Holy See intended to involve the Church’s highest authority in the dispute, both French Jansenists and Anti-Jansenists sent agents to defend their positions. The bull CUM OCCASIONE (May 31, 1653, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1962] 2001–2007) condemned the five propositions, but it was not sufficient to put an end to the controversy for it did not explicitly denote their origin and only disapproved of Jansenius’s work in general.

Mother Catherine Agnès Arnauld (Mother Agnès de Saint-Paul) and Sister Catherine of St. Susan (daughter of the artist), votive painting by Philippe de Champaigne, 1662. The family Arnauld was instrumental in the creation of the Jansenist Party of 17th-century France.

Conflicts. Against an anti-Jansenist claim that in censuring the five propositions the pope had condemned Jansenius's synthesis and even disapproved of Augustinian theology, A. Arnauld disputed the presence of the propositions in Augustinus: only the first one could be found verbatim and in a context that supported its orthodoxy. Following a classical theological distinction, he asserted his obedience to the droit (the Calvinist doctrine the pope intended to condemn) and his rejection of the fait (the presence in the book of the said propositions). In so doing he manifested a spirit of resistance and division that countered the Church's desire to settle the matter once and for all. The French bishops added to the papal condemnation an oath or formulary that linked explicitly the five propositions and Augustinus. This was Mazarin's way of obtaining Rome's goodwill and fighting those he considered to be the supporters of his enemy the frondeur Cardinal de Retz. Arnauld's appeal to public opinion in defending his interpretation of Cum Occasione caused the Faculty of Theology to censure (January 1656) and expel him with a significant number of fellow theologians. Another familiar of Port-Royal, Blaise PASCAL, was more successful in his Provincial Letters (1656–1657), which vindicated Arnauld's position and attacked laxist morality.

The escalation of pronouncements that followed showed that in the mind of the new pope matters of ecclesiastical obedience were as primordial as questions of orthodoxy. In AD SANCTAM BEATI PETRI SEDEM (October 1656, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2010–2012, sometimes indicated as Ad Sacram), Alexander VII intended to clarify the matter by specifying the presence of the propositions in the book and his predecessors's intention to condemn them "in the sense of Jansenius." He later followed the French bishops' oath requirement by prescribing his own formulary, in REGIMINIS APOSTOLICI (February 1665, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2020).

Regiminis Apostolici added a level of complications to the already intricate question of Jansenism. In the pope's words, the Church had the ability to rule on a "fact," both the material presence of the propositions and their meaning as intended by the author. This claim bore on another intense debate taking place in France at the time, on the relationship between the spiritual and secular powers. In this instance, recourse to the Roman pontiff not only backed Ultramontanism in its assertion of the supremacy of the pope, it also demanded an acceptance of his infallibility that extended to "dogmatic facts," such as the presence of the propositions in Augustinus. The assertion at the Sorbonne of such theories (1663) started a wave of Gallicanism that had little to do with the writings of Jansenius. It emboldened a resistance to the formulary that was endorsed by several pro-Jansenist bishops and prompted a settlement of the vexing formulary issue, by the agreement of a clause of conscience that allowed "respectful silence," that is private dissent on the fact. This "Peace of the Church" was authorized by Clement IX (Jan. 14, 1669).

By that time the movement had acquired its distinctive features, above all its individualism. In their insistence on defending what they considered to be the objective truth, most of the French Augustinians separated themselves from their more moderate associates in the Catholic Renewal; they also incurred Roman suspicion for their disobedience and government resentment for their political maneuvering, which at times threatened the unity of the kingdom. In their fight against laxist morality, they received the support of secular clergy but the success of their appeal to public opinion (Pascal's Provincial Letters) was a double-edged sword since it confirmed the existence of a "Jansenist party." In the same manner, this crusade, though moderately endorsed by Rome, was perceived there as dangerous because of its fierce opposition to religious orders and its occasional association with the secular power of the Parlements.

Truce. The "Peace of the Church" was a temporary but momentous respite. It allowed the Port-Royal circle to extend its influence through publishing, especially in biblical, patristic, liturgical, and historical studies; in a move to assert their orthodoxy, they also took an important part in the controversy with Protestants (Perpétuité de la foi, 1672). The campaign against laxism was carried on, receiving noticeable Roman support in 1679 (Condemnation of 65 propositions, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2101–2167) and in 1690 (Condemnation of "philosophical sin," H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2291); it expanded to Jesuit missionary methods, a prelude to the Chinese Rites controversy. The adversaries of the Jansenists were not idle in their efforts to counter and disparage them. Louis XIV was alerted to their spirit of independence by their lack of support in his conflict with Innocent XI (1675). By 1679, only the nuns were allowed to remain at Port-Royal. Arnauld chose to go into exile; in 1685 his disciple P. QUESNEL joined him in Brussels—a perilous choice, for in that city since 1678 a "secret congregation against Jansenism" had been busy preparing a new offensive. They secured Roman censure of an important number of rigorist propositions (1690, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2301–2332). They also initiated attacks against Quesnel's Réflexions morales sur le Nouveau Testament.

The Crisis of Unigenitus. Despite papal support for the "politics of silence," reiterated by Innocent XII in a brief to the Belgian bishops (1694), the conflict was bound to ignite. It was stirred up by the publication (1702) of a Cas of conscience, submitted to the Faculty of Theology of Paris. Forty doctors had approved a text that not only supported “respectful silence” on the “fact” but also exposed Jansenist positions on religious practice: Confession, Communion, Bible in the vernacular, restrained Marian devotion. The arrest of Quesnel in May of 1703 gave ample evidence of the activity, even in Rome, of a Jansenist network, a blatant breach of the “Peace of the Church.” At Louis XIV’s insistence, Clement XI promulgated an apostolic constitution, Vineam Domini (1705, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2390), which contented itself with renewing former condemnations without taking into account the transformation of the movement. In its publication in France, the bull was accompanied by an affirmation of episcopal authority to resolve dogmatic issues in conjunction with the pope, an action that signaled an alliance between Jansenist doctrine and Gallican ecclesiology. Another apostolic constitution, the bull UNIGENITUS (1713, D.S. 2400–2502), also requested by the French king, aimed at a comprehensive condemnation of Jansenism. It censured with general qualifications 101 excerpts from Quesnel’s Réflexions morales. A minority of French bishops, headed by Cardinal de NOAILLES, objected to this approach and asked for a revision of the document before its official publication in the kingdom. Their resistance infuriated the old king, who practically forsook his Gallican principles in order to squelch it, but he died a few days before the national council that was to convict them (1715). Political necessity forced his nephew, the Regent Philip of Orléans, to secure support of these very opponents. Emboldened by this situation, some extremists decided to appeal to a future general council against Unigenitus (1717), whereas the more moderate worked unsuccessfully on an official interpretation that would make it acceptable. In reaction, a new papal bull, Pastoralis Officii (1718), forbade any “explanation” of Unigenitus and declared the appellants excluded from his communion.

Despite the limited areas of resistance and the low numbers of opponents, Unigenitus generated a crisis that was to have ripple effects over the evolution of the post-Tridentine Church. The ill-fated papal constitution became exemplary of a type of Catholicism that was rejected for both its authoritarianism and its doctrinal deficiencies. This rejection also took political tones, due to the involvement of the secular power in the conflict.

The Politics of Jansenism. When the impossibility of a resolution became evident, the French ministry under Cardinal Fleury took drastic steps: exile, imprisonment of the major opponents, even the impeachment of Bishop Soanen by the Provincial Synod of Embrun (1727). In 1730 Unigenitus was registered as the law of the land. In 1749, the archbishop of Paris, Christophe de Beaumont, decided to deny the sacraments (and therefore Christian burial) to those who did not assent to the bull. These measures contributed to a weakening and dispersion of the Jansenists. An important group decided to yield, in order to maintain their original goal of Christian excellence. Between Jansenists and anti-Jansenists, they constituted an influential “Third Party.” Many continued in their opposition: they appealed to public opinion and sought support from the lawyers of the Parlements. Inevitably, some became more extreme: the miracles of Saint-Médard cemetery and the Convulsionaries (1730–1760) manifested the spiritual confusion of many, whereas the biblical “figuratism” of Duguet and d’Ettemare expressed the complete disillusion of a few.

Theological and political resistance was not entirely unsuccessful. In 1748, Benedict XIV reaffirmed the “liberty of schools” between Molinism, THOMISM, and AUGUSTINIANISM. In 1754, after a serious conflict with the Parlements, Louis XV forbade any public controversy on Unigenitus, later obtaining papal support of that position (Ex omnibus christiani orbis regionibus 1756). The expulsion of the Jesuits from France (1761–64), and the suppression of the Society of Jesuits in 1773, were perceived as a victory of the Jansenists. It certainly manifested the influence of the movement, diffused through innumerable pamphlets, books, and the clandestine newsletter, the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques (1728–1803), to the major posts of “Catholic Enlightenment.”

European Jansenism. Schism was not avoided in the Netherlands, where local tensions with Rome resulted in the election, and consecration by a French Jansenist, of the first bishop of the Old Catholic Church (1723). About the same time, in Mediterranean and Middle European countries, many of the Jansenist themes appeared in various expressions of the “Catholic Enlightenment” that developed under the protection of the States. Though opposed to the Philosophes, they favored a critical renewal of Christianity based on the early church model. As they found most of their inspiration in the writings of the Port-Royal circle, they revived the entire movement by developing an international network dedicated to this internal reform. The decrees of the Synod of PISTOIA (1786) are representative of this perspective, condemned by Pius VI in AUCTOREM FIDEI (1794, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2600–2700).

Jansenism and Revolution. Transferring to the State the principles they advocated in the church, members of the Jansenist party were influential in the opposition to absolutism that prepared the way for the French Revolution. They were also involved in the first stages of the revolution, but they disagreed on the issue of the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY. Very few actually adhered to the Constitutional church, but as its leaders, especially Bishop Henri Grégoire, came to see themselves as the heirs of Port-Royal; they manifested in the early 19th century what can be seen as the last coherent form of Jansenism.

Jansenist Mentality

As a movement, Jansenism defies a compact definition because of a conflict-filled history that spans two centuries of major change in European society. A “Jansenist mentality” that unites the different forms of Jansenism might more easily be described. It is a combination of three elements: theological, social, and political.

Theological. The theological specificity of Jansenism has its origin with a rigid Augustinian interpretation of the relation between nature and grace. The five propositions condemned by Innocent X mark the limits of its orthodoxy. As a part of the French Catholic renewal, it soon took a practical expression: to the “humanistic conception” of Molinism was opposed a high ideal of personal holiness. Based on Scripture, sacraments, and a strict morality, a more personal and truthful piety was to improve society at large. The pastoral efforts of bishops and clergy associated with the movement show abundantly the importance of biblical rediscovery, and of liturgical participation supporting an authentic spirituality.

This “archaic Jansenism” flourished in the “frontiers of Catholicism,” possibly emulating Protestantism. Its development was thwarted by its sacramental and moral rigorism, but also by an association of “patristic fundamentalism” with a static ecclesiology, incapable of accepting the post-Tridentine structure of the Church. The difficulties it encountered created an irresolvable opposition with the Magisterium of the Church, accentuating a form of individualism inherent to any reform movement. Hence a notable drift towards Gallican Episcopatism, and later Richerist Presbyterianism.

Social. The participation of the nobility and lower classes in the movement was limited, but it appears that especially in times of crisis the Jansenist cause received the support of an “old-style middle class,” the “bourgeoisie de Robe.” This may have a practical explanation: they had the education and time to be engaged in theological reflection. This explanation has been combined with a sociological interpretation: some members of this bourgeoisie expressed in their involvement with Jansenism the difficulties they experienced as a class in exerting political influence. Some found motivations for a spiritual withdrawal, a complete “refusal of the world” (Jansénisme extramondain); others for a total resistance, religious and political (Jansénisme intramondain). This thesis has the merit of pointing to the social composition of the movement and its varying attitudes toward society. It does not offer a satisfactory interpretation of a centrist position more concerned with the religious reform of society, principally through education, social action, and political involvement. If Jansenist exaltation of the right of conscience represented values attractive to the bourgeois ideal in earlier times, Jansenist morality with its rejection of temporal achievement and its opposition to usury explains the disaffection of 18th-century bourgeoisie.

Political. The political ideal of Jansenius and of his disciples was that of a Catholic monarch supporting the interests of the Church. Their resolved attachment to this theory and criticism of the emerging modern State accounts for their alienation from public authorities, and the persecution they often had to endure. These difficulties stirred up a spirit of resistance that combined a “mentality of opposition” with a dynamic defense of their ideas. They looked for support in the higher circles of the State and the Church, established a network of influence, relentlessly attacked their adversaries, and constantly sought public support through pamphleteering. This activism enriched and nuanced their “political theology,” which followed the religious evolution of the movement, but because of their theological perception of the monarchy, they never envisioned in the State the democratic polity they advocated in the Church. Jansenism’s democratic influence on society is indirect and unintentional, the result of a resistance movement mentality and a participatory ecclesiology.

Jansenism cannot simply be reduced to a reactionary struggle over ideals of Church, State, and society. It was an authentic spiritual movement that exceedingly rationalized its experience and obstinately defended its conclusions. In doing so it limited the function and authority of the Church, a flaw that its enemies were keen to stress and use against it. Subsequent resistance amply supported the accusation, prompting condemnation of a notion of spiritual renewal and ecclesiastical reform that might have been condoned in a different context. Despite the diversity of the movement, one element kept it together: an elitist and intellectual conception of the relationship between God and man and a deep commitment to vindicate it. Paradoxically, it can therefore be said that by their conduct the Jansenists hindered the very process of renewal that they so tenaciously espoused.

Bibliography: E. APPOLIS, Entre Jansénistes et Zelanti: Le Tiers Parti catholique au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1960). C. A. BOLTON, Church Reform in 18th-Century Italy (The Synod of Pistoia, 1786)

(The Hague 1969). L. CEYSSSENS, "Les cinq propositions de Jansenius à Rome," Jansenistica minora XI; L. CEYSSSENS and J. A. G. TANS, Autour de l'Unigenitus (Louvain 1987). P. CHAUNU, "Jansénisme et frontières de catholicité (XVII<sup>e</sup> et XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècles) Revue historique 227 (1962) 115–138. R. M. GOLDEN ed., Church and Society under the Bourbon Kings (Lawrence 1982). L. KOLAKOWSKI, God Owes Us Nothing (Chicago 1995). E. KOVACS, ed., Katholische Aufklärung und Josephinismus (Vienna 1977). B. R. KREISER, Miracles, Convulsions and Ecclesiastical Politics in Early Eighteenth-Century Paris (Princeton, N.J. 1978); H. DE LUBAC, Augustinianism and Modern Theology (London 1969). C. L. MAIRE, "Port-Royal: The Jansenist Schism," in P. NORA, ed., Realms of Memory: The Construction of the French Past, v. 1 (New York 1996) 301–351. B. NEVEU, L'erreur et son juge. B. PLONGERON, "Recherches sur l'Aufklärung catholique en Europe occidentale (1770–1830)," Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine 16 (1969) 555–605. J. L. QUANTIN, Le Catholicisme classique et les Pères de l'Église (Paris 1999). M. ROSA, ed., Cattolicesimo e lumi nel settecento italiano (Rome 1981). A. SEDGWICK, Jansenism in Seventeenth-Century France (Charlottesville 1977). J. SAUGNIEUX, Le Jansénisme espagnol du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle: Ses composantes et ses sources (Oviedo 1975). P. STELLA, Studi sul Giansenismo (Bari 1972). R. TAVENEAU, Jansénisme et politique (Paris 1965). D. VAN KLEY, The Jansenists and the Expulsion of the Jesuits from France, 1757–1765 (New Haven, Conn. 1975); The Religious Origins of the French Revolution (New Haven–London 1996). F. E. WEAVER, "The Neo-Gallican Liturgies Revisited," Studia liturgica 16 (1986–87) 54–72.

[J. M. GRES-GAYER]

JANSENISTIC PIETY

Though the strong divergent personalities of the Jansenist movement somewhat prevent identifying a clear and homogeneous spirituality, there are enough theoretical and practical elements to define a Jansenist type of piety. It would be irrelevant to find it in AUGUSTINUS, a purely theological book, but the Augustinian vision of the relation between God and man that it presents is certainly a key to understanding Jansenist spirituality. It was inspired by an abhorrence of MOLINISM, that is, a perspective that allowed for some human participation in the process of salvation. For the Jansenists, it was essential to stress God's transcendence and omnipotence in order to establish with him a proper relationship based on love. They saw the discernment of God's will in one's life mainly as a prayerful process, checked and guided by spiritual direction. What is particular to the movement may be the importance given to a knowledge of God acquired through meditation on Scripture and liturgy, the ordinary ways through which God inspires and communicates with the faithful. Consonant is the notion of "vocation" shared with the French school of SPIRITUALITY at large. Jansenist followers believed that every individual is called by God to a particular state of life and given the grace to live in it. This is clear in the case of religious or priestly vocations but is also applied to secular conditions as well. In accord with the accent put on divine transcendence is the Jansenists' attraction to manifestations of the supernatural, in the form of signs and miracles.

The Jansenists have been decried for their rigorism in moral and sacramental life. Their moral rigorism was at times more pronounced, because of their opposition to Jesuit laxism, or due to the austerity of some, but it was not a distinct feature, being shared by the elite of the Catholic renewal since the times of Charles Borromeo. The sacramental practice of encouraging a delay of absolution and infrequent reception of the Eucharist, was likewise not simply limited to the PORT-ROYAL circle, but reflected a common conception of the sacraments as means of grace that had to be taken very seriously. By insisting on the necessity of preparation for—and cooperation in—the saving encounter with God, these authors, in continuity with the teaching of the early church, saw the sacraments as the "seal," the strengthening of a process of purification begun through prayer and mortification. This explains why the group was so keen on liturgical participation and reform, advocating the use of translations and revision of the ancient rituals (neo-Gallican liturgies). In their desire to maintain a Christocentric spirituality, many Jansenists were critical of extreme Marian devotions, and fought against the new devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. In this they showed themselves in total disagreement with the type of popular spirituality successfully developed by the Society of Jesus.

All these features classically presented as typical of "Jansenism" were more representative of an intellectual, abstract, and rather haughty conception that did not respond to the needs of post-Tridentine Catholicism. It has been noted that the Jansenists did not involve themselves in any missionary action, preferring to focus on the communication of their ideas and perspectives. This attitude is indicative of what may be the main characteristic (and flaw) of the movement: their defective conception of the church. This is amply demonstrated first with C. Jansenius himself, preparing his Augustinus against a Roman ban; it was continued by successive resistance to papal and episcopal condemnations, and many instances of impertinence. The penitential practice of the Jansenists—rejection of attrition (allowed by Trent), placing of satisfaction (penance) before absolution—also suggests a sacramental theology that minimizes the mediation of the church.

In theory the type of ecclesiology exposed by the French Jansenists and their disciples was of the Gallican form, but more of a Richerist type than the classical episcopalism of the 1682 Articles. They saw the Church more as a community of believers sharing the same sacraments than a hierarchical and social structure, stressing therefore the “mysterical aspect” against the jurisdictional. As a consequence they recognized more the role of the laity, offering men and women a more active participation in the life of the church. This fit well with the spirituality of “vocation,” mentioned above, and attracted a motivated elite. This defective ecclesiology, theoretical and above all practical, explains why from an early stage Rome saw the movement as a dangerous sect, disobedience being perceived as a sign of heterodoxy, and condemned it without nuances. The bull UNIGENITUS complicated the issues, as it seemed to condemn perfectly orthodox positions. Only AUCTOREM FIDEI would clarify the situation, though it created an image of “Jansenism” that was more abstract than real. The unfortunate result would be that many elements of Jansenist life and spirituality that were a part of the larger post-Tridentine renewal were suspected of Jansenism and too easily discarded.

Bibliography: R. A. KNOX, Enthusiasm (New York 1950; repr. 1961). E. DUBOIS, “Jansenism,” in C. JONES, G. WAINWRIGHT, and E. YARNOLD, eds., The Study of Spirituality (New York and Oxford 1986) 396–408. L. DUPRÉ, “Jansenism and Quietism,” in L. DUPRÉ and D. E. SALIERS, Christian Spirituality: Post Reformation and Modern (New York 1989) 121–142. M. DE CERTEAU, “De Saint-Cyran au Jansénisme: Conversion et Réforme,” Christus 10 (1963), 399–414. L. MEZZADRI, La Spiritualità cristiana nell’età moderna (Rome 1987) 176–193. J. ORCIBAL, Saint Cyran et le Jansénisme (Paris 1961). L. COGNET, “La direction de conscience a Port-Royal,” Vie spirituelle, Supplément 7 (1955) 289–305. “La dévotion mariale à Port-Royal,” in Maria: Études sur la Sainte Vierge, ed. H. DU MANOIR (Paris 1950) III, 119–151; “Les Jansénistes et le Sacré-Cœur,” Le Cœur, Études Carmélitaines (Paris 1950) 234–253. R. TAVENEAU, La vie quotidienne des Jansénistes aux XVIIe et XVIIIe siècle (Paris 1973). Jansénisme et réforme catholique (Paris 1992). L. J. WANG, “A Controversial Treatise: Baillet’s De la Dévotion à la Sainte Vierge,” Harvard Theological Review 51 (1958) 263–274. N. D. KURLAND, “Antoine Arnauld’s First Controversy: De la Fréquente Communion,” in The Dawn of Modern Studies, ed. K. A. STRAND, (1962) 239–251. F. E. WEAVER, “Jansenist Bishops and Liturgical–Social Reforms,” in R. M. GOLDEN, ed., Church, State, and Society under the Bourbon Kings of France (Lawrence, KS 1982); “Erudition, Spirituality, and Women: The Jansenist Contribution,” in Women in Reformation and Counter Reformation Europe, ed. S. MARSHALL (1989) 189–206. J. M. GRES-GAYER, “The Bull Unigenitus: A Fresh Look at the Issues,” Theological Studies, 49 (1988) 259–282; “L’idée d’Église des Jansénistes,” Port-Royal et les Protestants (Paris 1998) 35–56. J. L. QUANTIN, Le rigorisme (Paris 2001).

[J. M. GRES-GAYER]

JANSSEN, ARNOLD, BL.

Religious founder; b. Goch, in the Rhineland, Germany, November 5, 1837; d. Steyl, Netherlands, January 15, 1909. After passing a state examination to teach natural sciences in the secondary schools in Bonn (1859), he studied for the priesthood in Münster and was ordained (1861). For the next 12 years he taught science in a secondary school in Bocholt. From 1867 he was also diocesan director of the Apostleship of Prayer, which he promoted throughout Germany by publishing a periodical and distributing free leaflets. After relinquishing his teaching duties (1873), he devoted himself to propagating devotion to the Sacred Heart and interest in the missions. With four companions he opened a house to train German priests for foreign mission work. Because of the Kulturkampf the site selected for this house was in the Netherlands at Steyl, near the German border. Janssen’s original plan of a missionary society of priests whose members would not take religious vows crystallized into the Society of the Divine Word, a congregation of priests and lay brothers with simple vows. The brothers operated the presses in his large printing establishment at Steyl. During Janssen’s term as the first superior general, the institute grew rapidly and spread to the U.S. and to several other countries. In 1889 Janssen founded the Holy Spirit Missionary Sisters to educate girls in mission territories. He founded the cloistered Sisters Servants of the Holy Ghost of Perpetual Adoration, dedicated to perpetual adoration in order to aid by their prayers his missions and missionaries. The Roman decree introducing Janssen’s cause for beatification was issued in 1942. He was beatified on Oct. 19, 1975 by Paul VI.

Feast: Jan. 15.

Bibliography: Briefe in die Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika (Nettetal 1994); Briefe nach Neuguinea und Australien (Nettetal 1996); Briefe nach Südamerika (Nettetal 1989–1993); Mit dem Segen der Kirche: Briefe an Arnold Janssen (St. Augustin, Steyler Mission, 1975); P. Arnold Janssen und P. Josef Freinademetz: Briefwechsel 1904–1907: Korresponde[n]z zwischen zwei Seligen, ed. R. HARTWICH (St. Augustin 1978). J. ALT, Arnold Janssen: Lebensweg und Lebenswerk des Steyler Ordensgründers (Nettetal 1999). J. A. BAUER, Das Presseapostolat Arnold Janssens (Nettetal 1989). H. DRENKELFORT, Pater Arnold Janssen SVD (Sankt Augustin 1975). H. FISCHER, Arnold Janssen: Gründer des Steyler Missionswerkes (Steyl 1919), Eng. Life of Arnold Janssen, tr. F. M. LYNK (Techny, Ill. 1925); Vater Arnolds Getreuen (Steyl 1925), Eng. Father Arnold Janssen, a Modern Pioneer in Mission Work, tr. and abr. S. KASBAUER, Ein Mensch unter Gottes Meissel (2d ed. Steyl 1959). F. M. LYNK (London 1934); Tempel Gottes seid ihr! (Steyl 1932).

[V. J. FECHER]

JANSSENS, ALOYSIUS

Theologian; b. Zele, Belgium, 1887; d. Louvain, 1941. A member of the Congregation of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, better known as the Scheut Fathers, he studied at the Schola Maior of the Jesuits and at the University of Louvain. Though he greatly profited by being in this scientific environment, he was nonetheless basically a self-educated man. Unable to go to the foreign missions for reasons of health, he was named professor of dogmatic theology for his religious community. His desire to keep his missionary fathers in the current of a living dogmatic theology led to a collection of dogmatic and apologetic treatises in Flemish, and he personally edited 17 of the 28 volumes that make up the series. These works go beyond mere popularization; they combine pedagogical clarity with the results of the research in Biblical and positive theology before 1940. Janssen's own research on the Assumption is still useful. He brought to bear on speculative questions a sound judgment and power of penetration. One of his chief merits was that he created a theological vocabulary in Flemish, at his time practically nonexistent. His works on Anglicanism, particularly on Cardinal Newman, encouraged a broader Catholic ecumenism. He was one of the founding members of the first Mariological society begun in 1931 at Tongerlo, Belgium, which by 1963 had published 20 volumes of proceedings. He was for his country the promoter of a theological renewal at once serious and apostolic.

Bibliography: A. VAN HOVE, Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses (1941) 279–293. G. PHILIPS, Enciclopedia cattolica 7:565–566.

[G. PHILIPS]

JANSSENS, LOUIS

Professor of moral theology; b. July 23, 1908, Olen, Belgium; d. Leuven, Dec. 19, 2001. At the encouragement of the local parish priest, young Janssens left the Flemish village in which he was reared for Herentals, a Walloon village where he attended high school. After studying at the major seminary, Janssens was ordained a priest of the diocese of Mechelen on Feb. 11, 1934. Janssens completed the S.T.D. degree at the Catholic University of Leuven, and in 1939 he was awarded the degree of Magister in Sacra Theologia.

Janssens' earlier work was in the field of patrology. His doctoral thesis was devoted to CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA's understanding of divine sonship (grace). He had published articles on GREGORY OF NYSSA (1936, under the pen name O. Van den Bergen) and Cyril (1938). Janssens' magisterial thesis, "Personne et société: théories actuelles et essai doctrinal," marked a clear turning point in Janssens' career. It was inspired by his ordinary, Cardinal Van Roey, who wanted the young scholar to study and respond to the depersonalizing social theories of the 1930s. Janssens' teaching career began at Mechelen's Seminary of St. Joseph in 1939, but Janssens was almost immediately called upon to teach a course in social philosophy at Leuven. After lecturing at the university in the area of fundamental dogma, he turned to moral theology, the subject that would occupy his interest until his (mandatory) retirement in 1978.

Throughout his academic career, the human person was a focal point of his interest. For Janssens, the norm of morality is the human person in itself and its relationships (God, others, the world). His contemporary CHRISTIAN ANTHROPOLOGY focused on the intentionality, the interiority, the physicality, the uniqueness, and the historicity of the human person. These themes appear in Personalisme en democratisering (1957, 1965) and "Personalist Morals" [Louvain Studies (1970)]. For several years he lectured on conjugal morality, a topic to which he devoted a number of essays in local pastoral journals. The development of the birth control pill led him to publish a major article in the Ephemerides theologicae lovanienses (1963), in which he held that the use of the pill in conjugal relationships was licit insofar as its use basically respected the nature and structure of the conjugal act. Janssens' position was widely discussed and supported by theologians in the years preceding the issuance of Paul VI's HUMANAE VITAE (1968).

Ever the personalist, Janssens devoted much of his later publication to matters of fundamental moral theology. Chief among his interests was the matter of "ontic good and evil," i.e., pre-moral values and disvalues, and the importance of PROPORTIONALITY in determining the moral rightness of human conduct. Using Aquinas as a source and his own personalism as a frame of reference, Janssens proposed that it was the end that is primary in moral evaluation. Appropriate means are to be chosen with regard to their relationship to that end. Not content merely with theory, Janssens used these insights of fundamental moral theology to advance the discussion of such issues as artificial insemination and organ transplantation. His views received wide circulation. Although Janssens was not cited by name in John Paul II's VERITATIS SPLENDOR (1993), the papal encyclical appears to have taken issue with some of Janssens' theory. In "Teleology and Proportionality: Thoughts about the Encyclical Veritatis Splendor," (1995) Janssens offered his personal reflections on the papal text.

While most of Janssens' writings appeared in Dutch journals, he published a number of significant English-language articles in Louvain Studies. He wrote few books, but one of them, Liberté de conscience et liberté religieuse (1964) was an important component of the dialogue that led to Vatican Council II's Dignitatis humanae.

Bibliography: D. L. CHRISTIE, "Adequately Considered: An American Perspective on Louis Janssens' Personalist Morals,"

Louvain Theological and Pastoral Monographs 4 (Louvain and Grand Rapids 1990). L. JANSSENS, "Teleology and Proportionality: Thoughts about the Encyclical Veritatis Splendor," in The Splendor of Accuracy, ed. J. JANS and J. SELLING (Grand Rapids 1995). J. A. SELLING, ed., Personalist Morals (Leuven 1988).

[R. F. COLLINS]

JANSSOONE, FRÉDÉRIC CORNIL, BL.

Franciscan missionary; b. Nov. 19, 1838, Ghyvelde (near Dunkirk), Flanders, Belgium; d. Aug. 4, 1916, Montréal, Québec, Canada. Although Frédéric was the youngest of 13 children from a wealthy farm family, he had to quit school to help his mother after his father's death (c. 1848). He soon discovered that his love for others made him a great salesman—this talent later served him well as a preacher. After his mother's death in 1861, he discerned his vocation. He entered the Franciscan novitiate (June 1864), was ordained (Aug. 17, 1870), served as a military chaplain during the Franco-Prussian War (1870–71), and was custodian for a time at the Bordeaux monastery. In 1876 he was sent to the Holy Land, where he raised funds to maintain two ancient churches, built a new one at Bethlehem, and revived the custom of pilgrims praying the Stations of the Cross in the streets of Jerusalem. He traveled to Canada (1881–82) to collect alms for the Holy Land and returned there six years later (1888). The rest of his life was spent preaching, evangelizing, and establishing the Canadian province of the Franciscans from his base at the shrine of Our Lady of Cap-de-la-Madeleine. Janssoone also composed about 30 popular monographs, most of which are spiritual descriptions of the Holy Land and hagiography. His deep spirituality and ministerial zeal drew many through him to Christ. He was beatified by John Paul II, Sept. 25, 1988.

Feast: Aug. 5.

Bibliography: Works: Vie de saint François d' Assise (Montréal 1894); Vie de notre Seigneur Jésus-Christ, écrite avec les paroles mêmes des quatre évangélistes (Québec 1894); La bonne sainte Anne. Sa vie, ses miracles, ses sanctuaires (Montréal 1896); Saint Joseph. Sa vie, son culte (Québec 1902); Le ciel, séjour des élus (Montréal 1912). The Life and Spirituality of Good Father Frederic Janssoone in His Own Words, ed. R. LÉGARÉ, tr. R. BROWN (Quebec 1973). Literature: O. LAMONTAGNE, Un témoin de l'autre monde: le père Frédéric dans l'intimité (Trois-Rivières, Québec 1960). R. LÉGARÉ, An Apostle of Two Worlds, tr. R. BROWN (Chicago 1958), tr. of Un apôtre des deux mondes: le père Frédéric Janssoone (Montréal 1953); Un grand serviteur de la Terre Sainte, le père Frédéric Janssoone (Trois Rivières, Québec 1965); Le bon père Frédéric, with C. BAILLARGEON (Montreal 1988). H. LEMAY, Bibliographie et iconographie du Serviteur de Dieu le R. P. Frédéric Janssoone (Québec 1932). J.-F. MOTTE, Frédéric Janssoone de Ghyvelde: franciscain apôtre du Christ en trois continents (Paris 1988). T. F. MURPHY, Our Lady's Herald. A Short Account of the Life of Father Frederick Janssoone (Trois Rivières 1965). Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 32 (1940) 516ff.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JANUARIUS, ST.

Martyr of Benevento, well known because of the liquefaction of a phial of his blood in the Cathedral of Naples; Januarius (or Gennaro) is believed to have been martyred in the DIOCLETIAN persecution of 305. Nothing is known of his life although a legendary passio narrates that after being thrown to the bears (ad ursas) in the amphitheater of Pozzuoli, he was decapitated together with the deacons Sossus, Festus, and Proculus, and Desiderius the lector. Januarius is mentioned by GREGORY OF TOURS and by BEDE. His remains are said to have been brought to Naples by Bishop John and placed in the catacomb of Capodimonte. In 831, they were translated to Benevento; in 1154, to Montevirgine; and in 1497, returned to Naples. The passio was translated into Greek in the 10th or 11th century, thus entering the Synaxary of Constantinople.

A dark mass that half fills a hermetically sealed four-inch glass container, and is preserved in a double reliquary in the Naples cathedral as the blood of St. Januarius, liquefies 18 times during the year: (1) on the Saturday before the first Sunday in May and the eight following days; (2) on the feast of St. Januarius, and during the octave; and (3) on December 16. This phenomenon goes back to the 14th century when it was mentioned in the chronicle of an unknown Sicilian in 1389 (published by G. de Blasiis, Naples 1887), although tradition connects it with a certain Eusebia, who had allegedly collected the blood after the martyrdom and given the reliquary to the bishop of Naples on the Via Antoniana during the transfer of the body from Pozzuoli to the catacomb. The ceremony accompanying the liquefaction is performed by holding the reliquary close to the altar on which is located what is believed to be the martyr's head. While the people pray, often tumultuously, the priest turns the reliquary up and down in the full sight of the onlookers until the liquefaction takes place. He then announces, "The miracle has happened," and the Te Deum is chanted by the people and clergy.

Various thermal experiments as well as spectroscopic analysis have been applied to the contents of the reliquary; but the phenomenon eludes natural explanation. There are, however, similar miraculous claims made for the blood of SS. JOHN THE BAPTIST, STEPHEN the proto-martyr, Pantaleon, Patricia, NICHOLAS OF TOLENTINO, and ALOYSIUS GONZAGA—nearly all in the neighborhood of Naples.

St. Januarius in an attitude of prayer, a 4th-century fresco in the catacomb of St. Januarius, Naples.

St. Januarius is the patron of Naples, and a vast folklore is connected with his cult. The earliest representation of the saint exists in a catacomb on Capodimonte, where he is depicted praying between two dead persons, and clothed in tunic, pallium, and sandals, and with a nimbus, the Constantinian monogram, the Alpha and Omega, and an inscription. (See CHI-RHO.) Many churches were erected in his honor and decorated with a bust or pictures of the saint.

Feast: Sept. 19.

Bibliography: P. FRANCHI DE' CAVALIERI, "S. Gennaro vescovo e martire," Note agiografiche 3 (Studi e Testi 24; 1912). H. DELEHAYE, Les Origines du culte des martyrs (2d ed., Brussels 1933) 24–49. G. B. ALFANO and A. AMITRANO, Il miracolo di S. Gennario (Naples 1950) with bibliog. A. CASERTA, Storia e scienza di fronte al miracolo di s. Gennaro (2d ed. Naples 1972). V. PALIOTTI, San Gennaro: storia di un culto, di un mito, dell'anima di un popolo (Milan 1983). M. L. STRANIERO, Indagine su san Gennaro:

miracoli, fede, scienza (Milan 1991). ARCHDIOCESE OF NAPLES, San Gennaro: tra fede, arte e mito (Pozzuoli, Italy 1997).

[E. G. RYAN]

JAPAN, MARTYRS OF

This account of the martyrs of Japan is presented in five parts: (1) the reasons for the persecution of Christians, (2) the external course of the persecutions, (3) the spirit of martyrdom in the early Japanese Church, (4) individual martyrdoms (the 26 holy and the 205 blessed martyrs), and (5) the number of martyrs.

Reasons for the Persecution of Christians

The resistance to Christianity in Japan and the harassment of Christians that ended frequently in martyrdom is derived from the following principal causes.

Memorial to the 26 Holy Martyrs at the Church of San Filippo, Nagasaki, Japan. (©Ric Ergenbright/CORBIS)

Religious Opposition. The primary roots of the persecutions are found in religious opposition. Ignorance and erroneous interpretation of Christian doctrine, which had been discussed ever since the arrival of St. Francis XAVIER (Aug. 15, 1549), might well have occasioned distrust, since the notions of Christianity were so new in this world of quite different religious and cultural traditions. The Christian movement in Japan had, after some years, advanced rapidly, aided by an increased number of European missionaries, their native assistants, and Japanese lay apostles, including in the course of time several specially zealous and influential feudal lords. Over against this minority stood the powerful world of Japanese BUDDHISM, rooted for centuries in the traditions of the people and nurtured by a considerable social, literary, and artistic culture; Buddhism's countless shrines covered the entire country, and its intellectual centers were famous Temple Universities whose prelates were often scions of the noblest families. SHINTOISM also influenced the people, partly as it was permeated and absorbed by Buddhism. But with the forward thrust of the Christian idea, a more or less palpable decline of the Buddhist and Shintoist religions began in various regions. The withdrawal of prominent members and often of quite large groups of the temple communities involved a loss of prestige and financial weakening. It is no wonder, accordingly, that the success of Christian missionary work aroused resentment on the part of the Buddhists and Shintoists. Since the bonzes in many localities had a strong influence on the provincial lords of the feudal states, the city governors, and the fortress captains, disapproval, if not open hostility, was to be expected from the authorities. The greater the success of Christianity, the more easily could the opposition be kindled into actual persecution.

Missionary Methods. Not infrequently anti-Christian feeling was deepened by the methods of the missionaries. They made efforts to win the favor of the provincial lords and wherever possible to convert them. They had great success in 1563 when the feudal lord of Ōmura and several respected noblemen in central Japan joined the Church. Soon other lords followed their example. Convinced that a durable Christianity could be guaranteed only if the entire fief became Christian, the missionaries began from 1574 to pressure the convert feudal lords (when the lords did not decide on the same course of action as a result of their own zeal) to open the path to complete conversion; the principle invoked was that of cujus regio, ejus religio, a principle often employed in Europe and not unknown in Japan in the dealings of the various sects with one another. Often the action was limited to inducing the population to take catechetical instruction, with no compulsory baptism being practiced. In other cases, everyone was faced with the decision of becoming a Christian or emigrating from the fief. This pressure was extended to include even the Buddhist bonzes, many of whom accepted baptism. The temples were either converted into Christian churches or destroyed, and the statues of the Buddhist and Shintoist shrines were burned (often as firewood in the mission stations), together with their sacred writings. Japanese chronicles of the period relate instances of bonzes fleeing with great difficulty into another feudal state, taking with them the secretly abducted religious pictures of their temple. It is not hard to imagine the motivation of their activity in their new home: to the extent of their influence, they became dangerous opponents of Christianity.

Domestic Political Tensions. With the growth of Christian influence and the almost simultaneous increase in the power of the Japanese central government, domestic political tensions came to the fore. At the outset of the mass conversion movement (from 1574) there was still some prospect of pushing Christianity to a complete triumph by the forcible methods mentioned above. The central government in the provinces around Kyōto was so weakened that, at least in distant Kyūshū, there was scarcely anything to be feared from it. And Oda Nobunaga (1534 to 1582), was so fiercely opposed to the bonzes that he openly favored the Jesuits. He was assassinated (June 1582) before any change of mind on his part could become disastrous for the missionaries. His successor, Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1536 to 1598), found a substantially different situation. More feudal lords had adhered to the Christian faith; among them was Ōtomo Yoshishige in Kyūshū, one of the greatest and, indeed, a few years earlier, the most important public figure in the Saikoku (southwest). In central Japan likewise the number and quality of the highly placed Christians was growing and the gifted, idealistic Justus Takayama Ukon was one of the most admirable. Toyotomi Hideyoshi, however, was not so completely opposed to the Buddhist circles as his predecessor had been. He had, indeed, to fight against the Sōhei (monk soldiers), and he knew how to keep the truculent bonzes drastically in check; but he also sought to win the good will of the monks: he allowed the rebuilding of the temples that Oda Nobunaga had destroyed, had a gigantic statue of Buddha erected in Kyōto (1586 to 1589), and gave the monks other proofs of his benevolence. Initially he seemed not unkindly disposed toward the Christian missionaries; indeed, the expressions of his favor mounted to an unexpected climax in the campaign in Kyūshū in 1587. But in Kyūshū the questions posed by the intensive Christian propaganda did not escape Hideyoshi's attention: Why were the Christians destroying the temples, which were an ornament of the country and objects of veneration to the Japanese as monuments of religious tradition and culture? How could there be effected a reconciliation of the Buddhist monks, who were so deeply disturbed by the development of the religious situation in Kūshū? But above all, the ruler believed he foresaw the possibility of severe domestic and political complications in a progressive Christianization of the country. He became convinced that all Christians, even the Christian feudal lords, had an inner unity that gave them solidarity; that the lords were submissive to the highly educated and intelligent missionaries; and that the effort of the missionaries was to convert not only the simple people but preferably and precisely the ruling circles. Hideyoshi compared the Christian missions with the Ikkō sects, whose head, the "bonze of Osaka," i.e., the chief of the fortified temple of Ishiyama-Honganji in Osaka, had been able for many years to defy Oda Nobunaga and still represented a latent danger for Hideyoshi. But whereas the Ikkō-shū had contented himself with winning over the agrarian population, the Christians were aiming at the aristocracy. Hideyoshi prided himself on having been the first to recognize the great danger, and to free himself from the deceptive brilliance of the missionaries' well-chosen words. To what extent he was afraid on principle of a possible alliance among the Christian feudal lords, and to what extent he had knowledge of such an alliance actively developing in the plans of Gaspar Coelho, the imprudent major superior of the Jesuits, and the Church in Japan, it is difficult to say. Coelho tried this policy with little success and less wisdom and in the process had a thorough falling out with the two Christian feudal Lords of Arima and Ōura.

Fear of Foreign Invaders. The extent to which motives of foreign policy played a part even as early as the outbreak of the persecution (1587) is not clear. Hideyoshi laid greater stress on the inner unity of the Japanese Christians among themselves than on their connection with any foreign power. It is certain, however, that Coelho had asked for Spanish soldiers and ammunition from Manila quite some time before 1587; he probably wanted these primarily to secure the Christian position in Kyūshū. Alessandro VALIGNANO, then Jesuit provincial of India, had resolutely rejected this initiative. After the Decree of Exile (1587), Coelho again revived his plan, summoned a consultation on Feb. 11, 1589, in Takaku (Arima), and approved the dispatch of Melchior de Mora to Valignano in Macau or, in the event of Valignano's absence, to the Philippines. Mora was to ask for Spanish soldiers from the Philippines. Valignano at once hushed the matter up and in 1590 took Mora back with him to Japan. Coelho died in that year and with him the plan. It is conceivable that his intentions were known not at all or only vaguely to the Japanese central authorities despite their intelligence service. But the distrust of foreigners grew more acute in those years. European globes and world maps were known in Japan, and the Spanish conquests, not only in South America but particularly in the nearby Philippines, with whom direct contacts were becoming more frequent, aroused fears. When in October 1596 the San Felipe was forced to make port in Urado (Tosa, Shikoku), her pilot pointed to the map of the world and made the famous declaration, obviously in the belief that this would terrify the Japanese, that the missionaries would come first and then the king would send soldiers and so conquer country after country. There is scarcely sufficient reason to doubt this statement, although it is possible that it was used by the Japanese authorities more as a pretext than as a justification for requisitioning the cargo of the San Felipe and for condemning to death the Spanish Franciscans of Tosa who had intervened to save the vessel. Still, the threat from abroad remained operative, now latent, now overt, until the end of the early Japanese Church. The Europeans themselves imprudently gave the threat new strength. Sebastián Vizcaino, the famous explorer, boasted in dispatches to the Spanish king that he had sounded and surveyed the northeast coast of Japan in 1611 to 1612 with permission of the Japanese. This may have been cartographically and nautically worthwhile; but it provided the enemies of the Christians at court the opportunity of raising anew the question of the foreign connections of the Japanese Christians.

