In that same period, the colleges and the universities in the United States were becoming separately incorporated from the Jesuits communities. That development came under the leadership of Paul C. REINERT (1910–2001), Jesuit president of St. Louis University. In adapting these educational institutions to the realities of American society, many Jesuits were defensive in believing that the Society of Jesus was abandoning its legacy in having the religious community recognized in civil law as separate from the educational institution. In view of the decline in vocations to the Society of Jesus, the move in that direction can be regarded as beneficial, especially in providing the financial means to support these Jesuit colleges and universities.

Furthermore, there was the confusion that arose from priests becoming involved in politics, usually regarded as reserved for the laity in the United States. While the Jesuit John J. McLaughlin (b. 1927), a speechwriter at the White House, was defending Richard M. Nixon and his Watergate crimes, Robert F. Drinan (b. 1920), another Jesuit, was bringing articles of impeachment against the President in the United States House of Representatives. At the same time, another Jesuit, Daniel J. Berrigan (b.

1921), made headlines in protesting against Nixon’s foreign policy. When Drinan’s position in Congress became a subject of controversy with the Holy See, he showed true Jesuit obedience early in 1981 by stepping down from his elected office, in which he had served for ten years, once Pope John Paul II had urged this.

Undeterred, Arrupe moved to implement the decrees of the Second Vatican Council on religious life. To this end, he sought to recapture the original charism of St. Ignatius so as to enable the Society of Jesus to adjust to the contemporary world. This was evident when the Thirty-Second General Congregation stated that the basic challenge for Jesuits was engagement in “the struggle for faith and the struggle for justice that the same faith requires,” and at least 40 Jesuits in the Third World have borne witness with their own lives to what this idea of a Jesuit means today. Among those who reflected this by their martyrdom were Rutilio Grande (1928–1977) in El Salvador, John Conway (1920–1977) and Christopher Shepherd-Smith (1943–1977) in Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe), João B. Penido Burnier (1917–1976) in Brazil, and Tarcisius Dewanto (1965–1999) and Karl Albrecht Karim Arbie (1929–1999) in East Timor in September of 1999.

As John Paul II succeeded to the papacy, the tensions between the Vatican and the Jesuits increased until Aug. 7, 1981, when Arrupe was afflicted with by a disabling stroke. Given Arrupe’s frail health and the difficult situation in which the Jesuits found themselves with respect to the papacy, Pope John Paul II appointed Paolo Dezza (1901–1999) as the pontifical delegate to govern the Society of Jesus from Oct. 5, 1981 to Sept. 13, 1983. In this way, the pope sidetracked the possibility of Vincent T. O’Keefe, a highly respected American Jesuit, whom Arrupe had appointed as his temporary vicar, from becoming the next superior general. For two years, Dezza held the Society of Jesus together, despite the hostile reaction that the papal intervention had caused among some members within the society. For this, he was duly rewarded when Pope John Paul II named him as a cardinal in 1991.

Peter-Hans Kolvenbach. Subsequently, when the pope found that the time was suitable, the Jesuits gathered in Rome to elect a superior general to succeed Arrupe, who resigned on Sept. 3, 1983. On the following September 13, the Jesuits elected Peter-Hans Kolvenbach (b. 1928), a native of Holland, to take over the leadership of the Jesuit Order. His tenure has been marked by improvement in relations with the pope, by the opening up of the dialogue with the religions of the non-Christian world, and by the strengthening of the Society of Jesus in Eastern Europe after the fall of communism.

At the same time, Father Kolvenbach’s government of the society has been noteworthy in a number of other ways. While the tragic murder by the military in El Salvador of six Jesuits and their two helpers on Nov. 16, 1989 stands out, there was of importance as well the Thirty-Fourth General Congregation of the Society of Jesus, from Jan. 5 to March 22, 1995. Although it dealt in part with the updating of the Jesuit Order in accord with the new code of Canon Law published in 1983, among its decisions was a positive stand on the rights of women, which made news.

Nevertheless, though the relationship between the Jesuits and the Vatican has improved, Kolvenbach's years have forced the Society of Jesus to face up to its traditional role in higher education as more Jesuits were becoming involved in other apostolates, including in the United States the increasing number of "Nativity Schools" that the Jesuits have started to educate inner-city youth in their later elementary grades. While some alumni found that Jesuit institutions in higher education have been losing their Catholic character, others maintain that these institutions are more truly Catholic than they have been in the past, especially in teaching their students to have a deep concern for justice in society. Such a debate was not unrelated to the Vatican's attempt to exercise some control over Catholic colleges and universities. This was explicitly stated when Pope John Paul II issued on Aug. 15, 1990 Ex Corde Ecclesiae, a document that has occasioned discussions about academic freedom within Jesuit institutions themselves.

The attitude of the papacy toward the Society of Jesus has been a significant development during Kolvenbach's tenure. An indication of this where John Paul II really stands can be derived from the way that the pope has increased the number of Jesuit saints and blessed and the number of Jesuit cardinals. Of the 28 Jesuits who have been raised to the rank of cardinal in the past, John Paul II has created 12 of them, a number that surpasses what any of his predecessors have done. The pope has shown similar affection for the Society of Jesus in having raised some 24 Jesuits to the ranks of the beatified and about half that number to the ranks of the canonized.

When the Jesuits celebrated the 500th anniversary of the birth of their founder in 1991, the Society of Jesus had endured many changes, many of which came during the period since the restoration of the Society of Jesus in 1814. That the Jesuit Order has survived the many challenges that it faced from its enemies and from the changes within its company is due in part to the leadership of those who have been elected Jesuit superior general. There is reason for optimism. By the year 2000 the Jesuits numbered at least 21,000 members, with its largest segments in India (3,559), the United States (3,495), and Spain (1,774). Laboring in 112 nations throughout the world, the Society of Jesus, which has almost 50 canonized saints and about 150 blessed in its history, is still involved in many apostolates, especially in schools, colleges, and universities, where it continues to form men and women for others.

Bibliography: W. V. BANGERT, A History of the Society of Jesus (2d edition; St. Louis, Mo. 1986). M. BARTHEL, The Jesuits, tr. Mark Howson (New York 1987). J. A. CASCIOTTI, Supplementum Catalogorum Societatis Jesu 2002 (Rome 2001). F. R. DUMAS, Grandeur et Misère des Jésuites (Paris 1963). J. A. FITZMYER, "A Recent Roman Scriptural Controversy," Theological Studies 22 (1961) 426-444. C. HOLLIS, The Jesuits (New York 1968). J. LA-COUTURE, Jesuits, tr. Jeremy Leggatt (Washington, D.C. 1995). V. A. LAPOMARDA, The Jesuits and the Third Reich (Lewiston, N.Y. 1989). W. LEDOCHOWSKI, Selected Writings of Father Ledochowski (Chicago, Ill. 1945). J. F. MACDONNELL, Companions of Jesuits (Fairfield, Conn., 1995). P. MCDONOUGH, Men Astutely Trained (New York 1992). P. MCDONOUGH and E. C. BIANCHI, Passionate Uncertainty: Inside the American Jesuits (Berkeley, Calif. 2002). R. MENDIZÁBAL, N. R. VERÁSTEGUI, and C. J. JACKSON, Catalogus Defunctorum, 3 v. (Rome 1972-2000). J. W. O'MALLEY, G. A. BAILEY, S. J. HARRIS, and T. F. KENNEDY, The Jesuits (Toronto, Canada 1999). W. J. O'MALLEY, The Voice of Blood (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1980). J. W. PADBERG, ed., The Constitutions of the Society of Jesus and Their Complementary Norms (St. Louis, Mo. 1996). M. R. TRIPOLE, ed., Jesuit Education 21 (Philadelphia, Pa. 2000). J. N. TYLEND, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (2d ed Chicago, Ill. 1998). J. M. DE VERA, ed., Jesuits, Yearbook of the Society of Jesus, 2000 (Rome 1999).

[J. F. BRODERICK/V. A. LAPOMARDA]

JESUS (THE NAME)

In English the name Jesus is a transliteration of the Latin form Iesus, which represents the Greek form Ἰησοῦς of the Hebrew name yēšūa'. The latter is a late form, by vowel dissimilation, of the name yōšūa', itself a contracted form of y<sup>e</sup> hōšūa', "Yahweh is salvation." This was the name of Moses' successor, JOSHUA, son of Nun. Both because of the fame of this early hero of Israel and because of the meaning of the name, many men both in the Old Testament and in the New Testament bore the name of Joshua or Jesus. The Septuagint generally uses the Greek form Ἰησοῦς where the Hebrew text has the form yōšūa' or y<sup>e</sup>hōšūa'. So also the New Testament, in referring to Joshua, son of Nun, calls him Jesus (Acts 7.45; Heb 4.8). An allusion is made in Mt 1.21 to the meaning of the name ("Yahweh is salvation"): Joseph is told by the angel of the Lord to name the child born of Mary's virginal conception "Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins."

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1141-42. L. W. FOESTER, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament 3:284-94.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

“The Transfiguration,” Christ in glory flanked by Old Testament figures, Moses (holding tablets of the Law) and Elijah, appearing in an opening in the clouds to his disciples St. John, St. Peter and St. James. (Archive Photos)

JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON

The Son of God, who became man, is considered in several articles, principally: JESUS CHRIST (IN THE BIBLE) and JESUS CHRIST (IN THEOLOGY). The latter article has a section devoted to specific questions of special interest, some of which are treated also in separate articles (e.g., THEANDRIC ACTS OF CHRIST; IMPECCABILITY OF CHRIST; HISTORICAL JESUS). See also CHRISTOLOGY. Mysteries of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ are treated in individual articles (ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST; RESURRECTION OF CHRIST [IN THE NEW TESTAMENT]; PASSION OF CHRIST [IN THE BIBLE]; VIRGIN BIRTH). Topics of special importance in the development of Christological doctrine are treated in CHRISTOLOGY, CONTROVERSIES ON (PATRISTIC) and in separate articles, e.g., MONOPHYSITISM; NESTORIANISM; for later controversies, see ASSUMPTUS-HOMO THEOLOGY; SUBSISTENCE (IN CHRISTOLOGY); INCARNATION, NECESSITY OF THE. The principal articles on the incarnation are INCARNATION; HYPOSTATIC UNION; HYPOSTATIC UNION, GRACE OF. The principal articles on the salvific work of Christ are REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE); REDEMPTION (THEOLOGY OF). Related articles are SACRIFICE OF THE CROSS; SATISFACTION OF CHRIST; ATONEMENT; RECAPITULATION IN CHRIST; SOTERIOLOGY.

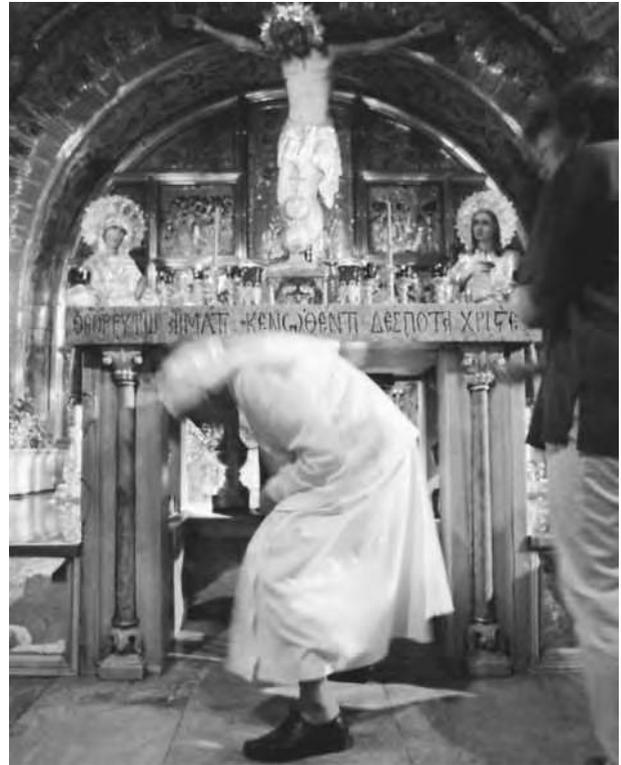

[G. F. LANAVE]

JESUS CHRIST (IN THE BIBLE)

Although there is an abundance of information about Jesus Christ in the Bible, there are difficulties in interpreting and evaluating it because of the nature of the Biblical writings. This article, therefore, begins with a discussion of the problems involved in using the Bible as a source of information about Jesus, His life, His work, and the meaning of His person. Secondly, taking into account the nature of the Biblical sources, it attempts to determine what conclusions can be reached regarding the main events of Jesus' life, what was the content of His personal teaching, and what Jesus Himself thought about His person and work. Lastly, it seeks to determine the Apostolic Church's interpretation of the person and work of Jesus by listing the titles with which the early Church spoke of Him.

The Biblical Sources and Their Value

Within the 1st century after Jesus' death only two Latin authors made undisputed mention of Him. Tacitus (Ann. 15.44) said that the Christians were named for a Christus who had been condemned to death by Pontius Pilate. Pliny the Younger (Letter to Trajan: Epist. 10.69) said that the Christians sang hymns to a certain Christus as to a God. The Jewish author Flavius Josephus (Ant. 20.9.1) mentioned the martyrdom of James, “a brother of Jesus who is called the Christ.” One must turn to the Bible for any further 1st-century information about Jesus.

At the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem a nun crouches to touch the stone at the 12th Station of the Cross, Golgotha, where Jesus died. The site is controlled by the Greek Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Armenian Orthodox churches. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Old Testament cannot be expected to give any direct historical information about Jesus. Furthermore, recent studies of the nature of Old Testament prophecy have shown that messianic prophecies do not give the detailed information that many Christian apologists have sought there (see MESSIANISM). The Old Testament is indispensable, however, for an understanding of the categories and terms in which both Jesus and the Apostolic Church expressed themselves. There remains only the New Testament as a source for the life of Jesus and the meaning of His work and person.

Apostolic Tradition. Since the New Testament is the product of the Apostolic Church, it can be expected to reflect the concerns of the Church at that time. The Christians of the 1st decade after Jesus continued to live as good Jews—as Jews, however, who were convinced that the expected MESSIAH had come, although in a totally unexpected way. The DAY OF THE LORD had arrived, the

Jesus Christ, illustration. (Archive Photos)

“Pietà,” painting by Titian, in the Academy at Venice.

SPIRIT OF GOD had been poured out on the world (Acts 2.1–11). Their enthusiasm drove them to try to share this conviction by recounting what had happened and by explaining its meaning, at first to their fellow Jews, later to the pagans. Thus the Apostolic Church, bursting with a message that would change the world, produced a brief preaching outline of significant facts drawn from Jesus’ life that served ultimately as the basic outline of the Gospels.

Although they continued to frequent the Temple (Acts 2.46), the Christians were conscious of a certain but as yet undefined distinctness from Judaism shown by their continuing “steadfastly in the teaching of the apostles and in the communion of the breaking of bread and in prayers” (Acts 2.42) in their homes. Innumerable new problems arose as the Christians became more conscious of this distinctness and of the universal character of their movement in its spread to the Gentile world. How did the everyday living of the Christian life differ from the life of the Jew and of the pagan? For answers they searched their memories for what Jesus had said. Instruction might be drawn from parallel situations on which Jesus had spoken or from the example of His actions. The moral teaching of the Old Testament and a deeper search into the meaning of Christianity could give principles to live by. This didactic activity of the early Church, as well as controversies with Jews and pagans, preserved the memory of many sayings and incidents from Jesus’ life. These tended to be single isolated incidents, cut off from the framework of chronology and geography since these details contributed little to the problems of practical Christian living. The sayings of Jesus did not need to be exact quotations; often they were not since they were drawn from memories and not from stenographic reports. The words of Jesus could and needed to be adapted to the Christian needs. The incidents were sometimes stripped of detail that did not serve a purpose. In time such sayings and incidents were collected together, not on the basis of chronology or topography, but on mnemonic and topical principles. Gradually a tradition grew about what Jesus had done and said. Practical, kerygmatic (see KERYGMA), didactic, apologetic, and liturgical concerns determined the form and content of this tradition, which developed against the background of Old Testament thinking and in Jewish categories of thought and modes of expression. See FORM CRITICISM, BIBLICAL; TRADITION (IN THE BIBLE).

“The Transfiguration,” from “The Gospel According to the Four Evangelists,” written in Armenia, 13th century.

“Christ Among the Doctors,” oil painting on wood panel by Bernardino Luini, showing Jesus as a young man, c. 1515–1530. (©National Gallery Collection; By kind permission of the Trustees of the National Gallery, London/CORBIS.)

Role of Faith in the Apostolic Tradition. Those who formulated and preserved the tradition just described were conscious of the necessity that it be based on historical occurrence. See, e.g., 1 Cor 15.14–15: “If Christ has not risen, vain is our preaching, vain too is your faith. Yes, and we are found false witnesses as to God, in that we have borne witness against God that he raised Christ.” But the bare recital of historical occurrences is ambiguous. Other men had been reported raised from the dead for whom no one claimed divinity. Other men had been executed and no one claimed that they had thereby redeemed the world. Yet the early Christians attached such significance to the death and Resurrection of Jesus. See RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, 1; REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE). Historical fact needs interpretation. St. Paul tried to use human wisdom to substantiate his interpretation at Athens and found it inadequate (Acts 17.22–33). Having profited from this experience, he told the Corinthians, “I . . . did not come with pretentious speech or wisdom, announcing unto you the witness to Christ. . . . My speech and my preaching were not in the persuasive words of wisdom, but in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power, that your faith might rest, not on the wisdom of men, but on the power of God” (1 Cor 2.1, 4–5). Therefore in early Christian tradition the bare facts of historical occurrence were always coupled with an interpretation drawn from faith. To substantiate the validity of the interpretation an appeal was made to the action of the Holy Spirit, who bore witness to what had happened through the Resurrection and ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST: He had been seated at the right hand of the Father as messianic Lord and Christ. Thus the earliest formulations of faith in the divinity of Jesus were in these terms (Acts 2.32–36; Rom 1.4). The early churchmen insisted on the effects of the Holy Spirit because they were tangible and could be substantiated by experience and historical witness, and thus these in turn confirmed the truth of the witness of the Holy Spirit to the person and meaning of Jesus in SALVATION HISTORY. Consequently, everything handed down about Jesus' works and words was colored by the post-Resurrection faith. Everything was seen in retrospect and reported with the understanding that the Apostles had later, not necessarily with the understanding they had at the time the events happened.

Christ being nailed to cross, engraving. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

New Testament Based on Apostolic Tradition.

The New Testament writings reflect their origins in the early Church. To assess their content and its historical trustworthiness, the reader must keep in mind the three stages of tradition through which the teachings and life of Jesus have come down to us. (1) Jesus chose a special group of disciples and taught them by His words and actions in a way accommodated to their mentality and designed to make a deep impression upon them and to be an aid to memory. This was the method used by other Jewish teachers of His day, when it was the custom that a man's teaching be passed on orally. (2) The Apostles, enlightened and strengthened by the Resurrection of Jesus and the possession of the Holy Spirit, proclaimed first and foremost the death and Resurrection of the Lord, then other events of His life and His teaching. They necessarily used the various forms of speech that suited their purposes and fitted the mentality of their hearers, interpreting the words and deeds of Jesus according to their hearers' needs. (3) Finally, for diverse reasons, the data of faith began to be preserved in the written word rather than by oral tradition. Pastoral considerations occasioned the writing of the Epistles; the death of the witnesses of Christ's death and Resurrection occasioned the writing of the Gospels. Thus, great diversity is to be found in the New Testament as a result of the different points of view and purposes of the different human authors, the different needs of the specific bodies of Christians to which each writing was directed, and finally, the fact that the diverse interests and methods of preaching and teaching of the early Church had left their marks on the tradition upon which these writings were based. "Unless the exegete, then, pays attention to all those factors which have a bearing on the origin and composition of the Gospels, and makes due use of the acceptable findings of modern research, he will fail in his duty of ascertaining what the intentions of the sacred writers were, and what it is that they have actually said" [Instruction of the Pontifical Biblical Commission (May 14, 1964) on The Historical Truth of the Gospel, authorized English translation, The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 26 (1964) 305–312].

Nevertheless a surprising unity runs through the diversity of the New Testament. This unity is not due to any preconceived master plan of a human editorial board, but to the work of the Holy Spirit, who both directed the development of the early Christian tradition and inspired the various human authors to write as they did.

Problem for the Theologian. Since the theologian's task is that of faith seeking understanding, he applies the principles of human reason to the data of faith in order to understand better the content of faith and to express better his insights. To do this he necessarily works within the framework of some philosophical system of human thought. He finds his first difficulty in the fact that he cannot presuppose that the New Testament writers worked from the same set of philosophical presuppositions as his own. The New Testament writers worked from a Jewish frame of reference that is dynamically oriented (often called existential), not from a static or essential one.

“The Agony in the Garden,” painting on wood panel by Giovanni Bellini, c. 1465. (© National Gallery Collection; By kind permission of the Trustees of the National Gallery, London/CORBIS)

Therefore the theologian can expect, for example, no discussion of the concepts of person and nature as applied to God, no formulated doctrine of the Holy TRINITY. Consequently, both those who deny any teaching on three Persons in one God in the New Testament and those who try to find there such a philosophical formulation of the doctrine are victims of the same error of thinking, viz, the projection of a foreign frame of reference upon the New Testament. The theologian’s first task is to understand the New Testament within the sacred authors’ frame of reference (principally the work of the Biblical theologian) and then translate these understandings into the framework and expression of a different set of philosophical presuppositions (principally the work of the systematic theologian). He gains much understanding from this latter effort, but the New Testament does not do this task for him. Secondly, the theologian must be aware that the New Testament writers are at the beginning of the process of finding ever more precise and adequate terminology. To read later theological precision into the terminology of the New Testament writer would be to do him an injustice and lose much of his meaning. Finally, the theologian must remain aware of the practical orientation of the New Testament and not expect to find worked out answers to the theoretical problems that claim his attention.

Problem for the Historian. According to modern historical method, the historian must first establish with considerable accuracy the sequence of events for the period his work is to cover. For this the indispensable guidelines are chronology and topology. Having established the sequence of events, he must proceed to point out the interrelation of cause and effect between the events, including the stages of psychological development of the principal personalities involved.

As soon as the historian attempts to apply this modern historical method to a biography of Jesus he finds that the New Testament, his only source of information, does not share his high regard for chronology and topology. Each Evangelist goes his own way except for a broad fourpoint outline: (1) the witness of the Baptist; (2) a public ministry in Galilee; (3) a journey to Jerusalem; and (4) the death and Resurrection there. But even this outline is developed with disproportionate emphasis on various points (e.g., compare Mark and Luke on the journey to Jerusalem) and is evidently schematic. John mentions several journeys to Jerusalem, while the SYNOPTIC GOS-PELS mention only one, although the saying “Jerusalem, Jerusalem! . . . How often would I have gathered thy children together” (Mt 23.37; Lk 13.34) seems to imply a considerably earlier ministry there. Any attempt at a detailed sequence of events of Jesus’ life will be a tissue of hundreds of hypotheses for which more or less support can be found in the sources, but which more often reflect only the arbitrary preference of the biographer for the order of one inspired author against that of another equally inspired author. Historians who have proceeded in this way have worked from the unexamined presupposition that the Evangelists were using the same historical method as they. Those who have denied any historical value to the contents of the Gospels because of the impossibility of establishing a detailed sequence of events in Jesus’ life seem to be working from the presupposition that history can be written only according to modern historical method. Today it is recognized more and more that there is much valid historical detail to be found in the Gospels, but each pericope must be judged on its own merits, and one must be content with much less certitude regarding the detailed order of the historical events than was formerly supposed. This does not contradict the inspired nature of the texts.

Before the historian can begin to assess the historical trustworthiness of the individual pericopes of the Gospel material he must determine to what extent the early churchmen’s post-Resurrection faith and their application of the traditions about Jesus to the practical needs of the early Church have modified the historical content of these traditions. In such an assessment full consideration must be given to the facts that the New Testament authors, who were responsible for preserving and applying the traditions about Jesus, were conscious that their work would be in vain if there were no historical basis for their teaching, that they were men of faith who had accepted the witness of the Holy Spirit, and that it was their office to present the traditions about Jesus in such a way that they could be the basis for a living Christian faith and activity. Finally, the Christian historian must remember that it transcends the power of the strict historical method alone to establish the validity of the interpretation based on faith that the tradition about Jesus put on the historical facts that it contains. In this regard the historical method can establish only motives of credibility. (See JESUS CHRIST, BIOGRAPHICAL STUDIES OF.)

The Historical Jesus

Once the difficulties inherent in the sources have been taken into account, it is possible to assert a great deal concerning the life and teachings of Jesus.

Outline of Main Events in the Life of Jesus Christ.

It is possible to group the following events into a rough biographical outline without claiming to give an exhaustive listing of facts that can be established by modern historical method.

Family Background and Early Life. Although born in Bethlehem before the death of HEROD THE GREAT (d. 4 B.C.), Jesus grew up in Nazareth in Galilee (see INFANCY NARRATIVES). JOSEPH, the carpenter, was popularly accepted as His father. His mother’s name was Mary (see MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, 1). James, Joseph (or Joses), Simon, and Jude were the names of close relatives, called simply BROTHERS of Jesus in the New Testament. We have no information about His early training. No doubt He spoke Aramaic. His later activity in the synagogues indicates He could read the Old Testament in Hebrew. He could have known some Greek, but there is no evidence that Greek thought influenced Him.

Public Life in Galilee. At about the age of 30 Jesus was baptized by JOHN THE BAPTIST (see BAPTISM OF THE LORD; TEMPTATIONS OF JESUS). He did not become a follower of John, but went back to Galilee and lived a life in many respects like that of the RABBIS. He spoke in the synagogues, debated with the SCRIBES, sometimes using their methods of exposition of the Scriptures, and gathered disciples and taught them. In other respects His life was in marked contrast to that of a rabbi. He often taught in the open, in the streets, by the Sea of Galilee, in the fields. He associated freely with the classes of people the rabbis made a point of avoiding—women, children, tax collectors, sinners, the poor “people of the land” who had no knowledge of the Law. The enthusiasm of the crowds was due in large part to His miraculous healing activity and His concern to relieve suffering. His usual method of teaching on His own authority and the main burden of His teaching were different from those of the rabbis. The result was that the rabbis did not accept Him as one of their own, but were often in open hostility to Him.

There is no way of knowing the precise length of this period of His life. The Synoptics mention only one Passover, whereas the Fourth Gospel mentions at least three without making any claim that the listing is exhaustive. Perhaps this period extended over three or four years or even longer.

Ministry in Jerusalem. An important turning point in Jesus’ life was His final journey to Jerusalem. On this occasion He openly confronted the highest authorities of Judaism and forced a showdown by His authoritative entry into the city and Temple and by His bold activities and teaching there. He ate a last supper with His disciples, after which He was arrested, tried by the Jewish authorities, found guilty of blasphemy, and turned over to the Roman authorities on charges of sedition; He died on a

Friday afternoon by crucifixion and was buried. These events occurred while Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea, a post he held from A.D. 26 to 36. One can only conjecture about a more precise date for His death. (See PASSION OF CHRIST, I.)

Nothing relating to Jesus can be more firmly established by the historical method than the early Christian conviction that Jesus rose from the dead. This conviction is not the particular experience of a few enthusiasts or a particular theological opinion of a few Apostles that carried the day, but is found wherever there were early Christian witnesses and communities, no matter how varied their emphasis in teaching might be. The Resurrection, however, as a mystery of faith cannot be proved by the modern historical method alone, but it can be shown to be most reasonable.

Characteristics of Jesus as Man. A historical study of the "Man, Christ Jesus" (1 Tm 2.5) has much more to offer than the meager outline just presented. Although the Gospels tell us nothing about the external appearance of Jesus, He could hardly have been repulsive. He must have been physically strong to stand up under the heat, cold, hunger, journeys, incessant activity, and the impetuosity of the crowds. The ease with which He turned to nature and the ways of men for illustrations in His teaching show Him to have been sensitive, appreciative, and observant of His surroundings. Yet the traditions about Jesus show practically no interest in these aspects of His personality.

The Gospels are made up almost exclusively of a series of vignettes in which a procession of very real and very different people come into contact with Jesus. He went out to them, met them, spoke to them, and interacted with them. Out of these accounts of the interplay of personalities emerges a dynamically attractive and distinctive historical person.

He was approachable and open to fishermen, farmers, Scribes, Pharisees, tax collectors, public sinners, officials in government, members of the Sanhedrin, and children. If they were hesitant, He invited them to come. He was adaptable to the demands they made on Him. This indicates a deep concern for the welfare of each individual who came into contact with Him, a willingness to become genuinely involved with the concerns of the people, and a capacity for great self-sacrifice.

He showed Himself to be a man of perception and penetrating insight into inner thoughts and motivations. Every scene described in the Gospels shows Jesus dealing with the situation according to the kind of person He encountered. He saw through His opponents, disarmed their objections, answered their unspoken questions, or forced them to give the answer for themselves. He forgave the paralytic's sins, although only a cure was explicitly requested. He often healed the sick, sometimes put them off to test them, or He refused, as He did at Nazareth, if He failed to find the acceptance of Him that He called faith. He was often at hand to help when the well-disposed were hesitant to ask.

He reacted to each situation with honest and appropriate emotion. He showed pity and compassion to the sufferer, such as the blind and the lame; the confused, such as Nicodemus; the self-disgusted sinner, such as the woman who bathed His feet with tears; the inadequate rich young man; and the superficial. He was encouraging to the sincere, demanding upon the self-interested, sometimes impatient with the obtuse disciples who were slow to understand, angry with the obstinate Pharisees and the perverse demons. There was no sham in Him, and He left no room for it in others. His behavior was often at variance with what was expected because of prejudice or unthinking convention, e.g., eating with tax collectors. Those who only imperfectly understood His purposes and goals could not sway Him. He fled from the crowds that tried to make Him king. He rebuked Peter when Peter tried to dissuade Him from a role of suffering. He refused the request of James and John because it was based on a false notion of His kingdom. He set His face resolutely toward Jerusalem, although His disciples tried to dissuade Him. He obviously had a different set of values, which He would not compromise, a consciousness of what He had to do, and a clear sense of goals from which He could not be turned aside.

The overall impression to be gathered from the Gospels is that of an extraordinarily endowed, powerful, well-poised, and attractive personality, whose psychological balance and good sense no one can question. But there hangs over Jesus a sense of mystery, a sense of unmistakable otherness that no amount of analysis of human traits can explain. It is the secret both of His influence and of His rejection.

The Teaching of Jesus. While Jesus knew, and on occasion used, the methods of the rabbis, more often His teaching was wonderfully direct, clear, simple, and within the grasp of His hearers, without appeal to the authority of tradition or even of Scripture. His manner of speaking was concrete, living, striking. At other times His words were paradoxical, hyperbolic, provocative of thought, and calling for a reexamination of conventional positions. (See PARABLES OF JESUS.)

Jesus' Jewish contemporaries found their God and their self-identity in God's great acts of the past and in the hope for future restoration of their life and character. The present was looked upon as a time of preserving what God had done, summed up in the covenant Law, and of waiting for the fulfillment of the promises. Consequently the present was relatively insignificant. What was startlingly new about Jesus' proclamation was that the present had become significant because "the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand. Repent and believe" (Mk 1.15).

The hope for the future had been summed up in the catchword, KINGDOM OF GOD, i.e., reign of God, the time of God's final interventions. With the appearance of Jesus, this definitive rule of God was at hand. Old methods of teaching designed to preserve, explain, and apply the covenant Law were no longer adequate. There was no longer time for procrastination in declaring oneself. To repent past duplicity and to submit to the present activity of God whatever may be its consequences were the "faith" that Jesus demanded. God and His will were inescapable present realities in the person, teaching, and activity of Jesus. The old era was drawing to a close. The Scribes and PHARISEES, the guardians of the Law, rebelled because they saw Jesus' teaching as an attack on the Law and tradition. The demons cried out because they sensed an encroachment on their sphere of power. His own relatives and neighbors thought Him mad. But the disinherited of this world marveled, and those of good will praised God.

What was Jesus' attitude toward the Law, the study and observance of which was the prime religious practice of His fellow Jews? From a superficial reading of the Gospels His attitude seems ambiguous. On the one hand, He showed respect for the Pharisees, the recognized men of the Law, by being a guest in their homes. He said of them, without trace of irony, "The Scribes and the Pharisees have sat on the chair of Moses. All things, therefore, that they command you, observe and do" (Mt 23.2-3). He sent the healed leper to the priests as the Law prescribed. He told the crowds, "Do not think that I have come to destroy the Law or the Prophets. I have not come to destroy, but to fulfill" (Mt 5.17). At other times He vehemently condemned certain interpretations and extensions of the Law and refused to conform His actions to them, e.g., the interpretations of what constituted work forbidden on the Sabbath. He ignored Mosaic prescriptions about ritual cleanliness and dietary restrictions (Mk 7.15). On the question of divorce He pronounced against an explicit Mosaic prescription explaining that "by reason of the hardness of your heart he [Moses] wrote you that commandment" (Mk 10.5).

In the SERMON ON THE MOUNT Jesus contrasted His understanding of the Law with what "was said to the ancients." It was a question not only of murder, adultery, etc., but even of wrath, the lustful look, the "legal" di-voice, the mere oath (by which one word is singled out above others as true), the degree of retaliation that falls within the limits of the Law, the kind of love that excludes the enemy—all these were equally against the Law.

To understand Jesus' attitude toward the Law it is necessary to consider the more fundamental concern of Jesus already alluded to. From many passages, especially in John, but also in the Synoptics, it is seen that the driving force of Jesus' life was the will of God. "My food is to do the will of him who sent me" (Jn 4.34). The Law had validity only insofar as it was an expression of God's will. Therefore those human interpretations and extensions of the Law that limited, misunderstood, or went beyond God's will had to be repudiated. Even the Old Testament itself, in which God at times accommodated Himself to human weakness and convention, was an imperfect expression of God's will. If Jesus was to "fulfill the Law" in the sense of bringing it to the achievement of its inner purpose, these imperfections had to be removed.

The strongest denunciations were reserved for that duplicity that sought by a misuse of casuistry to keep the external letter of the Law, but at the same time to leave the way open for a noncommittal attitude toward the will of God. Often associated with this duplicity was the attempt to define virtue in terms of external observance and the extension of such observance to minutiae never intended to be covered by the Law, e.g., the paying of "tithes on mint and anise and cummin," while leaving "undone the weightier matters of the Law, right judgment and mercy and faith" (Mt 23.23).

The will of God embraces more than what is expressed in the Commandments. When the rich young man came with the question, "What shall I do to gain eternal life?" Jesus listed the Commandments for him, and He looked upon him with love when he said he had always kept them. But one thing was still lacking in him: that commitment to God's will implied in rejecting the concerns of this life and throwing in his lot with Jesus (Mk 10.17-22). Consequently, as indispensable as keeping the Commandments might be, Jesus summed up the conditions for entry into the kingdom of God in the words, "He who does the will of my Father in heaven shall enter the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 7.21). This is the justice that "exceeds that of the Scribes and Pharisees" (Mt 5.20).

Jesus' Self-consciousness. How did Jesus Himself think of His person and mission? Many hesitate to ask this question either because they consider it impossible to answer or because they think it too human, especially if it implies a development of understanding on Jesus' part. But the question cannot be ignored. The Gospel portrait of the historical Jesus shows Him as having a clear idea of His mission, of goals from which He refused to be turned aside. It is permissible and necessary to ask how He thought of these goals. Concern for the psychological and human aspect of Jesus does not detract from faith in His divinity. The New Testament writers who spoke most realistically of His growth in knowledge (Lk 2.52) did not hesitate to proclaim Jesus' divinity. Finally, an answer to this question is a necessary prerequisite for a solution to the further question of the continuity between the historical Jesus and the Christ of faith. One can approach the question by summarizing the meaning and significance of the titles that Jesus applied to Himself.

Messiah. Perhaps Jesus never spoke of Himself as the Messiah, and He was most cautious when others applied the title to Him. According to a popular misconception, the Messiah was to establish the political sovereignty of Israel over the whole world. Jesus knew this was not His mission. Therefore, as soon as Peter recognized Him as Messiah, He modified the idea by stressing the need for His suffering (Mk 8.27–33). By this He implicitly laid claim to the Old Testament title, Servant of the Lord. When the high priest asked Him if He were the Messiah, He qualified His answer by a reference to the exalted Son of Man of Daniel (Mk 14.62; cf. Dn 7.13).

Jesus' reluctance to use the title was not shared by the first Christians. By the end of the Apostolic age the term CHRIST (χριστός, the Greek translation of the Hebrew mašîah, messiah) had lost its character as a title and was considered part of the personal name, Jesus Christ. The early Church must have found no better title by which to present the meaning of Jesus to the Jews as the fulfillment of the destiny of Israel. It had the further advantage of emphasizing the transcendent kingly nature and rule of Jesus in the kingdom He had established. The danger of political misunderstanding was no longer present since Jesus was no longer physically present. Thus, the confession of faith that first distinguished the Christian was "Jesus is the Christ."

Servant of the Lord. Deutero-Isaiah described a mysterious figure called simply the Servant. The essential characteristic of this Servant of Yahweh is that he suffers vicariously for the many who deserve to suffer and by so doing establishes the right relationship between God and men. In regard to the possible connection between the suffering Servant and Jesus' self-consciousness, two related questions must be asked: did Jesus see a place for suffering in the fulfillment of His mission, and did He explain the meaning of such suffering in terms of the Servant concept?

There are a number of statements attributed to Jesus in the Gospels that either imply or state that Jesus foresaw suffering and even violent death as part of His mission. Some of these (Mk 2.20; Lk 13.33; Mt 12.40) may reflect concerns of the early Church or the theology of the Evangelists. Both Mark and Luke, however, have the saying about the special baptism with which Jesus must be baptized, and from the context of Mark it is clear that this refers at least to a painful death (Mk 10.38; Lk 12.50).

The strongest argument, however, for the assertion that Jesus foresaw a painful death is found in the triple prediction of the Passion found in each of the Synoptic Gospels. Although it is possible or even likely that some details in these predictions were drawn from the actual event, the strong rebuke administered to Peter, "Get behind me, satan" (Mt 8.33), makes sense only as a response to Peter's incomprehension of the fact that Jesus the Messiah must suffer.

Concerning the question of Jesus' use of the Servant concept to explain the purpose of His suffering, it must be admitted that only Luke explicitly cites the Isaian poems in a saying of Jesus placed just before the agony in the garden (Lk 22.37; cf. Is 53.12). More significant, however, are certain allusions to the Servant poems in sayings of Jesus that are generally considered authentic. According to all the Gospels, Jesus used the Last Supper as the occasion for explaining the meaning of His approaching death. In blessing the cup of wine, He spoke of His blood that was to be "poured out for the many" (Mk 14.24), a probable allusion to Is 52.13–53.12, where the Servant is said to pour out his life and where the recipients of the Servant's blessings are four times designated as "the many." An even clearer allusion to the same poem is found in the saying of Jesus that "the Son of Man also has not come to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mk 10.45).

From Acts and the Christological hymn in Phil 2.5–11 it is seen that the early Church used the Servant concept to explain the significance of Jesus' death; but this approach soon fell into disuse. Thus the most plausible historical reconstruction of the use of the Servant theology seems to be that Jesus used allusion or even direct reference to the Servant to explain His understanding of the purpose of His life and to modify the popular misconceptions associated with the term Messiah. The early Church followed His example and found this concept useful while still in a Jewish environment, but less effective in a Gentile one.

Prophet. On several occasions after Jesus had worked wonders, His contemporaries referred to Him as a PROPHET (Lk 7.16). Jesus accepted the title when He applied to Himself the saying, "A prophet is not without honor except in his own country" (Mk 6.4). This title may have contributed to His consciousness of the necessity of His suffering since throughout the Old Testament the prophet was a man of unmerited suffering. However, both Jesus and the early Church found this title inadequate as an explanation of Jesus.

There was also a great deal of speculation about a special prophet—"the Prophet"—who would come to usher in messianic times. The current speculation pictured him in various ways: a great prophet of the past as ELIJAH returned, a prophet who is the forerunner of God Himself in His final intervention or the forerunner of the Messiah. While certain elements of the crowds speculated about whether Jesus was this Prophet (Mk 8.28), it seems that Jesus never so considered Himself. In the Synoptics John the Baptist is described as fulfilling this expectation. John the Evangelist, perhaps, saw some truth in this explanation of the role of Jesus.

Son of Man. The title by which Jesus regularly referred to Himself was SON OF MAN, used approximately 80 times in the Gospels and almost always on the lips of Jesus. It is applied to Him by another only once—by Stephen in Acts 7.56. Thus the Evangelists preserve the memory that Jesus used this title to describe Himself, but the early Christians made little use of it to express their faith in Jesus.

Aramaic bar nāšā' (literally, son of man) meant simply a man. While this meaning can be a satisfactory explanation of the term in many cases of the Gospel usage, the Old Testament background gives the reason for Jesus' predilection for the term. In the Old Testament the Aramaic expression for son of man or its Hebrew equivalent is most commonly used to mean an individual member of the human race with special emphasis on the weakness of man, prone to suffering, in contrast to the strength of God. Thus it is used regularly by God to address the prophet Ezekiel. In Dn 7.13, however, the term is applied to an apocalyptic figure that represents the messianic kingdom of God, a transcendent figure coming on the clouds of heaven surrounded by the exalted symbols of divine majesty. Thus the ambiguity of the term made it possible for Jesus to put into it the meaning He wished. It connoted high exaltation while leaving room for a conception of Himself as the Suffering Servant, and it had not the disadvantage of arousing mistaken political hopes. The ambiguity of the term forced the early Church to explain the two poles of the paradox, and this was done by applying different titles to Jesus and abandoning the title Son of Man. Thus began the theological process that culminated some centuries later in the formulation of the Church's faith in Jesus as true God and true Man.

Son of God. The early Church professed its faith in the divinity of Jesus by the confession, "Jesus is the SON OF GOD." All the books of the New Testament contain this confession in one form or another. It is the key to the understanding of Mark's Gospel (see MARK, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.), the climax of which is the exclamation of the centurion, "Truly this man was the Son of God" (Mk 15.39). Mark draws up his account of Jesus' life to lead the reader to make these words of the centurion his own profession of faith.

It is doubtful that Jesus ever made an explicit claim to be divine during His public life. Such a claim by one who was so obviously a man would have been dismissed as madness. Upon the supposition that Jesus was conscious of being divine, what course was open to Him other than that described by Mark? Jesus worked wonders for which there was no human explanation; He forgave sin; He taught in a way that indicated He was more than man, drawing the authority for His teaching from Himself and not from anything outside Himself, not even from the Scriptures. According to Matthew, Luke, and John, Jesus carefully depicted His unique relationship to God by the way He referred to Him as "my Father." He indicated that He was conscious of a unity of will and activity with God. His actions and words would be enigmatic if considered those of a simple man, no matter how highly endowed by God. His life, death, and Resurrection were all preparation for the reception of the witness of the Holy Spirit that Jesus was the Son of God. Thus the Evangelists were being faithful to a key fact of Jesus' life and person when they made explicit something that from the nature of things Jesus could only imply during His public life. Historical research can show the reasonableness of faith in the divinity of Jesus. It cannot be a substitute for this act of faith.

Christological Titles Originating in the Apostolic Church

The cautious and sometimes mysterious self-revelation of Jesus during His earthly ministry was succeeded by the full flowering of Christian faith in Him. The titles bestowed upon Him reflect the faith of the Church in His divinity and His exalted role with regard to mankind and all the world.

Lord. Closely associated with the titles Christ and Son of God was that of LORD. The disciples had called Jesus Lord in the secular sense of master. With the Easter experience they saw a much deeper meaning in this term. The risen Christ had received divine honors that made Ps 109(110).1 applicable to Him: "The Lord said to my Lord: Sit at my right hand till I make your enemies your footstool." This is the most frequently quoted Old Testament passage in the New Testament. The Easter experience showed that the title Lord could be used of Jesus in the same sense that it was used as a substitute for the name YAHWEH in the Jewish liturgy, for Jesus in His messianic kingship exercised the kingship of Yahweh (see KINGSHIP IN THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST). Passages in the Old Testament referring to Yahweh and titles of honor for God (except Father) could be applied to Jesus because the divine name Lord had been given to Him (Phil 2.9–11).

The same term was an apt one also in the Hellenistic world. There the term Lord was used as a title for divinities and also to express the imperial power of the emperor, to whom divine worship was shown, especially in the eastern parts of the Roman Empire. Thus for the Christian of pagan origin Lord expressed Jesus' supreme rule over all creation as well as over the people of God. Compared to the lordship of Jesus, all other lordships were insignificant. For St. Paul the essentially Christian confession of faith is, "Jesus is Lord" (Rom 10.9; 1 Cor 12.3).

Savior. When God rescued men from sin and death, He was often called SAVIOR in the Old Testament; so, too, were the divinely commissioned men through whom He worked. This title seems to have been transferred to Jesus at an early date, but became popular only in the later New Testament writers, e.g., Luke and the PASTORAL EPISTLES. Because of the connotations the word had in the Hellenistic world, which was looking for savior gods, and especially in pagan ruler worship, this title was a rich one combining certain aspects of the title Lord with the Old Testament idea of delivery from sin and death. It may have been found more useful than the Suffering Servant concept to explain the meaning of the death of Jesus to the Gentile world.

The Word. Although the title Word of God for Jesus became a favorite one in patristic times and the center of the Christological controversies of that period, it is found only in the Johannine writings of the New Testament, i.e., in Jn 1.1, 14; 1 Jn 1.1; and Rv 19.13. While John states clearly the preexistence of Jesus, his main purpose in using this title is to point out Jesus as the revelation of the Father. God's revelation can be found in the word because He created by the word (Gn 1.3–31) and communicated Himself to man in the prophetic word spoken under divine impulse, an action that reached its climax finally and perfectly in the words and actions of Jesus. Jesus is the perfect revelation of God because He is the Word (personified) made flesh. Thus each saying or action of Jesus is a "sign" because it reveals God to man. Secondly, John may have chosen this title for Jesus because he saw in Him the fulfillment of Hellenistic speculation on the λόγος. [See LOGOS, 1; JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.; REVELATION, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE).]

High Priest. Later Jewish speculation expected an eschatological mediator who would bring to perfection the role of the Levitical HIGH PRIEST; this is clear especially in the writings of the QUMRAN COMMUNITY. In Ps 109(110) the king is given a priestly role "according to the order of Melchisedec" (v. 4), and this Psalm was interpreted as referring to the expected kingly Messiah. Whether the two lines of priestly speculation based on Aaron and Melchisedec had any influence on one another is difficult to determine. The Epistle to the HEBREWS made the high priestly function of Jesus central to the understanding of Him. By coming as the perfect high priest, of the order of Melchisedec and not of Aaron, He combined in Himself and surpassed both priestly expectations. Jesus was the perfect high priest offering once and for all the perfect sacrifice, thus becoming the perfect mediator between God and man because He was both God and man (Heb 4.1–14–10.18). No other New Testament writing so stressed the humanity of Jesus on the one hand, or so clearly stated His divinity on the other.

God. This title is rarely used of Jesus in the New Testament, and in most of the places where it seems to be used (the text being uncertain) there are difficulties of interpretation. The theological controversies of the patristic period have had their repercussions on the transmission of the New Testament text. Jesus is rarely called God in the New Testament because the New Testament writers preferred to reserve that title for the Father and to apply to Jesus titles that described His functions—Lord, Son of Man, Son of God, and Logos—all of which, however, contain the idea of the divinity of Jesus. The only incontrovertible instances where Jesus is given the title God are found in Jn 1.1; 20.28; and Heb 1.8. While there are controversies about whether Paul called Jesus God, e.g., in Rom 9.5, where it is probable that he did, there can be no doubt that Paul believed Jesus to be preexistent and divine. He simply preferred the titles Lord and Son of God to express this idea. The few instances of the use of God as a title for Jesus come from the late New Testament writings and are evidence of the beginnings of the theological reflection that characterized the patristic period.

See Also: TRANSFIGURATION; PAROUSIA, 1

Bibliography: B. RIGAUX, "L'Historicité de Jésus devant l'exégèse récente," Revue biblique 65 (1958) 481–522. J. M. ROBINSON, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (Naperville, Illinois 1959). E. STAUFFER, Jesus and His Story, tr. R. and C. WINSTON (New York 1959). H. E. TÖDT, Der Menschensohn in der synoptischen Überlieferung (Gütersloh 1959). J. A. T. ROBINSON, Jesus and His Coming (London 1957). C. H. DODD, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, England 1963). O. CULLMANN, The Christology of the New Testament, tr. S. C. GUTHRIE and C. A. M. HALL (rev. ed. Philadelphia 1963). L. CERFAUX, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (New York 1959). J. BONSIRVEN, The Theology of the New Testament, tr. S. F. L. TYE (Westminster, Maryland 1963). R. BULTMANN, Theology of the New Testament, tr. K. GROBEL, 2 v. (New York 1951–55). V. TAYLOR, The Person of Christ in New Testament Teaching (New York 1958). A. SCHWEITZER, The Quest for the Historical Jesus, tr. W. MONTGOMERY (New York 1968). G. BORNKAMM, Jesus of Nazareth, tr. I. and F. MCLUSKEY (New York 1961). E. P. SANDERS, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia 1985). J. P. MEIER, A Marginal Jew, 3 vols. (Garden City, New York 1991, 1994, 2001). N. T. WRIGHT, Jesus and the Victory of God (Philadelphia 1996). For additional bibliography see JESUS CHRIST, BIOGRAPHICAL STUDIES OF.

“The Flagellation of Christ” by Caravaggio, 1607, Musée des Beaux-Arts, Rouen, France. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

[R. ORLETT]

JESUS CHRIST (IN THEOLOGY)

“The theology of Jesus Christ” in this article refers to the effort of Christian thinkers, subsequent to the New Testament writers, to arrive at a deeper understanding and to draw out the full consequences of the divinely revealed truth of the INCARNATION. The subject therefore prescind[s] so far as possible from the closely allied mysteries of Christ’s preexistence as God (see TRINITY, HOLY) and of His principal activities on earth as savior of mankind [see REDEMPTION (THEOLOGY OF)], founder of the Christian community [see CHURCH, II (THEOLOGY OF)], and source of Christian holiness (see SACRAMENTAL, THEOLOGY). This article is divided into three major parts. The first traces classical christological dogma as it developed in the patristic era. The second describes its development in the context of scholasticism, both medieval and modern. This section of the article will close with an account of the paradigm shift in christology in the twentieth century. The third part deals with individual questions of special importance in christology.

The Formation of Classical Dogma

By the close of the New Testament period, as Pliny the Younger observed, Christians were singing hymns to Christ as to a god. They imaged Jesus as the Son of Man who at his Second Coming would exercise the divine prerogative of judgment. They pictured him as Lord, seated at God’s right hand, having received the name at which every knee should bend and now pouring forth the gift of God's Spirit. They found in him the pattern according to which God had created the universe and the goal toward which God intended it. On two occasions in the fourth Gospel (Jn 1.1; 20.28) and once in the Letter to the Hebrews (1.8) Jesus is called "God."

In all of this, the New Testament suggests that in the context of their liturgical experience, the religious imagination of early Christians was so being shaped that they found themselves placing the man Jesus together with the one he called Father on the other side of the line which for Jews separates the transcendent Creator of the universe from all else. In worship they were experiencing an exigence to broaden the term "God" to somehow include Jesus as well.

Confessing Jesus as divine is one thing. Thinking through what this involves is another, and this task the New Testament bequeathed to subsequent generations. Two specific questions presented themselves. First, how can the Father be one, the Son another, both be divine, and yet there be only one God? Second, if the man Jesus be confessed as truly divine, how is the union of the divine and the human in him to be conceived without slighting one or the other? The literature of the patristic era documents a centuries-long process of trial and error in which first the one, then the other of these questions was addressed and out of which the classical dogmas of the Councils of Nicea (325 A.D.), Chalcedon (451 A.D.), and III Constantinople (681 A.D.) emerged.

Early controversies: denying the problem.

Viewed schematically, the simplest solution to the problem posed by confessing the man Jesus as divine is to deny one term or the other of the tension. It was Jesus' humanity, not his divinity, that first proved problematic. This issue came to the fore in Gnosticism, a highly complex religious movement which had originated before Christianity had appeared and which culminated during the 3d century A.D. in the form, and under the more familiar name, of MANICHAISM. Convinced that flesh is radically antagonistic to spirit, Gnostics conceived salvation as deliverance from the sordidness of the material world. Their myths pictured a heavenly redeemer sent from above to impart true knowledge, the liberating message that human beings' destiny lies in the realm of the spiritual and divine. They found a true incarnation of the redeemer inconceivable. Hence the New Testament accounts of the conception, birth, sufferings, and death of Jesus were not to be taken at face value. In various ways Gnostics affirmed that the mortal career of Christ was an illusion: he only "seemed" to be a man, he only "appeared" to suffer and die. Hence their position is known as Docetism (from the Greek verb meaning "to seem"). Some early form of this movement may have been known to the authors of Luke and John. Irenaeus of Lyons wrote extensively against its later, more developed forms. Ignatius of Antioch uttered a passionate warning against Docetism on his way to martyrdom:

Scene from the "Legend of the Holy Cross" by Piero della Francesca, Church of S. Francesco, Arezzo, Italy.

Be deaf, therefore, when anyone speaks to you apart from Jesus Christ, who was of the family of David and of Mary, who was truly born, both ate and drank, was truly crucified under Pontius Pilate, was truly crucified and died in the sight of those in heaven and on earth and under the earth. . . . But if, as some affirm who are without God—that is, are unbelievers—His suffering was only a semblance (but it is they who are merely a semblance), why am I a prisoner, and why do I even long to fight with the beasts? In that case I am dying in vain. [Trall. 9–10, tr. K. Lake, Loeb Classical Library (New York 1912— )]

The other extreme lay in denying the divinity of Christ. This was the charge leveled by Tertullian against the Ebionites, a second-century offshoot of Jewish Christianity living in Palestine. Their persistence in archaic imagery and thought-forms drew criticism from Eusebius as well; in his Church History (3.27), Eusebius reports that they denied the preexistence of Christ and imaged him as a messianic being especially created by God.

“The Baptism of Christ” by Andrea Pisano, panel of the first bronze doors of the Baptistery at Florence, 1336.

Arian crisis. A fierce storm arose at the beginning of the fourth century when ARIUS, a presbyter of Alexandria, resolved the ambiguities attendant upon previous Word christologies by affirming that strictly speaking the Word was not divine at all but rather God’s first creature. He is the most exalted of God’s creatures, authorized by God to be His agent in the work of creation, and adopted as His Son. The WORD, then, is specifically different from the Father. He is a secondary deity, subordinate in nature to, not the equal of, the Father. With this position Arius brought to its logical conclusion the subordinationism generated by various Greek philosophical assumptions in earlier thinkers like Tertullian and Origen for whom, although both Father and Son were divine, the Son, or Word, was less divine than the Father. Arius’ position, in effect, undercut the reality of the Incarnation, undermined the salvific efficacy of Christ’s mediatorship, and dissolved the Trinity. In response, the Council of Nicea (325 A.D.) affirmed the full divinity of Christ.

Apollinaris and the soul of Jesus. Nicea secured the full divinity of Jesus Christ but left unresolved the problem of the relationship between the divine and the human in him. This problem came to the fore with APOLLINARIS, bishop of Laodicea and a staunch defender of Nicea in the confusing period that followed that council. Though a resolute anti-Arian, Apollinaris nevertheless borrowed some elements of Arius’s teaching to formulate a theory of the Incarnation that would exclude from Jesus the presence of a human soul. His motives were beyond reproach. Utterly convinced of Christ’s true and complete divinity, Apollinaris reasoned that if Christ were to be one, He could not simultaneously possess a true and complete humanity. Two wholes, Apollinaris contended, cannot form one whole; two beings already perfect, God and man, cannot coalesce into unity. To ensure ontic unity in Jesus, therefore, the divinity and humanity must be thought of as complementing each other, one component contributing what the other is incapable of supplying. Hence Apollinaris theorized that the Word took a human body without a human soul, and that in Christ the Word substituted for the spiritual soul. The Incarnation, therefore, is adequately described as the union of the Word with living flesh.

These metaphysical reasonings seemed to find confirmation in the necessity of postulating in Christ total sinlessness and utter conformity to the divine will. If a human intellect and a human will were to be permitted to Christ, He could not be denied freedom of decision, and consequently there would be grave risk of His escaping, so to speak, the divine control. Made dependent on the good will of Jesus’ humanity, the divine plan for the Redemption of the human race might have gone awry if a humanly free Jesus had refused to cooperate. To safeguard Christ’s ethical goodness and to ensure the certainty of Redemption, therefore, Apollinaris argued that Christ was subject to transience only in His organic material being. His spiritual thinking and willing, on the contrary, were unalterable, for they were divine. He had but a single intellect, a single will, a single consciousness, and these were His deity. Thus Christ was a “heavenly human” insofar as He derived His flesh from Mary, but His thinking and willing He possessed from eternity.

Despite its good intentions, Apollinaris’ position rendered Christ less than human by denying him a spiritual, rational, immortal soul. On this position, the Incarnation and redemption were drained of relevance. If Christ had no human soul, he was not like us. An alien to the human race, he could be neither the exemplar of humankind nor the model of every virtue. If he assumed no human soul, his presence among us could not redeem, purify, and divinize our human souls. This was the line of criticism set down tirelessly by the Cappadocian Fathers.

“Christ Converses with Nicodemus.” (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS [Epistulae 101; Patrologia Graeca 37:182–183] expressed this argument succinctly in a letter to Cleodius against Apollinaris.

An official condemnation was pronounced at the Synod of Rome in A.D. 382 under Pope Damasus I: “We condemn those who claim that in his human flesh the Word of God dwelt in place of a rational and intellectual soul. Rather, instead of substituting for a rational and intellectual soul, the Word and Son of God Himself assumed and thereby saved a soul like ours (that is, a rational and intellectual soul) but without sin” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 159). Apollinarianism was also condemned by name at the Ecumenical Council at Constantinople in A.D. 381.

At the close of the fourth century. In the closing years of the fourth century, the elements of the christological problem proper were in place. Against the Docetists, the Church had established the reality of Christ’s flesh; against Arius, his full divinity; and, in opposition to Apollinaris, his possession of a truly human soul. Implicit in these affirmations was a notice that however the union of God and humankind in Jesus was to be understood, no solution involving either a dilution of his humanity or a dissipation of his divinity was to be accepted. This insight, however, remained negative. The crucial question still remained: how was the union of divinity and humanity in Jesus to be positively understood. This was the intricate question that largely focused attention from the fifth to the seventh centuries. In summary, one may say that an answer was arrived at in three successive movements, each of which culminated in an ecumenical council: Ephesus, Chalcedon, and III CONSTANTINOPLE. These councils dealt in turn with the challenges of NESTORIANISM, MONOPHYSITISM, and MONOTHELITISM, seeking in each case to balance the conflicting views of the rival schools of thought in the Eastern church of the era, at Antioch and Alexandria.

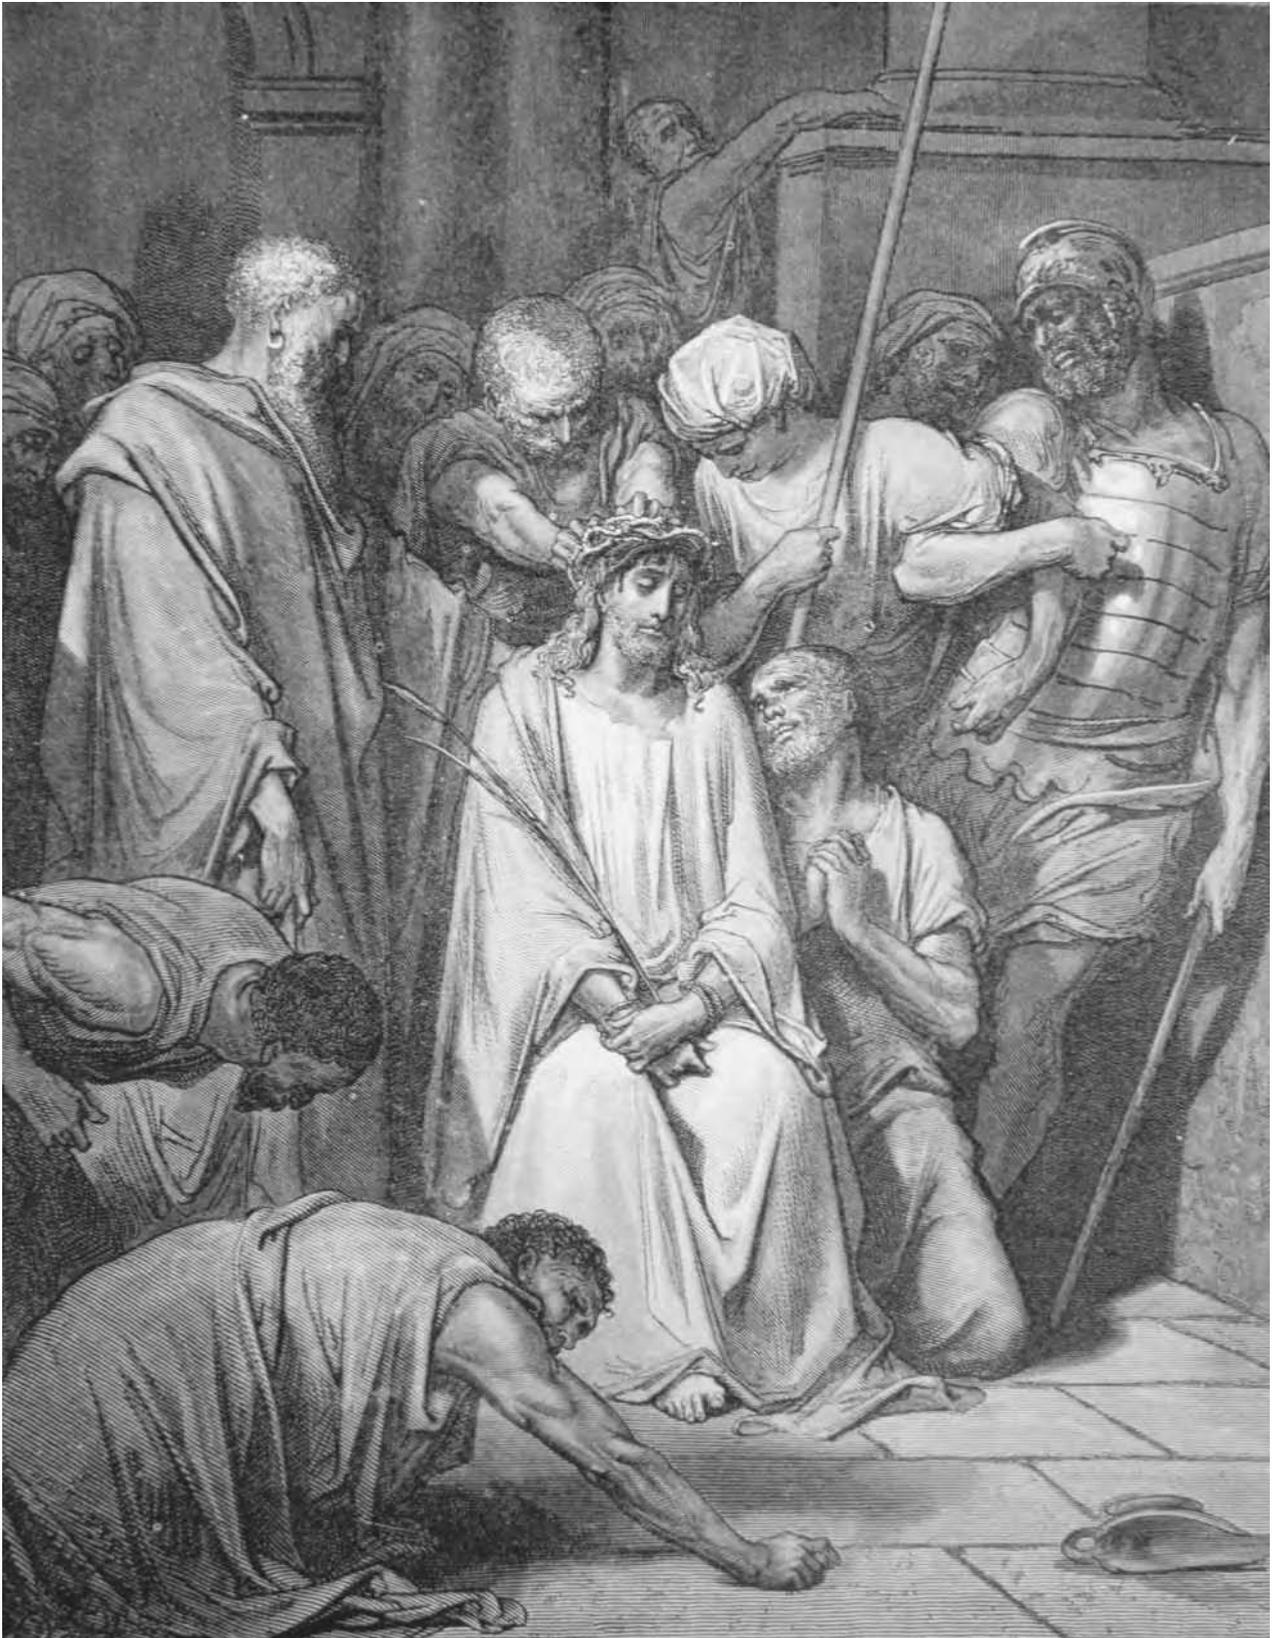

“Dead Christ” by Andrea Mantegna, 1466, Pinacoteca di Brera, Milan, Italy. (©Archivo Iconografico, S. A./CORBIS)

Theodore of Mopsuestia. Apollinarianism took Alexandrian theology to an extreme and drew a sharp reaction from the school of Antioch; the latter placed emphasis on the human nature of Christ. The two most important Antiochene theologians were DIODORUS OF TARSUS and his pupil THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA; only the latter’s thought has been amply preserved. Theodore objected strongly to the Alexandrian “Word-flesh” theology. He argued that if Christ were a divine nature imprisoned in a human body, then he would have been immune from all its weaknesses and defects, such as hunger, thirst, and fatigue, since these defects are not intrinsic to the body but come from imperfections of the soul that presides over it. Theodore concluded that the Word took not only a body but a complete human being, composed of a body and an immortal soul. As for the Apollinarian argument that the human soul is sinful, Theodore suggested that divine grace kept Christ’s soul free from all taint of sin. Hence Theodore of Mopsuestia’s scheme may be designated as a “Word-man” rather than a “Word-flesh” scheme. He proposes a human nature, complete and independent, that grows in knowledge and experience. He most often describes Christ in his earthly life as the “man assumed” by the Word. Though Theodore gives the impression of positing a duality between the Word and Christ, he rejects the idea of two Sons and argues that the distinction of natures does not prevent their being one individual.

Theodore’s chief weakness lay in accounting for the unity of Christ. His best effort appeals to the image of indwelling. The Word dwelt in the humanity as in a temple. In support of this he cites Jn 2.19, where Christ identifies his body with the Temple. Thus the God-man is a unity for Theodore. “The Son is unique,” he declares, “because of the perfect conjunction of natures operated by the divine will” (Hom. cat. 3.10; Studi e Testi 145:67). Again, “we point to difference of natures [physeis], but to unity of person [proson]” (De incarn. 11; Patrologia Graeca 66.983).

“The Crown of Thorns,” from the “The Bible,” engraving by Gustave Dore, 1866. (©Chris Hellier/CORBIS)

One hundred years after his death, the doctrine of Theodore of Mopsuestia was condemned by Pope Vigilius in 548, and by the Second Council of Constantinople in 553. These condemnations stemmed from events set in motion by Theodore’s pupil Nestorius.

Nestorius. In 427, Emperor Theodosius II elected NESTORIUS, a presbyter of Antioch, as patriarch of the imperial See of Constantinople. Nestorius promptly became embroiled in controversy. Being educated in the Antiochene school, which emphasized the distinction of the two natures in Christ, Nestorius protested against giving the Virgin Mary the title of THEOTOKOS, Mother of God. She should be called either “Mother of the man” or “Mother of Christ,” but not “Mother of God.” Nestorius strongly objected to attributing human properties to the Word, emphatically denying that the Word participated in the sufferings of Christ’s human nature. There was a union, but not a union of essence, between God and man. It was rather a “conjunction” which was described as “perfect,” “exact,” and “continuous.” “The man” was the temple in which “the God” dwelt.

The most remarkable feature of Nestorius’ teaching is his description of the two natures in the God-man as a single proson. By this term he seemed to have meant an individual considered from the point of view of his outward aspect or form. According to Nestorius, “It is Christ who is the proson of the union.” He took it for granted on philosophical grounds that for a nature to exist in reality, it had to possess a proson. Hence, the reality of the two natures in Christ demanded that each continue to exist in its own proson as well as in the “proson of union,” the latter resulting from the coalescence of the divine and human natures but identical with neither the proson of the Word nor that of the humanity.

Cyril of Alexandria. Nestorius found a bitter and brilliant opponent in CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA. In Cyril’s view, Nestorius’s attack on the title Theotokos for the Virgin Mary meant that Nestorius divided Christ into two, the divine Word and an ordinary human being who because of his moral excellence was favored with an exceptionally full indwelling of the Word. From Cyril’s viewpoint, Nestorius rendered the Incarnation an illusion and robbed Christ’s sufferings of redemptive significance.

None of this, modern scholars have recognized, was what Nestorius intended, but the Antiochene weakness in articulating the unity of Christ left him vulnerable to such a negative reading. Antiochene theology began with the concrete human being whom it confessed to be one with the divine Word; this theology has often been named an assumptus-homo theology for its emphasis on the human being whom the Word assumed as his own. Alexandrian theology, on the other hand, began with the divine Word who became human. The subject of this union is the divine self of the Logos. Even after the Incarnation, there is only one subject in Christ. This subject, the Word, assumed human nature physically and not through some moral act of the will. It follows that the actions of Christ as both God and human have one subject, the Logos. One can therefore legitimately say: “The Logos became human and suffered”; and also, in answer to the phrase over which the controversy began: “Mary is the Theotokos—the Mother of God.”

Cyril began his attack on Nestorius with a sharp exchange of letters. He also sent his account of Nestorius’s thinking to Pope Celestine, who called a synod at Rome that quickly decided against Nestorius. The pope entrusted Cyril with the task of calling Nestorius to order. Among the letters Cyril sent Nestorius was one that listed twelve propositions, provocative in language and unacceptable from an Antiochene perspective, to which Nestorius was to submit. Nestorius refused, and the Emperor Theodosius convened an Ecumenical Council at EPHESUS in 431. The proceedings of this council were highly irregular and confused. Taking advantage of the delay of the Antiochenes, Cyril had an assembly of bishops favorable to himself condemn Nestorius and canonize Cyril’s second letter to the latter, in which the phrase “Theotokos” occurred, as an official commentary on the faith of Nicea. When John of Antioch and his bishops finally arrived, they held a council of their own and condemned Cyril. Eventually the papal legates endorsed Cyril’s meeting, and thus Nestorius was condemned. After two years of mutual excommunication, the Antiochenes and Alexandrians were reunited through the acceptance by both sides of a creedal formula contained in a letter of John of Antioch to Cyril. The formula spoke of the “union of two natures” in “one proson,” while emphasizing the distinctness of the natures after the union. It also identified the subject in Christ as the eternal Word.

Monophysitism. Tension between the two schools erupted once again in 448, when Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, found the archimandrite EUTYCHES guilty of heresy. Eutyches refused to accept the creedal formula mutually agreed upon in 433 and stubbornly insisted on the phrase “after the union, one incarnate nature,” a phrase that he had received from Cyril and that had originated, unbeknownst to Cyril, with Apollinaris. While in Cyril’s usage the phrase simply meant that Christ was a single concrete individual, human and divine, Eutyches seemed to take it to mean that, though there were two natures before the Incarnation, after the Incarnation there was but one, the human being absorbed into the divine.

After his condemnation, Eutyches fled to Alexandria, where Dioscorus had succeeded Cyril as patriarch. Flavian reported the proceedings of the trial to Rome, and Pope Leo responded approvingly with a dogmatic letter known as the "Tome of Leo" in which he affirmed the completeness of each of Christ's two natures. Meanwhile, however, Dioscorus engineered a meeting in 449, which was subsequently known as the "Robber Synod of Ephesus." At this meeting, he refused to allow a reading of Leo's Tome, rehabilitated Eutyches, condemned Flavian on a technicality, and deposed other major Antiochene bishops from their sees.

Upon the accidental death of Emperor Theodosius, however, his sister Pulcheria assumed the throne, and she and her husband, Marcian, began undoing the mischief Dioscorus had wrought. In 451, with Pope Leo's reluctant consent, they convened the Fourth Ecumenical Council, first at Nicea and then closer to the capital at Chalcedon. The definition of faith at which this council eventually arrived marks a climax to the development of christological doctrine in the ancient church. Reiterating the creeds of both Nicea and I Constantinople, it confesses Christ as one and the same, complete in divinity and complete in humanity. Four times over it affirms this, balancing Nicea's confession of Christ's full divinity with an equally strong affirmation of his complete humanity: he is truly human, homoousios with us, composed of a rational soul and a body, like us in all things except sin. Summing up the two sets of attributes, divine and human, it predicates of the Son, the definition of faith introduces a technical term; he exists in two physeis (natures), and these are neither changed nor confused, nor are they divided or separated. Reaffirming Christ's unity, it states that these natures come together in one prosopon and one HYPOSTASIS or person.

Chalcedon thus articulated the dogma of the HYPOSTATIC UNION, the union of the two natures in the one person of Christ, and this dogma, with its terms of "substance," "person," and "nature," would come to provide subsequent Catholic christological reflection with its starting point, terms, and framework.

Monothelitism, adoptionism. Alexandrians interpreted Chalcedon as a victory for Nestorius and rejected it, and the eventual Monophysite schism proved to be permanent. Seeking reconciliation, Chalcedon's defenders stressed Chalcedon's compatibility with Cyril's thought, and this led to a condemnation of the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia and two other Antiochenes, Ibas of Edessa and Theodoret of Cyr, at II Constantinople in 553. Meanwhile the difficulties raised by Apollinaris regarding a possible conflict between the human and divine wills in Christ persisted, leading some to propose that there was in Christ a single energy (Monenergism) and, as Patriarch Sergius of Constantiople had it, only one will (Monothelitism). The Third Council of Constantinople, however, meeting in 681, rejected this Alexandrian view and drew out the implications of Chalcedon's two natures by affirming in Christ the existence of two natural operations and two wills. It thus reaffirmed that the union of the human nature with the divine subject in no way diminishes the fullness of Christ's humanity.

In the following century, an adoptionist position emerged briefly in Spain. Its proponents held that with respect to his human nature Jesus could only be regarded as God's adopted son, not his true Son. A synod in Frankfurt in 794 rejected this position and repeated that the human nature of Christ had its foundation in the divine subject, the Second Person of the Trinity. Thus concluded the formation of a body of classical patristic conciliar doctrine that proved a stable possession throughout the Middle Ages and beyond.

[W. P. LOEWE/J. J. WALSH]

Scholasticism, Medieval and Modern

Western Christendom in the Middle Ages saw the development of schools and eventually universities, and the latter provided the context for the flourishing of such theologians as THOMAS AQUINAS, BONAVENTURE, and DUNS SCOTUS. Anselm of Canterbury had identified their task as fides quaerens intellectum, faith seeking understanding. Taking classical doctrine developed in the patristic era as a given, the medieval doctors sought to develop a methodical, systematically ordered, metaphysically coherent account of its intelligibility. Not surprisingly, philosophical differences among them yielded differences in their accounts of Christ's inner constitution in the hypostatic union and of the perfections that accrued to his humanity because of it, namely, his holiness and fullness of grace, his sinlessness, freedom, and human knowledge. If it can be said that medieval theologians thus focused on what Christ is and what he has, post-Tridentine theologians then turned to a third point, what he wrought for our redemption, devoting their efforts to systematic understandings of Christ's satisfaction and merit. Soteriology thus emerged as a closely connected but separable sequel to christology.

Medieval issues. The most fundamental issue explored by medieval theologians was the inner constitution of Christ. They sought some a degree of understanding of how it was that the divine Person of the Word brings it about that two natures, human and divine, make up a substantial unity while each remains itself, wholly unchanged. On this issue, philosophical differences came forcefully into play. In Thomas Aquinas' position, there exists a real distinction between nature or essence, on the one hand, and existence on the other. A person is constituted when a particular kind of nature, namely, an intellectual nature, receives its own proper existence. Christ's human nature, however, lacked its own proper existence, and hence there was in him no human person. In its place was communicated an "existence of union," that is, a created participation in the proper existence of the divine Word. In this manner, Aquinas safeguarded the unity of Christ's person. Duns Scotus took another route to the same end. His philosophical background lay in the idealist tradition, and he denied the distinction of essence and existence. In his thought, to be a person consists in the negative attribute of a nature not being assumed by another subject. In Christ's case, since his human nature was assumed by the Word, there was no human person. The advantage of Thomas's solution lies in the intimate union it reveals between the human nature of Christ and the Second Person of the Trinity. The advantage of Duns Scotus's view is that it safeguards the fullness of Christ's humanity in every way. These, very briefly, are only two of many interpretations offered by theologians as they probed the central mystery of their faith in search of a richer and deeper understanding of the revelation of the living God. [See HYPOSTATIC UNION; PERSON (IN THEOLOGY); NATURE.]

Adoration. If Christ is both God and man, what should be one's religious posture with respect to him? In his ANATHEMAS drawn up before the Council of Ephesus, St. Cyril of Alexandria rejected the Nestorian notion of "co-veneration" of the man Jesus with the Logos. Cyril set it down as Catholic teaching that the Word-made-flesh was to be worshiped with a single ADORATION. This is based on Christ's own teaching recorded in John's Gospel, where He requires that the same worship be given to the Incarnate Son as to the Father: ". . . that all men may honor the Son even as they honor the Father" (Jn 5.23). Paul repeats this teaching when he writes to the Philippians "that at the name of Jesus every knee should bend of those in heaven, on earth and under the earth" (Phil 2.10).

Hence, Scripture and the Fathers make it quite clear that one should worship the God-man. But, another question can be asked: Can one worship the humanity of Christ? The humanity of Christ is a creature; it is not God. The medieval theologians, despite their differences on the question of the inner constitution of Christ, commonly held that the humanity of Christ is to be worshiped in itself though not for its own sake. The humanity of Christ, in such an act of worship, is the material object adored, but it is not the motive for the adoration. It is worshiped as the visible manifestation of the Second Person; and it is only the Second Person of the Trinity who is formally worshiped.

Christ's holiness, sinlessness, and freedom. A lack of common understanding of what was meant by sanctity led to controversy on Christ's holiness. Theologians in the Thomist line distinguished between substantial and accidental sanctity in the created order, while uncreated sanctity could be attributed to God alone. Created sanctity is defined as union of the creature with God. If this relationship is in the substantial order, as is true of Christ by virtue of the hypostatic union, then one can say that his humanity possesses substantial sanctity. Duns Scotus, however, seems to have understood substantial sanctity as identical to God's uncreated sanctity, and thus he rejected the Thomist position.

If Christ's substantial sanctity was a matter of dispute, his possession of accidental sanctity, that is, sanctifying grace, the reality by which a created human soul participates in the very nature of God, was not. (It is called "accidental" not in the sense that it could be lacking to Christ; that would be impossible; but in the sense that its principle is sanctifying grace, which, ontologically speaking, is an accident as opposed to a substance.) Taking their lead from John—"And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us . . . full of grace and truth. . . . And of his fullness we have all received, grace for grace" (Jn 1.14, 16)—theologians ascribed sanctifying grace in its fullness to the human soul of Christ. Though the human nature of Christ is holy by reason of its intimate relation to the Word, yet this does not give the human nature as such a share in the divine nature. As head of His Mystical Body, the Church, it is also fitting that Christ possess the fullness of the grace that flows to the members.

The negative side of Christ's holiness is his sinlessness. Scripture attests to this many times. "He did no sin; neither was deceit found in His mouth" (1 Pt 2.22). "For we have not a high priest who cannot have compassion on our infirmities, but one tried as we are in all things except sin" (Heb 4.15). And Jesus Himself challenges His enemies: "Which of you can convict me of sin?" (Jn 8.46). Chalcedon had taught that he is "like us in all things except sin," and the Council of Florence (1442) taught that he "was conceived, was born, and died without sin" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1347). Besides the fact of Christ's sinlessness, it was also commonly taught that he was absolutely incapable of sinning. This followed from the hypostatic union. All actions are attributable to the person, and in the case of Christ, the person is the divine Word, making it inconceivable that he could sin. It followed further that being impeccable, Christ was also free from concupiscence, the human inclination to sin, since this is the result of original sin.

If Christ was incapable of sinning, the question then arose, how was this compatible with his human freedom? The solution that would concede only one will in Christ had been rejected at the third Council of Constantinople in 680. This solemn definition posited two really distinct, physically free wills in Christ. In this it merely confirmed what is implied in Scripture where Christ prays in His agony: “Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass away from me; yet not as I will, but as thou wilt” (Mt 26.39; cf. Lk 22.42). Again, in John’s Gospel one finds Christ saying: “For I have come down from heaven, not to do my own will, but the will of Him who sent me” (Jn 6.38). Here the path to an answer lay through analysis of the concept of freedom. Freedom of choice is intrinsic to the earthly human condition, but the choice of evil is an abuse of that freedom. Hence being incapable of choosing evil rendered Christ free in a more basic sense, in that he enjoyed perfectly and without hindrance the freedom to achieve the destiny and fulfillment for which human-kind is made, union with God.

Christ’s human knowledge. Medieval theologians attributed three kinds of human knowledge to Christ. The Gospels say that Jesus “advanced in wisdom” (Lk 2.52). The Epistle to the Hebrews states that Jesus “learned obedience from the things that he suffered” (Heb 5.8). At face value, these texts say that Jesus did experience a definite progression in learning. Aquinas affirmed that, like all human beings, Christ acquired ordinary experiential knowledge. This was the kind of knowledge by which he came to know the world around him and the society of his day as he grew up. The Franciscans Bonaventure and Duns Scotus, and later the Jesuit Suarez, denied this kind of knowledge in Christ, since they thought it superfluous in light of the other sources of human knowledge he enjoyed.

Second, Aquinas and his contemporaries attributed infused human knowledge to Christ. This was a knowledge not acquired through ordinary sense experience but directly implanted or poured in by God. This seems to have first been proposed by Alexander of Hales (d. 1245). Thomas argued to this kind of knowledge on the basis of the principle that Christ’s humanity must be as perfect as possible, to which was added the consideration that as redeemer, Christ ought to have been equipped with the knowledge that would facilitate his mission. Thus it was fitting, for example, that he be able to predict the future.

Third, it was taught that from the moment of his conception, Christ enjoyed the BEATIFIC VISION, that face-to-face knowledge of God otherwise reserved for the saints in heaven that constitutes ultimate fulfillment and happiness for human beings. That Christ had such knowledge is perhaps implied in such texts from the Scriptures as: “Not that anyone has seen the Father except him who is from God; he has seen the Father” (Jn 6.46). “I speak what I have seen with my Father” (Jn 8.38). And Jesus prays at the Last Supper: “Just Father, the world has not known thee, but I have known thee” (Jn 17.25). Although the Fathers of the Church apparently did not consider the question as such, they did frequently write of the perfection of Christ’s knowledge. Moreover, it was taught that it was precisely through the Beatific Vision as knowledge of the Triune God that Christ humanly knew his divine identity as the Second Person. Obvious questions arose: how was this possession of the Beatific Vision to be reconciled with the ignorance implied in Christ’s growth in experiential knowledge? And how was it to be reconciled with the reality of Christ’s suffering in the Passion? With regard to the first, recourse was had to the limited character of the Beatific Vision. Christ’s human intellect is a created thing and therefore finite. It could not possibly comprehend God to the extent that God comprehends Himself. Jesus, in His human intellect, does not grasp God totally and at once in a single act. This is a limitation common to all created intellects enjoying the beatific vision. Furthermore, it was held that the vision of God is nonconceptual. It is not knowledge that is expressed in what we now know as concepts. Hence it does not remove the possibility of knowledge coming from sense experience. Sense experience may well be the means of conceptualizing discursively what is grasped in the Beatific Vision. To this problem and to the difficulties offered by indications of certain ignorances in Jesus revealed in the Gospels, Duns Scotus suggested that Jesus’ knowledge from the vision of God was potential knowledge. By way of contemplation He would realize this potential knowledge when His Father’s will required it.

With regard to the question of the reality of Christ’s suffering, Thomas made a distinction between the soul considered according to its essence and the soul considered according to its parts and powers. Thus Christ would have enjoyed the Beatific Vision in the essence of his soul even while suffering the Passion in his soul’s parts and powers.

Modern manuals. Late in the 19th century, Jesuits of the Roman school sought a return to medieval scholasticism as an antidote to modernity’s turn to the subject, and Pope Leo XIII commended Thomas Aquinas as the model for Catholic theology. In this context, the neoscholastic manual of christology, modeled after a tract composed by the Jesuit Cardinal Franzelin, came into common usage and dominated Catholic clerical education until shortly after Vatican II. Catholic seminarians marched through a logically ordered sequence of courses. Fundamental theology established that Christ was from God and had established the Catholic Church, so that whatever the Church taught was to be believed. A course on the one God (De Deo Uno) established the existence of God and God's general attributes. There followed a course on the Trinity (De Deo Trino), and then the course on christology (De Verbo Incarnato).

In one fundamental way, these neoscholastic tracts differed from their medieval antecedents. The basic unit of a medieval Summa was the quaestio, and the goal was enhanced understanding of the truths of faith. The basic unit of the manual, however, was the thesis; its goal was certitude, and the path to certitude lay through proving the thesis. The proof in turn often consisted in an appeal to authority, be the authority that of a council or of Scripture.

The course on christology commonly fell into three parts. First, since the triune character of God had already been established, the first issue to arise was how it was possible for the divine Second Person to become incarnate. In response, one worked out the metaphysics of person and nature as elements in the hypostatic union. Second, the ramifications for Christ's human nature of being assumed by a divine Person were deduced in terms of his human intellect (experiential and infused knowledge and the Beatific Vision) and his will (impeccability, freedom, fullness of grace). Third, an account of how the agent of redemption, thus equipped, performed his task was offered, generally with some version of satisfaction theory, sometimes with a fuller treatment of Christ's triple office as prophet, priest, and king.

Within this neoscholastic context old debates resurfaced, a new question suggested itself, and hesitations about traditional positions developed. As for old debates, medieval theologians had split on the question of the primary purpose of the Incarnation. Rupert of Deutz had been the first to assert that the Word would have become incarnate even if Adam had not sinned. Thomas Aquinas prudently disagreed. For him, scripture indicated that as a matter of fact Christ had come to redeem the human race, and regarding what might have otherwise occurred we have no data on the basis of which to speculate. Scotus, however, taught the opposite, positing the glorification of Christ as the primary purpose of the Incarnation. Thus the party lines were set for succeeding generations. The issue arose again in modern times with the publication in 1867 by a French Capuchin of a dissertation defending the Thomist view, and debate continued into the twentieth century along traditional lines, while a version of the Scotist view would live on beyond the demise of neoscholasticism in the theology of Karl Rahner.

An even more ancient debate revived when a new question came to be entertained. Scholastic theology was metaphysical in its treatment of person, natures, operations, and wills. It was settled doctrine that in Christ there was one person in whom were joined two natures, two operations, and two wills. But modern culture posed a new question: what did all this mean psychologically, in terms of Christ's consciousness? One approach, suggested by Déodat de Basly, revived the Antiochene theology of the assumed humanity, positing a fully human psychological ego in Christ. It followed that Christ humanly knew himself to be divine only through the Beatific Vision. On the other hand, the Alexandrian emphasis on the Word as subject of all Christ's activities found expression in those theologians who posited that the divine Word experienced himself humanly in all his conscious human acts. Yet proponents of this position disagreed philosophically among themselves on the meaning of consciousness and its relation to reflective knowledge.

Misgivings arose among neoscholastic theologians regarding the scope of human knowledge traditionally ascribed to Christ. Thomas had defended the role of experiential, acquired knowledge in Christ against those who found it superfluous because of the infused knowledge and Beatific Vision that he enjoyed. In conceiving Christ's knowledge, however, Thomas appealed to a principle of perfection: as the humanity of the Son of God, Christ's humanity ought to enjoy every perfection possible. It followed from this principle, for Thomas, that Christ knew all that could be known, that no ignorance could be ascribed to Christ, and that he did not learn from other people. Indeed, Christ freely assumed only those human weaknesses necessary for his redemptive passion and death, while from other defects, such as susceptibility to disease, he was free. Later commentators followed up on Thomas with claims that during his lifetime Christ already knew modern mathematics, science, and languages. Others, however, reacted against such exaggerations by setting reasonable limits to his human knowledge. They allowed as infused only that knowledge necessary to his mission, and they acknowledged in Christ an experiential knowledge fully subject to the conditions of the time and place in which he lived.

Paradigm shift. The year 1951 marked the fifteenth-hundredth anniversary of the Council of Chalcedon. The scholarship generated by that occasion marked a turning point in Catholic christology. What became clear first of all was a gap between the dogma of Chalcedon and the christology of the neoscholastic manuals. Chalcedon unambiguously affirmed the full humanity of Jesus. The manuals, however, as well as their medieval antecedents, exhibited a "neochalcedonianism" hearkening back to the period directly after Chalcedon when Alexandrian emphases in interpreting that dogma had prevailed.

A number of critiques of the neoscholastic manuals of christology began to be voiced. With regard to method, the question was raised whether the “high, descending” approach that simply and unproblematically took the divinity of Christ, the Son of God and Second Person of the Trinity, as its starting point was not inappropriate to a cultural situation in which the very existence of God was no longer self-evident. Was there not a need to render some account of how belief in Christ’s divinity had arisen and developed, rather than simply taking that belief as given? With regard to content, the manuals were found to have narrowed the christology of Thomas Aquinas and other medieval scholastics. Whereas Thomas pursued a full exploration of the New Testament narrative of the various mysteries of the life of Christ, the manuals were content to deal with Christ’s humanity under the abstract metaphysical rubric of nature. The manuals thus presented a christology that took no account of the specific shape and events of Jesus’ life, of how his life issued in his crucifixion, or of his resurrection. Finally, besides what the manuals took for granted and what they omitted, a problem of language was noted. Simple repetition of the terminology of “one divine person in two natures” in an age which had come to construe the notion of person psychologically rather than metaphysically engendered on the popular level what Karl Rahner called a “cryptomonophysitism.” People faithfully recited the orthodox formula, but they tended to imagine Jesus in docetic or Apollinarian fashion as a historical figure whose consciousness was divine though his outward form was human, so that he obviously was capable of reading minds, predicting the future, and exercising miraculous powers over nature.

Precisely out of faithfulness to Chalcedon, Catholic christology set about recovering the full humanity of Christ. In the 1950s and 1960s, this movement operated on two fronts, the one philosophical and the other biblical. Karl Rahner, for example, drew upon his contemporary reinterpretation of Thomism to forge a theological anthropology capable of dispelling any crudely mythological understanding of the Incarnation. On his view, the hypostatic union effected the supreme and gracious fulfillment of the universal call to self-transcendence into the holy mystery of God that constitutes humanity as such. Similar philosophical resources enabled Bernard Lonergan to meet the difficulties attending the traditional language of a single divine, and hence not human, person in Christ. Transposing the Chalcedonian terms into the realm of human interiority, he showed how the Chalcedonian formula calls for a full, free, and developing human subjectivity in Jesus coherent with the contemporary, psychologically informed understanding of what it means to be human. Meanwhile, on the biblical front, exegetes began to highlight in the gospel portraits of Christ precisely those human features—ignorance, sorrow, anger, weariness, and the like—which the dogmatic textbooks with their principle of perfection had tended to explain away.

Meanwhile, scholarly developments in other fields were making ever more evident the inadequacies and poverty of the neoscholastic manuals. In France “la nouvelle théologie” had set about recovering the riches of patristic theology. Burgeoning liturgical scholarship was restoring the centrality of Christ’s Paschal Mystery to Christian sacramental life and spirituality. The 1964 Instruction of the Pontifical Biblical Commission marked the full emancipation of Catholic biblical scholars, and within a short time they had joined the forefront of their field. Their practice of source, form, and redaction criticism rendered available the prehistory and variety of New Testament christologies, while newer sociological and literary methods of analysis and interpretation facilitated the appropriation of those christologies in the contemporary church.

If the project of recovering the full humanity of Jesus began as a self-corrective movement within the paradigm of the neoscholastic manual christology, that wineskin burst when, in the mid-1970s, Catholic theologians as diverse as Walter Kasper, Hans Küng, and Edward Schillebeeckx began drawing on the results of the so-called New Quest for the Historical Jesus, a project initiated in the 1950s among German Protestant exegetes trained by Rudolf Bultmann. With this development, the ahistorical classicism of the manuals yielded fully to the historical consciousness of modernity.

This profound shift in horizon bestowed a new shape on Catholic christologies. Whereas the christology of the manuals was basically commentary on Chalcedon, the new christologies offer a genetic and evaluative account of the entire christological tradition with a view toward mediating the revelatory and redemptive import of Jesus Christ into the contemporary situation. Very often they begin with the question of the historical Jesus, offering some account of what can be known of Jesus’ earthly career by historical means and taking a position on the theological significance of these historical data. Proceeding next to Jesus’ resurrection, they take a position on the nature and knowability of this event and of its significance both in relation to Jesus’ life and death and to such anthropological constants as human hope and the quest for meaning. Having secured the factors accounting for the genesis of Christian faith, namely, Jesus’ earthly career remembered in light of his resurrection, the new christologies survey the development and diversity of the christologies of the New Testament and then proceed to reconstruct the development of the classical dogmas of the patristic era.

Within this new christological paradigm, the dogmas of the patristic councils find themselves relocated as particular moments within the ongoing tradition, normative moments to be sure, but no longer defining the entire christological enterprise. Thus relocated, classical dogma requires interpretation, while that interpretation in turn comprises only one task within a more broadly conceived christological project. It should be noted that in the post-neoscholastic situation there exists a pluralism of philosophical foundations and methodological options among theologians. These come into play in the new christologies to render the meaning and significance of classical dogma a less than secure possession. Specifically, one not uncommonly finds the formulae of both Nicea and Chalcedon interpreted as confessions of the unique presence of God in the man Jesus, a line of interpretation which some find helpful in relation to other issues posed by contemporary culture, while others regard it as regressive to a pre-Nicene stage of development if not an outright denial of classical dogma.

The first task of the new christologies as we have been surveying them is retrospective, a critical determination of what the tradition has been in the past. Next, having reviewed the tradition, they face a second major task as a further question arises. Given what the tradition has been, what should the christological tradition be in the present? At this point, as theologians seek to discover and articulate what it means for God's salvation to be mediated through Jesus Christ here and now, soteriology rejoins christology.

As the church recognizes inculturation as necessary to its self-constitution, the variety of cultural and social contexts that concretely determine the present situation comes to the forefront. Within this variety, each specific context presents its own conditions for both the intelligibility of the gospel and for the significance of its saving message. Sin and redemption are concrete realities, and their shape varies among cultures and societies. For this reason also contemporary christologies exhibit a pluralistic character.

Bibliography: O. CULLMANN, The Christology of the New Testament, tr. S. C. GUTHRIE and C. A. M. HALL (rev. ed. Philadelphia, Pa. 1963). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Christ the Savior, tr. B. ROSE (St. Louis, Mo. 1950). R. GUARDINI, The Lord, tr. E. C. BRIEFS (Chicago, Ill. 1954). M. J. SCHEEBEN, The Mysteries of Christianity, tr. C. VOLLERT (St. Louis, Mo. 1946), esp. 313–465. P. FREDRIKSEN, From Jesus to Christ: The Origins of the New Testament Images of Jesus (New Haven, Conn. 1988). A. GRILLMEIER, Christ in Christian Tradition, v. 1, From the Apostolic Age to Chalcedon (451),

tr. J. BOWKER (2d ed., rev. Atlanta, Ga. 1975). B. STUDER, Trinity and Incarnation: The Faith of the Early Church, tr. M. WESTERHOFF, ed. A. LOUTH (Collegeville, Minn. 1993). L. D. DAVIS, The First Seven Ecumenical Councils (325–787): Their History and Theology (Collegeville, Minn. 1983). B. LONERGAN, The Way to Nicea: The Dialectical Development of Trinitarian Theology, tr. C. O'DONOVAN (Philadelphia, Pa. 1976). K. RAHNER, "Current Issues in Christology," Theological Investigations 1, tr. C. ERNST (Baltimore, Md. 1961) 149–200. W. KASPER, Jesus The Christ, tr. V. GREEN (New York 1976). H. KÜNG, On Being a Christian, tr. E. QUINN (Garden City, N.Y. 1976). E. SCHILLEBEECKX, Jesus: An Experiment in Christology, tr. H. HOSKINS (New York 1979).

[W. P. LOEWE/J. J. WALSH]

Special Questions

Theology has a number of foci of special interest in its study of Jesus Christ and His work. Certain of these, although they may have been treated in the historical portion of this article and elsewhere, receive specific treatment here.

1. BEATIFIC VISION

The human knowledge of Christ includes the beatific, or intuitive, vision of God. This is today common and certain doctrine. See the decree of the Holy Office, June 5, 1918 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3645–46), and Pius XII, Mystici Corporis Christi in Acta Apostolicae Sedis 76 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3812). Both scholastic theologians of the past and modern theologians teach that Christ in His humanity (i.e., in His human intellect, from the very first instant of the Incarnation) had the immediate vision of God. The main difficulty lies in explaining the coexistence in Christ of the vision and His Passion.

The fact of Christ's vision of God may not be explicitly stated in Scripture, but a solid foundation for a theological proof is found in Jn 1.18 and 3.11, and in Mt 11.27. Christ had a knowledge of the Father that no one else ever had, not even Moses (see, e.g., Ex 24.9–11) or Isaiah (Is 6.1–5). The Fathers, however, do not give any unambiguous statement of Christ's vision of God, except, no doubt, St. Augustine, in an indirect way, when saying that He is the only one who saw God when in the flesh (Divers. quaest. 60; Patrologia Latina 40:60).

The theological reason is mainly twofold: Christ's mission and the HYPOSTATIC UNION. He was to be, as man, the revealer of the Father; this function, which He discharged in His human nature, supposes that He knew the Father by His human (not only by His divine) knowledge (see St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 3a, 9.1 ad 1). As the head and fountain of all grace, He had to have the fullness of grace, including the vision (ibid. 3a, 9.2). Yet the reason is not cogent. His function as revealer did not require that He have the vision from the first instant of the Incarnation; nor is the vision expressible in human concepts and terms and so does not serve immediately for that function. Furthermore, only in the fullness of His glory is Christ the source of glory for His members.

Perhaps more stringent is the proof from the hypostatic union: the two, hypostatic union and vision, of necessity go together. The scholastics of former times said so on the basis of the principle of perfection: Christ must have had all the time all perfections He could have, including the vision. Modern theologians introduce into the argument a new element drawn from the psychology of Christ. Christ's self-awareness as a Divine Person in His human nature includes the beatific, or immediate, vision of God. Here again there is a twofold approach in conceiving the connection between His self-awareness and the beatific vision. One starts from the vision and shows that only in the vision Christ-man sees that He is, as He always was, the eternal Son of the Father (cf. H. Bouëssé). Another takes its starting point in Christ's self-awareness: He knows, as is clear from the Gospels, that He and the Father are one (Jn 10.30): He is aware of being God. In this very self-awareness He is aware of the Father and of the Spirit: He has an immediate vision of God (cf. K. Rahner).

Here, Rahner insists, one has some clue to the difficulty, or the mystery, of Christ being both viator and comprehensor, not being exempt from suffering though having the vision. His vision of God is identical with His self-awareness as Son of God, i.e., it is the awareness of Himself as subject, not as object. That is why, Rahner suggests, this intuitive vision of God can be immediate without being beatific. This explanation seems simpler than the more common one, namely, that it is by a special dispensation, a sort of permanent miracle, demanded by Christ's mission to save men by His Passion and death (and Resurrection), that the glory of the vision did not all the time transform and beatify His humanity, as it did at the Transfiguration.

Christ's vision of God, it is common teaching, was not comprehensive with regard to its primary object, the divine essence; it was limited because it was human. Nor did it extend, as to its secondary objects, to all that the divine knowledge comprehends, but only to what pertains to the object of God's vision-knowledge (scientia visionis), not to the object of the knowledge of simple understanding (simplicis intelligentiae); and here it extends particularly, if not exclusively, to all that pertains to His mission and men's salvation.

See Also: BEATIFIC VISION, 6, 7; JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:1273–74; 14.2:1651–53. Ibid. Tables générales 2:2583–86, 2650–54. K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:955; in H. VORGRIMLER, Dogmatic versus Biblical Theology (London 1964) 241–267. C. CHOPIN, Le Verbe incarné et rédempteur (Tournai 1963) 98–100. J. GALOT, Nouvelle revue théologique 70 (1960) 648–649.

[P. DE LETTER]

2. DEATH

Christ came to save all men from sin and its consequences through His Passion, death, and Resurrection: this is the faith one professes in the Credo. Death, a violent death, the death of the cross, was an essential part of His redemptive mission. To be considered are the fact and the manner, the reason and meaning, and various aspects of Christ's death, in the plan of salvation.

Fact. The gospel, the New Testament, and the early Christian tradition bear witness to the fact that Christ actually suffered and died (and rose again from death). Historically His Passion and death came about through the opposition of the Jewish leaders of the time to His spiritual messianic mission—their opposition and rejection of the God-Man symbolizing the rejection of the Holy One of God by sinful mankind. With the Fathers of the Church, one may see here how God's providence allows the wickedness of men and uses it as a way toward the fulfillment of His designs. Even so, the death of Christ is not only a historical fact but also a mystery.

Manner. Death was not for Christ, as it is for other men, a natural necessity and a penal consequence of sin. He, the Sinless One, was not bound by the law of death that in the present divine economy is for men a sequel to sin (cf. Rom 5.12). His hypostatic union and beatific vision well might have, perhaps should have, excluded for Him the possibility of dying (freely); but for the purpose of men's Redemption, He took a passible and mortal human nature so as to be able to suffer and die for men. Why did the way of men's salvation decreed by the Father include the death of Our Savior (when apparently it could have been accomplished otherwise)? Because of the very meaning and purpose of His redemptive mission.

Reason. Christ came, as second Adam and new head of the human race, summing up in Himself men's entire history, to restore what was lost by the first Adam (cf. Rom ch. 5). The fall of men in Adam meant the loss of the life of grace and of the original gifts that were to be its sacramental sign—freedom from CONCUPISCENCE and from death. With sin, death and disorder entered into the world. Fallen man could not redeem himself, yet for the honor of mankind no less than for His own glory God willed—according to what theologians call the principle of immanent reparation—that one of the human race should offer condign satisfaction for sin. Only through the insertion into human history of the Son of God made man could one of the race make good what Adam undid. In that manner, St. Thomas says, the Incarnation was “necessary” for men’s Redemption (Comp. theol. 200). Christ came and freely took upon Himself the penalty of sin—death and suffering—and by so doing He made satisfaction for the sin of man. Being God and man, He could do what only a man can do: suffer and die; and do what only God can do: have a hold on and restore the whole of our human nature and race. (No single merely human individual could do so; if Adam could so act, for the worse, it was because he happened to be the head of the race.) By the very fact of His Passion and death, Christ restored to men’s nature the lost gifts, including freedom from death, and so worked men’s Redemption. By dying He killed death. He rose from the dead, and so shall we.

Meaning. This basic concept of traditional and contemporary SOTERIOLOGY, expressed here after the teaching of St. Thomas (cf. Comp. theol. 227–230), manifests the meaning of Christ’s violent death on the cross. He suffered and died in order to “repair” our fallen nature, by freely taking upon Himself the penalty of sin. He died a violent death because in our fallen race reparation of sin implies suffering unto death, and because, as theologians say, on account of the perfect harmony of His humanity, suffering and death could come to Him only from external violence. He died the death of the cross of His own free will (though His human nature shrank from it; cf. Mt 26.39) in obedience to the Father’s plan of salvation and out of love for men. His death freely accepted led to a life of glory; it was a paschal mystery, a passage to life. It was also the highest revelation of God’s love: by dying out of love for sinful men, Christ gave them the highest proof of love a man can give (cf. Jn 15.13) and so told them, not in words but in deeds, that God is love (1 Jn 4.8).

Various aspects. The complex richness of the mystery of Christ’s death is proposed in the various theologies of the Redemption systematizing the teaching of the Church and that of Scripture and tradition. These are complementary, as it were, so many of its facets. Christ’s death on the cross meant condign satisfaction for the sins of mankind: the offer to God of a more precious gift and greater glory than had been rejected by the offense of sin. By dying freely, out of love for God and men, Christ merited our Redemption and all graces included in it, removing the obstacle to grace that is sin. He expiated our sins by freely taking up suffering and death; He bore our sins, not by substituting for us sinners, but by doing on our behalf, as the new head of the race, what no one else could do, viz, offer vicarious satisfaction. He thus liberated us from the slavery of sin and of the prince of this world, setting us free from sin and death, turning our own death into a sharing in His paschal mystery. By restoring grace and with it the pledge of all the original gifts, He repaired our fallen human nature and so reconciled us with the Father. His death was the sacrifice offered in expiation and reconciliation; it was the visible and effective sacrament of our reunion with and rededication to God, the efficacious sign of our restoration to grace, its acceptance being sanctioned in His Resurrection. The paschal mystery of Christ’s death and Resurrection is made permanent in both the heavenly liturgy (cf. Heb 7.24–25) and in the memorial of the Passion and Resurrection that is the Eucharistic Sacrifice. It equally reveals the transformation of death for those who die in Christ: Christian death is no longer a mere natural necessity or a penalty of sin; it is a means of satisfying for sin and the way to enter upon glory. Both Christ’s death and that of the Christian are inconceivable without the Resurrection.

See Also: CRUCIFIXION, THEOLOGICAL SIGNIFICANCE OF; DEATH (THEOLOGY OF); EXPIATION (IN THEOLOGY); REDEMPTION (THEOLOGY OF); REPARATION; RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, 2; SACRIFICE OF THE CROSS; SATISFACTION OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: J. LEBRETON, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT (Paris 1928) 4:1045–62. K. RAHNER, On the Theology of Death, tr. C. D. HENKEY (Quaestiones disputatae 2; New York 1961). F. BOURASSA, Sciences ecclésiastiques 15 (1963) 351–381. R. FEUILLET, Revue biblique 66 (1959) 481–513. L. MALEVEZ, Revue du clergé africain 18 (1963) 3–26.

[P. DE LETTER]

3. DIVINITY

Christ’s divinity is in a true sense the basis of the Christian faith: with it stands or falls the religion named after Him. Of this central mystery this article (1) states the meaning as expressed in the Credo, (2) sketches the growth in the awareness of the Church, from Scripture to Credo, and (3) indicates the bearing on Christ’s mission and men’s salvation.

Meaning of the faith. When the Catholic Church confesses that Jesus Christ is God, it states a mystery beyond men’s comprehension, yet it knows definitely what it means and does not mean to say. Christ is truly God: He is not a divinized or heavenly creature, as Gnostics said; or the first and greatest of God’s creatures, Word of God, as Arius held; or a God subordinate to the Father, as Semi-Arians said. He is not a man adopted as son of God, however unique and excellent adoptionists fancied His adoption to be. He is not a mere man, God’s minister of salvation, as Socinians and Unitarians felt compelled to say. Nor is the Jesus of history different from the Christ of faith, a man made into God by a process of APOTHEOSIS, as Modernists and liberals once said and the demythologizers of the New Testament say today. The Church repudiates all such attempts at eluding the mystery, as it also discarded the view of ancient modalists, who, misunderstanding the Trinity, believed that Christ is not only consubstantial but identical with the Father.

The Church believes that Jesus Christ is true God, Son of God made man, the Second Person of the Trinity, who took unto Himself a human nature and so exists not only in the divine but also in a human nature: one divine Person in two natures. The man who in His earthly life was known as Jesus of Nazareth was not a human person made one, as Nestorius said, in a unique way of moral unity, with the Person of the Son of God. He was God, Son of the Father, made man for men's salvation.

Reason and history are unable to prove the mystery as a fact. The eyewitnesses of Christ's life saw the man in Jesus but did not see God; they saw only signs, the miracles, and on the strength of them believed in the divine power He claimed. Historical evidence about Christ's life, death, and Resurrection can make His divinity reasonably acceptable or credible; it cannot prove it with logical stringency. To accept the divinity of Christ requires a free assent of faith assisted by the light of grace and justified before reason by guarantees of its truthfulness. Only so can one enter into the mystery of Christ's divinity. No wonder rationalism rejects it and endeavors to explain "rationally" the facts of the life of Christ and of the history of Christianity.

Growth of the faith. The starting point of the faith is Scripture, God's message of salvation to men. It may be doubted whether the Old Testament writers ever suspected that the Messiah, the Savior of men, was to be more than a man chosen and elected by the God of Israel for the salvation of His people. Even though they knew He was to be the Son of God, filled with His sevenfold spirit (Is 11.1–3), this need not mean nor could it have meant to the monotheists of Israel that He was God.

In the New Testament, the revelation of Christ's divinity was gradual, discreet, and mainly indirect. One never meets a blunt statement: Christ is God. It had to be so if that faith was to find entrance with the Jews. Christ's own testimony about Himself was explicit as to His being the Messiah and in continuity with the Old Testament expectation, though He repudiated a temporal messianic kingdom for a higher spiritual one. With regard to His divinity, His testimony was more implicit than explicit, more indirect than forthright. His works and miracles more than His words were to prove to men that He had divine power, even in another way than others had who worked miracles before. He meant to suggest that He had the power to forgive sins to the very people who thought that God alone forgives sins (Mt 9.6). In St. John's Gospel, Christ's testimony about His divinity is more definite, yet even here more indirect than plain. He never says in so many words, "I am God," but He says that He is one with the Father (Jn 10.30), a Son of God in a unique sense, in more than the messianic sense of the phrase (cf. Jn 5.18; 16.25–28; 20.17). He claims for Himself the prerogatives of the divine nature and confirms that claim in deeds. He has power over the Sabbath (Mk 2.28; 3.1–5), the power to give life (Jn 10.10), the power to judge (Jn 5.27). All power is given Him in heaven and on earth (Mt 28.18). He claims preexistence with God the Father from the beginning, before He came down to earth (Jn 8.58). He claims for Himself unity in being and power with the Father and mutual immanence with the Father (Jn 14.10). In men's religion He claims a central place, the same as that of God the Father; to believe in Him and to abide in Him means to believe and abide in God (cf. Jn 15.7–8). Thus in word and deed Jesus testified He was the Son of the Father equal with Him in divinity. How shocking this was to Jewish ears is apparent from their reaction. They understood His testimony in the way He intended it and accused Him of blasphemy. Nor did the disciples understand it in any other way, but they believed.

The Church of apostolic times shared the faith of the eyewitnesses of Christ's life, death, and Resurrection. The very titles of Yahweh and His attributes were given to Christ, Lord of all, and not merely Messiah (cf. Jn 20.28; Acts 10.36). Doxologies meant to be addressed to God alone were addressed also to Christ (cf. Rom 16.27). St. Paul is a witness to the faith in Christ's preexistence as the eternal Son of God, participating in the divine nature, though appearing among men in the form of a slave (Phil 2.6). If He nowhere explicitly calls Him God (except perhaps Rom 9.5), but only Lord and Savior, it was because to his mind God was synonymous with Father. More definite is St. John's intention of teaching that Christ Jesus is the Word incarnate: Word of God, true God, made flesh to dwell among us (Jn 1.1, 14). John is explicit about the Incarnation and the divinity of Christ. This faith of the Church is explicitly referred to Christ's testimony in word and deed—His life, death, and Resurrection.

When later the Church expressed its faith in Christ, inherited from the Apostles, it said in its Credo: "I believe in one Lord Jesus Christ, only begotten Son of God, born from the Father before all times . . . consubstantial with the Father . . . who for us men and our salvation . . . was incarnate by the Holy Spirit from the Virgin Mary, and became man" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 150). It could not say more explicitly that Jesus Christ is truly God, Son of God become man for men's salvation.

It was the task of the Fathers of the Church and of the early councils to formulate the mystery of Christ, true God and true man, in accurate and technical terms, the mystery of the INCARNATION and of the HYPOSTATIC UNION.

Christ's mission and men's salvation. The Son of God became man so that the sons of men might become sons of God (cf. St. Augustine, Epist. 140.3.9; Patrologia Latina 33:541). The Word was made flesh so that men might be deified (St. Athanasius, Inc. 54). These words express Christ's mission: He came for men's salvation and divinization. But unless He was truly God, the Fathers reason, He could not divinize men; nor would they become in Christ adoptive sons of God if He were not the true Son of God [cf. St. Athanasius, Adv. arian. 3.24; see É. Mersch, "Filii in Filio," Nouvelle revue théologique 65 (1938) 551–582, 681–702, 809–830].

Christ could not be men's Savior and the agent of their divinization unless He were the new head of the race, the second Adam, head of the Mystical Body, in which membership is through grace. He could not be such if He were a mere man. Only a God-Man, St. Thomas reasons, could remake fallen nature (cf. Comp. theol. 200) or take unto Himself the entire human race to make it into His Body (cf. Summa theologiae 3a, 7) and the new people of God. Thus the divinity of Christ is the ontological foundation both of His mission as men's Savior and of their salvation and deification as God's adopted sons.

Faith in Christ's divinity, then, is the cornerstone of the Christian faith. No doubt the mystery that the man Jesus is truly God baffles one's understanding. Yet, from the Church's teaching on this, faith and the work of its doctors seeking some understanding of that faith, one comes to have some insight into the mystery. The doctrine on Christ, or Christology, explains how the Divine Person of the Son of God subsists in two natures, divine and human, both of these unaltered and undiminished in the hypostatic union. Christ is true God and true man. And the Church's teaching on men's salvation in Christ, or soteriology, shows that only one of the human race who is truly God could, by immanent reparation, save men from the Fall and its consequences and divinize them so as to make them into sons of God by regenerating adoption. Men's faith in the divinity of Christ, therefore, is postulated by their faith in the history of their salvation through Him. Thus, for those who believe in Christ, the theology of Christ Our Savior shows that the mystery of His divinity, for all its exalted transcendence, in the context of the Christian faith stands to reason.

Bibliography: J. LEBRETON, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed., L. PIROT (Paris 1928) 4:1025–34. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de

théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:1172–1213. Ibid., Tables générales 2:2548–2655. K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:954. K. ADAM, The Son of God, tr. P. HEREFORD (London 1934). L. CERFAUX, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, tr. G. WEBB and A. WALKER (New York 1959). J. GUITTON, The Problem of Jesus, tr. A. G. SMITH (New York 1955). A. GEORGE, Revue biblique 72 (1965) 185–209.

[P. DE LETTER]

4. HUMANITY

Jesus Christ was truly man. His humanity is not only a fact of observation or of history; it is also a mystery of faith. Hence the twofold question: What do we believe of the humanity of Christ? What does this faith mean in Christology and soteriology?

We believe that Christ was (and is) a real and perfect man, one of the race of Adam. He had a real and complete human nature, including a real human body like ours, not only the appearance of a body, as Docetists and Manichees both in ancient and medieval times fancied. For them the flesh was evil. Nor was it a celestial body, whether ethereal, as the Gnostic Valentine said, or created in heaven by the Holy Spirit, as imagined by the Priscillianists (6th century) and the Anabaptists (16th century). Christ's humanity included a human soul like ours. The WORD did not take the place of His soul (as Arius said) or substitute for the "rational" soul (as Apollinaris held). His human nature was complete with all the potencies of the sense and bodily life, no less than with its human spiritual faculties of mind and will. (Monothelites excluded the latter.) He was born a real man from a human mother, the Virgin Mary, of Adam's race (but—a sign of the mystery—He was conceived and born miraculously). Thus He was consubstantial with us. Yet—and here lies the mystery of Christ's humanity—His human nature, perfect and complete, was not a human person distinct from the Divine Person of the Word, as Nestorius implied when he refused to call Mary the MOTHER OF GOD; it was the human nature of a Divine Person. This point of our faith enwraps the humanity of Christ in full mystery. The Son of God is this man known as Jesus of Nazareth.

The foundation of this faith lies in what the Gospels and other New Testament writings say of Christ's life and death (and Resurrection). Christ is presented there as an individual man, who was born and died, who lived a human life, felt hunger and thirst, loved and wept, prayed and obeyed. To His contemporaries these facts showed Jesus as a true man. This by itself may not exclude Docetism. But Christ said He came to die and give His life for our Redemption; were He not a true man, He would have been deceiving, not redeeming, us. His human life included true human knowledge and a human will distinct from the divine will. To interpret the facts of Christ's life and message in a Docetist sense, or in the sense of His having an incomplete human nature, would basically ruin the witness of the Gospels as reliable documents. Moreover, the place that the tradition of the Church gives to the humanity of Christ in its faith in Christ and the Redemption supposes faith in His real and complete humanity.

Faith in Christ, Son of God made man for our salvation, includes belief in His humanity. Our Redemption by His Passion, death, and Resurrection supposes that Christ's human nature was real and one like ours from the race of Adam. The Son of God became man that as man, by immanent reparation, He might restore our fallen nature. Redemption supposes that He took a complete human nature. "What was not taken on [by the Word] cannot be healed. . . ." (St. Gregory of Nazianzus, Epist. 101; Enchiridion patristicum 1018). In a word, unless Christ's humanity was real and complete, our Redemption could not be real and the restoration of our fallen nature complete.

Our faith in Christ, the God-Man, supposes that His humanity is not a human person (the mystery). For if it were, and if there were a duality of persons in Christ, then the Divine Person would not really be man but only united with a man; Christ would not be what our faith says He is. Theology may struggle to "explain" the hypostatic union and to show why His humanity is not a human person (see HYPOSTATIC UNION); it remains true that there is a mystery of Christ's humanity, real and complete and yet not a person, that is implied in our faith in the Incarnation.

Two consequences must be noted here. Christ as man is the natural, and not the adoptive, Son of God, because He is solely a Divine Person, not a human person. Christ's humanity is worthy of adoration, because it is the humanity of a Divine Person, and adoration goes to the Person.

One providential fact, symbolic of the mystery of Christ's humanity, is our ignorance of His human appearance. To His contemporaries this was known, but it veiled the mystery of the Person. To us this ignorance symbolizes the mystery of His humanity.

See Also: JESUS CHRIST, ARTICLES ON; MYSTERY (IN THEOLOGY); THEANDRIC ACTS OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:1148–64. Ibid. Tables générales 2:2548–2655. K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:954–955. R. GUARDINI, The Humanity of Christ, tr. R. WALLS (New York 1964). B. LEEMING, The Irish Theological Quarterly 22 (1955) 293–312.

[P. DE LETTER]

5. NATURAL DEFECTS

The doctrine of the HYPOSTATIC UNION implies that an ontologically perfect, concrete human nature was assumed by the Second Person of the Trinity. But a human nature qua human nature is created and composed, and thus a limited and imperfect nature, susceptible to certain deficiencies and weaknesses (i.e., defectus) by this very fact. Thus, in respect to Christ's own concrete human nature, the question arises whether and to what extent it was subjected to those infirmities of both body and soul that are characteristic of human nature in communi.

Scripture, while it, of course, says nothing explicitly about the ontological necessity or nonnecessity of this question, clearly testifies to the historical fact that, by reason of Christ's voluntary acceptance of all that in any way would fittingly contribute to His accomplishing the end of the Incarnation, viz, mankind's Redemption, His human nature was exposed to all those natural infirmities that are not in themselves directly sinful. The Synoptic Gospels in their descriptions of Christ's Passion and death, St. John's Gospel in its preoccupation with asserting Christ's true humanity (probably against the already rising heretical Docetist theories that argued Christ had only the fictitious appearance of a body that could suffer and undergo death), and many texts of St. Paul in their insistence on the efficacy of Christ's suffering for our salvation—all these can be seen as summarized in 4.14–5.10 of the Epistle to the HEBREWS: "For we have not a high priest who cannot have compassion on our infirmities, but one tried as we are in all things except sin. . . . And he, Son though he was, learned obedience from the things that he suffered, and when perfected, he became to all who obey him the cause of eternal salvation. . . ." (cf. the 12th of the anathemas of St. Cyril against Nestorius, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 263).

Further theological determinations and explicitations are presented by St. Thomas (Summa theologiae 3a, 14, the bodily defects assumed by the Son of God; 15, the defects of soul assumed by Christ). He formulates the principles implied in Scripture: (1) Because the human nature of Christ was assumed by the Divine Person of the Word, it could, by this very fact, have been preserved immune from those defects intrinsic to human nature in communi by reason of the human nature's ontological structure; (2) but the Divine Person Incarnate voluntarily chose not to enjoy this due immunity in order to accomplish in a superabundant and most suitable fashion the purposes of His becoming man. Thus, Christ would (a) satisfy for the sins of mankind by undergoing the punishment due to sin, such as hunger, thirst, fatigue, pain, and death; (b) confirm the faith of mankind in the truth of the Incarnation; and (c) give the Christian an example of those virtues of patience and endurance he ought to imitate in his own life.

Finally, St. Thomas derives from these two a third principle whereby it is possible to judge whether or not a specific human deficiency was assumed by the divine Word: Christ accepted all those infirmities of nature that are not actually repugnant to the dignity of the Divine Person, and are truly fit and suitable (convenientes) to either the principal or secondary purpose of the Incarnation. Such deficiencies, voluntarily endured and not allowed to be obliterated either by the divine nature itself or by the beatific vision enjoyed by the human nature, became meritorious for mankind's salvation.

Thus specifically, Christ assumed those bodily defects that are common to all human nature as consequences of original sin, but not those that are present only in some men as consequences of particular causes, for instance, sickness or disease. In Christ's soul there was no sin or any irrational inclination to sin (fomes peccati), no error or privative ignorance, although His soul was truly passible, i.e., subject both to bodily passions and to the animal or psychological passions, i.e., the sensitive appetites (see PROPASSIONS OF CHRIST).

See Also: IMPECCABILITY OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: K. ADAM, The Christ of Faith, tr. J. CRICK (New York 1957) 210–232. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Christ the Savior, tr. B. ROSE (St. Louis, Mo. 1950) 401–419. E. HUGON, The Mystery of the Incarnation, tr. a nun of St. Dominic's Priory, Carisbrooke (London 1925) 233–243. F. LAKNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:188–189. L. LERCHER, Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae (5th ed. Barcelona 1951) 3:124–135. B. J. LONERGAN, De Verbo incarnato (Rome 1961) 146–180. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:1155–64, 1327–28. A. SCHLITZER, Redemptive Incarnation (3d rev. ed. Notre Dame, Ind. 1962). B. M. XIBERTA Y ROQUETA, Enchiridion de Verbo Incarnato (Madrid 1957), Index Doctrinarium 22.

[D. R. GRABNER]

6. KNOWLEDGE

Christ being God and man had both a divine and a human knowledge. His divine knowledge was infinite, one with that of the Father and the Spirit; and because of the COMMUNICATION OF IDIOMS this man Christ could be said to have an infinite knowledge. This article deals only with Christ's human knowledge, which, though unique, was not infinite. It examines (1) the teaching of the faith based on Scripture; (2) its theological systematization, viz, Christ's threefold human knowledge (the vision, infused knowledge, and experimental knowledge); and (3) the objection to such knowledge from Christ's ignorance of the Last Day.

Faith about Christ's Human Knowledge. It is a doctrine of the faith, though not defined, that besides the divine there was in Christ human knowledge. This is a consequence of His real and complete humanity: His human mind and sense faculties had their own operations, as is attested abundantly in the Gospels. It is, moreover, postulated by His mission to preach to men in human concepts and words the message of salvation. The Gospels exalt the excellence of Christ's human knowledge. As a 12-year-old child, He astonishes people by His knowledge (Lk 2.40, 47), and later, during His ministry, all are wondering at His teaching (Mt 7.28–29; 13.54–55). He knows distant things (Mk 13.42); He reads the hearts of men (Lk 6.8; 7.39–40; Mk 2.6–8). He foretells the future—His Passion, the fall of Jerusalem, and His Second Coming. St. John calls Him full of grace and truth (Jn 1.14). St. Paul says that in Him are “hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge” (Col 2.3).

Christ Himself says that He draws His teaching from His knowledge of the Father (Mt 11.27; cf. Jn 1.18; 3.11–36). He speaks of what He has seen with the Father. Besides, He observed men and things, as is shown in His parables. He learns from experience what obedience means (Heb 5.8). He learns what was said by the Prophets of the Old Law. He asks questions and wonders at the answers He is given (Mk 5.31; Jn 11.34; Mt 8.10).

Accordingly, from Holy Scripture Christ's human knowledge appears as excellent and exceptional, multiple too—some of it He derives from His contact with the Father; some He learns from experience. On one occasion, however, He says (Mk 13.32) that He does not know about the Day of Judgment—this raises the problem of His “ignorance.”

Christ's threefold human knowledge. Theology has systematized the teaching of Scripture on Christ's human knowledge (the Fathers did little more than take up the problem of His “ignorance”). Theologians have done so on the basis of two principles: (1) the principle of perfection, meaning that Christ, being the most perfect of all men, had to have all possible perfection of human knowledge (possible in His concrete situation); and (2) the principle of equipment for His mission, meaning that He had to have the knowledge of God and men needed for His mission as Word-Incarnate Redeemer. Hence theologians say that He had the beatific vision, infused knowledge, and acquired knowledge.

Beatific Vision. Concerning the beatific vision of Christ, see part 1 of this article. One remark is to be made here. The sharing of Christ's human intellect in the vision, a connatural consequence of the hypostatic union, was not immediately serviceable for His mission as revealer of the mystery of salvation, because the vision is inexpressible in human concepts. But it was the reason for Christ's infused knowledge.

Infused Knowledge. The fact of this knowledge in Christ is commonly held by theologians. They distinguish, in the knowledge that Scripture says Christ derived from His contact with the Father, the vision of God (without species and ineffable) and the infused knowledge, or knowledge by infused species (expressible in human concepts and words). The distinction may be implicit in Scripture (cf. Jn 7.16; Mt 11.27).

The nature of this infused knowledge is akin to that of angelic knowledge. Angels know not by acquired but by infused species; this is their natural way of knowing. For Christ's human intellect, infused knowledge was not natural but supernatural, either absolutely, in the case of supernatural mysteries, or relatively, in the case of objects that can also be known naturally. The first is per se infused, the second infused per accidens.

The reason for this knowledge in Christ is not any imperfection or insufficiency in His immediate vision of God; rather it is the very perfection of this vision. Because vision knowledge is incommunicable in human terms, and Christ's mission entailed the communication to men of divine mysteries, a communicable knowledge of these mysteries was necessary. And so Christ's vision connaturally postulates as its complement the infused knowledge of the mysteries of salvation. The specific reason for the existence of infused knowledge in Christ is derived from His mission rather than from the principle of perfection.

The extension of Christ's infused knowledge is conceived differently, depending on the reason given for its existence. St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa theologiae 3a, 11.5), on the basis of the principle of perfection, says that by infused knowledge Christ knew all that pertains to human learning and all that men know through divine revelation (not, however, the divine essence, object of the vision). He adds that infused knowledge (unlike the vision) is not actual all the time but only habitual. Today theologians incline to explain the extension of Christ's infused knowledge from the purpose and nature of His mission; this was a coming in lowliness, not in glory, and did not require the knowledge of all human learning (infused per accidens) but only of all that pertains to men's salvation (mainly infused per se). This was necessary and sufficient for Christ to discharge His mission. In this latter supposition, Christ's infused knowledge was mainly, if not exclusively, supernatural, or per se infused; in that of St. Thomas, His infused knowledge of human learning was natural in substance but supernatural quoad modum (angelic), or infused per accidens.

Acquired Knowledge. The fact of Christ's experiential, or acquired, knowledge is considered certain by theologians today. (It was not so in the past; for fear of having to admit real progress in His knowledge, some postulated a complete infused knowledge and allowed only new manifestation of knowledge.) Since His humanity was complete and included sense faculties and a human intellect, to deny acquired knowledge in Christ seems to tend to Docetism. And without His having this knowledge, many sayings in the Gospels hardly have meaning.

The extension of this knowledge is conceived in different ways. St. Thomas, on the a priori principle of perfection, teaches that Christ knew by acquired knowledge all that could be known by the agent intellect (Summa theologiae 3a, 12.1). Some commentators went so far as to say He knew all about mathematics, the sciences, languages, etc. (A. Lépiciér). This, however, goes against the very nature of Christ's experiential knowledge, which, like that of anyone else, was limited and restricted. Nor did His mission require such a knowledge. Today it is commonly said that Christ's acquired knowledge was perfect in keeping with the concrete circumstances of His time and place, age and mission, and His dealings with people for His redemptive and prophetic mission.

The question of Christ's progress in knowledge causes no difficulty today and is commonly answered in the affirmative. It is of the nature of acquired knowledge to grow with observation and experience and to become more perfect. And cf. Lk 2.40, 52. Nor is there any difficulty about the question as to whether or not Christ learned from other people. St. Thomas (Summa theologiae 3a, 12.3–4) held that, because it is unbecoming for the first mover in any field of action to be moved by inferiors, Christ could not have been taught by others. What he said applies no doubt to the message of salvation that Christ learned from none but His Father. But it lies in the nature of one's acquired human knowledge, including that of Christ, that one learn from others; men are naturally social and dependent on one another to acquire the knowledge necessary for a human way of living. Jesus, then, learned from His parents, as later He also received, in answer to His questions, information that He did not yet know from experience. This in no way is contrary to the perfection of Christ's acquired knowledge.

Unity and Harmony of Christ's Threefold Knowledge. Christ's divine knowledge did not make unnecessary or meaningless His human knowledge. So also the three kinds of human knowledge in Christ, required by what Scripture and revelation say of the God-Man, did not hinder or exclude but rather complemented one another. The three were required on different grounds and existed on different levels, while uniting in one human consciousness for the purpose of Christ's mission.

The vision, though always in act, could coexist with infused and acquired knowledge, because it existed on a different level and was not conditioned by any created species. (But the mystery remains: Christ is both comprehensor and viator). Both infused and acquired knowledge depend on species, but on species of different origin: one depends on species infused by God, the other on species acquired through sense experience. Because the first kind of species pertains to objects that per se do not come within sense experience, they do not apparently stand in the way of acquired knowledge. A difficulty may arise, not easily soluble, as to whether the exercise of one of these two kinds of knowledge can go together with that of the other. Perhaps, as has been suggested, the experience of mystics in whom the more perfect mystical knowledge does no longer hinder (as it did in a less perfect stage) ordinary sense experience and experiential knowledge may be a hint that the perfect infused knowledge in Christ did not hinder His acquired knowledge. In the case of a knowledge infused per accidens, this should not hinder but rather help the cognate acquired knowledge.

Moreover, because the three kinds of knowledge in Christ referred to different objects, they complemented one another. His vision knowledge, ineffable and incommunicable, was the spring of His communicable infused knowledge of the mystery of salvation. Without being perfected by the latter, it was complemented by the infused knowledge, which made His mission as revealer of the Father possible. This infused knowledge, in turn, was in need of the acquired knowledge, because it was to be communicated to particular persons in the particular concepts and words of a particular language, to be learned from experience and intercourse with people. To that extent it was conditioned for its effective communication by Christ's experiential knowledge.

The three kinds of knowledge were the acts and possession of one human intellect and one human awareness; they were distinct, not separated. Their perfect harmony, however, remains mysterious; it is part of the very mystery of Christ.

Christ's ignorance of the Last Day. The text of Mk 13.32 was a problem in the time of the Fathers. Some seemed to say that Christ had no human knowledge of the Last Day, e.g., St. Gregory of Nyssa. Others, such as St. John Chrysostom and most of the Latin Fathers, rejected the supposition of a real ignorance in Christ. St. Augustine proposed the solution that has become universally accepted: Christ had no communicable knowledge of the Last Day, because it did not pertain to His mission to reveal it. Augustine said this in the context of the question about human infirmities taken on by Christ; his solution here too has prevailed: Christ took all of these infirmities, except ignorance, which is not only a consequence but also a principle of sin (Divers. quaest. 83.60). According to the scholastic systematization of Christ's threefold human knowledge, one should say then that Christ knew the Last Day in His vision knowledge, not in His infused knowledge.

A century after St. Augustine, the error of the Agnoetae, e.g., Themistius, categorically affirmed Christ's human ignorance of the day. It was condemned by Pope St. Gregory (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 474). Since then, both East and West have rallied to the teaching of St. Augustine.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:1628–65. Ibid., Tables générales 2:2548–2655. "Wissen Christi," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) v. 10. C. CHOPIN, Le Verbe incarné et rédempteur (Tournai 1963), 93–102. A. DOOLAN, The Irish Ecclesiastical Record 93 (1960) 249–254. J. GALOT, Nouvelle revue théologique 82 (1960) 113–131; condensed in Theology Digest 12 (1964) 48–52. B. LEEMING, Irish Theological Quarterly 19 (1952) 135–147, 234–253.

[P. DE LETTER]

7. WILL

Just as there are two complete and perfect natures in Christ, one divine, the other human, there are two wills in Christ, one divine, the other human. This is a doctrine of faith, and its denial was declared to be heretical by the Third Council of Constantinople (680–681), presided over by Pope Agatho through his legates, and confirmed in its acts by his successor, Pope Leo II. "According to the teaching of the holy Fathers, we proclaim that there are two natural wills in Him [Christ], and two natural operations, neither divided nor changed, neither separated nor intermingled" (H. Denz, Enchiridion symbolorum 556).