Lack of Unity among Europeans in Japan. Both the domestic and the foreign policy motives of the persecution were kept alive and heightened by the lack of unity, indeed hostility, between the various European groups in Japan: between the Portuguese, who had reached Japan via Goa-Malacca-Macau, and the Spaniards, who had come via New Spain and Manila; further and still more deep-seated, between the Nambanjin (the Southern Barbarians, i.e., the Iberians coming from Macau and Manila) and the Kōmōjin (the Redheads, i.e., the blond Englishmen and Dutchmen).

The Attitude of Christians toward the Japanese State and Its Laws. Whether in Japan, Macao, Manila, or elsewhere abroad, the Christian attitude toward the state and its laws gave rise to serious complications. Culpable conduct by individuals or groups was blamed by the Japanese authorities on the Christian religion as such. Scandals in the lives of the European merchants in Japan and the alleged kidnaping of Japanese for slavery were instances of such behavior. A total break in relations almost resulted from clashes in Macau between Japanese and Portuguese; for example, the disturbances set off by the Japanese passengers of two Go-shuin-sen (Red-Seal Ships) of the lord of Arima in Macau in 1608, which led to the Japanese attack (Jan. 6, 1610) against the Nossa Senhora da Graça in the harbor of Nagasaki. The quarrel (1611 to 1612) between two influential Christians, the lord of Arima (John Arima) and Paul Okamoto Daihachi, secretary at court, brought to light illegal operations on the part of both and resulted in their condemnation, thereby severely damaging the prestige of Christianity. In November 1613 several criminals, a Christian among them, were put to death near Miyako (Kyōto); there were Christians among the crowd of spectators who knelt at the moment of execution to pray for the dying Christian. This was interpreted by the pagans as an act of worship of the criminal. When the incident was reported to the authorities, Tokugawa Iyeyasu dismissed 14 Christian officials from court and deprived them of office. This example was quickly imitated by many feudal lords. The uneasiness of the court was augmented by reports of the rekindling of the Christian movement in Arima. Iyeyasu decreed unconditional banishment for the missionaries from the Gokinai (Central Japan) in February 1614 and from the whole of Japan in November 1614.

In later years, unlawful acts had an important influence on the vehemence of the persecution. The Dominican Diego Collado, for example, rescued a confrere from the Hirado prison only to have him again apprehended by pursuers in a boat, while Collado escaped into the neighboring forest. This infraction of Japanese justice caused a vehement outbreak of cruelty against the missionaries then under arrest. Again, Paulo dos Santos defied a Japanese ban by sending merchandise from Macau to Japan in 1632 in order to contribute by the proceeds to the support of the missionaries living clandestinely in Japan. In 1634 he wrote about it (this, too, was against the law) to a friend in Japan. His letter was confiscated and both the Portuguese who had the letter with him and the Japanese to whom it was addressed were publicly burned. Similar incidents increased the tensions between Japan and Macao. The Shimabara uprising of 1637 to 1638, a social revolt that rapidly assumed a religious character, resulted in the final break with the Portuguese: Macau, the last base of the Japanese mission, was eliminated in 1639.

These examples highlight the motives that impelled the Japanese rulers in the 16th and 17th centuries to disapprove of Christianity and to engage in a bloody persecution. The Japanese course of action is understandable, but even when all the circumstances are recognized and admitted, the government cannot be absolved of responsibility for its attitudes and methods.

External Course of the Persecutions

Though there was local molestation of Christians from the beginning of the Japanese mission, the first general persecution broke unexpectedly, like a hurricane. On the night of July 24 to July 25, 1587, Toyotomi Hideyoshi decreed the dismissal of the Christian general and feudal lord Justus Takayama Ukon and sent a moderately worded complaint to the Jesuit vice provincial, communicating to him on the same evening the measures taken against Ukon.

Toyotomi Hideyoshi's Decree of Banishment (1587). On July 25, 1587, Hideyoshi decreed that the missionaries could no longer remain in Japan because they were destroyers of the temples and preachers of a "diabolical" law. They were to leave within 20 days. The Portuguese merchants were still allowed unhindered access to Japan for trading purposes, so long as they observed Japanese laws. The decree could not be implemented in this form because there was no ship leaving Japan for Macau that soon. Hideyoshi's order did, however, have immediate serious consequences for the Church in Japan. A new piece of property in Hakata just given to the Church by Hideyoshi himself was lost; the port of Nagasaki, which for some years had been administered by the Church, was taken away from her jurisdiction, together with the smaller neighbor port of Mogi and the holdings in Urakami; and Hideyoshi levied an oppressive fine on the townsmen of Nagasaki. The church movables were for the most part successfully secured in Hirado, however, before Hideyoshi's men reached Nagasaki. These soldiers were willing to accept bribes to leave the churches in the city untouched and simply to close the main entrances. For the rest, they contented themselves with tearing down the city walls. The fortresses in the Christian fiefs of Ōmura and Arima also had to be dismantled. Later, Hideyoshi sent word that the fathers could remain in Japan until the next monsoon and the sailing of the China boat of the Portuguese, but meanwhile they must assemble on the Hirado Islands to await departure.

All the houses in central Japan, as well as the new foundations in southwest Hondo (Shimonoseki, Yamaguchi) and on Shikoku (in Dōgo, Iyo) were vacated. Most of the fathers in Kyūshū also came to Hirado. There in a consultation it was decided that all missionaries (with the exception of a few sick priests and some scholastics who could travel to Macau for ordination) were to remain in Japan and be secretly accommodated in the Christian fiefs. Soon after the persecution edict, Hideyoshi returned to central Japan; the decision taken at Hirado was forthwith carried out. In February 1588, shortly before the sailing for Macau, Capt. Domingos Monteiro sent Francisco Garcés to Hideyoshi with the message that not all the fathers had found accommodation on the boat and that the others would have to sail next year. Hideyoshi gave the order to destroy the Jesuit houses in Miyako, Osaka, and Sakai and many churches in the regions of Takatsuki (Settsu), Akashi (Harima), and Gifu (Mino). He threatened to kill all the missionaries who had remained behind. The Nao ran into port in Japan on Aug. 17, 1588. Captain Jeronymo Pereira sent the Portuguese Manoel Lopez to the court to take reassuring news to Hideyoshi (now Kambaku, a court title assumed in 1585) about the departure of the fathers. Hideyoshi appeared satisfied, but it was the general opinion that he knew they were still secretly in Japan. He gave permission for the fathers to accompany the Portuguese on the voyage from Macau to Japan so long as they departed again by the same ship; this was considered a further sign of relaxation of tensions.

Embassy of Alessandro Valignano (1590). After the audience, the Kambaku was notified that the ambassador of the viceroy of the Indies was waiting in Macau to come to Japan and pay his respects. Letters patent were made out that authorized the journey with the next ship. The announcement of this embassy had a further moderating effect on the ruler. The ambassador, Visitor Alessandro Valignano, SJ, arrived on July 21, 1590. On March 3, 1591, the memorable audience with Hideyoshi took place; it was as solemn as it was friendly. Although Valignano could not even bring up the question of the restitution of the fathers' former status, he indirectly achieved what he desired, for Hideyoshi permitted, indeed demanded, that ten fathers remain in Nagasaki as hostages until an answer had arrived from the viceroy of the Indies. This could be interpreted as a permission for all the Jesuits to remain in Japan, if they respected the Japanese mentality, accommodated their activities to the actual state of affairs, and did not irritate the ruler by any open protest against the persecution laws.

New Measures and the First Executions (1597). Even before the departure of the ambassador from Japan, the large church in Nagasaki was destroyed about August 1592; but it was established that this did not involve any new enmity toward Christianity; rather, Hideyoshi's minister simply wanted the valuable materials of the church for building operations in Nagoya (Hizen). The Korean War (1592 to 1598), which brought Hideyoshi several times to Kyūshū, made caution especially necessary. But basically a lively missionary activity still continued. It was only toward the end of his reign that the Taiko (court title Hideyoshi assumed in 1592) took sharper measures again, not against Christianity as such, but only against the monks who came from the Philippines. The open evangelization of the Spanish Franciscans, who were unfamiliar with the mentality and state of affairs in the country, their open intervention in favor of a Spanish ship, the San Felipe, stranded in Tosa, and the unfortunate expression of the pilot that was interpreted to mean that the Spaniards had come to conquer Japan, combined to create a new crisis. Hideyoshi condemned 26 Christians to death, among them six Franciscans, three Japanese Jesuits, and 17 Japanese laymen. Their deaths occurred on Feb. 5, 1597, on the Nishizaka, Nagasaki. Although the growing anti-Christian measures had not initially been directed against the Jesuits from Portugal, it soon caused them concern. Terazawa Hirotaka, Shimano-kami, Governor of Nagasaki, on receipt of a letter of Hideyoshi, forced the dissolution of the college and seminary and demanded a list of all Jesuits in order to dispatch them, with few exceptions, to Macau. He was given a list containing 25 names, primarily fathers and brothers who were known to him already. By Feb. 17, 1598, more than 130 churches had been burned in the Christian territories of Arima and Ōmura. The ship that sailed in February 1598 from Nagasaki to Macau took three Fathers, eight Irmãos, and seven or eight Dōjuku (lay acolytes or catechists). The death of Toyotomi Hideyoshi in September 1598 temporarily put an end to the persecution of Christians.

Policies of Tokugawa Iyeyasu. Although the Taikō had attempted to assure the succession of his son Toyotomi Hideyori, who was still a minor, by a most meticulously regulated regency government, civil war broke out. It ended in favor of Tokugawa Iyeyasu at the Battle of Sekigahara (Oct. 21, 1600). Christian lords in the armies that had taken the field against the victor expected his hostility. He vacillated for a time, but then yielded to the pressure of the Catholic feudal lords of Arima and Ōmura and allowed the free practice of the Christian religion. This made the period from 1601 to 1612 the golden age of Christianity in old Japan. Grim shadows, however, fell across these years. One of the saddest events was the banishment of Christians from the fief of Ōmura at the end of February 1606. From the year 1612 on, the Church in Japan rushed toward catastrophe. The lawsuit between John Arima and Paul Okamoto Daihachi and the family quarrel between the former and his son Michael Saemonosuke (who, despite his valid marriage, had married again, this time to a great-granddaughter of Iyeyasu) led not only to the condemnation of both plaintiff and defendant but also to the persecution of the Church in the fief of Arima, since Michael had accommodated to the court line out of political interests. On June 13, 1612, all missionaries were banished from his territories (four Jesuit fathers secretly remained behind), and all subjects were ordered to renounce Christianity. But the massive resistance of the Catholic population forced the feudal lord to allow them to live according to their Christian faith.

Expulsion of All Missionaries (1614). The incident of November 1613 in the neighborhood of Miyako, where the Christians knelt during the execution of a criminal, and a new wave of Christian religious enthusiasm in Arima were the first smoldering sparks of what was soon a conflagration. At the end of 1613 the Christians of the city of Miyako (Kyōto) were registered. On Feb. 14, 1614, the order went out to the missionaries to leave the Gokinai and retire to Nagasaki. Some managed to remain secretly in central Japan; the others took ship in Osaka on Feb. 25, 1614, and reached Nagasaki on March 11. In the autumn of 1614 the missionaries were definitively banished from Japan. At the beginning of November, four ships filled with missionaries left Nagasaki, three of them bound for Macau and the fourth for Manila. Only a small number succeeded in remaining behind. All religious houses were confiscated; many churches were at once destroyed or profaned; the others were shut down. This was the beginning of the suppression of the Japanese Church.

In the quarter century (1614 to 1639) before the sealing off of the country (Sakoku), the situation of the Church worsened. The year following the banishment (1615) was not so critical for the Church because attention was diverted by the domestic political struggle. The Osaka winter campaign (late 1614 and early 1615) had only effected an apparent reconciliation between the Tokugawas and the Toyotomis. The summer campaign (May and June 1615) ended with the fall of Osaka and the death of Toyotomi Hideyori, son and heir of Hideyoshi. Many Christian samurais and rōnins fought for Hideyori, their insignia and banners visible far and wide. At the fall of the fortress of Osaka, at least seven missionaries (two Jesuits, three monks, and two secular priests) were within its walls. Understandably this did not make Tokugawa Iyeyasu kindly disposed to the Christians. Yet comparative peace prevailed until the death of Iyeyasu (June 1, 1616).

The Ban of Tokugawa Hidetada (1616). Tokugawa Hidetada, Iyeyasu's successor, followed a decidedly anti-Christian policy. On Oct. 1, 1616, he published a new ban. When Bartholomew of Ōmura [grandson of the Christian tono (feudal lord) of the same name who had died in 1587] made his visit to the court at the Japanese New Year, he was instructed to search out Jesuits in Nagasaki and send them to Macau. That same year four European and several Japanese missionaries were put to death. The strife between the Christians Anthony Murayama Tōan and John Heizō at the beginning of 1618 occasioned new stringent measures, especially in Nagasaki. The apostate Murayama made accusations at court against the Jesuits still in Japan and against Heizō as favoring them. Heizō won the case, became head of the Otona of Nagasaki, and in November 1618, together with the governor of Nagasaki, Hasegawa Gonroku, he returned to the port city. Both had the strictest instructions to search out Jesuit priests. The grimmest threats against any householder sheltering the missionaries and against his entire family and street, together with rich rewards for informers, made the missionaries' situation in Nagasaki impossible; many were discovered and imprisoned. The imprudent and unsuccessful attempt to rescue a Dominican from prison in Hirado caused an outbreak of fury and cruelty on the part of Hidetada. He ordered to be burned alive not only the two monks in prison in Hirado and the captain who had brought them from Manila to Japan, but also all the missionaries hitherto incarcerated together with their hosts; Hidetada ordered also the beheading of the wives and sons (of whatever age) of the hosts, all Christians of that street with their wives and sons, and all the sailors and passengers of that ship. Even the wives and sons of the martyrs of the past three years were to be put to the sword, although there had previously been no talk of their punishment.

National Isolation under Shōgun Iyemitsu. If the missionaries still operating in Japan had hoped that the transition of power from Tokugawa Hidetada to his son Iyemitsu (1623) would bring moderation, they were bitterly disappointed. His long reign (1623 to 1651) meant for the Japanese Church a total severing of all contact with the outside world and a complete annihilation within Japan. Iyemitsu confirmed the anti-Christian laws. Searches for hidden missionaries were constantly intensified; the precautionary measures against any penetration of new missionaries from abroad became more meticulous and rigorous. The coasts were patrolled and the trading ships from Macau were searched thoroughly on arrival; even correspondence with priests abroad was forbidden under pain of death. The methods of torture became steadily more cruel; they were used not just to punish the "guilty" and terrorize the remaining faithful, but also to effect their apostasy.

A number of missionaries died from the exertions of their secret and harassed apostolate; most, however, fell sooner or later into the hands of the bailiffs. A long series of martyrdoms of priests and laymen fills the next years of the dying Church in Japan; but side by side with the heroic martyrs in the Japanese Church were many defectors from the faith, not only among the mass of Christians but even among their spiritual leaders (Christovão Ferreira and others).

The Shimabara Uprising. Year by year, the situation of Christians in Japan and communication with the centers in Macau and Manila became more unreliable. The total collapse of the Church in Japan was finally sealed by the Shimabara uprising (1637 to 1638). It originated as an act of desperation by the socially and economically oppressed agrarian population in Amakusa and nearby Takaku (Shimabara Peninsula), but in these territories, which had once been entirely Christian, it soon grew into a religious movement. The rebels named as their leader Masuda Shirō (better known as Amakusa Shirō), the 18-year-old son of a Christian samurai. But the real leadership lay in all probability with a few retired but capable military men. The rebels were defeated in Amakusa (January 1638) but retreated to neighboring Takaku, where they seized the abandoned fortress of Hara (Arima). The government sent against them an army estimated at 100,000 men. The besieged in Hara-jō numbered perhaps 37,000 (men, women, and children). The fortress fell in mid-April 1638 when supplies of ammunition and food failed. All were put to death. The government troops had suffered severe losses during the siege, perhaps 13,000 men. The protracted uprising and the poor spirit of the government troops made a deep impression at court, so that plans that had been made for the conquest of Manila were dropped.

Last Contacts. The fear that the rebellion might have been fomented from abroad led to a complete cordoning off of the country. When the Portuguese ships made their usual call in 1639, the ban signed by the Rōjū (shogunal council of state) on Aug. 4, 1639, was laid before them. It forbade them under pain of death ever to return to Japan. When the city of Macau in 1640 sent an embassy to Japan to restore the old ties, the captain, passengers, and all but 13 sailors were killed. From 1640 an office of investigation in Yedo (Tokyo) directed the supervision of entry into the country, and it became impossible for any missionaries to penetrate clandestinely into Japan. The two groups of Jesuits making the crossing to Japan in 1642 (under the leadership of the Visitor Antonio RUBINO) and in 1643 (under the command of Pedro Marquez) were at once spotted and arrested. The Portuguese embassy that came to Nagasaki in 1647 in order to begin new negotiations in the name of a Portugal that had again become independent under King John IV was allowed to return to Macau but without obtaining any concessions. A similar reception awaited the Portuguese who in 1685 brought back a group of Japanese who had been driven off their course and aground at Macau. The last European missionary to enter Japan, the Sicilian secular priest Giovanni Battista Sidotti, was arrested soon after he landed (October 1708) and brought first to Nagasaki and then to Yedo (Tokyo), where he was kept in prison in the Kirishitan-Yashiki until his death in December 1715.

Spirit of Martyrdom in the Early Japanese Church

The religious life of the Japanese Christians and missionaries was extraordinarily deep and solid. From the beginning, Xavier and his confreres roused in their Japanese converts a spirit that could endure every test. The missionaries taught them profoundest reverence for the majesty of God, a resolute shunning of sin, a high esteem for the Redemption, and a fervent love for the crucified Savior. Appealing to the realization, so native to the Japanese, of the transience of terrestrial things and the scorn of death, characteristic of the samurai of the feudal period who were accustomed to battles as a daily fare, they awakened in the Christians the love for an eternal heaven to which martyrdom provided sure and instant access.

Symbolism of the Cross. In many Christian communities high wooden crosses were erected, which Christians visited singly or in groups, privately or in public procession. The cross as symbol of victory and devotion shone on the armor, helmets, and banners of the soldiers; silver or gold pectoral crosses were worn by distinguished Christians of both sexes; the crosses that gleamed on the roofs or towers of the churches could be seen for miles around, such as the gilt crosses on the roof of the Nambanjin in Kyōto. Sermons on the Passion of Christ were preached in honor of the holy cross on ferial days of Lent; the Blessed Sacrament was reserved in a richly ornamented “holy sepulchre”; the liturgical unveiling and veneration of the cross was practiced with utmost solemnity; and a sermon on the Passion and the reading of the Passion narrative translated into Japanese introduced the mysteries of these holy days. Often also a procession was organized in which persons carrying the instruments of the Passion engaged in a pious “dialogue” with the suffering Savior. The text of the Gospel Harmony of the Passion narrative had been translated into Japanese early (it is mentioned in the History of Japan by Luís Fróis as early as 1552, again in 1563, 1566, etc.); later (at the latest by 1607) it was disseminated in printed form. Also read on such occasions were Japanese versions of the meditations on the Passion by the Dominican LOUIS OF GRANADA. Many Japanese lives of saints and martyrs were available for imitation; these circulated originally in manuscript form but were printed as Sanctos no Gosagevo as early as 1591. The idea of the world to come and of eternity were instilled into the Christians likewise by the special solemnity of the burial services and Masses for the dead. It can be said in general that wherever the Christians could be trained sufficiently in the truths of the faith, the remote preparation for persecution and even for martyrdom was thorough and profound.

Inspiration for Heroism. A more proximate preparation was given the Christians as the persecution became more general and threatening. When Toyotomi Hideyoshi suddenly declared war on the Christian faith in 1587, the missionaries distributed in the Gokinai an instruction on how to behave during the persecution. The Jesuit vice provincial Pedro Gomez composed a little work on martyrdom when a new persecution flared up in 1596 to 1597; the main ideas of this work he had already expounded in 1593 to 1594 in the Compendium Catholicae veritatis (a theology textbook for the Japanese Irmãos). The Exhortation to Martyrdom (Maruchirio no susume) was written perhaps in 1615, the Instruction on Martyrdom (Maruchirio no kokoroe) still later (1622?). Reports on individual martyrdoms were composed in the vernacular and served to stiffen the courage of the Christians.

Especially in the first decade of the last great persecution (1614 to 1623) there were often thousands and at times tens of thousands of the faithful present at the death of the martyrs, whose example inflamed rather than diminished the fortitude of the survivors. The lay organizations founded by the orders in Japan were a forceful factor in the defense of the faith, especially from the time of the persecution in Arima (1612), when thousands of members of the “Congregations of Martyrs” swore to offer their possessions and their lives rather than waver in the faith. When their hour of martyrdom arrived, they left their families, friends, or fellow prisoners, and wherever possible donned festive attire. If permitted, they proceeded to the place of martyrdom praying together, singing psalms and sacred hymns, each encouraging the other until their heads fell under the sword or the flames and smoke choked off their voices. That tens of thousands made this highest sacrifice for the love of Christ is one of the glories of the early Japanese Church. It is sad, however, that for reasons humanly understandable, many fell away, at least outwardly, when pressure demanded the final commitment.

Individual Martyrdoms (The Canonized and Beatified)

The inner worth of the sacrifice made by each individual martyr is known in all its depths only to God. But in the long series of the martyrdoms, certain ones stand out especially because of the personality and number of the martyrs, of their manifest heroism, of the participation of enormous crowds, and of their subsequent beatification or canonization. Here are listed in chronological order the martyrdoms of those already beatified or canonized. Since there are often defects in the transcription of the names, especially of the Japanese names, even in the official ecclesiastical documents, the original MSS reports have been consulted. Even so, it should be noted that definitive judgment cannot be attained in all cases. This does not affect the identity of the martyrs, which is clarified in the ecclesiastical proceedings, where, however, many divergencies in the transcription of the names likewise appear. In this list the Christian names of the Japanese have been anglicized.

The 26 Holy Martyrs. These were crucified in Nagasaki on Feb. 5, 1597, and are the only ones so far canonized—Six Franciscans: Pedro Bautista, Spanish commissary of the friars; Martín de la Ascención Aguirre and Francisco Blanco, Spanish priests; Felipe de Jesús de las Casas, Mexican cleric, not yet ordained; Francisco de San Miguel, Spanish lay brother; and Gonzalo García, lay brother, born in Baçaim, India; Three Jesuits: Paul Miki, eminent Japanese preacher; John Soan de Gotō, Japanese, accepted as a member of the society shortly before death; Diogo Kisai (Kizayemon), Japanese catechist, accepted as a member of the society shortly before martyrdom; 17 Japanese laymen: Leo Karasumaru (from Owari), baptized eight years earlier by the Jesuits, chief lay preacher of the Franciscans; Paul Ibaraki, brother of the preceding and a member of the Franciscan parish, baptized by Jesuits; Louis Ibaraki, Franciscan Dōjuku, 12 years old, nephew of the two preceding; Paul Suzuki (from Owari), 34 years old, baptized by the Jesuits 13 years earlier and one of the finest of the Franciscan preachers; Thomas Dangi (from Ise), baptized by Jesuits, Franciscan preacher; Anthony (from Nagasaki, father Chinese), Dōjuku of the Franciscans, 13 years old, baptized as an infant by the Jesuits; Gabriel (from Ise), Dōjuku of the Franciscans, 19 years old, his father was a porter with the Franciscans; Ventura (from Miyako), baptized as a child by the Jesuits, he fell away from the faith as a boy because of his father's death and became a bonze, but was instructed by the Franciscans and accepted as Dōjuku; Francis (from Miyako), physician and a Christian of one year, baptized by Franciscans; Leo Kinuya (from Miyako), 28-year-old carpenter [sources list him variously as Quinoya Leon and Quimiya Joan (Lúis Fróis), Quimiya João (Pedro Gomez), Quizuya Joannes (Proc. Remiss. Mexico City), Quizuja Joannes (Acta. Can., An tuto . . .), Guzaya Joannes (Proc. Remiss. Puebla de los Angeles, Mexico), and Guizaya Joannes (Proc. Remiss. Japon.)]; Matthias, converted (by the Franciscans) shortly before martyrdom, but not on the list of the condemned; when the others were arrested, the Franciscans' cook, named Matthias, was absent, and this Matthias offered himself in the cook's stead; Peter Sukejirō, long before baptized by the Jesuits, was sent by the Jesuit priest Organtino Soldo-Gnecchi to help the prisoners and was himself arrested (adauctus); Francis, carpenter, baptized by Franciscans, came to watch the death of the martyrs, was arrested and slain with them (adauctus); Cosmas Takeya (from Owari), baptized by Jesuits, preacher of Franciscans in Osaka; Michael Kosaki (from Ise), porter of Franciscans in Osaka; Thomas, son of the preceding, 16-year-old Dōjuku of the Franciscans in Osaka; and Joachim Sakakibara (from Osaka), 40 years old, baptized shortly before by the Franciscans, cook for Franciscans in Osaka. These 26 martyrs were beatified on Sept. 14, 1627, by Urban VIII and solemnly canonized by Pius IX on June 8, 1862 (feast, Feb. 3).

The 205 Blessed Martyrs. This summary account of the martyrdoms follows (with Boero) the lists attached to the acts of the proceedings (numbers in brackets are the total for each day):

May 22, 1617, in Ōmura [2]: João Bapt. Machado, Jesuit priest; Pedro de la Asunción, Franciscan priest; both beheaded.

June 1, 1617, in Ōmura [3]: Alonso Navarete, Dominican priest; Hernando de San José, Augustinian priest; Leo Tanaka, catechist of the Jesuits; all beheaded.

Oct. 1, 1617, in Nagasaki [2]: Caspar Hikojirō, housekeeper of the martyr Alonso Navarete (d. June 1, 1617); Andrew Yoshida, former pupil in the seminary and housekeeper of the martyr Hernando de San José (d. June 1, 1617); both beheaded.

Aug. 16, 1618, in Miyako [1]: Juan de Santa Marta, Franciscan priest, taken prisoner in 1615 in Ōmura; beheaded.

March 19 (May, according to Boero), 1619, in Ōmura [1]: Juan de S. Domingo, Dominican priest; died in prison.

Nov. 18, 1619, in Nagasaki [5]: Leonard Kimura, Jesuit lay brother; Domingos Jorge, Portuguese housekeeper of the martyr Carlo Spinola (d. Sept. 10, 1622); Andrew Murayama Tokuan, Japanese; John Yoshida Shoun, Japanese (from Kami); Cosmas Takeya Sozaburō, Korean; all burned alive.

Nov. 27, 1619, in Nagasaki [11]: Thomas Kiuni Koteda, descendant of Anthony Koteda, who went into voluntary exile for the sake of the faith in 1599 together with his whole family and many vassals from the Hirado Islands; Anthony Kimura, relative of the martyr Leonard Kimura (d. Nov. 18, 1619); Leo Nakanishi; Alexis Nakamura; Michael (Tashita?) Sakaguchi; John Iwanaga; Bartholomew Seki; Matthias Nakano; Matthias Kozaka?; Romanus Motoyama (Matsuoka, Miōta?); John Motoyama; all beheaded.

Night of Jan. 6 to Jan. 7, 1620, in Omura (Suzuta) [1]: Ambrosio Fernandes, Portuguese Jesuit lay brother, arrested together with Carlo Spinola on Dec. 13, 1618; died in prison.

May 27 (not 22), 1620, in Nagasaki [1]: Matthias, Japanese servant of the Jesuit provincial, refused to reveal the whereabouts of the missionaries even under cruel torture; died in prison.

Aug. 16, 1620, in Kokura [5]: Simon Kiyota Bokusai, Kambō (catechist); Magdalena, his wife; Thomas Gengorō; Mary, his wife; James Bunzo, his son; the last three in the service of Simon Kiyota Bokusai; all crucified.

Aug. 10, 1622, on Ikinoshima (Hirado) Island [1]: Augustine Ota, Jesuit Kambō of the martyr Camillo Costanzo (d. Sept. 15, 1622), and received into the society on the day before his martyrdom; beheaded.

Aug. 19, 1622, in Nagasaki [15]: Luis Flores, Dominican priest; Pedro de Zuniga, Augustinian priest; Joachim Hirayama Diaz, captain of the ship that had brought the priests from the Philippines to Japan; all burned to death; John Soyemon and Leo Sukuyemon, ship's officers; Michael Diaz Hori; Anthony Yamada; Thomas Koyanagi; James Denji; Mark Shinyemon; Lawrence Rokusuke (Rokuyemon?); Paul Sankichi; John Matashichi; John Yago; Bartholomew Mohyōye, merchant passengers; all 12 beheaded.

Sept. 10, 1622, in Nagasaki [52]: the "Great Martyrdom" in which 23 were burned alive and 29 beheaded; those burned were eight Jesuits: Carlo Spinola, Italian priest, and Sebastian Kimura, Japanese priest, and the following Japanese Irmãos, received into the society in prison: Gonzales Fusai, Anthony Kiuni, Peter Sampo, Michael Sato, Thomas Akahoshi, and Louis Kawara; six Dominicans: Francisco de Morales, Spanish priest; Alonso de Mena, Spanish priest; Angelo Ferrer Orsucci, Italian priest; Joseph de S. Jacinto, Spanish priest; Jacinto Orfanel, Aragonese priest; Alexis, scholastic; three Franciscans: Pedro de Ávila, Castilian priest; Ricardo de Santa Anna, Belgian priest; Vincent de S. José, lay brother; Leo de Satsuma, catechist; five housekeepers of the missionaries: Anthony Sanga (from Sanga, Kawachi), nephew of one of the finest Christian feudal lords of the Gokinai, Paul Sanga Sampaku (Anthony had belonged to the society for a time and left for reasons of health); Anthony, a Korean catechist and housekeeper of the martyr Sebastian Kimura; Paul Tanaka, host of Joseph de S. Jacinto; Paul Nagaishi, Japanese; and Luzia de Freitas, wife of a Portuguese and hostess of Ricardo de Santa Anna. Before the above 23 were burned to death, the following 29 were beheaded before their eyes: Thomas del S. Rosario and Domingos del S. Rosario (thus he is listed in the proceedings and in Boero, though in the original Annua he is called João), both of them Dominicans; John (do) Chugoku, Jesuit; five relatives of the martyrs of Nov. 18, 1619: Isabel Fernandez, wife of the martyr Domingos Jorge and her four-year-old son Ignacio; Maria, wife of the martyr Andrew Murayama Tokuan; Mary, wife of the martyr John Yoshida Shoun; Ines, wife of the Korean martyr Cosmas Takeya Sozaburō; Dominic Nakano, 19-year-old son of the martyr Matthias Nakano (d. Nov. 27, 1619); the original Annua lists also a five-year-old Peter Motoyama, son of the martyr John Motoyama (d. Nov. 27, 1619), but he is missing from the list of the beatified; seven relatives of those burned alive on Sept. 10, 1622: Magdalene, wife of Anthony Sanga; Maria, wife of Paul Tanaka; Maria, wife of the Korean Anthony, with her two sons, John, 12 years old, and Peter, three years old; Thecla, wife of Paul Nagaishi, with her son Peter, seven years old.

Eight male and five female martyrs were put to death because of their relationship to other condemned martyrs: Bartholomew Kawano Shichiyemon; Dominic Yamada and his wife, Clara (thus he appears in the proceedings and in the list of Boero; Garcia Garcés indicates only that Clara was the wife of a martyr; her name is not in the original Annua); Damian Yamichi Tanda with his son Michael, five years old; the 70-year-old Thomas Shikirō; Clement Ono with his son Anthony, three years old; Rufus Ishimoto; Apollonia, widow, aunt of the martyr Caspar Koteda, who was put to death on Sept. 11, 1622; Catherine, widow; Mary (or Marina) Tanaura, widow; Dominica Ogata, widow. The group originally numbered 25, but three freed themselves from the bonds, which had purposely been tied loosely to encourage apostasy: two allegedly in order to escape the fire and be beheaded, but according to the original Annua they would have denied the faith to save their lives; they were twice thrown back into the fire where they perished. Some doubt persisted concerning the third (Paul Nagaishi), but it was finally shown that he had freed himself only for a short time to encourage the other two in their faith; he is thus the only one of the three counted among the beatified. The witnesses in the proceedings, moreover, disagreed concerning the total number; some reports have 23 burned to death and 30 beheaded (apart from the two who fled the fire).

Sept. 11, 1622, in Nagasaki [3]: Caspar Koteda, catechist of the martyr Camillo Costanzo (d. Sept. 15, 1622); Francisco, the 12-year-old son of the martyr Cosmas Takeya Sozaburō (d. Nov. 18, 1619) and of his wife, Ines (beheaded Sept. 10, 1622); Peter, the seven-year-old son of the martyr Bartholomew Kawano Shichiyemon (d. Sept. 10, 1622); all beheaded.

Sept. 12, 1622, near Ōmura [6]: three Dominicans: Thomas del Espiritu Santo Zumarraga, priest, and the Irmãos Mancio de S. Thomas Shibata and Dominic Magoshichi de Hyūga, received into the order in prison; three Franciscans: Apolli-nar Franco, priest, and the Irmãos Francisco de S. Buenaventura and Pedro de S. Clara, clothed with the habit of the order in prison; all burned to death. With these suffered several others on which, however, no juridical records were available; only the above were beatified.

Sept. 15, 1622, in Tabira, at the strait between Hirado and Kyūshū [1]: Camillo Costanzo, Jesuit priest, burned to death.

Oct. 2, 1622, in Nagasaki [4]: Louis Yakichi, who had attempted to rescue the Dominican priest Luís Flores from the Hirado prison, burned alive; his wife, Lucy, and his two sons, Andrew, eight years old, and Francis, four years old, beheaded.

Nov. 1, 1622, in Shimabara [4]: Pedro Paulo Navarro, Jesuit priest, and the two Irmãos Peter Onizuka and Denis Fujishima (received into the society while in prison); also Clement Kyūyemon, a married layman in the service of the Jesuits.

Dec. 4, 1623, in Tōkyō [3]: 50 were burned alive for the faith, but for want of juridical evidence concerning the others only three have as yet been beatified: Francisco Galvez, Spanish Franciscan priest; Jeronymo de Angelis, Sicilian Jesuit priest; and Simon Yempo, Japanese Jesuit.

Feb. 22, 1624, in Sendai [1]: Diogo Carvalho, Portuguese Jesuit priest, exposed to a slow death in the icy water of a river.

Aug. 25, 1624, in Hokonohara (Ōmura) [5]: Miguel Carvalho, Portuguese Jesuit priest; Pedro Vasquez, Spanish Dominican priest; Luis Sotelo, Spanish Franciscan priest; Louis Sasada, Japanese Franciscan priest; Louis Baba, Japanese Third Order Franciscan; all burned alive.

Nov. 15, 1624, in Nagasaki [1]: Gajo, Korean catechist, burned alive together with the Japanese layman James Koichi (thus far only Gajo has been beatified).

June 20, 1626, in Nagasaki [9]: Francisco Pacheco, Portuguese Jesuit provincial; Balthasar de Torres, Spanish Jesuit priest; Giovanni Battista Zola, Italian Jesuit priest; Peter Rinsei, Japanese; Michael Tozo, Japanese; Vicente Kahyōye Caum, Korean; Paul Shinsuke, Japanese; John Kisaku, Japanese; Caspar Sadamatsu, Japanese. Of the six who were not priests, Caspar Sadamatsu had been a Jesuit lay brother for 42 years; the other five were received into the society shortly before their martyrdom; all were burned to death.

July 12, 1626, in Nagasaki [8]: this group originally had nine, but Mancio Araki Kyūzaburō died in prison; the others in the group were his brother Matthias Araki Hyōzaemon; their cousin Peter Araki Chōbyōye and his wife, Susanna; John Tanaka and his wife, Catherine; John Onizuka Naizen and his wife, Monica, together with their seven-year-old son, Louis. The women and boy were beheaded; the men were burned alive; they were housekeepers of the priests in Takaku.

July 29, 1627, in Ōmura [3]: three Dominicans and nine lay people (four men and five women) were burned to death; one woman and two small children were beheaded. Of these, three have been beatified: Luis Beltrán, Dominican priest, and Mancio de la Cruz and Pedro de S. Maria, lay brothers received into the Dominican Order before martyrdom.

Aug. 16, 1627, in Nagasaki [15]: 18 Christians were put to death, some by fire, others by the sword. Of these 15 have been beatified: Francisco de S. Maria, Spanish Franciscan priest; Bartholomeo Laruel, Mexican Franciscan lay brother; Anthony de S. Francisco, Japanese Franciscan lay brother (these last two admitted to the order before their death); also the housekeepers of the missionaries, Caspar Vas, Japanese; Francis Kuhyōye, Japanese; Magdalene Kiyota, a relative of the Ōtomos of Bungo; another Japanese woman named Frances; Francis (Leo?) Kurobyōye, Japanese; Caius Jinyemon, Korean?; Thomas Jinyemonō, Japanese; Luke Kiyemon, Japanese; Michael Kizaiyemon, Japanese; Louis Matsuo, Japanese; Martin Gomez, Japanese; Mary, Japanese.

Sept. 7, 1627, in Nagasaki [3]: Thomas Tsūji, Jesuit priest, his housekeeper Louis Maki, and the latter's adopted son John; all burned alive.

Sept. 8, 1628, in Nagasaki [22]: of the 11 burned alive, three were Dominicans: Domingos Castellet, priest; Thomas de S. Jacinto, lay brother; Antonio de S. Domingos, lay brother; two Franciscans: Antonio de S. Buenaventura, priest; and Domingos de S. Francisco (or de Nagasaki); six lay people: Luisa, the 80-year-old housekeeper of Domingos Castellet; Michael Yamada: John Tomachi; John Imamura; Paul Aibara Sōdai (Sandaya); Matheus Alvarez. The other 11 were beheaded: four sons of John Tomachi, Dominic, 16 years old, Michael, 13 years old, Thomas, ten years old, and Paul, seven years old; also Lawrence, three-year-old son of Michael Yamada; Romanus and Leo, sons of Paul Aibara; Louis Nihachi with his two sons, Francis, five years old, and Dominic, two years old; James Hayashi; the housekeeper Thomas (mentioned in Cardim) is not in the list of the beatified (Boero).

Sept. 16, 1628, in Nagasaki [3]: the Japanese laymen Dominic Shobyōye, Michael Himonoya, and the latter's son Paul; all beheaded.

Dec. 25, 1628 [1]: Michael Nakashima, Jesuit, admitted to the order before his martyrdom, died on Unzen Mountain.

Sept. 28, 1630, in Nagasaki [6]: John Mutsunoō Chōzaburō; Peter Sawaguchi Kūhyōye (Pedro de la Madre de Dios); Lawrence Kaida Hachizō (Lorenzo de S. Nicola); Mancio Yukimoto Ichizayemon (Mancio de Jesus Maria); Michael Ichinose Sukizayemon; Thomas Terai Kahyōye; all were fellow workers of the Augustinians and members of their third order. These were all beheaded. Numerous others were martyred in 1630 but are not yet beatified.

Sept. 3, 1632, in Nagasaki [6]: Bartholomeo Gutierrez, Mexican Augustinian priest; Vicent Carvalho, Portuguese Augustinian priest; Francisco de Jesús, Spanish Augustinian priest; Anthony Ishida-Pinto, Japanese Jesuit priest; Jerome de la Cruz Iyo (called de Torres by Boero), Japanese secular priest; Gabriel de S. Magdalena, Franciscan lay brother; all buried alive.

The 205 martyrs were beatified by Pope Pius IX in the brief of May 7, 1867 (feast, June 1 and Sept. 10).

This list of the 26 canonized and 205 beatified martyrs accounts for only a small group among thousands. Testimony has been taken on still others (but few in comparison to the total number), and even apostolic proceedings have been instituted, but none have been concluded. Originals or copies of these testimonies lie today in the archives in Rome, Madrid, Lisbon, and elsewhere. But juridical testimony is lacking in respect of the vast majority of those who, it seems, must also be called martyrs; their heroic deaths are known from annual letters, reports, etc. An unknown number of others have not even been given this purely historical recognition, and their number will probably never be known for certain.

Number of Martyrs in Japan

Only those who have been forcibly put to death for the sake of the faith are here called "martyrs." (The final judgment on this fact is, of course, the right of the Church.)

Earliest Catalogues. The number of the Japanese martyrs was a subject of study as early as the 1620s and 1630s. At that time Fathers Pedro Morejón and António Francisco Cardim, both active in the diocesan proceedings of the cause of the Japanese martyrs, compiled in the Jesuit College in Macau Martyr Lists based on the materials of the archives of the Jesuit Japanese province and giving the date, place, and manner of the martyrdom; this was thus a calculation of the number of the martyrs of Japan based on as accurate a foundation as possible. By Nov. 10, 1625, Morejón had already finished the list of the martyrs of the period from 1614 to 1624 and reached a figure of 550 (letter to the assistant N. Mascarenhas). On May 10, 1631, he wrote to Father Virgilio Cepari that the catalogue of martyrs already included almost 1,200 names. Morejón's work was continued by Cardim. In his report of May 24, 1646, on the Japanese province of the Jesuits, which he compiled in Rome, he was able to report from a thorough study that the number of martyrs in Japan had grown to 1,600 during four general persecutions up to the year 1640. Cardim published his catalogue in Rome in the same year.

More Recent Investigations. Masaharu Anesaki, the Salesian Mario Marega, and others have discovered that many more Christians died for the faith in the subsequent decades of the 17th century. Likewise the lists of Morejón and Cardim have been checked and expanded by L. Pagès, L. Delplace, SJ, M. Anesaki, and J. Laures, SJ. Laures concluded (June 1951) that 3,171 were actually executed while 874 perished in prison or while fleeing the bailiffs, etc. "Thus, 4,045 Christians would have become martyrs in the true sense of the word, for the sake of Christ." And here the ones who were slaughtered during the Shimabara uprising, especially upon the conquest of Hara-jō, are not included. Laures, who estimated their number at 35,000, stated that they could have saved themselves by renouncing the faith. He added: "It is simply impossible to procure even approximately accurate statistics on the positively endless number of those who were robbed of their possessions, driven out of house and home, thrown into prison, tortured in all conceivable manners to make them apostasize, or exiled from their country for the sake of Christ."

The total given by the authors mentioned, including J. Laures, can hardly be the final number. A careful examination of the European sources preserved indicates occasionally that there are gaps in knowledge of the martyrs. From the 1630s, the decline in the number of missionaries and the greater intensity of the persecution necessarily made it increasingly difficult for the Europeans to get exact information. The Japanese sources, which are now gradually becoming available, reveal a similar difficulty. Certainly the persecutions after 1640 put heavy pressure on many more thousands, perhaps tens of thousands. However, how many persons included in these numbers can be designated as martyrs in the strict sense of the term is very difficult to determine, especially since in legal action against simple folk the trial was short and aroused little notice. One of the best informed scholars on the question, Hubert Cieslik, SJ, is inclined to the view that some thousands can be added with confidence to the number of martyrs established above (however, their names are unknown). The number that the Japanese scholar Arai Hakuseki mentioned in passing in a memo-

Location: East Asia, between the North Pacific Ocean and the Sea of Japan, east of the Korean Peninsula.
Capital: Tokyo.
Size: 143,619 sq. miles.
Population: 126.5 million. The people are racially homogeneous, except for small communities of ethnic Koreans and Chinese.
Religions: More than three-quarters of the population observe both Shinto and Buddhism. Taoism, shamanism and new religious movements (e.g., Soka Gakkai, Rissho Kosei-kai, Tenrikyo and Konkokyo) attract a small but significant number of adherents. The Christian community is very small, comprising less than 1% of the total population.

random to the government c. 1710, namely, that 230,000 Christians died for their faith, has no satisfactory foundation, at least in the concept of martyrs as it has been defined above.