The occasion of this doctrinal declaration of the Church was the theologico-political attempt by Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, to reconcile Monophysites (who held one nature in Christ) with orthodox Catholics. (See MONOTHELETISM.) The theory that in Christ there is only one principle of operation was sufficiently ambiguous to be satisfactory to Monophysites, while Catholics might be led to acknowledge the single principle of operation as the Divine Person, operating through two natures. It even drew a timid and controverted approbation from Pope HONORIUS I (d. 638). Monothelism, although clearly condemned, continued to count adherents among Orientals as late as the Middle Ages.

Existence and nature of human will. Sacred Scripture testifies to the existence of a human will in Christ that is distinct from His divine will. His words "not my will but thine be done" (Lk 22.42) were addressed to His Father. Moreover, works of honor are attributed to Christ, such as prayer, obedience, merit, which cannot proceed from the divine will, since they are manifested to a superior. They can proceed only from a created will. In His Incarnation the Son of God assumed a perfect human nature, at the same time retaining His perfect divine nature. But there is no human nature without the human will, just as there is no divine nature without the divine will. St. Thomas adds: “Whatever was in the human nature of Christ was moved at the bidding of the divine will, yet it does not follow that in Christ there was no movement of the will proper to human nature” (Summa theologiae 3a, 18.1 ad 1). By this one is to understand that the human will is no useless appendage but an operating faculty in the human nature of Christ.

The WILL is defined as the intellectual appetite—an inclination to the good apprehended by the intellect. As human, the will is colored by the operation of the human intellect. Its operation is twofold, one with regard to the end, the other with regard to the means to the end. The human will is necessarily moved by the concept of HAPPINESS, of perfect goodness, as well as by goods that are desired in themselves, such as health. This function of the will denominates the will as nature. With regard to the means to the end, to created goods as distinguished from the absolute and perfect good, the will is in control of its movement. Hence this operation denominates the will as reason. Both of these functions are essential to the human will, and therefore must have been in Christ.

Freedom of will in Christ. Christ certainly enjoyed freedom of will, as is evident from the fact that the proper act of the will as reason is to choose, and this is also the proper act of free will. Not only had Christ free will, but He enjoyed perfect freedom (cf. Jn 10.17–18). The fact that His will was perfectly subject to the divine will in no way impaired its own proper motion and tendency. This conformity to the divine will was rather the guarantee of the perfect freedom of Christ, giving it its special value, so that having its own activity, it exercised it under and in accord with the divine influence. This is true of all human activity that is morally good. It befitted Christ in a special fashion, for He was not only sinless but impeccable.

Christ did not exercise free will where other men did not exercise it, i.e., in desire for the end, happiness, in the operation of His will as nature, in His love of the divine essence clearly seen in the beatific vision. Yet it was always within His power, under the efficacious motion of God, to turn toward this or that created good, which, because of its inherent limitation, cannot fully satisfy the aspiration of His will toward the complete and unalloyed good. This is the root of human freedom.

Impeccability of Christ. By reason of the hypostatic union, His possession of the beatific vision from the first instant of His conception, and the immutable fullness of grace, Christ’s will not only always factually conformed to the divine will, but, more than this, it could not defect from this conformity; Christ could not sin. It is a common fallacy that the inability to sin in some fashion curtails freedom. The erroneous foundation of this assumption is exposed by a little reflection that the power to choose indifferently good or evil (the apparent good) is really a sign of deficiency in the faculty whose object is the good as apprehended by reason.

While the choice between good and evil was not open to Christ, it was always within His power, under the efficacious motion of God, to turn toward this or that created good, which, because of its limitations, could not fully satisfy the aspirations of the will toward the perfect and absolute good. And yet in spite of all this, we are still forced to admit that Christ’s impeccability presents a serious problem when considered in relation to His obedience to His Father’s command.

Harmony of human and divine wills in Christ. Because He was truly man, Christ had a sensible nature and therefore a sensitive appetite. Because He was perfect man, His sensitive appetite never escaped, anticipated, or rebelled against the control of His reason. Therefore, because of this rational control, the sensible appetite in Christ is called the will in an extended sense. The field of the sensible appetite is sensible pleasure and pain. So theologically speaking, one can distinguish in Christ four wills: divine will, human will as reason, human will as nature, human will as sensuality. There was perfect harmony between the divine will and the human will as reason. Its perfect conformity was proof of its perfection. On the other hand, the will as nature and the will of sensuality, because of their natures, allowed by the Son of God to do what belonged to them (Summa theologiae 3a, 18.6), shrank from sensible pain and bodily hurt, as foreseen in His Passion. So Christ’s words in the Garden of Olives, “Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass away from me; yet not as I will, but as thou wilt” (Mt 26.39), expressed first of all the movement of the will of sensuality and the will as nature, then the absolute conformity of His will as reason to the divine will.

The natural shrinking of the will as sensuality and the will as nature from the suffering of the Passion, and the eager desire of Christ’s will as reason joyfully to embrace that suffering in complete obedience to the command of the divine will, did not constitute civil war within Christ. The salvation of the human race, the reason for the divine command, is a good beyond the scope of the sense appetite. Will as nature could love this goal as a good, but was incapable of ordering the Passion to it as a means to the end. Only the will as reason could do that. Nor was the will as reason impeded or retarded by the movement of the will of sensuality and the will as nature. So, just as the human will has its most proper operation, free choice, though it is perfectly subject to the divine will, so too the sense appetite and the will as nature in Christ have their full and proper operation in their perfect subjection to the will as reason. Both properly fly from sorrow and pain, but with the limitation of that flight to the demands of reason. So proclaimed the Third Council of Constantinople: “The human will is compliant, and not opposing or contrary; as a matter of fact, it is even obedient to His divine and omnipotent will” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 556).

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 3a, 18–20. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:1160–64, 1267–69, 1290–1312. M. JUGIE, ibid. 10:2307–23. Sacrae theologiae summa (Madrid 1961) 3:1.408–447. H. RAHNER and A. GRILLMEIER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:570–572. R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Christ the Savior, tr. B. ROSE (St. Louis, Mo. 1950) 439–486. W. R. FARRELL, Companion to the Summa, 4 v. (New York 1942) 4:99–104. C. HÉRIS, The Mystery of Christ, tr. D. FAHEY (Westminster, Md. 1950) 63–69.

[J. R. GILLIS]

8. POWER AND THEANDRIC ACTS

The power of Christ considered here is not His divine power that as Son of God He has in common with the Father and the Spirit and that He exercises independently of His humanity in such activity as pertains to creation, but the power of His humanity. Because of its being the “joined instrument” of the Word, Christ’s human nature has, besides its own power, natural and supernatural (through grace), a unique instrumental virtue, or power. The actions of the second power are called theandric in the strict sense of the term.

Christ’s own human power. The power of Christ’s humanity operative in those actions in which His human nature acts as chief cause, either in natural activity, such as walking, eating, speaking, or in supernatural operations, such as acts of infused virtues (e.g., fortitude, temperance) does not essentially differ from that of another man—except on two points. First, because of the unique perfection of His humanity and His sanctifying grace, these operations too have a unique perfection. Second, this activity is the human or supernatural (created) activity of a Divine Person.

These actions, however, are not theandric, because in them Christ’s humanity acts as chief cause. They may, however, be called theandric in a broad sense, not only because of the special divine, natural or supernatural, help that guides them, but specifically because they pertain to the Person of the Word in virtue of the HYPOSTATIC UNION.

His power in theandric actions. Theandric in the strict sense are those actions of Christ in which His humanity acts as the joint instrument of the Word, His divine Person and nature being the principal cause. The “instrumental virtue” added to His humanity by the hypostatic union is a power that enables it to be the instrument of the Word in theandric actions. Though not infinite, and therefore not omnipotent, because His humanity is finite, it yet extends to effects that are beyond purely human or created causality.

This unique power of Christ’s humanity is manifested mainly in two kinds of activity: in working miracles and in dispensing sanctifying grace. In both of these activities, the two natures of Christ are active: the divine nature as principal cause and the human nature as instrumental cause. The activity of His humanity is here raised in its conjoint activity with the Word so as to be actually the subordinate and instrumental cause of divine effects. In this sense, Christ’s humanity has a unique power. When other persons or creatures are assumed by God as ministers or instruments to work miracles or give grace, their instrumental causality differs from that of Christ’s humanity. They are separated instruments, persons or things distinct from the Person of the chief cause; Christ’s humanity is the permanently joined instrument of the Word, the principal cause. Because of this aspect of the hypostatic union, Christ’s human will and activity coincide with the divine will in a manner other created wills cannot. His instrumental causality in the dispensation of grace has an excellence that transcends that of any minister or Sacrament of grace.

Different theological concepts of this instrumental virtue have been proposed. Some reduce it to the moral causality of an infallibly efficacious intercession, after Scotus and G. Vázquez, in reference to Jn 11.41. Others, more commonly and more aptly, see it as an instrumental efficiency of Christ’s humanity. This latter concept fits better such texts as Lk 6.19 and 8.46, where a power is said to go out from Jesus, or Jn 15.5, about the vine and the branches. When this instrumentally efficient causality is conceived as physical (analogically) or intentionally perfective, i.e., as the expression of a divine command or will, then Christ’s working of miracles or granting of grace appears as something unique, in the sense that His human will, being the human will of the Word, of necessity coincides freely with His divine will, and so the man-Christ works miracles and grants grace on His personal authority.

This instrumental power of Christ’s humanity in giving grace is also manifested in the giving of the Holy Spirit; the Apostles receive the Spirit when Jesus breathes over them through the human words that He pronounces.

Another element of the power of Christ is His prayer, which has a unique power of intercession.

See Also: THEANDRIC ACTS OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:1312–23. PIUS XII, Mystici Corporis Christi in Acta Apostolicae Sedis 35 (1943) 50. B. RAIGNEAU-JULIEN, Revue thomiste 55 (1955) 615–628. C. CHOPIN, Le Verbe incarné et rédempteur (Tournai 1963) 105–108.

[P. DE LETTER]

9. MESSIANIC CONSCIOUSNESS

This question deals with a fact and not the conditions for its possibility. Whether Jesus actually attributed to Himself messianic prerogatives is the point under consideration, not how He was able to do so or what type of knowledge this presupposed. The method employed will be biblical rather than apologetical. It may not, however, be amiss to note that the Apostolic proclamation of Jesus as MESSIAH presupposed His own assertion of the same. Even the hypothesis tracing this kerygma to an erroneous acceptance of His Resurrection must admit that predisposition was necessary for His followers to witness such “apparitions.” This in turn has its most plausible explanation in His own pretensions before death. To investigate the function He attributed to Himself either directly or by acquiescing in the titles that others gave Him, recourse will be had above all to the Synoptics.

Although the Old Testament gave the Messiah the traits of king [Ps 2, 109 (110)], prophet (Dt 18.15; Is 42.1–9; 49.1–6; 52.13–53.12), and transcendent figure of the last days (Dn 7.13), all these were not, at the proper time, combined immediately and with ease so as to represent to people’s minds a single historical individual. Even Jesus’ Apostles were not exempt from a popular conception emphasizing the first to the exclusion of the second (Mk 8.31–33; Mt 16.21–23); a distinction was also made on occasion between the Messiah and the Prophet (Jn 1.21, 25; 7.40–41).

It will be recalled that the Gospel narratives in their present form were not the first books of the New Testament to be written. They presuppose an oral and written tradition; there are differences of perspective between them and other parts of the New Testament. One of the titles, SON OF MAN, given to Jesus most frequently in John and the Synoptics, appears almost never in the rest of the New Testament. Conversely, Christ is used in the Synoptics to refer directly to Jesus only rarely and with qualifying restrictions, though it is His normal title elsewhere.

To speak of His messianic consciousness is to inquire into His way of identifying Himself in terms of functions He fulfilled. These are described variously and can be analyzed in His titles. Messiah: both in the Greek text and in the Latin version, this rendering of the Hebrew is most infrequent. When it does appear, Jesus is not represented as using it (Jn 1.41; 4.25). Son of David: a messianic title; those seeking aid apply it to Him (Mk 10.47–48; Mt 20.30–31; Lk 18.38–39). Emphasizing the already popular regal qualities of the Messiah, the title SON OF DAVID only too easily lent itself to misinterpretation. Jesus explicitly approved its application to Himself only at the end of His public life and teaching (Mt 21.9, 15–17); He did not hesitate to point out its incompleteness as a means of designating the Messiah (Mk 12.35–37; Mt 22.41–46; Lk 20.41–44).

Christ: if the kerygmatic discourses in the Acts of the Apostles apply the title CHRIST to Jesus without hesitation and the Pauline Epistles treat it almost like a personal name, the Gospels are different in this regard. When it is attributed to Him, He does not receive it with perfect equanimity. Not His usual way of referring to Himself, when He does accept it, it is an adaptation to the form of questions put by others (Mk 14.61–62; Mt 26.63–64; Lk 22.66–69), or an accommodation to their usage (Mk 8.30; Mt 16.17–20; Lk 9.20–22). This often introduces the whole into a prophetic context of approaching suffering and death (Mk 8.31; Lk 9.22; Mt 16.21), or else into the apocalyptic frame of reference of Dn 7 (Mk 14.62; Mt 26.64; Lk 22.69).

Son of Man (cf. Dn 7.13): although the title is employed almost exclusively by Jesus in reference to Himself before His Resurrection, its biblical meaning is not always messianic (Ps 8.5). Still the repeated usage in the third person (with the definite article in the Greek text), when a subject is speaking of himself, is unusual and calculated to draw attention to the speaker. In the Synoptics, the title serves to designate Jesus in His functions, some exercised in the present and others to be fulfilled in the future.

The Son of Man as pictured in the first group has characteristics that are antithetical. Lord of the Sabbath (Mk 2.28; Mt 12.8; Lk 6.5), forgiver of sins (Mk 2.10; Mt 9.5–6; Lk 5.24), the Son of Man is already endowed with superhuman prerogatives. But He lacks what even the foxes and birds possess (Lk 9.58; Mt 8.20) and is subjected to misunderstanding and accusations on the part of men (Mt 11.19; Lk 7.34).

The future role of the Son of Man is likewise twofold. Again it will be both one of ignominy and suffering (Mt 17.22; Mk 10.45; Lk 11.30; Mt 12.40), as well as one of transcendence and glory (Mk 13.26–27; 14.62; Mt 26.64). The prophetic and the apocalyptic are thus introduced.

While announcing the presence of the KINGDOM OF GOD ushered in by John, Jesus gradually revealed His own identity as Messiah in terms of present and future endurance and action. This messianic secret He did not tell to all (Mk 4.11), or to the unprepared. The progressive steps in its revelation were psychologically capable of transforming an excessively political concept of God's Anointed into a more spiritual and religious one. Whereas He is not represented by the Synoptics as rejecting strictly messianic titles, He did not accept them, in the traditions these Gospels represent, immediately at the outset of His preaching without qualification and clarification. The designation He Himself chose to use included in its meaning the simultaneous verification of opposites in the present, together with emphasis on a future when He would realize in Himself transcendent apocalyptic glory through and after suffering as Yahweh's Servant (see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF). Before His death and Resurrection, He was already the Messiah and conscious of so being, but His messianic work was as yet incomplete. This temporal element in His progressive verification and manifestation of messianic properties was better expressed with a term that did not connote immediately the idea of triumph complete from the start. In this perspective certain messianic titles, with the associations they had at the time, were more likely to confuse than convey the desired message. Their avoidance and the choice of another term capable of progressive development and explanation are hardly coincidental in the Synoptics.

See Also: JESUS CHRIST, IN THE BIBLE; MESSIAH; MESSIANISM.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50), Tables générales 2:2551–53, 2598–2605, 2621–23. H. GROSS et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:336–342. A. Vögtle, ibid. 7:297–300. A. VÖGTLE and R. SCHNACKENBURG, ibid. 7:922–940, Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1142–56, 1510–25. E. DHANIS, “De filio hominis in Vetere Testamento et in iudaismo,” Gregorianum 45 (1964) 5–59, R. BULTMANN, Theology of the New Testament, tr. K. GROBEL, 2 v. (New York 1951–55).

[C. J. PETER]

10. PSYCHOLOGICAL UNITY

No more is intended in what follows than an exposition of the general positions taken by Catholic theologians. First, however, some explanation is necessary about the point under consideration. That Jesus Christ is unique in His divine personality and dual in His natures is an article of faith; whatever He did, whatever He endured, it was God the Son who was acting and suffering. This faith has its origin in Christ's revelation of His own ontological unity, that of a subject with attributes both divine and human. But to communicate this mystery of His unity to others in word and deed, He had first somehow to come to know it Himself.

If He enjoyed a variety of types of intellectual knowledge, how was it that He recognized Himself as the common subject of them all? Did He know Himself as such only as an object of contemplation in the vision of God? Or was He aware of this fact in other ways as well? Was the ego of the Suffering Servant divine or human? If the first, was the Word of God conscious of Himself in the pain experienced through and in and by virtue of His body and soul? Christ's subjective unity as grasped in His life of sense experience, intellection, and affection is what will be discussed here. What were the psychological conditions presupposed by His revelation of His oneness? How did that experience or knowledge arise?

Presuppositions. Constants appear in most Catholic attempts to answer these questions. The first is that in Jesus of Nazareth the one Person is that of the Word, who alone became incarnate and was man. The Father and Holy Spirit could not be conscious of themselves in His humanity since it belonged to or was united to the Person of neither of them. Second, no operation of the Son through the divine nature is proper to Him alone. Furthermore, a complete and perfect humanity in Christ is in no way impeded by either of the foregoing. If unconscious suffering is not real for man, neither is it for Him. Finally He had a special knowledge, usually reserved for the blessed in the final phase of God's kingdom, the vision of God. In this He saw the Word and His own human nature. He recognized that He was God the Word made man and realized that the ultimate subject of His human activity was the eternal Son of God.

Theologians discuss whether or not He experienced the same divine subject in acts of human knowledge other than beatific. When He was hungry, thirsty, tired, scourged, and crucified, was His divine Ego aware of itself in a human way precisely because of and in this sense experience? Was the Word conscious of Himself in all the acts of sensation, knowledge, and love realized in His humanity?

Here profound differences appear, based on philosophical conceptions of CONSCIOUSNESS. These are probably as much as any other the reason for the diverse theological opinions. Consciousness is proposed as the exercise of introspection or reflection in which the feeling, knowing, loving subject becomes the object of explicit consideration. As such it could not properly speaking be found in God, who knows Himself without reflecting on any prior act of cognition or volition. If not this, then consciousness is the self-presence or awareness a subject necessarily has of itself in every psychological act. Such experience provides the prerequisite data for in-trosection and for scientific studies of the subject as such. In addition, there is disagreement as to whether an ontological unity of person is compatible with a plurality of psychological egos. Must the latter be really identified with the person?

Theology of the assumed humanity. This theory is preoccupied with preserving the psychological integrity of the manhood in Jesus. What was present through reflection on acts of knowing and loving was a human ego. In this His situation was like that of other men. But He was different, since His Person was not human but divine. In His purely human or natural acts, He was present to Himself without being aware of the fact that He was the eternal Son of God. The latter He was and realized full well in an act of human knowledge that was supernatural, namely, the vision of God. Knowing Himself as the Word, He was nevertheless not strictly conscious of so being in acts other than the beatific vision. What He was conscious of in such activity was what appeared to Him in introspective reflection; that was a human ego, as His human nature was complete and the principle of His human actions. The subject of that ego was recognized as a Divine Person only through the beatific vision.

Theology of God-with-Us. The distinguishing characteristic of this theology, which embraces a number of different opinions, is that it maintains that Christ is conscious of His divine Ego through and by virtue of human acts other than the vision of God. What He experienced in such activity is not a human ego but the divine Ego of the Word. That experience of the eternal Word, however, is not described by all in the same way. It may take place in an act of reflection on one that precedes it; or it may be presupposed by and offer the grounds for such reflection. In either case, the reality experienced is divine though present in a human way. So too, though a divine Ego is experienced or falls within the field of human consciousness, the vision of God may be a necessary complement to it for Christ's assertion of identity between the subject He experienced and what He knew of God's own Son.

See Also: COMMUNICATION OF IDIOMS; HYPOSTATIC UNION; INCOMMUNICABILITY; PERSON (IN THEOLOGY); THEANDRIC ACTS OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50), Tables générales 2:2650–54. K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:959–961. “Wissen Christi,” ibid., v. 10. P. GALTIER, L'Unité du Christ (2d ed. Paris 1939). P. PARENTE, L'Io di Cristo (2d ed. Brescia 1955). B. J. LONERGAN, De constitutione Christi ontologica et psychologica (3d ed. Rome 1961). H. DIEPEN, La Théologie de L'Emmanuel (Bruges 1960).

[C. J. PETER]

11. PROPHET, PRIEST, AND KING

In treating of the incarnate Word's principal activity of REDEMPTION, many theologians prefer to propound the doctrine by considering the three messianic offices or functions of Christ, which can fittingly be said to comprehend His whole work as Redeemer and Mediator: (1) the prophetic or magisterial office, (2) the sacerdotal office, and (3) the kingly office. A detailed study of these three is ordinarily preceded by general considerations of the concept of Redemption, i.e., the unique restitution of the ORIGINAL JUSTICE mankind possessed before the Fall.

Prophetic or magisterial office. The scriptural teaching (especially of St. John) concerning Jesus as the LOGOS or WORD of the Father and the many related themes (e.g., wisdom, light, truth) stress the fact that man's attaining Redemption or salvation requires his coming to know God and God's positive will as revealed in sacred history. Thus Jesus must, first of all, be the concrete manifestation of God's will for man, i.e., of the divine precepts and promises: “Now this is everlasting life, that they may know thee, the only true God, and him whom thou hast sent, Jesus Christ” (Jn 17.3; cf. Heb 1.1–5).

The infallible efficacy of Christ's teaching power (magisterium) in bringing mankind to that indispensable knowledge of faith that is necessary for salvation derives ultimately from the fact that He is a Divine Person and thus uniquely enabled to know and make known the eternal MYSTERY of the Father's will: “All things have been delivered to me by my Father; and no one knows the Son except the Father; nor does anyone know the Father except the Son, and him to whom the Son chooses to reveal him” (Mt 1 1.27).

The infallible magisterium of the Church, by reason of Christ's authentic delegation of power and mission to teach given to the Apostles and their successors, is thus ultimately a participation in Christ's unique teaching power.

Sacerdotal office. The consideration of Christ in His priesthood, perhaps more than in any other aspect, brings out the totality of His mediatorship between God and man. As eternal High Priest, He offers Himself as a perfectly dedicated and consecrated Victim in a sacrifice of adoration, praise, thanksgiving, petition, and vicarious reparation, an infinitely pleasing sacrifice to God the Father. Thus He restores that intimate union between God and man that had been destroyed through sin.

The principal treatment in Scripture of Christ's priesthood and sacrifice is the Epistle to the HEBREWS, in which the author, through a detailed comparison of the New Covenant with the Old Covenant, shows the infinite superiority of the one over the other; he insists that Christ, called to this task by a unique vocation of God and taken from among men, whose lot He has shared in all things except sin, exercises a priesthood and offers a sacrifice that has a once-for-all and eternal efficacy: "It was fitting that we should have such a high priest, holy, innocent, undefiled, set apart from sinners, and become higher than the heavens" (Heb 7.26; see whole section 4.14–7.28).

Kingly office. At His trial, Jesus answered Pilate's question as to whether or not He was a king: "Thou sayest it; I am a king. This is why I was born, and why I have come into the world, to bear witness to the truth" (Jn 18.37). The Synoptic Gospels, preoccupied with announcing the Good News of the coming of the Kingdom of God, give a certain stress to the theme of Christ's kingship, to which they add, however, a number of other related themes. The general truth that these themes all illustrate in their own way is that into the hands of Jesus, as the Lamb of God, have been entrusted all "blessing and honor and glory and dominion, forever and ever" (Rv 5.13). For a great number of relevant scriptural texts, see the Mass and Office for the feast of Christ the King.

Bibliography: I. SOLANO, Sacrae theologiae summa (Madrid 1961) 3:1, 694–791. A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:1345–59. O. CULLMANN, The Christology of the New Testament, tr. S. GUTHRIE and C. HALL (Philadelphia, Pa. 1959). A. GRAHAM, The Christ of Catholicism (New York 1947) 214–260. C. V. HÉRIS, The Mystery of Christ, tr. D. FAHEY (Westminster, Md. 1950). A. SCHLITZER, Redemptive Incarnation (2d ed. Notre Dame, Ind. 1956) 184–307.

[D. R. GRABNER]

12. PRIMACY

The primacy of Christ is taught by St. Paul in Col 1.18: ". . . that in all things he [Christ] may have the first place." The following article outlines the historical development of this doctrine.

Early Christian writers considered Christ's primacy mainly in such partial, concrete aspects as His kingship and priesthood. Only St. Irenaeus took as his central theological viewpoint God's plan to sum up all things in Christ (see RECAPITULATION IN CHRIST). St. Jerome and St. Maximus, however, pointed out that the universe tends toward Christ as its goal, and many other Fathers, including the Cappadocians, stressed Christ's role as exemplar of the cosmos.

Rupert of Deutz, a medieval theologian, first asserted that the Word would have become man even if Adam had not sinned. This thesis was rejected by most scholastics for a reason given in a sermon of St. Augustine (Serm. 175, Patrologia Latina 38:945–949): without the disease, there is no need for a physician; without sin, no need for a redeemer. St. Thomas took a prudent stand: "We do not know what God would have done had He not foreseen sin" (In 1 Tim. 1.4). Yet because of Augustine's authority, he conceded that there probably would have been no Incarnation without a prior sin (Summa theologiae 3a, 1.3). Duns Scotus, however, pointed out that although Christ is certainly man's Redeemer, His role in the universe cannot be reduced to the Redemption exclusively. He would exist as man, then, even without the sin of Adam (In 3 sent. 7.3, Vivès ed., 14:354–355).

Scotists continued to hold this view, and Thomists the opposite one. L. Molina, seeking to reconcile these positions, taught that Redemption from sin and the glory of Christ were "equally first" as reasons for the Incarnation (Concordia, Paris 1876, 477–490). This solution clearly transferred the controversy from the hypothetical question (whether Christ would have come) to the question of fact: how does the Incarnation fit into the divine plan? Yet it was not widely accepted; most theologians continued to insist that one of Molina's "equally first" reasons for the Incarnation was in fact prior to the other.

Interest in the subject gradually waned, and it lay dormant until 1867, when Hilary of Paris, a Capuchin, published a dissertation defending the Thomistic view. A lively controversy then arose, in which several questions were clearly distinguished for the first time: the relation of Christ's humanity to other creatures, the primary reason for the Incarnation, the order of the divine intentions, and the effect of sin on God's plan.

The traditional division of opinion was still apparent and continues to this day. Thomists maintain a "relative" primacy, resulting from an adjustment in God's plan brought about by sin. In this view, the angels and man's first parents before the Fall belong to a different economy from that of redeemed mankind; the former partake of the "grace of God"; the latter, of the "grace of Christ." Molinists continue to propose a "middle way," in which Christ's glory and man's Redemption are "equally first" in God's plan. Scotists set forth the doctrine of Christ's "absolute" primacy, which allows for only one economy, based on the Incarnation. According to traditional Scotism, the God-Man was originally destined to come as a glorious king, but the Fall caused a modification of the divine plan and brought about the "passible mode" of the Incarnation.

A recent adaptation of Scotism, worked out by J. F. Bonnefoy, OFM (1897–1958), and accepted in its broad outlines by such independent theologians as K. Rahner and C. Davis, rejects even this modification in the divine plan. It maintains that out of many possible worlds, God chose to create one in which sin, although neither willed nor positively permitted by Him, would set the stage for a redemptive Incarnation. Even in God's primitive plan, which remains forever unchanged, Christ is here envisioned as one who will enter history in the passible flesh of sinful mankind, suffer, die, and thus enter into the glory prepared for Him by His Father (Lk 24.26).

As developed by Bonnefoy, the doctrine of Christ's primacy now has the following structure. Its basic premise is the revealed datum that Christ's human nature, by reason of its intimate union with the Godhead, occupies the first place among creatures. From this fact is deduced the corollary that the Incarnation was willed by God "in the first place" and all other created realities only "after"—i.e., in dependence upon—Christ's human nature.

This dependence is said to consist in a threefold causal bond: Christ as man is (1) the meritorious cause of all other creatures and events, (2) the exemplar whose perfections are imitated in all other creatures, and (3) the proximate goal toward which the entire created order tends. Mary, as Christ's mother and noblest of all mere creatures, is "second" in God's plan; angels and the rest of mankind are then willed as the Body of Christ, as sharers in His glorified life. The material universe, finally, is envisioned as the "home" of Jesus, Mary, and other men. The order of actual creation is thus the opposite of the order in God's plan, as is to be expected in the work of an intelligent agent.

See Also: INCARNATION.

Bibliography: J. F. BONNEFOY, Christ and the Cosmos, tr. M. D. MEILACH (Paterson 1965), contains full bibliography. I. M. ROCCA and G. M. ROSCHINI, De ratione primariae existentiae Christi et Deiparae . . . (Rome 1944). U. LATTANZI, Il primato universale di Cristo secondo le s. Scritture (Rome 1937). F. M. RISI, Sul motivo primario dell'Incarnazione del Verbo . . . , 4 v. (Rome 1897–98).

[M. D. MEILACH]

13. THE HISTORICAL JESUS

The question of the historical Jesus arises once biblical scholarship has made apparent the theological character of the NT witness to Jesus as the Christ. Given the New Testament theological articulations of Jesus' religious significance as grasped by Christian faith, what can be known about Jesus through the lenses made available by the modern discipline of critical history? This question has given rise to the so-called Quest for the Historical Jesus, an ongoing scholarly movement that has unfolded in three distinct phases.

The first phase, commonly referred to as the "old quest," began in the late eighteenth century with the German deist H. S. Reimarus and ran until 1906, the year in which A. Schweitzer published a magisterial summary and critique of the movement. After a hiatus of almost half a century, a "new quest" took its impetus from a programmatic lecture delivered in 1953 by E. Käsemann. Three years later G. Bornkamm's Jesus of Nazareth provided the basis of a consensus that would hold sway until 1985. In that year E. P. Sanders' Jesus and Judaism offered the sort of retrospective critique that Schweitzer had provided for the "old quest," and the same year saw the organization of a group known as the Jesus Seminar under the leadership of R. Funk and J. D. Crossan. A "third quest" has emerged in which such figures as J. P. Meier, N. T. Wright, and M. Borg play a prominent role. Profound conflict regarding what sources are relevant to historical inquiry into Jesus' earthly career and regarding what methods are most appropriate for obtaining historical knowledge of Jesus from those sources marks this phase of research. The result has been widely varying historical portraits of Jesus of Nazareth.

From the outset of the "old quest," a major ambiguity attendant upon the project became apparent. Within the context of the Enlightenment prejudice against religious traditions, H. S. Reimarus, and after him figures like D. F. Strauss and B. Bauer, sought to wield history as a weapon with which to discredit the Christian church. On their account, the real Jesus was the historical Jesus, and the discrepancy between the historical Jesus and Jesus as the Church confessed him undermined the plausibility of that confession. To the Christ of faith they opposed the real, historical Jesus. At the same time, liberal figures in the "old quest," like A. von Harnack, took a similar tack, though with a different goal. Their goal was not to discredit Christianity but to reconcile it with modernity, and to this end they appealed to the historical Jesus as the basis and norm of Christian faith. Thus Harnack sought contemporary relevance by proposing the historical Jesus and his simple message as the essence of Christianity, while dismissing the patristic doctrines about Jesus' divine status and inner constitution as a cultural husk whose day had passed.

The same maneuver toward the same goals can be observed among some exegetes as well as systematic theologians in the period of the "third quest" as well. For these scholars the historical Jesus is the real Jesus, and the real Jesus ought to be the basis and norm of Christian faith. This apparently commonsense approach masks, however, an ambiguity. There is no doubt that the real Jesus is the Jesus who lived two thousand years ago. This is the Jesus about whom historians inquire. This is also the Jesus whom Christians confess as Christ, Lord, Son of God. But when Reimarus, Harnack, and now scholars like Funk identify the historical Jesus with the real Jesus, they are claiming that historical inquiry has an exclusive franchise on the objective truth about Jesus. Such a claim is inflated, on two scores. First, the difference between the historical Jesus and the Christ of faith is epistemological, not substantive. The two terms refer, not to two different entities, but to one and the same entity grasped according to two distinct modes of knowing, each with its own scope, operations, and conditions for objectivity. Hence, to restrict the reality of Jesus to what can be grasped by historical method betrays a positivist constriction of human knowing. On the other hand, a refusal in principle to engage the significance of what historical research proffers constitutes fideism.

Furthermore, an analysis of what constitutes a historical portrait of Jesus discloses why no such portrait can of itself provide the basis and norm of Christian faith. The goal of arriving at a historical portrait of Jesus involves one in three distinguishable sets of historical operations. First, there is the question of determining what data are relevant as possible sources of historical information about Jesus. Answering that question imposes such tasks as determining dates for the possibly relevant sources, ascertaining the literary relationships among them, and delving into their prehistory. Conventionally, these have been the tasks that have defined source and form-critical analysis of the New Testament and related documents. Second, there is the task of extricating from the sources a set of more or less probable facts about Jesus—what he actually did and said. This task has been pursued through the application of such criteria as the principles of embarrassment, dissimilarity, multiple attestation, and coherence, though these criteria have themselves been subject to critique and refinement, and alternative procedures have also been proposed. Third, once such a set of facts has been established, they become data for the further question of what they add up to, what image renders them historically intelligible within the world of the first century. Though logically distinct from and posterior to the second question, in practice there is an interplay between image and facts. One commonly begins with some image, or several, as a hypothesis and then employs it or them as a heuristic guiding one's critical probe of the sources for determining the facts about Jesus; in the process that initial hypothesis is confirmed, revised, or replaced.

Thus, the historical Jesus refers to a complex construct that rests on a set of more or less probable judgments about what sources are relevant and to what degree. There follows a second set of judgments, again of greater or lesser probability, determining what Jesus actually said and did. Those judgments, in turn, supply the data for yet another judgment regarding what image or images best renders the facts constituted by the second set of judgments historically intelligible. The historical Jesus, concretely, is always someone's historical Jesus and always in principle subject to revision. Hence, appeals to the historical Jesus as the real Jesus that should norm Christian faith are misguided.

On the positive side, the project of historical inquiry about Jesus serves christology as a strong counterweight to the perennial tendency toward docetism. It provides a vivid reminder that the one whom his disciples came to confess as Christ, Lord, and Son of God first encountered them as one like them in all things except sin, as a first-century Jew among his fellow Jews. Furthermore, when historical reconstructions of Jesus' earthly career are drawn into the horizon of Christian faith, the coherence of these images and narratives with the transformative values appropriated in the tradition's confession of Jesus as the Christ may come to light. Then, in a manner analogous to the initial formation of the christological tradition, these historical constructs may provide the material for new christological symbols and postcritical narratives that function to disclose both Jesus' identity as the self-presence of God to the community and the values inherent in a response of faith to this Jesus as the Christ.

Bibliography: A. SCHWEITZER, The Quest for the Historical Jesus, tr. W. MONTGOMERY (New York 1968). G. BORNKAMM, Jesus of Nazareth, tr. I. and F. MCLUSKEY (New York 1961). E. P. SANDERS, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia, Pa. 1985). J. CROSSAN, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco, Calif. 1991). J. MEIER, A Marginal Jew, 3 vols. (Garden City, N.Y. 1991, 1994, 2001). N. T. WRIGHT, Jesus and the Victory of God (Philadelphia 1996). M. POWELL, Jesus as a Figure in History (Louisville 1998).

[W. P. LOEWE]

14. CHRIST AND THEOLOGIES OF LIBERATION

Historical consciousness recognizes the historical process and all the societies and cultures it has brought forth as the product of human agency. Humankind therefore faces the task of assuming responsibility for history itself. Theologically, this requires reconceiving sin and grace as factors in conflict not only in the lives of individuals but in the dynamics of globalization presently at work in the economies, politics, and cultures of every human society. In this context, a theological discernment of "the signs of the times" becomes a crucial dimension of proclaiming the gospel.

Against this background, the full significance of the projects of liberation theologies and their European counterpart, political theology, stands forth. Latin American liberation theology began with the insight that the poverty endemic to the peoples of Central and South America is more than an unfortunate state of affairs. Rather, situations in which a wealthy elite in service to neocolonial economic powers control the political institutions of society and maintain their status by violent means if necessary stand opposed to God's will. Such situations are sinful. In addition, in Latin America the societies in question have been culturally Catholic, and the Church has been complicit in creating and sustaining them.

Hence, liberation theology begins with a call to repentance. Theologically, this translates into the exercise of a hermeneutics of suspicion that asks what elements of the Christian tradition may have contributed to the present sinful situation. With regard to christology, two traditional images of Christ come under criticism. First, popular devotion to the suffering Christ has functioned ambiguously. Concentration on Christ's suffering apart from his resurrection fosters a christology of resignation that serves to reconcile victims of social injustice to their state in life; the element of protest implicit in the image of Christ suffering remains latent. Second, the image of the imperial, conquering Christ too easily colludes with the imperialist projects of the colonial and neocolonial eras in Latin America, inducing docility in those whom such projects oppress and exploit.

Liberation christologies begin from within the faith of the Church, but rather than starting from the classic dogmas of Christ's divinity and inner constitution, they seek to historicize those dogmas through recourse to narratives that explicate the redemptive significance of belief in Jesus as Son of God and Son of Man. Hence, they commonly appeal to the historical Jesus and his praxis as the starting point and basis of their christological narratives. This appeal differs significantly, however, from the maneuver noted above, in which the historical Jesus refers epistemologically to Jesus as reconstructed by historical-critical methods and in which such reconstructions are accorded a normative basis for critique of Christian belief. The historical Jesus, for liberation theologians, refers rather to Jesus as a historical subject and to the account of his praxis that emerges from a reading of the Synoptic Gospels, in some cases augmented by results of the "new quest," from the perspective of the impoverished and oppressed peoples of Latin America. This is a reading from faith to faith quite different from the positivist reductions of Enlightenment authors and their successors.

As the Son of God in history, Jesus proclaimed and enacted the reign of God, and this commitment placed Him in solidarity with the economically exploited, politically oppressed, and socially marginalized among his people. His ministry assumed a conflictual character that eventually led to His death. Jesus called twelve disciples to his inner circle, signaling that the time of Israel's renewal was at hand. He cured the ill, including those among them who were ritually unclean, and He proclaimed God's forgiveness to prostitutes and sinners. He challenged scribes and Pharisees and denounced the wealthy. Finally, He unmasked the violent, murderous character of the anti-reign and the system it sustained and, celebrating a final meal with his disciples, He poured himself out in loving trust of the Abba-God whose reign He proclaimed. Though the establishment condemned and executed him, God raised Him up and made him a life-giving Spirit to those who would find in following him the gift and task of liberation from the idols of this world. In Jesus' life, death, and resurrection they discover God's salvation urging them to continue Jesus' struggle for justice in the sure hope that not even death can overcome the power of self-sacrificing love.

Bibliography: I. ELLACURIA and J. SOBRINO, eds., Mysterium Liberationis: Fundamental Concepts of Liberation Theology (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1993). J. SOBRINO, Jesus the Liberator: A Historical-Theological Reading of Jesus of Nazareth, tr. P. BURNS and F. MCDONAGH (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1993).

[W. P. LOEWE]

15. FEMINIST CHRISTOLOGIES

The women's movement began with a challenge to the taken-for-granted character of the cultural and social place commonly assigned to women. Rather than reflecting the natural order of things, women's relegation to inferior and dependent status derives from patriarchy, an unjust system of relations in which males dominate the social order. Patriarchy, in turn, finds cultural expression in androcentrism, which accords universality to male experience, so that reality comes to be defined from a male perspective.

Applying the analytic concepts of patriarchy and androcentrism to the Christian tradition, feminist theologians find that Jesus' maleness has become entangled in an androcentric set of dualisms that associate the male with spirit, rationality, and power and the female with matter, emotion, and weakness. Hence, it comes to seem self-evident that women be excluded from roles of leadership and decision making within a hierarchically ordered ecclesial community. At the same time, Jesus' redemptive passion becomes a warrant for women to accept not only their subordinate role but even, in the extreme, the violent abuse that can accompany it.

For Christian feminists, the tradition is ambiguous, not simply oppressive, and hence they pursue a hermeneutics of remembrance. Like liberation theologians, they highlight the iconoclastic Christ of the Synoptic Gospels whose proclamation and enactment of the reign of God brought wholeness and liberation to the marginalized and oppressed of society. Without claiming that Jesus was a feminist, they note within all four gospel narratives the ways in which Jesus transgressed the social code of his day. Thus, Jesus healed and exorcized women; he formed friendships with women, called them to discipleship, taught them, and included them in His entourage as He pursued His itinerant ministry. Further, His address to God as “Abba” subverted patriarchal conceptions of both God and human fatherhood. In contrast to Peter and the male disciples who fled upon Jesus’ arrest, the women were faithful to Jesus to the end. The empty-tomb narratives portray women as the first to hear the good news of Jesus’ resurrection, and Mary Magdalen is the first to see the risen Lord.

Pushing behind the gospel narratives, feminist biblical scholars find indications that the early Jesus movement was a community of equals in which women exercised leadership roles conjointly with men, functioning as apostles, prophets, and heads of household churches. Soon, however, the mores of the Hellenistic world prevailed, and the same Paul who numbered women among his co-workers and declared that in Christ there is neither male nor female, also admonished women to cover their heads and be silent in church.

Classical dogma also yields liberating insights. In rejecting subordinationism and confessing Christ’s co-equality in divinity with the Father, the Council of Nicea (325) limned the mystery of ultimate reality as no isolated and monadic supreme monarch but as constituted by a community of persons with relationship at its very heart. Human beings, it would then follow, created in the image of God, are fundamentally relational and achieve their humanity through participation in community. The Council of Chalcedon (451), in turn, so distinguished person from nature that the former is never reducible to the latter, an insight that counters every form of sexism and racism.

Yet according to feminist theologians, the mysteries of Trinity and Incarnation find androcentric expression when Christians weekly profess belief “in one God, the Father almighty . . . and in His only Son, Jesus Christ.” Despite the constant doctrine of the divine transcendence, the dominant imagery of God in the Christian tradition has been male and so fosters the androcentric dualism that devalues women and deprives the tradition of the insights generated by women’s experience. To overcome this imbalance, feminist theologians turn to scriptural passages that ascribe maternal concern to God and that image divine creativity and redemptive activity as birthing; at the same time, they trace out a trajectory that continues this feminine imagery for God and Christ in patristic literature and in the writings of medieval doctors and mystics.

The biblical wisdom tradition plays a central role in the feminist project of recovery and reconstruction. Starting from the Greek literature of the late Old Testament period that personifies the divine wisdom in the figure of a woman, Sophia, who is preexistent agent of creation, and continuing in the New Testament, where Jesus is portrayed as both Sophia’s emissary and her embodiment, the wisdom tradition offers a resource for constructive re-articulations of the mysteries of Trinity and Incarnation that bring balance to the dominant Logos tradition.

Bibliography: R. RUETHER, Sexism and God-Talk: Toward a Feminist Theology (Boston, Mass. 1983). E. A. JOHNSON, She Who Is: The Mystery of God in Feminist Theological Discourse (New York 1992). A. CARR, Transforming Grace: Christian Tradition and Women’s Experience (New York 1988). E. SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (New York 1983); Jesus Miriam’s Child, Sophia’s Prophet (New York 1994).

[W. P. LOEWE]

16. JESUS CHRIST AND WORLD RELIGIONS

At the Second Vatican Council the Roman Catholic church adopted a new stance of ecumenical openness not only to other Christian communities but to the great world religions as well. The council’s “Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions” affirmed the genuine holiness and truth to be found in Hinduism and Buddhism. It expressed high esteem for Islamic belief and worship, and it recognized the special ties and common heritage that bind Christians to Jews. With respect to all, the council urged dialogue and collaboration.

With this stance of openness and appreciation toward other world religions, the council was retrieving an ancient stream of Christian tradition. Patristic writers like Justin Martyr had expressed an inclusive universality whereby Christians recognized in both Judaism and Hellenistic philosophical culture the work of God’s Logos. More typically, however, in the context of Christendom an exclusive attitude came to prevail, emblemized in the famous phrase of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) “extra ecclesiam, nulla salus.”

Distinctively, contemporary cultural factors fostered the council’s revival of a more inclusive tradition. Foremost among these is globalization, the process carried out by international economic networks and electronic communications media rendering different cultures immediately present and interactive with one another. Interaction becomes interpenetration as geopolitical and economic factors unleash new waves of migration, so that temples and mosques are taking their place on the Western landscape among the more familiar synagogues and churches; religious communities formerly distant and strange to one another now find themselves neighbors. Globalization, in turn, hastens the end of Eurocentric classicism, while contemporary anthropology suggests an empirical understanding of human cultures as constructs based on particular, historically generated sets of meanings and values, an understanding congenial to Vatican II's acknowledgment of other religions and their beliefs as responses to the questions posed by "the profound mysteries of human existence."

Recognition of religious authenticity in other world religions requires development in the Christian understanding of the salvific role of Jesus Christ. How is this central Christian belief to be conceived when no historical mediation of the Christ-event to the majority of the world's population can be discerned, when universal conversion to the Church seems an unlikely possibility, and when God's saving grace is acknowledged outside of Christianity?

Karl Rahner addressed this issue in a manner particularly congenial to the stance expressed in the council's declaration. On the one hand, he argued, God's efficacious will to save is universal, so that being human is as such conditioned by a "supernatural existential"; if human beings find their authentic humanity in fidelity to the unrestricted desire they experience to know the real and love the good, the secret of that desire, its origin and goal, is the lure of Holy Mystery, God's own self-offer in grace. Furthermore, human beings are intrinsically historical and social, requiring a mediation of grace that meets these dimensions of their humanity. Thus, on wholly inner-Christian grounds Rahner could conclude to the likelihood that it is precisely through the world religions as historically and socially constituted that God's saving grace is mediated to most of humankind. Yet this in no way relativizes either the Christ-event or the Church, for in the plan of salvation history Christ becomes, in scholastic terms, the final cause of the grace mediated through the world religions, while the Church functions as sacrament rendering present and explicit the meaning of the grace operating anonymously, as it were, in the world religions.

Rahner's position and variants on it break with Christian exclusivism, recognizing salvific efficacy in other religions. At the same time, they maintain intact the basic Christian narrative of salvation history, the story of preparation for Christ, His Incarnation, death, and Resurrection, His continuing presence in the Church until the Second Coming. Other religions now find a place in this story as mediators of the grace that heads toward Christ and is available in its fullness in the Church. Much as in Justin Martyr, Christianity now, in a sense, includes the other religions, recapitulating, correcting, and fulfilling them. Other religions have value, but that value is ultimately constituted by Christ and imperfect in comparison with the Christian Church. In this sense, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Islam join Judaism as praeparatio evangelica, even if the preparatory period is now likely to perdure until the eschaton.

Once religious authenticity is recognized in other religions, however, further questions arise. If in other religions God's salvation is indeed being mediated through savior figures other than Christ, what becomes of the Christian confession that He and He alone is universal savior? Similarly, on what grounds does one decide a priori that all other religions are in some way deficient and imperfect in comparison to Christianity? Do not the dogmatic assumptions of even an inclusive Christian approach to other world religions betray an unconscious hubris and lingering traces of Western cultural imperialism? Does not Christian inclusivism therefore ultimately reduce to the former exclusivism?

Among Catholic theologians, issues such as these have animated the work of R. Panikkar, P. Knitter, and R. Haight. On the position toward which they head, Jesus is one savior among others, decisive for Christians and deserving their total religious commitment, and also relevant to all other human beings. The savior figures of other religions are similarly decisive for their devotees and relevant to all, so that each religion remains itself while open to learn from the distinctive religious experience and insights of the others.

This position involves, in the work of all three, a radical christological revision. Pannikar, for example, elaborates a distinction between Christ and Jesus: Christ symbolizes the expressive dimension of ultimate reality, a non-dualistic theandric principle, and while Jesus' identity is fully constituted as the embodiment of Christ, Christ is in no way exhausted in that embodiment. Hence, while one may say that Jesus is Christ, one may not say simply that Christ is Jesus, for Christ is also Krishna and many others.

In the name of completely open dialogue, Knitter has espoused moving beyond the christocentrism of positions like Rahner's, first to a theocentrism like that expressed in the mission of self-understanding of the historical Jesus, and ultimately, since not all religions are theistic, to a soteriocentrism stance. New Testament passages that clearly express an exclusive view of Jesus as the sole savior can be ascribed to various cultural conditioning factors, and such passages are to be regarded as confessional, performative language rather than declarative assertions. To say, for example, that Jesus is Lord is always to say that Jesus is Lord for me, not that He is universally Lord. With regard to the Incarnation, both Knitter and Haight argue that Johannine symbolism must not be allowed to overpower the dynamic and evolving diversity of New Testament expressions of Jesus' religious significance, nor must such symbolism be literalized.

This linguistic requirement holds especially for the interpretation of the classical dogmas of Nicea and Chalcedon, whose point, Haight asserts, reduces to the saving presence of God in the man Jesus, such that Jesus is the symbol of God for Christians. From this perspective, contemporary interpretations of the Chalcedonian formula like Rahner's become dogmatically arbitrary when they assert that the Incarnation can occur but once.

A declaration from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in 2000, Dominus Iesus, met such revisionist christologies with a firm reiteration of traditional Catholic belief. Other theologians, notably Jacques Dupuis, find in the classic Christology and Trinitarian theology of the Christian tradition ample resources for addressing issues of religious pluralism and interreligious dialogue. First, Chalcedonian dogma suggests recognition of the historical and cultural particularity of both Jesus and the Church. While affirming that the identity of Jesus is that of the eternal Son of God, Chalcedon stressed that in the Incarnation the Son became fully human, "like us in all things except sin." Under contemporary cultural conditions, in which the empirical counts for as much as the essential, faith does not cease to recognize in Jesus the Incarnate Son. Faith also, however, perceives him as a first-century Jew with all the limitations of experience and knowledge implied by that ancient and alien cultural particularity. By His kenosis, the Son of God accepted the conditions of human historicity.

The same holds for the movement issuing from Him. The Church's expression of the mystery of grace that constitutes it is always subject to historical limitation and, precisely as the expression of mystery, that understanding and expression will always remain imperfect, analogous, and subject to development. Because the Church's identity and redemptive mission is always realized through concrete historical experience, it follows that at any moment the Church only exists as culturally embodied and thereby also limited.

If the Chalcedonian dogma of the hypostatic union bespeaks the human particularity and limitation of both Jesus and the Church, Nicea and I Constantinople suggest positive principles for Christian engagement with the world religions. The First Council of Constantinople confessed the full divinity of the Holy Spirit. Christians discern in their authentic religious experience, in their desire to love the Lord their God with their whole hearts, the gift of God's Holy Spirit, the Spirit whose love in turn illumines their minds to recognize God as triune and to recognize in Jesus and His Church the mediators of God's love to them. Yet by that same principle Christians may discern the operation of God's Holy Spirit in the authentic religious experience mediated by the other world religions as well.

This stance in no way implies a simple relativism. For all the historical particularity of Jesus and His Church, Christians will also recall Nicea's doctrine that given the full divinity of the Son, whatever can be said of the Father can also be said of the Son and vice versa, save what is proper to being precisely Father or Son. In that case, recalling the imperfect and analogous character of their understanding of the truth of God as triune mystery, Christians will advance into dialogue open to discerning in other world religions the operation of the Spirit who is always Spirit of both the Father and the Son and to enriching their understanding of the triune divine mystery from the experience and insights of other traditions.

In dialogue with other world religions, Christians encounter interpretations of Jesus in conflict with their own. In Judaism the Talmud reflects polemical antagonism, portraying Jesus as the illegitimate son of Mary and a Roman soldier, who performed wonders by black magic and was rightfully executed as a sorcerer. The contemporary scene reflects a softening of these harsh attitudes. Among some Jewish scholars there is a movement to reclaim Jesus as one of their own people. They stress, for example, his affinities with the Pharisaic movement of His day as well as His resonances with the classical prophetic tradition. For all this, however, Jews stand firm in rejecting Christian claims to a messianic title for Jesus. In their view, the messianic day of salvation clearly did not arrive with Jesus' advent. Rather, history continues as before, bloodily unredeemed, and Israel's sufferings have only intensified at the hands of those who claim to follow Jesus in the Christian churches.

Islam honors Jesus a son of the virgin Mary, a miracle-working prophet raised up by God to confirm the Torah and to prepare the way for a greater prophet yet to come. Jesus died a natural death, not at the Romans' hands on the cross. With their confession of Jesus' divinity, Christians crudely betray the utter transcendence of Allah.

Hindus like M. Gandhi have discerned in Jesus' teaching strong affinities with the way of bhakti, loving devotion and surrender to God. Yet they strongly reject the claim that in Jesus alone the divine has become incarnate even while they seem to devalue any incarnation as an occurrence in history and hence in the realm of the ultimately unreal.

In such conflicts over Jesus and His religious significance, two things should also be noted. First, each contested issue also points to areas of common conviction, and, second, each can provide a stimulus to refined Christian self-understanding. With the experience of prophecy, for example, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam intersect, while Jewish resistance to Christian messianic claims can dislodge any naive and triumphalistic realized eschatology in favor of heightened attention to authentic redemptive praxis. Hindu devotion, in turn, can illumine the significance of contemporary reconstructions of the teaching of the historical Jesus.

Bibliography: K. RAHNER, "Jesus Christ in Non-Christian Religions," in Foundations of Christian Faith, tr. W. DYCH (New York 1978) 311–321. R. PANIKKAR, The Unknown Christ of Hinduism (rev. ed.; Maryknoll, N.Y. 1981). P. KNITTER, No Other Name? A Survey of Christian Attitudes toward the World Religions (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1985). R. HAIGHT, Jesus Symbol of God (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1999). J. DUPUIS, Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1997).

[W. P. LOEWE]

JESUS CHRIST, BIOGRAPHICAL STUDIES OF

Biographical studies of Jesus Christ represent primarily not a question of historiography about the presence and reliability of authentic documents on the event of His having lived a human life but rather a double theological problem: the knowability of the historical Incarnation (epistemology of the Incarnation) and the significance of this event for the Christian. This article follows along the ages the unfolding of these two inseparably connected problems in five sections: (1) Lives of Jesus based on simple faith, (2) Jesus and the critics, (3) Lives of Jesus in the English-speaking world, (4) the Catholic development from apologetics to Christology, and (5) the imaginative Lives of Jesus.

Based on Simple Faith. The canonical Gospels, besides their kerygmatic and liturgical purpose, reveal a true historical interest in the earthly life of Jesus, a biographical interest that must, however, be measured by the standard of contemporary thinking. Christians have always desired to know more about the full human reality of the life of Jesus, not only as far as it concerns their own historical origin but also because this earthly life of the Lord determines the true and full reality of their own Christian existence. The same attitude is evident in the apocryphal writings that tried to fill in the blank spaces in Jesus' life, especially in its early stages, and thereby distorted His teaching with many, mostly Gnostic, additions [see W. Bauer, Das Leben Jesu im Zeitalter der neutestamentlichen Apokryphen (Tübingen 1909) and J. Walterscheid, Das Leben Jesu nach den neutestamentlichen Apokryphen (Düsseldorf 1953)]. Beginning with Origen [see R. M. Grant, The Earliest Lives of Jesus (London 1961)] and Melito of Sardes, a more historical realism can be observed in the desire to identify actual locations in Christ's early life. Moreover, the account (c.

A.D. 400) of Egeria's pilgrimage to the Holy Land (see PILGRIMAGES, 2), the work of archdeacon Theodosius, De situ terrae sanctae (both given in Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 39:35–101, 135–150), and other similar writings (see B. Altaner, Patrology, tr. H. Graef 261–262) show that Christianity even at that early age understood itself as the continuation and historical unfolding of Christ.

In Early Christianity. Tatian's DIATESSARON (c. 170–180) was the first attempt to reconstruct the life of the Lord according to the Gospels. It had an enormous success in the Orient, and in some churches it even replaced the individual Gospels in the liturgy. Of doubtful authenticity, however, is the work of Ammonius of Alexandria (c. 220), who completed Matthew with marginal notes from the other Gospels (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 85:1381–92). In any case, this work was employed by Victor, Bishop of Capua (d. 554), as the basis for his Ammonii Alexandrini evangelicae harmoniae interprete Victore episcopo capuano, in which he used the Vulgate text (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 68:255–359).

A Spanish priest, C. V. Aquilinus Juvencus, approached the subject more freely by writing the life of Jesus, Historiae evangelicae libri IV, in the form of 3,211 hexameters. Caelius Sedulius first wrote the five books of his Paschale Carmen in verse, then completed it as Opus Paschale in prose (Patrologia Latina 19:354–752). In the early Middle Ages the same romantic approach is shown in CAEDMON's poetry (c. 680) and in CYNEWULF's The Christ [c. 750; see A. S. Cook, The Christ of Cynewulf: A Poem in Three Parts: The Advent, the Ascension and the Last Judgment (Boston 1910)]. Then there are the HELIAND (c. 850) in 6,000 verses [for the text see O. Behaghel (Tübingen 1958)]; the Liber evangeliorum theodisce conscriptus (between 863 and 871) by Otfried of Weissenburg, OSB; the Cantilena de miraculis Christi (1063) by Ezzo von Bamberg, which became the song of the Crusaders; and the Xristos Paschon (11th century), a dramatic presentation in 2,640 verses of Christ's death and Resurrection.

The Oriental Church, even in more recent times showed no similar interest in the earthly life of Jesus. Oriental piety is centered more in the risen and eschatological Lord who is present in the liturgical performance of the mysteries and the life of the Church. On the other hand, Islam presents a picture of Jesus that is concerned with details of his earthly life. It draws on two traditions, the Jesus portrayed in the Qur'ān, and Jesus the wandering ascetic pictured in hundreds of pious tales in later Arabic literature (eighth century Iraq). Many of the details in the Qur'ān and in these stories have parallels in the

Jesus healing the sick. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Gnostic Gospels. (see, T. Khalidi, The Muslim Jesus, Harvard University Press 2001).

In the Middle Ages. The CRUSADES and the typically FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALITY with its devotion toward the humanity of Jesus created a new attitude: pious meditation on the individual events in His life. The Meditationes vitae Christi of the 13th or 14th century had profound influence on art and literature until the 17th century. For a long time the work was attributed to St. BONAVENTURE, but its author was most likely a certain Johannes a Caulibus (or Laudibus), although his authorship of it has recently been contested. The Vita Jesu Christi e quatuor evangeliiis et scriptoribus orthodoxis concinnata by the Carthusian LUDOLPH OF SAXONY (1300–78) had 88 Latin editions and was translated into many modern languages. Almost as popular, especially in Italy, was the work De gestis Domini Salvatoris (15 v. 1338–47) by the Augustinian Simon Fidati of Cascia.

More scholarly interest is revealed in PETER COMESTOR's (d. 1179) Historia scholastica (Patrologia Latina 198:1053–1722), which includes a life of Jesus, and in Guyart des Moulin's Bible Historiale (1291–94). Moreover, the great scholastics dedicated a special part of their Christologies to the mysteries of the life of Jesus (see, e.g., St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 3a, 31–57).

From the 15th to the 17th Century. In this period the Gospel harmonies served as basic patterns for the lives of Jesus. Some examples are: Jean GERSON (d. 1429), Monotessarion (printed in 1471); Cornelius JANSEN (the Elder), Bishop of Ghent, Concordia evangelica seu vita Jesu Christi ex quatuor evangeliiis in unum caput congesta (Douai 1571); Antonius Bruich, Monotessarion breve (Cologne 1539), noteworthy because of the author's keen sense for the truly historical; William of Branteghem, a Carthusian from Antwerp, Jesu Christi vita iuxta quatuor evangelistarum narrationes (Antwerp 1537), with several French translations; and Sebastian Barradas, SJ, Commentaria in concordiam et historiam evangelicam (Coimbra 1599). Christian Andrichomius, a priest of Delft, Holland, published under the pseudonym Christianus Crucis his Vita Jesu Christi ex quatuor evangeliiis breviter contexta (Antwerp 1578). The Spanish theologian Alfonso SALMERÓN, SJ, edited his Commentaria in evangelicam historiam (Madrid 1598). Late products of the same type were George Hesper, SJ (d. 1686), Vitae D.N. Jesu Christi monotessarion evangelicum, and M. Azibert, Synopsis evangeliorum historica seu vitae D.N. Jesu Christi quadruplex et una narratio (Albi 1897).

Of the Protestant contributions especially noteworthy is Andreas OSIANDER's Harmonia evangelica graece et latine (Basel 1537). Osiander, who firmly believed in the verbal inspiration of the Scriptures, reconstructed the life of Jesus with much care by using exclusively the words of the Bible. Other Protestant harmonies are: M. Chemnitz, Harmonia quatuor evangelistarum, continued and published by his student P. Leyser (1593–1611); J. Clericus (Amsterdam 1699); N. Toinard (Paris 1707); and J. J. Griesbach, Synopsis evangeliorum Matthaei, Marci et Lucae (Halle 1774–76, 4th ed. 1822). In the 20th century a number of Catholic authors attempted Gospel harmonies with varying degrees of success: S. Hartdegen (in English, Paterson, New Jersey, 1942), R. Cox (in English, Auckland 3d ed. 1954), A. Tricot (in French, Tournai 2d ed. 1946), and J. Bover (in Spanish, Barcelona 1943).

Chapel of Nativity. (Archive Photos)

The meditative types of the lives of Jesus were restored under the influence of St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA. In his spiritual exercises the 2d and 3d weeks were consecrated to meditations on the life of Christ. N. Avancini's (d. 1611) Vita et doctrina Jesu Christi had more than 50 editions. P. de Ribadeneira, Vida y misterios de Cristo Nuestro Senor, Luis de la Puente, Meditaciones de los misterios de nuestra S. Fe (Valladolid 1605, followed by more than 400 editions), and many other similar writings emphasized the meaning of Christ's earthly life for the Christian's own life.

The age of the Reformation, besides making a greater use of vernacular languages, introduced a more acute sense of the historical. Examples in this category are: Ludovico Filcaja, Vita del nostro Salvatore Jesu Christo (Venice 1548); Laurence Forer, SJ, professor at Ingol-stadt and Döllingen, Das Leben und Leiden Jesu Christi (Munich 1637); Bernard de Montereuil, SJ, Vie du Sauveur du monde Jésus-Christ, tirée du text des IV évangiles reduite en un corps d'histoire (Paris 1639, reed. many times); G. S. MENOCHIO, the well-known exegete, Historia sacra della vita . . . del nostro redentore Gesù Cristo (Rome 1633); and Nicholas Letourneux, Histoire de la vie de N.S. Jésus-Christ (Paris 1678; somewhat Jansenistically infected). Sebastian Le Nain de Tillemont, the famous French Church historian, wrote as an introduction to his monumental work on the first six Christian centuries a very solid and critical life of Jesus. The greatest success of the 17th century was Martinus Linus von Cochem, OFMCap, Leben und Leiden Jesu Christi (Frankfurt 1677), which from the fourth edition (1860) on was entitled Das grosse Leben Christi. Still being reprinted in the early part of the 20th century, it has had some 260 editions.

"Salvator Mundi," oil painting on wood panel by Andrea Previtali showing Christ as Savior of the World, 1519. (©National Gallery Collection; by kind permission of the Trustees of the National Gallery, London/CORBIS)

In the 18th Century. A. CALMET presented his excellent Histoire de la vie et des miracles de Jésus-Christ (Paris 1720) as a worthy contribution of his exegetical research. The outstanding life of Jesus published in that century was the Histoire de la vie de N.S. Jésus-Christ depuis son Incarnation jusqu'à son Ascension (3 v. Avignon 1774) by F. de Ligny (1709–88). This work, often reissued and translated into English, was regarded as a classic in France until J. E. Renan's superseded it.

The most original life of Jesus from this period was written by Clemens M. Brentano. It was based on the visions of Anna Catherina EMMERICH (1774–1824). The Passion story was published first (Sulzbach 1833), then came the three volumes of Das Leben Jesu (ed. K. E. Schmöger, Regensburg 1858–60), and finally the collection of all visions, which included the life of Mary, appeared under the title Das arme Leben und bittere Leiden unseres Herren Jesu Christi (Regensburg 1881, 5th ed. 1920; English tr. 2d ed. London 1907).

Jesus and the Critics. A revolutionary change came about between 1774 and 1778 when G. E. LESSING published the Wolfenbüttel Fragmenten of an unknown author [English tr. by A. Voysey, a deist, The Object of Jesus and His Disciples as Seen in the New Testament (1879)]. The "Fragments" were parts from the Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftige Verehrer Gottes, by Hemann Samuel REIMARUS (1694–1768), a teacher of Oriental languages in Hamburg. In Reimarus's writing, which he himself did not dare to publish, the postulates of DEISM (of English origins and propagated on the Continent by Voltaire, J. J. Rousseau, and by the Encyclopedists) confronted, for the first time, the historical reality of the Incarnation. According to Reimarus, Jesus was merely a man whose doctrine did not go, in its content, beyond the Jewish-apocalyptic expectations of the kingdom of God; His Resurrection was a fraud perpetrated by the Apostles.

Christ ascending from tomb, painting. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Earlier Rationalists. J. S. Semler's immediate answer (Halle 1779) could not stop the growing flow of rationalistic attacks on the real life of Jesus. K. H. G. Venturini's (1768–1849) Natürliche Geschichte des grossen Propheten von Nazareth (3 v. 1800; 2d ed. 4 v. Jena 1805) is full of exaggerations. He proposed a frivolous view of the Nativity, and according to him Jesus was crucified by the disillusioned populace and brought back to life by His friends after His apparent death. Venturini alluded to an ESSENE affiliation of Jesus, a theory that was taken up by Salvator in his Life of Jesus (2 v. Paris 1838). A much milder, more esthetic approach was shown in J. G. von HERDER (1744–1803), Vom Erlöser des Menschen nach unseren drei ersten Evangelien (Riga 1796) and Von Gottes Sohn der Weltheiland nach Johannes Evangelium (Riga 1797). Herder was the first to insist that any historical harmonization between John and the Synoptics must be regarded as impossible. H. E. G. Paulus

Detail of a fresco showing "Christ in Glory," 1157–1188, the Panteon de los Reyes, Colegiata de San Isodoro, Leon, Spain. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

(1761–1851) in his Das Leben Jesu als Grundlage einer reinen Geschichte des Urchristentums (2 v. Heidelberg 1828) mercilessly eliminated everything that is miraculous or supernatural.

Later Rationalists. F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER'S (1768–1834) mild resistance to these rationalistic interpretations in his Berlin University lectures on the life of Jesus (1831–32, ed. posthumously by Rüterich, Berlin 1864) was soon followed by the most extreme and logical explosion of rationalistic thought. D. F. STRAUSS (1808–74), who had attended Schleiermacher's lectures, published Das Leben Jesu kritisch bearbeitet (2 v. Tübingen 1835; English tr. The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, from the 4th German ed., London 1846, 3d ed. 1898). Influenced by G. W. F. HEGEL, Strauss first proposed the myth theory: although Jesus of Nazareth was a historical person, in the preaching of His disciples the true facts of His life and teachings were completely covered by Old Testament messianic dreams and other mythological imaginations; unintentionally the Gospel story became nothing else but a presentation of primitive Christian ideology that resembled history. Later, Strauss published a somewhat milder version of his ideas in Das Leben Jesu für das deutsche Volk bearbeitet (Leipzig 1863). However, in answering the publication of Schleiermacher's lectures, he returned to his extreme views in Der Christus des Glaubens und der Jesus der Geschichte (Berlin 1865).

The uproar of criticism from all over Germany quickly revealed the weak points of Strauss's rationalism. He had completely neglected sound and serious textual criticism and interpreted the Gospel history entirely on the basis of his philosophical presuppositions. One of his most renowned critics was J. A. W. Neander (1789–1850) in Das Leben Jesu Christi (Hamburg 1837; English tr. The Life of Jesus Christ, London 1851). Another leader of the Vermittlungs-Theologie who was strongly critical of Strauss was J. P. Lange (1802–84); he published a life of Jesus in three volumes (1844–47; English tr. 4 v. 1872).

In France, J. E. RENAN (1823–92) published, as the first volume of his Histoire des origines du Christianisme, his La Vie de Jésus-Christ (Paris 1863; English tr. London 1864). In Germany, Renan was not taken seriously, and his book was not translated into German until 1895. Actually, his Life of Jesus was a literary rather than a scholarly achievement. Renan proposed a legend hypothesis in order to do away with the miraculous and supernatural. According to him, Jesus was a likeable, peace-loving, good rabbi, and only the contradictions of His contemporaries turned Him into an apocalyptic revolutionary. In answering Renan, more than 95 books were published in France; one of the best was Jésus-Christ, son temps, sa vie, son oeuvre (2 v. Paris 1865; English tr. London 1869) by E. D. de Pressensé (1824–91), a conservative Protestant. Also, the Catholic A. J. A. GRATRY answered in Jésus-Christ, réponse à M. Renan (Paris 1864).

Liberal School. The rationalistic bias of Strauss and Renan and of many other authors of the same trend had a greater impact on the public mind than on the scholarly theological research that was represented by the so-called liberal school in Germany. Basing themselves on the substantial historical reliability of Mark, the liberals tried to understand psychologically the personality of Jesus, especially His messianic consciousness. The main representatives were K. T. Keim (1825–78), Die Geschichte Jesu von Nazara (3 v. Zürich 1867–72; English tr. 6 v. London 1873–83), a moderately rationalistic work that rejected the Resurrection and insisted on the priority of Matthew; K. A. von Hase (1800–90), Geschichte Jesu (Leipzig 1876), the first survey of previous lives; H. J. HOLTZMANN (1832–1910); and B. Weiss (1827–1918), Leben Jesu (2 v. 1882), of which the English translation, The Life of Jesus (Edinburgh 1883), was a standard book in its time.

The school of comparative religion tried to explain the phenomenon of Christianity as a natural development arising from the contemporary religious situation, from Hellenism, from Oriental influences, and especially from Esserie-apocalyptic speculations. Among its main representatives were: A. Hilgenfeld (1823–1907); O. Pfeiderer (1839–1908); and especially W. BOUSSET (1865–1920), who endeavored to deduce Christianity from Hellenistic influences on Jewish religious thinking in his Jesus (Halle 1904; English tr. London and New York 1906) and particularly in his Kyrios Christos (Göttingen 1913, 3d ed. 1926). A modern representative of this trend is R. OTTO, Reich Gottes und Menschensohn (Munich 1934, 3d ed. 1954; English tr. Boston 1943, repr. 1957).

Toward the end of the 19th century the eschatological school came into prominence. J. Weiss (1863–1914) in his Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes (Göttingen 1892) made the first attempt at a consistent eschatology: Jesus was not a moral preacher as the liberals thought; He announced the imminent coming of the eschatological kingdom of God in which He would be revealed as the true Messiah. A. Schweitzer (1875–1965), in his studies on the lives of Jesus, Von Reimarus zu Wrede (Tübingen 1902) and Geschichte der Leben Jesu Forschung [Tübingen 1906, 6th ed. 1951; English tr. The Quest for the Historical Jesus (London 1954)], developed the concepts of “interim ethics” and “imminent parousia.” For the later development of the eschatological school, see W. G. Kümmel, Verheissung und Erfüllung (Zürich 1945; English tr. Promise and Fulfillment, London 1957). Kümmel rejected not only Schweitzer’s views but also the more moderate “realized eschatology” of C. H. Dodd and T. W. Manson and the “center eschatology” of O. Cullmann, and he insisted on God’s active presence in Christ.

Form Criticism School. The problem of MESSIANISM, not yet fully answered, was forced to retreat in favor of an even more basic question, raised by Biblical FORM CRITICISM. W. Wrede (1859–1906) in his Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (Göttingen 1901) overthrew the Marcan hypothesis that sought to derive all early Christology from Mark. After the publication of M. Köhler’s (1835–1917) Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus (Leipzig 1892; rev. E. Wolf, Munich 1953, 2d ed. 1956; English tr. Philadelphia 1964), it became more and more axiomatic that there was an insurmountable abyss between the Christ of faith, presented in the Gospels, and the Jesus of history, of whom we have very little information.

The principles of the form criticism proposed by H. GUNKEL for the Old Testament were first applied to the Gospels by M. Dibelius and R. Bultmann. They endeavored to show that these accounts had been formed and shaped by the faith consciousness of the primitive Christian community. Events and teachings were selected and emphasized according to their existential meaning for Christian life (Sitz im Leben). K. L. Schmidt in his Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (Berlin 1919) pointed out that even the chronological and topographical data of the Gospel stories were chosen and arranged in order to illustrate doctrinal tenets.

Bultmann, by pushing this method to its extremes, reduced one’s total knowledge of the historical existence of Jesus to a merely subjective belief in His call to conversion. The only really meaningful thing for Christian existence in the life of Jesus is that one perceives God’s eschatological call for decision. All the rest of the Gospel stories stems from mythological attempts for a human realization of this call. In order to make the essential message of the Gospels acceptable to modern man, the Gospels must be demythologized (see DEMYTHOLOGIZING). “I do indeed think that we can now know almost nothing concerning the life and personality of Jesus, since the early Christian sources show no interest in either and are, moreover, fragmentary and often legendary; and other sources about Jesus do not exist” [Jesus and the Word (London 1934) 8; from the German Jesus, Berlin 1926, 2d ed. 1951].

Dibelius was less radical than Bultmann. In his Jesus (Tübingen 1926; 3d ed. Berlin 1960; English tr. 1949) and also in his earlier Die Botschaft von Jesus Christus (1935; English tr. 1939), he tried to recognize a historical process in the life of Jesus. Still, also for him everything is centered on the actuality of the kingdom of God that in Jesus came irresistibly and closely upon us.

Reaction. The post-Bultmannian Protestant research worked hard to overcome the extreme conclusions of the master. G. Bornkamm, in his Jesus von Nazareth (Stuttgart 1956, English tr. New York and London 1960), still had a rather negative outlook: for him the Jesus of history can be known only as a sign, not as a reality. E. Käsemann [“Das Problem des historischen Jesus,” Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche 51 (1954) 125–153 and “Neutestamentliche Fragen von heute” ibid. 54 (1957) 1–21] and E. Fuchs [“Die Frage nach dem Historischen Jesus” ibid. 53 (1956) 210–229, and “Glaube und Geschichte im Blick auf die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus,” ibid. 54 (1957) 117–156] insisted emphatically that the Christ of faith could not be divorced from the Jesus of history. Along this line most of the modern scholars, such as N. A. Dahl, H. Riesenfeld, G. Ebeling, J. Jeremias, H. Diem, have prepared the way for a more positive view and have tried to free the exegesis from the contamination of philosophical presuppositions. A faith without fact, without a person at its center, means mere DOCETISM. All of Bultmann’s critics have agreed that the problem must be restated. New methods were already proposed by W. Grundmann, Die Geschichte Jesu Christi (Berlin 1957), and especially by E. Stauffer, Jesus: Gestalt und Geschichte [Bern 1957; English tr. London 1960; see also his Die Botschaft Jesu (Bern 1959)]. H. Conzelmann, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 621) thinks that, against the basic conclusion of the form criticism, it is now generally accepted that the faith of the primitive community was not exclusively based on the Easter events but rather went back substantially to the historical life of Jesus. H. W. Bartsch, although accepting the continuity between the life and teachings of Jesus and the KERYGMA of the primitive community, still does not wish to base the Christian faith on the Jesus of history [Das historische Problem des Leben Jesu (Munich 1960)].

Other Non-Catholic Works. In France, there are two recent standard works on the life of Jesus: M. Goguel's Jésus-Christ (Paris 1930; English tr. The Life of Jesus, New York 1933, repr. 1960), with an excellent chapter, "The Life of Jesus in Research" (37–69), with full bibliographical information; and C. de Guignebert's Jésus (Paris 1933; English tr. New York 1935, repr. 1956), which is completely rationalistic.

The best work of Jewish scholarship on the life of Jesus is J. Klausner's Jesus of Nazareth (Hebrew original, 1925; German tr. Berlin 2d ed. 1952; English tr. New York 1953). An interesting attempt was made by A. Robert, Jesus of Nazareth: The Hidden Years (English tr. from the Fr., New York 1962), to understand the human religious life of Jesus from its devout Jewish background.

The English-Speaking World. The problems in the research on the life of Jesus in Germany affected also the English-speaking world. However, English and American scholars refused to accept the extreme conclusions of the 19th-century rationalism or those of the 20th-century form criticism. There were exceptions; e.g., C. C. Hennel, a retired London merchant, in his book, An Enquiry concerning the Origins of Christianity (London 1838), followed the lines proposed by Strauss. (Strauss himself wrote the foreword to the German translation of 1840.) In his Myth, Magic and Morals: A Study of Christian Origins (London 1909) and The Historical Christ (London 1914), F. C. Conybeare claimed that Paul's fictitious Christ of the faith who appears in the Gospels and in the dogmas of the Church is entirely different from the Jesus who lived in reality. In the United States, J. MacKinnon Robertson (1856–1933), Christianity and Mythology (1900) and Jesus and Judas (1927), and W. B. Smith (1850–1934), The Pre-Christian Jesus (1906), are the representatives of radical views.

Before World War II. Among the lives of Jesus written in English in the 19th century are: F. W. Farrar, Life of Christ (London 1874), an impressive Christian answer to Renan, which in one year had 12 editions; J. C. Geikie, The Life and Words of Christ (2 v. London 1877); A. Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (2 v. London 1883), erudite but at times lacking in critical judgment; and W. SANDAY, Outline of the Life of Christ (Edinburgh 1909, a reprint of his article from J. Hastings and J. A. Selbia, eds., Dictionary of the Bible).

Several works on the life of Christ appeared in the 20th century before World War II: E. Digges la Touche, The Person of Christ in Modern Thought (London 1912); T. J. Thorburn, Jesus the Christ: Historical or Mythical? (Edinburgh 1912); A. C. Headlam, The Life and Teaching of Jesus Christ (1923); A. W. Robinson, The Christ and the Gospels (1924); J. Warschauer, The Historical Life of Jesus (London 1927), based on A. Schweitzer's principles; S. J. Case, The Historicity of Jesus (Chicago 1912); and Jesus: A New Biography (Chicago 1927), written in a truly Christian spirit and judged by J. M. Robinson to be the best available; C. Gore, Jesus of Nazareth (1919); B. W. Bacon, Jesus the Son of God (1930); F. C. Burkitt, Jesus Christ (1932); B. S. Easton, Christ and the Gospels (1930), and What Jesus Thought (1938).

Since World War II. Among the lives of Christ published since 1945 are: V. Taylor, The Life and Ministry of Jesus (1945); G. S. Duncan, Jesus, Son of Man: Studies in a Modern Portrait (1947); C. J. Cadoux, Life of Jesus (1948); E. J. Goodspeed, Life of Jesus (1950); H. E. W. Turner, Jesus, Master and Lord (2d ed. 1954); H. R. Fuller, The Mission and Achievement of Jesus (1954); W. E. Bundy, Jesus and the First Three Gospels (1955); L. F. Church, The Life of Jesus (1957); and J. Knox, Jesus, Lord and Christ (1958).

Critical Works. The English answer to the messianic problem was given by the school of realized eschatology, represented by scholars such as C. H. Dodd in his History and the Gospel (1938), W. Manson in his Jesus the Messiah (1943), and T. W. Manson in his The Servant Messiah: A Study of the Public Ministry of Jesus (1953). According to these scholars Jesus understood Himself in the sense of a synthesis of the concepts of the SON OF MAN and that of the Servant of the Lord (see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF THE) combined with the idea of the presence of the kingdom of God.

In regard to the problems raised by form criticism, the extreme conclusions were not accepted by scholars in England or the United States. Some exceptions were A. E. J. Rawlinson, F. C. Grant, and especially W. E. Bundy in his Jesus and the First Three Gospels (1955). In a symposium [see Expository Times 53 (1941–42) 60–66, 175–177, 248–251] V. Taylor, T. W. Manson, and C. J. Cadoux, though agreeing that it is impossible to write a real biography of Jesus, still rejected the Bultmanian exaggerations in this regard. Also, G. V. Jones, Christology and Myth in the New Testament [(London 1956) 14–16, English bibliography], and H. E. W. Turner, Jesus, Master and Lord (London 2d ed. 1954) are on the conservative and constructive side.

In fact, all over the world the-life-of-Jesus research seems to have taken a more positive turn. J. M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London 1959; German tr. Kerygma und der historische Jesus, Zurich 1960, with more recent bibliography) rejects the attempts of the school of realized eschatology and of E. Stauffer and thinks that the problem has to be reformulated on an existentialist basis. According to Stauffer the historian mediates and builds a bridge for his generation to persons who lived in the past. He can do this on the basis of the Gospels also in regard to Jesus. Thus, by using the historical-critical method properly one can arrive at the very words of Jesus and so reach beyond the understanding of the primitive Church to the true understanding that Jesus had of His own existence. E. Käsemann may be correct, however, in his “The Problem of the Historical Jesus,” Essays on New Testament Themes (London 1964) 15–47, in saying that a historian may state the existence of the riddle of Jesus but he will never be able to answer and solve it.

Catholic Development from Apologetics to Christology. Lives of Jesus written by Catholics in the 19th century and the first decade of the 20th, which were based on the assumption of the full historical value of the Gospels, are still of value despite the valid observations of form criticism. Worthy of mention are: P. J. Schegg, Sechs Bücher des Lebens Jesu (2 v. Freiburg 1874–75); P. Naumann, Das Leben unseres Herren und Heilandes Jesus Christus (3 v. Prague 1875–77); J. Grimm, Das Leben Jesu nach den vier Evangelien (7 v. Regensburg 1876–99); P. H. J. Coleridge, The Life of Our Life (London 1869); J. N. Sepp and D. B. HANEBERG, Das Leben Jesu (7 v. 1843–46, 4th ed. Munich 1898); A. J. Maas, The Life of Christ according to Gospel History (4th ed. St. Louis 1891; repr. 1954); Christ in Type and Prophecy (New York 1893–96); and “Jesus Christ,” The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. Herbermann et al. 8:374–385.

In French, E. Bougaud, Jésus-Christ (Paris 1884), and P. Didon, OP, Jésus-Christ (2 v. Paris 1891; English tr. New York 1891), are both more devotional than scholarly, yet the latter is based on serious research. The real answer to Renan was given by H. C. Fouard, La Vie de N.S. Jésus-Christ (2 v. Paris 1880, 21st ed. 1911; English tr. 1891). Equally thorough and scholarly is É. P. LE CAMUS, La Vie de N.S. Jésus-Christ (2 v. Paris 1883; English tr. 1908).

Apologetical Works. Noteworthy achievements among the more recent apologetical lives of Jesus are: H. Felder, Jesus Christus (2 v. Paderborn 1911–14; English tr. Christ and the Critics, London 1924); A. Meyenberg, Leben Jesu Werk (3 v. Luzern 1922–32); and L. C. Fillion, Jésus-Christ (3 v. Paris 1922; English tr. St. Louis 1928–29). Deserving of special mention are: L. de GRANDMAISON, Jésus-Christ, (2 v. Paris 1928, 23d ed. 1941); M. Lepin, Jésus-Christ, sa vie et son oeuvre (Paris 1912) and Le Christ Jésus, son existence historique et sa divinité (Paris 1929), both still ranking among the best; M. J. LAGRANGE, L’Évangile de Jésus-Christ (Paris 1929, 2d ed. 1954), which unites modern criticism with Catholic orthodoxy; and J. LEBRETON, The Life and Teaching of Jesus Christ, Our Lord (French ed. 2 v. Paris 1931, 2d ed. 1947; English tr. London 1935, repr. 1950). J. Sickenberger, Das Leben Jesu nach den vier Evangelien (Münster 1933), is somewhat outdated; J. Christiani, Jésus-Christ, fils de Dieu (3 v. Lyons 1934); and A. GOODIER’s The Public Life of Jesus (3 v. London 1930) and The Passion and Death of Jesus (London 1933) are devotional rather than scholarly.

Interesting among the most modern publications are: F. M. Willam, Das Leben Jesu im Lande und Volke Israel (10th ed., Freiburg 1960–61; English tr. St. Louis 1944), which paints an excellent portrait of Jesus’ contemporary settings; J. Pickl, Messias König Jesus (Munich 1939; English tr. St. Louis 1946), which gives a good picture of Roman military life and guerrilla warfare and conveys new insights into the Passion of Jesus; and W. Beilner, Christus und die Pharisäer (Vienna 1959), which elaborates on another important aspect on a solid exegetical basis. More comprehensive lives are: G. Ricciotti, The Life of Christ (Milan 1941; English tr. Milwaukee 1947); H. Daniel-Rops, Jesus and His Times (New York 1956, from the French); and A. FERNÁNDEZ TRUYOLS, The Life of Christ (Madrid 1954; English tr. Westminster, Maryland 1958). The most recent work by an American Catholic is F. J. Sheen, Life of Christ (New York 1958).

Theological Works. After the modernistic assumptions of a gradual and purely human development of Jesus’ messianic consciousness had been rejected, Catholic authors, in treating the psychological problem of the life of Jesus, were more concerned about the Chalcedonian orthodoxy of the metaphysical divine sonship than about the reality of a truly human historical existence. The turn is marked by P. Galtier, L’Unité du Christ (Paris 1939). R. Guardini, Der Herr (Würzburg 11th ed. 1959; English tr. The Lord, Chicago 1937, 5th ed. 1954); K. Adam, Jesus Christus (Düsseldorf 8th ed. 1949; English tr. The Christ of Our Faith, New York 1957); and A. Graham, The Christ of Catholicism (London 1947) fully acknowledge the modern theological and psychological problem of the life of Jesus without sacrificing Catholic orthodoxy. The reinterpretation of Jesus' consciousness of His own divinity—for which, according to K. Rahner and J. Galot, the beatific vision does not seem any more to be a conditio sine qua non—makes it possible to accept a real, human, historical progress in His life. How much of this life can be reconstructed on the basis of Biblical and archeological research remains another problem. But according to H. Vögtle (Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. Hofer and K. Rahner, 5:923) a minimalistic evaluation of the cognoscibility of the historical facts of Jesus' human life can be much more erroneous than the basic confidence in the truly historical value of the Gospel narratives.

The theological problem here lies, perhaps, not so much in going back beyond the Christ of faith to the Jesus of history—for here the answer depends entirely on the different ecclesiological conceptions—as in the transition from the Jesus of history to the Christ of faith. What was the basis on which the Apostles recognized and accepted this Man as the Messiah and, ultimately, as the trinitarian Son of God? Was their faith and the subsequent faith of the Church founded on the life of Jesus that was exposed to everybody, to all human observation and judgment? Or is the historical human life of Jesus to be regarded as the visible sacramental presence of which the inner mystery—now and then flashing through the mortal exterior in the strange aura of miraculous phenomena—cannot be comprehended by merely human intelligence but solely by the faith that is a grace given by God?

The rationalistic refusal to accept the Jesus of history in order to save the transcendent God of reason; the liberal attempts to consider the life of Jesus as a purely human and moral phenomenon so as to save Jesus the man in His admirable human reality; or Bultmann's concern to save the divine reality of Jesus by demythologizing the Gospel and reducing the divine in Him to mere subjectivity; or all the other Protestant theories that change the full reality of the Incarnation of the Word to a mere "word event" (Wortereignis)—all are ultimately rooted in the confusion over the radical theological problem of a true ontological encounter between God and man in the mystery of the Incarnation. In the Incarnation, as Rahner states, not only is an individual human nature assumed by the Son of God, but also the whole of human history is assumed by Him. As the historical Jesus He became part of man's mortal history, and through His death, Resurrection, and Ascension He transcended it and became the Lord of history. Only after a due clarification of such essentially theological problems, and particularly those concerning the dynamic, personal, social, and ontological structure of the Incarnation, will it be possible to reconsider successfully the hitherto somewhat Monophysitically—either too divinely or too humanly—conceived life of Christ.

Imaginative Lives of Jesus. T. Ziolkowski divides the fictionalizing biographies into two principal groups. There is the group that he calls "modern apocrypha," a blend of scholarship, fiction, and literary forgery, that claim to be based on documents, newly discovered, that throw new light on the life of Jesus—notably on the so-called Silent Years before he began his public ministry. A notable example of this kind of fictional biography is La vie inconnue de Jésus Christ by Nicolas Notovitch (1894). Notovitch, a Russian war correspondent, alleged to have discovered an ancient "Life of Saint Issa, Best of the Sons of Men," during his travels to Tibet in 1887. Another example of this kind of apocrypha is Der Benan-Brief published by Ernst von der Planitz (1910), based on the letter allegedly written by Benan, a priest at Memphis, who described how Jesus' reputation as a great healer dates from the time he was studying medicine in Egypt.

The second group of fictionalized biographies had precedents in the early Latin poets, the mystery plays of the Middle Ages, and modern literature that aimed to make the figure of Jesus appealing to contemporary audiences and had as their purpose pious meditation on his life. In more recent times the most widely circulated was Ernest Renan's Vie de Jésus (1863) "whose critical insufficiency is matched only by its aesthetic charm" (Ziolkowski). Although Renan manifested an anti-Christian bias, his work owed its popularity in large part to the fact that many moderns are more interested in the human reality of Jesus than in His divinity—although in a way that does not necessarily exclude faith in His divinity. Giovanni Papini argued in his introduction to his Story of Christ (Storia di Cristo, Florence, 1921), perhaps the greatest success since Renan, that since every generation has its own concerns it is necessary to translate the Gospel into their terms. Papini was followed by a series of "Jesus books" as varied as the points of view of their authors: F. Timmermann, Das Jesuskind in Flandern (1923); Emil Ludwig, Der Menschensohn (1928); D. Mereshkowsi, Jesus the Unknown (1932) and Jesus Who Is to Come (1934); Shalom Asch, The Nazarene (1939); Edzar Schaper (converted to Catholicism in 1952), Das Leben Jesu (1936); and Fulton Oursler, The Greatest Story Ever Told (1949). For all its factual detail Jim Bishop's effort to describe The Day Christ Died (1957) as if he were a journalist reporting the day's news from Jerusalem is a fictional account. Two of the most imaginative (and popular) fictionalizing biographies in the mid-twentieth century were Robert Graves's King Jesus (1946) and Nikos Kazantzakis's The Last Temptation of Christ (1953). Despite Graves's claim that "every important element in the story is based on some tradition however tenuous” and that he took pains to verify the historical background, it reflects his pagan sympathies. Kazantakis makes no pretense at historical accuracy. His is a bold and highly personal interpretation of Jesus. “That part of Christ’s nature which was profoundly human,” he writes in the prologue, “helps us to understand him, and love him and to pursue his Passion as though it were our own.”

It should be noted that these fictionalizing biographies must be distinguished from another genre that Ziolkowski calls “fictional transfigurations.” The latter are works of fiction that take Jesus’ life as a pattern for an entirely modern plot much as James Joyce did with Odysseus in his Ulysses. Among Ziolkowski’s examples are such twentieth-century novels as Thomas Mann’s The Magic Mountain, John Steinbeck’s Grapes of Wrath, Ignazio Silone’s Bread and Wine, and Nikos Kazantzakis’ The Greek Passion. The parallels are essentially formal. Often the Christ-figure in works of this genre has little resemblance to the moral values and religious attitudes of the Jesus of the Gospels.

Bibliography: J. M. BELLAMY, Les Biographies nouvelles de N.S. Jésus-Christ et les commentaires récents de l’Évangile (Vannes 1892). W. SANDAY, The Life of Christ in Recent Research (New York 1908). W. D. MACKENZIE, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 7:505–551. H. WEINEL, Jesus im 19. Jahrhundert (3d ed. Tübingen 1914). G. BALDENSPERGER, “Un Demi-siècle de recherches sur l’historicité de Jésus,” Revue de théologie et de philosophie 12 (1924) 161–210. F. M. BRAUN, Où en est le problème de Jésus? (Paris 1932). J. KLAUSNER, Encyclopedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 10 v. (Berlin 1928–34) 9:52–77. E. F. SCOTT, “Recent Lives of Jesus,” Harvard Theological Review 26 (1934) 1–32. H. ANDERSON, Jesus and the Christian Origins: A Commentary on Modern Viewpoints (New York 1964). A. PATON and L. POPE, “The Novelist and Christ,” The Saturday Review of Literature (Dec. 4, 1954). R. DETWEILER, “Christ and the Christ Figure in American Fiction,” The Christian Scholar (Summer 1964). T. ZIOLKOWSKI, Fictional Transfigurations of Christ (Princeton 1972).

[C. H. HENKEY/EDS.]

JESUS CHRIST, ICONOGRAPHY OF

The early Christians had images of Christ made for their own veneration despite the Biblical prohibition (Ex 20.4) against the making of images. Eusebius of Caesarea wrote that in his own day images of Christ and the Apostles going back to apostolic times still existed (Ecclesiastical History 7.18). According to Irenaeus (Adversus haereses 1.25.6), the heretical Gnostics and Carpocratians venerated or worshiped effigies of Jesus, Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle. An image of Jesus, together with those of Abraham and Orpheus, was venerated in the lararium of the Emperor Alexander Severus.

It is not possible to determine if any of these images were intended to represent the true likeness of Christ. However, one can assume that the anthropomorphic representation of Christ was not posterior to, but was either contemporary with, or even anterior to, the representation of Christ by symbols. This would appear to be true even in the face of the opposition of Church Fathers such as Irenaeus, Eusebius, and Epiphanius to the making of such images. Also, the Council of Elvira (c. 315) had condemned the making of religious pictures (Picturas in ecclesia esse non debere, ne quod colitur et adorabitur in parietibus dipingatur).

Physical Types. Each period created the type of Christ it desired, since neither the New Testament nor patristic literature provides a physical description of Jesus. In general, there are two types, one based on Ps 44(45).3, “Fairer in beauty are you than the sons of men; grace is poured out upon your lips”; and the other on Is 53.2, “There is in him no stately bearing to make us look at him, nor appearance that would attract us to him.” In the Acts of the Martyrs, which probably reflects a popular tradition, Christ always appears as youthful and beautiful (Acta Andr. et Matth. 33; Mart. Mt. 13).

From the very beginning, these two types were further divided into subcategories. The young, beardless Christ was represented as a lad with short, curly hair (sarcophagus, Musée Lapidaire, Arles, early 4th century; strigillated Christ, Peter sarcophagus, Lateran Museum, Rome, late Tetrarchian period, 300–310; clipeus sarcophagus, Lateran Museum), as a boy with long, curly hair (statuette of seated Christ, Museo Nazionale, Rome c. 360; Christ on a sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, Vatican Grotto), as an older but still youthful man with short, curly hair (mosaic of Christ between Archbishop Ecclesius and S. Vitale, Ravenna, 6th century), and as a youth with long hair (arcade sarcophagus, Lateran Museum, c. 350–360; Ascension on an ivory relief, National Museum, Munich, c. 400; mosaic of the Good Shepherd, Mausoleum of Galla Placidia, Ravenna, c. 440; mosaic of Christ and Apostles in the squinch of the baptistery, S. Lorenzo, Milan, 355–397).

The youthful types of the beardless Christ were derived from the image of the Good Shepherd, which was always represented as a youth according to the custom of entrusting boys with the task of tending sheep. This type was dominant in antiquity to the 5th century, in Ravenna to the 7th century. It occurs in representations of Christ as Orpheus, Christ as the Thaumaturge, and even in those of Christ as Teacher and Pantocrator. The image persisted in the West through the Ottonian period, after which it appeared only sporadically: mosaics, St. Mark’s, Venice, end of the 13th century; Timoteo Viti (1467–1523), Art

"Head of Christ Crowned with Thorns," oil painting on wood panel after Guido Reni, c. 1640–1749.

Master of the Aachen Altar, Christ appearing to Mary, 1485. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Gallery, Brescia; Bernardino Luini (1470–1532), Ambrosian Gallery, Milan; Giovanni Antonio Boltraffio (1467–1516), Carrara Academy, Bergamo. An older but still beardless type appears in “The Redeemer” by RAPHAEL (Municipal Art Gallery, Brescia). A heroic beardless Christ dominates the Last Judgment in the Sistine Chapel by MICHELANGELO.

The bearded type of Christ appeared at the turn of the 4th century concurrently with the appearance of the historical representation of New Testament scenes and persons. Since the 5th century this has been the major mode of representation of Christ in both East and West, except in Ravenna and in the Carolingian and Ottonian West. In addition to the beard, the style of which changes from period to period, Christ wears long hair, parted in the middle. Although the Nazarenes did wear their hair long, in contrast to the Romans, it was not the intent of the artist to show an ethnic type of Christ. Rather, it was traditional for Prophets and angels, creatures more than human, to be represented as wearing the hair long; moreover, philosophers and teachers continued to wear their hair long, and even retained their beards, after the custom had gone out of existence. The aim was to invest the image of Christ with something of the transcendental.

The bearded type, in its turn, was subdivided into a full-bearded one and another wearing only cheek and chin beard, with the upper lip clean-shaven. The fully bearded type, which became typical in the East after the 8th century and also dominant in the West after the Ottonian period, was used originally for representations of Christ as the True Philosopher (polychrome fragment of a frieze sarcophagus, Museo Nazionale, Rome, c. 300), as the Miracle-Worker (Jona sarcophagus, Lateran Museum, end of 3d century), as Christ in Majesty or the Law-Giver (mosaic of Christ between SS. Cosmas and Damian, apse of SS. Cosmas and Damian, Rome, 6th century; sarcophagus fragment, Museum of S. Sebastiano, Rome,

Bronze crucifix, detail showing head and shoulders of the Christ figure, Ottonian, 11th century. (Marburg-Art Reference, Art Resource, NY)

c. 370), and as Pantocrator (Daphni, Greece, c. 1100; wall painting of Christ Blessing, Boiana, near Sofia, 1259).

The second type, which is rare, appears in the following works: a 5th-century mosaic of Traditio Legis, S. Costanza, Rome; Crucifixion fresco, S. Maria Antiqua, Rome, 8th century; Master of the Lyversberger Passion, "Jesus Crowned with Thorns," Cologne Art Gallery, 15th century; Hans Holbein the Elder (c. 1465–1524), "The Crucifixion," Augsburg Museum; Master of Mary's Life, "Crucifixion," Munich Art Gallery, 15th century; George Minne, wood engraving, "The Baptism of Christ," 20th century.

It has been suggested that these types of Christ were derived from pagan deities such as Zeus, Eros, Apollo, or Asklepios. But it is highly unlikely that the early Christians would have utilized these pagan types for the exemplification of Christ. There exists a legend of a painter who, having sought to depict an image of Christ according to a type of Zeus, was punished by having his hands withered by God (Theod. lect. 15). Moreover, the bearded and beardless types were not products of specific geographic areas of the Roman world representing ethnic types. The so-called Syrian and Semitic types of Christ were not developed in Syria and Palestine, and the contrasting youthful type was not a Western innovation; for the types of Christ did not depend so much on external influences as on the concept of Christ held in each period or area.

Thematic Types. The earliest representations, which have to do specifically with the theme of salvation and resurrection, depict Christ in a completely nonpersonalized manner; there are no distinctive traits of character or individuality in countenance or in the conformation of the body. Rather, images reflect a compromise between the classical ideal of physical beauty (kalos kagathos) and the description in Ps 44(45).<sup>3</sup>

At this stage of the development of Christian society, when persecution was rife and there were forebodings of doom of the empire, the ordinary believer was profoundly concerned with the assurance of his own salvation and the provision of a basis for hope of a resurrection and eternal life. Christ was for him a symbol of salvation. Thus the various representations of Christ on the painted walls of the catacombs corresponded to those passages in the Bible and in the writings of the early Church Fathers where the hope of redemption is expressed (Ex 34.23, 37.24; Is 40.11) Christ thus appears as a Good Shepherd as early as the 2d century, as Orpheus in the 3d century, and as the True Philosopher (Tertullian, Apol. 46–47). He might appear as Orpheus, since the story of the latter was considered analogous to that of the Good Shepherd. Orpheus, like Christ, had been able to charm with his music (redeem) the wild beasts (sinners, lost souls), and also, like Christ, to descend into Hades to redeem a soul incarcerated there.

As the Good Shepherd, Christ was represented wearing a tunica exomis and carrying a sheep on his shoulders or surrounded by sheep; as Orpheus he was dressed as a Phrygian; and as the True Philosopher, He wore at first, as Cynic philosopher, the pallium with breast and shoulder uncovered; but later, as a specifically Christian philosopher, a pallium that covered the entire body, and sandals. The portrait of the True Philosopher as Cynic corresponded to the description in Is 53.2.

As a result of the Christological controversies that took place from the 4th to the 7th century, a deliberate attempt was made to stress the human nature of Christ, if not the actual, historical Person. The task was difficult since neither the Gospels nor any other historical writings furnish a description of the real Christ. Descriptions of Christ, however, existed in legendary works. In the 8th century, John of Damascus described Jesus as being handsome and tall, with hair slightly curled, eyebrows very arched and meeting in the middle of the forehead; His face oval, complexion pale olive, and hair and beard the color of ripe corn. A 13th-century text, probably derived from a contemporary Greek source, is written in the form of a letter by Publius Lentulus, “president” of the people of Jerusalem, to Tiberius Caesar, in which Christ is described as tall, with fair long hair flowing down to the shoulders. “It is slightly crisp and curled, parted in the middle and falling on either side as in the custom of the Nazarenes. His cheeks are somewhat rosy, the nose and mouth are well shaped, the beard is thick and the color of a ripe hazel nut, like the hair it is short and parted in the middle.” His eyes are blue, at times flashing with sudden fire. “No man has ever heard Him laugh but often men have seen Him weep. . . . He is as handsome as a man can be.”

It is likely that the handsome images produced in the Gothic period, e.g., the Beau Dieu at Amiens and the Beau Christ at Rheims, are based on such a description as that in the letter of Lentulus, which had some currency during the period. St. Thomas Aquinas in his commentary on Psalm 44(45) stated that Christ possessed physical beauty of the highest order. Finally, according to Syrian legends, Christ had black eyes and a black beard.

Acheiropoietic Images. There are several “acheiropoietai,” or images made without the intervention of human hands; but from the existing evidence concerning them, these images no more correspond among themselves than do the descriptions that have come down. Perhaps the two most famous are the so-called Mandylion of Edessa, supposedly produced by Christ Himself for Abgar (preserved at S. Silvestro, Rome), and the veil of Veronica, supposedly an impress made by Christ Himself (preserved in the treasury of St. Peter’s, Rome). Another legend relates that a portrait begun by St. Luke was completed by angels (now venerated at the chapel of the Sancta Sanctorum, Rome); there is also a portrait supposed to have been given by St. Peter to the Roman senator Pudens (exposed on Easter Sunday at S. Prassede, Rome).

A resolution to difficulties surrounding the acheiropoietic images can be found in the statement made by St. Augustine that “the image of Christ according to the flesh has been created and modified by countless conceptions, all varying. His true likeness is unknown to us” (Conf.). St. Irenaeus also had said that “the physical features of Jesus are unknown.” Moreover, the New Testament had declared specifically (2 Cor 5.16) that we no longer know Christ according to the flesh. In the 4th century a true portrait of Christ would have been unthinkable (Epiphanius, Panarion haereseon 27.6.9).

Majestas Domini. Christian artists of the 4th and 5th centuries sought to represent the majesty of Christ. In one book of the New Testament, the Revelation, they found an image of Christ more mysterious than that of either the liturgy or the other books of the New Testament. In the Revelation the apparitions are closest to the ancient theophanies of Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. Illustrated Apocalypses that appeared from the 5th century on offer a magnificent history of the majesty of Christ.

German 13th-century stained glass panel depicting Christ. (Marburg-Art Reference, Art Resource, NY)

In the West the vision of the Lord surrounded by four winged creatures was detached from the total setting of the Apocalypse; it was made purely Christological and called Majestas Domini. In the 2d century, Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons, saw in the central figure of Ezechiel’s vision the Logos and in the tetramorphic cherubim the modes of operation of the Logos that were later fulfilled in the Apocalypse: “It is clear that the creator of the universe, the Logos, He who is seated on the cherubim, had delivered to us the Gospel under four forms” (Adversus haereses, Patrologia Graeca 7:1039). The four creatures resembling lion, ox, man, and eagle were generally interpreted as the four Evangelists. From Irenaeus the interpretation passed into the exegetical works of the Latin Church Fathers where it was available for the programming of artistic representations. According to the theologians of the Middle Ages, who called them sacramenta of Christ, they signified four aspects of His nature corresponding to the four principal moments of His earthly existence: Birth, Death, Resurrection, and Ascension. The compact formula was expressed in a sermon on the Ascension by Honorius of Autun: Christus erat homo nascendo, vitulus moriendo, leo resurgendo, aquila ascendendo (Patrologia Latina, 172:956). The distich summed up epigrammatically Christ's earthly career from birth through death and resurrection to final divinization and reunion with the Godhead.

"The Dead Christ," bronze sculpture by Giuseppe Sammartino, 1753. (©Mimmo Jodice/CORBIS)

Though it originated in the East, the figure of Christ surrounded by the four living creatures was given definitive form in the Carolingian period. A representation of Christ in Majesty appeared in the Evangelistary of Gudohin (751–754, Autun Library); He is flanked by angels in a large central clipeus and surrounded by the symbols of the four Evangelists. In the art of the Carolingian renaissance the image of Christ was patterned after the youthful figure in the mosaics and sarcophagi of the early Christian period. He is represented in this manner in the Evangelistary of Godescalc (Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris), a masterpiece of apocalyptic art. In ivories of the same period the imperial figure of Christ is shown seated in the midst of the four winged creatures. The type was maintained in the Romanesque period, as in the apsidal fresco of S. Clemente de Tahull.

The Christ in Majesty of Western art was derived from the Byzantine Pantocrator. But whereas the Pantocrator was always represented as a bust at the top of cupolas within the church, the Majestas Domini shows Christ seated on a throne either in the apse or on the tympanum of a portal. The portal was considered symbolic of the entranceway to revelation. The Majestas Domini in the portal tympanum greeted the pilgrim and the faithful. Suger said to the visitors at St. Denis that the beauty that illumines souls must direct them toward the light of which Christ is the true gateway (Christus janua vera).

In the 12th century the type became universal throughout the West. All of the exemplars represented the Majesty of the Lord and were enhanced with the figures of the Apocalypse and Old Testament visions. The fully developed type is found in 12th-century French sculpture, as at Moissac, Chartres, and Charlieu, and in Limoges enamels, all of which display a common image of Christ. Derived from successive redactions of apsidal frescoes of the preceding period, representations of the period from 1140 to 1160 are especially homogeneous.

In its beginnings monumental sculpture had translated mainly hieratic and frontal models, but the fiercely linear image of the miniatures, for example, gradually was ennobled. The frontal figure of the Byzantine Pantocrator was given classical qualities and made more supple. Though in Germany and Italy the type of Christ remained little changed from its Byzantine prototype, in France it acquired a new expressiveness and beauty. The last Majesties of Gothic sculpture reflect a humanizing tendency that is at a considerable remove from the hieratic tradition.

With the creation of the image of the Pantocrator and its Western derivatives, Christian art reached the acme of its representation of Christ as the Logos. Thereafter, it was concerned only with the Son of Man, subject to all the infirmities. The suffering Christ, the vir dolorum spoken of by Isaiah (53.3), was depicted as human in His frailty, reviled, spat upon, mocked, wilting under the blows of the scourges, bent under the weight of the cross, exhausted and in extremis on Calvary, and finally agonizing and dying on the cross.

The Dead Christ. The representation of the dead Christ, however, appeared at an earlier time in history. The change was brought about, probably during the Christological controversies in the Church from the 4th to the 7th century, by the necessity of emphasizing Christ's human nature, the reality of which had been denied by the Docetists. Eastern Christian art went straight to the heart of the problem by representing a dead Christ on the cross (Greek Psalter, 1066, British Museum, manuscript Add. 19352, fol. 87b; mosaic of the Crucifixion in the monastery of Daphni, Greece, 11th century).

The image of the dead Christ was revived by Nicetas Stethatos "Pectoratos" (Antidialogus and Dialexis), in accordance with the ritual of the Zeon of the Byzantine Church and the apthartodocetic doctrine on which it is based. Christ was depicted with bent head (Jn 19.30) and closed eyes but without any mark of suffering or of the scourging on His body, and with two separate jets, one of blood and the other of water, gushing out of His side wound to imply that the body was not in a state of decomposition. This representation was attacked by Cardinal Humbert as a representation of the antichrist, but it spread westward and appeared in Italy in the 13th century (Coppo di Marcovaldo, panel crucifix, Palazzo Comunale, San Gimignano). On the whole, however, Western artists refrained from the representation of an incorruptible body of Christ, and by and large they painted a fully dead Christ on the Cross, as in the many Luccan and Pisan Crucifixions of the 13th century.

Man of Sorrows. Christ portrayed as the Man of Sorrows seems at an opposite pole from triumphant representations of Christ in the earlier Middle Ages, and is also strikingly different in conception from the active Christ of Renaissance art.

In the 11th and 12th centuries the concept of a triumphant Christ was pervasive, and the High Middle Ages produced an idealized representation that is best seen in the Beau Dieu of Amiens. In the late 14th century appeared the fully developed type of the Man of Sorrows; it was frequently represented in the art of the 15th and early 16th centuries. In one class of representations Christ is shown standing with the crown of thorns on His head and pointing with His right hand to the wound in His side. The tragic crown of thorns replaced the actual royal crown in certain representations of Christ in the 12th century; subsequently it became an attribute of all representations of the suffering Christ, whether as the crucified or as the Man of Sorrows. Another class shows him seated on a rock or wooden block, wearily supporting His head with the right hand (sculpture, Heiligkreuzkirche, Gmünd, early 15th century). This type, the Christ in Distress, was influenced by the developed medieval iconography of the Patriarch Job on the dungheap, wearied by extreme physical suffering and the psychic torment of false comforters. A third class of representations is to be found in Italian art, where Christ stands in the tomb or is seated on it, with the Virgin and St. John or angels supporting Him.

In works of art from northern Europe the countenance of Christ as Man of Sorrows is filled with deep grief (Conrad von Einbeck, 1416, Moritzkirche, Halle). The suffering and sorrowful aspect of Christ was made explicit in a 15th-century painting by an anonymous Spanish master. His head is crowned with thorns, His brow is knit in anguish, and two large tears are on His eyelids, paralleled by two thin streams of blood on His cheeks. An inscription around the frame reads: O vos omnes qui transitis per viam, [attendite] et videte si este dolor similis sicut dolor meus. Albrecht Dürer returned to the subject several times during his career. In a final version of the Man of Sorrows in “The Small Passion” (1511), he depicted a tragic, isolated, and abject figure of Christ, with head in hand and face almost completely hidden in dark shadow cast by the lowered head. Dürer’s was the climactic representation of the figure of the Man of Sorrows.

The Crucifixion of Jesus Christ, sculpture by Bernini, in the Spanish monastery of El Escorial. (©Adam Woolfitt/CORBIS)

Humanity of Christ. The concept of the humanity of Christ was carried forward in Renaissance and baroque art. If God may not die, He may not despair either. Only man is subject to both despair and death. In the 17th century an awesome Christ appears in the art of Pacheco, Zurbarán, and Velázquez, who attempt to render the moment when He cried out: “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” (Mt 27.46). Christ is shown looking up to heaven in anguish, surrounded by the gloom of that “darkness at noon” in the image of the Cristo agonizante. The Veronica image of the suffering Christ provided a source for the Spanish painters Zurbarán and Velázquez in their creating of the Cristo agonizante; they transferred the visage to that of the crucified Christ to express the moment of “despair.”

Christ’s Humanity is shown also through His compassion for the multitude and for children. Rembrandt in particular depicted the tender Christ of the Gospels (“Disciples of Emmaus,” 1648, Louvre, Paris; “Christ Healing the Sick,” known also as “The Hundred Guilder Print,” c. 1642; “The Raising of Lazarus,” Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam). The 19th-century painter Fritz von Uhde, in whose works the influence of socialism is visible, depicted the Christ of the Poor in his “Suffer the Little Children to Come unto Me” (“Lasset die Kindlein zu mir kommen,” 1884, Museum der bildenden Künste, Leipzig) and “Come, Lord, Be Our Guest” (“Komm, Herr Jesu, sei unser Gast,” 1885, National-galerie, Berlin). The type of Christ appearing in Protestant art is related to the idealized description in the letter of Lentulus. The exception is the ethnic Christ of Rembrandt.

Christus Coelestis Medicus. In the 17th and 18th centuries, in part due to increased respect for the medical profession following upon improvement in the science of healing, a new type of Christ was created, which appears mostly in German art, although the earliest representation appears in Dutch art in 1510. Christ as Apothecary is shown behind a counter and surrounded by the paraphernalia of the druggist’s profession. This image had been prepared by the mystical speculations of such writers as J. V. Andreae (1586–1654), J. Arndt (1555–1621), and J. Boehme (1575–1624), but the seed for it may be found in the NT (Mt 9.12, Mk 2.17, and Lk 5.31) and also in the OT (Is 53.5). Tertullian, among the early Church Fathers, also makes reference to it (Adv. Marcionem 3.17.11).

Sacred Heart of Jesus. The Heart of Jesus image, or Caritate Christi, intended to demonstrate Christ’s all-consuming love for man, is based in general on the scriptural texts that speak of His compassion for man, and specifically on the vision of St. Margaret Mary Alacoque (1674). Past images of Christ shown pointing or looking at the wound of His side, or even spreading the gash, as in a Vision of St. Bernard by the Master of the Peringsdorfer Altar (Germanisches Museum, Nuremberg), contributed to the creation of the new image in which Christ is shown usually in half-length, pointing to a flaming heart in which the lance wound is shown, inscribed in a crown of thorns, surmounted by a cross. Though frequently repeated, this representation retains only the long hair and beard of the Pantocrator and otherwise is an example of the decline of Christian art. As a conceptual image of Christ’s love for man, it is aesthetically inferior to the compassionate Christ.

The Ethnic Christ of the Missions. The images of Christ that have come out of the missionary fields of Asia, Africa, and the Americas reveal no new concept of Our Lord, except ethnically. It is still the long-haired, bearded type of the West with, however, native features. If Christ, despite His Hebraic race, is to be conceived as representing universal human nature, the insistence of each people to look upon Him merely as representing one of their own kind is not an acceptable solution to the problem. His image should rise above all race so that in it one should be able to say that in Him “there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision or uncircumcision.”

In the 20th century, images of the Suffering Christ by G. Rouault and of the Crucified Christ by G. Sutherland and R. Lebrun are in the tradition of powerful representation by GRÜNEWALD and a host of German, Spanish, and French masters from Gothic to baroque times.

See Also: TRINITY, HOLY, ICONOGRAPHY OF; GOD THE FATHER, ICONOGRAPHY OF; HOLY SPIRIT, ICONOGRAPHY OF; CRUCIFIXION (IN ART); TREE OF JESSE; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, ICONOGRAPHY OF; LAST SUPPER, ICONOGRAPHY OF; DESCENT OF CHRIST INTO HELL; PENTECOST, ICONOGRAPHY OF; APOCALYPSE, ICONOGRAPHY OF; JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., ICONOGRAPHY OF; APOSTLES, ICONOGRAPHY OF; SACRAMENTS, ICONOGRAPHY OF; HOLY NAME, ICONOGRAPHY OF; SACRED HEART, ICONOGRAPHY OF; ICON.

Bibliography: J. E. WEIS-LIEBESDORF, Christus- und Apostelbilder (Freiburg 1902). F. DE MÉLY, “Le Christ achéropoïète de Sainte-Praxède,” Bulletin de la Société nationale des antiquités de France (1903) 182–183. P. LAUER, “Images achéropites du Christ,” ibid. 229–. G. STUHLFAUTH, Die ältesten Porträts Christi und der Apostel (Berlin 1918). L. HEILMAIER, “Der jugendliche Christus in der altchristlichen Volkskunst,” Die christliche Kunst 15 (1918–19) 236–. J. SAUER, Die ältesten Christusbilder (Berlin 1920). R. EISLER, Orpheus the Fisher (London 1921). J. SAUER, Die ältesten Christusbilder (Berlin 1923). G. E. MELLE, Christ’s Likeness in History and Art (London 1924). W. ROTHES, Christus, des Heilands Leben, Leiden, Sterben und Verherrlichung in der bildenden Kunst (Cologne 1924). V. SCHULZE, “Die Christus Statue in Panéas,” Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 24 (Giessen-Berlin 1925) 51–55. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 7.2:2393–2468. E. PANOFSKY, “Imago Pietatis,” in Festschrift für Max J. Friedländer (Leipzig 1927). K. HORN, Das Christusbild unserer Zeit (Berlin 1929). F. WALTER, Wie sah Christus aus? Ein Jerusalemfund (Munich 1930). H. PREUSS, Das Bild Christi im Wandel der Zeiten (Leipzig 1932). H. PRIEBE, Das Christusbild in der Kunst des 19. und 20. Jahrhundert (Berlin 1932). L. TANDELLI, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, lettere ed arti, 36 v. (Rome 1929–39) 16:856–880. C. C. DOBSON, The Face of Christ (Milwaukee 1933). W. F. A. VIFFER, Die Entwicklung des Christusbildes in Literatur und Kunst in der frühchristlichen und frühbyzantinischen Zeit (Bonn 1934). G. VAN DER OSTEN, Der Schmerzensmann (Berlin 1935). J. KOLLWITZ, “Christus als Lehrer und die Gesetzübergabe an Petrus in der konstantinischen Kunst Roms,” Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte

44 (Freiburg 1936) 45–66. E. PETERSON, “Le Christ Emperor,” Questions liturgiques et paroissiales 23 (1938) 282–287. G. DE JERPHANION, “L’Image de Jésus-Christ dans l’art chrétien,” Nouvelle Revue théologique 65 (Tournai-Louvain-Paris 1938) 257–283. P. MORNAND, Visage du Christ (Paris 1938), illus. F. VAN DER MEER, Maiestas Domini: Théophanies de l’Apocalypse dans l’art chrétien (Paris 1938). F. GERKE, Christus in der spätantiken Plastik (Berlin 1940). J. KOLLWITZ, Oströmische Plastik der theodosianischen Zeit (Berlin 1941). The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, Son of Man (Westminster, MD 1946), pictures and carvings by Indian, African, and Chinese artists. F. MADER and R. HOFFMANN, Christus in der Kunst (Munich 1947). J. KOLLWITZ, “Das Bild von Christus dem König und Liturgie der christlichen Frühzeit,” Theologie und Glaube 35 (Paderborn 1947–48) 95–117. P. DONCOEUR, Le Christ dans l’art français (Paris 1948). W. MERSMANN, Der Schmerzensmann (Düsseldorf 1952). H. P. L’ORANGE, Studies on the Iconography of Cosmic Kingship in the Ancient World (Oslo 1953) 124–197. Reallexikon zur deutschen Kunstgeschichte, v.3 (Stuttgart 1954). E. KITZINGER, “The Cult of Images in the Age before Iconoclasm,” Dumbarton Oaks Papers, 8 Harvard University (Cambridge, MA 1954) 83–151. F. OSLENDER and L. SCHREYER, eds., Das Antlitz Christi (Hamburg 1956). Imago Christi (Antwerp 1958), exhibition catalogue. T. BURCKHARDT, Principes et méthodes de l’art sacré (Lyons 1958) 107–137. L. SCHREYER, Das Christusbild und die Kunst des 20. Jahrhunderts (Salzburg 1960). C. IHM, Die Programme der christlichen Apsismalerei vom 4. Jahrhundert bis zur Mitte des 8. Jahrhunderts (Wiesbaden 1960). J. JOBÉ, Ecce Homo (New York 1962). H. AURENHAMMER, Lexikon der Christlichen Ikonographie.

[L. P. SIGER; L. A. LEITE]

JESUS PRAYER

A method of meditation that consists in the control of breath and bodily movement accompanied by the repetition of the name of Jesus to bring about an absorption in the presence of God. It postulates concentration of consciousness through an intensive exercise of those bodily organs in which spiritual potentialities are supposedly located. The method demands that, in a sitting position, subjects control their breathing and flex their muscles, concentrating on the heartbeat and repeating continually, “Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me,” while the will is relaxed in acts of forgiveness, mercy and hope in God. Its aim is not ecstasy, but a liberation of the understanding for the peaceful acceptance of union within the Word of God or the Silent Nameless One.

The origin of this kind of prayer is unknown, though hypotheses postulate the influence of ancient Indian Chakras technique on the Greek Fathers. In EVAGRIUS PONTICUS and MACARIUS THE EGYPTIAN there are traces of this practice; and THEODORET OF CYR speaks of prayerful breath control (Patrologia Graeca, 83:589), while Diadochus of Photice, HESYCHIUS OF JERUSALEM, GREGORY SINAITES, and Peter the Hagiorite (d. 734) mention different forms of the prayer “Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on us.”

In his Philocalia (Venice 1782) NICODEMUS THE HAGIORITE cites 38 spiritual treatises that mention the Jesus Prayer, and in modern times the archimandrite Paissy VELITCHKOVSKY popularized this kind of devotion as a Russian spiritual practice.

There is a trace of a similar kind of prayer in the West with BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (Sermones), Hugh of Balma, BERNARDINE OF SIENA.

Bibliography: J. HAUSHERR, “La Méthode d’oraison hésychaste,” Orientalia Christiana Analecta, 9 (Rome 1927) 101–209. I. BRYANCHANINOV, On the Prayer of Jesus: From the Ascetic Essays . . ., tr. FATHER LAZARUS (London 1952). G. WINKLER, “The Jesus Prayer as a Spiritual Path in Greek and Russian Monasticism,” in The Continuing Quest for God: Monastic Spirituality in Tradition and Transition, ed. W. SKUDLAREK (Collegeville, Minn. 1982), 100–113. K. WARE, “The Origins of the Jesus Prayer: Diadochus, Gaza, Sinai,” in The Study of Spirituality, eds. C. JONES, G. WAINWRIGHT, E. YARNOLD (New York 1986) 175–184. R. F. SLESINSKI, “The Philosophical Presuppositions of the Jesus Prayer,” Following the Star from the East: Essays in Honour of Archimandrite Boniface Luyckx, ed. A. M. CHIROVSKY (Ottawa 1992) 203–214. N. CORNEANU, “The Jesus Prayer and Deification,” Saint Vladimir’s Theological Quarterly 39:1 (1995) 3–24. K. VOGT, “The Coptic Practice of the Jesus Prayer: A Tradition Revived,” in Between Desert and City: The Coptic Orthodox Church Today, eds. N. VAN DOORN-HARDER and K. VOGT (Oslo 1997) 111–120. J. B. TRAPNELL, “The Mutual Transformation of Self and Symbol: Bede Griffiths and the Jesus Prayer,” Horizons 23 (1996) 215–241.

[F. X. MURPHY/EDS.]

JEURIS, PAULINE, ST.

In religion Sr. Marie Amandine, called by the Chinese, ‘the laughing foreigner’; martyr, religious of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary; b. Dec. 28, 1872, Herk-la-Ville, Belgium; d. July 9, 1900, Taiyüan, China. Without a doubt Pauline’s family was pious—four of the seven siblings entered religious life. Following her mother’s death (ca. 1879), the children were separated into several homes when her father was forced to seek work in a neighboring village. At age 15, Pauline became a secular Franciscan tertiary. Later she followed her sister Rosalie (Sr. Marie Honorine) into the novitiate at Antwerp and was herself imitated by their sister Mathilde. Now known as Sr. Marie Amandine, she was trained in Marseilles, France, as a nurse in preparation for service in the hospital Bp. Francisco Fagolla wished to establish in Shanxi. En route to her assignment, she met with Sr. Marie Honorine who was stationed in Colombo, Sri Lanka (then Ceylon). She undertook her work with joy until she fell seriously ill. Soon after her recovery the mission was besieged by the Boxers. Having died singing the Te Deum, she was beatified as a martyr with her religious sisters by Pope Pius XII, Nov. 24, 1946, and canonized, Oct. 1, 2000, by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: July 4.

Bibliography: G. GOYAU, Valiant Women: Mother Mary of the Passion and the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary, tr. G. TELFORD (London 1936). M. T. DE BLARER, Les Bse Marie Hermine de Jésus et ses compagnes, franciscaines missionnaires de Marie, massacrées le 9 juillet 1900 à Tai-Yuan-Fou, Chine (Paris 1947). L. M. BALCONI, Le Martiri di Taiyuen (Milan 1945). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 47 (1955) 381–388. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 40 (2000): 1–2, 10. 5503.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JEWEL, JOHN

Bishop of Salisbury and first official apologist of the new Elizabethan Church; b. Buden, Devonshire, England, May 24, 1522; d. Monkton Fairleigh, near Wiltshire, Sept. 23, 1571. After being educated at Merton and Corpus Christi Colleges, Oxford, he became a fellow of Corpus Christi in 1542, and a renowned teacher. With Mary Tudor's accession (1553), those suspected of Protestantism were dismissed from Oxford. Jewel lost his fellowship. Seeking refuge in Frankfurt, he supported John Foxe in his controversy with John Knox. Later he met Peter Martyr Vermigli in Strasbourg, and together they visited Zurich and Padua. Their letters, written between 1553 and 1555, provide a valuable source of historical data. Upon the accession of Elizabeth I (1558), Jewel returned to England and was sent in 1559 as disputant to refute the Roman Catholics at the Conference of Westminster. On Jan. 21, 1560 he was consecrated bishop of Salisbury, and he soon challenged the Catholics on three different occasions to show that certain Catholic practices could be proved by Scripture or the writings of the Fathers. His Apologia ecclesiae Anglicanae (1562), the first official pronouncement of the position of the Church of England, was answered by Thomas Harding (1516–72), a Louvain exile and former chaplain of Bishop Stephen Gardiner. For three years a bitter controversy continued between the students at Louvain and the Protestant divines in England, during which theological works gave way to political tracts. Jewel's writings were published in 1609 by Richard Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, and later edited by J. Ayre (4 v. London 1845–50).

Bibliography: J. JEWEL, An Apology of the Church of England, tr. J. E. BOOTY (Ithaca, N.Y. 1963). W. M. SOUTHGATE, John Jewel and the Problem of Doctrinal Authority (Cambridge, Mass. 1962). M. CREIGHTON, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 10:815–819. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church 726. M. SCHMIDT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3:663–664.

[M. A. FRAWLEY]

JEWISH PHILOSOPHY

Jewish philosophy may be described as the explication of Jewish beliefs and practices by means of general philosophical concepts and moral norms. It must thus be seen in a twofold manner: as an outgrowth of the Biblical-rabbinic tradition on which Judaism rests and as a part of the history of philosophy at large. Whereas the Biblical and rabbinic writings developed within the Jewish community, Jewish philosophy flourished whenever Jewish thinkers participated in the philosophical speculations of an outside culture. And though significant differences, both religious and philosophical, distinguish ancient and medieval from much of modern Jewish thought, the subject matter of Jewish philosophy may generally be divided into three parts. As interpretation of Jewish tradition, Jewish philosophy concentrates on topics such as the election of Israel, the prophecy of Moses, the Law (Torah) and its eternity, and Jewish conceptions of the Messiah and the afterlife. As religious philosophy, it investigates those philosophical notions common to Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, such as the existence of God, the divine attributes, creation, prophecy, the human soul, and the principles of human conduct. Finally, as philosophy, it studies notions that are primarily of philosophical interest, such as the structure of logical arguments, the constitution of the world, and the divisions of being.

Chronologically, Jewish philosophy may be divided into three phases: (1) its early development in the Diaspora community of the Hellenistic world, (2) its flourishing in both Islamic and Christian lands in the Middle Ages, and (3) its modern period, which began in the 18th century and has continued to today. The remainder of this article sketches the details of this chronology.

Early Development. Jewish philosophy developed in the Hellenistic world, where, from 200 B.C. to A.D. 100, Jewish thinkers of the DIASPORA produced a Jewish philosophical literature in Greek.

Of the Hellenistic writers, PHILO JUDAEUS is the only one the majority of whose works are extant. Writing largely in the form of commentaries on the Pentateuch, Philo proposed to show that Biblical thought, allegorically interpreted, is identical with Greek philosophical teachings. For Philo, God is one, self-sufficient, incorporeal, and possessed of infinite power and goodness. He created the world out of a preexistent matter by means of the ideas and patterns contained in an intermediate being, the logos, also created by God. According to other Philonic usages, logos may refer also to the ideas existing in the mind of God and the ideas embodied in the world.

Man, in Philo's view, is composed of a body rooted in the world of sense and a soul directed toward the world of spirit. He attains his ultimate happiness through control of his desires and through contemplation, particularly the contemplation of God. Philosophical speculation finds its culmination in the mystical intuition of God.

Whereas Philo influenced Fathers of the Christian Church, he had no direct successor among the Jews. Thus Jewish philosophy lay dormant until the Middle Ages.

Medieval Period. The first contribution of the medieval phase, which was part of a cultural revival in the Islamic East, was that of SA'ADIA BEN JOSEPH, head of the rabbinical academy at Sura (near Baghdad). Influenced by the MU'TAZILITES, a branch of the Mutakallimūn (Muslim rational theologians), and making use of Platonic, Aristotelian, and Stoic notions, Sa'adia set out to formulate a Jewish KALĀM.

Kalām. He wrote his major work, Kitāb al-Amanāt wal-I'tiqādāt (Beliefs and Opinions), to resolve the doubts of his contemporaries and to turn them from belief on the basis of religious authority alone to belief confirmed by rational speculation. In the true kalām fashion, he begins his demonstrations with proofs for the creation of the world, which, in turn, lead to the demonstration of the existence of God, the creator. Affirming that the world was created in time, out of nothing, and by a creator distinct from it, Sa'adia refutes 12 cosmogonic theories that he considers incorrect. He establishes the unity of God by philosophical arguments and polemicizes against dualists and Trinitarians. He appears to hold that God is known through negative predication, teaching that multiple attributes are ascribed to God because of the shortcomings of human language, not because of any multiplicity in Him.

God communicates with men through prophets whose mission is attested by miraculous occurrences. Prophecy is productive of the Law. Following kalām distinctions, Sa'adia divides the Law into rational laws, which are also discoverable by human reason, and traditional laws, which are the result of God's will.

Human freedom is the central doctrine of Sa'adia's philosophy of man. Though God is omnipotent and omniscient, man possesses freedom of choice, as is shown by sense experience and confirmed by doctrines of human responsibility. Hence God is just in rewarding and punishing man.

Neoplatonism. Although kalām teachings did influence later Jewish philosophers, Sa'adia remained the major representative of this school. Already in his day, however, Jewish philosophy had begun to turn in a Neoplatonic direction. Influenced by Neoplatonic works such as the Theology of Aristotle, Jewish Neoplatonists inquired how the world emanated from God and how man may return to Him. Their solutions emphasized the voluntary nature of emanation and the fact that, in his return to God, man can never become united with the godhead.

Moses Mendelssohn. (Archive Photos)

ISAAC ISRAELI, author also of medical treatises, is best known as a philosopher for his Book of Definitions and Book of Elements, which have been preserved in Hebrew and Latin translations. According to Isaac, the world emanated from God through His power and will, with primary matter and first form preceding intellect, the souls, and the world. Human life has as its goal union with supernal wisdom, a union that is preceded by the purification and illumination of the soul.

By far the most important Jewish Neoplatonist was Solomon ibn Gabirol, known in the Latin world as AVICEBRON or Avicembrol, with whom the setting of Jewish philosophy shifted from the Islamic East to Spain and the Islamic West. Known among his people for his magnificent Hebrew poems—among them his cosmogonic poem, The Royal Crown—Gabirol achieved fame in the Christian world through the Latin translation of his major philosophical work, Fons vitae (Fountain of Life).

Metaphysical in nature, without Biblical and rabbinic citations, the Fountain of Life is primarily an exposition of Gabirol's doctrine of matter and form. Beginning with an account of emanation, Gabirol holds that the world proceeded from the First Essence, God. The first emanation is the Divine Will, which emphasizes the voluntary, as opposed to the necessary, emanation of the world from God. From Divine Will emanates primary matter and first form; these, according to Gabirol, are the constituent principles of all created beings, the intelligences included. Gabirol's notion that even intelligences are composed of matter and form became the subject for an extensive debate among Christian philosophers of the 13th and 14th centuries.

The 11th and 12th centuries saw two philosophers who, virtually unknown outside Judaism, greatly influenced their own people. Bahyā ibn Pāqūdā (fl. 1080–90; Enciclopedia filosofica, 1:562) wrote a much-read ethical treatise, Duties of the Heart, in which he describes ten spiritual qualities—the highest being the love of God—and gives practical directions for attaining them.

The Kuzari (c. 1140) of Judah Ben Samuel Ha-Levi was another widely read work. Using as his framework the story of the conversion of the King of the Khazars to Judaism, ha-Levi sets down his apologia for the Jewish religion in the form of a dialogue. Rejecting the philosophical conception of God as the first cause, ha-Levi describes Him as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who reveals Himself in historical events. The author devotes a special portion of his book to the election of Israel, which he understands as the result of a special divine emanation and which culminates in prophecy. In spite of the generally anti-rationalistic tenor of his views—in which he parallels the Muslim ALGAZEL—ha-Levi, at times, uses kalām and other philosophical arguments.

The first Jewish philosopher to write in Hebrew was Abraham bar Hiyya, a younger contemporary of ha-Levi. Neoplatonic in orientation, he is noteworthy for his attempt to develop a philosophy of history.

Aristotelianism. By the middle of the 12th century Jewish philosophy was ready to begin its next phase. Under the influence of ALFARABI, AVICENNA, and AVEMPACE, it turned in an Aristotelian direction. Abraham ben David ha-Levi, otherwise known as Ibn Daud (c. 1110–80), discussed a number of problems in Aristotelian physics and metaphysics and their application to religious teachings in his Exalted Faith, which also contains an extensive critique of Ibn Gabirol.