Bibliography: Though this presentation is based largely upon manuscripts of the 16th and 17th centuries, the following were used repeatedly for comparison: For the causes, course of the persecutions, and the psychological attitude of the Japanese toward martyrdom, L. FRÓIS (Froes), Die Geschichte Japans, 1549–78, tr. G. SCHURHAMMER and E. A. VORETZSCH (Leipzig 1926); Segunda parte da Historia de Japan, 1578–82, ed. J. A. ABRANCHES PINTO and Y. OKAMOTO (Tokyo 1938); Relación, del Martirio . . . , 1597, ed. R. GALDOS (Rome 1935); Kulturgegensätze Europa-Japan, 1585, ed. and tr. J. F. SCHÜTTE (Tokyo 1955). D. BARTOLI, Dell'istoria della Compagnie di Gesù l'Asia, 3 v. (Rome 1653–63). C. R. BOXER, The Christian Century in Japan, 1549–1650 (Berkeley 1951), bibliography. J. LAURES, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Japan (Kaldenkirchen 1956). Lists. A. F. CARDIM, Fasciculus e Iapponicis floribus, suo adhuc madentibus sanguine, 2 parts (Rome 1646); Catalogus regularium et secularium, qui Iapponiae regnis a fundata ubi a S. Francisco Xaverio, gentis apostolo, ecclesia, ab ethnicis in odium Christianae fidei sub quatuor tyrannis violenta morte sublatis sunt (Rome 1646); Mors felicissima quatuor legatorum Lusitanorum et sociorum, quos Iapponiae Imperator occidit in odium christianae religionis (Rome 1646). L. PAGÈS, op. cit. L. C. PROFILLET, Le Martyrologe de l'Église du Japon, 1549–1649, 3 v. (Paris 1895–97). M. ANESAKI, A Concordance to the History of Kirishitan Missions: Catholic Missions in Japan in the 16th and 17th Centuries (Tokyo 1930). For the number of martyrs, J. LAURES, "Die Zahl der Christen und Martyrer im alten Japan," in Monumenta Nipponica 7 (1951) 84–101. J. R. DE MEDINA, El martirologio del Japón, 1558–1873 (Rome 1999). P. HUMBERTCLAUDE, Guillaume Courtet: Dominicain français, martyr au Japon (1590–1637) (Paris 1981).

[J. F. SCHÜTTE]

JAPAN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Christianity first came to Japan in the mid-16th century. The history of Christianity in Japan is closely connected with the history of Japan's relations with the West.

Although the population of Christians remained small at the beginning of the 21st century, Christian churches continued to play a significant role in shaping the Japanese society through their higher educational institutions, medical institutions and public think-tanks.

Background. The Japanese islands were partially unified in the early 3rd century A.D. under Queen Himiko who pacified the warring ruling clans, set up her court at Yamatai and, relying on her religious powers as priestess, ruled over a confederation of more than 30 states. Subsequent contacts with China and Korea led to the Japanese adopting Chinese culture, writing, art and Confucianism. Complete political unification was achieved around the beginning of the 5th century A.D. under the Yamato rulers. With the achievement of political unification, Japanese civilization grew in stature and power from its center, first at Nara in the 8th century A.D., and then at Heian (modern Kyoto) from the latter part of the 8th century onwards. From the late 12th century until the mid-19th century, Japan was ruled by various military rulers who imposed varying degrees of isolationism. This self-imposed isolationism was broken in the 19th century by Commodore Perry, ushering in a new wave of modernization. In their determination to place Japan on par with the European colonial powers, the Japanese ruling elite embarked on a disastrous path of military expansion in Asia, leading to confrontation with the United States and its allies and to defeat in World War II. In the ensuing period, the Japanese people rebuilt their society and achieved spectacular economic growth, vaulting their nation to the forefront of the global economy.

Japanese Religion. The primitive religion of Japan, Shintō, the "Way of the Gods" (in Japanese, Kami), originated as a form of nature worship which deified the forces of nature and fostered ancestor worship. The Shintoism described in the early Japanese historical works, Kojiki (A.D. 712), Nihon Shoki (720), and others, had as its central theme the myth of the sun goddess Amaterasu, who was worshiped also as the ancestral mother of the imperial family. This ancestral connection resulted in Shintoism's continuing link with the national emperor worship (in Japanese, Tennō). Confucianism was introduced from China and exercised a significant influence on Japanese culture in tandem with native ancestor worship and national emperor worship. Buddhism was introduced from China by way of Korea in the 6th century A.D., and owed its rapid success to imperial patronage, the allure of monastic life and its unlimited adaptability, which made possible not only its assimilation to Japanese folkways, but also its syncretistic combination with Shintoism. Within Buddhism, the Amida (Pure Land), Nichiren (Lotus Sutra) and the many schools of Zen Buddhism captured Japanese popular imagination. The vitality of Nichiren Buddhism, an entirely indigenous Japanese Buddhist school, inspired many Japanese new religious movements in the twentieth century (e.g., Soka Gakkai and Rissho Kosei-kai).

HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN JAPAN

Origins. After the Portuguese opened trade relations with Japan (1543), St. FRANCIS XAVIER met three Japanese at Malacca (December 1547). Six months later they were received into the Church as the first converts. Accompanied by them and by Father Cosme de Torres and Brother John Fernandez, both Jesuits, Francis Xavier landed in Kagoshima in the southern part of Kyushu Island (Aug. 15, 1549). Because neither the Emperor nor the Ashikaga shogunate possessed real control of the country, the first missionaries had to rely on the consent of the local lords to begin their apostolate. During his stay in Japan (1549-51) Xavier founded communities in Kagoshima, Hirado, Yamaguchi, and Funai (Oita) with a total of about 800 Catholics. Assured of protection for the missionaries by Otomo Yoshishige, the most influential daimio in Kyushu, Xavier departed from Japan (November 1551).

Early Successes. His successor, Torres, directed activities until 1570, during a period of recurring civil war. Lack of priests, opposition from Buddhist bonzes, and imprudent zeal of some missionaries and new converts greatly hampered Christian progress during these years. Brother Luis d’Almeida, a very capable physician and merchant from Lisbon, who had joined the Jesuits in Japan in 1556, made a significant contribution to the expansion of Christianity in southern Japan by dedicating his fortune to establish a foundling home (1556) and a hospital (1557) in Funai, and by founding the missions in Omura, on the Shimabara Peninsula, on Goto and Amakusa Islands (1562-70), and in Nagasaki. In Kyushu many converts were from the lower class, but in central Japan Father Vilela and Brother Lourenço, joined later by Father Luis Frois, converted many noblemen. Kyoto, Sakai, and Imori became the first Christian centers there.

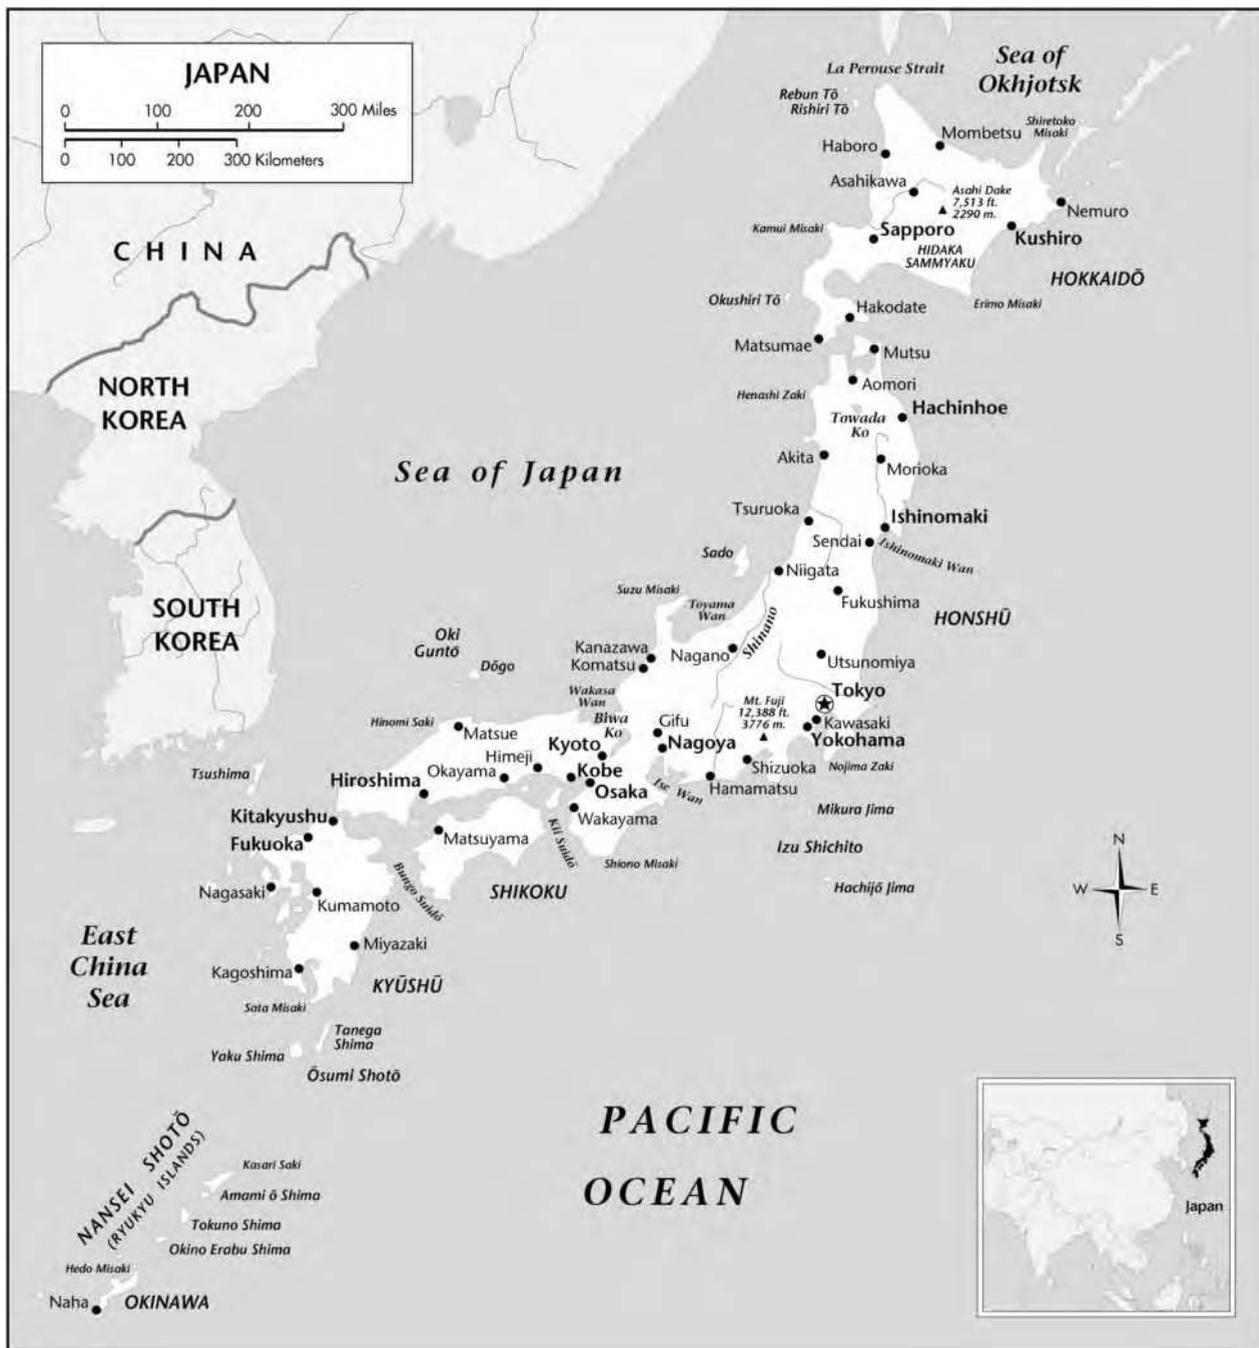

When Torres died (October 1570), Japan had about 30,000 Christians. Under his strong-willed successor Francisco Cabral, SJ (1570–81), the converts included the feudal lords of Arima and Amakusa, and Otomo Sorin of Bungo and about 100,000 in Kyushu. The Lord of Omura had been baptized in 1563. After 1568 the missionaries in central Japan enjoyed the protection of Oda Nobunaga, the pioneer of the movement that led to the restoration of a strong central government in a united Japanese Empire. After moving his headquarters from Gifu to Azuchi, Nobunaga gave the Jesuits a property near his new castle. Nearby, Father Organtino dedicated the

Metropolitan Sees	Suffragans
Nagasaki	Fukuoka, Kagoshima, Naha, Oita
Osaka	Hiroshima, Kyoto, Nagoya, Takamatsu
Tokyo	Niigata, Sapporo, Sendai, Urawa, Yokohama
Apostolic Prefecture:	Karafuto

newly constructed church to Our Lady of the Assumption (Nambanji) in Kyoto (Aug. 15, 1577) and also constructed a seminary and another church.

During the last three years of Nobunaga’s reign (1579–82), Alessandro VALIGNANO made his first official visit to Japan as Jesuit visitor general. In lower Kyushu he received a rather poor impression. Several lords had become Christians from self-interest and had compelled their vassals to follow their example without sufficient preparation. Mass conversions in Arima were followed by mass desertions because of the attitude of the local lord. After visiting nearly all Christian centers and interviewing missionaries, catechists, and many Christians, Valignano reorganized the Japanese mission. To remedy the scarcity of missionaries, Valignano founded a novitiate and a college for the spiritual and scientific training of young Jesuits and also two seminaries for the education of boys desiring to become priests or catechists. He ordered European missionaries to study the Japanese language more thoroughly and to adapt themselves to Japanese ways. Since Cabral, the superior of the mission, opposed these changes, Valignano removed him from office (1581) and appointed in his place Gaspar Coelho, who became the first Jesuit vice provincial of Japan. A few months before leaving Japan, Valignano conceived the plan of taking along with him some young Japanese nobles as envoys from the Christian daimios of Bungo, Arima, and Omura, to the pope and the king of Spain. By means of this embassy Valignano hoped to arouse more European interest in Japan and to obtain material support for the Church there. He wanted also to give the young Japanese an opportunity to contact European culture. The envoys left Japan (Feb. 20, 1582), accompanied by Valignano as far as India, and by Father Diogo Mesquita from there to Rome and then back to Japan (1582–90). At the end of Valignano’s first visitation Japan had about 150,000 Christians, two-thirds of whom lived in Kyushu.

After Nobunaga’s assassination (1582), his most capable general, Toyotomi Hideyoshi (generally known by his title Taikosama), son of a woodcutter, inherited his master’s territories and carried on the work of unifying the country. Like Nobunaga, Hideyoshi was an enemy of the militant bonzes and for some years showed a rather favorable attitude toward Christianity. When the powerful anti-Christian Shimazu from southern Kyushu were on the point of subduing to their rule the entire island of Kyushu (1586–87), Hideyoshi acceded to the requests of the Otomo and Father Coelho by coming to their rescue with an army of 200,000. In Hideyoshi's service were Konishi Yukinaga and his father Ryusa, Takayama Ukon, Kuroda Yoshitaka, and other fervent Catholics. Through their efforts new churches were erected in Osaka, Sakai, Takatsuki, and Akashi. After Hideyoshi subdued Kyushu, he bestowed half of its fiefs on Christian lords.

The First Great Persecution. It was at this time that the first severe blow struck the Church and its 200,000 members. At the instigation of the former bonze Seyakuin Senso, a personal foe of Takayama Ukon and a bitter enemy of Christianity, Hideyoshi sent Ukon into exile and published a decree ordering the missionaries to leave Japan within 20 days (July 24, 1587). The real reasons for Hideyoshi's change of attitude are still imperfectly known. Most likely he was deeply offended by Coelho's refusal to deliver to him a well-armed ship, by the refusal of the Portuguese captain to bring his ship to Hakata, and by the refusal of other Christians to sacrifice their faith in exchange for Hideyoshi's favor. Most of the missionaries assembled in the port of Hirado, but others went into hiding. Since Hideyoshi did not enforce his decree for long, almost all the missionaries remained in Japan, under the protection of the Christian lords of Kyushu.

Before news of Hideyoshi's anti-Christian edict reached Europe, Pope Sixtus V created (Feb. 19, 1588) the Diocese of Funai (Oita), the first see in Japan. About the same time Valignano, accompanied by the four returning Japanese envoys, revisited Japan (1590–92). This time he came as ambassador of the Portuguese viceroy of India. Valignano and his entourage were received in audience by Hideyoshi (March 3, 1591). Although Valignano could not persuade Hideyoshi to abrogate his edict, he was allowed to move freely about Japan and received permission for ten priests to stay in Nagasaki.

In 1592 Juan Cobo, OP, arrived from Manila as an envoy of the governor of the Philippines. After Cobo's tragic death (1592), four Spanish Franciscans came to Japan from the Philippines on an embassy (1593). When they completed their business, they did not return home but remained in Japan and evangelized openly in Kyoto, Osaka, and Nagasaki. Two Franciscans and two Augustinians had visited Japan for two months in 1584 while on their way from Manila to China.

When the Spanish vessel San Felipe was stranded at Urado in Shikoku (Oct. 19, 1596), it started a fresh outbreak of Hideyoshi's anti-Christian animus. At his order the ship's rich cargo was confiscated and 26 Christians (six Franciscans, three Jesuits, and 17 Japanese lay persons) were put to death in Nagasaki on Feb. 5, 1597. These martyrs were canonized in 1862 (see JAPAN, MARTYRS OF). About that time most of the Christian lords were participating in the Korean war (1592–98), which ended soon after Hideyoshi's death (Sept. 16, 1598). For more than a year during this war Gregorio de Cespedes, SJ, and a Japanese Jesuit lay brother resided in Korea to minister to the Japanese Christian soldiers. During the years of restricted toleration (1587–98) the number of Christians came to exceed 300,000. Among the converts in central Japan (1595–96) were two sons of Maeda Munehisa, the governor of Kyoto; Oda Hidenobu, a grandson of Nobunaga; Hosokawa Okimoto; Kyogoku Takatomo; and Akashi Kamon. From 1598 to 1603

Roman Catholic Church, Nagasaki, Japan. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Valignano visited Japan for the third time, bringing with him Bp. Luis Cerqueira, SJ, the sole bishop who was permitted to reside in Nagasaki. He resided there until his death (Feb. 20, 1614). His predecessor, Bp. Pedro Martins (d. February 1598), had to leave Japan a few months after his arrival (1596) because of the new outbreak of persecution. Between the time of Hideyoshi's death and the outbreak of civil war (October 1600) many churches were rebuilt and more than 70,000 converts were won. When Konishi Yukinaga leagued with the enemy during the civil war, Tokugawa Ieyasu became enraged against Christianity. Konishi, the most influential Christian daimio, was put to death. Fortunately the Christian daimios Kuroda Yoshitaka and his son Nagamasa supported Ieyasu. This, coupled with the decided attitude of other Christian lords and an eagerness to continue trade with the Portuguese and Spaniards, made Ieyasu refrain from more hostile acts against Christianity.

The 17th-Century Suppression of Christianity. Ieyasu's somewhat tolerant attitude during the first decade of his rule permitted the Church to make notable progress. In 1601 the churches of Nagasaki, Kyoto, and Osaka were granted legal recognition. The Franciscans were allowed to build churches in Yedo (1599) and in Uruga (1608). The missionary personnel was greatly augmented. By 1614 there were 140 Jesuits, 26 Franciscans, nine Dominicans, four Augustinians, and more than 400,000 Christians. From 1601 Nagasaki was the seat of the bishop and had a Jesuit college and novitiate, a seminary to train diocesan clergy, a printing press, and an academy of fine arts for the formation of painters and engravers; it became the most important Christian center. In 1611 Nagasaki had 11 churches and 40,000 Catholics. Between 1601 and 1614 Bishop Cerqueira ordained 15 Japanese priests (seven diocesan and eight Jesuits). Nevertheless, the Japanese Church's growth was greatly hampered by Ieyasu's anti-Christian edicts. Early in his reign he issued a decree forbidding all daimios and nobles to embrace Christianity. Christian lords were often urged to renounce their faith. As a result no mass conversions occurred after 1600, and many Christian lords abandoned their faith. For example, So Yoshitomo, Lord of Tsushima did so in 1600; Omura Yoshiaki, Mori Takamasa, and Goto Sumiharu, in 1606; and Arima Naozumi, in 1612 after his father's scandalous behavior in a bribery affair with Okamoto Daihachi, the Christian secretary of Ieyasu's minister Honda Masazumi. By that time Ieyasu, an ardent devotee of Buddhism since childhood, had become violently hostile to Christianity. Suden, a Zen priest; Hyashi Razan, a Confucian, Hasegawa Sahyoe, the governor of Nagasaki; and William Adams, an English sea pilot influenced this attitude; they were advisers of Ieyasu and bitter enemies of the missionaries. Another factor in Ieyasu's change of outlook was that by 1613 the prospects for expanded trade with the Spanish, Dutch, and English competitors had improved, and the activity of the Japanese fleet engaged in catching red seals had increased. These developments greatly reduced the importance of the Portuguese trade. Particularly injurious was the influence of William Adams, who in 1612 replaced João Rodriguez, SJ, as Ieyasu's commercial adviser. In this function he gave sinister interpretations to current events, such as the survey of the east coast by Vizcaino with the support of the daimio Date Masamune. Furthermore, an antigovernment conspiracy was discovered about the time that Masamune sent Hasekura Tsunemasa (Rokuemon) and Father Luis Sotelo with 150 Japanese as envoys to the king of Spain and the pope (1613–20).

Peter Tatsuo Doi, who became the first Japanese cardinal in 1960. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

The persecution edict of Jan. 27, 1614, manifested the intent of the Tokugawa regime to unify Japan by giving strong support to the national religions of Buddhism and Shintoism. The revival of Shintoism was inspired by the renaissance of Confucianism, which began c. 1600. The result of the edict was that all churches and missionary centers were destroyed within a year. More than 90 missionaries, together with Takayama Ukon, John Naito, and other leading Christians, had to leave Japan for Macau in China and Manila (November 1614); but at least 37 priests remained in the country to care for the faithful. After Ieyasu's death (April 17, 1616), the persecution grew in violence under his son Hidetada (1605–23); it reached its peak during the reign of Iemitsu (1623–51). To avoid depopulating entire districts, the persecutors resorted to increasingly cruel punishments, so that Christians would apostatize rather than face the horrors involved in martyrdom. It has been estimated that more than 4,000 Christians sacrificed their lives for their faith during this persecution.

This total does not include any of the 35,000 victims of the Shimabara rebellion (1637–38), which was caused by the intolerable fiscal exploitation of the poor peasants in the Shimabara Peninsula by Matsukura Shigeharu. This uprising developed later into a religious war and incited the Tokugawa government to sever all commercial relations with the Portuguese (July 5, 1639). The Dutch came to be the only Europeans allowed to have a factory on Deshima in Nagasaki. When a group of 74 Portuguese from Macau came to Nagasaki in 1640 in a last effort to reopen trade relations, 61 of them were put to death. The survivors were forced to witness the execution of their companions before being sent back to Macau with the warning that "Even if King Felipe himself, or even the God of the Christians, or the great Buddha contravened this prohibition, they shall pay for it with their heads!"

The last missionaries to Japan came in 1642 and 1643; they were quickly arrested, tortured, and executed. It was not until 1708 that another priest came. When Giovanni Sidotti, an Italian secular priest, landed at Yakushima (1708) he was arrested, imprisoned in Yedo, and interrogated by the famous Confucian scholar and statesman Arai Hakuseki (1657–1725). After converting his guard, Sidotti was thrown into an underground cell, where he died from starvation (Nov. 15, 1715).

Mid-19th Century Revival. For about two centuries the Church in Japan was cut off from contacts with the outside world. In 1844 Father Theodore Forcade, of the Paris Foreign Mission Society (MEP), disembarked at Naha in the Ryukyu Islands. He remained there until 1846 without being able to proceed farther. Not until Commodore Matthew Perry of the U.S. Navy induced (1853–54) Japan to open its doors to foreigners was it possible for another Paris Foreign Mission priest, Louis Théodore Furet to accompany a French commandant to Japan as an interpreter for a short while in 1855. After the United States, England, Russia, and France had concluded commercial treaties with Japan (1858–59), Paris Foreign Mission priests received permission to dwell in Yokohama (1859), Hakodate (1859), and Nagasaki (1863). It was in Nagasaki that Bernard Petitjean, MEP discovered (on March 17, 1865) a group of descendants of 17th-century Christians who had preserved their faith for two centuries in secret, despite persecutions and lack of priests. Later discoveries revealed that there were more than 15,000 such Christians in Kyushu. As the result of a new outbreak of persecution (1867–73) more than 4,000 Nagasaki Catholics were exiled. Many of them died from starvation and other forms of mistreatment.

Religious freedom was granted tentatively in 1873. The Meiji constitution of Feb. 11, 1889 gave a permanent guarantee of this liberty. This changed atmosphere permitted the bishops of Japan and Korea to hold in Nagasaki their first synod (March 1890). In 1890 the first regional seminary for Japan was established in Nagasaki. By 1894, 23 Japanese had been ordained there. In 1891 Pope Leo XIII established the Japanese hierarchy. The Archdiocese of Tokyo became the metropolitan see, with Hakodate, Osaka, and Nagasaki as suffragans. Previous to this, the single vicariate apostolic for all of Japan, created March 27, 1846, had been divided in 1876 into a northern and southern vicariate. The Vicariate of Central Japan was created in 1888. The Prefecture Apostolic of Karafuto was created in 1938. Tokyo was the scene of both the second (1895) and third (1924) synods of Japanese bishops. In 1925 a second regional seminary was opened in Tokyo. In 1946 the Jesuits assumed charge of it and subsequently incorporated it into the Catholic Sophia University.

Church of San Filippo at Nagasaki, Japan. The church stands near the site where 26 Christians, Japanese and Portuguese, were crucified after the outlawing of Christianity in Japan in the late 16th century. (©Ric Ergenbright/CORBIS)

The Paris Foreign Mission Society pioneered the 19th-century apostolate in Japan. Next to arrive were the Sisters of St. Maur who came in 1873. The coming of other religious congregations of women since 1877 has permitted the inauguration of numerous educational and social welfare activities. Until 1899 foreign missionaries were allowed into the interior of Japan under close supervision that required them to possess special passports. They were forbidden also to possess any residence and property outside the foreign concessions. These restrictions disappeared in 1899 when the whole of Japan was opened to foreigners. To provide adequate missionary personnel, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1904 invited other religious institutes to send members to Japan. In reply the Marianists, whose educational work in Japan started in 1888, dispatched more members; so did the Trappists, whose first arrival was in 1896. Dominicans came in 1905; and the Society of the Divine Word in 1907. The Franciscans returned in 1906 and the Jesuits in 1908. The Paris Foreign Mission Society (MEP), which in Japan as elsewhere was always specially intent on training candidates for the priesthood, sent ten Japanese seminarians to Penang, Malaysia, in 1868 at the outbreak of persecution. Once persecution had ceased, they returned to Japan. The first three Japanese priests were ordained in 1882.

The Japanese mission undertook an educational apostolate early. After the Meiji restoration, however, the field of elementary education became more and more a government monopoly and the Church concentrated on Catholic secondary schools. The Marianists opened (1888) the first middle school for boys. Various religious orders opened secondary schools for girls from 1900 onwards. The first Catholic University (Sophia) was started in 1913 in Tokyo by the Jesuits, who were entrusted with this task by Pope Pius X. Catholic charitable works aroused admiration among non-Christians, particularly the care of the plague-stricken during the cholera epidemics of 1886 and 1890, the housing of abandoned girls, and the direction of leprosaria.

The imperial rescript on education (Oct. 30, 1890) imposed on all the cult of the imperial ancestors as a sacred duty of the Japanese people. After the outbreak of hostilities with China (1894) the influence of the militarist party, anti-Christian campaigns by intellectuals, such as Inoue Tetsujiro (1855–1944) and others set up new barriers against the progress of Christianity. The prospects for Christianity became even less enviable after the outbreak of the Manchurian war (1931), when Shintoism was identified with patriotism. The very existence of Catholic schools and, with them, the existence of the Church itself, was seriously menaced in 1932. A new threat came in 1939 with the promulgation of the Religious Organization Bill, which aimed to place all religious personnel and activities under close government control. The resignation of all foreign ordinaries and their replacement by Japanese bishops saved the Catholic Church in Japan from further government interference. During World War II most foreign priests were repatriated; many churches, convents, and schools were destroyed, and 13,097 Catholics, including 15 priests, lost their lives.

Rebuilding. The new democratic constitution (Nov. 3, 1946) imposed by the United States on Japan guaranteed complete freedom of religion to all. As the Catholic population increased, new dioceses were erected. Nagasaki, which had been a diocese since 1891, became in 1959 an archdiocese and metropolitan see, with Fukuoka, Hiroshima, and Kagoshima as suffragans, to which was added Oita in 1961. The apostolic delegation, established in 1919, was elevated to the status of internunciature on April 28, 1952.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN JAPAN SINCE VATICAN II

The Impact of Vatican II. The Second Vatican Council brought about major changes in the practices and attitudes of Japanese Catholics. The change that had the greatest ramifications was the introduction of Japanese language and artistic forms in the liturgy. George Hirschboeck, MM, director of the Catechetical Center in Kyoto, was among the first to apply the insights of Vatican II in the Japanese Church. His team of catechists, trained at the Jesuit East Asian Pastoral Institute in Manila, produced literature and sponsored workshops on the new directions of the Church in mission. Kakichi Kadowaki, SJ, East-West Religious Research director at Sophia University, promoted Japanese art forms that combined Buddhist tradition, Zen practice, and Christian prayer. Father Kadowaki also produced ancient Noh drama with Christian themes in Japan and Europe. From the 1970s onwards, the Japanese Church became a sending Church. A Japanese lay mission organization was formed under Bishop Fumio Hamao, with members in the Philippines, Cambodia, and Indonesia. Japanese missionaries, clerical, religious, and lay, went abroad to serve the Church in 47 countries in Africa, Southeast Asia, South America, and Oceania.

National Incentive Congresses. The desire to make the Christian presence more widely felt in Japanese society took new directions after Pope John Paul II's visit to Japan in 1981. The pope inspired a strong sense of Catholic identity and emphasized the responsibility of the local church for evangelization. This prompted the Japanese Bishops' Conference in June 1984 to publish a statement, "Basic Policies and Priorities of the Catholic Church in Japan." This paved the way for the first National Incentive Congress on Evangelization (NICE), Nov. 20–23, 1987, which brought together bishops, clergy, religious, and laity in Kyoto. Working on the theme of "Building an Open Church," the congress produced two important initiatives: to bring the light of the Gospel to social issues, and to build programs for lifelong growth in faith. One result was the establishment of a Japan Catholic Research and Training Center in Nagoya. A decade later, NICE II met in Nagasaki, Oct. 21–24, 1993, with the theme "to look for the ideal way of evangelization through the reality of the family."

Educational Ministry. The Christian contribution to the educational world of Japan is well-known and documented. Protestant missionaries founded the universities of Rikkyo (St. Paul), Aoyama, and Doshisha. The Jesuits operate Sophia University in Tokyo, while the Divine Word Society operates Nanzan University in Nagoya. Religious communities of women have operated distinguished colleges for girls, such as Sacred Heart, Shirayuri, and Futaba in the Tokyo area. In the Kyoto Diocese, Notre Dame Women's College was established by the School Sisters of Notre Dame from St. Louis in 1961. The chaos of 1969, when university administrators battled rioting students, resulted in the Japanese Ministry of Education taking control of university education. In the ensuing reorganization, all church-run universities and colleges lost their independence and autonomy. In return, the government subsidizes the operating costs of private universities and colleges.

Justice and Peace. One of the early results of Vatican II was the establishment of the Justice and Peace Office of the Bishops' Conference. Bishop Nobuo Soma took over this responsibility in the mid-1970s and built a very influential force for Christian justice in Asia. In the 1970s, the Japanese Justice and Peace Office brought to world attention the repression and exploitation of the Church in the Philippines during the Marcos era. In the early 1980s, it publicized the oppression endured by the South Korean Church under the military dictatorship, and appealed to the United Nations on behalf of the people of East Timor in their struggle for freedom. After Pope John Paul II's visit to Hiroshima and his worldwide "Peace Appeal" in February 1981, the Japanese Bishops' Conference issued a statement titled "Peace and the Japanese Catholic Church Today," which emphasized the importance of peace education and the participation of the whole Church in peace making. Episcopal concern led the Church to work with other Japanese religious leaders for world peace.

Subsequent Catholic justice and peace efforts have targeted two areas of discrimination within Japan: the Burakumin problem ("the Fourth Class") and Korean residents in Japan. The Kyoto Justice and Peace Council brought the issue of the Burakumin to its national gathering in 1978. Members of the Burakumin, a segregated community easily identified by their registration papers, were objects of prejudice in marriage arrangements and employment. In December 1987 the Catholic Church dropped the requirement that those seeking marriage provide copies of their family registries. The situation of Korean residents predated World War II. Korean laborers were seized, brought to Japan and forced to work in industrial plants. After the war many Koreans remained in Japan, forming a minority community of some 700,000 in 1993. Initially, as aliens, they had to be fingerprinted and were frequently discriminated against. In February 1984 the Episcopal Commission for Social Activities petitioned the Prime Minister, the Justice Minister, and the Home Affairs Minister to repeal the fingerprinting requirement of the Alien Registration Law. Father Edouard Brzostowski, a missionary, dramatized the issue in October 1984 by refusing to be fingerprinted, and other foreign missionaries did likewise. Active awareness movements led to the revision of the fingerprinting law in 1987. Second and third generation Koreans born in Japan no longer needed to be fingerprinted, but other aliens were still required to be fingerprinted upon arrival in Japan.

Interfaith Dialogue Another area where the influence of Vatican II has been felt is the relationship of the Church to non-Christian religions. Jesuit pioneers Heinrich Dumoulin and Enomiya Lasalle had introduced Zen and its prayer forms to the Japanese Church and seminarians in the 1950s and 1960s. After the Council Dominican Shigeto Oshida established a rural farm where he conducted Bible studies and reflection groups in a Japanese Zen pattern. Xaverian Franco Sottocornola set up Seimeizan in Kumamoto in 1987 as an inter-religious dialogue temple where Buddhist and Christian traditions meet in mutual respect. In 1979 Jan Van Bragt, CICM, organized an ongoing exchange of Buddhist and Christian monks. Four years later, 17 European monks visited Kyoto to experience the Buddhist monastic life. August 1987 witnessed a gathering of world religious leaders for a Religions Peace Meeting at the Japanese Buddhist center on Mt. Hiei, above Kyoto.

A certain ambivalence, however, marks the attitude of the average Japanese Catholic towards interreligious dialogue. At one level, it seems to have made little practical difference in their faith. Like most other Japanese, Catholics regard multiple religious affiliation as normal. It is common practice in Japan for a person to be taken to a Shinto shrine as a baby, to celebrate a Christian wedding, and to have a Buddhist funeral. On another level, Japanese Catholics recognize the spiritual implications of cooperating with leaders of other religions in peace movements, social concerns, and environmental issues.

Ecumenical Relations and Cooperation. Although Dutch and British Protestants had commercial relations with Japan from about 1600, they did not inaugurate mission activities until 1859. Among the first arrivals were the American Episcopalian Channing M. Williams (1859) and the Presbyterians Hepburn (1861), Werbeck (1861), and Thompson (1863). Protestants completed the translation into Japanese of the New Testament (1880) and of the Old Testament (1887). As early as 1877 several Protestant groups started to merge into one association. Since 1890 this association has been called Nippon Kirisuto Kyōkai (Church of Christ in Japan). The Russian Orthodox Church was introduced in Japan in 1861 by Ivan Kasotkin (Nicolai), who was subsequently canonized in 1970 for his role in establishing Orthodox Christianity in Japan. Constituting less than one percent of the population, Catholics, Orthodox and Protestants find themselves a minority in the Japanese world. They have combined efforts in justice and peace activity, social programs, and prayer meetings. Activists in both communities find a mutual understanding and purpose in confronting public issues, and charismatics from both traditions find it congenial to pray together. One great achievement of the Japanese ecumenical movement is the common Bible translation of 1987 that forms the basis of worship for both Catholics and Protestants.

Bibliography: J. LAURES, Kirishitan Bunko (Tokyo 1957); The Catholic Church in Japan: A Short History (Rutland, Vt. 1954). A. EBIZAWA, Christianity in Japan (Tokyo 1960). J. JENNES, History of the Catholic Church in Japan, 1549–1873 (Tokyo 1959). J. L. VAN HECKEN, The Catholic Church in Japan since 1859, tr. J. VAN HOYDONCK (Tokyo 1963). R. HAMMER, Japan's Religious Torment (London 1961). CATHOLIC CENTRAL COMMITTEE, Cathopedia '92 (Tokyo 1992). R. H. DRUMMOND, History of Christianity in Japan (Grand Rapids 1971). Y. KUMAZAWA and D. SWAIN, Christianity in Japan, 1971–90 (Tokyo 1991). P. F. O'DONOGHUE, Japanese Catholics (Tokyo 1985). J. M. PHILLIPS, From the Rising of the Sun: Christians and Society in Contemporary Japan (New York 1981). D. REID, New Wine: The Cultural Shaping of Japanese Christianity (Nagoya 1991). J. J. SPAE, Japanese Religiosity (Tokyo 1971); Christianity Encounters Japan (Tokyo 1968); Christian Corridors to Japan (Tokyo 1965). M. SUZUKI, Japan Catholic History (Tokyo 1993).

[A. SCHWADE/P. F. O'DONOGHUE/EDS.]

JARICOT, PAULINE

Foundress of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith; b. Lyons, France, July 22, 1799; d. Lyons, Jan. 9, 1862. On Christmas Day 1816 she took a perpetual vow of virginity. At the age of 17 she founded the Union of Prayers in Reparation to the Sacred Heart, an organization of servant girls. It was among them that she first solicited contributions for the foreign missions. In 1820 she formed an Association to Aid the Society of Foreign Missions of Paris, and in 1826 the Association of the Living Rosary. Each member was assigned a certain decade to say daily. This association also spread good books and distributed articles of piety. She founded the Loretta, a home for working girls, promoted the Association of the Holy Childhood, and engaged in other apostolic works for women of all classes.

Her main preoccupation, however, was to help the foreign missions through the alms and prayers of the faithful. In 1822 Angelo Inglesi, Vicar-General of New Orleans, came to Lyons to raise funds for his mission. He gathered a group of 12 laymen into an association. Because of Pauline Jaricot's success in such work, this association joined with her existing group to form the Society for the Propagation of the Faith (May 3, 1822). Pauline Marie Jaricot is recognized as the foundress. At the time it was called also the Missionary Society of Lyons or the St. Francis Xavier Society. There was much discussion of the fund-raising technique. Pauline's, a simple system through which a promoter found ten persons to contribute a cent a week and who turned these funds over to another person in charge of ten promoters, and so on, was adopted. In 1822 the society collected more than $4,000.

The cause of her canonization was introduced in 1930. On Feb. 25, 1963, the Congregation of Rites declared that she had practiced virtue to a heroic degree.

Bibliography: J. MAURIN, Pauline Marie Jaricot . . ., tr. E. SHEPPARD (New York 1906). D. LATHOUD, Marie-Pauline Jaricot, 2 v. (Paris 1937). J. JOLINON, Pauline Jaricot (Paris 1956). K. BURTON, Difficult Star: The Life of Pauline Jaricot (New York 1947). M. CRISTIANI, Marie-Pauline Jaricot (Paris 1961). J. SERVEL, ed., Un Autre visage: Textes inédits de Pauline Jaricot (Lyons 1961). G. GORÉE, Pauline Jaricot, une laïque engagée (Paris 1962).

[J. A. MCCOY]

JARRETT, BEDE

Dominican preacher, historian, and spiritual writer; b. Greenwich, England, Aug. 22, 1881; d. London, March 17, 1934. The son of Col. H. S. and Agnes (née Beaufort) Jarrett, he was named Cyril at Baptism. After studying at Stonyhurst he entered the Dominicans at Woodchester in 1898 and was given the name Bede at his reception of the habit. He made his philosophical and theological studies at Woodchester and Hawkesyard. In 1904 he was the first Dominican in modern times to be sent to the University of Oxford, where he read history and took his degree in 1907. The following year he spent in Louvain, where he received his lectorate in theology. He was thereupon assigned to parish work in London. He was made prior of the London house of his order in 1914 and was elected provincial of the province of England in 1916, in which office he served for 16 years. During his provincialate Jarrett opened a study house for Dominicans at Oxford in 1921; it became a priory in 1929. He established a house at Edinburgh in 1931, transferred the school for boys to Laxton in 1924, and extended the work of the English Dominicans to South Africa in 1917. He helped the congregations of English Dominican Sisters in effecting their amalgamation. Despite his involvement in administration, he managed to find time for scholarly work and spiritual writing. At the expiration of his provincialate, Jarrett became the second prior of the house he had established at Oxford. He had a remarkable genius for friendship, was a man of vision and an exemplary Dominican—many have said that his St. Dominic (London 1924) was an unconscious self-portrait—who profoundly influenced all who knew him. Among his other works, all published in London, were: Medieval Socialism (1913), St. Antonino and Medieval Economics (1914), Social Theories of the Middle Ages (1926), A History of Europe (1929), The Emperor Charles IV (posthumous, 1935), Religious Life (1920), The English Dominicans (1921), Meditations for Layfolk (1915), Living Temples (1919), The Space of Life Between (1930), The House of Gold (1931), and No Abiding City (1934).

Bibliography: K. WYKEHAM-GEORGE and G. MATHEW, Bede Jarrett (London 1952). W. GUMBLEY, Obituary Notices of the English Dominicans from 1555 to 1952 (London 1955).

[S. BULLOUGH]

JARRIGE, CATHERINE, BL.

Also known as Catinon Menette, lay Dominican tertiary; b. Oct. 4, 1754, Doumis near Cantal and Mauriac, Diocese of Saint-Flour, France; d. July 4, 1836, Mauriac, France. The youngest of seven children in a poor family, Catinon Menette ("Catherine the Little Nun") entered domestic service at age nine. About 1774, she moved to Mauriac, became a DOMINICAN tertiary, and rearranged her priorities so that she could live the Rule of the menettes in its entirety. By this time she was employed as a lace-maker to rent the garret room she shared with her sister. In her free time Catherine responded to the needs of the less fortunate, often by begging on their behalf. During the FRENCH REVOLUTION, she established and supplied a covert network of safe houses to protect refugee priests and deliver them to safety. Though she was arrested several times, the authorities were never able to convict her of any offense. Following the Reign of Terror, Catherine continued her charity, assisted in repairing the hospital, supervised the renovation of her parish church, and urged the lapsed to return to the Church. Her cause for beatification was not opened until 1929. She was declared venerable in 1953 and a miracle attributed to her intercession was approved June 25, 1996, which opened the way for her beatification by John Paul II, Nov. 24, 1996.

Feast: July 4.

Bibliography: M. C. DE GANAY, La Menette des prêtres, Catherine Jarrige (S. Maximin, France 1923). V. MARMOITON, La vie héroïque de Catherine Jarrige (Toulouse 1956). J. B. SERRES, Catherine Jarrige, dite Catinon Menette (Paris 1864, 3d ed. 1910). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed. 48 (1996): 1-3.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JARROW, ABBEY OF

Former English Benedictine monastery in Northumbria, England, on the Tyne River, in the present town of

Bede Jarrett.