Jewish Aristotelianism reached its climax, however, with Moses MAIMONIDES, the Rabbi Moses of the Latins. The towering figure of medieval Jewish thought, Maimonides discussed some philosophical issues in his legal writings, but the full and technical exposition of his views is found in his Guide of the Perplexed.

Addressing students of philosophy who had become vexed by literal interpretations of certain scriptural passages, Maimonides devoted his Guide to explaining the inner meaning of the Law. To provide a correct conception of God is the first part of this task. Beginning with the interpretation of Biblical anthropomorphic and anthropopathic terms applied to God, Maimonides shows that such terms must be understood either as attributes of action or as negative attributes. He rejects the use of positive attributes in describing God. Before setting down his proofs for existence, unity, and incorporeality of God, Maimonides undertakes an extensive critique of the views of the Mutakallimūn, judging their proofs of these same attributes incorrect since based on faulty philosophical methods. Besides demonstrating the existence of God as the prime mover and the first cause, Maimonides uses the notions of necessary and contingent being to show that God is a being necessary through Himself. Maimonides maintains that human reason alone cannot prove whether the world had a beginning in time or is eternal. He accepts creation because the arguments for it are more convincing and because it is the teaching of Scripture. Prophecy occupies a central position in Maimonides's thought. A prophet must possess physical, moral, and intellectual perfection as well as a well-developed imagination. In prophecy an emanation proceeding from God through the intermediacy of the Active Intellect affects the rational and imaginative faculties of the prophet. In his political function the prophet, particularly Moses, is the bearer of the Law. The final purpose of the Law is to produce correct opinions about God in all believers and to instill those moral norms that are prerequisites to understanding. Many Biblical commandments, according to Maimonides, serve to eradicate idolatrous practices.

After Maimonides, the setting of Jewish philosophy shifted to Christian lands—Christian Spain, southern France, and Italy—and its language became Hebrew. Under the influence of AVERROËS, most of whose commentaries on Aristotle had been translated into Hebrew, Jewish philosophy turned in a more strictly Aristotelian direction. Shem Tob Falqera (d. 1290), Joseph ibn Kaspi (1279-c. 1340), and Moses of Narbonne (d. after 1362) wrote commentaries on Maimonides's Guide as well as a variety of general philosophical works, including supercommentaries on Averroës.

Among 13th-century philosophers, Hillel ben Samuel of Verona defended individual immortality against Averroës's doctrine of the unity of the intellect, whereas Isaac Albalag developed a doctrine of the double truth (see INTELLECT, UNITY OF; DOUBLE TRUTH, THEORY OF).

By far the most important post-Maimonidean was LEVI BEN GERSON (also known as Gersonides), astronomer, Biblical exegete, and commentator on Averroës. In his major work, the Wars of the Lord, Gersonides investigated, in true scholastic fashion, problems that he considered had been treated insufficiently or solved unsatisfactorily by Maimonides. Showing an affinity to Averroës, Gersonides described God in Aristotle's phrase as "Thought Thinking Itself" rather than as the ineffable Neoplatonic One. Similarly, holding that analytic distinctions do not introduce real distinctions in the things to which they are applied, Gersonides held that positive attributes may be predicated of God. Differing again from Maimonides, Gersonides affirmed that the creation of the world can be philosophically demonstrated. The world was created by God out of an unformed, eternally existing matter and is not, as the Neoplatonists thought, the result of emanation. In line with his more Aristotelian views, Gersonides held that God knows and guides the world only insofar as it is subject to general laws.

Reaction. The reaction to Jewish Aristotelianism came with Hasdai ben Abraham CRESCAS, who, in his Light of the Lord, undertook a critique of certain of Aristotle's physical and metaphysical views. Affirming, against Aristotle, that the existence of an actual infinite (in particular, infinite space) is possible, Crescas rejected the Aristotelian proofs for the existence of God as the first mover and the first cause, but retained the proof for God as a necessary being. For Crescas, goodness is the primary attribute of God, who created the world by His will and out of love. Crescas saw the goal of human life as the love of God rather than the contemplation of God. The precepts of the Law, for him, become means of loving God. Unlike other Jewish philosophers, however, Crescas denies the freedom of the human will.

Medieval Jewish philosophy drew to a close with such writers as Simon ben Zemaḥ Duran (1361–1444); Joseph ALBO, author of the Book of Principles; and Isaac ABRABANEL.

Modern Period. Modern Jewish thought differs from ancient and medieval in that many modern Jewish thinkers brought a liberal interpretation of Judaism to their investigations. In addition, reflecting modern philosophical movements, they developed their thought along rationalist, idealist, neo-Kantian, pragmatic, and existentialist lines.

Historians of philosophy sometimes consider Baruch SPINOZA the first Jewish philosopher in the modern world. However, although it is true that Spinoza was influenced by medieval Jewish philosophers, particularly Maimonides and Crescas, he can hardly be placed within the mainstream of the Jewish philosophical tradition. When he undertakes to separate philosophy from religion in his Theologico-Political Treatise, he attempts in the process to invalidate the claims of Scripture as understood by Jewish tradition. Moreover, the pantheistic system developed in his Ethics, with its identity of God and nature, cannot be said to be in harmony with Jewish beliefs.

The first modern Jewish philosopher was Moses Mendelssohn (1729–86). A true philosopher of the Enlightenment, he relegated speculation about God, the world, and man to philosophy and considered Judaism largely as revealed legislation (see ENLIGHTENMENT, PHILOSOPHY OF).

Of the more recent philosophers, Hermann Cohen (1842–1918) is worthy of note. Basing himself on Kantian thought, Cohen saw in Judaism, with its emphasis on the unity of God, moral law, and Messianic expectations, the ideal embodiment of the Religion of Reason. In his later years Cohen emphasized the more personal elements of religion, such as man's awareness of his transgressions and the need for reconciliation with God. (See KANTIANISM.)

With Franz Rosenzweig (1886–1929) and Martin BUBER (1878–1965), Jewish philosophy entered its existentialist phase. Rejecting the categories of speculative philosophy, Buber makes the more personal aspects of human life the subject of his investigations. Developing his dialogical philosophy, Buber describes two types of relations: "I-It," the relation between man and objects; "I-Thou," the relation between man and man. A special relation is that between the "I" and the "Eternal Thou," God. Man, according to Buber, can establish an "I-Thou" relation even with objects. The community rather than the isolated life of the individual is the proper setting for human life. In his writings, Buber draws heavily on Scripture and the Hasidic literature. The present mood of Jewish philosophy appears to be existentialist to a large extent. (See EXISTENTIALISM, 6.)

See Also: ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY; SCHOLASTICISM, 1.

Bibliography: Texts in translation. Three Jewish Philosophers (Meridian Bks.; New York 1960), contains Philo: Selections, ed. H. LEWY; Saadya: Selections from Book of Doctrines and Beliefs, ed. A. ALTMANN; Jehuda Halevi: Selections from Kuzari, ed. I. HEINEMANN. Philo, tr. F. H. COLSON and G. H. WHITAKER, 10 v. (Loeb Classical Library; 1929–62). S. IBN GABIROL, Fountain of Life [Fons vitae], tr. from Lat. text of C. BAEUMKER by H. E. WED-ECK (New York 1962). I. ISRAELI, Works, tr. with comments and an outline of his philosophy, A. ALTMANN and S. M. STERN (Oxford 1958). SAADIA GAON, The Book of Beliefs and Opinions, tr. S. ROSENBLATT (Yale Judaica Ser 1; New Haven 1948). BAHYA BEN JOSEPH IBN PAKUDA, Duties of the Heart, tr. M. HYAMSON, 2 v. (2d ed. New York 1962). JUDAH HA-LEVI, The Kuzari, tr. H. HIRSCH-FELD (New York 1964). M. MAIMONIDES, Guide of the Perplexed, tr. with introd. and nn. S. PINES, introd. essay L. STRAUSS (Chicago 1963). H. A. WOLFSON, Crescas' Critique of Aristotle (Cambridge, MA 1929). J. ALBO, Sefer ha-'Ikkarim (Book of Principles), ed. and tr. I. HUSLICK, 4 v. in 5 (Philadelphia 1929–30), Hebrew and English

M. I. BUBER, I and Thou (2d ed. New York 1958). Studies. G. VAJDA, Jüdische Philosophie (Bern 1950), 2 bibliog; "Les Études de philosophie juive du moyen âge 1950–1960," Die Metaphysik im Mittelalter, ed. P. WILPERT (Miscellanea Mediaevalia 2; Berlin 1963) 126–135. J. GUTTMANN, Philosophies of Judaism: The History of Jewish Philosophy from Biblical Times to Franz Rosenzweig, tr. D. W. SILVERMAN (New York 1964). H. A. WOLFSON, Philo: Foundations of Religious Philosophy in Judaism, Christianity and Islam, 2 v. (Cambridge, MA 1947). I. HUSIK, A History of Medieval Jewish Philosophy (2d ed. New York 1930; pa. 1958). S. H. BERGMAN, Faith and Reason: An Introduction to Modern Jewish Thought, tr. and ed. A. JOSPE (Washington 1961). J. B. AGUS, Modern Philosophies of Judaism (New York 1941). L. STRAUSS, Persecution and the Art of Writing (Glencoe, IL 1952); Philosophie und Gesetz (Berlin 1935).

[A. HYMAN]

JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE

The history of the Jewish people is primarily the history of its religious development and, at the same time, in the Old Testament period, the history of man's salvation. From the time God made Israel His chosen people through His covenant with them on Mount Sinai, the Torah, or the Mosaic Law, has been regarded by the Jewish people as the center of its life, and ever since the Babylonian Exile the Jews have considered the study and fulfillment of this Law their principal duty.

The history of the Jews reveals its real and deep meaning only if one concentrates attention on the religious element in it. The same is true of the post-Biblical era, which for the Jewish people on the whole was an almost uninterrupted period of suffering and persecution. Even the unfriendly attitude Christendom has shown the Jews throughout the centuries must be considered here. The objective, chronological presentation here of the most important events in the history of the Jews is neither tendentious nor accusatory. The external happenings in this history, frightful though they frequently were, especially in recent times, have always been subservient to the very special plan of God, whose call and gifts of grace to Israel are, according to the testimony of Saint Paul (Romans 12.29), irrevocable. Justice can be done to the history of the Jews only if it is primarily regarded as the expression of God's inscrutable government of the world. For the Biblical era of the history of the Jews, see ISRAEL, 3.

The post-Biblical era is reviewed here in a survey of the six main periods of the Jewish history: (1) the Roman and Byzantine period (A.D. 67–622), (2) the Islamic period (622–1096), (3) the period of the Crusades and the Spanish Inquisition (1096–1492), (4) the period of the Renaissance and the Reformation (1492–1650), (5) the beginning of the modern era (1650–1750), and (6) the emancipation (1750–1948). For the period since 1948, see ISRAEL (STATE OF).

Roman and Byzantine Period (67–622). The history of the Jews in this period was marked by their first revolt against Rome (67–70), which brought about the destruction of Jerusalem; by their second revolt under BAR KOKHBA (132–35), which ended in the complete devastation of Palestine; and by the survival of the Jews in the Babylonian and other Diasporas.

First Revolt. The ever increasing tension between the Jews and the Roman authorities in Palestine reached its breaking point when the tyranny of the Roman governor Gessius Florus (64–66) provoked the Jews to open, armed rebellion against Rome. The military preparations on the Jewish side were supervised by Joseph ben Matathiah, who later, under the name of Flavius JOSEPHUS, left to future generations, together with other historical writings, a description of this revolt in his Jewish War. The Jewish military forces, however, could not withstand the legions of the Roman General Vespasian and, after heavy losses, withdrew to Jerusalem. A siege of several months followed; the city was conquered by Vespasian's son Titus in the year 70 and, together with its Temple, utterly destroyed. The Roman soldiers, after inflicting a terrible massacre on the population, led thousands of Jews away into slavery.

The national catastrophe of the year 70 made a renewal of religious life imperative for the Jews. From now on emphasis was placed on the so-called academies. While Jerusalem was still under siege, Rabbi JOHANAN BEN ZAKKAI, with wise foresight, had obtained permission from Titus to settle with his disciples at Jamnia, which now became the new seat of the SANHEDRIN. Even after the year 70 the Jews of Palestine retained a certain amount of local autonomy, which the Romans sanctioned by conferring on Gamaliel (II), the head of the Jamnia academy, the title of patriarch. The main concern at this time of the doctors of the Law, among whom Rabbi AKIBA BEN JOSEPH was outstanding, was in the field of HALAKAH, i.e., the interpretation of the various prescriptions of the Law that would assure for the future that the observance of the commandments of the Torah would hold the first place in the life of the Jewish people.

Second Revolt. Meanwhile the hand of Rome lay heavy on the land, and there were several uprisings among the Jews, sometimes, as in 115, extending into the DIASPORA; all of them were cruelly suppressed. The limit was reached in 132, when the Emperor Hadrian decided to erect a heathen sanctuary on the site of the ruined Temple. The whole population rose up in protest under the leadership of Simeon bar Koziba, called Bar Kokhba by his disciples. For three years he held the country under his control. But the conquest of Bethar by the Roman legions put an end to this last attempt to regain national independence. The population of Judea was decimated, and the remnant of the religious and national life sought refuge in the mountains of Galilee, while strictly enforced laws made every practice of the Jewish religion liable to severe penalties.

Under the Emperor Antoninus Plus (138–61) conditions became better for the Jews, and they even received a certain amount of local autonomy. The interest of the leading Jewish academies was now concentrated on the codification of all the extra-Biblical traditions, which until then had been handed down only orally, but which, on account of the unfavorable conditions of the time, were in danger of being entirely lost. This work is mainly contained in the MISHNAH, completed by the Patriarch Rabbi JUDAH HA-NASI c. 200. The gradual dissolution, however, of Palestinian Judaism could not be checked, and with the abolition of the patriarchate in 425, its whole political life was practically extinguished.

Babylonian Diaspora. In Mesopotamia, where, ever since the first (Babylonian) destruction of Jerusalem (587 B.C.) there had been a Jewish colony that constantly grew in importance, the political situation, first under the Parthians and then under the Sassanians, was considerably better than in Palestine. The Jews were subject to a so-called exilarch who was acknowledged as their official head and whose authority extended to all the Jewish communities in the Persian Empire; they thus enjoyed considerable autonomy. Academies for the study of the Law were established in the chief centers of Jewish life. The most important of these were the academies of Sura and Pumbedita, which were founded by two famous doctors of the Law, Rab and Samuel (175–254). The heads of the Babylonian school, who later had the title of gaon, were regarded as the highest religious authority in Judaism.

The discussions of the scholars both in Palestine, especially in the academies of Caesarea and Tiberias, and in Babylonia concerning the religious decisions of the Mishnah were in turn codified and resulted in the two TALMUDS, the one of Palestine, inaccurately called the Jerusalem Talmud, and the other of Babylonia; the former was completed toward the end of the 4th and the latter toward the beginning of the 6th century. From this time on, the norms of the Talmud formed the supreme guide for the whole religious life of JUDAISM. At the same time other ancient traditions were likewise being constantly recorded, and these came down to us in the MIDRASHIC LITERATURE, which is partly of a halakic-judicial character and partly of a haggadic-edifying character (see HAG-GADAH). All these writings constitute what is known as the ancient rabbinical literature.

Jewish Diaspora in Other Countries. Besides those in Mesopotamia, Egypt, and Asia Minor, there were Jewish communities also in most of the commercially important places of the Roman Empire. The catastrophes that the Jewish nation suffered in Palestine did not, on the whole, seriously affect the juridical status of the Jews in the Diaspora. They were the only people in the empire who, for recognized religious reasons, did not have to take part in the official state worship.

During the first Christian centuries the cleft widened between Judaism and rising Christianity. The latter, despite periodic waves of persecution, grew stronger and stronger and, thanks to the well-organized activity of its missionaries, made considerable progress everywhere. Since the Christians who were converted from paganism soon vastly outnumbered the Judaeo-Christians, the formulation of Christian doctrine had to be adapted to the mentality of these converts from the heathen world; hence, there appeared a more and more noticeable alienation between Judaism and Christianity, which subsequently had a decisive influence on the relations between the two religions throughout the centuries. [See R. Wilde, The Treatment of the Jews in the Greek Christian Writers of the First Three Centuries (Washington 1949).]

With the Edict of MILAN, which Constantine the Great issued in 313, the way was opened for Christianity to become the official religion of the state. Consequently the juridical status of the Jews was changed, and against them a large number of legal enactments, based on a quite definite theological bias, were made, whereby the Jews were limited more and more in their freedom of action and increasingly discriminated against in their social life.

There was a short period of relief for them under Julian the Apostate (361–63), who even considered the idea of rebuilding the Temple of Jerusalem. But under Theodosius II (408–50) the reaction had already set in, and the regulations against the Jews in the Theodosian Code remained, from then on, a fixed part of all the subsequent laws that regulated Jewish life in Christian countries.

The invasion by the barbarians made the Jewish communities share in the common misery, but even in the new states that were eventually founded by these invaders, whose rulers were now converted to Christianity, the general situation of the Jews was hardly improved. The popes of Rome, particularly Gregory the Great (590–604), objected to the persecutions and forced conversions of the Jews, yet even the canonical regulations continued to limit the freedom of the Jews more and more.

Especially oppressive were the conditions in the Byzantine Empire, where the Jews were accused of being in collusion with the enemies of the country, particularly the Persians. Thus, Emperor Heraclius (610–42), in whose reign Jerusalem was conquered by the Persians, forbade all practice of the Jewish religion. At that time in Europe too the expulsion of the Jews had already begun, as in France under King Dagobert (626). The condition of the Jews was very bad also in Spain, where in the last centuries of Visigothic domination the influence of the regulations that were made in the provincial synods of Toledo rendered the exercise of Jewish worship practically impossible.

Islamic Period (622 to 1096). Despite certain discriminatory legislation, the Jews generally prospered in the lands conquered by the Muslims, and in the mutually beneficial symbiosis between Judaism and ISLAM the Jewish medieval culture reached its greatest heights, especially in Spain.

Jewish-Arabic Symbiosis. A new era began for Judaism with the appearance of Islam on the scene of history and with the establishment of the caliphate (see CALIPH). At the height of the Islamic power, the caliphate was able, though after several internal ruptures, to subject to Arab hegemony under the law of the Prophet all the nations from India to the Atlantic Ocean and from Arabia to the borders of the Pyrenees.

MUḤAMMAD, who had borrowed much from Judaism and whose initial success in Arabia was due largely to the great religious influence of the Jews on the peninsula and to the spiritual preparation that this had made possible, had hoped that the Jews would embrace his religious system with open arms. Their resolute opposition, however, led also in Islam to laws of segregation, which resulted especially in laying on the Jews, as well as on the Christians, heavy financial burdens and in relegating them to a merely tolerated position at the edge of the Dâr el-Islâm (the Muslim world). However, it protected them, as well as the Christians, from forced conversion, since it regarded each group as a "People of the Book," that is, a community that participated in a stage on the road of divine revelation.

In spite of this legislation, which, moreover, came into full force only after the decline of Muslim supremacy, the position of the Jews in the Islamic countries was more favorable, to a greater or lesser degree, than it had been under Christian rule. To earn a living they now turned more and more to trade—a development that was greatly fostered by their international connections, whereas until then agriculture and small industry had been their main occupations. In cultural matters a certain symbiosis developed between the Jews and the Arabs, which was furthered by the relationship between the two groups in language (both Hebrew and Arabic being Semitic languages) and in the sphere of religious concepts and which led to a new efflorescence in Jewish intellectual life.

The Jews very soon adopted Arabic as their everyday language, and this aroused in them a new interest in Hebrew, the language of their own sacred literature. Thus, this became the age of the first great Hebrew grammarians. The position of the exilarch was confirmed by the caliphs who resided in Baghdad, near ancient Babylon, and the Babylonian academies received a fresh impetus, so that their heads, called geonim (plural of gaon), were able, through their circular letters, to direct Jewish life throughout the world. (See RESPONSA, JEWISH.)

Through the Arabs, Jewish scholars became acquainted also with the ideas of ancient philosophy, from which until then they had kept aloof—with the exception of Philo, who had but little influence on official Jewish thought. For the first time Jewish theology now left the way of purely inner meditation on the treasures of tradition and adopted the system of the Islamic theologians, the KALĀM, which is the interpretation of revealed truths with the help of philosophical principles.

In the second half of the 8th century there became noticeable in Judaism a certain opposition to the Talmudic practices as they were handed down and carried out by the Babylonian academies. Taking up ancient concepts and the tendencies of several sects, the adherents of this movement, who gathered around Anan ben David of the exilarch family, denied the binding force of the oral traditions that were codified in the Talmud. They called themselves Benê Mikrā (Sons of the Scriptures), a term with which the word Karaism is related, because they accepted only the Sacred Scriptures as their sole law. The Karaites met a resolute opponent in Gaon SA'ADIA BEN JOSEPH (882–942), the first Jewish religious philosopher. With the death of Sa'adia the decline of the centers of Jewish learning in Mesopotamia set in, which coincided with the fall of the caliphate of Baghdad; in the 11th century the office of the exilarch, after it was combined for a short time in a personal union with that of the gaon, disappeared. The centers of Jewish learning in Palestine were restored to new vigor for a short period under the Egyptian Fatimid Dynasty, but the conquest of Jerusalem by the Crusaders in 1099 put an end to all Jewish life in the Holy Land.

Spanish Period. The Jewish-Arabic symbiosis reached its climax in Spain, where, after the conquest of Toledo by the Muslim army in 711, a development began that culminated in the 10th century with the establishment of the caliphate of Córdoba. Jewish scholars and wealthy Jews occupied prominent positions, such as those held by Hasdai Ibn Shaprut at the court of Córdoba and by Samuel ha-Nagid in Granada. Religious philosophers, mystics, scholars, and poets could freely develop their genius, and so in Spain there was a new flowering of Hebrew literature. The great work of religious philosophy by Solomon ben Judah ibn Gabirol (1020–50), who was called Avicbron by the scholastics, became universally known. Ibn Paqūda (c. 1080) wrote The Duties of the Heart, a widely circulated work that many generations of Jews used as a source of spiritual direction. Moses ben Jacob IBN EZRA (c. 1100) left to posterity a large number of elegiac poems. Judah ben Samuel ha-Levi, who lived about the same time, was the greatest poet of the era. In his Songs of Zion the intense longing of the Jewish people for the days of their past glory finds eloquent expression, and in his Kuzari he left them a highly prized apologia of Judaism. Abraham ben Meir IBN EZRA was a gifted poet also, but he is better known for his valuable commentary on the Scriptures.

The greatest personality of this period is without doubt Moses ben Maimon (1135–1204) or MAIMONIDES, as he is also called. He was concerned primarily with proving that faith and reason do not contradict each other. For this purpose he made use of the categories of Aristotelian philosophy, which at that time was enjoying the increasing and special interest also of the Muslim philosophers. In his Guide to the Perplexed Maimonides endeavored to solve the seeming contradictions between religion and philosophy. His most important work is the Mishneh Torah (Repetition of the Law) or Yad Hazaka (Strong Hand), a clear, systematic summary of the whole of Talmudic erudition. In the Book of Knowledge, a commentary on the Talmud, Maimonides sets forth his well-known 13 basic dogmas of Judaism.

However, in Spain too the situation of the Jews grew worse with the Reconquista, the reconquest of the country by the Christian princes.

Period of the Crusades and Spanish Inquisition (1096 to 1492). After a few centuries of relative freedom following the Carolingian revival, the Jews suffered from restrictive laws and active persecution in western Europe during the era of the Crusades and the later Middle Ages; these reached their climax in the Spanish Inquisition.

West-European Jewish Communities. After the disturbances of the so-called migration of the nations, Charlemagne, at the beginning of the 9th century, was the first to reunite under a single rule the countries that were later called France, Germany, and Italy. The condition of the Jews in these lands was now noticeably improved. New Jewish communities were formed in various places, and the previously existing ones took on new life and played an important role in the development of commercial relations. On the whole, the situation remained unchanged, in spite of repeated attacks by ecclesiastics, in the states that evolved from the Carolingian monarchy.

The Jewish communities enjoyed far-reaching rights of self-government, and in the 10th century important Jewish schools arose for the first time in western Europe. One of the foremost authorities was Rabbi Gershom ben Judah, “the Light of the Exile” (c. 1000), who taught at Mainz and adapted the norms of Old Testament and Talmudic law to the changed conditions of the European Jews, as, for instance, by his prohibition against polygamy. Rabbi Shelomoh ben Yisḥaq of Troyes, more commonly known as RASHI, who lived at this time (1040–1105), was the greatest commentator on the Bible and Talmud that Judaism ever produced. In Italy, too, there were everywhere growing Jewish communities that displayed a vigorous intellectual life.

The Crusades. A sudden change, however, was brought in the conditions of the Jews by the Crusades. In a frightful manner the ill-will against the Jews that had been fostered by religious motives through the centuries now burst forth in violence and deepened more and more the chasm that separated Christians and Jews.

In the First Crusade (1096) it was especially the Jewish communities of the Rhineland that had to suffer, and in the Second Crusade (1146–47) the same outrages were repeated there in spite of the courageous intervention of Saint Bernard of Clairvaux on behalf of the persecuted Jews. This age, too, witnessed the first appearance of the calumny of Jewish “ritual murder,” i.e., the allegation that the Jews murdered Christians in order to obtain blood for the Passover and other rituals. This libel raged on for centuries despite all the papal counter-declarations and prohibitions. During the Third Crusade (1189) the measures taken to protect the Jews by the German princes proved more successful, but now it was mainly the Jewish communities in England that had much to suffer.

The Crusades brought with them a complete revolution in the way of Jewish life. Everywhere the ancient anti-Jewish laws were again enforced and augmented by new regulations, even in the field of Canon Law. Where it had not yet been the custom, the Jews were ordered to live in separate districts or GHETTOS and to wear a distinctive costume (the “Jewish hat” and the “yellow patch”). As Christians now began to engage in commerce on a constantly increasing scale, the Jews were more and more forced out of this livelihood. Since the Third Council of the Lateran (1179) renewed in full rigor the prohibition against taking interest on loans, the Jews, for whom this law did not apply, were forced more and more into the pawn and loan business, which, besides the old-clothes trade, was practically the only way left open for them to earn a living. On the other hand, numerous chain reactions of anti-Jewish outrages were provoked. Practically all social contact between Jews and Christians ceased, and Jewry, which, in keeping with the admonitions of such Fathers of the Church as Augustine and John Chrysostom, was allowed a bare subsistence at the edge of the Christian community, began to live a life entirely of its own. The situation lasted practically until the era of the emancipation. These various regulations and phenomena did not manifest themselves uniformly everywhere; there were great differences in the various countries. From this time on, expulsions of the Jews took place periodically. They began in France, where, however, at the payment of much money, the Jews were allowed to come back several times. England followed suit in 1290, and here the expulsion remained in effect for several centuries. Jews were forced to listen to Christian sermons and religious discussions, their own literature was strictly censored, and the Talmud was made a forbidden book and frequently burned in the public squares.

The Spanish Tragedy. At the beginning of the 13th century, with the victories of the Christian princes in all parts of Spain except the enclave of Granada, the Reconquista of this country was practically complete. But the importance of the Jews in every field was too great to allow at once a rigorous enforcement of the anti-Jewish laws. Nevertheless, the Inquisition was soon introduced in Spain, and in 1265 the great Jewish scholar Moses ben Nahman, called also NAHMANIDES, was among those who were forced to leave the country.

In the inner-Jewish sector a battle now began over the question of the recognition or the condemnation of the writings of Maimonides. As early as the middle of the 12th century Abraham ben David of Posquières had violently opposed the great teacher's use of philosophical principles in the exposition of divine revelation, and in the 13th century Rabbi Solomon ben Abraham had condemned his writings at Montpellier and handed them over to the Inquisition. In Spain itself the strict Talmudic system had been recently strengthened through the efforts of Rabbi Solomon ben Adret (c. 1235–1310), but the viewpoint of Maimonides found adherents in Hasdai ben Abraham CRESCAS (1340–1410) and his disciple Joseph ALBO (c. 1388–1444), the author of the Book of the Principles of Faith.

In the field of religious legislation the ideas of Maimonides gained the upper hand. In the spirit of his Mishneh Torah, Rabbi Jacob ben Asher (c. 1300) wrote his Arba Turim, a commentary on the Talmud that later formed the basis for the Shulḥan Aruch of Rabbi Joseph ben Ephraim CARO (1488–1575). The latter work, with the glosses of Rabbi Moses Isserles of Cracow (1520–75) which was adapted to conditions in central and eastern Europe, has remained the basis of all the rabbinical interpretations of the Talmud.

Increasing external difficulties and the internal religious struggle caused an ever larger group of Jews to turn to the mysticism of the CABALA, which likewise went back to ancient traditions and which began its irrepressible march of triumph through the Jewish world after the still mysterious "discovery" of the ZOHAR by the Spanish-Jewish mystic, Moses de Leon (1260–1305).

The general situation of the Jews in Spain now noticeably deteriorated; in 1391 and in 1412 excesses of cruelty ensued, and a large number of Jews, known as MARRANOS, submitted, through fear, to the pretense of being baptized. When, toward the end of the 15th century, the kingdoms of Castile and Aragon were united, the Inquisition was reactivated, primarily against the Marranos, under the leadership of Tomás de TORQUEMADA, and in 1492 a decree was issued that all the Jews who refused to be baptized would have to leave Spain within three months. This spelled the end, after more than 1,000 years, of Spanish Judaism. Many refugees first migrated to neighboring Portugal, but six years later they were expelled from this country too; others went to Turkey, where they were given asylum, or to other lands in the Mediterranean area, where numerous communities were founded of so-called Sephardic Jews, speaking their Spanish dialect of Ladino.

Period of the Renaissance and Reformation (1492 to 1650). Although the humanism of the Renaissance did not result in any noticeably humane treatment of the Jews in Europe, and the disturbances that accompanied the Reformation added to their sufferings, both the Ashkenazi Jews of Poland and the Sephardic Jews of the Mediterranean lands and western Europe were able to preserve and develop their typically Jewish way of life.

General Situation. In Germany, after the massacres in the period of the Crusades, when numerous Jews fled from this country to eastern Europe (bringing with them their German dialect, Yiddish), conditions became somewhat stabilized, although ominous warnings of danger were ever present. As imperial Kammerknechte (chamberlains), the Jews were placed under the direct protection of the emperor, but they had to pay a heavy tax for this privilege. Later on, in 1355, the right to collect this tax was given to the local princes by the Golden Bull of Charles IV. Yet this did not protect the Jews from the constantly recurring bloody outrages and pillages, such as occurred in 1298 (under Rindfleisch), from 1336 to 1339 (the "Armleder" massacres), in 1337 (the "desecration of the hosts" incident in Deggendorf, Bavaria), in 1348 to 1349 (the outbreak of the Black Death and the accusation of poisoning of wells), and in 1421 (the “Vienna Geserah,” ritual murder accusation). In 1434 the Council of Basel renewed the old anti-Jewish regulations as part of the Church’s Canon Law, and the Franciscan friar JOHN CAPISTRAN took it on himself to aid the execution of these laws everywhere, which caused a new outbreak of serious persecution.

At the beginning of the Reformation the situation of the Jews looked as if it would improve. But when Luther had to admit that his expectations for their conversion had come to naught, the benevolence that he had first shown the Jews out of reverence for the people of God now turned into a grim hostility that found expression in a series of anti-Jewish pamphlets. One positive aspect of the Reformation, in the eyes of the Jews, was the revival of interest in the study of Hebrew, which brought renowned Christian scholars in contact with learned Jews.

The Catholic Counter Reformation, too, led to a renewal in the strict application of the laws against the Jews. These laws now affected the Italian Jews also, who, despite their relatively small number, had played a significant role in the cultural sphere because of their contact with the Renaissance. In Italy, for instance, the first Jewish printing press was set up and the first Hebrew books were printed. But because of the inauspicious omens of renewed persecution, the centers of Jewish life moved to other countries where better conditions prevailed.

Polish Judaism. In the period of the Crusades Jewish settlements were fostered by the dukes of Great Poland, since those nobles saw in this a chance to bring their country into the network of international commerce. In spite of the resolute resistance of the clergy, Boleslas of Kalisz issued a statute in 1264 that was very favorable to the Jews. Later on, King Casimir the Great (133–370) admitted into his realm a large number of Jews who had fled from the persecution that had broken out after the Black Death. With a few interruptions, this favorable situation lasted under the Lithuanian Jagiellos. During the reign of Sigismund III (1588–1632) the condition of the Jews in Poland deteriorated as a result of the anti-Jewish propaganda of the Jesuits, though the Jewish communities there had grown so strong and were so well organized that they withstood these attacks with ease.

In Poland the autonomous Jewish system of community government reached the peak of its development. Every community of importance was directed by a kahal, a body of notables elected yearly that conducted all the administrative affairs. Juridical matters were entrusted to the rabbis, and a court of appeals met every year in Lublin at the time of the annual fair in that city and in conjunction with the assembly of the various kahal. The highest court of appeals in Poland was the Council of the Four Countries (Great Poland, Little Poland, Podolia-Galicia, and Volhynia); in Lithuania there was the Council of the Great Communities.

The kahal was especially interested in education. In every community there was a heder (elementary school), and in many of them there was also a yeshivah (Talmudic academy); in both of these, exclusively Jewish disciplines were taught and studied, which soon assured to the Polish Jews great intellectual superiority and to their leading rabbis undeniable authority.

The Sephardic Sphere. The immigration of the Jews from Spain into Turkey continued long after 1492 with a flow of Marranos who had found more and more unbearable the activities of the informers and secret police that the Inquisition encouraged. Many Spañolos, such as Don Joseph Nassi, reached positions of great influence at the Sublime Porte (the Ottoman imperial court).

In 1517 the Turks occupied Egypt also and thereby became the rulers of Palestine as well. Groups of refugees, therefore, now migrated to the Holy Land, new communities arose in the cities of Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, and especially Safed (in Galilee). Safed became the seat of a new school of the cabalists. Its founder, Jacob Berab, who had settled there in 1534, was followed in 1538 by Rabbi Joseph Caro, the author of the Shulḥan Aruch, and by his close friend, Solomon Alkabeş. Among the great sages in the cabalistic school of Safed were Rabbi Isaac LURIA (1534–72) and his disciple and brother-in-law, Moses Cordovero (d.1570). Luria’s teachings, with their pronounced messianic spirit, found an able propagandist in his disciple, Ḥayyim Vidal Calabrese.

Under the pressure of the Jewish expulsion from Spain and of the consequent sufferings, messianic movements were started in various places. Their beginnings are connected with the names of David Reubeni and Solomon Molcho. Later on, their climax was reached in the person of Shabbatai Şevi of Smyrna (1626–76). Many respectable Jewish personalities, among whom were learned rabbis, hailed Shabbatai as the promised Messiah. Even after his conversion to Islam, the messianic movement did not fully die out but provoked heated discussions in the Jewish communities. On lines similar to those of Shabbatai Şevi was the movement in Poland that was inspired by Jacob Frank (d. 1791), who eventually was converted to Christianity. (See SHABBATAIISM.)

An important new wave of immigration started in the 17th century when Marranos from Portugal found refuge in Holland. The Dutch, who had shaken off the Spanish domination toward the end of the 16th century, showed the refugees, whom they let settle wherever they wished, a toleration that was most unusual in those days. A large Jewish community arose in Amsterdam, which soon reached a very flourishing state under the leadership of such renowned Ḥakamim (sages) as Manasseh ben Israel. Amsterdam also was the home of the great Jewish thinkers Gabriel (Uriel) ACOSTA (d. 1640) and Baruch SPINOZA (d. 1677), both of whom, however, came in conflict with the rabbinic authorities and fell under the ban of the synagogue. After the Dutch revolution of 1649 some Portuguese Jews from Holland settled in England—for the first time since the expulsion in 1290. Colonies of Marranos were established also at Bordeaux and other places in southern France, where they were known as “new Christians.” Genuine Jewish communities did not exist in France till 1648, when Alsace-Lorraine was incorporated in the French kingdom.

Beginning of the Modern Era (1650 to 1750).

From the middle of the 17th to the middle of the 18th century the situation of the Jews in Poland grew more desperate, but they found spiritual consolation in the pietist movement of ḤASIDISM; in the rest of Europe the Jews suffered the usual series of persecutions.

Economic Situation in Eastern Europe. In the 17th century the position of the Jews in Poland became more and more untenable, although up to that time they had lived there in relatively tolerable circumstances. The revolt of the Cossacks under Bogdan Chmielnicki in 1648 destroyed hundreds of Jewish communities in the Ukraine and in Volhynia and caused numerous deaths, and the subsequent wars and disturbances brought much misery on all the other Jewish settlements in Poland. Meanwhile the tax burden weighed ever heavier on the Jews there. The Polish merchants and artisans were gradually driving the Jews out of business, and many of these were obliged to live as tenant farmers on the estates of the nobility, which in turn aroused the hatred of the exploited peasantry against them, so that bloody outrages occurred constantly.

Religious Reaction: Ḥasidism. The Jewish reaction to these oppressive conditions arose from within, on the religious level. Since the late medieval period, and especially since Isaac Luria, the influence of the cabala on the life of all Jewry had constantly grown. On the other hand, it was precisely in Poland, the center of Jewish learning, that opposition arose against the tendency of the Talmudists to stress exclusively man's intellectual faculties.

On this background appeared, about 1730, the figure of Rabbi Israel ben Eliezer, called Ba'al Shem Tov, who became the founder of the Ḥasidim (the devout). The teaching of Ba'al Shem (Master of the Name, i.e., of God), which was set forth by means of popular stories, emphasized, without at all calling in question the traditional doctrines, the absolute superiority of the life of piety expressed by devout prayers of the heart and an ardent love of God, all based on the Lurian cabala. Under Ba'al Shem's successor, Rabbi Dov Ber of Mezhrich (d. 1773), the Ḥasidic movement received a firm structure and continued to spread, especially in Podolia, Galicia, and Volhynia, despite the strong opposition of the Mitnagdim (opponents), whose spokesman was the greatest Talmudist of his time, Gaon Rabbi Ella of Vilna (1720–97). In the following generation Ḥasidism split up into numerous local groups, each of which at times were under the leadership of a Tzaddik (“saintly” miracle-working rabbi). Ḥasidism was the last great religious movement in Judaism.

Situation in Germany and Austria. In the Germanic countries, too, the Jews had hard times during the 16th and 17th centuries. Pogroms and outrages were their constant lot. At the beginning of the 16th century the old communities of Frankfurt am Main and Worms suffered hardships because of the so-called Fettmilch revolt. In 1670 the Jews of Vienna, some of whom as financiers had rendered valuable services to the Hapsburg emperors during the Thirty Years' War, became victims of a decree of expulsion. In Bohemia, which, especially in Prague, had the largest Jewish community in the Hapsburg countries, the attempt was made to limit the number of the Jews by the so-called family-control law which permitted only the oldest son of a family to marry.

Emancipation (1750–1948). After their emancipation, which was largely the result of the 18th-century Enlightenment and the French Revolution, the Jews adapted themselves to the new conditions with various degrees of success. But the waves of modern anti-Semitism finally broke over them with such fury that they were almost annihilated by the Nazis. An indirect outcome of this was the establishment in Palestine by the Zionists of the Jewish State of Israel.

The Enlightenment and the French Revolution. While the old structure of the regulations concerning the Jews remained unchanged, the liberal ideas that were broadcast in France, especially by the Encyclopedists, made themselves felt more and more. The first Jew of this time who made contact with modern thought was the Berliner Moses Dessau, better known as Moses Mendelssohn (1728–86). Being an important philosopher himself, he endeavored by all means to have his fellow believers, who had remained almost completely unaffected by the intellectual movements of the modern age, to join the general stage of cultural development achieved by their contemporaries. He was practically the first Jew who wrote in High German, and he translated the Bible into this language—a very bold enterprise at that time, because it made him look like a heretic in the eyes of the strictly tradition-minded rabbis.

The first real civic emancipation of the Jews, which liberated them after centuries from the ghettos and made them equal to their fellow men, with full human rights, was a result of the French Revolution. The effective legal measures, however, met with stubborn opposition from the Christian population, especially in Alsace. At the invitation of Napoleon, the so-called Great Synagogue met at Paris in 1807 to settle the relations between the Jews and the State. The emperor applied the consistorial system to the Jews also, and thus put an end to the old autonomy of their communities. In the countries occupied by Napoleon, such as Italy, Holland, and Westphalia, the Jews were likewise given civil rights. In other countries the development was much slower and not without setbacks.

Reactions within the Jewish Communities. The emancipation and its forerunners caused a complete revolution within Judaism. The traditional framework of Jewish life, which had remained practically unchanged for centuries, now collapsed in western Europe and along with it was shattered the Jewish system of instruction and education. At this time there came into being a new type of Jew, who, while retaining his Jewish faith, was also a full-fledged citizen of this or that country and consequently became more and more assimilated to the life and culture of his non-Jewish environment. Since many progressive Jews thought that their emancipation was proceeding too slowly, this period saw the so-called Baptism Movement widely affecting various social strata among the Jews who looked upon Baptism as an entrance ticket into Christian society.

This development, which, within a few years, transplanted the Jews from the Middle Ages into the modern world, advanced so fast that it took some time until there were aroused in Judaism the counterforces for stemming the constant loss in the ranks of the Jews. Endeavors were now made to adapt, by means of suitable reforms, the religious institutions of Judaism, particularly those connected with synagogue service, to the changed conditions of the time. The leaders of the movement in Germany were Samuel Holdheim (1806–60), Abraham Geiger (1810–74), and Ludwig Philippson (1811–89). Such attempts at reform provoked violent opposition from those who were attached to the traditional forms. The latter found a militant spokesman in Rabbi Moses Sofer-Schreiber of Pressburg (1773–1839), who opposed on principle any kind of innovation. A conservative, conciliatory movement, which later gained the upper hand in most of the Jewish communities in Germany, was represented by Zacharias Frankel (1801–75), the founder of the Jewish theological seminary of Breslau, the first modern institution for the education of rabbis, while Samson Raphael Hirsch became the spiritual father of the new German-Jewish orthodoxy that recognized the necessity of modern education while holding fast to the old. In this period of intellectual innovation the “Science of Judaism” was born under the Altmeister Leopold Zunz (1794–1886), the historian Heinrich Graetz (1817–91), as well as under several others.

Progressive civil emancipation of the Jews made some advances in certain countries, but only the year 1848 brought the decisive change. The real, or at least theoretically and legally granted equality was effected in Germany with the founding of the German Empire in 1870 to 1871, and in the Austrian countries with the Austro-Hungarian settlement in 1867.

In Russia. Russia received its Jewish population through the various partitions of Poland (in 1792, 1793, and 1795), and the Russian government anxiously watched the Jews to keep them within the boundaries of the newly annexed lands (“settlement area”). Under Alexander I (1801–25) some liberal measures in their favor were attempted, such as the Jewish Statute of 1804, but these largely remained dead letters. Under Nicolaus I (1825–55) a 25-year term of military service was introduced for the Jews, in order to further their “assimilation” (i.e., Baptism). Among cultured Jews, the Enlightenment, which in Russia and Poland they adopted in a typically Jewish form called the HASKALAH, made great progress and stimulated the growth of neo-Hebrew literature. During the reign of Alexander II (1855–81) certain civil rights and cultural possibilities were granted to the Jews, but when the reactionary party was victorious under Alexander III (1891–94), a real reign of terror began; in 1881 to 1882 a series of bloody pogroms broke out, which were followed by oppressive anti-Jewish measures.

Anti-Semitism. After the emancipation, opposition against the Jews adopted a new shape: modern anti-semitism that aimed at forcing the Jews out of the positions they already had achieved and preventing them from making further progress in social life. This anti-Semitism was strongly promoted by the fact that many Jews, in making good use of the opportunities offered by liberalism and the nascent industrial revolution, had won for themselves leading positions in economic life.

In Germany the soul of the movement was the Protestant minister Adolf Stöcker, who was appointed court preacher in Berlin (1878). In Austria, Canon Rohling, a theology professor of Prague, zealously propagated anti-Semitism by his writings. Karl Lueger, who later became mayor of Vienna, founded the Christian Socialist party, which made anti-Semitism a part of its program, while, in the so-called Greater-Germany Camp, Georg von Schönerer was the exponent of his party's anti-Semitic principles. In France the journalist Edouard Drumont was the mouthpiece of the anti-Semites whose agitation led to the Dreyfus affair. This led the Jews, in turn, to reflect on the hazardous nature of their "equality" and to stand a sponsor of Zionism in the person of the Viennese journalist Theodore Herzl.

In America. The pogroms in Russia, the anti-Semitic movements in the other countries, and the lack of possibility for economic progress produced, from 1880 on, the great wave of Jewish immigration, especially from eastern Europe, to America. Here, since the 18th century, a Portuguese-Jewish community had already existed, and this had later been increased by other Jewish settlers, particularly from Germany. The Jewish population in America soon made its importance felt in the economic sphere and showed a remarkable growth in cultural life. In the field of Jewish science and religious reform, all the movements brought over from Europe underwent further independent development in America, and in their variety have given to American Judaism its characteristic features.

In Palestine. Under the influence of the Zionist movement and its forerunners, emigrants, at first from Russia, began to settle in Palestine. In its beginnings this emigration was strongly promoted by Baron Edmond de Rothschild. The great pogroms of 1903 in Kishinev and Homel again drove numerous refugees into all the countries that would receive them.

In the Muslim World. In the Islamic countries the Jews remained for a long time within the framework of their traditional structure. The Damascus Affair of 1840, when the libel of so-called ritual murder caused a persecution of the Jews, cast a glaring light on their real situation and called to their defense leading European Jews, such as Sir Moses Montefiore, the English philanthropist, and Adolphe Crémieux, cofounder of the Paris Alliance Israélite Universelle. The occupation of Algiers by France in 1830 changed the lot of the Jews in this country also. The Alliance instituted a lively cultural activity, and in 1870 the Algerian Jews were granted French citizenship by the Lex Crémieux. Likewise in Tunisia, when it was formed into a French protectorate in 1881, the Jews were given civil equality with the Muslims though in Morocco they were not freed from their medieval ghettos until 1912, and then only partially. In Egypt the way to the same development was prepared by the English Protectorate in 1882, but in other Arab countries, such as Yemen, the Jews still remained without civic rights.

World War I and Its Consequences. It was again mainly the Russian Jews who suffered the consequences of the war; they were herded from the border areas into the interior of the country on the pretext that they were conspiring with the enemy. Although the revolution of 1917 brought them freedom, the Jewish communities, especially in the Ukraine, were again sorely afflicted in the ensuing struggles between the "Reds" and the "Whites."

In the countries newly established by the peace treaty of 1918 to 1919 the Jewish problem had to receive new solutions. An agreement for the protection of minorities was drawn up, and a committee of the League of Nations was entrusted with the execution of its stipulations. The largest number of Jews (almost three million) lived in the newly organized state of Poland, where they were able to preserve, in spite of some tendencies toward assimilation, their individual character as a people with its own language (Yiddish) and its own cultural institutions. Thanks to this situation, the traditional way of life of the Ashkenazi Jews was retained longer in Poland than elsewhere. Polish Judaism thus formed a large reservoir of native Jewish forces. The equality granted to the Jews by the constitution in Poland, as well as in Rumania and Hungary (Numerus clausus), was quite limited in practice, whereas Czechoslovakia, under President Masaryk, presented a praiseworthy exception in this regard.

In Soviet Russia the Jews in particular suffered in the economic upheaval that the new regime brought with it, which necessitated a change to entirely new means of gaining a livelihood. The attempt to establish the Jewish autonomous region of Biro-Bidyan in the far-eastern part of the Soviet Union met with but little response. Yiddish culture was still flourishing to some extent in Russia during the first years after the revolution, until under Stalin all genuinely Jewish life was made impossible.

In Germany: The Beginning of the End. In the German Reich, where the Jews played a certain role during the political revolution of 1918 and where, in the so-called Weimar Republic, the way was prepared for an organic symbiosis between the Jews and the non-Jewish population, the anti-Semites again appeared on the scene. In 1922 the Jewish minister of foreign affairs, Walter Rathenau, fell a victim to their machinations, and in 1923 Adolf Hitler managed the first Putsch in Munich, assisted by the anti-Semites of General Ludendorff's "Old Guard." Hitler's book Mein Kampf, which incorporated and systematized all the old anti-Semitic theories and slogans, became the modern Bible of anti-Semitism, and when Hitler came to power in 1933 as the leader of his NSDAP (German National Socialist Labor party), the stage was set for the greatest catastrophe in the history of the Jewish people; six million people were its victims solely because they were Jews. It will take Judaism a long time to recover from this enormous massacre, but its inner power is unbroken, and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, despite the outrageous injustice that was thereby done to the non-Jewish inhabitants of Palestine, has given a new proof of its vitality.

Bibliography: S. W. BARON, A Social and Religious History of the Jews, 8 v. (2d ed. New York 1952–58; index 960). S. M. DUBNOW, Weltgeschichte des jüdischen Volkes, 10 v. (Berlin 1925–29). H. H. GRAETZ, History of the Jews, ed. and tr. B. LÖWY, 6 v. (Philadelphia 1945). M. MARGOLIS and A. MARX, A History of the Jewish People (New York 1927; repr. pa. 1958). L. FINKELSTEIN, ed., The Jews: Their History, Culture and Religion, 2 v. (3d ed. New York 1960).

[K. HRUBY]

JIMÉNEZ DE ENCISO, SALVADOR

Bishop of Popayán, Colombia; b. Málaga, Spain, 1765; d. Popayán, Feb. 13, 1841. Jiménez came to America with the Archbishop of Charcas (Sucre), José Antonio de San Alberto. He graduated from the University of Charcas with degrees in theology and law before returning to Spain where he became a canon in Córdoba and Málaga.

On Feb. 14, 1815, Ferdinand VII presented Jiménez as a candidate for the episcopate of Popayán. Pius VII appointed him on March 13, 1815, and he was consecrated in Madrid. He assumed possession of his episcopate by proxy on May 7, 1818, and entered it on Aug. 6, 1818. When the troops of the cause of independence, victorious at the battle of Boyacá (Aug. 7, 1819), approached Popayán, Jiménez withdrew to Pasto and excommunicated the supporters of the republic from there. The vice president of the republic, Gen. Francisco de Paula Santander, then declared the See of Popayán to be vacant, a measure approved by the congress on Aug. 31, 1821. In Pasto, Jiménez arranged an armistice between the royalists and the republican troops commanded by General Sucre. When Bolívar wrote to him (Jan. 31, 1822) that several bishops had supported the independence movement, he did not reply, but his intervention brought the Pasto fighters, who upheld the king's cause, to sign a capitulation agreement with Bolívar.

Jiménez then requested his passport in order to return to Spain, but Bolívar replied (June 10, 1822) that a bishop could not leave his church for political reasons, and asked him, in the name of the Colombian government, to remain. The prelate, believing that the independence of Colombia was now an accomplished fact, returned to Popayán and gave his obedience to the new government (Sept. 22, 1822). Bolívar then wrote to Santander, praising the bishop's decision: "The bishop of Popayán will be very useful to us because he is sensitive to the best interests of Colombia." Jiménez wrote to Pius VII on behalf of the new republic, asking him to attend to its needs as soon as possible: "I shall not conceal from Your Holiness that there are also some weeds in the fertile field of the Church in Colombia; but the good seed is more abundant, and I should even venture to say that in the history of mankind's revolutions, no other can be said to have inflicted fewer wounds on the sacrosanct religion of our Lord Jesus Christ" (P. de Leturia, Relaciones entre la Santa Sede e Hispanoamérica, 3:268). In 1833, Jiménez wished to return to Spain because he was vexed with several influential persons in Popayán, but again the government dissuaded him.

During his episcopate Jiménez restored the seminary and began the construction of the new cathedral. He consecrated various bishops of Colombia and Ecuador. He maintained friendly relations with the Colombian government, in spite of its frequent meddlings in ecclesiastical matters. Because of the scarcity of clergy, he was often forced to ordain as priests persons who had not completed the necessary studies and nor possessed the required moral qualities.

Bibliography: R. VARGAS UGARTE, El episcopado en los tiempos de la emancipación sudamericana (Buenos Aires 1945). P. DE LETURIA, El ocaso del patronato real la América española: La acción diplomática de Bolívar ante Pío VII . . . (Madrid 1925). G. GARCÍA-HERRERA, Un obispo de historia: El obispo de Popayán, don Salvador Ximénez de Enciso y Cobos Padilla (Málaga 1961).

[J. M. PACHECO]

JOACHIM OF BRANDENBURG

The name of two imperial electors (father and son) of the 15th and 16th centuries.

Joachim I, Catholic elector; b. Feb. 21, 1484; d. Stendal, July 11, 1535. He inherited the electorate of Brandenburg upon the death of his father, John, on Jan. 9, 1499, and soon restored sorely needed law and order. In 1506 he founded the University of Frankfurt-an-der-Oder, and in 1524 he added the county of Ruppín to the family holdings. His hostility to the teachings of Martin Luther prolonged the influence of Catholicism in Brandenburg until the reign of his son Joachim II. In his political alignments and alliances, such as the Swabian League, he followed a proimperial, propapal policy. In 1530 he was among the few Catholic princes ready to go to war for these convictions. Not only was he intolerant of Protestantism, but as early as 1510 he had banished the Jews from his lands. Upon his death in July 1535, he divided Brandenburg between his two sons, Joachim II and John, in violation of the Dispositio Achillea's provision for the establishment of primogeniture.

Joachim II, Protestant elector; b. Jan. 9, 1505; d. Kopenick, Jan. 3, 1571. In 1535 he received only the old and middle marks of Brandenburg with the title of elector, while his brother John inherited the new mark and the title of margrave. John immediately embraced Lutheranism, but not until 1539 did Joachim II allow Lutheran preachers to enter Brandenburg. Joachim did not break with Rome at once. Rather, he followed the example set by Henry VIII in England. Monasteries and convents were closed, and the bishops came under state control. This new settlement was approved by the Emperor Charles V in 1541. Joachim's main reason for embracing the reform faith seems to have been the desire for personal wealth resulting from the confiscation of church lands, rather than religious conviction. By the time Joachim died in 1571, Brandenburg was one of the principal Protestant strongholds in Germany. In 1537 he gained a claim to Silesia (the duchies of Liegnitz, Brieg, and Wohlau) for the Hohenzollern family. This claim was later to be the basis upon which Frederick the Great relied in 1740 when he annexed the three Silesian duchies.

Bibliography: J. JANSSEN, History of the German People at the Close of the Middle Ages, tr. M. A. MITCHELL and A. M. CHRISTIE, 17 v. (London 1896–1925). F. VOIGT, Geschichte des brandenburgisch-preussischen Staates (3d ed. Berlin 1878). J. HEIDEMANN, Die Reformation in der Mark Brandenburg (Berlin 1889). J. LORTZ, Die Reformation in Deutschland, 2 v. (Freiburg 1939–40). F. L. CARSTEN, The Origins of Prussia (Oxford 1954). H. HOLBORN, A History of Modern Germany: The Reformation (New York 1959). S. SKALWEIT, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 5:974–975.

[J. G. GALLAHER]

JOACHIM OF FIORE

Cistercian mystic; b. Celico, near Cosenza, Italy, c. 1130; d. Fiore, Calabria, 1201 or 1202. As a young man, Joachim of Fiore (Flora, Floris) made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, witnessing en route (probably at Constantinople) the horrors of an epidemic. This experience, together with his visit to the Thebaid anchorites and a Lenten retreat in Jerusalem, changed his life. Returning to Sicily, he withdrew to the Cistercian monastery at Sambucina, but without taking the habit, and devoted himself to lay preaching until ecclesiastical disapproval led him to make profession at the Cistercian monastery in Corazzo, where he was ordained in 1168. Elected abbot (1177–78), he appealed to Lucius III, who authorized him to spend a year and a half writing at the monastery in Casamari. In 1191 he left the Cistercians to found at San Giovanni, in Fiore, a more austere branch of the order, which was approved in 1196. In 1202(?) he publicly submitted all his works to the judgment of the Holy See but died before any judgment was passed. Contemporaries testified to his love of Christ, his fervor at Mass, his inspiring eloquence in preaching. Gentle and pure, he loved all creatures and lived in utter poverty.

Joachim's entire doctrine is reducible to his teaching on the Trinity and on history. Opposing Peter Lombard, Joachim held the unity of the Trinity to be not vera et propria, but collectiva et similitudinaria, a thesis that was condemned by Lateran IV (1215) as tritheistic. The same tritheistic tendency appeared in Joachim's developmental theology of history, which moves from the Age of the Father (Old Testament), characterized by fear and servile obedience (this was the age of the married and the old), to the Age of the Son (New Testament), which was characterized by faith and filial obedience (this was the age of the clergy and the young), to the Age of the Holy Spirit, due to begin about 1260, which Joachim believed would be characterized by love and liberty (this was the age of monks and infants). The visible Church of the second age was to be absorbed by the spiritual Church of the third; the clergy and hierarchy were to have a place in the spiritual order; the active life was to be absorbed by the contemplative; Jews were to be converted, Greeks and Latins reconciled; wars were to cease, universal love would reign, and the theology of the beatitudes would endure to the end of the world, the evangelium aeternum of the Revelation (14.6).

This doctrine was taken up by the Spiritual Franciscans, that is, the Joachimites, mixed with ideas from the Apocrypha, and carried far beyond Joachim's intentions. With the condemnation of Gherardo of Borgo San Donnino's Introductorium in evangelium aeternum by Alexander IV (1256), the teaching of Joachim himself was condemned. It was revived in a modified form by PETER JOHN OLIVI and UBERTINO OF CASALE, and by many German writers of the Reformation, and with COLA DI RIENZO it resulted in the political messianism familiar to later times. Joachim's concept of history, developmental and tripartite, is also familiar through Hegel, Schilling, and many contemporary thinkers.

After Joachim's death, a multitude of works, largely pseudo-prophetic, appeared under his name, making his canon difficult to establish. Unquestionably authentic and most important are Concordia novi et veteris testamenti (Venice 1519); Expositio in Apocalypsim (Venice 1527); and Psalterium decem chordarum (Venice 1527). Of probable or doubtful authenticity are Tractatus super quattuor evangelia, ed. Ernesto Buonaiuti (Rome 1930); De articulis fidei, ed. idem (Rome 1936); Liber figurarum, ed. Leone Tondelli (Turin 1939; tr. 1953); De vita et regula S. Benedicti, ed. C. Baraut in Analecta sacra Tarraconensia 24 (Barcelona 1951) 33–122; De septem sigillis, ed. Marjorie Reeves and Beatrice Hirsch-Reich, in Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 21 (1954): 24–247; and Adversus Judaeos, ed. Arsenio Frugoni (Rome 1957). Very doubtful is the authenticity of the Liber contra Lombardum, ed. C. Ottaviani (Rome 1934).

See Also: FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum (Antwerp 1643—; Venice 1734—; Paris 1864—) May 7:87–141. E. JORDAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:1426–58. J. RATZINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:975–976. F. EHRLE, Wetzer und Welte's Kirchenlexikon, v. 6 (2d ed. Freiburg 1889) 1471–80; “Die Spiritualen, ihr Verhältnis zum Franziskanerorden und zu den Fraticellen,” Archiv für Literatur- und Kirchengeschichte des Mittelalters, 7 v., ed. H. DENIFLE and F. EHRLE 1:509–569; 2:108–164, 249–336; 3:553–623; 4:1–200. M. W. BLOOMFIELD, “Joachim of Flora: A Critical Survey . . .,” Traditio 13 (1957): 249–311. F. RUSSO, “Rassegna Gioachimito-Dantesco,” Miscellanea Franceseana 38 (1938): 65–83; Bibliografia gioachimita (Florence 1954); Gioacchino da Fiore e le fondazioni fiorenti in Calabria (Naples 1959). E. BUONAIUTI, G. da Fiore: I tempi, la vita, il messaggio (Rome 1931). D. L. DOUIE The Nature and Effect of the Heresy of the Fraticelli (Manchester 1932). H. GRUNDMANN, Neue Forschungen über Joachim von Fiore (Marburg 1950). M. REEVES, The Influence of Prophecy in the Later Middle Ages: A Study in Joachimism (Oxford 1969). B. MCGINN, “The Abbot and the Doctors: Scholastic Reactions to the Radical Eschatology of Joachim of Fiore,” Church History 40 (1971): 30–47. D. C. WEST and S. ZIMDARS-SWARTZ, Joachim of Fiore: A Study in Spiritual Perception and History (Bloomington 1983).

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

JOAN, POPESS, FABLE OF

Concerns a woman alleged to have been pope in the 9th, 10th, or 11th centuries. It is based on a 13th-century tale found in the writings of such chroniclers and preachers as the Dominicans John de Mailly and Stephen de Bourbon, and the 13th-century Franciscan author of the Chronica minor (Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores 24:184), but especially the Polish Dominican MARTIN OF TROPPEAU. Martin's account (Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores 22:428), the one most widely circulated and accepted, declared that LEO IV (d. 855) was succeeded by a John Anglicus, pope for two and a half years, who was, in fact, a woman. Joan, educated in Athens, was returning to Mainz dressed as a man when she stopped off at Rome and so impressed all by her learning that she became a curial notary, a cardinal, and finally pope. Her sex was discovered when, during a procession, she gave birth to a child in the road between the Colosseum and St. Clement's, or in the church itself. Her punishment and death are variously described. An ancient statue of a pagan priest with a serving boy, discovered and set up near St. Clement's, and an inscription variously resolved and interpreted, were both considered to refer to Popess Joan.

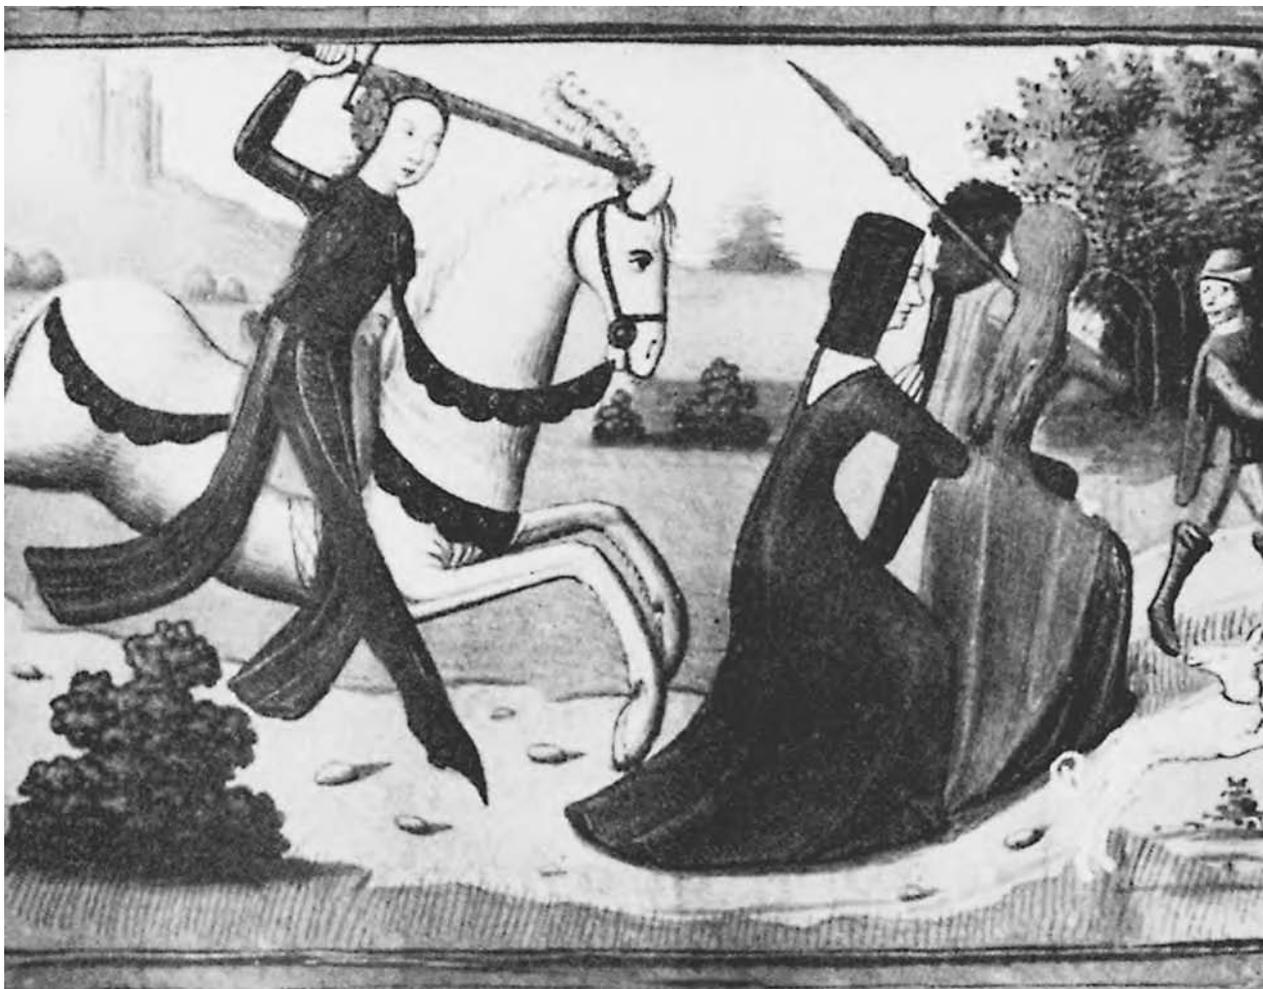

Manuscript folio from “Expositio in Apocalypsim” (Cod. Vat. Lat. 4860), by Joachim of Fiore.

Pius V ordered both destroyed (according to Jakobclerus who wrote a guidebook to Rome in 1575). That the story was accepted is evident from the fact that her statue was included among the popes in the cathedral of Siena (c. 1400). Hus reproached the Council of CONSTANCE (1415) with Popess Joan, whose existence no one denied. The domination of the 10th-century popes by the women of the house of Theophylactus is one of several explanations given for the development of the fable. Its falsity was recognized first by J. AVENTINUS (d. 1534) and by O. Panvinio, R. BELLARMINE, and D. Blondel, all in the 16th century.

Bibliography: Sources. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 22:428; 24:184, 243, 514. Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1958) 2:xxvi–xxvii. Literature. F. SPANHEIM, Histoire de la papesse Jeanne, 2 v. (3d ed. The Hague 1736). J. J. I. VON DÖLLINGER, Die Papstfabeln des Mittelalters (2d ed. Stuttgart 1890). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh (Leipzig 1931–41) 2:238–240. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (Paris 1719–23) 1.1:367. E. VACANDARD, Études de critique et d'histoire religieuse, 4 v. (Paris 1909–23) 4:13–39. Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 20 (Louvain 1924) 296*, 5401. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:984–985. H. FUHRMANN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:803.

[C. M. AHERNE]

Joan of Arc drives out camp followers in a scene from the "Vigils of Charles VII," 1431.

JOAN OF ARC, ST.

Jeanne la Pucelle, national patroness of France; b. Domremy, Lorraine (Department, Meuse), France, Jan. 6, 1412; d. Rouen, France, May 30, 1431.

Except for her piety, nothing in "Jeannette's" early years distinguished her from other children of the countryside. When she was about 13, her "voices," which she kept secret for almost five years, revealed her mission, the deliverance of the French Kingdom from English control. The treaty of Troyes (May 20, 1420), had made the English king, Henry V, king of France, setting aside the legitimate heir, the future Charles VII. The madness of Charles VI, French military reverses, and the alliance between England and Burgundy had prepared for this shattering event. After the successive deaths of Henry V and Charles VI, the duke of Bedford, regent of France for his nephew, HENRY VI, undertook to complete the conquest of the kingdom by tracking down the Dauphin (Charles VII), who had taken refuge beyond the Loire, and by putting Orléans under siege.

Joan secretly left her home in January of 1429, succeeded in obtaining an escort from the captain of Vaucouleurs, who had remained faithful to the king of France, and was presented to Charles VII at Chinon (Feb. 25, 1429). Having had Joan examined by theologians at Poitiers, Charles consented to follow her advice and reassembled his army. With Joan in command they marched on Orléans and in eight days (May 8, 1429) ended the siege that had lasted eight months. After the brilliant victory of Patay (June 18), she opened the road to Reims, where Charles was crowned in the cathedral on July 17.

The coronation rallied the people of France, who until then had been hesitant in their support of Charles; it marked the end of English victories. But unfortunately the apathetic and ill-advised king opposed Joan's further plans. When at length she again went into action, hoping to relieve Compiègne, besieged by the Burgundians, Joan was taken prisoner (May 23, 1430). She was sold to the English, who, in placing her on trial for heresy, sought at once to remove a formidable adversary and to discredit the king who owed her his crown. The trial was held in Rouen, presided over by the bishop of Beauvais, Pierre Cauchon, the former rector of the University of Paris and a staunch champion of the English. After months of interrogation (Feb. 21 to May 24, 1431) and artifice, in which Cauchon tricked Joan into an admission of guilt, the judge sentenced her to death as a relapsed heretic. On May 30 she was excommunicated, turned over to the secular arm, and burned at the stake. Engulfed by the flames, Joan protested her innocence and the holiness of her mission.

Even during her lifetime, Joan was hailed as a saint because of both the preternatural character of her deeds and the purity of her life. She was solemnly rehabilitated by the Church after a seven-year trial (1449–56), during which 115 witnesses were heard; she was beatified April 19, 1909, and canonized May 9, 1920.

Feast: May 30.

Bibliography: Sources. P. TISSET and Y. LANHERS, Procès de Jeanne d'Arc (Paris 1960). J. E. J. QUICHERAT, Procès de condamnation et de réhabilitation de Jeanne d'Arc, 5 v. (Paris 1841–49). P. DONCOEUR and Y. LANHERS, eds., Documents et recherches relatifs à Jeanne la Pucelle, 5 v. (Paris 1952–61). P. DONCOEUR, La Minute française des interrogatoires de Jeanne d'Arc (Paris 1952). C. QUINTAL and D. RANKIN, Letters of Joan of Arc (Pittsburgh 1969). Literature. W. P. BARRETT, ed. and tr., The Trial of Joan of Arc (New York 1932). R. BRASILLACH, Le procès de Jeanne d'Arc (Paris 1941). G. BORDONOVE, Jeanne d'Arc et la Guerre de Cent ans (Paris 1994). O. BOUZY, Jeanne d'Arc, mythes et réalités (Paris 1999). R. CARATINI, Jeanne d'Arc: De Domrémy à Orléans et du bûcher à la légende (Paris 1999). M. DAVID-DARNAC, Histoire véridique et merveilleuse de la Pucelle d'Orléans (Paris 1965) tr. as The True Story of the Maid of Orleans, tr. P. DE POLNAY (London 1969); Le Dossier de Jehanne (Paris 1968). A. LANG, The Maid of France (London 1913). N. MARGOLIS, Joan of Arc in History, Literature, and Film (New York 1990). R. M. J. PÉROUD, The Retrial of Joan of Arc, tr. J. M. COHEN (New York 1955); Jeanne d'Arc par elle-même et par ses témoins (Paris 1975) tr. as Joan of Arc by Herself and Her Witnesses, tr. E. HYAMS (New York 1982); La Libération d'Orléans (Paris 1969); with G. BAÏLAC and G. GAUCHER, Jeanne et Thérèse (Paris 1984); with M.-V. CLIN, Jeanne d'Arc (Paris 1986) tr. as Joan of Arc: Her Story, tr. J. DUQUESNAY ADAMS, ed. B. WHEELER (New York 1999); Jeanne d'Arc et la guerre de Cent Ans (Paris 1990); La spiritualité de Jeanne d'Arc (Paris 1992); Réhabilitation de Jeanne d'Arc (Monaco 1995); with J. TULARD and J. PÉROUD, Jeanne d'Arc, Napoléon: le paradoxe du biographe (Monaco 1997); Réhabilitation de Jeanne d'Arc (Monaco 1995). V. M. SACKVILLE-WEST, Saint Joan of Arc (New York 1991). P. DE SERMOISE, Jeanne d'Arc et la mandragore (Monaco 1983); Les missions secrètes de Jehanne la Pucelle (Paris 1970) tr. as Joan of Arc and Her Secret Missions, tr. J. TAYLOR (London 1973). Memorial du Ve centenaire de la réhabilitation de Jeanne d'Arc, 1456–1956 (Paris 1958). K. SULLIVAN, The Interrogation of Joan of Arc (Minneapolis 1999). B. WHEELER and C. T. WOOD, eds., Fresh Verdicts on Joan of Arc (New York 1996).

[R. PÉROUD]

JOAN OF AZA, BL.

Mother of St. DOMINIC; b. castle of Aza, in Old Castile, Spain, c. 1140; d. Calaruega, c. 1190–1203. She married Felix de Guzman of Calaruega and bore him four children. The two eldest, Bl. Mannes (d. c. 1230; feast: July 30) and Antonio having become clerics, Joan visited the shrine of St. DOMINIC OF SILOS to pray for another child. When her prayer was heard, she resolved in gratitude to name the child Dominic. According to tradition, she dreamed that “she bore a dog in her womb and that it ran with a burning torch in its mouth to set the world aflame.” This is the origin of the symbolic dog representing the Dominican Order. Joan’s fourth child, a daughter, became the mother of two sons who entered the order. Joan is buried at Peñafiel; her cult was confirmed in 1828.

Feast: Aug. 8.

Bibliography: Année Dominicaine, August 1 (Lyons 1898) 31–48. M. C. DE GANAY, Les Bienheureuses dominicaines (2d ed. Paris 1924) 13–21. L. BERRA, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 2:135. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:283–284.3.

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

JOAN OF FRANCE (VALOIS), ST.

Foundress of the Franciscan Annunciades; b. Paris, 1464; d. Bourges, France, Feb. 4, 1505. Joan, the sister of Charles VII, was deformed from birth, and because of her infirmity was despised by her father, Louis XI. When she was only two months old, she was betrothed to the duke of Orléans, and at the age of five she was sent to his chateau to be trained in court etiquette. Joan was a devout child with a lively horror of sin. She wanted to enter a cloister, but her desire met with only derision and abuse. She was once apparently granted a vision in which it was revealed to her that someday she would flee the world she feared and found a religious community. However, the marriage was solemnized when she was 12. The duke treated her with utmost contempt, and when he succeeded to the throne he had the marriage annulled, pensioning off his unwanted wife. Free at last, Joan devoted herself entirely to prayer and good works. Her Franciscan confessor wanted her to found a Poor Clare monastery, but she preferred the active works of charity. With a group of 10 devout women she founded the Franciscan Annunciades. The rule was approved in 1501, and a year later she erected a second monastery at Bourges, dedicated to the care of the sick as well as to the ordinary austerities of monastic life. Joan adopted the name of Sister Gabriella Marie and made profession in the community, but resided in her own palace until the time of her death. She was buried in the habit along with her royal crown. In 1617 the canonization process was opened. Briefs of Popes ALEXANDER VII, INNOCENT X, and CLEMENT XI styled her "saint" without undertaking formal canonization proceedings, and in 1775 PIUS VI authorized the cult.

Feast: Feb. 4.

Bibliography: A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:252–253. A. DESTEFANIS, Louis XII et Jeanne de France (Avignon 1975). J.-F. DRÈZE, Raison d'Etat, raison de Dieu: politique et mystique chez Jeanne de France (Paris 1991). A. M. C. FORSTER, The Good Duchess: Joan of France (London 1950). A. REDIER, Jeanne de France (Le Puy, France 1946).

[M. J. DORCY]

JOAN OF ORVIETO, BL.

Dominican tertiary and mystic; also known as Giovanna or Vanna; b. Carnaiola, near Orvieto, Italy, 1264; d. Orvieto, July 23, 1306. Having refused a proposed marriage, she entered the Third Order of St. Dominic; Bl. JAMES OF BEVAGNA was her spiritual director. She received the stigmata and frequently entered into ecstasy. Her special devotions were to the holy angels and the Passion of Christ. Distinguished for her care of the poor, she was venerated by the townspeople, who, despite all her efforts to the contrary, honored her as a saint. Reportedly, the best way to be assured of her prayers was to do her an injury. BENEDICT XIV approved her cult in 1754.

Feast: July 23.

Bibliography: M. C. DE GANAY, Les Bienheureuses dominicaines (2d ed. Paris 1924) 109–120. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 3:171–172. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:984.

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

JOAN OF PORTUGAL, BL.

Eldest child and heiress to Alfonso V, king of Portugal; b. Lisbon, Feb. 6, 1452; d. Aveiro, Portugal, May 12, 1490. Despite family pressure to contract an advantageous marriage alliance, Joan, devout from her earliest years, resolved to maintain her virginity and to join a convent. She remained briefly in the cloister of Odivellas before entering the Dominican convent of Jesus at Aveiro. There in 1475 she assumed the Dominican habit; however, she was not professed, nor did she give up control of her property; this was in deference to her father's desire to maintain a clear line of succession to Portugal's throne. She died, apparently of a fever, and was buried in the cloister of Aveiro, which is today a museum. At the request of King Pedro, she was beatified by INNOCENT XII on April 4, 1693.

Feast: May 12.

Bibliography: M. PINHEIRA, Vita, Acta Sanctorum May 7:711–749. F. CORREIA DE LACERDA, Virtuosa vida, e sancta morte da princesa dona Ioanna (Lisbon 1674). Crónica da fundação do Mosteiro de Jesus, de Aveiro e memorial da infanta santa Joana, filha del Rei Dom Alfonso V, ed. A. G. DA R. MADAHIL (Aveiro 1939). M. C. DE GANAY, Les Bienheureuses dominicaines (Paris 1913). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2: 291–292. A. G. DA R. MADAHIL, Iconografia da infanta santa Joana (Aveiro 1957). R. F. DOS SANTOS, Rumos cruzados (Fátima 1968).

[A. O'MALLEY]

JOAN OF SANTA LUCIA, BL.

Virgin; b. Bagno, Romagna, Italy, September 4 (year unknown); d. there January 16 or 17, c. 1105. She became a nun in the CAMALDOLESE convent of S. Lucia at Bagno. Her remains were transferred to the town's parish church in 1287. Later the town ascribed the cessation of a plague to her intercession and made her its patroness in 1506. Her cult was confirmed in 1823. There is a fresco of Bl. Joan and Agnes in the Camaldolese church at Bagno.

Feast: Sept. 4 (Bagno); Feb. 13 (Camaldolese).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan. 2:423–424. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 3:13–14.

[M. R. P. MC GUIRE]

JOAN OF SIGNA, BL.

Virgin and recluse; b. Signa, near Florence, Italy, c. 1245; d. near Signa, Nov. 9, 1307. At the age of 23 she became a recluse in a cell in the neighborhood of Signa. She remained there for 40 years and had a reputation for working miracles. Her cult gained considerable impetus in 1348, when the cessation of an epidemic was attributed to her intercession; her cult was confirmed in 1798. She is claimed by the FRANCISCAN ORDER as a tertiary and also by the VALLOMBROSAN MONKS, the CARMELITES, and the AUGUSTINIANS, although the BOLLANDISTS hold there is no evidence of her connection with any order.

Feast: Nov. 7 (Florence); Nov. 17 (FRANCISCANS).

Bibliography: Vitae ed. in Archivum Franciscanum historicum 10 (1917) 367–386. Acta Sanctorum 544 Nov. 4 (1925) 280–288. Gruppo archeologico signese, Vita e miracoli della beata Giovanna da Signa, ed. M. BENELLI and R. VANNINI (Signa 1995). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 4:374–375. J. BAUR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:985.

[C. R. BYERLY]

JOANA ANGÉLICA DE JESÚS

Brazilian nun, heroine of Independence; b. Salvador, Bahía, Dec. 11, 1761; d. there, Feb. 20, 1822. She was the daughter of José Tavares de Almeida and Caetana Maria de Silva, both Bahians of Portuguese ancestry. In 1782 she entered the Conceptionist Franciscan convent of Lapa in her native city. She made her profession as one of the Reformed Nuns of Our Lady of Conception on May 18, 1783. She held the positions of clerk (1797), vicar (1812), and, finally, abbess (1817), a post to which she returned in 1821. She was exercising her duties as abbess when the struggle broke out in the city between the Portuguese troops, under the command of General Madeira de Melo, and the Brazilians, led by Brigadier Freitas Guimarães. The fighting moved from street to street. On Feb. 20, 1822, the Portuguese soldiers, convinced that Brazilian soldiers were using the tower of the convent of Lapa as a vantage point from which to shoot at the Portuguese, decided to invade it. The abbess opposed this bravely; she appeared in the door of the cloister, impeding the entrance of the invaders and exclaiming: “Go back, bandits! Respect the house of the Lord. Before carrying out your infamous plan, you will pass over my dead body.” She was not able to deter the fury of the soldiers, who forced their entrance by means of bayonets and killed the abbess. The chaplain of the convent, Daniel Nunes da Silva, who also tried to oppose the entry, suffered a number of wounds but survived. Nothing was found in the convent to justify the violence.

Bibliography: B. J. DE SOUZA, Joana Angélica: A primeira heroína da independência do Brasil (Bahia 1922). A. L. DE SOUZA, Bahianos ilustres, 1564–1925 (Salvador 1949).

[A. J. LACOMBE]

JOANNES ANDREAE

The most distinguished and successful lay canonist of the Middle Ages; b. probably at Bologna, c. 1270; d. Bologna, July 7, 1348. There is no evidence that Joannes was illegitimate, as many biographers assert and there is no reason to doubt the validity of his parents marriage, even though his father did become a priest when Joannes was about eight years old. Having been taught the rudiments of grammar by his father and theology by the Dominican JOHN OF PARMA, Joannes entered the University of Bologna, where he studied Canon Law under Aegidius de Fuscariis, GUIDO DE BAYSIO, and Marsilius de Mantighellis and civil law under Martinus Syllimanus. He received his doctorate in Canon Law between 1296 and 1300. Shortly thereafter he married Mylantia, the daughter of Bonincontro dall’Ospedale, the vicar of the bishop of Bologna. They had four sons and three daughters. Two of his sons chose ecclesiastical careers, while the other two, Bonincontro and Federico, became successful lay canonists. His daughters married jurists. Joannes also adopted the famous canonist Joannes Calderini. First and foremost a teacher, he spent almost his entire life as professor of Canon Law in Bologna, although he did teach for a short time in Padua from 1307 to 1309 and again in 1319. Highly esteemed by popes and civil leaders, he carried out several diplomatic missions on behalf of Bologna and of the papal legate. Joannes died of the plague and was buried in the church of St. Dominic in Bologna. With his death the classical period of Canon Law came to a close (see CANON LAW, HISTORY OF, 4).

Many of his works are to a large extent compilations, in which Joannes gathered together, from the works of preceding canonists, all that was important for the benefit and convenience of his students. He was not a mere compiler; he made judicious selections, not hesitating to criticize when necessary, and from them he developed his own doctrine. Furthermore, his concern for questions of authorship and chronology ranks him as the first historian of Canon Law, to whom succeeding generations owe a great debt.

Two of his commentaries, the Apparatus on the Liber Sextus of BONIFACE VIII (1301) and the Apparatus on the Clementines (1322), were accepted as the GLOSSA ORDINARIA. Two minor treatises on marriage law Summa super quarto libro Decretalium and Lectura super arboribus consanguinitatis et affinitatis, enjoyed considerable popularity in the Middle Ages.

His greatest achievement was his Novella Commentaria series, comprising the Novella on the Decretals of GREGORY IX (c. 1338), the Quaestiones Mercuriales (1338–40), and the Novella on the Liber Sextus (1342–46). These works are similar in structure and method to Guido de Baysio’s Rosarium. In them Joannes supplemented the text of the decretals with glosses indicating later canonical enactments found in the Liber Sextus, the Clementines, and the Extravagantes, and he enriched the Glossa ordinaria by gathering together all that he found useful in the various apparatuses of his predecessors and contemporaries. The Quaestiones Mercuri- ales is a dual work, comprising a Novella commentaria on the title De regulis iuris of the Liber Sextus and a collection of more than 100 quaestiones disputatae composed by Joannes Andreae and many others. The Quaestiones are arranged according to the various rules of law, supplement the commentary, and serve as illustrations of the rules.

Beginning of the Prologue to Joannes Andreae's "Novella," dated 1353, in the Bibliotheca Apostolica Vaticana, Rome (Cod. Vat. Lat. 1456, fol. 1r).

Joannes did not publish a Novella on the Clementines, although the beginnings of such a commentary may perhaps be seen in an apparatus of additions (Apostillae, 1324–30) recently discovered in a Vatican MS. His last work, and one of his best, was the Additiones to the Speculum of William DURANTI (the Elder, 1346–47). It is similar in style and structure to the Novella commentaria.

Bibliography: S. STELLING-MICHAUD, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–) 6:89–92. F. K. V. SAVIGNY, Geschichte des römischen Rechts in Mittelalter, 7 v. (2d ed. Heidelberg 1934–51) 6:98–125. S. KUTTNER, "J. A. and His 'Novella' on the Decretals of Gregory IX," The Jurist, 24 (1964) 393–408; "The Apostillae of J. A. on the Clementines," in Études d'histoire du droit canonique dédiées à Gabriel Le Bras, 2 v. (Paris 1965) 1:195–201. G. ROSSI, "Contributi alla biografia del canonista Giovanni d'Andrea," Rivista trimestrale di diritto e procedura civile, 11 (1957), 1451–1502.

[C. M. ROSEN]

JOANNES DE DEO

Canonist, b. Silves, Portugal, end of 12th century; d. Lisbon, March 15, 1267. He studied under Zoen, Archpriest of Bologna, later bishop of Avignon (after 1240), to whom he dedicated several works. As professor in the University of Bologna he published many treatises with valuable information about decretists and decretalists.

His Principium decretalium is very important for the history of the Compilationes. Among his early works are the Casus decretalium, Breviarium decretorum, Distinctiones super toto iure canonico, Arbor versificata, and Chronica, all of which were mentioned in Liber iudicum (1238). Later appeared the Apparatus decretorum (before 1241), Epistulae canonicae de decimis (May 30, 1240), Notabilia cum summis super titulis decretalium (dedicated to Cardinal Gil Torres, Sept. 1241), Casus Legum canonizatarum (Sept. 1, 1241), and the Summa super quattuor causis decretorum (1243), which is a continuation of the Summa Huguccionis, and contains a list of all his earlier works. The Liber dispensationum, published Aug. 28, 1243 and dedicated to Dominican and Franciscan friars, with a list of his earlier works, was submitted to Innocent IV for correction. It is a complete recension, some parts of which had been published before the election of the pope. In the dedication (after 1248) of the Liber Cavillationum (dated Sept. 2, 1246) to Cardinal William, and of the Liber quaestionum to Cardinal Ottaviano Ubaldino (Sept. 6, 1248), he lists the Liber pastoralis (August 1244) dedicated to Cardinal William of Sant' Eustachio and the Liber poenitentiarius dedicated to the Bishop of Lisbon (Oct. 28, 1247). The above lists do not mention other authentic works: Concordantiae decretorum cum titulis decretalium, De electione, Principium decretalium, De abusibus contra canones (an appendix to the Liber poenitentiarius), Liber opinionum, which was submitted for correction to Innocent IV in October 1251, and the Summula super decimis ecclesiasticis, a letter urging the Dominicans to preach about the duty of paying tithes, with the addition of a prologue and further considerations on the same subject addressed to Alexander IV and the cardinals. Even if some of these works are not very original, they are valuable for their rich indication of sources.

Joannes de Deo was appointed judge several times, even by Popes Innocent IV and Alexander IV. Upon his return to Portugal, he was archdeacon of Santarém in Lisbon in March 1260, and was appointed judge and arbiter in lawsuits. One of them concerned the Monastery of S. Cruz in Coimbra, and in it Pedro Julião, the famous philosopher and later Pope John XXI, was also involved.

Bibliography: A. D. DE SOUSA COSTA, Um mestre português em Bolonha no século XIII (Braga 1957). A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici 1, v.1–5 (Mechlin 1928—) 1:477, 480, 484–486.

[A. D. DE SOUSA COSTA]

JOANNES DE LIGNANO

Jurist and canonist, son of Count Giacomo degli Olandi; b. Milan, c. 1320; d. Feb. 16, 1383. He studied law at the University of Bologna and by 1350 had earned his doctorate in utroque iure. Intensely devoted to the Church and a leading political figure in Bologna, he played an important role in settling the disputes between the papacy and Bologna that broke out during the last 30 years of his life. Peace was finally achieved in 1377, and in 1378 Joannes was appointed the first vicar-general of the pope at Bologna. As a sign of gratitude, Bologna conferred honorary citizenship upon him. During the Western Schism he defended the election of Urban VI, particularly by means of his tract De Fletu Ecclesiae (1378–79).

His writings embrace canon and civil law, philosophy, theology, astronomy, and astrology. His principal canonical works are: Commentaria in Decretales, Commentaria in Decretum, Commentaria in Clementinas, De beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum pluralitate and De interdico ecclesiastico. His most important works, De bello (on war) and De pace (on peace), are a systematic exposition and a synthesis of all the problems regarding war and peace, taking into consideration canon, civil, and feudal law. Because of these two works, Joannes is considered the creator of the juridic doctrine on war and the precursor of public international law.

Bibliography: S. STELLING-MICHAUD, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:111–112. J. F. V. SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1975–80) 2:257–261. G. ERMINI, “I trattati della guerra e della pace di Giovanni da Legnano,” Studi e memorie per la storia dell’Università di Bologna, 8 (1924) 1–154.

[C. M. ROSEN]

JOANNES FAVENTINUS

Canonist; b. Faenza, Italy; d. Faenza, 1187. Faventinus (John of Faenza) was a student and professor at the school of Bologna, which he left about 1174 to return to his native city. His best known work is a Summa on the Decretum of GRATIAN, likely composed while he was still at Bologna. Although he borrows heavily from his predecessors, as he himself confesses, especially from the Summae of RUFINUS and of Stephen of Tournai, he is important for the fact that he made these works as well as the teaching of other early decretists widely known. He has been rated as the most-used and best of the Bolognese canonists before Huguccio. More than 40 manuscripts have survived. All later commentators on the Decretum refer to his work. He comments only briefly on the De poenitentia and the De consecratione. His references to the more recent papal legislation are few, with nothing on that of Alexander III. He is quite conversant with Lombard and Roman law and the commentaries on the latter. His later Glossae, perhaps begun at Bologna and continued at Faenza, reveal a more mature and independent thinker.

Bibliography: A. STICKLER, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:99–102. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937) 11, 143–145. J. F. V. SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80) 1:137–140.

[T. P. MCLAUGHLIN]

JOANNES LAPUS CASTILIONEUS

Lay canonist and teacher, b. Florence, Italy, d. June 27, 1381. He received his doctorate in law (1353) from Bologna, where he was a student of John Calderini and John of Lignano. He was professor of law in Florence until 1378. During this time he held important positions in the city government and was head of the Guelph party. He was sent on missions to Urban V and Gregory XI. He was accused of wanting to see Florence under the temporal power of the papacy and was forced to flee the city. His property was sold, and a reward was offered for his death or arrest and return to Florence. In spite of this, he won the favor of Charles of Durazzo and became professor of law in Padua. When Charles was crowned king, Castilioneus was appointed personal representative to the pope, who named him consistorial lawyer and senator. His principal works are Allegationes Iuris, Tractatus hospitalitatis, the first treatment of the privileges and juridic import of works of charity and Repetitiones.

Bibliography: J. VIRET, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:110–111. J. F. V. SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80) 2:270–272.

[H. A. LARROQUE]

JOANNES PARVUS

French theologian (also known as Jean Petit); b. Caux, France, c. 1360; d. Hesdin, France, July 15, 1411. His addresses on the various aspects of the WESTERN SCHISM c. 1403 made him a well-known member of the theological faculty of the University of Paris, but his teaching on TYRANNICIDE won him even greater notoriety. On Nov. 23, 1407, Louis, Duke of Orléans, brother of King Charles VI of France, was assassinated in Paris. His cousin, John the Fearless, Duke of Burgundy, who was responsible for the crime, retired to his domains in Flanders and summoned Joannes Parvus to Amiens to prepare his vindication. Before the king and a carefully selected assemblage in Paris, Parvus delivered on March 8, 1408, an ostentatiously learned apologia in defense of his patron's role in the assassination, the Justificatio ducis Burgundiae [J. Gerson, Opera omnia, ed. L. E. Dupin (5 v. Amsterdam 1706) 5:15–42].

His method of argumentation can be reduced to the following syllogism: it is licit to put to death one who is guilty of high treason and has become a tyrant; the Duke of Orléans was guilty of treason and was a tyrant; therefore, he deserved death, and the Duke of Burgundy was not guilty of murder or complicity. In proof of his major premise Parvus chose the main texts in favor of tyrannicide from Scripture, Aristotle, Seneca, St. Augustine, C. SALUTATI, and especially from JOHN OF SALISBURY and THOMAS AQUINAS. Few texts apodictically supported his thesis, and historical and doctrinal truths suffered at his hands. Despite strong reaction, John the Fearless obtained letters of pardon from the king, and Parvus left Paris for the estate of his patron in Hesdin, where he wrote three answers to attacks on his Justificatio. There he died, regretting, it was said, his defense of such a thesis. Gerson found heresy in seven propositions he drew from the Justificatio, and the bishop of Paris along with the inquisitor of France condemned the work and nine propositions said to be found in it, on Feb. 23, 1414. After the appeal of the Duke of Burgundy, the antipope JOHN XXIII established a papal commission of investigation, but Gerson's assault on Parvus's Justificatio was relentless. At the Council of CONSTANCE he strove to secure conciliar support for the condemnation by the bishop of Paris until both parties agreed, by the terms of the Treaty of Arras, Feb. 23, 1415, to end the discussion by their envoys at the council. After the withdrawal of John XXIII from the council, Gerson disregarded this stipulation and publicly upheld the condemnation. On July 6, 1415, the council enacted a general condemnation of tyrannicide without naming Joannes Parvus. His opponents insisted on conciliar censure of the nine propositions drawn from his Justificatio, but the commission on matters of faith annulled, on Jan. 16, 1416, the condemnation of the bishop of Paris, and a final attempt to have the council declare Parvus a heretic, along with John of FALKENBERG (d. 1435), proved futile. In Paris on Nov. 3, 1418, the Duke of Burgundy had the condemnation of Parvus by the bishop of Paris withdrawn, while at this same time the king and the University of Paris repudiated the opponents of the duke and his apologist, ending the conflict.

Bibliography: J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98) 2:731–873. B. BESS, "Die Lehre vom Tyrannenmord auf dem Konstanzer Konzil," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte (Stuttgart 1876—) 36 (1902) 1–61. C. KAMM, "Der Prozess gegen die Justificatio ducis Burgundiae auf der Pariser Synode, 1413–1414," Römische Quartalschrift für Christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte (Freiburg 1887—) 26 (1912) 3–19, 27–57, 97–113, 159–186.

A. COVILLE, Jean Petit (Paris 1932). A. TEETAERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:1338–44. G. SANTINELLO, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 3:1343–44. L. BOEHM, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, eds. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1069.

[J. M. O'DONNELL]

JOANNES TEUTONICUS (ZEMECKE)

Glossator; b. second half of 12th century; d. Halberstadt, April 25, 1245 or 1246. He was provost of the Collegiate Chapter of St. Maria. He studied civil law (under Azo) and Canon Law in Bologna and taught there probably until 1220. He is one of the most important glossators of his day and from 1210 to 1220 was among the outstanding scholars of Bologna.

His works include the Apparatus for the constitutions of the Fourth Lateran Council, written immediately after the publication of these constitutions; the Compilatio IV antiqua, composed in 1215–16 and presented to Pope Innocent III but not approved by him, thus slow to win recognition; the Apparatus for the Compilatio IV antiqua, which was composed at the same time as the collection itself, and which became in practice the GLOSSA ORDINARIA on Compilatio IV antiqua, Apparatus for Compilatio III antiqua, composed about 1217 and making thorough use of the preceding; glosses on Compilatio V antiqua, which, however, are scattered and do not amount to an apparatus; glosses on the Arbor consanguinitatis et affinitatis; and Quaestiones contained in various collections, notably, as QQ. dominicales, in the Klosterneuburg Collection.

But there is no doubt that his chief work is the Glossa ordinaria on the Decretum of GRATIAN. This glossary was elaborated between 1212 and 1215 but was certainly not published until after the conclusion of the Fourth Lateran Council; between 1216 and 1217 it was again revised, especially in respect of certain allegations against the Compilatio IV antiqua. The apparatus begins with the words Tractatus Gratianus de iure canonico primo incipit a simplicioribus. . . In it Joannes collates the basic doctrines of the Decretum and the decretals, relying mainly on the Apparatus Ordinatus Magister, on the Summa of HUGUCCIO, on the Apparatus of ALANUS ANGELICUS, and on the Apparatus of Laurentius Hispanus. These must be regarded as his chief sources and are sometimes even cited verbatim. His own glosses played a significant role; in them he often expressed his own doctrine in a polemical form. However, he is not generous in his credits (i.e., in ascribing the individual glosses to the original authors) and many glosses appear as his own, although they have been taken over, often literally, from others. This basic and not unduly prolix commentary on the Decretum was soon adopted by the school of Bologna and by juridical practice as the standard apparatus and was used as such.

The only threat to its dissemination and importance was the appearance of the decretals of GREGORY IX (1234; however, it is a point to Joannes's merit that no new apparatus was composed; his was taken over and merely revised by BARTHOLOMEW OF BRESCIA and brought up to date in form and content. In this revision it survived, was disseminated, and entered into the later printed editions. The Glossa ordinaria of Joannes is even today a basic source for research on the history of Canon Law in the field of classical Canon Law. What Joannes has failed to include, especially from Huguccio and Laurentius, but from others as well, was added later in repeated essays, among which the Apparatus of Johannes de Phintona and the Rosarium of GUIDO DE BAYSIO deserve special mention.

Bibliography: J. F. V. SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80) 1:172–175. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937), passim. S. KUTTNER, "Bernardus Compostellanus antiquus," Traditio, 1 (1943) 291–292, 305 n.82, 323 n.16; "Joannes Teutonicus, das vierte Laterankonzil und die Compilatio Quarta," Miscellanea Giovanni Mercati, 6 v. (Rome 1946) 5:608–634. A. GARCÍA, "El Concilio IV de Letrán y sus comentarios," Traditio, 14 (1958) 493–498. S. STELLING-MICHAUD, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:120–122.

[A. M. STICKLER]

JOB, BOOK OF

This masterpiece of Old Testament (OT) wisdom literature will be discussed under the following headings: Plan, Content, and Integrity; Rhythm and Structural Features; Author, Date, Canonicity, and Setting; and Teaching.

Plan, Content, and Integrity. Job is a complex mosaic of rich and evocative poetry. It has, however, a detailed plan carefully elaborated by its author:

1. Prose Introduction: the affliction of Job (ch. 1–2).
2. Three Cycles of Dialogue between Job and his friends (ch. 3–28).
  - a. Opening Complaint: Job curses the day of his birth (ch. 3).
  - b. First (ch. 4–14), Second (ch. 15–21), and Third (ch. 22–27) Cycles of Dialogue between Eliphaz, Bildad, Zophar, and Job.
  - c. Encomium of Wisdom, accessible only to God (ch. 28).
3. Job's Review of His Case before God (ch. 29–31).

4. The Intervention of Elihu (ch. 32–37).
5. The Lord's Response to Job (ch. 38–42.6).
6. Prose Conclusion: the restoration of Job (ch.42.7–17).

1. Prose Introduction. The introduction (ch. 1–2), with its scenes at the heavenly court, its recurrent series of disasters, and the persevering integrity of Job, is presented as a setting for the poetry to follow. Whatever facts or popular tales may underlie the narrative, the biblical writer clearly meant to pose in unmistakable terms the problem of the sufferings of the just and the relation of these sufferings to the plan of the Creator.

2. Three Cycles of Dialogue. The dialogue, using the freedom proper to poetry, enlarges on various aspects of the problem of suffering and makes it plain that a complete answer to it is beyond the reach of the speakers, including Job himself.

- a. Job, who in the prose is a model of patient perseverance (see Jas 5.11), here (ch. 3) prepares the way for the remonstrances of his friends by wishing he had perished at birth.
- b. In three rounds of speeches (ch. 4–27) the friends of Job probe into the reason for his misfortunes, which they attribute to his fault. They counsel him to pray for forgiveness. Job insists both on the extremity of his misery and on the absence of any wrongdoing that would justify the imputations of his friends. The speeches are not intended each to counter the arguments of the preceding; and the progression is not a matter of logic. Thus, in the first cycle Eliphaz (ch. 4–5) suggests the chastening effect of affliction and the certainty of Job's restoration if he prays for it. Job's reply (ch. 6–7) calls for death, rebukes the timidity of his friends, and turns to God in complaint, rather than in penitence. Then Bildad (ch. 8) and Zophar (ch. 11) declare that Job's future is sure to be visibly in harmony with his guilt or innocence before God. Following Bildad, Job (ch.9–10) acknowledges God's might, wishes that he had an arbiter before God, and asks why his Creator afflicts His own handiwork. In ch. 12–14, Job protests that God's might can be seen at times to bring about destruction, and that his friends are using unworthy arguments on God's behalf; he then turns to God and asks again why he is being chastised. The end of this speech (ch. 14) describes before God the pitiful condition of all mankind, guilt-stained and confronted with death. The two later cycles add more asperity than argument. In the second cycle, the friends (ch. 15, 18, 20) all make the point that the wicked do not remain unpunished. Job first protests (ch. 16–17) that God is allowing his friends to wrong him; then, in a famous passage (ch. 19), he appeals to the vindication he still expects from God, by whom he has been struck; and finally (ch. 21) he denies outright that the punishment of the wicked is visibly evident from experience. The third cycle (ch. 22–27) has suffered damage in transmission, after Eliphaz's renewed plea to Job to repent (ch. 22), so that the progress of the debate, and even the identity of the speakers, becomes difficult to follow. Many arrangements for these chapters have been proposed. The reader may take ch. 23–24 as spoken by Job, with the warning that verses 24.13–24 are textually of extraordinary difficulty. If Bildad is given ch. 25 and Job ch. 26, a panegyric of God's creative might, then Zophar's last speech may be found in 27.13–21 and Job's response to this in 27.2–12. In any case, Job is still maintaining his innocence in 27.5–6, and the positions are unchanged as the dialogue closes. Decreasing proportions observable in the three cycles make it unlikely that any sizable number of verses belonging to the third cycle has been lost.

The encomium of wisdom (ch. 28) has often been thought to be distinct in authorship from the rest of Job. Its message is that wisdom, which is of transcendent value, cannot be discovered by any creature, but is known fully only to the Creator. The final line (28.28) sees man's wisdom in the fear of the Lord and the avoidance of evil—qualities attributed to Job in the prose introduction (1.8, 2.3). There seems no adequate reason to deny this poem to the original author of Job; it draws from the dialogue the only general conclusion that can be drawn from it and balances very well Job's bitter outcry of ch. 3. This would be the only place in the poetry where the author speaks in his own name (at least in 28.28).

3. Job's Review of His Case. In ch. 29–31, Job reviews his life without reference to the debate. His past blessings are contrasted with the wretched state of those whose sons now revile him (29.1–30.8), his present sorrows are feelingly described (30.9–31), and his examination of a blameless conscience leads him at last to call upon the Almighty to enter into judgment with him (31.1–40). The text of this section is well preserved, though verses 31.38–40, for example, are out of place.

4. Elihu's Intervention. If the Almighty does not at once answer Job's final plea (31.35–37), this is due, in the Book as we have it, to the intervention of Elihu (ch. 32–37). There is widespread agreement that these chapters differ in effectiveness from the rest of Job. Elihu is a youth who, in a series of monologues with prolonged and wordy introductions, impetuously takes issue with all the preceding speakers. Many see his chief contribution in the appraisal (33.13–32, 36.8–15) of the chastening value of affliction, although this was already spoken of by Eliphaz (ch. 4–5). Elihu's final description of God's hidden majesty (36.22–37.24) is impressive and prepares for the appearance of the Lord in ch. 38. Yet this entire section is seemingly an afterthought in the arrangement of the Book, and it is most easily explained as the work of a subsequent inspired poet.

5. *The Lord's Response to Job. The speech of the Lord (38.1–41.26) can be seen to balance, in structure and intent, the final plea of Job (ch. 29–31), to which it is the reply. Job only is addressed; Elihu and the three friends are ignored. After pointing to the marvels of His creation in the earth, the sea, and the heavens (38.2–38), the Lord takes up the wonders of His providence for birds and beasts (38.39–39.30). There is a brief exchange with Job (40.1–5); the Lord concludes His discourse by introducing (40.7–14) two fabulous examples of His creative art: behemoth (40.15–24), and LEVIATHAN (40.25–41.26). Job then humbly repents (42.1–6) his presumption. Some have supposed that the behemoth and leviathan passages are later additions. They are, however, integral to this section of the Book, and there is every reason to attribute them to its original author.

6. *Prose Conclusion. The conclusion (42.7–17) provides a resolution to the theme of the Book; it finds Job, by God's favor, restored to fully twice the benefits he had enjoyed before his affliction and interceding with God for his friends. This by no means represents the culmination of the sacred writer's understanding of the problem he has broached; rather, it is his expression of faith in the abiding goodness and justice of the Lord, in the only terms through which in his day Old Testament man could concretely relate those attributes to the case of Job. That the conclusion is by the author of the poetry has sometimes been denied, but it is so closely tailored to the requirements of the case that no alternative is really plausible.

Job is for the most part well preserved in Hebrew (for ch. 24–28, see above), but the difficulties of its unusual diction are not the only problems of detail. The LXX is a kind of abridged poetic approximation of it, rather than a systematic rendering into Greek; since the days of Origen, omissions in it have been eked out from the rendering of Theodotion. A pre-Christian Targum of Job in Aramaic found in fragmentary state in a cave near Khirbet Qumran has proved to be a close rendering of the Hebrew, with the third cycle presented in the customary order.

Rhythm and Structural Features. Job employs the normal "didactic" meter of other Hebrew poetry, with two (occasionally three) hemistichs of three or four stresses each to the full verse line. These lines are grouped into recognizable larger units that may vary from couplets (two full lines) to seven-line stanzas. There is a standard length for a normal speech in the dialogue, so that the stanzas are woven into a pattern of between 20 lines (ch. 8) and 24 lines (ch. 3), but they are usually of 22 or 23 lines. This norm is borrowed from alphabet acrostics (as in Lamentations, some Psalms). Longer discourses in the first cycle are multiples of such patterns. Job's speech, or its initial pattern, always exceeds the preceding speech of a friend by a minimal number of lines. Eliphaz speaks in five-line stanzas, Bildad in 3s, Zophar in 6s. Job's speeches are more varied: patterns built on 3s and 4s after Eliphaz, others on 5s and 6s after Zophar. In the later cycles, the speeches are systematically diminished in length; otherwise, the same conventions are observed. Job's final plea (ch. 29–31) is of 33 + 22 + 40 lines, with ch. 31 especially complex; the Lord's reply in ch. 38–41 is of 36 + 34 (= 70) + 50 lines, including in the last grouping the 33-line description of Leviathan, in alternating 6s and 5s.

Author, Date, Canonicity, and Setting. The unknown author of Job lived in Palestine, probably in the 6th or 5th century B.C. His work shows a knowledge of various Psalms (cf. Ps 8.5 with Jb 7.17 and Ps 38[39].14 with Jb 10.20) and shares common problems with Jeremiah (Jer 12.1–4, 20.14–18). His language is tinged with Aramaic (this is more pronounced in the Elihu passages) and with Arabic; in part, this may be deliberate local coloring. Though perhaps earlier than the final editing of Proverbs, Job, in its teaching on God's dealings with the individual (see "Teaching" below), stands intermediate between Proverbs and the later books of Ecclesiastes and Wisdom as a preparation for New Testament doctrine. That Job belongs in the canon of inspired OT books is a constant datum of Christian and Jewish tradition. Babylonian compositions, such as "I will praise the lord of wisdom," and the so-called Theodicy, which share many elements of the problem treated in Job, are neither directly related to it nor truly comparable in form or content. The technique of Jb 31, with its disclaimer of a series of faults ("negative confession"), is a commonplace in Egyptian literature, but the parallel is of little significance. A Syro-Canaanite mythological coloring in some of the descriptions in Job (Rahab: 9.12; Leviathan and the sea: 3.8, 7.12, 26.13) echoes themes from that pagan culture.

Teaching. The Book of Job includes majestic descriptions of the omniscience and omnipotence of God; these are the attributes impressed on Job himself (40.1–5, 42.1–6). Job's own earlier testimony to them (9.2–24, 12.7–25, 23.1–17) is inadequate as long as he maintains that his human, created justice gives him a claim on God for an explanation of his own case. The praises of God in ch. 25–26 (and again by Elihu in 36.22–37.24) combine with the Lord's description of His created works in ch. 38–41 to inculcate this lesson.

In the book as a whole, Job learns first, under the prodding of his friends, that the theory they all shared—that a man's justice regularly goes hand in hand with visible mundane gifts from God—is false. Ultimately, he learns that the limited human justice to which he clings vanishes into inconsequence before the majesty of God; whatever there is of it is God's, who will use it, as He uses Job's sufferings, for what He will. When Job accepts this, the mystery is not removed, but the way for God's bounty is open to the full (42.7–17). Neither does the New Testament remove the mystery, but the Crucifixion and the Resurrection of the Son of God give to both suffering and justice their ultimate meaning for the man of faith.

The much-discussed passage Jb 19.25–27 has been used as early as the time of Clement of Rome (1 Clem. 26.3) as an evidence for the doctrine of the resurrection of the body. The Hebrew text has real obscurities, however, and the versions do not agree. The Vulgate rendering of it is luminous with St. Jerome's Christian faith on the subject, and it is this rendering which is employed by St. Augustine (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 271 v., indexes 4 v. [Paris 1878–90] 41.779). On the other hand, St. John Chrysostom's statement that Job had no clear idea of the resurrection of the dead (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 v. [Paris 1857–66] 57.396) is well known. This judgment is so much more in conformity with the actual data of the text, with the tenor of the argument in the book as a whole, and with the progress in understanding of individual retribution that can be traced throughout the OT that it would seem to command acceptance. The Job of the book bears witness to a crucial stage in that progress, but though he wishes for the possibility of a return from the nether world (Jb 14.13–17), it is not given to him to affirm it.

Angels in the Book of Job are the exalted servants of God, in whom He can yet find fault (4.18, 15.15). The SATAN of the introduction is not the devil, but a member of the heavenly court; loyal to God and distrustful of Job, he is imagined for purposes of the story.

Bibliography: E. J. KISSANE, The Book of Job (New York 1946). E. P. DHORME, Le Livre de Job (Études Bibliques; Paris 1926). C. WESTERMANN, Der Aufbau des Buches Hiob (Tübingen 1956). F. HORST, Hiob (Biblischer Kommentar, Altes Testament 16; Neukirchen 1960–) 4 fasc; HANS STRAUSS, v. XVI/2 (Neukirchener Verlag 1996). H. H. ROWLEY, "The Book of Job and Its Meaning," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 41 (1958–59) 167–207. A. LEFÈVRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:1073–98, esp. "Étude Doctrinale" 1088–98. R. A. F. MACKENZIE, "The Purpose of the Jahweh Speeches in the Book of Job," Biblica 40.1–2 (1959) 435–445. P. W. SKEHAN, "Strophic Patterns in the Book of Job," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 23 (1961) 125–142; "Job's Final Plea (Job 29–31) and the Lord's Reply (Job 38–41)," Biblica 45 (1964) 51–62. R. A. F. MACKENZIE and R. E. MURPHY, in The New Jerome Bible Commentary (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1990) 466–488. A. SCHÖKEL, Job (Madrid 1981). P. DHORME, A Commentary on the Book of Job (London 1967).

[P. W. SKEHAN]

JOCELIN OF BRAKELOND

English Benedictine, chronicler of BURY-ST-EDMUNDS; flourished late 12th century. His account of this distinguished Benedictine house under the rule of Abbot SAMSON (1182–1211) provided Carlyle with materials for the sympathetic second book of Past and Present. When Jocelin served his novitiate (1173) at St-Edmunds, Samson of Tottington was novice master. In 1182 Samson became abbot and for six years thereafter Jocelin served as his chaplain—an office that kept him in close association with a model administrator. Jocelin's history covers the years 1173 to 1202. It is forthright, familiar, clear, and convincing. David Knowles has observed that in Jocelin's pages "the daily life of the cloister is mirrored with a fidelity found in no other medieval chronicle" [Monastic Sites from the Air (Cambridge, Eng. 1952) 14]. Jocelin was guest master in 1198 and almoner in 1212. The date of his death is unknown, but it must have been sometime after April 1215.

Bibliography: T. ARNOLD, ed., Cronica, in Memorials of St. Edmund's Abbey, 3 v. [Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v. (1890–96) 1:209–336]. H. E. BUTLER, ed. and tr., The Chronicle (New York 1949). T. E. TOMLIN, ed. and tr., Monastic and Social Life in the Twelfth Century as Exemplified in the Chronicles of Jocelyn de Brakelond (London 1844). T. CARLYLE, Past and Present (2d ed. New York 1843). D. KNOWLES, Saints and Scholars (Cambridge, Eng. 1962) 63–69.

[A. R. HOGUE]

JOCELIN OF GLASGOW

Scottish Cistercian, bishop; d. Melrose Abbey, 1199. Jocelin became prior and then abbot of MELROSE ABBEY (1170). In 1174 he was elected bishop of Glasgow and immediately asserted his see's independence of YORK by going to CLAIRVAUX for his consecration, which he received at the hands of the papal legate, Archbishop ESKIL OF LUND (1175). Resistance to the claims of York over the Scottish Church marked his entire episcopate and in 1181, when ROGER DE PONT L'ÉVÊQUE, Archbishop of York, placed Scotland under an interdict, it was Jocelin who, at the request of the Scottish King William the Lion, went to Rome to secure absolution from the interdict. Not only did he succeed in this, but he also brought back the GOLDEN ROSE as a present from Pope Lucius III to William. As part of his resistance to York he promoted Jocelin of Furness's life of St. KENTIGERN, the patron of Glasgow. He largely rebuilt the cathedral at Glasgow. He was buried at Melrose.

Bibliography: Chronica de Mailros, ed. J. STEVENSON (Edinburgh 1835). C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 10:833–834.

[D. NICHOLL]

JOCELIN OF WELLS

Bishop, royal servant; d. Wells, England, Nov. 19, 1242. Jocelin came of a landed family from the neighborhood of Wells, Somerset, and was the younger brother of Hugh, bishop of Lincoln (1209–35). The two brothers rose quickly in the royal service and by 1203 or 1204 Jocelin was one of the justiciars at Westminster as well as a canon of Wells. On his election as bishop of Bath and Glastonbury by the canons of Bath and Wells (1205–06) he became involved in the ancient dispute between Bath and GLASTONBURY ABBEY (see SAVARIC OF BATH) which was not settled until 1217 when Jocelin, in return for certain manors, surrendered his claim over Glastonbury and the see was henceforth known as BATH AND WELLS. In 1208 Jocelin left England because of the interdict resulting from the disputed appointment of Abp. STEPHEN LANGTON, but he returned in 1213 and was henceforth active in the service of both King JOHN and HENRY III as justiciar and custodian of castles. His name appears in the preamble of MAGNA CARTA. Along with his brother Hugh he founded St. John's Hospital at Wells. He reorganized the constitution of his chapter and its prebends and rebuilt much of the cathedral, the present nave and choir as well as the west façade being his work. He is buried in the choir in a striking tomb.

Bibliography: C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 10:835–836. J. LENEVE, Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae 1300–1541 (1716) 1:130–131. H. WHARTON, Anglia sacra . . ., 2 pts. (London 1691) 1:563–564, 582–583. J. H. ROBINSON, Somerset Historical Essays (Oxford 1921).

[D. NICHOLL]

JOCHAM, MAGNUS

Noted moral theologian; b. Rieder-bei-Immenstadt, March 23, 1808; d. Freising, March 4, 1893. Jocham is referred to also with the pseudonym "Johannes Clericus." He was engaged in pastoral work from 1841 to 1878, thus providing himself with valuable experience for his later work as professor of moral theology at the Freising lyceum. In this position, which he assumed in 1878, he soon developed a keen interest in Thomistic moral theology. Much stimulated by the organic unity of dogma and moral in St. Thomas's Summa theologiae, and relying to a great extent upon J. M. SAILER and J. B. HIRSCHER, he produced his Moral-theologie oder die Lehre vom Christl. Leben nach den Grundsätzen der Kath. Kirche (Sulzbach 1852–54). This is a moral theology in the sense of a doctrine of sacramental fulfillment and was directed against the rationalism and moralism current at the time. Jocham also contributed much by means of numerous translations, as well as the composition of many pastoralascetical treatises.

Bibliography: M. JOCHAM, Memoiren eines Obskuranten (Kempten 1896). P. HADROSSEK, Die Bedeutung des Systemgedankens für die Moraltheologie in Deutschland seit der Thomas-Renaissance (Munich 1950).

[E. LEWIS]

JOCISM

The movement of young workers founded by Joseph CARDIJN (1882–1967) as a curate in Belgium, named the Jeunesse Ouvrière Chrétienne (JOC) and extended first in Belgium and France and then throughout the world in a variety of specialized movements, e.g., the Jeunesse Agricole Chrétienne (JAC) and the Jeunesse Étudiante Chrétienne (JEC). Its characteristic organization of small groups for the apostolate of "like to like" and its method of formation (see-judge-act) were widely adopted and praised by Pius XI and succeeding popes. Paul VI elevated the founder to the college of cardinals in 1965. The concept of a Catholic youth movement that would be autonomous, socially oriented, and aimed at the development of all aspects of young factory workers was a radical innovation in Catholic circles of the time. The whole weight of tradition had been paternalistic and pietistic. By 1918, however, Belgian Catholics were becoming aware of the disastrous effects of the neglect of the social problems resulting from industrialization. Socialism had filled the vacuum, and the working class had largely abandoned traditional religion. To satisfy working-class aspirations it was necessary to direct an appeal specifically to this social class and to create working-class organizations under working-class leadership with working-class goals. This necessity was seen clearly by Cardijn, a true pioneer.

[J. N. MOODY]

JOEL, BOOK OF

The second of the MINOR PROPHETS. The Book of Joel can be divided into two parts. Two sermons in which Joel calls the people to prayer and repentance to avert a severe locust plague constitute the first part (1.2–2.17). For his first sermon the prophet seems to use a liturgical framework. After picturing the ravages of the locusts (1.2–12), he urges the priests to assemble the community for a solemn fast (1.13–14), and finally he recites the prayer for the occasion (1.15–20). The second sermon opens with a cry to sound the alarm in Zion and a description of the oncoming locusts as an army (2.1–11). An urgent, moving call to repentance follows (2.12–14); the sermon then ends with a renewal of the command to assemble the community for a solemn fast (2.15–17).

The second part (2.18–4.21) opens quietly. Yahweh responds to Israel's repentance, in an oracle announcing the end of the locusts (2.18–20). The prophet replies with a hymn of thanksgiving (2.21–24); Yahweh's response continues with promises of prosperity (2.25–27). Suddenly, Joel's vision of the future unfolds the final, climactic DAY OF THE LORD (YAHWEH). The description is striking, resembling apocalyptic rather than prophetic literature. The heralds, or symptomatic signs, of that final, messianic Day of Yahweh will be the pouring out of the Spirit (3.1–2) and astronomical, cosmic disturbances (3.3–5) from which Mt. Zion will be a refuge for those who call upon the name of the Lord. The judgment and destruction of the nations in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (merely a symbolic name, "Yahweh judges") will then take place (4.1–17). A dramatic scene then pictures the nations assembling from every side to war against Yahweh and His people in the Valley of Jehoshaphat. Yahweh's judgment on them is an execution, accompanied by dreadful cosmic disorders. Peace and calm then return in the description of the new earth of the messianic age, a peaceful, marvelous country (4.18–21). Judah and Jerusalem will remain continually with Yahweh, who dwells in Zion. The elements in Joel's vision of the final day of Yahweh, taken together, indicate that the work belongs to a literature in the process of transition from simple prophetic to apocalyptic.

Debate continues over the unity of authorship. For various reasons, many recent critics favor a literary unity, e.g., A. Bentzen (1940), A. Lods (1950), A. Weiser (1940), and A. S. Kapelrud (1948). Others hold for a duality of authorship. According to B. Duhm (1911), a Deutero-Joel would have written ch. 3 and 4. Duhm was followed by G. Hölscher (1914), O. Eissfeldt (1934), W. Baumgartner (1947), J. Trinquet (1953), and T. H. Robinson (1938). Robinson would apparently demand a further special author for 4.4–8. The interpretation of the first two chapters is closely connected with this question of the unity of authorship.

The figurative interpretation sees the locust plague as a military invasion or political catastrophe—one of the signs of the Day of Yahweh. Many favoring this interpretation understand as lying in the future the disaster that is described as present, the future being a historical or an eschatological one. The real or "literal" interpretation sees in these chapters a description of an actual locust plague. However, some of these "realists" regard the plague as eschatological: the historical locusts figured in the plagues in Egypt, but the disaster was placed among the final disorders that would herald the Day of Yahweh. Others prefer to interpret this description of an actual locust plague as present. Even here there is a division of opinion. Some commentators maintain that since these passages are concerned with a historical present, whatever is eschatological must be due to a Deutero-Joel. Others claim that this present actual locust plague is viewed in a prophetic perspective that sees the plague as a symptomatic sign of the Day of Yahweh.

Scholarly opinion regarding the date of Joel is fairly unanimous: c. 400 B.C. This date is based on a combination of factors, e.g., the absence of any reference to Jewish kings or to Babylon, the position of the priests and elders as heads of the community, and a strong similarity to several books regarded as late.

Joel's message envisions a final onslaught against Jerusalem, an eschatological conflict between Yahweh and the nations (see Ez ch. 38–39; Zec ch. 14). Yahweh will intervene with cosmic disorders, slaughtering His enemies. This catastrophic divine intervention will usher in the final age, an entirely new age in which God's people will be forever at peace.

Bibliography: R. PAUTREL, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928—) 4:1098–1104. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible (New York 1963) 1173–75. A. ROBERT and A. FEUILLET, Introduction à la Bible (Tournai 1959) 1:576–578. L. H. BROCKINGTON, in Peake's Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. BLACK and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1962) 438a–540d.

[J. MORIARITY]

JOHANAN BEN ZAKKAI

Jewish religious and political leader who laid the foundations of a new epoch in JUDAISM after the Roman destruction of Jerusalem; b. Palestine, around the beginning of the Christian era; d. there, c. A.D. 80. Johanan studied under both Hillel and Shammai, but he was influenced more by the former. Later, as one of the leading PHARISEES in Jerusalem, he engaged in frequent controversy with the SADDUCEES. Because of the fanatical attachment of the Sadducean priests and the ZEALOTS for the Temple, he foretold its destruction several years before the event (Yoma 39b). At the beginning of the Jewish revolt of 66–70 he at first remained in Jerusalem; but later, during the siege, he escaped from the doomed city, carried out by his disciples, according to tradition, in a coffin (Git. 56). Vespasian received him kindly and allowed him to establish a Jewish academy at Jabneh (Jamnia) even before the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70). From then to the revolt of BAR KOKHBA (132–135), Jabneh and its academy formed the spiritual center of Palestinian Jewry. Thanks to the leadership of Johanan, “the state was changed into an academy, the royal dynasty into a patriarchate, and the Sanhedrin left the Temple site and continued independently in Jabneh” [H. J. Schoeps, Ausfrühchristlicher Zeit (Tübingen 1950) 168]. Johanan was one of the tannaitic teachers whose sayings are frequently cited in the TALMUD. He was held in such high esteem that the rare title of Rabban (our teacher) was bestowed on him.

Bibliography: J. NEUSNER, A Life of Rabban Johanan ben Zakkai (Studia Post-Biblica 6; Leiden 1962). H. REVEL, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia ed., J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 6:164–166. Jewish Encyclopedia (New York 1939–44) 7:214–217. Encyclopedia Judaica (Berlin 1928–34) 9:222–227. K. SCHUBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:981. E. LOHSE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 3:800.

[M. J. STIASSNY]

JOHANNES CORNUBIENSIS

Theologian; b. Cornwall, between 1125 and 1130; d. 1199 or 1200. He was a student of THIERRY OF CHARTRES in the arts before 1155 and of PETER LOMBARD, MAURICE OF SULLY, and ROBERT OF MELUN (HEREFORD) in theology before 1160. He returned to England by 1173 and taught theology, probably at Oxford. About 1155 he translated from the Welsh and commented upon the Prophetia Merlini, or Book of the Seven Kings [C. Greith, Spicilegium Vaticanum, (Frauenfeld 1838) 82–106]. From 1177 to 1179 he wrote an important Christological treatise [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 199:1043–86; “The Eulogium ad Alexandrum papam tertium of John of Cornwall,” Mediaeval Studies 13 (1951) 253–300]. Unauthentic are another Christological treatise [Patrologia Latina, 177:295–316; “The So-Called Apologia de Verbo incarnato,” Franciscan Studies (1956) 102–143; 17 (1957) 85], the De canone mystici libaminis [Patrologia Latina, 177:455–470], an Argumentum et quaestio [extracts in E. Rathbone, “John of Cornwall, a Brief Biography,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale, 17 (1950) 40–60], and an unprinted Abbreviatio Sententiarum Petri Lombardi.

Bibliography: R. F. STUDENY, John of Cornwall, an Opponent of Nihilianism: A Study in the Christological Controversies of the Twelfth Century (Vienna 1939). A. M. LANDGRAF, Introducción a la historia de la literatura teológica de la escolástica incipiente (Barcelona 1956). J. C. DIDIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) Tables générales 2:2460–61. L. OTT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1022.

[J. N. GARVIN]

JOHANNINE COMMA

In 1 John 5.7–8 there appears a striking reference to the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity. “For there are three who bear witness [in heaven: the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit; and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness on earth]: the Spirit, and the water, and the blood; and these three are one” (CCD translation). The bracketed phrases appear in the Clementine-Vulgate version of the Bible, the official version of the Sacred Scriptures for the Latin rite of the Church. Among scholars these phrases are commonly called the “Johannine Comma.” On the basis of manuscript evidence scholars seriously question their authenticity.

The Comma is absent in all the ancient Greek manuscripts of the New Testament with the exception of four rather recent manuscripts that date from the 13th to 16th centuries. The Comma is lacking in such ancient Oriental versions as the Peshitta, Philoxenian, Coptic, Ethiopic, and Armenian. While the majority of the Latin manuscripts of 1 John do contain the Comma, the earlier and better manuscripts, both of the Old Latin and Vulgate versions, lack it. The earliest manuscript in which it appears dates from the 9th century.

The Fathers of the East do not quote or refer to the Johannine Comma in their Christological controversies. This omission indicates that the Comma was not part of the biblical text of their time, for they surely would have used it had it been in the text. Some 4th-century Latin writers, while referring to 1 John 5.8b and giving this a Trinitarian interpretation, failed to give any indication that they knew of the existence of the Comma as a scriptural passage.

The development of the Comma can be followed in the ecclesiastical writers of the late 4th and 5th centuries, especially in Spain and Africa. Apparently, it developed as a result of the Trinitarian interpretation of the triad: spirit-water-blood found in 1 John 5.8b. By way of a gloss on the sacred text it eventually found its way into the text itself. It is first mentioned as a scriptural quotation by Priscillian of Avila (d. 380), or perhaps his disciple Instantius, in the Liber Apologeticus. Since the 5th century it has been part of the material that the Church has used in its Trinitarian teaching and has appeared with increasing frequency in the Latin manuscripts of 1 John.

Due to the overcritical spirit that was prevalent in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the Church considered it necessary in its decree of the Holy Office of January 13, 1897, to caution its scholars against rashly rejecting or doubting the authenticity of this passage. However, in a decree of June 2, 1927, the Holy Office clarified its earlier statement in declaring that scholars may be inclined to doubt or reject the authenticity of the Johannine Comma subject to any forthcoming judgment of the Church. No scholar any longer accepts its authenticity. But even though the Comma is not a biblical passage, it is a firm witness to the fact that the faith of the 5th-century Christian was fully Trinitarian.

Bibliography: R. E. BROWN, The Epistles of John (The Anchor Bible 30; New York 1982) 775–87. I. H. MARSHALL, The Epistles of John (The New International Commentary on the New Testament; Grand Rapids 1978) 235–39. R. SCHNACKENBURG, The Johannine Epistles. A Commentary, tr. R. and I. FULLER (New York 1992) 235–38. Further detailed bibliography can be traced in the references found in these commentaries, especially Brown's detailed bibliography (see The Epistles, 786–87).

[C. DRAIN/A/F. J. MOLONEY]

JOHANNINE WRITINGS

The Johannine Gospel

The Gospels were not literal accounts of the ministry of Jesus. While John drew on an authentic tradition of Jesus' words and deeds, various influences had modified that tradition in the six or seven decades separating Jesus from the evangelist. Then, even after the evangelist had shaped the tradition into a written composition (perhaps in several editions), the work was redacted further (probably at a time when the evangelist was dead). Until recent times, much scholarly attention has been paid to the traditions that may have formed the Gospel of John, and attempts have been made to isolate the stages of redaction that produced the Gospel as we now have it. These concerns are still present in Johannine scholarship (Painter, Schnelle, Labahn), but more attention is currently dedicated to the narrative power of the final narrative (Culpepper, Stibbe, Moloney).

It is not universally accepted that the first "Johannine Writing" to appear was the Gospel of John, but that is the majority position, and it is adopted for this article. Today few scholars would identify either the source of the Johannine tradition or the evangelist as the apostle, John the Son of Zebedee. They pay greater attention to the failure of John to use the term "apostle" (in the technical sense), to the constant stress on "disciple," to the rivalry between the Johannine "disciple whom Jesus loved" and Peter (who in other NT works appears as the most famous of the Twelve apostles), and to the lack of anything approaching apostolic authority in the community situation envisaged in the Johannine epistles. All these factors make better sense if the Johannine community could not trace its origins to one of the Twelve—a lack that led Johannine theology to exalt love by Jesus rather than apostolic commissioning as the most essential factor. The disciple whom Jesus loved may best be seen as an unknown companion of Jesus during the ministry, perhaps insignificant when compared with the first-ranked members of the Twelve, but a figure whose subsequent history and role in the origins of the Johannine community gave him a major symbolic significance for this group. The majority of scholars has come to distinguish him from the evangelist, a second-generation Christian who may have been his disciple. Whoever he may have been, a historical figure who knew Jesus of Nazareth, and who became the founding figure and storyteller of a later Christian community, is a major source for the so-called Johannine writings.

Johannine community history. Differences in theology and tone that separate John from the Synoptics are often explained through the peculiar history of the Johannine community. With variations, that history as proposed by a number of scholars (J. L. Martyn, R. E. Brown, G. Richter—with variations) may be synopsized thus. The forebears were Jews who believed in Jesus as the Messiah and the royal Son of God, a Christology similar to that found in the Synoptic Gospels. Presumably a disciple, later known as the one whom Jesus loved, would have been among this group. We may find traces of them in John 1 in which the first disciples are Galileans who use traditional titles for Jesus. The advent of other believers of less traditional backgrounds changed the Johannine orientation. Part of this advent may be exemplified in Jn 4:39–42 in which a large number of Samaritans accept Jesus—something unheard of in the other Gospels.

This second strain presumably brought a different set of Israelite concepts through which they interpreted Jesus. For instance, while in the Synoptics Jesus is presented as a wisdom teacher using parables and only occasionally associated with divine Wisdom (Mt 11:19; Lk 11:49), in John there is little by way of parables and Jesus is consistently described in language echoing the OT portrait of personified divine Wisdom: a figure with God at the creation, coming into the world to give life and knowledge, dwelling among people, seeking them out and inviting them to eat. While in Matthew and Luke, Jesus is insistently shown to be descended from David, for John a Moses imagery is far more important. David became king by divine appointment and thereafter was treated by God as His representative and son; Moses spoke to God on the mountain and was shown by Him the divine plan to be revealed to the people when he came down. The Johannine Jesus is a Son who came down from God and who does and says only what He had seen and heard when He was with God (Jn 5:19; 8:38). The similarity to Moses is obvious; yet Moses had first to ascend to God's presence, while the Johannine Son of Man was already with God and had only to descend (3:13). Thus the Johannine Jesus combines aspects of divine Wisdom with the Moses imagery. The Samaritans would be a possible source for part of this imagery since they rejected Davidic claims and based their theology on Mosaic revelation. But the Johannine contact with the original traditions concerning Jesus always remains an important influence. The Johannine Son of Man may have to descend, but he also must be lifted up on a cross (3:14; 8:28; 12:32–34). It is interesting that in Jn 8:48 the christological claims of Jesus are rejected by "the Jews" with the charge that He is a Samaritan.

In any case, several relevant facts are clear. Among the four Gospels, only John describes an Incarnation in which a figure who had been with God comes into the world and becomes flesh. The Johannine Jesus can speak of a life He had with the Father before the world began (17:5). Using the divine "I am" (8:58), He states that He is one with the heavenly Father (10:30) and in Him God is intimately present and visible (10:38, 14:9–10). None of this appears in the other Gospels. Correspondingly, John describes extreme Jewish hostility toward Jesus on the basis of this exalted Christology because Jesus makes Himself equal to God (5:28; 10:33). Mention is made of synagogue trials and expulsions (9:22,34; 12:42; 16:2), an understandable procedure if the Jewish authorities thought that the disciples of Jesus had departed from the cardinal principle of Israel: "The Lord our God is One" (Dt 6:4). Undergoing such trials plausibly explains why much of John is cast in the legal language of confession, testimony, and witness (e.g., 1:19–20; 5:30ff.), and why debates over the meaning of Scripture are technical (6:31–33; 10:34–36). Inevitably such a history would have made the expelled Johannine Christians more emphatic about their Christology of a divine Word become flesh, and so they would have had contempt for other believers in Jesus who were unwilling to go so far (6:60–66; 8:31ff.; 12:42–43).