Jarrow, six miles east of Newcastle upon Tyne. Dedicated to St. Paul, Jarrow was settled by CEOLFRID in 681 with 22 monks, almost eight years after its founder, Abbot BENEDICT BISCOP, had founded its sister abbey of WEARMOUTH (dedicated to St. Peter), about six miles to the southeast. Following customs based on the BENEDICTINE RULE, the two monasteries, both established on land presented by King Egfrid of Northumbria, comprised a joint foundation. These two abbeys were usually ruled by the same abbot; Ceolfrid eventually succeeded Benedict Biscop as the second abbot. It was at Jarrow that Venerable BEDE spent his life. Many of the community died of the plague in 686, and the abbey was sacked by the Norse (794), by the Danes (867-870), and by King William I the Conqueror (1069). Walcher, bishop of Durham, restored Jarrow in 1072. In 1083 both Jarrow and Wearmouth were reduced to the status of cells of DURHAM; both were dissolved in 1536 under King HENRY VIII. Jarrow was an important center of civilization and learning. Its SCRIPTORIUM may have produced the Codex Amia- tinus of the Vulgate; its library seems also to have had the Itala version of the Bible.

Bibliography: “Historia abbatum auctore Baeda” and “Historia abbatum auctore anonymo” (used by Bede), ed. C. PLUMMER, in Baedae opera historica, 2 v. (Oxford 1896) 1:364–404. W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73) 1:501–503. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 7:2163–64. D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953). J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (Cambridge, Eng. 1962).

[C. MCGRATH]

JASHAR (YASHAR), BOOK OF

One of the last compositions of the Jewish haggadic literature, pretending to be the book of this name (now lost) that is mentioned in Jos 10.13 and 2 Sm 1.18 (the latter passage is misunderstood in the Vulgate and Douay Version). It is written in good Hebrew and covers the period from Adam to the Judges (see HAGGADAH; MIDRASHIC LITERATURE). Most of the work is concerned with the pre-Mosaic era, a fifth of it with the Mosaic period, and only three pages with later history. In elaborating on the Biblical themes, the author introduces entire sections, which he inserts between the Biblical texts. For example, he invents a long explanation of Cain’s murder of Abel, and he adds a lengthy genealogy of Noah’s descendants. Abraham’s life is narrated in an elaborate manner, including an apparition of a star to him, and other details such as his two visits to his son Ishmael. Many other similar legends are thus added to various parts of the Biblical text.

This haggadic retelling of the Biblical story contains, no doubt, many ancient elements, but no critical or literary study of it has yet been made. There are interesting parallels between it and the writings of Flavius JOSEPHUS and PHILO JUDAEUS, which it would be most useful to examine scientifically (see JOSIPPON). The author’s acquaintance with Italian place names, such as Tuscany, Lombardy, and the Tiber, indicates Italian origin; Arabic names also point to southern Italy, which was strongly influenced by Arabic culture in the 11th-century.

Bibliography: M. SELIGSOHN, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 7:74. S. OSCHER, ibid. 12:588–589.

[A. BRUNOT]

JASOV, ABBEY OF

Premonstratensian monastery, located near Košice in Slovakia. It was founded c. 1220, but the Tatars destroyed the buildings and reduced the archives to ashes. King Bela IV (d. 1270) rebuilt and enlarged it. From 1436 to 1591 Jasov was besieged by the Turks; after 1552 it was held by commendatory abbots and no canons lived there. From 1614 to 1650 it was the seat of the cathedral chapter of Eger. The PREMONSTRATENSIIANS repossessed it in 1697 and under Abbot Andraeas Sauberer (1745–70) it was restored and proclaimed independent of Klosterbruck. Joseph II suppressed the abbey on March 26, 1787, but 25 years later it was reestablished. Jasov controlled the Institute Norbertinum in Budapest and conducted gymnasia in Leles, Great Varadin, Košice, and Rožňava. In 1922 Jasov became an abbey nullius with eight incorporated parishes. In 1924 Jasov opened a gymnasium with a resident community in Gödöllö, and in 1935 a gymnasium was added to the community in Košice. After World War II Jasov’s possessions were confiscated by the government, and when the religious orders were suppressed Jasov became a concentration camp for religious women. On April 14, 1950, Premonstratensians, Jesuits, and other religious men from Slovakia replaced the sisters in the camp.

Bibliography: Schematismus ven. cleri admin. apost. Cass. Satmar. (Košice 1948) 63. Schematismus ven. cleri dioec. Cassoviensis (Košice 1943) 32. Katolícké Slovensko (Trnava 1933) 179–181. V. WAGNER, Dejiny výtvarného umenia na Slovensku (Trnava 1930) 172–173. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 14 (1922) 582–584. A. Y. ZAK, Contributions to the 800th Anniversary of the Premonst. Order (Rožňava 1920), in Hung. N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense, I–III 1:445–448.

[J. PAPIN]

JASPERS, KARL

Philosopher; b. Feb. 23, 1883, Oldenburg, Germany; d. Feb. 25, 1969, Basel. Jaspers established himself as one of the leading existentialists of his time, although he himself did not accept the label existentialist. He followed his father into the study of law (1901), received his doctorate in medicine (1909) and married Gertrud Mayer in 1910. He worked as a scientific assistant in a psychiatric clinic, where he applied the methods of phenomenology to clinical psychiatry. He became a lecturer in psychology in 1913, and there began his transition from psychology to philosophy. He obtained his first post as lecturer in philosophy in 1916 at Heidelberg. In 1921 he was named professor of philosophy at Heidelberg. During this time he developed a friendship with Martin HEIDEGGER, which ended because of their differences over the growth of the Nazi party. He remained at Heidelberg until 1937, when the Nazis forced him to resign. He was reinstated in 1945, where he worked to rebuild the university and urged a national acknowledgment of guilt for the horrors of Naziism. Disappointed with the response he received, in 1948 he moved to Switzerland and became a professor at the University of Basel. He advocated a political unity to the world wherein various entities could live together in peace. His disapproval of the manner in which German democracy was developing after the war caused him to surrender his passport in 1967 and apply for Swiss citizenship.

Thought. When a student once asked him by what label he would like to be known, he retorted: "by that of a philosopher." For Jaspers philosophy was philosophizing and arose out of the philosopher's own life situation. Philosophy is not a body of knowledge accessible to consciousness in general, but rather a thoroughly personal struggle to understand life and by that activity to rise above objective knowledge (Dasein) to Being-for-onself, where a person is conscious of the limits of science and of his basic freedom as a responsibility. To exist authentically, one must also accept his individual and collective past—his historicity—and make his free decisions with this in mind. Furthermore, communication with other unique existences of the present and of the past is a condition of self-fulfillment, a requirement of the good life.

Jaspers's special contribution to modern philosophy is his analysis of the critical fringes of human existence, what he calls the "limit-situation" (Grenz-situation). Limit situations, such as the death of another and one's own projected death, suffering, conflict, failure, and guilt lead the self to the edge of TRANSCENDENCE. As the objective world falls to pieces, personal existence is in a position to hear the voice of transcendence. At this level, FAITH becomes operative. Faith must not be considered a sure, objective, and communicable conquest of reason. Philosophy can only point to an experience of God; each person is left to himself for the last step. Being-for-onself brings with it access to this intuitive cognition, a type of experience not to be equated with traditional mysticism. For Jaspers, contact with transcendence comes in rare high moments through reading "ciphers." Myths, religions, and philosophies are commentaries on the original ciphers: nature, history, and personal existence. None of these reveal a definitive truth about transcendence. On the other hand, they are the means through which one must acquire his personal convictions about the ultimate meaning of life.

In describing the limit-situation Jaspers tells us that every human being faces two unsettling experiences. First are the antinomies. These refer to the irreducibility of life to thought. The constructs of reason are always a distortion of the particularity and progressive character of truth. Second are the experiences constituting the limit-situation proper. These are the experiences on the boundary of our empirical existence (freedom, suffering, death, guilt). Here we become aware of the limits of objective thought.

Limit-situations can be resolved only by experience, not thought, because they involve contradictory poles (freedom-destiny, good-evil, life-death). Human existence is suspended between the law of the day and the passion of the night (i.e., between objective thought and existential aspirations). It is in the acceptance of this tension that the subject transcends mysticism and positivism and finds his salvation.

Bibliography: Main works. Allgemeine Psychopathologie (Berlin 1948). Psychologie der Weltanschauungen (Berlin 1925). Philosophie, 3 v. (Berlin 1956). Works in English. Man in the Modern Age, tr. E. and C. PAUL (London 1951). Reason and Existenz, tr. W. EARLE (New York 1955). The Perennial Scope of Philosophy, tr. R. MANHEIM (New York 1949). The Origin and Goal of History, tr. M. BULLOCK (New Haven 1953). "On My Philosophy," tr. F. KAUFMANN, Existentialism from Dostoevsky to Sartre, ed. W. KAUFMANN (New York 1956) 131–158. Literature. P. A. SCHILPP, ed., The Philosophy of Karl Jaspers (New York 1957). B. WELTE, La Foi philosophique chez Jaspers et saint Thomas d'Aquin, tr. M. ZEMB (Paris 1958). P. RICOEUR, Gabriel Marcel et Karl Jaspers: Philosophie du mystère et philosophie du paradoxe (Paris 1948). K. PIPER, ed., Karl Jaspers' Wirk und Wirkung (Munich 1963). C. WALLRAFF, Karl Jaspers: An Introduction to His Philosophy (Princeton 1970). J. F. KANE, Pluralism and Truth in Religion: Karl Jaspers on Existential Truth (Chico, CA 1981). L. H. EHRLICH, Karl Jaspers: Philosophy as Faith (Amherst 1975).

[J. K. LUOMA/L. A. BLAIN/EDS.]

JAVELLI, GIOVANNI CRISOSTOMO

Dominican philosopher and theologian; b. Casale, Italy, c. 1470; d. Bologna, c. 1538. He studied in Bologna, became bachelor of theology in 1513 and master in 1515, and was regent of studies from 1518 to 1521. His university career was confined entirely to Bologna in an era when the intellectual life of his order was directed by T. de Vio CAJETAN. Javelli studied under Cajetan and was a colleague of FERRARIENSIS. Preferring the contemplative life of study and writing, Javelli wrote extensive commentaries on the works of Plato and of Aristotle and numerous treatises in theology. His philosophical works seek to defend the interpretation of Aristotle as found in St. Thomas Aquinas and to reject Averroism. They have been published under the general title Totius rationalis, naturalis, divinae, et moralis philosophiae compendium (Lyons 1567–80; Venice 1577). In 1611 he wrote a commentary on the prima pars of Aquinas's Summa theologiae (Mainz and Venice 1612), to which he added a treatise on the Trinity and one on predestination and reprobation. In order to avoid the errors of M. LUTHER, Javelli took a position that seems to depart from the accepted Thomistic doctrine; it is regarded by Quéatif and Échard as semi-Pelagianism or at least Molinism. Javelli took an active part in the controversies over the rationalistic Aristotelianism of Pietro POMPONAZZI OF PADUA, at the latter's request. He refuted the errors of Pomponazzi's De immortalitate animae (1516) in a work entitled Solutiones rationum animae mortalium probantium (Bologna 1519). It was subsequently published by Pomponazzi with his own work (1525) and is reported to have saved Pomponazzi from more solemn condemnation at the hands of the inquisitor Jean de Torfani.

See Also: THOMISM, SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography: J. QUÉATIF and J. ECHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 2.1:104–105. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5:885. Enciclopedia Universal Ilustrada Europa-Americana 28:2611–12. M. D. CHENU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 8.1:535–537. L. CARDIN, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:1620. H. HURTER Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 2:1209–1212. C. GIACON, La seconda scolastica, 3 v. (Milan 1944–51) 1:87–90.

[F. J. ROENSCH]

JAVOUHEY, ANNE MARIE, BL.

Religious foundress; b. Jallanges (Côte-d'Or), Burgundy, France, Nov. 10, 1779; d. Paris, July 15, 1851. She was fifth of the ten children of a prosperous farmer. During the French Revolution she helped her family house many nonjuring priests, one of whom, Abbé Ballanche, encouraged her religious vocation. She spent a few months in the novitiate of the Sisters of Charity of St. Joan Antida at Besançon (1800) and in that of the Trappistines near Riédra, Switzerland (1803). In 1806 Anne and her three sisters started a school and an Association of St. Joseph in Chalon-sur-Saône after PIUS VII had approved their plans when he passed through the town (1805). In 1807 Anne founded the Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny (see ST. JOSEPH SISTERS) to conduct schools and orphanages and to aid the sick and aged. She became superior general and pronounced her vows, together with her three sisters and five others. Soon the congregation spread to mission territories. In reply to a request from the local governor, four sisters went to the island of Réunion (then called Bourbon), to the east of Africa (1817). After starting houses in France, Anne went to Senegal, where she inaugurated a project, later abandoned, of sending Senegalese boys to France to prepare for the priesthood. At the invitation of the British government, she set up hospitals in Gambia and Sierra Leone. In 1828 she went to French Guiana, where she achieved her most remarkable success by establishing a self-supporting colony for enfranchised slaves. Visits to her foundations within France and outside it caused her to travel very frequently. She had to suffer the opposition of colonial officials. The bishop of Autun, in whose diocese the motherhouse was at first located, and other French bishops sought to remake the constitutions and to direct the work of the congregation. Because of her differences with the bishop of Autun, the local clergy in Guiana denied her the Sacraments for 20 months. After 1843 she directed the institute from Paris, where the motherhouse was established permanently in 1848. At her death the congregation had 118 houses, 700 sisters in France, and 300 more in Africa, India (from 1827), Tahiti (1844), and South America. Anne Javouhey was beatified Oct. 15, 1950.

Feast: July 15.

Bibliography: Lettres, ed. J. HÉBERT and M. C. DE SEGONZAC (Paris 1994). C. C. MARTINDALE, Life of Mère Anne-Marie Javouhey (London 1953). G. D. KITTLER, The Woman God Loved (Garden City, N.Y. 1959). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 13:142–162. B. A. MOORE, A Little Good (Melbourne 1982). J. CRAMBLIT, Blessed Anne Marie Javouhey (Northfield, Ill. 1995). J. LIBIS, Folies douces: approches de la peinture de Marie Javouhey (Mâcon 1995).

[C. E. MAGUIRE]

JEALOUSY

An intolerance, accompanied generally by some measure of emotional disturbance, of another's possession of a good that one wishes to belong exclusively to himself. It expresses itself often in suspicion, anger, hurt feelings, depression, etc., and sometimes issues in thoughts, words, or deeds contrary to justice and charity. In ordinary speech as well as in theological literature it is not always clearly distinguished from ENVY, although better usage favors taking envy to mean any coveting for oneself of a good possessed by another, and jealousy the desire for the exclusive possession of something.

St. Paul lists jealousy under the 15 works of the flesh (Gal 5.19–21) and under the 11 acts unworthy of a Christian (2 Cor 12.20–21). In these lists St. Paul piles up synonyms as is his custom, and his vocabulary is identical with that of the Stoics. Through St. Gregory the Great the capital sins of the Stoics were introduced into Christian terminology. Jealousy seems to be what St. Gregory meant by the fourth species of pride, whereby one is led to cherish the idea that he is the sole possessor of a given type of excellence. In the Summa Theologiae St. Thomas Aquinas seems to make jealousy synonymous with envy, in which form it appears as a capital sin, but it is doubtful that he had in mind jealousy used in the same sense as here defined.

The word jealousy is sometimes used without pejorative connotation, as in Ex 20:5: "For I, the Lord, your God, am a jealous God, . . ." The desire for the exclusive possession of something is not necessarily unreasonable, for one's right to such possession may be well founded, and its vindication is not sinful if it is accomplished in an ordinate manner. But when the claim to exclusive right is unjustified, or when its vindication involves violations of charity or justice, it is more or less gravely sinful, depending upon the harm that is done.

Exaggerated jealousy in the form of suspicion and resentment are symptoms often associated with such pathological states as melancholy, paranoia, and alcoholism. In such instances it can be assumed that what appears to be jealousy has no moral significance or that its moral quality is greatly attenuated. This is true also of the apparent jealousy found in the senile who suffer from cerebral arteriosclerosis.

Bibliography: F. ROBERTI et al., Dictionary of Moral Theology, ed. P. PALAZZINI et al., tr. H. J. YANNONE et al., from 2d Ital. ed. (Westminster, MD 1962). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 28.4; 2a2ae 36.4, 162.4.

[W. HERBST]

JEALOUSY OF GOD

The usual contemporary connotation of jealousy does not apply to God, that is, he is not neurotically suspicious or envious. Normally, one does not speak of righteous jealousy as one does of righteous anger. Nonetheless, the Bible does speak of the jealousy of God. "I the Lord your God am a jealous God" (Ex 20:5, also 34:14, Dt 4:24, 5:9, 6:15; Jos 24:19, Na 1:2). God is jealous for his holy name (Ez 39:25). The Lord becomes jealous for his land (Jl 2:18). He is jealous for Jerusalem and Zion (Zech 1:14, 8:2). God is stirred to jealousy by the worship of false gods (Dt 32:21, Ps 77-78:58). The Psalmist is concerned about how long God's jealous wrath will burn against them (Ps 78-79:5). God threatens that because of the Israelite's sin his jealousy will depart from them (Ez 16:42). God will set his hot jealousy against the nations who have plundered Israel (Ez 36:5-6). In God's jealous wrath all nations shall be consumed (Zeph 1:18, 3:8). Paul warns the Corinthians not to provoke the Lord to jealousy (1 Cor 10:22).

God, as the one true God, will not tolerate the worship of any false gods. He is rightly jealous, in the sense of protective, of his holy and righteous name and will not allow it to be profaned. God is also jealous in his love of his people. He has made a special covenant with his people and so he has bound himself to them with a special love. This love is like that between a husband and wife. "I will betroth you to me forever; I will betroth you to me in righteousness and in justice, in steadfast love, and in mercy. I will betroth you to me in faithfulness" (Hos 2:19-20). Because of this spousal love, God is jealous both in his protection and care of his people and their land, and he is also jealous in his demand that they remain faithful to him. Thus God jealously guards his people from the sin and evil of the pagan nations, and his jealous wrath can strike against them. Yet, God's jealous wrath can equally turn against his own people when they break the covenant and become unfaithful. Sin provokes the jealousy of God because, in sin, one has turned in false love to something other than God. Thus the greatest threat against his people is for God to revoke his jealousy, for to do so would mean that he would revoke his singular love for them. God wishes to call his people back precisely because he is jealous. In his jealous love he does not want to lose his people.

Bibliography: J. J. SCULLION, "God," The Anchor Bible Dictionary, v. 2, ed. D. N. FREEDMAN (New York 1992) 1041-48.

[T. G. WEINANDY]

JEANNE MARIE DE MAILLÉ, BL.

Franciscan tertiary, mystic, and recluse; b. Roche-Saint-Quentin, near Tours, France, 1332; d. Tours, Mar. 28, 1414. Of noble birth, she was married at 16 to Robert de Sillé, with whom she maintained a virginal relationship. After his death (1362), dispossessed by the Sillé family, she returned to Tours, where in a little dwelling adjacent to the church of St. MARTIN she spent her days in prayer and good works. Later she became a recluse in a solitude near Cléry. Around 1377 she entered the Third Order of St. Francis at Tours. Her confessor, Martin de Boisgaultier, the guardian of the Franciscan community at Tours, was her first biographer. She prayed unceasingly for the end of the WESTERN SCHISM and sought to reform the morals of the French court of Charles VI and Isabelle. PIUS IX approved her cult in 1871.

Feast: Nov. 6.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Mar. 3:733-762. J. BARBIER, Jeanne-Marie de Maillé (Vendée 1993). M. DE CRISENOY, Bienheureuse Jeanne-Marie de Maillé (Paris 1948).

[F. ETZKORN]

JEDBURGH, MONASTERY OF

Abbey of Canons Regular of St. Augustine, Roxburghshire, Diocese of Saint Andrews, Scotland.

Founded c. 1138 by DAVID I of Scotland with the help of Bp. John of Glasgow, the priory of St. Mary was built high on the banks of the Jed. It appears to have been raised to the status of an abbey before 1152. Its large and architecturally imaginative church was completed before 1250, but being near the English frontier it suffered heavily in the Anglo-Scottish wars (1297–1300) and again in the 15th and 16th centuries, being almost destroyed by the English in 1545. Finally suppressed in 1559, it was erected into a temporal lordship for Alexander Home in 1606. Partially used as a reformed church until the 19th century, the abbey is now an imposing ruin.

Bibliography: C. INNES, ed., Origines parochiales Scotiae, 2 v. (Bannatyne Club; Edinburgh 1850–55) v. 1. Royal Commission on the Ancient and Historical Monuments and Constructions of Scotland, An Inventory of the Ancient and Historical Monuments of Roxburghshire, 2 v. (Edinburgh 1956) v. 1. D. E. EASSON, Medieval Religious Houses: Scotland (London 1957) 77.

[L. MACFARLANE]

JEDIN, HUBERT

Church historian; b. June 17, 1900, Grossbriesen, near Breslau, Upper-Silesia; d. July 16, 1980, Bonn, West Germany. Jedin was ordained a diocesan priest on March 2, 1924. On Sept. 1, 1933 his academic authorization was removed by the German authorities because of his “non-Aryan” background. In 1936 he was named archivist of the archdiocese of Breslau. Since his mother was of Jewish ancestry, the Gestapo arrested Father Jedin in 1938, but he was released and left Germany on Nov. 1, 1939. He spent 1939 to 1949 in Rome researching the history of the Council of TRENT concerning which he became the acknowledged expert. In 1951 PIUS XII had offered him the post of Vice-prefect of the VATICAN LIBRARY, but he declined, preferring to succeed Wilhelm Neuss in the chair of Church history in Bonn, where he taught from 1949 to 1965.

After the 1959 announcement by Pope JOHN XXIII that an ecumenical council would be convoked, Jedin quickly published his Ecumenical Councils of the Catholic Church: An Historical Outline (Eng. trans. 1960) and then in 1964 his Crisis and Closure of the Council of Trent (Eng. trans. 1967). These were prepared for students of ecclesiastical history who needed perspective on the nature of an “ecumenical council” in the Catholic Church. Jedin also served as a peritus at the council. In 1970 Pope PAUL VI had offered him the position of Prefect of the Vatican Library, but he declined on the grounds of advancing age and infirmity. Poor health during the 1970s slowed his progress, but in the end none of his projected works were left incomplete.

Jedin’s study of Trent resulted in the publication of a variety of works: four volumes of The History of the Council of Trent (two of which have appeared in English); Papal Legate at the Council of Trent: Cardinal Seripando (1937; Eng. trans. 1947); monographs on Tommaso Campeggio (1958), Carlo Borromeo (1971), and Cardinal Caesar Baronius (1978); and a longer book dealt with the closing of Trent, Krisis und Abschluss des Trienter Konzils 1562–63 (1964). Jedin was also a generalist. He launched the massive ten-volume series History of the Church (Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte), intended as a text for students. It appeared in seven languages nearly simultaneously with the German. The tenth volume was finally translated into English in 1981, one year after Jedin’s death. He also supervised the cartographic church history, Atlas zur Kirchengeschichte. Die christlichen Kirchen in Geschichte und Gegenwart, published in Germany in 1970.

The autobiographical book, Lebensbericht: Mit einem Dokumentenanhang, appeared posthumously in 1984 and was reprinted in 1988. It was not the first effort of this kind since his early youth had already been presented as “Eine Jugend in Schlesien, 1900–1925,” and published in 1979 in the Archiv für schlesische Kirchengeschichte. The Lebensbericht outlines his professional career. It included the Memorandum he communicated in 1968 to the West German bishops after the annual “Katholikentag” held at Essen which seemed, to Jedin, to promote opposition to Humanae vitae. He drew upon his knowledge of Trent and the Reformation process to point out to the bishops a similar process underway in the postconciliar church. In a public controversy with Archbishop Annibale Bugnini in 1969 he published a criticism of the reform process in L’Osservatore Romano. However, these were rare interventions from a man who was a retiring and pure scholar.

Bibliography: H. JEDIN, Kirche des Glaubens, Kirche der Geschichte: Ausgewählte Aufsätze und Vorträge, 2 vols. (Fribourg-en-Br.-Bâle-Vienne 1966). Bibliography by R. SAMULSKI and G. BUTTERINI in Jahrbuch des italienisch-deutschen historischen Instituts in Trient 6 (1980) 287–367. J. KÖHLER, “Hubert Jedin, Schlesien und die schlesische Kirchengeschichte,” Archiv für schlesische Kirchengeschichte 39 (1981): 12–19; “Geschichte des Konzils von Trient (1950–1975) ein Jahrhundertwerk oder der Abgesang einer kirchenhistorischen Methode,” Archiv für schlesische Kirchengeschichte 55 (1997): 93–118.

[B. VAN HOVE]

JEHOVAH

False form of the divine name Yahweh. The name Jehovah first appeared in manuscripts in the 13th century A.D., but had probably been in use for some time. The form arose from a misunderstanding of the precautions taken by pious Jewish scribes to prevent the profanation of the divine name. About the 3d century B.C., the practice arose of reading the word ADONAI "Lord" or ELOHIM "God" instead of YAHWEH. After the invention of vowel signs, the vowels of the word Adonai were written beneath the consonants of the sacred name YHWH. With the passage of time the correct pronunciation of Yahweh was forgotten. The hybrid form of Jehovah, resulting from reading the consonants of Yahweh with the vowels of Adonai, the first "a" being changed to a short "e," became widespread in English-speaking circles because of its use in Ex 6.3 of the King James Version. In modern versions either Lord in capital letters or Yahweh is used for the sacred Tetragrammeton.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1109–10. P. JOÜON, Grammaire de l'hébreu biblique (2d ed. Rome 1947).

[R. T. A. MURPHY]

JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES

A sect, originally called Russellites, founded in the early 1870s by Charles Taze RUSSELL. In 1931 the title Jehovah's Witnesses was proclaimed by Joseph F. RUTHERFORD, the second president of their legal corporation, the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, at their convention in Columbus, Ohio.

"Judge" Rutherford introduced important changes in the Witnesses' creed and transformed the congregational structure of the sect as it was under "Pastor" Russell into a rigid theocracy. The third leader, "Brother" Nathan H. Knorr, gradually replaced the offensive convert-making tactics of the Rutherford era by suave manners that have gained the Witnesses their current reputation as one of the best-behaved groups in the world. In legal battles that they have often carried to the highest courts of many free countries—and by appealing to freedom of speech and religion—they have acquired the right to exercise their proselytism without interference. They hold that other religions and worldly power are the devil's instruments in keeping people away from the Truth.

Doctrine. According to Witness doctrine, there is but one God, and since 1931 they have insisted that He should be called Jehovah (Ex 3.15; Is 42.8). They condemn the Trinity as pagan idolatry and accordingly deny Christ's divinity.

They consider Jesus as the greatest of Jehovah's Witnesses, "a god" (so they translate John 1.1), inferior to no one but to Jehovah. Before existing as a human being, he was a spirit creature called the Logos, or Word, or Michael the Archangel. He died as a man and was raised as an immortal spirit Son. His Passion and death were the price he paid to regain for humanity the right to live eternally on earth. Indeed, the "great multitude" (Rev 7.9) of true Witnesses hope in an earthly Paradise; only 144,000 faithful (Rev 7.4; 14.1, 4) may enjoy heavenly glory with Christ. The wicked will undergo complete destruction.

Russell had announced that Armageddon—the final clash between the forces of good and evil—could not happen later than 1914. From 1920 on Rutherford proclaimed that "millions now living will never die"; he also expected the princes of old, Abraham, Isaac, and the others, to come back to life by 1925 as rulers over the New World. The Watch Tower Society of the mid-20th century no longer specified an exact date; but it repeated that "this generation will by no means pass away until all things occur" (Lk 21.32). Thus, Witnesses are deeply convinced that the end of the world will come within a very few years. This vivid belief appears to be the strongest driving force behind their indefatigable zeal.

Way of Life. The fundamental obligation of each member of the sect is to give witness to Jehovah by announcing His approaching Kingdom. He may do this by door-to-door calling, by meeting with others for home Bible studies, or by standing at street corners to display Watch Tower literature. Preaching the good news is the only means of salvation. Baptism—which Witnesses practice by immersion and usually in mass demonstrations—is in no way a Sacrament but only the exterior symbol of their dedication to the service of Jehovah God.

Jehovah's Witnesses have attracted publicity by refusing blood transfusions even when it meant death to themselves or to their children. Except for birth control, which they leave to the couple's own decision, their conjugal and sexual morality is quite rigid. They abide by taboos such as those against smoking and the celebration of any kind of feast.

They regard the Bible as their only source of belief and rule of conduct, but the Witnesses' Bible aids are apparently used more abundantly than the Bible itself. They are allowed no other books than the Bible and the society's own publications, which includes its own translation of the Bible with an impressive critical apparatus. The work is excellent except when scientific knowledge comes into conflict with the accepted doctrines of the movement. In their so-called New World Translation, the term Kyrios is rendered Jehovah instead of Lord everywhere in the New Testament (237 times) except at Philipians 2.11, where St. Paul refers the word to Christ. In their book Jesus' words at the Last Supper become:

“Take, eat. This means my body” (Mt 26.26). And they add but one word to the phrases of Col 1.16–17: “By means of him [Christ Jesus] all other things were created in the heavens and upon the earth. . . . All other things have been created through him and for him. Also he is before all other things and by means of him all other things were made to exist.”

The rate of growth of the movement reached a peak in the late 1930s, when membership increased almost 25 percent annually: from 1938 to 1942 it grew from less than 50,000 to more than 100,000. Since then, growth has slowed somewhat.

Bibliography: Sources. Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, New World Translation of the Holy Scriptures (rev. ed. Brooklyn 1961); Let God Be True (rev. ed. Brooklyn 1952), 18,900,000 copies in 54 languages; From Paradise Lost to Paradise Regained (Brooklyn 1958). Yearbook of Jehovah's Witnesses (1926–). The Watchtower (1879–), pub. semimonthly or monthly in 68 languages; Awake! (Brooklyn 1919–), pub. semi-monthly or monthly in 26 languages. Literature. H. H. STROUP, The Jehovah's Witnesses (New York 1945). W. J. WHALEN, Armageddon Around the Corner: A Report on Jehovah's Witnesses (New York 1962). G. HÉBERT, Les Témoins de Jéhovah: Essai critique d'histoire et de doctrine (Montréal 1960).

[G. HÉBERT/EDS.]

JENINGEN, PHILIPP, VEN.

Preacher of missions; b. Eichstätt, Bavaria, Jan. 5, 1642; d. Ellwangen, Swabia, Feb. 8, 1704. He entered the Society of Jesus at Landsberg, Jan. 19, 1663, and completed his studies at Ingolstadt in 1672. After his ordination on June 6 of that year, he asked to join the foreign missionary field but was refused because of poor health. He taught at the Gymnasium at Middelheim and Dillingen, and came to Ellwangen in 1680, where he won renown as a preacher. His missions throughout the Dioceses of Augsburg, Eichstätt, and Würzburg, his zeal and mystical gifts, and his devotion to the Blessed Virgin earned him the title “Apostle of the Ries.” He directed the construction of the shrine of Our Lady of Scönenberg, a popular place of pilgrimage and a fine example of baroque architectural style. The cause of his beatification was introduced on March 23, 1945.

Bibliography: A. HÖSS, P. Philipp Jeningen, S.J.: Ein Volksmissionar und Mystiker des 17. Jahrhunderts (3d ed. Ellwangen 1948). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 37 (1945) 221–223. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt 913–914.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

JEREMIAH

Jeremiah was born at Anathoth, a few miles north-east of Jerusalem, c. 650 B.C. At the time of his vocation in 627, he was a young man of a priestly class that had been excluded from the Temple cult (1 Kgs 2.26–35). During his ministry that lasted until after 587, he was a witness to one of the most troubled periods in the Near East.

When Ashurbanipal died c. 633, Assyria's power declined, leaving Josiah free to begin c. 621 a religious reform of JUDAH that also extended to the land once ruled by the Northern Kingdom of Israel (2 Kgs 22–23). Jeremiah, who had already severely attacked the Judeans' crimes (Jer 2–6), must have approved of this reform for he seems not to have preached again until Josiah's death in 609.

In Jehoiakim's reign idolatry revived and Jeremiah again began to condemn infidelity to God and hypocritical worship, at the same time opposing any alliance with Egypt against Babylon. His preaching caused him repeated persecution, but his warnings proved accurate when Joakim's policy led to the first capture of Jerusalem in 597. Judah's last king, Zedekiah, powerless before the political forces at work, followed the priests and false prophets in affirming the Egyptian alliance. Jeremiah strongly objected, proclaiming that Judah must be subjected to Babylon, but to no avail. As a result Jerusalem was destroyed completely in 587 and the Prophet was persecuted anew (Jer 37–38). After his release from detention, he joined the governor, Gedaliah, at Mizpah until Gedaliah's assassination. He then was forced by fugitives to go to Egypt, and witnessed the people's new apostasy before he died there. Thus, his whole life was one of suffering and frustration (Jer 40–44).

By attributing LAMENTATIONS to him, tradition has wrongly classified him as a lachrymose prophet, whereas his faith in God and his own mission strengthened his sensitive nature and made him “a fortified city” (Jer 1.18). Although he loved his people, he did not fail in his duty as God's spokesman but condemned them again and again. The conflict between his love and the harshness of his vocation caused the interior crises described in his “Confessions.” He was the only prophet to reveal his interior life.

The summation of his message is that the COVENANT promises will be realized only if people and leaders are faithful to the covenant's moral force. The new modality Jeremiah gives to this fidelity is found in each one's personal commitment and man's interior validation of external religion. Cult is vain when not inspired by the heart's religion that comes from love, justice, and faith (Jer 7.1–28).

In early Christian art Jeremiah was practically ignored compared to the three other major Prophets, especially Daniel. In the 6th century his images began to appear in basilicas—St. Ambrose, Milan, and St. Vitalis, Ravenna—and later in miniatures of manuscripts—Syriac codex 341 (National Library, Paris; 7th or 8th century) and a Greek manuscript of Cosmas Indicopleustes (Vatican 699; 8th or 9th century). Henceforth, his images proliferated in all media. Michelangelo's painting of him in the Sistine Chapel is the most famous.

Bibliography: J. SKINNER, Prophecy and Religion (Cambridge, Eng. 1922). A. C. WELCH, Jeremiah, His Time and His Work (Oxford 1928; reprint 1951). J. MUILENBURG, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville 1962) 2:823–835. L. G. PERDUE, et al., A Prophet to the Nations (Winona Lake, 1984).

[G. COUTURIER]

JEREMIAH, BOOK OF

The contents, structure and composition, and theology of the Book of Jeremiah are discussed here.

Contents

Jeremiah can be divided into five parts according to each section's general theme. These include oracles against Judah and Jerusalem, oracles against the Nations, prophecy of Israel's and Judah's salvation, the story of the persecution of Jeremiah, and an appendix concerning the end of the Kingdom of Judah.

Oracles against Juda and Jerusalem (1.1–25.13b).

With rare exceptions the oracles collected in the section are attacks against the political and religious errors of the chosen people; the collection probably dates from the first edition of the book by Baruch (ch. 36). The heading (1.1–3) is an editorial composition that shows an unawareness of the prophet's role in the events at Mizpah and Egypt (ch. 40–44). The vocation account (1.4–19) assumes two forms: a dialogue with Yahweh (1.4–10, 17–19) and visions (1.11–16). The prophet's predestination and God's help in the accomplishment of his mission, which will be mainly for condemnation, are especially emphasized.

The following chapters (2–6) contain Jeremiah's first warnings under Josiah, but before the Deuteronomic reform of 621 B.C. In the form of a trial, Jeremiah reproaches JUDAH for its foreign alliances and its idolatry, which break the Sinaitic covenant (ch. 2). See COVENANT (IN THE BIBLE). He then makes an urgent appeal for conversion (3.1–4.4), but this is humanly impossible; God is going to accomplish it through His mercy. The poem recalls Osee's preaching: Israel's alliance with Yahweh is the result of love by divine covenant.

The religious apostasy will be punished by an invasion coming from the north; the scourge is described in a long and vividly colored poem (4.5–6.30).

The "lion" from the north used to be identified with Assyria, or Babylon, but since B. Duhm's Das Buch Jeremias erklärt (Tübingen 1901), the Scythians have attracted exegetes' attention. According to Herodotus the Scythians invaded Palestine between 630 and 625 B.C., but since such an invasion is not otherwise assured, it is more probable that Jeremiah had no particular people in mind when he composed his poem. His faith in God's justice assured him that a war would correct Judah's crimes; this is why he used such general terms in describing the scourge.

On the whole, ch. 7 to 20 date from the reign of Johoiakim: Josiah's reform had failed, and Jeremiah had to combat infidelities of all kinds. The "Temple Sermon" (7.1–8.3) attacks the superficiality of the cult, since cult could be a guaranty of salvation only if it were a genuine expression of interior religious values. Jeremiah, like the other prophets, does not reject the cult in itself, but only the legalistic counterfeits employed in carrying it out. Circumcision is criticized for the same reason (9.24–25). His plea for the covenant (11.1–14) is still a much-discussed problem, Jeremiah's attitude toward Josia's reform being one of its elements. The discourse is probably authentic and clearly shows that the prophet supported Josiah's policy. Under Johoiakim, however, he became painfully aware of the reform's failure.

During Johoiakim's reign, Jeremiah's severe warnings led to repeated persecutions of him. The interior crises that resulted are described in his "Confessions" (11.18–12.6; 15.10–21; 17.14–18; 18.18–23; 20.7–18). His faith in God and in his mission conquered these temptations to abandon his task.

The prophet proposes the same severe judgment in parabolic sermons (13.1–14; 18.1–12) and by symbolic, prophetic actions (19.1–20.6); in fact his life itself assumed a prophetic character (16.1–18).

The last part of this section (ch. 21–24) dates on the whole from the reign of Sedecia. It begins with the king's consulting of the prophet during the siege of the city in 588 B.C. (21.1–10). Then various oracles condemning the last kings of Judah are collected (21.11–23.8), except the one concerning the "future King" that belongs to the theme of royal, Davidic MESSIANISM (23.1–8). Oracles against false prophets follow (23.9–40) and are of interest because they raise the question of the true nature of PROPHECY in Israel. Jeremiah here contrasts the traits of true prophecy with those of professional prophets who flatter the sinful people and play on their hopeful imaginations. The last discourse (25.1–13b) is a heavily glossed summation of Jeremiah's activity up to the year 605-604.

Oracles against Nations (25.13c–38; ch. 46–51).

This second section presents great divergences between the Masoretic Text (MT) and the Septuagint (LXX). In the Greek, the oracles are placed immediately after the oracles against Juda, as in the works of other prophets. Most exegetes consider this to be the primitive order of the book. It is difficult to find a reason why the Hebrew transferred them to the end (ch. 46–51). The order of the oracles is different also in the two traditions: the LXX follows a logical order according to the historical importance of the nations while the MT adopts a geographical order going from south to north and from west to east. Finally, the section's authenticity is greatly disputed; some expositors have rejected it completely as a later addition (Duhm, Smend, Stade, etc.); others now hold it authentic but replete with additions. The long poem against Babylon (50.1–51.58) was undoubtedly composed later than Jeremiah.

The judgment of the nations (25.13c–38) is a summation of all this type of preaching: the theme of "the cup of divine wrath," symbolizing God's vengeance against the neighboring countries that had dealt harshly with the Chosen People, is the burden of the text. Israel's God, then, is the master of all nations and of history.

Israel's, Judah's Salvation (ch. 26–35). Jeremiah's mission was not only to destroy a present evil, but also to build up a promising future (1.10). Persecuted for his initial severe message (ch. 26), he attacks the groundless hope of escape proclaimed by the professional prophets (ch. 27–29). Judah's restoration can be secured only by its subjection to Babylon. The prophet graphically plays out this drama by a symbolic act (ch. 27), then envisions an exile of undetermined duration (70 years: 29.10; 25.11). Next, in exquisite poems that come very likely from the first years of his ministry, he proclaims the return of the northern kingdom, Israel: once its purification has been achieved, its return will be a new Exodus (30.1–31.22). Short oracles follow in which Juda also shares in this rebirth (31.23–40).

The oracle of the New Alliance is especially important (31.31–34). It is the same as the covenant of Sinai, yet it is new because it reaches into the depths of man's heart and can never be broken. Its fulfillment is accomplished in Christ's coming (Lk 22.20; 1 Cor 11.25; Heb 8.8–12).

Finally, oracles concerning Judah's future were pronounced during the last siege of Jerusalem (ch. 32–33); but the glorious future is possible only if Judah remains faithful (ch. 34–35).

Jeremiah's Passion (ch. 36–45). In style and subject this section forms a homogeneous whole, the work of one author, Baruch. He tells the story of the persecutions his master suffered, especially at the king's court during the last storming of Jerusalem (588-587 B.C.) and during the few months following its fall. The narration is a precious source for reconstructing the history of these troubled years. One must wait for the New Testament to see such detailed biographical narrations. An oracle in favor of Baruch completes this section (ch. 45).

Appendix (ch. 52). This chapter reproduces, with some variants, 2 Kgs 24.18–25.30 that relates the destruction of Juda. Obviously the addition's purpose is to illustrate the fulfillment of the prophet's message. The list of deportees in vv. 28–30 is a unique source that can hardly be questioned. A third deportation in 582-581 is recorded here, and according to Josephus (Ant. Jud. 10.181–182) might have coincided with an anti-Babylonian rebellion of Transjordanian states.

Structure and Composition

Even a cursory analysis of the book reveals that its production was quite complicated. There are numerous doublets (6.12–15 and 8.10–12; 10.12–16 and 51.15–19; 16.14–15 and 23.7–8; 17.3–4 and 15.13–14; 23.19–20 and 30.23–24; 30.10–11 and 46.27–28; 49.19–21 and 50.44–46). Also, the Greek text is an eighth shorter than the Hebrew, suggesting that the work underwent several redactions.

Literary Forms. With S. Mowinckel [Zur Komposition des Buches Jeremiah (Kristiania 1914)] one can distinguish three principal literary forms or sources: poetic oracles (1–25; 30–31; 46–51), biographical stories (26–29; 36–45), and deuteronomic sermons (7.1–8.3; 11.1–14; 16.1–13; 17.19–27; 18.1–12; 19.1–20.6; 21.1–10; 22.1–5; 25.1–13b; 32.1–2, 6–16, 24–44; 34–35). The authenticity of the first source is no longer disputed, while the second source is attributed to Baruch. The origin of the deuteronomic discourses is still debated; some label them pure deuteronomic interpolations, while others consider them later editions of Jeremian sermons in the style and spirit of Deuteronomy. It is probable that they have a style quite common in Juda during the seventh and sixth centuries (W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson) and connected with liturgical assemblies (A. Weiser). Deuteronomy and these sermons are two different examples of the style. For this reason one may legitimately reject as unauthentic only the following passages: 3.14–18; 9.11–15; 10.1–16; 12.14–17; 16.19–21; 17.5–11, 19–27; 22.8–9; 23.19–20, 33–40; 31.38–40; 32.17–25, 29–41; 50.1–51.58; 52.

Compilation of Sources. Chapter 36 relates the story of the book's first editions; in 605 Jeremiah dictated his threats against Judah and Jerusalem to Baruch. They are found generally in ch. 1 to 25. Other partial compilations can be traced, such as discourses attacking kings and prophets (21–23), symbolic actions (18–20), Jeremiah's confessions scattered through the book's first section, salvation oracles for Israel (30–31) and Judah (32–35), Baruch's biographical accounts (36–45), and oracles against the nations (46–51). The book's present form must have been fixed sometime after the Exile [see E. Podechard, "Le Livre de Jérémie" Revue biblique 37 (1928) 181–97; O. Eissfeldt, Einleitung in das AT<sup>3</sup> (Tübingen 1964) 471–92].

Theology

Jeremiah's theological contribution was not original; he did not advance much beyond his predecessors, but his different approach to sin and conversion is worthy of note.

Sin. Jeremiah proposed traditional themes with an original insistence by emphasizing the interior spirit that should vivify religious life. Thus, God's knowledge of man reaches into the depths of his thoughts and heart (1.5–10; 11.20; 12.3; 17.16; 18.23); correspondingly, man's knowledge of God must spring from the heart (31.31–34). As a consequence, more than any other prophet, Jeremiah delved deeply into the problem of sin. He saw it as a refusal to know God (2.6–8), an apostasy (2.11–12), an ungrateful desertion of God (2.17–19, 32; 3.21). Sin is an unnatural perversion (2.11, 21). Its universality in Judah led the prophet to describe it as almost an innate quality in man (13.23) although there is no clear idea yet of ORIGINAL SIN.

Conversion. In contrast, Jeremiah greatly developed the idea of conversion, which he believed impossible for man left to himself. Conversion could be accomplished only if God changed man's heart (3.1–4.4). In this connection his Messianism remained within the perspectives of the Davidic dynasty that must endure, but the future king would reign with justice according to the terms of the covenant (23.5–6; cf. Is 9.5–6; 11.1–4). His eschatology also remained within the normal sequence of history; the world would not end, but a new epoch coinciding with the return from the Exile would begin (23.1–8; 30.10–21; 31.10–14, 23–25; etc.) and would be marked by the conclusion of the New Alliance (31.31–34).

See Also: JEREMIAH; LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF; JEREMIAH, LETTER OF; BARUCH, BOOK OF.

Bibliography: P. VOLZ, Der Prophet Jeremia (2d ed. Leipzig 1928). F. NÖTSCHER, Das Buch Jeremias (Bonn 1934). A. GELIN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:857–889. A. WEISER, Das Buch der Propheten Jeremia, 2 v. (Göttingen 1952–55). A. PENNA, Geremia (Turin 1954). W. RUDOLPH,

Jeremiah (2d ed. Tübingen 1958). J. PATERSON, "Jeremiah," Peake's Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. BLACK and H. H. ROWLEY (London 1962) 465–489. G. P. COUTURIER, The New Jerome Bible Commentary (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1990) 265–297. L. BOADT, Jeremiah 1–25/26–52, 2 v. (Wilmington 1982). E. W. NICHOLSON, Jeremiah 1–25/26–52, 2 v. (Cambridge 1973, 1975).

[G. COUTURIER]

JEREMIAH, LETTER OF

A paraenetic composition of the Hellenistic period directed to the Jewish exiles in Babylon urging them to repudiate Babylonian idolatry because the idols are not gods. In the Septuagint (LXX) the letter is found as an independent unit between Lamentations and Ezekiel, but in the Vulgate it is reckoned as ch. 6 of Baruch. It was formerly thought to be an original Greek composition, written at Alexandria against Egyptian idolatry, since its oldest preserved form is the Greek of the LXX; but internal evidence has now made it certain that it was written originally in Hebrew and most likely in Babylonia, since it is Babylonian idolatry that it condemns.

In subject matter the author, without much logical sequence or literary skill, treats of various aspects of the impotence of idols, thus demonstrating the folly of idol worship.

The author cannot be Jeremiah because, among other reasons, he speaks of the "seven generations" of the Exile, which, if taken literally, would date the work to c. 300 B.C. It is apparently a late and poor imitation, in synagogue-homily fashion, of the authentic letter of Jeremiah (Jer 29.1–28), with much borrowing from Jeremiah's polemic against idols (Jer 10.3–16). Arguments against idolatry have also been taken from Isaiah ch. 40 to 55, especially Is 44.9–20. The letter shows considerable knowledge of Babylonian religion.

Bibliography: A. ROBERT, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:849–857. C. J. BALL, "Epistle of Jeremy," The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English, ed. R. H. CHARLES et al., 2v. (Oxford 1913) 1:596–611. A. PENNA, "Geremia," La Sacra Bibbia, ed. S. GAROFALO, 3 v. (Rome 1954) 2:745–749.

[L. A. IRANYI]

JERICHO

In the Bible, Jericho is chiefly famous as the first city captured by the Israelites at the time of the conquest of Palestine during the last quarter of the 13th century (1220–1200) B.C. Two Old traditions that center around the Benjaminite sanctuary at Gilgal are intertwined in the story of Jericho's fall before Joshua's army (Jos 4.13–6.26). The narrative receives some epic coloring and establishes a parallel with the Exodus from Egypt. It could well be that the Jericho of Joshua's day was little more than a strong fort [see JOSHUA, SON OF NUN]. In Old Testament times Jericho does not appear again as an important town, although it is occasionally mentioned.

Several incidents in our Lord's life are associated with Jericho. The JORDAN ford where He was baptized is not far from the town (Mt 3.5–6). Jericho also figures in the stories of Bartimaeus (Mk 10.46) and of Zacchaeus (Lk 19.1), and in the parables of the gold pieces (Lk 19.11) and of the good Samaritan (Lk 10.30). Jericho is called the "city of palm trees" in Dt 34.3; Jgs 1.16; 3.13. The root meaning of the word Jericho, however, is perhaps connected with yrh, "moon," i.e., sanctuary of the moon-god.

Site. Jericho is situated about six miles north of the north end of the Dead Sea and five miles west of the Jordan River. It is the earth's lowest town, lying some 825 feet below sea level. Jerusalem is about 17 miles north-east and some 3,200 feet above Jericho's mounds.

Jericho has a series of sites, for the location of the city has changed after sieges, earthquakes, and other catastrophes. Modern Jericho, the small Arab town of er-Rīḥā, was also the Jericho at the time of the Crusaders. It is now a thriving municipality and, with its orange and banana groves, a fruitful cultivation center, but has little to interest the Bible student.

Tell es-Sultān, one mile northwest of er-Rīḥā, is the site of Old Testament Jericho. The large (six-acre) tell is adjacent to 'Ain es-Sultān, a copious water supply still known as the fountain of Elisha (2 Kgs 2.19–22) and fertilizing a rich oasis in the dry 14-mile wide plain of the Jordan Valley.

Square in the path of any invader of the hill country from the southern portion of the Jordan Valley, Jericho was a city of great strategic importance, a key defense position for the western section of the plain. In the background the hills of the western highlands rise sharply, the 1,500-foot ridge called the Mount of Temptation hardly one mile away. These are the hills where Joshua's spies hid (Jos 2.22). Forbidding as they appear, they are actually cut by hidden wadies giving access to the interior plateau of Palestine. Jericho thus controlled the access to the hill country from Transjordan.

Archeology of Old Testament Jericho. During the first part of the 20th century three major archeological expeditions investigated Tell es-Sultān. The latest (1952–58) and most important was conducted by Miss Kathleen M. Kenyon, director of the British school of archeology in Jerusalem. The work of the excavators has shown that Jericho was founded in the latter part of the New Stone Age (c. 7800 B.C.) before the invention of pottery. Jericho is thus the oldest settlement yet found in the Near East and an important element in the history of civilization.

Miss Kenyon's most remarkable find was a group of seven portrait skulls. These are actual human skulls on which the features of the face have been modeled in plaster. The eyes were inset with shells with slits representing the pupils. The heads have an astonishingly lifelike appearance and are perhaps the portraits of important leaders or venerated ancestors. They must be placed among the earliest examples of human art, being clay modeled portrait busts of individuals who died 7,000 years ago.

The most surprising result of Miss Kenyon's work has been the discovery that virtually nothing remains of the site from the late Bronze period (1500–1200 B.C.), which includes Joshua's time. The mound has suffered such extensive denudation of its upper strata through erosion and human deprivations that almost all remains later than the third millennium have disappeared from its top. The two walls that preceding archeologists believed were ruins dating back to Joshua's time are now known to date back to the third millennium and to represent only two of some 15 different walls of that age. There is, however, evidence at BETHEL, Lachish, Debir, and Hazor of their destruction during the 13th century B.C., which agrees with the hypothesis that the Israelite conquest was in progress at that time.

Beneath the mud houses and tents of the large Arab refugee camp that is now north of the old Jericho mound lies the ancient cemetery area. A number of Middle-Bronze-Age (2000–1500) tombs were explored, some of them dating back to the 17th century B.C. Some of the objects placed with the deceased are in an amazing state of preservation and offer good evidence for the culture of these people living at the time of the Biblical patriarchs. Of particular interest are some human skulls 3,500 years old, with the desiccated brain shriveled to the size of a walnut, but with all its convolutions still plainly to be seen.

Archeology of New Testament Jericho. The Jericho of New Testament times (Tulūl Abū'l-'Alāyīq), through which our Lord often passed en route to Jerusalem, is situated about two miles south of Old Testament Jericho and one mile west of the modern town. Much of it was built by Herod the Great who died here in 4 B.C. The mound is located at the entry of Wadi Qelt into the Jordan Valley. The presence of an abundant waterway from the wadi along with the amenities of the winter climate made it a favored spot. It was a magnificent Roman-style city with pools, villas, a hippodrome, and a theater. Parts of an elaborate building with a great terrace-façade in Roman style opus reticulatum were excavated and may be Herod's palace. This particular type of construction, made by setting small square pyramidal stones into plaster, gives the appearance of a net (hence its name) and is characteristically Roman of that period. It bears witness to the international culture that was then Palestine's.

Bibliography: L. HENNEQUIN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 3:410–414. K. M. KENYON and D. TUSHINGHAM, "Jericho Gives up Its Secrets," National Geographic 104 (1953) 853–870. K. M. KENYON, "Ancient Jericho . . .," Scientific American 190 (1954) 76–83; Digging up Jericho (New York 1958). R. NORTH, "Les Murs de Jericho," Bible et Terre Sainte no. 14 (1958) 10–17. J. B. PRITCHARD et al., The Excavation of Herodian Jericho (1951) (Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research, 32–33; 1958).

[E. LUSSIER]

JEROME, ST.

Church Father, Scripture scholar, Doctor of the Church; b. Stridon, extreme (modern) northeast Italy, c. 345; d. Bethlehem, Palestine, 419–420.

Life, Literary Career, Character. Jerome was born Sophronius Eusebius, of Christian parents at Stridon "on the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia" (De vir. ill. 135). At 12 he was sent to Rome with Bonosus to study grammar, rhetoric, and the liberal arts under the famed grammarian Donatus. There he met RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA and the patrician (St.) PAMMACHIUS, and there he was baptized at 19. He journeyed through Gaul, stopped at Treves (Trier, Germany) where he became acquainted with monasticism, copied HILARY OF POITIERS's De Synodis and De Psalmis, and then joined a choir of ascetics (Jerome, Chron. 329), including Rufinus and CHROMATIUS, in Aquileia under Bishop Valerian (c. 370). In 372 he suddenly left on "an uncertain journey through Thrace, Bithynia, Pontus, Galicia, and Cilicia," settling finally in the home of Evagrius of Antioch (Epist. 3:3). He retired for two years to the desert of Chalcis, near Aleppo, where he fell sick and had his famous dream in which he was accused of being a "Ciceronian not a Christian" (Epist. 22:30), and perfected his Greek and studied Hebrew (homo trilinguis: Contra Ruf. 3:6).

Literary Career. Disturbed by the MELETIAN SCHISM in Antioch, Jerome wrote to Pope DAMASUS I concerning the Trinitarian terminology (Epist. 15, 16) and on return to Antioch began his literary career with his legendary life of Paul the Hermit (c. 377). He attended lectures of APOLLINARIS OF LAODICEA on Scripture and was ordained a priest (379) without pastoral obligation, by the Woodcut of St. Jerome.

Rome-recognized Paulinus of Antioch. In 380 he journeyed to Constantinople to consult with GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, GREGORY OF NYSSA, and AMPHILOCHIUS OF ICONIUM, and to read ORIGEN. He translated the World Chronicle of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA (SALAMIS) as well as some of the homilies of Origen.

In 382 Jerome traveled to Rome with Paulinus of Antioch and EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS and became secretary to Pope Damasus I. He entered the ascetical life of the city, serving as spiritual pedagogue and director to a group of noble women on the Aventine: MARCELLA, her widowed mother, Albina, and sister, Asella; PAULA and her daughters Blesilla and EUSTOCHIUM; and Marcellina, Felicitas, Furia, Lea, FABIOLA, and Principia. He made a collation of Origen's Hexapla with Aquila's version of the Old Testament and prepared a correction of the Old Versions (Itala) of the Gospels and Psalms for Damasus. He also wrote the Refutation of Helvidius, to prove the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary; his Dialogus contra Luciferianos, concerned with the validity of heretical baptism and priestly and episcopal orders; and he prepared a translation of the tables of concordance of Eusebius of Caesarea.

His strictures on the laxity of the Roman clergy and married Christians and the accusation that his harsh as-etical advice caused the death of St. Blesilla destroyed his hope (Epist. 45:3) of succeeding Damasus (d. December 384), and he departed from Ostia for Palestine with his brother Paulinian and some monks (August 385).

Jerome visited Crete and Antioch, then with St. Paula and a group of Roman women toured the desert of Egypt and Palestine, talking with the hermits and making copious geographical and hagiographical notes. He settled in Bethlehem (386) where Paula built a double MONASTERY. He then entered cordial relations with a similar establishment under Rufinus and MELANIA THE ELDER in Jerusalem and embarked upon his scriptural exegesis. By way of cenobitical propaganda Jerome wrote his Life of Hilarion, Life of the Monk Malchus, Two Books against Jovinian in defense of virginity, and the De viris illustribus (393–395), a list of 135 authors from Peter to himself, including Philo, Josephus, and the heretics Tatian, Bardesanes, and Novatian for their influence on Christian authors. It was the first literary history, or attempt to dignify Christians as men of letters.

Quarrel over Origen. When Atarbius, an emissary of Epiphanius of Constantia, stirred anti-Origenistic propaganda in Palestine (395), Jerome forsook allegiance to Origen's teaching, while Rufinus remained loyal. There ensued a quarrel in which Bishop JOHN OF JERUSALEM took part with Rufinus and deprived Jerome and his monastery of spiritual assistance. Jerome attacked John in his Contra Johannem Hierosolymitanum. The quarrel was pacified at Easter 397, and Rufinus left for Italy; but it was renewed when Jerome's friends in Rome, particularly SS. Marcella and Eusebius of Cremona, complained that Rufinus had translated Origen's Peri Archon using Jerome's fame as guarantor. Rufinus replied to a warning from Jerome with his Apology against Jerome; Jerome answered him in two books before seeing the full text, rebutting Rufinus's reply with a third book. AUGUSTINE deplored this quarrel between former friends (Epist. 73:6–10), but Jerome continued the attack until Rufinus's death in Sicily (410), which Jerome announced with "Now that the scorpion lies buried in Tinacria . . ." (Jerome, Praef. ad Ezech.).

Of Jerome's correspondence, 117 letters remain; many among them are eulogies on Blesilla, Paula, Eustochium, Fabiola, Marcella, Nepotian, and Nebridius. Others reflect his interests in education; asceticism, history, and doctrine. He exchanged 19 letters with Augustine (Florilegium Patristicum 22) and several with PAULINUS OF NOLA (Epist. 53) and the virgin DEMETRIAS, and he made literal translations of Origen's Peri Archon, the festal letters of THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA, the anti-Origenistic writings of EPIPHANIUS, the tract on the Holy Spirit of DIDYMUS THE BLIND, and ascetical works of PA-

CHOMIUS, Theodore, and Orsisius. He opened a school for boys at Bethlehem, gave spiritual and scriptural homilies to the monks and nuns, wrote refutations of the anti-ascetical doctrines of Vigilantius and the Pelagians, and continued the immense work of his Scripture translations and studies. His monastery gave hospitality to the refugees from the sack of Rome and the Vandal invasions (410–412), and was burned by marauders (416). Following his death, his bones were deposited in the grotto at Bethlehem, then reportedly transferred to the crypt of St. Mary Major in Rome.

Probably the most learned man of the age, Jerome had an exceptionally fine classic style, but could adapt himself to the popular Latin of the day. Jerome was sensitive and suspicious of ascetical and theological rivals; his indulgences of his strong likes and dislikes, both literary and personal, betray his complicated character. Irascible in temperament, he used sarcasm, irony, and invective that reflect the hyperbole of the literary tradition of his age, as do his attitude toward women and extremes in asceticism. His personality cannot be readily subjected to modern psychiatric investigation because there is a problem with his literary sources, since much of his learned lore was taken bodily from Suetonius, Josephus, Porphyry, and Theophrastus.

Scripture Scholar. He was an exegete rather than a theologian; his first scriptural composition was an allegorical commentary on the Prophet Abdias, which he later deprecated as juvenile (Pref. in lib. Job).

Influence of Origen. At Constantinople (380–382) he translated 14 of Origen's homilies on Jeremiah, 14 on Ezekiel, eight on Isaiah, and two on the Song of Songs. He published his own treatise on Isaiah's vision of the Seraphim (Is. 6:1–8:cf. Epist. 18), in which he rejected Origen's explanation of the two Seraphim as signifying God the Son and the Holy Spirit (Epist. 84:3).

During his stay in Rome (382–385), he produced letters dealing with individual Hebrew words untranslated in the Latin version of the Scriptures, e.g., Hosanna (Epist. 20), alleluia, amen, and Maran Atha (Epist. 26) and with the Alphabetic Psalms (Epist. 30) and criticized the commentary of Reticus of Autun on the Song of Songs (Epist. 37). He revised the Old Latin version of the New Testament based on an excellent text of the original Greek Gospels, and made a new version of the Psalter from the Septuagint.

In Bethlehem (386–390) he started a new version of the Old Testament based on Origen's Hexapla, of which only the so-called Gallican Psalter has been preserved. For Paula's nuns he translated 39 homilies of Origen on St. Luke and composed his own commentaries on Philemon, Galatians, Ephesians, and Titus (386–387). His commentary on Ecclesiastes was the first Latin work to take cognizance of the Hebrew text (389), and a short while later he wrote the Liber Hebraicarum quaestionum in Genesim, based partially on current Hebrew exegesis (pref.) and published his book on Hebrew names, drawing heavily on Philo and Origen, and a book on Biblical place names, adapted from Eusebius's Onomasticon but corrected by Jerome's own information.

The Hebrew Bible. He published (391–406) a new translation of all the books of the Hebrew Bible, a commentary on the 12 minor Prophets, a series of notes on St. Matthew's Gospel for Eusebius of Cremona, and the Commentarioli in Psalmos (402). Two essays, one on the study of Scripture for Paulinus of Nola (Epist. 53), and one on translation (Epist. 57), are invaluable for an insight into Jerome's mind in approaching the understanding of the Word of God. He wrote a number of brief explanations of various scriptural problems in letters to friends and petitioners.

During the last 15 years of his life Jerome concentrated on his exegetical masterpieces, the Opus prophetale, as he calls it, with his commentaries on Daniel (407), Isaiah (408–410), Ezekiel (410–415), and Jeremiah (ch. 1–32:415–419) and a few minor tracts, closing with an exposition of Psalm 89 (Epist. 140), in which he dilates on the sorrows of “decrepit old age.”

Jerome brought to his exegesis an enormous erudition beginning with his knowledge of the classics and amplified with a close attention to Hebrew tradition and an on-site appreciation of the milieu in which the Scriptures were composed. He had an original mind and excellent human intuition. He employed a well-defined hermeneutical method, borrowing what was good from all three traditions of exegesis, the Alexandrian, Antiochene, and Rabbinical, and while his earlier works abound in allegorical interpretation, his later demonstrate a well-balanced utilization of the best thought then available for “giving my Latin readers the hidden treasures of Hebrew erudition” in keeping with the true meaning of the Scriptures.

Vir Ecclesiasticus. Proud of his orthodoxy as a vir ecclesiasticus, he was gentle and kind with his close associates in the ascetical life, though unmerciful toward his enemies. His scriptural exegesis and historical information in his adaptation of Eusebius's Chronicle made him a founder of the Middle Ages, where he is frequently depicted with a lion for a companion in study. A favorite of Renaissance scholars for the elegance of his Latin style, his strong invective, and breadth of knowledge, he is frequently depicted in an act of supine penance, or with a cardinal's hat (Germany). Various nations including Spain have claimed him as a native.

He has been considered a Father of the Church since the eighth century. The Council of TRENT spoke of Jerome as the Doctor maximus in sacris scripturis explanandis, and modern exegesis—from the Spiritus Paraclitus of Benedict XV (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 12:385–420) and the Divino afflante Spiritu (Sept. 30, 1943) of PIUS XII to more recent exegetical progress—has found him an indispensable witness to the mind of the Church in dealing with the Word of God.

Feast: Sept. 30.

Bibliography: Opera Omnia, 9 v. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 22–30; Opera, ed. J. HILBERG and S. REITER, 4 v. (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 54–56, 59; Vienna 1910–13); ed. P. LAGARDE et al., 2 v. (Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 72, 78; Turnhout, Belg. 1958–59); Sur Jonas, ed. and tr. P. ANTIN (Sources Chrétiennes, ed. H. DELUBAC et al. 43; Paris 1956). The Correspondence (394–419), between Jerome and Augustine of Hippo, tr. C. WHITE (Lewiston, N.Y. 1990); Curiosissimus excerptor: gli “Additamenta” di Girolamo ai “Chronica” di Eusebio, ed. G. BRUGNOLI (Pisa 1995); Epistula di misser sanctu Iheronimu ad Eustochiu, ed. F. SALMERI (Palermo 1999). Literature. P. T. CAMELOT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 5:326–329. H. LIETZMANN, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 8.2 (1913) 1565–81. J. FORGET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 8.1:894–983. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ), Tables générales, 2:2498–2505. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 462–476. F. CAVALLERA, Saint Jérôme, 2 v. (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 1, 2; Louvain 1922); Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIRTO et al. (Paris 1928– ) 4:889–897. A. PENNA, S. Gerolamo (Turin 1949); Principi e caratteri dell' esegesi di S. Gerolamo (Rome 1950). I. D'IVRAY [J. FAHMY-BEY], Saint Jérôme et les dames de l'Aventin (Paris 1938). P. ANTIN, Essai sur saint Jérôme (Paris 1951); “Les Idées morales de S. Jérôme,” Mélanges de science religieuse 14 (1957) 135–150. F. X. MURPHY, ed., A Monument to Saint Jerome (New York 1952). H. HAGENDAHL, Latin Fathers and the Classics (Göteborg 1958). R. and M. PÉNOUD, Saint Jerome, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1962); Saint Jérôme: père de la Bible (Monaco 1996). J. N. D. KELLY, Jerome: His Life, Writings, and Controversies (London 1975). H. FRIEDMANN, A Bestiary for Saint Jerome (Washington 1980). V. LARBAUD, An Homage to Jerome: Patron Saint of Translators, tr. J.-P. DE CHEZET (Marlboro, Vt. 1984). B. RIDDERBOS, Saint and Symbol: Images of Saint Jerome in Early Italian Art, tr. P. DE WAARD-DEKKING (Groningen 1984). M. HODGES, St. Jerome and the Lion (New York 1991). D. ERASMUS, Patristic Scholarship, ed. and tr. J. F. BRADY and J. C. OLIN (Toronto 1992), v. 61; Vita di San Girolamo, ed. and tr. A. MORISI GUERRA (L'Aquila 1988). D. BROWN, Vir Trilinguis: A Study in the Biblical Exegesis of Saint Jerome (Kampen, the Netherlands 1992). C. KRUMEICH, Hieronymus und die christlichen feminae clarissimae (Bonn 1993). P. LARDET, L'apologie de Jérôme contre Rufin (Leiden 1993). A. KAMESAR, Jerome, Greek Scholarship, and the Hebrew Bible (Oxford 1993). L. MIRRI, La dolcezza nella lotta: donne e asceti secondo Girolamo (Magnano 1996). H. LOCHER, Domenico Ghirlandaio, Hieronymus im Gehäuser (Frankfurt am Main 1999). P. P. VERGERIO, Pierpaolo

Vergerio the Elder and Saint Jerome, tr. J. M. MCMANAMON (Tempe, Ariz. 1999). M. LUTHER, Annotierungen zu den Werken des Hieronymus, ed. M. BRECHT and C. PETERS (Cologne 2000). D. F. HEIMANN, "Christian Humanism in the Fourth Century: Saint Jerome," in The Endless Fountain, ed. M. MORFORD (Columbus, Ohio 1972), 58–126.

[F. X. MURPHY]

JEROME OF PRAGUE

Pre-Hussite; b. Prague, c. 1365; d. Constance, May 30, 1416. He studied at Prague, Paris, and then Oxford, where he copied John WYCLIF's theological treatises Dialogue and Triologue, which he brought back to Prague (1401). On his return Jerome (Jeromyn) became a zealous propagator of Wyclif's doctrine in Prague, where he was on the university faculty. He was an active participant in the disputes at the University of Prague and played a special part in the Kutná Hora decree of 1409 (see HUS, JOHN). Through his traveling and eloquence he left his imprint on Paris, Heidelberg, Cologne, and Vienna; but the Wyclifite doctrine he propounded forced him to flee from city to city; e.g., in 1410 he had to flee the Inquisition in Vienna. Because of his renown and learning, King Ladislaus II JAGIEŁŁO of Poland employed him (1413) to organize the University of Cracow; but because of his dissemination of Wyclifite doctrine during his travels with Prince Vytautas, the Polish bishops turned against him. In April 1415 Jerome secretly went to the Council of CONSTANCE in a vain attempt to defend his friend Hus. On the way home he himself was arrested and brought back before the Council. On Sept. 23, 1415, he signed a retraction of the condemned articles of Wyclif and HUS. However, Michael de Causis and Stephen of Pálec declared his recantation ambiguous. On the last of his three appearances before the council (May 26, 1416) he withdrew his earlier retraction. He was proclaimed a relapsed heretic, and as such he was condemned and burned at the stake. Hussites venerate him as a reformer and martyr. He is remembered for his preaching more than for his writing (ed. Fontes rerum Austriacarum 6:112–128).

Bibliography: L. HELLER, Hieronymus von Prag (Lübeck 1835). J. PUTNY, Mistr Jeronym Pražský (Prague 1916). R. R. BETTS, "J. of P.," Univ. of Birmingham Historical Journal 1 (1947) 51–91. P. BERNARD, "J. of P., Austria and the Hussites," Church History 27 (1958) 3–22. L. R. LOOMIS, tr., The Council of Constance, ed. J. H. MUNDY and K. M. WOODY (New York 1961). P. DE VOOUGHT, Catholicism 6:706–707.

[J. PAPIN]

JERON (HIERON), ST.

Priest and missionary to the Frisians; a.k.a. Hieron or Iero; martyred by the Northmen, 856? Differing traditions place his birth in Egmond, Holland, England, or Scotland. When brought before a tribal assembly and sharply questioned, Jeron bore eloquent witness in the best tradition of the Roman martyrs, quoting fluently from the Scriptures. He was then tortured and slain. The saint's head is at Noordwijk, the scene of his martyrdom. Other relics are at St. Adalbert's monastery in Egmond. In the late Middle Ages, and again recently, his cult has been popular in Holland and miracles have been attributed to him.

Feast: Aug. 17; Aug. 18 (Diocese of Haarlem).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 3:475–479. O. OPPERMAN, Fontes egmundenses (Utrecht 1933) 181–307. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:591. H. J. A. COPPENS, Algemeen Overzicht der Kerkgeschiedenis van Noord-Nederland (2d ed. Utrecht 1902) 96–97.

[R. BALCH]

JERUSALEM

Principal city of PALESTINE, capital of modern Israel, and the "Holy City" of Jews, Christians, and Muslims. Its history is of universal interest, not only in the Biblical period, but also in the Christian Era.

Biblical Jerusalem

Jerusalem's name, topography and water supply, archaeological excavations, history, and fortifications are questions of particular concern to students of Sacred Scripture.

Name. The original Hebrew name of the city, y<sup>e</sup>rûšālēm, has been tendentiously vocalized in the Masoretic Text (MT) to the dual form of y<sup>e</sup>rûšāla'im or (five times) y<sup>e</sup>rûšālayim, perhaps to indicate the two hills to which it spread, or to show its importance as the capital. The earlier, correct form, y<sup>e</sup>rûšālem, is still shown in the Aramaic sections of the MT (Dn 5.2, 3; Ezr 4.12; 5.2, 15), and this is the pronunciation presupposed by the spelling y<sup>r</sup>wšlm of the Elephantine papyri. Both forms, y<sup>r</sup>wšlm and y<sup>r</sup>wšlym, are used indiscriminately on the shekels and half shekels of the First Revolt and in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. In the Septuagint (LXX), Ἱερουσαλήμ prevails in the protocanonical books, Ἱεροσόλυμα in the deuterocanonical books. In the NT, the more common form is Ἱερουσαλήμ. In the so-called Execration Texts, the Egyptians of the 19th century B.C. wrote the name of the city as 'wš'mm (for rwšlm). In the Amarna Letters of the 14th century B.C., the name is spelled in cuneiform as Urušalim, and in the Akkadian inscriptions of the Assyrians and Babylonians (middle of the 1st millennium B.C.)

the ordinary spelling is Uršalimmu. In 1962 there was found in a cave about five miles south of Jerusalem an inscription of the 8th century B.C., written in ancient Hebrew (or Phoenician) script, with the oldest known form of the name yršlm. The folk etymologies that connect šālēm with Hebrew šālôm, “peace” (already witnessed to in Heb 7.2) and explain the meaning of the city’s name as “city of peace,” “vision of peace,” or “possession of peace” are of no scientific value. The probable meaning is Foundation (yerû from the yrw, “to found”) of (the god) Shalem. This god (šālēm) is a well-known deity of the Semitic pantheon, and his birth is recounted in the texts of UGARIT. Perhaps the word Salem (šālēm) in Genesis 14.18 originally had nothing to do with Jerusalem; but apparently it was later understood as a synonym for Jerusalem, for it is so used in Ps 75(76).3. Before David’s capture of the city, the dominant clan among its mixed inhabitants was the Jebusites (yebûsî: Jos 15.8; 18.28), and so it was also known at that time as Jebus (yebûs: Jgs 19.10–11; 1 Chr 11.4–5). At present, its official name is Yerushalayim in the State of Israel, and El-Quds (“the holiness,” i.e., holy place; cf. “the holy city” in Is 52.1; Mt 4.5; 27.53; Rv 11.2) in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

Topography and Water Supply. Jerusalem is situated at 35°14' east longitude and 31°46' north latitude (about the same latitude as El Paso, Tex.), near the water divide on the central limestone plateau of Palestine, 32 miles east of the Mediterranean Sea and 14 miles west of the northern end of the Dead Sea. It has the general form of an inclined plain, somewhat wider and higher in the north than in the south, and surrounded on the east, south, and west by valleys that give it the appearance of a promontory. Actually, the city spreads over two hills that are separated by a valley running down from north to south, from the present Damascus Gate to the Pool of Siloam. In Roman times this was known as the Tyropoeon Valley or Valley of the Cheesemakers (τυροποιῶν); the present Arabic-speaking inhabitants call it simply el-Wād (the valley). The two hills are more noticeable at the southern end of the valley, where they face each other on the east and west outside the south wall of the present “Old City.” The western hill is higher (c. 2,525 feet above sea level) and broader than the eastern hill and is divided by a slight east-west depression into the higher land at Herod's Gate (near Calvary) in the north and the higher land at the Cenacle (Christian Zion) in the south. The valley that skirts it at the west and south was known in Biblical times as the Valley of (the sons of) Hinnom, in Hebrew, gê' (b'nê) hinnôm, whence the word GEHENNA; it is now called Wadi er-Rabābi. The eastern hill is less high (c. 2,425 feet above sea level) and less wide. Two slight depressions divide it into three elevations, decreasing in height from north to south: Bezetha, the Temple area (identified in post-exilic times with the Mount Moria of Abraham's sacrifice: cf. 2 Chr with Gn 22.2), and Ophel (Neh 3.26), now called edh-Dhahūra. On the east the Biblical valley of the Kidron, now called Wadi en-Nār, separates the eastern hill of Jerusalem from the MOUNT OF OLIVES and its southern extension, the so-called Mount of Scandal (or Offense: cf. 2 Kgs 23.13), now called Jebel Baṭn el-Hawa.

Greek Orthodox priests outside the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, constructed c. 12th Century, Jerusalem. (©Paul A. Souders/CORBIS)

On the western side of the Kidron Valley, at the foot of Ophel, is the strong, intermittent spring of water known in OT times as Gihon (1 Kgs 1.33), now called in Arabic 'Ain Umm ed-Derej (Spring of the Mother of the Steps), from the double flight of 32 steps by which one now descends to the spring, or, especially by the Christians, 'Ain Sitti Maryam (Spring of Lady Mary) from the traditional tomb of the Blessed Virgin Mary further up the Kidron Valley. This copious, perennial source of water is the primary reason why the hill of Ophel, just above it, has been settled by men ever since prehistoric times. In the archeological explorations around this spring that were begun by C. Warren in 1867 and resumed by the Parker Mission between 1909 and 1914, there was discovered a shaft tunnel by which the spring could be reached from within the ancient city. This tunnel is apparently the šinnôr (poorly translated as "gutter" in the Douay Version) by which Joab gained access to the city when he captured it for David (2 Sm 5.8). At the time of King Ahaz (c. 735–715) there were two pools or reservoirs at the southern end of Ophel, each of which received its water from Gihon through a conduit (re'ālā) constructed along the base of the hill. Isaiah speaks of this water as "the waters of Siloam" (Is 8.6), the Hebrew word šlōah, "the sending," being another term for conduit. The two reservoirs at the southern end of Ophel, one of which was on somewhat higher ground than the other, were known simply as "the Upper Pool" (habberēkâ ha'elyônâ: Is 7.3; 36.2) and "the Lower Pool" (habberēkâ hattaḥtônâ. Is 22.9). Since the Gihon spring and the conduits that brought its water to these pools lay exposed to besieging enemies, King Hezekiah (c. 715–687), in preparing for Sennacherib's siege (701 B.C.), had a tunnel cut under Ophel connecting Gihon with the "old" Upper Pool, "the Pool of Siloam" (Jn 9.7, 11), which he renovated (Is 22.9–11; 2 Kgs 20.20; Sir 48.17). He could thus block up and conceal the outside entrance to Gihon and discontinue the use of the exposed conduits. The Siloe (Siloam) tunnel (c. 600 yards long), a remarkably skillful work of engineering for that time (see SILOAM INSCRIPTION), still brings the water from 'Ain Sitti Maryam to the Pool of Siloe, now called Birket Silwān. The old Lower Pool, at present silted up and used as a vegetable garden, is now called Birket el-Ḥamra.

A little to the southeast of Ophel, at the juncture of the Kidron and the Hinnom valleys, is a poorer spring, En-ragel (Jos 15.7; 18.16; 2 Sm 17.17; 1 Kgs 1.9). With the present silting up of the valley, it is now considerably below the surface; its modern Arabic name is Bir Ayyub, "Job's Well." It is often considered, though not with certainty, the same as the 'ēn hattannīn [Dragon's(?) Well] of Nehemiah 2.13. The Pool of BETHESDA near the Sheepgate in Jerusalem (Jn 5.2) has been discovered and excavated near the Church of St. Ann.

No doubt, many houses in Jerusalem had their own cisterns for the storage of rain water (2 Kgs 18.31; Prv 5.15), and probably there were public cisterns also (cf. 2 Sm 23.15; 2 Chr 26.10). Modern Jerusalem has several public cisterns, such as Birket Ḥammam el-Baṭraḳ, Birket es-Sultān, Birket Mamilla, and Birket Sitti Maryam. The main water supply for modern Arab Jerusalem comes from the strong springs and reservoir in Wadi el-Fāra (Biblical Parah: Jos 18.23; Jer 13.4–7), about ten miles northeast of the city. Water for Israeli Jerusalem is pumped up from the reservoir fed by the powerful spring of Rās el-'Ain near ancient Antipatris.

Archeological Excavations. The archeology of Jerusalem presents special difficulties both because the city has often suffered violent destruction and because a large part of the ancient city, at least as it was at the time of Christ, is still thickly settled. Almost all the archeological excavations have been to the south of the southern wall of present-day Jerusalem. Fortunately, this thinly settled section contains the oldest part of ancient Jerusalem. A brief summary is given here in chronological order of the chief archeological explorations of the city.

Older Explorations. From 1867 to 1870 C. Warren explored the land below the southeast corner of the Ḥaram esh-Sherif (area of Herod's Temple) and discovered the ancient well now known as Warren's Well. From 1880 to 1881 G. Schick and H. Guthe made soundings along the eastern base of Ophel from Birket el-Ḥamra to

Pope Paul VI celebrating Mass at the Holy Sepulcher during his January 1964 pilgrimage to the Holy Land. He was the first pope since St. Peter to set foot into the Holy City.

'Ain Sitti Maryam. From 1894 to 1897 F. I. Bliss and A. C. Dickie explored the Wadi er-Rabābi and excavated at the eastern side of Birket el-Ḥamra and among the ruins of a Byzantine church at the north of the Pool of Siloam.

Between 1904 and 1914 the Parker Mission made further explorations of the various tunnels and conduits connected with the Gihon Spring. At the same time L. H. Vincent published studies of the blind tunnels, Warren's Well, the second conduit, and Hezekiah's tunnel. In 1913 and 1914 and again in 1923 and 1924, R. W. Weil made methodical excavations in the southern part of edh-Dhahūra, where he discovered many ancient tombs, including the so-called royal necropolis, as well as important sections of ancient city-walls and the remnant of a large tower, which he identified with "the Tower of Siloam" of Luke 13.4. From 1923 to 1925 R. A. S. Macalister and G. Duncan made excavations at the northern end of Ophel, where they believed they discovered the northern limit of the Canaanite city with its moat that ran in an east-west direction across the hill and with its complicated system of city walls. Within the city an outcropping of rock was described as an altar. On the eastern edge of the hill, above the Gihon Spring, a well-preserved section of the city wall was dated to the Jebusite period, and the adjoining tower to the period of David or Solomon. In 1927 J. W. Crowfoot discovered, in a deep excavation in the Tyropoeon Valley, remnants of a large city gate that gave access to the western side of the original city. It was built in the Bronze Age and continued in use until the Hellenistic period. From 1925 to 1927 E. L. Sukenik and L. A. Mayer studied the groups of stone blocks left in a line at intervals some distance to the north of the present northern wall of Jerusalem, and they attributed them to the so-called Third Wall of the city. Between 1934 and 1940 and in 1947, C. N. Johns identified the remnants of Hellenistic and Herodian constructions in the Citadel (the so-called Tower of David) near the Jaffa Gate. In 1940 R. W. Hamilton made a sounding at the Damascus Gate and studied part of the Turkish wall.

King Jehu of Israel paying homage to King Salmanasar (Shalmaneser) III of Assyria (859–825 B.C.), detail of the black obelisk of Salmanasar III.

From 1961 to 1963, K. Kenyon of the British School of Archeology and Père R. de Vaux of the École Biblique undertook a series of excavations at various points around the city, in order to check, according to the strict methods of modern scientific archeology, the findings of the earlier explorations of Jerusalem's system of defenses. A long trench that was dug in 1961 from the foot of the wall on top of Ophel that Macalister had discovered in 1925 down to the Gihon Spring showed that the so-called "fine example of Canaanite wall" rested on houses that had been built in the 8th century B.C., and that the so-called Davidic-Solomonic tower was really a construction of the 2nd century B.C. Along the trench there were found remnants of houses from the Early Bronze Age (3rd millennium B.C.) and Iron Age II (900–600 B.C.) and, at 50 yards above the spring, part of a massive wall ascribed to the 18th century B.C. In 1961 and 1962 these dates were fully confirmed, and the massive wall of the 18th century B.C. was shown to have formed the eastern limit of the Canaanite city. The city that David captured from the Jebusites was not limited to the top of the hill of Ophel, as was previously thought, but it spread out over the steep eastern side of the hill, and so it remained until it was completely destroyed by NEBUCHADNEZZAR in 587 B.C. When Nehemiah rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem in the second half of the 5th century B.C., he did not follow the line of the ancient eastern wall, but built a new wall on top of the hill, as can be seen from the position of the pottery from the Persian period.

It was along this new wall of Nehemiah's that Jonathan, c. 143 B.C. (1 Mc 12.37), built the fortress tower that had formerly been attributed to Solomon. Likewise, the soundings made at the southern and western parts of Ophel showed that the walls that Bliss and Guthe had ascribed to the time of the kings of Judah were really only of the 1st century B.C. Although the findings of this most recent archeological campaign at Jerusalem are not definitive, and further campaigns are announced, it can now be stated with certainty that both in the pre-exilic period and in the first few centuries of the post-exilic period the city was situated on the eastern hill, that is, between the Kidron Valley and the Tyropoeon Valley; the city gate in the Tyropoeon Valley that Crowfoot discovered in 1927 should have, even then, made this certain.

Biblical History of Jerusalem. This can be conveniently divided into three periods: (1) from earliest settlements to David's capture of the city (c. 3000–1000 B.C.); from David's conquest to the Babylonian destruction of the city (1000–587); from Nehemiah's rebuilding of the city to its destruction by the Romans in A.D. 70.

From Earliest Settlement to David's Conquest. Aborigines lived at various periods of the Paleolithic and Neolithic ages in caves near the Gihon Spring until they were supplanted by people possessing a higher culture and acquainted with the use of bronze. These people who invaded Palestine in the course of the 4th millennium B.C. the OT calls Canaanites—a term to be understood more in a geographic than in an ethnologic or linguistic sense (see CANAAN AND CANAANITES). The numerous samples of pottery dating from the end of the Chalcolithic Age to the end of the Early Bronze Age that the Parker Mission gathered from the caves on Ophel give concrete evidence of a primitive urban nucleus on this hill during the 3rd millennium B.C.

The Amorrite clan of Jebusites, who understood the importance of the Gihon Spring, settled on the hill above the spring, and to the natural defenses of the steep hill they added a strong encircling stone wall. In the center of their settlement they built for their king a fortress "palace" (no doubt of very modest proportions), which was known by the indigenous name of ZION (šīyōn), and to ensure their water supply in case of siege, they dug a secret shaft tunnel (šinnōr) that gave them access from within the city to the Gihon Spring. According to a Jewish tradition that was already known to Josephus (Ant. 1.10.2), it was in this city that Melchisedec, a priest of EL ELYON (the Most High God), ruled as king at the time when Abraham lived a seminomadic life in Palestine (Gn 14.17). Having come under Egyptian domination after the conquest of Palestine by Thutmose III (c. 1490–1436 B.C.), the mixed population of Jebusite Urušalim ("Your father was an Amorrite and your mother a Hittite": Ez 16.3) was governed as vassals of Pharaoh. At that time, it seems, members of a military caste were installed there, as can be deduced from a tomb, discovered in 1954 on the Mount of Olives, that contained much pottery of the Middle and Late Bronze Age and Egyptian imports, such as alabaster vessels, seals, scarabs, and weapons. Even the city's ruler with the partly Hurrian name of 'Abdi(Putu-) Hepa sent a message (as known from the Amarna Letters) from his lofty fortress city asking Pharaoh to defend his Bît Šulmān (capital) from the attacks of the HABIIRU (Habiri) marauders. At the time of the Israelite invasion under JOSHUA, the city's King Adonizedek made himself head of a league of neighboring Amorrite kings in an effort to withstand and stop the invasion at Gibeon (Jos 10.1–6). Although captured and put to death by Joshua (Jos 10.23–26), Adonizedek left his city so strongly fortified that it was able to hold out against the Israelite invaders for more than two centuries (Jgs 1.21; 19.10–12).

From David's Conquest to Babylonian Destruction. After David had reigned for seven years at Hebron, he finally succeeded in capturing Jerusalem, which he forthwith made the political and religious center of his kingdom. David's general Joab apparently caught the Jebusite garrison by surprise when he led his men up the secret shaft tunnel (the šinnōr) that connected the Gihon Spring with the center of the city (2 Sm 5.6–8; 1 Chr 11.4–6). The first care of the conqueror was to repair the walls of the city and, with the help of workmen sent by the King of Tyre, to build a new palace for himself on the acropolis of Zion, which, because he had captured it, became his personal property, "the City of David" (2 Sm 5.9, 11). Later, he brought the ark of the covenant from Cariath-Jarim into Zion and installed it in its sacred tent on his acropolis; thus Jerusalem became the religious as well as the political center of the country.