Attention must also be given to the world in which the Gospel was written. The Gospel of John is not a gnostic document, but it most likely finally appeared in Asia Minor (the traditional location of Ephesus remains the best contender), where a number of religious influences were present. The mixture of the decaying traditional Greek religions, largely taken over and added to by Roman religious strains, and the influence of religions coming from the East produced a unique religious atmosphere. These were the major elements in the eventual development of Gnosticism, a form of religion also strongly influenced by early Christianity. There are many elements in the Gospel of John that deliberately address this new world. Johannine Christianity had its origins within Judaism, but the Gospel of John also makes much of "knowledge" (17:3), revelation (1:18), ascent and descent (3:13; 6:62), and certain expressions appear that were important in later Gnosticism (for example,  $\tau\alpha\ \iota\delta\iota\alpha$  and  $\circ\ \lambda\omicron\gamma\omicron\varsigma$ ). Perhaps the greatest sign of genius in the composition of the Gospel of John is its loyalty to the Christian tradition, but its telling the story of Jesus in a new way that it might be better understood in a new world.

Literary skill of the evangelist. As the point just made indicates, the tone and emphases given to the Jesus tradition in John have been shaped by the community's life, but the effectiveness of the Gospel in communicating the resultant Christology stems from the techniques of the narrative. Those techniques have been studied from the vantage point of modern literary criticism (e.g., Culpepper; Stibbe, Moloney), and we are now much more conscious of the extraordinary blending of message and vehicle in John. If there were synagogue trials that forced the Johannine Christians to decide for or against Jesus and thus to be judged, the Gospel itself is meant to make the reader decide about Jesus. The dramatic technique of having Jesus confront the dramatis personae of the Gospel face to face, one to one, inevitably involves the reader in a confrontation.

The Christology of a stranger who has come from above into an alien world is conveyed by having Jesus misunderstood by the Gospel characters who try to evaluate Him in the categories familiar to their own lives. An important narrative strategy of the author is found in the Prologue (1:1–18). Only the reader has access to this exalted presentation of who Jesus is (the pre-existent Logos, the unique revelation of God, the bringer of life to those who accept him in faith, the fulfillment of God's gifts, made flesh in the person of Jesus Christ). Having read this first page, the readers can understand Jesus better than the characters in the story, who have not read the Prologue, and are thus often found "misunderstanding" the words of Jesus (for example, 2:19–20; 3:3–5; 4:13–15; 5:17–18; 6:32–34). The readers have no such option. Enticed into participation in the drama by out-guessing the Gospel characters, the reader may find that they may also misunderstand Jesus. This leads them to be challenged by Him as the evangelist intends (20:31). The solemn conclusion to the Gospel makes it clear that the evangelist does not write the story for the sake of the story, but to lead his readers into deeper faith. The exalted and quasi-poetic language of Jesus' self-revelation is entirely fitting for a figure from above who speaks of another world and is very similar in tone to the OT speeches of divine Wisdom and strikes a chord with the newer religions, emerging at the turn of the first Christian century. The characterizations found in John (Nicodemus, the Samaritan Woman, the Blind Man, Pilate) are increasingly seen as reflecting the evangelist's intention of personifying an array of attitudes that will speak to the readers' life situation.

Traditional Johannine questions, such as sources, history of religion background to the Gospel, and stages of redactional activity, continue to be pursued. Sources have been delineated (R. Fortna, W. Nicol; Langbrandter, Labahn), but the issue is somewhat relativized if the sources came from the same community tradition ultimately reflected in the Gospel. The thesis of John's dependence on the Synoptics has been strongly revived (F. Neirynek, M. E. Boismard; U. Schnelle, M. Lang), but has not won the day.

The Johannine Epistles

It is likely, but not certain, that the three Epistles were by one author. Most scholars would distinguish him from the evangelist. One might plausibly posit a Johannine school of writers consisting of the evangelist, the epistolary "presbyter," and the final redactor of the Gospel—all distinct from but perhaps disciples of the disciple whom Jesus loved. That sequence may also reflect the dating of the composition: the main edition of the Gospel in the 90s, the Epistles c. 100, and the redaction of the Gospel shortly afterward. None of this is certain, as we do not have the scientifically controllable data to come to firm final conclusions.

While 2–3 John fit the letter format perfectly, 1 John has no aspect of that format and is not an epistle or letter. Serving as a treatise on the interpretation of Johannine thought as found in the Gospel, 1 John is best understood if both the author (with his adherents) and those whom he attacks as secessionists (1 Jn 2:19) considered John as their sole authoritative Gospel (hē angelia of 1:5 and 3:11?). The complete absence in 1 John of references to the Jews and the synagogue suggests that that phase of Johannine life is long past, but now the high Christology that caused the struggle with the Jews has become a source of conflict within the community. One group, attacked by the writer, seems to have put little emphasis on the human career of Jesus, on how He "walked," and on His death. For them it was enough that the Word entered the world: this was the divine salvific intervention. Correspondingly, they would have attributed little salvific importance to what the disciples of Jesus did in their lives once they had received God's light and life by faith.

Since the Gospel was written in struggle with the Jews, there is a danger that the elements in the Gospel that highlight Jesus' humanity might drop from view. He speaks as a divine figure who knows all things (Jn 2:25; 6:6) and apparently He does not need to petition God for assistance in His actions (11:41–42; 12:27–28). In the Gospel, life and light are offered by Jesus during the ministry (and thus before His death on the cross) to those who believe in Him (4:10; 5:40; 6:47); the only sin stressed is the failure to believe (9:41). Thus it is not inconceivable that the secessionists could have read John in this light to support their theology. Insistently, in order to correct them the author of 1 John has to argue from what was at the "beginning" (1 Jn 1:1; 2:7, 13, 24; 3:11), apparently a period of the Jesus tradition antedating the Gospel and (in the epistolary author's view) presupposed by the evangelist. For that reason, 1 Jn 1:1–4 comments on the Prologue of John but puts stress on witnesses who could constitute a chain of contact with the earthly Jesus—a chain in which the writers of the Johannine school would undoubtedly be prominent—as a guide to the importance of Jesus in the flesh. Throughout, 1 John stresses the importance of how Jesus walked, his salvific death, and the ethical behavior of the believer in view of further divine judgment—themes close the Synoptic theology and a confirmation of the insight advocated above that Johannine beginnings were not unlike the origins of the Synoptic tradition.

In struggling with the secessionists, the epistolary author never seems to have apostolic authority or the authority against error ascribed to the presbyter bishops emerging in the churches described in Acts and the Pauline Pastorals. The supreme authority is the anointing (presumably by the Spirit; 1 Jn 2:27) which would guide the believer. Since the secessionists could also appeal to the Spirit for their teaching (and the author could respond only that their Spirit was the spirit of deceit; 4:1–6), apparently the secession was successful and spread widely (prompting the fear expressed in 2 Jn). A possible interpretation of 3 John is that in one Johannine community Diotrophes decided on the necessity of supreme local pastoral authority in order to fight the secession, much to the distress of the epistolary author, who regarded such assumption of primacy as a violation of Johannine tradition. His may have been a rear guard resistance, however, for the redactor of the Gospel (21:15–17) recognizes human pastoral authority over the sheep.

If there are strains in the Johannine Epistles that would heighten similarity between the Johannine Christians and other churches attested in the NT, the secessionists may have been a bridge in the other direction to the Gnostics, who were the first to comment on the Gospel and almost made it their own work in the 2d century. Indeed, the issue of the relation of John to Gnosticism needs elaboration in this direction. As has already been mentioned in the above discussion of the development of the Gospel, John is not a gnostic work but that, having its roots in Jewish Wisdom speculation, it had outlooks that Gnostics could find harmonious. Such compatibility seems to have made John suspect in more traditional 2d century Christian circles (whence a relative silence about the Gospel), until Irenaeus, Adversus Haereses, used 1 John to show how John could be read in an orthodox manner. The ultimate contribution of 1 John may have been to save John for the larger Church.

The Johannine Revelation

Only Revelation names its author as “John” (Rv 1:1, 4, 9; 22:8). Paradoxically, this document, which should also be dated about the same time as the other Johannine writings (toward the end of the 1st century), is universally regarded as not belonging to the same “school” that produced the Gospel and the Epistles of John. The fierce traditional end-time eschatology of the Revelation (Rv 17–22) cannot be related to the important realized eschatology of the Gospel (e.g., Jn 3:16–21; 5:24–25; 6:50, 58), even though an end-time eschatology is also found in the Gospel (e.g., 5:28–29; 6:40, 54). Similarly, the Christology of Revelation, especially its understanding of the crucifixion as the slain and vindicated Lamb (Rv 5:6–14), is very different from the Johannine understanding of the crucifixion of Jesus as a “lifting up/exaltation” (Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:32–33). The Johannine use of “the Lamb of God” (Jn 1:29, 36) cannot support the weight of an argument associating the two writings. The glory of God and the means by which the Son of God will be glorified are crucial to the Gospel, yet absent from Revelation, which has a quite different understanding of the vindication of the crucified Jesus. From the time of Irenaeus, the association of the Gospel, and subsequently the Epistles, with John the Son of Zebedee, led Christian tradition to associate the only book signed by an author named “John” with the Gospel and the Epistles. While often regarded as part of “the Johannine writings,” the Revelation and the other Johannine writings have little in common.

See Also: JOHN, EPISTLES OF ST.; JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.; REVELATION, BOOK OF.

Bibliography: M. É. BOISMARD and A. LAMOUILLE, Synopse des quatre Évangiles. III: l'Évangile de Jean (Paris 1977). R. E. BROWN, The Gospel According to John, 2 v. (Garden City 1966, 1970); The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York 1979). O. CULLMAN, The Johannine Circle (Philadelphia, Pa. 1976). R. A. CULPEPPER, The Johannine School (Missoula, Mont. 1975); Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel (Philadelphia, Pa. 1983). M. DE JONGE, Jesus: Stranger from Heaven and Son of God (Missoula, Mont. 1977). R. FORTNA, The Gospel of Signs (Cambridge 1970); The Fourth Gospel and its Predecessor: From Narrative Source to Present Gospel (Edinburgh 1989). E. HAENCHEN, John, 2 v., Hermeneia (Philadelphia, Pa. 1984). E. KÄSEMANN, The Testament of Jesus According to John 17 (Philadelphia, Pa. 1968). R. KYSSAR, The Fourth Evangelist and His Gospel (Minneapolis, Minn. 1975); “The Fourth Gospel. A Report on Recent Research,” Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt II 25/3 (1985) 2389–2480. B. LINDARS, The Gospel of John (London 1972). M. W. G. STIBBE, John (Sheffield 1993). F. J. MOLONEY, The Gospel of John (Collegeville, Minn. 1998). J. L. MARTYN, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (rev. ed. Nashville, Tenn. 1979); The Gospel of John in Christian History (New York 1978). W. MEEKS, The Prophet-King (Leiden 1967). U. SCHNELLE, Antidocetic Christology in the Gospel of John: An Investigation of the Place of the Fourth Gospel in the Johannine School (Minneapolis 1992). W. LANGBRANDTNER, Weltferner Gott oder Gott der Liebe. Der Ketzerstreit in der johanneischen Kirche. Eine exegetisch-religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung mit Berücksichtigung der koptisch-gnostischen Texte aus Nag-Hammadi (Bern 1977). F. NEIRYNCK, Jean et les Synoptiques (Louvain 1979). M. LANG, Johannes und die Synoptiker. Eine redaktionsgeschichtliche Analyse von Joh 18–20 vor dem markinischen und lukanischen Hintergrund (Göttingen 1999). W. NICOL, The Semeia in the Fourth Gospel (Leiden 1972). M. LABAHN, Jesus als Lebenspendler. Unsersuchungen zu einer Geschichte der johanneischen Tradition anhand ihrer Wundergeschichten (Berlin 1999). J. PAINTER, The Quest for the Messiah. The History, Literature and Theology of the Johannine Community (2d ed. Edinburgh 1993). G. RICHTER, Studien zum Johannesevangelium (Regensburg 1977). R. SCHNACKENBURG, The Gospel According to St. John, 3 v. (New York 1968, 1980, 1982). D. M. SMITH, Johannine Christianity: Essays on Its Setting, Sources, and Theology (Columbia, S.C. 1984). John Among the Gospels. The Relationship in Twentieth-Century Research (Minneapolis, Minn. 1992). Epistles. Commentaries by R. E. BROWN (Garden City 1982); R. BULTMANN (Philadelphia 1973); J. L. HOULDEN (New York 1973); I. H. MARSHALL (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1978); S. S. SMALLEY (Waco, Tx. 1984); R. SCHNACKENBURG (New York 1992); D. RENSBERGER (Nashville, Tenn. 1997).

[R. E. BROWN/F. J. MOLONEY]

JOHN, APOSTLE, ST.

The brothers James the Greater [see JAMES (SON OF ZEBEDEE), ST.] and John were sons of Zebedee (Mt 4.21). This evidence points to the possibility that their mother was Salome (cf. Mt 27.56 with Mk 15.40). Further speculation flows from this identification. A comparison of the last two passages (Mt 26.56 and Mk 15.40) with Jn 19.25 indicates that the mother of the brothers may have been the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, and that, therefore, the brothers may have been cousins of Jesus. Zebedee and his sons were fishermen, and in Lk 5.10 it is said that the brothers were partners of Simon Peter. The common order of the names, James and John, may indicate that John was the younger. Acts 4.13 characterizes John as uneducated. Such evidence, however weak, warns against crediting too much literary and theological creativity to John, the son of Zebedee.

If the unnamed disciple of Jn 1.35–40 was John, then he was once a disciple of John the Baptist and first met Jesus in the Jordan Valley. There is a reasonable possibility that the unnamed disciple of 1.35–40 should be identified with the Beloved Disciple of the Fourth Gospel. The step from that identification to the further identification of the Beloved Disciple with John, the Son of Zebedee, is at best speculative, and based upon later patristic and ecclesial traditions. John, James, Peter, and Andrew were the first four disciples called in Galilee (Mk 1.16–20), and these four names appear first in all lists of the TWELVE. John, along with Peter and James, was one of the three disciples most closely associated with Jesus, witnessing the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mk 5.37), the Transfiguration (Mk 9.2), and the agony in the garden (Mk 14.33). Too much should not be made of these associations, however. Mark has deliberately established an inner group among "the Twelve," and he associated this group with important moments of revelation in the Gospel of Mark. John and James were ready to call down fire from heaven against the Samaritan towns that did not accept Jesus (Lk 9.54). This fiery disposition (see also Mk 9.38–39) may account for the name given to them by Jesus, Boanerges or "sons of thunder" (Mk 3.17). Their request for the highest rank in the kingdom (Mk 10.35–41) was met by Jesus with a demand for willingness to suffer martyrdom. If John is to be identified with the beloved disciple of the Fourth Gospel, further information concerning him is available from that source; see JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST.

According to Lk 22.8, Peter and John were the two sent to prepare the Last Supper; this association of Peter and John is found also in Acts, e.g., 1.13. Peter and John encountered the lame beggar at the Temple and were subsequently arrested and released (Acts ch. 3–4); Peter and John went to Samaria to communicate the Holy Spirit (8.14–25); when Paul visited Jerusalem for the second time after his conversion, he found John along with Peter and James (the brother of the Lord) as the three principal figures in the Jerusalem church (Gal 2.9). A final Biblical reference to John is in Rv 1.9 if, as is customary (Justin, Dial. 81), the visionary John is identified with the son of Zebedee; this John was in adverse circumstances at Patmos, off the coast of Asia Minor. The identification of John, the Son of Zebedee with the John of the Apocalypse, however, is most unlikely.

For these later years of John's life we are dependent on inferences about the authorship of the Johannine writings and on patristic tradition. A very plausible report is that of Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. 2.22.5), a tradition he had from Polycarp of Smyrna who knew John: John lived at Ephesus in Asia Minor until the time of Trajan. The common opinion, drawn from Irenaeus and other 2d-century witnesses, is that on Patmos John wrote the Apocalypse (perhaps late in the reign of Domitian, 81–96) and at Ephesus, the Epistles and the Gospel (perhaps early in the reign of Trajan, 98–117). Modern literary criticism, however, would require at least the positing of several editings and the use of secretaries to preserve authorship by John and yet account for the diversities in style and thought of the five Johannine writings.

The more likely scenario is that an ex-disciple of John the Baptist was the foundational figure and inspiration of a so-called "Johannine Community." He is the "author" of the Fourth Gospel (see Jn 1.35–40; 21:24). Other "Johannine Communities" developed from the original group, and divisions among them eventually led to the writing of the Johannine Epistles. They were not written by the Beloved Disciple, who had died by this time (see Jn 21.20–23). But they continued the same theological tradition as they faced new difficulties, and as the originally unified community began to divide (see 1 Jn 2.19). Revelation comes from another figure, also called "John" (a common name), identified as "the presbyter" (see Rv 1.1, 4, 9; 21.2; 22.8).

An ancient cult of John at Ephesus is attested to by the ruins of an impressive basilica.

Contrary to Irenaeus, there is a tradition that John died an early death; it has no real value. Tertullian (Praescrip. Haer. 36) says that John was brought from Ephesus to Rome and cast into a cauldron of boiling oil before the Latin Gate, but was miraculously preserved. This tradition is seemingly not historical, and the feast (May 6) has been omitted from the general calendar. Among stories told of John may be made of his unwillingness to associate with the heretic Cerinthus in the public baths (Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 3.3.4), his raising a dead man to life (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5.18.14), his reclaiming a robber for Christ (Clement of Alexandria, What Rich Man 42), and his repeating of the instruction: "Little children, love one another" (Jerome, On Gal. 6.10).

Of Docetic or Gnostic origins are several Acts of John (by Leucius, by Prochorus) and an Apocryphon of John; the former stresses the virginity of John. A legend of the assumption of John developed in Encratite circles.

Of the four Evangelistic figures based on Ez 1.10 and Rv 4.7, John is depicted as an eagle because of the theological heights of the Prologue. The late use of the chalice in Johannine iconography may reflect Mt 20.23 (“You will drink my cup”), combined with the legend that when John was given a poisoned cup, the poison came out in the form of a serpent. There is a custom in Europe of a “cup of charity” drunk in honor of John. The practice of celebrating John’s feast (Dec. 27) immediately after that of Stephen is ancient, originating before the 5th century. Sometimes John and James were honored together; but in this feast, perhaps through confusion, the James who was honored was the brother of the Lord, and not the brother of John.

The data provided above lists all the possible appearances of John, the Son of Zebedee, in the New Testament, and the major subsequent reflection upon that data. Several family and apostolic links have been suggested in this listing. None of them are certain, and most are based upon a tendency to render more certain data that remains outside our scientific control. John, the Son of Zebedee, was certainly one of the first disciples of Jesus, the brother of James (see Mk 3.17). He was also one of “the Twelve,” a historical group of foundational disciples of Jesus whom Jesus gathered around himself during his public ministry. The long association of the name of John the Son of Zebedee with the Gospel of John, this link was first made late in the second century by Ireneus. He was anxious to save the Fourth Gospel from becoming the Gospel of the Gnostics. The earliest use of the Fourth Gospel is found in Gnostic writings. His apostolic ministry and his death in either Jerusalem or (more likely) Ephesus, remain in the realms of speculation. We only have the witness of later interested parties for such detail.

Bibliography: In addition to the bibliography provided in the entry under the Gospel according to St. John, see M.-E. BOISMARD, Le Martyre de Jean l’Apôtre (Paris 1996). R. E. BROWN, The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York 1979). J. H. CHARLESWORTH, The Beloved Disciple. Whose Witness Validates the Gospel of John? (Valley Forge 1995). R. A. CULPEPPER, John, the Son of Zebedee: The Life of a Legend (Columbia 1994). J. P. MEIER, “The Circle of the Twelve: Did It Exist During Jesus’ Public Ministry?” Journal of Biblical Literature 116 (1997) 635–672.

[R. E. BROWN/F. J. MOLONEY]

JOHN, EPISTLES OF

Three canonical works come under this rubric: 1 John, a general letter addressed as a warning to a particular area, but applicable to all Christians; 2 John, a letter addressed to the “elect lady,” which is probably a reference to a church, and it is also generally applicable; 3 John, a letter addressed to Gaius. In 2 and 3 John the author is identified as the “presbyter” or “elder.” These two epistles are of about the same length, each probably written on one papyrus sheet.

This article discusses the questions of authorship, the relationship between the Epistles and the Fourth Gospel, and then gives attention to the literary form and the message of 1–3 John. It concludes with some suggestions concerning the historical situation in early Christian communities reflected in the Gospel of John and the Johannine Epistles.

The Authorship of the Epistles. Polycarp of Smyrna (Phil. 7), writing between A.D. 115 and 140, seems to cite 1 Jn 4.2–3; and Papias, c. 140, is said by Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica 3.39.17) to have cited 1 John. Therefore there has been no real doubt about the canonicity of 1 John. The MURATORIAN CANON, c. 200, mentions two Epistles of John; and Irenaeus cites both 1 and 2 John and ascribes them, along with the Gospel, to John the Apostle. Beginning with Clement of Alexandria and Origen references to three epistles are found. Both Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica 3.25.3) and Jerome (Vir. illus. 9.18) suggest that 2 and 3 John were written by one other than John the Apostle who wrote the Fourth Gospel and 1 John. By the end of the 4th century, 2 and 3 John found their way into canonical acceptance both in the West and the East, except at Antioch. They are not found in the Syriac PESHITTA.

The Council of Trent settled the canonicity of 1, 2, and 3 John; it did not settle the question of authorship, disputed even in antiquity. Since 2 and 3 John are so much alike and claim the same author, there is no real reason to doubt their common authorship. But did this “presbyter” also write 1 John? There are many parallels in thought between 2 John and 1 John, although the phrasing is not always the same. In 1 Jn 1.7 the phrase “walk in light” occurs, while 2 Jn 4 has “walking in the truth.” Both Epistles (1 Jn 2.7–8; 2 Jn 5) mention a new commandment that is also old because it existed from the beginning. The connection between love and keeping the commandments is similar in both (1 Jn 2.4–5; 2 Jn 6). Both (1 Jn 4.2; 2 Jn 7) stress the importance of confessing that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh. Thus whether or not the same scribe is responsible for the writing, it seems clear that these Epistles belong to the same school of thought, and thus to the same author in the Biblical sense, i.e., the person responsible for the message.

The Epistles and the Fourth Gospel. The author of the Gospel looks back upon a period when those who confessed that Jesus was the Christ had been cast out of the Synagogue (see 9.22; 12.42; 16.2). After the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70, the surviving Jews, who largely belonged to a group described in the Gospels as the Pharisees, worked hard to re-establish its religious practice which, for the Jews (then and now), is intimately associated with all aspects of everyday life. But Jewish-Christians had also survived. Gradually these two different forms of Judaism went their separate ways. The Fourth Gospel is one piece of evidence of this process that would have gradually taken place across the Mediterranean world. However, the final separation of the communities behind the Epistles of John from their Jewish roots was long since past. The problems with people “outside” the Johannine communities had been resolved, for better or for worse. The Epistles face an inevitable further stage in the story of the people for whom they were written: problems were emerging within the communities. There was a breakdown among members of different communities that looked to the Gospel of John for their story of Jesus. Thus, “Johannine” communities existed with differing interpretations of their founding tradition, the Gospel of John. The author of 1 John can write: “They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would have continued with us; but they went out, that it might be plain that they all are not of us” (1 Jn 2.19. See also 2 Jn 7).

As is evident from the language and theological solutions proposed to overcome early Christian crises, the Gospel and the Epistles come from the same theological background. But the Epistles reflect a situation where the original group is spreading (and dividing) into a number of communities. A Christian leader addresses his fellow Christians in an attempt to dissuade them from following the behavior and beliefs of others who, in his opinion, are in error and have “gone out” from the founding community. The presence of different communities is especially clear in 3 John where the author of the Epistle, an “Elder,” a senior figure in a Christian community, pleads with the leader of another community, Gaius, to disregard the thought and behavior of a third party, Diotrephes (3 Jn 9–10). At least three groups are involved.

Throughout 1 John the author writes negatively of the group who “went out” (see 1 Jn 2.19). The first part of the Epistle is dedicated to an attack upon some who do not share his ideas. He writes accusingly: “If we say that we have fellowship with him while we are walking in darkness, we lie and do not do what is true” (1.6). The same spirit lies behind a series of further affirmations: “If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and truth is not in us” (1.8); “If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us” (1.10). A similar form of attack is phrased differently: “The one who says ‘I know him’ but disobeys his commandments is a liar, and the truth is not in that person” (2.4); “The one who says he abides in him ought to walk in the same way in which he walked” (2:6). These examples, drawn from the first pages of the Epistle, are but a sample. The list could go on, as the writer continually attacks “whoever says. . .” (2.4, 9, 11) or “everyone who. . .” (2.23; 3.4, 8). Such angry polemic is directed against people who are divided from the author.

The Problem of a Principle of Love. A fundamental belief of the Christian tradition which has its origin in the Gospel of John is that God is love (see 1 Jn 4.8, 16). This belief comes from the Gospel’s insistence that the presence of Jesus in the human story is the result of God’s love: “God so loved the world that he gave his own only Son” (Jn 3.16). The mission of the Son was to make the Father known (see Jn 4.34; 5.36; 15.13; 17.3–4). This takes place in the loving self-gift of Jesus on the Cross. There the love of God can be seen as generations of believers gaze upon the one whom they have pierced (Jn 19.37). The mission of Jesus has consequences for those who regard themselves as his disciples. They are called to a unity of love (see Jn 13.34–35; 15.12, 17; 17.11, 20–23). A loving God has called disciples who are to love one another as he has loved them: “You did not choose me, but I chose you and appointed you that you should go and bear fruit and that your fruit should abide” (Jn 15.16).

For the author of 1 John, this central feature of John’s Gospel had not become a reality in the lives of the subsequent members of those communities who looked back to the story of Jesus as it had been passed down to them in the Gospel of John. The author seeks the fruits which should be visible (see Jn 15.5), but abiding fruits that should flow from the initiative of God in choosing his disciples are hard to find among some. But not all is anger and pain. The members of the communities are reminded of fundamental principles of the Gospel of John. The author faces the inevitable difficulty of looking to a document from the past as he tries to make it relevant to his present situation.

The Epistles of John are proof that this was already a problem within the short period of time that had elapsed between the production of the Gospel of John and the writing of the Epistles. The author of 1 John presupposes that the recipients of this letter are on his side, but he may have some doubts. They may have been wavering, and this could explain the harshness of his stance against all who had a different understanding of the Gospel. The author of the Epistle looks back to the Johannine tradition in the Christian Church. But the tone of the document indicates that one of the central elements in the Gospel’s teaching on discipleship is not being lived. No doubt he writes in the hope of restoring the mutuality of love demanded by the teaching of Jesus. However, he risks the establishment of a community where like-minded people love one another, but have little affection or concern for those outside the boundaries of their community.

A Letter? Unlike 2 and 3 John, 1 John can only be called a “letter” in a general sense. As we shall see below, the two later Epistles (2 and 3 John) follow the stereotyped form of a letter in antiquity. From the many examples of letters still available from that time, scholars have been able to trace the common structure of a letter. Ancient letters began with a standard form of introduction, in which the writer was introduced, the addressee named and an initial greeting exchanged. This was generally followed by a word of thanksgiving to the gods, and then the body of the letter. At the beginning and end of this main section, were found stereotyped expressions of good will and indications of the purpose of the letter. It would close with a formula of farewell.

There are hints of these forms in 1 John (cf. 2.1, 5.21), and the author continually addresses himself to a very specific audience. But this is hardly enough to call it a stereotypical letter from antiquity. Indeed, its literary form is unique and, as we will see, the uniqueness comes from the loyalty of the author to the tradition that formed him: the Gospel of John. The majority of the so-called “epistles” in the Christian Scriptures are motivated by something other than everyday events, business matters, or personal greetings and family communications. They are what we might call theological tracts, even though they use the overall shape of a letter. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans is an outstanding example of a letter which is only loosely associated with the letter-form, but which must be regarded as an authentic letter. Paul writes to persuade the Romans of the importance of God’s all-embracing offer of salvation, made through the death and resurrection of Jesus. It is this effort to persuade which gives the Epistle its lasting value.

The letter-form has been transcended by the passion of early Christian authors to convince the recipients of the importance of what God had done in and through Jesus Christ. 1 John communicates between an author who has things he wishes to teach readers who might be losing confidence in their beliefs. A “rhetoric of persuasion” is at play across the document and generates the unique literary form of 1 John.

The Shape and Message of 1 John. The structure and argument of 1 John parallel the founding Gospel of John. This further indicates that the people to whom this letter was written were part of the tradition that produced the Gospel of John. The readers received a document restating in a letter-tract form the major theological arguments of the Gospel. The author has modeled the Epistle upon the structure of the Gospel, with a prologue (1.1–4.

See Jn 1.1–18), the body of the Epistle in two parts ([a] 1.5–3.10. See Jn 1.19–12.50. [b] 3.11–5.12. See Jn 13.1–20.19) and a conclusion (5.13–21. See Jn 20.30–31).

The Prologue (1.1–4) recalls Jn 1.1–18. It too tells of the “beginnings” of the Christian story: Jesus who revealed the word of life. But it also looks back to another “beginning,” to the original community which lived in fellowship with the Father and the Son. In the first part of the Gospel’s account of the ministry of Jesus (Jn 1.19–12.50), Jesus lived and proclaimed his message within the context of hostile rejection. So also the first central section of the Epistle, which could be given the description, “God is light and we must walk in the light as Jesus walked” (1.5–3.10), is also at times hostile. It insists that Christians live as Jesus lived, and attacks the false ideas and way of life of some who have left the community. In the second central section, to which we could give the title, “We must love one another as God has loved us in Jesus Christ” (3.11–5.12), the hostility softens, but does not disappear. Recalling Jn 13.1–17.26, the author develops the theme of the centrality of true love and true faith as the basis for Christian confidence. The Epistle concludes (5.13–21) with an assurance that true believers can pray with confidence, in the midst of difficulties and conflicts, and rest in God’s unfailing protection.

As is obvious from this schematic presentation of the First Epistle of John, the pain and anger generated by division among Johannine Christians have not impoverished the power and comfort of the Christian message. The author’s presentation of God, Jesus and the Christian response to the action of God in his Son, is not dissipated. The Christian tradition which first found expression in the story of Jesus in the Gospel of John remains strongly present in the First Epistle of John. The very way the author organized his Epistle, following the overall shape of the Gospel, is an indication of his loyalty to that tradition.

A Passionate Voice. Despite the polemical voice that rings through 1 John, our reading these pages should focus, not so much on the so-called errors of the opponents, but on the passion which generated the Epistle. For all his one-sidedness, the author has produced within this short document a remarkable synthesis of some of the essential elements of the Christian tradition:

Jesus’ teaching about God as Father, and especially in his association of this teaching with the themes of love (1 Jn 3.1; 4.7–12, 14; 5.1–2).

Fellowship with God means fellowship with the Father and the Son (1.3; 2.22–25).

The importance of the human Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ, the Son of God (2.22; 3.23; 4.2; 5.6), and that his death on the cross atones for our inevitable sinfulness (2.2; 3.16; 4.10; 5.6).

The tension between the gifts of the “now” and the need to wait for a “not yet” (2.18, 28; 3.2–3). The experience of the Spirit (3.24; 4.4, 6, 13) grounded in some form of initiation rite, possibly baptism (2.20, 27; 3.9; 5.18).

The emphasis on the importance of faith for salvation, for knowledge of God through the acceptance of Jesus as the Christ (3.23; 4.16; 5.1, 4–5, 10–12).

The ethical teaching of the love of God and the love of our neighbor (see 2.15–17; 3.17; 4.20; 21; 5.21).

A New Way of Stating Truths. These elements of the Christian tradition have been recast in a letter-form, using the language and imagery of the Gospel of John.

Developing the theme of “light” in the Gospel of John (see Jn 1.4–5, 7–9; 3.19–21; 8.12; 9.5; 11.9; 12.35–36, 46), the author of the Epistle claims that God is light (1.5) and love (4.8, 16). The person born of God (2.29; 3.9; 4.7; 5.1, 4, 18) walks in the light (2.9). Those born of God are children of God (3.1), and derive their life from God (5.11–13).

The realm opposed to God is one of darkness and death, characterized by hatred, falsehood, murder and unbelief. The dualism of the Fourth Gospel continues in 1 John.

Ways of speaking about Jesus found in the Gospel of John remain. Jesus is even called “the word” (1.1. See Jn 1.1–2). But especially significant is the use of the two titles “the Christ” and “the Son of God” which are so important for correct faith, according to the Gospel’s conclusion (Jn 20.31). The close identification between God and Jesus (see Jn 1.1–2) is repeated as the Epistle comes to a close: “This is the true God and eternal life” (1 Jn 5.20).

To be saved is to have “eternal life” and to be a child of God (3.1; 5.11–13, 20. See Jn 17.3, 12; 5.19–30), even though the believer must still wait for the coming of the end time (2.18; 3.2. See Jn 5.27–29; 6.40, 44).

The Holy Spirit in the community is the gift of God (3.24; 4.13; see Jn 14.26).

The commandments of God and of Christ must be obeyed, especially the love command (3.11, 23). The Gospel commands that the disciples love one another as Jesus has loved them, so that the world might know that they are his disciples (see Jn 13.34–35). This ideal command becomes more practical in 1 John. Mutual love, reflecting the love of God and obeying the command of the Son, is to be shown to our fellow believer (4.7–21), and should be seen in the way we walk as Jesus walked (2.6).

These indications demonstrate a robust understanding of both foundational Christian beliefs which have their roots in the life and teaching, death and resurrection of Jesus, and the articulation of those beliefs in the Gospel of John.

2 and 3 John: True Letters. From Christianity’s earliest years, believers and critics have wondered why such short (and somewhat fractious) documents as 2–3 John have become part of the Christian Scriptures. They were addressed to a local situation in an attempt to deal with conflicts in these communities, but they were quickly associated with the figure of John, the author of a Gospel. They were thus seen as part of a tradition deserving a place in “the Johannine Writings.” 2 and 3 John correspond reasonably well with the widely attested form of a First Century Hellenistic letter. The following indicates how the three basic elements of these letters appear in 2 and 3 John.

2 John

Opening formula (vv. 1–3)

Sender—addressee—greeting (vv. 1–3)

Body of the Letter (vv. 4–12)

Expression of joy—transition to the body of the letter (v. 3)

Request concerning the commandment to love (vv. 5–6)

Warning against the Antichrists and their teaching (vv. 7–11)

Promise of a visit, closing the body of the letter (v. 12)

Concluding Formula (v. 13)

3 John

Opening formula (vv. 1–2)

Sender—addressee—greeting (vv. 1–2)

Body of the Letter (vv. 3–14)

Expression of joy—transition to the body of the letter (vv. 3–4)

Request for hospitality and support (vv. 5–8)

The hostility of Diotrephes (vv. 9–10)

An appeal to do good and a recommendation for Demetrius (vv. 11–12)

Promise of a visit, closing the body of the letter (vv. 13–14)

Concluding formula (v. 15)

Message. We only hear one side of the argument, but these documents allow us to eavesdrop upon a conversation between a significant figure within the communities (“the Elder”) and a community (2 Jn: the elect lady and her children) or the leader of one of the communities, another “Elder” (3 Jn: Gaius). 2–3 John are not theological tracts, but reflect the Elder’s concern for the ongoing faith of early Christian communities. They thus afford us access to the sometimes difficult experiences of an emerging Christian Church.

In 2 John 7 the author of the Epistle, in a way reminiscent of 1 Jn 2.19, warns the community of those who have left them. Not only have they departed from a once unified community; they have also departed from the teachings the author would regard as true Christian belief. Such dangerous deceivers and antichrists must be shunned if they approach the community to which 2 John is written. For the moment that is all the author wishes to tell his fellow-believers. He will explain the situation when he comes to visit them in the near future. The situation in 3 John is more local, personal, and bitter, written to Gaius, a senior figure in a community (also an "Elder"), who deserves praise for the way he has made wandering fellow Christians welcome. His acceptance of itinerant believers, however, is to be contrasted with the attitude and arrogance of a certain Diotrophes who has refused to welcome the emissaries of the letter-writer, and has also refused to accept his authority. But all is not lost, as the author can recommend another Christian, Demetrius, who is true. Divisions are hardening, as some are "in" and others are "out." But this arrogance is not only to be laid at the door of Diotrophes, who rejects the letter-writer's emissaries and his authority (3 Jn). It was also the position advocated by the author of 2 John as he instructed his "beloved lady and her children" to avoid the dangerous influence of the deceivers and the antichrists: "If any one comes to you and does not bring this doctrine, do not receive him into the house or give him any greeting" (2 Jn 11).

The Story of the Gospel and Epistles of John.

Many scholars believe that a single tradition, which can be called "the Johannine tradition," lies behind the Gospel of John and 1, 2 and 3 John. There were those who believed that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (Jn 20.31), but who found it difficult to love one another as Jesus had loved them (see Jn 13.34–35; 15.12). The Gospel already reflects the tensions which existed in an early Christian community as it developed an understanding of Jesus which became steadily more distant from the community's origins within Judaism (see, for example 6.60–66). A missionary activity, initially among the Samaritans (see 4.1–42), and a physical journey of a community which had its origins in Israel, but which seems to have finally settled in Asia Minor, led to the development of its tradition. The community could no longer locate Jesus within the strictly Jewish categories of other early Christian communities. They came to speak of Jesus as "the Christ," "the Son of God," "I AM," "the Word," and they told of Jesus' claims to be one with God, whom he called his Father (see, for example, 5.19–30; 10.30, 38).

The community and the local Synagogue inevitably suffered a complete and final separation (see 9.22; 12.42; 16.2). Once this took place, the tradition developed with a greater sense of independence. These early Christians no longer used only Jewish categories to understand Jesus, but moving into the broader Greco-Roman world of Asia Minor saw the need to tell the old story in a new way. The presentation of the person and role of Jesus Christ in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel (1.1–18) and the final prayer of Jesus (17.1–26) are good examples (but not the only examples) of such writing. These well-known and much-loved passages have their roots in the Jewish story of Jesus and the earliest years of the tradition, but they re-tell the traditional story that it might make sense in a new world. This was not a simple process. The addition of John 21 indicates that there may have been some misunderstanding of the nature of the community. This is clarified by the account of the miraculous draft of many fish into the one boat (21.1–14). Its attention to Peter, the pastor and shepherd, and the Beloved Disciple who also follows Jesus (vv. 15–24) shows that there were concerns over authority in the community.

The Epistles continue this story. Difficulties with the Synagogue long since past, the threat of opposition from outside the community seemed to have disappeared. The Elder focuses his attention upon internal difficulties. Already in 1 John the author of the Epistle presents an argument which is aimed at supporting his fragile community in the face of some ex-members of the community who have left them (see 1 Jn 2.19). They are regarded as the antichrists (2.18), purveyors of a false ethic (see 1.8–10; 2.15–17; 3.4–10; 5.2), rejecting the importance of mutual love within the community (see 2.9–11; 3.14–18, 4.7–12, 20–21). They do not regard the historical Jesus as the Christ and the Son of God (2.22–23, 3.23; 4.2–3; 5.5–6), and they seem to have difficulty with the traditional understanding of the end of time (3.2–3; 4.17). Such teaching and practice are contrary to the tradition which the author insists communities had received "in the beginning" (1.1; 2.7, 13–14, 24). As we have seen, the structure and argument in 1 John can be interpreted as a loose commentary upon the Fourth Gospel. It certainly presupposes a knowledge of that story of Jesus, and the Christian traditions which flow from it.

Toward the end of the first Christian Century, there were a several communities which looked back to the story of Jesus as it is told in the Gospel of John. There they found inspiration and guidance in their Christian lives. No specific audience is indicated in 1 John. It was probably written for the central community where a division had already taken place over different interpretations of the original tradition. These interpretations disturbed the remnant that remained faithful to the tradition defended by the author. The situation of 2 and 3 John, understood as brief letters from the same author as 1 John, now calling himself “the Elder,” are indications of his campaign to protect other communities from the teachings of missionaries coming from the breakaway group. 2 John warns a Church against admitting them; 3 John attempts to get help for the itinerant brethren who had the support of the Elder. They were probably missionaries sympathetic to the position of the Elder, moving about among the early Christian communities, spreading the warning and defending the tradition. Strong personalities emerged, especially the Elder and Diotrephes. Originally from the same tradition, but leaders of geographically separate communities, Diotrephes took seriously the warnings of 2 John 10–11. He would not admit anyone into his community, not even the emissaries of the Elder, whose authority he refused to accept (3 Jn 9–10). Yet the Elder still has support from the community of elect lady (2 Jn 1.1–2, 13), Gaius (3 Jn 1–4, 15), and Demetrius (3 Jn 11–12).

We can only speculate about the subsequent history of the emerging interpretations of the tradition that originated in the Gospel of John. A lack of teaching authority leads the author of 1 John to point to the need to test the spirits (1 John 4.1–6), a method of identifying truth which would hardly be effective in a faith community attempting to establish a body of doctrine. But the belief that Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ, the Son of God who atones for our sins, becomes fundamental to the emerging Christian Church. The same could be said for the Elder’s defense of a traditional understanding of the end of time. We have a very one-sided presentation of those who have left the original community. But their ethics, their idea of community, their understanding of the end-time and of Jesus Christ, as presented by the Elder, look very like an early stage of what eventually flowered in second-century GNOSTICISM. This powerful religious tradition, which had many different representatives, understood Jesus as a revealing figure who imparted a saving “knowledge” (Greek: γνῶσις). His humanity and his death faded in importance. The Gnostics regarded some people as “illuminated” by knowledge, and considerable ambiguity surrounded their ethical behavior. Gnosticism faltered as the Christian Church gradually asserted itself, with the support of secular authority, as the dominant belief system. It could be suggested that neither the one-sided Christianity of the Elder nor the early Gnosticism of Diotrephes lived beyond the second century.

Bibliography: A. E. BROOKE, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Johannine Epistles (Edinburgh 1912). R. E. BROWN, The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York 1979). C. H. DODD, The Johannine Epistles (New York 1946). D. RENSBERGER, 1 John, 2 John, 3 John (Abingdon New Testament Commentaries; Nashville 1997). R. SCHNACKENBURG, The Johannine Epistles. A Commentary (New York 1992). S. S. SMALLEY, 1, 2, 3 John (Word Biblical Commentary 51; Waco 1984). B. F. WESTCOTT, The Epis- tes of St John: The Greek Text with Notes (3d ed. 1892; repr. Abingdon 1966).

[F. J. MOLONEY]

JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO

After a discussion of the unity of the Fourth Gospel, this article considers the questions of historical tradition in the Gospel, influences on the Gospel, its destination and purpose, the date of its writing, the problem of authorship. It concludes by proposing an outline of the Gospel.

Unity of the fourth Gospel. Is John as it now stands the work of one man? The solution commonly accepted before the advent of criticism was that this Gospel was the work of John, son of Zebedee, composed shortly before his death. Leaving the problem of the author’s identity for a later section, we note here that there are indications of more than one hand in the Gospel. The Prologue has a formal poetic style and theological stresses, e.g., the personified Word, not found elsewhere in the Gospel. Coming after 20.30–31, ch. 21 is clearly an addition, narrating Resurrection appearances totally independent of those narrated in ch. 20 and exhibiting a Greek style somewhat different from the rest of the Gospel. Within the body of the Gospel there are breaks in sequence difficult to reconcile as the work of one writer, e.g., one ending for the public ministry in 10.40–42 and another ending in 12.37–43; two endings for the farewell discourse of Jesus in 14.31 and 18.1; unattached speeches that ill fit the context, such as 3.31–36 and 12.44–50. There is no need to dwell on the problem of the story of the adulteress (7.53–8.11), which is certainly not Johannine in style, does not fit the context, and is missing in the early Greek MSS. (It was an independent morsel of Gospel tradition that in later witnesses was inserted in John or sometimes in Luke; according to Tridentine norms it is inspired Scripture.) All this has led scholars to posit that, besides an author or evangelist who was chiefly responsible for the tradition of John, there was a subsequent editor (or a series of editors), perhaps the evangelist’s disciple(s), who added material to the body of the Gospel narrative, material stemming in one way or another from the author.

Source Theory. Many critics suggest that, leaving aside the editorial additions, even the body of the Gospel is not a unity but is a combination of sources. The most articulate formulation of this theory is that of R. Bultmann, who posits three sources that were combined by the evangelist. First, there was, according to him, a collection of revelatory discourses. Composed originally in Aramaic, this source began with the Prologue and contained poetic discourses wherein a revealer from heaven announced himself under the formula, “I am . . .” (Jn 6.35; 10.7, 11; 15.1) and demanded faith in himself as the condition for man’s salvation. Bultmann connects the GNOSTICISM of these discourses with the thought of the Mandaeans, a syncretistic baptizing sect living in Iraq, somehow related to John the Baptist (see MANDAEAN RELIGION). Second, there was a collection of Jesus’ miraculous signs. Written in Greek with strong Semitic affinities, this source had as an introduction the call of the first disciples (1.35–51) and enumerated the signs done by Jesus (2.11; 4.54; 20.30). Finally, there was a narrative of the Passion and Resurrection.

The Virgin of Humility and Saint Jerome translating the Gospel of John, diptych by Benedetto di Bindo, 15th century. (©Philadelphia Museum of Art/CORBIS)

For Bultmann, the first and second sources had no real historical value as a memory of the actual words and deeds of Jesus. The evangelist combined them, Christianized the Gnosticism, and made the composite work the vehicle of a personal, somewhat existential theology. His hand may be seen in certain additions to the sources. For Bultmann, a final stage in the composition of the Gospel was the work of “the ecclesiastical redactor,” a primitive censor who adapted the evangelist’s work to make it acceptable to orthodox authorities in the Church. The redactor corrected the antisacramental tenor of the original by adding sacramental references (“water” in 3.5; the Eucharist in 6.51–58; the Eucharist and Baptism in 19.34). He adapted the Evangelist’s realized eschatology [see ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)] by adding references to the second coming of Christ (5.28–29), and he harmonized John with the Synoptic tradition.

This analysis is ingenious and has some valid insights, e.g., the poetic style of the discourses; but it is open to serious objections. For instance, realized eschatology and a hope for the second coming are not mutually exclusive, and the corrective aspect of the final editing is highly questionable. There are no satisfactory contemporary literary parallels for the sources that Bultmann posits. Moreover, the same stylistic peculiarities are rather uniform throughout the Gospel, as shown by E. Schweizer and E. Ruckstuhl; yet it would be logical to expect different styles to be evident in the remnants of the different sources. C. H. Dodd has shown that miraculous sign and discourse in John are not artificially juxtaposed, but that the discourse is a most necessary explanation of the sign.

Redaction Theory. If the source theory is rejected, there is another more plausible explanation of the composition of John. This is the redaction theory: that underlying the body of the Gospel there is a series of redactions, oral and literary. M. E. Boismard suggests that the one evangelist was responsible for these redactions, as might well happen if the same material was preached over and over again for a long time. This theory would explain different theological emphases within John, e.g., realized and final eschatology, and less and more specific sacramentalism. It would also explain the repetitiveness of John where there seem to be different versions of the same material (e.g., 5.19–25 and 5.26–30; 14.1–31 and 16.4–33). If such redactions stem from the same evangelist at different periods, the unity of Johannine style would still be respected. According to this theory, the evangelist himself may have given written form to one or more of these editions; but as seen above, the final form of the Gospel would not be the work of the evangelist but the work of an editor who acted not as a censor but as the completer of the evangelist's work. This theory would do justice both to the evidence of the Gospel itself and to tradition, for there is a suggestion in the early witnesses (MURATORIAN Canon, Toletan Latin Preface, Acts of John by Prochorus) that others were associated with John in producing this Gospel.

It is not possible for the modern scholar to reconstruct perfectly the various editions of the evangelist or always to detect the hand of the final editor(s). Various scholars (J. Bernard, F. Hoare, Bultmann) have rearranged John to get a better sequence, e.g., by transposing ch. 5 and 6, and by putting 10.1–18 after 10.19–29.

Today the tendency is to comment on the Gospel as it has been given to us. The meaning thus obtained is more likely to be loyal to the author's intent than is a modern subjective and often tendentious rearrangement. The advent of a greater attention to the importance of narrative as such, and the development of a number of approaches to biblical narratives, has tipped the balance even further against the earlier interest in sources and re-ordering the material. Source critical study continues (see U. Schnelle; J. Painter) but the majority of contemporary Johannine scholars, especially those writing in English, devote their attention to the structure and message of the narrative as we have received it in the canonical text (see M. W. G. Stibbe, T. Brodie, F. J. Moloney).

Historical Tradition in the fourth Gospel. If unity is posited for John, the question must still be asked whether the body of the Gospel as it stems from the evangelist represents independent historical tradition. It has been maintained by some critics that the evangelist borrowed and adapted his historical framework from the SYNOPSIS GOSPELS and that what is peculiar to John may be explained either as deliberate alteration of Synoptic details for theological purposes, or else as invention.

Today this approach has lost ground for three reasons. First, it is now seriously contested that John borrowed from the Synoptic tradition; P. Gardner-Smith and Dodd have made a careful study of the relationship between the two traditions as regards the words and deeds of Jesus. In scenes shared by the two traditions, such as the healing of the royal official's son (Jn 4.46–54) and the multiplication of the loaves (Jn 6.1–13), it is almost impossible to explain the differences in John on any pattern of deliberate alteration. Many of the details peculiar to John have every mark of being primitive. Thus it seems that there must be posited for John a tradition independent of the Synoptic tradition, a tradition that in some details will be more primitive, in some details more advanced. Such a position also rules out the ancient theory that John was written to supplement the Synoptic Gospels.

Second, there has been external verification or support for some of the material found in John alone. The pool of BETHESDA in Jn 5.2 has been excavated in Jerusalem and has been found to have five porticoes, just as John describes it. Its name appears in the copper scroll from Qumran. The stone pavement of the Lithostrotos (19.13) may have been uncovered under the fortress Antonia (see PRAETORIUM). As A. Guilding has reconstructed the synagogue lectionary, the texts read in the synagogue at a particular feast were often those that underlie Jesus' discourse on that feast as reported in John, e.g., 6.35–50, on the Passover. P. Borgen shows that a discourse such as 6.35–50 fits all the rules of rabbinic exegesis prevailing in Jesus' own time. These and many other discoveries indicate that the author of the Gospel had an accurate knowledge of Palestine and its customs before the destruction of A.D. 70.

Third, some of the arguments against Johannine historicity have been weakened in recent years. A prime example is the argument that the abstract language of dualism in John, e.g., light and darkness in 3.19–21, could not possibly stem from the Palestine of Jesus' time, but belongs to the Gnostic or Hellenistic world of the 2d century. But this language has recently been found in the Dead Sea Scrolls of Qumran, showing that it was current at least among one group of Jews before and during Jesus' time. A proper understanding of John's theological purpose explains other difficulties. For example, in 11.49 the author does not mistakenly think that the high priesthood was an annual office; he is emphasizing the significant character of "that year" in which Jesus died.

Although there is an increasing tendency to admit that the fourth Gospel contains independent historical tradition, there is widespread overconfidence in the other direction, that John cannot be used as a biographical guide in reconstructing the life of Christ. The standard lives of Christ have been written by fitting Synoptic material into Johannine chronology. This procedure is objectionable on several accounts. First, often the Synoptic Gospels themselves do not give the words and deeds of Jesus in their historical order; many once independent stories have been fitted into their existing sequence according to logic or theology rather than chronology. Second, there is no guarantee that John's chronology is complete. The whole basis for thinking that Jesus had a two- or three-year ministry is that John mentions three Passovers (2.13; 6.4; 11.55). However, the reason for mentioning these Passovers is theological (20.30–31); they are significant for the narrative. There is no guarantee that there were not more Passovers in the ministry of Jesus that were not mentioned because they had no significance. Moreover, in the final editing of John there has been rearrangement, and the present Johannine sequence is not necessarily always historical. One must recognize, then, the limitations imposed on the use of the historical tradition preserved in John, but this must not be overstated. Recent work on the historical Jesus (J. P. Meier; F. J. Moloney) has turned more regularly to John, and often concluded in favor of the basic historicity of many elements in the Johannine account. (See JESUS CHRIST, BIOGRAPHICAL STUDIES OF.)

Influences on the fourth Gospel. Complementary to the previous problem is that of influences on the Gospel. Those who do not accept the historical character of the Johannine tradition often suggest Gnostic or Hellenistic influences on the Evangelist.

Gnostic Influence. The "History of Religions School," prominent early in the 20th century, brought forward the possibility of Gnostic influence on John, and W. Bauer and Bultmann have been prominent defenders of this theory. Until recently there were very few examples of 2d-century Gnosticism, and so it was possible to think that John might fit into this sphere. The discovery of Gnostic documents at Chenoboskion (see CHENOBOSKION, Gnostic Texts of) has changed the picture. Neither the Gospel of Truth nor the Gospel of Thomas is close to John in thought. Both betray indirect knowledge of John, but their Gnosticism is more developed than anything in John. At most, it may be said that John, like the Dead Sea Scrolls, exhibits a dualism and a vocabulary that is pre-Gnostic but that was funneled into later Gnosticism.

Nor has Bultmann's Mandaean hypothesis won any real following. The oldest extant forms of Mandaean theology are to be dated late in the Christian period. It is possible that sectarians of John the Baptist were among the forebears of the Mandaeans; but as far as can safely be reconstructed, the peculiarly Gnostic aspect of Mandaean theology is the product of later syncretism. The most important single factor in Bultmann's theory concerns the Gnostic redeemer-myth, but there is no clear evidence of the existence of this myth at a period early enough to have influenced John.

Hellenistic Influence. It has also been suggested, in varying degrees, e.g., by B. W. Bacon, Dodd, and C. K. Barrett, that John betrays Hellenistic influence. A distinction must be made here. There was already considerable Hellenistic influence on pre-Christian Judaism. This is exemplified in the speculations on personified Wisdom in Sirach and the Book of Wisdom and in the theology of sectarian Judaism as seen at Qumran and among the Samaritans. There is no doubt that this Hellenistic strain within Judaism had its indirect influence on John. Our problem concerns direct Hellenistic influence. In writing in Greek every one of the evangelists made an inevitable adaptation of the message of Jesus; but the question is whether John adopted Greek patterns and vocabulary on a large scale in order to interpret Jesus to the Greek world. For instance, it has been suggested that John reflects a popular Platonism in his distinctions between what is above and what is below (3.31), between the real heavenly bread and natural bread (6.32). Some have thought that the "Word" of the Prologue is an adaptation of the Stoic λόγος. Each suggestion could be discussed in detail, but in general, there is today a strong tendency to recognize that the basis of such thought can be found in Palestinian Judaism. The "Word" is far closer to personified Wisdom and to the Jewish notion of God's creative word than it is to anything in Stoicism. Even the parallels suggested between Philo and John are explicable mostly in terms of common OT background and milieu rather than in terms of direct influence. The HERMETIC literature has also been suggested as having parallels to John. Once again there is the difficulty of dating, since the body of Hermetic literature is post-Johannine, and earlier stages have to be imaginatively reconstructed. The parallels between John and the Dead Sea Scrolls are closer than those between John and Hermetism.

Palestinian Judaism. Thus it may be said that in many ways it is neither Gnosticism nor the Hellenistic world, but Palestinian Judaism, that remains the most plausible influence on Johannine thought and expression, an influence that fits with the theory that John gives us an independent, reliable tradition about Jesus of Nazareth. The standard currents of OT thought are found in John. Jesus is presented as the Messiah, the elect Servant of Yahweh, the King of Israel, the Prophet. While the number of explicit OT citations in John is relatively low, there are many implicit references to OT personages and scenes: to the first chapters of Genesis (Jn 1–2.10); to Abraham (8.31–58); to Isaac (3.16); to Jacob (4.5–12); to Moses (1.17; 5.46; etc.); to the events of the Exodus, such as the manna (6.31–59), the water from the rock (7.38), the bronze serpent (3.14), and the Tent of Meeting (1.14); to the judges (10.35); to the theme of the royal shepherd (ch. 10). Jewish institutions are the theme of ch. 2 to 4; Jewish feasts are the theme of ch. 5 to 10. The Aramaic features that underlie John's Greek are so strong that some scholars have suggested that John was originally composed in Aramaic. H. L. Strack, P. Billerbeck, A. Schlatter, and Dodd have pointed out the echoes in John of patterns that are found also in rabbinic Judaism.

The strongest objection to explaining John in terms of Palestinian Judaism remains; it is the difference between Johannine thought and expression and that of the Synoptics. Contemporary scholarship is pointing out that many of the Johannine characteristics may have had their origins in Palestinian Judaism, but they have been deliberately used in the Gospel of John because they addressed the syncretistic religious world into which the Gospel was proclaimed at the end of the First Christian Century.

Yet, if both represent historical tradition, if both come from the background of the Palestine in which Jesus lived, how can they be so different? It is because Jesus speaks so differently in John from the way he speaks in the Synoptics that scholars have posited some extraneous influence on John. No complete solution of this problem has yet been forthcoming, but today the problem is being studied more seriously in terms of both traditions being faithful to Jesus. An important factor that we must recognize is that John highlights strains in the tradition about Jesus that are present also in the Synoptic tradition, but only in muted form. John capitalizes on the divine "I am" drawn from the use of ἐγώ εἰμι in the Septuagint (LXX) of Deutero-Isaiah (Is 43.10–11, 25) and perhaps from the Wisdom literature. This usage is seen once in Mk 6.50. The Hour of Jesus' return to the Father in death, Resurrection, and Ascension is important in John (2.4; 7.30; 12.23; 13.1; 17.1), but it is only incidental in the Synoptic tradition (Mk 14.35, 41). Only occasionally does Jesus speak as divine Wisdom in the Synoptics (Mt 11.9; Lk 11.49), but He does so all through John. The figures of bread and water that Jesus uses to describe Himself and His revelation (John ch. 6; 4; 7.37–39) are used of Wisdom in the OT [Prv 9.5; Dt 8.3; Is 55.1–3; Sir 24.18–20; Ps 35(36).9]. Perhaps one of the best indications that the Johannine Jesus is not exclusively Johannine is the so-called Johannine Logion in Mt 11.25–30 and in Lk 10.21–22, where the Synoptic Jesus speaks like the Johannine Jesus.

Another factor contributing to a solution is a better appreciation of each of the four evangelists as a theologian. Something of John's theology has gone into his picture of Jesus, but so has something of the theology of the other three evangelists gone into each of their portraits of Jesus. Even though Clement of Alexandria early designated St. John's as the spiritual Gospel and though John is known as "the theologian," his way of presenting Jesus in the Gospel differs from the Synoptic way only in degree, not in kind. It is now believed that each evangelist interpreted Jesus in his own way; consequently, differences among the Gospels are less startling than when it was thought that the evangelists were giving strictly objective and coldly factual portraits of Jesus. If one allows interpretative freedom to the evangelist and recognizes that he is expounding a different KERYGMA than that expounded in the Synoptics it may be held that Johannine singularities do not necessitate the positing of a major extraneous, non-Jewish influence on the Gospel according to John, but the presence of the unique and new features of the Johannine telling of the Gospel account indicates that in this Gospel we have a telling of the old story in a new way.

Destination and purpose of the Gospel. Scholars have argued about the group to which John was directed, and the most important suggestions will be given below. That there are persuasive arguments for more than one group makes it likely that the Gospel had more than one purpose. It may be that some of the diversity of purpose reflects the different redactions by the Evangelist and the editor(s).

Apologetic against Sectarians of the Baptist. In the Prologue there are several references in which it seems that the writer wishes to prevent anyone from claiming too much glory for John the Baptist. Because of this, it has been suggested that one of the chief purposes of the Gospel was to refute exaggerated claims of the followers of John the Baptist. Bultmann's theory of Mandaean influence on John also gives attention to the followers of John the Baptist; indeed, he has suggested that the Prologue was originally a hymn in praise of John the Baptist.

In evaluating this theory, one recognizes that there was a group of John the Baptist's followers who never accepted Christianity. The pseudo-Clementine writings (c. 200) portray these sectarians as asserting that John the Baptist, not Jesus, was the Messiah. We should note, however, that there is not the slightest evidence that these sectarians were originally Gnostic; neither is it safe to use the Mandaean writings to reconstruct their theology. Some of the negations about John the Baptist in John do seem to be an apologetic refutation of the putative claims of the sectarians in John's time as far as we can reconstruct these claims from other sources. Thus Jn 1.8–9 insists that Jesus, not John the Baptist, was the light; and if the BENEDICTUS was originally a hymn to John the Baptist, Lk 1.78 might suggest that the baptist's followers thought of him as the light. Also worth mentioning is the insistence that Jesus existed before John the Baptist, not vice versa, and that therefore Jesus is greater (1.30). In John, John the Baptist denies that he is the Messiah (1.20) and indicates that Jesus is (3.28–30). Nevertheless, John does not deprecate the baptist but regards him as a uniquely important witness sent by God (1.6, 31; 5.31–40). In summation, it is an exaggeration to see the apologetic against the sectarians of John the Baptist as playing a predominant role in the Gospel, even though it is important. If anything, there may have been difficulties in the early Church with the ex-disciples of John the Baptist. John never speaks negatively of John the Baptist, but Acts 18.24–19:7 indicates that there were some who knew the baptism of John the Baptist, but not Christian Baptism. How were they to be handled? (see C. Niemand)

Polemic against "the Jews." Jesus addressed Himself to His Palestinian Jewish contemporaries in order to persuade them that His was a special role in bringing God's reign (kingdom) into time. Therefore, in any Gospel that preserves a historical tradition one may expect a certain apologetic addressed to the Jews. John is stronger, however, in this respect than the Synoptic Gospels, since the perfection of Jewish institutions (purifications, Temple, worship) and feasts (Sabbath, Passover, Tabernacles, Dedication) is the theme on which the Johannine account of the ministry is organized. It is for this reason that W. C. van Unnik and J. A. T. Robinson have advanced the theory that the primary and almost exclusive purpose of the Gospel was a missionary effort directed to the Diaspora Jews.

It seems that John was not addressed to Palestinian Jews. The term "the Jews" is a hostile one throughout most of John. It is clear that the term is not an ethnic designation, for in ch. 9 the blind man and his parents are contrasted to "the Jews," even though the family is obviously Jewish. "The Jews" often appears in John when the Synoptics speak of the chief priests, the Pharisees, and the Sanhedrin authorities (also cf. Jn 11.47 with 18.14); it may be said that for John "the Jews" refers to the Jewish authorities, especially those in Jerusalem, who are hostile to Jesus. Why does the evangelist give them a title that is clearly anachronistic in the ministry of Jesus? By the time of the writing of John, the Jews in general had become hostile to the followers of Jesus. No longer was there a practical hope for the conversion of the Jews, for synagogue and Church were locked in struggle, and a bitter polemic was developing on both sides. By using the title "the Jews" to refer to those who were hostile to Jesus during the ministry, John was associating the Jews of his own time with them as their descendants. Obviously such terminology ill befitted any missionary effort addressed to Palestinian Jews.

However, as R. Schnackenburg has insisted, the general tenor of John toward even the non-Palestinian Jews can scarcely be called missionary. The hostile debates between Jesus and "the Jews" in Jn 5–12 reflect opposite theological positions. Many of the members of the Johannine community would have been ethnic Jews, but they believed that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (see Jn 20.30–31), the only one who has come from God to make God known (see Jn 1.18; 3.13–14). Jesus' opponents ("the Jews") will not accept this claim. They have rejected the suggestion that anyone except Moses has made God known (see Jn 9.28–29). For John, "the Jews" represent a closed religious system. For John, Jesus does not "replace" the traditions of Israel. He is the consummate gift of God, perfecting the former gift of the Law, given through Moses (see Jn 1.16–17). This is most clear in that section of the Gospel where the conflict between Jesus and "the Jews" is most intense, Jn 5–10. Jesus does not abolish the Jewish celebrations of Sabbath (Jn 5), Passover (Jn 6), Tabernacles (Jn 7.1–10.21), and Dedication (Jn 10.22–39). The theology, language, and ritual of the Jewish celebrations are rendered christological, and thus perfected in Jesus Christ. This is the root of the conflict between Jesus and "the Jews" (see Moloney, Signs and Shadows).

Encouragement to Jewish Christians. There is one exception that fits in with this picture of a general polemic against hostile Judaism. Before the destruction of the Temple, official Judaism had tolerated Jewish Christians within the synagogue. In the decades following the Jewish War, and into the 2d century, there was a gradual parting of the ways between two pre-war Jewish sects: Pharisaic Judaism and Christian Judaism. It has long been claimed that a formal curse against Christians was recited publicly as part of the Eighteen Benedictions, so that failure to pronounce it would betray a Jew of Christian leanings. Under the leadership of Gamaliel II at Jamnia, it has been claimed that this blessing was used to eliminate Jews who accepted Jesus as the Messiah from the Synagogue (J. L. Martyn; R. E. Brown). Recent scholarship has shown that this so-called “blessing” (birkat ham-minim) cannot be reconstructed as a direct attack upon the Christians. Nor can it be clearly associated with Gamaliel II (P. van der Horst). It is also clear that in some places Jews and Christians continued a close association well into the 2d century (J. M. Lieu). Nevertheless, behind the Gospel of John lies an experience of expulsion (see Jn 9:22; 12:42; 16:2, where the Greek word ἀπέλαση is found). There is no need to link this with any formal post-war decision from the Jewish leadership at Jamnia. However local the parting of the ways over the christological claims made for Jesus by the Christians, the pain of separation from the Synagogue is still felt by the readers of the Gospel of John. Undoubtedly many of the Jewish Christians were torn between their ties to their brethren and their faith in Jesus. It is most probable that one of the principal purposes of the fourth Gospel was to encourage such Jewish Christians. The arrangement of the first part of the Gospel is designed to show them that, although they leave Judaism, they have in Jesus a perfection of all that they hold dear by way of institutions and feasts. In the Gospel narratives those who believe in Jesus are distinguished from the hostile “Jews,” and indeed the blind man in ch. 9 is a hero who is excommunicated from the synagogue for his faith (9.22, 34). On two other occasions, John anachronistically mentions excommunication (12.42; 16.2), showing that it was a major issue when the Gospel was being written. In 12.42–43 we have a criticism of those who believe in Jesus but are afraid to confess it publicly for fear of the Jews, and in 19.38 we see how Joseph and Nicodemus overcome their fear and acknowledge their adherence to Jesus’ cause. The Gospel was written, in part, to help the Jewish Christians at the end of the century to do likewise.

Encouragement to Christians in General. The purpose of the Gospel is expressed in Jn 20.31: “That you may believe that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name.” If the first half of this statement reflects some of the apologetic motifs we have seen above, the second half shows a desire to confirm those who already believe in Jesus. By the time John was written, there was a well-organized Christian community with a sacramental and liturgical life. What was the connection between all of this and Jesus of Nazareth? Was He merely a figure of historical interest who had founded a religion that now stood on its own? The fourth Gospel is a resounding “no” to this question. Its message is that Jesus is as vital a source of life to His followers at the end of the century as He was when He walked through Palestine. Only through belief in Him can a man have eternal life; the Church exists not as a substitute for Jesus but as a community rooted in belief in Jesus. The Johannine image for the Church is the vine and branches (ch. 15), for the branches cannot live apart from the vine, which is Jesus. John recognizes a sacramental system, but he shows that the Sacraments are ways in which Jesus gives life. During His lifetime His miracles were signs of life-giving activity; in the Gospel John often gives these miraculous signs a secondary sacramental import to show that Sacraments have taken the place of miracles as life-giving acts. In ch. 3 the suggestion that sight and entry into the Kingdom can only take place by means of the spirit and water has baptismal background. Ch. 6 the multiplication of the loaves symbolizes the Eucharist. Similar sacramental background is found in the gift of the blood and water in 19:34–35.

A particular aspect of rooting the life of the Church in Jesus is seen in the presentation of the PARACLETE (ch. 14–16). The Apostolic generation was dying out, and this was producing a crisis in the Church (2 Pt 3.4). Without those who had been eyewitnesses commissioned to preach Jesus, how would Jesus’ presence be kept alive in the Church? The other NT writings know of the Spirit as a charismatic force, of the Spirit’s role at Baptism, etc.; but it is John above all that shows the Paraclete as the continuation of Jesus’ activity in the Church. The key to the Paraclete passages in John is that the activities predicated of the Paraclete have previously been predicated of Jesus, so that the Paraclete is the answer to how Jesus will remain active in the Church when the last human links in the chain of eyewitnesses connecting the Church to Jesus have been broken. Jesus has given His Spirit to the Church to teach, to guide, to be with it forever.

The Johannine emphasis on realized eschatology can also be understood against this background of Church life. As the apostolic generation died out, the failure of Jesus to return became a problem. Many had understood that this generation would not die out before Jesus returned (Mt 24.34), and there seems to have been a special hope that Jesus would return before John died (Jn 21.22–23). Without ever losing the primitive hope of the return of Jesus, John has its own solution to the problem: an emphasis on the fact that many of the things that Christians expected at the end of time were already here, at least in part. There was no need to wait for the second coming in order to face judgment, or to receive eternal life (3.18–21; 5.24–25), or to become children of God, since human beings were already begotten from above through the Spirit at Baptism (3.5), or even to have the presence of Jesus, since he was among them in His Paraclete. In these aspects and in many others the Gospel is a great work of theology, developing a historical tradition about the words and deeds of Jesus in order to give new depth to the faith and life of Christians.

Encouragement for the Gentiles. In particular, John shows the Gentile Christians that their conversion was part of God's plan in sending His Son. By the use of irony, Jn 7.35 hints that ultimately Jesus will go to the Gentiles ("the Greeks") to teach them. In 10.16 there is an insistence that the Good Shepherd will lay down His life for sheep that are not of the fold of Israel in order to bring them into His flock. By unconscious prophecy, Caiphas (11.52) predicts that Jesus will die not only for the nation of Israel, but for all God's scattered children. Finally, the public ministry of Jesus reaches its climax when, after He has been rejected by the Jews, the whole world begins to come to Him (12.19) and the Gentiles seek after Him (12.20–21). This is the sign that the hour of His glorification has come (12.23); and when in that hour He is lifted up on the cross in return to His Father, He draws all men to Himself (12.32). This theme of "gathering" is symbolically acted out at the cross. There Jesus gives the Beloved Disciple to his Mother, and vice-versa. As he dies, he gives the Spirit, blood and water to the new community, standing at the foot of the cross (19:25–37)

Date of writing. The plausible range for the dating of John has narrowed according to recent scholarly views, and a range between A.D. 90 and 110 has the widest following. It is to be stressed that this is a range for the actual writing of John in its final, complete form; as has been seen, the basic tradition behind John may have taken its form earlier, and some parts of John may have been written long before the final form.

Latest Date. The latest plausible date is c. 110. The arguments formerly proposed for a late 2d-century dating (A. Loisy, 150–160) have lost their force, e.g., the proposed similarities between John and Gnosticism, the dependency of John on the Synoptics. One argument for late dating must be discussed, namely, that John was not known by any early 2d-century writer. It is quite clear that after c. 170 John was known to Tatian, Theophilus of Antioch, Irenaeus, and others. The discussion about the earlier part of the century is centered around Ignatius of Antioch and Justin. J. W. Sanders, followed by Barrett, questions whether these authors used John; but in detailed studies, C. Maurer and J. S. Romanides strongly maintain dependence on John. In the most complete study ever done on the use of John in the 2d century, F. M. Braun finds ample reason to affirm that John was accepted in orthodox circles in Egypt, Rome, Syria, and Asia Minor from the early years of the century.

Although the arguments for late dating have now lost their force, new arguments for early dating have appeared. In 1935 C. H. Roberts published an Egyptian papyrus fragment (P<sup>52</sup>) of John ch. 18 that is dated between 135 and 150. Since few scholars think that John was composed in Egypt or that this papyrus was the autograph, one must allow time between the writing of John and its wide circulation in Egypt. Papyrus Egerton 2, a composite work of c. 150 drawing on both John and the Synoptics, is another mid-century Egyptian witness to John. There are two long papyri texts of John from the end of the 2d century in the Bodmer collection (P<sup>60,75</sup>). Since these reflect different textual traditions (P<sup>66</sup> is closer to Codex Sinaiticus; P<sup>75</sup> is closer to Codex Vaticanus), one must allow time between the writing of John and this development. All these witnesses make a date of much later than 110 for the Johannine autograph very unlikely.

The positing of an independent historical tradition for John has also led to an earlier dating. This tradition must have come out of Palestine not much later than 70, for the flight of the Christian community from Palestine during the first Jewish revolt and the thoroughness of the destruction at that time make it unlikely that material for a genuine historical tradition could have been gathered after that date. Working on probabilities, we may suppose that the author composed or collected his tradition in Palestine before 70, or outside Palestine within a generation after 70. If we allow another generation for editorial process, we reach a date of c. 110 at the latest for final writing.

Earliest Date. The earliest plausible date is less certain, but it is probably c. 90. There have been some suggestions (W. F. Albright, E. R. Goodenough) of a very early date, before 70. Recently, J. A. T. Robinson has claimed that John was the first of the Gospels, written well before the fall of Jerusalem. Too early a date cannot be reconciled with the literary process posited from internal analysis. The argument from silence for an early date is weak; e.g., Goodenough argues that John 7.42 betrays ignorance of the virginal birth of Jesus at Bethlehem, and that therefore John is earlier than Matthew or Luke. In 7.42 we probably have an example of Johannine irony in which, as in 4.12, the speakers in their ignorance actually formulate a true statement about Jesus. Similarly, Robinson claims that the words of the chief priests and the Pharisees in 11.48 show that the Romans had not yet destroyed the holy place and the nation. This is also typical Johannine irony. They decide to slay Jesus (see 11.53), but as the Gospel is read and heard in a Christian community, the holy place and the nation have been destroyed by the Romans, and the risen Jesus is alive.

One internal argument that is helpful for determining the earliest plausible date for John is the question of the expulsion from the synagogue mentioned above. The experience of the Johannine Christians evidenced by 9.22, 12.42, and 16.2 may not have been universal, but the gradual parting of the ways between two pre-war Jewish sects does seem to have been an active issue before the mid-80s. No date before 90 seems likely. The plausible range of 90 to 110 thus arrived at agrees with the earliest tradition (Irenaeus) that John was written as the last of the Gospels, during the reign of Trajan (98–117).

Authorship of the Fourth Gospel

External attestation. In this discussion we note that the concept of authorship in antiquity was broader than our modern identification of author and writer. For the ancients, attribution of a work to an author did not preclude a free use of secretaries, editors, and schools of writers. The author is the man who stands behind the tradition. The major tradition that has come down within the Christian Church is that the author of this Gospel was John, son of Zebedee, who published it in his last years at Ephesus. This tradition is found at the end of the 2d century in Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 3.1.1.), the Muratorian Canon, Clement of Alexandria, and others. The evidence of Irenaeus is important because he claims to have it from Polycarp of Smyrna, who knew John; but this evidence is contested in four grounds. First, there is a curious silence about John's presence at Ephesus in works where one might expect to find it mentioned: Paul to the Ephesians, Ignatius to the Ephesians, Polycarp's writing, the life of Polycarp, and Papias.

Second, Irenaeus might have been wrong about Polycarp's relation to John the Apostle. He says (Adv. haer. 5.33.4) that Papias heard John, but Papias himself does not confirm this. Was there another John whom both Papias and Polycarp knew? It should be noted that Irenaeus claims to have known Polycarp but not Papias. Third, there is a tradition that John the Apostle died early. It is found in a late extract of Philip of Side (430), in George Hamartolus (9th century), and in some 5th- and 6th-century martyrologies. It probably results from an overliteral interpretation of Mk 10.39 and from a confusion of names (John the Baptist with John of Zebedee; James, the brother of the Lord, with James of Zebedee).

Fourth, it has been suggested that it was another John at Ephesus who wrote the Gospel—Elder, or Presbyter, John. Papias (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.4) says that he got information about Christian origins from the sayings of the elders: what Andrew, Peter, Philip, Thomas, James, John, and Matthew said—clearly members of the Twelve; what the disciples (of the Lord), Aristion and Elder John, say. The difference of tenses seems to indicate that the first group was dead and the second group alive when Papias made the inquiry (100–140). That there were two Johns involved is the most obvious meaning. Later, Dionysius of Alexandria and Eusebius, in their desire to remove the Apocalypse with its MILLENARIANISM from the canon of the Scriptures, attributed it, but not the fourth Gospel, to Elder John. (For the presbyter, or elder, of 2 and 3 John in relation to the Gospel, see JOHN, EPISTLES OF ST.).

In summation, Irenaeus's evidence is not infallible, but it is still far from disproved. There were ancient denials of apostolic origin for John on the part of some anti-Montanists and of the ALOGOI. But these were sectarians who disliked John's doctrine, and they are no witness to any widespread doubt in the Church about Johannine authorship.

Internal Evidence. Was Irenaeus right? It is impossible to give a certain answer. The majority of contemporary scholars do not regard it as a significant question. Most who have pursued the matter conclude that the author was a founding figure in the community, probably a disciple of Jesus, but not the son of Zebedee or one of the Twelve Apostles. John the Evangelist fails to pay any attention to the term "apostle" in the technical sense, favoring the use of the expression "disciple," with a particular focus upon the "Beloved Disciple." Indeed, there is an apparent rivalry between Peter and the Beloved Disciple, unresolved until the addition of ch. 21. There is a complete lack of any sense of apostolic ministry in John, and the only commandments that are found are to love (13.34–35; 15.12, 17) and to believe (14.1, 11, 12). These factors make better sense if the Johannine community could not trace its origins to one of the Twelve—a lack that led Johannine theology to exalt love and belief rather than an apostolic commissioning as the essential factor in the cohesion of the community. This lacuna is remedied by Peter's commissioning as the shepherd in 21:15–19. However, dating the Epistles of John after the Gospel indicates that the lack of more formal institutional authority led to the disintegration of the Johannine community.

From the story of the Gospel itself, however, an interesting anonymous figure emerges. An active character in the story is never named. He is generally called "the other disciple" (see 18.15, 16; 20.3, 4, 8), but eventually becomes "the other disciple... whom Jesus loved" (see 20.2). This is "the Beloved Disciple" (see 13.23; 19.26), the author of the Gospel (21.20, 23, 24). The narrative of the Gospel bears traces of its "author." He was a disciple of Jesus, a founding figure in a community whose Gospel we today call the Gospel of John. His desire to keep his name out of the account of the life of Jesus was respected, even after he had died.

His death is presupposed by 21.20–23. The addendum to the Gospel (ch. 21) provides information about the later situation of the Johannine community. As Peter “follows” Jesus (21.19), he looks back to the Beloved Disciple who is, in turn, following (v. 20). He enquires about the destiny of this other important figure (v. 21). Jesus tells Peter that he is not to concern himself whether or not the Beloved Disciple will live on until Jesus returns (v. 22), but the narrator then adds a further explanatory comment to the words of Jesus (v. 23). Jesus did not say that the Beloved Disciple would not die, but that whether or not he would die was not Peter’s concern. This comment is called for because “the rumor spread in the community that this disciple would not die” (v. 23), but that is not exactly what Jesus had said. The community had to be taught exactly what Jesus meant. What was the problem? The Beloved Disciple was no longer alive as ch. 21 was being written, and his death had to be explained.

The weight of the evidence, briefly summarized above, is against the Beloved Disciple and Apostle John being one and the same figure, but it should not worry us that we cannot be certain. The authority of the Gospel of John comes from its message, not from the apostolicity of its author. The important thing about the Gospel is that it has stood the test of time. After two thousand years of Christian history we continue to read this life-story of Jesus. The author (see 21.24) was diligent in keeping his name out of the story, even when it appears that he may have been an active participant (see 1.35–40; 13.23–25; 18.15–16; 19.25–27; 20.2, 3, 8; 21.7, 20, 24). Oceans of scholarly ink have been spilt attempting to put it back again. Perhaps the ultimate fruitlessness of the search for certainty should teach us to respect the desire of the original author, and respect the work he has left us.

Outline of the Gospel. Outlines of John are notoriously unsatisfactory because, while there are broadly defined sections and themes, the sections overlap and the themes are stated briefly, left, and then picked up again and further developed later in the narrative. Many rich themes are merely stated, and not thoroughly worked through. The Gospel of John contains a great deal of “self-contained allusiveness” (E. C. Hoskyns).

Many outlines or structures of the Gospel of John are determined by scholarly discussion of the sources behind the Gospel, or the way various redactional stages have shaped the material. The following outline is determined by the belief that, whatever the sources and the redaction history of the Gospel, the finished product is to be read as a coherent narrative and theological unity.

I. THE PROLOGUE (1.1–18). This hymn informs the reader of who Jesus is (pre-existent Logos become flesh in the person of Jesus the Christ, the perfection of God’s gifts to humankind, the unique revelation of God who brings life to all who believe in him). Armed with this knowledge, unavailable to the characters in the story, the reader is called into judgment as each encounter between Jesus and those characters takes place.

II. THE BOOK OF SIGNS (1.19–12.50). The public ministry of Jesus is told. In this section of the Gospel, Jesus calls and forms disciples, teaches, works miracles, encounters opposition, and challenges the characters in the story, and especially the reader of the story.

A. The first days of Jesus (1.19–51). Set within a context of four days (see vv. 24–28, 29–34, 35–42, 43–51), John the Baptist gives witness to Jesus over the first two days, and the first disciples move toward Jesus, expressing partially correct faith. They are finally challenged by Jesus to a deeper faith, and promised the sight of “greater things” (vv. 50–51).

B. From Cana to Cana (2.1–4.54). Framed between two Cana miracles (2.1–12; 4.43–54), and marked by two comments (2.23–25; 4.31–38), a series of episodes tell of a variety of responses to Jesus. These responses serve as examples of false, partial, and perfect faith, first among Jews, and then from the Samaritans.

1. The first miracle at Cana (2.12)
2. Jesus and “the Jews” (2.12–22)
3. The narrator’s comment on faith (2.23–25)
4. Jesus and Nicodemus (3.1–21)
5. Jesus and John the Baptist (3.22–36)
6. Jesus and the Samaritan woman I (4.1–15)
7. Jesus and the Samaritan woman II (4.16–30)
8. Jesus comments on his mission (4.31–38)
9. Jesus and the Samaritan villagers (4.39–42)
10. The second miracle at Cana

C. The feasts of “the Jews” (5.1–10.42). Within a context of increasing hostility, Jesus claims to perfect the Jewish celebrations of Sabbath, Passover, Tabernacles, and Dedication.

1. Jesus and the Sabbath (5.1–47)
2. Jesus and the Passover (6.1–71)
3. Jesus and Tabernacles I (7.1–8.59)
4. Jesus and Tabernacles II (9.1–10.21)
5. Jesus and Dedication (10.22–42)

D. Jesus turns toward “the hour” (11.1–12.50). The resurrection of Lazarus triggers the decision that Jesus must die for the nation, and not only for the nation, but to gather into one the children of God who are scattered. The arrival of the final Passover is noted as Jesus is anointed, enters Jerusalem, is sought by the Greeks, and makes a final attempt to have “the Jews” walk in the light of his revelation of God on the cross.

1. A resurrection that will lead to death (11.1–54)

2. The hour has come (11.55–12.36)
3. Conclusion of the ministry and the Book of Signs

III. THE BOOK OF GLORY (13.1–20.29). The second half of the Gospel moves toward the fulfillment of Jesus' promise that he would be "lifted up" (see 3.14; 8.28; 12.32–33) on a cross. In Johannine theology, this act of self-gift is a consummate act of love (see 15.13) and is thus the time and the place where the glory of God can be seen, and the means by which the Son of God is glorified (see 11.4). The focus on "glory" emerges from the events, discourses, and prayer of Jesus' final evening with the disciples, and then from the unique Johannine narrative of Jesus' death and resurrection.

A. The last discourse (13.1–17.26). This carefully constructed description of events and words of Jesus from his last night with the disciples states and re-states themes around the command to love (15.12–17), in the midst of rejection and hatred (15.1–11, 15.18–16.3).

1. Making God known: the footwashing and the morsel (13.1–38)
2. Living after Jesus' departure (14.1–31)
3. To abide, to love, and to be hated (15.1–16.3)
4. Living after Jesus' departure (16.4–33)
5. Making God known: Jesus' final prayer (17.1–26)

B. The Passion (18.1–19.42). A further carefully constructed narrative tells the traditional story of the arrest, trials, crucifixion, death, and burial of Jesus, but it focuses upon this moment is Jesus' royal enthronement, making God known and establishing a community.

1. Jesus and his enemies in a garden (18.1–11)
2. Jesus' appearance before "the Jews" (18.12–27)
3. Jesus before Pilate (18.28–19.16a)
4. The crucifixion of Jesus (19.16b–37)
5. Jesus buried in a garden with his new-found friends (19.38–42)

C. The Resurrection (20.1–29). Scenes at the tomb, and then in the house return to the faith response of those who encounter Jesus (see 2.1–4.54)

1. Scenes at the tomb (20.1–18)
  - a. Visits to the empty tomb (20.1–10)
  - b. Jesus appears to Mary Magdalene (20.11–18)
2. Scenes in the house
  - a. Jesus appears to the disciples, but not Thomas (20.19–23)
  - b. Jesus appears to the disciples, including Thomas (20.24–29)

IV. THE CONCLUSION TO THE GOSPEL (20.30–31)

V. EPILOGUE: Further resurrection appearances deal with matters left unresolved by the original Gospel: who belongs to the community of Jesus, and the respective roles of Peter and the Beloved Disciple (21.1–25)

1. The miraculous draft of fishes on the Sea of Tiberias (21.1–14)
2. Jesus, Peter, and the Beloved Disciple (21.15–24)
3. A second conclusion to the Gospel (21:25)

Bibliography: General. Commentaries: C. K. BARRETT, The Gospel According to St. John (2d ed. London 1978). J. H. BERNARD, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to St. John, 2 v. (International Critical Commentary, New York 1929). G. R. BEASLEY-MURRAY, John (Word Biblical Commentary 36, Waco, Tx. 1987). J. BECKER, Das Evangelium des Johannes, 2 v. (Ökumenischer Taschenbuchkommentar zum Neuen Testament 4/1–2, Gütersloh and Würzburg 1979–1981). R. BULTMANN, The Gospel of John: A Commentary, tr. G. R. BEASLEY-MURRAY (Oxford 1971). T. L. BRODIE, The Gospel According to John: A Literary and Theological Commentary (New York 1993). R. E. BROWN, The Gospel According to John, 2 v. (Anchor Bible 29–29a, New York 1966–1970). D. A. CARSON, The Gospel According to John (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1991). E. HAENCHEN, John 1–2, 2 v. (Philadelphia, Pa. 1984). E. C. HOSKYNS, The Fourth Gospel (2d ed. London 1947). R. H. LIGHTFOOT, St. John's Gospel: A Commentary (Oxford 1956). B. LINDARS, The Gospel of John (New Century Bible, London 1972). F. J. MOLONEY, The Gospel of John (Sacra Pagina 4, Collegeville, Minn. 1998). R. SCHNACKENBURG, The Gospel According to St. John, 3 v. (London/New York 1968–82). U. SCHNELLE, Das Evangelium nach Johannes (Theologischer Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament 4, Leipzig 1998). M. W. G. STIBBE, John (Readings: A New Biblical Commentary, Sheffield 1993). Other Studies: R. E. BROWN, The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York 1979). C. KOESTER, Symbolism in the Fourth Gospel (Minneapolis, Minn. 1995). R. KYSAR, The Fourth Evangelist and His Gospel: An Examination of Contemporary Scholarship (Minneapolis, Minn. 1975). R. KYSAR, "The Fourth Gospel: A Report on Recent Research," in W. HAASE and H. TEMPORINI, eds., Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt Teil II: Principat. Religion (Berlin 1979—) 25:2389–2480. M. LABAHN, Jesus als Lebensspender. Untersuchungen zu einer Geschichte der johanneischen Tradition anhand ihrer Wundergeschichten (Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 98, Berlin 1999). W. LANGBRANDTNER, Weltferner Gott oder Gott der Liebe. Der Ketzerstreit in der johanneischen Kirche. Eine exegetisch-religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung mit Berücksichtigung der koptisch-gnostischen Texte aus Nag-Hammadi (Beiträge zur biblischen Exegese und Theologie 6, Bern 1977). F. J. MOLONEY, The Johannine Son of Man (2d ed. Biblioteca di Scienze Religiose 14, Rome 1978); "Where Does One Look? Reflections on Some Recent Johannine Scholarship." Salesianum 62 (2000) 223–251. C. NIEMAND, Die Fusswashingtonserzählung des Johannesevangeliums. Untersuchungen zur ihrer Entstehung und Überlieferung im Urchristentum (Studia Anselmiana 114, Rome 1993). J. PAINTER, The Quest for the Messiah: The History, Literature and Theology of the Fourth Gospel (2d ed. Edinburgh 1993). U. SCHNELLE, Antidocetic Christology in the Gospel of John: An Investigation of the Place of the Fourth Gospel in the Johannine School (Minneapolis, Minn. 1992). M. W. G. STIBBE, John as Storyteller: Narrative Criticism and the Fourth Gospel (Society for New Testament Studies Supplement Series 73, Cambridge 1992). On the unity of the Gospel. E. SCHWEI-

ZER, Ego eimi (Göttingen 1939). E. RUCKSTUHL, Die literarische Einheit des Johannes-evangeliums (Fribourg 1951). B. NOACK, Zur Johanneische Tradition (Copenhagen 1954). D. M. SMITH, Johanne Christianity. Essays on Its Setting, Sources, and Theology (Columbia 1984); M.-É. BOISMARD, "S. Luc et la rédaction du Quatrième Évangile," Revue biblique 69 (1962) 185–211. D. M. SMITH, The Composition and Order of the Fourth Gospel (New Haven, Conn. 1965). On historical tradition in the Gospel. P. GARDINER-SMITH, Saint John and the Synoptic Gospels (Cambridge, Eng. 1938). C. H. DODD, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, Eng. 1963). R. E. BROWN, "The Qumrân Scrolls and the Johannine Gospel and Epistles," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 17 (1955) 403–419, 559–574; "The Problem of Historicity in John," ibid. 24 (1962) 1–14; D. M. SMITH, John Among the Gospels: The Relationship in Twentieth-Century Research (Columbia, S.C. 2001). J. P. MEIER, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2 v. (New York 1991–1994). F. J. MOLONEY, "The Fourth Gospel and the Jesus of History," New Testament Studies 46 (2000) 42–58. On influences on the fourth Gospel. H. ODEBERG, The Fourth Gospel Interpreted in Its Relation to Contemporaneous Religious Currents in Palestine and the Hellenistic-Oriental World (Chicago, Ill. 1960, reprint of 1929 edition). R. H. STRACHAN, The Fourth Gospel: Its Significance and Environment (London 1941). F. M. BRAUN, Jean le théologien, v. 1 (Paris 1959) treats subject of John and Gnosticism, v. 2 (1964) treats subject of John and Judaism. C. H. DODD, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, Eng. 1960), esp. 3–130. G. QUISPÉL, "L'Évangile de Jean et la Gnose," L'Évangile de Jean (Louvain 1958) 197–208. R. E. BROWN, "The Gospel of Thomas and St. John's Gospel," New Testament Studies 9 (1962–63) 155–177; H. KOESTER, "The History of Religions School, Gnosis and the Gospel of John," Studia Theologica 40 (1986) 115–36; K.-W. TRÖGER, "Ja oder Nein zur Welt. War der Evangelist Christ oder Gnostiker?" Theologische Versuche 7 (1976) 61–80; M. J. J. MENKEN, Old Testament Quotations in the Fourth Gospel (Kampen 1996); A. OBERMANN, Die christologische Erfüllung der Schrift im Johannesevangelium. Eine Untersuchung zur johanneischen Hermeneutik anhand der Schriftzitate (Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2. Reihe 83). Tübingen 1996). J. H. CHARLESWORTH, John and the Dead Sea Scrolls (New York 1990). On destination and purpose of the Gospel. E. L. ALLEN, "The Jewish Christian Church in the Fourth Gospel," Journal of Biblical Literature 74 (1955) 88–92. K. L. CARROLL, "The Fourth Gospel and the Exclusion of Christians from the Synagogues," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 40 (1957) 19–32. J. A. T. ROBINSON, "The Destination and Purpose of St. John's Gospel," New Testament Studies 6 (1959–60) 117–131. W. C. VAN UNNIK, "The Purpose of St. John's Gospel," Studia Evangelica (1957) 1:382–411. A. WIND, "Destination and Purpose of the Gospel of John," Novum Testamentum 14 (1972) 26–69. R. SCHNACKENBURG, "Die Messiasfrage im Johannesevangelium," N.T. Aufsätze. für J. Schmid (Regensburg 1963) 240–264. C. K. BARRETT, The Gospel of John and Judaism (London 1975). F. MANNING, L'Évangile de Jean à la lumière du Judaïsme (Studia Biblica Franciscana analecta), Jerusalem 1991). J. ASHTON, "The Identity and Function of the Ioudaioi in the Fourth Gospel," Novum Testamentum 27 (1985) 40–75. J. L. MARTYN, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (2d ed. Nashville, Tenn. 1979); F. J. MOLONEY, Signs and Shadows: Reading John 5–12 (Minneapolis, Minn. 1996). On the date of writing. J. N. SANDERS, The Fourth Gospel in the Early Church (Cambridge, Eng. 1943). C. MAURER, Ignatius von Antiochien und das Johannesevangelium (Zürich 1949); J. S. ROMANIDES, "Justin Martyr and the Fourth Gospel," Greek Orthodox Theological Review 4 (1958–59) 115–134. E. R. GOODENOUGH, "John: A Primitive Gospel," Journal of Biblical Literature 64 (1945) 145–182. W. F. ALBRIGHT, The Archaeology of Palestine (rev. ed. Baltimore, Md. 1960) 243–249. J. A. T. ROBINSON, The Priority of John (London 1985). M. WILES, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel in the Early Church (Cambridge 1960). J. M. LIEU, Image and Reality: The Jews in the World of Christians in the Second Century (Edinburgh 1996). P. W. VAN DER HORST, "The Birkat ha-minim in Recent Research," The Expository Times 105 (1994) 363–68. On the authorship of the Gospel. H. P. V. NUNN, The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel (Oxford 1952). M. HENGEL, The Johannine Question (Philadelphia, Pa. 1989). R. A. CULPEPPER, John, the Son of Zebedee: The Life of a Legend (Studies on Personalities of the New Testament), Columbia 1994). J. H. CHARLESWORTH, The Beloved Disciple: Whose Witness Validates the Gospel of John? (Valley Forge, Pa. 1995)

[R. E. BROWN/F. J. MOLONEY]

JOHN III DUCAS VATATZES, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

In Byzantine Church, St.; b. c. end of 12th century; d. Nicaea, Oct. 30, 1254. The son-in-law of Emperor Theodore I Lascaris, he ascended the throne in 1222 at Nicaea, the Byzantine capital during the Latin occupation of Constantinople (1204–61). After the death of his first wife, he married Constance (Anne), daughter of the German Emperor FREDERICK II. Throughout much of his reign he carried on unionistic negotiations with Rome, chiefly with the object of recovering Constantinople. Generally considered one of the greatest of the Byzantine emperors, he pursued an effective economic policy and made significant territorial gains, largely at the expense of the Latins, all of which led to a regeneration of the empire and prepared the way for the reconquest of Constantinople. His interest in learning and his charitable measures made him so popular that soon after his death he was honored as St. John the Merciful.

Feast: Nov. 4.

Bibliography: H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 672–674. F. DÖLGER, Corpus der griechischen Urkunden des Mittelalters und der neueren Zeit, series A, Regesten (Munich 1924–32) 3:1709–1822. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN, 3 v. (Brussels 1957) 1:34–35. G. OSTERGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State, tr. J. HUSSEY, from 2d German ed. (Oxford 1956) 386–395.

[G. T. DENNIS]

JOHN, KING OF ENGLAND

Reigned 1199 to Oct. 19, 1216; b. Oxford, England, Dec. 24, 1167; d. Newark, England. The youngest son of King HENRY II of England and Eleanor of Aquitaine, he was called John Lackland since his father did not at first grant him an appanage on the Continent. Upon the death of his brother King RICHARD I the Lion-Hearted, John became King of England and lord of the “Angevin empire” in France, even though his young nephew Arthur had by right of primogeniture a stronger claim to the throne. John eventually had Arthur murdered (1203).

John, King of England, engraving. (©UPI/CORBIS)

John’s marriage in 1200 to Isabella of Angoulême, who was betrothed to Hugh of Lusignan, led to a judicial action initiated by the Lusignans at the court of King PHILIP II AUGUSTUS, their common suzerain in France. This action resulted in open warfare between John and his feudal overlord (Philip) and John’s ultimate forfeiture and loss of NORMANDY as well as of the Angevin possessions on the Continent (roughly Brittany, the Loire country, and Aquitaine) to the French Crown. After the death of Abp. HUBERT WALTER (1205) a disputed election to Canterbury was settled in Rome by Pope INNOCENT III, who chose STEPHEN LANGTON for the see. This led to a quarrel between Innocent and John when the King refused to recognize Langton. After two years of dispute Innocent placed England under interdict; then in 1209 he excommunicated the King. In 1212 he deposed him, released his subjects from their oath of allegiance, and threatened to elect a new king. Philip Augustus was already preparing an invasion of England to execute the papal sentence when John, faced with the united opposition of Innocent, Philip Augustus, and various of his own dissatisfied barons, decided to capitulate to the Pope. He submitted to the papal demands on May 12, 1213, and three days later accepted the Kingdom of England as a fief of the Apostolic See in return for an annual tribute to his new suzerain. While this capitulation earned him the future protection of the Pope and undermined both the Capetian justification for aggression and the baronial justification for rebellion, it did not reconcile the barons to John’s despotic government and arbitrary scutages, or to his military ineptitude, which led to the brilliant French victory at Bouvines in 1214. In June 1215 a considerable number of barons, with the moral support of Langton, met the King in arms at Runnymede and exacted his agreement to MAGNA CARTA, which severely limited his exercise of the royal authority and placed the Crown under the control of an oligarchic committee of his vassals. John, however, as a papal vassal, enjoyed the support of Innocent III, who annulled Magna Carta. In the course of the civil war precipitated by this maneuver and the French invasion that followed in its wake, King John died of a surfeit of peaches, leaving the throne and the confusion to his young son, King HENRY III of England.

Bibliography: GERVASE OF CANTERBURY, Gesta Regum, ed. W. STUBBS [Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v., 73.2. (1879)]. RALPH OF COGGESHALL, Chronicon Anglicanum, ed. J. STEVENSON [Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v., 66. (1875)]. WALTER OF COVENTRY, Memoriale, ed. W. STUBBS, 2 v. [Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v., (1872, 1873)]. ROGER OF WENDOVER, Flores Historiarum, v. 1–3 of Chronica Majora, ed. H. R. LUARD [Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v., 57, (1872–83)]. Annales Monastici, ed. H. R. LUARD, 5 v. [Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v., 36, (1864–69)] v.1 De Margam, Theokesberia, et Burton, v.3. De Dunstaplia et Bermundeseia. K. NORGATE, John Lackland (London 1902). Z. N. BROOKE, The English Church and the Papacy from the Conquest to the Reign of John (Cambridge, Eng. 1931). C. E. PETIT-DUTAILLIS, The Feudal Monarchy in France and England . . . , tr. E. D. HUNT (New York 1964). S. PAINTER, The Reign of King John (Oxford 1949). A. L. POOLE, From Domesday Book to Magna Carta, Oxford History of England, ed. G. N. CLARK, 14 v. (2d ed. Oxford 1955) 3. J. T. APPLEBY, John, King of England (New York 1959). W. L. WARREN, King John (New York 1961).

[J. BRÜCKMANN]

JOHN III SOBIESKI, KING OF POLAND

Reigned 1674 to 1696; b. Olesko, Galicia, June 2, 1624; d. Wilanow, June 17, 1696. Through his mother, he inherited the Zolkiewski fortune; through his father, the enormous Sobieski estates. He was one of the wealthiest nobles in Poland. Later, he augmented his fortune through his marriage to Marie Kazimiera d’ Arquiien, the widow of John Zamoyski. After completing his education on his family estates and at the University of Cracow, he traveled widely in western and southern Europe. He fought in the Cossack insurrection (1648) and helped expel the Swedes from Poland. He was rapidly advanced in the army for his services to King John Casimir and in 1665 became the commander in chief. His first exploit in the latter capacity was, with an army raised chiefly at his own expense, to suppress an insurrection of the Cossacks who were assisted by the Turks and Tatars. Later he led the Poles against a Turkish invasion, which he turned back with a crowning victory at Chocim (1673) in which the Turks lost some 20,000 men and a great many guns. The coincidental popularity of his victories at the time of King Michael Wisniowiecki's death contributed greatly to his election as king.

Sobieski attempted to strengthen the power of the monarch and to transform Poland into a hereditary monarchy as a way of stemming the decline of the state. He was encouraged in this by his wife, who sought to recast the Polish constitution according to the patterns set by Louis XIV. However, the opposition of the nobility proved too strong for them to overcome. In the end Sobieski failed in his program to reform the constitution.

Sobieski was more successful in his foreign policy. One of his greatest ambitions was the union of Christian Europe in a crusade to drive the Turks out of Europe; he partially realized this through the organization of the Holy League and to this he sacrificed other more specifically Polish interests. When in 1683 the Turks laid siege to Vienna, which the Emperor Leopold had abandoned, Sobieski, at the request of the papal nuncio, gathered a force of some 25,000 Poles and marched to the relief of the city. These troops were joined by some 28,000 troops from the Holy Roman Empire and some 23,000 men raised among the peoples of the Austrian Empire, to form a combined Christian force of some 76,000 men led by Sobieski against the Turks, who were led by Kara Mustapha and whose forces numbered from 115,000 to 210,000 men. On Sept. 12, 1683, he personally led his Polish cavalry in the charge that decided the battle. The resulting relief of Vienna and the liberation of Hungary were the crowning achievements of his career. Henceforth Turkey ceased to be a serious threat to Christian Europe. Sobieski did not see the culmination of the war, however, since he died three years before the Treaty of Karlowitz was signed.

A devout Catholic and a staunch defender of the Church, Sobieski promoted the cause of the Eastern Catholic Church within his realms. At the same time, he spurred on the reform of the Orthodox Church, assisted the Protestants and scrupulously protected the rights of the Jews. After his reign began the long decline that culminated in Poland's partition.

John III Sobieski, King of Poland. (Archive Photos)

Bibliography: J. B. MORTON, Sobieski, King of Poland (London 1932). O. HALECKI, A History of Poland (3d ed. New York 1961). Cambridge History of Poland, v.1., ed. W. F. REDDAWAY et al. (Cambridge, Eng. 1941—). R. DYBOSKI, Ten Centuries of Poland's History (Warsaw 1937). A. TAMBORRA, Enciclopedia cattolica, ed. P. PASCHINI et al. (Rome 1949–54) 6:598–599.

[E. KUSIELEWICZ]

JOHN III SCHOLASTICUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Patriarchate: Jan. 31, 565, to 577; pioneer canonist of the Byzantine Church; b. Sirimis, near Antioch, 503 or 525–530; d. Aug. 31, 577. John, son of a cleric, entered the law profession, was ordained rather late in life, and served as APOCRISIARIUS for the patriarch of Antioch at Constantinople. He was appointed patriarch of Constantinople by JUSTINIAN I and was consecrated probably on Feb. 1, 565. He succeeded Euty chius, who was exiled for opposing the edict favoring aphantodocetism. John seems to have accepted the honor on condition that he would not subscribe to the edict until it had been accepted by the other patriarchs, especially by Anastasius of Antioch.

He became a close friend of Justin II, who became emperor on Nov. 14, 565, and he took an active part in the new ruler's efforts to win over the MONOPHYSITES during the first six years of his reign. To cure the schisms within the heretics' ranks first, the patriarch found himself in the curious position of acting for the emperor as arbiter for two groups of heretical bishops, the tritheists and other Monophysite sects. When Justin decided on persecution, John was commissioned to carry it out, showing no mercy. But when he consecrated a patriarch for Alexandria, he was reprimanded by the patriarch of Antioch (Theophan., Conf. 6062).

While still at Antioch, John had compiled the earliest systematic, Byzantine collection of canons (ecclesiastical legislation) that has been preserved. He used as the basis an anonymous collection of canons under 60 headings prepared in Antioch c. 545 with an appendix of 21 laws of emperors on Church matters. John's collection rearranged the work under 50 titles and added 68 canons from those of St. BASIL, as he himself says (Joannis Scholastici, Synagoga L titularum 5.10). After coming to Constantinople, John composed his so-called Collection of 87 Chapters. It is a collection of excerpts, some word for word, others summarized, taken from Justinian's novels pertaining to ecclesiastical affairs. About 570 John gave both these works a final revision. He also published a Catechetical Treatise or Mystagogia, which JOHN PHILOPONUS controverted. Many Byzantinists have attempted to identify John with the chronicler JOHN MALALAS, but E. Stein and V. Benešević reject the identification.

Bibliography: H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 422–423. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) v. 4. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, translated by J. R. PALANAQUE, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949–59) 2:687–689. F. DÖLGER, in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1080–81. L. PETIT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 8.1:829–831. HERMAN, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:118–120. J. SCHOLASTICUS, Synagoga L titularum, ed. V. BENEŠEVIČ (Munich 1937). E. SCHWARTZ, Die Kanonensammlung des Johannes Scholastikos (Munich 1933).

[M. J. HIGGINS]

JOHN IV THE FASTER, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Consecrated April 12, 582; d. Sept. 2, 595. John is known chiefly for his part in the controversy over the title "ecumenical patriarch" (see BYZANTINE CHURCH, HISTORY OF). According to the synaxary and the patriarchal lists, he was born in Constantinople, earned his living as a coinmaker, and was ordained deacon by JOHN III

Scholasticus and appointed sacellarius (in the early Byzantine period the official in charge of funds for the care of the poor). He was famous for his asceticism and was chosen to succeed EUTYCHIUS I shortly before the death of Emperor Tiberius II. He was present in his official capacity when Tiberius solemnly proclaimed MAURICE coemperor and successor, and he blessed the wedding of Maurice and Tiberius's daughter. Though Tiberius himself had crowned Maurice when he raised him to the imperial rank, in keeping with customary procedure, when Maurice co-opted his 4-year-old son, Theodosius, it was John the Faster who crowned the boy. This was a most unusual procedure, introduced, no doubt, because the monarch wished to make the succession more secure.

It was the patriarch who, according to John of Nikiu, led the opposition to Maurice's restoration of Chosroes II to the throne of Persia and forced a postponement of longer than a year. When the emperor advocated clemency toward two men accused of sorcery, the patriarch insisted on the death sentence. John, however, is supposed to have favored tolerance of the Monophysites.

Maurice had a very high personal regard for John because of his asceticism and charity; and esteem for the prelate's virtue may have influenced the emperor as much as self-interest when he supported the patriarch against Pope GREGORY I in the dispute over the title "ecumenical." The Byzantine Church canonized John and commemorated him on September 2. Of the various works on Confession ascribed to him, only the sermon on penitence (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 88:1937–78) may be authentic.

Bibliography: THEOPHYLACTUS SIMOCATTES, Historiae, ed. C. DE BOOR (BT; 1887) 1.1.2:22; 1.10:2–3; 1.11:14–21; 7.6:1–5. THEOPHANES THE CONFESSOR, Chronographia, ed. C. DE BOOR, 2 v. (Leipzig 1883–85) 6074.23–24; 6082.26–27; 6086, cf 6087; 8–10, cf. 28. Synaxarium ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae. Propylaeum ad Acta sanctorum novembris, ed. H. DELEHAYE (Brussels 1902) September 2:2. The Chronicle of John, Bishop of Nikiou, tr. R. H. CHARLES (London 1916). M. J. HIGGINS, The Persian War of the Emperor Maurice, v.1 (Washington 1939) 43–45. H. G. BECK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1065–66.

[M. J. HIGGINS]

JOHN VII GRAMMATICUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

A leading iconoclastic theologian during the second phase of iconoclasm (815–843); b. Constantinople, c. end of 8th century; d. near Constantinople, between 843 and 863. He was of Armenian origin, and his literary talents earned him the name of Grammaticus, although he was often called by other epithets based on his supposed knowledge of magic. He was ordained about 806. His first open attack on the veneration of images came in 813 when the iconoclast Byzantine Emperor LEO V attained the throne. At his request John compiled a handbook of Biblical and patristic texts against the cult of images; it was used in the iconoclastic council of 815, but is no longer extant. Too young to be named patriarch, he was appointed to the palace clergy and took charge of the education of the future Byzantine Emperor THEOPHILUS. Upon the accession of his pupil (829), John was promoted to syncellus and was also sent on embassies to Bagdad. On Jan. 21, 837, he was named patriarch and he immediately began a violent persecution of the orthodox, especially among the bishops and well-known monks. The death of Theophilus in January of 842 signaled the end of iconoclasm, and the Empress THEODORA (2) had John deposed. Excommunicated in March 843, he died in prison sometime before 863.

Bibliography: P. J. ALEXANDER, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople (Oxford 1958). V. LAURENT, Catholicisme 6: 513–515, with complete bibliography.

[G. T. DENNIS]

JOHN X CAMATEROS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Episcopate: Aug. 5, 1198 to April or May 1206. As chartophylax John was already highly placed in the patriarchal chancery before his accession to patriarch. He was respected for his knowledge of classical literature and proficiency in philosophy and rhetoric. His two letters to Pope Innocent III, written early in his patriarchate (1199 and 1200), focus primarily on the Roman primacy and more briefly on the FILIOQUE; they constitute an important addition to the Byzantine Orthodox view that the papal claims to universal primacy were ecclesiastically indefensible.

Rome's primacy, according to the patriarch, was always understood in regional terms and was based historically on the city's political importance as the capital of the empire, rather than on St. Peter. In terms of its relationship to the other churches and patriarchates, Rome was in effect "first in rank as among sisters of equal honor." As we should expect, John's subsequent alleged submission to Innocent (based on the evidence of western sources) is unlikely, given his earlier exegesis of primacy.

The most important of John's synodal decisions concerned the teaching of Michael Glycas who had earlier written against the incorruptibility of the Eucharistic elements. The synod responded by censuring Glycas posthumously and by repeating the anathema issued by the Church in 1157 on a related Eucharistic controversy. The patriarch's literary output was otherwise modest. A response to several dogmatic questions posed by Narses of Lampron survives as well as a homily on the feast of the Epiphany and three treatises on the procession of the Holy Spirit, addressed in part to Hugh Etherianus of Pisa.

John lived to see the latinization of his church and the dismemberment of the Byzantine Empire by the fourth crusade (April 1204). Theodore I Lascaris, the imperial successor to the Angeli, urged him to join his government at Nicaea but he refused. He died a refugee-exile at Didymoteichon (June 1206).

Bibliography: F.R. GAHBAUER, Die Pentarchietheorie im Zeitalter des Grossen Schismas (Frankfurt am Main 1993) 199–208. V. GRUMEL et. al., Les registres des Actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople 8 fascicules (Paris, 1932–79) fasc.3, nos.1193–1204. A. PAPANAKIS and A. TALBOT, "John X Camaterus Confronts Innocent III: An Unpublished Correspondence," Byzantinoslavica 33 (1972) 26–41. J. SPITERIS, La Critica Byzantina del Primato Romano nel secolo XII (Rome 1979) 248–399, 324–331.

[A. PAPANAKIS]

JOHN XI BECCUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Artisan of the union of Oriental and Western churches; b. Nicaea between 1230 and 1240; d. St. George, Bithynia, March 1297.

Recipient of an excellent Byzantine education, John became a functionary in the Constantinopolitan patriarchate in 1263 and was named chartophylax (archivist and assistant chancellor) by Patriarch Arsenius (1254–66), then the great skeuophylax or sacristan of the patriarchate. In the dispute between Patriarch Arsenius and Emperor MICHAEL PALAEOLOGUS, Beccus followed Arsenius but eventually was won over to the emperor's side. Michael entrusted him with important diplomatic missions, sending him in 1268 to Kral (King) Stephen Uroš of Serbia, and to St. LOUIS IX at Tunis on the eve of the crusading French king's death (1270).

When Pope GREGORY X accepted the emperor's overtures toward a union of the Greek and Latin Churches and assembled the bishops in a synod to demonstrate the advantages of such a move, Beccus opposed the project and was imprisoned on charges that he eventually proved to be calumnious. In prison, however, he made a study of the Greek and Latin theology, particularly with regard to the FILIOQUE or the double procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, in keeping with the opinions of NICEPHORUS Blemmydes. As a consequence he recognized the primacy of the Bishop of Rome as well as the orthodoxy of the filioque and found himself bound in conscience to work for the reunion of the Churches. This union was solemnly proclaimed at the Council of LYONS in 1274 in the presence of Pope Gregory X and the Greek ambassadors. The patriarch of Constantinople opposed the move and abdicated; and John Beccus, returned to imperial favor, was elected patriarch in 1275.

Kindly and charitable, he used his office to care for the poor while working feverishly to have the union achieved at Lyons accepted in the Greek churches; and in a synod, he, with his clergy, abjured the schism, recognized the pope's jurisdiction over the universal Church while respecting Byzantine rites and customs, and admitted the double procession of the Holy Spirit. However, he was opposed by members of his clergy and the imperial family and particularly by the violently anti-Latin monasteries. To counter this opposition he called a second synod in which he excommunicated whoever would not recognize "the Roman Church as mother and head of all the Churches, and the mistress who teaches the orthodox faith."

The demands of Pope NICHOLAS III (1277–80) for an unconditional submission of the Greek Church to Rome provoked a new and grave crisis in the already difficult relations between Rome and Byzantium.

Abandoned by both the emperor and the higher clergy, Beccus abdicated in 1279. He was recalled by the emperor to participate in negotiations relative to the union with ambassadors of the pope; he was reinstated in 1280, but found the task of imposing the union most difficult, particularly when the emperor attempted to achieve it by force. In 1282 Pope MARTIN IV (1281–85) denounced the union for political motives and excommunicated both the emperor and the Greek Church. Michael Palaeologus died that same year, and the rise of ANDRONICUS II and the rupture of relations with Rome forced Beccus to resign once more. He was exiled to Broussa and gave himself over to a violent polemic particularly against his successor, George of Cyprus, who took the name Gregory. At the Synod of Blachernae in 1284 he upheld the double procession of the Holy Spirit and attacked Gregory violently. He was deported to the fortress of St. George on the Gulf of Nicomedia, but continued his attacks on Gregory, eventually securing his abdication (1289). Though reduced to poverty, he steadfastly refused to buy his liberty by compromise and died in exile.

Among his writings, which are mainly polemical and circumstantial, are a letter to Pope John XXI (1277) and another to Pope Nicholas III (1278); a profession of faith;

Epigraphai, or a collection of patristic texts on the procession of the Holy Spirit, later controverted by Gregory PALAMAS; a tract on the peace and union of the ancient and new Roman Churches, which deals with the theological thought of authors of the patristic age and later writers, including PHOTIUS, John Phurnes, and Nicholas of Methone (revised several times); three books on the procession of the Holy Spirit and four books addressed to Constantine Meliteniotes; and Antirrhethikos against George Moschamper and one encyclical letter against GREGORY II CYPRIUS. His writings bring a new historical viewpoint into play. Of all the Greek theologians he manifested the greatest erudition and constraining logic in dealing with theological arguments favoring the union of the Churches and the antiquity of the doctrine of the double procession of the Holy Spirit. Spread widely by his followers at the end of the 13th century, his writings occasioned a movement that prepared the way for the reunion at the Council of FLORENCE in 1439.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 141. H. LAEMMER, Scriptorum Graeciae orthodoxae bibliotheca selecta (Freiburg 1864). L. PETIT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–05) 8.1:656–660. L. BRÉHIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 7:354–364. V. LAURENT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1008–09. Échos d'Orient, 25 (1926) 316–319. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 677–683. J. DRÄSEKE, Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie NS 15 (1907) 231–253. R. SOUARN, Échos d'Orient, 3 (1899) 229–237. D. J. GEANAKOPOLOS, Emperor Michael Palaeologus and the West, 1258–1282 (Cambridge, Mass. 1959). G. HOFMANN, Orientalia Christiana periodica, 11 (1945) 141–164.

[L. VEREECKE]

JOHN XIV CALECAS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Flourished 1334 to 1347; b. Apros, Asia Minor, c. 1283; d. Constantinople, Dec. 29, 1347. Of a modest family, Calecas entered the Constantinopolitan clergy and was favored by the Grand Domesticus, later Emperor JOHN VI CANTACUZENUS, who selected him for patriarch in 1334 despite the fact that Calecas was married and the father of a family. In 1341 he held a synod that censured BARLAAM OF CALABRIA, and forbade further discussion of the Hesychast question on the light that appeared on Mt. Thabor during the Transfiguration. On the death of ANDRONICUS III (1341), Anne of Savoy became regent for John V Palaeologus. Calecas supported her, and broke with Cantacuzenus, who encouraged the Hesychast monks and Gregory PALAMAS to disobey the orders of the synod of 1341. Calecas held a second synod (1342) that condemned Palamas and imprisoned him. Anne of Savoy attempted to reconcile Calecas and Palamas and, on failing, had Calecas deposed by a synod in February 1347. On taking power in March, Cantacuzenus confirmed the deposition. Calecas was imprisoned and exiled to Didymotichus, but returned to die in Constantinople at the end of the year.

Of John's writings, besides his polemical treatises and encyclical condemning Barlaam (1341), the collection of his disciplinary, dogmatic, and canonical decisions is an important source for the history of the period. The collection of Sunday sermons attributed to him is rather the Homiliary of Constantinople begun by Patriarch John IX Agapetus (1111–34) and used by succeeding patriarchs. Accounts of his life by his enemies John Cantacuzenus and Nicephorus Gregoras are prejudicial.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 150:891–903; 152:1215–84. Acta et diplomata graeca medii aevi, eds. F. MIKLOSICH and J. MÖLLER, 6 v. (Vienna 1860–90) 2:168–243. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 728–729. J. M. HOECK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1047–48. J. GOUILLARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 11:378–380. M. JUGIE, Catholicism 2:377–378.

[F. CHIOVARO]

JOHN I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Aug. 13, 523 to May 18, 526; b. Tuscany, d. Ravenna. The liquidation of the ACACIAN SCHISM was viewed by the Emperor JUSTIN I and his nephew Justinian as a necessary preliminary step to long-range plans aimed at consolidating and restoring the Roman Empire. A year after the restoration of communion with Rome, an imperial decree closing all Arian churches in Constantinople and dismissing all Arians from employment in the imperial services indicated that a harder line would be followed toward Ostrogothic Italy, since a considerable number of King THEODORIC's coreligionists living in Constantinople had to bear the brunt of the new measure. Theodoric retaliated by altering his policy of conciliation and toleration toward Catholics. Pope John I had been a supporter of Laurentius who had made peace with Symmachus. At the time of his election he was a senior deacon but elderly and infirm. He was summoned to Ravenna to head an embassy to Constantinople to secure a reversal of the imperial policy and to obtain permission for those who had been forcibly converted to Catholicism to revert to Arianism. The pope undertook to plead the first request, but refused the second. He was received in the capital on the Bosphorus (Oct. or Nov. 525) with the utmost honors; a large delegation came out as far as the 15th milestone with candles and crosses to greet him, and the emperor prostrated himself before him "as if he were Peter in person." The pope solemnly celebrated Christmas and crowned the emperor once again in a festal coronation. He celebrated Easter (April 19, 526) with great solemnity in HAGIA SOPHIA, in the presence of the patriarch, the clergy, and the imperial court. The pope occupied a throne of honor on the right-hand side of the basilica, above that of the patriarch, and read the prayers aloud in Latin. Pope John remained in Constantinople for five months, successfully negotiating the return of the Arian churches, but was unable to secure satisfaction on the other points demanded by the king, thus making his diplomatic mission a failure, despite all the honors paid to him.

Suspecting that the Roman aristocracy was plotting with Constantinople against him, King Theodoric put two prominent members, the Christian philosopher BOETHIUS and his father-in-law Symmachus, to death as a warning. When Pope John returned to Ravenna, he was imprisoned with his suite and died shortly thereafter, probably from maltreatment (starvation). He was regarded as a martyr and was interred in St. Peter's. The pope brought back with him from Constantinople rich gifts from the Emperor Justin I, which were distributed among the Roman basilicas. In 526 the canonist DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS drew up his Paschal Cycle according to the Alexandrian usage, which Rome had adopted; he began the practice of numbering years from the Incarnation, abandoning the unwieldy custom of designating them according to the era of Diocletian; this new method gradually gained acceptance under the name, the Christian Era.

Feast: May 27.

Bibliography: Patrologia latina 63:529–534, spurious letters. Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Streenbrugge 1961) 1685. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1958) 1.275–278; 3:90–91. H. LÖWE, "Theoderich der Grosse und Papst Johann I," Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 72 (Munich 1953) 83–100. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:625. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York, 1986) 54–55. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 109–113; 118–1120. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, 26 (Paris 1997). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (Freiburg 1996).

[J. CHAPIN]

JOHN II, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 31, 532 to May 8, 535. The death of Pope BONIFACE II was followed by a vacancy in the papacy of two months, during which attempts were made by all aspirants to bribe their way into the papacy. When the elderly Roman priest Mercurius was finally elected, he took the name of John II. He considered it inappropriate to keep Mercury, the name of a pagan deity, and thus became the first pope to change his name. He obtained from the Gothic king Athalaric confirmation of the decree of the Roman Senate banning simony in papal elections. This is the last known senatus consultum of that body and had been enacted a few years earlier. The king ordered it to be engraved on marble and set up in the atrium of St. Peter's. He added a provision that if a disputed election had to be referred for arbitration to Ravenna, the Roman clergy and the people were to be fined 3,000 solidi, and the amount would be given to the poor.

In a dogmatic decree defining the faith of Chalcedon, published in 533 after a religious conference in Constantinople, the emperor JUSTINIAN I incorporated the theopaschite formula favored by the Scythian monks, which he had already inserted in the profession of faith found at the beginning of his great code (528). The "sleepless" monks of Constantinople (Acoemeti), the chief opponents among the orthodox to use the formula, felt themselves threatened by the emperor's acts and appealed to the pope. Justinian dispatched his edict to the pope, the Senate, and the Roman people, requesting that the pope approve the formula and condemn the recalcitrant monks, even though Pope Hosmisdas had rejected the formula.

John II attempted to persuade the monks to abandon their opposition, but when this failed, he excommunicated them as Nestorians (March 24, 534). He wrote to the emperor informing him of the fact, and sanctioned use of the formula. The emperor's letter to the pope, Reddentes honorem (June 6, 533), was incorporated in the Code of Justinian together with the pope's reply. It contained remarkably deferential language with respect to the Apostolic See, acknowledged as "the head of all the Churches." The emperor was anxious to inform them of "all that concerns the state of the Church." He referred to "the authority of your see," which he claimed that he was eager to increase, and he praised Rome as the center of unity and criterion of orthodoxy. These comments were not incompatible with the looser view of the Roman primacy entertained at Byzantium and generally in the East, as subsequent events demonstrated. John II was in correspondence with St. CAESARIUS OF ARLES regarding Bp. Contumeliosus of Riez in Provence, who was accused of various crimes. The pope ordered him to be confined in a monastery. Pope John was buried in the portico of St. Peter's. Four of his letters are extant.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Str-eenbrugge 1961) 1692. Patrologia Latina ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878-90) 66:17-32. Senatus consultum of 530, E. SCHWARTZ, Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum 4.2 (Berlin 1914) 97. Liber pontifi- calis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886-1958) 1:285-286; 3:91. R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei papi (Rome 1957). E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 1:621. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:444-445. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of the Popes (New York 1986) 57-58. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy in the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 126-127. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, 25 (Paris 1995) s.v. "Innocent, évêque de Maronée en Thrace." R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, 26 (Paris 1997). J. SPEIGL, "Formula Iustinianus. Kircheneinigung mit kaiserlichen Glaubensbekenntnissen (Codex Iustinianus I 1, 5-8)," Ostkirchliches Studien 44 (1995) 105-34.

[J. CHAPIN]

JOHN III, POPE

Pontificate: July 17, 561 to July 13, 574. Following the death of PELAGIUS I, Catelinus, son of the vir illustris Anastasius, was elected pope, but he had to wait for four months for imperial confirmation before he could be consecrated. The pope took the name John III. During his reign the Lombards invaded Italy. It is not known whether the Byzantine General Narses was responsible for inviting them. His critics said that he did so out of anger over his recall by Emperor JUSTINIAN I at the request of the Italians, who were suffering from his exactions. The withdrawal of Narses facilitated the Lombard conquest of the backbone of the peninsula under King Alboin. One result of the invasion was to hasten the end of the schism over the THREE CHAPTERS (572) that separated Milan and the northern Italian sees from the apostolic see. Bishop Laurentius II of Milan, unable to occupy his see because of the Lombards, thought it best to reconcile with Rome in the face of the barbarian onslaught. However, the archbishop of AQUILEIA refused to be reconciled. When the barbarians reached Aquileia, the patriarch and his flock fled to the island of Grado, imitating the Venetians who had fled to the islands from the hordes of Attila in the fifth century. The pope persuaded Narses to return from Naples to defend Rome, but owing to strife between the Byzantine commander and the Romans, the pope took up residence in the cemetery of Praetextatus on the Via Appia until the death of Narses (c. 572) to avoid entanglement in the quarrel. John III was buried in St. Peter's.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Str-eenbrugge 1961) 1704. Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Berlin 1826-) division: Epistolae 1 (1891) 230. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886-92, 1958) 1:305-307, 3:92. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907-53) 13:1:1221-22. O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941). R. U. MONTINI, Le Tombe dei papi (Rome 1957) 112. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:629. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of the Popes (New York 1986) 64. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy in the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 162–166. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, 26 (Paris 1995).

[J. CHAPIN]

JOHN IV, POPE

Pontificate: August 640 to Oct. 12, 642; d. Rome. He was a Dalmatian by birth, son of Venantius (probably consultor to the exarch of Ravenna). He redeemed Christian captives taken by the Slavs in the Balkans and he endowed a chapel at the Lateran baptistery with relics. In a letter written to the Celtic clergy in England while he was pope-elect, John censured both PELAGIANISM and the Celtic custom of keeping Easter on the 14 of Nisan (Bede, Hist. Eccl. 2.19). Early in 641 he assembled a synod that condemned MONOTHELITISM (Mansi 10:607e). Later he informed PYRRHUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, that he rejected the ecthesis published by Emperor HERACLIUS in 638 because it proclaimed a single Will in Christ (Mansi 11:9b). John's epistle to Emperor Constantine III upheld the orthodoxy of Pope HONORIUS I (625–38), explaining that Honorius had understood the unity of Will in Christ as meaning that in His sinless humanity there was no place for opposition between the law of the members and the law of the mind (see Rom 7.23).

Bibliography: E. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christianum natum 1198, ed. P. EWALD 1:227–228; 2:698–739. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, v. 1-2 (Paris 1886–92), v. 3 (Paris 1958) 1:330; 3:94. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 80:601–608. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 3.1:390–398. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304, 18 v. (London 1902–32) 1.1:351–368. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum, 5 v. (2d, rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 1:314–317. F. X. SEPPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh., (Munich) 2:57–59. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 72–73

[H. G. J. BECK]

JOHN V, POPE

Pontificate: July 23, 685 to Aug. 2, 686; d. Rome. He was of a Syrian family, the son of Cyriacus. While a deacon, as recorded in his epitaph, John had been one of Pope Agatho's legates to the sixth ecumenical Council of CONSTANTINOPLE III (680–681). He was canonically elected in the Lateran basilica and then installed in the Lateran palace, in accord with the recent decree of the Emperor CONSTANTINE IV Pogonatus to Pope Benedict II (Dölger Reg. 252). John, in synod, cassated the ordination of the bishop of Sassari, Sardinia, by Citonatus, Archbishop of Cagliari in Sardinia, and decreed that the irregularly consecrated bishop be again subject to the provincial authority of the bishop of Rome rather than to that of Cagliari.

Bibliography: E. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christianum natum 1198, ed. P. EWALD 1:242. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, v. 1-2 (Paris 1886–92), v. 3 (Paris 1958) 1:366–367; 3:96. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304, 18 v. (London 1902–32) 1.2:64–67. F. DÖLGER, Corpus der griechischen Urkunden des Mittelalters und der neueren Zeit, series A, Regesten (Munich 1924–32) 1.1:252–254. J. GAY, “Quelques remarques sur les papes grecs et syriens avant la querelle des iconoclastes (678–715),” Mélanges Schlumberger (Paris 1924) 1:40–54. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft, 2v. (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:620–631. O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941). J. HALLER, Das Papsttum, 5 v. (2d, rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 1:342–344. F. X. SEPPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh., (Munich) 2: 78–82. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 80–81.

[H. G. J. BECK]

JOHN VI, POPE

Pontificate: Oct. 30, 701, to Jan. 11, 705; d. Rome. Of Greek descent, John succeeded in quelling the revolt of the Italian militia against the imperial exarch, Theophylactus, who had moved from Sicily to Rome. John's negotiations with the Lombard Gisulf, Duke of Benevento, resulted in the liberation of captives taken during Gisulf's invasion of the Campania and the withdrawal of the Beneventan troops. The only extant letter of John's pontificate (Eddius, Vita s. Wilfredi, ch. 54) originated from a four-month Roman synod of 704 that referred the dispute between the exiled WILFRID OF YORK, Bosa, Bishop of York, and JOHN OF BEVERLEY, Bishop of Hexham, to the jurisdiction of Archbishop BRITHWALD OF CANTERBURY, with the provision that should an appeal be lodged from the decision of Canterbury all concerned would be obliged to appear in Rome.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:383–384; 3:98. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. P. EWALD (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1:245–246. EDDIUS STEPHANUS, The Life of Bishop Wilfrid, ed. and tr. B. COLGRAVE (New York 1927). BEDE, A History of the English Church and People, tr. L. SHERLEY-PRICE (Harmondsworth 1955) bk. 5, ch. 19. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 1.2:105–108. O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941); “I Papi e le relazioni politiche di Roma con i ducati Longobardi di Spoleto e di Benevento,” Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia 9 (1955) 1–57. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950–53) 1:342–344. F. X. SEPPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte

Pope John VII, contemporary mosaic portrait now in the Grotto of St. Peter's in Rome, early 8th century.

des 20. Jh. (Munich 1955) 2:85. J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (Cambridge, Eng. 1962). R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 26 (Paris 1997). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 83.

[H. G. J. BECK]

JOHN VII, POPE

Pontificate: Mar. 1, 705 to Oct. 18, 707; d. Rome. John was of Greek ancestry, the son of that Plato whose epitaph records his restoration of the imperial palaces at Rome. John's own building activity at St. Peter's, St. Eugenia's, and S. Maria Antiqua is noted by the Liber pontificalis. During his reign King Aribert II (701–712) of the Lombards restored to the Roman Church its patrimony in the Cottian Alps. Emperor JUSTINIAN II, probably in 706, dispatched two bishops from Constantinople to request a Roman synod that would indicate which of the 102 canons decreed by the QUINISEXT SYNOD in 692 were objectionable to the Holy See. Pope SERGIUS I (687–701) had earlier rejected all of them, but John returned the canons without emendation. His contemporary biographer censured him for this; but the papal action may well have been an indication that the question was no longer open. Two contemporary likenesses of John are extant: one in mosaic, in the Grotto of St. Peter's, Rome; the other in a painting in S. Maria Antiqua, Rome.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 1:385–387; 3:98–99. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. P. EWALD (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1958) 1: 246–247. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. LECLERC (Paris 1907–38) 3.1:578–581. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 1.2:109–123. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:630–637. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (2d ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 1:343–344. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1955) 2:85–95. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:987–988. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, 26 (Paris 1997). A. GUILLOU, "Nom du pape Jean VII (705–708), commanditaire d'un ambon à Sainte-Marie-Antique," Recueil des inscriptions grecques médiévales d'Italia (Rome 1996) 123–4. V. NOE, "L'oratorio mariano di Giovanni VII," La Madonna della Basilica Vaticana (1994) 21–24. P. J. NORDHAGEN, "Icons Designed for the Display of Sumptuous Votive Gifts," Dumbarton Oaks Papers (Washington, DC 1987) 453–60. J. OSBORNE, "Early Medieval Wall Paintings in the Catacomb of San Valentino," Papers of the British School at Rome (London 1981) 82–90. I. ŠEVČENKO, "Three Paradoxes of the Cyrillo-Methodian Mission," Ideology, Letters and Culture in the Byzantine World (London 1982) n.4. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 84–85.

[H. G. J. BECK]

JOHN VIII, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 14, 872 to Dec. 16, 882. The son of the Roman, Gundo, he was an archdeacon of the Roman Church for twenty years before he succeeded ADRIAN II in the Papal See, despite the opposition of FORMOSUS. In his ten-year pontificate John was compelled to contend with the EASTERN SCHISM, Roman intrigue, the treachery of Italian princes, contention for the imperial throne, and Saracen invasion: in short, the entire gamut of troubles characteristic of his violent epoch. Although no contemporary biography was written, a long series of letters (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 7:1–133) and a lengthy Register of his acts (Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 1:376–422; 2:704, 746) trace in detail a complicated and action-filled pontificate. John supported the missionary work of (St.) Methodius (see CYRIL AND METHODIUS, SS) among the Slavs. At first John forbade the Slavonic language for use in their liturgy, but later approved it. Although intrigue and violence against Methodius and his Slavic colleagues by German and Hungarian princes and churchmen crushed the use of the Slavonic liturgy in Moravia, it survived among the BULGARS. Other problems prevented John from effectively seizing the opportunity offered by King BORIS I of bringing the Bulgarian Church under the direct jurisdiction of Rome rather than Constantinople. He did, however, manage to preserve the Church of Croatia for the West. In 879 John recognized PHOTIUS as patriarch of Constantinople. John has been condemned for his early indulgent treatment of Photius, but it is more realistic to recognize that the pope continuously received false intelligence from the East and, throughout the affair of Photius, was distracted by problems at home.

In the West the most harassing of John's troubles was with the Saracen pirates who, in alliance with petty Italian princes, kept invading, occupying, pillaging, retreating, and returning to Italy throughout John's pontificate. The pope's natural ally in Italy against such an enemy was the Roman Emperor: John supported Emperor LOUIS II and on the death of Louis (875) named Charles the Bald emperor, crowning him in Rome on Christmas Day, 875. In February 876 Charles became king of Italy also, and he and John joined forces against the Saracens and allied Italian princes. Before his help could be of much use, however, Charles died (October 877). Pope John favored Boso, duke of Arles, to succeed to the Empire, but Boso was reluctant to fight for the crown. Staving off the pressures of Guido III of Spoleto and Adalbert of Tuscany, John crowned Charles III the Fat emperor in 881. John, in effect, was his own general and admiral; he fortified Rome, founded a pontifical navy, and defended the coasts. He was still repelling invaders when he died in 882. Pope John's ten-year pontificate seems incredibly eventful, and he emerges as one of the better popes in the centuries between Gregory I and Gregory VII.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:221–223. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 3:231–352. A. LAPÔTRE, Le Pape Jean VIII (Paris 1895). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935—) 6:413–439. F. DVORNIK, Byzantine Missions among the Slavs. SS. Constantine-Cyril and Methodius (New Brunswick 1970). F. E. ENGREEN, "Pope J. VIII and the Arabs," Speculum 20 (1945) 318–330. F. DVORNIK, The Photian Schism (Cambridge, Eng. 1948). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1955) 2:305–329, 434. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Tables générales, Paris 1951—) 2442–43. M. M. GAREJO-GUEMBE, "Die Erfahrungen der Zeit des Photios für den heutigen ökumenischen Dialog zwischen Orthodox und Katholizismus," Orthodoxes Forum (St. Ottilien 1993) 179–86. R. HAUGH, Photius and the Carolingians: The Trinitarian Controversy (Belmont, Mass. 1975). A. GEROSTERGIOS, Photius the Great (Belmont, Mass. 1980). TH. GRANIER, "Napolitains et Lombards aux VIIIe–Xie siècles. De la guerre des peuples à la 'guerre des saints' en Italie du Sud." Mélanges de l'École Moyen Âge-Temps Modernes (Roma 1996) 403–50. J. MEIJER, A Successful Council of Union: A Theological Analysis of the Photian Synod of 879–880 (Thesslonikë 1975). N. STAUBACH, "Herkules an der 'Cathedra Petri'," in Iconologia sacra. Mythos, Bildkunst und Dichtung in der Religions- und Sozialgeschichte Al- teuropas. Festschrift für Karl Hauck zum 75. Geburtstag (Berlin/New York 1994) 383–402. H. TAVIANI-CAROZZI, "La vision impériale de l'Occident médiéval: un témoignage lombard du Xe siècle," in Histoire et société. Mélanges offerts à George Duby (Aix-en-Provence 1992) 179–92. G. VISMARA, Impium foedus. Le origini della "Respublica christiana," (Milano 1974). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 110–111.

[C. E. SHEEDY]

JOHN VIII, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: January 844. Virtually nothing is known of the deacon John, except that he was acclaimed pope upon the death of Pope Gregory IV (827–844). Gregory died in January, and the people of Rome rioted, seized the Lateran and proclaimed John the new pope. The city's aristocracy put down the uprising and forced John to leave the Lateran; they then elected the archpriest Sergius (844–847) as pope. The emperor Lothair (840–855) subsequently recognized the election through his son Louis, who served as an envoy in Rome. Nothing certain is known of John's fate, though some sources report that he was confined to a monastery.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.86–87. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1.327. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts (Munich 1954–59) 2.221. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 103. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1997) 26:1160.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

JOHN IX, POPE

Pontificate: December 897 or January 898 to January–April 900. John, a Roman who was a Benedictine monk and was ordained priest by Pope FORMOSUS, was elected pope despite strong opposition from a rival candidate, Sergius, bishop of Caere (later Pope SERGIUS III), who was a leader of the party opposed to Pope Formosus. John enjoyed the support of Emperor LAMBERT OF SPOLETO in this disputed election. As pope, John's chief concern was to continue the effort begun by his predecessor, Pope THEODORE, aimed at ending the strife that had dominated Rome since the trial of Pope Formosus in 897. The issues causing that strife were addressed in two councils held at Rome and at Ravenna in 898; Lambert of Spoleto, who had been crowned emperor by Formosus, lent his support to this effort. The acts of the council that had tried Formosus' corpse were nullified. Provisions were made for pardoning all those who had acted against Formosus except Sergius and his close followers, who were deposed and excommunicated. All of Formosus' acts, including his ordinations, were declared valid with the exception of his coronation of Arnulf of Germany as emperor; however, his coronation of Lambert was validated. The prohibition of transfer of bishops from one see to another was confirmed. In an effort to regularize papal elections the provisions of the Constituto Romana of 824 agreed upon between Pope EUGENIUS II and Emperor Lothair I were reaffirmed. This agreement provided that the pope was to be elected by cardinal bishops and clergy meeting in the presence of the Senate and the people, but required that the consecration of a newly elected pope must be held in the presence of an imperial legate. Also reconfirmed were the provisions of the Constituto Romana defining the rights and responsibilities of both pope and emperor in the governance of the Papal State in terms that guaranteed the territorial integrity and limited autonomy of the Papal State while reserving to the emperor the right to intervene in the internal affairs of the Papal State in the interests of keeping order. In effect, in order to gain an effective protector for the Papal State, John IX was willing to turn back the clock by accepting an arrangement that many of his predecessors had resisted.

John's concerns reached beyond affairs in the Papal State and Italy. His legates played a decisive role in a council in Constantinople in 899 that worked out solutions to the final, unsettled issues involved in the long-standing quarrel centering on Patriarch PHOTIUS. It also allowed a reconciliation not only between Rome and Constantinople but among the factions in the East that emerged from the Photian affair. In an effort to repair the damage done to the missionary establishment of Methodius in Moravia by rival German clergymen seeking to dominate that land, John IX responded favorably to a request from the Moravian ruler to create an independent church organization for Moravia. He was called upon to adjudicate a disputed episcopal election in the West Frankish kingdom.

But these actions paled in the face of the crisis emerging in Italy. John's hope of having found a reliable protector disappeared suddenly with the death of Lambert in 898. Italy suffered increasing chaos involving several factors: rivalry of powerful princes, especially Berengar of Friuli and Louis of Provence, for the kingship of Italy and the imperial title; Magyar invasions of the north; Greek and Saracen incursions in the south; the efforts of local potentates unrestrained by any higher authority to carve out private lordships. Soon after the death of John IX partisan strife again took center stage, creating an opportunity for a Roman official, Theophylactus, and his family to seize control of the papal office and the Papal State.

Bibliography: Sources. Le Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 3 v., 2nd ed. (Paris 1955–1957), 2: 232. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v., 2nd ed. (Leipzig 1885–1888), 1: 442–443. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum conciliorum, nova et amplissima collectio, 54 v. (Paris 1901–1920; reprinted Graz, 1960–1961), 18A: 109–234. Papsturkunden 896–1048, ed. H. ZIMMERMANN v. 1, 896–996 2nd ed. rev., Denkschriften, Österreichische Akademie der Wissenschaft, Philosophische-Historische Klasse 174 (Vienna 1989) 13–23. E. DÜMMLER, Auxilius und Vulgarius: Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte des Papsttums im Anfange des zehnten Jahrhunderts (Leipzig 1866). E. DÜMMLER, Gesta Berengarii Imperatoris. Beiträge zur Geschichte Italiens im Anfange des zehnten Jahrhunderts (Halle 1871) (In these two studies, Dümmler edits and comments on the main texts that emerged from the quarrel over Formosus' trial, including the tracts by Auxilius and Eugenius Vulgarius). Literature. L. DUCHESNE, The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes, A.D. 754–1073, tr. A. H. MATTHEW (London 1908) 167–216. C. J. HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. LECLERCQ, v. 4, part 2 (Paris 1911) 708–719. J. DUHR "La concile de Ravenna, 895. La réhabilitation du pape Formose," Recherches de science religieuse, 22 (1932) 541–579. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte des Papsttums. Eine Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zum Tod Pius X, v. 2: Das Papsttum im Frühmittelalter. Geschichte des Papste von Regierungsantritt Gregors des Grossen bis zum Mitte des 11. Jahrhundert, (Leipzig 1934) 333–335. A. FLICHE, L'Europe occidentale de 888 à 1125, Histoire générale: Histoire du Moyen Âge 2 (Paris 1941) 41–59, 110–131. É. AMANN and A. DUMAS, L'Église au pouvoir des laïques (888–1037), Histoire de l'Église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, ed. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, 7 (Paris 1948) 26–28, 115–116. F. DVORNIK, The Photian Schism: History and Legend (Cambridge 1948). W. HARTMANN, Die Synoden der Karolingerzeit im Frankenreich und in Italien, Konziliengeschichte, ed. W. BRANDMÜLLER (Paderborn 1987) 388–396. P. LLEWELLYN, Rome in the Dark Ages (London 1993) 286–315.

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

JOHN X, POPE

Pontificate: March or April 914 to May or June 928; b. John of Tossignano, Romagna. Bishop of Bologna and archbishop of Ravenna, c. 905 to 914. John owed his office to the family of THEOPHYLACTUS; but the account of LIUTPRAND OF CREMONA, suggesting an affair with the influential THEODORA, wife of Theophylactus, as the cause of John's preferment, is improbable. John was determined to rid southern Italy of the Saracens, and to this end formed an alliance between the Byzantine Emperor CONSTANTINE VII, Berengar I (whom he crowned as emperor December 915), and other Italian princes. In the campaign that followed, the pope himself took part, and by August 915 the Saracens had been driven from their stronghold on the Garigliano River. During the difficult years of his pontificate, John strove to establish the temporal authority of the Holy See. He approved the strict rule of CLUNY, which had just been founded (910), and promoted the conversion of the Normans and the interests of the Church in Spain and the Slavic areas. He sent legates to the Synod of Hohenaltheim (916), which prepared the way for the close union of Church and State in Germany. He unfortunately approved of Hugh, the five-year-old son of Count Heribert, as archbishop of Reims in order to secure the release of King Charles the Simple, whom Heribert held in prison. A schism between Rome and Constantinople over the allowing of marriage for the fourth time ended during his pontificate. Whether John conferred the imperial title on Simeon, Czar of Bulgaria (893–927), is uncertain. John's pontificate ended in tragedy. After the murder of Berengar in 924, the pope formed an alliance with King Hugh of Italy, thus arousing the enmity of MAROZIA, daughter of Theophylactus and Theodora. John was deposed and imprisoned in April 928, and afterward smothered by order of Marozia.

See Also: CRESCENTII.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. s. LÖWENFELD, 882–1198. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE 2:240–241. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 4:149–187. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. LECLERCQ 4.2:734–750. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 7:34–38. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum 2:199, 546–549. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 26 (Paris 1997), s.v. "Jean X, pape." H. FUHRMANN, "Die Synode von Hohenaltheim (916)—quellenkundlich betrachtet," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters (Kön–Wien 1987), 440–68. R. KATĪ, "Methodii doctrina," Slovo (Zagreb 1986), 11–44. I. NICHOLAS PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, Letters [913–25] (Washington, DC 1973). R. SAVIGNI, "Sacerdozio e regno in età post-carolingia: l'episcopato di Giovanni X, arcivescovo di Ravenna (905–914) e Papa (914–928)," Rivista di Storia della Chiesa in Italia (Roma 1992), 1–29. H. WOLTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3d. ed. 5 (Freiburg 1996) s.v. "Hohenaltheim, Synode v. [916]." H. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3d. ed. 5 (Freiburg 1996), s.v. "Johannes X." J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 121–122.

[S. MCKENNA]

JOHN XI, POPE

Pontificate: March 931 to Jan. 936; d. Rome. Upon the death of STEPHEN VII in 931, MAROZIA, of the House of THEOPHYLACTUS, obtained the papacy for her son John, a youth in his early twenties and a cardinal priest at the church of Santa Maria in the Trastevere. The Liber pontificalis and LIUTPRAND OF CREMONA assert that John XI was the son of Marozia and SERGIUS III but this is open to question. Undoubtedly John was Marozia's son, possibly by her first marriage with Alberic of Spoleto by whom she had another son, Alberic II. As pope, John was dominated by his mother. When Marozia married her third husband, Hugh of Provence, King of Italy, in 932, John XI witnessed the ceremony. As a result of the Roman revolt (932) led by Alberic, King Hugh sought refuge in Pavia. Marozia was taken prisoner, and Alberic, master of the city, had himself proclaimed Prince of Rome. He ruled the city effectively for the next 20 years. John XI became Alberic's prisoner and exercised spiritual duties only. Even in these Alberic interfered, as is evidenced by the creation of Artold, Archbishop of Rheims (933) and Theophylactus, Patriarch of Constantinople. At the request of St. ODO OF CLUNY, John granted many privileges to CLUNY and its dependent daughterhouses. His pontificate was marked by cordial relations with the Byzantine Emperor. John was buried in St. John Lateran.

See Also: CRESCENTII.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. s. LÖWENFELD 1:454–455; 2:706, 746–747. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE 2:243. L. DUCHESNE, The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes, A.D. 754–1073 (London 1908). H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 4: 191–204. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum 2:201–204. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. 2:355–357, 434–435. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5:990. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 26 (Paris 1997), s.v. "Jean XI, pape." R. BENERICETTI, La cronologia dei Papi dei secoli IX–XI secondo le carte di Ravenna (1999), 39. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 123.

[M. A. MULHOLLAND]

JOHN XII, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 16, 955 to May 14, 964; b. Rome, c. 936. Before his death in 954, Alberic II of Spoleto, the undisputed master of Rome, made the nobles swear to elect his only son, Octavian, to the papacy at the death of Agapetus II. As pope, Octavian changed his name to John. Even if this immature pontiff, scarcely 18, were not guilty of all the vices attributed to him by LIUTPRAND (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 3:340–346), there is sufficient unbiased evidence to prove that he was unworthy of his office. In 959, attempting to recover former papal lands from King Berengarius II, John appealed for help to OTTO I. The German king willingly obliged, and late in 961 his army appeared in Italy. On Feb. 2, 962, John crowned Otto emperor and Otto's wife, (St.) Adelaide, empress, in St. Peter's Basilica, beginning the long association of the imperial title with the German kingdom (see HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE). Otto issued the Privilegium Ottonianum, promising to make the pope the temporal ruler of almost three-fourths of Italy. On the other hand, the pope had to recognize the emperor's suzerainty over the STATES OF THE CHURCH and agree that future popes were not to be consecrated until they had taken an oath of fealty to the emperor. The pope resented these terms, and when Otto left the city, began to plot against him. The emperor, therefore, returned on November 3, but John escaped to Tivoli with the papal treasury. On November 6, Otto summoned a synod in St. Peter's, and there the pope was accused of gross misconduct; he was ordered to appear in person and clear himself of these charges. When John refused, he was deposed on December 4 and replaced by a Roman lay official, LEO VIII. Many in Rome opposed this high-handed action and John easily regained control of the city (early 964) after Otto's departure. He punished many of his enemies and declared the acts of Leo VIII null and void. John died suddenly under circumstances that, according to Liutprand, were just as scandalous as his life.

See Also: CRESCENTII.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (Graz 1956) 1:463–467. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:246–249. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 4:241–272. E. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:619–626. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935—) 7:44–55. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale, 774–1252 (Bologna 1947). J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950–53) 2:204–215, 549–555. W. ULLMANN, "The Origins of the Ottonianum," Cambridge Historical Journal 11 (Cambridge, Eng. 1953) 114–128; The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (London 1955). P. E. SCHRAMM, Kaiser, Rom und Renovatio (Darmstadt 1957). H. BEUMANN, "Die Gründung des Bistums Oldenburg und die Missionspolitik Ottos des Grossen," Ausgewählte Aufsätze aus des Jahren 1966–1986. Festgabe zu seinem 75. Geburtstag (1987) 177–92. G. GRESSER, Biographisch-Bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon 6 (1993), s.v. "Otger (Otggar, Otkerius), Bischof von Speyer." K. HAMPE, "Die Berufung Ottos des Grossen nach Rom durch Papst Johann XII," in Historische Aufsätze Karl Zeumer zum sechzigsten Geburtstag als Festgabe dargebracht von Freunden und Schüer (Frankfurt 1987) 153–63. E. D. HEHL, "Die angeblichen Kanones der römischen Synode vom Februar 962," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters (Köln-Wien 1986) 620–8. E. D. HEHL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5 (Freiburg 1996), s.v. "Johannes XII." H. PLATELL, "Théophylacte," Catholicisme hier aujour'd'hui demain (Paris 1996) 119–20. T. STRUVE, Lexikon des Mittelalters, 7 (München-Zürich 1994–1995), s.v. "Privilegium Ottonianum." J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 126–127.

[S. MCKENNA]

JOHN XIII, POPE

Pontificate: Oct. 1, 965 to Sept. 6, 972; b. Rome, probably a cousin of Alberic II of Spoleto and brother of Crescentius. John was the bishop of Narni when he was chosen as pope by OTTO I. Noble opposition in Rome, re-sending the imperial election and John's attempts to curb their power, rebelled in December 965 and took the Pope to the Campagna as a prisoner. However, early in 966 John escaped and, aided by Otto's army, returned to Rome in November. The CRESCENTII had remained loyal and gradually became the leaders of the Roman aristocracy. John's remaining years were spent in peace since Otto stayed in Italy until 972. The pope and the emperor encouraged the extension of the CLUNIAN REFORM. Together they presided at a synod in Ravenna, April 967, where laws were passed against clerical marriage (see CELIBACY, CLERICAL HISTORY OF); but the times were not propitious for so sweeping a reform. The pope conferred the imperial crown on the 12-year-old OTTO II on Christmas Day 967; on April 14, 972, he married the young emperor to the Byzantine princess Theophano, whom he also crowned as empress. In 962 John XII, at Otto's request, had approved the erection of the metropolitan See of Magdeburg, but opposition in the German hierarchy prevented the erection. By 968, John XIII had succeeded, and he consecrated Adalbert its first and most important archbishop. Magdeburg with its suffragan sees became the headquarters for the conversion of the Slavs. John died in Rome and was buried in St. Paul-Outside-the-Walls.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD 1:470–477. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE 2:252–254. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. LECLERCQ 4.2:825–832. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale (Bologna 1947). H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 4:282–304. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum 2:215–218, 554–555. P. E. SCHRAMM, Kaiser, Rom und Renovatio (2d. ed. Darmstadt 1957). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5:990–991. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 26 (Paris 1997), s.v. "Jean XIII, pape." E. D. HEHL, "Meresburg—eine Bistumsgründung unter Vorbehalt. Gelübde, Kirchenrecht und politischer Spielraum im 10. Jahrhundert," Frühmittelalterliche Studien (Berlin 1997), 96–119. LIUDPRAND OF CREMONA, "Relatio de legatione Constantinopolitana (The Mission to Constantinople)," The Journal of Ecclesiastical History (Cambridge 1994). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 129–130.

[S. MCKENNA]

JOHN XIV, POPE

Pontificate: November or December 983 to Aug. 20, 984; b. Peter Canepanova. Bishop of Pavia and archchancellor for Italy, he was chosen pope by OTTO II. A letter to Alo, Archbishop of Benevento, the only extant document of his pontificate, reveals his concern for the reform of the Church. When Otto II died at Rome, Dec. 7, 983, the Empress Theophano was forced to leave the city to defend the claim of her three-year-old son, OTTO III. John was now at the mercy of the CRESCENTII and their anti-pope, Boniface VII, who returned to Rome from Constantinople. He was deposed and imprisoned in the Castel Sant' Angelo in April 984, and died from either hunger or poison.

Bibliography: L. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (Graz 1956) 1:484–485. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUSHESNE (Paris 1958) 2:259. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 4:330–338. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN eds. Historie de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935– ) 7:62–63. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum, (2d, rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 2:217, 555. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire de géographie ecclésiastiques, 26 (Paris 1997). R. BENERICETTI, La cronologia dei Papi dei secoli IX–XI secondo le carte di Ravenna (1999) 50. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of the Popes (New York 1986) 132–133.

[S. MCKENNA]

JOHN XV, POPE

Pontificate: August 985 to March 996. The son of a Roman priest named Leo, he was elected pope after the forcible removal of the legitimate Pope JOHN XIV and the eleven-month reign (until July 985) of the usurper, Boniface VII. He owed his election (which took place some time between Aug. 6 and Sept. 5, 985) to the influence of John Crescentius II, who as PATRICIUS ROMANORUM continued to hold political sway over Rome. John sought at times to evade this domination of the CRESCENTII and succeeded, to a limited degree, in restoring impeded papal authority during his ten-year pontificate. He enjoyed friendly contacts with the Empire's regents, namely, Emperor OTTO I's widow, St. Adelaide, and Emperor OTTO II's widow, Theophano. Through his legate, Leo of Trevis, he brought about the Peace of Rouen (991), which settled the quarrel between King Ethelred II of England and Duke Richard of Normandy; he confirmed the peace with a papal bull.

John brought papal authority to bear on the dispute over the archdiocese of Reims precipitated by Hugh Capet, king of France, who had made Arnulf, nephew of Duke Charles of Lorraine, the archbishop there in 989. Charles, an opponent of Hugh Capet, had imprisoned the archbishop; subsequently Capet held a synod at Saint-Basle near Reims, which deposed Arnulf (991). Capet considered him a traitor and chose as his successor Gerbert of Aurillac (the future SYLVESTER II). The pope objected to this deposal, and in 995 his legate presided over a council at Mouzon (995)—attended only by the German bishops—which condemned and suspended Gerbert in turn. When Capet died (October 996) Arnulf was finally released from imprisonment and restored to his see.

About 990 John received Poland as a papal fief from Duke Mieszko of Poland. He initiated the practice of papal CANONIZATION OF SAINTS, and on Jan. 31, 993, solemnly canonized Bp. ULRIC OF AUGSBURG at a Roman synod held in the Lateran and proclaimed the canonization in a papal bull of February 3 to the French and German bishops. John has been considered a promoter of the CLUNIAN REFORM. His dictatorial manners and his tendency to favor his relatives, however, provoked criticism and opposition among the Roman clergy that John Crescentius II utilized to force the pope to flee to Tuscany. There John successfully sought the support of the young OTTO III, and as the king progressed toward Rome (996) for his imperial coronation, Crescentius was forced to seek peace with the pope. John returned to Rome but died before the imperial party reached the city.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (Graz 1956) 1:486–489; 2:707–708. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:260; 3. K. G. VON ZMIGROD-STADNICKI, Die Schenkung Polens an Papst Johannes XV (Fribourg 1911). F. SCHNEIDER, "Johann XV., Papst, u. Ottos III. Romfahrt," Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 39 (1923) 193–218. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Tables générales 1951—) 2444. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 26 (Paris 1997), s.v. "Jean XV, pape." F. X. BISCHOF, "Die Kanonisation Bischof Ulrichs auf der Lateransynode des Jahres 993," in Bischof Ulrich von Augsburg, 890–973. Seine Zeit—sein Leben—sein Verehrung. Festschrift aus Anlaß des tausendjährigen Jubiläums seiner Kanonisation im Jahre 993 (1993) 197–222. K. GÖRICH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5 (Freiburg 1996), s.v. "Johannes XV." CHR. LÜBKE, Lexikon des Mittelalters 6 (München-Zürich 1992/1993), s.v. "Mieszko I. Fürst von Polen." L. MUSSET, "Un millénaire oublié: la remise en place de la hiérarchie épiscopale en Normandie autour de 990," in Papautés, monarchisme et théories politiques. Études d'histoire médiévale offertes à Marcel Pascaut (Lyon 1994) 563–73. G. WOLF, "Die Kanonisationsbulle von 993 für den hl. Oudalrich von Augsburg und Vergleichbares," Archiv für Diplomatik Schriftgeschichte, Siegelkunde und Wappenkunde 40 (Köln-Wien 1994, 85–104). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 133–134.

[W. M. PLÖCHL]

JOHN XVI, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: February or March 997 to May 998. He probably died in 1001. John Philagathos was a Greek born in Rossano (Calabria). He was Otto II's chancellor for Italy from 980 to 982, when the emperor appointed him abbot of Nonantola (near Modena). In 987 he was one of young Otto III's (983–1002, emp. 996) tutors. The following year he was appointed bishop of Piacenza, which Pope John XV temporarily raised to an archbishopric for him at the request of Otto. Also in 987 John Philagathos headed the king's court in Pavia, and he was chancellor for Italy again in 991–92. In 994 he was sent to Constantinople to find a Byzantine princess to wed Otto III. Having made progress in this mission, he returned to Italy with the Byzantine ambassador Bishop Leo of Synada in November 996. However, the month before John and Leo arrived, Crescentius II Nomentanus had used the emperor's absence from Rome to revolt against Otto's rule. Crescentius had expelled Pope Gregory V (996–99) and set himself up as dictator of the city.

Upon his return, John went to northern Italy, where he was in contact with both Otto (in Aachen) and Crescentius. It is difficult to understand John's position in this divisive situation, but for reasons that remain obscure, he went to Rome and was named Pope John XVI in February or March 997. Some scholars see in John's actions a conspiracy with the Byzantines; others consider him a victim of Crescentius' intrigues and perhaps of his own ambition. Whatever the truth, he had become involved in a dangerous political situation that quickly worsened. In March 997, Gregory V excommunicated him, removing him as abbot of Nonantola and archbishop of Piacenza. Additionally, Crescentius had usurped for himself all temporal power in the city and the Papal States. These actions left John with little spiritual authority and no political resources of his own. That summer he received messages from Otto, and a letter from Abbot Nilus of Rossano (ca. 910–1004); both criticized his actions and called for him to step down. John attempted to contact Otto and seemed ready to submit to his demands, but Crescentius jailed the imperial messengers who were sent to negotiate with the antipope.

Finally, when Otto marched on Italy in December 997, John fled Rome for Campagna. After the emperor and Pope Gregory V entered Rome in February 998, Crescentius was seized and soon beheaded. Troops were sent to search for John, whom they captured and imprisoned in a Roman monastery. Later he was blinded, mutilated on the nose, ears, and tongue, and paraded through the streets of Rome on a donkey. Abbot Nilus protested these actions, but to no avail. At a Lenten synod in 998, Gregory formally deposed John and confined him to a monastery where he later died.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.261–64. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1.495–96. M. P. VINSON, ed. and trans. The Correspondance of Leo Metropolitan of Synada and Syncellus (Washington, DC 1985). B. PLATINA, De vita Christi ac omnium pontificum 143, ed. G. GAIDA, in Rerum italicarum scriptores 3.1, ed. L. A. MURATORI (Città di Castello and Bologna 1913–32) 174–75. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages (London 1902–32) 4.389–90, 415–46. H. ZIMMERMAN, Papstabsetzungen des Mittelalters (Graz, Vienna, Cologne 1968) 105–18. A. NITSCHKE, “Der mißhandelte Papst: Folgen ottonischer Italienpolitik,” in Staat und Gesellschaft in Mittelalter

und Früher Neuzeit: Gedenkschrift für J. Leuschner (Göttingen 1983) 40–53. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 135–36.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

JOHN XVII, POPE

Pontificate: May 16 to Nov. 6, 1003. He was a native of Rome, called John Sicco, and a member of the party of the CRESCENTII before his election. After the death of SYLVESTER II, John was made pope by the patricius Crescentius III (d. 1012), who had exercised great influence over Roman affairs since the death of OTTO III in January 1002. Before he had taken orders he had been married and was father of three sons, who also became ecclesiastics. There exist no reports of the activities of his short pontificate, except the fact that he was obviously a puppet of the Crescentii.

Bibliography: J. HALLER, Das Papsttum, 5 v. (2d, rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 2:229, 562. R. POUPARDIN, “Note sur la chronologie de Jean XVII,” Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 21 (1901) 387–390. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christianum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD 1:501. E. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 8.1:629. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 5:992. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 26 (Paris 1997), s.v. “Jean XVII (XVIII), pape.” R. BENERICETTI, La cronologia dei Pape dei secoli IX–XI secondo le carte di Ravenna (1999), 55. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 138.

[W. M. PLÖCHL]

JOHN XVIII, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 25, 1003 to June or July 1009; b. Joannes Fasanus, Rome; d. Abbey of St. Paul–Outside–the–Walls, Rome. Prior to his election he was cardinalis s. Petri. He was elected through the influence of Crescentius III (d. 1012), but he was less dependent on the Roman patrician family of CRESCENTII than his predecessor, JOHN XVII, had been. He somewhat strengthened papal authority by the restoration of the episcopal See of Merseburg in 1004. In 1007 he confirmed the foundation of the bishopric of BAMBERG, which had been erected by Emperor HENRY II. He also conferred the PALLIUM on Abp. Meingaudus of TRIER and Elphege (d. 1012) of CANTERBURY. He bestowed papal protection on the abbey of SAINT-BENOÎT-SUR-LOIRE, and he definitely opposed the pretensions of Abp. Leticus of SENS and

Bp. Fulco of ORLÉANS, who tried to abrogate the papal privileges of that monastery. It is noteworthy that John was recognized in Constantinople as the bishop of Rome, for his name appears on the DIPTYCHS of the BYZANTINE CHURCH. John at length retired to ST. PAUL-OUTSIDE-THE-WALLS and lived there as a monk. He is buried at the same monastery.

Bibliography: J. HALLER, Das Papsttum 2:229, 242–247, 562. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. 2:401. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD 501–503. E. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. 8.1:629–630. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 26 (Paris 1997), s.v. "Jean XVIII (XIX), pape." R. BENERICETTI, La cronologia dei Papi dei secoli IX–XI secondo le carte di Ravenna (1999), 56–57. W. ZIEZULEWICZ, "Monastic Forgery in an Age of Reform: A Bull of Pope John XVIII for Saint-Florent-de-Saumur (April 1004)," Archivum Historicum Societatis Iesu (Roma 1985), 7–42. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 138–139.

[W. M. PLÖCHL]

JOHN XIX, POPE

Pontificate: April 19, 1024 to 1032. Romanus, as he was named, came from the family of the TUSCULANI, successors to the CRESCENTII in providing the Church with popes. He adopted, during the pontificate of his brother BENEDICT VIII, the title Consul, dux et senator omnium Romanorum, with no special claim to this title except Emperor HENRY II's approval. After the death of his brother, Romanus, although still a layman, took possession of the papacy as a family inheritance and, despite canonical regulations, received all the orders on one day, taking the name John XIX. At Easter 1027 he crowned CONRAD II emperor. In ecclesiastical affairs he was dominated by Conrad, especially in the interminable controversies between the patriarchs of AQUILEIA and GRADO and between the bishop of Constance and the abbot of Reichenau. On the other hand, he prevented Conrad's interference in Rome and made Tusculum supreme in the States of the Church. John could hardly contribute much to the reform of the Church and showed himself an inconsistent administrator, interested chiefly in financial gain; e.g., he made demands of money for hierarchial posts. According to RODULPHUS GLABER, John even planned to recognize the patriarch of Constantinople as ecumenical in exchange for money but is supposed to have been dissuaded by WILLIAM OF SAINT-BÉNIGNE of Dijon. The name of the pope was omitted from the diptychs of the Byzantine Church since John's time, a fact that may indicate that Glaber's statement and other exaggerated charges made against the pope are false. Among his positive achievements were the support he gave to GUIDO OF AREZZO, the CLUNIAC REFORM, and—at least indirectly—the Truce of God. He was buried in St. Peter's.

Bibliography: Sources. J. M. WATTERICH, ed., Pontificum romanorum . . . vitae, 2 v. (Leipzig 1862) 1:70, 75, 708–711. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (repr. Graz 1956) 1:514–519. R. GLABER, Les Cinq livres de ses histoires, ed. M. PROU (Paris 1886) 93–94. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:269; 3:132. L. SANTIFALLER, "Chronologisches Verzeichnis der Urkunden Papst Johanns XIX," Römische historische Mitteilungen 1 (1956–57) 35–76. W. KÖLMEL, Rom und der Kirchenstaat im 10. und 11. Jahrhundert (Berlin 1935). P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale (Bologna 1947). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935) 7:87–89. L. SANTIFALLER, Zur Geschichte des ottonischsalischen Reichskirchensystems (2d ed. Vienna 1964). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1954–59) 2:408–412. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:992. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 26 (Paris 1997). R. BENERICETTI, La cronologia dei Papi dei secoli IX–XI secondo le carte di Ravenna (1999), 60–62. G. TURRI, "Guido d'Arezzo o Guido di Pomposa," in Palestra del Clero (1994) 527–32. H. WOLFRAM, "Die Gesandtschaft Konrads II. nach Konstantinopel (1027/29)," Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung (1992) 161–74. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 141–142.

[G. RILL]

JOHN XX, POPE

There was no pope of this name. Because of confusion in the writings of MARIANUS SCOTUS, copied by subsequent authors, a mythical Pope John reigned four months between BONIFACE VII (d. 985) and JOHN XV, who thereby was designated, erroneously, as John XVI and so on. The several popes named John in the 10th and 11th centuries have since been correctly numbered, but JOHN XXI (PETER OF SPAIN) and JOHN XXII bear numbered names that they themselves assumed.

Bibliography: Annuario Pontificio (Rome 1912–), footnote under John XXI and esp. see under John XIV. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 8.1:632–633. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:992.

[A. O'MALLEY]

JOHN XXI, POPE

Pontificate: Sept. 16, 1276, to May 20, 1277; b. Petrus Juliani or Petrus Hispanus, Lisbon, Portugal, before c. 1205; d. Viterbo, Italy. Little is known about Peter. His short tenure as pope has made it virtually impossible to assess the impact of his reign. The two major tasks of his papacy, the restoration of the Eastern Church to the Western Church and a crusade, were incomplete at the time of his death. By contrast, Peter's work in the academic arena is much better known. Peter himself was an energetic man who made significant contributions in the fields of philosophy, theology, medicine, and logic. He is particularly remembered in the history of philosophy for his ordering of an investigation into the teaching of Averroism at the University of Paris. The action ultimately culminated in the condemnations of 1277.

There is virtually no information regarding Peter's early life. The currently accepted theory is that he was born before 1205, although scholars have suggested later dates. There is consensus, however, that Peter was born in Lisbon, Portugal, that he was the son of a man named Julianus, that he was baptized Peter Juliani and that he was probably tied to a noble family. In terms of his academic formation, Peter probably attended the cathedral school in Lisbon and by 1220 he was studying at the University of Paris. His teachers in theology were more likely Alexander of Hales, William of Auxerre, and William of Auvergne. By 1231 it would appear that Peter had traveled to northern Spain where he taught logic and composed a famous logical treatise that was entitled Tractatus. In 1235, Peter was probably studying medicine in both Toulouse and Montpellier.

By Jan. 11, 1245, Peter was in Siena, Italy where he taught medicine. He remained there for roughly five years and then he likely returned to Portugal. While there, Peter served as the dean of the Church of Lisbon and as archdeacon of Vermoim in the diocese of Braga. In March 1254, Peter attended the Cortes (Diet) of Leiria and in 1257 he was given the office of prior of Santa Maria at Guimarães. In 1263, Peter had been appointed magister scholarum of the Cathedral School of Lisbon. His activities between the years 1264–1272 are not known. In 1272 Pope Gregory X summoned Peter to become his court physician at Viterbo. It was during this period that Peter probably compiled his medical treatise Thesaurus pauperum. By the end of March or in early April 1273, Peter was selected to be the archbishop of Braga and on June 5 of that same year Pope Gregory X appointed him cardinal-bishop of Frascati (Tusculum). In June 1273, Peter accompanied Gregory to the General Council of Lyons in June 1273.

There is some evidence that suggests that that Peter returned to the University of Paris for a short stay in 1274. Nevertheless, he continued to govern the See of Braga until May 23, 1275. Peter's friend and patron Pope Gregory X died on Jan. 10, 1276. Gregory was succeeded by the remarkably short reigns of Innocent V and Adrian

V and after the latter's death, Peter was elected pope. On Sept. 13, 1276 Peter was mistakenly crowned John XXI instead of XX. His reign as pope is commonly viewed as a political compromise between French and Italian factions. His most important deeds were the issuance of the bull Relatio nimis implacida in which he ordered the bishop of Paris, Étienne Tempier, to investigate errors being taught at the University of Paris. The bull led to attacks on Latin Averroism, a few positions regarding courtly love by Andrew Campellanus, and some ideas relating to St. Thomas' thought. In a second bull, Flumen aque vive, John ordered Bishop Tempier to purify the doctrines of the Parisian masters. John's pontificate ended abruptly when the roof of his study collapsed on him on May 14, 1277. He died from his injuries on May 20, 1277.

Peter was an able scholar and on one occasion he referred to himself as "doctor in liberal arts, rector of the philosophical sublimity, honor of the medical faculty and past master in the science of the soul." The description is apt but there are questions concerning the authorship of his Summulae logicales. According to one tradition of scholarship the work may have been written by a Dominican friar named Peter Alfonsi of Spain. The more popular view, however, is that the man who became Pope John XXI was the author of the Summulae logicales which is more properly called Tractatus. In addition to the Tractatus, Peter probably wrote a second logical treatise titled Synkategoremata. In the field of medicine, Peter's Thesaurus pauperum achieved great notoriety and has overshadowed his 14 other works on medicine that include commentaries on Hippocrates, Galen, and Isaac. As rector of philosophical sublimity, Peter is credited with having commented on Aristotle's De Anima, Historia animalium, De morte et vita, De causis longitudinis et brevitatis vitae, and De sensu et sensato. Apparently Peter wrote two commentaries on pseudo-Denys the Areopagite that reflect some influence from De coelesti hierarchia, Neoplatonism, and St. Augustine. Finally, as a past master of the science of the soul, Peter argued for an Augustinian view of God's role in illuminating the intellect in ordinary cognition in his work Scientia libri de anima.

Bibliography: Sources. JOHN XXI, Summulae logicales, ed. I. M. BOCHENSKI (Turin 1947); Tractatus, called afterwards Summule Logicales, ed. L.M. DE RIJK (Leiden 1972); Expositio librorum beati Dionysii, ed. M. ALONSO (Lisbon 1957); Scientia libri de anima, ed. id. (Madrid 1941); Comentario al "De anima" de Aristoteles, ed. id. (Madrid 1944); Expositio libri De anima. De morte et vita et De causis longitudinis et brevitatis vitae. Liber naturalis de rebus principalibus, ed. id. (Madrid 1952); Thesaurus pauperum, ed. and tr. L. DE PINA, and M. H. DA ROCHA PEREIRA (Oporto 1955); Regimen sanitatis, ed. M. H. DA ROCHA PEREIRA (Figueira da Foz 1960); Die Ophthalmologie: Liber de oculo, ed. and tr. A. M. BERGER (Munich 1899); Le Registre de Jean XXI, ed.

L. CADIER (Paris 1898); The Summulae logicales of Peter of Spain, ed. and tr. J. P. MULLALLY (Notre Dame, Ind. 1945). Literature. R. STAPPER, Papst Johannes XXI (Münster 1898). L. THORNDIKE, A History of Magic and Experimental Science (New York 1923–58) 2:488–516. M. GRABMANN, Handschriftliche Forschungen und Funde zu den philosophischen Schriften des Petrus Hispanus, Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu München 9 (Munich 1936). J. FERREIRA, “As Sūmulas logicais de Pedro Hispano e os seus comentadores,” Colectânea de Estudos 3 (1952) 360–393; “Introdução ao estudo do Liber de anima de Pedro Hispano,” Revista filosófica 3 (Coimbra 1954) 177–198; Presença do Augustinismo avicenezante na teoria dos intelectos de Pedro Hispano (Braga 1959); “L’Homme dans la doctrine de Pierre d’Espagne,” in L’Homme et son destin (Actes du Premier Congrès International de Philosophie médiévale; Louvain-Paris 1960) 445–461. L.M. DE RIJK, “On the Genuine Text of Peter of Spain’s Summule Logicales I,” Vivarium 6 (1968) 1–34; “On the Genuine Text of Peter of Spain’s Summule Logicales IV,” Vivarium 7 (1969) 120–162; “On the Life of Peter of Spain, the author of the Tractatus, called afterwards Summule Logicales” Vivarium 8 (1970) 123–154. M. DE ASUA, “El Comentario de Pedro Hispano Sobre el De Animalibus. Transcripción de las quaestiones sobre la controversia entre medicos y filosofos,” Patristica et mediaevalia 16 (1995) 45–66; A. D’ORS “Petrus Hispanus O.P. Auctor Summularum,” Vivarium 35 no. 1 (1997) 21–71; M. DE ASUA “Los Problemata o Quaestiones de animalibus de Pedro Hispano,” Stromata 54 (1998) 267–302

[J. A. SHEPPARD]

JOHN XXII, POPE

Pontificate: Aug. 7, 1316, to Dec. 4, 1334; b. Jacques Duèse (or d’Euze) in Cahors, southern France, c. 1245; d. Avignon. Born into a rich bourgeois family, he studied canon and Roman law at Montpellier and Orléans. Bishop of Fréjus from 1300, he was appointed chancellor of Charles II and then Robert of Naples (1308–10); he was consecrated bishop of Avignon in 1310, cardinal-priest of S. Vitale in 1312, and cardinal bishop of Porto in 1313, his last stage before the See of St. Peter. At the age of 72, he was elected to the papacy after a two-year vacancy and not before he encouraged rumors about his precarious physical condition. Eventually, John ruled the Church for 18 consecutive years, during which he established the papal court at Avignon.

John XXII continued the reorganization of the Church along the centralizing lines fixed in the previous century and increased the papal treasury through strengthening apostolic control over church offices and benefices. He promulgated the Liber Septimus, the collection of decretals of his predecessor, Clement V, also known as CLEMENTINAE; his own judicial decisions, the EXTRAVAGANTES COMMUNES, were the last addition to CANON LAW until the 16th century. Although he was personally austere, energetic, and kindly, his strong family affections and local patriotism brought charges of nepotism. Indeed, of the 28 cardinals he nominated, 20 were from southern France, three of them his nephews.

In the political sphere, John continued the strong alliance with the western kings and submitted the papacy to the interests of Edward II and Edward III, both in the internal arena of England and in their protracted conflict with Scotland. In France, as well, he tried to strengthen the monarchy in the critical transition period between the Capetians and the Valois.

Less successful was John’s long conflict with Emperor Louis IV, the Bavarian. Following a disputed election to the German crown (1314), the pope admonished the two contenders to settle their dispute amicably. Papal moderation, however, changed radically once Louis of Bavaria defeated Frederick of Austria (1322), for the victorious king appointed an imperial vicar in Italy and gave political support to the pope’s enemy, Galeazzo VISCONTI of Milan. Employing the precedent established by INNOCENT III, John declared that the imperial election lay with the papacy and ordered Louis to annul his former acts and to renounce the imperial dignity until a papal decision was issued. The German response came in the Declaration of Nuremberg, which formally denied the papal claims (Nov. 16, 1323). These were condemned once again in the Sachsenhausen Appellation (May 22, 1324), which declared John a heretic because of his declarations on evangelical poverty. At this stage the conflict between pope and emperor-elect lost its original, political essence and became a war between two well-defined ideological factions. To fortify his position, Louis gave asylum to MARSILIUS OF PADUA and JOHN OF JANDUN, the authors of the Defensor pacis, who championed the independent status of secular princes and declared the ecumenical council superior to the pope. John retaliated by excommunicating Louis, but the latter was crowned emperor in Rome by the senator Sciarra COLONNA (Jan. 17, 1328). Louis thereupon charged John with being an usurper and oppressor of the Church, deposed him, and brought about the election of the Franciscan Spiritual Peter of Corbara, as antipope NICHOLAS V (May 12). These extremist measures, however, proved short lived. After Louis returned to Germany (1329), Peter submitted to the pope, who had excommunicated him and subsequently imprisoned him in Avignon. Louis tried unsuccessfully to negotiate a reconciliation with the papal curia. Still, the radical Franciscans (among them the English philosopher WILLIAM OCKHAM) together with Marsilius of Padua continued their vigorous antipapal campaign from the imperial court in Munich.

The critical role of the FRANCISCANS during the conflict between regnum et sacerdotium hints at their own clash with the papal curia during John’s pontificate.

Throughout the 13th century, the order had enjoyed papal protection, which brought about, inter alia, the nomination of a special coordinator between the order and the Holy See, as well as papal formal ownership of Franciscan wealth as a means of safeguarding the order's allegiance to evangelical poverty. Still, the many conflicts within the ranks of the order between the Spirituals, who favored strict adherence to St. Francis's rule of poverty, and the Conventuals, who held to a broader interpretation, led to continuous papal intervention. Shortly after his accession, John took action against the Spirituals and imprisoned their delegates at Avignon. In a series of decrees, the pope ordered them to resume obedience to their superiors (Quorundam exigit, Oct. 7, 1317). He condemned the most extreme champions of evangelical poverty, such as the FRATICELLI and BEGUINES (Sancta Romana, Dec. 30, 1317), and the Tuscan Spirituals, who had taken refuge in Sicily (Gloriosam ecclesiam, Jan. 23, 1318). Twenty-five Spirituals were handed over to the INQUISITION, which put four of them to the stake. In order to undermine their ideological foundations, John condemned the Postilla super Apocalypsim, a treatise written by the undisputed leader of the Spirituals, PETER JOHN OLIVI. Up to this point, the pope had confronted the tenets and way of life of the most radical Franciscans. Two years later, however, he began a frontal attack against the order as a whole, condemning the Franciscan doctrine of evangelical poverty, (Ad conditorem canonum, Dec. 8, 1322) and made it heretical to assert that Christ and the Apostles had not owned goods (Cum inter nonnullos, Nov. 12, 1323) (see POVERTY CONTROVERSY). The pope later deposed and excommunicated the minister-general, MICHAEL OF CESENA (Quia vir reprobus, Nov. 16, 1329), who, together with the proctor of the order, BONAGRATIA OF BERGAMO, and William Ockham, had fled from Avignon and joined forces with the emperor. John eventually succeeded in submitting the Franciscan Order to apostolic obedience. The Perpignan Chapter chose Gerald Odonis as minister-general in place of Cesena, thus facilitating a reconciliation with the papal curia (1331).

The protracted conflict with the Franciscans exposed John to criticism, but it did not challenge his status as Vicar of God on Earth and ultimate speaker of Catholic orthodoxy. The controversy over the BEATIFIC VISION, however, threatened the theological foundations of the papacy, for criticism came no longer from members of a monastic order suspected of a biased approach, but from the masters of the faculty of theology in Paris. During the winter of 1331–32, John XXII preached four sermons on the beatific vision. Although not yet defined as dogma, traditional doctrine maintained that the souls of the saints, who were in paradise, enjoyed the full vision of God immediately after their deaths. The pope, however, claimed that since an individual is composed of body and soul, his final reward is deferred until their reunion at the resurrection on the Day of Judgment. The University of Paris condemned these theories in the autumn of 1333, and it was supported by most theologians whom the pope consulted. On his deathbed, John retreated to some degree, acknowledging that the souls of the blessed see God and the divine essence face to face as clearly as their condition permits. He stated that his former position was only a personal opinion. The pope's capitulation to the theological tenets of the university can be regarded as a reflection of the changing balance of power in Christendom on the eve of the Conciliar Movement.

John set up foreign missions and established bishoprics in Anatolia, Armenia, Iran, and India. A patron of learning, he founded the papal library at Avignon (see VATICAN LIBRARY) and the University of Cahors.

Bibliography: Lettres de Jean XXII, ed. A. FAYEN, 2 v. in 3 (Rome 1908–12); Lettres secrètes et curiales de Pape Jean XXII . . . , ed. A. L. COULON and S. CLÉMENCET (Paris 1906–); Lettres communes . . . , ed. G. MOLLAT and G. DE LESQUES, 16 v. in 15 (Bibl. des Écoles franç. ser. 3; Paris 1904–47). G. MOLLAT, The Popes at Avignon, tr. J. LOVE (New York 1963). J. E. WEAKLAND, "Administration and Fiscal Centralization under Pope John XXII, 1316–1334," Catholic Historical Review 54 (1968) 39–54, 285–310; "Pope John XXII and the Beatific Vision Controversy," Annuaire Mediaevale 9 (1968) 76–84. M. D. LAMBERT, "The Franciscan Crisis under John XXII," Franciscan Studies 10 (1972) 123–143. K. E. SPIERS, "Pope John XXII and Marsilius of Padua on the Universal Dominion of Christ," Medioevo 6 (1980) 471–478. S. MENACHE, "The Failure of John XXII's Policy toward France and England," Church History 55:4 (1986) 423–437. R. LAMBERTINI, "Usus and usura: Poverty and Usury in the Franciscans' Responses to John XXII's Quia vir reprobus," Franciscan Studies 54 (1994) 185–210. S. KINSELLA, "The Poverty of Christ in the Medieval Debates between the Papacy and the Franciscans," Laurentianum 36:3 (1995) 477–509. M. DYKMANS, "Nouveaux textes de Jean XXII sur la vision beatifique," Revue d'histoire ecclesiastique 66:2 (1971) 401–417. C. TROTTMAN, "Vision beatifique et intuition d'un objet absent: des sources franciscaines du nominalisme aux défenseurs scotiste de l'opinion de Jean XXII sur la vision différée," Studi Medievali ser. 3, 34:2 (1994) 653–715.

[S. MENACHE]

JOHN XXIII, POPE, BL.

Pontificate, Oct. 28, 1958, to June 3, 1963; Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli, b. Sotto il Monte, Bergamo, Italy, Nov. 25, 1881; d. Rome, Italy, June 3, 1963.

Prepapal Career

He was the third of 13 children, the first son, of pious peasants, Giovanni Battista and Marianna Giulia (Mazzola) Roncalli, who rented land as sharecroppers (mezzadri). Besides working in the fields, Angelo attended the elementary school in the town, took lessons from a priest in the neighboring town of Carvico, went to a “college” in Celana, and at 12 entered the diocesan minor seminary at Bergamo. There he came under the influence of the progressive leaders of the Italian Catholic social movement, especially of Bp. Camillo Guindani of Bergamo and two zealous laymen, Count Stanislao Medolago-Albani and Niccolò Rezzara. A scholarship of the Cerasoli Foundation in 1901 enabled Roncalli to become a student at the Roman Seminary (Apollinare), where Umberto Benigni deepened his knowledge of church history. He interrupted his education for a year to serve as a volunteer in the 73d Infantry Regiment of the Italian Army, thereby shortening the period of compulsory military training. After taking the doctorate in theology, he was ordained on Aug. 10, 1904, in the church of S. Maria in Monte Santo.

Early Priesthood. As he was beginning graduate studies in Canon Law, he was appointed secretary of the new bishop of Bergamo, Count Giacomo Radini-Tedeschi, a far-sighted, social-minded prelate, whom Roncalli served faithfully for more than nine years, gaining experience in all forms of Catholic action and an understanding of the problems of the working class. At the same time he taught apologetics and ecclesiastical history, and later also patrology, at the diocesan seminary. In that era of violent reaction against MODERNISM he was falsely accused of such errors by some integralists; actually, in his teaching he tended to avoid controversial questions. He published several brief monographs—one in commemoration of the great Church historian Baronius, Il card. Cesare Baronio, per il centenario della sua morte (Monza 1908; repub. Rome 1961), and two on local history, Gli inizi del seminario di Bergamo e S. Carlo Borromeo (1910; rev. Bergamo 1939) and La ‘Misericordia Maggiore’ di Bergamo e le altre istituzioni di beneficenza amministrate dalla Congregazione di Carità (Bergamo 1912). As diocesan assistant to the Women’s Catholic Action and a member of various diocesan committees, he became concerned also in political problems and favored Catholic involvement in national affairs.

In 1915, when Italy entered World War I, Roncalli was recalled to the army and was assigned to military hospitals in Bergamo first as a sergeant in the medical corps and then as a lieutenant in the chaplains’ corps; he also ministered to the soldiers on the battlefields of the Piave and to the sick during the epidemic of Spanish influenza. In his leisure time he wrote In Memoria di Monsignore Giacomo Radini-Tedeschi, vescovo di Bergamo (Bergamo 1916), a laudatory and cautious biography. After the war he resumed the duties of spiritual adviser to the Union of Catholic Women and the Union of Catholic Youth, was appointed spiritual director of the diocesan seminary, and at his own expense, opened a hostel and clubhouse for young men studying in Bergamo (Casa dello Studente). At the request of Bp. Luigi Marelli, he established the Opera di Sant’Alessandro to coordinate the various educational activities of the diocese.

Pope John XXIII. (©Bettmann/CORBIS.)

In 1920 he helped to organize the first national Eucharistic Congress to be held in Italy after the war. A year later he was invited to Rome by Benedict XV, named director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in Italy, and given the task of centralizing the administration of the society first on the national level and then on the international. He collaborated in the writing of the motu proprio Romanorum Pontificum (May 3, 1922) by which Pius XI raised the society to papal status, transferred its headquarters from Lyons to Rome, and placed it under the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH. Roncalli was a member of the General High Council, which coordinated the work of this association with that of other bodies supporting the missions.

Diplomat in the Near East. In 1925 Roncalli was appointed titular archbishop of Areopolis and apostolic visitor to Bulgaria and was consecrated on March 19 in the church of SS. Ambrose and Charles (San Carlo al Corso) in Rome. Accompanied by a Belgian Benedictine, Constantine Bosschaerts, he promptly took up residence in the politically troubled capital, Sofia, and concerned himself with the problems of the Eastern-rite Catholics, who constituted a small, scattered minority of about 4,000 among the predominantly Orthodox population. He visited the remote and impoverished communities of refugees from Macedonia and Thrace and selected a young native priest, Kyril Kurteff, as apostolic administrator (later exarch). He had fewer anxieties over the 40,000 Catholics of the Latin rite, who were better organized but were unfortunately dependent on the political and ecclesiastical support of France. He introduced retreats for isolated priests, presided over the first congress of Bulgarian Catholics at Yambol, and personally assisted the victims of the earthquake of 1928 with money from Rome. Since the state church was Orthodox, he was watched with suspicion by its ecclesiastical leaders. When the king or czar, Boris III, contrary to his promises, had his marriage with Giovanna di Savoia, Catholic daughter of King Victor Emmanuel III of Italy, repeated according to the Orthodox rite in 1930 and had their first child baptized by the Orthodox metropolitan in 1933, Roncalli protested to no avail. He was successful, however, in securing the government's consent to the establishment of an apostolic delegation in 1931.

On Nov. 24, 1934, Roncalli was named apostolic delegate to Turkey and Greece, and on the 30th he was transferred from the titular see of Areopolis to that of Mesembria (in Bulgaria). He succeeded in closing the breach that existed between the delegation and the local clergy of the Latin rite. As administrator of the Vicariate Apostolic of ISTANBUL, Roncalli had immediate jurisdiction over the approximately 10,000 Catholics of the Latin rite, who were for the most part foreigners and were decreasing in number. Amid trying circumstances he fostered harmony among the different national colonies in the city. Not only was his presence as apostolic delegate officially ignored and barely tolerated by the Turkish government, but he had to contend with the antireligious reforms of Kemal Atatürk's secular and nationalistic republic and to witness the closing of many Catholic schools, the cessation of Catholic publications, and the laying aside of clerical garb and religious habits in public. With characteristic optimism he took a benevolent view of the new constitution and tried to demonstrate to the Turkish rulers the purely spiritual and supranational nature of the Church's activity. To show his respect for the government and people of Turkey, he introduced the use of the Turkish language into divine worship and official documents. Eventually he won the personal esteem of some of the highest Turkish statesmen. One of his many conciliatory gestures toward the Orthodox was the visit that he paid to the Ecumenical Patriarch Benjamin, in the Phanar on May 27, 1939; he was courteously received.

During World War II, when Istanbul became a center of international espionage and intrigue, Roncalli provided the Holy See with much valuable information that he obtained from diplomats as well as public sources. Among the former he cultivated a useful friendship with the German ambassador to Turkey Franz von Papen, who was a Catholic. He made every effort to pacify the French of his flock, who bitterly resented Italian participation in the disastrous war against their fatherland, and he helped many persecuted Jews fleeing from central and eastern Europe.

In Greece, where he was confronted with the confusion existing among the 50,000 Catholics of the country, he eventually succeeded in bringing about greater unity of action among the bishops of the Latin, BYZANTINE, and ARMENIAN CHURCHES. He was never able, however, to achieve the desired modus vivendi with the Greek government, which, under the pressure of the Orthodox churchmen, enacted anti-Catholic legislation concerning marriages, conversions, and publications, and obstructed his efforts to found a seminary for Latin Catholics. During the war he was impeded in his relations with the Greeks by having the same nationality as the army of occupation, but he kept aloof from political disputes and tried to act as a mediator between the opposing parties. He aided the starving regardless of their religion, and he went to Rome to urge the Holy See to persuade the British to relax the blockade of Greek ports in order that desperately needed food supplies and medicines might be imported. Upon his return he negotiated with the representatives of the Axis for the required guarantees; he also intervened frequently to prevent or repair injustices. He visited both the occupying and the captured troops, and he set up in Istanbul an office for the location of prisoners of war and missing persons. After August 1942, he was unable to maintain further contact with the Catholics of Greece because of the military operations.

Nuncio in Paris. Meanwhile in France Charles de Gaulle's provisional government at Paris requested the Holy See to recall the nuncio Valerio Valeri, who had been accredited to Henri Pétain's government at Vichy. Pius XII chose Roncalli for the difficult post, and the nuncio, appointed on Nov. 22, 1944, arrived in Paris on December 30. Unobtrusively he labored to repair the spiritual divisions that had been embittered by the war and its consequences. When the leaders of the Resistance accused at least half of the French bishops of collaboration with the Nazis and when the government called for the removal of 33, the nuncio investigated and in the end advised only three bishops to resign. He also obtained the government's consent to 27 episcopal nominations within his first three years, and in 1945 he successfully recommended to the pope three archbishops for the cardinalate.

He pleaded for the humane treatment and prompt repatriation of the German prisoners of war who were detained in France for several years, and he arranged for the transfer of several hundred theological students among them to one camp at Le Caudrey (near Chartres), where their preparation for the priesthood could be continued.

Throughout the continual succession of unstable governments that followed De Gaulle's withdrawal from public life, Roncalli remained on friendly terms with whatever politicians came to power. He won the admiration of the Socialist Vincent Auriol, president of the Republic, and of the radical Édouard Herriot, president of the National Assembly, and he enjoyed the confidence of Catholics such as Georges Bidault and Robert Schuman; but he never attempted to become intimate with the members of the Mouvement Républicain Populaire. When the government grant to private schools, begun under the Vichy régime, was suspended in 1945, he cooperated with the French episcopate in presenting the Church's claim to a fair share of the funds; eventually (1951) his efforts were rewarded to some extent by the concession of a small annual subsidy for each pupil. To his regular duties, he added those of first permanent observer of the Holy See at the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) for 19 months, and he addressed the sixth and seventh general assemblies in 1951 and 1952.

Roncalli traveled widely, made a pilgrimage to LOURDES almost every year, and in 1950 made a journey to Algeria and other parts of North Africa. In his dealings with the French bishops, he was not hasty in judging new experiments in the apostolate and he was tolerant of discussion in the intellectual sphere and patient with innovations in the pastoral ministry. Thus he viewed Cardinal Emanuel SUHARD'S novel plan to evangelize the dechristianized masses (Mission de France) hopefully, and he attentively observed the activities of the WORKER-PRIESTS among the proletariat; this movement was severely restricted by the Holy See several months after his final departure from France. After he became pope, it was completely suppressed by a decree of the Holy Office dated July 3, 1959.

Patriarch of Venice. Roncalli was made a cardinal priest (Jan. 12, 1953), and given the titular church of Santa Prisca on the Aventine. He received the red biretta (and the grand cross of the Legion of Honor) from President Auriol in the Elysée Palace on January 15. Although he had at first been destined for a position in the Roman CURIA, he was offered the patriarchate of VENICE after the death of the incumbent, and he gladly accepted. Appointed on January 15, he arrived in the city on March 15, where he soon won the affection of his clergy and people.

During his five years in Venice, he wrote brief, frequent circular letters on topics of current importance; visited all the parishes and showed his concern for the working class; established 30 new parishes and built a new minor seminary; and developed various forms of Catholic action. Concerned about moral laxity in the city, he prevented the projected transfer of the gambling casino from the Lido to the center of town, and he forbade the clergy to visit the biennial festival of art in 1954 because of some improper pictures exhibited there; two years later he was able to revoke the prohibition and even to attend the exhibition himself. As president of the Tri-Venetian Episcopal Conference, he compelled the left-wing faction of the Christian Democrats to suspend publication of their weekly, Il Popolo Veneto; in a letter dated Christmas 1955, the Episcopal Conference denounced the proposed "opening to the Left." On Aug. 16, 1956, Roncalli issued a pastoral letter in which he rebuked those who persisted in advocating this policy at any cost. Nevertheless when the Italian Socialist party held its national convention at Venice in February 1957, he exhorted his flock to welcome the delegates, who appeared to him to desire to promote the ideals of social peace and justice; some of the right-wing Christian Democrats then protested his action. In 1958 he completed the fifth and last volume of Gli Atti della Visita Apostolica di S. Carlo Borromeo a Bergamo (1575), the collection of historical documents that he had been editing since 1909 (with the collaboration of a Bergamask priest, Pietro Forno, for v.1 and 2) and had published at intervals (Florence, 1936, 1937, 1938, 1946, 1958) in the series "Fontes Ambrosiani."

Pontificate

After PIUS XII'S death (Oct. 9, 1958), Roncalli was summoned to the conclave, which opened October 25 and was attended by 51 cardinals (of whom 17 were Italian); Roncalli was elected on October 28 and crowned on November 4. He kept as his private secretary Loris Capovilla, who had served him in that capacity at Venice, and he appointed Domenico TARDINI pro-secretary (soon cardinal secretary) of state; this office had been vacant since 1944. After Tardini died on July 30, 1961, the pope appointed Cardinal Amleto Cicognani his successor. With only 52 members in the College of Cardinals, including 12 more than 80 years old, Pope John held his first consistory on Dec. 15, 1958, at which, annulling in part the regulation of Sixtus V (1586) and Canon 231 of the Code of Canon Law by which a maximum of 70 members was fixed, he created 23 new cardinals. In the second consistory (Dec. 14, 1959) he added eight more; the third (March 28, 1960) announced the elevation of ten prelates, of whom seven were named and three were reserved in pectore. In the fourth consistory (Jan. 16, 1961), four new cardinals were created, and in the last (March 19, 1962), ten. The total was then the highest in history—87 (plus the three never revealed)—and the representation the most international.

In another consistory (Jan. 25, 1959) the pope proposed to the cardinals three major undertakings: a diocesan synod for Rome, an ecumenical council for the universal Church, and a revision of the Code of CANON LAW (preceded by the promulgation of the Code of Oriental Law). The synod, the first in the history of Rome, was solemnly opened by the pope in the Basilica of St. John Lateran on Jan. 24, 1960; he addressed it at St. Peter's on the following three days and closed it there on January 31. Its decrees, promulgated by the apostolic constitution Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum, were designed to remedy the ills of the Church in a city that had grown from 400,000 inhabitants in 1900 to more than two million in 1960 and that had only 220 secular and 360 religious priests.

Vatican Council II. The ecumenical council, which he decided to call the Second Vatican Council, is undoubtedly the major achievement of John's pontificate, although it was not completed before his death (see VATICAN COUNCIL II). Attributing the idea of convoking such an assembly to a sudden inspiration from the Holy Ghost, he prescribed as its immediate task the renewal of the religious life of Catholics and the bringing up to date of the teaching, discipline, and organization of the Church, with the ultimate goal being the unity of Christians. At the solemn opening of the council on Oct. 11, 1962, he delivered a memorable discourse, and on the next two days he received the members of the 86 extraordinary missions sent by governments and international bodies and the 39 non-Catholic observers and guests who had accepted invitations to the council. Although he did not attend the general congregations or normally interfere with the deliberations, he intervened on November 21 at a critical point by deciding that the schema on revelation, which had been rejected on the preceding day by somewhat less than the required majority of two-thirds, should not be discussed further but should be revised by a special mixed commission. This encouraged the majority who were in favor of change; hence it was a turning point in the first session. He closed the first period of the council on December 8 with an allocution in which he announced the creation of a new commission, charged with following and directing the conciliar activities during the nine-month recess. On Jan. 6, 1963, he sent to each father of the council a letter, Mirabilis ille, in which he gave directives for the continuation of the work during the interval and recommended local collaboration.

Law and Liturgy. John took the first step toward revision of the Code of Canon Law by announcing the creation of a pontifical commission on March 28, 1963. Earlier modifications of ecclesiastical law had been introduced by his motu proprio Suburbicariis sedibus (April 11, 1962), removing all power of jurisdiction over the SUBURBICARIAN sees from the cardinal bishops who bear their tides and entrusting the government of these dioceses to the bishops of the place; thus he freed the cardinals of distracting responsibilities and enabled them to devote their undivided attention to curial affairs. Four days later by the motu proprio Cum gravissima he decreed that the episcopal dignity would henceforth be conferred on all cardinals, regardless of their rank within the College. Moreover, by the motu proprio Summi Pontificis electio (Sept. 5, 1962) he modified Pius XII's dispositions regarding the vacancy of the Holy See. He also made the patriarchs of the Eastern churches who were not cardinals adjunct members of the Congregation for the ORIENTAL CHURCH. Finally, he added another office to the Roman Curia by elevating to that rank, by the motu proprio Boni Pastoris (Feb. 22, 1959), the papal commission for cinema, radio, and television; he laid down new rules for its functioning and put Abp. Martin J. O'Connor, rector of the NORTH AMERICAN COLLEGE in Rome, at its head.

John manifested his determination to enhance the sacred liturgy by the motu proprio Rubricarum instructum (July 25, 1960), approving a new code of rubrics for the Breviary and Missal. He also permitted the distribution of Holy Communion to the sick in the afternoon (Oct. 21, 1961). Several times he warned against exaggerations and excesses in the worship of the saints. He chose the schema on the liturgy as the first topic to be treated by Vatican Council II, and he ordered that the name of St. Joseph be inserted in the Canon of the Mass after that of the Blessed Virgin Mary (Nov. 13, 1962). Finally, in response to the direct appeal of the Greek Melkite patriarch Maximos IV Sayegh, he rescinded (April 5, 1960) the decision of the Holy Office forbidding the use of the vernacular in the Byzantine rite (specifically, the use of English in Birmingham, Alabama).

Encyclical Letters. John issued seven encyclical letters: Ad Petri cathedram (June 29, 1959), treating the triple theme of truth, unity, and peace, which are to be acquired and developed under the inspiration of charity; Sacerdotii Nostri primordia (July 31, 1959) on the centenary of the death of St. Jean Marie Baptiste VIANNEY, Curé d'Ars, with regard to all aspects of the contemporary life of priests; Princeps Pastorum (Nov. 28, 1959) on the 40th anniversary of the apostolic letter Maximum illud on the missions (development of a native hierarchy and clergy, collaboration of other countries, education of the clergy, apostolate of the laity, etc.); MATER ET MAGISTRA (dated May 15, 1961, pub. July 15) on recent developments of the social question in the light of Christian doctrine; Aeterna Dei (Nov. 11, 1961) on the 15th centenary of the death of St. Leo the Great; Paenitentiam agere (July 1, 1962) on the necessity of penance to ensure the success of Vatican Council II; and PACEM IN TERRIS (April 11, 1963), addressed to all men of good will, on peace among all nations based on truth, justice, charity, and liberty and on the right organization of society for the attainment of this end. He also issued an encyclical epistle, Grata recordatio (Sept. 29, 1959), on the recitation of the rosary.

Canonizations. John canonized the following saints: Carlo da Sezze and Joaquina de VEDRUNA Y DE MAS (April 12, 1959), Gregory BARBARIGO (May 26, 1960), Juan de Ribera (June 12, 1960), Maria Bertilla BOSCARDIN (May 11, 1961), Martin de PORRES (May 6, 1962), Pierre Julien EYMARD, Antonio Maria Pucci, and FRANCESCO MARIA OF CAMPOROSSO (Dec. 9, 1962), and Vincent PALLOTTI (Jan. 20, 1963). He declared the following to be blessed: Elena GUERRA (April 26, 1959), Marguerite d' Youville (May 3, 1959), Innocenzo of Berzo (Nov. 12, 1961), Elizabeth SETON (March 17, 1963), and Luigi Maria Palazzolo (March 19, 1963). He also declared St. LAWRENCE OF BRINDISI to be a doctor of the Church (March 19, 1959).

Ecumenism and Diplomacy. During John's pontificate notable advances were made in ecumenical relations (see ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT). Catholic theologians conferred with the Orthodox at Rhodes in August 1959, when the executive committee of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES met there. The Secretariat for Promoting CHRISTIAN UNITY was instituted by the motu proprio Superno Dei nutu (June 5, 1960) and Cardinal A. Bea was appointed president. Two papal envoys were sent to the patriarch of Constantinople, Athanagoras, on June 27, 1961. For the first time the Catholic Church was represented at an assembly of the World Council of Churches, when in November 1961 five official observers designated by Bea's secretariat went to New Delhi. In consideration of the Jews the pope commanded that the epithets "perfidis (Judaeis)" and "(judaicam) perfidiam" in the Roman liturgy of Good Friday be deleted.

During his pontificate a very large number of statesmen were received in audience. The pope's visit to Pres. Antonio Segni (May 11, 1963) was the first made by a pope to the Quirinal since the establishment of the Republic of ITALY. Secret negotiations with the Soviet Union resulted in the release of Josyf Slipyi, Ukrainian metropolitan of Lvov, who had been confined in Siberia and who arrived in Rome on Feb. 9, 1963. Attempts to procure the liberation of other Catholic prelates imprisoned behind the Iron Curtain, especially Cardinal József Mindszenty, archbishop of Esztergom, ended in failure. John's efforts for world peace included an appeal to the heads of the governments involved (Sept. 10, 1961) when international tension was rapidly mounting over the Berlin Crisis; he appealed to the French and to the revolutionaries on June 3, 1962, during the civil war in Algeria; and he appealed again to the rulers of the most powerful countries on Oct. 25, 1962, begging them to continue to treat with each other in regard to Cuba. The International Balzan Foundation awarded him its Peace Prize for 1962; the four Soviet members of the foundation's general council concurred in this decision, and Nikita Khrushchev approved of their action.

Other Accomplishments. As bishop of Rome, John XXIII displayed unremitting care of his diocese; he made frequent appearances in the parishes, hospitals, and educational and charitable institutions of the city. He also traveled farther than any pope since Pius IX, going by automobile to the summer villa of the Roman Seminary at Rocantica (Sept. 10, 1960) and by train to Loreto and Assisi (Oct. 4, 1962) to pray for the forthcoming ecumenical council. To improve the education of candidates for the priesthood, he elevated the Lateran Athenaeum to the status of a pontifical university on May 17, 1959; on March 7, 1963, he did the same for the Athenaeum Angelicum, now known as the Pontifical University of St. Thomas Aquinas. In order to promote the study of Latin among seminarians and other students, he issued the apostolic constitution Veterum sapientia (Feb. 22, 1962). He sought means to strengthen the Church in Latin America and frequently expressed his concern for the "Church of Silence" in eastern Europe and eastern Asia. He also fostered the growth of the missions; besides writing the encyclical Princeps Pastorum, he consecrated 14 bishops for Africa, Asia, and Oceania in St. Peter's on May 8, 1960, and 14 more on May 21, 1961.

Pope John appeared in public for the last time at his window in the Vatican on May 22, 1963. Shortly thereafter he began to succumb to a gastric cancer from which he had suffered for about a year. Having endured a prolonged agony, he died on June 3 (Pentecost Monday). As the world mourned, his body was buried in a simple tomb in the crypt of St. Peter's. On Nov. 18, 1965, Paul VI announced initiation of procedures looking to the beatification and ultimate canonization of his two immediate predecessors, John XXIII and Pius XII.

Character. A man of evangelical simplicity and unaffected humility, John XXIII was never ashamed of his lowly origins and always remained closely attached to his native soil and his rustic family. His diary, Journey of a Soul [tr. by D. White (New York 1965)], published posthumously, reveals a profound interior life and an unwavering trust in Divine Providence. One of his favorite apothegms was Voluntas Dei, pax nostra. He was a highly cultured man, versed in history, archeology, and architecture, fond of literature (especially Manzoni), art, and music; he could speak French, Bulgarian, Russian, Turkish, and modern Greek, in addition to Italian and Latin. Gifted with an agreeable disposition and a ready wit, he was characteristically open and affable, understanding and compassionate, jovial and calm, familiar in audiences, hospitable, and a lively conversationalist.

Throughout his life he valued the care of souls above any other occupation. He disliked the bureaucracy of the Roman Curia, demythologized the papacy, and diminished the cult of the pontifical personality. He allowed as much freedom of thought and action as possible to others and recognized the limitations of his own knowledge and ability. He perceived the need of reform and his pontificate is regarded as a turning point in the history of the Catholic Church. Considered by some, because of his advanced age and ambiguous reputation at the time of his election, to be merely a transitional pontiff, John XXIII instead initiated a new age. As part of the Jubilee Year 2000 events, he was beatified by Pope John Paul II on September 3 together with Pope Pius IX.

Bibliography: Scritti e discorsi, 1953–1958, 4 v. (Rome 1959–62); Discorsi, messaggi, colloqui del Santo Padre Giovanni XXIII, 5 v. (Vatican City 1961–64). Souvenirs d'un nonce: Cahiers de France, 1944–1953 (Paris 1963); Encyclicals of Pope John XXIII (Washington 1965). Acta et documenta Concilio oecumenico Vaticano II apparando, ser.2, v.1 Acta summi pontificis Ioannis XXIII (Vatican City 1964). Wit and Wisdom of Good Pope John, comp. H. FESQUET, tr. S. ATTANASIO (New York 1964). U. GROPPi and J. S. LOMBARDI, Above All a Shepherd: Pope John XXIII (New York 1959). A. LAZZARINI, Pope John XXIII, tr. M. HATWELL (New York 1959). F. X. MURPHY, John XXIII Comes to the Vatican (New York 1959). R. ROUQUETTE, "Le Mystère Roncalli," Études 318 (1963) 4–18, Eng. tr. Catholic Mind 62 (Apr. 1964) 4–12. E. E. HATES, Pope John and His Revolution (London 1965). V. BRANCA and S. ROSSO-MAZZINGHI, ed. Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli: dal patriarcato di Venezia alla cattedra di San Pietro (Florence 1984). G. ALBERIGO, ed. Giovanni XXIII: transizione del papato e della Chiesa (Rome 1988). P. HEBBLETHWAITE, Pope John XXIII, Shepherd of the Modern World (Garden City, NY 1985).

[R. TRISCO]

JOHN XXIII, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate (Pisan obedience): May 17, 1410 to May 29, 1415. Born Baldassare Cossa into an impoverished family of Neapolitan aristocrats (ca. 1370), he died in Florence on either June 23, 1419 or (see Esch) on December 27. There are few reliable facts concerning Cossa's early life, though there is a tradition that he left a military career in favor of church service. He studied canon law at Bologna and entered the papal curia of Boniface IX (1389–1404). Cossa became archdeacon of Bologna in 1396, and in 1402 Boniface named him cardinal deacon of St. Eustachio and appointed him legate to Bologna and Romagna. From 1403 to 1408 he lived in Bologna, where his administrative and financial abilities brought that region of Italy back under the control of the Papal States. During the Great SCHISM, Cossa was one of the cardinals who broke with GREGORY XII (1406–15) in May 1408, when the latter showed that he had no intention of ending the Schism (Gregory named four new cardinals, thus signaling his desire to continue his line of the papacy). Cossa went to Pisa where he and most of Gregory's and antipope Benedict XIII's cardinals called for a council to end the Schism. Together with Peter of Candia, he took the leading role in organizing the Council of Pisa and was largely responsible for engineering Peter's election as Antipope Alexander V (1409–10). After Alexander's death in the following year, and in spite of rumors (now largely considered false) that Cossa had poisoned him, the Pisan cardinals met at Bologna and unanimously elected Cossa to be Alexander's successor. He took the name John XXIII.

John's election did little to change the nature of the Schism; there were still three active claimants to the papacy: John, Benedict XIII (1394–1417), and Gregory XII. While John had by far the widest political support (England, France, and many Italian and German states), he was still politically vulnerable, especially in Italy. He had also acquired the reputation of being a worldly, unscrupulous, and ambitious man of questionable moral character (he was considered tyrannical as papal legate in Bologna, and was rumored to have had numerous romantic liaisons). In Italy, King Ladislaus of Durazzo-Naples (1386–1414) continued to press his claim to much of the Papal States, and John depended on Louis II of Anjou for protection. After Louis defeated Ladislaus at Roccasecca (May 19, 1411), John entered Rome on April 12, 1411. Here John called a council (April 29, 1412–March 1413), ostensibly to continue church reform, but it only managed to condemn (Feb. 10, 1413) the writings of the English reformer John Wycliff (ca. 1325–84). John also created several new cardinals, among whom were Francisco Zarabella, Pierre d'Ailly, Guillaume Fillastre, and Robert Hallam. In August 1412, John excommunicated the Bohemian reformer Jan Hus (ca. 1369–1415) because he was preaching against the antipope's pseudo-crusade against Ladislaus (John granted indulgences to all who contributed money to the cause).

Soon John was forced to come to terms with Ladislaus because his protector, Louis of Anjou, had returned to France. For a brief time the two were allies, but in May 1413 Ladislaus again attacked Rome, and John had to flee with his cardinals. They went to Florence, where John asked for the support of the German king Sigismund (1410–37; emp. 1433). Sigismund saw this appeal as an opportunity to hold a general council and to end the schism. In exchange for his support, Sigismund forced John to call a council in the king's territory. On Dec. 9, 1413 John issued a bull convoking a council to be held at Constance in November the following year. In spite of Ladislaus' death on Aug. 6, 1414, John was compelled by his cardinals to travel to Constance, where he opened the council on Nov. 5, 1414.

John hoped that as pope he could dominate the proceedings and convince the council to ratify the decisions made at the Council of Pisa, thus eliminating BENEDICT XIII and GREGORY VII, and leaving John as legitimate pope. But his hopes came to naught in February and early March 1415, when the Germans, English, and French insisted that all three rival popes should abdicate. During the night of March 20 John fled Constance for Schaffhausen, in Duke Frederick of Austria's territory. Soon Sigismund declared war against the duke, and John was compelled to flee again, this time to Burgundy. But the Duke of Burgundy refused him safe conduct, and John had to retire to Freiburg instead (April 29, 1415). These actions further inflamed opposition to him at the council, and he was formally deposed in the 12th session (May 29, 1415).

In the meantime, Sigismund had captured Freiburg and brought John back to the council. Here he officially ratified the council's decisions, declared them infallible, and renounced his right to the papacy. Again known as Baldassare Cossa, he remained in captivity for three years. Sigismund handed him over to Louis III of Bavaria (a well-known enemy of Cossa), who kept him as a prisoner in Rudolfzell, Gottleiben, Heidelberg, and Mannheim until well after Dec. 28, 1417, the time that the council had decreed his release. He was set free sometime in 1418. Cossa then went to Florence and formally submitted to the council's pope, MARTIN V (1417–31). On June 23, 1419 Martin appointed Cossa cardinal bishop of Tusculum-Frascati, but he died six months later. Cossa's magnificent tomb, which displays the papal crest, is in the baptistery at Florence. It was commissioned by Cosimo de Medici and includes work by Bartolomeo di Michelozzo and Donatello.

JOHN XXIII is generally considered one of the more worldly and opportunistic popes of the Great Schism. He showed little concern for spiritual matters, and some of his actions, particularly during his battles with Ladislaus and the Council of Constance, support this judgment. But John's deep involvement in the political, administrative, and financial aspects of ecclesiastical life often led to a positive outcome for the papal court. His policies concerning the Papal States were surprisingly effective; and, given the circumstances of Italian politics, it is difficult to see how he could have more circumspectly protected his interests in Rome or solidified control of the Papal States. Furthermore, the circumstances of his deposition raise a difficult question: can a council suspend and depose the pope under whose authority it has been convened if he is unwilling? For these reasons and others, current scholarship is mitigating some of the negative interpretations of John XXIII's reign.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2:507–20, 543–45, 554–55. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Florence and Venice 1759–98; repr. Graz 1960–61) 27:506–715. Acta concilii Constanciensis, ed. H. FINKE and J. HOLLENSTEINER (Münster 1986–28). DIETRICH OF NIEHEIM, De schismate libri tres, ed. G. ERLER (Leipzig 1890); and De vita ac factis constanciensibus Johannis Papae XXIII, in Magnum oecumenicum Constanciense Concilium, ed. H. VON DER HART (Frankfurt 1697–1742) 2:335–459. B. PLATINA, De vita Christi ac omnium pontificum 213 (208) ed. G. GAIDA, in Rerum italicarum scriptores 3:1, ed. L. A. MURATORI (Città di Castello and Bologna 1913–32) 304–12. C. J. VON HEFELE and H. LECLERCQ, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) v. 7. J. BLUMENTHAL, "Johan XXIII: seine Wahl un seine Persönlichkeit," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 21 (1901) 488–516. E. J. KITTS, In the Days of the Councils (London 1908); Pope John XXIII and Master John Hus (London 1910; New York 1978). H. G. PETER, Die Informationen Papst Johanns XXIII und dessen Flucht von Konstanz bis Schaffhausen (Freiburg 1926). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts (Munich 1956) 4:241–53. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:995. L. R. LOOMIS, The Council of Constance (New York 1961). H. JEDIN and J. DOLAN, eds. Handbook of Church History (New York 1965–81) 4:448–68. J. SMITH, The Great Schism, 1378: The Disintegration of the Papacy (New York 1970). A. ESCH, "Das Papsttum unter der Herrschaft der Neapolitaner," in Festschrift für Hermann Heimpel, v. 2 (Göttingen 1972) 713–800. L. WALDMÜLLER, "Materialien zur Geschichte John XXIII, 1410–1414," Annuaire historiae conciliorum 7 (1975) 229–237. C. M. D. CROWDER, Unity, Heresy, and Reform: 1378–1460 (London 1977). R. CONDON, A Trembling upon Rome: A Work of Fiction (New York 1983). A. LANDO, Il papa deposto, Pisa 1409 (Torino 1985). J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (Oxford and New York 1986) 237–39 for additional bibliography. W. BRANDMÜLLER, "Infeliciter electus fuit in Papam," in Ecclesia et Regnum: Festschrift F.J. Schmale (Bochum 1989) 309–22. W. BRANDMÜLLER, Das Konzil von Konstanz (Paderborn 1991). For additional bibliography see A. FRENKEN, Lexikon des Mittelalters (Munich 1991) 5:546–47; and Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1997) 26:1171–72.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

JOHN BACONTHORP

Known as Doctor resolutus; b. Baconsthorpe, Norfolk, England, c. 1290; d. London, c. 1348. After joining the order, he studied at the Oxford Whitefriars under Robert Walsingham (d. 1310) and at Paris under Guy Terrena (d. 1342). He lectured on the Sentences (ed. Lyons 1484) and became a master in theology at Paris before Whitsun 1323. As regent master he delivered Quodlibeta 1–2 at the University of Paris and Quodlibeta 3 at the Carmelite school in 1330. He was lecturer in Cambridge by 1330. Between 1327 and 1333 he was provincial of the order in England.

Agostino NIFO called Baconthorp princeps Averroistarum. But in fact he accepted none of the heterodox teachings of AVERROËS, such as the eternity of the world or the unicity of the intellect. To him Averroës was “the worst of heretics.” However, Baconthorp was an outstanding commentator on Aristotle and Averroës; his interpretations of Averroës, which were more benign than those of Thomas Aquinas, were highly valued by the Averroists of the Renaissance.

Baconthorp denied the real distinction between the soul and its powers, as well as that between active and passive intellects, insisting that these are but two aspects of the same power. In explaining knowledge he eliminated intelligible species as useless and absurd. For him, the essence of a material substance is intelligible in itself; it does not need an agent intellect to render it actually intelligible. Rejecting many doctrines of St. Thomas, he adopted positions widely held in his day. For him, essence and existence are really distinct, not as different things, but as different modes of being; essence corresponds to potential being, and existence to actual being. In theology Baconthorp was an ardent advocate of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION promulgated by DUNS SCOTUS and the Franciscans. He defended the attempt of THOMAS BRADWARDINE to reconcile human freedom with divine sovereignty and the primacy of divine causality. An outstanding theologian and philosopher, he exercised great influence on the Carmelite school up to the 17th century.

His commentaries on Aristotle’s Metaphysics, De anima, and Ethics are no longer extant. He also wrote commentaries on Matthew and Paul; on Augustine’s De Trinitate and De civitate Dei; on Anselm’s De incarnatione Verbi and Cur Deus homo; and various Opuscula. His three Quodlibeta were printed in Venice, 1527.

Bibliography: B. M. XIBERTA Y ROQUETA, De scriptoribus scholasticis saeculi XIV ex ordine Carmelitarum (Louvain 1931) 167–240. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:88–89. A. DI S. PAOLO, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 6:87–90. É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955).

[A. MAURER]

JOHN BAPTIST OF THE CONCEPTION, ST.

Trinitarian reformer, writer, mystic; b. Almadóvar del Campo, Spain, July 10, 1561; d. Córdoba, Feb. 14, 1613. Juan García early evidenced remarkable spirituality and love for recollection. He studied philosophy with the Discalced Carmelites at Almadóvar and theology at the Universities of Baeza and Toledo. He entered the Trinitarian Order in 1580. Admired for outstanding virtue, mortification, and prayerfulness, he was professed (1581) and made official preacher at La Guardia and Seville.

When the general chapter approved the establishment of houses for the primitive observance of John de Matha (1594), John Baptist was made superior at Valdepeñas. His sanctity, self-effacement, and love for God enabled him to overcome opposition to his “reform” as foretold by St. TESESA OF AVILA. He thought of his work as a restoration rather than reform, adding the use of sandals and other austerities to the original rule. A prolific writer, he wrote on all phases of theology, but with special emphasis on mysticism; his works fill nine volumes. Winning the support of Pope CLEMENT VIII (1599), King PHILIP III, and others, he established 19 houses of the Discalced friars before his death. His Discalced Trinitarians today form the surviving branch of the Trinitarian Friars founded by JOHN OF MATHA (1213) and FELIX OF VALOIS (1198). He was beatified by PIUS VII in 1819 and canonized by Paul VI on May 25, 1975.

Feast: Feb. 14.

Bibliography: ANTONINO DE LA ASUNCIÓN, Diccionario de escritores trinitarios (Rome 1899) 1:182ff. JUAN DEL SAGRADO CORAZÓN, Santo y Reformador (Córdoba 1959). P. MEDRANO HERRERO, San Juan Bautista de la Concepción, escritor (Ciudad Real, Spain 1994); Valores literarios de San Juan Bautista de la Concepción (Ponce, P.R. 1994). J. PUJANA, Trinidad y experiencia mística en San Juan Bautista de la Concepción (Salamanca 1983); San Juan Bautista de la Concepción: Carisma y misión (Madrid 1994). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:339–340.

[P. M. DONOVAN]

JOHN BASSANDUS, BL.

Religious reformer and diplomat; b. Besançon, France, 1360; d. in the monastery of Collemaggio, near Aquila, Italy, Aug. 26, 1445. He entered the Augustinian monastery in Besançon in 1378, joined the CELESTINES in Paris in 1390, and was sent to found a monastery in Amiens, where he was spiritual director of St. COLETTE. He was prior in Paris and provincial of France five times from 1411 to 1441, traveling in Italy, Spain, and England for the visitation of Celestine houses. Charles VII of France sent him on an unsuccessful mission to persuade AMADEUS OF SAVOY (antipope Felix V) to resign his claims to the tiara. Jean GERSON, his friend, dedicated his De susceptione humanitatis Christi to him. In 1443, Eugene IV called on him to reform Collemaggio. St. JOHN CAPISTRAN gave his funeral oration, and his third successor at Collemaggio wrote his vita (Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 5:870–892). His relics are in Aquila.

Feast: Aug. 26.

Bibliography: B. HEURTEBIZE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 6:1263–64.

[J. PÉREZ DE URBEL]

JOHN BENINCASA, BL.

Servite hermit; b. Florence, Italy, 1376; d. Monticelli, Italy, May 9, 1426. He entered the SERVITES at Montepulciano while still very young and at the age of 25 was permitted to embrace the life of a hermit on Mount Montagnata, near Siena, and later in a cave near Monticelli. The local population had great admiration for the rigorous asceticism he practiced in his lonely retreat, and they often sought him out for spiritual advice. His death was reputed to have been announced by the spontaneous ringing of the local church bells. He was buried at Monticelli, and his cult was approved on Dec. 19, 1829. Although he has the same family name, he is not related to (St.) Catherine of Siena.

Feast: May 11.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, May 7:651–652. L. RAFFAELLI, Vita breve del beato Giovanni Benincasa da Firenze (Rome 1927). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:275.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

JOHN BLUND

English philosopher and theologian; b. c. 1180; d. 1248 (place unknown). Blund studied and taught the arts first at Paris, then at Oxford. He left Oxford at the dispersal of masters and scholars in 1209 and went to Paris for his theological course, becoming master c. 1220. At the great dispersion of the University of Paris in 1229, he returned to England with other English masters and resumed teaching theology at Oxford. On Aug. 26, 1232, he was elected archbishop of Canterbury; but his election was contested and finally annulled by Gregory IX because of his irregularity in holding two benefices with the cure of souls without a dispensation. However, as canon and prebendary of Chichester, and also possessing both benefices, restored to him by papal bull in 1233, he was appointed chancellor of York in 1234.

St. John Baptist of the Conception.

Henry of Avranches claims that Blund was the most distinguished Aristotelian of his day and was the first to lecture on the newly discovered books of ARISTOTLE at Paris and Oxford. Indeed his Tractatus de anima shows his truly vast knowledge of Aristotle; its chief inspiration, however, was AVICENNA. Blund followed Avicenna closely but not blindly, arranging the matter as best suited himself, inserting new elements from other sources, and retaining his full freedom to dissent from his model whenever he had reason to do so. Against Avicenna and the generally accepted view at the time, he firmly maintained that the heavenly bodies are not animate, and so are moved by their natures, not by their souls. With Aristotle, he defined the soul as “the perfection of a body endowed with organs having in it the capacity of life” (De anim. 412a 27–28), following the Greek-Latin version but substituting perfectio for actus and omitting prima. (There was indeed a long tradition coming down from CALCIDIUS for the use of perfectio in the definition of the soul.) Blund’s definition became current in the first quarter of the 13th century (cf., e.g., ROLAND OF CREMONA and WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE). With Avicenna he stressed the substantiality of the soul; and to safeguard its immortality, which he vigorously defended, he upheld its absolute simplicity and spirituality and denied its hylomorphic composition. He taught the unity of soul in one individual. Yet there were other influences at work: Calcidius, BOETHIUS, NEMESIUS OF EMESA, JOHN DAMASCENE, ADELARD OF BATH, and WILLIAM OF CONCHES, and perhaps also the De naturis rerum of his older contemporary ALEXANDER NECKHAM. His chapter on memory is dependent mainly on St. AUGUSTINE, and that on free will on St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY. On the other hand, traces of Blund's influence may easily be detected in Alexander Neckham's latest work, the Speculum speculationum, and in the Summa de creaturis of St. ALBERT THE GREAT. Blund's treatise De anima belongs to a period of transition and reflects the interests and controversies of the time. It is an attempt to join Eastern philosophy with Western thought: a good illustration of the teaching of the faculty of arts in the first decade of the 13th century and a striking example of the penetration of Aristotle and Avicenna into the Paris and Oxford schools.

The Tractatus de anima is extant in three MSS; an edition is in preparation by D. A. CALLUS. The theological writings have not survived.

Bibliography: The Shorter Latin Poems of Master Henry of Avranches Relating to England, ed. J. C. RUSSELL and J. P. HIERONIMUS (Cambridge, Mass. 1935) 127–136. J. C. RUSSELL, Dictionary of Writers of 13th Century England (New York 1936) 56–58. D. A. CALLUS, "Introduction of Aristotelian Learning to Oxford," Proceedings of the British Academy, 29 (1943) 241–252; "The Treatise of John Blund On the Soul" in Autour d'Aristote: Recueil d'études . . . offert à Mgr. A. Mansion, (Louvain 1955) 471–495. O. LOTTIN, Psychologie et morale aux XII et XIII siècles, 6 v. in 8, (Louvain 1942–60) 3:606, 610–617. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1857–59) 1:206.

[D. A. CALLUS]

JOHN BONUS OF MILAN, ST.

Bishop; b. Camogli, Italy, end of sixth century; d. Jan. 2 (3?), 660. John (Giovanni) Camillus the Good was bishop of Milan from 649 until his death. The name Camillus derived from Camogli, where he was born of a noble family; the cognomen Bonus became attached to him in his own time because of his great prudence, magnanimity, and especially his easy friendship with and love of neighbor. He fought strenuously against Monothelism and had a part in the LATERAN COUNCIL of 649. His cult grew only after the discovery and translation of his relics by Bp. Aribert of Milan in the 11th century. His remains are at present in the cathedral of Milan, brought there by Charles BORROMEO in 1582.

Feast: Jan. 10.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan 1:622–623. Analecta Bollandiana 15 (1896) 356–358. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:4354. A. TAMBORINI, I santi milanesi (Milan 1927) 46–51. F. MANTUANO, La leggenda del beato Zannebono da Mantua (Mantua 1971, rep. of 1512 ed.).

[W. A. JURGENS]

JOHN BURIDAN

Philosopher and precursor of modern science; b. probably Bethune, northern France, toward the end of the thirteenth century; d. after 1358. Few definite facts are known about his life. Except for at least one trip to the Papal Curia at Avignon, his entire career was spent at the University of Paris, where, according to HENRY OF KALKAR, he taught for about 50 years. In 1328 he was a master of arts and rector of the university, a post he held again in 1340. In 1342 Pope Clement VI conferred on him a canonry in the church of Arras. In 1348 the bishop of Paris made him chaplain of the church of St. André-des-Arcs. His name headed the list of 22 Parisian masters from Picardy presented to the pope in 1349. He served as a delegate from the "Picard nation," drawing up in 1347 a statute relating to the administration of finances and to the organization of religious offices for that nation, and in 1357 and 1358, reestablishing peace between the "Picard nation" and the "English nation." The last year in which the name of Buridan is mentioned is 1358; possibly he died soon after that date.

Buridan's philosophy is known chiefly through his commentaries. He wrote Quaestiones in artem veterem (on the Isagoge of Porphyry, the Categories, and On Interpretation) and Quaestiones in Analytica priora et posteriora, Quaestiones in Topica, and Quaestiones super libro De elenchis. Under the title of Summa logicae he reshaped the Summulae logicae of Peter of Spain (see JOHN XXI), adapting them to nominalist ideas. His natural philosophy is contained in commentaries and questions on the physical treatises of Aristotle: Physics, De caelo et mundo, De generatione et corruptione, Meteorologica, De anima, Parva naturalia, De motibus animalium, and De physiognomia. He wrote similar elaborations of Aristotle's Metaphysics, Nicomachean Ethics, and Politics. Aside from certain indications of relative chronology, the dates of these treatises cannot be determined. He also wrote minor independent works devoted to particular questions. When the royal order of March 1, 1474, ordering the confiscation of all nominalist books was revoked in 1481, there was a revival of interest in Buridan's views; repeated printings were made of his principal works at the end of the fifteenth century and the beginning of the sixteenth century.

Buridan was a leading figure in the nominalist current of the fourteenth century, although the exact extent of his faithfulness to WILLIAM OF OCKHAM is a matter of debate. In spite of the judgments of censure passed by the university in 1326, 1339, and 1340 against certain nominalist positions, Buridan's authority was not affected. He was prudently careful to disassociate himself from the extreme NOMINALISM of such men as NICHOLAS OF AUTRE-COURT and JOHN OF MIRECOURT. Against Nicholas he defended the principle of causality and its application in proving the existence of God; and he engaged in a polemic with John about the distinction between substance and accidents. Although, like Ockham, he tended to enlarge the field of probable truths at the expense of demonstrable truths and to separate more concisely the domain of faith from that of philosophical thought, he maintained his independence on many points, for example, on the idea of science, supposito, local motion, and time. In the doctrine of the will, he professed an intellectual determinism: the choice between two goods is inevitably determined by the one that is superior to the other; freedom consists only in the power to suspend this choice by a supplementary thought.

Buridan is important mainly for his physical theories, particularly his explanation of local motion by the theory of IMPETUS, which he applied to the motion of the celestial spheres as well as to motion in the sublunary world. Because of this and related theories about the nature of weight and the acceleration of falling bodies, and by his acceptance of Ptolemy's system of astronomy, Buridan is considered a forerunner of LEONARDO DA VINCI, Nicolaus COPERNICUS, and Galileo GALILEI.

Otherwise, his nominalism found a more immediate area of expansion into the new universities, particularly German, which were being founded in growing numbers during this period, and where his former students, now professors (such as ALBERT OF SAXONY and MARSILIUS OF INGHEN), spread his philosophical ideas.

Bibliography: Iohannis Buridani Quaestiones super libros quattuor de caelo et mundo, ed. E. A. MOODY (Cambridge, Mass. 1942). E. FARAL, "Jean Buridan: Notes sur les manuscrits, les éditions et le contenu de ses ouvrages," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 21 (1946): 1–53; "Jean Buridan, maître ès arts de l'Université de Paris," Histoire littéraire de la France 38 (1949): 462–605. G. SARTON, Introduction to the History of Science, 3 v. in 5 (Baltimore 1927–48) 3.1: 540–546. A. C. CROMBIE, Augustine to Galileo: The History of Science, 400–1650 (Cambridge, Mass. 1953). R. TATON, ed., A History of Science, v. 1 Ancient and Medieval Science, tr. A. J. POMERANS (New York 1963). M. CLAGETT, The Science of Mechanics in the Middle Ages (Madison 1959). P. M. M. DUHEM, Le Système du monde: Histoire des doctrines cosmologiques de Platon à Copernic (5 v. Paris 1913–17; repr. 10 v. 1954–59). A. MAIER, Die Vorläufer Galileis im 14. Jahrhundert (Rome 1949); Zwei Grundprobleme der scholastischen Naturphilosophie: Das Problem der intensiven Grösse. Die Im- petustheorie (2d ed. Rome 1951); An der Grenze von Scholastik und Naturwissenschaft (2d ed. Rome 1952); Metaphysische Hintergründe der spätscholastischen Naturphilosophie (Rome 1955); Zwischen Philosophie und Mechanik (Rome 1958). M. E. REINA, Il problema del linguaggio in Buridano (Vicenza 1959); Note sulla psicologia di Buridano (Milan 1959).

[H. BASCOUR]

JOHN CANTIUS, ST.

Theologian; b. Kanti near Oswiecim, Poland, June 23, 1390; d. Cracow, Poland, Dec. 24, 1473. He enrolled at the University of CRACOW in 1413 and received the master's degree in liberal arts in 1417. From 1421 to 1429 he was rector of the school of the TEMPLARS at Miechów. After returning to the university, he taught in the school of philosophy, of which he was dean in 1432 and again 1437–38. In 1443 he obtained the degree of master in theology. He made a pilgrimage to JERUSALEM and journeyed several times to Rome. As the 16 extant manuscript volumes of his lectures show, he was a devoted and conscientious professor, but he became noted more for his sanctity than for the brilliance and originality of his teaching. A man of great mortification, he was also very considerate of the destitute. His biographies, mostly popular, abound with examples of his holiness and miracles, actual and legendary. Beatified in 1690, he was declared patron of Poland and Lithuania in 1737 by CLEMENT XII and canonized in 1767. He was buried in the church of St. Anne at Cracow.

Feast: Dec. 23 (formerly Oct. 20).

Bibliography: Podreczna encyklopedia Kościelna, v.17–18 (Warsaw 1909) 336–337. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 8:1042–1106. F. JAROSZEWICZ, Matka Świętych Polska (Cracow 1767; repr. in 4 pts. Poznań 1893). P. SKARGA, Żywoty Świętych Pańskich [Kraków: 1723] z dod. Ks. Stagracyńskiego (Chicago 1905) 393–397. A. ZAHORSKA, Ilustrowane Żywoty Świętych Polskich (Potulice, Poland 1937) 264–273. M. RECHOWICZ, Święty Jan Kanty i Benedykt Hesse w świetle krakowskiej kompilacji teologicznej z XV wieku (Lublin 1958). R. M. ZAWADZKI, ed., Catalogus codicum manu s. Ioannis Cantii scriptorum qui in Bibliotheca Apostolica Vaticana asservantur (Cracow 1997).

[L. SIEKANIEC]

JOHN CAPISTRAN, ST.

Franciscan theologian, preacher, and papal diplomat; b. Capistrano, Abruzzi Province, Italy, June 24, 1386; d. Ilok, Yugoslavia, Oct. 23, 1456. He was the son of a baron named Anthony, who came across the Alps in 1382 with the army of Louis I of Anjou; his mother was of the Amici family in Abruzzi. He was assigned a tutor at the age of six. His father and his brothers were killed during the struggle between the partisans of Louis II of Anjou (d. 1399) and of Ladislav of Naples (d. 1414). In 1401 he went to PERUGIA, where he studied civil and canon law from c. 1406, becoming in 1411 the adviser to the rector of the Sapienza, and in 1413, judge for the quarter of Santa Susanna (Archivum Franciscanum historicum 55:39–77), in which position he dealt severely with the FRATICELLI. When he sided with the populace, he was imprisoned by Braccio of Montone (d. 1424) after the battle of San Egidio. As a result of this event a religious crisis arose in this worldly man, who was already married to the daughter of the Count of San Valentino, although the marriage had not yet been consummated.

Religious Vocation. Once out of the Brufa prison, he joined the Observant FRANCISCANS at Perugia on Oct. 4, 1415, and became a humble and unpretentious novice under the direction of his master, the lay brother Onuphrius of Seggiano. Professed on Oct. 5, 1416, he studied theology and was admitted to Holy Orders c. Nov. 14, 1418 (Archivum Franciscanum historicum 49:77–82), after which he preached against the Fraticelli. In 1422 he was in Rome for the jubilee, and MARTIN V authorized him on November 11 to establish five residences. He preached during Lent of 1423 at SIENA, and he spent 1425 working with BERNARDINE OF SIENA, hearing confessions while Bernardine preached. In 1426 Bernardine was accused of HERESY for his devotion to the name of Jesus, and Capistran came from Aquila and successfully defended him before Martin V. He continued to preach against the Fraticelli and returned to Rome in 1429 to represent the Franciscan Observants, who looked to him for leadership when the papacy called a general chapter to resolve the split in the order. After being appointed assistant (1430) to the new minister general William of Casale (d. 1442), Capistran saw his Constitutiones Martinianae approved by the chapter of Assisi in June 1430; but when the Conventual FRANCISCANS obtained the bull Ad statum in August, the attempted reform and unification failed. By 1431 the Observants were granted their own provincial vicars, and in 1433 the care of the holy places in Palestine was entrusted to them. Capistran opposed events in Ferrara in 1434, defended in vain the Angevin cause in Naples as papal legate from 1435 to 1436, and in December of 1436 obtained for the members of the Third Order the right to live in common. In 1437 he assisted with the Collettine reform of the POOR CLARES at Ferrara, defended the Venetian JESUATI, and preached during Advent and the following Lent at Verona, as well as completing three valuable treatises. He visited the Holy Land at the end of 1439, and the years from 1440 to 1442 were spent in Milan preaching and writing. In late 1442 and early 1443 he was Franciscan visitor in Burgundy and in Flanders, where he worked to prevent Philip the Good from joining the antipope Felix V (Amadeus VIII of Savoy); he also tried in vain to attract St. COLETTE and her followers to the Observants and deposed two unworthy provincial ministers (Archivum Franciscanum historicum 35:113–132, 254–295).

Franciscan Administrator. The Padua chapter of 1443 saw the final failure of the attempted unification of the Order, and Capistran became, for the first time, vicar general of the Cismontane family of the Observants, promulgating on Sept. 23, 1443, his Ordinationes montis Alverniae. He reconciled Aquila with Alphonse V of Aragon, drew up a course of studies dated Feb. 6, 1444, preached the crusade in Sicily, and after Easter 1445 obtained the Ara Coeli as the main house for the Observants. The bull Ut sacra (Jan. 11, 1446) sanctioned the independence, which was already an accomplished fact, of the two Observant groups within the order.

Appointed to the Ara Coeli community by the next vicar-general, James Primaducci (d. 1460), Capistran became vicar provincial of Abruzzi and worked for the canonization of Bernardine of Siena. In that same period he founded several convents and monasteries, reformed the Poor Clares of Perugia, wrote a Vita s. Bernardini, and received into the Third Order James Franchi, whose writings provide valuable insights into Capistran's career.

When once again elected vicar general at Bosco di Mugello, Florence, in 1449, he ousted the Fraticelli from Sinalunga and from Massa Fermana. In Rome on May 24, 1450, he saw the canonization of St. Bernardine, and late that same year he visited the Province of Liguria. He preached in Venetia during the early months of 1450 and at Venice during Lent.

Apostolate to Central Europe. In 1451 Pope NICHOLAS V, at the request of Emperor Frederick III and the urging of Enea Silvio Piccolomini, the future PIUS II, sent Capistran to Austria to preach against the HUSSITES. He left on April 28 with 12 confreres, and on May 30 he received Wiener Neustadt as his mission. His efforts at conversion of the Jews, reform of the Franciscan Conventuals, and propagation of the Observants met with success, but although he spared no effort by word and pen to convert the Hussites, he could not enter Prague. On May 27, 1452, his commissioner general, Mark Fantuzzi of Bologna, succeeded him as vicar general, and he himself was promoted to commissioner general for Austria, Styria, Hungary, and Bohemia. He continued to correspond with Rome in order to prevent any attack on the bulls of EUGENE IV in favor of the Observants, especially after CALLISTUS III succeeded Nicholas V in 1455.

On Crusade. The critical situation on the Turkish front led Piccolomini in July 1454 to urge that Capistran be given the additional mission of preaching the crusade, and at the end of May the following year Capistran proceeded to Hungary, where plans were prepared for battles at Győr and at Budapest. In January 1456 he undertook an energetic campaign to win back the schismatics, and during the following months he recruited crusaders whom he led to Belgrade at the beginning of July. If the naval attack on the 14th must be credited to John Hunyadi, Capistran alone was responsible for the victory of the 21st, thanks to his courage and his devotion to the name of Jesus. Hunyadi died of the plague at Zemun on Aug. 11, 1456, and Capistran was ill when he left for Slankemen (letters to the pope, dated July 23 and Aug. 27). He arrived at Ilok on Sept. 1, 1456; he remained there until his death. A last missive dated Oct. 21 prescribed that all his books and personal possessions be returned to Capestrano.

Cult. Popular veneration began soon after his death, as is evidenced by the paintings of Bartolomeo Vivarini in 1459 (Louvre and oratory of Gagliano-Aterno) and of Sebastian of Casentino (Museum of Aquila). The process of canonization began as early as 1457, but his cause, promoted by the zealous JAMES OF THE MARCHES and John of Tagliacozzo, was opposed by Cardinal John of CARVAJAL (d. 1469). Biographies of Capistran were numerous from 1459 to 1463 (Studi francescani 53:299–344). In 1514 his cultus was permitted in the Diocese of Sulmona, and in 1622 was extended to the Franciscan Order. The canonization proceedings begun in 1625 were resumed in 1649 and were continued until Capistran was finally canonized with PASCHAL BAYLON and three others by ALEXANDER VIII on Oct. 16, 1690. In 1880 his feast was extended to the universal Church. He is honored with the title “apostle of Europe” (Studi francescani 53:252–274), and the West is his debtor for his efforts in delaying the Turkish advance in the mid-15th century.

Feast: March 28; Oct. 23 in Abruzzi, Austria, and Hungary).

Bibliography: A. STANKO, The Miracles of St. John Capistran (New York 2000) 429–441, bib. F. BANFI, “Le fonti per la storia di S. Giovanni da Capestrano” Studi francescani 53 (1956), 299–344. S. DAMIAN and F. DE MARCHIS, “Giovanni da Capestrano, 1386–1456: Il mistero delle sue reliquie: Contributo per una ricerca di storia francescana con le ultime acquisizioni documentali,” Vita Minorum 64 (1993) 226–41, 331–49. P. PETRECCA, San Giovanni da Capestrano (Florence 1992).

[J. CAMPBELL]

JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, ST.

Patriarch of Constantinople, Father and Doctor of the Universal Church, patron of preachers; b. Antioch, c.

349; d. Comana in Pontus, Sept. 14, 407. The surname Chrysostom first occurs in the sixth century and has practically supplanted his given name.

Life. A vivid and true image of John emerges both from his own works and, especially for the period after his elevation to the See of Constantinople (397), from the contemporary Dialogue of PALLADIUS. The older ecclesiastical historians, SOCRATES and, more reliably, SOZOMEN, give important accounts; later pre-Bollandist biographers, more interested in hagiography than history, offer collections of anecdotes and legends. C. Baur provides a definitive modern biography.

At Antioch. Fourth-century Antioch was a center of culture, heresy, and schism. Pagans were numerous and powerful in the government and the schools; the majority of bishops had been at least semi-Arians; the Catholics themselves were separated by a schism between Bishops Paulinus and Meletius. There John was born and reared. His father, Secundus, was a high-ranking army officer, probably a Latin and a Christian; his Greek mother, Anthusa, was widowed at the age of 20 shortly after John's birth. Renouncing remarriage, she reared her son with great courage and piety. In his treatise On the Priesthood John pays her a signal tribute as a great Christian mother. She sent John to study philosophy under Andragathius and rhetoric in the school of the distinguished pagan sophist and rhetorician Libanius.

His parentage and classical training combined to produce in him the strong will and firmness of the Roman, tempered by the versatile and vivacious spirit of the Greek. At the age of 18, still a catechumen, John came under the influence of Meletius. He directed John to the monastic school of DIODORE, who initiated him in the literal and grammatical exegesis of the school of Antioch. The following Easter (c. 368) Meletius baptized John and three years later ordained him lector. Although John lived an ascetical life at home, he longed to become a monk; after four years with Meletius and Diodore he moved to the nearby mountains. For another four years he studied and prayed there under the direction of an old hermit. The next two years he lived alone in a cave, studying the Scriptures and practicing indiscreet austerities, which impaired his health and forced his return to Antioch. As soon as he had sufficiently recovered, John resumed his duties as lector. In 381 he was ordained deacon by Meletius, and for five years assisted at liturgical functions, cared for the poor, the sick, and the widows, and helped in instructing the catechumens. It was probably toward the end of this period that he wrote his famous work On the Priesthood, a classic on the importance and dignity of the pastoral office.

In 386 FLAVIAN, successor to Meletius, ordained John a priest, and he began his remarkable career as preacher, exegete, and moralist. The next year he proved his eloquence and rapport with his people when tax-burdened Antioch revolted to protest a new levy. Rioters pulled down the statues of the imperial family and dragged them through the streets. Chrysostom met the crisis in a series of sermons (De statutis; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1857–66] 49: 15–222) in which he exhorted and consoled his now penitent hearers and restrained them from further excesses born of remorse and despair. Bishop Flavian hurried to the capital, winning the emperor's clemency, and John was able to report the happy outcome in his Easter sermon of 387.

John preached at Antioch for twelve fruitful years. There he produced the bulk of his literary legacy, which has proved so rich a source of theological and historical knowledge. Although a polemicist, apologist, and dogmatist of some stature, he owes his place as a DOCTOR OF THE CHURCH chiefly to the continuous explanation of Scripture that he presents in his magisterial commentaries.

Bishop of Constantinople. Nectarius, Patriarch of Constantinople, died in 397. Many vied to succeed him; but the Emperor ARCADIUS, at the suggestion of his minister Eutropius, selected John as the new Patriarch. Chrysostom was lured to the capital by a ruse and consecrated bishop on Feb. 26, 398.

Immediately he was plunged into a morass of ecclesiastical and political intrigue. Nectarius had wasted church revenues; John curbed expenses, opened hospitals, and alleviated the misery of the poor. Since Nectarius had likewise permitted clerical laxity, John had to institute reforms. He ousted one deacon for murder, another for adultery. His clergy were forbidden to keep virgins and deaconesses in their houses, a practice that had occasioned much scandal (see VIRGINES SUBINTRODUCTAE). Monks who preferred aimless wandering to cenobitic discipline were confined to their monasteries. Worldly widows were ordered to remarry or show the decorum proper to their state.

These reforms alienated many of the clergy, but were popular with the people and generally approved at court. The people also applauded John's good services when the imperial minister, Eutropius, fell into disgrace (399) and General Gainas revolted (400). When Eutropius fled to the cathedral for sanctuary, John excoriated his abuse of power, but defended his right to asylum and thus temporarily saved his life. When Gainas demanded a church for his Arian Goths and highborn hostages to guarantee his usurped consulship, John intervened. He refused the church and saved the hostages from death, but not from exile. Gainas was soon declared a public enemy and fled. After these events, Empress Eudoxia completely dominated the vacillating Emperor Arcadius.

John's influence was now at its peak, but he had his tragic flaw. Although he was usually peaceful and patient, his zeal for God, Church, and justice often led him to blunt speech and action offensive to those in high places. His excoriation of luxury and extravagances delighted many who heard him, but the attacks were intolerable to the upper classes. The ladies at court especially resented his rebukes and convinced Eudoxia that John's onslaughts were aimed at her. Thenceforth she collaborated with his foes.

In 401 John's zeal for the Church took him to Ephesus, where he presided over a synod that deposed six bishops found guilty of simony. Although Constantinople enjoyed a de facto hegemony as a patriarchate over Ephesus, and John presided at the express invitation of several bishops, his jurisdiction was questioned and he made more enemies. On his return to Constantinople he found that a guest, Bishop SEVERIAN OF GABALA, had stirred trouble among the local clergy. Severian, a favorite at court, protested to Eudoxia when John asked him to return to his own diocese. To prevent an open rift with the court and schism in the Church, John agreed to let him stay; but Severian, who coveted the capital see, thereafter worked successfully with other disaffected bishops and courtiers to destroy John.

The cabal found an unscrupulous leader in THEOPHILUS, Patriarch of Alexandria. Jealous for the eastern primacy of his own see, he had reluctantly consecrated John bishop instead of his own Egyptian candidate. In 401 he had excommunicated and exiled as Origenists some Nitrian monks who had offended him. Led by the TALL BROTHERS (Dioscorus, Ammon, Eusebius, and Euthymius), they arrived in the capital, where John gave them shelter, but prudently withheld ecclesiastical fellowship pending settlement of their case. They appealed to the emperor, who summoned Theophilus to the capital to appear before a synod over which Chrysostom would preside. Theophilus was slow to obey the summons, but quick to mount a counterthrust: he decided to oppose the synod that was to judge him with another that would judge John. But agents sent to Antioch failed to find grounds against John. EPIPHANIUS OF CONSTANTIA also demanded the expulsion of the Nitrian monks and John's signature on a synodal decree condemning Origen, but returned home when he recognized that Theophilus was making him his tool. Theophilus enlisted aid at court, where Severian and other foes seem to have falsified John's published sermons to make it appear that he had slandered the empress. John often preached on the vanity and luxury of women, and Eudoxia was easily convinced that John had referred to her as Jezebel.

Meanwhile 40 bishops, summoned by imperial rescript, waited for Theophilus to arrive, but John protested against convening the synod on canonical grounds: Theophilus must first be heard by a synod in his own province; further, such schisms among bishops were a scandal to the Church.

On his arrival in 403 Theophilus convened the illegal Synod of the OAK, and presided over 36 bishops, of whom at least 29 were his Egyptian suffragans. The others included Severian and some bishops John had deposed at Ephesus. When summoned to defend himself against 46 charges, John refused to appear or to recognize a synod in which not only his accusers, but even his judges were his bitter foes. He ignored a second and third summons and was declared deposed. Arcadius ratified the deposition, and three days later John was spirited from the capital under military guard. That very night an accident occurred in the palace—probably the empress had a miscarriage—and this Eudoxia connected with the injustice committed in Chrysostom's case. She saw to his immediate recall and, after some delay, John returned amid general rejoicing.

Late in 403 a silver statue of Eudoxia was erected in the square facing the cathedral. The noise of the celebration disturbed the Divine Liturgy, and from his pulpit John complained bitterly. Eudoxia took this as a public insult. A new insult was alleged in early 404 when Chrysostom, preaching on John the Baptist, was reported to have said "Again Herodias rages . . . again she demands the head of John on a platter." The text survives (Patrologia Graeca 59:485), but may well be spurious. Again his enemies urged his exile, but Arcadius only forbade him to enter the cathedral, and at Easter some 3,000 catechumens assembled at the Baths of Constantine to be baptized. Soldiers broke up the service and the baptismal waters ran red with blood. Two attempts on John's life failed. Tension ran high, riots threatened, and Arcadius finally decreed exile. On June 24, 404, yielding only to force, John left Constantinople for the last time.

Exile and Death. Scarcely was he on board ship when the cathedral and senate house went up in flames. John and his followers (Johnites) were accused of setting the fire to cover their theft of the church treasures. An inventory showed nothing missing. When the Johnites refused to recognize John's successors (the aged Arsacius and, shortly after, Atticus, both of whom had been among his accusers at the Synod of the Oak), their property was confiscated and they were exiled.

Before leaving Constantinople, John had written to Pope INNOCENT I to protest his deposition and to request a trial. Theophilus also sent a report. After hearing witnesses on both sides, Innocent refused to recognize John's deposition. A synod of Latin bishops who examined the matter declared the Synod of the Oak invalid.

Through Innocent and the Western Emperor Honorius they requested Arcadius first to restore Chrysostom and then to have the case decided by a general synod of Greeks and Latins to meet at Salonika, but the synod never convened.

On arrival at the capital, the papal envoys, including five bishops, were jailed, treated ignominiously, and finally sent back to Rome. Innocent then broke off communion with Theophilus, Atticus, and all of Chrysostom's chief opponents. The schism endured until, after John's death, atonement was made and John's name was restored to the diptychs at Alexandria, Antioch, and Constantinople.

For three years John's place of exile was Cucusus, a frontier outpost in Armenia. Despite the dangers and remoteness of the place, friends still visited him, and he kept up a correspondence with the faithful at Antioch and Constantinople. Angered by his persistent popularity and influence in the capital, his foes persuaded Arcadius to send John to more remote Pityus, 600 marine miles from Constantinople across the Black Sea, but the trip had to be made overland, across six mountain ranges and numerous streams. His guard forced him to march bareheaded in sun and rain. Worn out with hardship and fever, he died at Comana in Pontus, uttering as his last words, "Glory to God for all things."

In 438 Theodosius II brought his body to Constantinople and solemnly buried it in the Church of the Apostles. In 1204 the Venetians plundered the city and sent his relics to Rome, where his grave is still shown in the choir chapel of St. Peter's.

Feast: Jan. 27.

Character and Eloquence. Iconography gives no authentic portrait of Chrysostom, but tradition reveals him as an ascetic, unimposing yet dignified. His intellect was lively and penetrating, although not given to speculation. Although dauntless in the fight for justice, John went out with mercy to the poor and sinners. His rich imagination infused his sermons with power and variety. Like a true Greek, he loved proportion, but his choleric temperament often blazed forth in deep and vehement feeling.

He was not an orator in the classic mold. His homilies seem poorly structured, roving from point to point and filled with repetitions, but they have an interior, spiritual unity. He was often interrupted with applause and tears. This rapport made him feel free to say whatever he wished and his audience willing to hear whatever he had to say. Few orators ever roused more enthusiasm or exercised so complete a mastery over their audience.

Works. John's stature in ecclesiastical history derives less from his administrative ability than from his talents as writer and preacher. Few Greek Fathers have left so extensive a literary legacy of writings in the form of treatises, homilies, and letters.

Treatises. These deal with monastic, ascetical, and apologetical topics and are published in Patrologia Graeca 47, 48, 50, and 52. Most noteworthy are two exhortations Ad Theodorum lapsum, the one (Patrologia Graeca 47:277–308) addressed to a fallen monk, the other (ibid. 309–316) to his fellow student THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, who planned to return to the world and marry; Adversus subintroductas (ibid. 495–574), condemning the custom of priests having virgins as housekeepers; De sacerdotio (ibid. 623–692), on the greatness and dignity of the pastoral office; Contra Judaeos et Gentiles (Patrologia Graeca 48:813–838), demonstrating to Jews and Gentiles that Christ is God; Quod nemo laeditur (Patrologia Graeca 52:459–480), written in exile, proving that no man can be harmed unless he cooperates with those who would harm him.

Homilies. Here belong the commentaries on Scripture, groups of sermons on special subjects, and single homilies. (1) Commentaries on the Old Testament include 67 homilies on Genesis and eight sermons on Genesis, ch. 1 to 3 (Patrologia Graeca 53, 54), which may be a first recension; 59 on selected Psalms (Patrologia Graeca 55), which interpret Psalms 4 to 12, 43 to 49, 108 to 117, and 119 to 150. Those on the New Testament include 90 homilies on Matthew (Patrologia Graeca 57, 58); 88 on John (Patrologia Graeca 59), probably in a second recension; 55 on Acts (Patrologia Graeca 60), also in two recensions; there are more than 200 homilies on the Pauline Epistles (Patrologia Graeca 59–63), as well as a running elucidation of the text of Galatians (Patrologia Graeca 61:611–682), which is probably a recension made by a later editor from a series of homilies. (2) Among the groups on special subjects must be mentioned 21 homilies De statutis (Patrologia Graeca 49:15–222) delivered during the revolt at Antioch; two on the fall of Eutropius (Patrologia Graeca 52:391–414); eight against Judaizing Christians (Patrologia Graeca 48:843–942); twelve against the Anomoean Arians on the incomprehensible nature of God (ibid. 701–812); and eight baptismal catecheses discovered on Mt. Athos in 1955 by A. Wenger. (3) There are numerous single homilies, on the occasion of his ordination (Patrologia Graeca 48:693–700), before his exile (Patrologia Graeca 52:427–430), and on his recall (ibid. 443–448); also sermons on moral subjects and on certain feasts and saints.

Letters. Best known of some 236 letters are two to Pope Innocent I and 17 to the deaconess Olympias; the rest, addressed to more than 100 persons, give an intimate picture of his exile (Patrologia Graeca 52).

Spurious Works. These include a synopsis of Old Testament and New Testament (Patrologia Graeca 56:313–386); the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, which in its present form postdates his death, although he may have contributed to earlier versions; an incomplete commentary on Matthew, the Opus imperfectum, existing only in Latin, which seems to be the work of a fifth-century Arian.

Exegete and Doctor. As an exegete Chrysostom, like his teacher Diodore, followed the school of Antioch and was the most important exponent of its historico-grammatical method. Alexandrian allegory was foreign to him. He used allegory only when the inspired writer suggested it; even then it was the simple kind, which sees a reality through a type. He employed his deep insight into the meaning of Scripture to find applications for the lives and conduct of his flock. His exegesis was never far removed from instruction in morality and exhortation to the life of virtue.

Chrysostom was no speculative theologian. He felt that few were attracted to the Church by the profundity of her dogma; it was the moral teaching of the Gospels, the ideal of Christian charity, the hope that God would rescue them in their miseries that brought men into the Church. His task was to keep them there as worthy members of Christ. Nonetheless his works are rich in doctrine, and from the first he stood forth as an important witness to the faith. He clearly taught the duality of natures in Christ, but made no attempt to explain the oneness of person. His many clear statements on the Real Presence and sacrificial role of Christ in the Eucharist have won for him the name of Doctor of the Eucharist. He was not always clear on the nature and transmission of original sin, but Augustine rightly exonerates him of Pelagian error (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 44:656). He never referred to Mary as Θεοτόκος, a name suspect at Antioch. Neither did he call her Χριστοτόκος or ἀνθρωποτόκος, but stood apart from this controversy. He spoke explicitly of her perpetual virginity, but elsewhere implied that she was guilty of at least imperfections. As St. Thomas Aquinas observed, here Chrysostom has gone too far (Summa theologiae 3a, 27.4 ad 3).

Efforts to find in his works an unequivocal witness to the practice of private confession to a priest have failed. He often spoke of confession, but meant either public confession or that made to God alone in which the sinner judged himself guilty and God forgave him. He clearly acknowledged the primacy of Peter, but nowhere accorded the same primacy to the pope. Possibly this was because in the schism at Antioch neither Meletius nor Flavian was in union with Rome until John, on his accession to the See of Constantinople, obtained letters of ecclesiastical communion with Rome for both Flavian and himself. When he was deposed, he did ask Innocent I to intervene in his favor and to maintain communion with him, but this was not a recognition of papal primacy. He sent the same request to the bishops of Milan and Aquileia. The problem of papal primacy as now understood in the Church may never have occurred to him. For him the Church was one: schisms that divided it were just as bad as heresies that altered its faith. (For the so-called Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, see BYZANTINE RITE.)

Bibliography: Complete editions. Opera graece, ed. H. SAVILE, 8 v. (Eton 1610–12), best text; Patrologia Graeca ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) v. 47–64, repr. of B. DE MONTFAUCON, 13 v. in 24 (Paris 1835–39). Translations. Lettres à Olympias, ed. and tr. A. M. MALINGREY (Sources Chrétienues, ed. H. DE LUBAC et al. [Paris 1941] 13; 1947); Huit catéchèses baptismales inédites, ed. A. WENGER (ibid. 50; 1957); Commentary on St. John, ed. T. A. GOGGIN, 2 v. (The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation, ed. R. J. DEFERRARI et al. 33, 41; 1957, 1960); Baptismal Instructions, ed. P. W. HARKINS (Ancient Christian Writers, ed. J. QUASTEN et al. [Westminster, Md.-London 1946–] 31; 1963). Literature. D. BURGER, Complete Bibliography of Scholarship on the Life and Works of St. John Chrysostom (Evanston 1964). J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, Maryland 1950–) 3:424–482; E. VENABLES, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE (London 1877–87) 1:518–535. H. LIETZMANN, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 9.2 (Stuttgart 1916) 1811–28; repr. in Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 67 (Berlin 1958) 326–347. C. BAUR, John Chrysostom and His Time, tr. M. GONZAGA, 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1960–61). R. E. CARTER, “The Chronology of St. John Chrysostom’s Early Life,” Traditio 18 (1962) 357–364. F. H. CHASE, Chrysostom: A Study in the History of Biblical Interpretation (Cambridge, Eng. 1887). B. GIORGIATIS, Die Lehre des Johannes Chrysostomos über die heiligen Schriften (Athens 1947). A. MOULARD, Saint Jean Chrysostome, le défenseur du mariage et l’apôtre de la virginité (Paris 1923). E. BOULARAND, La Venue de l’homme à la foi d’après saint Jean Chrysostome (Analecta Gregoriana 18; Rome 1939). H. KEANE, “The Sacrament of Penance in St. John Chrysostom,” The Irish Theological Quarterly 14 (1919) 305–317. G. FITTKAU, Der Begriff des Mysteriums bei Johannes Chrysostomus (Bonn 1953). E. MICHAUD, “L’Ecclésiologie de s. Jean Chrysostome,” Revue internationale de théologie 11 (1903) 491–620. L. MEYER, Saint Jean Chrysostome, maître de perfection chrétienne (Paris 1933). G. G. CHRISTO, Martyrdom According to John Chrysostom: “To Live Is Christ, To Die Is Gain” (Lewiston, NY 1997). J. N. D. KELLY, Golden Mouth: The Story of John Chrysostom: Ascetic, Preacher, Bishop (Ithaca, NY 1995). F. VAN DE PAVERD, St. John Chrysostom, the Homilies on the Statues: An Introduction (Rome 1991). R. A. KRUPP, Shepherding the Flock of God: The Pastoral Theology of John Chrysostom (New York 1991). M. A. SCHATKIN, John Chrysostom as Apologist (Thessalonike 1987). R. L. WILKEN, John Chrysostom and the Jews: Rhetoric and Reality in the Late Fourth Century (Berkeley, Calif. 1983).

[P. W. HARKINS]

JOHN CLIMACUS, ST.

Abbot, ascetic, and writer on the spiritual life (also known as Ἰωάννης ὁ τῆς κλίμακος and John the Scholastic); b. 579; d. 649. Details of his life are unknown. His Heavenly Ladder, κλίμαξ τοῦ παραδείσου, was one of the most widely used Greek handbooks of the ascetic life. Its popularity with lay as well as monastic readers is attested by the existence of 33 illustrated Greek manuscripts, plus an uncounted number of copies without illustration—so large a number of manuscripts being responsible for the fact that there is as yet no critical edition. The work was translated into Latin, Syriac, Arabic, Armenian, and Church Slavonic, as well as a number of modern languages.

The Ladder, written while the author was abbot of the monastery at Mt. Sinai, shows striking psychological insight, stemming from his acute powers of observation and deep knowledge of the spiritual life. As the title indicates, the ascetic life is portrayed in the form of a ladder that the monk must ascend, each step on the ladder representing a virtue that must be acquired or a vice that must be eradicated. There are 30 steps, representing the 30 years of the hidden life of Christ, before the beginning of His public ministry. Each step is the subject of a chapter in which the author describes the virtue or vice in question and shows the way in which it is to be acquired or eliminated.

After undergoing discipline as a novice, the monk has to gain a solid footing on each step as he masters in succession such qualities as obedience, meekness, chastity, temperance, poverty, humility, and discretion or comes in his progress to the steps at which he has to deal with malice, slander, sloth, gluttony, avarice, vainglory, pride, etc. As the monk toils upward he has to fight off the attacks of demons who seek to tear him from the ladder and hurl him into the abyss. Finally the monk, if he passes successfully through all trials, reaches step 30, titled Faith, Hope, and Charity, and there receives the crown of glory from the hand of Christ.

John Climacus was evidently familiar with the works of earlier ascetic writers, and, though his treatment and point of view are his own, his book shows similarities in method and arrangement to the collection of sayings of holy men preserved in a Latin translation of a Greek original under the title Verba seniorum. The Ladder had widespread and important influence on later Greek ascetic writers, especially the Hesychasts (see HESYCHASM), and was popular in monasteries in Slavic countries. SYMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN was especially indebted to his lifelong study of the Ladder.

Feast: March 30.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 88:632–1161. JOHN CLIMACUS, Ladder of Divine Ascent, tr. L. MOORE, intro. M. HEPPELL (New York 1959); Scala paradisi, ed. P. TREVISAN, 2 v. (Turin 1941). L. PETIT, Dictionnaire de théolo-

Manuscript from "Heavenly Ladder," by St. John Climacus.

gie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 8.1:690–693. J. R. MARTIN, The Illustrations of the Heavenly Ladder of John Climacus (Princeton Studies in MS Illumination 5; Princeton 1954). J. CHRYSAVGIS, Ascent to Heaven: The Theology of the Human Person according to Saint John of the Ladder (Brookline, Mass. 1989). J. MACK, Ascending the Heights: A Layman's Guide to the Ladder of Divine Ascent (Ben Lomond, Calif. 1999).

[G. DOWNEY]

JOHN COLOMBINI, BL.

Founder of the JESUATI; b. Siena, c. 1304; d. Monte Amiata, Italy, July 31, 1367. John was a merchant, a member of the Sienese senate, and a magistrate. In 1342 he married Biagia Cerretani. After reading the biography of St. MARY OF EGYPT he began to lead an ascetic life. He provided for his wife, gave his goods to the poor, and dedicated himself to the care of the sick. Disciples gathered about him, and he obtained approbation of his congregation from URBAN V in 1367. He was buried in Siena. His cult spread locally, and GREGORY XIII beatified him. Colombini's writings included 114 Letters, reflecting affective spirituality, the Laudi spirituali, of which only the "Diletto Gesù Cristo chi ben t'ama" has been authenticated, and avita of Peter Petroni, now lost.

Feast: July 31.

Bibliography: A. BERTOLI, ed., Le lettere del b. G. Colombini (Lanciano 1925). Acta Sanctorum July 7:344–420. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:228–230.

[M. G. MC NEIL]

JOHN DA PIAN DEL CARPINE

Better known as John of Plano Carpini, the first European to give detailed information on the Mongols; b.

probably Piano della Maggione (formerly Pian di Carpini), near Perugia, c. 1180; d. probably Italy, Aug. 1, 1252. An early companion of St. Francis, John became a Franciscan warden in Saxony in 1222, and provincial of Germany in 1228. On April 16, 1245, he left Lyons as head of one of the three embassies sent by Innocent IV to contact the Mongols and deliver to them the letters Dei Patris immensa and Cum non solum. His mission successfully accomplished, John wrote a voluminous report—Istoria Mongalorum quos nos Tartaros appellamus. The first part of this work is a masterly description of the country of the Mongols, the customs of the inhabitants, their character, and their history. It is a sober, objective, concise report, a masterpiece of its kind. The second part of the Istoria is a short record of the journey to Mongolia undertaken in the company of BENEDICT THE POLE. In Mongolia John assisted at the enthronement of the Great Khan Güyük (Aug. 24, 1246), by whom he was received on several occasions. He left the Khan's court on November 13, and almost six months later he reached the Khan's uncle Batu, in the region of the Volga. Via Kiev and Hungary he returned to Lyons in November 1247. Soon afterward John was installed as archbishop of Bar (Antivari). The journey of this sexagenarian monk to the Mongols ranks among the finest journeys of exploration; his report is one of the best sources on the Mongols of the 13th century.

Bibliography: F. SORELLI, "Per Regioni Diverse: Fra Giovanni da Pian del Carpine," in I Compagni di Francesco e la Prima Generazione Minoritica (Spoleto 1992), 259–83. P. DAFFINA, Giovanni di Pian di Carpine (Spoleto 1989), bibliography.

[D. SINOR]

JOHN DAMASCENE, ST.