David's son Solomon (c. 961–922), however, brought even more importance and splendor to the city by erecting, with the aid of skilled craftsmen sent by King Hiram of Tyre, a magnificent TEMPLE on the hill just to the north of the City of David (1 Kgs 5.1–6.38). The altar of holocaust in front (to the east) of the Temple was probably a little to the south of the sacred rock that is now in the center of the Muslim "Dome of the Rock" (the so-called Mosque of Omar; see B. Bagatti, Biblica 46:428–444). Although this "house of Yahweh," the abode of the ark of the covenant, was surrounded by an inner and an outer courtyard (1 Kgs 6.36; Jer 36.10), these open spaces should not be thought of as occupying the vast space that is now the Haram esh-Sherīf. The latter does indeed correspond quite well with the courts of Herod's Temple, which were designed to hold immense crowds of pilgrims. But Solomon's temple, like the later sanctuary of Yahweh in the Northern Kingdom, was primarily the king's private chapel (cf. Am 7.13). To the south of the Temple and its courts were the royal palaces and government buildings (1 Kgs 7.1–12). But later constructions and destructions have apparently removed all traces of these buildings, so that their exact location (in part probably where the modern Mosque el-Aqşa stands) is now unknown. Likewise uncertain is the nature of the Millo (literally “filling”) that Solomon made (1 Kgs 9.15–24; 11.27); probably it was a retaining wall with fill built to protect a weak section of the city wall between the City of David and the Temple area.

With the death of Solomon the city’s growth was checked by the secession of the ten northern tribes of Israel, and Jerusalem remained henceforth the capital of merely the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, ever more and more weakened by raids and invasions from without and by dissensions within. In the 5th year of Rehoboam’s reign (c. 917 B.C.) King Shishak of Egypt invaded Palestine, captured Jerusalem, and pillaged its temple and royal palace (1 Kgs 14.25–26). About the year 897 B.C., King Asa of Judah impoverished the city in order to purchase the help of Ben-hadad of Syria against King Baasha of Israel (1 Kgs 15.18; 2 Chr 16.2–3). Toward the end of the 9th century B.C. King Joash had to pay immense tribute to Hazael of Damascus to have this Syrian king raise his siege of Jerusalem (2 Kgs 12.17–18). About the year 783 B.C., after Joash of Israel defeated Amaziah of Judah at the battle of Beth-Shemesh, the penalty that Jerusalem had to pay was not only a large indemnity from the Temple and palace treasures, but also the destruction of the northern wall of the city from the Ephraim Gate to the Corner Gate—a stretch of 600 feet (2 Kgs 14.13–14). Amaziah’s successor, Uzziah, evidently repaired this damage, for he built fortified towers at the Corner Gate, the Valley Gate, and the Angle (2 Chr 26.9). The earthquake that occurred in the reign of Uzziah (Am 1.1; Zec 14.5) probably did much damage in the city, for his successor, Jotham (regent 750–742, king 742–735), had to repair the wall of Ophel (2 Kgs 15.35; 2 Chr 27.2–3). King Ahaz (735–715) again impoverished the city by paying a heavy tribute to the Assyrians for their help against Damascus (2 Kgs 16.5–9).

After the fall of Samaria in 721 B.C., Jerusalem probably received many refugees from the north. This growth in the city’s population may be the reason why a section of Jerusalem was later known as the mišneh, “Second Ward” (2 Kgs 22.14; Zep 1.10). The work of King Hezekiah (715–687) in strengthening the defenses of the city under the threat of Sennacherib’s siege, especially his construction of the tunnel under the hill of Ophel, to bring the water from the Gihon Spring into the Pool of Siloam, has been mentioned above. His successor, King Manasseh (687–642), made extensive repairs and new constructions in Jerusalem’s defenses—“an outer wall for the City of David west of Gihon in the valley, and for the entrance of the Fish Gate, and around Ophel” (2 Chr 33.14). But all these measures proved useless against the battering rams of the Babylonians who besieged the city from Jan. 15, 588, until they captured it on July 30, 587. Its walls, its temple, and its houses were all completely demolished; its inhabitants were all either killed, enslaved, or deported into exile (2 Kgs 25.1–21).

From Nehemiah to Titus. After Cyrus issued his edict in favor of the Jews in 538 B.C., the people of the former Kingdom of Judah (or Jews, as they were now called) began to return in small groups to Palestine, and Jerusalem slowly revived. On the site of the ruined Temple of Solomon, Sheshbazzar began the building of a new Temple shortly after 538 B.C. (Ezr 5.16), but it was not until 515 B.C. that the Davidic prince Zerubbabel and the high priest Joshua were able to finish and dedicate it (Ezr 6.15). The city walls, however, still lay in ruins until NEHEMIAH had new ones built, at least in some places on new lines, in 439 B.C. (Neh 2.11–6.15). Yet during the Persian period (538–333 B.C.) the city, under the rule of the Persian governors and the Jewish high priests, was apparently slow in recovering its former glory.

With the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great in 331 B.C., Jerusalem passed to the dominion of Greek rulers, first of the Ptolemies of Egypt, and then (after 198 B.C.) of the Seleucids of Syria. During this Hellenistic period (331–63) the city grew greatly in size and population, spreading out to the north and west over an area that had not formed part of the older town. In 168 B.C. King ANTIOCHUS IV EPIPHANES of Syria pillaged the city and profaned its Temple (1 Mc 1.20–58). To keep control of the city, the Syrians built a strong citadel known as the Acra (1 Mc 3.45; 4.41; 6.18, etc.); it is uncertain whether it was situated on the southeast hill (Ophel) or on the southwest hill (the new part of the town). The strong Maccabean reaction, however, prevented the complete Hellenization of the city. After three years of hard fighting, Judas Maccabee recovered and purified the Temple (in 164 B.C.), which, in the language of that time, was spoken of as Mount Zion. Simon, the leader of the Maccabean party from 142 to 135 B.C., strengthened the fortifications of the city and finally succeeded in driving the Syrians from the Acra (1 Mc 13.49). During the following years of the Hasmonaean rulers, Jerusalem “the holy” (as it was called on the coins of the period) enjoyed a period of great prosperity, which was not greatly disturbed until the civil war that broke out in 69 B.C. between the Hasmonaean brothers Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II and eventually led to Roman intervention. In 63 B.C. Pompey made Jerusalem tributary to Rome.

After HEROD THE GREAT, with the approval of Caesar Augustus, installed himself as king in Jerusalem in 37

B.C., this monarch embellished the city with many buildings in the Greco-Roman style: an agora, a theater, a gymnasium, and a hippodrome. On the western hill, near the present Jaffa Gate, he built a large fortress palace, which was protected by three towers, named respectively Hippicus after a friend of his, Phasaël in memory of his older brother, and Mariamne in honor of his beloved Hasmonaean wife whom he had put to death. On the eastern hill, northwest of the Temple, there had been a fortress (bîrâ) at least from the time of Nehemiah (Neh 2.8), which served as the headquarters of the Persian governor (Neh 7.2). Known as the Baris, it was repaired by the Hasmonaeans (Josephus, Ant. 15.11.4; 18.4.3). Herod rebuilt it and named it the Antonia in honor of the Roman triumvir Mark Anthony. Under the Roman procurators of Palestine it served as the barrack for the Roman soldiers who policed the city, and it may well have been the PRAETORIUM where Pilate condemned Jesus to death. The chief marvel, however, of Herod's building activity in Jerusalem was the Temple, which he completely rebuilt on a much grander scale than before and with surrounding courtyards, the present Ḥaram esh-Sherîf, more than twice their former size. This is the Temple mentioned so often in the NT. Part of the immense retaining wall for the southwestern part of its enclosure, now known as the Wailing Wall, is the best-preserved example of Herodian construction in the city.

In A.D. 66 the Jewish revolt against Rome broke out and ended in A.D. 70 with the destruction of the city and its Temple by the Romans under Titus. After the suppression of the revolt of BAR KOKHBA in A.D. 135, Emperor Hadrian had the city completely rebuilt on the Roman plan and renamed Colonia Aelia Capitolina. The position of the city walls and the plan of its streets, with the main north-south avenue running from the Damascus Gate to the so-called Dung Gate and the transverse east-west avenue running from the Jaffa Gate to the Temple area, have been essentially preserved in the present "Old City" of Jerusalem.

Fortifications. The sparse and incidental topographical references to the walls and gates of Jerusalem that are given in 2 Samuel 5.9; 1 Kings 9.15; 2 Kings 14.13; 2 Chronicles 26.9; 27.3; 33.14, as well as the more detailed account of Nehemiah's nocturnal inspection of the city walls (Neh 2.11–15), his rebuilding of them (Neh 3.1–32), and the procession at their dedication (Neh 12.27–39), do not give sufficiently consistent data for delineating the extent of the city in either the pre-exilic or the early postexilic period.

According to Josephus. Flavius Josephus (Bell. Jud. 5.4.2) gives a rather elaborate account of the defenses of the city at the time of the Roman siege of A.D. 68–70. But this is not easy to follow, and its author was evidently mistaken in thinking that two of the walls of the city of his time were the same as those of earlier periods. The city that he knew certainly extended over the western as well as the eastern hill. It was protected by three walls, which he calls simply the First, the Second, and the Third Wall. Only the First Wall, however, made a complete circuit; the Second and the Third Wall were constructions added successively at the northern limits of the city.

The First Wall, Josephus says, was the most ancient, having been built by David and Solomon and their successors. In the north it ran east from the Hippicus Tower (El Qala'ah or the Citadel of the present day) to the west side of the Temple area, probably in the vicinity of the Bâb es-Silsileh (Gate of the Chain) entrance to the Ḥaram esh-Sherîf; on the west and the south it ran from the Hippicus Tower south along the western and southern edge of the western hill, above the Wadi er-Rabâbi, till it met the eastern wall a little south of the Pool of Siloe; on the east it ran north from the latter point along the eastern edge of the Ophel Hill till it came to the southeast corner of the Temple area. The Second Wall, according to Josephus, began at the Gennath Gate (unidentified, but probably just to the east of the Hippicus Tower) in the First Wall and, enclosing the northern part of the city, ended at the Antonia.

Despite the statement of Josephus, no part of his First Wall was built by David. The Jebusite city that David captured and named the City of David was solely the eastern hill, between the Kidron and the Tyropoeon valleys, but also including the eastern slope of this hill and thus extending east of the First Wall of Josephus, which was at the top of this hill. Solomon built his Temple and palaces on the hillock to the north of this hill. The Millo of Solomon by which "he closed the breach of the City of David" (1 Kgs 11.27) may have been the "filling" used in the intervening space, but this is uncertain. Although the city evidently grew somewhat under the later kings of Judah, as evidenced by the mention of the Mishneh of "Second Ward" (apparently a new addition to the city), and also by the references to the walls that these kings built or rebuilt (the Hebrew verb bânâ having both meanings), the extent of the city that the Babylonians destroyed has been a much disputed question, depending mostly on the interpretation of the data supplied by Nehemiah.

According to L. H. Vincent. The most ardent defender of the opinion that Josephus's First Wall represented the city wall at the time of the last kings of Judah has been L. H. Vincent. According to this eminent archeologist the northern section of the First Wall had a gate, at about halfway along its course, called the Ephraim Gate, because the road from it led northward to the region of Ephraim (the Northern Kingdom of Israel), and about 200 yards to the west of this, at the place where Herod later built the Hippicus Tower, was the Corner Gate (cf. 2 Kgs 14.13). The wall on the western and southern edge of the western hill was the same as this section of Josephus's First Wall; at a point shortly after it bent to the east was the Valley Gate (2 Chr 26.9; Neh 2.13, 15), which opened on the Hinnom Valley, and 500 yards to the east of this gate (Neh 3.13) was the Dung Gate (Neh 2.13; 3.14; 12.31), which would thus be at the southeast corner of the wall. A short distance northward, up the Kidron Valley, was the Fountain Gate (Neh 2.14), near the Pool of Siloe and the stairs up to the City of David (3.15). Further up the Kidron Valley was the Water Gate (3.26; 8.1, 3; 12.37), near the Gihon Spring, followed by the Horse Gate (3.28; Jer 31.40), near the southeast corner of the Temple area, and the Muster Gate (Neh 3.31), corresponding to the modern (walled-up) Golden Gate.

To the north of the northern section of this First Wall, according to Vincent, was the Mishneh or Second Ward (2 Kgs 22.14; Zep 1.10), and to protect this suburb, Hezekiah built the "outer wall" (2 Chr 32.5), which was the same as Josephus's Second Wall. Along this wall, from east to west, were the following gates and towers: the Sheep Gate (Neh 3.1–32; 12.39; cf. Jn 5.2), north of the Temple area; the Tower of the Hundred (Neh 3.1; 12.39) and the Tower of Hananeel (hānan'el: 3.1; 12.39; Jer 31.38; Zec 14.10), at the northwest of the Temple area; the Fish Gate (Neh 3.3; 12.39; 2 Chr 33.14; Zep 1.10), in the upper Tyropoeon Valley; the Old Gate (Neh 3.6; 12.39); the Ephraim Gate (Neh 8.16; 12.39), which received its name from the Ephraim Gate in the First Wall whose place it took, and of which Vincent believed he found remnants under the modern Russian Hospice near the Basilica of the Holy SEPULCHER; and finally the Tower of the Ovens (Neh 3.11; 12.38), at the Corner Gate (2 Kgs 14.13; Jer 31.38) in the northwestern corner of the city.

According to More Recent Archeologists. Although this plan of the walls and towers of Jerusalem at the time of Nehemiah as drawn up by Vincent was reproduced in various maps of the city printed during the first half of the 20th century and still has its supporters, it is now rejected by several leading archeologists, who argue from the almost complete lack of pottery earlier than the Hellenistic age on the western hill of Jerusalem that the city of the pre-exilic and early postexilic periods did not extend over nearly so vast an area. The city gate that J. W. Crowfoot discovered in 1927 in the Tyropoeon Valley and showed to have been in use from the Bronze Age to the Greco-Roman period seems to clinch the argument that in the Persian period (the time of Nehemiah) Jerusalem was still limited to the eastern hill, even though at the time of its destruction by the Babylonians it may well have extended further to the north and west of the Temple area than it did at the time of David and Solomon.

On the map of the city as drawn by M. Avi-Yonah, who is representative of the more recent opinion, the gates and towers are distributed as follows. In the north wall, from east to west: the Sheep Gate, which is the same as the Benjamin Gate (Jer 20.2; 37.13; 38.7; Zec 14.10); the Tower of the Hundred, protecting the eastern side of the Fish Gate; the Fish Gate, which is the same as the Ephraim Gate, located on the eastern slope of the northwestern hill; the Tower of Hananeel, protecting the western side of the Fish Gate and forming the northwestern corner of the city. In the west wall: the Mishneh Gate, which gave access to the northwestern part of the city known as the Mishneh or Second Ward; the Broad Wall (Neh 3.8; 12.38), which first turned east down the slope of the northwestern hill, then south in the Tyropoeon Valley; the Valley Gate, which gave access from the Tyropoeon Valley into the City of David. At the southern point of the city, where the western wall turned eastward to meet the eastern wall, the Fountain Gate (Neh 2.14; 3.15; 12.37), in which were "the stairs [stone steps] of the City of David" (Neh 12.37). Outside the southwest end of this wall there was another wall, the Outer Wall that King Hezekiah had built to protect the two pools that were supplied with water from his newly dug tunnel (2 Chr 32.2–5). This wall, or at least its eastern section, is called "the Wall of the Pool of Siloam at the King's Garden" in Nehemiah 3.15. At the southwestern corner of this Outer Wall was the Dung Gate, known also as "the Gate between the Two Walls" (2 Kgs 25.4; Jer 39.4). The eastern wall of the city would be the same as that described above. This hypothetical reconstruction of the wall of Jerusalem as it was at the time of Nehemiah has the advantage of being in agreement with the findings of archeology. All of its details, however, are not certain, particularly in regard to the distance between the various gates of the city.

The Third Wall. According to Josephus, the Third Wall of Jerusalem was begun by King Herod Agrippa I (d. A.D. 44), who laid immense stones for its foundation, but was obliged by the Emperor Claudius to desist from finishing it. It was hurriedly completed at the outbreak of the Jewish revolt in A.D. 66. Agrippa had planned this wall as a defense for the suburbs north of the city, which till then had been defenseless. Josephus says that this Third Wall began in the west at the Hippicus Tower of Herod the Great and first ran north for the distance of about 400 yards to a large tower called Psephinus; from here it turned to the east, passing south of the Tomb of Queen Helena of Adiabene (now commonly known as the Tomb of the Kings); on reaching a point north of the eastern wall of the city, it turned south to join this wall.

Formerly this Third Wall was regarded as on the same line as the present north wall of the Old City. Although the present walls of the Old City of Jerusalem date, in their actual condition, only from the reign of the Turkish Sultan Suleiman I the Magnificent (1520–66), at several places along its north wall there are stones near or under the ground that apparently come from the 1st century. Therefore, many scholars, especially Vincent, regarded this as marking the line of what Josephus calls the Third Wall.

But in 1925–27 and again in 1940 remnants of a city wall were found considerably to the north of the present wall. A large stone of this wall can be seen a little to the south of the American Consulate in Jordan, and other sections were discovered to the east of this, on the property of the American School of Oriental Research. Although Vincent protested to the end that this was hurriedly built by the Jews in the revolt of Bar Kokhba [see his article, “Jerusalem,” Dictionnaire de la Bible, 4 (1949) 923–926], most archeologists now hold that this wall fits so well with the description that Josephus gives of the wall that Agrippa began that it cannot be other than the so-called Third Wall. In any case, the identification of this wall does not concern the question of the authenticity of the traditional site of Calvary—which was “outside the gate” (Heb 13.12). The Church of the Holy Sepulcher is a little to the north of the line of the Second Wall, and the Third Wall was not yet built at the time of the death of Jesus. The line of the present north wall of the city most likely does not antedate the 2nd century, the ancient 1st-century stones in its base having been probably reused from the destroyed walls of Herod’s city when the Emperor Hadrian had the city rebuilt as Aelia Capitolina.

Christian Jerusalem

The history of Jerusalem in the Christian Era will be treated here in connection with that of the Greek (Orthodox) patriarchate. After that, something will be said of the other Christian patriarchates of the city.

Greek Patriarchate. The present Greek Orthodox patriarch of Jerusalem is, ecclesiastically speaking, the lineal descendant of the Apostle, St. James the Less, the first Bishop of Jerusalem. Historically, the history of this patriarchate, like that of the city itself in the Christian Era, falls into four main periods: (1) the Roman-Byzantine period, from the 1st century to the Muslim conquest of the city in A.D. 638; (2) the Arab period, from the Muslim conquest to the capture of the city by the Crusaders in 1099; (3) the period of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem till the loss of the city in 1187; (4) the Turkish and modern period from the end of the 12th century to the present.

From the 1st Century to the Muslim Conquest. In Acts, the Apostle St. JAMES THE LESS acts as head of the first Christian community in Jerusalem, and so he has been traditionally reckoned as its first bishop. According to Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 2.23), when James died a martyr in A.D. 63, he was succeeded by St. SIMON THE APOSTLE, who survived the Roman destruction of the city in A.D. 70 and died a martyr in 107 (ibid. 3.32). Eusebius gives a surprisingly long list of 13 successive bishops of Jerusalem between the death of St. Simon in 107 and the second Roman destruction of the city at the end of the Bar Kokhba revolt in 135. All of these were Judaeo-Christians. But from Mark of Caesarea (135–136) on, all the bishops of the rebuilt city (Aelia Capitolina) were of non-Jewish origin.

When the hierarchical structure of the whole Church was more highly developed in the 2nd century, Jerusalem, then mostly a pagan city, did not receive the position that might have been expected for it as the mother cell of Christianity. It was merely a suffragan see of the metropolitan see of Caesarea Maritima, itself under the patriarch of Antioch in Syria. Yet, after peace was restored to the Church by Constantine the Great in 312, Jerusalem soon acquired great importance because of the Basilica of the Holy Sepulcher and the other famous churches that this emperor and his wife, St. HELENA, built in or near the city; this led to a large influx of pilgrims and to the erection of many monasteries in or near Jerusalem. At the Council of Nicaea (325) Bishop Marcarius obtained for his see (still called Aelia) an honorary precedence immediately after the patriarchates of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, though still subject jurisdictionally to the metropolitan see of Caesarea Maritima—an anomalous situation that later led to much friction, particularly at the time of the celebrated bishop, St. Cyril of Jerusalem (352–386), in his disputes with the Arians.

Bishop Juvenal of Jerusalem (422–458), a clever, unscrupulous politician, succeeded in getting at the Council of Chalcedon (451) what he had failed to obtain at the Council of Ephesus (431)—the elevation of his see to a genuine patriarchate, independent of Antioch, with a territory south from Lebanon to Arabia embracing three metropolitan and 56 suffragan sees. The Empress Eudocia, wife of Theodosius II (408–450), and the Emperor Justinian I (527–565) contributed to the development of the city by building churches, monasteries, and public edifices, the magnificence of which can be seen in the mosaic map of Medaba. Throughout the Monophysite conflict the patriarchate of Jerusalem remained orthodox, thanks especially to the efforts of the monk St. Sabas (d. 532).

But there were sufficient Monophysites in Palestine for the Monophysite (Jacobite) patriarch of Antioch to appoint Severus Bishop of Jerusalem in 597, and from him is derived the line of Jacobite bishops of Jerusalem down to the present.

In 614 Christian Jerusalem suffered a dreadful disaster: the city was taken by the Persians, who destroyed most of its churches and monasteries, including the Basilica of the Holy Sepulcher, massacred thousands of its inhabitants, deported the Patriarch Zacharias to Persia, and took as booty the great relic of the holy cross. Yet, even before the Emperor Heraclius in 629 brought back the relic of the holy cross in triumph, the monk Modestus had begun a reconstruction of the Basilica of the Holy Sepulcher, though on a somewhat smaller scale than the Constantinian Basilica. Some further reconstruction of the devastated churches continued until 636, when the Byzantine period of Jerusalem came to an end with the capture of the city by the Arabs under Caliph Umar.

From Muslim Conquest to Crusades (638–1099). After the city was besieged for four months, the Patriarch St. Sophronius (634–644) wisely capitulated to the Muslims on fair and honorable terms. For the next three centuries Christians and Muslims lived together in fairly friendly fashion in Jerusalem. With the aid of Byzantine architects and artists, Caliph 'Abd al-Malik (684–705) built on the site of Solomon's Temple the lovely Dome of the Rock (Qubbet es-Sahra), popularly known as the Mosque of Umar. From the death of Sophronius to the appointment of John IV (705–735) the patriarchal See of Jerusalem was vacant, being administered by vicars responsible to Constantinople or Rome. In 800 the Patriarch George (796–807) sent a delegation to Charlemagne to obtain his aid for the Holy Places, and in the same year Hārūn al-Rashīd sent Charlemagne the keys of the Basilica of the Holy Sepulcher as a sign of entrusting to him the protection of this sanctuary. But in 1010 the Fatimid Caliph al-Ḥākīm leveled to the ground, not only the basilica, but the Holy Sepulcher itself. After negotiations between the Byzantine emperors and later caliphs, the rebuilding of the edifice on the lines of Modestus's structure was completed in 1048. With the restorations made by the Crusaders, this is still essentially the present basilica. In 1072 the Muslim SELJUKS took Jerusalem and closed its gates to Christian pilgrims. The resulting wave of indignation that swept Europe was the main cause of the Crusades.

Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem (1099–1187). After the capture of Jerusalem by the Crusaders on July 15, 1099, the first Christian ruler of Jerusalem, GODFREY OF BOUIL-LON, was satisfied with the title of Defensor Hierosolymitanae Ecclesiae. But after his death on July 18, 1100, his brother Baldwin I, who succeeded him, took the title of King of Jerusalem (1100–18). The Crusaders won more and more land in the Near East, and the kingdom continued to grow in territory under Baldwin II (1118–31) and Fulk (1131–43), until it reached its maximum extension for a time under Baldwin III (1143–62). Its internal unity, however, was unstable, and its borders insecure on both the north and the south. The kingdom was set up on a feudal basis, and its powerful feudal lords greatly limited the power of the king. Although it had a standing army, the need for a continuous influx of new men and supplies greatly handicapped the government.

In less than a century the Holy City again fell into the hands of the Muslims. Weakened by internal quarrels and lacking the men and means to withstand the almost continuous border raids of the Arabs, the Kingdom of Jerusalem suffered a disastrous defeat in the Battle of the Horns of Hattin, near Tiberias in Galilee, on July 4–5, 1187, at the hands of Muslims under the leadership of SALADIN, head of the Seljukian Turks. Guy of Lusignac, King of Jerusalem, was taken prisoner and later purchased his liberty by surrendering Ascalon. On Oct. 2, 1187, Jerusalem capitulated to the Seljuks. A few Christian strongholds in the Near East held out for another century, until the last of them, Saint-Jean d'Acre (Accho), the capital of the 13th-century nominal Kings of Jerusalem, fell before the onslaughts of the Mamelukes on May 29, 1291. The empty title of "King of Jerusalem" continued to be borne by various European princes almost to the end of the 19th century. For the later history of the Christian knights in the Near East, see CRUSADES.

Turkish and Modern Periods. When the Crusaders captured Jerusalem in 1099, its Greek Orthodox patriarch seems to have fled to Cyprus. Since at that time the Greek Church was not in union with the Latin Church, the next Greek patriarchs of Jerusalem lived at Constantinople until the Muslim reconquest of the Holy City. Thereafter, they have lived at or near Jerusalem. At the Second Council of Lyons (1274) the Greek patriarch of Jerusalem was opposed to union with Rome. At the Council of Florence the representative of the Jerusalem patriarchate signed the decree of union, but in 1443 the patriarch himself rejected it. In 1672 the learned Patriarch Dositheus (1669–1707) convoked the Synod of Jerusalem. At this synod, which was, in a general way, the Eastern equivalent of the Council of Trent, the bishops of the Greek Orthodox Church ably defended it against the inroads that Protestantism had been making even in the East.

The political history of Jerusalem after the Crusades follows the general course of the history of surrounding Muslim states. After the hegemony in the Near East passed from the Seljukian Turks to the Mamelukes of Egypt and from them to the OTTOMAN TURKS of Asia Minor; Palestine was incorporated into the Ottoman Empire in 1516 by the Sultan Selim I (1512–20). Muḥammad II (1415–81), the conqueror of Constantinople, had already declared the Greek patriarch of Constantinople religious and civil head of all Christians in the Ottoman Empire. Although in theory the patriarchate of Jerusalem was not under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the patriarchate of Constantinople, in practice during the period of Turkish domination the patriarchs of Jerusalem were subservient to the patriarchs of Constantinople, and all of them during this time were Greeks and favored the Greek clergy against the native, Arabic-speaking Orthodox Christians. The 16th century saw the establishment of the Fraternity of the Holy Sepulcher, an organization of the Greek Orthodox clergy that had a monopoly of the high ecclesiastical offices and all the revenues of the sacred places in charge of the Greek patriarchate. This led to discontent and, in 1852, to open revolt of the native Orthodox Christians against the Fraternity of the Holy Sepulcher. The new regulations that were drawn up in 1875 for the election of the patriarch of Jerusalem still favored the Greeks. After the revolt of the Young Turks in 1908, the native Orthodox of Palestine renewed their demands for the abolition of the privileges of the Greeks. When the Patriarch Damian signified his willingness to make some concessions to the Arabic Christians, he was deposed by the Synod and only after some time restored to his office. The Mixed Council that was created never functioned and was abolished at the outbreak of World War I.

In the British campaign against Turkey in World War I, the British General Allenby, advancing from Egypt, entered Jerusalem on Dec. 11, 1917, and the centuries-old Turkish rule over the city came to an end. At the Treaty of Versailles, Palestine was made a British Mandate, and a High Commission was appointed to govern the country. A commission set up by the mandatory power acknowledged the just claims of the Arabic Christians, and in 1938 a new ecclesiastical constitution supplanting the one of 1875 was published. After the end of the British Mandate, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, which retained control of the “Old City” of Jerusalem (within the walls), took up the question and in 1957 published a statute that was very favorable to the Arabic Christians. In 1958 a somewhat less radical statute was enacted, by which the Orthodox Church of Jerusalem is still governed. It ordains that the patriarch and his suffragan bishops must be citizens of Jordan and must know how to speak and write Arabic. A Council of Arabic Orthodox Christians is in charge of the finances, the schools, and the charitable works of the patriarchate.

But British Mandate did not bring peace to the region. Local Arabs were apprehensive at growing Jewish immigration and feared their aspirations. There had been a marked increase in terrorism and civil war when the Mandate ended on May 14, 1948, and all British troops departed. An inconclusive battle for Jerusalem immediately ensued, and the city remained partitioned between 1948 and 1967. Israel controlled the western suburbs, and Jordan held the Old City and the northern suburbs. After the Six Day War in 1967 Israel took control of the city and claimed that its sovereignty over the whole capital was non-negotiable. This claim was unacceptable to the local Arab population, and as of 2001 no accommodation had been reached. In his Christmas message of 1999, Patriarch Michael Sabbah stated: “The basis for any solution is sharing and equality for its citizens with their rights and duties so that no one is superior to anyone else, and no one subject to another or in need of protection from others. All are equal, and all are equally protected by the laws. Claiming exclusive rights or pretending to offer protectionism for others is a fundamental obstacle to peace.”

Latin Patriarchate. When the Crusaders took Jerusalem in 1099, an ecclesiastical organization modeled on that of the West was set up in Palestine, with Latin-rite archbishops, bishops, and parish priests. Since the Greek patriarch was no longer in the country, a Latin Rite patriarchate of Jerusalem was established. Arnulf, chaplain of the Norman Crusaders, was elected, with doubtful legality, as the first patriarch, but because of his disreputable life, he was soon set aside in favor of Dagobert, Archbishop of Pisa (1100–07), who was followed in turn by seven other patriarchs residing in the city. During the near century of Crusader rule in Palestine the orders of the Knights TEMPLARS and the KNIGHTS OF ST. JOHN were powerful factors in the religious life of the land. Numerous castles and churches were built or restored in the Romanesque style, including the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, which, despite its present mutilated condition, is still basically a Crusader monument.

When Jerusalem was retaken by the Muslims in 1187, the Latin Patriarch Heraclius (1180–91) took refuge with the Latin King of Jerusalem at Accho. His eight successors resided here until Accho fell to the Muslims in 1291. Thereafter the line was continued by merely titular patriarchs who lived in Rome, with St. Laurence-outside-the-Walls as their patriarchal basilica, until Pius IX restored the real Latin patriarchate in Jerusalem in 1847.

With the disappearance of the Latin hierarchy in Palestine in the 13th century, the task of preserving the Catholic faith and guarding the Holy Places fell almost entirely upon the Franciscans, who constituted the Custody of the Holy Land. Thanks to their heroism in the face of untold hardships, the rights of the Latin Church at the principal shrines of the Holy Land have been saved through the centuries. However, in the 19th century, with the Turks becoming somewhat more tolerant and more and more European Catholics visiting the Holy Land and even residing there, Rome decided that it was time to re-establish a Latin hierarchy in Palestine. The new line of Latin patriarchs of Jerusalem were all Italians with the exception of Michael Sabbah, who is an Arab: G. Valerga (1847–72), V. Bracco (1872–89), L. Piavi (1889–1905), P. Camassei (1906–19), L. Barlassina (1920–47), A. Gori (1947–70), G. Beltritti (1970–88), M. Sabbah (1988–).

In 2001 there were 165,00 Christians out of a population of 8.7 million in the Patriarchate of Jerusalem, which comprises Israel proper and territories. There continued to be a dramatic drop in the Christian population, which began in the 1900s, when Christians represented 13 percent of the total population. By 1948 only seven percent of the population was Christian, and by 2001, only two percent. In Jerusalem itself by 2001 the total population of Christians was under 10,000 out of a total of 600,000. There were 3,500 Roman Catholics, and Melkites, 3,000 Greek Orthodox, 1,000 Armenian Orthodox, 1,000 Protestants, and 200 Coptic Orthodox. In Bethlehem the total population of Christians was 10,000 out of population of 72,000. Only 4,000 were Roman Catholics.

Between 1948 and 2001, 234,000 Christians left the Holy Land. The growth rate of Christians resident there is expected to decline to zero by 2020. In 1995 the Franciscan Custody, which has been ministering to the Christian population of the Holy Land since 1218, established the Holy Land Foundation to ameliorate the situation. Headquartered in both Washington, D.C. and Jerusalem, it provides incentives for young Christians to remain in their homeland. These include scholarships, employment opportunities, and housing.

Bibliography: On Biblical Jerusalem. General. J. SIMONS, Jerusalem in the O.T. (Leiden 1952). L. H. VINCENT and A. M. STÈVE, Jérusalem de l'Ancien Testament, 3 v. in 2 (Paris 1954–56). H. GEVA, ed., Ancient Jerusalem: Excavations, 1993–1999 (Jerusalem 2000), On the topography and history. J. GERMER-DURAND, Topographie de l'ancien Jerusalem des origines à Titus (Paris 1912). G. DALMAN, Jerusalem und seine Gelände (Gütersloh 1930). J. JEREMIAS, Jerusalem zur Zeit Jesu (Göttingen 1958). K. GALLING, Biblisches Reallexicon (Tübingen 1937) 297–305. Excavations. C. W. WILSON and C. WARREN, The Recovery of Jerusalem (London 1871). C. WARREN, Underground Jerusalem (London 1876). F. J. BLISS and A. C. DICKIE, Excavations at Jerusalem 1894–97 (London 1898). L. H. VINCENT, Underground Jerusalem: Discovery on the Hill of Ophel, 1909–11 (London 1911); Jérusalem: Recherches de topographie, d'archéologie et d'histoire, 2 v. in 4 (Paris 1912–26) v.1. Antique. R. WEILL, La Cité de David. . . Campagne, 1913–14 (Paris 1920). R. S. MACALISTER and J. G. DUNCAN, Excavations on the Hill of Ophel, Jerusalem, 1923–25 (Palestine Exploration Fund Annual 4; 1926). J. W. CROWFOOT and G. M. FITZGERALD, Excava- tions in the Tyropoeon Valley, 1927 (ibid. 5; 1929). C. N. JOHNS, "Recent Excavations at the Citadel," Palestine Exploration Quarterly (1940) 36–58; "The Citadel of Jerusalem," Quarterly of the Department of Antiquities in Palestine 14 (1950) 121–190. R. W. HAMILTON, "Excavations against the North Wall of Jerusalem," ibid. 10 (1940) 1–53. K. M. KENYON, "Excavations in Jerusalem," Palestine Exploration Quarterly 95 (1963) 7–21. The walls. L. H. VINCENT, "Jerusalem," Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928– ) (1949) 4:897–966; Revue biblique 36 (1927) 516–548; 37 (1928) 80–100, 321–339; 54 (1947) 90–126. M. BURRELLS, Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research 14 (1933–34) 115–140; The Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 64 (1937) 11–64. M. AVI-YONAH, Israel Exploration Journal 4 (1954) 239–248. W. F. ALBRIGHT, The Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 81 (1941) 6–10. C. S. FISCHER, ibid. 83 (1941) 4–7. S. SALLER, The Excavations at Dominus Flevit, v.2: The Jebusite Burial Place (Jerusalem 1954). In the Christian Era. M. LE QUIEN, Oriens Christianus, 3 v. (Paris 1740; repr. Graz 1958) 3:101–528. T. E. DOWLING, The Orthodox Greek Patriarchate of Jerusalem (3d ed. rev. and enl. New York 1913). K. PIEPER, Die Kirche Palästinas bis zum Jahre 135. . . (Cologne 1938). H. MUSSET, Histoire du christianisme spécialement en Orient, 2 v. (Harissa, Lebanon 1948). G. BATEH, Les Chrétiens de Palestine sous la domination ottomane (Jerusalem 1963). P. MEDIEBELLE, La Diocesi del Patriarcato latino di Gerusalemme (Jerusalem 1963). B. BAGATTI, L'Église de la circoncision (Jerusalem 1965). F. E. PETERS, Jerusalem: The Holy City in the Eyes of Chroniclers, Visitors, Pilgrims, and Prophets from the Days of Abraham to the Beginnings of Modern Times (Princeton 1985). J. J. MOSCROP, Measuring Jerusalem: The Palestine Exploration Fund and British Interests in the Holy Land (London and New York 2000). A. J. BOAS, Jerusalem in the Time of the Crusades (Great Britain 2001). M. SICKER, Between Rome and Jerusalem: 300 Years of Roman Judaeon Relations (Westport, Conn. 2001). B. WASSERSTEIN, Divided Jerusalem: The Struggle for the Holy City (New Haven, Conn.: 2001). M. BIDDLE, The Church of the Holy Sepulchre (New York 2002). M. DUMPER, The Politics of Sacred Space: The Old City of Jerusalem in the Middle East Conflict (Boulder, Colo. 2002).

[D. BALDIP. VASKO/B. SABELLA]

JERUSALEM, COUNCIL OF

Name given to the meeting described in Acts 15.1 to 15.35, which determined that Gentile Christians were not bound by the Mosaic Law. Acceptance of the date c. A.D. 50 is based on the fact that Gallio, to whose tribunal in Corinth Paul was summoned during his second missionary journey (Acts 18.12–17), was proconsul of Achaia in A.D. 51 to 53. If the Council was held, as Acts implies, shortly before that journey started, it must be dated c. 50.

Occasion. According to Acts 15.1, the meeting was occasioned by the arrival at Antioch of Judaic Christians from Jerusalem who insisted that Gentiles must observe the Mosaic Law. A vigorous controversy ensued, and Paul and Barnabas, with some others, were sent to Jerusalem to present the issue to the Apostles and other leaders. The question was settled after the defense of Gentile freedom from the Law was made by Peter, Barnabas, and Paul. James's confirmation of the defense made this view unanimous. The importance of James with regard to this question stemmed from three factors. He was "the brother of the Lord" (Gal 1.19), one of Jesus's relatives. He was also the head of the Jerusalem Church since Peter's departure (Acts 12.17). Finally, he was a devout observer of the Mosaic Law, a man to whom the most fanatically Jewish of the Christians would listen with respect. The Council did not consider, much less decide, the question of the binding force of the Law on Judaic Christians.

The main source of information about the Council is Acts 15. It is possible that Gal 2.1 to 2.10 describes the same meeting from a different viewpoint. However, the identification of Acts 15 with Galatians is disputed (see GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE).

The Speeches. Two speeches, those of Peter and James, are given in detail in Acts 15. The comments of Barnabas and Paul are simply summarized. One problem here, not yet solved with any unanimity, concerns the unity of events in 15.1 to 15.29. Some scholars maintain that, while there is basic unity, vv. 4 to 5 describe a preliminary meeting, vv. 6 to 21 a formal one among the officials, vv. 22 to 29 a final public session. Others call vv. 1 to 29 a composite, a literary summary of decisions made by the Church with regard to two different but related questions. The first concerned the necessity of the Mosaic Law for Gentile Christians; the second centered around the practical demands to be made on the Gentiles for the furtherance of peaceful common life with the Judaic Christians.

Peter claimed the Gentiles were not bound by the Law. He argued from fact—from the witness of the Holy Spirit who descended upon uncircumcised Gentiles (Cornelius and his household) even as He had upon the Apostles. Peter's final words, "We are saved through the grace of the Lord Jesus, just as they are," stated a principle from which would follow the freeing of even Judaic Christians from the Law.

Barnabas and Paul also appealed to the evidence of divine approval implied by the miracles God had worked among the pagans. They must surely have described the miracles at Iconium (Acts 14.3) and Lystra (Acts 14.9). The order of the names, "Barnabas and Paul," indicate Luke's historical accuracy, for at Jerusalem Barnabas would have precedence over Paul.

James's speech (vv. 13–18), exclusive of the decree, viewed the acceptance of Gentiles into the Church as a fulfillment of Am 9.11 to 9.12. The crucial part of the citation is: "That the rest of mankind may seek after the Lord, and all the nations upon whom my name is invoked" (Acts 15.17). Such is the text found in the Septuagint, the Greek version of the OT. James, however, would most likely have quoted from the Hebrew, which reads: "That they may conquer what is left of Edom and all the nations that shall bear my name." The difference makes it appear that the reconstruction of the speech is somewhat artificial. Either James's words have been made more pertinent by recourse to the Greek version of Amos or this part of James's speech owes as much to Luke, or his source, as to James himself.

The Decree and Its Meaning. The decree is listed three times in Acts: fully in vv. 19 to 20 and vv. 28 to 29 and partially in vv. 21, 25. Its all-important point was the freedom of Gentile Christians from the Law. The formula, "For the Holy Spirit and we have decided" (15.28), states the Apostles' conviction that important Church decisions were assisted by the Holy Spirit.

The secondary element in the decree was an injunction to the Gentile Christians in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia intended to make communal life between them and the Judaic Christians less difficult. There are variants in the text at this point, but it is certain that the so-called Eastern text, "to abstain from anything that has been contaminated by idols and from immorality and from anything strangled and from blood," is correct. The partaking of food offered to idols would imply a participation in pagan cults. The eating of meat from which the blood had not been properly drained would have offended the Judaic Christians, since for the Jews blood was the symbol of life and hence something which pertained to the divine (see BLOOD, RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE OF). The "immorality" mentioned probably means marriage with-in forbidden degrees of kinship. This interpretation is based on the striking similarity between these conciliar injunctions and those of Lv 17 to 18.

In conclusion, the total decree of the Council was a compromise. It must be interpreted according to its historical setting. The main point was the exemption of Gentiles from the Law. The rest of the injunctions were given in the interest of peaceful unity and were applied only in localities where many Judaic Christians were to be found. Outside of Acts no mention is made of them; Paul never refers to them (cf. 1 Cor 8.1–10.30) in his Epistles, an indication that they were only of local and temporary importance.

Bibliography: J. GEWEISS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:742, 754–55. A. LEMONNYER, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 113–20. L. MARCHAL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:1682–85. H. WAITZ, "Das Problem des sog. Aposteldekrets," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 55 (1936) 227–63. J. R. PORTER, "The 'Apostolic Decree' and Paul's Second Visit to Jerusalem,"

Journal of Theological Studies 47 (1946) 169–74. M. DIBELIUS, “Das Apostelkonzil,” Theologische Literaturzeitung 72 (1947) 193–98. J. DUPONT, “Pierre et Paul à Antioch et à Jérusalem,” Recherches de science religieuse 45 (1957) 42–60, 225–39; “λαός ἐξ ἐθνῶν,” New Testament Studies 3 (1956) 47–50. N. A. DAHL, “A People for His Name,” New Testament Studies 4 (1958) 319–27. C. N. JEFFORD, “Tradition and Witness in Antioch: Acts 15 and Didache 6,” Perspectives in Religious Studies 19 (1992) 409–19. J. A. WOOD, “The Ethics of the Jerusalem Council,” in With Steadfast Purpose (Waco, Tex. 1990) 239–58. O. KALU, “Luke and the Gentile Mission: A Study on Acts 15,” American Journal of Biblical Studies 1 (1986): 59–65. P. J. ACHTEMEIER, “An Elusive Unity: Paul, Acts, and the Early Church,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 48 (1986) 1–26. F. F. BRUCE, “The Church of Jerusalem in the Acts of the Apostles,” Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester 67 (1985) 641–61. C. K. BARRETT, “Apostles in Council and in Conflict: [Acts 15; Gal 2],” Australian Biblical Review 31 (1983) 14–32. P.-H. MENOUD, “Justification by Faith according to the Book of Acts,” Jesus Christ and the Faith: A Collection of Studies (Pittsburgh 1978) 202–27. G. ZUNTZ, “An Analysis of the Report about the ‘Apostolic Council,’” Opuscula selecta: Classica, Hellenistica, Christiana (Manchester, England 1972) 216–51.

[N. M. FLANAGAN]

JERUSALEM, KINGDOM OF

One of the states founded by the Crusaders in the Holy Land (1099–1291).

History. After the capture of Jerusalem, July 15, 1099, the barons and prelates constituting the ruling council of the First CRUSADE made GODFREY OF BOUILLON protector of the Holy Sepulcher with the rank of advocatus: the overlordship of the Holy City was to belong to the church of the Holy Sepulcher. But Godfrey’s brother BALDWIN had himself crowned king (rex Jerusalem Latinorum) in 1100, brushing aside the claims of the patriarch to suzerainty.