Surnamed Chrysorrhoas or the Golden Speaker, Oriental monk, Father of the Church; b. Damascus, c. 645; d. near Jerusalem, c. 750.

Life. John's family was the well-to-do Manšūr family; his grandfather and father had occupied ministerial posts, first under the Byzantine and, after 636, under the Arab rulers of Damascus. Under the care of Cosmas, a ransomed Sicilian prisoner, he received a well-rounded Greek education and a knowledge of Arabic as well as of the Islamic religion. He achieved a position of trust in the Muslim court, but because of the Caliph Abd al-malik's (685–705) hostility toward Christians he resigned his post (c. 700). With Cosmas he became a monk at Mar Saba near Jerusalem, and was ordained by Patriarch John V of Jerusalem (705–735) before the outbreak of the controversy over iconoclasm. John taught in the monastery, preached in Jerusalem, and counseled various bishops on questions of faith, devoting himself in particular to the composition of theological tracts. According to information in the vita he reedited his writings toward the end of his life; this statement is supported by evidence in MSS tradition.

Iconoclasm. John's career is inseparably connected with the controversy over ICONOCLASM in which he supported the veneration of images with theological arguments, and because he lived outside the Byzantine realm he was able to oppose the iconoclastic-minded emperor with vehemence. The story that his hand was cut off and miraculously healed by the Mother of God is legendary. He was dead before the Iconoclastic Synod of 754, which condemned him with a fourfold anathema. His orthodoxy was vindicated by the seventh general council (Nicaea II) in 787; and he has been considered a saint since the end of the 8th century.

John was buried in the monastery of Mar Saba, where the body seems to have been located until the 12th century, when, apparently, it was removed to Constantinople and venerated there from the 13th to the 15th century. Despite evidence provided by several vitae, one of which was written by the Patriarch John of Jerusalem (d. 966), and all of which depend upon an Arabic source, as well as other information supplied in ecclesiastical and profane documents, the chronology of his life and particularly the date of his death is uncertain. The latter is usually ascribed to 749, following S. Vailhé. The Acts of the synod of 754 record John as already dead (Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 13:356) and an Arabic menologion says that at his death he was 104 years old (Patrologia Graeca, 94:501). Other Arabic sources describe him and the poet al Aḥṭal (b. c. 640) as friends and table companions of Prince Yazīd I (b. c. 642). Hence it is assumed that he was of a similar age and his dates are given as 645 to 750.

Dogmatic Writings. John left a literary heritage of which J. Hoeck has claimed 150 titles as authentic works. His principal dogmatic work is Πηγὴ γνώσεως (Source of knowledge), which is usually considered to include a trilogy, although the title refers properly only to the first part. In its present form this work is prefaced with a dedicatory letter to Cosmas, John's adopted brother who became bishop of Maiuma near Gaza c. 743. Part one, called the Dialectica, is a philosophical propaedeutic, or preparation for the faith, in 68 chapters, depending largely on patristic citations and strongly influenced by the Isagoge of the Neoplatonist Porphyry. Part two is a history of heresies that recapitulates the 80 chapters of the Panarion of EPIPHANIUS OF CONSTANTIA (SALAMIS) and adds 20 further chapters taken bodily from other sources. The chapters dealing with Islam (100), iconoclasm (102), and the Aposchites (103) do not seem to be authentic. This entire section is also found as chapter 34 of the Doctrina patrum. Part three is the Ekthesis, or Exposition of the Orthodox Faith, in 100 chapters and treats of God, creation, anthropology, Christology, soteriology, and eschatology, with an appendix that deals with ascetical questions.

Miniature detail of St. John Damascene composing a sermon, 11th century, from "Menologion of Basil II".

This Exposition was translated into Latin in the 12th century and divided into four books modeled on the scholastic structure of the Sentences of Peter Lombard. The principal sources of the first and third sections are the Epitome of THEODORET OF CYR, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, EULOGIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, NEMESIUS OF EMESA, PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, LEONTIUS OF BYZANTIUM, MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR, and ANASTASIUS SINAITA. Originally this work seems to have consisted of the Dialectica and the Exposition and only in the second redaction was it made into a trilogy by Damascene himself. His other dogmatic writings include an Institutio elementaris, or elementary introduction to dogma, written for Bp. John of Laodicea, several Professiones fidei, tracts against the Nestorians, Jacobites, Monothelites, Manichees, and Islamites, and three celebrated Discourses against the Iconoclasts (726–730) in which he defends classical doctrine in favor of the veneration of images, but demonstrates his own independent thinking.

Ascetical and Exegetical Works. Among Damascene's moral and ascetic writings are treatises on sacred fasting, the eight spirits of evil, and the virtues and vices, as well as a number of prayers. It is probable that he had a hand in structuring the collection of maxims and devotional texts known as the Sacra Parallela. In his exegetical writings Damascene prepared a commentary on the Pauline Epistles borrowing freely from St. John Chrysostom. But the authenticity of the homilies on the Hexaemeron attributed to him is doubtful.

Hagiography. John devoted much of his preaching to hagiographical encomiums in praise of SS. Anastasia, Barbara, John Chrysostom, and Elias (unedited) and accounts of the sufferings of the martyrs, including Artemius and Catherine (lost); of doubtful authenticity are the passions of Paraskeue and Meletius of Antioch. He produced a masterful story in the edifying account of the life of BARLAAM AND JOASAPH, whose authenticity, though long disputed, seems now established. Of his sermons on the mysteries of the liturgy and the saints, at least 13 are authentic; some are still unedited and several have been attributed to John of Euboea.

Mariology. His Marian sermons are most famous, in particular three homilies for August 15 preached on the site of Mary's dormition at Gethsemane. In the second of these, the celebrated passage referring to the deposit of Mary's clothing in the Blachernae convent in Constantinople has long been recognized as an interpolation. The sermon on Mary's nativity was delivered in the Sanctuary of the Sheep pool, the legendary place of Mary's birth. John is renowned likewise as a hymn writer; at least eight of the Canones, or poems made of nine odes each differing in metrical structure, which celebrate the principal feasts of the Lord, are authentic, and a number of the hymns in the so-called Octoechos are of his authorship.

John is credited with an Easter Table (Paschalion) and the composition or redaction of the monastic Typicon of Mar Saba. Under his name there are a large number of pseudoepigraphica, some of which may be the remains of lost works.

Sources. Characteristic of John's writings is a traditionally carefree plagiarizing of authors without reference to sources. Thus in his Exposition of the Faith he combined the greater part of the anthropology and psychology of Nemesius of Emesa with the pseudo-Cyrrillian tract on the Trinity; in his passio of Artemius he embodied part of the lost church history of Philostorgius; in the Barlaam romance, the Apology of Aristides and a section of the Prince's Mirror of Agapetus; and in his Christmas Sermon, a religious conversation held at the Sassanid court. His use of Chrysostom's commentaries on St. Paul and his embodiment of the Panarion of Epiphanius in his history of heresies has been mentioned. G. Richter has unearthed various strata in the Dialectica; but the investigation of his sources is difficult and still in need of attention. John frequently repeated entire sentences and even paragraphs of his own writings, even within the same work.

Evaluation. John Damascene was certainly the most significant, however, not the most independent, theological thinker in an age little distinguished for creativity. Starting with the principle that he desired to say nothing of his own creation and did not wish to pass beyond traditional bounds, he tried to adapt himself to the whole patristic learning without indulging in originality. In his principal work, the Exposition, which he put together out of many diversely oriented sources, he did not achieve the closed circle of the Latin scholastic Summae. In his art of compilation by means of selection and omission together with inserted commentaries, he managed to achieve a high degree of intellectual autonomy and a compositional technique that, considering the limitations of Byzantine systematic thinking, deserve esteem. His learning and works were conditioned by an environment that was not conducive to the elaboration of the Christian faith. While his theological influence on both East and West has often been exaggerated, the mass of MSS, editions, and whole or partial translations of his works—among the oldest are Syriac (c. 800), Arabic, Armenian, and ancient Bulgarian (10th century), Georgian (11th century), and Latin (12th century)—demonstrate the high appraisal given him by posterity.

Essentially a Chalcedonian, John Damascene was considered in the West the principal witness of Greek theology. He was rated as one of the greater Byzantine dogmaticians and an Oriental writer of considerable versatility, although a critique of his accomplishment according to current standards of scholarship demands a negative evaluation.

Feast: March 27.

Bibliography: M. JUGIE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951– ) 8.1:693–751, doctrine and bibliog. J. NASRALLAH, Saint Jean de Damas (Harissa 1950). J. M. HOECK, "Stand und Aufgaben der Damaskenos-Forschung," Orientalia Christiana periodica 17 (1951) 5–60; Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN, 3 v. (Brussels 1957) 3:884–885. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 476–486. H. PERI, Der Religionsdisput der Barlaam-Legende (Salamanca 1959). I. DICK, Proche-Orient chrétien, 12 (1962) 209–223, 319–332; 13 (1963) 114–129. B. HEMMERDINGER, "La Vita arabe de saint Jean Damascène et Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, 884," Orientalia Christiana periodica 28 (1962) 422–423. L. SWEENEY, "John Damascene's Infinite Sea of Essence," Studia Patristica, v. 6 (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 81; Berlin 1962) 248–263. B. KOTTER, Die Überlieferung der "Pege gnoseos" des hl. Johannes von Damaskos (Studia patristica et byzantina 5; Ettal 1959). G. RICHTER, Die Dialektik des Johannes von Damaskos (Ettal 1964). M. GORDILLO, Orientalia Christiana periodica 27 (1961) 162–170. G. D. DRAGAS, "Exchange or Communication of Properties and Deification: Antidosis or Communicatio Idiomatum and Theosis," Greek Orthodox Theological Review, 43, no. 1–4 (Spring-Winter 1998) 377–399. K. PARRY, Depicting the Word: Byzantine Iconophile Thought of the Eighth and Ninth Centuries (Leiden 1996). T. F. X. NOBLE, "John Damascene and the History of the Iconoclastic Controversy," in Religion, Culture, and Society in the Early Middle Ages, ed. T. F. X. NOBLE and J. J. CONTRENI (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1987) 95–116. D. J. SAHAS, John of Damascus on Islam: The "Heresy of the Ishmaelite" (Leiden 1972).

[B. KOTTER]

JOHN DE BRITTO, ST.

Missionary and martyr; b. Lisbon, Mar. 1, 1647; d. Oriyûr, India, Feb. 4, 1693. De Britto, of the high nobility, was educated as a page with the royal Prince (later Peter II). He entered the Jesuits in December 1662 and was ordained in January 1673. He arrived in Goa in September 1673, and after preparation, went to his mission in southeast India (Madura, Tanjore, Marava, the Cauvery delta). He followed the ascetic, withdrawn life of a sannyasi missionary that R. de NOBILI had led, thus having access to both Brahmins and the lower castes. His labors were successful, although handicapped by war and other disasters. After a period spent farther south (1679–85), he returned to Marava and was imprisoned (July 17, 1686), tortured, and expelled from the country. In September 1687, he returned to Portugal but was not allowed to go to Rome to report in person. In March 1689, he left again for India, where he was visitor of the Jesuit mission (1691). He had great success, converting many to Christianity, including the feudal chief of Siruvalli. The chief then dismissed all his wives except the first. Among those dismissed was the niece of the Prince of Marava. The prince, with Brahmin support, began a persecution. He had the missionary brought before him and sent him to Oriyûr, where he was beheaded. John was beatified Feb. 17, 1852, and canonized June 22, 1947.

Feast: Feb. 4 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: A. DE BIL, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 10:771–772. C. A. MORESCHINI, San Giovanni de Britto (Florence 1943). A. BESSIÈRES, Le Nouveau François-Xavier (Toulouse 1946). A. SAULTIÈRE, Red Sand (Madura 1947). A. NEVETT, John de Britto and His Times (Anand, India 1980).

[J. WICKI]

JOHN DE GRANDISSON

Bishop of Exeter; b. Ashperton, Herefordshire, England, 1292; d. Chudleigh, Devon, July 16, 1369. He was studying civil law, probably at Oxford, by c. 1306. Between 1313 and 1317 he studied theology at Paris under Jacques Fournier, later Pope BENEDICT XII. By 1322 he was a papal chaplain. He returned to Oxford for study in 1326–27, the year that he became bishop of EXETER by papal provision. A diligent diocesan, he finished the reconstruction of the nave of his cathedral and built St. Radegunde's Chapel, where he is buried. He founded the College of Ottery St. Mary in 1337. Concerned over the effect of papal PROVISION in England, he informed Pope CLEMENT VI in 1342 that at the council of the Province of Canterbury held in London "no small wonder arose at the burdensome and hitherto unknown multitude of apostolic provisions." In 1349 the Bishop presented his views concerning provision to King Edward III. He composed a Legenda de sanctis and a life of Thomas BECKET, copies of which are in Exeter Cathedral Library, and in 1337 compiled an Ordinale for the regulation of services performed in his cathedral. He willed his large library to his cathedral church, the collegiate churches of Ottery, Crediton, and Bosham, the Black Friars of Exeter, and Exeter College.

Bibliography: F. C. HINGESTON-RANDOLPH, ed., Register of John de Grandisson . . . , 3 v. (Exeter 1894–99). J. N. DALTON, ed., Ordinale, 2 v. Henry Bradshaw Society (London 1891—) 37, 38; 1909). W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 8:371–372. W. A. PANTIN, The English Church in the 14th Century (Cambridge, Eng. 1955). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:800–801.

[V. MUDROCH]

JOHN DE GREY (GRAY)

Bishop of Norwich, justiciar of Ireland; b. Norfolk, England; d. Saint-Jean-d'Audely, near Poitiers, France, Oct. 18, 1214. First mentioned in 1198 in the service of Prince John (see JOHN, KING OF ENGLAND), he rose rapidly in the ecclesiastical hierarchy once John succeeded King RICHARD I, the Lion-Heart on the English throne (1199). By March 1200 he had become archdeacon of Cleveland, and a month later he is mentioned as archdeacon of Gloucester. On September 24 of the same year he was consecrated bishop of Norwich. He evidently enjoyed the royal favor, and when HUBERT WALTER, the Archbishop of Canterbury, died in 1205, King John had him elected to CANTERBURY. This election, however, was disputed, and Pope INNOCENT III sought to resolve the matter by suggesting the election, instead, of STEPHEN LANGTON. King John refused to recognize Langton's election, and this precipitated the disastrous quarrel between king and pope that plagued the greater part of King John's reign. During this period John de Grey continued to function as justiciar at court and as itinerant royal judge except while in Ireland, where he served as justiciar (1209–13). There he distinguished himself by his attempts to increase English influence northward and westward and to reform Irish coinage, law, and administration along English models, as well as to raise money and troops for the king. His devotion and loyalty to the cause of the king earned him both an early excommunication by the pope and a special exclusion from the general absolution that followed John's submission to Innocent in 1213. Later that year, however, John de Grey went to Rome and received not only a full pardon but also the papal favor to such an extent that it was feared in England that he would return there as Innocent's special agent to subject the kingdom to papal rule. In 1214 Innocent provided for his election to Durham, over the protest of the monastic chapter there, but John de Grey died on his way back to England before taking possession of his new see. He was the uncle of Abp. WALTER DE GRAY.

Bibliography: A. L. POOLE, From Domesday Book to Magna Carta (2d ed. Oxford History of England 3; 1955). W. L. WARREN, King John (New York 1961).

[J. BRÜCKMANN]

JOHN DE OFFORD

Chancellor of England, archbishop-elect of Canterbury; d. Tottenham Court, May 20, 1349. The alternate form "Ufford" derives from the assumption that he was a son of Robert Ufford, Earl of Suffolk, but the evidence points to his being of the family of Offord, whose estate at Offord Dameys, Huntingdonshire, he administered until 1332. His younger brother Andrew frequently appears in the records as envoy and commissioner to foreign courts and held various minor posts in church and state. John was a doctor of civil law by 1334, probably of Cambridge, where he is commemorated as a benefactor. He had entered the royal service before 1328 and soon won King EDWARD III's confidence. For the next 20 years he was constantly employed in private and political negotiations with the pope and the French king in France, Brabant, and Flanders. He is said to have added eloquence, sagacity, shrewd counsel, and dependability to legal acumen, and this brought him rapid promotion to high office. In 1342 he became keeper of the privy seal and later of the great seal also. In 1344 he was installed as dean of Lincoln Cathedral, and in 1345 he was appointed lord chancellor of the kingdom. Although by then aged and paralytic, and despite his strong support of the stringent measures taken against papal PROVISION, Offord was nominated to the See of CANTERBURY by the King, who rejected the cathedral chapter's election of THOMAS BRADWARDINE. Offord was papally provided to the see on Sept. 24, 1348, and took custody of the temporalities in December. But he died before receiving the pallium or consecration. He was buried by night at Christ Church, Canterbury.

Bibliography: H. WARTON, Anglia sacra, 2 v. (London 1691) 1:42, 60, 118, 794. T. RYMER, Foedera, conventions, litterae... inter reges Angliae et alios quosvis imperatores, reges, pontifices... ab A.D. 1101 ad nostra usque tempora... (to 1654), 20 v. (London 1704–35). W. F. HOOK, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, 12 v. (London 1860–84) 4:73, 103. C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 14:901–902. A. B. EMDEN, Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Cambridge before 1500 (Cambridge, Eng. 1963) 431–433.

[J. H. BAXTER]

JOHN DE RIDEVALL

Franciscan writer, fl. 1331 to 1340. He was the 54th lector at the Franciscans' Oxford Convent, 1331–32, and was also known as John of Musca. He became a doctor of theology c. 1331. A number of theological and philosophical works are attributed to him. He wrote a Commentarius super Fulgencium (Venice, St. Mark's manuscript 139, codex, F. 121–136) in which, like NICHOLAS

TREVET and the Franciscan, JOHN OF WALES, he considers classical mythology as a reservoir of moralizing subject matter for the use of preachers. A similar commentary, Ovidii metamorphoseos fabule ccxviii moraliter expositae (Cambridge, Eng., Public Library 1:11, 20 F. 162–199) is now usually ascribed to Peter Bersuire rather than to John. Books 1, 2, 3, 6, and 7 of John's commentary on St. Augustine's De civitate Dei are extant (Manuscripts Oxford C.C.C. 186 and 187, by Jo. Rydevallis or Rydewall, Friar Minor). There is a commentary on the Apocalypse, Lectura super Apocalypsi, at St. Mark's, Venice (Classification 1, manuscript 139, folios 110–119). A commentary on the letter of Valerius to Rufinus, In Valerium ad Rufinum de uxore non ducenda (Manuscripts Cambridge, Public Library, Mm 1, 18, 5), often ascribed to John, shows a similarity to John of Wales.

Bibliography: J. DE RIDEVALL, Fulgencius metaforalis: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der antiken Mythologie im Mittelalter, ed. H. LIEBESCHÜTZ (Leipzig 1926). C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 16: 1164–65. A. G. LITTLE, The Grey Friars in Oxford (Oxford 1892). B. SMALLEY, "J. Ridewall's Commentary on De civitate Dei," Medium Aevum, 25 (1956) 140–153. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 7 v. (Madrid 1949–61) 3: 4882–86. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1576.

[J. J. SMITH]

JOHN DE SACROBOSCO

Astronomer, applied mathematician; b. Paris, late 12th century, d. mid-13th century (1244 or 1256). Also known as John of Hollywood. Extant historical documents from his own time do not mention the name of Sacrobosco; his fame began only as a result of the growing popularity of his works. He is recognized as an early promoter of the ongoing project to describe nature mathematically. Franciscan and Dominican theologians took interest in Sacrobosco and wrote numerous commentaries on his De Sphaera. A 1271 commentary on De Sphaera by Robertus Anglicus identifies the author of the work as "Johannes de Sacrobosco Anglicus" suggesting an English origin. Historians seeking Sacrobosco's place of birth etymologically variously suggest England, Scotland, and Ireland. Most follow the early English tradition, although lacking a satisfactory etymological explanation for Sacrobosco or Hollywood. The popular suggestion of Halifax has since proven incorrect as fax refers to hair, not wood. His grave, apparently destroyed in the French Revolution, lay in the monastery of Saint-Mathurin in Paris. The epitaph recognized Sacrobosco as a famous astronomer and a computista—an expert in time calculations. A 1297 commentary on De Sphaera connects Sacrobosco to the University of Paris, where he was likely on faculty from about 1221.

Four extant treatises can be attributed to Sacrobosco with some degree of certainty. In the popular textbook, Algorismus, he demonstrates the use of what he terms “Arabic” numerals for arithmetic, ushering the use of Indo-Arabic numerals into the university curriculum. His most notable work, Tractatus de Sphaera, is divided into four chapters concerning (1) the structure of the universe, (2) the circles of the celestial sphere, (3) the observable implications of the foregoing for the rotation of the heavens, and (4) the motion of planets, theories of Sun and Moon, and the cause of eclipses. De Sphaera follows a Ptolemaic model, but innovates in its explanation for the phenomenon of procession. While Algorismus cannot be dated, de Sphaera seems to have been composed during Sacrobosco’s career at the University of Paris and an early manuscript dates to 1240. De Sphaera remained in constant print for two centuries, the last edition being published in 1674 at Antwerp. It is significantly shorter than Sacrobosco’s Compotus, a general treatise on ecclesiastical and civil time reckoning written between 1232 and 1235. In the Compotus, Sacrobosco proposes reforms to the Julian calendar that would eliminate the effects of accumulated errors and bring stability to the dates of the equinoxes. The Tractatus de quadrante is a brief work describing the Old Quadrant and its use. A number of spurious works exist, such as the Theorica planetarum and commentaries on Aristotle’s De Caelo and De generatione et corruptione.

Bibliography: O. PEDERSEN, “In Quest of Sacrobosco,” Journal for the History of Astronomy 16 (1985), 175–221. W. R. KNORR, “Sacrobosco’s Quadrans: Date and Sources,” Journal for the History of Astronomy 28 (1997), 197–222. J. MORETON, “John of Sacrobosco and the Calendar,” Viator 25 (1994), 229–244. L. THORNDIKE, The Sphere of Sacrobosco and its Commentators (Chicago 1949).

[J. H. BARLOW]

JOHN DE SAINT-POL

Archbishop of Dublin, chancellor of Ireland; b. Ows-ton, West Riding, Yorkshire, England, c. 1295; d. Dublin, Ireland, Sept. 9, 1362. The Saint-Pol family had originally come from Guienne, France. Some time before 1330 John had received a papal dispensation from the disabilities of illegitimacy, but in 1339 the bishop of Winchester was directed by Rome to affirm his legitimacy, new evidence having come to light. John was already a clerk in the royal chancery by 1318, and in 1330 he was licensed to hold the numerous ecclesiastical BENEFICES he acquired in various dioceses. From Jan. 13 to Feb. 17, 1334, as well as several times thereafter, he was guardian of the great seal in the absence of the chancellor of England, and on April 29, 1337, he was created master of the rolls. Imprisoned in 1341 by King EDWARD III on grounds of misadministration, he was released through the help of Abp. JOHN STRATFORD and in 1343 regained a position at the chancery. On Sept. 4, 1349, he was named archbishop of Dublin by papal PROVISION. In 1351 the new Archbishop was ordered by Pope CLEMENT VI to proceed against certain heretics who, fleeing from the persecution of Bp. Richard Lederede of Ossory (fl. 1350), had obtained protection from Alexander Bicknor, John’s predecessor as archbishop. John disputed the right of RICHARD FITZ-RALPH, Archbishop of ARMAGH, to use the title PRIMATE OF IRELAND, until Edward revoked (1353) the royal letters in favor of Armagh and had the whole case removed to Rome. From 1350 to 1356 John was also chancellor of Ireland; in 1358 he was made a member of the privy council. He used his influence at Dublin in attempting to win a general amnesty for English and Irish rebels. As archbishop he enlarged Holy Trinity Cathedral (now called Christ Church), tried to secure numerous privileges for the see, and played a part in developing its liturgy. He held a provincial synod at Dublin in Lent of 1351 and a number of his decrees, issued on this occasion and later, for the regulation of diocesan affairs, are extant. He was buried in his cathedral.

Bibliography: “Provincial and Diocesan Decrees of the Diocese of Dublin . . .,” Archivium Hibernicum, ed. A. GWYNN, 11 (1944) 34–37, 84–90. A. BELLESHEIM, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Irland, 3 v. (Mainz 1890–91) 1:519–520. E. I. CARLYLE, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 17:662–663. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1629–30. G. J. HAND, “The Psalter of Christ Church, Dublin,” Reportorium novum, 1.2 (1956) 313; “Cambridge University Additional Manuscript 710,” ibidem 2.1 (1958) 21. W. HAWKES, “The Liturgy in Dublin, 1200–1500: Manuscript Sources,” ibidem 36–37.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

JOHN DE SECHEVILLE (SÈCHEVILLE)

English scholastic philosopher, diplomat; b. of noble Exeter family; d. between 1279 and 1292. De Seccheville, called also John of Siccavilla, of Sackville, or of Driton, was a master of arts by 1245, possibly of Oxford. He studied at Paris, where he was rector of the faculty of arts of the university in 1256. He took part in the university’s struggle against the MENDICANTS and was a member—along with men such as WILLIAM OF SAINT-AMOUR—of the delegation the university sent to Rome during these troubles. In 1258, during the Barons' War, he was back in England, where he served as secretary to the Duke of Gloucester. In 1259 he served as an intermediary between King Henry III of England and the King of France in their peace negotiations. He seems to have returned to Paris after that. In 1263, when the University of Paris was dispersed, John probably resided at Oxford for a time; but it was at Paris (c. 1263) that he wrote his chief work, the De principiis naturae, which seems to favor the Averroistic theses concerning monopsychism, eternity of time, and eternity of generation and motion (see AVERROISM). He was in London in 1265 and seems not to have left England again. He remains one of the chief representatives of the Averroistic current at the University of Paris during the second half of the 13th century.

Bibliography: JOHN DE SECHEVILLE, De principiis naturae, ed. R. M. GIGUÈRE (Montreal 1956). J. C. RUSSELL, Dictionary of Writers of 13th Century England (New York 1936) 76–77. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1661–62.

[T. C. CROWLEY]

JOHN DISCALCEATUS, BL.

Franciscan friar; b. Saint-Vougay, Brittany, France, c. 1280; d. Quimper, France, Dec. 15, 1349. From his youth he devoted himself to works of charity; and after he was ordained (c. 1303) in the Diocese of RENNES, he led a life of poverty and austerity, devoted to the cure of souls. He was so attracted by FRANCISCAN spirituality that in 1316 he joined that order. He is said to have gone barefoot for more than 13 years—hence the name Discalceatus—and led an exemplary life of charity and self-denial, giving to the poor the very clothes he wore. He died of the plague. For the many miracles attributed to him, he was popularly proclaimed a saint, but his cult has never been approved by the Church, although he is commemorated in the Franciscan order.

Feast: Dec. 15.

Bibliography: F. M. PAOLINI, Un Document inédit du XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle sur la vie de St. Jean Discalceat (Rome 1910). Acta Ordinis Fratrum Minorum 29 (1910) 12–28; 33 (1914) 161–163. W. LAMPEN, Collectanea Franciscana 26 (1956) 421–424. W. FORSTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1028.

[S. OLIVIERI]

JOHN GILBERT

Dominican theologian, bishop, treasurer of England; d. London, July 28, 1397. Without family influence, he rose to high administrative office by his ability, in Church and state, becoming bishop of Bangor (1372–75), Hereford (1375–89), and Saint David's (1389–97) and serving as treasurer of England from October 1386 to May 1389 and August 1389 to 1391. He proved himself to be an efficient and conscientious official. He studied at Oxford before 1366 and later at Paris. In 1378 he was chancellor of the University of Oxford. As friar and theologian he opposed John WYCLIF both at Oxford and at the 1382 synod of Blackfriars. One of the ablest diplomats in the royal service, he took part in important embassies on both ecclesiastical and secular business from 1373 to 1395. He was occupied with administrative reforms between 1380 and 1388. Though at times associated with John of Gaunt, he appears to have been trusted by both Richard II and the opposing baronial factions.

Bibliography: Registrum Johannis Gilbert, Episcopi Herefordensis, ed. J. H. PARRY (Canterbury and York Society; London 1915) 1375–89. T. F. TOUT, Chapters in the Administrative History of Mediaeval England, 6 v. (Manchester 1923–35) 3:413, 454–460. É. PERROY, L'Angleterre et le Grand Schisme d'Occident (Paris 1933). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:765–766.

[M. M. CHIBNALL]

JOHN GUALBERT, ST.

Abbot, founder of the VALLOMBROSANS; b. Florence, Italy, c. 995; d. S. Michele Arcangelo Abbey, Passignano, Italy, July 12, 1073. A member of the Visdomini family, John was a knight until the murderer of one of his kinsmen asked his forgiveness on Good Friday. He spared the man's life and was soon after professed as a Benedictine monk at S. Miniato, Florence. Seeking a more austere life, he went to CAMALDOLI sometime before the death of St. ROMUALD (d. 1027). But John wished to found an order aimed directly at promoting Church reform, and c. 1030 he withdrew to VALLOMBROSA to lead an eremitic life. In 1038 he founded a monastery there, which he placed under the BENEDICTINE RULE but with special statutes. He made provision for CONVERSI in order to free the choir monks from manual labor. Vallombrosans soon reformed or founded other communities, such as those of S. Salvi, Moscheta, and Passignano, to which hospices were attached for the care of the poor and the sick. All these houses were placed under the authority of a single abbot general. John's reforms brought him into bitter conflict with the archbishop of Florence, Peter Mezzabarba, the notorious simoniac. John is buried at Passignano. In 1193 he was canonized by Pope CELESTINE III.

Feast: July 12.

Bibliography: Two lives of John and prayers attributed to him, Acta Sanctorum July 3:297–433. S. CASINI, Storia di S. Gio- vanni Gualberto Fiorentino (Florence 1934). B. QUILICI, Giovanni Gualberto e la sua riforma monastica (Florence 1943). E. LUCCHESI, S. Giovanni Gualberto. Dai boschi d'Italia alle foreste del Brasile (Florence 1959). A. SALVINI, S. Giovanni Gualberto, fondatore di Vallombrosa (Livorno 1972). G. SPINELLI and G. ROSSI, eds., Alle origini di Vallombrosa (Novara 1984).

St. John Gualbert, four scenes from his life, 14th-century altarpiece, Italian school, in Santa Croce, Florence.

[B. HAMILTON]

JOHN ITALUS

Byzantine philosopher and humanist; b. Southern Italy, c. 1025; d. after 1082. A student at Constantinople under Michael Psellus (c. 1049), he succeeded his master at the university there early in 1055 and became a close friend of Emperor MICHAEL VII DUCAS. He reached the height of his career in the 1070s, but his popularity as a teacher earned him many enemies, particularly among the Byzantine clergy. His lectures dealt with the teachings of Plato and the Neoplatonists, and he wrote commentaries on Plato, on Aristotle's logic, on Proclus, and on IAMBlichus. In 1077 nine theses reputed to be taken from his teachings were condemned by a synod in Constantinople. Finally, on March 13, 1082, Italus and his doctrines were solemnly condemned by a second synod, and he was banished to a monastery when the sentence was confirmed by Emperor Alexius I Comnenus (March 20). Most modern scholars believe that he was not guilty of doctrinal error, but that it was his devotion to Platonic philosophy and his overemphasis in the employment of logic and reason to explain dogma that brought down the wrath of the Church upon him. Although his works were publicly burned, some MSS are still extant.

Bibliography: Opuscula selecta, ed. G. CERETELI (Tiflis 1924–26). Quaestiones quodlibetales, ed. P. JOANNOU (Ettal 1956). P. STEPHANOU, Jean Italos, philosophe et humaniste (Orientalia Christiana Analecta 134; 1949). Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 5:1043. V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople (Kadikoi-Bucharest 1935—) 1.3:907, list of theses condemned in 1077. P. JOANNOU, Die Il- luminationslehre des Michael Psellos und Joannes Italos (Ettal 1956). F. MASAI, Pléthon et le platonisme de Mistra (Paris 1956) 284–297.

[G. T. DENNIS]

JOHN JOSEPH OF THE CROSS, ST.

Religious; b. Ischia, in the Gulf of Naples, Aug. 15, 1654; d. Naples, March 5, 1734. Leaving his well-to-do parents at the age of 16, John Joseph became the first Italian to join the Alcantarines, a strict reform group within the Franciscan Order newly introduced into Italy by friars from Spain. When only 21 years old, he was entrusted with the building of a new house of the reform at Piedimonte di Alife. It was only under obedience that he received Holy Orders in 1677. After his ordination to the priesthood he was appointed master of novices. In this office he showed himself unusually gifted in the art of spiritual direction, and throughout his life he was much sought after as a confessor. He served two terms as guardian, and when the first Alcantarine province was erected in Italy in 1702, he was chosen to head it. He successfully guided the new province through its first stormy years, when disputes between the Spanish and Italian factions within the reform movement threatened the very existence of the Alcantarines in Italy.

John Joseph vigorously embraced the almost repellent austerities that typified the Alcantarine reform in its early days and sought to emulate in every detail the life and virtues of St. Peter of Alcántara, its founder. He wore a number of spiked crosses under his rough habit, scourged himself daily, and for the last 30 years of his life abstained from all liquids. He died at the friary of Santa Lucia del Monte. He was buried there, and his tomb immediately became a place of popular pilgrimage. He was beatified by Pius VI in 1789 and canonized by Gregory XVI in 1839.

Feast: March 5.

Bibliography: DIODATA DEL'ASSUNTA, . . . Vita di B. Gio Guiseppe della Croce (Naples 1789). LÉON DE CLARY, Lives of the Saints and Blessed of the Three Orders of St. Francis, 4 v. (Taunton, Eng. 1885–87) 1:349–368. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:490–493.

[C. LYNCH]

JOHN KLENKOK

Theologian, opponent of the Sachsenspiegel; b. Buken, Hanover; d. Avignon, June 17, 1374. John became doctor utriusque iuris, probably at Bologna, before he joined the AUGUSTINIANS in Herford where a document of 1346 calls him clericus OESA. He was sent to Oxford where he received a D.D. in 1359. In 1363 and 1367–68, he was provincial of the province of Saxony. John criticized certain articles of the Sachsenspiegel, the medieval civil law of eastern Germany, which he felt were opposed to human and divine law. The inquisitor Walter Kerlinger, OP, asked for his opinion in writing but misused the confidence by turning over the treatise, called the Decadicon, to the magistrate of Magdeburg instead of to the proper ecclesiastical authorities (1369). A great outcry followed, and John called on Bp. Albert of Halberstadt to appoint two Austin masters, Rudolf Block and Jordan of Saxony, to be his judges. Both decided against him. In 1370 Klenkok was a professor at Prague and an intimate friend of Bp. John of Neumarkt, chancellor of the empire. A year later he sent Gregory XI at Avignon a revision of his Decadicon, in which 21 articles of the Sachsenspiegel were held condemnable. Gregory responded in 1374 by denouncing 14 articles, which became known in German law as articoli reprobari. Klenkok was made papal penitentiary. As such he opposed JOHN MILÍČ, the Bohemian nationalist and foe of the mendicants. Both died at Avignon in June 1374. John wrote commentaries on the Apocalypse, the letters of St. John, and the Lombard, but only the Decadicon has been published.

Bibliography: H. BÜTOW, “Zur Lebensgeschichte des Augustinermönches Johannes Klenkok,” Historische Vierteljahrschrift 29 (1934–35) 541–575. D. TRAPP, “Augustinian Theology of the 14th Century,” Augustiniana 6 (1956) 223–239; “Notes on John Klenkok,” Augustinianum 4 (1964) 358–404. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1057. A. ZUMKELLER, “Manuskripte von Werken der Autoren des Augustiner-Eremitenordens in mitteleuropäischen Bibliotheken,” 521–534. B. OCKER, “Johannes Klenkok: A Friar's Life, c. 1310–1374,” Transactions of the American Philosophical Society 83, part 5: VII-116 (Philadelphia 1993).

[F. ROTH]

JOHN KYNYNNGHAM

Carmelite theologian (also known as John Cunningham); b. Suffolk, England; d. York, England, May 12, 1399. He entered the CARMELITE ORDER at Ipswich, had moved to Oxford by 1372, and served as provincial prior of the English Carmelites from 1393 till his death. He was one of a number of Carmelite confessors to John of Gaunt and he witnessed that prince's will, in which he is described as “mestre Johan Kynyngham doctour en theologie.” Kynyngham was an early (c. 1373) and vigorous opponent of John WYCLIF, and as a member of the council assembled at Black Friars, London, in 1382 to condemn 24 propositions taken from the writings of Wy-clif, he was called upon to preach the final sermon to the assembly. He was present also for the trial of Henry CRUMPE in 1392, and on November 1 of the same year he preached before Richard II, who later summoned Kynyngham to a council scheduled to begin on Jan. 27, 1399, for the discussion of the WESTERN SCHISM. He died in the Carmelite friary at York where he is buried.

Bibliography: Kynyngham's three Ingressus against Wyclif: Fasciculi Zizaniorum magistri Johannis Wyclif cum tritico, ed. W. SHIRLEY, [Rerum Britannicarum mediæ aevi scriptores, 244 v., 5, (1858)] 4–104. C. DE VILLIERS, Bibliotheca carmelitana, ed. G. WESSELS, 2 v. in 1 (Rome 1927) 2:9, 21–23. C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 11:361–362. J. CROMPTON, "Fasciculi Zizaniorum," The Journal of Ecclesiastical History (London 1950–) 12 (1961) 35–45, 155–166. J. A. ROBSON, Wyclif and the Oxford Schools (Cambridge, Eng. 1961) 162–170. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1077.

[K. J. EGAN]

JOHN LE MOINE

Cardinal and canonist; b. Crécyen-Ponthieu (northern France), c. 1250; d. Avignon, 1313. He studied philosophy and theology in Paris and was also a doctor in utroque iure. For a time an auditor of the Rota, he was dean of the Church of Bayeux from 1288 to 1292. Celestine V named him cardinal, which is why authors often refer to him simply as Cardinalis. Under Boniface VIII he became vice chancellor of the Roman Church. He was also called to fulfill important diplomatic missions, particularly during the great controversies between Philip IV (the Fair) of France and the Holy See. As a canonist, John is known above all for his Apparatus (1301) on the LIBER SEXTUS of Boniface VIII (1298), of which there are many manuscripts and printed editions (e.g., Paris 1535; Venice 1585, 1602). He also glossed some later constitutions of Boniface VIII and Benedict XI. A sagacious jurist, experienced in controversies, quick to reconcile opposing issues, he developed an important theory on the constitution and rights of the College of Cardinals.

Bibliography: G. A. DIGARD, Philippe le Bel et le Saint-siège de 1285 à 1304, 2 v. (Paris 1936) 1:140–142, 157–159. A. VANHOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici 1, v. 1–5 (Mechlin 1928–) 1:474–476. B. TIERNEY, Foundations of the Conciliar Theory (Cambridge, Eng. 1955) 180–191, 208–209. Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:112–113.

[P. LEGENDRE]

JOHN LE ROMEYN

Archbishop of York; b. c. 1230; d. Bishop Burton, near Beverley, Yorkshire, England, March 10, 1296. He was the illegitimate son of the Italian-born treasurer of York and a servant woman. A dispensation from illegitimacy was obtained (c. 1237), thus enabling him to be ordained. Romeyn received a master of arts degree from Oxford in 1256 and was the recipient of a number of livings. By 1270 he was at Paris, where he took a doctorate in theology (1276). Elected archbishop of YORK (Oct. 29, 1285), Romeyn was consecrated at Rome on Feb. 10, 1286. His episcopal career was stormy. He antagonized King Edward I by trying secular cases in his episcopal court, and he quarreled with the influential Anthony BEK, bishop of Durham, and formerly keeper of the king's wardrobe. In the course of this controversy, which centered on judicial appeals from the consistory court of Durham to York, Romeyn appealed his case to Rome and eventually excommunicated Bek (1292). Edward, in turn, imprisoned the Archbishop in the Tower, charging that the excommunication infringed on the royal prerogative. In 1293 Romeyn was released on promise to pay 4,000 marks. His register reveals that, in spite of this involvement in Church-State affairs, Romeyn concerned himself with his own province: his clergy was encouraged to study theology in the chancellor's school at York, and he rebuilt the nave of York Minster. During his tenure the chapter houses at York and Southwell were built, and the choir of Ripon extended. Romeyn's body was interred in York Minster.

Bibliography: JOHN LE ROMEYN, Register, ed. W. BROWN (Surtees Society 123, 128; London 1913–16). C. M. FRASER, A History of Antony Bek, Bishop of Durham 1283–1311 (Oxford 1957) 47–48, 53, 57, 94–96, 111, 113–114, 147–148, 228. D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1948–60) 1:89–90, 93. D. L. DOUIE, Archbishop Pecham (Oxford 1952) 69, 112, 230–234, 322. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1134–35.

[B. F. BYERLY]

JOHN LOBEDAU, BL.

Franciscan; b. Toruń (Pomerania), probably after 1231; d. Chelmno, Oct. 9, 1264. Having entered the Franciscan convent (founded in 1239) in his native city, subject to the province of Bohemia and Poland, he was transferred in 1258 to the newly founded convent of St. James at Chelmno. Pious, learned, animated with zeal for souls, he was the confessor and spiritual director of JUTTA OF SANGERHAUSEN, a relative of Anno, the grand master of the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS (1257). He was buried at Chelmno, and miracles reputedly obtained through his intercession established him as the protector of sailors and fishermen. Hymns testify to an early cult. He is represented holding a book and surrounded by a bright light. His cult, approved Oct. 31, 1638, is limited to Poland; his name is not in the Franciscan liturgical calendar.

Feast: Oct. 9.

Bibliography: F. SCHEMBEK, Żywot b. Jana Prussaca (Toruń, Poland 1627); Lat. tr., Acta Sanctorum Oct. 4:1097–1100. Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, ed. T. HIRSCH et al., 5 v. (Leipzig 1861–74) 2:392–396. A. DU MONSTIER, Martyrologium franciscanum (2d ed. Paris 1753). L. LEMMENS, “Annales minorum Prussicorum,” Archivum Franciscanum historicum 6 (1913) 702–704. C. KROLLMANN, ed., Altpreuussische Biographie (Königsberg 1936–) v.1. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes 10:253–254.

[J. CAMPBELL]

JOHN LUTTERELL

English scholastic theologian and philosopher; d. Avignon, July 17, 1335. Before 1304 he obtained a papal dispensation from the impediment of illegitimacy, in view of his ordination to sacred orders, and again on Sept. 1, 1331, probably in prospect of the bishopric of Salisbury. About 1317 he acquired his doctor’s degree of divinity at Oxford, was elected chancellor of the university on Oct. 10, 1317, and successfully prosecuted the dispute of the university with the Dominicans. He may be the author of many documents on this question, collected by Richard of Bury in his Liber epistolaris [Formularies which bear on the history of Oxford c. 1204–1420, ed. H. E. Salter et al. (Oxford 1942) 1.4–5, 14–66, 71–79]. When Cardinal Gaucelm de Jean visited England c. 1318, John Lutterell was appointed by the university to conduct the dispute before him. In 1322 he became the central figure in a conflict with the masters and scholars of the university; this was so serious that the chapter of Lincoln warned it could lead to a general schism. He was deposed as chancellor in September 1322. At the invitation of his friend at Avignon, Master Stephen de Kettelbergh, he was at the papal court there from late summer of 1323 to May 13, 1325, when he was recalled to England. John XXII explained his prolonged stay as attributable to papal proceedings against “a certain pestiferous doctrine.” There is no doubt that the teaching of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM was meant, since Lutterell had just finished examining Ockham’s commentary on the Sentences, from which he denounced 56 propositions as “against true and sane doctrine” [J. Koch, “Neue Aktenstücke zu dem gegen Wilhelm von Ockham in Avignon geführten Prozess,” Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale, 7 (1935) 353–380; 8 (1936) 79–93, 168–197]. He was also one of the masters of theology who condemned 51 articles of Ockham in 1326 [A. Pelzer, “Les 51 articles de Guillaume Occam censurés, en Avignon, en 1326,” Revue

d’histoire ecclésiastique, 18 (1922) 240–70]. In 1328–29 he was again in Avignon, and in 1332–33 he was among the masters of theology who condemned theological errors of DURANDUS OF SAINT-POURÇAIN and THOMAS WALEYS.

Lutterell was esteemed for his skill as a stylist. His doctrines are known from his Libellus contra doctrinam Guilelmi Occam, written in 1323–24. Between 1327 and 1333 he wrote a treatise at Avignon, Epistola de visione beatifica, defending the singular view of John XXII. He is said to have written also In vesperies magistrorum and Praelectiones Oxonienses. He held several benefices and in the years 1325 to 1334 he received 32 papal mandates [Calendar of Entries in the Papal Registers relating to Great Britain and Ireland, Papal Letters, 2 (London 1895), passim].

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1181–82. F. HOFFMANN, Die erste Kritik des Ockhamismus durch den Oxforder Kanzler Johannes Lutterell (Breslau 1941); Die Schriften des Oxforder Kanzlers Johannes Lutterell (Leipzig 1959). G. N. BUESCHER, The Eucharistic Teaching of William Ockham (Washington 1950), xix–xxvii, 145–150.

[S. GIEBEN]

JOHN MALALAS

In Syriac Malel, or “rhetorician,” Byzantine historian; fl. mid-sixth century. Nothing definite is known of his life, but he seems to have been a native of Antioch, and was probably of Syrian origin. He may be identical with the Patriarch JOHN III Scholasticus (565–577). His Chronicle recounts the history of the world from creation to 565 A.D. and embraces Biblical history, Greek mythology, and the history of Eastern peoples, as well as the political history of Greece, Rome, and the early Byzantine Empire. Malalas was an uncritical compiler, with a taste for the anecdotal and trivial, e.g., his description of the personal appearance of the heroes of the Trojan War. But he had access to many sources now lost, in particular a history of his native Antioch, on which he supplies much priceless information. His tone is one of extremely naïve Christian apologetic. Used with critical discrimination, his Chronicle is a valuable source for the history of his own time. He wrote a simple, unclassical Greek, with no literary pretensions, but he could tell a good story well. The Greek text survives in a slightly abbreviated form in a single manuscript, but an Old Slavonic translation made in the 10th or 11th century preserves a fuller version. His Chronicle was copied or excerpted, directly or indirectly, by all subsequent Byzantine writers of universal history.

Bibliography: Ioannis Malalae chronographia, ed. L. DINDORF (Bonn 1831). The Chronicle of J. M., bks. VIII–XVIII, trs., M. SPINKA and G. DOWNEY (Chicago 1940). Die römische Kaiser-geschichte bei Malalas, ed. A. SCHENK VON STAUFFENBERG (Stutt-gart 1931), critical text of bks. 9–12. G. MORAVCSIK, Byzantinoturcica, 2 v. (2d ed. Berlin 1958) 1:329–334, full bibliog. K. WEIERHOLT, Studien im Sprachgebrauch des Malalas (Oslo 1963).

[R. BROWNING]

JOHN MILÍČ

Ascetic, Bohemian reform preacher; b. Kroměříž, Czechoslovakia, c. 1305; d. Avignon, June 29, 1374. After being educated in Prague, he became registrar at the court of Emperor CHARLES IV (1358–60) and then an official of the chancery (1360–62). Under the influence of the Archbishop of Prague, ERNEST OF PARDUBICE, he became a priest and later a canon of Prague. Inspired by the reform spirit on one hand and disgusted by the corruption of the clergy on the other, he renounced all dignities, and from December 1363 he lived in absolute poverty and preached penance.

John inaugurated the DEVOTIO MODERNA in Bohemia with VOJTĚCH RAŇKŮV in an attempt to materialize true reform under the guidance of John of Jenštejn, Archbishop of Prague. Each day Milíč preached in Latin for the clergy in St. Nicholas Church and then for the people in St. Egid's; after the death of Conrad of Waldhausen (1369) he preached daily in St. Vitus Cathedral. He was an ardent proponent of daily Communion as an integral part of the reform. Milíč was one of those who urged a vernacular translation of the Bible for the use of the laity. Because of prevailing corruption of morals he awaited the end of the world and predicted an imminent coming of Antichrist. When he thus preached in Rome, in 1367, he was imprisoned by the INQUISITION as a heretic. There he wrote his Libellus de Anti-Christo in 1368. Pope URBAN V, to whom he sent his ideas on the urgency of Church reform in a special memorandum, permitted him to return to Prague. There he resumed his preaching, in both German and Czech. He founded a house called Jerusalem for reformed women sinners. In 1373, once again accused of heresy, he went to AVIGNON to justify himself before Pope GREGORY XI and was allowed to preach to the cardinals. Milíč is characterized as one of the forerunners of the HUSSITES, but he radically opposed reform carried on outside the Church. His Latin works Gratiae Dei and Abortivus are still unpublished.

Bibliography: Vitae sanctorum et aliorum quorundam pietate insignium, ed. J. PERWOLF, et al., 7 v. (Fontes rerum Bohemicarum 1; Prague 1873–1932) 401–436. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed., Innsbruck 1903–13) 2:663. O. ODLOZILIK, Jan Milíč z Kromerže (Prague 1924). A. HYMA, The Christian Renaissance: A History of the "De- votio Moderna" (New York 1925). S. H. THOMPSON, "Learning at the Court of Charles IV," Speculum, 25 (1950) 1–20. F. DVORNIK, The Slavs in European History and Civilization (New Brunswick, N.J. 1962).

[J. PAPIN]

JOHN OF ACTON

Priest and noted English canonist; d. November 1349. He received a doctor of civil law degree from Oxford c. 1311 and a doctor of Canon Law degree from Cambridge before 1330. While at Cambridge he engaged in a fictitious quaestio disputata with M. Walter Elveden c. 1335 (Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, MS 483, flyleaf). A canon of Lincoln by papal provision in 1329, he became rector of Willingham by Stow, Lincolnshire, in 1330, and an official of the Court of York in 1335.

He is chiefly known for his famous gloss, composed c. 1333 to 1335, on the Legatine Constitutions of the 13th century Legates, Otto and Ottobuono. In this he performed a valuable service for the Church in England, providing a comprehensive gloss on every significant word of the constitutions of 1237 (Otto) and 1268 (Ottobuono). He shows a wide knowledge of the classic sources and commentators of Canon Law, although, as Maitland has noted, he is a little too human to be strictly scientific: his gloss often is a growl against greedy prelates, hypocritical friars, rapacious officials, and papal exactions. The gloss has been printed twice, and many manuscripts survive. In 1346, three years before his death, he also wrote a Septuplum, a two-part work of moral theology that has not yet been edited.

Bibliography: JOHN OF ACTON, Constitutiones legatime, seu legatine regionis Anglicane, as appendix to W. LINDWOOD, Provinciale seu Constitutiones Angliae, 2 pts. (Oxford 1679). S. LEE, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 1:67. F. W. MAITLAND, Roman Canon Law in the Church of England (London 1898). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:11–12; Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Cambridge before 1500 (Cambridge, Eng. 1963) 2. L. BOYLE, "The Curriculum of the Faculty of Canon Law at Oxford in the First Half of the 14th Century," in Oxford Historical Society, Oxford Studies Presented to Daniel Callus (Oxford 1964).

[L. E. BOYLE]

JOHN OF ANTIOCH

Fifth century bishop of Antioch; d. c. 441. Little is known of the early life of John of Antioch, before his consecration as bishop of that see in 428, except that he was a friend and fellow student of NESTORIUS. When the latter began to preach his ideas on the THEOTOKOS, John, as bishop of Antioch, urged him not to stir up trouble, and claimed that the title had been sanctioned by the early Fathers. Once the disturbance began, however, John sided with Nestorius. Summoned to the Council of EPHEBUS by imperial order, John sent word that he and his suffragans would not be able to reach Ephesus in time for the opening session. As a result, the Antiochians were not present on June 22, 431, when the council condemned and deposed Nestorius. On June 26, John of Antioch arrived at Ephesus, was incensed at the reports of council proceedings, and began a rival synod that vindicated Nestorius and condemned CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA as an Apollinarian. On July 10, the original council repeated its denunciation of Nestorius, and, on July 17, excommunicated John and his adherents. John appealed to the Emperor, who ratified the decisions of both assemblies, deposing Cyril and Nestorius.

As a result of the council, the Antiochene Church broke away from the rest of Christianity, although it seems that both John of Antioch and Cyril were sincerely desirous of reunion. In April 433, the schism was healed when John and Cyril were reconciled. John had sent to Alexandria a profession of faith probably drawn up by THEODORET OF CYR. Cyril accepted the formula and, in turn, John agreed to the condemnation of Nestorius.

This reconciliation caused violent reactions in the Byzantine Church. Those who leaned toward Nestorius's views thought that John had betrayed their cause and espoused heresy. Toward these, John at first adopted a policy of conciliation. Meanwhile, others criticized him for not stamping out NESTORIANISM. Eventually, the Church at EDESSA, a Nestorian stronghold, renounced its ties with Antioch and began the East Syrian Nestorian Church. At this point John tried to use civil and military force to end the schism but died soon afterward.

John corresponded with PROCLUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE, Cyril of Alexandria, and Emperor THEODOSIUS II on the subjects of Proclus's letter to the Armenians and the orthodoxy of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA. Some of John's letters on the Nestorian controversy are preserved among the correspondence of Proclus and of Cyril of Alexandria.

Bibliography: Letters Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 77:131–132, 163–166, 167–174, 247–250, 329–332, 365, 877–878; 83:1440–46. Synodicon adversus tra-goedum Irenaei, Patrologia Graeca, 84:550–864. Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum (Berlin 1914—) 1.1:93–96, 119; 1.4:79, 33; 1.5:124–135; 1.7:84, 146, 151–161; 3; 4. M. LE QUIEN, Oriens Christianus (Leipzig-Wiesbaden 1904—) 2 721. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 5 v. (Freiburg 1913–32) 4:362. 370–371. W. KRAATZ, Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur (Berlin 1882—) 26.2:191–200, on Nestorius. P. T. CAMELOT, Éphèse et Chalcédoine 54, 70–72, 209–211. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, eds. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935—) 4:163–191. J. DANÉLOU and H. I. MARROU, The First Six Hundred Years, tr. V. CRONIN, of The Christian Centuries (New York 1964—) 1:345–348. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 329. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–53) 3:118, 130.

[J. F. KRASTEL]

JOHN OF APPLEBY

Ecclesiastical lawyer, dean of St. Paul's, London (1365–89); b. perhaps at Appleby, Westmorland, date unknown; d. between Sept. 24 and Oct. 1, 1389. A bachelor of civil law by 1349, he had a doctorate in this subject by 1359, possibly from Oxford. He was not John of Appleby, bachelor of civil law, Archdeacon of Carlisle (1364), and brother of Thomas, Bishop of Carlisle. He was active as a lawyer, and in 1361 the convent of Durham retained him as adviser, a position he held until his death. In 1363, while an advocate at the papal Curia, he obtained a reservation of the deanery of St. Paul's. Archbishops WILLIAM WITTESEY and SIMON OF SUDBURY employed his services. He was present at the condemnation of John WYCLIF's doctrines at the Blackfriars' synod (London 1382). Twice in 1372 King Edward III used him on diplomatic missions; in 1389 he was a member of the famous court of chivalry that affirmed the right of Sir Richard le Scrope of Bolton to bear the arms "azure, a bend gold." He was a great pluralist. In his will he remembered the parish church and poor of Appleby and asked to be buried in St. Paul's cathedral.

Bibliography: North Country Wills, ed. J. W. CLAY, 2 v., Durham Surtees Society (Durham 1908–12) v. 2. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:40–41. I. J. CHURCHILL, Canterbury Administration, 2 v. (New York 1933) 1:29 n., 501 n.; 2:3. J. LENEVE, Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae 1300–1541 (1716) v.5.

[F. D. BLACKLEY]

JOHN OF AVILA, ST.

Preacher, spiritual director, and mystical writer; b. Almodóvar del Campo (New Castile), Spain, 1500 (1499); d. Montilla (Córdoba), May 10, 1569. He was born of a wealthy and pious family and received an excellent education. At the age of 14 he was sent to the University of Salamanca to study law, but he soon abandoned this profession in favor of training in philosophy and theology. These he studied at Alcalá, where he was a student of Domingo de Soto. John's parents died leaving him the sole heir of the family fortune, but after his ordination he distributed his inheritance to the poor and prepared to become a missionary in America. In 1527 he went to Seville from whence he hoped to journey to Mexico, but there Abp. Hernando de Contreras persuaded him to stay and work for the faith in Spain.

As a missionary in Andalusia for nine years, he attracted great crowds by his magnificent preaching and was in great demand for confession and spiritual direction. However, his strong pleas for reform and his denunciation of vice in high places won him the enmity of certain influential persons. He was accused before the Inquisition, but the charges were easily refuted and he was declared innocent in 1533. From Seville he went to Córdoba and then to Granada in 1537 where he collaborated with Abp. Gaspare Avalos in the organization of the university there.

John of Avila's greatest work was as a reformer of clerical life in Spain. He became the center of a circle of disciples, secular priests of devout life who dedicated themselves to the spiritual direction and teaching of youths in the colleges that John founded. Outstanding among these clerical schools was the University of Baeza, which became a model for seminaries and for the schools of the Jesuits. Among the many saintly persons who enjoyed the friendship and spiritual direction of John of Avila were St. John of God, St. Francis Borgia, St. Teresa of Avila, and Louis of Granada, who wrote a biography of John. He is especially revered by the Jesuits with whom he had a close relationship and whose work he particularly encouraged. The spread of the Society of Jesus in Spain was greatly facilitated by his friendship and support.

His Audi filia is a masterwork on Christian perfection and a singularly fine example of the mystical literature of the period. His other writings include many sermons and letters of spiritual direction that are considered classics of Spanish literature. Not long after his death his writings were collected and translated into other languages. A critical and annotated edition of John's works was published in 1952 by Luigi Sala Balust. John of Avila was beatified by Leo XIII on April 15, 1894 and canonized by Paul VI on May 31, 1970.

Feast: May 10.

Bibliography: Obras completas, ed. L. SALA BALUST, 2 V. (BAC; 1952-53); Lettres de direction, ed. and tr. J. M. DE BUCK (Louvain 1927). Certain selected spiritual epistles, 1631 (Ilkley, Eng. 1977). L. DE ODDI, Life of the Blessed Master John of Avila, ed. J. G. MACLEOD (New York 1898), tr. from Ital. Baudot-Chaussin 13:37-45. C. M. NANNEI, La Doctrina cristiana de San Juan de Avila: Contribución al estudio de su doctrina catequética (Pamplona 1977). J. GAUTIER, Catholicisme 6:417-419. Vidas del padre maestro Juan de Avila, Luis de Granada, Luis Muñoz, ed. L. S. BALUST (Barcelona 1964).

[J. C. WILLKE]

JOHN OF BASTONE, BL.

Sylvestrine monk; b. early 13th century; d. Fabriano, Italy, March 24, 1290. John joined SILVESTER GUZZOLINI as a teacher of grammar in Fabriano and was later ordained. He lived for 60 years as a Sylvestrine BENEDICTINE in the monastery of Monte Fano. His cult was approved by Pope CLEMENT XIV in 1772, and his relics are kept in the church of San Benedetto near Fabriano. Andreas Jacobi (d. 1326) of Fabriano, a confrere of John, wrote a vita that is published along with the Acta canonizationis (Rome 1772) and edited in altered form by J. Mercati (Camerino 1613).

Feast: March 24.

Bibliography: G. GUIDI, Brevi notizie. . . del b. Giovanni del Bastone (Fabriano 1916). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898-1901; suppl. 1911) 4335. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933-38) 1: 367-370. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 5:1006.

[C. R. BYERLY]

JOHN OF BEVERLEY, ST.

Anglo-Saxon bishop of Hexham and York; b. Harpham, Humberside; d. Beverley, England, May 7, 721. He was of noble birth and was a disciple of HILDA at WHITBY and later of Abp. THEODORE OF CANTERBURY. Consecrated bishop of Hexham in 687, he ordained BEDE deacon in 692 and priest in 703. In 705 he was translated to YORK as successor to WILFRID OF YORK. John resigned this see in 720, consecrating Wilfrid the younger as his successor. He retired to the monastery he had founded in Beverley and died shortly afterward. His cult became very popular in the north of England, and his shrine at Beverley was a place of pilgrimage and sanctuary all through the Middle Ages. Bede, the main source for his life, tells a number of delightful stories of the miracles he performed. His relics are still at Beverley Minster.

Feast: May 7; Oct. 25 (translation).

Bibliography: W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 10:872-873. BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 4.23; 5.2, 3, 24. FOLCARD, The Historians of the Church of York and Its Archbishops, ed. J. RAINE (Rerum Britannicarum mediæ aevi scriptores 71; 1879) 239–260.

[B. COLGRAVE]

JOHN OF BICLARO

Bishop of Gerona, historian; b. Scallabis, Lusitania, Portugal, c. 540, of Catholic Visigothic nobility; d. Gerona?, after 621. He was a contemporary of ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (Vir. ill., 44). On his return to Spain c. 576, after 16 years of study in Constantinople, he was exiled to Arian Barcelona because of his faith. After the death of Leovigild (569–586) John founded the monastery of Biclara (location unknown). As its abbot, he also wrote a rule, no longer extant. He attended councils in Saragossa in 592, Toledo in 597 and 610, Barcelona in 599, and Egara in 614. His chronicle (567–590) continued that of VICTOR OF TUNNUNA, whose erroneous chronology he adopted until 583. On firsthand information John described the politically active reign of Leovigild, to whom he was loyal despite religious differences. In his work John reported on the rebels exiled to far parts of Spain; the rebellion of Leovigild's Catholic son HERMENEGILD in Seville (579–584); the conversion to Catholicism of King Reccared and the Visigoths in 587; attacks by the Franks in Visigothic Gaul; and Byzantine, Lombard, and North African history. He gave the regnal years for both Byzantine and Visigothic rulers but did not use the Spanish Era. Isidore's comprehensive work supplanted John's chronicle.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Auctores antiquissimi (Berlin 1826–) 11:207–220. Juan de Biclara, ed. J. CAMPOS (Madrid 1960). O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 5 v. (Freiburg 1913–32) 5:396–398. B. SÁNCHEZ ALONSO, Historia de la historiografía española (2d ed. Madrid 1947–) v. 1. H. BRAUNERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1010.

[E. P. COLBERT]

JOHN OF BRIDLINGTON, ST.

The last Englishman to be canonized until modern times; b. Thwing, York, c. 1320; d. Bridlington, 1379. He studied at Oxford for three years (1335–38) before entering the CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE at St. Mary, Bridlington, near Thwing. In 1361 he was elected prior. He was venerated as a saint during his lifetime, and was canonized by Boniface IX, Sept. 24, 1401. The prophecies under his name are now known to have been written by John Erghome.

Feast: Oct. 21 (formerly Oct. 10).

Bibliography: Sources. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 5:135–144; Oct. Suppl. 42. P. GROSJEAN, Analecta Bollandiana 53 (1935) 101–129. Literature. C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 10:888. J. S. PURVIS, St. John of Bridlington (Bridlington, Eng. 1924). A. O. GWYNN, The English Austin Friars (London 1940) 134–138, 220–221. D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England 2:117–118. A. B. EMDEN, Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Cambridge before 1500 1:265.

[T. P. DUNNING]

JOHN OF BROMYARD

English Dominican preacher; from the name Bromyard it is conjectured that he was born in Herefordshire, England; d. 1352(?). Probably a student at Oxford, he was licensed to hear confessions in the Hereford diocese from 1326 to 1352. He prepared his Opus trivium, or Distinctiones Bromyard, a compilation from the divine, canonical, and civil laws, as a handbook for preachers. A revised and augmented version of this work, entitled Summa praedicatorum, was a voluminous source of moral and anecdotal sermon materials arranged in alphabetical form. The Summa was highly esteemed during the later Middle Ages. It was multiplied in manuscripts and went through many printed editions (the first, at Basel, 1474), and served for years as a manual for preachers. The prologue to the Summa indicates its relationship to the Opus trivium. Bromyard further prepared notes for sermons, entitled also Distinctiones. The Summa was formerly ascribed to another John Bromyard (d. after 1397), who was at one time chancellor of Cambridge, prior of the Dominican priory of Hereford, and member of the 1382 London Black Friars council, which condemned the errors of John WYCLIF. From internal textual evidence, contemporary allusions in the Summa, and a sermon of Bp. John de SHEPEY OF ROCHESTER preached in 1354, it is now clear that the later Bromyard was not the author.

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:278. G. R. OWST, Preaching in Medieval England (Cambridge, Eng. 1926); Literature and Pulpit in Medieval England (2d ed. New York 1961) 224, 595.

[A. DABASH]

JOHN OF CARAMOLA, BL.

Cistercian brother, ascetic; b. Toulouse, France; d. Sagittario, Italy, Aug. 26, 1339. John was a native of the city of Toulouse, but he led the austere life of a hermit for several years in the remote wilderness on Mt. Caramola in Lucania, Italy. During the whole period of Lent, he allowed himself bread sufficient for only one small meal. He lived in close communion with God and was reputedly endowed with the gift of prophecy. Because of a severe illness during a very cold winter, he went to the CISTERCIAN monastery of Santa Maria of Sagittario at Chiaramonte to seek assistance. There he continued his austere penitential practices as a lay brother. His diet consisted of small amounts of bread and water; his bed was so small that he could not lie in a normal position. The monks testified that they never saw him sleeping. He edified his confreres by his observance of silence; contemplation was his great occupation. After his death many miracles were attributed to his intercession: e.g., the infirm were cured by touching his incorrupt body, which led to his popular veneration.

Feast: Aug. 26.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum August 5:854–862. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:4369. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:625–626. s. LENSSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense, 2 v. (Tilburg 1948–49; suppl. 1951) 1:194. F. UGHELLI, Italia sacra, ed. N. COLETTI, 10 v. in 9 (2d ed. Venice 1717–22) 7:91–93.

[M. B. MORRIS]

JOHN OF CHÂTILLON, ST.

Abbot and bishop; b. Châtillon, Bretagne, France, c. 1098; d. Quingamp, Feb. 1, 1163. He is sometimes called Jean de Craticula (of the grate) because of the iron grating around his tomb. His parents were Breton. He is often confused with a CISTERCIAN contemporary of the same name whom St. BERNARD sent to found a monastery at Bégard in the Diocese of Tréquier. John became bishop of Aleth and transferred that see to the isle of Aaron, which he renamed Saint-Malo. He was a strict, zealous abbot of the Saint-Croix monastery of the CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE, at Quingamp. He found himself involved in endless litigation when, as bishop, he attempted to replace monks from MARMOUTIER with the canons regular in his cathedral.

Feast: Feb. 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 1:250–254. F. M. DUINE, Catalogue des sources hagiographiques (Paris 1922). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 1:154. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 1:229–230. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg, 1957–65) 5:1022–23.

[E. J. KEALEY]

JOHN OF DUKLA, ST.

(Polish: Jan); observant Franciscan priest; b. c. 1414 in Dukla in the Central Beskid Mountains of Galicia in the southeastern extremity of Poland; d. Sept. 29, 1484 at Lviv (Lvov), now in the western Ukraine; canonized June 10, 1997.

John of Dukla was born into a middle-class family. He studied at the Jagiellonian University of Krakow, which had been founded by Queen St. Hedwig. After living as a hermit in Dukla, John became a Franciscan at Lemberg (1440), where he was ordained and served for a time as guardian. About this time he realized that he must share the fruit of his contemplation with souls seeking salvation. At the instigation of John of Capistrano, he became a member of the Observant Franciscans (Bernardines) in 1463. Thereafter, John was a successful missionary in Galicia, especially among the Ruthenian schismatics and the German burghers of Lviv. Impassioned preaching, pastoral zeal, ardent prayer, patience, and charity were hallmarks of his sanctity. Blinded in old age, he continued to hear confessions and preached by having others read his sermons. Originally, his remains were buried in the cemetery of Lviv. In 1945 the body was translated to Rzeszow, then to the church of the Franciscans at Dukla. Although John was beatified in 1733 by Pope Clement XII, his canonization had been delayed due to the partition of Poland. He is one of the patrons of Poland and Lithuania.

Feast: July 10 (formerly Sept. 28 and Oct. 1).

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 26 (1997) 8, 11; no. 27 (1997) 6–8, 11.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JOHN OF DUMBLETON

Oxford philosopher; fl. 1338–49. A native of Dumbleton in Gloucestershire in the diocese of Worcester, he is first mentioned as a fellow of Merton College in the scrutinies of 1338–39. He was named a foundation fellow of Queen's College in the founder's statutes of Feb. 10, 1340. By this date he had completed his regency in arts and was enrolled in the faculty of theology, intending to take Holy Orders. However, he returned to Merton where he remained at least until 1348. He is assumed to have died of the plague around 1349, a "bachelor of sacred theology." His fame rests largely on his unpublished Summa logicae et philosophiae naturalis, begun after 1335 and ending abruptly in part nine of ten projected. This work is also known as Summa theologiae maior, Summa philosophiae, and In philosophiam moralem lib.

X. Other works attributed to him by Leland, Tanner, Coxe, Poole, and Duhem are insufficiently established. An Ockhamist in logic and natural philosophy, he also accepted enthusiastically the mathematical theorem of THOMAS BRADWARDINE and tried to apply it to new problems of intension and remission of velocities, densities, illumination, and certitude. Although largely unsuccessful in this, he prepared the way for the completely mathematical approach of RICHARD OF SWYNESHED.

See Also: OCKHAMISM; SCIENCE (IN THE MIDDLE AGES).

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 1:603. J. A. WEISHEIPL, “Place of John Dumbleton in the Merton School,” Isis 50 (1959) 439–454.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

JOHN OF EGYPT, ST.

Hermit of Lycopolis, b. Lycopolis (modern Asyut), c. 300; d. near Lycopolis, 394. A carpenter, he entered a monastery between the ages of 25 and 30, and after several years there he became a hermit in a cave on Mt. Lykos, where he remained until his death some 40 years later. John, who communicated with visitors only through a window, was sought for spiritual advice and was reputed to have the gift of prophecy, so that he was known as the Seer. Legend credits him with having foretold the victories of the Roman Emperor THEODOSIUS I over Maximus and Eugenius, as well as the death of the Emperor himself (395).

Feast: Mar. 27; Oct. 17 (Coptic Church).

Bibliography: PALLADIUS OF HELENOPOLIS, Historia Lausica, Patrologia Graeca 34:1107–15, new ed. by A. J. FESTUGIÈRE in Historia Monachorum in Aegypto (Subsidia hagiographica 34; 1961) 9–35. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca 3:34.

[G. T. DENNIS]

JOHN OF EPHEBUS

Sixth century Monophysite bishop and Church historian; b. near Amida (DIARBEKR), c. 507; d. 586. John of Ephesus, known also as John of Asia or of Amida, began his career as a monk. Because of the anti-Monophysite decrees of JUSTIN I (521) he was forced to lead a nomadic life. Going to Constantinople, he gained the favor of Empress THEODORA (1) and, through her, of JUSTINIAN I. He became “titular” bishop of Ephesus (c. 542) and was sent to convert the pagans of the mountainous areas of Lydia and Caria in Asia Minor. His efforts were most successful; more than 70,000 persons were baptized, pagan temples were destroyed, and Christian churches and monasteries were built in their places. Under JUSTIN II John’s fervent Monophysitism led to his imprisonment. After being released, he wandered about until his death.

John of Ephesus is the most important early historian in the Syriac language. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History in three volumes, tracing Church history from the time of Julius Caesar to 585. Only the third volume is extant (years 571–585). He was also the author of Lives of the Eastern Saints (c. 568), which contains 58 sketches of the lives of Oriental monks and ascetics.

Bibliography: Lives of the Eastern Saints, ed. and tr. E. W. BROOKS, 17 v. (Paris 1923–25). Patrologia orientalis, ed. R. GRAFFIN and F. NAU (Paris 1903—) 17.1; 18.4; 19.2. Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium (Paris-Louvain 1903) 105. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949–59) 371–372, 683–684, 829–831. H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1030. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 258. E. TISSERANT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:752–753. L. DUCHESNE, L’Église au VI<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1925) 276–280.

[J. F. KRASTEL]

JOHN OF FALKENBERG

Polish Dominican, polemicist, b. Danzig, Pomerania, c. 1365; d. Legnica, Poland, c. 1435. He entered the Order of Preachers and spent his novitiate at Kammin in his native Pomerania. In 1385 he was master of theology at the studium in Vienna, in 1408 he was preaching in Prague, and in 1411 he functioned as inquisitor at Magdeburg. In opposition to the Dominican Master General Leonard de Datis, Falkenberg declared himself a supporter of GREGORY XII (1406–15), the Pope in Rome during the WESTERN SCHISM. In 1406 Falkenberg attacked Matthew of Cracow. In the long altercation between the Teutonic Knights and the Polish King, he allied himself with the former; in a violent tractate (or Satira), De monarchia mundi, written in 1410, he defended the cause of the Knights against the king. During the Council of CONSTANCE he maintained the morality of tyrannicide as advocated by Joannes Parvus and wrote his Tres tractuli in answer to Gerson, Peter of Ailly, and others who condemned the works of Parvus. Nicholas, Archbishop of Gniezno, insisted that the council examine the De monarchia and a conciliar committee ordered it burned (1417). A chapter of the Dominican Order at Strasbourg in 1417 also condemned the work and sentenced Falkenberg to life imprisonment. The Poles and Lithuanians at Constance continued to urge the council as a whole to condemn Falkenberg for heresy, but Pope Martin V refused to ratify any such sentence, saying that he confirmed only what the council had done conciliariter circa materiam fidei. However, when the pope returned to Rome (May 1418), he took Falkenberg with him and kept him in confinement until 1424.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.2:760–761. B. BESS, “Johannes Falkenberg, O.P. und der preussisch-polnische Streit vor dem Konstanzer Konzil,” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 16 (1896) 385–464. G. SOMMERFELDT, “Johann Falkenberg,” Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 39 (1915) 803–805. H. FINKE, ed., Acta concilii Constanciensis 4:249–254, 352–432. H. J. SCHROEDER, Disciplinary Decrees of the General Councils (St. Louis 1937) 451. H. TÜCHLE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1031–32. The Council of Constance, tr. L. R. LOOMIS, ed. J. H. MUNDY and K. M. WOODY (New York 1961).

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

JOHN OF FECKENHAM

Alias Howman, Marian abbot of Westminster; b. Feckenham, Worcestershire, c. 1512; d. Wisbech Castle, Cambridgeshire, c. October 1584. Of a yeoman family, he was educated probably at the almonry school at the Benedictine abbey of Evesham; he was professed there, taking—as was then usual—the name of his hometown. Sent to the Benedictine Oxford college, Gloucester Hall, Feckenham graduated Bachelor of Divinity in 1539. His monastery was dissolved by Henry VIII in January of 1540 after which he became, in succession, chaplain to the two religiously conservative bishops, Bell of Worcester and Bonner of London. Like them he accepted the royal supremacy, but rejected Protestantism and for this he was imprisoned (1551–53). At the accession of the Catholic Queen Mary he was released, reconciled to the Church, and made dean of St. Paul’s, London, in January of 1554. He played a minor part in the restoration of Catholicism. By November 1556 Westminster Abbey was restored as a monastery to a group of some 20 former monks, mostly former colleagues at Gloucester Hall, and Feckenham was elected abbot. Cardinal Reginald Pole intended to introduce there the reformed observance of the Cassinese Congregation and to make Westminster the seedbed for the gradual restoration of reformed Benedictines, Cistercians, and Augustinian Canons throughout England. But very little of this program had been achieved when Pole and Queen Mary died in November of 1558. Feckenham spoke in the House of Lords against the Elizabethan Bills of Supremacy, First Fruits, and Uniformity. By June of 1559 the Westminster community was dispersed by royal orders, and on May 20, 1560 Feckenham was sent to the Tower for opposing Elizabeth-than policies. He remained in custody for the rest of his life. Although he was accused of wavering in his Catholicism, the truth seems to be that he was always eager to attend Protestant sermons so as to debate afterward with the preachers and that he was willing (the royal ecclesiastical supremacy apart) to accept Elizabeth as the rightful queen, all papal bulls to the contrary notwithstanding. He is important as the only Marian prelate to have left any body of theological writings.

Bibliography: H. AVELING, Dictionnaire d’histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng 1948–60) 3:421–443.

[H. AVELING]

JOHN OF FREIBURG (RUMSIK)

Dominican, moralist, canonist, lector at Freiburg im Breisgau; b. Haslach(?), date unknown; d. March 10, 1314, Freiburg. He wrote a Summa Confessorum (1280–98) that made pastoral theology a science by relating its material to speculative moral principles, especially those of St. THOMAS AQUINAS. This work, the classic in its genre, was inspired by the Summa de poenitentiis of St. RAYMOND OF PEÑAFORT. Many manuscripts, an alphabetically arranged German version by Berthold Huenlin, OP (11 ed. between 1472–98), and a French extract, La règle des marchands, attest its opportuneness. John also wrote a Manuale, an epitome of his Summa, a Confessionale for less skilled confessors, Additiones to Raymond’s Summa, a Tabula to the text and gloss of the same Summa, a Quaestiones causales (1280), and perhaps a commentary on the Sentences.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 1.1:523–526. M. D. CHENU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:761–762. W. MÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1033–34.

[W. A. HINNEBUSCH]

JOHN OF GOD, ST.

Founder of the Brothers Hospitallers; b. John Ciudad, in Montemor-o-Novo, Portugal, March 8, 1495; d. Granada, Spain, March 8, 1550. John Ciudad, as a youth, was a shepherd in the service of the bailiff of the count of Oropusa in Castile. In 1522 he enlisted in a company of soldiers raised by the count, and fought in wars between the Spaniards and French, and later, in Hungary, against the Turks. While a soldier, he gave up the practice of his religion and lived an immoral life.

At about the age of 40 he left the military life and returned to Spain, where he became a shepherd. He became remorseful over his sinful life while a soldier and attempted to enter Africa to ransom captives and, possibly, to become a martyr. Assured by a confessor that his wish for martyrdom was ill founded, he returned to Spain. In 1538 he opened a small shop in Granada, where he sold books and religious pictures. Here, influenced by a sermon of St. JOHN OF AVILA, he became very extreme in his conduct, running about the city praying for mercy. For some months he was committed to a lunatic asylum. Through the counsel of John of Avila, he recovered and devoted himself to the care of the sick poor.

In Granada he rented a house, which he supported by his own labor and in which he cared for the abandoned sick of the city. He soon attracted others to the work, and his apostolate of the sick won the approval of the archbishop of Granada. John was an able administrator; he operated his hospital in a businesslike way and was consulted on the setting up of homes for the sick in other parts of the country.

He had no thought, it seems, of founding a religious community. His work drew others into the care of the sick. The bishop of Tuy, who gave him the name John of God, prescribed a habit for him and his companions. A rule, bearing his name, was drawn up after he died, and his followers were approved as a religious congregation in 1571 by PIUS V. Final approval was given to the order in 1596 by SIXTUS V.

John was canonized by ALEXANDER VIII in 1690, although the bull was not issued until the following year, by INNOCENT XII. In 1886 LEO XIII declared St. John, with St. CAMILLUS DE LELLIS, patron of hospitals and the sick. In 1930 PIUS XI declared him patron of nurses. He is also honored by booksellers and printers. Generally St. John is pictured with the symbol of a pomegranate surmounted by a small cross; the pomegranate stands for the city of Granada and refers to the legendary visitation he received from the Child Jesus, who told him, "Thou wilt find thy cross in Granada."

Feast: March 8.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 1 (1668) 814-60. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:517-520. PIUS XI, "Expedit plane" (apostolic letter, August 28, 1930) Acta Apostolicae Sedis S 23 (1931) 8-9. M. GÓMEZ-MORENO, Prinicias históricas de San Juan de Dios (Madrid 1950), N. MCMAHON, St. John of God (New York 1953). W. CROSS, St. John of God: Patron Saint of Hospitals, the Sick, Nurses and All Who Look After the Sick (London 1977). R. D. RUMBAUT, John of God: His Place in the History of Psychiatry and Medicine (Miami, Fla. 1978). P. DREYFUS, Saint Jean de Dieu: le père de l'hôpital moderne / Paul Dreyfus (Paris 1995), includes extensive bibliography. A. DE GOUVEIA, Vida e morte de S. João de Deus: seguida das cartas do Santo e da sua iconografia, ed. M. CADAFAZ DE MATOS, tr. M. DE ANDRADE (Lisbon 1996). ORDEN

St. John of God.

HOSPITALARIA DE SAN JUAN DE DIOS, Iconografía: San Juan de Dios in México, América Central (Mexico City 1997).

[T. J. MUNN]

JOHN OF GORZE, ST.

Abbot and monastic reformer (known also as Jean de Vandières); b. Vandières, France, late 9th century; d. c. 975. He was the son of a wealthy landowner and, according to his biographer, John, Abbot of Saint-Arnulf (d. 977), he studied for a time at METZ and later at the Abbey of SAINT-MIHIEL in the Moselle Valley. Upon the death of his father and his mother's remarriage, John was forced to interrupt his studies to care for his ancestral estate and the education of his younger brothers, but he resumed his studies at Toul, under the direction of Bernerus the Deacon. Already cherishing a desire for the more perfect life, he made a pilgrimage to Rome and visited MONTE CASSINO. Upon his return he met the deeply spiritual Einold, archdeacon of Toul, and spent some time under his direction. In 933 Einold and John with five companions went to the Abbey of GORZE to reestablish monastic discipline there according to the wish of ADALBERO, bishop of Metz. Einold became abbot and John, his loyal supporter, functioning as procurator, was busy with the physical restoration of the monastery, which had suffered from the ravages of the Normans, as well as with the spiritual reform of the monks. In 953 John went to CORDOBA, where he spent 3 years as the envoy of OTTO I to the Umayyad Caliph Abd-er-Rahman III (d. 961). After the death of Einold, John became abbot and played a leading role in the monastic reform movement of which Gorze was the center. The exact date of John's death is not known, but it is known that he died in the 40th year of his monastic profession.

Feast: Feb. 27 or March 7.

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum Feb. 3:691–721. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum (Berlin 1826) 4:335–377. A. D'HERBOMEZ, ed., Cartulaire de l'abbaye de Gorze (Paris 1898) 169–206. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 1:258–261. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et des prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:13033–04. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 7:420–421. Vies des saintes et des bienheureux 2:574–578. S. HILPISCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1038. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 6:437–438. E. SACKUR, Die Cluniacenser, 2 v. (Halle 1892–94), 1:146–150, 2:358–361.

[H. DRESSLER]

JOHN OF HOVEDEN

John of Hoveden (present-day Howden in Yorkshire) is the name of several illustrious men in the 13th century. The most famous was an English religious poet, d. after 1275. It is difficult to determine the facts of his life. He may be the astrologer of that name, who is known to have been born in London. The poet reputedly studied at the University of OXFORD, and although the official records of the school do not report his attendance, his scientific outlook as reflected in his poetical works tends to corroborate an Oxford education. It is certain that by 1268 he was a clerk of Queen Eleanor of Provence, wife of King HENRY III of England and mother of King EDWARD I. It seems that he was one of the first prebendaries of the collegiate church of Howden, where he undertook to rebuild the choir and was eventually buried. It is known that he was made canon and prebendary of the king's free chapel in Bridgnorth Castle, Salop; some aver that he had vacated this position by 1275; others claim that he still held it in 1284 but not in 1291. The mystical poetry of Hoveden was of an uncommonly high order, original and wide-ranging. His masterpiece was undoubtedly the Philomena, a work of 4,000 lines on the birth, Passion, and Resurrection of Christ. His eight other Latin poems include the Canticum amoris, which is a kind of preliminary sketch of the Philomena, and the 723-stanza Quinquaginta cantica salvatoris. The Quindecim gaudia BMV dwells on the 15 joys of Mary; the very similar Cythara treats of the love and Passion of Christ. The Quinquaginta salutationes is on the sorrows of Mary. The Viola praises the Virgin in 250 verses, while the short work Lyra is especially interesting because in its musical setting it is a conductus duplex in the manner of the Notre-Dame school. Hoveden's only surviving poem in Anglo-Norman is the Rossignol (see L. W. Stone), addressed to Queen Eleanor and on the same theme as the Philomena. He is also credited with a scientific treatise, Practica chilindri (ed. E. Brock, Essays on Chaucer, Chaucer Society 1868).

As a religious poet of 13th-century England, Hoveden belongs in the front rank beside JOHN PECKHAM. An inheritor of the Bernardine and Franciscan tradition of spirituality (see FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALITY), he was a precursor of the great 14th-century mystics, and Richard ROLLE DE HAMPOLE especially shows Hoveden's influence (see HYMNOLOGY).

Bibliography: Works. C. BLUME, ed., "Johannis de Hovedene Philomena," Hymnologische Beiträge 4 (Leipzig 1930). The Poems of John of Hoveden, ed. F. J. E. RABY (Surtees Society 154; London 1939). L. W. STONE, "Jean de Howden, poète anglo-normand du XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle," Romania 69 (1946–47) 496–519. Literature. F. J. E. RABY, "John of Hoveden," Laudate 12 (1935) 87–. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (2d ed. Oxford 1953) 389–395. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:974–975. J. SZÖVÉRFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung. Ein Handbuch, 2 v. (Berlin 1964–65) 2:82, 259–262.

[M. J. HAMILTON]

JOHN OF JANDUN

Averroist master of arts at Paris; b. Jandun, Ardennes, France, c. 1275; d. Todi, Italy, 1328. He studied arts at the University of Paris, where he taught and became an intimate friend of MARSILIUS OF PADUA. In 1316 he obtained a canonry at Senlis. The foremost advocate of Latin Averroism in his day, he described himself as "a mimic of Aristotle and AVERROËS" [In Metaph. (Venice 1525) folio 84]. In his commentaries on Aristotle's De anima (Venice 1473), Physics (Venice 1488), De caelo et mundo (Venice 1501), Parva naturalia (Venice 1505), and Metaphysics he strongly defended all the basic teachings of Latin Averroism, especially the eternity of the world and motion, unicity of the human intellect, denial of personal immortality, and personal responsibility in moral actions (see AVERROISM, LATIN; INTELLECT, UNITY OF; SCHOLASTICISM, 1). Unlike SIGER OF BRABANT and BOETHIUS OF SWEDEN, he explicitly taught the doctrine of a double truth and gave greater weight to truths demonstrated by reason than to truths revealed by faith (see DOUBLE TRUTH, THEORY OF). While teaching in Paris he collaborated with or at least gave some kind of assistance to Marsilius of Padua in the composition of Defensor pacis. When authorship of this antipapal work became known in 1324, he was forced to leave Paris with Marsilius. In 1326 he sought the protection of LOUIS IV the Bavarian, together with Marsilius of Padua, WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, and MICHAEL OF CESENA. In 1327 many propositions extracted from Defensor pacis were condemned by JOHN XXII; John of Jandun was explicitly mentioned in the bull of condemnation. Louis IV nominated him bishop of Ferrara in 1328, but it is doubtful that he was ever consecrated.

Besides commenting on the works of Aristotle, he wrote De laudibus Parisius, Quaestiones de formatione foetus, Quaestiones de gradibus et pluralitate formarum, Tractatus de specie intelligibili, Duo tractatus de sensu agente, and a commentary on Averroës' De substantia orbis.

While professedly admitting all the truths of faith, he adamantly denied that reason could prove that the higher faculties of man's soul—the possible intellect, the agent intellect, and the will—are immaterial and spiritual. Similarly, he believed in creation ex nihilo, although this doctrine seemed to him to be absolutely incomprehensible. He remarked, "I believe that this is true, but I do not know how to prove it; good for those who do" (sed demonstrare nescio; gaudeant qui hoc sciunt). Because of many such remarks, it is impossible to know whether John scoffed at Christian faith or merely sneered at the simplicity of theologians who pretended to prove what they held only on faith.

Bibliography: A. POMPEI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:760–761. N. VALOIS, "Jean de Jandun et Marsile de Padoue," Histoire littéraire de la France, 33 (1906) 528–623. E. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy, 522–524. E. SANTOVITO, Enciclopedia cattolica, ed. P. PASCHINI et al., 12 v. (Rome 1949–54) 6:566. B. NARDI, Sigieri di Brabante nel pensiero del Rinascimento italiano (Rome 1945). U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Bibliographie, 2 v. (2d ed. Paris 1905–07) 2426. S. MCCLINTOCK, Perversity and Error: Studies on the Averroist John of Jandun (pa. Bloomington, Ind. 1956).

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

JOHN OF JERUSALEM

Fourth century Palestinian bishop; d. 417. John succeeded Cyril as bishop of Jerusalem in 387. His relations with JEROME and RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA were excellent at first—all shared in enthusiasm for ORIGEN. In 393, however, EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS, following his emissary, the monk Atarbius to Palestine, preached a thunderous sermon against Origen in John's own church and presence. While Rufinus was unimpressed and John indignant, Jerome joined Epiphanius in attacking John. John denied the Bethlehem monks access to the holy places in Jerusalem and refused to baptize their converts or bury their dead. In the fall of 396 Jerome published his virulent broadsheet, To Pammachius, against John of Jerusalem [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 23:371–412].

THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA, whose sympathies then lay with John and Rufinus, effected a reconciliation at Easter in 397. When the quarrel between Jerome and Rufinus flared up again, John held aloof; he attended Paula's funeral in 404. When PELAGIUS, whose ally Caelestius had already been condemned at Carthage, came to Palestine, John received him kindly, whereas Jerome was hostile; AUGUSTINE sent Orosius to Bethlehem to alert the monks. Pelagius confronted Orosius at a Jerusalem diocesan synod in July 415. Orosius (Lib. Apol. 3–7) alleged that Pelagius taught a doctrine opposed by Augustine; but "I," said John, "am Augustine here." There was, apparently, interpreter trouble; but verbal agreement was reached, to Orosius's annoyance, on the formula, "God can enable the earnest man to avoid sin," and John declared Pelagius innocent. In December John attended the metropolitan synod at Diospolis, where Pelagius was again acquitted. John is probably the bishop of Jerusalem mentioned in Egeria's Pilgrimage.

Arabic Manuscripts of Mount Sinai, edited by A. S. ATIYA, lists unpublished sermons of John (codex 309). The evidence very slightly favors John's authorship of the Mystagogical Catecheses ascribed in most manuscripts to his predecessor Cyril. The tenth century Munich manuscript attributes them to John, and three other manuscripts attribute them to "Cyril and John." While the converse often happens, the works of famous men are not easily attributed to unknown authors. John may have simply borrowed his predecessor's Mystagogiae; or if they are his own, they may be quite heavily indebted to Cyril. It is probable that the need to complete Cyril's pre-baptismal catecheses, which originally, at least in some manuscripts, circulated alone, was felt, John's Mystagogiae were added, and either (W. TELFER) the difference in authorship was not always copied or (T. SCHERMANN) scribes gradually displaced John's name in the manuscripts by that of the famous catechist.

Bibliography: W. J. SWAANS, Muséon 55 (1942) 1–43. W. J. SWAANS and RICHARD, Mélanges de science religieuse 5 (1948) 282, support John's authorship. P. PEETERS, Analecta Bollandiana (1943) 270–271, doubts Cyril's authorship. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950—) 3:362–367 and St. Cyril of Jerusalem's Lectures on the Christian Sacraments, ed. F. L. CROSS, Society for Promoting Christian knowledge (London 1951) consider the case for John still unproved. J. FERGUSON, Pelagius: A Historical and Theological Study (Cambridge, Eng. 1956). F. CAVALLERA, Saint Jérôme, 2 v. Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense (Louvain 1922) 1, 2; 1:193–227; 323–329; 2:31–36, 91–96. T. SCHERMANN, Theologische Revue, 10 (1911) 575–579. A. S. ATIYA, A Hand List of Arabic manuscripts and Scrolls Microfilmed at the Library of the Monastery of St. Catherine (Baltimore 1955).

[A. A. STEPHENSON]

JOHN OF JESUS MARY

Or Juan de San Pedro y Ustarroz, educator and mystical writer; b. Calahorra, Logrono, Spain, Jan. 27, 1564; d. Montecompatri, May 29, 1615. He was the son of the famous physician, Diego de San Pedro. He came to know the Discalced Carmelites while studying at Salamanca. He took the habit and was later professed at Pastrana (Jan. 30, 1583). Soon afterward he was appointed professor at the Colegio Complutense. Nicholas Doria chose him for the same office in the newly founded convent of Genoa, Italy, where he was ordained priest in 1590. He accompanied Doria to Cremona for the general chapter of the Carmelite Order (1593) that decreed the separation of the Reform from the old Order of Carmel. On his return from the general chapter, he was appointed master of novices at St. Ann's of Genoa (1593–98) and was later transferred to the novitiate of La Scala in Rome, where he served first as assistant to the master of novices (1599–1601), then as master of novices (1601–11). He took an active part in the foundation of the Italian Congregation. At its first general chapter (1605), he was elected second definator and procurator general (1608–11); he finally became general in 1611. Completing his term as general in 1614, he retired to the convent of St. Sylvester in Montecompatri.

Almost all his writings deal with the proper spiritual formation of religious, both superiors and subjects; his published writings number 65. These appeared together in a three-volume collection, first published in Cologne (1622), and again in Florence (1771–74).

Bibliography: FLORENCIO DEL NIÑO JESÚS, El ven. P. fr. Juan de Jesús María (Burgos 1919). E. A. PEERS, Studies of the Spanish Mystics, 3 v. (London 1960) v.3. PIER GIORGIO DEL SACRO CUORE, La contemplazione secondo il Ven. P. Giovanni di Gesù Maria (Cremona, Italy 1950).

[O. RODRÍGUEZ]

JOHN OF LA ROCHELLE (DE RUPELLA)

Franciscan philosopher and theologian; b. La Rochelle, France, c. 1190–1200; d. Paris(?), Feb. 8, 1245.

The first clear reference is a listing of him as a friar and master of theology (1238). It is probable that he was already a master or at least licensed in theology when he entered the order. Before coming into intimate association with ALEXANDER OF HALES, John seems to have planned and partly written a Summa theologicae disciplinae, as may be concluded from the introduction to his Summa on the Articles of Faith. Much of the material in this Summa was later incorporated into the so-called “Summa of Alexander of Hales.” To this period likewise belongs the Tract on the Soul and the Virtues, and perhaps several of the commentaries on Scripture [confer F. Stegmüller, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 7 v. (Madrid 1949–61) 3:4888–4915].

Under the guidance and inspiration of Alexander, John achieved maturity as a theologian. After 1236 he was the faithful companion and helper of this “monarch of theologians.” Together they were the principal counselors of the ministers provincial in the deposition of ELIAS OF CORTONA in 1239 [Analecta Franciscana 1:18; Archivum Franciscanum historicum, 33 (1940) 221–225]. In 1241–42 they wrote an explanation of the Franciscan Rule in collaboration with two other masters [Expositio quatuor magistrorum super regulam fratrum minorum, ed. L. Oligier (Rome 1950)]. Their Disputed Questions are so intermingled that it is sometimes difficult to distinguish those of Alexander from those of John. On his part, John made considerable use of Alexander's Gloss on the Sentences, with material also from PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR, to produce a Summa de anima, justly regarded as the first scholastic text of psychology [ed. T. Domenichelli (Prato 1882)].

This close collaboration bore fruit in the Summa of Theology that bears the name of Alexander; book 1, on God, and book 3, on the Incarnation and Passion, law, grace, and faith, were almost beyond doubt written by John of La Rochelle. At the same time, as a preacher he attained independent fame [confer Eleven Marian Sermons, ed. K. Lynch (St. Bonaventure, N.Y. 1961)]. His last known sermon was before the Roman Curia at Lyons on Dec. 4, 1244. John, like Alexander, died the following year.

Bibliography: V. DOUCET, “Prolegomena” to Alexander of Hales, Summa theologica, book 3 in v.4 (Quaracchi-Florence 1948); “Prolegomena” to Alexander of Hales, Glossa in quatuor libros Sententiarum Petri Lombardi (Bibliotheca Franciscana Scholastica Medii Aevi 12–15; Quaracchi-Florence 1951–57). P. MICHAUD-QUANTIN, “Une Division ‘augustinienne’ des puissances de l'âme au Moyen-âge,” Revue des études augustiniennes, 3 (1957) 235–248. E. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy, 683–685.

[I. C. BRADY]

JOHN OF LA VERNA, BL.

Franciscan priest; b. Fermo, near ANCONA, Italy, 1259; d. La Verna, Aug. 9, 1322. Ascetical even as a child, at ten he joined the Augustinian canons and at 13 the Franciscans. After residing in hermitages in the Marches of Ancona and Fermo, he settled in a hermit's cell at La Verna (Alvernia) c. 1290. He received graces of rapture, infused knowledge, and prophecy. His mystical experiences, described in part in the FIORETTI, included visions of the Sacred Heart, the Blessed Virgin, St. FRANCIS, and St. LAWRENCE. Though he opposed the Franciscan SPIRITUALS, he befriended and gave the last rites to their partisan, the poet JACOPONE DA TODI. In his last years John preached throughout Tuscany, and in 1311 he testified in favor of the PORTIUNCULA indulgence. He wrote the one-page, mystical De gradibus animae, but his authorship of the Preface of St. Francis is disputed. His cult was approved in 1880.

Feast: Aug. 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum August 2:453–474. Fioretti di San Francesco, ch. 49–53; English ed. R. BROWN (Garden City, NY 1958) 155–168, 211–213, 305–307, 329, 332, 343, 347, 349. I fioretti del B. Giovanni della Verna, ed. G. MELANI (La Verna 1959). L. OLIGER, “Il B. Giovanni della Verna,” La Verna (Arezzo 1913) 116–155. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:324–325. D. CRESI, “Il prefazio di S. Francesco,” Studi francescani 35 (1960) 95–102. GIOVANNI DA SETTIMO, Vita del B. Giovanni della Verna, ed. G. MELANI (La Verna 1962).

[R. BROWN]

JOHN OF LANGTON

Bishop, chancellor of England; b. perhaps at Church Langton, Leicestershire; d. Chichester, July 19, 1337. Langton may have been from a landed family and the brother of bishop Walter Langton of Coventry and Lichfield (1296–1321). He obtained his Master of Arts probably at Oxford, to which he left a sum of money for poor students. Langton's early career was spent in the royal chancery where he was competent as an official, but not outstanding as an individual. He was keeper of the rolls before 1286, chancellor for EDWARD I from 1292 to 1302 and for EDWARD II from 1307 to 1310. In 1298 he was the minority candidate for the See of Ely, but despite royal support, did not obtain the bishopric; in 1305, however, he was elected and became bishop of CHICHESTER. During the troubled reign of Edward II he was a moderate and a peacemaker, belonging to the Middle Party and helping to negotiate the Treaty of Leake in 1318. He did not take an active part in the overthrow of Edward II and retired from politics after the coronation of Edward III.

Bibliography: C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 11:561–562. T. F. TOUT, Chapters in the Administrative History of Mediaeval England, 6 v. (New York 1920–33). K. EDWARDS, “The Political Importance of the English Bishops During the Reign of Edward II,” Englist Historical Review (London 1886—) 59 (1944) 311–347; “The Social Origins and Provenance of the English Bishops During the Reign of Edward II,” Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th series 9 (1959) 51–79. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1099–1100.

[F. D. BLACKLEY]

JOHN OF LICHTENBERG

German Dominican Thomist; flourished 1307 to 1313. Sometimes known as Picardi, a family name or sobriquet, and Teutonicus, he lectured at the Dominican priory in Cologne before 1307. As bachelor in theology at Paris (1307–08), he wrote a commentary on the Sentences (Vienna, Biblical Naturalist Manuscript Latin 1114). His studies were interrupted when he was elected provincial of the German province (1308–10), but he returned to Paris in 1310 to become master in theology. He was in the retinue of HENRY VII, Holy Roman Emperor, during his journey to Italy in 1311–12. Named bishop of Regensburg by CLEMENT V in 1313, he did not take possession of the see since the cathedral chapter had already elected another. At an unknown date he discussed and determined 36 Quaestiones at the priory in Cologne (Vat. lat. 859). He was one of the earliest and more important members of the early Thomistic school in Germany.

Bibliography: J. P. MÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1056–57. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23) 1.2:523–526. A. LANDGRAF, “Johannes Picardi de Lichtenberg und seine Quaestiones Disputatae,” Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie (1922) 510–555. M. GRABMANN, “Forschungen zur Geschichte der ältesten deutschen Thomistenschule des Dominikanerordens” in his Mittelalterliches Geistesleben, 3 v. (Munich 1926–56) 1:4104–20. A. FRIES, “Codex Vaticanus Latinus 1114 und der Sentenzenkommentar des Johannes von Lichtenberg,” Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum, 7, (1937) 305–319.

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

JOHN OF LODI, ST.

Benedictine; b. Lodi, Lombardy, Italy, c. 1025–30; d. Gubbio, Sept. 7, 1105. After an excellent education in the liberal arts, he abandoned society for a strict eremitical life. Already a priest, he joined the group of hermits at FONTE AVELLANA (c. 1065) and became the assistant and traveling companion of the elderly (St.) PETER DAMIAN (d. 1072). Shortly after Damian's death he prepared a reliable biography of his master, who had addressed two of his writings to him (Opusc. 44 and Ep. 6.10), and who had entrusted him with the critical revision of his literary works. After 1080 John became prior of the hermitage in Fonte Avellana. In 1104 he was elected bishop of Gubbio, but he died in the first year of his office and was buried in the cathedral of Gubbio.

Feast: Sept. 7.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:4409–10. A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca historica medii aevi (2d ed. 1896; repr. Graz 1954) 2:1400. F. NEUKIRCH, Das Leben des Petrus Damiani (Göttingen 1875). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:25, 27. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 9:148–149. K. REINDEL, "Studien zur Ueberlieferung der Werke des Petrus Damiani," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 15 (1959) 23–102. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Bibliographie, 2 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1905–07) 1204.

[F. DRESSLER]

JOHN OF MATERA, ST.

Also known as John of Pulsano, Benedictine, founder and abbot; b. Matera, Kingdom of Naples, 1070; d. Pulsano, June 20, 1139. Following what he considered divine commands, John spent much of his life journeying from one religious house to another seeking an environment conducive to his severe mortifications. Having lived some years as a hermit, he founded a small monastery at Ginosa (not far from Matera), which was dispersed by the NORMANS. He then joined WILLIAM OF VERCELLI, but he left that community when fire destroyed its buildings. When preaching in Bari, he narrowly escaped being burned as a heretic. Finally he settled at Pulsano near Monte Gargano in Apulia (c. 1130), where he attracted a small group of followers (the now extinct Benedictine Congregation of Pulsano), whom he governed, until his death, according to a strict interpretation of the BENEDICTINE RULE.

Feast: June 20.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 5:33–50. G. J. GIORDANO, Croniche de Monte Vergine (Naples 1649) 520–527. A. F. PECCL, Vita S. Iohannis a Mathera abbatis, Pulsanensis Congregationis fundatoris (Putineani 1938); rev. B. DE GAIFFER, Analecta Bollandiana 57 (1939) 174–176.

[E. J. KEALEY]

JOHN OF MATHA, ST.

Founder of the Trinitarians; b. Faucon (Provence), France, June 23, 1160; d. Rome, Italy, Dec. 17, 1213. He studied and was ordained at Paris and there, presumably, founded the TRINITARIANS in 1197, obtaining approval of his order from INNOCENT III in 1198 or soon after. The order, whose principal houses were at Cerfroid (Dept. Aisne, France) and Rome, devoted itself to ransoming Christians carried into slavery in Africa by the Muslims. John propagated his institute in Italy and Spain as well as France. His alleged connection with FELIX OF VALOIS is unhistorical, and details of his life are very uncertain since the early Trinitarians failed to preserve their archives. Hence the above few facts about John's life are all that can be known with certainty. Stories of his many miracles and of his personal journeys to Africa are largely the invention of 15th and 16th century Trinitarians. John's relics were taken to Madrid in 1655, and in that year and again in 1694 his cult was officially approved.

Feast: Feb. 8.

Bibliography: P. DESLANDRES, L'Ordre des Trinitaires, 2 v. (Paris 1903). G. ANTIGNANI, Vita di Giovanni de Matha e ripercussioni della sua opera nei tempi (Siena 1982). R. CASTAÑO, Nacido para la liberación: San Juan de Mata (Córdoba 1985). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:276–278, indicates the deficiencies in the early history of the Trinitarians.

[A. G. BIGGS]

JOHN OF MECKLENBERG, ST.

First bishop of Mecklenberg and martyr, of Anglo-Saxon ancestry; d. Nov. 10, 1066. The ancient historians of Iceland testify that he was one of several foreign missionaries who preached the faith in that country. John returned to the Continent at the request of Abp. ADALBERT I of Bremen-Hamburg, but it is not clear whether the archbishop sent him to Iceland in the first place. Although of advanced age, John was made the first bishop of Mecklenberg sometime after 1055 and was sent to the Slavic tribes (see SLAVS), including the Wends in Saxony. During an uprising there in 1066 he was captured with many other Christians. When he would not abjure the faith, his hands and feet were amputated; he was decapitated and his head, impaled on a spike, was offered to the tribal god Redigast. John of Mecklenberg is falsely called the first American martyr because the territory Viendland (land of the Wends) is erroneously identified as Vinland, the reputed Norse settlement in North America.

Feast: Nov. 10.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum November 4:564–566. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 29:413. J. FISCHER, "Kann Bischof Johannes aus Irland († 1066) mit Recht als erster Märtyrer Amerikas bezeichnet werden?" Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 24 (1900) 756–758. K. SCHMALTZ, Kirchengeschichte

Mecklenburgs, 3 v. (Schwerin 1935–52) v.1. H. FUHRMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1060.

[V. A. SCHAEFER]

JOHN OF MIRECOURT

Cistercian scholastic theologian of French origin (de Mirecuria, Vosges), often referred to simply as the white monk (monachus albus); flourished Paris 1345–47. He studied theology at Paris. In 1345 he was a bachelor of theology and wrote a commentary on the Sentences. In 1347 Parisian masters of theology censured 63 propositions from this commentary; later the chancellor, acting on the advice of the masters, condemned 41 of these [Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, ed. H. Denifle and E. Chatelain, 4 v. (Paris 1889–97) 2:610–614]. To each of these university actions John reacted with an apology justifying his position [Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 5 (1933) 40–78; 192–204]. Two versions of the commentary are extant, but the second seems to be an anonymous compilation based on the first. Neither version has been published. It is most likely that John never became a master in theology.

Two themes are dominant through the commentary, namely, the difficulty of attaining human certitude and the capacity of nature in moral matters. For John, there is little hope of more than mere probability because (1) it is rarely possible to reduce proofs to the basic first principle that contradictories cannot be true at one and the same time, since sense knowledge is deceptive, and (2) God can always intervene miraculously. For him, probability characterizes any statement not known with certainty, or believed by faith, or determined by the Church, or proposed by one whose statement ought not be negated or its opposite affirmed. John's insistence on the probable character of most human knowledge led him to maintain many absurd views as at least equally probable. Agreeing that God's existence is not a per se nota proposition, he maintained that assent to demonstrations of His existence is less meritorious than assent to articles of faith based on charity. He held that God can by His absolute power (potentia absoluta) command man to hate Him. Moreover, God can be said to be the cause of sin, provided "cause" is restricted to permissive causality. John and many of his contemporaries, notably NICHOLAS OF AUTRECOURT, defended disturbingly extreme views for two reasons. They wanted to guarantee unquestionable certitude in knowledge, and they wished to emphasize the unlimited freedom of God. In his two Apologies John carefully explained that he wished to prove merely that outside the data of faith, very few demonstrations are more than probable.

John was influenced by WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, ROBERT HOLCOT, and THOMAS OF BUCKINGHAM; some historians maintain that he was also influenced by the De causa Dei of THOMAS BRADWARDINE. He had considerable influence on PETER OF AILLY and the development of late medieval NOMINALISM in theology.

Bibliography: JOHN OF MIRECOURT, Commentary on the Sentences (Paris), Biblical Naturalist Manuscript Latin, 15882 (folio 1–184: book 1); Manuscript Latin 15883 (folio 1–94: book 2; folio 95–133: book 3; folio 134–150: book 4). A. BIRKENMAJER, Ein Rechtfertigungsschreiben Johans von Mirecourt, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters, 20.5; (1922). K. MICHALSKI, "Die vielfachen Redaktionen einiger Kommentare zu Petrus Lombardus," Miscellanea Ehrle (Rome 1924) 1:219—. A. POMPEI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:762.

[J. R. O'DONNELL]

JOHN OF MONTE CORVINO

First Western missionary to China, founder of the medieval Franciscan mission in China; b. Monte Corvino (Salerno); d. c. 1330. In 1289 this Franciscan, already an experienced missionary conversant with the Persian and Armenian languages, and the bearer of letters to the pope from certain Eastern rulers, was in turn entrusted by Pope NICHOLAS IV with various letters, including one to the Mongol great Khan at Khanbalik (Peking). In 1291 John set out through Persia, passed a year in India, where he made about 100 converts, and followed the sea route up the China coast, thence to the Mongol capital. One of his two companions, Nicholas of Pistoia, OP, died in India. The other, Peter Lucalongo, a merchant, remained with the friar, and the two reached Khanbalik in 1294. Khan Timor Olcheitu (Chen Tsung) received them courteously. For a number of years John labored alone, overcoming with his tact the hostility he encountered from Nestorian clergy. At Tenduk, northwest of Khanbalik, the ruler, Prince George, a convert from NESTORIANISM, supported the establishment of a mission, which did not, however, outlast George's lifetime. The letters to the West that John dispatched in 1305 and 1306 resulted in his being named archbishop by Clement V (1307). Franciscan suffragans were named to consecrate him and further develop the mission. Meanwhile, on land donated by Peter Lucalongo, John built three churches in Khanbalik. He also baptized more than 6,000 converts, translated the New Testament and Psalter into the native speech, probably Uighur or Mongol in Uighur characters, and trained a native boys' choir that delighted the Khan. He had also made contacts with the Alans resident in the capital and personally served a church of the Armenian rite. On his death at the age of 82, he was mourned by non-Christians and Christians alike.

See Also: MISSIONS, HISTORY OF (MEDIEVAL).

Bibliography: Sinica franciscana, v. 1, ed. A. VAN DEN WYNGAERT (Quaracchi-Florence 1929). A. C. MOULE, Christians in China before the Year 1550 (New York 1930). K. S. LATOURETTE, A History of Christian Missions in China (New York 1929). A. VAN DEN WYNGAERT, Notes sur Jean de Mont Corvin (Lille 1924), also in La France franciscaine, 6 (1923) 135–186. J. RICHARD, “Essor et déclin l’église catholique de Chine au XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle,” Bulletin de la société des missions étrangères de Paris (Hong Kong 1962).

[M. W. BALDWIN]

JOHN OF MONTE MARANO, ST.

Bishop and patron of the city of Monte Marano, Province of Avellino, Italy; fl. late 11th century. Said to have been a BENEDICTINE monk, he was nominated bishop on request of the faithful of the city by GREGORY VII in 1074 and consecrated at Benevento. He was outstanding for his charity to the poor, for whom he labored with his own hands, and according to a legendary vita he also performed miracles. His body is preserved with great honors in the cathedral of Monte Marano, and his cult was confirmed in 1906. A tradition with no historical foundation makes him a disciple of WILLIAM OF VERCELLI, founder of the Abbey of Monte Vergine.

Feast: Aug. 17.

Bibliography: F. UGHELLI, Italia sacra, ed. N. COLETI, 10 v. in 9 (2d ed. Venice 1717–22) v.8. J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti 9:874–876. Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 3:510–513. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 1:4414. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 2:585–586. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes 8:302. Rivista storica benedettina 1 (1906) 324; 2 (1907) 362. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup> 5:1062.

[A. LENTINI]

JOHN OF MONTFORT, BL.

Nobleman from Voralberg, Knight Templar, crusader; d. Famagusta, Cyprus, 1177, 1200, or 1248. He was wounded in a battle at Jerusalem against the Saracens and died as a result, after having been taken to Cyprus. His body was translated to the abbey church of Beaulieu, Nicosia, where it was venerated until the Turkish conquest (1571). The native Cypriots have venerated him as blessed. Through the counts of Montfort he was commemorated also in the region of Langnau, Switzerland.

Feast: May 24 (formerly May 25 on Cyprus).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, May 5:273. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 2:220–221. J. HACKETT, A History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus (London 1901). M. KERVAN, Les grandes heures de Jean de Montfort et de Jeanne la Flamme (Mayenne 1981).

[M. A. HABIG]

JOHN OF MONTMIRAIL, BL.

Cistercian monk; b. 1165; d. Longpont Abbey, Sept. 29, 1217. An impetuous and loyal knight in the service of King PHILIP II AUGUSTUS OF FRANCE, he converted to a less worldly life and established a hostel near his castle, where he himself cared for the sick. In 1210 he left his wife and children to become a CISTERCIAN monk at the Abbey of Longpont in the diocese of Soissons. There he distinguished himself by his extraordinary devotion to the virtues of obedience and humility. His relics were translated to the abbey church in 1253, and he was honored as early as 1491 in the Cistercian martyrology. His cult was approved July 19, 1891.

Feast: Sept. 29 (Italian Cistercians and in the Dioceses of Soissons and Châlons-sur-Marne).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum September 8 (1863) 186–235. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Bibliographie, 2 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1905–07) 2:2448. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:115–118. A. DIMIER, “Le Bienheureux Jean de Montmirail moine de Longpont,” Mémoires de la fédération des sociétés savantes de l’Aisne 7 (1960–61) 182–191. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 9:613–615. K. SPAHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1063.

[M. STANDAERT]

JOHN OF NAPLES

Dominican Thomist theologian; b. Naples, Italy, of noble parents; fl. 1310 to 1336; d. Naples. He entered the order in that city at the priory of San Domenico Maggiore, where THOMAS AQUINAS had entered and spent the last years of his life. Sent to the University of Paris, he met HARVEY NEDELLEC, DURANDUS OF SAINT-POURÇAIN, Meister ECKHART, John of Parma (fl. 1313), and PETER OF LA PALU. He read the Sentences during the academic years 1310 to 1312 and received license to incept in December 1315. He taught as a master in Paris until 1317. In his fidelity to Aquinas he stands in sharp contrast to Durandus of Saint-Pourçain. The general chapter of the order that met in Metz in June 1313 appointed John to the commission entrusted with examining the teaching of Durandus. In 1316–17 he and Peter of La Palu compiled a list of 235 errors in the writings of Durandus. In one of his quodlibetal questions he publicly maintained the right to teach all the doctrines of Aquinas despite the condemnation of Étienne TEMPIER in 1277.

The general chapter of Pamplona in 1317 assigned him as lector in the Dominican Studium in Naples; he taught there for many years. He was frequently consulted concerning current controversies, notably the absolute poverty of Christ in the Franciscan poverty controversy, the state of the blessed before the Last Judgment as viewed by JOHN XXII, and the affair of MICHAEL OF CESENA. Deeply concerned with the canonization of Aquinas, he presented hearsay testimony on Aug. 1, 1319, to commissioners entrusted with promoting Aquinas's beatification and canonization. In 1323 as substitute for William of Tocco, procurator general and promoter of the cause, he went to Avignon with witnesses and officials for the second process of inquiry. Illness prevented him from delivering his panegyric prepared for July 14, 1323. He was present at the general chapter of Bordeaux in 1324 that elected Barnabas of Vercelli master general of the order. He was named executor of Bartholomew of Capua's will on March 14, 1325. A document concerning this will, dated June 9, 1336, is the last known evidence of his activities.

His commentary on the Sentences is no longer extant. His Quaestiones variae 42 disputatae (ed. Naples 1618) were disputed at Paris, as were his 13 Quodlibeta and 8 sermons. Because of his personal devotion and fidelity to St. Thomas, his activities are a significant witness to the development of THOMISM among Italian Dominicans.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum 1.2:567. J. P. MÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup> 5:1064–65. P. GLORIEUX, La Littérature quodlibétique 1:159–173. M. GRABMANN, “La scuola tomistica italiana nel XIII e principio del XIV secolo,” Rivista di filosofia neoscolastica 15 (Milan 1923) 138–143. C. J. JELLOUSCHEK, “Johannes v. Neapel und seine Lehre vom Verhältnisse zwischen Gott und Welt,” Xenia Thomistica (Rome 1925) 2:75. J. KOCH, “Durandus de S. Porciano, OP,” Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 26 (Münster 1927). T. KAEPEL, “Giovanni Regina di Napoli,” Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 10 (Rome 1940) 48–71. A. ISZAK, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:765.

[P. GLORIEUX]

JOHN OF NEPOMUC, ST.

Patron of the Czechs, alleged martyr; b. John (Ivan) Wölflin at Nepomuc (or Pomuk), Bohemia, March 20, c.

1350; d. Prague, 1393. A canon of the Prague cathedral, he advanced to the post of vicar-general of the Archdiocese of Prague (1389) while John of Jenštejn was archbishop (1378–1400). Nepomuc has traditionally been considered “the patron of the seal of confession” for supposedly, as spiritual director of Queen Sophie, he refused to reveal anything when the king, WENCESLAUS IV of Bohemia, demanded his confirmation of Sophie's suspected adultery. The whole incident, however, is probably legendary, for it is unthinkable that the queen's confessor could have been anyone closely connected with the archbishop, who had distinguished himself as a determined opponent of the king ever since they had both assumed office in 1378. More historically accurate is the account of Nepomuc's death. In 1393 the king and archbishop were currently clashing over the Benedictine Abbey of Kladruby, which Wenceslaus had intended to confiscate once the old abbot died and to use as the basis for a new diocese he wished to found. However, when the abbot died, Nepomuc, as vicar-general, immediately confirmed the appointment of a new abbot on March 10, 1393. At a subsequent conference of king and archbishop, the choleric Wenceslaus flew into a rage, seized three of the archbishop's counselors, including Nepomuc, and ordered them to be tortured. (Exactly what information he sought is not known.) When the king recovered from his fit of anger, two of the counselors were released without grave ill effects. Nepomuc, however, was in such poor condition that he was dispatched by being thrown into the River Vltava. When his body was retrieved, he came to be popularly regarded as a martyr. It was especially during the Counter Reformation in Bohemia that Nepomuc was established as a great national martyr and patron by the Catholics of Bohemia (in much the same way that John HUS became the hero of the Protestants of Bohemia). In 1729, despite more than three centuries of controversy over the cause and details of his death, Nepomuc was canonized by Pope BENEDICT XIII. However, in 1961 the Sacred Congregation of Rites suppressed his feast in the calendar of the universal Church [Ephemerides liturgicae, 75 (1961) 424].

Feast: May 16 (local churches).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, May 3 (1680) 668–80. F. M. BARTOS, Jan Nepomucky sveteck temna (Prague 1921). J. WEISSKOPF, Johannes von Pomuk (Munich 1948). Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1065. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:332–333. P. DE VOOHT, “J. de Pomuk,” Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, 48 (1953) 777–795. Hussiana (Louvain 1960) 400–441. Schlossmuseum Gobelsburg, Barocke Volksfrömmigkeit. Andachtsgraphik, Votivbilder, Zeugnisse d. Volksverehrung des hl. Johann v. Nepomuk. Ausstellung. Katalog, ed. L. SCHMIDT (Vienna 1971). Johannes von Nepomuk: ein Text-BildBand, ed. J. NEUHARDT (Graz 1979). H. L. ZOLLNER, Johannes von Nepomuk zu

Ehren: die Ettlinger Schlosskapelle. . . (Karlsruhe 1992). v. VLNAS, Jan Nepomucký, česká legenda (Prague 1993), cult.

[B. B. SZCZESNIAK]

JOHN OF OTZUN

Also known as Hovhannes IV Otznetzi, Armenian Catholicos, called the Philosopher for his theological and canonical works; b. Otzun, 650; d. Dwin, 729. Esteemed for holiness and learning, he was chosen Catholicos in 718. Soon afterward he held a national synod at Dwin to reform the liturgy and discipline of the Armenian Church. In 726 he presided over a synod at Manzikert, which discussed the doctrine and union with the SYRIAN (Jacobite) Church, and was the recipient of a letter from the Patriarch of Constantinople, Germanus I (715–730), urging the Armenian Monophysites to accept union with the Byzantine Church on the strength of the Christology of St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA. His chief writings are: (1) a discourse (or pastoral letter) at the synod of Dwin insisting on preserving Armenian ecclesiastical traditions; (2) a treatise on the Incarnation (Contra Phantasticos), stressing the two natures in Christ; (3) a work against the PAULICIANS; (4) a reform of the Armenian Breviary; and (5) a collection of canonical works. Without mentioning the Council of CHALCEDON, his teaching generally follows its doctrines, although he sometimes employs different terms to emphasize various aspects of CHRISTOLOGY.

Bibliography: Domini Joannis Philosophi Ozniensis, Armeniorum Catholici opera, ed. and tr. J. B. AUCHER, Latin and Armenian eds., (Venice 1834). v. INGLISIAN, "Die Armenische Literatur," Armenische und Kaukasische Sprachen, v. 7 of Handbuch der Orientalistik, ed. B. SPULER et al., (Leiden 1963) 174–175. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 2:407–417. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 474.

[G. T. DENNIS]

JOHN OF OXFORD

Bishop of Norwich, jurist; d. June 2, 1200. The son of Henry of Oxford, sheriff in 1154–55, John began his early career c. 1154–56 within the framework of family influence in Oxford, and c. 1160 he became rural dean of Oxford. It is clear that by 1163–64 John was engaged in royal administration. He was deeply involved in negotiations resulting from the archbishop Thomas BECKET dispute and perhaps presided at Clarendon in January 1164 (see CLARENDON, CONSTITUTIONS OF). He was ubiquitous in the service of King HENRY II in the years 1164 to 1170:

on missions to Pope ALEXANDER III (in 1164, 1166, and 1169–70), to King LOUIS VII of France, to Philip of Flanders, and to Emperor FREDERICK I; in dealings with the papal legates in 1169; and in Becket's company on the latter's return from exile in 1170. His intrusion as dean of Salisbury in 1165 at Henry's wish but against the commands of both pope and archbishop (in November 1166 he was finally appointed by papal COLLATIO), together with his participation at the schismatical council of Würzburg on May 23, 1165, resulted in his excommunication by Becket at Vézelay on Whitsunday 1166. And, despite his subsequent reconciliation with the pope, John remained for the Becket party the former usurper dean and notorious jurator. Before and after his elevation to the bishopric of Norwich in 1175 (elected Nov. 26; consecrated Dec. 14) he was among the most active executors of Henry II's policies: in the Saxon and Sicilian marriage affairs of 1166 and 1176; in judicial business; as an archjusticiar of the realm in 1179; and as participant at many royal councils. His work as bishop is recorded in his acta and charters and in the decretals and commissions he received as a papal judge delegate. He was present at the Third LATERAN COUNCIL of 1179 and set out on crusade with King RICHARD I in 1190 but was absolved by the pope from his crusading oath on reaching Italy. Various writings have been, without clear evidence, attributed to him, and Daniel de Morley's Liber de naturis was dedicated to him.

Bibliography: R. W. EYTON, Court, Household and Itinerary of King Henry II (London 1878). W. H. HUTTON, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 15:1517. R. FOREVILLE, L'Église et la royauté en Angleterre sous Henri II Plantagenet (Paris 1943), passim. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:1414.

[C. DUGGAN]

JOHN (QUIDORT) OF PARIS

Dominican theologian, polemicist, and defender of THOMISM; b. Paris, between 1240 and 1269; d. Bordeaux, Sept. 22, 1306. Although little documentation is available, it is probable that he received his arts education from the University of Paris before entering the Dominican Order at Saint-Jacques at an early age [J. Quéatif and J. Échard, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23) 1:500]. Prior to 1284 he strongly defended the doctrines of THOMAS AQUINAS in his Correctorium "Circa" [ed. J. P. Müller (Rome 1941)], replying to the Correctorium fratris Thomae by WILLIAM DE LA MARE (see CORRECTORIA). Between 1284 and 1286 he commented on the Sentences as a bachelor of theology. From this commentary sixteen propositions were extracted from his teaching on the Eucharist and reported to the master general of the order as erroneous. He defended himself successfully in his Apologia, c. 1287, but his studies at the university were postponed. He acquired fame as a preacher in Paris, where he was sometimes called Praedicator Monoculus. He continued to defend basic Thomistic teachings under attack in Tractatus de unitate formarum (ed. Venice 1513). In 1302 he wrote his celebrated De petestate regis et papali [ed. J. Leclercq, (Paris 1942)], which discusses the distinction and limitations of civil and papal authority. On June 26, 1303, he signed an appeal to the council against BONIFACE VIII [Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, ed. H. Denifle and E. Chatelain, 4 v. (Paris 1989–97) 2:634]. In 1304 he received his license to incept as a master of theology at the university. In that year he presented a Determinatio on the question of how the real Body of Christ exists in the Eucharist (ed. London 1686). While he admitted the traditional teaching that the substance of bread is converted into the substance of Christ's Body, namely, TRANSUBSTANTIATION, he insisted that this doctrine was not defined by the Church, and therefore not necessarily the only explanation. He suggested as equally tenable a second possibility, whereby the substance of bread is assumed by the person of Christ (suppositum Verbi) and remains together with the Body of Christ. This theory, which later came to be known as consubstantiation, or impanation, attracted much attention among the Reformers of the 16th and 17th century. John's view was examined and censured by a commission of four bishops, numerous theologians, and canonists. Perpetual silence was imposed on him under pain of excommunication, and he was suspended from teaching and preaching (Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, 2:656). He appealed his case to CLEMENT V, who was then at Bordeaux, but died before receiving a decision.

Substantially Thomistic on all controverted doctrines of Aquinas in his day, he was an original thinker who did not simply repeat the views of St. Thomas. His contribution to ecclesiology and political philosophy is significant in the development of Thomism. Among his metaphysical doctrines, the notion of esse has attracted most attention, but contemporary scholars are not unanimous in their evaluation of it. Nevertheless, he is one of the most significant representatives of the early Thomistic school in France.

Bibliography: P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1933–34) 1:189–193. A. J. HEIMAN, "Essence and Esse according to Jean Quidort," Mediaeval Studies, 15 (1953) 137–146; "Two Questions concerning the Esse of Creatures in the Doctrine of J. Q.," An Étienne Gilson Tribute, ed. C. J. O'NEIL (Milwaukee 1959) 51–67. P. STELLA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice–Rome 1957) 2:763. F. J. ROENSCH, Early Thomistic School (Dubuque 1964). J. P. MÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1068. E. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy, passim.

[A. J. HEIMAN]

JOHN OF PARMA, BL.

Franciscan minister general, 1247 to 1257; b. 1208?, Parma; d. 1289. John was born in the anti-imperial city of Parma. After entering the Franciscan Order in the 1230s, he lived most of his life beyond the confines of his native city. Sent to study at the Franciscan studium generale in Paris, he was appointed as a lector of theology in various studia of the Order, in Bologna (c. 1241) then in Naples (c. 1243–45). In 1245, upon the deaths of ALEXANDER OF HALES and JOHN OF LA ROCHELLE, John found himself called back to Paris, this time as lector in theology for the friars. When in July 1245 the minister general of the Franciscan Order, Crescentius of Jesi, decided not to attend the First Council of Lyons (whose primary aim was to excommunicate Emperor Frederick II), INNOCENT IV asked John to represent the friars. At the General Chapter of 1247, the friars chose him as minister general, replacing the irascible Crescentius. John immediately set out on a visitation of the provinces of England, France and Spain.

During his time in Naples, John had absorbed the eschatological ideas of JOACHIM OF FIORE, and became one of the leading proponents of them. The Franciscan chronicler, SALIMBENE, refers to John as a maximus joachita. This current of eschatological thinking was highly critical of the actions of Frederick II toward the Church and the moral corruption of the ecclesiastical hierarchy; it also envisioned a leading role to be played by both the Friars Minor and Preacher—the prophesied viri spirituales of Joachim of Fiore—in the eschatological events of an end-time fast approaching. John was instrumental in bringing these ideas—and the associated pseudo-Joachim texts—northward. Indeed the well-known fascination with Joachite ideas of HUGH OF DIGNE and his circle of adherents at Hyères can be traced directly to John.

One of the key elements in the eschatological scenario propounded by Joachim and the Franciscan Joachites was the reunion of the Latin and Greek Churches. Thus, it was not simply John's knowledge of Greek, but more especially, his belief in the critical importance of this latter event that prompted Innocent IV to call him back from his visitation in early 1249 to lead a delegation of friars to Nicaea in order to explore the possibility of a reunion between Rome and the Greek Church in exile led by its emperor, John Vatatzès. John and his companions (among whom was another maximus joachita, Gerard of Borgo San Donnino) were responsible for drafting the interpolations to the Vaticinium Sibillae Erithraeae, an apocalyptic text that predicted the return of the Greek Empire and Church from exile in Nicaea to Constantinople and the demise of the Hohenstaufen line as the necessary preludes to the last days. In addition, the Vaticinium anticipates the friars serving not simply as missionaries to but bishops of a renewed Church in the East, activities already strongly promoted within the Order itself by the minister general.

When the mission foundered in mid-1250 with no concrete results, John returned to the West. He addressed himself to the critical issue facing the Franciscan community in this period: how to balance the needs of food, clothing and housing of an ever-growing Order with its vocation of total poverty. Determined that the deeds of the friars match their ideals, at successive general chapters in 1251 and 1254, John led the opposition of many within the community to Ordinem vestrum—the bull of Innocent IV granted to the Order in 1245 that had opened the door to the possibility of greater laxities among the friars in their observance of poverty.

John struck a humble posture on behalf of the Minors at the University of Paris during the controversies with the secular masters, calming the situation by publicly promising to abide by the strictures imposed by the masters limiting the mendicants to one chair of theology. But in 1255 when it was learned that an inflammatory book fiercely critical of the papacy and hierarchy, predicting their demise in a new Age of the Spirit—the famous Liber introductorius to the works of Joachim of Fiore—had actually been written by a Franciscan, Gerard of Borgo San Donnino, John rallied to the defense of his embattled confrère. In doing so, he became inextricably associated with the radical ideas of the book.

ALEXANDER IV demanded that John resign as minister general at a special chapter in Rome on Feb. 2, 1257; he was replaced by the young theologian, BONAVENTURE of Bagnoregio. The latter put Gerard and his companions on trial the following year for heresy, resulting in their perpetual imprisonment, but John suffered only the humiliation of his deposition. A few years later, however, probably in 1261 or 1262, John himself was put on trial by Bonaventure for, according to Angelo Clareno, having written a “little book,” whose identity has never been determined. Only the timely intervention of Cardinal Ottobono in his behalf spared the former general from a fate similar to the other Franciscan Joachites. He was allowed to retire, under house arrest, to the quiet of the hermitage of Greccio. There he remained for nearly the rest of his days until, in 1289, having received permission to leave the hermitage, he set out again for his beloved East. But

John died en route shortly afterwards in the town of Camerino in the Marches of Ancona.

Bibliography: SALIMBENE, Cronica, I, ed. G. SCALIA (Turnhout 1998), 453–477. A. CLARENO, Liber chronicarum sive tribulationum ordinis minorum, ed. G. BOCCALI (S. Maria degli Angeli 1999), 354–388. R. BROOKE, Early Franciscan Government (Cambridge 1959). P. ALEXANDER, “The Diffusion of Byzantine Apocalypses in the Medieval West and the Beginnings of Joachimism,” in Prophecy and Millenarianism. Essays in Honour of Marjorie Reeves, ed. A. WILLIAMS (Essex 1980), 53–106. A. FRANCHI, La svolta politico-ecclesiastica tra Roma e Bisanzio (1249–1254). La legazione di Giovanni da Parma. Il ruolo di Federico II (Rome 1981).

[M. F. CUSATO]

JOHN OF RAGUSA

Theologian and churchman, active at the Council of BASEL; b. Ragusa, c. 1390 to 1395; d. Lausanne, 1443. John (Stojković) entered the Dominican Order in his native city and studied at Paris, receiving his doctor's degree in 1420. In 1423 he was envoy of that university to the Synod of Pavia. Here he was papal preacher, but he protested when the assembly was dissolved. In the interval, and definitely in 1429, before the opening of the Council of Basel, he served as procurator-general of the Dominicans at the Holy See. Most of John's subsequent history is connected with the Council of Basel. In 1431, Cardinal G. Cesarini being impeded, John was delegated to open the Council and he delivered the inaugural sermon; he left an account of the early activities of the assembly. In 1433 John, one of several theologians named to negotiate with the Hussites, debated at great length with one of their leaders, John Rokycana, on the reception of Communion under one or both species. In 1435 and 1437 he was ambassador of the Council to Constantinople to urge the cause of reunion and was instrumental in having the Eastern Emperor and the patriarch send a delegation to Basel for this purpose. On a mission in 1438 to the Emperor Albert II, he spoke in behalf of the council, showing conciliarist leanings. Upon his return to the council he joined the dissident party. In 1438 he was made bishop of Ardijsch, and in 1440 cardinal priest of San Sisto by the antipope Felix V. John's writings include a treatise on the Church, the sermon on Communion under both species, the history of the early work of the Council of Basel, a treatise on reunion of the Hussites, an unfinished account of his travels in the East and on reunion with the Greeks, and a concordance of indeclinable words in Sacred Scripture.

Bibliography: B. ALTANER, “Zur Geschichte der Handschriftensammlung des Kardinals Johannes von Ragusa,” Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 47 (1927) 730–732. A. WALZ, “I cardinali domenicani: Note bio-bibliografiche,” Memorie Domeni- cane 57 (1940) 32. G. THILS, "Le Tractatus de Ecclesia de Jean de Raguse," Angelicum 17 (1940) 219–244. K. BINDER, "Der Tractatus de Ecclesia Johannis von Ragusa und die Verhandlungen des Konzils von Basel mit den Husiten," ibid. 28 (1951) 30–54. B. DUDA, Joannis Stojkovič de Ragusio, O. P.: Doctrina de cognoscibilitate Ecclesiae (Rome 1958). R. ROGOSIĆ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1073–4.

[J. F. HINNEBUSCH]

JOHN OF RAVENNA

Archbishop; b. c. 812; d. after 863. Traditionally it has been held that John was the first archbishop of Dalmatia and Croatia; but many scholars now doubt this attribution and think that he has been confused with Pope JOHN IV, a native of Dalmatia, or with Pope JOHN X, who reorganized the hierarchy of Dalmatia and Croatia and subjected the area to Split c. 925. As archbishop of RAVENNA from 850 to 861, John was a partisan of Emperor LOUIS II and a troublemaker for both LEO IV and NICHOLAS I. He fraudulently seized the property of Leo's subjects, oppressed clergy and laity alike, and even murdered a papal legate. In all this he was helped by his brother Gregory, Duke of Emilia. A visit to Ravenna by Leo to reprimand him was of no avail [P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198], and later, under Nicholas, deputations came to Rome to protest against John's continued oppressions. The pope tried to dissuade him by legates and letters, but John continued to excommunicate his opponents and seize property, even papal property, arbitrarily. He also acted ultra vires in sentencing clerics directly subject to Rome. Summoned to Rome in 861 to give an account of his misdeeds, he refused to go, was found contumacious by the pope, and excommunicated [J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Concillorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98) 15:658; Liber pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne, v.1–2 (Paris 1886–92), v.3 (Paris 1958) 2:168]. John enlisted the help of Louis and with the Emperor's ambassadors went to Rome, but he failed to reverse the decision. Nicholas himself visited Ravenna to restore the properties appropriated by the archbishop. In all, John was condemned by three successive synods at Rome, and when he was rebuffed at a second appeal for help to Emperor Louis, he was forced to make his peace with a synod at Rome in November of 861 [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 106:787–792]. He swore fidelity and obedience to the pope and purged himself of heresy, but his repentance was short-lived, and he had to be deposed again in 863 for siding with Gunther, Archbishop of Cologne (d. 873), and Thiergaud of Trier in their conflict with the papacy over the divorce of King LOTHAR II.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, v.1–2 (Paris 1886–92), v.3 (Paris 1958) 2:157–158. F. DVORNIK, The Slavs: Their Early History and Civilization (Boston 1956). A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1957–58) 2:172. F. BULIĆ and J. BERVALDI, Kronotaksa spljetskih nadbiskupa (Zagreb 1913) 116–132. R. ROGOSIĆ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2 d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1073–74. T. SCHIEFFER, "Nikolaus I," ibidem 7:976–977.

[T. P. HALTON]

JOHN OF RÉÔME, ST.

Monastic founder, abbot; b. Courtangy, France, c. 450; d. Jan. 28, c. 539–44. He took the monastic habit at Lérins. Recalled by his own bishop, he founded at Réôme (now Ménétreux, commune of Corsaint) a monastery later called Saint-Jean-de-Réôme or Mouëtier-Saint-Jean-en-Auxois. He introduced into his monastery the rule of MACARIUS OF EGYPT, under which he had lived at LÉRINS. He was one of the pioneers of the monastic life in Burgundy, enjoying a great reputation for sanctity and for working miracles. His remains were preserved from the Saracens (731) and the Vikings (888); and again in 1793 the principal relics escaped the Revolutionaries. His biography was written by Jonas of Susa.

Feast: Jan. 28.

Bibliography: Vita, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 3:502–517. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 1:4424–31. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 1:187. T. PAYR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup> 5:1074. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 6:433–434.

[T. P. HALTON]

JOHN OF RIPA

Italian Franciscan theologian known as Doctor difficilis and Doctor supersubtilis; flourished Paris, 1357–68. Although his family name was Plantadosi, he was called Joannes de Ripa or de Marchia because he belonged to the Franciscan friary of Ripatransone in the Marche of Ascoli near Piceno. It is not possible to assign exact dates for his academic activities, although it is most probable that he lectured on the Sentences at the University of Paris c. 1357 and remained there as professor until after 1368. His basic formation and outlook were Scotistic, but he manifested more originality and independence than most in the development of SCOTISM. It is unlikely that he was ever personally censured for his teachings, although some of his followers were, namely, Louis of Padua (flourished 1362–64) and John of Bâle (flourished 1381–85). Three major works of John are extant: Lectura super primum Sententiarum [ed. A. Combes, (Paris 1961)], Conclusiones circa primum librum Sententiarum [ed. A. Combes, (Paris 1957)], and Determinationes [ed. A. Combes, (Paris 1957)]. Parts of a commentary on the other books of the Sentences also are extant. Other treatises have been attributed to him, but they are spurious, or wrongly catalogued, or simply lost.

In the commentary on the Sentences John tried to make as clear as possible the character of the beatitude communicated by God to His creatures. The problem was fundamentally Augustinian and was made more explicit by DUNS SCOTUS; it was concerned with reconciling the immensity of God and the finiteness of creatures. John carefully examined the nature of God's immensity, especially in relation to man's sanctification. Employing a philosophy based on the "intension and remission of forms," he saw in man a potentia vitalis as a basis for sanctity and beatific knowledge by way of presence rather than of physical information. In the Determinationes, however, he went out of his way to refute the tenet that God is somehow the formal cause of creatures.

The influence of John of Ripa is difficult to assess. He was a disciple of Duns Scotus, yet he often disagreed with him. His teaching is reflected in the fourteen articles of the Franciscan Louis of Padua that were condemned in 1362 [Chartularium universitatis Parisensis, ed. H. Denifle and E. Chatelain, 4 v. (Paris 1889–97) 3:95–97].

Bibliography: A. COMBES, "Jean de Vippra, Jean de Rupa ou Jean de Ripa," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge (Paris 1926—) 14 (1939) 253–290; "Présentation de J. de R.," ibidem 31 (1956) 145–242; Jean Gerson, commentateur dionysien (Études de philosophie médiévale 30; Paris 1940). P. VIGNAUX, "Dogme de l'Incarnation et métaphysique de la forme chez J. de R.," Mélanges offerts à Étienne Gilson (Toronto 1959) 661–672. Z. KALUZA, "La nature des écrits de Jean de Ripa" Traditio 43 (1983) 257–98. F. RUELLO, La théologie naturelle de Jean de Ripa (Paris 1992), bibliography; La pensée de Jean de Ripa: Immensité divine et connaissance théologique (Fribourg 1990); "Le projet théologique de Jean de Ripa" Traditio 49 (1994) 127–70.

[J. R. O'DONNELL]

JOHN OF RODINGTON

Franciscan scholastic; b. Rodington (Rodendon, Rodin, etc.) on the river Roden, c. 1290; d. Bedford, 1348? He may have entered the Friars Minor at Stamford, and he is listed as the fifty-sixth lector of the order at Oxford, where he had become master of theology; his regency probably dates between c. 1325 and 1328. There is some indication that he also taught at Paris [Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters (Münster 1891—) supplement 3.2:1158], and it is known that he visited Basel in July of 1340. Sometime thereafter he became the nineteenth minister provincial of the English Franciscans. It is affirmed without great evidence that he died in 1348, a victim of the Black Death; one list states he is buried at Bedford. Besides his Sentences he left a quodlibet "On Conscience," and may also have written one "On Faith." According to some, he was a follower of DUNS SCOTUS; yet in the question published by B. Nardi (from In 1 sent. 3.3), John upholds the earlier, Augustinian position on divine ILLUMINATION. Despite its title, "On Conscience" considers the whole basis of the moral life, citing AUGUSTINE as the primary authority, together with RICHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR and St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY. John opposes, rather than accepts, WILLIAM OF OCKHAM. (See AUGUSTINIANISM; SCOTISM.)

Bibliography: E. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy 762–63. J. LECHNER, "Die Quästionen des Sentenzenkommentars des Johannes von Rodington, O. F. M.," Franziskanische Studien, 22 (1935) 232–248; "Kleine Beiträge zur Geschichte des englischen Franziskaner-Schrifttums im Mittelalter," Philosophisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft, 53.3 (1940) 375. B. NARDI, Soggetto e oggetto del conoscere nella filosofia antica e medievale (2d ed. Rome 1952) 70–92. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1583–84.

[I. C. BRADY]

JOHN OF SAINT-SAMSON

Carmelite lay brother and mystic; b. Sens, France, Dec. 29, 1571; d. Rennes, Sept. 14, 1636. His name in the world was Jean du Moulin. He was born of well-to-do parents, but the mishandling of an eye disease when he was three years old left him blind for life. He received a good education, became acquainted with literature and history, and learned to understand and speak Latin. He also learned to play various musical instruments well. In 1589, his parents having died, he turned to Christ, and he began a wandering existence until 1597, when he took up residence in Paris. Apparently, he quickly became well acquainted with the works of many spiritual writers, especially of the mystics of the Low Countries and the Rhineland. About 1600 he came into contact with the Paris Carmelites of the Place Maubert, where he was able to fire a small circle of young religious with enthusiasm for the spiritual life and mysticism. In 1606 he joined the Carmelites at Dol in Brittany. He lived there for six years in great poverty and underwent various severe trials. Now spiritually mature, he entered the reform of Touraine under the name of John of Saint-Samson.

The leaders of this movement tested him thoroughly and minutely respecting his virtues and his spiritual reading, enlisting the help of doctors of the Sorbonne and of men of outstanding spiritual prestige. He stood the test with conspicuous success. From this time until his death, he assisted in the spiritual formation of numerous generations of novices, and he was the spiritual adviser of many others. Hence in the reform of Touraine, he exercised great influence, especially as a master of the spiritual life.

His writings exhibit a very complex character. They form the residue of conferences, instructions, and counselings, all reflecting his personal experience and prayer. Some he dictated himself, but more often they were committed to writing later, and subjects are not treated systematically and comprehensively. Moreover, John employed the difficult terminology of his favorite authors, Jan van RUYSBROECK and HENRY OF HERP. His works, comprising some 60 treatises and contemplations, along with a number of letters, were published in 1658 and 1659 by Donatien de Saint-Nicolas. Unfortunately, the editor recast the text and destroyed much of its vividness. A critical edition is needed.

According to John of Saint-Samson, the queen of the spiritual life is love, which is directed to Christ, the "Bien-Aimé." Love brings with it as an inseparable partner, detachment (humility, mortification, suffering, etc.) in all stages of the spiritual life. Love looks to the All of God, detachment to the nothingness of the creature. Love makes the soul steadily more contemplative; detachment causes it to turn steadily further away from the non-divine. Thus the spiritual life looks to nothingness and to the All at the same time. The soul reaches this state fully only in the hereafter, but some foretaste of it is experienced in the highest mystical grace. Then the soul knows itself as one with God, who is the All, and loses all psychological consciousness of created being and of itself.

Love and detachment govern the spiritual life. Love strives toward interior and exterior conformity to the divinity and the humanity of Christ. Moreover, the mind must live by this divine and human life, must lose itself completely in the Person of the God-Man, to the last degree of identification with Christ and in Christ. In this striving, the life of prayer, particularly aspirative prayer, occupies an important place. This frequently repeated, brief lifting of the mind and heart to God reaches its fullest scope only when the soul has progressed to some degree in the spiritual life. Love thereby becomes strengthened and purified, and recollection becomes more profound. As long as recollection is not complete, this kind of prayer retains its worth. In combination with detachment, John emphasizes two traditionally Carmelite values, solitude and silence, both of which are helpful in excluding all contact with the non-divine. Furthermore, John has many beautiful texts dealing with Marian mysticism.

The mystics of the Low Countries were very popular in France about 1600. From them, especially from Ruysbroeck and Herp, John took over, in addition to terminology, certain fundamental theological ideas: their teaching on the Trinity, exemplarism, the structure of the soul, recollection, and Trinitarian mysticism. John is one of the most important writers of the so-called abstract school, which assumes the possibility of a union of the soul with the Divine Nature, a union that is direct, without intermediacy or distinction (at least it is so experienced). Another characteristic of John's doctrine deserving of mention is the emphasis on self-annihilation (anéantissement) and pure love (amour pur et désintéressé). Both attain their zenith in the highest mystical grace; yet it appears from the texts that John did not assume or advocate a complete anéantissement or a complete amour pur.

Bibliography: DONATIEN DE S. NICOLAS, Les Oeuvres spirituelles et mystiques du divin contemplatif F. Jean de S. Samson, 2 v. (Rennes 1658–59). MATHURIN DE S. ANNE, Vita, theorematum et opuscula insignis mystae venerabilis fratris Ioannis a S. Samson (Lyons 1654). S. M. BOUCHEREAUX, La Réforme des Carmes en France et Jean de St.-Samson (Paris 1950). P. W. JANSSEN, Les Origines de la réforme des Carmes en France au XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle (The Hague 1963). SERNIN-MARIE DE S. ANDRÉ, La vie du V. F. Jean de Saint-Samson, religieux carme de la Réforme de Touraine (Paris 1881).

[P. W. JANSSEN]

JOHN OF ST. THOMAS

Thomistic theologian and philosopher; b. Portugal?, July 9, 1589; d. Saragossa, Spain, July 17, 1644.

John was the son of Peter Poinsoot, nobleman secretary to Archduke Albert of Austria, cardinal and viceroy to Portugal, and later governor of the Netherlands under Philip II of Spain. With his brother Luis, who became a Trinitarian and taught theology at Coimbra from 1637 to 1655, John received his baccalaureate in arts at Coimbra in 1605. At the same Jesuit school, he began his theological course under two Trinitarians. After one year of study he moved to the Netherlands and attended Louvain where he studied under Thomas de Torres, a Spanish Dominican. He entered the Order of Preachers after he received his Baccalaureus Biblicus.

John of St. Thomas began his theological teaching in 1620, after spending several years as an artium lector. Having taught at Piacenza and Madrid, he was made associate professor at the University of Alcalá, where he lectured to classes larger than any then assembled in Spain. After about a decade he succeeded to the principal theological chair at Alcalá. During all this time he exercised with justice and charity the office of qualificator of the Supreme Council of the Spanish Inquisition. Despite accusations to the contrary, he seems not to have assisted the Jansenist heretics. However, he did refuse to allow the professors at Louvain to be condemned on insufficient evidence before Philip IV, who held civil jurisdiction over that university. For Philip, he performed the difficult function of confessor and adviser. He was at his king's side in battle, yet at the same time he corrected the text of his theological treatise on the Gifts of the Holy Spirit.

John of St. Thomas died either from fever, or from poison administered by courtiers envious of his influence for good over the king. His influence had been widespread through his efforts with the king and through letters and minor writings such as his Compendium of Catholic doctrine; this last was published first in Madrid in 1640, and after seven Spanish editions, translated into Italian, Latin, Gaelic, and Polish. John also wrote a directory for a good confession for Philip IV, and, just before he died, a treatise on preparation for a happy death.

His first major work, the Cursus Philosophicus, which was reprinted (at least in part) 16 times between 1631 and 1930, is in two sections, the first of which is available in English. That first section, including both formal and material logic, has been the basic source of much recent traditional and contemporary Catholic teaching on the art of logic. The second section, Philosophia Naturalis, accurately represents Thomistic philosophical teaching on corporeal being and psychology.

His Cursus Theologicus, published five times before the current Solesmes edition, follows the order of the questions, but not the articles, of the Summa Theologiae. After prefatory treatises on the nature of theology, its certitude against opponents, and its order, John of St. Thomas discussed basic theological problems in the light of the thinking of the post-Reformation period, although not that of the Counter Reformation. For the most part he was in doctrinal agreement with Capreolus and Cajetan (Tommaso de Vio), but he did advance some unique opinions, e.g., that the quintessential characteristic of the Deity is in knowing rather than in being. Some of his treatises, such as the Gifts of the Holy Spirit (New York 1951), rise above both classroom technique and commentary, and become autonomous presentations, classical in both content and style.

The style of John of St. Thomas is simple and clear. He preferred austere lucidity, and he made his own the words of St. Jerome: "I have written for the strong not the squeamish."

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum. (Paris 1719–23) 2.2:538–539. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1926) 3:915–916. J. M. RAMIREZ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:803–808. D. RAMIREZ, "Vita Johannis a Sancto Thoma," in JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, Cursus Theologicus, ed. BENEDICTINES OF SOLESMES (Paris 1930–53) 1:xxxv–xliii. E. J. FURTON, A Medieval Semiotic: Reference and Representation in John of St. Thomas' Theory of Signs (New York 1995). John Poinsot issue, The Thomist 58 (1994): 543–615.

[D. HUGHES]

JOHN OF SALERNO, BL.

Also known as Giovanni (John) Guarna; Dominican preacher; b. Salerno, Italy, c. 1190; d. Florence, Aug. 9 (or Sept. 10), 1242. After receiving the habit from (St.) DOMINIC at Bologna, he was delegated by him to introduce the order into Florence. He founded the priory of Santa Maria Novella in that city and the monastery of the Dominican nuns at Ripoli. GREGORY IX commissioned him to preach against the PATARINES, a Manichaean sect, especially in Florence, and to reform the Diocese of Chiusi. PIUS VI beatified him in 1783.

Feast: Aug. 9.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 3:626–636. Analecta Bollandiana 7 (1888) 85–95. Année Dominicaine, 23 v. (Lyons 1883–1909) Aug. 1:477–485. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1079.

[A. H. CAMACHO]

JOHN OF SALISBURY

Political theorist, historian, philosopher, humanist of the twelfth century renaissance, and Bishop of Chartres; b. Old Sarum, near Salisbury, c. 1115; d. Chartres, October 25, 1180.

Life. Though little is known about his background, John's writings contain a large amount of biographical material and historical information. After undergoing his formative training in England, John began his higher education at Mont-Saint-Geneviève in Paris in 1136 under Peter ABELARD, ROBERT OF MELUN, and a teacher known only as Alberic. In 1137 finding himself insufficiently prepared in grammar, he went to study under WILLIAM OF CONCHES, whom he calls the greatest grammarian since BERNARD OF CHARTRES. After three years of study, presumably at Chartres, John continued his education at Paris where he also tutored younger students. At some point he also studied under THIERRY OF CHARTRES, GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE, ROBERT PULLAN, and Adam of the Little Bridge. His writings mention some of his notable life-long friends and acquaintances, who included PETER OF CELLE, Thomas BECKET, and Nicholas Breakspear—later Pope ADRIAN IV.

In 1147 John returned to England, where he served in the household of THEOBALD Archbishop of Canterbury for the next twenty years. As the bishop's consultant, confidant, friend, secretary, and advisor, John became familiar with the most powerful men in the realm. He represented the Archbishop on the continent, even at Rome, where he was attached to the papal court. In 1148 he attended the Church Council of Reims, where BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX and others challenged the orthodoxy of Gilbert Bishop of Poitiers. Because of his support for Theobald and later for Becket in their conflicts with King Henry II, John twice found himself in exile from England. He spent most of the seven years (1163–70) of the second exile at the Abbey Church of Saint R emi. John returned to England after his friend Thomas Becket was murdered (December 29, 1170) and remained there until his election as Bishop of Chartres in 1176. After being consecrated at Sens by Maurice Bishop of Paris, John returned to Chartres and took up the duties of the bishopric. He attended the Third Lateran Council of 1179. He died on October 25, 1180 and was buried at the abbey church of Notre Dame de Josaphat in Chartres.

Works and Thought. John read widely. He moves freely from the writings of the Church Fathers and Scripture to "pagan" poetry, and he uses any story or example that makes his point. Although John wrote both poetry and prose, the great bulk of his literary output lay in his letters, where he demonstrates the full range of his rhetorical skills. John's early works include his philosophical treatises. Entheticus, De dogmatic philosophorum also called the Entheticus Major (c. 1155), the Metalogicon (c. 1157), and the Policraticus (1157–59).

The first of these is a satire of princes and courtiers, in which contemporary people are compared to ancient poets and philosophers. It is a good example of the esteem that twelfth century humanists had for the ancient non-Christian world.

The Metalogicon is a book written against a clerk whom John calls Cornificius and his group of educational reformers, the Cornificians. Before turning his focus to logic, especially that of Aristotle (the Organon), John presents a defense of the traditional curriculum, the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, and logic). John argues against the Cornifician program that sought to shorten the course of study so students could advance onto their careers. In this work John offers the reader a wealth of information about himself and the schools in the first half of the twelfth century. It includes accounts of his teachers, his courses of study, and recollections about the teaching style of his teachers' teachers, like Bernard of Chartres, who instructed William of Conches and Gilbert de la Por ee.

The Policraticus is a work of political philosophy in which John adds to what he had begun in the Entheticus, by offering a more sustained and organized discussion of the art of government. John desires to harmonize ancient political philosophy—most notably Aristotle—with Patristic and medieval Church teachings, and he creates an abstract framework for governing society and for making people better human beings and better Christians. Philosophy is presented as a tool to aid people in bringing about the reign of God. John outlines the traits, not only of good and bad princes, but of church officials as well. He chastises clerics and priests and presents a powerful call for reform of abuses within the Church. He calls tyranny—private, public, and ecclesiastical—an evil that we have the right to oppose, and he justifies the execution of tyrannical kings. Since the Policraticus was written during one of John's exiles from the court of Theobald, not surprisingly John attempts to analyze the relationship between Church and state. Interestingly, although John was loyal to Church authority in its struggle with the secular authority, he devises a plan of government that offers a large measure of autonomy to the state to govern without the oversight of ecclesiastical authority.

John's later writings include the Historia pontificalis (1163–64) in which John offers a mostly first-hand account of life in the papal court from 1148 to 1151. It presents to the reader a unique view of the pontiffs and the papal curia. John also wrote two biographies; The Life of Saint Anselm (1163), written at the request of Becket, and the Life of Thomas Becket (1171–73), which was composed shortly after the archbishop's martyrdom.

Bibliography: Sources: Entheticus de Dogmatic philosophorum (Entheticus Major), ed. R. E. PEPIN, Traditio 31 (1975) 127–193. Metalogicon, ed. J. B. HALL and K. S. B. KEATS-ROHAN, (Turnhout, Brepols 1991). Policraticus, ed. C. C. J. WEBB, 2 vols., (Oxford 1909); English trans. C. NEDERMAN, (Cambridge 1990). Life of Thomas Becket, ed. J. C. ROBERTSON and J. B. SHEPPARD, Materials for the History of Archbishop Thomas Becket, II Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, vol. 67 (1876) 301–322. The Life of Saint Anselm, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 199 1009–1040. Historia Pontificalis, ed. M. CHIBNALL (London 1956, Nachdruck 1986). The Letters of John of Salisbury, Volume I, The Early Letters (1153–61), ed. W. J. MILLOR, H. E. BUTLER and C. N. L. BROOKE (London 1955). The Letters of John of Salisbury, Volume II, The Later Letters (1163–1180), ed. W. J. MILLOR and C. N. L. BROOKE (Oxford 1979). Literature. K. L. FORHAN, "A Twelfth-Century 'Bureaucrat' and the Life of the Mind: The Political Thought of John of Salisbury," Proceedings of the PMR Conference (Villanova, Pennsylvania 10, 1985), 65–74. H. LEIBESCH TZ, Medieval Humanism in the Life and Writings of John of Salisbury (Nendeln, Lichtenstein 1968). C. C. J. WEBB, John of Salisbury (London 1932). M. WILKS, ed., The Life and Times of John of Salisbury (Oxford 1984). C. NEDERMAN, "Aristotelianism in John of Salisbury's Policraticus," in Journal of the History of Philosophy, XXI, 1983, 203–229; "Aristotelian Ethics and John of Salisbury's Letters," Viator, XVIII, 1987, 161–173. K. S. B. KEATS-ROHAN, "The Chronology of John of Salisbury's Studies in France," Studi medievali, XXVIII, 1987, 193–203.

[P. ELLARD]

JOHN OF SCYTHOPOLIS

Sixth century Byzantine priest and bishop of Scythopolis in Palestina II for a period probably after 536 but before about 548. He is not to be confused with John the Grammarian. A scholastikos, or lawyer, and a very learned man, John of Scythopolis composed several important theological works, all but one of which are lost: a work against the Monophysites, attacked before 512 by the strict Dyophysite, Basil of Cilicia, now lost; after about 518, a work against SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH, extant in a fragment defending the formula of two energies in Jesus Christ; and finally, the first long scholia on the works of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS the Areopagite, later incorporated into the less extensive scholia of MAXIMUS the Confessor but preserved also in a Syriac translation. The scholia defend both the authenticity and orthodoxy of the corpus of Pseudo-Dionysius. John's Christology is Neochalcedonian, that is, defends the agreement of the formulas of the Council of CHALCEDON (451) with the Christology of CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA.

Bibliography: H. U. VON BALTHASAR, "Das Scholienwerk des Johannes von Scythopolis." Scholastik, 15 (1940) 16–38. C. MOELLER, "Le Chalcedonisme et le néo-chalcedonisme," A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 1:674–676.

[D. B. EVANS]

JOHN OF SPAIN (HISPANUS)

Philosopher; d. Toledo, 1166. A converted Jew, he lived principally in Toledo and became bishop of Segovia in 1149, and then archbishop of Toledo. He is often confused with JOHN OF SEVILLE (HISPALENSIS). Although lacking originality in thought, he adroitly synthesized the ideas of others and made observations concerning differences among the schools from a historical viewpoint. Collaborating with his disciple DOMINIC GUNDISALVI, he promoted the spread of philosophy in Europe by translating Arab texts and elaborating original works. Among the fruits of this collaboration, the following are the most noteworthy: (1) Tractatus de anima, ed. J. T. Muckle, "The Treatise De anima of Dominicus Gundisalvus," manuscript 2 (1940); (2) Liber de causis, ed. from the Arab-Latin text by O. Bardenhewer, Die pseudoaristotelische Schrift über das reine Gute bekannt unter dem Namen Liber de causis. . . (Freiburg 1882); (3) Liber de causis primis et secundis, ed. R. De Vaux, in Notes et textes sur l'avicennisme latin (Paris 1934).

Bibliography: M. ALONSO, "Traducciones del árabe al latín por Juan Hispano (Ibn Dawud)," Al-Andalus, 17 (1952) 129–151; Temas filosóficos medievales (Ibn Dāwād y Gundisalvo) (Comillas 1959).

[D. CABANELAS]

JOHN OF STERNGASSEN

Dominican theologian and mystic; d. Cologne, after 1327. Often said to have been an immediate disciple of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, he was a contemporary of Meister ECKHART and a brother of Gerard, author of the popular Pratum animarum. As master in theology he taught in the priories at Strassburg and notably at Cologne, where he lived from 1310 onward. Some sermons and sayings survive in German. His principal work, a commentary on the Sentences, was discovered by M. GRABMANN. This work clearly shows him to be an avowed Thomist. He frequently refers to Aquinas as doctor noster. Like his brother and NICHOLAS OF STRASSBURG, he did not subscribe to the Neoplatonic tendencies of many of his German confreres, but followed closely the Aristotelianism of St. Thomas. Only on the question of the real distinction between essence and existence in creatures did he depart from authentic Thomistic teaching, preferring the intentional distinction proposed by HENRY OF GHENT.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23) 1.1:700. C. TESTORE, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:769–770. M. GRABMANN, Mittelalterliches Geistesleben, 3 v. (Munich 1925–56) 1:392–400. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi, 2 v. (Würzburg 1947) 1:244–245.

[J. J. PRZEZDZIECKI]

JOHN OF THE CROSS, ST.

Founder (with St. Teresa) of the Discalced Carmelites, Doctor of the Church, renowned for his poetry and writings in ascetical-mystical theology; b. Fontiveros, Spain, June 24, 1542; d. Ubeda, Dec. 14, 1591.

Life. Gonzalo de Yepes, John's father, was disowned by his wealthy family of silk merchants for marrying a humble silk weaver, Catalina Alvarez. When forced to adapt to surroundings of poverty and hard work, Gonzalo died young, shortly after the birth of John, his third son.

John received his elementary education in Medina del Campo at an institution for the children of the poor, in which he was also fed and clothed. Besides his elementary studies, he was introduced to various crafts through apprenticeships. At 17 he found work at a hospital in Medina and was also able to enroll in the Jesuit College, where he received solid training in the humanities.

In 1563, he entered the Carmelite Order in Medina and changed his name to Fray Juan de Santo Matía. After his novitiate and profession of vows, he went for studies to his order's College of San Andrés at Salamanca.

He enrolled at the university in Salamanca in the school of arts from 1564 to 1567 and in the theological course from 1567 to 1568. In the school of arts, he attended classes in philosophy; in theology, he probably heard the lectures of Mancio de Corpus Christi, OP, on the Summa of St. Thomas. An indication of Fray Juan's talents is evident in his appointment as prefect of studies while still a student. As prefect his duties were to teach class daily, defend public theses, and assist the regent master in resolving objections.

He was ordained in 1567, and while in Medina to sing his first Mass, he met Teresa of Avila, who had begun a reform within the order. She spoke to him of her plan to restore the Carmelite Primitive Rule for the friars as well as the nuns. Fray Juan, who had been longing for a life of deeper solitude and was thinking about transferring to the Carthusians, promised to adopt this life. With two others he made profession of the Carmelite Primitive Rule at Duruelo, Nov. 28, 1568, and changed his name to Fray John of the Cross. The new life in keeping with the Primitive Rule was austere and predominantly contemplative. But the active apostolate was not excluded; it consisted mainly of preaching and hearing confessions. The friars of this new reform wore sandals and were soon referred to as Discalced Carmelites.

At Duruelo Fray John was appointed subprior and novice master. Later he was named rector of a newly established house of studies in Alcalá. In the spring of 1571, Teresa was ordered to govern the Convent of the Incarnation and to reform its 130 nuns. Realizing the need of a prudent, learned, and holy confessor at the Incarnation, she obtained permission from the apostolic visitor to have Fray John as confessor.

While he was confessor there, the reform grew rapidly. But the attitude of the Carmelite Order toward the reform began to change mainly due to a conflict of jurisdiction. In 1575, in a chapter at Piacenza, it was determined to stop the expansion of the reform of the order.

On the night of Dec. 2, 1577, some Carmelites seized Fray John, took him to Toledo, and demanded a renunciation of the reform. He refused, maintaining that he had remained at the Incarnation by order of the nuncio. They declared him a rebel and imprisoned him. He lived nine months in a cell 6 feet wide and 10 feet long, with no light other than what came through a slit high up in the wall. During this imprisonment he composed some of his great poems. In August 1578, in a perhaps miraculous way, he escaped; eventually he journeyed to a monastery of Discalced in southern Spain.

The following years were given to administration: he was prior on several occasions, rector of the Carmelite College in Baeza, and vicar provincial of the southern province. In 1588 he was elected major definitor, becoming ing a member of the reform's new governing body, headed by Father Doria.

St. John of the Cross.

During these years as superior he did most of his writing. He also devoted much time to the guidance of lay people as well as giving spiritual direction to the Carmelite friars and nuns.

His deep life of prayer is evident in the splendid descriptions of The Spiritual Canticle and The Living Flame of Love. He once admitted: "God communicates the mystery of the Trinity to this sinner in such a way that if His Majesty did not strengthen my weakness by a special help, it would be impossible for me to live."

Toward the end of his life, a controversy arose within the reform. Father Doria desired to abandon jurisdiction over the nuns founded by St. Teresa and also to expel Father Gratian, a favorite confessor of Teresa, from the reform. As a member of the governing body, Fray John of the Cross opposed Doria in both matters. For obvious reasons John was not elected to any office in the chapter of 1591. He was instead sent to a solitary monastery in southern Spain. While there, he heard news of the efforts being made to expel him also from the reform.

In mid-September, he noted a slight fever caused by an ulcerous inflammation of the leg. As the sickness grew worse, he was obliged to leave the solitude he so loved for the sake of medical attention. He chose to go to Ubeda rather than Baeza because “in Ubeda, nobody knows me.” The prior of Ubeda received him unwillingly and complained of the added expense. On the night of December 13, John of the Cross died, repeating the words of the psalmist: “Into your hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit.”

In 1592 his body was transferred to Segovia. He was beatified by Clement X in 1675, canonized by Benedict XIII in 1726, and declared a Doctor of the Church by Pius XI in 1926.

Writings. The saint’s major treatises are The Ascent of Mount Carmel—The Dark Night, The Spiritual Canticle, and The Living Flame of Love. These writings have greatly influenced studies in spiritual theology. Pius XI, in proclaiming St. John of the Cross a Doctor of the Church, stated that they are rightly looked upon as a code and guide for the faithful soul endeavoring to embrace a more perfect life.

The Ascent of Mount Carmel—The Dark Night, beginning as a commentary on the poem The Dark Night, is a treatise on how to reach perfection (union with God). The poem, St. John says, refers to the path of perfection as a dark night for three reasons: the soul on this path must mortify its appetites, journey in faith, and receive God’s communication. These reasons involve privation just as night involves a privation of light. The Ascent has three books and the Dark Night, two.

Book One of the Ascent discusses the mortification of all voluntary, inordinate appetites because these appetites are contrary to the perfect love of God. It frequently refers as well to the active night (or purification) of the senses, teaching that a man must acquire the habit of using his sense faculties only for God’s honor and glory, out of love for Christ and in imitation of Him.

Books Two and Three of the Ascent treat the journey in faith, especially as it is in the active purification of the spirit. The soul must walk in the darkness of faith to reach union with God, and deprive itself of everything contradicting full adherence to God and to the law of Christ and of His Church. In the active night (or purification) of the spirit, a man must endeavor to purge his spiritual faculties through the theological virtues. The saint explains how each of these virtues purifies its respective faculty of whatever is not for God’s glory, and unites it to God. In these two books he has especially in mind souls receiving contemplation; hence, in seeking to purify their spiritual faculties they must also turn aside in prayer from particular knowledge in order to receive through a general, loving attentiveness to God in faith the general, loving knowledge of God, which is the meaning of contemplation.

The two books of the Dark Night describe how God purifies the soul passively. The discussion of God’s communication is limited to that communication called purgative contemplation. Because this contemplation is dark and painful to the soul it is called a night.

Book One of the Night deals with the defects of beginners, the signs of initial contemplation, and the benefits of the passive purification of the senses. Book Two gives a vivid picture and analyses of the purgative contemplation that God infuses in the passive night of the spirit.

Through these active and passive purifications, the soul reaches union with God, ridding itself of everything out of conformity with His will. In this union, it habitually employs all its faculties, appetites, operations, and emotions in God, so that in its activity it resembles God; this union is called “the union of likeness.”

The Spiritual Canticle comprises a poem (a loving colloquy between the soul and Christ) and its commentary. The stanzas of the poem are like outpourings of that love which arose from the abundant mystical knowledge communicated by God to the soul of the saint. They recount the history of his love of Christ and its forward movement, and mark the degrees and stages of his spiritual life. In its general plan the poem dwells on four main aspects of the life of divine love: (1) the anxious loving search for the Beloved; (2) the first encounter with Him; (3) perfect union with Him; (4) the desire for that perfect union that will be had in glory.

The chief elements of the commentary include: a general summary of the content of each stanza, a detailed explanation of each verse, and frequent doctrinal explanations of the thought.

The Living Flame of Love is also a poem with a commentary. This poem is the song of a soul that has reached a highly perfect love within the state of transformation. The state of transformation in God is the loftiest attainable on earth. It is equivalent to the state called “spiritual marriage” in the Canticle and “the divine union” in the Ascent-Night: a habitual union with God through the likeness of love. The four stanzas of the Living Flame refer to transient, intense actual unions (in contradiction to the habitual union) experienced by one advanced within this state of transformation.

The commentary, like that of the Canticle, gives a general summary of each stanza, a detailed explanation of each verse, and many doctrinal explanations.

In his major works, therefore, St. John of the Cross writes mainly of how one reaches perfection (or union with God), and of the life of divine union itself. In brief, this union is reached through the practice of the theological virtues, which purify the soul and unite it with God. The life of union with God is a life of perfect faith, hope, and charity.

His remaining writings include relatively few letters, various maxims and counsels, and about ten poems. These minor works deal chiefly with the same themes as the major works.

Feast: Nov. 24.

Bibliography: The Collected Works of Saint John of the Cross, trans. K. KAVANAUGH and O. RODRIGUEZ, rev. ed. (Washington, D.C. 1991). K. KAVANAUGH, John of the Cross: Doctor of Light and Love (New York 1999). C. THOMPSON, The Poet and the Mystic: A Study of the Cantico Espiritual of San Juan de la Cruz (Oxford 1977). R. HARDY, Search for Nothing: The Life of John of the Cross (New York 1982). I. MATTHEW, The Impact of God: Soundings from St. John of the Cross (London 1995). E. PACHO et al., Introducción a la lectura de San Juan de la Cruz (Salamanca 1991). S. PAYNE, John of the Cross and the Cognitive Value of Mysticism: An Analysis of Sanjuanist Teaching and Its Philosophical Implications for Contemporary Discussions of Mystical Experience (Dordrecht 1990). F. RUIZ et al., God Speaks in the Night, trans. K. KAVANAUGH (Washington, D.C. 1991, repr. 2000). G. TAVARD, Poetry and Contemplation in Saint John of the Cross (Athens, Ohio 1988). K. WOJTYŁA, Faith according to St. John of the Cross, trans. J. AUMANN (San Francisco 1981).

[K. KAVANAUGH]

JOHN OF THORESBY

Archbishop of York, chancellor of England; b. probably North Thoresby, Lindsey, England; d. Bishopthorpe, Yorkshire, Nov. 6, 1373. He studied at Oxford, where he was a bachelor of civil law by 1341. He was made bishop of SAINT DAVIDS in Wales by papal PROVISION in 1347, was translated to WORCESTER in 1351, and finally, was translated to York in 1352, though he was enthroned there only in 1354. In the royal service from 1330, he was a notary in the chancery (1336), master of the rolls (1341), keeper of the privy seal (1345–47), and chancellor of England (1349–56). He was one of the guardians of the kingdom during King EDWARD III's absence in France (1355). As archbishop he first settled the dispute between CANTERBURY and YORK as to the right to bear the cross: it was decided that each primate was to be allowed to bear his cross erect in the other's province (April 20, 1353). This was confirmed by the pope on Feb. 22, 1354, who directed at the same time that the archbishop of York should be styled "Primate of England" while the archbishop of Canterbury should be called "Primate of All England." Thoresby laid the foundation of the new choir in York Minster in 1360 and built the lady-chapel at the east end. By his direction a "catechism" or commentary in English on the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments was drawn up (1357) for his parish priests by John de Traystek (or Garrick), a monk of St. Mary's, York.

Bibliography: JOHN OF THORESBY, Lay Folks' Catechism, ed. T. F. SIMMONS and H. E. NOLLOTH, Early English Text Society (London 1901) 118. W. A. PANTIN, The English Church in the 14th Century (Cambridge, Eng. 1955). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1863–64. M. MCKISACK, The Fourteenth Century, 1307–1399 (Oxford 1959). C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 19:760–762.

[V. MUDROCH]

JOHN OF VALENCE, ST.

Bishop; b. diocese of Lyons, France; d. Valence, March 21, 1146. John became a priest and a canon of the Lyons cathedral. He resolved to enter CÎTEAUX but decided to substitute a pilgrimage to the shrine of SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA. On his return he had a dream in which Christ complained: "He ought to be Mine, not as a pilgrim, but as a dweller in My house." John then entered Cîteaux (1114) and in 1118 was sent to found the monastery of Bonnevaux (Bona Vallis) on the Loire, from which he established four daughter-houses. In 1141 John was elected bishop of Valence, where, while maintaining a rigorous way of life for himself, he actively alleviated the sufferings of widows, orphans, and the poor, and in other ways promoted social justice. His cultus was confirmed in 1901.

Feast: April 26.

Bibliography: See the life by John's contemporary and eyewitness, GIRARDUS, Vita s. Johannis episcopi Valentiniensis in E. MARTÈNE and U. DURAND, Thesaurus novus anecdotorum 3:1693–1702. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 4446. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 1:364–366.

[J. R. SOMMERFELDT]

JOHN OF VERCELLI, BL.

Dominican master general; b. Mosso Santa-Maria, Biella (prov. Vercelli), c. 1200; d. Montpellier, Nov. 30, 1283. As a secular priest, he studied and taught civil and Canon Law at Paris, and later at Vercelli. Received into the order by JORDAN OF SAXONY (c. 1230), he became prior of Vercelli (1245), vicar-general for Hungary (1255), prior of San Nicolo at Bologna (1256), provincial of Lombardy (1257–64), and finally sixth master general (1264–83). As general he visited personally, and on foot, almost all the houses of the order, except those of Spain, urging perfect observance of the constitutions and traditions of the order; presided at 20 general chapters and sent many encyclical letters [ed. Monumenta Ordinis Fratrum Praedicatorum historica 5 (1900) 63–129]; and built the famous Arca into which he translated the body of St. DOMINIC. Among the eminent Dominicans whom he consulted were Peter de Tarantaise (INNOCENT V), ALBERT THE GREAT, and THOMAS AQUINAS. He declined the patriarchate of Jerusalem (1278). Pius X approved his cult Sept. 7, 1803.

Feast: Dec. 1.

Bibliography: J. P. MOTHON, Vita del b. Giovanni da Vercelli, Ital. tr. L. CHINA (Vercelli 1903). D. A. MORTIER, Histoire des maîtres généraux de l'ordre des Frères Prêcheurs, 8 v. (Paris 1903–20) 2:1–170. G. D. D'OLDENICO, "Dei rapporti tra Giovanni Garbella da Vercelli sesto Maestro Generale dei Domenicani con Giovanni Gersen Abate di S. Stefano di Vercelli nei riguardi della Imitazione di Cristo," Memorie Domenicane 68 (1951) 201–211; "B. Giovanni Garbella da Vercelli sesto Maestro Generale Domenicano," ibid. 69 (1952) 259–265. A. P. FRUTAZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1094. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 12:48–51.

[S. L. FORTE]

JOHN OF WALDBY

Preacher, writer; d. shortly after 1372. John must be distinguished from his younger relative, archbishop ROBERT WALDBY OF YORK. He was ordained acolyte Dec. 16, 1334, and had received his D.Th. from Oxford by 1354, probably the year he became provincial of the AUGUSTINIANS in England. Five of his works are extant while at least nine others are lost. All were originally sermons but were changed into devotional reading texts. His collection of seven homilies on the Our Father treat the seven capital sins. In his collection of five sermons on the Ave Maria covering the principal feasts of Our Lady, he defends the Immaculate Conception. His name and ideas received wide circulation through the Mirour of Life of William of Nassington, who claimed to have based his work on John's Our Father, but there is little similarity to John's extant text. The collection of 12 sermons on the Apostles Creed was dedicated to Thomas de la Mare, future abbot of ST. ALBAN's, and prior of TYNEMOUTH PRIORY where the Austins taught Latin. John's Novum opus dominicale is extant; the Misericordiae Domini long assigned to Richard ROLLE DE HAMPOLE is now credited to him. His main sources were St. Bernard and especially Augustine, almost all of whose works were available to John in the Austin library in York. John must be counted among the mystical writers of England.

Bibliography: A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1957–58. B. HACKETT, Sanctus Augustinus, vitae spiritualis magister, 2 v. (Rome 1959) v. 2. A. O. GWYNN, The English Austin Friars (London 1940) 114–123. G. R. OWST, Literature and Pulpit . . . (New York 1961).

[F. ROTH]

JOHN OF WALES

Bolognese canonist of the classical period, of whom nothing is known other than that he was a native of Wales. He wrote an apparatus to the Compilatio tertia antiqua (1210–15), and put together and glossed what is known as the Compilatio secunda antiqua between 1210 and 1212 or 1215. This compilation is, in fact, the third in time of the five "received" collections of decretal letters prior to the great compilation commissioned by Gregory IX in 1234 (see QUINQUE COMPILATIONES ANTIQUAE), but it became known as the "second" or "intermediate" since it contained decretals after those in the Breviarium, or Compilatio prima, of Bernard of Pavia (1191–92) and before the official collection of Innocent III's decretals known as Compilatio tertia (1210). John's fellow exiles GILBERTUS ANGLICUS and ALANUS ANGLICUS had made collections of decretals to supplement Compilatio prima before 1210; but although these collections had been superseded by Innocent's Compilatio, there was still a demand for the extra documents they contained. Of all the attempts made to arrange these documents of Gilbertus and Alanus systematically in a single collection, only that of John was accepted by the schools as Compilatio secunda. The center of his compilation depends on Gilbertus and Alanus; the system is that of the five books of the Compilatio prima. In all there are 106 titles divided into 331 chapters, embracing texts prior to the Decretum and many decretals of Clement III (1187–91) and Celestine III (1191–98), as well as decretals omitted from Compilatio prima, such as some of Alexander III and Lucius III [ed. A. Friedberg, Quinque Compilationes Antiquae (Leiden 1876) 66–104].

Bibliography: F. GILLMANN, "Johannes Galensis als Glossator . . .," Archiv für katholisches Kirchenrecht, 105 (1925) 488–565. "Des Johannes Galensis Apparat zur Compilatio III in der Universitätsbibliothek Erlangen," ibidem 118 (1938) 174–222. G. POST, "Additional Glosses of Johannes Galensis and Silvester in the Early Tancred or So-called Laurentius Apparatus to Compilatio III," ibidem 119 (1939) 364–375. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici I, v.1–5 (Mechlin 1928—) 1:356, 444, 445. A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini: v. 1, Historia fontium (Turin 1950) 234. S. KUTTNER, "Bernardus Compostellanus antiquus," Traditio 1 (1943)

310. G. OESTERLÉ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 6:105–106.

[L. E. BOYLE]

JOHN OF WALES

English theologian (known also as Waleys, Guallensis, de Wells); d. Paris, April 3?, 1285. He was a bachelor in theology before entering the FRANCISCANS and was made the sixth lector in the Oxford friary c. 1257–58. As a regent master in Paris (1281–83), he was known as arbor vitae, and was appointed (1282) one of the five masters in theology to examine the doctrines of PETER JOHN OLIVI. In the same year he was employed by archbishop JOHN PECKHAM to negotiate peace between the English and the Welsh. At his death he was respected and admired for his practical wisdom and piety. Among his writings, some of which were translated into Catalan and Italian and published as often as 12 times between 1470 and 1520, are: a Communiloquium of informal discourses; a Compendiloquium, which is a biographical history of philosophy; a Breviloquium of the four cardinal virtues as illustrated in the lives of great men of antiquity; a Moniloquium for the use of young preachers; a Legiloquium on the Ten Commandments; a Summa de penitentia; and a treatise on the seven deadly sins.

Bibliography: J. SWANSON, John of Wales: A Study of the Works and Ideas of a Thirteenth-Century Friar (Cambridge 1989). W. A. PANTIN, "John of Wales and Medieval Humanism," in Medieval Studies Presented to Aubrey Gwynn (Dublin 1961) 297–319.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

JOHN OF WALES

English Franciscan theologian, lector at the Oxford friary c. 1349; flourished 1349–78. He took part in the riot against the university chancellor in March 1349. He lectured for many years at the London Friary before receiving the degree of master by order of Urban V in January 1367, and again in September 1368. Having received the doctorate in theology, he was appointed papal chaplain in April 1372, and envoy of the king to the Roman Curia in September 1377. In 1378 his London hospice was robbed of horses, books, money, and plate, but these were returned by order of the king.

Bibliography: A. G. LITTLE, The Grey Friars in Oxford (Oxford 1891) 78, 175, 311–312. The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 20:1140. P. É. D'ALENÇON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:763–764. W. LAMPEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1040–41. A. B. EMDEN, A Bio- graphical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:2008.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

JOHN PARENTI

Franciscan minister general, 1227 to 1232; b. probably at Civita Castellana; b. and d. dates unknown. He was a Roman citizen and doctor of laws who joined the order soon after its establishment. In 1219 he was made provincial minister of Spain. His policies as minister general advanced the development of the Friars Minor into an educated and efficient order. Two notable events occurred in 1230: the translation of the relics of St. FRANCIS to the basilica in ASSISI and the acquisition of the bull Quo elongati, and GREGORY IX's exposition of the Rule. In 1232 Parenti resigned under pressure from the friars supporting ELIAS OF CORTONA.

Bibliography: THOMAS OF ECCLESTON, Tractatus de adventu Fratrum Minorum in Angliam, ed. A. G. LITTLE (2d ed. Manchester 1951). GRATIEN DE PARIS (E. BADIN), Histoire . . . de l'ordre des frères mineurs au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris 1928). R. B. BROOKE, Early Franciscan Government (Cambridge, Eng. 1959).

[R. B. BROOKE]

JOHN PAUL I, POPE

Pontificate Aug. 26–Sept. 28, 1978; b. Albino Luciani, Oct. 17, 1912, Forno di Canale, Italy. He was born into a poor family. His father, a Socialist Party organizer, was at one point forced to migrate to Switzerland for work. After studies in the minor seminary at Feltre and the major seminary at Belluno, young Luciani was ordained a priest on July 7, 1935. Fr. Luciani earned a doctorate in theology at the Gregorianum in Rome in 1937, and served briefly as a parish priest at Forno di Canale and Agerdo. From 1937 to 1947 he was professor of theology, canon law, and history of sacred art at the Belluno seminary, for a time serving also as vice-rector. Popular as a preacher and a catechist, his book Catechism Crumbs went through several editions. While continuing to teach, he also became in 1947 pro-chancellor of the diocese, then named vicar-general. In 1958 he was named to the see of Vittorio-Veneto and ordained bishop by John XXIII at St. Peter's. He participated in VATICAN COUNCIL II, and his commitment to its spirit of renewal was expressed in a pastoral letter to his diocese in 1967, "Notes on the Council."

Bishop Luciani, named Patriarch of Venice in 1969, was created cardinal by Pope Paul VI at the consistory of March 5, 1973, with San Marco, Piazza Venezia, as his titular church. In 1976 he published Illustrissimi, an imaginative book of letters he addressed to famous literary and historical figures, including Jesus. In the conclave that met in August 1978 to elect a successor to Paul VI, Cardinal Luciani was elected the first day, on the fourth ballot. His election was surprising because of its swiftness and was welcomed because of his warmth and simplicity. He did away with the traditional papal coronation and was installed as the supreme pastor by receiving the archiepiscopal pallium on Sept. 3, 1978; the pope referred to the ceremony as the inauguration of his pastoral ministry. The program Pope John Paul outlined the day after his election proposed the following: to continue to put into effect the heritage of Vatican II; to preserve the integrity of church discipline in the lives of priests and faithful; to remind the entire Church that the first duty is evangelization; to continue the ecumenical thrust, without compromising doctrine but without hesitancy; to pursue with patience but firmness the serene and constructive dialogue of Paul VI for pastoral action; to support every laudable and worthy initiative for world peace.

The pope did not live to carry out this program; the Church and the world were shocked by his sudden death after barely a month in office. But John Paul I had long suffered from poor health, although illness was kept secret and not revealed until after his death. His physical condition and the pressures of the office, not a fanciful assassination plot, joined to bring his pontificate to an abrupt end. The “September Papacy” had brought fulfillment to the longing in people’s hearts for a person and a leader who radiated joy, holiness, and simple goodness. His passing left the hope that the response to his brief pontificate would be remembered by his successors and by every pastor in the Church.

Bibliography: J. CORNWELL, A Thief in the Night: The Mysterious Death of Pope John Paul I (New York 1989). P. HEBBLETHWAITE, The Year of Three Popes (Cleveland 1979).

[T. C. O'BRIEN]

JOHN PAUL II, POPE

The first Slavic pope ever and the first non-Italian elected to the See of Peter in four and a half centuries, John Paul II’s personality, pastoral method, and magisterium left indelible marks on world Catholicism. As the Council of Trent and the Counter-Reformation popes defined the Church’s relationship to an emerging modern world, the Second VATICAN COUNCIL as authoritatively interpreted by John Paul II may well define Catholicism’s relationship to whatever follows the “modern world” in the twenty-first century and beyond.

PRE-PAPAL YEARS

Early Life. Karol Józef Wojtyła was born on May 18, 1920 in Wadowice, a provincial Galician town near Kraków. His father, Karol, was a retired army officer; his mother, Emilia Kaczorowska, had previously borne another son, Edmund, and a daughter who died shortly after birth. Emilia Wojtyła died in 1929; young Karol, “Lolek” to his family and friends, was just finishing the third grade. Three and a half years later, his brother Edmund, a doctor, died of scarlet fever contracted from a patient. Lolek and his father lived by themselves for the next nine years. The son would later write that his father’s piety, austerity, and interest in Polish literature and history constituted “my first seminary.”

Wojtyła received an excellent classical elementary and secondary education in Wadowice, where he was a star student and a fine athlete and outdoorsman. During high school he immersed himself in the classics of Polish Romantic literature and became deeply involved in the theater under the influence of an avant-garde director, Mieczysław Kotlarczyk.

In 1938, Wojtyła moved with his father to Kraków to begin studies in Polish philology at the Jagiellonian University. His undergraduate career was interrupted by the Second World War. Shortly after conquering Poland, the Nazis closed the university and shipped many of its professors to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. Polish cultural life went underground for the duration of the war.

The War Years. From 1939 to 1945, Wojtyła was heavily engaged in various forms of cultural resistance to the German Occupation of his homeland. He continued his studies when the Jagiellonian University reconstituted itself underground. With his mentor, Mieczysław Kotlarczyk, he founded the Rhapsodic Theatre, a clandestine troupe whose experimental productions of Polish classics helped keep alive the national memory the Nazis were determined to erase. He joined UNIA, a broad-based, clandestine resistance movement which included armed cadres and a unit devoted to saving Polish Jews from the Holocaust; UNIA worked to lay the cultural, social, and political foundations for a postwar Christian democratic Poland. Young Wojtyła also took an active role in his parish, leading one of the original Living Rosary groups of young men; here he encountered the lay mystic Jan Tyranowski, who introduced him to the writings of St. JOHN OF THE CROSS and St. TERESA OF AVILA. As all these activities were strictly banned by the Occupation, Wojtyła lived for more than five years at the daily risk of his life.

From 1940 to August of 1944, Wojtyła was also a manual laborer, first as a quarryman and blaster and later as a worker in the Solvay chemical factory on the outskirts of Kraków; the experience marked him for life. After his father's death in February 1941, Karol struggled to discern his vocation, torn between his love for the theater and the academic life and an increasing sense that he was being called to the priesthood. After a period of intense reflection (during which he explored the possibility of entering the Carmelites, only to be told that they were accepting no new novices during the war), it became clear to him that God intended him for the priesthood. The heroic archbishop of Kraków, Adam Stefan SAPIEHA, accepted him as a candidate and for two years Wojtyła lived a double life, continuing his manual work and his resistance activities while beginning his philosophy and theology studies in the clandestine seminary that Sapieha had created in defiance of the Occupation. In August 1944, when the Gestapo attempted to arrest the young men of Kraków to forestall a repetition of the Warsaw Uprising, Sapieha took his clandestine seminarians into his home, which functioned as an underground seminary until the Soviet Army drove the Germans from Kraków in January 1945. Daily life with the "prince-archbishop," as Sapieha (son of a noble Polish-Lithuanian family) was known, provided Wojtyła with his model of the priest and bishop as defensor hominis, the defender of the rights of his people.

The Young Priest. On Nov. 1, 1946, Cardinal Sapieha ordained Wojtyła to the priesthood and then sent him to Rome to obtain his doctorate in theology at the Pontifical University of St. Thomas Aquinas, the "Angelicum." After living at the Belgian College for two years and exploring the Belgian and French worker-priest experiments during vacations, Wojtyła completed a dissertation on The Doctrine of Faith According to St. John of the Cross under the direction of Reginald GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, O.P. Garrigou's single criticism of the dissertation, that Wojtyła did not use the phrase "divine object" of God, indicated that the young Polish priest-scholar was beginning to move beyond the NEO-SCHOLASTICISM then dominating Catholic intellectual life.

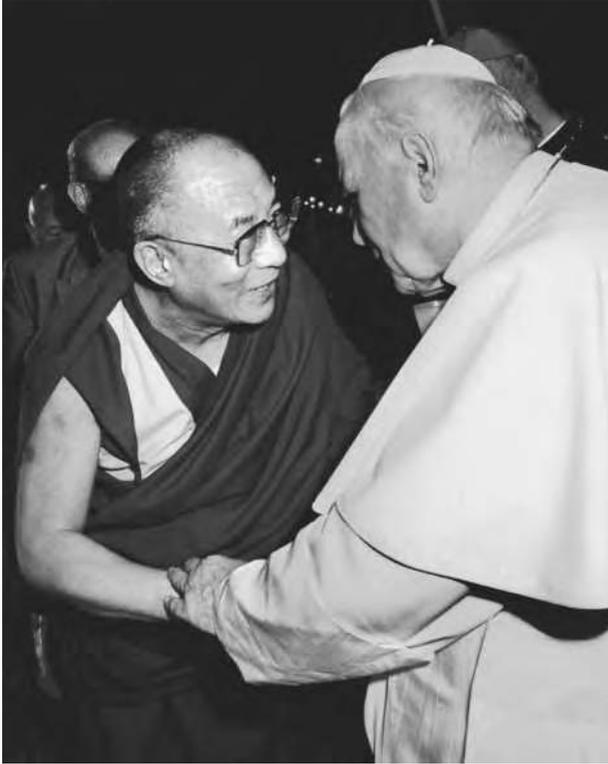

After six months of service in the country parish at Niegowić, Father Wojtyła was assigned by Cardinal Sapieha to St. Florian's Church in Kraków, a parish frequented by Catholic intellectuals and professionals. His task was to form a new student chaplaincy for the students of the Jagiellonian University, the Kraków Academy of Fine Arts, and the Kraków Polytechnic: a front-line post in the struggle with Poland's new communist regime for the soul of Polish youth. Father Wojtyła became an immensely successful student chaplain and a pastoral pioneer. He encouraged his students to participate actively in the Mass; he formed choirs, directed theatrical groups, and provided off-campus opportunities for the kind of philosophical and theological studies that were difficult or impossible in the Marxist-dominated academic environment of Kraków. Defying both clerical convention and communist restrictions on organizing youth groups, he took young men and women into the countryside for skiing, hiking, camping, and kayaking trips that were also opportunities for pastoral care. His young friends called him Wujek, "Uncle," a kind of Stalin-era nom de guerre; as the circle of students expanded, they came to call themselves Wojtyła's Środowisko, or "milieu." The friendships formed in these years endured throughout Wojtyła's life. As he formed young professionals into mature Christians, they were forming him into one of the most dynamic priests of his generation and igniting his interests in modern problems of sexual ethics, marriage, and family life.

Pope John Paul II embraces the legs of Jesus Christ on a wooden crucifix during Day of Pardon Mass in St. Peter's Basilica, Vatican City, 2000. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Amidst this intense pastoral activity, Father Wojtyła wrote numerous essays and poems (the latter published pseudonymously) for the independent Kraków Catholic newspaper Tygodnik Powszechny (Universal Weekly). He also composed a play, Our God's Brother, which explored the temptations of revolutionary violence through Kotlarczyk's "inner theater" dramatic method. The play was loosely based on the life of Albert CHMIEŁOWSKI, a Polish painter who founded a religious community dedicated to the homeless.

Pope John Paul II (right) with Tibet's exiled spiritual leader, Dalai Lama, at the Interreligious Assembly, St. Peter's Square, Vatican, Rome, Italy, 1999. (Arturo Mari/AP/Wide World Photos)

Scholar and Bishop. In 1953, Wojtyła completed his habilitation doctorate under instructions from Archbishop Eugeniusz Baziak. His dissertation explored the moral philosophy of the German phenomenologist, Max Scheler, and marked the beginning of Wojtyła's intellectual combination of THOMISM and PHENOMENOLOGY. One of the dissertation readers, Professor Stefan Swieżawski, encouraged the young philosopher to join the faculty of the Catholic University of Lublin (KUL), the only Catholic institution of higher education behind the iron curtain. Archbishop Baziak approved the arrangement and Karol Wojtyła was appointed instructor in philosophical ethics at KUL, where he would shortly rise to full professor. Wojtyła maintained his relationship to KUL for decades, participating in a distinctive philosophical project in which the truth of reality and morals would be probed through a disciplined reflection on the human person. The KUL philosophers proposed to challenge Marxism and other distorted modern ideologies on their own intellectual ground: what was authentic human liberation? On this basis, Wojtyła would eventually develop a complex philosophical anthropology rooted in an analysis of human moral agency.

While commuting weekly to KUL, where he was a magnetic teacher, confessor, and counselor, Father Wojtyła continued his pastoral work in Kraków, adding a ministry to healthcare professionals to his ongoing work with students, and teaching social ethics in the Kraków seminary. In 1958, Pope Pius XII appointed him Titular Bishop of Ombi and Auxiliary Bishop of Kraków. Wojtyła was ordained bishop in Wawel Cathedral on Sept. 29, 1958, and added a new load of episcopal duties to his academic work at KUL and his pastoral activities. In conversation with his graduate students and other lay friends, Bishop Wojtyła prepared his first book, Love and Responsibility, in which he discussed sexual ethics and the beauty of sexual love with a frankness startling in its time and place.

The Second Vatican Council. When the Ante-Preparatory Commission appointed by Pope John XXIII wrote the world's bishops inviting suggestions for agenda of the Second Vatican Council, Bishop Wojtyła, the forty-year-old auxiliary of Kraków, responded with a philosophical essay urging that the council propose Christian humanism as the Church's response to the civilizational crisis of the mid-twentieth century. Defective ideas of the human person, Wojtyła argued, were at the root of a century of fear that had already produced two world wars, three totalitarian systems, unprecedented slaughter, and the greatest persecution of the Church in history. Reconstituting the Church as an evangelical movement proclaiming the truth about the human person was, in his judgment, the crucial intellectual and pastoral task of the Council—a vision congruent with John XXIII's historic opening address to the bishops on Oct. 11, 1962. That vision would guide Wojtyła's participation in and implementation of Vatican II for more than forty years.

Wojtyła attended all four periods of the Council, taking an increasingly active role. Entering the council as a very junior auxiliary bishop, he participated in the third and fourth periods (and the crucial intercession between the third and fourth periods) as the archbishop of Kraków, a post to which he was nominated by Pope Paul VI on Dec. 30, 1963. His formal interventions at the council were on themes he had stressed during his priestly ministry: the universal call to holiness, the baptismal dignity of all Christians, the lay vocation in the world as an expression of the triple munus of Christ, and religious freedom as the first of human rights. Wojtyła's largest contribution to Vatican II came in helping draft and then defend Gaudium et spes, the "Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World." Work on this document during the early 1965 intercession and the fourth period of Vatican II brought Wojtyła into contact with important Western theologians, including Yves CONGAR and Henri de LUBAC, the latter becoming a good friend.

A rally to celebrate the Jasna Góra Shrine's 600th anniversary. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

During the later periods of the council, Wojtyła began work on Osoba y czyn (Person and Act), his major philosophical work, which was intended to provide a secure philosophical foundation for the council's anthropology and teaching on religious freedom. In it, he utilized the resources of both a renewed Thomism and phenomenology.

Archbishop of Kraków. With the entire Polish Church, Wojtyła celebrated the millennium of Polish

Christianity in 1966. In 1970, after completing a guidebook to the Vatican Council's 16 documents, Sources of Renewal, he began planning an extensive implementation of Vatican II, aimed at enabling his entire archdiocese to relive the conciliar experience. After two years of preparation, the Synod of Kraków began in May 1972 and was completed in June 1979. Five hundred discussion groups brought religious, clergy, and laity together to learn the council's teaching and apply it to the pastoral life of the archdiocese.

Named cardinal in 1967, Wojtyła's priorities as archbishop included a vigorous defense of religious freedom (which involved an ongoing battle with the communist regime over the construction of new churches and the public expression of Catholic faith); the development of the seminary and a faculty of theology to replace the Jagiellonian University faculty of theology, which had been closed by the regime in 1954; support for family life (including the establishment of an Institute of Family Life and diocesan-wide marriage-preparation programs); youth ministry; outreach to intellectuals; a broad-ranging ministry of charity; and extensive parish visitations. In carrying out these projects, Wojtyła exemplified the local bishop as pastor, teacher, and defender of the rights of his people.

Cardinal Wojtyła collaborated closely with Cardinal Stefan WYSZYŃSKI, Primate of Poland. The two men had different sensibilities, and Wojtyła's ecclesiology was more reflective of Vatican II than Wyszyński's. But the communist regime was completely unsuccessful in its ongoing attempts to drive a wedge between the two Polish cardinals, both of whom were determined to maintain the Church's unity against an implacable foe. Wojtyła also did what he could to support the hard-pressed Church in Czechoslovakia; he and one of his auxiliary bishops clandestinely ordained priests for service underground in Czechoslovakia.

During his 14 years as archbishop of Kraków, Wojtyła became one of the best-known and most highly respected churchmen in the world. In addition to his work as a cardinal with various dicasteries of the Roman Curia, he participated in the meetings of the Synod of Bishops in 1969, 1971, 1974, and 1977, serving as relator of the 1974 synod on evangelization. Wojtyła was also elected by his episcopal peers as a member of the Synod Council. In 1968, a Kraków-based theological commission organized by Cardinal Wojtyła sent a lengthy memorandum on the Church's marital ethic to Pope Paul VI, who was then preparing the encyclical Humanae vitae; the memorandum proposed a thoroughly humanistic understanding of human sexuality as the foundation for the Church's sexual ethic and teaching on contraception.

Wojtyła visited the United States and Canada in 1969, and returned to the United States in 1976 for the International Eucharistic Congress. He also led the Polish delegation to the 1973 International Eucharistic Congress in Australia. In April 1974, he gave a major philosophical paper at the International Thomistic Congress in Italy, drawing the admiration of the German philosopher Joseph Pieper, among others. Paul VI invited Cardinal Wojtyła to deliver the 1976 Lenten retreat for the pope and his closest Curial collaborators; Wojtyła's retreat conferences were later published as a book, Sign of Contradiction.

The Year of Three Popes. Paul VI died on Aug. 6, 1978; Wojtyła traveled to Rome with Cardinal Wyszyński for the conclave that elected Albino Luciani of Venice as Pope John Paul I on August 25. On September 29, after celebrating his twentieth episcopal anniversary with friends, he received the news of John Paul I's death the previous night. Over the next several days, Wojtyła wrote his last poem, "Stanisław," a meditation on the first martyr-bishop of Kraków. On October 8, at the church of St. Stanisław in Rome, he preached at a memorial Mass for John Paul I, citing Jn 21.15 and the capacity for a greater love of Christ as the prime requisite of Peter's successor.

On October 16, the second day of the second conclave of 1978, Karol Wojtyła was elected the 263rd successor to St. Peter. Taking the name John Paul II, he immediately broke precedent by receiving the first homage of the College of Cardinals standing, rather than sitting on a faldstool as tradition dictated. Like John Paul I, he declined coronation with the tiara. The homily at his installation Mass on October 22 was punctuated by the antiphon, "Be not afraid! Open the doors to Christ!"—a proclamation of robust faith and a call to a new Christian humanism that would characterize his pontificate for more than two decades.

JOHN PAUL II AND THE WORLD

Pope John Paul II had a greater impact on contemporary history than any pope in centuries. Yet his capacity to shape the world of his times was not mediated through the normal instruments of power. Rather, his papacy embodied a new, "post-Constantinian" approach to politics that was anticipated by the Second Vatican Council. The council's Declaration on Religious Freedom had broken the Church free from the embrace of political authority by asserting that the Catholic Church would no longer accept coercive state power as a buttress for its truth claims or a support for its evangelical mission. This new vision of the Church's relationship to the worlds of power—an ecclesiology of public engagement in which the Church sought to teach the nations, not rule the nations—had a decisive influence on the pontificate of John Paul II, and through him, on the history of the late twentieth century.

The Framework. The intellectual framework for John Paul II's public witness and diplomacy, and his distinctive view of the history of his times, may be found in his two addresses to the General Assembly of the United Nations.

In his first U.N. address on Oct. 2, 1979, John Paul characteristically began his analysis of world politics with the dignity of the human person: any legitimate politics, he proposed, "comes from man, is exercised by man, and is for man." Human progress was to be measured, not only by material standards, but in the realm of the human spirit; that was why the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights was a "milestone on the long and difficult path of the human race." Violations of human rights, not weapons stockpiles, were at the root of the world's division into Cold War camps and the primary threat to world peace. The cause of peace was thus the cause of human rights, and the first of human rights was religious freedom. To deny anyone the freedom to search for the truth, to adhere to it, and to express it publicly was profoundly dehumanizing, because the search for truth was of the very essence of humanity. Religious believers, agnostics, and atheists should be able to agree on this as a matter of shared humanistic conviction. Rightly understood, religious freedom was not a sectarian matter.

In this 1979 address, which challenged both communist regimes and the instrumental view of politics frequently encountered in the West, John Paul II explicitly committed the Catholic Church to the cause of human freedom and the defense of basic human rights as the primary goals of its engagement with world politics, a commitment that had been implicit in Pope John XXIII's 1963 encyclical PACEM IN TERRIS, and in Vatican II's "Declaration on Religious Freedom." Sixteen years later, on Oct. 8, 1995, the pope deepened that commitment in a second address to the U.N. General Assembly, which was marking its fiftieth anniversary in a world dramatically changed from 1979.

In that address, John Paul II vigorously defended the universality of human rights, a concept then being challenged by authoritarian regimes in Asia, by Islamic activists, and by some western intellectuals. The universal reach of the quest for freedom, the pope argued, was a key to understanding this quest as "one of the great dynamics of human history." Moreover, the global character of the human striving for freedom bore empirical witness that there is a universal human nature and a universal moral law; this moral logic built into human beings was the basis for a genuine dialogue between individuals, nations, and cultures. The "universal moral law written on the human heart is precisely [the] kind of 'grammar' which is needed" if the world was to engage in a serious conversation about the human future: if a "century of violent coercion," as the pope put it, was to be followed by a "century of persuasion." The world had yet to learn to "live with diversity"; yet difference was enriching, for "different cultures are but different ways of facing the question of the meaning of human existence." If humanity could learn "not [to] be afraid of man," then men and women would eventually come to see that "the tears of this century have prepared the ground for a new springtime of the human spirit."

The Challenge to Communism. As his 1979 U.N. address made clear, John Paul II intended to be a global public defender of human rights: he would challenge the material power of totalitarian and authoritarian regimes with the weapons of the human spirit and of culture, those products of man's spiritual nature that create national identities. This "culture first" strategy of change was first tested in the pope's native east central Europe.

The Soviet authorities quickly discerned that the election of a Polish pope created a profound challenge to the post-Yalta order in Europe. As restive and persecuted Catholic minorities in Lithuania and Ukraine began to assert themselves more vigorously in the wake of John Paul's election, and as the pope ignited a revolution of conscience in Poland that spread throughout the Soviet external empire, the Kremlin's worst fears began to be realized.

John Paul II's epic nine-day pilgrimage to Poland in June 1979 was a primary, even decisive, catalyst in the decade-long process that led to the collapse of European communism ten years later. In some 40 homilies and addresses, John Paul returned to his Polish countrymen their authentic history and culture, giving them tools of resistance that communism could not blunt. One-third of the Polish nation saw the pope in person, and virtually everyone else saw him on television or heard him on radio. The visit, a moment of catharsis for a people oppressed since 1939, was also a moment of moral clarification in which tens of thousands of people made the personal decision to resist the communist culture of the lie and to take the "risk of freedom," as the pope would call it at the U.N. in 1995.

The results of that revolution of conscience came swiftly. Solidarity, a free-trade union movement that was also a de facto political opposition, was born in August 1980 in Gdańsk. In December 1980, the Soviet Union was on the verge of launching an invasion of Poland to crush the new independent union and execute its leaders. On Dec. 16, 1980, having been made aware of this threat through his own informants and through United States intelligence sources, John Paul II wrote an unprecedented personal letter to Soviet president Leonid Brezhnev, urging full respect for the integrity of Poland and the rights of its people and signaling his nonnegotiable support for Solidarity. It seemed to many observers that there was an obvious connection between the pope's relationship to Solidarity and the attempt on his life that took place on May 13, 1981 in St. Peter's Square, when he was shot by a professional assassin with links to Warsaw Pact intelligence services.

John Paul condemned the imposition of martial law in Poland on Dec. 13, 1981, which included the mass arrests of Solidarity leaders. During his 1983 pilgrimage to his homeland, he urged the Polish authorities to enter a dialogue with the Solidarity leadership as the precondition to national renewal. In 1987, as the Polish economy and regime slowly crumbled, John Paul returned to Poland to help lay the moral foundations for the free society whose emergence he anticipated, an expectation that was vindicated two years later when Solidarity swept the available seats in the first semi-free elections in Poland in decades.

During the 1980s, the pope urged Catholic leaders throughout east central Europe to be vigorous defenders of religious freedom and other basic human rights. His support had a marked effect on Cardinal František Tomášek of Prague, who was transformed from a rather mute figure into the grand old man of the democratic resistance to communism in Czechoslovakia. John Paul also inspired a revitalized Catholic resistance in Slovakia, where numerous Catholic clergy and laity emerged from underground to take leading roles in the resistance. As these events were unfolding, the Lithuanian Catholic Committee for the Defense of Believers Rights intensified its activity despite harsh Soviet repression, and activists for religious freedom became more vocal among the Greek Catholics of Ukraine. John Paul's apostolic letter of Dec. 31, 1980, Egrediae Virtutis, naming SS. CYRIL AND METHODIUS, apostles of the Slavs, as co-patrons of Europe was an unmistakable signal to Catholics throughout central and eastern Europe that the pope would bend every effort to re-link the two halves of Catholic Europe. The pope's increasing prestige as a global moral leader brought him into contact with Soviet dissidents in the mid-1980s. In 1985, human rights activist Elena Bonner left a secret meeting with John Paul in the Vatican in tears, saying "He's the most remarkable man I have ever met. He is all light. He is a source of light." Some three years later, John Paul counseled Bonner's husband, Soviet physicist and human rights campaigner Andrei Sakharov, as he tried to clarify his political responsibilities in the U.S.S.R.

Mikhail Gorbachev, the last leader of the Soviet Union, visited John Paul II in the Vatican on Dec. 1, 1989, symbolically marking the end of 70 years of fierce Soviet anti-Catholic propaganda and persecution. In the mid-1990s, Gorbachev publicly conceded what was obvious to the Catholic people of central and eastern Europe throughout the 1980s: that John Paul II had been the pivotal figure in the complex events that led to the collapse of communist regimes in 1989. That the pope did this not by issuing anathemas or by calling princes to repentance in the snow but by igniting a revolution of conscience that ultimately produced a nonviolent political revolution demonstrated in action the morally driven approach to world politics that he had outlined to the United Nations in 1979.

John Paul II was less successful in engaging communist regimes in Asia. More than two decades of efforts to open a line of dialogue with the People's Republic of China were largely frustrated, although diplomatic contacts between the Holy See and the PRC took place. In November 1983, the pope wrote a private letter to Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping, underscoring the Church's respect for Chinese culture and requesting a formal dialogue; Deng Xiaoping never answered and his successors persistently blocked the pope's efforts to visit any part of China. Holy See relations with Vietnam were also difficult during the pontificate, although some progress was made in the 1990s on the appointment of bishops.

The Challenge to Free Societies. John Paul II quickly discerned that the quest for human freedom had not been completely vindicated, much less secured, by the Revolution of 1989. On May 1, 1991, his third social encyclical, CENTESIMUS ANNUS, analyzed the dramatic events of the recent past while scouting the terrain of public life in the democracies of the future. Describing the free and virtuous society as an interlocking complex of three parts—democratic polity, free economy, public moral culture—the pope argued that the last was the foundation of the entire edifice. Democracy and the free economy were not machines that could run by themselves. Absent the disciplines and direction given by a vibrant public moral culture, democracy and the free economy would self-destruct; as the pope put it in perhaps the most controversial sentence of the encyclical, "a democracy without values easily turns into open or thinly disguised totalitarianism."

The totalitarianism John Paul had in mind was not a recrudescence of fascism or communism, but a gross utilitarianism which drove genuine moral discourse out of public life. A democracy without transcendent moral reference points would have to resolve its differences on the basis of power alone, the pope warned. And that would spell the end of democracy. In his 1992 encyclical VERITATIS SPLENDOR, the pope deepened his challenge to free societies, arguing that a mutual recognition of the obligations of the moral law was the most secure foundation on which to build democratic equality and to safeguard the rights of the less powerful. John Paul returned to this theme in the encyclical EVANGELIUM VITAE (1995), chastising democracies that erect moral wrongs into "rights" as "tyrant states." The democratic future was profoundly threatened, the pope wrote, if those whom the strong deemed weak, inconvenient, or burdensome could be put beyond the boundaries of legal protection through the legalization of abortion and euthanasia.

The urgency of these life issues for the democratic future was underlined by the World Conference on Population and Development, held in Cairo in September 1994. The U.S. government and several of its European allies, coordinating their efforts with the U.N. Fund for Population Activities and the International Planned Parenthood Federation, intended that the Cairo conference would declare abortion as a basic human right on a par with religious freedom or freedom of speech. John Paul II, amidst the difficulties caused by a broken femur and hip-replacement surgery in April 1994, led a worldwide effort against this proposal, deploying all the assets of Vatican diplomacy while conducting a vigorous public campaign through the media in defense of the rights of women and the rights of the unborn. It was a striking example of the pope's enduring conviction that the word of truth, spoken clearly and forcefully enough, can bend the shape of history in humane directions. The Cairo conference refused to endorse the notion of abortion as a basic human right. Few doubted that it would have done so absent the intervention of John Paul II, exercising the power of moral witness.

John Paul II and Latin America. When John Paul was elected in 1978, Latin America was both the demographic center of world Catholicism and an arena of turmoil, confusion, and violence. During his first pilgrimage abroad in January of 1979, the pope spoke to the Third General Conference of the Conference of Latin American Bishops Conferences (CELAM) in Puebla, Mexico. In a lengthy address he criticized those aspects of LIBERATION THEOLOGY which portrayed Jesus as the "subversive man of Nazareth." A Church fully engaged in the struggle for justice in Latin America was an evangelical imperative; a partisan Church, the pope insisted, was an evangelical impossibility. These themes were later developed in two instructions from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, on "Certain Aspects of the Theology of Liberation" (1984) and on "Christian Freedom and Liberation" (1987). The pope's 1979 visit to Mexico, which had been governed as a secularist one-party state for decades, gave the local Church an unprecedented opportunity to express itself publicly. Tremendous popular support set in motion a process in which the Church was gradually freed to assume the kind of culture-forming role that John Paul II had urged at Puebla. In 2000, one-party rule in Mexico ended, and a new future for Mexican Catholicism opened up.

The pope's sharpest personal confrontation with certain distorted theologies of liberation came in Nicaragua in 1983. There, the Marxist Sandinista government (which included several priests), attempted to disrupt the pope's Mass in Managua and to drown out his homily. The pope's efforts were vindicated, however, in the democratic transitions in Central America of the late 1980s. Those transitions, effected through popular votes, put an end to the civil wars in Nicaragua and El Salvador, which had led to a crude persecution of the Church in the former and the murder of the Archbishop Oscar ROMERO in the latter.

The problems of democratic transition also framed John Paul's important pilgrimage to Chile in 1987. Chile had been ruled for 14 years by a military dictatorship led by General Augusto Pinochet. Human rights abuses were widespread; the Chilean Church had responded by creating a Vicariate of Solidarity which sought to rebuild civil society in the country. Beginning in 1978, the Holy See, at John Paul II's initiative, had successfully mediated a border dispute between Chile and Argentina which threatened to result in war, and the pope had considerable credibility with both the Pinochet regime (which included many serious Catholics) and the Chilean democratic opposition. The pope and his Chilean collaborators designed a pilgrimage built around the theme of civil reconciliation. During the pilgrimage, John Paul defended the Church's role as promoter of human rights, signaling to both the government and the democratic opposition that a nonviolent transition to democracy was imperative. The pilgrimage was marred by a violent demonstration which threatened to disrupt the pope's Mass in Santiago; the pope refused to leave the venue and the Mass was completed, despite a riot in which the government seemed not entirely innocent. Eighteen months after the pilgrimage, a national plebiscite rejected continuing military rule and set Chile firmly on the road to democracy.

A year later, John Paul defied the efforts of Paraguayan dictator Alfredo Stroessner to block his meeting with that country's democratic dissidents. As in Chile, the pope stressed the moral cleansing of society as the foundation of building authentic democracy. Less than nine months after the pope's visit, General Stroessner was overthrown in a military coup, which led to general elections in 1989 and a democratic transition that the local Church supported throughout the 1990s, despite difficult political and economic conditions.

As with Poland in 1979, John Paul's epic pilgrimage to Cuba in January of 1998 sought to restore to a hard-pressed people their authentic history and culture. This reclamation of national culture would, it was hoped, create the foundations of civil society and enable Cuba to move beyond communist dictatorship and re-enter the community of the western hemisphere. The Castro regime was reasonably cooperative during the papal visit, which saw the first public display of the national Marian icon, Our Lady of Charity of El Cobre, in 40 years. In the years immediately following the papal pilgrimage, however, change in Cuba was much slower than either the Holy See or the local Church had anticipated.

In 1978, when John Paul II was elected pope, virtually all of Latin America was ruled by authoritarian regimes of one sort or another; economic stagnation was epidemic; and Central America was beset by chaos and war. Within two decades, Latin America had made a remarkable transition to democratic governments and free economies, although widespread poverty and some political instability remained. While the changes in Latin America had multiple causes, it was clear that John Paul's ability to inspire an engaged Church that was not a partisan Church had had a considerable impact on Latin American public life.

Papal Diplomacy Under John Paul II. Even as John Paul II explored the possibilities of a post-Constantinian papacy that engaged the world of power through moral witness and argument, the diplomacy of the Holy See continued. By 2000, the Holy See had formal diplomatic relations at the ambassadorial level with 172 countries, and was represented at the United Nations, the European Community, and a host of other international agencies and organizations. John Paul's annual New Year meetings with the diplomatic corps accredited to the Holy See provided an opportunity to drive home the message that all politics, including international politics, had an irreducible moral component.

A singularly dramatic accomplishment of John Paul II's diplomacy was the completion of a "Fundamental Agreement" between the Holy See and the State of Israel on Dec. 30, 1993; ambassadors were exchanged the following year. The Fundamental Agreement was the result of a complex 18-month-long negotiation in which the pope's personal commitment to full diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the Jewish state played a decisive role.

John Paul's diplomacy also suffered frustrations. Through both formal and informal means, the pope tried to help create conditions for a peaceful resolution of the crisis of Yugoslavia. These efforts did not meet with notable success. John Paul was determined to go to Sarajevo as a witness for peace as the city was being destroyed by shelling, but a scheduled 1994 visit was canceled because of the threat of violence against pilgrims. When the pope did manage to get to shattered Sarajevo in 1997, officials discovered and defused a bomb, evidently intended to destroy his motorcade, along the road into the city.

In 1982, the pope was confronted by a diplomatic conundrum: could he make a long-planned pilgrimage to Great Britain during the Falklands/Malvinas War, which was being fought against Argentina, a Catholic country? John Paul's solution was instinctively pastoral: to fulfill his commitment to Great Britain, to go on pilgrimage to Argentina the following month, and to urge peace and reconciliation in both countries. The 1989–90 Gulf crisis was a trying time for the pope, who for months urged a negotiated diplomatic resolution to Iraq's invasion and subjugation of Kuwait. In 1992, addressing the U.N. Food and Agricultural Organization in Rome, John Paul spoke of a duty of humanitarian intervention in situations where genocide was impending or underway; the pope did not specify on whom this duty fell or how it was to be carried out. As with the Gulf War, the question of a papal development of the Church's traditional just-war doctrine was, evidently, being left for a future pontificate. In 1979 in Ireland, in Latin America throughout the 1980s, and in 1985–86 in the Philippines, the pope had urged a kind of "preferential option for nonviolence" in resolving sectarian conflict and in effecting democratic transitions. The relationship of this option to the Church's traditional approach to interstate conflict, in which the restoration of justice was the primary imperative, was also a topic for future theological development.

Throughout his pontificate, John Paul II, whose contempt for the Yalta division of Europe into Cold War camps dated back to the late 1940s, spoke frequently about the urgency of rebuilding a Europe that could breathe with both its "lungs," east and west. This personal passion matched the Holy See's longstanding commitment to European unification through such instruments as the Common Market and the European Union [EU]. In later years, however, the pope sharply criticized the tendency of EU bureaucracies and the European Parliament to enshrine a host of dubious lifestyle rights in European law; the Holy See also grew increasingly concerned about the way in which issues of abortion, euthanasia, and the technological means of human reproduction were being resolved in western European states. These concerns raised questions about the future of the Holy See's commitment to European integration.

John Paul II also dealt with the worlds of power through an unprecedented informal diplomacy. With the pope's encouragement, although without any formal linkage to the Holy See, the SANT' EGIDIO Community, a Rome-based Catholic renewal movement, successfully mediated the Mozambican civil war in a series of negotiations during the 1990s. Similar Sant' Egidio efforts took place in Algeria and the Balkans, although without measurable success. John Paul II also sent Cardinal Roger Etchegaray, the French president of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, as a personal, unofficial representative to conflict situations in Africa, Latin America, Asia and Oceania. The cardinal described this informal diplomacy, aimed at getting conflicted parties in conversation with one another, as a "politics of presence" that was a "reinforcement and extension of the spiritual mission" of the pope.

THE POPE AND THE CHURCH

Immediately after his election, John Paul announced that the program of his pontificate would be the full implementation of the Second Vatican Council. Like Pope John XXIII, John Paul II believed that the council was a “new Pentecost” in which the Holy Spirit was preparing the Church for a “springtime of evangelization” in its third millennium. That conviction set the framework for the pope’s governance of the Church, his magisterium, and his distinctive papal style.

An Evangelical Church. The most visible expression of John Paul’s vision of the Church as a dynamic evangelical movement proposing to the world the truth of the human condition was his wide-ranging program of pastoral pilgrimages, of which there were 94 between January 1979 and June 2001. The pope took seriously the injunction of Luke 22.32, that Peter’s distinctive mission was to strengthen his brethren in the faith. Interpreting this mandate literally while marrying it to the modern transportation and communications revolutions, John Paul II traveled to virtually every corner of the planet. His global evangelism drew the largest crowd in human history in Manila in January 1995, and as the pontificate unfolded, statisticians suggested that John Paul II had been seen in person by more human beings than any man who ever lived. The impact of this new style of papal witness was multiplied by the broadcast media, as radio and television brought the Successor of Peter into billions of homes.

In line with his evangelical priorities, John Paul moved quickly to address one of the most deeply contentious issues in post-conciliar Catholicism, devoting 129 general audience addresses between 1979 and 1984 to an innovative “theology of the body” which sought to explain the Church’s sexual ethic (and meet the challenge of the sexual revolution) on the basis of a humanistic reading of human sexuality and a fresh analysis of biblical texts. In a similarly conflicted area, John Paul worked to open a new dialogue between the Church and natural science. In 1981, he established a papal commission to re-examine the Galileo case; the commission report, issued in 1992 and endorsed by the pope, openly admitted that the Church had made an “objective error” in the Galileo controversy.

The pope’s commitment to Vatican II teaching on the “universal call to holiness” impelled him to restructure the process of beatification and canonization in 1983. The apostolic constitution Divinus Magister Perfectionis shifted the paradigm of the process from legal procedure to scholarly historical investigation. The result was an unprecedented number of beatifications and canonizations during the pontificate, as the pope sought to give public expression to the Church’s teaching that sanctity was available to everyone.

WORLD YOUTH DAYS, which drew millions of young people from all over the planet for a week of catechesis and liturgical celebrations with the Bishop of Rome, were another John Paul II innovation and quickly became a signature event in the pontificate. The first international WYD, held in Buenos Aires in 1987, was followed by similar meetings in Santiago de Compostela (1989), Czestochowa (1991), Denver (1993), Manila (1995), Paris (1997), and Rome (2000). The Rome WYD, which drew two million young people to its closing Mass, was the largest pilgrimage in European history. The pope’s magnetic attraction for the young, which involved a profound challenge to lead lives of moral heroism, continued even as he aged.

John Paul’s leadership in more traditional Church events should also be understood in an evangelical and conciliar framework. The 16 general, regional, and local Synods of Bishops he summoned and attended, like the post-synodal apostolic exhortations he wrote as a reflection on the deliberations of a Synod general assembly, were intended to provide interpretive keys to the renewal of Catholic life as proposed by Vatican II. The Extraordinary Synod of 1985, marking the twentieth anniversary of the Council, was of particular importance for its stress on the Council’s COMMUNIO ecclesiology, its critique of political and ideological interpretations of Vatican II., and its commissioning of the Catechism of the Catholic Church. Of special note as well were the Synods (and subsequent apostolic exhortations) on the family, the priesthood, the sacrament of reconciliation, the lay vocation in the world, the priesthood, and the consecrated life. While few, including the pope, were entirely satisfied with the Synod process, the pontificate unmistakably established the SYNOD OF BISHOPS as a permanent feature of Catholic life.

John Paul’s was also one of the most important legislative pontificates in history. Following the intentions of John XXIII, he completed a thorough reform of canon law, issuing the new Code of CANON LAW for Latin-rite Catholicism in 1983. The apostolic constitution promulgating the new code, Sacrae disciplinae leges, stressed its incorporation of the ecclesiology of Vatican II. A new Code of Oriental Canon Law for eastern Catholic Churches was issued in 1990. In addition to these legislative accomplishments, the pope also reorganized the Roman Curia to reflect the council’s concerns in the 1988 apostolic constitution Pastor Bonus. In 1996, he issued Universi Dominici Gregis, which reformed the process for the election of a pope by suppressing election by acclamation and delegation, stressing the personal responsibility of the cardinal-electors, and providing for election by simple majority after two weeks of inconclusive ballots under the traditional two-thirds majority rule.

In another apostolic constitution, EX CORDE ECCLESIAE (1990), John Paul sought to strengthen the Catholic identity of all Catholic institutions of higher education, as he had done in SAPIENTIA CHRISTIANA, a 1979 apostolic constitution regulating pontifical universities and pontifical faculties in the sacred sciences. Ex Corde Ecclesiae caused considerable controversy in the United States, even as the pope changed the terms of debate over the distinctive character of Catholic colleges and universities. Sapientia Chistiana and Ex Corde Ecclesiae were important moments in the pope's continuous effort to strengthen Catholic intellectual life as an integral part of what he came to call, in the 1990s, the "new evangelization," which put considerable emphasis on the evangelization of culture.

The pope's reform of Vatican press relations was also evangelically inspired. John Paul II recognized the crucial importance of the media. His 1984 decision to appoint Joaquín Navarro-Valls, a Spanish layman and veteran foreign correspondent, as papal spokesman and head of the Holy See Press Office helped move the Vatican into the modern communications age. An online Vatican Information Service began transmitting daily bulletins in 1991. According to Navarro, John Paul II saw the "dialectic with world opinion" available through the media as an instrument for reforming the Church and shaping the world political agenda, as in the months before the Cairo world population conference in 1994.

The multiple strands of John Paul's effort to get the Church to experience itself as a vibrant evangelical movement were woven into a complex tapestry during the Great Jubilee of 2000, which the Pope frequently described as the interpretive key to his pontificate. After opening the Holy Door of St. Peter's on Christmas Eve, 1999, John Paul undertook an extensive biblical pilgrimage in several phases to Mount Sinai, the Holy Land, Athens, and Damascus. The Iraqi government made it impossible for the pope to begin this pilgrimage in Ur, home of Abraham, the Church's "father in faith," so John Paul celebrated a day of recollection in honor of Abraham in the Vatican audience hall. Symbolizing the universal call to holiness, there were special jubilee days in Rome for consecrated religious men and women, the sick, health-care workers, artists, permanent deacons, the Roman Curia, craftsmen, priests, scientists, migrants and itinerant people, journalists, prisoners, young people, intellectuals, the elderly, bishops, families, athletes, parliamentarians and government workers, the world of agriculture, the armed forces and police, laity, the disabled, and the entertainment world. In June 2000, Rome hosted the forty-seventh International Eucharistic Congress. On the First Sunday of Lent during the jubilee year, the pope, presiding at a Mass in St. Peter's Basilica, publicly asked God's forgiveness for the sins Christians had committed against the Gospel and against their neighbors in the first two millennia—a "cleansing of the Church's conscience" which John Paul believed essential to preparing for the twenty-first century springtime of evangelization. The Christian witnesses of the twentieth century, the greatest century of persecution in history, were honored at a special ecumenical service at the Roman Coliseum on May 7. During the Jubilee, the pope beatified a host of martyrs (from Brazil, the Philippines, Poland, Thailand, Mexico, and Vietnam), two popes (Pius IX and John XXIII), and two of the child visionaries of Fatíma (Francisco and Jacinta Marto). The first saint canonized during the jubilee was Sister Faustina KOWALSKA, the Polish mystic whose devotion to the merciful Christ had spread throughout the world. In October 2000, John Paul canonized 120 martyrs of China, the Philadelphia heiress and foundress Katherine DREXEL, and Josephine BAKHITA, a former Sudanese slave.

The Great Jubilee of 2000, which drew an estimated twenty-seven million pilgrims to Rome, was solemnly closed on Jan. 6, 2001. As John Paul had intended, it had been a celebration of the evangelical future, not simply a commemoration of the past.

Magisterium. Unlike previous councils, Vatican II had provided no interpretive keys to its teaching through doctrinal definitions, creeds, canons, or anathemas. The extensive magisterium of John Paul II, which marks his as one of the great teaching pontificates in history, offered the Church keys for the authentic interpretation of Vatican II and its implementation.

In addition to issuing seven apostolic constitutions, John Paul II wrote thirteen encyclicals and ten post-synodal apostolic exhortations, touching virtually every major issue on the post-Vatican II Catholic agenda. His inaugural encyclical, REDEMPTOR HOMINIS, was the first encyclical ever on Christian anthropology and offered the Church and the world a set of program notes for the pontificate to follow; Redemptor hominis was also the first panel in a Trinitarian triptych of encyclicals that came to include DIVES IN MISERICORDIA and DOMINUM ET VIVICANTEM. Two encyclicals, Veritatis splendor and FIDES ET RATIO, defended the human capacity to know the truth of things, including the moral truth of things. The pope's social doctrine was developed in three encyclicals: LABOREM EXERCENS, SOLLICITUDO REI SOCIALIS, and Centesimus annus. UT UNUM SINT was the first encyclical ever devoted entirely to ecumenism. REDEMPTORIS MISSIO recommitted the Church to the mission ad gentes in a distinctively dialogical mode: “The Church proposes; she imposes nothing.” Evangelium vitae was a passionate defense of the right to life from conception until natural death. Other encyclicals honored SS. Cyril and Methodius (SLAVORUM APOSTOLI) and the Blessed Virgin at the end of the 1986-87 Marian Year (REDEMPTORIS MATER).

Following the lead of Paul VI in Evangelium nuntiandi, John Paul sought to complete the work of general assemblies of the Synods of Bishops with post-synodal apostolic exhortations addressing key issues of the post-Vatican II period: Catechesi tradendae (catechetics), Familiaris consortio (marriage and family life), Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (the sacrament of penance), Christifideles laici (the lay vocation in the world), Pastores dabo vobis (the ministerial priesthood and priestly formation), and Vita consecrata (consecrated life). John Paul also issued apostolic exhortations after the pre-jubilee regional synods for Africa, Asia, North and South America.

The Pope also wrote a large number of apostolic letters, among the most important of which were Dominicae cenae (the Eucharist), Salvifici doloris (redemptive suffering), Euntes in mundum (the millennium of Christianity among the eastern Slavs), Mulieris dignitatem (women in the modern world), TERTIO MILLENNIO ADVENIENTE (announcing the Great Jubilee of 2000), Dies Domini (on sanctifying time and the Lord’s Day), and Novo millennio ineunte (concluding the Great Jubilee of 2000). Among some Catholics in North America and western Europe, the apostolic letter Ordinatio sacerdotalis, which reaffirmed that the Church was not authorized to ordain women to the ministerial priesthood, caused controversy.

John Paul II also devised new forms of the papal magisterium, writing extensive letters to families, children, artists, and the elderly. John Paul’s theology of the body should also be considered among the most important developments in his papal magisterium.

Ecumenism and Interreligious Dialogue. With the pontificate of John Paul II, the Catholic Church entered fully into the ecumenical movement, and in doing so reconfigured the world movement for Christian unity.

The pope laid particular emphasis on ecumenism with the Christian East, in the hope that the wounds of a millennium of Christian division (formally opened in 1054), could be healed on the threshold of the third millennium of Christian history. While the pope did not bring that great dream of ecclesial reconciliation to fruition, in part because of the reluctance (and, in some cases, hostility) of Orthodox leaders and theologians, he did advance Catholic ecumenism ad orientem in numerous ways: visiting Ecumenical Patriarch Dimitrios I at the Phanar in 1979, hosting Dimitrios in Rome in 1987 and his successor, Bartholomew I, in 1995; through his pilgrimages to Romania (1999), the Holy Land (2000), Greece and Damascus (2001) and Ukraine (2001); and in the encyclical Ut unum sint, which seemed to propose a return to the status quo before 1054. The difficulties of dialogue with Orthodoxy were amplified by the post-communist resurgence of the once-heavily-persecuted eastern Catholic Churches in the former Soviet Union and its satellites.

More tangible progress was made during the pontificate with the Oriental Orthodox churches (sometimes known as MONOPHYSITE or pre-Chalcedonian churches), as the pope signed or re-affirmed common Christological declarations with the Armenian Apostolic Church, the Coptic Orthodox Church, and the Syrian Orthodox Church, and also with the Assyrian Church of the East. John Paul II formed a close spiritual friendship with the Armenian Catholicos, Karekan I Sarkissian, who died in 1999.

John Paul also bent considerable efforts toward closing breaches in western Christianity dating back to the REFORMATION. At the pope’s insistence, a meeting with other Christian leaders and an ecumenical prayer service were part of virtually every papal pilgrimage throughout the world. The once-promising Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue ran into considerable difficulties, however, when parts of the Anglican Communion decided to admit women to the ministerial priesthood, a decision which raised questions about Anglican understandings of apostolicity and sacramentality. The pontificate saw some advances in the Lutheran-Catholic dialogue, including a historic “Joint Declaration on Justification by Faith” in 1999, but without the cause of full ecclesial communion being much advanced. John Paul’s global evangelism and his vigorous defense of the right to life created new possibilities for ecumenical dialogue with evangelical and pentecostal Protestantism, even as the Catholic insistence on the centrality of the life issues to contemporary Christian witness created further ecumenical difficulties with liberal Protestant communities.

In 1995, the general secretary of the World Council of Church told a Roman audience that a new ecumenical paradigm was needed, in which the various Christian communities would abandon the quest for a common creed, a common baptism, and a common Eucharist while working together on issues of the environment, peace, and world poverty. Thus John Paul’s insistence that Christian unity must be unity in the truth that Christ bequeathed his Church made the Catholic Church the principal institutional defender of the classic goals that had launched the modern ecumenical movement in 1910.

Building on Vatican II's declaration Nostra aetate, Catholic-Jewish relations entered a new phase with the pontificate of John Paul II. The pope's historic 1986 visit to the Synagogue of Rome, his steady condemnations of the sin of anti-Semitism, the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the State of Israel, and the pope's Holy Land pilgrimage laid the foundation for what some observers saw as a new, theologically oriented Catholic-Jewish dialogue in the twenty-first century.

In 1985, at the invitation of King Hassan II, John Paul addressed a large gathering of Muslim young people in Casablanca. During his jubilee pilgrimage to Damascus in 2001, he became the first pope to visit a mosque. The dialogue with Islam, however, was made more difficult because of Muslim persecution of Christians in the Holy Land, Asia, and Africa, which the pope sharply challenged during a visit to Sudan in 1993. The pope also met on several occasions with the Dalai Lama, and was enthusiastically received by Hindus in India in 1986.

On Oct. 27, 1986, the pope gathered several dozen world religious leaders at Assisi for an unprecedented World Day of Prayer for Peace. "Being together to pray," John Paul insisted, was not syncretism. Criticism of the event from some curial elements continued long afterwards.

Internationalizing the Curia. The pope drew his closest collaborators in Rome from throughout the world Church, accelerating the internationalization of the Roman Curia that had begun under Paul VI. Among the pope's closest advisers were a German (Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith from November 1981), an African (Cardinal Bernardin Gantin of Benin, prefect of the Congregation for Bishops from 1984 to 1998), a Slovak (Cardinal Jozef Tomko, general secretary of the Synod of Bishops from 1979 to 1985, and prefect of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples [Propaganda Fidei] from 1985 until 2001). A Spaniard (Eduardo Martínez Somalo), an Australian (Edward Cassidy), an Italian (Giovanni Battista Re), and an Argentine (Leonardo Sandri) served the Pope in the crucial post of Sostituto (Deputy for Ordinary Affairs of the Secretariat of State), in effect the papal chief-of-staff. In 1998, an American, James Harvey, was named Prefect of the Papal Household, and by 2001, 19 of the 24 heads of Roman dicasteries were non-Italians.

After Paul VI's Secretary of State, the Frenchman Jean Villot, died in 1979, two Italian papal diplomats were appointed to this most senior post in the Roman Curia: Agostino CASAROLI (1979–1990) and Angelo Sodano (from 1990). The pope's choice of Casaroli, architect of the Ostpolitik of Paul VI (about which Cardinal Wojtyła had had serious doubts), surprised some. But the Polish pope, with his vigorous public defense of religious freedom, and the Italian curialist, devoted to the discretions of diplomacy, made an effective team in confronting European communism. An Italian (Achille Silvestrini, later Prefect of the Congregation for the Oriental Churches), and a Frenchman, Jean-Louis Tauran, served John Paul as Secretary for Relations with States, or foreign minister of the Holy See. Father Roberto Tucci, S.J., the president of Vatican Radio, played an invaluable role as impresario of the pope's foreign travels for more than 15 years.

The pope's willingness to go against the grain of bureaucratic convention led to several distinctive episcopal appointments during his pontificate: a convert from Judaism as archbishop of Paris (Jean-Marie Lustiger); a former U.S. Navy chaplain who had been a diocesan bishop for just a few months as archbishop of New York (John O'CONNOR); and, in the latter years of the pontificate, intellectually accomplished and publicly assertive younger bishops who had not followed the conventional career path as leaders of major sees.

Between 1979 and 2001, John Paul II created 201 cardinals. On six occasions, he called the College of Cardinals into extraordinary consistory to discuss various problems of Catholic life, a practice that had lain fallow for 400 years. By 2001, John Paul had created over 90 percent of the electorate that would eventually choose his successor.

Controversies. Ecumenical Councils have always been followed by controversy, and the pontificate of John Paul II, an expression of Vatican II, was no exception.

In 1982, the pope intervened in the governance of the Society of Jesus, appointing a personal delegate to lead the Society after the incapacitation of its general, Father Pedro ARRUPE. Father Arrupe's successor, Father Pieter-Hans Kolvenbach, was elected in 1983; opinions differed widely on whether the papal intervention had led to a successful reformation of the Church's largest and most prestigious male religious order.

The situation of post-conciliar Catholic theology was another arena of controversy. On Dec. 15, 1979, at the order of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Father Hans Küng's ecclesiastical mandate to teach as a professor of Catholic theology was withdrawn; in 1987, CDF wrote the Chancellor of the Catholic University of America that Father Charles Curran was to be considered no longer suitable to teach Catholic theology. In both cases, action followed extensive and public dissent by the theologians in question and lengthy consultations with Vatican officials. Public action was taken against four other theologians in the first 22 years of the pontificate. The pope's theological critics, however, remained in control of many theological faculties in the West, suggesting that frequently heard charges of repression were overwrought.

John Paul II and Cardinal Ratzinger made considerable efforts to reconcile Archbishop Marcel LEFEBVRE and his followers. In 1984, the pope granted an indult allowing more widespread use of the TRIDENTINE rite in the 1962 Roman Missal. But the core of the Lefebvrist dissent was not liturgical, but rather theological: among other matters, the French archbishop disdained the Council's ecclesiology and refused to accept Vatican II's Declaration on Religious Freedom. His refusal to be mollified by the 1984 indult made clear that he considered Vatican II an act of infidelity of which liturgical change was but one manifestation. Dissent became crisis when, on June 30, 1988, Lefebvre, after lengthy and fruitless negotiations and a plea from the pope, ordained four new bishops without authorization. On July 1, Cardinal Gantin signed a decree stating that, as Lefebvre had committed a schismatic act, he, the four bishops he ordained, and the retired bishops who had taken part in the ordinations had automatically incurred excommunication. Any Catholic supporting Lefebvre would also incur excommunication. On July 2, the pope issued an apostolic letter, Ecclesia Dei, creating a commission to reconcile those of Lefebvre's supporters who did not wish to follow the Frenchman into schism.

While criticism of the pope from self-styled progressive Catholics received extensive media attention, John Paul II was also criticized, if less vocally, by Catholics who welcomed his strong evangelical presence and his vigorous exercise of the papal magisterium, but who thought him lax in his governance of the Church: too willing to countenance theological dissent, insufficiently energetic in reforming the episcopate, the priesthood, and the religious orders. The pope, committed to what he termed the "method of persuasion," had, it seems, a different ecclesiological vision and a different strategy, based on the conviction that what was true to the vision of Vatican II would endure and flourish, while what was false would wither and eventually die of its own implausibility.

A Different Kind of Pope. Determined to remain himself, John Paul II gave a distinctive personal stamp to the Office of Peter. Every year he hosted a seminar at Castel Gandolfo, the papal summer residence, for humanities scholars or scholars in the natural sciences; some participants were agnostics or atheists. With the exceptions of those times when he was in hospital or on vacation (two more innovations: a pope being treated in a hospital, and a pope spending time hiking in the Italian Alps), he invited guests for lunch or dinner every day, drawing information about the Church and the world from a diverse set of personalities. The pope also maintained an extensive, informal correspondence, outside official channels, with interlocutors throughout the world. Friends and colleagues became accustomed to unexpected phone calls announcing that "the Holy Father would like to speak with you."

John Paul also reorganized the procedures for the quinquennial AD LIMINA visit that all diocesan bishops make to Rome in order to spend more time with the bishops individually and in national or regional groups. Ad limina visits under Paul VI gave the visiting bishop one opportunity to meet the pope; John Paul met each bishop four times, in a private session, at Mass, over a meal, and by delivering a discourse to the bishop's national or regional group (the discourse was given to each bishop individually in written form after 1995). By one knowledgeable estimate, 40 percent of the pope's official schedule was devoted in any given year to meetings with bishops. John Paul II also took his title as Primate of Italy with greater seriousness than any pope in centuries, making dozens of pastoral visits throughout the Italian peninsula and personally visiting some three hundred Roman parishes.

The pope's determination that the Vatican itself should reflect the realities of the world Church was manifest in the vast number of audiences he granted to an extraordinary range of groups, including chefs, hairdressers, and kayakers. John Paul changed the ambience of the Vatican in other ways. In 1994, he opened a convent for contemplative nuns inside Vatican City, a new feature of Vatican life which demonstrated the pope's conviction that prayer must be at the heart of the ministry of service exercised by the apostolic see. In 1988, John Paul dedicated a shelter for the homeless within the walls of the Vatican. During his pontificate, the pope also created two new pontifical academies: the Pontifical Academy for the Social Sciences and the Pontifical Academy for Life.

From 1994 on, John Paul suffered from an increasing number of physical burdens. He was most visibly affected by a form of Parkinson's disease and a hip replacement that left him walking with pain. Yet the pope's charisma did not diminish, as the jubilee year amply demonstrated. In a world tempted to think of the elderly and disabled as disposable, the pope's witness to the dignity of human life was magnified by his evident physical suffering.

Enduring Accomplishments. As he led the Church into the third millennium of its history, ten enduring ac-accomplishments of the pontificate of John Paul II could be identified. He had revitalized the papacy as an office of evangelical witness. He had secured the legacy of Vatican II in its fullness as an epic spiritual event at which the Church, guided by the Holy Spirit, had engaged modernity through an enriched sense of its own unique nature and mission. He had been the pivotal figure in the collapse of European communism. He had identified the moral challenges facing free societies in the twenty-first century. He had put ecumenism at the heart of the Church's consciousness. He had created the possibility of a new religious dialogue between Catholicism and living Judaism. He had modeled a truth-centered method of interreligious dialogue, demonstrating that humanity's deepest convictions could be in conversation not conflict. He had proposed a compelling Christian response to the sexual revolution in his theology of the body. He had made clear, in the Catechism of the Catholic Church, that the Church could still advance a comprehensive account of its faith and hope, and he had positioned the Catholic Church as the principal institutional defender of the claims of human reason. He had given unmeasurable inspiration to tens, perhaps hundreds, of millions of human beings. His inaugural call, "Be not afraid!" had changed the course of world history by changing the direction of individual lives.

Bibliography: POPE JOHN PAUL II, Crossing the Threshold of Hope (New York 1994). K. L. SCHMITZ, At the Center of the Human Drama: The Philosophical Anthropology of Karol Wojtyła/Pope John Paul II (Washington 1993). G. WEIGEL, Witness to Hope: The Biography of Pope John Paul II (New York 1999; rev. ed. 2000), contains bibliography.

[G. WEIGEL]

JOHN PAUL II CULTURAL CENTER

The cultural center that takes its name and inspiration from Pope John Paul II is located in Washington, DC. The center features state-of-the-art exhibits and interactive media activities designed to provide visitors an experience that inspires faith, promotes religious values, and fosters respect for diverse cultural backgrounds. The five main galleries explore (1) the history of the Church and the papacy; (2) how faith is celebrated around the world; (3) the relationship between the human and the physical world; (4) ways that God's presence is expressed in art; and (5) world cultures and their relationship to the Catholic Church.

Works by Christian artists from around the world and from the collection of the Vatican Museum are displayed. The permanent collection highlights Marian themes. Another component integral to the center is the Intercultural Forum. Scholars research and study themes related to the impact of the papacy on world cultures and the promotion of values relating to the dignity of the human person. Facilities include a library, auditorium, and conference rooms. The inspiration for the center is Pope John Paul's call for renewed evangelization in the new millennium.

The multi-million dollar project was initiated by Cardinal Adam Maida, archbishop of Detroit, and designed by Leo A. Daly, architect, engineer, and interior designer, and Edwin Schlossberg, Inc., exhibit designer. It opened during the Jubilee Year 2000 on a 14-acre site adjacent to the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception and the Catholic University of America in northeast Washington, DC.

[G. M. BUGARIN]

JOHN PAUL II INSTITUTE ON MARRIAGE AND FAMILY

The John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and Family, with headquarters at the Pontifical Lateran University in Rome, has as its purpose study and research that highlight the uniqueness and importance of the Church's mission to the family. The Synod of Bishops (Fifth General Assembly, 1980) had called for the creation of theological centers devoted to the study of the Church's teaching on marriage and the family. Pope John Paul II responded in October 1982 by issuing Magnum Matrimonii Sacramentum, an apostolic constitution that serves as the charter of the Institute. The Institute is empowered to grant degrees, and its president is appointed by the Holy Father.

It was Pope John Paul II's stated intention that the work of the Institute be spread throughout the world, and thus it established extensions in Spain (Valencia), Mexico (Mexico City-Guadalajara), and the United States (Washington, D.C.). The last was founded by the invitation of James Cardinal Hickey, archbishop of Washington, and the request of Virgil C. Dechant, supreme knight of the Knights of Columbus, to serve American and other English-speaking students. The Congregation for Catholic Education gave it the status of a pontifical faculty August 22, 1988.

The curricula of the John Paul II Institute encompass the full range of studies required for a complete theological education in the areas of marriage and family: philosophy, theological method, systematic and spiritual theology, Christian ethics and moral theology, public policy, canon law, biblical theology, and the life sciences. The programs of study seek to foster in students the theological competency necessary for the exercise of a variety of Christian ministries, including counseling, pastoral and missionary work in the specialized areas of marriage and family, and for religious leadership positions, especially in family life bureaus. In particular, the Institute prepares its students for work in Christian education, research, and publication, especially as members of the faculties of seminaries, theological schools, and departments of religious studies. In addition, the Institute enables persons anticipating professional service in education, health care, social work, community and public interest organizations, law, and public life to understand more fully the theological basis of their vocations.

The American extension is located at 487 Michigan Avenue, NE, Washington, DC 20017.

[C. A. ANDERSON]

JOHN PECKHAM (PECHAM)

English Franciscan theologian, archbishop of Canterbury, known as Doctor ingeniosus; b. Patcham, Sussex, c. 1220–25; d. Mortlake Manor, Surrey, Dec. 8, 1292. Peckham received his early schooling probably at Lewes, then studied at Paris in the faculty of arts (1245–50), possibly under ROGER BACON; he completed these studies at Oxford. Peckham entered the order in c. 1250 and returned to Paris, where he studied theology, becoming a master in 1269. If not an immediate disciple of BONAVENTURE, Peckham was at least strongly influenced by his doctrines. With THOMAS AQUINAS, he took an active part in the POVERTY CONTROVERSY.

While at Paris he wrote Tractatus pauperis (1270) and some of his quodlibets. Among his disciples was THOMAS OF CANTELUPE, later bishop of Hereford. Peckham left Paris c. 1271–72 for Oxford, where he is said to have introduced the disputatio de quolibet. Chosen minister provincial of England in 1275, he participated in the general chapter of Padua (1276) and was made the first Franciscan Magister S. Palatii at Rome in 1277. During these years he tried to prevent “the spread of Averroism and THOMISM” [A. B. Emden, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59)].

On Jan. 28, 1279, he was elected archbishop of Canterbury and primate of England by NICHOLAS III, succeeding ROBERT KILWARDBY. Peckham was noted for his zeal for ecclesiastical discipline and the rights of the Church. At Oxford on Oct. 29, 1284, he renewed the prohibitions issued by Kilwardby in 1277; on April 30, 1286, he condemned a number of opinions of RICHARD KNAPWELL. In 1290 he preached the Crusade.

Woodcut frontispiece to “Perspectiva Commuis,” by John Peckham, Paris, 1511 Edition.

Among Peckham’s more than 50 writings are those on science and philosophy: Perspectiva communis, Summa de esse et essentia, and Tractatus de anima; on the Bible: Collectarium S. Bibliae I–IV, Postilla Threnorum; on theology: In 1 sent. and Tractatus de Trinitate; numerous Quaestiones disputatae; and four quodlibets. On Franciscan spirituality Peckham is noted for three treatises on poverty: Tractatus pauperis, Tractatus de paupertate contra R. de Kilwardby OP, and Defensio fratrum mendicantium, a satiric poem of dubious authenticity. His liturgical and pastoral writings include Constitutiones provinciales of Reading and Lambeth; Acta episcopatus; Officium SS. Trinitatis, a poetic composition; and some religious hymns.

Peckham was one of the best representatives and defenders of AUGUSTINIANISM against the rising forces of ARISTOTELIANISM. He taught the immediate evidence of the existence of God, approved the argument of ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, and denied the possibility of eternal creation. In psychology he accepted only a virtual distinction between the soul and its faculties, and held that immortality can be proved by irrefutable arguments. In addition, he accented the autodeterminism of the will and its primacy over the intellect. Peckham also disputed Thomas’s notion of the unicity of the substantial form in man. In theology he taught the absolute primacy of Christ, a twofold real sonship in Christ, and the real identity of grace and charity. His Perspective communis was used as a textbook in optics in many universities, and his Office of the Trinity was widely adopted.

Bibliography: I. BRADY, "John Peckham and the Background of Aquinas' De Aeternitate Mundi," in Saint Thomas Aquinas 1274–1974 (Toronto 1974) 141–178. D. L. DOUIE, Archbishop Peckham (Oxford 1952). A. P. ESTEVEZ, La Materia, de Avicena a la Escuela Franciscana (Avicena, Averroes, Tomas de Aquino, Buenaventura, Peckham, Marston, Olivo, Mediavilla, Duns Escoto) (Maracaibo, Venezuela 1998).

[A. EMMEN]

JOHN PELINGOTTO, BL.

Franciscan tertiary; b. Urbino, Italy, 1240; d. there, June 1, 1304. Descended from one of the leading families of the area, he led an exemplary life of prayer and penance both inside and outside his family circle. With his father's permission he gave up trade, for which he had been trained, and joining the Third Order of St. Francis c. 1255, he devoted himself entirely to prayer and the service of God. In 1300 he went on pilgrimage to Rome for Pope BONIFACE VIII's Jubilee Year, and L. Wadding (Annales Ordinis Minorum 4:38–42) relates that people pointed him out as "the holy man from Urbino." After his death, according to his own wish, he was buried in the church of San Francesco in his native city. His cult was approved by BENEDICT XV on Nov. 12, 1918.

Feast: June 2.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 1:144–151. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 10 (1918) 513–516, decree approving cult. Acta ordinis Fratrum Minorum 37 (1918) 218–221; 38 (1919) 11–12, 28–31, 49–51. Archivum Franciscanum historicum 14 (1921) 27.

[S. OLIVIERI]

JOHN PHILOPONUS

Alexandrian theologian and philosopher of the sixth century, known also as John the Grammarian. He was a disciple of Ammonius of Hermias. The name Philoponus means lover of work; the philoponoi were members of a confraternity whose task it was to look after places of worship.

Philoponus wrote treatises on the Astrolabe and the Arithmetic of Nichomachus of Gerosa and two treatises on grammar that had some influence as lexicons. He also wrote commentaries on the following works of Aristotle: the Categories, Prior and Posterior Analytics, four books of the Physics, Generation and Corruption, Generation of Animals, the Metaphysics, the Meteors, and the Soul, of which only William of Moerbeke's translation of the third book is authentic. His theological and philosophical treatises include On the Eternity of the World Against Proclus, On the Creation of the World, the Arbiter, the Relation of the Whole and Its Parts, On Images Against Iamblichus, On Easter, and On the Resurrection. Many of his works are not extant.

The commentaries, although Aristotelian in terminology, are Platonic in character, often mixed with Stoic and occasionally Christian notions. Moreover, they reflect the opinions of Ammonius to such an extent that they often appear to be little more than an edition of his teachings. It may be that Philoponus, a Christian, was used to prevent the closing of the school at Alexandria, as had already happened at Athens.

In the Categories Philoponus insists that all possible beings will sometime be realized in being. In the Physics he attributes a real and efficient causality to the demiurge; all generation requires divine causality. Creatures exercise no really efficient causality but are, at best, instrumental causes. He considered the Neoplatonists pantheists and asserted an exaggerated pluralism against them. Following the Stoics, he granted three dimensions to primary matter. The soul is a mover of the body; the agent intellect is within the soul. Genus and species have no reality outside the mind. Logic is necessary in both the speculative and practical disciplines to distinguish between truth and falsity, good and evil.

The theological works are clearly Monophysitic; his exaggerated pluralism and the doctrine of the relation of the whole and parts allowed him no alternative. When these doctrines were applied to the Trinity, a sort of verbal tritheism resulted; nowhere, however, does Philoponus say that there are three gods. He attacked the primacy of the Roman See and called Leo the Great a Nestorian. In discussing the whole and its parts, Philoponus asserted that the totality is not a sum total of the parts, but the resulting reality of the composite; outside the reality of the individual the term parts is meaningless. Nature, hypostasis, substance, essence, and individual are in reality one and the same thing. Consequently, in Christ there is only one nature, a composite nature. This, Philoponus claimed, was the teaching handed down from ancient times. He was reprimanded at the Council of Constantinople III (680). Through the Arabian philosophers and WILLIAM OF MOERBEKE some of Philoponus's teachings reached the West; but with the exception of his doctrine of the agent intellect and the kinetic theory of IMPETUS, his influence was not great.

Bibliography: Works. Commentaries on Aristotle in Commentaria in Aristotelem Graeca, 13–17 (Berlin 1887–1901).

Τονικά παραγγέλματα, ed. W. DINDORF (Leipzig 1825). Περί τῶν διαφόρων τονουμένων καὶ διαφορᾶ σημαίνοντων, ed. P. EGENOLFF (Breslau 1880). "On the Astrolabe," The Astrolabes of the World, tr. R. W. T. GUNTHER, 2 v. (Oxford 1932) 61–81. De Aeternitate Mundi Contra Proclum, ed. H. RABE (Leipzig 1899). De Opificio Mundi, ed. G. REICHHARDT (Leipzig 1897). H. REINER, "Der Metaphysik-Kommentar des Joannes Philoponos," Hermes 82.4 (1954) 480–482. Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893—). Literature. G. FURLANI, "Sei scritti Antetriteistica in lingua Siriaca," Patrologia orientalis, ed. R. GRAFFIN and F. NAU (Paris 1903—) 14:685–772. "Il trattato di Giovanni Filopono sul rapporto tra le parte e gli elementi ed il tutto e le parte tradotto dal Siriaco," Atti del Reale Istituto Veneto di scienze, lettere ed arti. 86.2 (1921–22). "L'Anatema di Giovanni d'Alessandria contro Giovanni Filopono," Atti della Reale Accademia delle scienze di Torino 55 (1919–20) 188–194. "Unità e dualità di natura secondo Giovanni il Filopono," Bessarione 27 (1923) 58–65. A. SANDA, Opuscula Monophysitica Joannis Philoponi (Beirut 1930), contains Latin text of Arbiter, an epitome of Arbiter, Solution of doubtful questions, Treatise to Sergius's On Totality and Parts, Treatise on difference, number and division, Letter to Justinian. H. D. SAFFREY, "Le Chrétien Jean Philopon et la Survivance de l'école d'Alexandrie," Revue des études grecques (Paris 1888—) 78 (1954) 396–410. T. HERMANN, "Johannes Philoponos als Monophysit," Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche, 29 (1930) 209–264. E. ÉVRARD, "Les Convictions religieuses de Jean Philopon et la date de son commentaire aux Météorologiques," Académie royale de Belgique: Bulletin de la classe des lettres et des sciences morales et politiques, 5th ser. 39.3 (1953) 299–357. G. VERBEKE, "Guillaume de Moerbeke, traducteur de Jean Philopon," Revue philosophique de Louvain, 49 (1951) 222–235. M. DE CORTE, "Le Commentaire de Jean Philopon sur le troisième livre du Traité de l'âme," Bibliothèque de la faculté de philosophie et lettres de l'Université de Liège, fasc. 65 (Paris 1934), see corrections by A. MANSION in Mélanges Auguste Pelzer (Louvain 1947) 325. S. SAMBURSKY, "Philoponus' Interpretation of Aristotle's Theory of Light," Osiris 13 (1958) 114–126. M. STEIN-SCHNEIDER, "Johannes Philoponos bei den Arabern," Mémoires de l'Académie des sciences de S. Petersbourg 13 (1869) 152–176. Several important articles by S. PÉTRIDÈS et al., in Échos d'Orient, 4 (1900–01) 225–231; 7 (1904) 341–348; 14 (1911) 277–278; 33 (1934) 181—. "Third Council of Constantinople," see J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Concillorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98) 11:501C.

[J. R. O'DONNELL]

JOHN PRANDOTA OF CRACOW, BL.

Bishop; b. Białaczów, Poland, early 13th century; d. Cracow, Poland, Sept. 21, 1266. A descendant of the noble Odroważ family, he became bishop of CRACOW in 1242, and he did much to secure, in 1253, the canonization of St. STANISLAUS, his martyred predecessor in that see. He drove the heretical Flagellants out of his diocese (see FLAGELLATION). When Duke CONRAD OF MASOVIA seized church property, Prandota excommunicated him. A respected leader of the Polish magnates, the bishop worked together with Boleslav V the Chaste (d. 1279) and his saintly wife, KINGA, for the welfare of Little Poland. Prandota was an ideal bishop of his time, combining sanctity with political sagacity and moral leadership. His cult ended in the 17th century because of a misunderstanding of Pope URBAN VIII's bull on the veneration of saints (see SAINTS, DEVOTION TO THE).

Feast: Sept. 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 6:279–288. Monumenta Poloniae historica, 6 v. (LVOV 1864–93) 4:439–500. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 4421. A. ZAHORSKA, Ilustrowane Zywoty Swietych Polskich (Potulice, Pol. 1937) 170–180. Z. SZOSTKIEWICZ, "Katalog biskupów obrz. łac. przedzobiorowej Polski," Sacrum Poloniae millenium 1 (1954) 540. B. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup> 5:1072.

[L. SIEKANIEC]

JOHN SCOTUS ERIUGENA

Theologian, translator, known variously as John the Scot, Erigena, and Scottigena; b. Ireland, c. 810; d. probably in England, c. 877. Arriving between 845 and 847 at the palace school of Charles the Bald, at Quierzy near Laon, he taught grammar and dialectics. Earliest factual information concerns his involvement in the controversy concerning predestination that began in 849 and continued with varying degrees of intensity until 860. In 851 Pardulus of Laon urged HINCMAR OF REIMS to consult John about the question; at that date John must have attained a certain eminence as a theologian. In his De predestinatione (Patrologia Latina 122: 355–440), completed in 851, he insisted that there is but one predestination to good and that no one is compelled by God's foreknowledge to do evil. Through FREE WILL, a gift of God, man may sin, but he is not predestined to do so, since evil is not a physical reality. If one knows the simple rules of dialectics, he would know that a twofold predestination is a rational impossibility. Attacked by PRUDENTIUS OF TROYES and FLORUS OF LYONS, this work was condemned at the councils of Valencia (855) and Langres (859). John's work as teacher of the LIBERAL ARTS is reflected principally in the Annotationes in Marcellianum Capellam, ed. C. E. Lutz (Cambridge, Mass. 1939), completed about 859–860.

Translations. A new phase in his life and thought began when Eriugena was commissioned by Charles around 860 to make a new translation of the works of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS (Patrologia Latina 122:1029–1194; Dionysiaca, 2 v. Bruges 1937–1950). Equipped, most probably, with a rudimentary knowledge of Greek learned in Ireland, he perfected his knowledge in France. In 827 the Byzantine Emperor Michael Balbus sent a copy of Dionysius's works to Louis the Pious, who immediately commissioned Hilduin, Abbot of Saint-Denis, to translate them into Latin. The imperfection of this translation, or transliteration, prompted Charles to ask Eriugena to prepare a better translation. This influential translation, completed between 860 and 862, consisted of four works (De divinis nominibus, Theologia mystica, De hierarchia caelestia, and De hierarchia ecclesiastica) and ten letters together with two prefaces. Charles then commissioned Eriugena to translate the commentaries (Ambigua) of MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR (Patrologia Latina 122:1193–1222). This translation, composed between 862 and 864, consisted of a preface, two poems, and 67 chapters, of which only the first five and beginning of the sixth have been printed. He translated also Sermo de imagine (περὶ κατασκευῆς ἀνθρώπου) of Gregory of Nyssa and Sermo de fide (Ἀγκυρατός) of Epiphanius about 865. This contact with Greek sources provided Eriugena with a new appreciation of dialectics and Platonic thought “longeque a modernis sensibus remotum.”

Later Works. The result was a new period of personal, creative writing: commentaries on the Gospel of St. John (Patrologia Latina 122:283–348), Pseudo-Dionysius [Patrologia Latina 122:125–284; H. F. Dondaine, Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 18 (1950–1951) 245–302], and De divisione naturae (Patrologia Latina 122:441–1022). This last, sometimes called Perifiseon, or περὶ φύσεως μερισμοῦ, is his most important original work. Composed between 862 and 866, it was dedicated to Wulfad, later archbishop of Bourges. Written in the form of a dialogue between a master, designated by N (Nutritor), and a disciple, A (Alumnus), it drew heavily from Greek and Latin Platonic sources, notably Pseudo-Dionysius, St. AUGUSTINE, Maximus, and ORIGEN. It is divided into five books. Book one deals with God, His unknowability, and man's language in speaking about Him; book two deals with various divisions of being, created and uncreated; book three considers creatures as theophanies of God; book four is concerned mainly with man, his creation, life in Paradise, and the Fall; book five is devoted to the return of all things to God through Christ.

De divisione naturae apparently was used by AMALRIC OF BÈNE and DAVID OF DINANT to interpret Aristotle in the 13th century. The work was condemned at the Council of Paris in 1210; and, on Jan. 23, 1225, Honorius III ordered all copies to be burned publicly, under pain of excommunication and suspicion of heresy. When Eriugena's works were first printed at Oxford in 1681, the De divisione naturae was placed on the INDEX OF FORBIDDEN BOOKS because of the pantheistic implication of its expressions.

Reason and Revelation. Eriugena was always motivated by a profound passion for truth. “There is no death worse than ignorance of truth,” he wrote, “and no pit deeper than promulgation of what is really false.” Human reason, in its present state, is clouded as a result of original sin, but it is still capable of attaining truths from the contemplation of creatures seen. The infallible source of truth is divine revelation unfolded in the Scriptures. Both rational and revealed truths are theophanies, for they are both manifestations of God. Consequently Eriugena was convinced that there can be no conflict between ratio vera and divine revelation. Since God embodied a hidden truth in the words of Sacred Scripture, it is prudent for reason to begin with the word of God: “Ratiocinationis exordium ex divinis eloquiis assumendum esse aestimo.” Eriugena used several analogies to press this point: Scripture is a banquet tempting reason to eat, a holy sepulcher into which Peter (symbolizing faith) entered before John (symbolizing reason) to seek the Lord. Therefore reason should begin by accepting God's revelation and pursue its task under the inspiration of grace.

Following tradition, Eriugena recognized four senses of Scripture: literal, spiritual, historical, and allegorical. Of these Eriugena preferred the spiritual and allegorical, insisting that works (agere) and knowledge (scire) must culminate in theology. Although the Scriptures are divinely inspired and many earlier writers have interpreted them, the excellence of reason must not be underestimated. Priority of nature is of greater dignity than priority of time. Since the Fathers interpreting Scripture are prior in time and reason is prior by nature, reason has the greater dignity. Eriugena recognized a hierarchy of guides in the attainment of truth: Scripture, reason, and the authority of the Fathers. In seeking ultimate truth reason exercises an activity that the Greeks called “philosophizing.” For Eriugena, as for St. AUGUSTINE before him, true philosophy does not differ from true religion. “What is philosophy but an expounding of the rules of religion whereby man humbly adores and rationally seeks God, the highest cause and source of everything.” Thus in De predestinatione Eriugena could identify true philosophy and true religion; in his Annotationes in Martianum Capellam he said, “No one enters heaven except through philosophy.”

For Eriugena, the disciple of Pseudo-Dionysius and Maximus, the formal structure of philosophy is dialectical, consisting of division, definition, demonstration, and resolution. The formal, logical structure perceived in thought is also found in physical reality. Thus the division of concepts corresponds to the division of natures.

Division of Natures. In De divisione naturae Eriugena presented a number of divisions according to which being may be classified, the most important of which is his division of natures into four types or stages: (1) nature that creates and is not created (“natura creans et non creata”), (2) nature that is created and also creates (“natura creata et creans”), (3) nature that is created and does not create (“natura creata et non creans”), (4) nature that is not created and does not create (“natura non creata et non creans”).

Nature that creates and is not created is God Himself. Since being is whatever can be grasped by sense and intellect, God must be said to transcend all being (supra ens, supra bonum). As far as knowledge is concerned, He is more properly nonbeing, nothing. He is, in fact, the nothingness from which all things are made (Gn 1.2), since apart from Him there is nothing from which anything can be made. None of the CATEGORIES OF BEING can be predicated of God, who is ineffable and incomprehensible, even to Himself. Although unknowable and ineffable, God expresses himself through theophanies, which are divine ideas, revelation, and creation. Following Pseudo-Dionysius, Eriugena distinguished three theologies, or approaches to knowledge of God: affirmative, negative, and transcendent. Affirmative theology is limited to the positive statements that can be said of God, such as that He is one substance (οὐσία) and three Persons (ὑποστάσεις). Negative theology consists of all the negations that must be said of God, such as incorporeal, ineffable, and incomprehensible. Transcendent theology is marked by the use of such transcendent terms as super-substantial, superessential, and superdesirable. According to the Scriptures, the Father generated the Son and “Catholic faith obliges one to profess that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, or from the Father through the Son.” Since the exact Trinitarian formula is difficult to determine, according to Eriugena, it is better not to venture any rash conjecture. For him, God reveals Himself as the Father of all when He creates everything in the Word and distributes His graces through the Holy Spirit.

Nature that is created and also creates is the theophany of divine ideas existing in the Word. These ideas are eternal because they are created in the Word and, in a certain sense, are coeternal with God; but precisely because they are created and come from God, they are not fully coeternal. Here Eriugena’s dialectics faltered. As he interpreted divine ideas, they were a fulfillment and completion of God Himself. They are the first theophanies of creation, needing only to be divided into lower genera, species, and individuals. This division is properly the work of the Holy Spirit. The image of the Trinity, therefore, is manifested not only in the Scriptures, but also in things, e.g., essence, power, and activity.

Nature that is created and does not create is the world of immaterial and material creatures made from the nothingness that is God. For Eriugena, God is made (factus est) in His creatures and these constitute three vast regions: purely immaterial substances (angels), composite substances of spirit and matter (man), and purely material substances (world). Being in all His creatures, God is, in a sense, their essence, even though creatures are not divine. While Eriugena’s language is often pantheistic, he insists on the absolute transcendence of God beyond all being (supra ens). Created nature constitutes a hierarchy, and angels within that hierarchy also constitute a hierarchy of essences. The nature of each angel is determined by its position in the hierarchy. Each angel receives intellectual illumination from above and diffuses it below. Man, the lowest intellectual creature, receives intellectual illumination from angels and God. Before Adam’s fall, man, although corporeal, was not divided into male and female; nor was reproduction achieved through intercourse. Original sin, according to Eriugena, divided man sexually and individually. In his fall, man carried all lower creatures with him to disorder, to further division, and to fatal dissension. Creatures had their true and perfect being in the mind of God, in divine ideas. In the mind of God, man had perfect knowledge of all things. After the fall of Adam, man can gather knowledge only gradually and with great difficulty from the divided, fragmented, and fleeting impressions of sense. From sensory impressions of the world man must form the unity of images and ideas whereby God can once more be known. Objects of sense also existed originally as ideas in the mind of God and as such their existence was perfect. But after the fall, they too became further divided into a conglomeration of intelligible qualities. Now they are only imperfect theophanies revealing something of God.