The state thus founded survived because the crusaders seized the coastal towns (e.g., Tyre in 1124). Ascalon, the key to Egypt, fell to the crusaders in 1153 and served as base for the campaigns of King Amaury in that country. In the north TANCRED had founded the principality of Galilee and envisaged the conquest of Damascus; but his kingdom extended no further north than the headwaters of the Jordan and eastward to Paneas (Caesarea Philippi). In the south Baldwin I had occupied Transjordan and Arabia Petraea. Numerous fortresses were built to assure the defense of these frontiers and domestic security.

The kingdom of Jerusalem survived the loss even of Jerusalem and the conquests of SALADIN (1187). The later crusades enabled it to retake little by little the areas lost, and the treaties negotiated with the Muslims in 1229 and 1241 restored to it the Jordan River as a boundary, except in Samaria. The Muslim reconquest began with the recapture of Jerusalem (1244) and ended with the fall of Acre (1291).

Feudal Monarchy. Succession was not by election as has been said; it was hereditary and went to the heirs of Godfrey. His brother Baldwin I took the crown after Godfrey’s death and transmitted it to his cousin Baldwin II. The eldest daughter of Baldwin II brought it to her husband Fulk of Anjou, then to his sons, Baldwin III and Amaury. The son of Amaury, Baldwin IV, a leper, named as successor Baldwin V, his sister Sybil’s son. At Baldwin V’s death, Sybil took the crown for herself and her husband, Guy of Lusignan, despite the opposition of Raymond III of Tripoli. And on Sybil’s death the succession passed to her sister Isabel and her successive husbands, Conrad of Montferrat, Henry of Champagne, and Aimery of Lusignan. Conrad’s daughter Mary married John of Brienne; their daughter was the wife of Emperor FREDERICK II and bore him a son Conrad. But a coup d’état led by the Ibelin family, which had already taken Acre from the king in 1232, postponed the recognition of Conrad as king (1243). The regency was entrusted to Mary’s sister, Alice of Champagne, then to her descendants, the kings of Cyprus, who did not assume the royal title till 1268 and were to continue to call themselves kings of Jerusalem after 1291.

The monarchy had by then fallen under the control of the great noble families who expressed in the Assizes of Jerusalem their conception of a monarchy limited in the exercise of its power by the application of the feudal right and above all by the Assise de la ligéce, which permitted the vassals to league themselves against a despotic king. But this would be the outcome of a long evolution: the monarchy was much more powerful in the 12th century.

The Church of the Holy Land. The Latin Church took root in the kingdom of Jerusalem as it had in the other crusader states: bishops, archbishops, and the Latin patriarch installed themselves in the ancient Greek sees that were vacant. But the main emphasis was on the holy places: an archbishop was installed in Nazareth, bishops in Bethlehem and Hebron. To assure adequate service of the sanctuaries, canons were established in the Holy Sepulcher, in the Templum Domini; Benedictines at Josaphat and Thabor. And as pilgrims were arriving in great numbers from East and West, the hospital of St. John under the Hospitallers (see KNIGHTS OF MALTA), until then a simple dependency of the monastery of St. Mary of the Latins, was enlarged and developed to care for the sick, while the Knights TEMPLARS associated themselves with this venture as escort for the pilgrims. The two orders finally adopted analogous rules, were given the custody of castles, and became powers restive under the authority of king and patriarch. Frederick II tried to impart importance to the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS on whom he was counting for support.

Other religious orders were established in the Holy Land: the DOMINICANS of Jerusalem, notably, between 1229 and 1244, established relations with the Oriental Churches and tried to convert the Muslims by preaching. The Latins had not in fact tried to convert the Muslims forcibly and had likewise respected the religious liberty of their Christian subjects.

Trade. Because of the influx of pilgrims, the ports of the kingdom were frequented by Italian ships. The trading cities of Italy had received quarters in the ports that they had helped to conquer, and these became centers of active trading that sent the products of the Orient to French Syria, which thus could compete with Egypt. Acre and Tyre were, together with Tripoli, the principal trading centers. The Italian cities incidentally ended by exercising what amounted to a protectorate over the towns of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and their quarrels contributed to create a climate of anarchy, which was one of the causes of the decline of this kingdom.

See Also: CRUSADERS' STATES.

Bibliography: W. VON HEYD, Histoire du commerce du Levant au Moyen-Âge, tr. F. RAYNAUD, 2 v. (Leipzig 1885–86; repr. Amsterdam 1959). R. ROEHRICHT, Geschichte des Königreichs Jerusalem (Innsbruck 1898). J. L. LA MONTE, Feudal Monarchy in the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem (Cambridge, Mass. 1932). D. C. MUNRO, The Kingdom of the Crusaders (New York 1935). M. W. BALDWIN, Raymond III of Tripolis and the Fall of Jerusalem (Princeton 1936). PHILIPPE OF NOVARA, The Wars of Frederick II against the Ibelins in Syria and Cyprus, ed. and tr. J. L. LA MONTE and M. J. HUBERT (New York 1936). W. HOTZELT, Kirchengeschichte Palästinas im Zeitalter der Kreuzzüge, v. 3 of Kirchengeschichte Palästinas (Cologne 1940). J. RICHARD, Le Royaume latin de Jérusalem (Paris 1953). H. E. MAYER, Bibliographie zur Geschichte der Kreuzzüge (Hanover 1960).

[J. RICHARD]

JERUSALEM, PATRIARCHATE OF

Upon the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in 70 A.D., Caesarea of Palestine became the capital of the civil province and the ecclesiastical center for Palestine with Jerusalem as a suffragan see. At the end of the fourth century, however, the bishops of Jerusalem began to assert their authority and desire for autonomy. At the Council of CHALCEDON (451) Bishop Juvenal obtained autonomy and jurisdiction over 58 bishoprics that formerly belonged to the Patriarchate of Antioch. Thus the Patriarchate of Jerusalem was given fifth place of honor after Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch.

From the Fourth to the End of the 12th Century. Under the Byzantine emperors, Palestine enjoyed a period of prosperity from the fourth to the seventh century. The Holy Places were covered with magnificent basilicas and chapels. Pilgrims from the Christian world flocked to this land, and the desert of Judea between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea became a thebaïd of monasteries. Palestinian monasticism, together with the theology based on Origen's celebrated school of Caesarea, became renowned.

The Islamic Persians invaded Palestine in 614, and in 637 the Arabs destroyed the shrines and oppressed the Christians, coercing many to embrace Islam. With the conquest of the Holy Land by the Crusaders in 1099 (see CRUSADES) and the establishment of a Latin kingdom in Jerusalem (1099–1187) liberty was returned to the Christians, but the Byzantines were subjected to a Latin hierarchy. The Orthodox Patriarch of Jerusalem took residence in Constantinople, and the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople imposed his jurisdiction on the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. When Constantinople and Rome excommunicated each other in the schism of 1054, the patriarch of Jerusalem, residing under the roof of the Ecumenical Patriarch, supported him in his dispute with the papal legates.

From the End of the 12th Century to 1965. The Latin kingdom in Jerusalem dissolved in 1187, and the Orthodox Patriarchs gradually returned to their ancient patriarchal see from their exile in Constantinople. The struggle that ensued for the return of the Holy Places to the Jerusalem patriarch's authority lasted until the 19th century. The Greek Orthodox obtained control of the major portion of the Basilica of the Holy Sepulcher, half of Mt. Calvary, the main upper portion of the Basilica of the Nativity at Bethlehem, and the Tomb of Our Lady at Gethsemane.

A temporary reunion was effected between the patriarchs of Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome following the Council of FLORENCE (1439), but lacking support among the faithful, did not survive long. An Eastern Catholic church never developed in the Jerusalem patriarchate. Melkite Catholics from Syria and Lebanon moved into this patriarchate, and in 1838 the Melkite Catholic Patriarch of Antioch, MAXIMOS III MAZLŪM, was given the title of Patriarch of Jerusalem and Alexandria with jurisdiction over all Melkite Catholics residing in these two patriarchates.

The Orthodox Patriarch of Jerusalem governs the patriarchate from Jerusalem with the members of his Holy Synod. The Melkite Catholic Patriarch also holds the title of Patriarch of Jerusalem (his formal title is "Melkite Greek Catholic Patriarch of Antioch and All the East, of Alexandria and of Jerusalem"). Besides the Greek Orthodox and Melkite Catholic patriarchs, there is also a Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem. The Latin patriarchate was established in the Holy Land in 1099, when the Latin

The ruins of Jervaulx Abbey. (©Patrick Ward/CORBIS)

Crusaders set up a kingdom under King Baldwin. It fell into long disuse, but was restored in 1847 to administer to the Latin Catholics, mostly of foreign background, found in the Holy Lands. The Latin patriarch resides in Jerusalem.

Bibliography: D. ATTWATER, The Christian Churches of the East, 2 v. (rev. ed. Milwaukee 1961–62). J. W. PARKES, A History of Palestine from 135 A.D. to Modern Times (New York 1949). R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed (Rome 1999).

[G. A. MALONEY/EDS.]

JERVAULX, ABBEY OF

Former CISTERCIAN monastery near East Witton, York, England, Diocese of York (Latin, Jorevallis, from Jore or Eure Valley). Founded in 1150 from Byland Abbey in North Yorkshire, a daughterhouse of SAVIGNY, it was originally located at Fors but moved 16 miles east to Jervaulx in 1156. John de Kinstun was the first abbot;

Akarius Fitzbardolph and Alan, Earl of Richmond, were the original patrons. Since the records have perished, little is known of its internal history. It made no foundations but was economically powerful, being specially noted for horses and sheep. Yet it was reduced to 16 monks and two lay brothers in 1381. It incorporated two churches, Aysgarth and Anderby, and got the privilege of miter in 1409. In 1535 one of the monks, George Lazenby, refused to take the Oath of Supremacy under King HENRY VIII and was executed. Two others, R. Hartlepoole and J. Stainton, were active in the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE (1537), in which the last abbot, Adam Sedbergh, was unwillingly involved and was executed May 20, 1537; another monk died in prison. The abbey was declared forfeit (its revenue was £234), and none of the 26 monks received a pension. The buildings were dismantled in 1538. Today the ruins are scheduled for protection as an ancient monument although they are owned privately.

Bibliography: J. M. CANIVEZ, ed., Statuta capitulorum generalium ordinis cisterciensis, 8 v. (Louvain 1933–41) v.1–5. Letters and Papers, Foreign and Domestic, of the Reign of Henry VIII . . . , 21 v. (London 1862–1907) v.12–13, ed. J. GAIRDNER, under Jervaulx, Sedbergh. W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73); best ed. by J. CALEY et al. (1817–30) 5:567–582, gives sources now lost. L. JANAUSCHEK, Origines Cistercienses, v.1 (Vienna 1877) 119–120. J. R. WALBRAN and J. T. FOWLER, eds., Memorials of the Abbey of St. Mary of Fountains, 3 v. (Surtees Society 42, 67, 130; Newcastle 1863–78) 1:268–274. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1483. The Victoria History of the County of York, ed. W. PAGE, 4 v. and index (London 1907–13) 3:138–142, best modern account. L. E. WHATMORE, “George Lazenby, Monk of Jervaulx: A Forgotten Martyr?,” Downside Review 60 (1942) 325–328. D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953) 110.

[J. O’DEA]

JESU, CORONA VIRGINUM

The office hymn that was historically used at Vespers and Lauds of the Common of Virgins. It is in iambic dimeter and was composed probably by St. AMBROSE, although the tendency toward rhyme and the use of four stanzas instead of his customary eight make some scholars doubt Ambrose’s authorship. The first three stanzas, based on Is 28.5, Sg 2.16, and Rv 14.4, respectively, are in praise of Christ, the heavenly bridegroom, rather than of the virgins who follow Him. The hymn concludes with a prayer directed to Christ for a life free of the wounds of sin.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 50:20–21, text. J. CONNELLY, ed. and tr., Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, Md. 1957), translation and commentary. A. S. WALPOLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Chris- tian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953).

[M. A. MALONE]

JESU, DULCIS MEMORIA

One of the best-known medieval Latin hymns. Originally, this hymn (beginning with the words Dulcis Jesu memoria) had 42 stanzas, each of four rhyming lines. A. Wilmart collected some 90 manuscripts showing divergent texts, and altogether they contain, among other things, 18 completely new, additional verses and 25 stanzas with major modifications, along with 19 doxologies. There were several major adaptations of the hymn as well as a number of medieval translations into vernacular languages. Originally a nonliturgical hymn, it gradually gained acceptance in local liturgies before it was introduced into the medieval Roman liturgy. In the late Middle Ages the original hymn was ascribed to Bernard of Clairvaux, but in fact the author was an anonymous English Cistercian who lived at the close of the 12th century. However, Gilson found clear evidence of the influence of the mystical writings of Bernard on this hymn. Post-Reformation liturgists made many arbitrary changes of dubious value in the verses of the original hymn and their order was greatly changed. The hymn achieves its best effect in its original version with eight divisions; see the reconstructed hymn by A. Wilmart [Ephemerides Liturgicae 57 (1943) 3–285]. Representative of the new spirit of medieval mysticism, this hymn was alien to the traditions of Ambrosian hymnody and thus marked a turning point in the history of early Cistercian hymnography. It may also be regarded as an excellent expression of early Gothic religious feelings, although it differs greatly from most of the contemporary regular sequences of Adam of Saint-Victor, and others. In a certain sense, this hymn was already ushering in the subjective-personal spirit of Franciscan poetry that culminated in the rich poesy of the Passion in the 13th century and afterward.

Bibliography: É. H. GILSON, “Sur le Jesu Dulcis Memoria,” Speculum 3 (1928) 322–334; Les Idées et les lettres (Paris 1932) 39–57. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953) 329–330. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 2:79–. H. LAUSBERG, Der Hymnus Jesu dulcis memoria (Munich 1965). J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 62–63, 219.

[J. SZÖVÉRFY]

JESU, REDEMPTOR OMNIUM

Office hymn that was historically sung at Lauds in the Common of a confessor bishop. Although not attributed directly to St. AMBROSE, it is one of the many hymns written in imitation of him designated as “Ambrosian” using the iambic dimeter. Its date of composition is usually assigned to the eighth century. Addressing Jesus as “the crown of bishops,” it recalls the anniversary of the saint’s entrance into glory, contrasting the fleeting joys of time with those of eternity. It concludes with a prayer for a like reward and, through the saint’s intercession, for forgiveness of sin.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 51:133, text. J. CONNELLY, ed. and tr., Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, Md. 1957), translation and commentary. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (rev. ed. London 1925). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1953).

[M. A. MALONE]

JESUATI

Originally a lay congregation; founded in Siena, Italy, by Bl. JOHN COLOMBINI about 1366. After his conversion Colombini, together with his disciples, lived on alms, cared for the plague stricken, and buried the dead. Colombini, accused of FRATICELLI errors, sought papal approbation to clear his order from this charge. After an investigation, Urban V approved the congregation in 1367. In the same year Colombini died, and Francesco Di Mino Vincenti assumed direction of the congregation. The Jesuati spread to many Italian cities, and in 1425 settled in Toulouse, France. At first they followed the Benedictine rule, but in 1426 Bl. John of Tossignano composed their constitutions based on the rule of St. Augustine. Their particular dedication was to the spiritual works of mercy, especially the care of the sick, and their piety was rigorously penitential. Their frequent ejaculatory mention of the name of Jesus led to their being called Jesuati. In 1499, by permission of Alexander VI, they were called Apostolic Clerics of St. Jerome after their special patron. Paul V in 1606 and 1611 granted permission for some of their members to pursue higher studies and be ordained. Finally, because they had departed from their early fervor and because of their small numbers, the Jesuati were suppressed by Clement IX in the bull Romanus Pontifex of Dec. 6, 1668.

About 1367, Catherine, Colombini’s cousin, established the Poor Jesuatesses of the Visitation of the B.V.M., a contemplative order following the rule of St. Augustine; it survived in Italy until 1872.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863—) July 7:344–408. P. MORIGIA, Historia degli huomini illustri . . . che furono giesuati (Venice 1604). M. HEIMBUCHER, Die Orden und Kongregation der katholischen Kirche (Paderborn 1932–34)

1:596–598. G. MORONI, Dizionario de erudizione storico-ecclesiastica (Venice 1840–61) 30:108–110.

[M. G. MCNEIL]

JESUIT RELATIONS

Relations des Jésuites was the name given to the annual report of the Mission of New France addressed by the superior of Quebec, Canada, to the provincial of Paris, who had it printed for public circulation.

Editions. The first Relation was that of 1632; the last, that of 1672. Thus the original collection is composed of 41 small volumes, duodecimo. Complete collections are rare today; there is one at Laval University, Quebec, and another at the John Carter Brown Library, Providence, R.I.

In 1858 the Canadian government had the full text of all the Relations from 1632 to 1673 printed in three octavo volumes. Also included was the Relation of Rev. Pierre Biard of the Acadian mission (1616) as well as the letter (1626) sent by Rev. Charles Lalemant from Quebec to his brother Jérôme. The text of the Quebec edition was not annotated, but the third volume contained an alphabetical index, incomplete but quite useful.

In Cleveland, Ohio, in 1896 Reuben Gold Thwaites began the publication of the vast collection, The Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents, in 73 volumes, which carry an English translation on the pages facing the original Latin or French. The Thwaites edition is superior to the Quebec edition because (1) it contains the Relations of 1673 to 1679, drafted in the 17th century by Rev. Claude DABLON, but published after the Quebec edition under the title of Unpublished Relations (Relations inédites); (2) its Allied Documents, the first of which is dated 1611 and the last dated 1791, provide a better understanding of the missionary work of the Jesuits in North America; and (3) its bibliographical notes, as well as its scholarly notes and detailed index, make it an important research tool.

Authors and contents. The Jesuit superior in Quebec was responsible for each Relation, and more often than not he drafted it himself. Among those who held this office were Paul Le Jeune, Barthélémy Vimont, Jérôme Lalemant, Paul Rageneau, François Le Mercier, and Claude Dablon, all of whom were eye-witnesses to the events that took place in the Quebec area. For the rest, they relied on the official reports addressed to them by their widely scattered missionaries.

The Relations are a source of information on the religion, the morals, the mechanics of government, and the tactics of warfare among the Native American nations of North America during the 17th century. Through these reports the forward movement of the Church through the vast forests of the country may be traced and an insight gained into the qualities of the colonists newly arrived from France. The Relations provide an account of the progress of the French colonies at Quebec, Trois-Rivières, and Montreal, as well as of the labors, sufferings, and successes of the missionaries throughout the region, especially in Huronia. They are an important source of information concerning the lives and deaths of the Jesuit martyrs.

Significance and value. As a means of arousing interest in France in the ministry of the Jesuits in America, the Relations were notably successful. They were, especially during their first years, an excellent medium of publicity, and they helped to populate New France by their descriptions of the beauty of the country, the fertility of the soil, the richness of its natural resources, and the peace and good fortune to be obtained by its inhabitants. They evoked fervent prayers, generous alms, and apostolic vocations. They were responsible for the origin of institutions that, 300 years later, were still serving the Church in Canada. It was in answer to an appeal of the Relations that the Ursulines and the Hospitalières disembarked at Quebec in 1639—the first time in the history of the Church that women's institutions were consecrated to a missionary ministry in a distant country. The Relations also exercised considerable influence in the founding of Montreal; its founder, M. Jérôme Le Royer de La Dauversière; its first governor, M. de Maisonneuve; and its first lay hospital nurse, Jeanne Mance, were all readers of the Relations.

The Relations should not be evaluated as a continuous history of the French colony or of the missionary work among the natives. The Jesuits were not and did not pretend to be formal and scientific historiographers. But if the Relations do not tell the whole story, they are worthy of belief in what they do recount. A specialist in the historical beginnings of the United States, Edmund Bailey O'Callaghan, wrote of them in 1847: "No historian can do a complete research job on the first settlements of this country without being acquainted with them, and those who pretend to be capable of doing this without having studied them in advance only give proof of their incapacity for this type of work."

Bibliography: E. B. O'CALLAGHAN, Jesuit Relations. Discoveries and Other Occurrences in Canada and the Northern and Western States of the Union (New York 1847), French tr. by F. MARTIN (Montreal 1850). J. C. MCCOY, Jesuit Relations, 1632–1673 (Paris 1937), a bibliog. Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents, ed. R. G. THWAITES, 73 v. (Cleveland, Ohio 1896–1901; New York 1959— ) 1:37–44, gen. intro. L. POULIOT, Étude sur les Relations des Jésuites de la Nouvelle-France (1632–1672) (Montreal 1940).

[L. POULIOT]

JESUITS

The Society of Jesus (SJ, Official Catholic Directory #0690) is a religious order of priests and brothers, popularly known as Jesuits, a name that was originally derogatory. The order grew out of the activity of its founder, St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, and six companions who at Montmartre in Paris on Aug. 15, 1534, bound themselves by vows to poverty, chastity, and apostolic labors in the Holy Land or, if this latter plan did not prove feasible, as it did not, to any apostolic endeavor enjoined by the pope. Canonical establishment of the order came on Sept. 27, 1540, when Pope Paul III, in Regimini militantis Ecclesiae, approved the first outline of the order's makeup (Prima formula instituti), authorized the framing of detailed constitutions, and limited to 60 the number of members. This last restriction was withdrawn four years later.

Purpose. The purpose of the society is the salvation and perfection of individual Jesuits and of the human race. Jesuit organization, manner of life, and ministries are all directed to fulfill this twofold aim. Official directives in these matters are contained in a body of writings known collectively as the Institute (Institutum). They comprise chiefly pertinent papal documents; the Jesuit constitutions and Spiritual Exercises, both composed by Ignatius; the rules and statutes of general congregations; instructions of superiors general; the Epitome instituti; and the Ratio Studiorum, or plan of studies. There are no secret regulations. The so-called MONITA SECRETA is a 17th-century forgery.

Government. Supreme authority, subject always to the pope, is vested in a general congregation. It alone possesses full legislative power, the capacity to enact permanent statutes on matters of greater moment, to alter or abrogate parts of the constitutions, or to make new decrees equal in force with the constitutions. Membership in this body is limited to the superior general, vicar-general, all assistants and provincials, two electors chosen from each province by a provincial congregation, and procurators from independent vice provinces and missions. Meetings are not held at regular intervals. A congregation must be convened for the election of a superior general. This accounts for 25 of the 31 meetings that took place between 1558 and 1965. It is otherwise permissible to convene sessions to handle questions of grave importance.

A superior general is at the head of the highly centralized, day-by-day government of the entire order. The sole elected superior, he is selected for life by a general congregation, which also has power, never exercised to date, to remove him for serious causes. His authority, defined in the constitutions, is very extensive. It includes the right to admit or dismiss members, to make final decisions on all concerns of the entire order, and to appoint and remove all superiors. Terms of office for superiors are not fixed, but normally they last about six years. Frequent official correspondence keeps the superior general fully informed of Jesuit activities everywhere. His residence, together with that of his curia, is in Rome. The first superior general was Ignatius.

Ignatius Loyola, engraving by H. Adlard, 1870.

For administrative purposes, the order is divided into provinces, with a provincial at the head of each province. Groups of provinces in turn are formed into assistancies. Each assistancy is represented by an assistant, an official chosen normally by a general congregation, who dwells with the superior general and serves him in an advisory capacity.

Membership. Members are either priests, candidates preparing for the priesthood, or brothers whose assignments comprise a very wide variety of ministries. Upon entrance into the order, all spend two full years of spiritual training in a novitiate as novices, preceded in the case of brothers by a six-month postulancy. At the end of the novitiate, all take simple, perpetual, public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

The Religious Profession of St. Ignatius of Loyola with his signature below it. At the bottom of the same page, the profession of his five companions with their attesting signatures, Rome, 1541.

Those continuing for ordination, called approved scholastics, devote several more years to intellectual and spiritual formation in Jesuit houses of study. The duration varies according to individual academic backgrounds. Normally the course of studies involves two years of liberal disciplines; then ten years are devoted mainly to philosophy. This is followed by a few years of practical experience as teachers or prefects, a period that is called regency. Four years of theological studies ensue, with ordination to the priesthood at the close of the third year. Many also dedicate further years at universities to gain higher academic degrees in specialized branches of ecclesiastical or secular learning. Another year of spiritual formation, tertianship, completes the training.

Subsequently, priests receive their final grade, either as formed spiritual coadjutors, or as professed of solemn vows. At this time, the former take final simple vows of religion. The latter take these three vows of religion as solemn vows. To them they add a fourth solemn vow of special obedience to the pope in regard to accepting missions, as well as five simple vows obligating them never to seek or allow any mitigation in the vow of poverty; never to solicit or receive any ecclesiastical dignity outside the order unless directed under obedience to do so; and never to try, even indirectly, to win any dignity within the society. Solemn religious profession with only three vows occurs occasionally for special reasons. Only the solemnly professed may hold certain higher posts, such as superior general or provincial. But no special privileges attach to the profession. Duties of religious observance and external manner of living are similar to those of spiritual coadjutors. Brothers are assigned their final grade as formed temporal coadjutors after at least ten years in religion; and, since 1958, a tertianship of at least three months is required.

Distinctive features. In its structure, the society borrowed much from older orders, while introducing several original features, some of which have found their way into more recent congregations. These include high centralization of authority; life tenure of the head of the order; probation lasting several years preceding final vows; gradation of members; prohibition against preferences in the Church; private instead of choral recitation of the Divine Office; absence of regular penances or fasts obligatory on all; wearing of a religious habit that is not distinctive, but modeled on that of the secular clergy in each region; lack of a second, female branch; absence of a Third Order. Owing to the nature of his foundation, Ignatius particularly stressed the virtue of obedience. Expressions of his, characterizing obedience as blind, like that of a cadaver, or an old man's staff, were not coined by him; they are figurative phrases handed down from ancient monastic traditions, and they should be interpreted in that light. Jesuit obedience is not military but religious.

Jesuits were not the first religious to distinguish themselves as teachers, but theirs were the first constitutions to enjoin general educational work as a regular task. Another innovation of Ignatius was the extension of ministries, excluding secular businesses and political involvements, to embrace all types of apostolic endeavors in all parts of the world, as long as they tend to the greater glory of God. The order's motto is A.M.D.G. (AD MAJOREM DEI GLORIAM).

Objections to one or another of these innovations were early voiced by other religious orders and by a few 16th-century popes: Paul IV, Pius V, Sixtus V, and Clement VIII. But they proved temporary. The constitutions also survived intact, concerted attempts by certain Jesuits to alter them substantially, especially during the administration of Claudius ACQUAVIVA (1581–1615), whose handling of this severe internal crisis ranks him as one of the order's greatest superiors general.

IGNATIAN SPIRITUALITY, rooted in the SPIRITUAL EXERCISES, has ever been that of the society, and it has had a profound effect on the development of modern spirituality (see SPIRITUALITY, CHRISTIAN, HISTORY OF).

History from Foundation to Suppression (1540–1773)

The growth of the Society of Jesus was continuous. During the first century, the increase was particularly rapid, totaling about 938 members in 1556 when Ignatius died; 3,500 in 1565; and 15,544 in 1626. A complete enumeration still available for 1710 shows a moderate increment over nearly a century to 19,998. In 1749, the last year previous to 1773 for which full information is extant, the total was 22,589 (11,293 being priests).

The society quickly won renown and maintained until 1773 a unique position. Its first century was far more abundant in men eminent for sanctity and learning, and more striking in its accomplishments in spreading the faith. Above all, this COUNTER REFORMATION era is memorable for the society's extremely prominent role in revivifying Catholicism spiritually and intellectually, stemming the advances of a hitherto victorious Protestantism, and even regaining vast regions lost to heresy or seriously threatened by it in the Low Countries, France, and Central and Eastern Europe. Ignatius did not, however, found the order specifically to counteract Protestantism. With the close of the Reformation period around mid-17th century, the same opportunities for accomplishment were not available. Yet the maintaining, and gradual extending, of previous gains in Europe and in the missions provided a formidable, if less spectacular, record during the society's second century. These were the decades, too, when Jesuits took the lead in combating JANSENISM. From about the mid-18th century, the order was under heavy attack, battling for its existence. So diversified was the Jesuit apostolate, so widely spread over the globe, so intricately interwoven into the fabric of ecclesiastical and secular history that it defies brief summation.

Education. Almost from the start, education turned out to be the society's principal work. Originally Ignatius did not envision such concentration in this area, but the needs of the time, the urging of popes, bishops, and laymen, reoriented his views. While he was superior general, the society became decisively committed to education, which by 1556 engaged three-fourths of available personnel (excluding brothers and those in training) in 46 colleges. In 1579 there were 144 colleges; in 1626, 444 colleges, 56 seminaries, and 44 houses of training for Jesuits; in 1749, 669 colleges, 176 seminaries, and 61 houses of study for Jesuits. Colleges provided education mostly on the secondary level. But in 1749, 24 universities were wholly or partly under Jesuit control.

Uniform norms for organization, methods, and subjects in all Jesuit schools were set forth in the RATIO STUDIORUM (1599). Stress was on the humanities. Students were drawn from all classes, from royalty to the sons of the poor. Tuition was not charged. Few were exclusively boarding schools. Only one school in four in 1749 accepted any boarders. Complete enrollment statistics are no longer extant; but the highest figures per year may well have attained 200,000. Clerical training also became largely a Jesuit responsibility. The best-known of these seminaries, and the most outstanding of all Jesuit educational institutions, was the Roman College. Begun in 1551 and since the time of Gregory XIII known also as the Gregorian University, it was the first modern seminary, and it served as a model for succeeding ones. Largely by means of these schools for laity and clergy, the order accomplished what it did during the Counter Reformation. Their academic repute caused Jesuits to be known as "the schoolmasters of Europe."

Scholarship. The promotion of sciences and letters by scholarly investigation and writings was diligently cultivated. Urgently needed, it was an efficacious apostolate. As a result, many branches of ecclesiastical and profane learning were advanced. The number of both writers and writings was very large. Quantity was greater in the latter 17th century and thenceforth, but superior talent was more evident in the earlier period.

Theological Disciplines. Theology and philosophy were the subjects most assiduously pursued. In the remarkable 16th-century revival of theology, subsequent to the pre-Reformation decline, Jesuits supplied much of the impetus. As a rule, they adhered to THOMISM, while showing a certain eclecticism. Unlike students of medieval SCHOLASTICISM, more intent on speculation, they attended also to positive theology and to a historical approach appropriate in refuting the new heresies. Controversies perforce engaged much of their energy, especially with the Protestants during the 16th century, and with the Jansenists thereafter. They crossed swords with Dominican and other Catholic theologians on erudite questions concerning divine grace, free will, and predestination in the celebrated dispute over Molinism. (See THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF.)

Leading theologians, whose fame often extended to other pursuits, included two 16th-century doctors of the Church: St. Peter CANISIUS, noted for his catechisms; and St. Robert BELLARMINE, a celebrated controversialist. Francisco SUÁREZ remains the order's outstanding theologian and philosopher. Luis de Molina developed the system known as MOLINISM. Denis PÉTAU (PETAVIUS) founded the study of the history of dogmas and produced important works on patristics and chronology, as well as positive and polemical theology. Others of special merit were Francisco de TOLEDO, GREGORY OF VALENCIA, Gabriel VÁZQUEZ, Leonard LESSIUS, Adam TANNER, Juan de RIPALDA, and Jakob GRETSER.

Jesuits were preeminent in the development of moral theology into a separate discipline in the 16th century. They provided many, if not most, of the leading moralists up to 1773. Most conspicuous were the contributions of Paulus LAYMAN, Cardinal Juan de LUGO, and Hermann BUSENBAUM. During the 17th and 18th centuries long, bitter conflicts raged among rival systems of moral theology, ranging from RIGORISM to LAXISM. Almost all Jesuits upheld PROBABILISM, which is still taught in the Church. For this they were vilified as laxists by Jansenist rigorists, most notoriously by Blaise PASCAL in his Provincial Letters. When Tirso González, superior general (1687–1705), championed PROBABILISM he precipitated a crisis within the order. In the allied field of canon law, the writings of Franz SCHMALZGRUEBER were of enduring value. (see MORAL THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF; MORALITY, SYSTEMS OF). In scriptural scholarship, the most illustrious figures were Johannes MALDONATUS, Francisco de Ribera, and Cornelius a LAPIDE.

Among authors in ascetical theology, the following composed works still honored as classics: Alfonso RODRÍGUEZ, Diego ÁLVAREZ DE PAZ, Luis de LA PUENTE, Jeremias DREXEL, Nicholas LANCICIUS, Jean SAINT JURÉ, Jacques Nouet (1605–80), Nikolaus Avancini (1611–86), Giovanni SCARAMELLI, and Jean GROU.

Other Disciplines. Historical studies, especially ecclesiastical ones, list important Jesuit contributions. Several publications of patristic, conciliar, and hagiographic sources were permanent in value. Both Petavius and Jacques SIRMOND edited writings of the ancient Fathers. During the 17th and 18th centuries Philippe LABBE, Jean HARDOUIN, and Joseph Hartzheim printed collections of the councils. Pietro PALLAVICINO is noted as a historian of the Council of Trent. Most famous of all is the Acta Sanctorum, a vast collection of hagiographical source materials in 67 folio volumes, edited critically with commentaries by a small group called BOLLANDISTS. The work, conceived by Heribert Rosweyde (1569–1629) and developed by Jean van Bolland (1596–1665), first editor, has been carried out by succeeding generations of Belgian Jesuits and is still in the process of being published.

Although philosophy did not enjoy the resurgence that favored theology, Jesuit theologians were also masters of philosophy. The principal theologians, above all Suárez, were eminent in philosophy. The publications consisted largely of manuals, as well as commentaries on Aristotle, whom the Jesuits admired most among philosophers.

Other sciences vitally interested the Jesuits, who contributed much to them. Among the exact sciences, mathematics, physics, and astronomy were cultivated. Athanasius KIRCHER and Ruggiero Boscovich were the best-known mathematicians. Christopher CLAVIUS was celebrated as an astronomer. Missionaries were responsible for many original contributions in natural history; in geography, as explorers and cartographers; and in linguistics, as compilers of the first grammars and dictionaries in numerous primitive languages. Knowledge of distant lands, along with enthusiasm for the missions, were widely disseminated in Europe by accounts of the missionaries. Best remembered of this type of writing are the JESUIT RELATIONS, composed by French Jesuits in North America, which is still esteemed as a historical source and widely read in the original French or in English translation.

Art. In the development of art, Jesuits have been significant not so much for creating new forms as for advancing those currently in vogue. The so-called Jesuit style in church architecture is not distinct from baroque art. In Rome the Gesù, a church of the society, was artistically influential as the model for numerous other edifices built by the order.

Pastoral ministries. These exhibited wide diversity. Preaching, much neglected before the Council of Trent, occupied a foremost place. Among the famous pulpit orators in Italy were Diego LAÍNEZ, superior general succeeding St. Ignatius and eminent theologian, Francisco de Toledo, and Paolo SEGNERI; in Portugal and Brazil, Antônio VIEIRA, celebrated also as a missionary and diplomat; in Poland, Piotr SKARGA, whose writings are classics in his native tongue; and in France, Louis BOURDALOUE, a preacher at the court of Louis XIV for 34 years. Domestic missions were zealously promoted. In this labor excelled St. John Francis REGIS, FRANCIS OF GERONIMO and Bl. Antonio Baldinucci in Italy, and the martyr St. Andrew BOBOLA in Poland. Presenting retreats to clergy and laity, following the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius, have ever been a favored apostolate.

Sodalities of the Blessed Mother (Marian Congregations) with spiritual and practical aims progressed under Jesuit impetus. Originating in the Roman College (1563), they sprang up wherever Jesuits were located, enrolling hundreds of thousands of men as sodalists. Devotion to the Sacred Heart has been prominent in the society, which has since the 17th century taken the lead in popularizing it. Restoration of discipline in religious houses was frequently entrusted to the order, especially during the 16th century. Jesuits displayed commendable zeal and courage in caring for the sick and plague-stricken, and in aiding and instructing the poor. Chaplaincies in the military services, galleys, and prisons have been accepted from the beginning.

Royal confessors. As ministers of the Sacraments, Jesuits undertook no task more memorable or controverted than that of confessors at courts and in noble houses. They became royal confessors reluctantly; yet, they came largely to monopolize these positions. Thus, they acted as royal confessors to all French kings for two centuries, from Henry III to Louis XV; to all German emperors after the early 17th century; to all dukes of Bavaria after 1579; to most rulers of Poland and Portugal; to the Spanish kings during the 18th century; to James II of England; and to many ruling or princely families throughout Europe. The post was both confidential and influential, since the director of the royal conscience might frequently be consulted and heeded above all others in ecclesiastical, political, and economic affairs. Almost without exception, these confessors were above reproach. Multifarious charges against them, springing from jealousy, were unsubstantiated or wild exaggerations. Among the most famed were the French royal confessors Pierre COTON, Nicholas Caussin, and especially François de LA CHAIZE, guide to Louis XIV's conscience for 34 years. Another noted confessor was Wilhelm LAMORMAINI.

Jesuits in Protestant countries. Strenuous efforts were expended to instruct and strengthen loyal Catholics and to win back those who had forsaken the traditional faith in regions such as the British Isles, Holland, Scandinavia, and parts of Germany, where governments supported Protestantism. Extreme hardships, discouragements, and dangers were the lot of those dedicated to this apostolate. Official opposition forced operations into secrecy. Detection meant torture, prison, exile, or death. Bitter hostility was almost unremitting in the British Isles. To prepare priests for this work, Jesuits directed seminaries on the Continent. In Rome they guided the English, Irish, and Scots Colleges; other colleges were located at Douai in France, and at Salamanca and Madrid in Spain.

In England the work of the society began in 1580 with the arrival of St. Edmund CAMPION, Robert PERSONS, and ten others. By 1623 this mission numbered 213 Jesuits, and it was established as a province. Its highest total was 374 in 1636. In 1773 it comprised 274, about half of whom resided within England. During the 18th century, about 100 Jesuits held chaplaincies in families of the Catholic gentry. Difficulties multiplied because of unjustified attempts to implicate Jesuits in the Gunpowder Plot (1605) and the OATES PLOT (1679), and because of differences with the secular clergy. Seventy or so sacrificed their lives during the 16th and 17th centuries. Of these, 26 have been beatified as martyrs, including Edmund Campion and Robert SOUTHWELL, who is also famous for his poetry (See ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF). In Scotland, despite severe persecution, a restricted number of Jesuits toiled, notably, St. John OGILVIE, who was martyred in 1615.

In Ireland, where the population remained overwhelmingly Catholic, English rulers persecuted the Church as they did in England. Jesuit efforts were confined largely to the Pale. There they preached, celebrated the Sacraments, and conducted schools in hiding, or occasionally in the open, when circumstances permitted. Irish Jesuits could also be found on the Continent, especially as teachers in the Irish colleges there. Their numbers attained a peak in the early 17th century, when there were 42 in Ireland and 40 on the Continent. In 1773 there were 24 in Ireland.

Missions. This apostolate has always been highly esteemed and has engaged more men than any other work, save education. In its constitutions, the order is designated as a missionary society. The Jesuit vocation requires a willingness to travel to various places and to dwell in any part of the world where there is hope for the salvation of souls. Ignatius was vitally interested in the conversion of the unbeliever. External circumstances alone prevented him and his first companions from devoting their lives completely after 1534 to evangelizing the Holy Land. Within months of the order's founding, Ignatius dispatched his ablest disciple, St. Francis XAVIER, with three companions to the East. When Ignatius died in 1556, his followers were already spreading the Gospel in Africa, Asia, and the New World.

Subsequent to the epochal discoveries of the 15th and early 16th centuries, and the resultant acquisition of vast overseas dominions by Catholic Spain, Portugal, and France, came an unequalled expenditure of efforts to convert the native populations. The Society of Jesus was born too late to share in the inauguration of this movement. In its early years, however, the society joined its predecessors in the field, principally the Franciscans, Dominicans, and Augustinians. In time, it surpassed them all in mission personnel and territory. Jesuit missionaries numbered 3,276, one-seventh of the whole order, in 1749. They could be found widely dispersed over five continents, although in 1749 more than nine out of were harvesting the claims of Spain and Portugal to natives in Asia and the New World.

The society's framework, with its centralization of authority and mobility of personnel, proved to be admirably adapted to these demands. As missionaries, Jesuits displayed marked organizational talent, zeal, daring, and persistence. They were not deterred by difficulties created by travel, climate, barbarous living conditions, loneliness, or opposition from both pagan natives and greedy, ruthless Europeans. Would-be missionaries received special training, for example, at the college of Coimbra, whence proceeded most of the over 1,700 Portuguese missionaries during two centuries. Abroad they were expected to master native dialects and to adapt their approach to local cultures and traditions, whether primitive or advanced, in order to allay prejudices and to inculcate the Christ Gospel in its new local setting. This practice of inculturation, so beneficial in many respects, involved the order in conflict over the CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY and the INDIAN RITES CONTROVERSY, the longest, most acrimonious, and injurious in mission history. By no means could all attention be devoted to indigenous populations. Pastoral ministries among European settlers demanded much of the missionaries' attention, as did the conducting of schools. Sons of colonists or of natives were attending in mid-18th century 115 colleges and 23 seminaries in Spanish and Portuguese possessions alone.

Africa. In Africa, where mission penetration before the 19th century was comparatively slight, Jesuits labored in the Portuguese settlements along the west and east coasts, in the Congo, and on the island of Madagascar. Francis Xavier, on his way to the Orient, was the first missionary. In Africa, as in the New World, Jesuits sought to protect the natives against the notorious slave traders. They also came early to the north coast of the continent, to Morocco and Egypt. Ignatius himself dispatched the first group to Ethiopia.

Asia. This part of the world was much more intensively and extensively evangelized. Jesuits penetrated Asia Minor, the Near East, Persia, Tibet, Ceylon, Burma, the Malay Peninsula, Siam, Indochina (notably Alexandre de RHODES), and the islands of the East Indies. Their main efforts, however, were directed to India, China, Japan, and the Philippines. The first to reach the Far East was Francis Xavier, whose 12 years of organizing, preaching, and baptizing perhaps 30,000 people from India to Japan, ended with his death in 1552. One of the greatest missionaries since St. Paul, he was designated by Pope Pius XI as Patron of All Missions.

In India, Jesuits worked not only along the coast, but soon penetrated the interior. Particularly memorable was the mission inaugurated by Bl. Rudolf ACQUAVIVA and three companions in 1579 in the dominions of Akbar the Great Mogul. During the next two centuries 100 more Jesuits toiled there. In Madura, Robert de NOBILI, "Apostle of the Brahmins," began in 1606 a famous and important mission, using new methods of inculturation.

In China, Jesuit mission efforts began three decades after the death of Francis Xavier (1552) on the island of Sancian, off the China coast. During the next two centuries, a total of 456 Jesuits composed the most numerous and prominent of all mission groups. They became famed for their methods, devised by Alessandro VALIGNANO and Matteo RICCI. These were intended to inculturate the Catholic religion, insofar as possible, to Chinese traditions and manners and to attract educated, influential Chinese, who would in turn facilitate mass conversions among the populace. The huge population, the high culture regarded by Chinese as superior to European, the independence of the country, and the lack of political and commercial aids elsewhere available to missionaries combined to urge a novel approach. To impress the Chinese with Western culture and knowledge, especially of a scientific and technical kind, several leading Jesuit scientists gained a welcome at the imperial court, notably the astronomers Matteo Ricci, Johann Adam SCHALL VON BELL, and Ferdinand Verbiest. The vernacular was utilized in the liturgy. Chinese terms for the divinity were retained. Temporary permission was granted to converts to continue ancient, beloved practices honoring their ancestors and the sage CONFUCIUS. Western religion thereby became more palatable. But to some members of other missionary orders, and to powerful circles in the Roman Curia, it seemed rather to be undergoing a process of corruption. The resultant Chinese rites controversy, intensified by national and interorder rivalries, dragged out for more than a century to a final papal settlement (1742) that was unfavorable to the Jesuits. This dispute, along with government persecution, gravely injured the youthful Chinese Church.