Nature that is not created and does not create is the return of all things to God. The return begins at the moment sensible things reach their ultimate division, for even divided qualities unite to form a corporeal substance. Man’s final division comes with death, when his soul departs and his body disintegrates. The return of all things to God is possible only through Christ’s redemptive act and redeeming grace. The return of man to God does not take place instantaneously, but gradually. Death must be followed by the final resurrection when the body returns to the soul, becoming spiritual and sexless. Then body and soul will return to their ideal state in the mind of God. The whole terrestrial sphere will be brought back to Paradise in the mind of God. In the end there will be only God. This does not mean the annihilation of all things, but the restoration of all things to “real being” in the divine nothingness. All men will become pure spirits. The blessed will have an “intellectual vision” in the darkness of the Godhead. The wicked will be punished by being deprived of knowledge; they will suffer the worst punishment possible—ignorance of the truth.

See Also: SCHOLASTICISM; PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF; DIALECTICS IN THE MIDDLE AGES; PANTHEISM.

Bibliography: É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) 113–128. M. CAPPUYNS, Jean Scot Érigène, sa vie, son oeuvre, sa pensée (Louvain 1933). M. DAL PRA, Scoto Eriugena e il neoplatonismo medievale (2d ed. Milan 1951); Enciclopedia filosofica 4:473–478. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 5.1:401–434. L. SCHEFFCZYK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 5:1082–83. W. N. PITTENGER, “The Christian Philosophy of John Scotus Eriugena,” Journal of Religion 24 (1944). H. F. DONDAINE, “Saint Thomas et Scot Érigène,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 35 (1951) 31–33. K. G. MOORE, “Johannes Scotus Eriugena on Imagination,” Journal of Psychology 23 (1947) 169–178. J. J. O’MEARA, Eriugena (Oxford 1988). D. MORAN, The Philosophy of John Scottus Eriugena: A Study of Idealism in the Middle Ages (Cambridge 1989). D. CARABINE, John Scottus Eriugena (New York 2000).

[L. E. LYNCH]

JOHN STRATFORD

Archbishop of Canterbury, chancellor of England; b. Stratford-on-Avon; d. Mayfield, Sussex, Aug. 23, 1348. He was educated at Oxford, where by 1312 he was doctor of civil law. The demand for his legal skill gained him many benefices in the Church as well as civil offices, including that of royal envoy at the papal Curia in AVIGNON, where King EDWARD II charged him to secure the election of ROBERT BALDOK as bishop of WINCHESTER in 1323. Instead John secured his own appointment to Winchester by papal PROVISION, much to the king’s indignation. Though he was later readmitted to the king’s favor, it was Stratford who drafted the six articles giving reasons for Edward II’s deposition in 1327, and he was one of the bishops who obtained the king’s consent to abdication. For the next decade Stratford was a leading actor on the political scene, serving as chancellor (1330–34, 1335–37, 1340) and in 1333 becoming archbishop of Canterbury. But in late 1340 he strongly objected to the foreign policy of EDWARD III, who returned from Flanders, removed Stratford’s brother, ROBERT STRATFORD, from the chancellorship, and initiated a propaganda war upon Archbishop Stratford throughout England. Stratford replied on December 29 by comparing himself to the persecuted Thomas BECKET. When the king attempted to try Stratford in the court of exchequer, the archbishop insisted on taking his place in Parliament, thus vindicating the right of peers not to be tried outside of Parliament. Within a year (October 1341) Stratford was reconciled to the king, whom he continued to advise until his own death. He was always more a politician than a pastor.

Bibliography: T. F. TOUT, Chapters in the Administrative History of Mediaeval England, 6 v. (New York 1920–33) v. 3. M. MC-

KISACK, The Fourteenth Century, 1307–1399 (Oxford 1959). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:1796–98.

[D. NICHOLL]

JOHN THE ALMSGIVER, ST.

Patriarch of Alexandria, 610 to 617 or 619; b. Amathus, Cyprus; d. there, 619. He was the son of Epiphanus, the governor of Cyprus, and Honesta. John married early and had a number of children, all of whom died in infancy. Later, as a widower and friend of SOPHRONIUS (patriarch of Jerusalem), John MOSCHUS, and Leontius of Neapolis, John was elected patriarch of Alexandria by acclamation in 610 and set about reforming the discipline of the clergy and laity. He built monasteries and churches, established refuges for the Syrians dispossessed by the Persians, and strenuously urged the rich of Alexandria to participate in his work for the poor. When the imperial official Nicetas confiscated the Church’s revenues for military purposes, John forced him to make restitution. When the Persians occupied Egypt, he fled to his ancestral home in Cyprus, where he died. His remains were translated several times and finally came to rest at Presbourg on Jan. 23, 1632. John wrote a vita of Bishop Tychon of Amathus in Cyprus; his own vita was written by Leontius of Neapolis.

Feast: Jan. 23 and Nov. 12 (Greek Church).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Jan. 3:108–148. Three Byzantine Saints: Contemporary Biographies of St. Daniel the Stylite, St. Theodore of Sykeon, and St. John the Almsgiver, tr. E. A. S. DAWES and N. H. BAYNES (Crestwood, N.Y. 1996). Leontios von Neapolis Leben des hl. Johannes, ed. H. GELZER (Freiburg 1893), Greek original and French tr. in Vie de Syméon le Fou; Vie de Jean de Chypre, ed. A. J. FESTUGÈRE and L. RYDÉN (Paris 1974). H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 459–460. H. DUCKWORTH, St. John the Almsgiver (Oxford 1901). H. DELEHAYE, Analecta Bollandiana, 26 (1907) 244–245; ibid. 45 (1927) 5–74, vita by Sophronius. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN, 3 v. (Brussels 1957) 3:886–889.

[F. CHIOVARO]

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST.

Christ’s precursor, son of the priest ZACHARY and Mary’s kinswoman St. ELIZABETH.

Birth and Infancy. The Gospel of Luke provides details of John’s annunciation, birth, and infancy. The archangel GABRIEL appeared to Zachary while he was performing his priestly duty in the Temple and announced that Elizabeth would conceive a son in her old age (Lk 1.11). The form used corresponds to that employed in the OT in foretelling the births of the famous men (Jgs 13.2–20). Gabriel told Zachary to give his promised son the name of John, which means “Yahweh is gracious” (Lk 1.13). The child would be filled with the Holy Spirit from his mother’s womb and become an ascetic of Israel. He would lead many of the sons of Israel to their Lord and would walk in the power and spirit of Elias (1.14–17). In his canticle called the BENEDICTUS ZACHARY sings of his son as “prophet of the Most High” (1.76). John was born six months before Christ (1.36), according to tradition in the town of Ain Karim, about three-and-a-half miles west of Jerusalem. During the visit of Mary to Elizabeth the unborn John leapt with messianic joy in his mother’s womb (1.44). Luke also relates that John spent his youth in the desert (1.80).

Ministry. John appeared in the region of the JORDAN as an ascetic and a preacher of penance (Mt 3.1–6; Mk 1.1–6; Lk 3.1–6; Jn 1.19–28). With his preaching of baptism for the forgiveness of sins, the Kingdom of God began to unfold. As PRECURSOR OF THE MESSIAH, his principal task was to announce the arrival of Jesus Christ as Messiah and to baptize him. He appeared not as a priest, like his father, but as a preacher clothed in camel’s hair, the traditional garb of the prophets; ELIJAH, whom John resembles in many ways, is described as wearing the same ascetic clothing (2 Kgs 1.8). For centuries the people had honored this sign of the prophet, but false prophets had caused it to fall into disrepute, so that to wear it was to invite sarcasm (Zec 13.3–4).

John came as “a voice crying in the desert” (Is 40.3–4). All four Evangelists identify the Isaian “voice” with the Baptist. According to the Fourth Gospel the Baptist categorically denied that he was Elijah or the expected Prophet or the Messiah (Jn 1.19–23). But he was indeed the last of the OT prophets, one sent by God to announce the baptism of repentance and the arrival of the Kingdom in Christ. He preached a moral reform designed to prepare the Jews for the advent of the Messiah. Their interior conversion was to be visibly proclaimed by baptism with water and a confession of sin. Jesus’ submission to John’s baptism indicated his acknowledgement of the truth of John’s mission but by that very act supplanted John’s baptism (Mt 3.13–17; Mk 1.9–11; Lk 3.21–22; Jn 1.32–34). (See BAPTISM OF CHRIST.)

The message of John’s sermons is rather forbidding and severe (Mt 3.7–12; Mk 1.7–8; Lk 3.7–18). More important is the imminent coming of the Messiah and the impending judgment he would bring: “the axe is laid to the root of the trees” (Lk 3.9). But Luke (3.10–14) insists also on the positive and humane aspects of the Baptist’s message. No profession is denied salvation; all are called primarily to practice justice and charity toward their fellow man.

John the Baptist. (Archive Photos)

In John’s Gospel the Baptist describes himself as the friend of the Bridegroom who must decrease as Christ must increase (Jn 3.25–30); he proclaims Jesus as the Lamb of God, and a few of John’s disciples follow Jesus (Jn 1.35–37).

The Disciples of John the Baptist. John gathered around him a group of disciples (Mt 11.2; Lk 7.18–19) who remained faithful to him until his death. He taught them a special way of prayer (Lk 11.1) and fasting. The apostles Andrew and John had been disciples of the Baptist before joining Christ (Jn 1.35–40). The Synoptic Gospels record a dispute between the disciples of the Baptist and those of Christ over fasting (Mt 9.14 and parallels), and John’s Gospel refers to a dispute between the disciples of the Baptist and those of Jesus over baptism (Jn 3.25–28). The Baptist, however, seems to have counseled his disciples to follow Jesus (Mt 11.2–6; see below).

Later (A.D. 53), Paul met Apollos and about 12 Ephesians who had received the baptism of John and apparently formed their own religious community at Ephesus (Acts 18.24; 19.1–7). The Fourth Gospel seems to contain a polemic against the disciples of the Baptist (Jn 1.6–8), which suggests that they existed as a separate group, distinct from the Christian Church, even up to the end of the first century.

“Salome Receiving the Head of Saint John the Baptist,” painting by Guercino, Museo Civico, Rimini, Italy. (© Archivo Iconografico, S. A./Corbis-Bettmann)

Imprisonment and Death. The Evangelists further describe how “all the country of Judea went out to him, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem” (Mk 1.5; Mt 3.5; Lk 3.7). Josephus (Ant. 18.5.2), as well as the Evangelists, records the reaction of HEROD ANTIPAS, who, fearing an uprising, had the Baptist imprisoned. John had fearlessly denounced Herod’s sinful marriage with HERODIAS, his brother’s wife. In turn, Herodias instigated her daughter Salome to request John’s death; to please her Herod had John beheaded, although he had regarded him as a religious and just man (Mt 14.3; Mk 6.17–20). While in prison, John had sent a delegation of his disciples to ask Jesus if He was the Messiah. According to some critics, John had found it difficult to accept a meek and merciful Messiah rather than an Elijah-like figure. In answer, Jesus pointed to his fulfillment of the OT messianic expectation, especially as described by Isaiah (35.5; 61.1). He then took the occasion to eulogize John as “a prophet, yes, more than a prophet. . . . Among those born of women there has not arisen a greater than John the Baptist” (Mt 11.9–11; Lk 7.18–28).

John the Baptist and Qumran. Many scholars think that the QUMRAN community of the Judean desert had an important influence on the Baptist. Some claim that John belonged to the community (e.g., J. Steinmann); others suggest that a common eschatological expectation in the area of the Judean desert is sufficient to explain the similarities (e.g., P. Benoit).

These similarities are striking. The Baptist stands against a specific background, that of the messianic expectation of the Judean desert. The Qumran community was a priestly one; John, too, came from a priestly family that manifested intense messianic hopes. Both John and the sectarians of Qumran found inspiration in the text of

Is 40.3. John preached a baptism of repentance, and while the Qumran community practiced ritual ablutions, there is no indication that they attached any moral significance to these. Yet the Qumran ritual was frequently repeated, whereas that of John was apparently administered only once. John announced a second baptism with the Holy Spirit and with fire (Lk 3.16), that is, an eschatological judgment; the Qumran ascetics, too, preached a second baptism that would be the work of the Spirit of God and would be eschatological (1QS 4.20–22). A striking difference, however, between John the Baptist and the Qumran community is the universality present in John's preaching in contrast to the closed character of the Qumran group, which regarded all outsiders as "sons of darkness."

Since John spent many years in the desert (Lk 1.80) and since there are marked similarities between John and the Qumranites, it seems probable that he knew the Qumran community. It has even been suggested that as a child he had been educated by them. Certainly, it appears that an influence was at work, for the discoveries at Qumran shed light upon the figure of John the Baptist and upon the general eschatological expectation that existed in the Judean desert. Whether there was a more immediate influence is not ascertainable. But he certainly was not a member of the Qumran community during his active ministry, for his missionary life was not in keeping with the rule of this community.

Iconography. The first representation of John, dating from the beginning of the second century, is found in the Catacombs of St. Callistus in Rome. It depicts the baptism of Christ by John. Evidence of a cult of the Baptist is not apparent before the fourth century, when Constantine built the Lateran Basilica and dedicated it to St. John the Baptist. In the sixth century the baptism of Christ by John was sculptured in bas relief on the ivory throne of Bishop Maximian, at present in the Archiepiscopal Museum at Ravenna. Throughout the Middle Ages and Renaissance and to the present, the Baptist has been the subject of paintings, sculptures, bronzes, and frescoes by the greatest of the artists. Statues of him are found on the Cathedrals of Chartres, Amiens, and Reims. In the Peruzzi Chapel of the church of S. Croce in Florence there is a series of frescoes by Giotto depicting John's life.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1179–81. J. MICHL et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup> (Freiburg 1930–38) 5:1084–89. P. VIELHAUER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart<sup>3</sup> 3:804–808. J. STEINMANN, Saint John the Baptist, tr. M. BOYES (New York 1958). P. BENOIT "Qumrân et le N. T.," New Testament Studies 7 (1960–61) 276–296. J. DUPONT "L'Ambassade de Jean-Baptiste," Nouvelle revue théologique 83 (1961) 805–821, 943–959. A. FEUIL-

LET, "Lea Trouvailles de Qumrân: Saint Jean-Baptiste et les hommes du désert," Cahiers Évangiles 27 (1957) 33–38.

[M. E. MCIVER]

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., ICONOGRAPHY OF

The iconography of St. John the Baptist is manifest in both cyclic representations of his life and in noncyclic representations.

Cyclic. The figure of John the Baptist was represented in Christian art as early as the 2d century. In the first stage he was represented only in relation to Christological scenes, especially to the scene of the Baptism of Christ (sarcophagus from Basilica Petronilla, Rome). As early as the 5th century, artists depicted various scenes of the life of John the Baptist on the basis of Biblical texts as well as apocryphal literature and legends. Consequently there existed a rich narrative cycle of the life of the saint already by the 11th century, and in the 13th century it came to include almost 20 scenes (frescoes of Braunschweig cathedral). The important scenes of the life of John the Baptist are: (1) the annunciation to Zacharias in the Temple; (2) the Visitation; (3) the birth and the naming; (4) the Circumcision; (5) the flight of Elizabeth, his mother, and young John to the mountain; (6) John the Baptist going into the wilderness; (7) the preaching in the wilderness; (8) the axe laid on the foot of a tree; (9) John the Baptist and the people of Israel receiving baptism from him; (10) John the Baptist bearing witness to Christ; (11) the baptism of Christ; (12) John the Baptist before Herod and Herodea; (13) arrest and imprisonment of John the Baptist; (14) the feast of Herod; (15) beheading of John the Baptist; (16) burial of the saint by his disciples; (17) burning of the bones of the saint; (18) quenching of the ashes; (19) discovery of the head of John the Baptist.

Noncyclic. In the early Church he soon became an object of veneration of the faithful and was ranked with the 12 Apostles and the four Evangelists. In the ivory sculpture on Maximianus's cathedra in Ravenna (6th century) he is represented with the four Evangelists, holding the symbol of the Lamb of God. In middle Byzantine art he was represented in the scene of the Last Judgment as an intercessor side by side with the Virgin Mary (Deësis). In the illustration to the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, he was represented as foretelling the Descent of Christ into Hell. In the Italian Renaissance, artists invented a religious-genre motif of John the Baptist as a young boy dressed in camel fur and holding a cross-staff. Donatello represented the saint as an idealized youth (Museo Na-zionale, Florence) and in a very realistic manner (Siena cathedral). In the 16th century John the Baptist came to be represented as a playmate of Christ. This was a favorite motif in the series of Raphael's Madonna portraits (e.g., the Alba Madonna; National Gallery, Washington). In the baroque period, especially in the areas of Westphalia and the Lower Rhine, there arose a fervent veneration of the saint as a healer of illnesses of the head and neck. The so-called Johannesschüssel, the head of the saint on a charger, became a very popular motif of the period (paintings of Pordenone and Luini).

Life of St. John the Baptist, 13th-century fresco cycle in the cathedral church of St. Blasius, Braunschweig, Germany.

Bibliography: W. HARING, "The Winged St. John the Baptist," Art Bulletin 5 (1922) 34–40. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CARROLL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 7.2:2167–84. G. KAFTAL, Iconography of the Saints in Tuscan Painting (Florence 1952) 550–560. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 2.1:431–463.

[S. TSUJI]

JOHN THE DEACON OF NAPLES

Hagiographer; b. Naples, c. 880; place and date of death unknown. A student of the priest AUXILIUS, he had become deacon of Southern Gennaro in Naples by 906; in that year he took part in the translation of the relics of St. Sosius from Miseno to Naples. While still young he compiled a lively chronicle of the bishops of Naples from 762 to 872 [Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum (Berlin 1826—) 424–435; also L. A. Muratori, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, 25 v. in 28 (Milan 1723–51) 1.2:291–318]. He is best known for his hagiographical works dealing with St. Severinus [Acta Sanctorum January 1:497–499], St. Januarius (Acta Sanctorum September 6:874–878), St. Sossius (Acta Sanctorum September 6:879–884), the Forty Martyrs of Sebaste, a Latin translation (Acta Sanctorum March 2:22–25), and St. Procopius (Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500, 1.2:269–273).

Bibliography: D. MALLARDO, "Giovanni diacono napoletano," Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia, 2 (1948) 317–337; 4 (1950) 325–358.

[G. T. DENNIS]

JOHN THE DEACON OF ROME (HYMMONIDES)

Author of the vita of GREGORY THE GREAT; b. c. 824; d. before 882. Probably a monk of MONTE CASSINO, he belonged to the court of CHARLES THE BALD for some time and subsequently (after 875) was a member of the entourage of Pope JOHN VIII (872–882). At John's request he wrote the Vita Gregorii Magni [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 217 V., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 75:59–242], which is considered the best biography written in the period. For this work he used Gregory's register, quoting it extensively, and these extracts are still important for the study of PAPAL REGISTERS, particularly Gregory's. John is reputed to be the author of several other works, some of which are extant. He planned an extensive history of the Church for which his friend ANASTASIUS THE LIBRARIAN translated fragments for the Greek writings of Nicephorus, GEORGE SYNCELLUS, and THEOPHANES, but the plan was never realized. At the request of GAUDERICH OF VELLETRI he began a Vita s. Clementis Romani, but this work is lost. He rewrote in verse the apochryphal Coena Cypriani (ed. A. Lapôte), attributed to St. CYPRIAN. John's authorship of the Epistola ad Senarium remains doubtful; however, his authorship of the Commentary of St. John Chrysostom on the Pentateuch is more probable. It is believed that he contributed to the account of Pope ADRIAN II in the LIBER PONTIFICALIS, and that he acted as papal secretary to JOHN VIII.

Bibliography: A. LAPÔTRE, "Le Souper de Jean Diacre," Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 21 (1901) 305–385. M. MANITUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 1:689–695. G. ARNALDI, "Giovanni Immonide e la cultura a Roma al tempo di Giovanni VIII," Bullettino dell'Istituto storico italiano per il medio evo e Archivio Muratoriano 68 (1956) 33–89.

[J. J. MUZAS]

JOHN THE GRAMMARIAN, OF CAESAREA

Flourished in early 6th century, in Palestine, Byzantine theologian. Between 514 and 518 he wrote an Apology in defense of the Trinitarian definition of the Council of Chalcedon. Apart from three fragments that have been identified among the fragments of Eulogius of Alexandria by C. Moeller, his original work in Greek is lost. However, the moderate Monophysite theologian SEVERUS of Antioch, who was patriarch of that see from 512 to his deposition in 518 and was subsequently active as a writer, composed an elaborate attack on John's Apology entitled Contra impium Grammaticum, which is preserved in Syriac translation. This work contains forty-four extensive passages from John's work, including numerous patristic texts that John employed to support his exposition. John was an acute theological thinker who wished to give a strict but clear interpretation of the central teaching of the Council of Chalcedon. At the same time, he wished to establish an essential harmony between the definition of CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, including the ideas expressed in his Anathematisms, and that of the Council of Chalcedon. Relying heavily on the Trinitarian teachings and terminology of the great Cappadocian Fathers, he was the first to state formally that the human nature of Christ can never be thought of without hypostasis, since at no time did it exist alone without the Logos. He maintained in precise terms that the two natures of Christ were united by a hypostatic union in one hypostasis. John has been characterized by B. Altaner as the first important exponent of NeoChalcedonian Christology.

Bibliography: J. LEBON, Contra Impium Grammaticum (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientaliū, 93, 101, 111; 1929–1938; repr. 1952). C. MOELLER, "Trois fragments grecs de l'Apologie de Jean le Grammairien pour le concile de Chalcédoine," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, 46 (1951) 683–688. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 285, 377, 388, with bibliography. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 613–614, with bibliography.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

JOHN THE SILENT, ST.

Called the Hesychast or Sabaite; 6th-century Armenian monk and bishop of Colonia; b. Nicopolis, 454; d. Jan. 8, 559. John's biography was written by CYRIL OF SCYTHOPOLIS, who described him as the son of a rich family. At 18, on the death of his parents, John abandoned his fortune and founded a monastic settlement in a wilderness, which he directed for a number of years. He was chosen bishop of Colonia in Armenia; but after a short time he fled to Jerusalem, where he was received into the monastery of St. Sabas and lived in perpetual silence.

Feast: May 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 3:230–236, 14*–18*. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca 897, 898. E. SCHWARTZ, ed., Kyriillos von Skythopolis (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 49.2; 1939) 201–222. G. GARITTE, Analecta Bollandiana 72 (1954) 75–84.

[P. ROCHE]

JOHN VINCENTIUS, ST.

Benedictine bishop and hermit; d. probably Dec. 12, 1012. At first a bishop in the district around RAVENNA, he later became a hermit on Monte Pirchiriano in Piedmont, where, after the fashion of St. ROMUALD and the CAMALDOLESE, he gathered around himself a colony of hermits known as Santa-Maria delle Celle. On this spot in 987 he built the chapel in honor of St. Michael, which by the year 1000 had grown into the Abbey of San Michele di Chiusa. Later, in 1006, he played a part in the foundation of San Solutore in Turin. In 1154 his remains were translated to the parish church of Sant' Ambrogio.

Feast: Dec. 21.

Bibliography: Chronicon monasterii s. Michaelis Clusini in Monumta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 30.2:961–964. F. SAVIO, Gli Antichi Vescovi d'Italia, v.1 Il Piemonte (Turin 1898). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 3:466–468.

[P. L. HUG]

JOHN WELLES

English theologian; d. Perugia, 1388. He was a Benedictine of RAMSEY ABBEY and was ordained on June 7, 1365. He studied at Oxford (Gloucester College), becoming master in theology by 1377, and served as head of Gloucester College for many years. He became an active and bitter opponent of John WYCLIF when the Oxford reformer attacked monastic orders as religiones privatae. Welles, known as the “Hammer of Heretics,” was one of the 12 doctors who examined the writings of Wyclif at Oxford in 1380. He took a prominent part in the council at Blackfriars, London, convened by archbishop William COURTENAY for suppression of Wyclifite teachings in 1382. In 1387 the provincial chapter of English Black Monks appointed him to transact its business on the Continent and to plead for the release of Cardinal ADAM EASTON from the papal prison in Rome. He died the following year in Perugia and was buried in the church of Santa Sabina. He was author of many sermons, letters, and polemical treatises, including: De socii sui ingratitude, Pro religione privata, Super cleri praerogativa, and Super Eucharistiae negotio.

Bibliography: Fasciculi Zizaniorum, ed. W. W. SHIRLEY, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v. (London 1858–96) 5:239–241, 287, 499. H. B. WORKMAN, John Wyclif, 2 v. (Oxford 1926) 2:123–124. The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 20:1139–40. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 3:2008.

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

JOHN AND PAUL, SS.

Roman martyrs named in the Canon of the Mass. According to the legendary passio, John and Paul were brothers, officials at the imperial court, whom JULIAN THE APOSTATE (361–363) had put to death as Christians by the Roman officer Terentianus. They were allegedly decapitated in their home on the Caelian hill and secretly buried in the basement. On the death of Julian, the new Emperor Jovian then constructed a basilica over the site of their martyrdom. Excavations beneath the Basilica of Saints Giovanni e Paolo in Rome were interpreted by Germano di S. Stanislao at the beginning of the 20th century, and more recently by G. de Sanctis, as indicative of the historical existence of the two saints. However, the complexity of the manuscript tradition of the passio and its authenticity have been studied by outstanding hagiographers who deny its historical worth: FRANCHI DE' CAVALIERI considered the passio a plagiarism on the Acts of Saints Juveninus and Maximinus; Lanzoni and H. Delehaye thought the original title of the basilica referred to John the Baptist and the Apostle St. Paul. A. Prandi's judgment (1953) still seems to be the most authentic: the archeological remains beneath the present church are a remarkable specimen of what was a large pagan home apparently used for Christian services, over which the original basilica was built in the fifth century; but the archeological evidence provides no clear or undisputable link between the monument and the saints. John and Paul were greatly honored in England; a council at Oxford in 1222 made their feast a holy day of obligation in Great Britain. Because of the generosity of Cardinal Francis Spellman of New York, whose titular church it was, the remains of the ancient house beneath the present basilica have been almost totally restored.

Feast: June 26.

Bibliography: G. DI S. STANISLAO, La casa Celimontana dei SS. Martiri Giovanni e Paolo (Rome 1894); cpf. Analecta Bollandiana, 14 (1895) 332. G. DE SANCTIS, I Santi Giovanni e Paolo martiri celimontani (Rome 1962); cpf. B. DE GAIFFIER, Analecta Bollandiana, 82 (1964) 439–440. E. GASDIA, La casa paganocristiana del Celio (Rome 1937). A. PRANDI, Il complesso monumentale della basilica celimontana (Vatican City 1953). V. L. KENNEDY, The Saints of the Canon of the Mass (Vatican City 1938) 131–137. P. FRANCHI DE' CAVALIERI, Note agiografiche (Studi e Testi), 9; (1902) 53–65. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 738.

[V. RICCI]

JOHNSON, GEORGE

Professor, administrator; b. Toledo, Ohio, Feb. 22, 1889; d. Washington, D.C., June 4, 1944. He was the son of Henry and Kathryn (McCarthy) Johnson. After studying at St. John's University, Toledo, (M.A., 1912), and St. Bernard's Seminary, Rochester, N.Y., he was sent to the North American College, Rome, Italy, where he was ordained in 1914. He served for two years as secretary to Bp. Joseph Schrembs and then left to obtain his doctorate in education (1919) at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. He was then diocesan superintendent of schools at Toledo until 1921, when Bp. Thomas J. Shahan appointed him professor of education at Catholic University, a post he held until his death.

In addition to his teaching, he served (1923–27) as assistant at neighboring St. Anthony parish, where he was in charge of the parochial school. He was also director of the Campus School of The Catholic University from its inception in 1935. In 1928–29 Johnson was appointed director of the Department of Education of the National Catholic Welfare Conference and secretary general of the National Catholic Educational Association. These posts, which he held until his death, gave him national influence on American education and led to appointments on several presidential committees. When the Commission on American Citizenship was founded at Catholic University by the American hierarchy in 1938, Johnson was named to its executive committee. In 1943 he was made director of this commission. He wrote the commission's statement of principles, Better Men for Better Times (1943), as well as a study of Catholic elementary school curricula, three textbooks on Bible and Church history, and several periodical articles. In November 1942 he was named domestic prelate by Pius XII.

[E. KEVANE]

JOHNSON, ROBERT, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Shropshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), May 28, 1582. Johnson entered the German College in Rome on Oct. 1, 1571, but completed his seminary studies at the English College in Douai. Following his ordination at Brussels (April 1576), he labored in London for six years interrupted only by a pilgrimage to Rome (1579) and imprisonment. He was arrested July 12, 1580 and imprisoned at the Poultry Counter until he was transferred to the Tower of London (December 5). Johnson endured the rack (December 16), then was thrust into an underground dungeon until his trial (November 14) at which he was found guilty on the fictitious charge of conspiring against the king at Rome and Rheims. On November 20, he was condemned. He was executed with BB. Thomas FORD and John SHERT, who were also implicated in the same "plot." He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JOHNSON, THOMAS, BL.

Carthusian priest, martyr; starved to death at Newgate Prison, London, Sept. 20, 1537. Thomas, a monk at the London Charterhouse, had already seen the deaths of many of his Carthusian brothers, including the priors SS. John HOUGHTON, Robert LAWRENCE, and Augustine WEBSTER (d. 1535), as well as others. On May 18, 1537, the 38 remaining monks of the London Charterhouse were required to take the Oath of Supremacy. Frs. Thomas Johnson, Richard Bere, and Thomas Green, as well as John Davy and the lay brothers Robert Salt, William Greenwood, Thomas Redyng, Thomas Scryven, Walter Pierson, and William Horne were imprisoned at Newgate for refusing to recognize King Henry VIII as supreme head of the Church in England. There they were chained to posts with their hands behind them and left to die. St. Thomas More's former ward, Margaret Giggs Clement bribed the jailer to allow her access to the prisoners to feed them. This continued for some time until authorities questioned the monks' continued survival without food. Seven died June 6–16 (Greenwood, Davy, Salt, Pierson, Green, Scryven, and Redyng). Thereafter it appears Cromwell ordered that the remaining monks be fed so that they could stand for execution, but it is believed that Johnson was eventually starved to death. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JOLENTA OF HUNGARY, BL.

Widow, Poor Clare nun; b. Hungary, c. 1235; d. Gniezno, Poland, c. 1298–99. Jolenta (Yolande, Helena) was a grandniece of St. HEDWIG, a niece of St. ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY, and a sister of SS. MARGARET OF HUNGARY and KINGA of Poland. Her father was King Bela IV of Hungary and her mother, Mary, a daughter of the Emperor of Constantinople. At the age of five, Jolenta was placed under the care of her sister Kinga, queen of Poland, wife of Boleslas V the Chaste. Jolenta married Duke Boleslas VI the Pious of Kalisz. After the duke died in 1279 and two daughters had married, she and her youngest daughter joined her widowed sister Kinga in the POOR CLARE convent at Stary Sacz. Later Jolenta moved to the Poor Clare convent she and her husband had founded at Gniezno, and there held the office of abbess. Originally authorized by URBAN VIII, Jolenta's cult was approved by LEO XII in 1827. Prior to 1961 her feast was observed by all three branches of the First Order of St. Francis.

Niccolò Jommelli. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS.)

Feast: June 15.

Bibliography: LÉON DE CLARY, Lives of the Saints and Blessed of the Three Orders of St. Francis, 4 v. (Taunton, England 1885–87) v.2. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:550. M. A. HABIG, Franciscan Book of Saints (Chicago 1959) 421–423.

[M. A. HABIG]

JOMMELLI, NICCOLÒ

Composer of opera and sacred music in classical style; b. Aversa, near Naples, Sept. 10, 1714; d. Naples, Aug. 25, 1774. After basic music training under the Aversa cathedral choirmaster, Mazillo, and contact with contemporary musicians such as Feo, Durante, and Leo, he produced his first opera, L'Errore amoroso, in 1737. In 1741, while under the tutelage of Padre Giovanni Martini, he began writing sacred works of artistic importance. Following further opera composition in Venice and Vienna, he was appointed assistant maestro di cappella of St. Peter's in 1750, and three years later, Kapellmeister to the Duke of Württemberg at Stuttgart. It was during his 15-year stay in Germany that his style underwent a distinct change. From the flowing Neapolitan idiom of his Italian compositions, he turned toward placing more emphasis on harmonic complexity, frequent and free use of modulation, and instrumental accompaniment. Because of these innovations he is sometimes called the Italian Glück. His sacred works include Masses, motets, oratorios, Te Deums, Offertory hymns, and sequences. His most famous, Miserere, for two voices, was completed just before his death.

Bibliography: R. EITNER, Quellen-Lexikon der Musiker und Musikgelehrten, 10 v. (Leipzig 1900–04; New York 1947) 5:294–299, listing of church music. O. URSPRUNG, Die katholische Kirchenmusik (Handbuch der Musikwissenschaft 8; Postdam 1931). A. MONDOLFI, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 7:142–154. J. O. CARLSON, Selected Masses of Niccolò Jommelli (Ph.D. diss. University of Illinois 1974). W. HOCHSTEIN, Die Kirchenmusik von Niccolò Jommelli (1714–1774) (Hildesheim 1984). M. P. MCCLYMONDS, Niccolò Jommelli: The Last Years, 1769–1774 (Ann Arbor 1980); “Niccolò Jommelli,” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed., S. SADIE (New York 1980) 9:689–695. D. E. MONSON, “Niccolò Jommelli,” in International Dictionary of Opera, ed., C. S. LARUE, (Detroit 1993) 653–56. N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (New York 1992) 862–63. A. L. TOLKOFF, The Stuttgart Operas of Niccolò Jommelli (Ph.D. diss. Yale University 1974).

[M. CORDOVANA]

JÓN ÖGMUNDSSON, ST.

Also known as Ogmund; first bishop of Hólar, Iceland; b. Breidabolsstadur, 1052; d. April 23, 1121. He went abroad, perhaps as far as Rome, and brought back Saemund the Learned, founder of the famous Icelandic school at Oddi. Jón was priest of Breidabolsstadur when the decision was made to divide Iceland into two dioceses. He built a new church at Hólar and started a school there for future priests. Jón has left a permanent mark on the Icelandic language, as he was responsible for renaming the days of the week to remove their pagan associations. He was canonized in 1201, and devotion to him has survived in Iceland to the present day.

Feast: March 8.

Bibliography: Byskupa sögur, 3 v. (Reykjavík 1948; reprint 1953). Origines Islandicae, ed. and tr. G. VIGFÚSSON and F. Y. POWELL, 2 v. (Oxford 1905). J. HELGASON, “Jón Ögmundsson . . .,” Norvegia sacra, 5 (1925) 1–34. J. C. F. HOOD, Icelandic Church Saga (London 1946). E. KRISTJÁN, Um Hóladómkirkju (Hólar 1993).

[D. C. C. POCHIN MOULD]

JONAH, BOOK OF

Written in clear, simple language, this difficult and profound little book has long been the subject of lively discussion. This article covers the structure and content; authorship, sources, and date; and literary genre and theological purpose.

Structure and Content. Although traditionally listed among those of the MINOR PROPHETS, the book is not, strictly speaking, a prophetic book but a story of late date concerning a particular mission of Jonah (Hebrew: yōnâ, “dove”). The book falls into two parts (ch. 1–2 and ch. 3–4), each part consisting of two scenes.

Part I. The first part prepares the reader for the impact of the second. God commissioned Jonah to go to Nineveh to preach repentance, but Jonah rebelled—presumably against the idea of preaching salvation to non-Israelites—and sailed toward Spain. God sent a storm that was about to destroy the ship. When the mariners discovered that Jonah had occasioned their danger by his disobedience, they threw him into the sea, which immediately became calm. A “large fish” swallowed Jonah. After three days God commanded the fish to vomit him safely on dry land.

Part II. At the second order to preach, Jonah obeyed. The Ninevites heard him, repented, and were pardoned, but Jonah was angry because of Nineveh’s good fortune. The story ends in a confrontation of God and Jonah. Having lost the shade from the plant that God had miraculously provided for him, Jonah was indignant enough to die. God forced Jonah to see reason by a rhetorical question: If you are so upset about losing so small a thing, which you did nothing to procure, is there not much greater reason for my being concerned over Nineveh and all its inhabitants who are also objects of my loving care?

Author, Sources, and Date. This anonymous writing exhibits dependence on earlier Biblical books. The pseudonym of the hero alludes to the historical Jonah, son of Amittai, an 8th-century Galilean prophet from Gath-hepher (modern Khirbet ez-Zurrâ’) in Zebulun (2 Kgs 14.25). The storm recalls Ez 26–28, especially ch. 27, where the technique is reversed: In Ezekiel, God hurls a storm against His enemies but in Jonah, against His own prophet. In Ezekiel, ship and crew sink; but in Jonah, pagan mariners and their ship survive while Jonah is cast into the sea. The author of the Book of Jonah develops

Jonah Thrown in the Sea, from the “Great Bible of Demeter Néksei-Lipocz.”

Jeremiah’s theology of divine pardon for repentant sinners (cf. Jon 3.10b and Jer 18.7–8; 26.3), and God’s universal love (cf. Jon 1.2 and Jer 1.5). Ancient commentators generally considered the 8th-century prophet Jonah both hero and author of the book. However, the literary and theological dependence already noted, in addition to considerations of language, of history, and of mentality, indicate a post-Exilic period as the time of composition. Philological examination reveals late Hebrew and Aramaisms but probably no Greek influence. The author speaks of Nineveh (destroyed 612 B.C.) as no longer existing except in popular imagination. Moreover, in the people’s minds it had become a colossal city (Jon 3.3), whereas archeologists have shown ancient Nineveh to have been only three miles wide. Finally, the author’s liberal attitude toward pagans seems to be a reaction against a too-nationalistic view of God’s providence. These data drawn from the story itself point to a post-Exilic writer probably of the Ezra-Nehemiah period (middle of the 5th century). He probably wrote before the Greek period, certainly before Sirach (cf. Sir 49). Because the canticle (Jon 2.3–10) is probably without Aramaisms and any apparent connection with the context, it is generally considered an insertion. Some judge it a mosaic of psalm pieces, some of which may be as late as the 3rd century B.C.; others consider it an original and unified composition.

Literary Genre and Theological Purpose. Scholars today do not consider Jonah a historical narrative but an edifying story. The unknown writer artfully, ironically compounds familiar scriptural material, with perhaps some folklorish elements, to make a didactic fiction, a MIDRASH. The “sign of Jonah” mentioned in the Gospels (Mt 12.38–41; Lk 11.29–32), if correctly transmitted, is no argument for the historicity of Jonah. Neither Jesus nor the Gospel writers were treating of literary or historical criticism, but were citing a familiar example somewhat as people today allude to Cinderella or the Prodigal Son. The author’s purpose is to warn his Jewish contemporaries against their extreme nationalism. He accomplishes this by a satire in which every narrow-minded Israelite of the day would see himself reflected in the person of Jonah. In the first part of the book Jonah is a recalcitrant prophet; in the last chapter, the incarnation of the particularist spirit. Criticizing this spirit furthers the author’s purpose. When Jonah was the beneficiary of divine mercy, he prayed; but when Ninevites were objects of the same mercy, he was angry enough to die. Theologically broad-minded, the author teaches that God rules the world, that His providence extends to all men. Tension between the spirit of particularism and universalism should be resolved in favor of the latter because the mercy of God waits for all who repent no matter what their nation.

Bibliography: A. ROBERT and A. TRICOT, Guide to the Bible, tr. E. P. ARBEZ and M. P. MCGUIRE, 2 v. (Tournai-New York 1951–55; v. 1, rev. and enl. 1960) 1:345–346. L. DENNEFELD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 8.2:1497–1504. H. G. MITCHELL, et al., Aggai, Zachariah, Malachi, and Jonah (New York 1912). E. SELLIN, Das Zwölfprophetenbuch (Leipzig 1929). T. H. ROBINSON and F. HORST, Die zwölf Kleinen Propheten (Handbuch zum Alten Testament 14; 2d ed. 1954). A. R. JOHNSON, “Jonah II. 3–10: A Study in Cultic Phantasy,” Studies in Old Testament Prophecy, ed. H. H. ROWLEY (Edinburgh 1950) 82–102. S. H. BLANK, “Doest Thou Well to Be Angry? A Study in Self-Pity,” Hebrew Union College Annual 26 (1955) 29–41. J. HOWTON, “The Sign of Jonah,” Scottish Journal of Theology 15 (1962) 288–304. S. R. DRIVER, An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (11th ed. rev. and enl. New York 1905) 321–25. A. FEUILLET, Le Livre de Jonas (2d ed. Paris 1957). Popular presentation. A. JONES, Unless Some Man Show Me (New York 1951) 48–68.

[J. M. LANE]

JONAH, SIGN OF

The answer that Jesus gave when His adversaries asked Him for a sign in proof of His heavenly mission as recounted in Mt 12.38–42; 16.1–4; and Lk 11.29–32. These three passages create a problem because they give different explanations of what He meant by the sign that He offered, “the sign of Jonah.” The matter is further complicated by the partial parallel in Mk 8.11–12. The solution seems to be that the words and deeds of Jesus were not always recorded by the Evangelists exactly as they were spoken or done, but they were often given new meanings in the inspired KERYGMA OF THE APOSTLES, and these different interpretations were then recorded in the Gospels. See FORM CRITICISM, BIBLICAL.

Gospel accounts. In Mk 8.11–12 it is stated that when the PHARISEES demanded of Jesus a sign from heaven as a means of embarrassing Him, He became angry and answered simply: “A sign shall not be given to this generation.”

According to Luke, when Jesus was asked for a sign (Lk 11.16), He first said, “This generation is an evil generation; it demands a sign, but no sign will be given it but the sign of Jonah” (11.29); then He adds this explanation: “Even as Jonah was a sign to the Ninevites, so will the Son of Man be to this generation. . . . The men of Nineveh will rise up in judgment with this generation and condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and behold, a greater than Jonah is here” (11.30, 32).

According to Mt 12.38–42, when “certain of the SCRIBES and Pharisees” asked Jesus for a sign (v. 38), He first said in answer: “An evil and adulterous generation demands a sign, but no sign will be given it but the sign of Jonah the prophet” (v. 39); this is parallel with Lk 11.29. Then He added a first explanation of the sign: “Even as Jonah was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights, so will the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth” (v. 40); this is unique to Matthew. Finally a second explanation is given: “The men of Nineveh will rise up in the judgment with this generation and will condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and behold, a greater than Jonah is here” (v. 41); this is parallel to Lk 11.32.

According to Mt 16.1–4, in a context that is similar partly to Mk 8.10–12 (a boating scene) and partly to Lk 12.54–55 (signs of the weather), when “the Pharisees and SADDUCEES. . . asked Him to show a sign from heaven” (Mt 16.1), He answered: “An evil and adulterous generation demands a sign, but no sign will be given it but the sign of Jonah” (v. 4); this is parallel to Lk 11.29 and Mt 12.39. In this passage no explanation of the sign is given.

Original logion and kerygmatic explanations. Most exegetes are now agreed that the original logion (saying) of Jesus was as in Mt 12.39; 16.4; Lk 11.29, i.e., simply that no sign at all would be given to the present wicked generation except the sign of Jonah—with no explanation of the sign. It is therefore certain that the sign concerns the future, after the present generation is dead; this is clear from the future tense of the verb δοθήσεται (will be given) and from the fact that the sign of Jonah is not mentioned in Mk 8.11–12 (the present generation will not see any sign, not even the sign of Jonah). Actually, Jonah gave no “sign” to the Ninevites.

The two explanations of the sign that are given in the Gospels, viz, the Ninevites converted by Jonah testifying against the present generation on Judgment Day (Mt 12.41; Lk 11.32) and the comparison between Jonah’s salvation from the belly of the fish and the Resurrection of Jesus from the dead (Mt 12.40, a passage that presupposes the Resurrection as already having happened), although not originally spoken by Jesus to His adversaries, are inspired interpretations of the Apostolic preaching that give a key for solving the puzzle of the sign of Jonah. Since the kerygmatic explanations of this sign connect it with the Resurrection and the Last Judgment, it can be explained best as designating the PAROUSIA of the risen Christ coming in judgment. Other interpretations, viz, that the sign of Jonah is the preaching of Jesus on repentance and the coming judgment, or the entire ministry of Jesus, or solely His Resurrection, do not do justice to all the passages concerned. The notion that takes the meaning of Jonah’s name (Heb. yônâ, dove) as the basis for an interpretation whereby the “sign of the dove” would refer to Jesus under the symbol of a dove cannot be taken seriously.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible (New York 1963) 1200–02. A. VÖGTLE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1116–17. J. HOWTON, “The Sign of Jonah,” Scottish Journal of Theology 15 (1962) 288–304. O. GLOMBITZA, “Das Zeichen des Jona,” New Testament Studies 8 (1962) 359–366.

[J. M. LANE]

JONAH BEN JIŠHAQ, JEHUDAH

Learned Jewish convert; b. Safed, Galilee, Oct. 28, 1588; d. Rome, May 26, 1668. During his extensive travels in Europe as a rabbi he was converted to Catholicism in Poland and took the name of John the Baptist. Later he was sent by the King of Poland to Constantinople for the purchase of precious stones. There, however, he was arrested on the charge of espionage and would have been executed had not the Venetian ambassador interceded for him and enabled him to go to Italy. In Italy, where he was known as Giovanni Battista, he taught Hebrew and Aramaic, first at Pisa and then at the College of the Propaganda, Rome. One of his students at Rome was G. BARTOLOCCI (1613–87), who received much help from Jonah in preparing his masterpiece, the Bibliotheca magna rabbinica de scriptoribus et de scriptis hebraicis (4 v. Rome 1675–94). Jonah himself published a Hebrew translation from the Latin of the four Gospels, with a preface by Pope Clement IX (Rome 1668).

Bibliography: E. LEVESQUE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 1.2:1514. F. X. E. ALBERT, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 2:350.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

JONAS, JUSTUS (JODOCUS KOCH)

Lutheran theologian at Wittenberg and reformer of Halle; b. Nordhausen, Germany, June 5 or 6, 1493; d. Eislefeld, Oct. 9, 1555. Jonas studied in Erfurt (Bachelor of Arts 1507, Master of Arts 1510) and at Wittenberg. In 1518 he returned to Erfurt as lecturer in law. In 1521 he became professor of Canon Law at Wittenberg and accompanied Martin Luther to Worms. An Erasmian humanist, he was won over to theology and scriptural studies. His activity as a theologian included collaboration on Luther’s Bible translation, a commentary on the Acts, a translation of Melancthon’s Loci and of Luther’s De servo arbitrio, a contribution to the Augsburg Confession, participation in the Marburg Colloquy with Ulrich Zwingli, and the composition of an influential church order for Zerbst. His activity as a reformer included the introduction of the Reformation in Naumburg and service as visitor in Ducal Saxony after the death of Duke George (1539), Protestant leader in Halle (1541–46), evangelical preacher in Hildesheim (1547), court preacher for Duke Ernest in Coburg (1552), organizer of the Lutheran Church in Regensburg (1552), and superintendent at Eislefeld (1553–55).

Bibliography: Der Briefwechsel der Justus Jonas, ed. G. KAWERAU, 2 v. (Halle 1884–85). W. DELIUS, Justus Jonas, 1493–1555 (Berlin 1952). Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart<sup>3</sup>, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:856. M. E. LEHMANN, Justus Jonas, Loyal Reformer (Minneapolis 1963).

[L. W. SPITZ]

JONAS OF BOBBIO

Hagiographer; b. Susa, in Piedmont, c. 600; d. after 665. He entered the abbey of BOBBIO in 618, about three years after the death of the Irish missionary abbot, COLUMBAN. Here Jonas served as secretary to abbots ATHALA OF BOBBIO (d. 626) and BERTULF OF BOBBIO (d. 639). He also knew another companion of St. Columban, St. EUSTACE OF LUXEUIL. Jonas spent three years

(639–642) as a missionary with St. AMANDUS in the north of France. From his writings it is evident that he traveled extensively; at the request of Clotar III he visited Chalon-sur-Saône. After 650 Jonas seems never to have returned to Bobbio. In 652 and 653 he served temporarily as abbot of Saint-Amand-les-Eaux and was still alive in 665. Most of our information about Jonas comes from the autobiographical asides in his writings. Jonas's works include a life of Bishop VEDAST OF ARRAS, [Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826—) 3:406–413] and a life of abbot JOHN OF RÉOMÉ (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 3:505–517). His principal work, a life of St. Columban, undertaken on orders from Bertulf, was completed only after the abbot's death (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 4:61–152). The first of its two books is an account of the founder based on information Jonas gathered in his travels and on interviews with those who knew the saint. The second book is primarily an account of St. Columban's successors: Athala and Bertulf at Bobbio, Eustace at LUXEUIL. As a hagiographer Jonas reflects the shortcomings of the age and the genre: disregard for chronology, preoccupation with the miraculous, and decadence in language and grammar. On the other hand, Jonas did make an effort to ascertain facts, and generally shows himself a reliable reporter.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CARBOL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 7.2:2631–41. W. WATTENBACH Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Vorzeit und Karolinger, Hefte 1–4, ed. W. LEVISON and H. LÖWE (Weimar 1952–63) 1:133–134.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

JONAS OF ORLÉANS

Frankish bishop, theological writer; b. Aquitaine, before 780; d. Orléans, 843. Jonas, whose name is connected with the questions of veneration of images and Church-State relations, succeeded THEODULF as bishop of Orléans in 818 and governed that see for 25 years during the reigns of LOUIS THE PIOUS and CHARLES THE BALD. He was active in the reform synods of 825 to 837. He opposed his fellow bishops AGOBARD OF LYONS and EBBO OF REIMS. Jonas left three treatises [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 106:117–387]: De institutione laicali, on the moral duties of married persons; an untitled work on the duties of monarchs, given the title De institutione regia by later editors; and De cultu imaginum, on the veneration of images. De institutione laicali and De institutione regia are companion pieces, similar in approach and style. Jonas wrote the first at the request of Matfrid, Count of Orléans. The second was written for the instruction of Pepin, young King of Aquitaine, son of Louis the Pious. Neither contains much original material. Jonas followed the typical pre-scholastic practice of employing a chain of passages from Scripture and the Fathers, with only transitional and connective comment. In the treatise for Matfrid, Jonas discusses, among other things, the dominant vices of the laity: delay of repentance, with the presumptuous hope of getting into Purgatory; receiving Holy Communion only at the great feasts; postponement of Extreme Unction for the dying; excessive preoccupation with gambling, hunting, and dogs; and cursing, lying, and worldliness. In the treatise for King Pepin, Jonas explains what it is to be a king, what the king must do and avoid, what is properly his office. The king must reward good citizens, punish criminals, suppress crime, and care for the poor. His justice will be a support to the throne, while injustice will overthrow it. De cultu imaginum was written on commission of Emperor Louis against the views of bishop CLAUDIUS OF TURIN. It is in three books: on images, on the veneration of the cross, and on pilgrimages and the invocation of saints. Jonas apparently tried to steer a middle course between ICONOCLASM and image worship. He held that IMAGES properly are for the adornment of churches, for commemoration, and for the instruction of the faithful. He rejected excessive and superstitious cults amounting to adoration.

Bibliography: JONAS OF ORLÉANS, Les Idées politico-religieuses . . ., ed. J. REVIRON (Paris 1930). M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 1:374–380. W. WATTENBACH Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Vorzeit und Karolinger, Hefte 1–4, ed. W. LEVISON and H. LÖWE (Weimar 1952–63) 3:311ff. Beih. 9. A. GARCIA MARTINEZ, "El primer tratado político-religioso del siglo IXe tratado de institutione regia del obispo aquitano Jonas de Orléans," Crisis 4 (Madrid 1957) 239–264.

[C. E. SHEEDY]

JONATUS, ST.

Benedictine; d. c. 691. He was a disciple of St. AMANDUS, the Apostle of the Belgians, by whom he was summoned to come from the Abbey of Elnon to serve as abbot over the monks of the double monastery of Marchiennes, near Douai. The nuns of this house were governed by St. Rictrudis.

Feast: Aug. 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 1:70–75. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 8:12. Miraculum, ed. E. SACKUR, in Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 15 (1890) 448–452. A. M. ZIMMER-

MANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:523–525.

[O. L. KAPSNER]

JONES, EDWARD, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Diocese of St. Asaph, Wales; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered in Fleet Street, London, England, May 6, 1590. When Jones, raised as an Anglican, was convicted of the truth of the Catholic faith, he migrated to Rheims where he was received into the Church in 1587 and ordained priest the following year. He immediately returned to England to exercise his ministry. He was arrested (1590) in a Fleet Street shop by a man pretending to be a Catholic, imprisoned in the Tower of London, and tortured into admitting his priesthood. At his trial he skillfully pled that a confession elicited under duress was not legally sufficient to ensure a conviction. Although the court complimented him on his courageous bearing, he was nevertheless convicted of high treason for entering England as an illegally ordained priest. He was executed immediately—across from the grocer's shop where he had been captured. Jones was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), I, 168–69. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JONES, JOHN ST.

Franciscan priest and martyr; alias Buckley; b. Clynog Fawr, Caernarvonshire, June 1559; d. St. Thomas Waterings, Southwark, July 12, 1598. He joined the Franciscans at Pontoise (France) or at Rome, where in 1591 he was certainly a member of the community at the convent of S. Maria in Ara Coeli. In 1592 he left for the English mission and appears to have worked mostly in London, where he became a close friend of Henry GARNET, who praised his religious spirit and zeal. Arrested in 1597, he was kept a prisoner for a year, during which time he or John Gerard reconciled John RIGBY to the Church. He was indicted in February of 1598 along with Robert Barnes, a Wiltshire gentleman, and Jane Wiseman of Braddocks, Essex. Probably for lack of evidence, the trial was postponed until June 30. The charge against Jones was that, as a priest ordained overseas, he had returned to minister in his native country; his two co-defendants were charged with sheltering him. Present in court was Richard Topcliffe, the pursuivant, who had assured his agent, Nicholas Jones, that he would give him Barnes's property in return for his assistance in securing the priest's condemnation. The chief witness against the prisoners was Nicholas Jones's wife, Anne Bellamy, the betrayer of Robert Southwell. In spite of a brilliant defense, Barnes was condemned; Jane Wiseman, who refused to plead, was sentenced to peine forte (the death suffered by Margaret CLITHEROW); Jones was found guilty of exercising his priesthood contrary to statute. The place chosen for Jones's execution was St. Thomas Waterings on the Old Kent Road, once the first halting place of pilgrims from London to the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket in Canterbury. Because the hangman forgot his rope, the execution was delayed an hour. Jones prayed, and addressing the waiting crowd, he protested that he had never in his life entertained any thought of treason against his queen or country and declared that Topcliffe's cruelty had "been sufficient to make [the Queen] odious to all priests in the kingdom." His head was displayed in Southwark and his members in the Lambeth and Newington roads. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929 and canonized on Oct. 25, 1970, as one of the Martyrs of ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES.

Feast: July 12; Oct. 25; May 4.

Bibliography: Publications of the Catholic Record Society 5:14, 362–375. J. E. PAUL, Blessed John Jones (Postulation pamphlet; London 1960). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 3:87. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time (New York 1961) 3:657–660. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924).

[G. FITZ HERBERT]

JONES, WILLIAM AMBROSE

Bishop, missionary; b. Cambridge, New York, July 21, 1865; d. Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Feb. 17, 1921. After joining the Augustinians in 1886 at Villanova, Pennsylvania, he made his religious profession on Feb. 6, 1887, and was ordained in Philadelphia by Archbishop Patrick J. Ryan in 1890. Having been assigned first to parishes in Philadelphia and Atlantic City, New Jersey, he was master of novices and clerics at Villanova from 1896 to 1899. Following the Spanish–American War an appeal was made for American clerics to go to Cuba, and Jones was sent to Havana in January of 1899 to take charge of an old church called San Agustín (Spanish Au-gustinians had been in Cuba since the early 17th century). Two years later he opened the Colegio San Agustín, and in 1903 he assumed care of the church known as El Cristo. Jones's Cuban mission later developed into three parishes and a pontifical university (St. Thomas of Villanova, which was confiscated by the Castro government in April 1961). In 1906 he was appointed bishop of San Juan, Puerto Rico. When he was consecrated in Havana on Feb. 24, 1907, he became the second American bishop in Puerto Rico, succeeding James H. Blenk, SM (1899–1906).

[A. J. ENNIS]

JONG, JOHANNES DE

Cardinal (1946), ecclesiastical historian; b. Nes, Ameland Island, Netherlands, Sept. 10, 1885; d. Amersfoort, Netherlands, Sept. 8, 1955. After ordination (1908) he studied in Rome, where he received a Doctorate in Philosophy from the Academy of St. Thomas Aquinas (1910) and a Doctorate in Sacred Theology from the Gregorian University (1911). In 1914 he became professor of ecclesiastical history in the major seminary in Rijsenburg, and in 1931, rector. His lectures there resulted in a textbook, Handboek voor de Kerkgeschiedenis (2 v., 1929–31; 5th ed. in 5 v., revised by R. Post and G. Abbink, 1962—). De Jong was appointed coadjutor (1935) to archbishop J. H. G. Jansen of Utrecht and succeeded to the archdiocese upon Jansen's resignation (1936). During the German occupation of the Netherlands (1940–45) non-Catholics as well as Catholics acknowledged De Jong as the leader in resistance to encroachments on liberty. The archbishop's protests against the dissolution of the Catholic Worker's Association (1941) and the persecution of Jews clearly manifested this leadership. De Jong, in poor health since 1944, retired in 1951 and was succeeded by Bernard Alfrink, who had become his coadjutor a few weeks previously.

Bibliography: H. W. F. AUKESS, Kardinaal de Jong (Utrecht 1956), with a list of De J.'s writings.

[A. G. WEILER]

JORDAN, EDWARD BENEDICT

Professor, author; b. Dunmore, Pennsylvania, Dec. 17, 1884; d. Washington, D.C., July 19, 1951. He was the son of Patrick F. and Bridget (O'Hara) Jordan. After completing his undergraduate studies at St. Thomas College, Scranton, Pennsylvania (1903) and Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Maryland (1905), he attended the Propaganda University, Rome, receiving the Doctorate in Sacred Theology in 1909. He was ordained the same year, and appointed to the faculty of Mt. St. Mary's College, where from 1910 to 1921 he served successively as professor of biology, professor of education, and vice president. In 1921 he came to Washington, D.C., as an instructor in the department of education at The Catholic University of America. He was promoted to the rank of associate professor in 1926, named a domestic prelate by Pius XI in 1936, and became head of the department in 1941. He served also as dean of the Catholic Sisters College after 1936 and was made national director of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae in 1943. That same year he was appointed vice rector of The Catholic University, a post he held until his death. Jordan's writings included translations of Franz de Hovre's works, Philosophy and Education (1931) and Catholicism in Education (1934). At a time when the views of John Dewey and his school were influencing American education, these treatises provided Catholic teachers and students with useful expositions of fundamental principles. Jordan also wrote monographs on the theory of evolution and the philosophy of education.

[E. KEVANE]

JORDAN, FRANCIS MARY OF THE CROSS

Religious founder; b. Gurtweil (Baden), Germany, June 16, 1848; d. Tafers, Switzerland, Sept. 8, 1918. After seminary studies in Freiburg im Breisgau, he was ordained (1878). Interest in Oriental studies led to his extended visit to the Holy Land (1880). Upon returning to Rome he founded the SALVATORIANS to combat modern evils and to circumvent the religious restrictions imposed by the KULTURKAMPF. Jordan and two other priests pronounced their religious vows on Dec. 8, 1881. At this time the founder, whose baptismal name was John Baptist, took the name Francis Mary of the Cross. Jordan's original aim was to form a loosely knit group of priests, but he deferred to the wishes of Rome and reorganized his society into a congregation of priests and brothers. As superior general until 1915, Jordan witnessed the spread of the Salvatorians to several countries. He visited the U.S. and established the first permanent foundation in this country at St. Nazianz, Wisconsin. In 1883 Jordan organized a community of religious women whose superior was Mother Petra Streitel. This group was the nucleus of the FRANCISCAN SISTERS OF THE SORROWFUL MOTHER, organized into a new congregation in 1885. In 1888 Jordan cooperated with Mother Mary of the Apostles to found the Sisters of the DIVINE SAVIOR, who were to aid the Salvatorians in their labors. The decretum super scripta in Jordan's cause for beatification was issued in 1956.

Bibliography: F. M. JORDAN, Exhortations and Admonitions, tr. W. HERBST (2d ed. St. Nazianz, Wisconsin 1946). P. PFEIFFER, Father Francis Mary of the Cross Jordan, tr. W. HERBST (St. Nazianz, Wisconsin 1936).

[R. MOLLEN]

JORDAN, THE

Forming one of the world's most remarkable water-courses, the Jordan Valley traverses the entire length of Palestine from north to south. The etymology of the word Jordan is uncertain; some scholars favor an Indo-Aryan origin composed of yor-don, "year-river," i.e., "perennial river," but most hold that it is derived from the Semitic yārad, "to descend," which is more descriptive, for no valley or river descends deeper than the Jordan (yardēn in Hebrew).

Geology and Geography. The wide, arid Jordan depression is part of the larger geological trough known as the Great Rift Valley, which runs from northern Syria, through the Jordan Valley, the DEAD SEA, the Araba in the south, down through the Gulf of Aqaba and the RED SEA, to Lake Nyasa in East Africa—a distance of more than 3,000 miles. Some 30 million years ago, probably during the Miocene Age when the main mountain-forming changes occurred in the Near East, two parallel faults in the earth's crust developed, and as the hills shoved higher on either side, the depression between these faults continued sinking along the same line of weakness. In Palestine a large inland sea formed, which for a time extended even into the trans-Jordan region. However, because of the elevation of the Wādi el-'Arabah in the south it did not join with the Gulf of Aqaba. After the last Pluvial period in Palestine, the water flooding the valley receded to the three natural basins of the valley floor, thus creating the present Lake Huleh, the Sea of GALILEE, and the Dead Sea. These bodies of water are of markedly different altitudes, and each is fed in turn by the waters of the Jordan River flowing into the valley from the region of Mount Hermon.

The streams that cascade from the slopes and foothills of this majestic mountain meet in the marshy area approximately seven miles above Lake Huleh to form the Jordan proper. Lake Huleh is a small, triangular body of water 230 feet above sea level; it serves as the river's first pause on its rapid descent southward. Although well known to Jesus and the Apostles, who traveled as far north as CAESAREA PHILIPPI (ancient Paneas), the lake is not mentioned in the Bible. From Lake Huleh to the Sea of Galilee, which lies 695 feet below sea level, is a distance of not more than ten miles. The river tumbles and cascades vigorously, cutting a gorge in the black basalt rock left by volcanic activity of previous ages and then flows through a delta into the Sea of Galilee. This beautiful lake, which for the Christian evokes such vivid memories of the Master and his fishermen Disciples, measures 13 miles long and about seven miles wide.

Francis Mary of the Cross Jordan.

Leaving the lake and the verdant Galilean countryside the Jordan descends swiftly again. The valley is now called by the Arabs el-Ghor, which may best be translated as "the canyon." In the central strip the ancient sea bed lies exposed and has been severely eroded, so that qattarah hills (mounds and gullies of whitish-gray marl and clay) create the very real effect of typical badlands. The river itself has cut a deep channel through this alluvial deposit, and here in the "river bottom" one finds a sort of jungle inhabited by wild life, which in ancient times included large animals such as the lion (Jer 49.19). It is still heavily thicketed and is called in Arabic ez-Zor (the thicket). As one goes further south the valley narrows. The rapid waters of the Jordan swirl and twist as though trying to escape the destiny that awaits them in the Dead Sea. From the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea is a distance of 65 miles, but the Jordan, looping constantly, covers more than three times that distance.

Pilgrims baptised in Jordan River, Galilee. (©Richard T. Nowitz/CORBIS)

From the east the Jordan is joined by two important tributaries, the Yarmuk and the Jaboc (Jabbok). These streams, which today are used extensively for irrigation by the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, equal the Jordan proper in volume of water. Both are perennial and flow through mighty canyons of their own. Below the Jaboc the valley widens again until at JERICHO it is some 12 miles across. Owing to the high temperatures of the Jericho Plain, caused by the sub-sea level situation, tropical fruits and vegetables respond readily to irrigation. The Jordan River meanders through this plain and finally forms a sizeable delta as it dumps its muddy waters into the deep, salty reservoir of the Dead Sea. The Dead Sea is 1,286 feet below sea level—the lowest point on the surface of the earth.

History and Typology. There is abundant evidence that in prehistoric times the Jordan Valley was dotted by large and small settlements and that a thriving civilization flourished. Archeological surveys made of numerous sites by Nelson Glueck, especially on the eastern side of the valley and at the delta junctures of the Jordan tributaries, as well as the truly astonishing excavations at Tell es-Sulṭān (ancient Jericho) under the direction of Kathleen Kenyon, have dramatized the importance of this valley in man's first efforts toward an agricultural and sedentary way of life. The primitive settlement at Jericho, the oldest known city in the world, dates back to c. 7800 B.C. (plus or minus 210 years), as evidenced by carbon-14 tests.

The Jordan is referred to more than 200 times in the Bible. It is particularly with the conquest of Canaan by the Israelite tribes, as popularly told in the Book of JOSHUA, that the Jordan enters historically and symbolically into the life of Israel. The story of Moses and the Exodus is continued in the account of the Israelites crossing miraculously dry-shod through the Jordan River, storming the walled city of Jericho, and entering into the land of promise. However, it was only in the Christian era that the full typology of the Jordan was developed. The early Church Fathers, particularly of the Alexandrian school, insisted that the crossing of the Jordan into the land of promise is as deeply symbolic of Christian initiation as the crossing of the Red Sea out of the land of bondage. The story of Elijah (2 Kgs 2.11) and the account of Naaman the Syrian (2 Kgs 2.12) were frequently used in a baptismal context.

Turning to the New Testament, the Gospels begin with the scene of JOHN THE BAPTIST, a man from the desert near the Jordan, preaching repentance and baptizing the people in the river. The Christian rite of Baptism owes much to the practice of the Baptist and the ascetical communities in the area. See BAPTISM (IN THE BIBLE). Today there is a little shrine-chapel on the banks of the Jordan not far from Jericho that commemorates the BAPTISM OF CHRIST by John.

Also, an allusion to the Jordan as a symbol of redemption is made in Matthew ch. 19–20 (also possibly in Jn 10.40–42, where Jesus, like Josue, waits three days before crossing the Jordan to raise his friend Lazarus): Jesus, traveling from Galilee to Jerusalem for the last time, proceeds slowly through the territories on the far side of the Jordan, then crosses the river at Jericho and ascends to the Holy City, where the Passover would be realized fully in His own death and Resurrection.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1205–08. K. HÖPF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1118–19. F. M. ABEL, Géographie de la Palestine, 2 v. (Paris 1933–38) 1:161–178. D. BALY, The Geography of the Bible (New York 1957) 193–216. E. G. KRAELING, Rand McNally Bible Atlas (2d ed. New York 1962) 25–27. C. KOPP, The Holy Places of the Gospels, tr. R. WALLS (New York 1963) 99–103. J. DANIELOU, The Bible and the Liturgy (South Bend, Ind. 1956) 86–113, for typology.

[J. W. RAUSCH]

JORDAN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan is a small Arab country of the Middle East, bordered on the south and east by Saudi Arabia, on the northeast by Iraq, and on the north by Syria and the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights. To the west, the Jordan River provides a natural boundary with Israel and separates Jordan from the Israeli-occupied West Bank, which has been claimed as a Palestinian homeland since the mid-20th century. Largely comprised of arid desert that stretches westward from Saudi Arabia, Jordan's landscape rises to highlands in the west before descending to the Great Rift Valley lining the Jordan River. Al'Aqabah, a port city, is located in the south, on the coast of the gulf of 'Aqaba. Despite the limited supply of fresh water, the country's rainy season allows for the production of wheat, barley, olives, and citrus fruits, while natural resources include phosphates, potash, and small amounts of shale oil. Among Jordan's main exports are fertilizers, phosphates, and manufactured goods.

After gaining independence from Great Britain in 1946, Jordan instituted a parliamentary government with

Capital: Amman.  Size: 37,737 sq. miles.  Population: 4,998,560 in 2000.  Languages: Arabic; English is widely understood among the upper classes.  Religions: 4,598,678 Muslims (92%), 69,971 Catholics (1%), 74,970 Protestants (1.5%), 32,490 others. a hereditary monarch. The vast majority of the population is Arab, though there are small groups of Circassians and Armenians. Most residents of Jordan are Sunni Muslim.
--

Catholics in Jordan are divided between Greek Orthodox, the majority, and Latin-rite. Ecclesiastically, a vicariate for the Latin-rite located in Amman is governed by the Patriarchate of Jerusalem, with its seat at Palestine, while the Melkite Greek Catholic Church's Archdiocese of Petra and Filadelfia is located in Amman. A large part of the Promised Land of Biblical times as well as all of ancient Edom, Galaad, and Moab lies within the borders of the country. The spiritual capital of Jordan is the Old City of Jerusalem, sacred to Muslims and Christians alike. Wadi Al-Kharrar, a site on the east bank of the Jordan River that is thought by many Christian historians to be the site of the baptism of Jesus, was prepared by the Jordanian government and opened to the public as part of Jubilee 2000.

Until the 20th century, the lands of Jordan spanned both sides of the Jordan River, its western boundary extending to the Dead Sea. Amman, the nation's capital, was known in OT times as Rabbah or Rabbath-Ammon, capital city of the AMMONITES, and in the Greco-Roman period as Filadelfia, the southernmost city of the DECAPO-LIS. In 1998 archeologists working in Ayla discovered the remains of what was judged to be the oldest Christian church in the world, a Roman structure that dated to A.D. 350. In A.D. 636 the region was invaded by the Muslims; the OTTOMAN TURKS assumed control from 1517 to 1918. Between 1918 and 1949 the lands east of the JORDAN RIVER were known as the Emirate—later the Kingdom of Transjordan—while those to the west, together with the modern State of Israel (created in 1948), formed the British-mandated territory of PALESTINE.

On May 25, 1946, Jordan gained its independence from Great Britain. Between 1953 and 1999 the country was ruled by King Hussein, who guided the nation through several turbulent decades as pressures from the world's superpowers and the age-old tensions between Arab nations flared. In 1989 Hussein instituted parliamentary elections, after which the government grew increasingly liberal. In 1994 Jordan signed an historic peace treaty with Israel. Praised by the pope, the agreement ended decades of armed conflict. Reconciliation of the status of the West Bank had yet to be decided, although the Vatican signed an agreement of recognition and enumeration of rights with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat in February 2000.

Although Islam was declared the official state religion, Jordan's 1952 constitution guaranteed the freedom of most religious faiths and of the right to worship in the three recognized faiths: Islam, Christianity, and Judaism. In 1976 Pope Paul VI's visit to the holy sites in Jordan did much to encourage stronger relations between King Hussein and the Vatican. In 1980 the Church was given the right to teach the faith in its own schools, and in 1997 the government began providing Christian education in public schools where it was requested. While Christian religious tribunals and other church-run programs operating in Jordan were extended the same rights and freedoms as were Islamic ones, evangelization activities were prohibited as in violation of Islamic law. In addition to Roman Catholics, Jordan had groups of Greek Orthodox, Greek Melkite Catholics, Armenian Orthodox, and Maronite Catholics living within its borders. A number of small evangelical Christian churches were denied classification by the Ministry of Justice as legitimate religions. Jordan established diplomatic relations with the Holy See in 1994; in 2000 there were 64 Catholic parishes located within the country.

On Feb. 8, 1999, King Hussein died and was succeeded by his son, Abdullah II. The following September the new Jordanian king traveled to the Vatican for an audience with Pope John Paul II, during which time a papal visit to Jordan was planned. On March 20, 2000, the pope arrived in Amman as part of a trip to the Holy Land. During a Latin-rite mass in Amman that was attended by over 35,000 people, the Pope honored both St. John the Baptist, the patron saint of Jordan, and the late King Hussein for his efforts in advancing the Middle East peace process. He also spoke of his wish that all believers realize themselves to be “one people and one single family” and acknowledged each of the Catholic community’s leaders by commending their “noble tradition of respect for all religions.” As a country with large-scale external debt (estimated at $8.4 billion in 1998), Jordan was among those nations receiving the help of Pope John Paul II in encouraging wealthy nations to forgive a portion of these payments.

The Treasury is the first building a visitor sees coming through the Siq, a canyon, which leads to Petra, Jordan. (©Wolfgang Kaehler/CORBIS)

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde 2:540–545. Jordan Ministry of Economy, Department of Statistics, First Census of Population and Housing (Amman 1962—).

[A. A. DI LELLA/EDS.]

JORDAN FORZATÈ, BL.

B. Padua, Italy, c. 1158; d. Venice, 1248. After studying law, he became a CAMALDOLESE monk and was later prior of San Benedetto Novello in Padua, which he began rebuilding in 1195. GREGORY IX appointed him (1231) examiner in the canonization process for ANTHONY OF PADUA. During FREDERICK II’s struggle with the popes, Jordan, as doctor decretalium (see DECRETALISTS) of the city council of Padua, played a crucial role in the quarrel. Imprisoned by Ezzelino III of Romagna in 1237, he was freed by Frederick two years later and took refuge in Aquileia. He went finally to the monastery Della Celestia in Venice. His body was moved in 1810 to the cathedral of Padua.

Feast: Aug. 7 (Padua, Treviso, Praglia).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 2:200–214. C. I. BERNARDI, Il beato Giordano F. (Treviso 1930). I. ROSA, Il beato Giordano F. (Padua 1932). The Book of Saints (4th ed. New York 1947) 343.

[M. CSÁKY]

JORDAN OF GIANO

Franciscan chronicler; b. Giano, in the valley of Spoleto, Italy, c. 1195; d. Magdeburg, Germany (where he is buried), after 1262. He entered the order in 1217 or 1218, when he was probably already a deacon. Toward the end of September 1221 he went to Germany with CAESARIUS OF SPEYER; he was ordained in 1223, and from 1224 to 1239, was custos of the order in Thuringia. In 1230 and again in 1238 he was sent by his superiors to Rome, becoming involved in the difficulties with ELIAS OF CORTONA. In 1241 he was provincial vicar of Bohemia-Poland, where he lived through the Tartar invasion, of which he gave a good account in his letters. In 1242 he was provincial vicar of Saxony. The provincial chapter commissioned him (1262) to put into writing his recollections of the foundations of the order in Germany. His chronicle, dictated to Brother BALDWIN OF BRANDENBURG, runs from 1207 to 1262 and was continued as the provincial chronicle of Saxony until the end of the 15th century. Although partly anecdotal, betraying the weaknesses and lacunae that often mar the efforts of old age, it is still an important source for the early history of the order.

Bibliography: Chronica, ed. H. BOEHMER (Paris 1908). Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores (Berlin 1826—) 28:208–211. E. J. AUWEILER, The “Chronica fratris Jordani a Giano” (Washington 1917). L. HARDICK, ed., Nach Deutschland und England (Werl 1957).

[L. HARDICK]

JORDAN OF QUEDLINBURG

Augustinian scholar and author; b. Quedlinburg, Saxony, Germany, c. 1300; d. Vienna, Austria, 1380. He was a student of HENRY OF FRIEMAR, of Hermann of Halle (d. 1334), and of Prosper of Reggio (c. 1318). He lectured in the Augustinian monasteries of Erfurt and Magdeburg and in other German houses of the order, including the provincial of Saxony from 1341 to 1351, where he was instrumental in the reorganization of the AUGUSTINIANS and in their transformation into a MENDICANT ORDER. The difficulties of this undertaking are partly recorded in his writings. However, his chief influence lies in his spirituality, for he was considered to be a master of the spiritual life. He deplored the ascetic exaggerations that were typical of his times; his writings reflect the strong influence of German MYSTICISM on his thought. He was also renowned as a preacher, and collections of his sermons were widely used during the late Middle Ages. Perhaps his most important work, one of the most celebrated ascetical treatises of the 14th century, was the Vitasfratrum (Rome 1587), which influenced the spiritual reform of the order and provides valuable evidence of its early history. It is disputed whether he lived and died in Vienna; indeed, some scholars have placed his death in Vienne, France. However, many important Augustinians connected with him were members of the Viennese convent, attracted there by the new University of VIENNA, founded in 1365.

Bibliography: Works. Liber vitasfratrum, ed. R. ARBESMANN and W. HÜMPFNER (New York 1943). Opus postillarum et sermonum de tempore (Strasbourg 1483). Sermones de sanctis (Paris 1484). Collectanea seu Speculum Augustinianum (Paris 1686). Tractatus de spiritu libertatis (lost). Expositio dominicae orationis (manuscript). Literature. R. LIEVENS, J. van Quedlinburg in de Nederlanden (Ghent 1958). F. RENNHOFFER, Die Augustiner-Eremiten in Wien (Würzburg 1956). A. ZUMKELLER in Sanctus Augustinus vitae spiritualis magister, 2 v. (Rome 1959) v.2. E. SAAK, "Quidlibet christianus. Saints and Society in the Sermons of Jordan of Quedlinburg OESA," in Models of Holiness in Medieval Sermons (Louvain-la-Neuve 1996) 317–338; "The Creation of Augustinian Identity in the Later Middle Ages, Parts I and II," Augustiniana 49 (1999) 109–164, 251–286.

[W. M. PLÖCHL]

JORDAN OF SAXONY, BL.

Second master general of the Order of Preachers; b. date unknown, apparently in the ancient Diocese of Mainz; d. in shipwreck returning from the Holy Land, Feb. 13, 1237. Jordan received the Dominican habit in Paris on Ash Wednesday, 1220, where he was a lecturer at the University of Paris. In 1221 he was named provincial of the Lombardy Province, the greatest province of the Order at that time. Less than a year later he succeeded St. Dominic as master general. He travelled frequently between Paris and Bologna, the two most important seats of European learning, visiting the convents of the various provinces, strengthening and enlarging them. In these travels he drew many vocations to the Order through his preaching and teaching. He is said to have brought more than 1,000 candidates into the Order himself.

His literary work is accepted as that of a master of letters. He is renowned for the spiritual letters of direction he addressed to Bl. Diana d'Andalo and her community at the Monastery of St. Agnes in Bologna. These letters are still used by spiritual directors. His influence left a deep impression on the constitutions of the Order of Preachers. He was the outstanding historian of the early days of the Order and the first biographer of St. Dominic. Historians continue to use his Libellus de principiis Ordinis Praedicatorum. His 15 years as master general enabled him to develop most of the machinery needed for the governing of provinces and to perfect the general government of the entire Order.

Jordan initiated the Dominican tradition of singing the Salve Regina at the end of the Dominican liturgical day, as well as at the side of a dying friar. The possibility of his identification with Jordanus Nemorarius, the mathematician, has been discussed by historians, most of whom reject it.

Feast: Feb. 15.

Bibliography: M. ARON, Saint Dominic's Successor (St. Louis 1955). G. VANN, To Heaven with Diana! A Study of Jordan of Saxony and Diana d'Andalo, with a Translation of the Letters of Jordan (New York 1960). H. C. SCHEEBEN, Beiträge zur Geschichte Jordans von Sachsen (Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte des Dominikanerordens in Deutschland 35; Vechte 1938). B. ALTANER, Die Briefe Jordans von Sachsen, des zweiten Dominikanergenerals, 1222–37 (Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte des Dominikanerordens in Deutschland 20; Leipzig 1925).

[E. M. ROGERS]

JORIS, DAVID

Visionary Dutch religious leader who combined elements of pacifist, revolutionary, and spiritualist Anabaptist teachings and whose followers (Jorists) survived in Holland and North Germany into the 17th century; b. Bruges or Ghent, Flanders, 1501?; d. Basel, Switzerland, Aug. 25, 1556. A painter of stained-glass windows, he joined the Anabaptist movement early. While rejecting revolution, he nevertheless accepted the apocalyptic expectations of the revolutionaries. Mystic visions led him to claim to be the "third David," sent to complete the work of the second (Christ). After years of persecution, he and many of his followers found refuge in Basel (1543), where he used an assumed name (Jan van Brugge) and pretended adherence to the Reformed faith. He continued his prolific production of mystical writings, which were published in Holland (Wonder Book, 1542, 1551). After his death, disputes among his adherents led to an investigation that resulted in the exhumation of his corpse, which was burned at the stake in 1559. This led to the saying, "If Basel would burn her heretics alive, she would not have the trouble of digging them up." His Basel adherents, who recanted, were not molested.

Bibliography: R. H. BAINTON, David Joris, Wiedertäufer und Kämpfer für Toleranz im 16. Jahrhundert (Leipzig 1937); The Travail of Religious Liberty (Philadelphia 1951). G. H. WILLIAMS, The Radical Reformation (Philadelphia 1962). E. HAMMERSCHMIDT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1122.

[G. W. FORELL]

JORNET E IBARS, TERESA, BL.

Foundress of the LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR AND AGED; b. Aytona (Lérida), Spain, Jan. 9, 1843; d. Liria (Valencia), Aug. 26, 1897. Teresa, the daughter of pious peasants, joined the Poor Clares, but ill health soon compelled her to return home. With the cooperation of Saturnino López Novoa, a priest, she founded her religious congregation to provide care and solace for the aged. Together with ten companions, Teresa of Jesus (as she was known in religion) took the habit at Barbastro (Huesca) but soon transferred the mother-house to Valencia, where it remains. She continued as superior general until her death, by which time the institute had 103 houses. By 1961 it had 3,079 members and 201 houses and had spread to several countries, including the U.S. Papal approval came in 1887. Teresa was noted for her affability, kindness, and devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary. She was beatified April 27, 1958.

Feast: Aug. 26.

Bibliography: E. PIETROMARCHI, La Beata Teresa de Jesus: Jornet e Ibars (Rome 1958). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 50 (1958) 322–325. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 13:196–197.

[I. BASTARRIKA]

JOSAPHAT KUNCEVYČ, ST.

“Apostle of Union” and martyr; b. Włodzimir, then in the Polish Province of Wolyn, c. 1580–82; d. Witebsk, Nov. 12, 1623. Sent to Wilno as an apprentice tradesman, he came under the influence of those clergy adhering to the Union of BREST, entered a Basilian monastery (1604), and was ordained in 1609. He achieved quick advancement in his order through his ability as a speaker and the example of his zealous religious life. His success in winning adherents to the cause of the Union brought him the bishopric of Witebsk in 1617, with the right of succession to the archbishopric of Polotsk. In his new capacity, his efforts on behalf of the Union were so successful that within a short time the greater part of the Orthodox within Lithuania were won to the Union and the position of the Church greatly improved; however, as a result of the efforts of Peter Sahaidachny, the leader of the Cossacks, a new Orthodox hierarchy was named in Lithuania and a more effective opposition to the activities of the Eastern Catholics was organized, directed primarily against Kuncevyč and his followers. Despite the fact that King Sigismund III wavered in his support of the Eastern Catholics during this phase of the struggle with the schismatics, Kuncevyč succeeded in holding his own and even in having Meletiĭ SMOTRYTS'KYĪ, the newly named Orthodox archbishop of Polotsk, deposed. Shortly thereafter, Kuncevyč suffered a martyr's death at the hands of an enraged mob during a sharp outbreak against the Eastern Catholics of Witebsk. His remains were recovered from the Dnieper River and interred at Biala, in Podlasie. Kuncevyč was beatified in 1643 and canonized in 1867.

Feast: Nov. 12 (formerly 14).

Bibliography: S. Josaphat Hieromartyr, documenta romana beatificationis et canonizationis, ed. A. G. WELYKYJ, 2 v. (Rome 1952–55). N. CONTIERI, Vita di S. Giosafat arcivescovo e martire Ruteno dell' ordine di S. Basilio il Grande (Rome 1867). G. HOFFMANN, “Der hl. Josaphat,” Orientalia Christiana, 1 (1923) 297–320; 3 (1924–25) 173–239. A. GUÉPIN, Un Apôtre de l'union des églises au XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle: St. Josaphat et l'église gréco-slave en Pologne et en Russie, 2 v. (Rome 1897). T. BORESKY, Life of St. Josaphat (New York 1955). Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 15 (1923) 49–63. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:337–340. Cambridge History of Poland, ed. W. F. REDDAWAY et al., 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1941–50) v.1.

[E. KUSIELEWICZ]

JOSCIO, BL.

Monk at SAINT-BERTIN, near Saint-Omer, diocese of Arras, France, also known as Josbert, Joscius, or Valbertus; d. there, apparently Nov. 30, 1163 (or 1186). According to legendary material incorporated into the Speculum Maius by VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS (8.116), five roses were said to have sprouted from Joscio's head at his death. Each carried a letter of the name Maria. THOMAS OF CANTIMPRÉ in his Bonum universale de apibus (2.29) calls the monk “Josbert” and reports that this miraculous phenomenon took place at Déols (Berry). The monk's grave was under the small choir altar at Saint-Bertin, and the miracle was depicted in the ambulatory of the choir. He received his own feast at Saint-Bertin's in 1619.

Feast: Nov. 30.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Oct. 11 (1864) 793. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 3:375–376. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes 11:1003–04. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 5:1124.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

JOSEPH, ST.

Husband of the Blessed Virgin Mary and father of Jesus Christ by right of marriage and by spiritual and legal ties. The name that he bore, in honor of the Patriarch JOSEPH, son of Jacob, was quite common in his time; cf. Joseph of Arimathea (Mt 27.57), Joseph Barsabbas (Acts 1.23), Joseph Barnabas (Acts 4.36), etc. Except for incidental references to Joseph as being regarded as the father of Jesus (Mt 13.55; Lk 3.23; Jn 1.45; 6.42), the only NT information on Joseph is given in Mt, ch. 1 and 2, and Lk, ch. 1 and 2. On the historical value of these chapters, see INFANCY NARRATIVES.

Life. In Mt 1.6–16, where Joseph's father is called Jacob, his ancestry is traced back to King David through the latter's son Solomon; but in Lk 3.23–32, where Joseph's father is called Heli, his ancestry is traced back to David through the latter's son Nathan. The two lines of descent are thus completely different, except for their convergence at Salathiel and Zorobabel (Mt 1.12; Lk 3.27). The obvious purpose of both lists is to show that Jesus, by being the legal son of Joseph, had a right to be called the "Son of David" (Mt 15.23), a recognized title of the Messiah (Mt 22.42).

Although Joseph was apparently living in Nazareth at the time when he was betrothed to Mary (Lk 1.26–27), he was probably a native of Bethlehem, or at least he owned property there. It was primarily for the sake of property taxes that he was obliged to be registered in the Roman census at Bethlehem, for the Romans would not have been interested in his Davidic descent as such (Lk 2.4). In Mt 13.55 Jesus is called "the son of the τέκτων," while in the parallel passage of Mk 6.3 Jesus Himself is called "the τέκτων." It is possible that the oral tradition represented in Matthew attributed to Joseph what was originally, as in Mark, attributed only to Jesus. But there is no good reason why both father and son should not have had the same trade. In any case, it is commonly taken for granted that Joseph was a τέκτων. This Greek word, like the corresponding Latin word faber, signifies in itself no more than "craftsman, artisan," and could be used of a worker in stone or metal as well as in wood. Yet in actual usage it almost always designated a woodworker, i.e., either a carpenter or cabinetmaker.

Art and popular imagination have usually pictured Joseph as an old man. But this is surely a false idea. The rabbis at the time of Christ commonly taught that men should marry between the ages of 13 and 19, and Joseph, as a "just" (i.e., law-abiding) man, would no doubt have conformed to this practice. Since the Gospels never suggest that he was still living during the public ministry of Jesus, he most likely died before he was 50 years old.

Marriage with Mary. At the time of Jesus' conception and birth Mary was "betrothed" to Joseph (Mt 1.18; Lk 1.27; 2.5). Hebrew "betrothal" was more than engagement in the modern sense, but less than full marriage. It consisted in a formal contract that made the man and woman husband and wife. Conjugal infidelity on the part of the "betrothed" woman was regarded as adultery in the strict sense. The betrothal ceremony was followed after several months by the "wedding," the ceremony in which the man received the woman into his house and consummated the marriage. As related in Mt 1.18–25, Joseph noticed that Mary, while thus betrothed to him, had become pregnant. The Evangelist forewarns the reader that this had happened "by the Holy Spirit." But the whole point of the story is that Joseph himself did not yet know the cause of her pregnancy. "Joseph, her husband, being a just man, and not wishing to expose her to reproach, was minded to put her away privately." The Greek word, δίκαιος, that is here translated as "just," is the equivalent of the Hebrew word, šaddiq, that designates a man who is very conscientious in the observance of the Law, which in the present case would not allow him to consummate a marriage with a woman who had been guilty of adultery during the time of her betrothal.

Stone monument of St. Joseph, Montreal. (©Jan Butchofsky-Houser/CORBIS)

Historically, Joseph's conduct, when he learned of Mary's pregnancy, has had three principal interpretations: (1) that he actually suspected Mary of adultery [e.g., Augustine, Epistolae 153.4, 9 (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 44:2.3, 405)]; (2) that he surmised she was the mother of the Messiah, and he wished to withdraw in humility [e.g., Bernard, Hom. super "Missus est" 2.14 (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 183:68)]; (3) that he was subjected to agonizing perplexity [e.g., F. Suárez, In 3, q. 29, disp. 7.2, 6; Op. om. (Paris 1860) 19.1190]. Traditionally, the third supposition has by far prevailed; namely, that in his uncertainty Joseph strove to obey the law concerning adulterous wives by arranging for a divorce, but that at the time his evident conviction that Mary was somehow innocent led him to decide “to put her away privately” as the only way out of the dilemma. This would have been the type of divorce whereby the reason for it did not have to be revealed.

The angel reassures St. Joseph, detail of a mosaic in the Santa Maria Maggiore, Rome.

After an angel of the Lord revealed to him in a dream the sacred mystery of the virginal conception of Jesus and commanded him “to take Mary as his wife,” he was at once faithful to the responsibility that he had assumed at his betrothal to her, and “he took unto him his wife”; that is, he went through with the second, “wedding,” ceremony, whereby he took her into his house. The Evangelist, however, immediately warns the reader that he did not consummate the marriage: “He did not know her till she brought forth her first-born son.” The only purpose of the latter statement is to insist that Mary was a virgin at the birth of Jesus. It says nothing, one way or the other, regarding the relations between Joseph and Mary after the birth of Jesus. The Catholic doctrine of the perpetual virginity of Mary is based on tradition that goes back to the earliest age of the Church. Although never consummated, the marriage of Joseph and Mary was unquestionably a genuine marriage. On the problem of how Mary could have contracted a true marriage when she, as often supposed by Catholic theologians, had a vow of perpetual virginity, a supposition based erroneously on Lk 1.34, see MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, II (IN THEOLOGY.)

Joseph and the Child Jesus. The commonly held notion that Joseph and Mary arrived at Bethlehem on the day before Jesus was born is almost certainly wrong. The phrase used in Lk 2.6, that Jesus was born “while they were there,” clearly implies that they had been there for some days before His birth. Moreover, the four-day journey from Nazareth to Bethlehem at a time when Mary would have been so close to term supposes unbelievable carelessness on the part of both Joseph and Mary. The statement that “there was no room for them in the inn” at Bethlehem need not imply that they had been turned away by a hardhearted innkeeper. It might just as well mean that the “inn,” a stockade with open alcoves like the modern Near-Eastern khan, was regarded by them as an unfitting place for Mary to give birth to her Son. They therefore withdrew to a cave (rather than a stable) that was ordinarily used as a refuge for cattle, and here Mary laid her newborn Babe on the stone shelf that otherwise served as a feeding trough for the animals.

Luke speaks of Jesus’ “parents” (Lk 2.27, 41, 43), “His father and mother” (2.33), and in Mary’s words, “Thy father and I” (2.48), thus linking Joseph with Mary as a true, though evidently equally virginal, parent of Jesus. As the legal father of Jesus, Joseph exercised the right of naming his Child (Mt 1.21, 25) and, in the opinion of some authors, was the one who circumcised Him at home (Lk 2.21). He was also present at the Purification and Presentation in the temple (Lk 2.22). If the account in Mt ch. 2 is to be harmonized chronologically with this, the visit of the Magi to the Holy Family at Bethlehem must have taken place more than 40 days after the birth of Jesus, because at the departure of the Magi Joseph was warned by an angel to flee with Mary and Jesus into “Egypt”—probably the frontier between Palestine and Egypt, south of ancient Judah (Mt 2.13). Some time later he was told, again in a dream by an angel, to return to the land of Israel (Mt 2.20). Prudently, fearing the tyranny of Herod’s son Archelaus, Joseph went, not to his own town of Bethlehem, as he had first intended, but to Mary’s town of Nazareth (Mt 2.22). There Jesus was subject to him as well as to Mary (Lk 2.51). Each year Joseph and Mary went to Jerusalem for the Feast of the Passover. When Jesus was 12 years old he accompanied them on this journey (for the first time?). When the boy Jesus had remained behind and was found after three days in the temple, Joseph, like Mary, did not understand the deeper messianic import of His words, that they should have known that He would be “at His Father’s” (Lk 2.41–50). This is the last that is known of Joseph from the Gospels. Whatever else legends have imagined is of value only as a token of Christian piety.

Bibliography: U. HOLZMEISTER, De Sancto Ioseph Quaestiones Biblicae (Rome 1945); “De Nuptiis S. Ioseph,” Verbum

Adoration of the Magi, detail of ivory book cover from Metz, late 9th or early 10th century, with Joseph standing behind the chair.

Domini (Rome 1921– ) 25 (1947) 145–149. D. BUZY, Saint Joseph (Paris 1952).

[F. L. FILAS]

JOSEPH, ST., DEVOTION TO

The devotion to St. Joseph as emphasizing his position in the Holy Family originated relatively late in Church history. The chief reason for this delay was undoubtedly the fear that Joseph's unique role as virginal husband of Mary and father of Jesus by spiritual ties might have caused misunderstanding about the dogmas of Mary's perpetual virginity and Jesus' miraculous origin in Mary.

Influence of Apocryphal Legends. The apocryphal legends of Christ's childhood also played a key role in thwarting the full appreciation of Joseph's true dignity. The chief sources for these tales were the Protoevangel of James, the Gospel of Thomas, the Coptic History of Joseph the Carpenter, the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, and the Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, composed with mutual interdependence from before A.D. 150 onward. These pious tales expanded on Christ's childhood, adding bizarre miracles and even irreverent fantasies. Uncritical use of the legends in medieval drama, art, and poetry helped keep their stories alive, though it handed them down to us in more romantic form. The legends make four principal claims concerning St. Joseph: his miraculous selection as a mere guardian of Mary; and his advanced age as a widower.

To make sure that Joseph could not be considered the natural father of Jesus, the legends attributed to him an advanced age when sexual powers would be least imperative. Yet if Joseph had been so old, he could not have appeared to be the natural father of Jesus in the public eye, as was part of his vocation to protect the reputation of Jesus and Mary. The legends had another reason for representing the age of St. Joseph. It was necessary to depict him as a widower with six children from an earlier marriage, as an attempt to explain the gospel references to the "brethren of Jesus" (Mt 12.46; Jn 2.12; 7.10). The legends claimed that Joseph was miraculously selected, but they shrank from using the gospel term "husband." They proposed the miracle of Joseph's blooming staff as a sign of his divine selection. This prodigy was patently modeled on the miracle of Aaron's blooming staff in Nm 17.19–24. Apart from the gross impropriety of setting up the young maiden Mary for the public scrutiny that the legends claim was exercised, much like that turned upon a slave on the block, to narrate so manifest a miracle would have been unfit, since such an event would have contradicted the obscurity that we know surrounded the Incarnation. The special providence of God certainly brought Joseph and Mary together, but the circumstances of the legendary miracle are in such bad taste or appear so artificially contrived that they make the event incredible. In paintings and statues of St. Joseph the lily as an emblem of purity replaced the staff for many centuries, first occurring perhaps in the “Espousal,” a fresco painted by Giotto between 1303–06 at Padua.

Betrothal of Mary and Joseph, detail of a fresco by Giotto in the Arena Chapel at Padua, first quarter of the 14th century.

History of the Devotion. Former claims of an independent devotion early manifested toward St. Joseph in the Eastern Church cannot be allowed, since Joseph was grouped there with Patriarchs of the Old Testament. He was pictured at best as the aged guardian and widower, only incidentally on the scene and never intimately sharing in the mysteries of Christ’s childhood. Moreover, it is no longer justified to claim that the Carmelites brought the devotion from the East in the 12th century.

The first known independent commemoration of St. Joseph occurs in an 8th-century martyrology from an unknown church in northern France or Belgium, listing the saint on March 20 as “spouse of Mary” (Analecta Bollandiana 72 [1954], 357–362). In the early 800s martyrologies such as those from the Benedictine monastery at Reichenau list March 19 as the day of St. Joseph’s death. The definitive explanation for the choice of March 19 still remains to be found. During the Middle Ages the desire to know more of Jesus and Mary led to the first recognition of St. Joseph; this was an embryonic form of the independent devotion. First observances of March 19 as a feast, not a mere commemoration, seem to have occurred among the Servites by the year 1324, although evidence suggests equally early observances among the Franciscans and at Bologna.

The Franciscans Peter John Olivi (d. 1298) and his near contemporary, Ubertino de Casale, appraised Joseph's greatness in terms that suggest that they were far ahead of their times, but the great publicizers of the devotion were John Gerson (d. 1429), St. Bernardine of Siena (d. 1444), and later St. Teresa of Ávila (d. 1582). The feast of St. Joseph had not been celebrated widely until its introduction at Rome in about 1479 by Sixtus IV. This seems to have stimulated its spread to at least 70 known European cities by the time of the Council of Trent. In 1522 the Dominican Isidore de Isolani published the first essay toward a scholarly theology of St. Joseph. After the saint's steady rise in popular esteem and in the liturgy, a momentous event in the history of the devotion occurred in Pius IX's proclamation of St. Joseph as Patron of the Universal Church, Dec. 8, 1870. Worldwide devotion to St. Joseph is centered at St. Joseph's Oratory, Montreal, Canada, founded by Brother André, CSC, in 1904.

Theology. Josephology is the name for the theological study of St. Joseph's dignity, mission, and prerogatives. Fundamental to the saint's position is the fact of his true, virginal marriage to the Mother of God. Jesus is the fruit of this marriage not because He was generated by means of it, but because He was received and reared within it according to God's reason for bringing it into existence (cf. St. Thomas Aquinas, In 4 Sent. 30 2.2 ad 4). Mary's parenthood was shared with Joseph, since Mary belonged to Joseph as his wife (see Augustine, De Cons. Evang. 2.1; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 43.3.4:83; Francis de Sales, The Spiritual Conferences, Burns, Oates, London, 1909, no. 19, 367); since they owned everything in common as husband and wife (e.g., Suárez, In 3, 29.8.1.4; Vivès, 123; Cornelius a Lapide, In Isaiam, 8; Comment. in Script. Sac., Vivès, Paris, 11, 214); and since the procreation of the Child Jesus in Joseph's wife, even though virginal, belonged to Joseph's marriage. Normally, a mutual moral bond arises between father and son because of physical generation, because such generation calls for the rearing of the child (St. Thomas Aquinas, In 4 Sent. 26.1.1). In the case of St. Joseph this parental and therefore paternal moral bond between father and son was miraculously present without generation of Jesus by Joseph. Hence, it presents an example of a unique fatherhood in an analogous and wide sense, but still a true fatherhood in the moral order. Thus, Jesus belonged to Joseph's family by right of Joseph's marriage to Christ's mother, and by Joseph's fatherly love, authority, and watchful service—all implied in the traditional title of "foster father of Jesus." Joseph appeared publicly as if he were the natural father of Jesus, thus shielding the virginity of Mary and the reputation of Jesus. It is to be noted that this public opinion (referred to in the title, "putative father of Jesus") does not of itself create a fatherly relationship. The genealogies (Mt 1.1–16; Lk 3.23–28) were traced through St. Joseph and thus recognized him as the already constituted direct legal ancestor of Christ (hence, his title of "legal father of Jesus"). Joseph's actions in naming Jesus and in protecting, accepting, and supporting both Mary and her Child indicated that Joseph was the head of their household. His authority was acknowledged as such (especially by Mary in Lk 2.48 and by Luke in 2.51: "subject to them"). "Adoptive father of Jesus" in the strict sense is not a correct title of St. Joseph, because Jesus belonged to Joseph's own family and was not adopted into it.

19th-century stained glass window depicting a scene from the life of Jesus featuring St. Joseph the Carpenter. (©Marc Garanger/CORBIS)

Augustine presents the entire modern doctrine on the fatherhood of St. Joseph even though he does not develop it fully (cf. Filas, Joseph and Jesus, 21–61, for other analyses of patristic opinion). In his classic text, "Every good of marriage was fulfilled in the parents of Christ: offspring, loyalty, and the sacrament" (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 42.8.2:225), Augustine asserts that the marriage is not merely potentially but is actually fruitful, so that from the union of Joseph and Mary the Child Jesus somehow drew his origin. Since “conjugal intercourse did not take place” (ibid.), the origin of the Child was influenced not in the physical but exclusively in the moral order. The same idea recurs almost as a theme throughout much of Sermon 51 (esp. 10–21; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 271 v., indexes 4 v. [Paris 1878–90] 38: 342–351): “Just as she was virginally the wife, so was he virginally the husband; and just as she was virginally the mother, so was he virginally the father . . . . Why was Joseph father? Because the certainty of his fatherhood is in proportion to his virginity.” Here Augustine equivalently originated a new title for Joseph, “virginal father of Jesus” (cf. Enchirid. Indulg. no. 477), signifying that Joseph himself was a virgin, and that he received Christ within his virginal marriage with a selfless paternal love. All this can be called the Augustinian tradition and is fully developed in Suárez (In 3, 29.8), with the significant innovation that Joseph shared with Mary a true though subordinate role of cooperating in the order of the hypostatic union. Suárez (d. 1617) emphasizes that Joseph is father of Jesus in every way short of physical generation. This would make Joseph at least a moral cause removing obstacles to the Incarnation, or, more positively, a moral dispositive cause of the Incarnation according to the following reasoning: Joseph’s holiness and Joseph’s consent to the marriage as virginal brought about the circumstances that in God’s plan were required for the Incarnation, namely, the virginal marriage receiving Christ within it, and the superlative holiness that should have fittingly existed in the head of the Holy Family.

From Joseph’s position as husband and father, therefore, there “arise all his dignity, grace, holiness and glory. . . . Since the bond of marriage existed between Joseph and the Blessed Virgin, there can be no doubt that more than any other person he approached that supereminent dignity by which the Mother of God is raised far above all created natures” (Leo XIII, Quamquam Pluries, Aug. 15, 1889). Although liturgical rank does not indicate the relative holiness of a saint, one can say that in accordance with these words the Church in practice venerates St. Joseph as second in holiness and dignity only to Mary. In this sense he receives a cultus of protodulia, i.e., “first veneration” in degree above all other saints except Mary. The words of Jesus (Mt 11.11; Lk 7.28) concerning John the Baptist do not militate against this preeminence. They are to be interpreted as hyperbolic praise of John as the greatest Prophet of the Old Testament. Since all theological evidence points to the uniqueness of Mary’s Immaculate Conception, no sound grounds exist for claiming that Joseph was conceived without original sin. Whether or not he was purified of original sin in his mother’s womb is uncertain, since no arguments are conclusive. It is theologically agreed as a certain minimum that because of his exceptional intimacy with Jesus and Mary he never committed grievous sin after his marriage to Our Lady. While some theologians do not admit his complete freedom from semideliberate venial sin and from concupiscence, others hold as more likely a lifelong confirmation in grace as well as those two added privileges, believing them necessary to give Joseph the holiness befitting his exalted vocation. An impressive number of Catholic theologians (such as Suárez, St. Francis de Sales, Lepicier, Jugie, and Llamera) present the assumption of St. Joseph (i.e., the belief that his glorified body is now in heaven with his soul) as a probable opinion of several centuries’ standing. Joseph’s intimacy with the body of Christ in the family life at Nazareth and his spiritual likeness to Mary are the strongest reasons to suppose that if anyone, at least he in addition to Mary was granted this privilege (also cf. Mt 27.52).

Patronage and Feast. St. Joseph is Patron of the Universal Church because “this is his numberless family, scattered throughout all lands, over which he rules with a sort of paternal authority, because he is the husband of Mary and the father of Jesus Christ” (Leo XIII, Quamquam Pluries). In the Litany of St. Joseph he is also invoked as patron of workmen, families, virgins, the sick, and the dying. In papal documents and by popular acclaim he has been hailed also as patron of prayer and the interior life, of the poor, of those in authority, fathers, priests and religious, travelers, and because of his closeness to Our Lady, as patron of devotion to Mary. He was officially declared patron of Mexico (1555), Canada (1624), Bohemia (1655), the Chinese missions (1678), and Belgium (1689). In 1937 Pius XI chose him as patron in the Church’s campaign against atheistic communism, in the encyclical Divini Redemptoris. On March 19, 1961, John XXIII proclaimed him heavenly protector of Vatican Council II.

March 19 is celebrated as a feast of the first class, the principal feast of St. Joseph, spouse of the Blessed Virgin, Confessor, and Patron of the Universal Church. According to 1917 Codex iuris canonici c.1247.1, it is a holy day of obligation, but an indult releasing the United States from earlier Church law was granted by the Holy See to the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1884 because of the difficulty of observing holy days in a non-Catholic environment. The Feast of St. Joseph the Worker on May 1 was promulgated by Pius XII in 1955. Thereafter, the Solemnity of St. Joseph, formerly called the Feast of St. Joseph’s Patronage and observed on the third Wednesday after Easter, was suppressed. By indult the Mass of Joseph the Worker may be said on Labor Day in the United States and Canada. The choice of May 1 was made to counteract atheistic communism's celebration of May Day, and to emphasize the dignity of labor, Christian ideals in labor relations, and the example of St. Joseph as a workman. The Feast of the Holy Family (on the first Sunday after Epiphany) commemorates the hidden life that Jesus shared with Mary and Joseph. In that sense it is a feast of St. Joseph. Ever since 1815 petitions have been sent to the Holy See from hundreds of bishops and thousands of layfolk asking for the inclusion of St. Joseph's name in the Confiteor, Suscipe Sancta Trinitas, Communicantes, and Libera Nos Quaesumus of the Mass. The inclusion would be a means of granting him an honor more aptly proportioned to his dignity as head of the Holy Family and Patron of the Universal Church, for he would be recognized as such in the liturgy. By a decree of John XXIII dated Nov. 13, 1962, and effective December 8 of the same year, the name of St. Joseph was finally inserted into the Communicantes.

Bibliography: F. L. FILAS, The Man Nearest to Christ: Nature and Historic Development of the Devotion to St. Joseph (Milwaukee 1944); Joseph and Jesus (Milwaukee 1952); Joseph Most Just (Milwaukee 1956); St. Joseph and Daily Christian Living (New York 1959); Joseph: The Man Closest to Jesus (Boston 1962). R. GAUTHIER, La Paternité de Saint Joseph (Montreal 1958). U. HOLZMEISTER, De Sancto Joseph quaestiones biblicae (Rome 1945). A. H. LEPICIER, Saint Joseph: Époux de la très sainte Vierge (Paris 1933). J. MUELLER, The Fatherhood of St. Joseph, tr. A. DENGLER (St. Louis 1952). H. RONDET, Saint Joseph, tr. and ed. D. ATTWATER (New York 1956). J. SEITZ, Die Verehrung des hl. Joseph: In ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung bis zum Konzil von Trient dargestellt (Freiburg 1908). B. LLAMERA, Saint Joseph, tr. M. ELIZABETH (St. Louis 1962).

[F. L. FILAS]

JOSEPH II, HOLY ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned 1765 to 1790; b. Vienna, Mar. 13, 1741; d. there, Feb. 20, 1790. As the eldest son of Emperor Francis I and MARIA THERESA, he was carefully educated. At an early age he showed keen intelligence but also a changeable, imprudent character, lack of sympathy, and a pronounced tactlessness, especially with inferiors. In 1764 he was elected emperor and coregent in Austria with his mother. In reality, at this time he could play an independent role only in military affairs. He successfully insisted upon the participation of Austria in the first partition of Poland (1772) and later obtained the territory of Bucovina, which Turkey ceded voluntarily (1775). However, a plan for the acquisition of Bavaria was frustrated by FREDERICK II OF PRUSSIA in 1778, 1779, and again in 1785. Toward the end of his reign Joseph allowed Russia to draw him into a hapless war against Turkey (1782–92); after severe reverses, his troops conquered Belgrade (1789) but were forced to evacuate it at the conclusion of the Treaty of Sistova on Aug. 4, 1791.

Engraving of Joseph II, Holy Roman Emperor.

Plans for Church Reform. Imbued from youth with the ideals of the ENLIGHTENMENT, he submitted to his mother such a radical plan for the transformation of the Catholic monastic orders that it was unacceptable even to Prince Wenzel von KAUNITZ. Joseph welcomed the dissolution of the Society of Jesus and eagerly collaborated in a scheme for its liquidation in Austria. He also supported the introduction and execution of Kaunitz's new State-Church system and regretted that his mother was too frightened to carry it out fully. One of his first executive acts as a sole and absolute ruler (1780) was to ask for a perusal of all the legislative proposals that Maria Theresa had not acted upon because of religious scruples. At the same time he informed the qualified expert in ecclesiastical affairs, Councilor Franz Joseph HEINKE, of a program of innovations he intended to introduce into the Austrian Church. This plan was so little thought out that Heinke dissuaded him from executing some of his ideas; for example, the appointment of a primate of Austria.

The emperor then sought to effect his reforms in another direction. First he severed all jurisdictional ties between national monasteries and their superior generals residing abroad. Then he put the correspondence of the Austrian bishops, which until that time had been free, under state control. Particularly vicious was the demand of the emperor, inspired by Kaunitz, that the pope should grant him the right to nominate the bishops of his Italian provinces, as was the case in the other parts of the empire. Should the Holy See not accede to this demand, the emperor threatened to exercise his ancient sovereign rights and appoint the Catholic bishops in Lombardy himself. Pius VI resolved to journey to Vienna to try by personal talks to divert the monarch's intentions. He arrived on March 22, 1782, and diplomatically succeeded in eliminating Chancellor Kaunitz from the discussions. Kaunitz, however, sent his master an ultimatum, demanding control of the negotiations and, having obtained it, refused every important concession. To avoid more extreme developments, the pope conceded to the emperor the right to nominate the Italian bishops, but as a papal privilege. This was confirmed by a concordat on Jan. 20, 1784, after the emperor's visit to Rome on Dec. 23, 1783. The chancellor nearly succeeded in having the bishop of Laibach (Ljubljana), persona non grata with the pope, appointed archbishop; only the bishop's death frustrated this plan.

Monasteries and Parishes. More spectacular were Joseph II's innovations within the Austrian Church. First, all contemplative orders were suppressed, for the reason that contemplative life is useless to the world and therefore cannot be agreeable to God. Secondly, it was enacted that members of any and all monasteries could be used to remedy cases of pastoral need. These two measures showed Joseph's lack of understanding of monastic life in general and resulted in the suppression of 876 monasteries and convents within the empire. The money realized by the sale of their properties, often squandered irresponsibly, formed a patrimonium ecclesiasticum to provide pensions for monks expelled from their houses, salaries for clergymen, and funds for new parishes—774 in all. Through this new system of salaries, the clergy became ecclesiastical civil servants to look after the interests of the state in a domain not directly accessible to secular civil servants. Thirdly, it was established as a policy that no foreign bishops should have jurisdiction of an Austrian diocese, and similarly no Austrian diocese should include non-Austrian territory.

Seminary Legislation. Since the clergy had been reduced to servants of the Josephinist state, the state had to take care of the education of priests and to provide buildings for that purpose. Maria Theresa had already put the study of theology under strict state supervision. In 1783 Joseph II established in all of Austria 12 general seminaries to replace the episcopal seminaries and the corresponding institutions of the religious orders. In the new institutions, administered by rectors appointed by the state, the students of theology received an education for the priesthood penetrated by enlightened and anti-Church ideas, but neglecting the most elementary moral training. The emperor himself found reason to reproach the administration of the general seminary in Prague in 1787 on this point. An outstanding interference in the ecclesiastical domain was the Josephinist Marriage Act of Jan. 16, 1783, which separated the marriage contract from the Sacrament; abolished several ecclesiastical marriage impediments, replacing them with impediments formulated by the state; and assigned complete jurisdiction over matrimonial affairs to the state in contradiction to canons of the Council of Trent.

Since Joseph II enforced these innovations with his accustomed haste and harshness and without consideration for tradition, the new rules aroused the resentment and growing resistance of the people and finally led to a national revolution in Hungary and Belgium. The emperor, already weakened by tuberculosis, could no longer cope with such opposition. He was forced to apply for help from the pope he had treated so badly. Finally, toward the end, he withdrew most of his political reforms in despair over the failure of his actions, without, however, being able to restore peace to his dominions. Joseph II was denied a harmonious family life. He held a true affection for his first wife, Isabella, daughter of the duke of Parma, but she died when he was 22 years old. His second marriage to Josepha (d. 1767), daughter of Charles Albert, elector of Bavaria, was a political maneuver and was unhappy. He left no children and was succeeded by his brother, Leopold II (reigned 1790–92), formerly the grand duke of Tuscany (1765–90).

Bibliography: P. P. MITROFANOV, Joseph II, seine politische und kulturelle Tätigkeit, 2 v. (Vienna 1910). F. MAASS, Der Josephinismus: Quellen zu seiner Geschichte in Österreich 1760–1790, 5 v. (Vienna 1951–61) v.2–3. E. WOLF, 3:862–864. S. K. PADOVER, The Revolutionary Emperor Joseph the Second (New York 1934). RGG<sup>3</sup>-Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65). F. FEJTŐ, Un Habsbourg révolutionnaire: Joseph II (Paris 1953). M. C. GOODWIN, The Papal Conflict with Josephinism (New York 1938). E. BENEDIKT, Kaiser Joseph II (2d ed. Vienna 1947).

[F. MAASS]

JOSEPH I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Flourished 1267 to 1275 and 1282 to 1283; b. Asia Minor, c. 1200; d. Constantinople, March of 1283. A priest and chaplain at the imperial court of Nicaea, Joseph, upon the death of his wife, entered the monastery of Mt. Galesios between Smyrna and Ephesus. However, he continued to take part in ecclesiastical affairs and was excommunicated by the Patriarch Arsenius Autorianus for interference with the patriarch's jurisdiction. But Arsenius was deposed soon after; and after a short incumbency of Germanus III, Joseph was enthroned as patriarch on Jan. 18, 1267. He proved an intransigent opponent of the reunion projects of Emperor MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS and was aided in his opposition by the controversialist Job Jasites. In defiance of the reunion achieved at the Council of LYONS (1274), Joseph took an oath never to recognize the Roman Church unless it gave up its errors or a panorthodox council ruled on the question. Joseph was urged to this position by the emperor's sister Eulogia. He wrote a Confession in support of his oath; and when the Emperor Michael persuaded him to reconsider the problem, Joseph retired from the patriarchate because of his oath (1275). He was reinstated by the Emperor ANDRONICUS II on Dec. 31, 1282 and, on his death, was hailed as a confessor by the emperor. His letters and testament are unedited, but several excerpts of an anti-Latin work on the FILIOQUE are contained in a manuscript attributed to Joseph II.

Feast: Oct. 30.

Bibliography: F. DÖLGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1127–28. L. PETIT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:1541–42. V. LAURENT, “Le Serment anti-latin du patriarche Joseph I<sup>er</sup>,” Échos d'Orient, 26 (1927) 396–407. Byzantinische Zeitschrift 30 (1929–30) 489–496, his excommunication. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 676–677. J. CARELLIUS, ed., Confessio, in Nuova raccolta d'opuscoli scientifici e filologici, ed. F. MANDELLI, v. 23 (Venice 1755) 20–23. L. BRÉHIER, Le Monde byzantin, 3 v. (Paris 1947–50) 1:392–411. G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State, tr. J. HUSSEY from 2d German ed. (Oxford 1956) 411, 433. D. J. GEANAKOPOLOS, Emperor Michael Palaeologus and the West, 1258–1282 (Cambridge, Mass. 1959).

[F. CHIOVARO]

JOSEPH CALASANCTIUS, ST.

Founder of the Clerks Regular of Religious Schools (PIARISTS); b. Peralta de la Sal, near Barbastro, Aragon, Spain, Sept. 11, 1556; d. Rome, Italy, Aug. 25, 1648. He studied law and theology at the universities of Lérida and Valencia, and was ordained in 1583. He went to Rome in 1592 and became associated with Cardinal Marc'-Antonio Colonna. He also became a member of various confraternities, which better acquainted him with the problems of the laity. He was convinced of the need for religious and secular education for the children of the poor, and opened the first free public school in Europe, at the Church of Santa Dorothea, in 1597. An increasingly large number of students required Calasanctius to enlist more teachers. CLEMENT VIII encouraged and financially assisted the new institution; PAUL V continued this help and recognized the foundation of Calasanctius as a formal religious congregation in 1617. Other schools were opened, and in 1621 the teachers were given the full privileges of a religious order. Calasanctius was named superior general and was later confirmed in this appointment for life.

The order enjoyed a rapid growth in Italy and in neighboring countries. Before the death of Calasanctius the order was organized in six provinces, with 500 members in 37 houses. Partly because of its rapid growth, internal dissension arose and Calasanctius suffered grave opposition from some of his own brethren. External attacks frequently centered on the nature of the work done by the Piarists. Free education of the poor was an idea that was novel and suspect at the time, for many believed that the poorer classes, once educated, would no longer pursue their former occupations, to the detriment of society. Moreover, the friendship of Calasanctius and GALILEO, and the fact that many young Piarists were educated by the great scientist, contributed to further misunderstandings.

Calasanctius's troubles culminated in 1643 when URBAN VIII ordered the deposition of the generalate, and at the age of 86 Calasanctius stood trial before the Holy Office. He saw the destruction of his work in 1646 when INNOCENT X reduced the order to a simple federation of independent religious houses. With the patience of Job, to whom he was likened, Calasanctius never lost hope that the Piarists would be restored to their original status as a full religious order. This hope was fulfilled only after his death. In 1656 ALEXANDER VII partially reestablished the Piarists as a congregation of simple vows, and the order was completely reinstated in 1669 by CLEMENT IX. Calasanctius was beatified in 1748 and canonized in 1767. He was declared “the heavenly patron of all Christian schools” by PIUS XII.

Feast: Aug. 25 (formerly 27).

Bibliography: JOSEPH CALASANCTIUS, Florilegium Calasanctianum, ed. L. PICANYOL (Rome 1958). Epistolario, ed. L. PICANYOL, 9 v. (Rome 1950–56). J. DE C. BAU, Biografía crítica de San José de Calasanz (Madrid 1949). S. GINER GUERRI, El proceso

de beatificación de San José de Calasanz (Madrid 1973). TERESA OF AVILA, Calasanz Teresian Reader: Selection of Teresian Sentences and Sayings That Deeply Influenced the Spirituality of Her Devoted Reader, Saint Joseph Calasanz, ed. L. GRACIA (New York 1987). J. TIMON-DAVID, Vie de saint Joseph Calasanz, fondateur des écoles pies, 2 v. (Marseille 1884). C. S. DURRANT, The Life of Saint Joseph Calasanz (Los Angeles 1954). F. GIORDANO, Il Calasanzio e l'origine della scuola popolare (Genoa 1960). J. C. HEIDENREICH, Der hl. Joseph Calasanz (Vienna 1907). A. SAPA, Teologia spirituale e pedagogica di san Giuseppe Calasanzio (Florence 1951). R. BRANCA, Avventura del Calasanzio (Cagliari 1967). G. SÁNTA, Ensayos críticos sobre S. José de Calasanz y las escuelas Pías (Salamanca 1976). M. A. ASIAIN, La experiencia cristiana de Calasanz (Salamanca 1980).

[L. A. IRANYI]

JOSEPH OF CUPERTINO, ST.

Conventual Franciscan friar whose ecstatic flights earned him the title the "flying friar"; b. Cupertino (Lecce), June 17, 1603; d. Osimo, Sept. 18, 1663. He desired religious life and entered the Capuchin Order as a lay brother but was dismissed. His mother appealed to two uncles, both Conventuals, who brought him into their order as a tertiary. His simplicity and obedience won him acceptance to the clerical state in 1625. Despite his poor progress in theological studies, he was ordained in 1628. Joseph was sent to Grotella, where his life of miracles and ecstasies began. For ten years the surrounding countryside witnessed the wonders of this friar. Authorities tried to hide him and forbade his presence at public office and the gatherings of the friars. He was denounced to the Inquisition at Naples in 1638, freed after three examinations, but sent to his general in Rome. Here he was taken to visit Pope URBAN VIII. At the sight of the Holy Father, Joseph went into ecstasy and rose from the ground till the command of his general called him to his senses. He was assigned to the Sacro Convento, Assisi, where the mystic phenomena ceased. Two years later, the ecstasies returned. His fame soon spread beyond Italy and pilgrims came to witness his ecstatic flights. One group, including the Spanish ambassador, saw him take flight over their heads to the high altar. The Duke of Brunswick, a Lutheran, became a Catholic after twice witnessing Joseph in ecstasies at Mass. Pope INNOCENT X ordered Joseph into retirement with the Capuchins at Pietrarubbia and later at Fossombrone. In 1657 Pope ALEXANDER VII allowed him to return to the Conventuals at Osimo. He spent the remainder of his life in seclusion. He was beatified by Benedict XIV in 1753, and canonized by Clement XIII on July 16, 1767.

Feast: Sept. 18.

Bibliography: G. PARISCIANI, L'inquisizione e il caso S. Giuseppe da Cupertino: Con appendice di documenti inediti

(Padua 1996). H. THURSTON, The Physical Phenomena of Mysticism, ed. J. H. CREHAN (London 1952).

[R. J. BARTMAN]

JOSEPH OF LEONESSA, ST.

Capuchin preacher and missionary; b. Leonessa, Italy, Jan. 8, 1556; d. Amatrice, Italy, Feb. 4, 1612. St. Joseph was the son of a nobleman, Giovanni Desiderii, and Francesca Paolini, who had him baptized as Euphranius. At 15, both parents having died, he lived with his uncle Battista, a professor in Viterbo, who educated him. On Jan. 1, 1573, he joined the Capuchin Order and changed his name to Joseph. When or where he was ordained is not known, but after ordination he preached with much success in Abruzzi and the neighboring regions. At his request, he was sent to preach to the infidels. He departed on Aug. 1, 1587, for Constantinople, where he ministered to galley slaves and preached in the city. Eventually he was imprisoned, but upon his release he took up the same tasks. Later, he was seized in an attempt to enter the royal palace to preach to the sultan and was condemned to death. After hanging by hooks through his hand and foot for three days, he was miraculously released. He returned to Italy, where he again became known for his preaching and love for the poor and sick, working many miracles, before dying after an operation for cancer. His body, buried first in Amatrice, was transferred to Leonessa. He was beatified on June 19, 1737, by CLEMENT XII; canonized on June 29, 1746, by BENEDICT XIV; and declared on Jan. 12, 1952, the patron of the Capuchin missions in the Turkish Republic by PIUS XII.

Feast: Feb. 4.

Bibliography: Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 865–867. A. BRENNAN, Saint Joseph of Leonessa (London 1912). GIACINTO DA BELMONTE, Vita di St. Giuseppe da Leonessa (Rome 1896). I. MAUSOLF, Round Table of Franciscan Research 14 (1948) 1–23.

[V. WYDEVEN]

JOSEPH OF METHONE

Byzantine scholar, prounionist, and bishop; b. John Plusiadenus, probably in Candia, Crete, c. 1429; d. Methone, Aug. 9, 1500. He was well educated in Latin, Greek, and theology, an excellent copyist, and a specialist in ecclesiastical music. He was ordained before 1455. Like most Cretans, John Plusiadenus in his earlier years was a strong anti-unionist, but was converted by studying the acts of the Council of FLORENCE, and became one of 12 Byzantine priests who officially supported the union, for which they were generally boycotted as religious and national traitors. In an encyclical and a dialogue he tried in vain to justify the group's position, and eventually they had to ask for financial aid from Venice and the pope. Cardinal BESSARION selected Joseph as "head of the Churches" in the Orient and "vice-Protopapas" (c. 1466–67 to c. 1481). He probably resided in Italy, chiefly in Venice, employed in copying manuscripts from 1472 to c. 1492, when he was elected to the See of Methone with the name of Joseph. He was in Venice again in 1497, in Rome at Christmas 1498, and was about to visit Crete when he was informed of the impending Turkish attack on Methone. He hastened to his see and was killed there, cross in hand, by the onrushing Turks.

Plusiadenus is best known for his consistent support of the union of Florence, notably in his Defensio synodi Florentinae, a patristic defense of the five main elements in the decree of union, written after 1455, and often printed under the name of Gennadius [Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 154:1109–1394]. He also wrote Sermo apologeticus pro synodo Florentina adv. Marcum Ephesium (Patrologia Graeca, 154:1023–94); Disceptatio de differentiis inter Graecos et Latinos (c. 1460; Patrologia Graeca, 154:959–1023); and poetry, sermons, and other minor works, as well as ecclesiastical music.

Bibliography: M. MANOUSSAKAS, "Recherches sur la vie de Jean Plusiadénos," Revue des études Byzantines, 17 (1959) 28–51. L. PETIT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VANCANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 8.2:1526–29. M. CANDAL, "La Apologia," Orientalia Christiana periodica, 21 (1955) 36–57.

[J. GILL]

JOSEPH OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

Discalced Carmelite theologian and writer (name in the world, Joseph Barroso); b. Braga, Portugal, Dec. 26, 1609; d. Madrid, Jan. 27, 1674. He is commonly known as the "Portuguese" to distinguish him from his homonym the "Andalusian." He was professed in the Discalced Carmelites in Lisbon (May 30, 1632) and after ordination was instrumental in the establishing of foundations at Braga (1635), Nahia (1653), and Cascaes. Because of his fame as a preacher the King of Portugal offered him a bishopric, which he refused out of humility; he was never consecrated bishop, as some authors have stated, but was a professor of theology for many years. He was transferred to the general's house of St. Herenegild in Madrid where he died, esteemed for his holiness. Here his body was venerated until the exclaustation of religious orders in Spain (1835). He wrote two works of importance. One was the Cadena Mistica (Madrid 1678), the first attempt to codify the spirituality of the Teresian school. It remains useful even today, since the author had access to many writings and manuscripts no longer available. His other work, Eucleatio mysticae theologiae, was published posthumously (Cologne 1684).

Bibliography: "Vita et opera," in Eucleatio mysticae theologiae S. Dionysii Aropagitae, crit. ed. ANASTASIO A S. PAULO (Rome 1927); introduction is the best biography. J. HEERINCKX, "Doctrina mystica Iosephi a Sp. Sancto Lusitani, O. C. D.," Antoniana 3 (1928) 485–493. SIMEON S. FAMILIA, "Mystical Chain of Carmel," Spiritual Life 8 (1962) 99–106.

[O. RODRIGUEZ]

JOSEPHINISM

The Austrian State-Church system of the period of ENLIGHTENMENT, the rules of which were worked out by the Imperial Chancellor, Prince Wenzel Anton von Kaunitz, approved by Empress MARIA THERESA, and implemented by her son JOSEPH II to such an extent that the whole System took its name from him.

Principles of Reform. In contradistinction to the preceding Hapsburg State-Church system, Josephinism did not take the papal privileges as the legal basis for papal interference in Church affairs, but the sovereign power of the State to which, it was thought, the Church and its ministers also were subject. Hence, even those ecclesiastical reforms effected by the Josephinist State for the material benefit of the Church, e.g., increase in parishes, demarcation of dioceses, better remuneration of the clergy, and reorganization of theological studies, were dictated in the first place by reasons of state: pastoral care was held to be inseparable from the safety of the State. But improvements in ecclesiastical administration cannot by themselves evoke and further internal spiritual life, as every real reform in Church matters testifies. Not only is the purely secular purpose of the State unable to do this, but besides, the interference of Josephinism in the intimate organization of the Church was liable to weaken the supernatural life to the vanishing point, if not to kill it. A standard example is the suppression, on principle, of the contemplative orders, judged and condemned from a purely utilitarian standpoint in complete misunderstanding of their spiritual purpose. Hence, the first real reform of Austrian Catholicism that began in the first half of the 19th century took place without Josephinist influences in its spiritual regeneration.

Influence of Prince Kaunitz. In the 1760s Prince Kaunitz recognized during his negotiations with the Roman Curia that the latter was unwilling to forego the immunity of Church property without corresponding compensation from the State. He, therefore, in 1767 issued ordinances for Austrian Lombardy, a territory under his immediate administration, restricting on essential points Church property rights, endangering the free movement of Church personnel, and imperiling the independence of the Church from the State. When, notwithstanding Church protests, Maria Theresa confirmed these ordinances, Kaunitz submitted to her on June 15, 1768, a set of secret instructions to his supreme administrative body in Milan, which was to put the relation between State and Church on an entirely new basis. The Church was to be subject to the State in all mixed questions. The State was to obtain all Church property. It was even to control the spiritual activity of the clergy, since, so the document declared, "the ruler is vitally interested in keeping dogma in harmony with the gospel and in adapting the discipline of the clergy and the outward forms of religion to the needs of the commonweal." The instructions further prevented the formation of a "corpus ecclesiasticum," as in France, so that all churchmen stood before the State as individual persons. Herewith there was erected a State-Church system differing unfavorably from Gallicanism in its pressure on the Church. Another protest, this time from the Pope, was disregarded by the Empress. In 1769 the system was extended to the whole monarchy, and in the last decade of the reign of the Empress it was applied especially against the monastic orders.

Summit and Decline. While Maria Theresa hesitated to draw the last consequences from the new State-Church system, her successor, Joseph II, knew no such restraints. He isolated the Austrian Church from Rome and subjected her internally to so far-reaching a control that the whole system, though already in use for 12 years, was named after him. His enforced innovations were bound to wound the feelings of the people. Everywhere disturbances broke out, so that his successor, Leopold II, promised kindly to examine the complaints of the bishops. But when quiet had been restored to the state, the Josephinist system was confirmed on all essential points on March 17, 1791. Under Emperor Francis II (I) the situation remained unchanged; Josephinism was introduced in 1816 even in the newly gained Italian territories. A formal papal condemnation was threatening. But after a journey to Rome in 1819, the Emperor tried to reestablish peace with the Church. To that effect he had Prince Klemens Wenzel von Metternich conduct negotiations with the papal nuncio in Vienna from 1832 to 1836, but they were interrupted by the unexpected death of Francis, March 2, 1835. After 1848, many churchmen, especially among the younger clergy, were won over to the idea of freeing the Church from the yoke of the State. The last phase of the emancipation came when the young Emperor Francis Joseph I, through the ordinances of April 18 and 23, 1850, abolished the Josephinist Church-State system.

Bibliography: F. MAASS, ed., Der Josephinismus: Quellen zu seiner Geschichte in Österreich 1760–1850, 5 v. (Fontes rerum Austriacarum II.71–75; Vienna 1951–61). M. C. GOODWIN, The Papal Conflict with Josephinism (New York 1938). F. VALJAVEC, Der Josephinismus (2d ed. Vienna 1945), with reservations. E. WINTER, Geschichte des Josefismus (Berlin 1962), anti-Catholic. E. WOLF, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:866–867.

[F. MAASS]

JOSEPHINUM, THE PONTIFICAL COLLEGE

The Pontifical College Josephinum was officially founded by Rev. John Joseph Jessing (1836–1899) on Sept. 1, 1888 in Columbus, Ohio. He established it as a bilingual German-English institution to prepare candidates for the priesthood who would serve the growing German-American immigrant population in the United States. In 1875 Jessing had opened an orphanage for boys in Pomeroy, Ohio, where he was pastor of Sacred Heart Catholic Church from 1870 until 1877, at which time he and the orphanage moved to Columbus, the state's capitol. By means of appeals in the German-language newspaper Ohio Waisenfreund ("Orphan's Friend"), first published on May 2, 1873, Jessing raised funds first for the orphans, then later for needy students when the seminary was founded in 1888. With each passing year, classes were added with the result that by the time of Jessing's death in 1899 a faculty of philosophy and theology complemented the first six years of classical studies. All costs associated with the training of seminarians were provided by the bilingual (German and English) institution. The name "Josephinum" dates back to the May 5, 1886 edition of the Ohio Waisenfreund where it appeared as another name for "St. Joseph's Orphan Home."

Jessing was born in Münster, Germany. After combat service in the Westphalian Artillery (1864–1866), he immigrated to the United States in 1867 where he entered Mt. St. Mary's Seminary, Cincinnati, in 1868. Upon ordination to the priesthood in 1870 for the diocese of Columbus, he was immediately appointed pastor in Pomeroy. Both his newspaper and seminary were inspired by his objective to sustain the language and Catholic faith of fellow German-speaking immigrants in the United States. Monsignor Jessing created a domestic prelate in 1896, and saw the first class of six men ordained to the priesthood on June 29, 1899, shortly before his death (Nov. 2).

In an effort to ensure the ethnic and missionary character of the Josephinum, Jessing initially offered the title to the institution and its future direction to the Deutsch-Americanischer Priester-Verein (German-American Priests' Association), founded in St. Louis in 1887. Failing to secure their patronage, Jessing entered into negotiations with the Holy See. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith accepted his proposal and designated the Josephinum a pontifical institution on Dec. 12, 1892. In the original constitutions accepted by Rome, the apostolic delegate in the United States (now the apostolic nuncio) was named the ordinary of the Pontifical College Josephinum and was given the task of assigning the priests ordained there to various U.S. dioceses. This provision was later changed, and since the 1960s all students are affiliated with particular dioceses or religious communities into which they are incardinated upon ordination.

The orphanage division was closed in 1932, followed by the high school in 1967. After more than a century, the Josephinum, is the only pontifical college in the United States, under the direct supervision of the Holy See's Congregation for