Japan received its first Jesuit missionary in the person of Francis Xavier, who may have converted as many as 700 people. Until 1593 Jesuits alone staffed this mission. Development was rapid until 1614. At that time Catholics numbered about 300,000, and missionaries, 150, over three-fourths being Jesuits. Thereafter persecutions, particularly severe from 1614 to 1651, destroyed the Church almost entirely. Missionaries were banished or put to death. Jesuit martyrs totaled 111. For the coming two centuries Japan closed itself to the Gospel (see JAPAN, MARTYRS OF).

The Philippines, which fell to Spanish control, were the sole Asiatic region gained in large percentage to the faith. From 1581 Jesuits joined other orders in propagating Catholicism. Each order came to have its assigned sector. Spain's expulsion of the society from her colonies in 1767 affected 158 Jesuits in the Philippines and in the Mariana and Caroline Islands, and it deprived about 200,000 Catholics, a fifth of the total, of their ministries.

South America. The Western Hemisphere, more so than Asia, attracted Jesuit missionaries. Indeed, it engaged four out of five of them in 1749 (590 in Portuguese Brazil, 2,075 in Spanish possessions, 104 in French claims, less than a score in the English colonies). They were spread from Canada southward, on the mainland and in the adjoining islands of the West Indies. Preponderantly they dwelt south of the Rio Grande River, an area that was by far the most fruitful area of conversions anywhere (see MISSION IN COLONIAL AMERICA).

Brazil saw the first Jesuits in the New World when Manuel de NOBREGA arrived with five companions in 1549. By 1597 the total number of missionaries had risen to 120. The Society of Jesus continued to be the most numerous and prominent of the orders. Its labor of converting and educating the natives and the imported African slaves proved to be very rewarding. Many priests here, as elsewhere, also ministered to the Europeans. Many others staffed the schools which, begun in 1556, increased to nine colleges and a seminary two centuries later, thus constituting the Jesuits as the country's principal educators. In the evolution of a distinctive Brazilian culture and nation, the Jesuits played a major role, more prominent than in any other land. José de ANCHIETA, "Apostle of Brazil," whose work lasted 44 years until his death in 1597, was the most outstanding missionary, along with Antônio Vieira (1608–97), who was also remarkable as a preacher, writer, and defender of the oppressed.

Spanish territories embraced almost all of South America outside of Brazil, Central America, Mexico, large areas in the present United States., and a large segment of the West Indies. The first permanent Jesuit missions were in Peru (1567) and Mexico (1572). From there missionaries gradually radiated throughout these vast regions, as their numbers grew to 908 in 1615 and 1,768 in 1710. Schools appeared in Lima and Mexico City soon after the Jesuits' arrival. Under Jesuit control in Spanish America in mid-18th century were two universities, 79 colleges, and 16 seminaries. Apostolic endeavors among the natives were very successful. None, however, are better known than the REDUCTIONS. These were separate village communities of Catholic natives, under the spiritual, social, economic, and political direction of the missionaries, which were set up with the approval of the government. The aim was to convert and civilize the native tribes and to protect them from exploitation and vice. Jesuits did not originate or monopolize this system. Yet the chief reductions lay in Spanish America under control of the Jesuits, who conducted about 100 of them, beginning early in the 17th century. Best known were those in the Jesuit province of Paraguay, which extended into modern Argentina, Bolivia, Uruguay, and Brazil. Here the 30 or so reductions among the Guaranis were the most notable. The Guarani population fluctuated widely, but it exceeded 140,000 in 1731. During a century and a half of operation, the Guarani reductions alone brought about the baptism of more than 700,000 people.

North America. North America occupied, during the course of two centuries, about 3,500 Jesuits (329 in French, 144 in British, and the rest in Spanish territories). The last mentioned were under the jurisdiction of the Mexican province, which included New Spain, reaching southward to Guatemala, and northward to encompass enormous, if imprecisely defined, sections of the present-day United States. The Mexican province, the largest and most important outside of Europe, listed 272 members in 1600, and 572 in 1749, most of whom were stationed mostly. In the latter year, there were 23 colleges and eight seminaries for Europeans, creoles, and natives. Under Jesuit charge was much of the public instruction in New Spain, which was culturally the most advanced of Spain's overseas dominions. Work among the native tribes began in 1591 and slowly moved into northwest Mexico, and Lower California (from 1683), regions where Jesuits were, until their suppression, almost the sole missionaries, as well as the first explorers and pioneers of civilization. They are credited with baptizing about two million people. They also organized the natives into communities similar to those in Paraguay. In 1767 there were 122 Jesuits supervising about 100 mission stations, with 122,000 natives.

Within the limits of the present United States, the first Jesuit mission (1566–72) was a short-lived one on the southeastern seaboard, between the states of Florida and Virginia, an area that the Spaniards called Florida. In all, 12 Jesuits came, together with seven or eight young catechists who were destined for the order. Their reception was extremely hostile. Pedro Martínez, leader of the first group of three, was tomahawked on the island of Cumberland, off of the Georgia coast, within a few weeks of landing. He became the first Jesuit martyr in the United States and in all of Spanish America. After his successor, Juan Segura, along with seven companions, met the same fate in 1571 in the neighborhood of Chesapeake Bay, the decimated mission withdrew to Mexico the following year.

In the southwest a permanent foothold was gained. The one responsible was Eusebio KINO, whose extensive journeys in the Pimería Alta region between 1687 and 1711 brought him to southern Arizona, where he established San Xavier del Bac and other missions.

In the immense French possessions of New France and Louisiana (in Canada and the United States), French Jesuits began their apostolate in 1611, when Enemond Massé and Pierre Biard came to Acadia, and to the Abenaki natives in Maine. Their numbers were never large, totaling only 51 in mid-18th century; but their zeal was extraordinary. The Jesuit school, started in Quebec in 1635 and developed into a classical college, initiated the educational system of French Canada. A considerable portion of the missionaries always resided in the French settlements as educators and pastors. Greater fame has attached to the Canadian mission that extended westward beyond the Great Lakes, and eastward into New York and northern New England. Jesuits were almost the sole missionaries in this arduous task, whose visible fruits were in no way commensurate with the heroic efforts expended, owing to the primitive savagery of the tribes, and the sparsity and nomadic character of the population. From Canada the mission moved southward along the Mississippi Valley to the Gulf of Mexico. The missionaries won renown also as explorers, especially Jacques MARQUETTE, who accompanied Joliet in the exploration of the Mississippi River in 1673. Martyrs numbered 22. Of these, eight, who were put to death by the Iroquois (1642–49), were canonized in 1930. Known as the NORTH AMERICAN MARTYRS, they include St. Isaac Jogues, slain with two companions near Auriesville, N.Y., and St. Jean de Brébeuf, slaughtered with four companions in Canada.

In the British possessions along the East Coast, during the entire Colonial period, pastoral care of the Catholics was consigned almost entirely to Jesuits of the English province. In 1634 Andrew WHITE and John Gravener (or Altham) arrived in Maryland with the first settlers. In numbers the missionaries varied from one to 23 (in 1771). Catholics represented about one percent of the colonists, totaling perhaps 25,000 on the eve of the American Revolution. Jesuit ministries were nearly all confined perforce to their coreligionists in Maryland and Pennsylvania, with some evangelizing among the native peoples.

Suppression and Restoration (1773–1814)

Supreme tragedy struck the order while it was in full vigor and free from evidence of internal corporate decadence. It occurred because of the concerted efforts of disparate groups in Catholic countries in Europe, whose numbers, strength, and determination increased with the passing decades of the 18th century.

The size, prestige, and educational and scholarly status of the society had aroused widespread jealousy. Its central involvement in great controversies, notably the De auxiliis theological dispute, and the conflict over rites in the missions, had bequeathed a heritage of resentment (see CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS). Its unwavering championship of Rome drew the ire of the partisans of GALLICANISM and monarchical absolutism. As a result, influential circles of Catholic laity and clergy, including segments of religious orders, the hierarchy, and the Roman Curia, sought at least to humiliate or weaken the order. Consciously or unconsciously, however, these served the ends of the bitterest foes bent on the order's ruin.

Chief among its foes were proponents of JANSENISM, whose heresy had met its greatest opposition from the Jesuits. Even more important were the radical devotees of the rationalistic ENLIGHTENMENT, who attacked the Jesuits as a step toward their ultimate objective of abolishing all religious orders, the papacy, and finally the Church itself. Promoting these aims were richly talented and influential writers, such as Voltaire, Rousseau, and other "philosophers" among the ENCYCLOPEDISTS, the followers of Freemasonry, and high-placed government officials. Along with direct action there was devised a long campaign of calumnies, false rumors, distorted manipulation of incidents, which were all intended to undermine the society's reputation by ascribing to it nefarious doctrines, purposes, and practices. The advisability of doing away with the order became a major issue in the Church and in European politics from about the middle of the 18th century.

Partial suppression. Preparing the way for complete suppression was a series of expulsions from Latin countries and their colonies between 1759 and 1768. Portugal seized the initiative, due mainly to the machinations of its powerful, ruthless minister of state, POMBAL, a disciple of the Enlightenment. By royal decree in 1759 the society's properties were ordered confiscated, and its members were expelled from the Portuguese homeland and overseas possessions, unless they abandoned their vocation. This the vast majority of the more than 1,700 affected religious refused to do. Brutality characterized the expulsion. Thus about 1,100 were unceremoniously dumped penniless on the shores of the States of the Church. Some 250 more were cast into dungeons, many to perish from mistreatment.

France, headquarters of the Enlightenment, Gallicanism, and Jansenism, abounded with enemies of the order. They also included the Parlement; Mme. Pompadour, the royal mistress; and Étienne François de Choiseul, minister of state and patron of the "philosophers." In their schemings, they made capital of the unfortunate LA VALLETTE case in the Jesuit mission in Martinique. Finally they demolished the resistance of King Louis XV. In 1764 the society was declared an illegal body in France and its colonies, but the over 3,500 Jesuits involved were not exiled.

Spain and its territories, impelled by a few influential civil officials, in 1767 confiscated the order's properties and expelled more than 5,100 of its members with great cruelty. The same year another region ruled by the Spanish Bourbons, the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, took a similar action against more than 1,400 Jesuits. In the next year, the Duchy of Parma, likewise under Spanish Bourbon representatives, summarily banished another 170 or so Jesuits.

Complete suppression. With half the order affected by these expulsions, the Bourbon courts turned to Rome to legislate the entire order out of existence. Clement XIII (1758–69) resisted and spoke out in defense of the persecuted body. In the conclave following this pontiff's death, the fate of the Jesuits was the dominating issue. Foes determined to secure a pope favorable to their views. Cardinal Giovanni Ganganelli, their choice, emerged as Clement XIV, although there is no proof of an explicit bargain struck to win the tiara. For four years the pope kept deferring a decision in the face of steadily mounting pressure and threats of schism. Then, in the brief Dominus ac Redemptor (July 21, 1773), in virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, he decreed complete dissolution. As reasons the document cited the need to restore peace within the Church, the inability of the society under the circumstances to provide the usefulness for which it came into being, and other unspecified considerations, which Clement XIV said were "suggested to Us by the principles of prudence and which We retain concealed in Our breast." No condemnation of the Ignatian constitutions appeared, nor were there charges against the orthodoxy or personal conduct of individual members.

To the Church as a whole this papal act came as a severe blow; to Catholic education and missions, it was a crippling one. To the order it came as a death sentence and was accepted with obedience. Lorenzo RICCI, the superior general, was imprisoned in Rome until his death in 1775. Very many priests carried on their sacerdotal functions as part of the secular clergy. In good part German and Austrian Jesuits were not obliged to desert their educational or scholarly pursuits; they frequently continued to dwell together in communities. Some were raised to the hierarchy, such as John CARROLL, archbishop of Baltimore and first member of the hierarchy in the United States. Twenty-three, martyred during the French Revolution, were beatified in 1927. A few joined the Society of the SACRED HEART OF JESUS, which was founded in 1794; or the PACCANARISTS, which began in 1797. Both were congregations modeled on the Society of Jesus and dedicated to strive for its revival.

History from 1814 to the Twenty-first Century

Restoration. The suppression was never put fully into effect. The order was not completely extinguished; a small remnant endured from 1773 to 1814. Unwittingly, the dismemberment of Poland proved to be the society's salvation, for the Partition of Poland in 1772 brought 201 Polish Jesuits under the scepter of the schismatic Russian Empress CATHERINE II. To take effect, Clement XIV's brief had to be officially promulgated locally. Catherine II never permitted this in Russian dominions, because of her esteem for Jesuits as teachers and her resolve to keep alive their schools. In White Russia Jesuits lawfully prolonged their corporate existence and even perpetuated themselves by accepting novices, with the approval of Pius VI and Pius VII. At the time of the restoration, this group had 337 members. In Prussia, Frederick II did not allow the brief of suppression to take full effect until 1780. Pius VII canonically restored the order in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies in 1804. By 1814 membership there had attained 199. Pius VII also permitted those of the old society in Europe, England, and the United States to affiliate with their brethren in White Russia. The pope awaited a favorable political climate before proceeding further. This came about with the downfall of Napoleon and the release of Pius VII from captivity in France. Soon thereafter, on Aug. 7, 1814, appeared the apostolic constitution Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum, revoking the brief of suppression and completely restoring the order. Since its restoration, the Society of Jesus has fashioned a unique history, in the service of the Roman Catholic Church, which can be reviewed by way of the Jesuits who have been responsible for its leadership. By focusing upon their administrations over almost two centuries, it is possible to trace in broad outline the history of the Jesuits since their restoration.

Tadeusz Brzozowski. First among the leaders was Tadeusz Brzozowski (1749–1820), a Pole, who was elected general of the Society of Jesus on Aug. 7, 1814, and who governed the Jesuit Order until Feb. 5, 1820. Since 1812 there had been growing tensions between the Jesuits and the Russian Tsar over Brzozowski's desire to leave Russia for Rome. Shortly after Brzozowski's death, Tsar Alexander I expelled 350 Jesuits from his empire on March 13, 1820.

Elsewhere the restoration of the Jesuits met with various reactions as veterans of the old Society of Jesus assumed leadership roles. On the Italian peninsula, where St. Joseph PIGNATELLI (1737–1811) had labored for its restoration while preserving the archives of the old Jesuit Order, its members faced severe challenges as its individual states began the march toward nationhood. In Spain, within a year of the restoration, at least 120 Jesuits, mostly priests, accepted King Ferdinand VII's invitation to return to take over the Imperial College. In France, Pierre-Joseph Picot de Clorivière (1735–1820), who had witnessed the horrors of the French Revolution that took the lives of 25 former Jesuits, assumed leadership; in Belgium, Henri Fonteyne (1746–1816) opened a novitiate; and, in Ireland, Peter Kenney (1779–1841) founded a school, Clongowes Wood College. In Mexico, which was emerging as a new nation, 20 Jesuits directed two seminaries and four colleges before they were forced into exile in 1821.

In the United States, Brzozowski's tenure was marked by the return of the Jesuits to Maryland with Robert Molyneux (1738–1808) as the superior and with Giovanni A. Grassi (1775–1849) becoming, on March 1, 1815, the first president of a Catholic university in that nation, when President James Madison signed a bill recognizing Georgetown as a university. The Jesuits in Maryland had become diocesan priests during the suppression and recited their vows as members of the Society of Jesus upon its restoration. On May 6, 1816, in an exchange of letters between two former American Presidents, John Adams wrote to Thomas Jefferson: "I do not like the resurrection of the Jesuits." Fortunately, the Jesuits in the United States had the staunch support of former Jesuit John Carroll (1736–1815), founder of Georgetown and archbishop of Baltimore. In 1825, the Jesuits took over St. Louis University, a diocesan institution that was established in 1818.

Luigi Fortis. To succeed Brzozowski, the society elected Luigi Fortis (1748–1829), a native of Verona, as superior general on Oct. 18, 1820. He continued in office until Jan. 27, 1829 and focused on the growth of the order. The Twentieth General Congregation, which had elected him, approved of all the laws and rules of the old Society of Jesus in its determination to preserve the true Jesuit character in the formation of its members. While the same congregation had mandated the updating of the Ratio Studiorum, other problems prevented Fortis from implementing the recommendations that a special commission had made with respect to teaching subjects more relevant to the times. Nevertheless, in pursuit of education, the Jesuits had the consolation of returning to operate the old Roman College in 1824.

During the tenure of Fortis, the English Jesuits encountered opposition in 1819 from the civil authority until the pope made it clear in 1829 that they had been validly restored. The Polish Jesuits, who had been forced out of White Russia in 1820, founded colleges in Krakow, Lemberg, and Tarnopol, and they established Przegląd Powszyczny, their special review. In Spain, where revolution broke out, 25 Jesuits lost their lives in the early 1820s, forcing the other Jesuits to leave the country until they could return in 1823. By 1826, the Spanish Jesuits, operating schools and residences, saw their number grow to 350 members over the next 12 years. In 1826, when the Jesuits were involved in ten educational institutions, hostility against the Society of Jesus in France rose to such an extent as to prohibit the Jesuits from teaching by 1829. In this year, after 70 years of absence, the Society of Jesus returned to Portugal under a handful of French Jesuits.

Jan Roothan. Jan Roothan (1785–1853), a native of Amsterdam, became the third Jesuit general of the restored Society of Jesus with his election on July 9, 1829. In office until May 8, 1853, he was a strong advocate of the value of Jesuit spirituality and of the expansion of the Society of Jesus overseas. His vision brought Belgian Jesuits to Africa, French Jesuits to China, German Jesuits to India, and Italian Jesuits to Bangalore, India.

In Europe, moreover, where Roothan had split the Jesuits into a Belgian and a Dutch province, he had to cope with the continuing expulsions of Jesuits. Having visited his men in Belgium, Germany, Ireland, the Netherlands, and Sicily, he witnessed the challenges facing the Society of Jesus, encouraging the members not to lose hope. In Madrid, after 15 of the fathers were slaughtered on June 17, 1834, the Jesuits were driven out of Spain in 1835. In France, in 1843, Jules Michelet published his diatribe, Les Jésuites, before François Guizot, a Protestant, dispersed the Jesuits. In 1847, during the Sonderbund war, the Jesuits were expelled from Switzerland while anti-clericals forced about 275 Jesuits out of Germany. And, in 1848, the year of Vincenzo Gioberti's attack on the Jesuits with his Il Gesuita Moderno, revolutionary disturbances forced the Jesuit general himself to flee Rome in disguise.

On the intellectual front, La CIVILTÀ CATTOLICA, a journal dealing with religion in society approved by Pope Pius IX, published its first issue during April of 1850. The first of a number of journals of opinion that the Jesuits founded in various countries, it reflected their outlook as upholders of a stable social order in their support of conservative regimes. The latter had been the victors at the Congress of Vienna (1815) in restoring Europe after the final defeat of Napoleon Bonaparte, who was no friend of the Jesuits on the international scene.

In the fast-developing United States, there was sizable growth in colleges and universities during Roothan's years. New Jesuit educational institutions were founded in such cities as Mobile, Ala., in 1830; Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1831; Bronx, N.Y., in 1841; Worcester, Mass., in 1843; Santa Clara, Calif., and Philadelphia, Pa., in 1851, and Baltimore, Md., in 1852. By updating the Ratio Studiorum in 1832, Roothan had brought the work of Father Fortis to completion.

Furthermore, in Latin America, Roothan saw his men return to such countries as Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and New Granada (it became Colombia in 1886). But there were setbacks. Ecuador banished the Jesuits in 1830; Brazil, under Don Pedro, expelled them in 1834; and similar turmoil in Argentina resulted in Jesuits moving into Paraguay and Venezuela in 1842, and into Chile in 1843. Likewise, when troubles hit New Granada, the Jesuits moved into Ecuador again in 1850.

Pieter Beckx. Pieter Beckx (1795–1887), a Belgian, was Roothan's successor as superior general from July 2, 1853 to March 4, 1887. As the streak of expulsions of Jesuits in various countries continued, Beckx sought to keep the Jesuits together pastorally when their religious lives were being affected by frequent banishments. In 1861, the Society of Jesus helped to spread devotion to the Sacred Heart by initiating the Apostleship of Prayer. In Spain, where the Jesuits had returned and grown into a province of 860 members, Beckx divided the country into two provinces in 1863, before another revolution expelled the Jesuits for almost a decade in 1868.

In France, where Gustave Xavier Lacroix de Ravignan (1795–1858) was a renowned orator and author, the Jesuits founded in 1856 Études, a journal of history, philosophy, and theology. Tragically, during the violence of the Commune of Paris, in May of 1871, a number of Jesuits were executed by the Communists. However, once calm had returned them to their country, the French Jesuits were operating about 30 colleges and six seminaries by 1880. Then the anticlerical government sent the Jesuits into exile once more after the passage of the decree by Minister of Public Instruction Jules Ferry. In both Spain and France, the Jesuits would return but not for very long after these troubles, thereby underscoring the frequency with which European nations were banishing the members of the Society of Jesus during the 19th century. Despite such turmoil, there was a hopeful sign when ten Spanish Jesuits arrived in the Philippine Islands on April 14, 1859, thereby paving the way for a university at the Ateneo de Manila, from which would come the renowned Jesuit historian Horacio De La Costa (1916–1977).

In Europe there were further troubles. In Italy, the proclamation of a united country in 1860 led to the banishment of the Jesuits. Ten years later, during the invasion of Rome in 1870, the forces of King Victor Emmanuel plundered the Jesuit properties. Eventually, in 1873, Father Beckx was forced to move his headquarters to Fiesole, taking with him those segments of the Jesuit archives that the Italian government did not confiscate. In Germany, starting in 1872, the Kulturkampf was being implemented, when Dr. Adalbert Falk, not unlike Ferry in France, pursued a course that forbade the Jesuits, opponents of the Bismarckian supremacy of the State over the Church, to teach, thus forcing 550 of them into exile.

In the face of these difficulties, the embattled papacy signaled its appreciation for the loyalty of the society. Pope Pius IX elevated the Jesuit Johann B. Franzelin (1816–1886), a papal theologian in 1876, in the wake of VATICAN COUNCIL I. The latter had come to depend on the Jesuits as his allies in fighting the revolutionary ideas of the age, especially by defending his Syllabus of Errors (1864). The Jesuit Superior General came to be popularly known as the “black pope” because of the power of the Jesuits during the papacy of Pius IX. While the Jesuits were gaining enemies in Europe as they followed a line of thinking which even John Henry NEWMAN considered to be too conservative, they were gaining friends in America. However, there were problems for the Jesuits even in the United States, as the tarring and feathering by Know-Nothings of the Jesuit John Bapst (1815–1887), a Swiss refugee, in Ellsworth, Maine, on the night of Oct. 14, 1854, had earlier demonstrated.

Nevertheless, the distresses in Europe during the years of Father Beckx were counterbalanced by the successes in the new world. In the United States during his tenure, University of San Francisco (1855), Boston College (1863), Canisius College (1870), Loyola University of Chicago (1870), St. Peter's College (1872), Regis University (1877), University of Detroit Mercy (1877), Creighton University (1878), and Marquette University (1881) were founded. Some of these institutions were in regions where banished European Jesuits were working. In 1854, the Rocky Mountain Mission, which Father Pierre DE SMET (1801–1873), the first Jesuit among the Native Americans since the suppression, had established in 1840, and California were placed under the Jesuits of the Province of Turin. In 1869, the Sante Fe Mission became the work of the Neapolitan Province; the German Jesuits were given responsibility for the Buffalo Mission; and Woodstock College, the Jesuit house of studies in Maryland, opened with Italian Jesuits in charge. Meanwhile, in 1863, De Smet distinguished himself as a mediator between the Native Americans and Washington.

In Latin America, the fortunes of the Jesuits were not those of the Jesuits in Europe. In Mexico, where the Jesuits had been banned in 1821, they returned in 1853, only to be banned again in 1855, restored again in 1863, and banned again in 1873. The same rotating doors of banishment were true for Jesuits in Guatemala in 1871, in San Salvador in 1872, in Nicaragua in 1881, and in New Granada in 1859 and 1875.

Anton Anderledy. To succeed Beckx, the Jesuits chose Anton Anderledy (1819–1892), a Swiss Jesuit, who served first as his vicar (1883–1887) and then as general (1887–1892) of the Society of Jesus. Pope Leo XIII, having expressed his sorrow for the sufferings of the Jesuits in France, reaffirmed the documents of his predecessors supporting the Society of Jesus and, on Jan. 15, 1888, canonized Alfonso Rodriguez, John Berchmans, and Peter Claver as saints of the Society of Jesus. The pope supported the work of the Jesuits at La Civiltà Cattolica and brought them together at the Gregorian University to advance the thought of St. Thomas Aquinas. In June of 1889 came the death of Gerard Manley HOPKINS (1844–1889), the English Jesuit who is honored as a poet in Westminster Abbey.

During Anderledy's tenure, troubles with the civil authorities continued. Even though Germany revoked the Falk Laws in 1886, the Jesuits did not return there until after World War I. In France, after their expulsion again in 1880, they were able to return for about a decade in 1890. With the Italian political situation still very unpredictable, Anderledy continued to maintain the Jesuit headquarters at Fiesole.

Upon the direction of Pope Leo XIII, moreover, the Jesuits by means of both La Civiltà Cattolica and of the Gregorian University helped to bring about a renewal in theology and philosophy based on the teachings of St. Thomas Aquinas. This resurgence of neo-scholastic thought reached into the new Jesuit institutions like John Carroll University (1886), Gonzaga University (1887), University of Scranton (1888), and Seattle University (1890) that came into being in the United States. For his part in the revival of St. Thomas, Leo XIII raised the Jesuit Camillo Mazzella (1833–1900), who had been the first prefect of studies at Woodstock College in Maryland, to the rank of cardinal in 1886.

Luis Martin. To succeed Anderledy, Luis Martín (1846–1906) was elected the general of the Jesuits at Loyola in his native Spain on Oct. 2, 1892, and he continued in office until his death on April 18, 1906. During his years, the Jesuits returned to Egypt and Madagascar, and moved into the Belgian Congo. As French republicans prepared more legislation against the religious orders, the Jesuits came under attack for being on the side of those who had accused Alfred Dreyfus of spying in 1894. Expelled from France in 1902 and again in 1904, the Jesuits were forced to leave behind 28 educational institutions after the passage of civil laws aimed at the destruction of their work. In the face of such challenges, Jesuits like Henri Leroy (1847–1917) and Gustave Desbuquois (1869–1959) sought to compensate for the lack of the influence of religion in French society. They brought about Action Populaire, a center of social studies to make sure that Christian principles were available to help solve France's social problems.

As general, Martin's most significant contribution was his effort to preserve the history of the Jesuit Order. Having directed the provincials of the various provinces around the world to assign Jesuits to record the history of the Society of Jesus, the superior general devoted himself to gathering in Rome the important documents on its history, thereby bringing about the Monumenta Historica Societatis Iesu, a vast collection of sources relating to the origins and history of the religious order that he governed. To write this history, Martin set up in 1894 the College of Writers for Jesuits.

Franz Xavier Wernz. Upon the death of Father Martin, Franz Xavier Wernz (1842–1914), a German, was elected general on Sept. 8, 1906, and he served until Aug. 19, 1914, as the Society of Jesus continued to face severe challenges on both the secular and religious fronts. With the overthrow of Manuel II, the Jesuits were again banished from Portugal in 1910. On the intellectual front, the turmoil raised by George TYRRELL (1861–1909), who had been dismissed from the society in 1906, contributed to the controversy over Modernism with the publication of his work, Christianity at the Crossroads (1909). Wernz, a canon lawyer, had become involved in the debate when he attacked the roots of Modernism, of which he had himself been suspected. In the United States, America, a journal of opinion, in which American Jesuits would voice their views on religion and society, was founded in 1909.

One of those involved in the controversy over Modernism in 1912 was the French theologian Léonce de GRANDMAISON (1868–1927). Among his pupils at Hastings was Pierre TEILARD DE CHARDIN (1881–1955), who took up the study of paleontology. This Jesuit later helped to shape the ideas that would influence the Catholic Church in a liberal direction with the advent of the Second Vatican Council, when the Jesuits would be distinguished once more for intellectual leadership.

Much was accomplished in the spread of the Jesuits under Wernz. New Jesuit houses of studies and colleges were established inside and outside of Europe. The dispersed German Jesuits had established their theologate at Valkenburg while the Austrian Jesuits were able to accommodate some 300 Jesuit students of theology in their center at Innsbruck. Similar developments were taking place in Krakow, Louvain, and Toledo, thereby indicating the deepening strength of the Jesuit Order. Then it had a handful of provinces in North America and missionaries stationed in such disparate areas as Albania, Armenia, Australia, Denmark, Egypt, the Greek Islands, Indonesia, Sweden, and Syria. Given the rising importance of overseas missions, where in Calcutta, 130,000 were converted to Catholicism and another 12,000 in China, Father Wernz realized the need to preserve the historical record of their missions and established the Monumenta Missionica for the Jesuits.

The foundation of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL INSTITUTE in Rome in 1909, the opening of Sophia University in Tokyo under the leadership of the German Jesuit Hermann A. Hoffmann (1864–1937) in 1913, the establishment in the United States of new Jesuit institutions like Rockhurst College (1910), Loyola Marymount (1911), and Loyola University of New Orleans (1912), underscored the diversity in education of the Society of Jesus, which was also active in Argentina, Brazil, and Mexico. In these countries, as in Canada and the United States, and even Ireland, the rapid growth of the worldwide Society of Jesus forced the Jesuits to explore further expansion plans. In Mexico, where the revolution began in 1910, the Jesuits had to flee from a movement that would make martyrs of a small number of them before the third decade of the twentieth century ended.

Wladimir Ledochowski. Upon the death of Wernz, Wladimir LEDOCHOWSKI (1866–1942), a Polish noble, was elected Jesuit superior general and began a tenure that lasted from Feb. 11, 1915, to Dec. 13, 1942. Having served as a young page in the court of the Hapsburgs at Vienna, he had imbibed the Catholic monarchical ideas that were totally against the spirit of the age in which he lived. With the outbreak of World War I, Ledochowski faced a crisis that enveloped at least 2,000 of his own men. Of the 855 Jesuits involved in the French army and navy, including the 165 who perished, they won a total of 1,056 decorations. In 1915, Pierre ROUSSELOT (1878–1915) was killed in action; in 1916, Teilhard de Chardin was writing in the trenches and working as a stretcher-bearer while earning the Croix de Guerre and the Legion d'Honneur; Joseph de GUIBERT (1877–1942), the expert on Jesuit spirituality, served as a chaplain; and, in 1917, Henri de LUBAC (1896–1991) was seriously wounded in the fighting. In addition to the French, other Jesuits were involved from Austria (82), Belgium (165), Canada (4), England (83), Germany (376), Ireland (30), and the United States (50).

Ledochowski, who had to leave Italy during the war because he was a citizen of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, governed the Jesuit Order from Schloss Zizers in Switzerland, where the Jesuits once operated three schools. Upon his return to Rome after the war, he had to bring about the reorganization of provinces in accord with the political realities of Europe and to bring the laws of the Society of Jesus in accord with 1917 Code of Canon Law. It was a time when statistics for 1920 showed that the Jesuits numbered 17,245 members, spread over 25 provinces throughout the world, compared to 600 at the time of the restoration. In the Twenty-Seventh General Congregation in 1923, everything was adapted to a rigid legal framework. Meanwhile, the thinking of German Jesuits on religion and society was reflected in a journal like Stimmen der Zeit, which dated from 1915.

The fact that the Russian Revolution had broken out in 1917 created more problems for the Roman Catholic Church and the Jesuits. At Ledochowski's urging, the Holy See entrusted the apostolate for Russia to the Society of Jesus, including the operation of the Russicum in Rome. Edmund A. WALSH (1885–1956), the Jesuit who headed the Papal Relief Mission during the Russian famine (1922–24) was later chosen by Ledochowski to lead the fight against communism. Michel d' HERBINGNY (1880–1957), another Jesuit, was sent by the pope to Moscow to consecrate quietly three bishops after he had himself been secretly ordained for this mission in Berlin. These and other efforts did not bear much fruit, except to lead to the martyrdom of a large number of the faithful.

Likewise, in coping with the attacks on the church in Mexico and in Spain, the results were costly. Blessed Miguel Augustin PROJUAREZ (1891–1927) had fled Mexico to continue his studies for the priesthood and was later given permission to return to his native country in July of 1926, only to be captured and executed 16 months later. In Spain, the civil war there was responsible for some 6,800 killed due to hatred of the faith, among them at least 120 Jesuits, of which 11 have been beatified.

Moreover, Ledochowski, who had a sense of history, was very pleased with the canonizations of such Jesuit luminaries before the suppression as Peter Canisius (1925) and of Robert Bellarmine and the NORTH AMERICAN MARTYRS (1930). That same year, with his dream of a new Jesuit headquarters in Rome realized, he founded on February 11 the Institutum Historicum Societatis Iesu, which continues to publish its findings twice a year in the Archivum Historicum. Having done all that after the 1929 settlement of the Roman Question between Pope PIUS XI and Benito Mussolini, all the documents of the Society of Jesus were moved to the archives at the new headquarters. During these years, the Jesuits and the Holy See had Pietro Tacchi Venturi (1861–1956), the eminent Jesuit historian, act as the intermediary of the Catholic Church with the Italian government.

In coping with the challenges rising from the political, economic, and social crises of the depression years, the Society of Jesus under Ledochowski was very much at the service of the papacy. This was particularly true of Oswald von Nell-Breuning (1890–1991), a disciple of Heinrich Pesch (1854–1926), the Jesuit social philosopher. With the help of another Jesuit, Gustav GUNDLACH (1892–1963), Nell-Breuning became the main architect of QUADRAGESIMO ANNO (1931), an encyclical designed to meet the problems of society, especially with its emphasis on the principle of SUBSIDIARITY. Its ideas influenced social legislation in the United States and Europe, with the rise of the Christian Democrats after World War II. At the same time, the Society of Jesus was stressing the importance of the social apostolate as the Twenty-Eighth General Congregation had decreed in 1938. American Jesuits like John LAFARGE (1880–1963), Leo C. Brown (1900–1978), and Louis J. TWOMEY (1905–1969) were deeply involved in spreading the papal teachings on social justice in a nation in which the Jesuits founded still another educational institution with Fairfield University in 1942.

Meanwhile, the rise of Nazism, coming as it did in the wake of the problems with Russia, Mexico, and Spain, would capture much of Father Ledochowski's attention, especially after the invasion of Poland in 1939. Having taken precautions to continue the government of the Society of Jesus, he had the general congregation, on the eve of World War II, appoint Maurice Schurmans (1901–1970), a Belgian Jesuit, to be his vicar. With Italy in the war, Ledochowski, in a generous delegation of power for one who had issued directives to Jesuits on such minute details as the care of one's hair, gave some regional assistants the necessary authority to make decisions with respect to their areas of jurisdiction when it involved seeking approval from Rome. In the case of the American assistant Zachaeus Maher (1882–1963), Ledochowski had a Jesuit who unhesitatingly took up his responsibilities until 1946, when he was replaced by Vincent McCormick (1886–1963), a confidant of Pope Pius XII.

An astute observer of contemporary events, Ledochowski had sensed the problems facing the Jesuits in Germany as early as February of 1934. Remaining in Rome, he led the battle against Nazism through the Jesuits who operated Vatican Radio. Although the Jesuit general has been blamed by some scholars for sidetracking the encyclical that Pope Pius XI, before his death, was about to publish against anti-Semitism, Ledochowski cannot be regarded as in any way sympathetic to the Nazis. His strong and steady hand was firmly behind Vatican Radio's transmissions, which inspired hope for many peoples oppressed by the Nazis, including the Jews. With respect to the latter, Tacchi Venturi, whose name is as venerated in Rome as much as that of Felice

M. Capello (1879–1962), the popular confessor, and Riccardo Lombardi (1908–1979), the founder of the Movement for the Better World and famed preacher, used his quiet diplomacy with Italy to help save many of them from the Holocaust.

That almost 150 Jesuits, among them the German Alfred Delp (1907–1945) and the Frenchmen Victor Dillard (1897–1945) and Yves de MONTCHEUIL (1900–1944), perished as victims of the Nazis as they defended the rights of others, some even risking their lives to save Jews, stands as a tribute of the resistance that Ledochowski led against the Nazis who went so far as to outlaw the Jesuits. Among the prisoners who survived was the famous English writer and preacher Cyril Charles MARTINDALE (1879–1963) and Blessed Rupert MAYER (1876–1945), the Munich preacher who had earned the Iron Cross in World War I and boldly opposed the Nazis. Martindale, like Jesuits Martin C. D'ARCY (1888–1976) and Frederick COPLESTON (1907–1994) after him, had an impact on religion and culture outside of his native England.

Interim vicars general. Between Ledochowski's death and the election of John Baptist Janssens (1889–1964) in 1946, due to the situation of World War II, which prevented a meeting a general congregation, Alessio A. Magni (1872–1944), an Italian, and Norbert de Boynes (1870–1954), a Frenchman, served as vicars general of the society. While Magni's tenure was a relatively quiet one, de Boynes sought to tone down what Vatican Radio was doing in resisting the Nazis. In fact, before assuming office as vicar, he did not hesitate to tell the French, as Ledochowski's assistant in 1941, that they should fall in line behind the government of Vichy under Marshall Philippe Pétain, who had restored the Society of Jesus in France. This did not go over well with Jesuits like Henri de Lubac and others in the resistance movement, who were openly opposed to such collaboration.

John Baptist Janssens. On Sept. 6, 1946, the Jesuits elected John Baptist Janssens, a Belgian, who served as their superior general until Oct. 5, 1964. Recognized as a "Righteous Among the Nations" by Yad Vashem, he had helped to save Jews in Brussels during the war. However, with the end of World War II, the world had changed and the Catholic Church faced a new threat from Russia's dominance over Eastern Europe where, since 1944, the Society of Jesus saw its work severely restricted, if not entirely banished.

Perceptive and realistic, Janssens encouraged the Jesuits to keep pace with the changes that industry, science, technology, and war had brought about in human society. All this came from a man who appeared quite isolated from the developments of the modern world and whose failing health required him to appoint the Jesuit John L. Swain (1907–1987) as his vicar in 1960. During Janssens' tenure, the American Jesuits established two more colleges: LeMoyné (1946) and Wheeling (1954).

At the same time, Janssens left his mark by his own concern for the social apostolate and the missions. In itself, the latter was a reflection of Father Janssens' zeal, which was confirmed at the meeting of the Second Vatican Council by at least some 40 Jesuit bishops, who were pictured in Rome with Augustin Cardinal Bea (1881–1968). As for the goals of the social apostolate, the activities of Bl. Alberto Hurtado Cruchaga (1901–1952) in Santiago, Chile, in caring for the homeless, and the work of Jerome D'Souza (1897–1977), a Jesuit from India, in establishing a social institute in his native land at Janssens's suggestion, stand as good examples.

The society suffered a setback among its scholars during Janssens' time. Biblical experts like Stanislas LYONNET (1902–1986), Luis Alonso Schökel (1920–1998), and Maximilian Zerwick (1901–1975), and such theologians as Henri de Lubac (1896–1991) and John Courtney MURRAY (1904–1967) were silenced. They would be vindicated later by Pope John XXIII during the Second Vatican Council, when many of their ideas became the foundation for the Second Vatican Council. In particular, those biblical scholars had put into practice the words of Pius XII's Divino afflante Spiritu (1943) about Catholic scholars approaching the biblical texts critically and historically. That restoration, it should be noted, came about due to the intervention of Cardinal Augustin BEA, who was influential in the composition of Divino afflante Spiritu.

Janssens' years were also marked by much suffering because of the communist regimes that established themselves in Eastern Europe and in China. In Eastern Europe, Walter J. Ciszek (1904–1984) had gone through the gulag after one of his Jesuit associates, Jerzy Moskwa (1910–1941), had perished. One of the more distinguished Jesuits among many behind the Iron Curtain, where at least 20 were killed, was Jan Korec (b. 1924), now cardinal, who kept the underground church alive in Czechoslovakia. Behind China's Bamboo Curtain, where at least 15 Jesuits have been killed, Dominic Tang Yee Ming (1908–1995), archbishop of Canton; Paul Li Zhenrong (1919–1992), bishop of Cangzhou; and priests like Francis Chu (1913–1983) and Xavier Cai (1907–1997) were some of members of the Society of Jesus who suffered for their loyalty to the Holy See in the land where the name of the Jesuit Matteo Ricci (1552–1610) is still revered 300 years after his arrival in Beijing.

Pedro Arrupe. Pedro ARRUPE (1907–1991) succeeded Janssens on May 22, 1965. The first Basque since

St. Ignatius to head the Jesuit Order, his life was affected by two decisive world events before his election as superior general. One was the expulsion on June 23, 1932 of the Society of Jesus from Spain on the eve of the Spanish Civil War, sending him as a Jesuit scholastic into exile in Belgium. The other was the explosion of the atomic bomb on Hiroshima on Aug. 6, 1945, when he was the master of novices on the outskirts of that city, where he turned the Jesuit novitiate into a hospital.

At the time of the Second Vatican Council, the Society of Jesus numbered some 36,000 members, with more than 8,000 of them in the United States, including 6,000 of them who were laboring as missionaries around the world and operating an educational complex of some 4,000 schools (more than half in elementary education, with at least 800 in secondary education and 750 in higher education). Among the outstanding Jesuits who served in various capacities at the council were Karl RAHNER (1904–1984), John Courtney MURRAY (1904–1967), and Bernard LONERGAN (1904–1984). With such capable minds, including Jean DANIELOU (1907–1974) and Josef A. JUNGSMANN (1889–1975), in 1963 Pope Paul VI assigned the Jesuits the task of putting together the documents relating to the actions of Pope Pius XII during Holocaust and, in 1965, the mission of confronting atheism in the aftermath of the Second Vatican Council.

As superior general, Arrupe endeavored to reshape the Society of Jesus in accordance with the documents of the Second Vatican Council. This was done by holding a second session of the Thirty-First General Congregation between Sept. 8 and Nov. 17, 1966, to take care of the issues that were not resolved in the first session. Subsequently, he convened the Thirty-Second General Congregation between Dec. 2, 1974, and March 7, 1975. Renewal and reform came at a cost. The number of Jesuits declined from 36,038 members when Arrupe was elected to 25,952 when he left office.

Father Arrupe brought the Society of Jesus to an agonizing reappraisal of itself and espoused the Church's teaching at Medellín, Columbia in 1968, with its emphasis on the preferential option for the poor. As the numbers of departure of Jesuits from the society increased and vocations declined, dissatisfaction with the superior general grew. A group of Spanish Jesuits petitioned Pope Paul VI that they be removed from Arrupe's authority. The very conservative views of those Jesuits and the Basque identity of the Jesuit superior general, who was perhaps even a nationalist spirit, in a country where Spanish far outnumber the Basques in the society, helped fuel their request.

Although Pope Paul VI was aware of the challenges confronting the superior general, as he indicated in the concerns that he had voiced in addressing the Jesuits at the closing of their general congregation on Nov. 17, 1966, he refused, especially since there was no reason to doubt the dedication and loyalty of Arrupe to the Holy See, as was evident when later the Jesuit General called for “unswerving and decisive loyalty” in the wake of Humanae Vitae (1968), the controversial encyclical on birth control. While staunch conservatives within the order were disgruntled with the changes wrought by the Second Vatican Council and were inclined to blame Arrupe for the crisis within the Society of Jesus, there was more to it than that.

During that time, although the Jesuits witnessed an increase in the number of local-born Jesuits in the Third World, especially in parts of Africa and Asia, this increase was dwarfed by a huge decline in numbers in Europe and North America. In the United States, the numbers declined from 8,400 to less than 5,000. This decline was due to a number of factors, including changes in traditional practices. No less a Jesuit than Carlo M. Martini (b. 1927), later cardinal archbishop of Milan, pointed out in preparation for the opening of the Thirty-Second General Congregation in 1974 that a number of Jesuits, at least in Europe, had already abandoned such practices as daily Mass, the examination of conscience, and the annual eight-day retreat. Then, in the work of the congregation, Arrupe ran into resistance from Paul VI when changes regarding the fourth vow of obedience to the pope were discussed.

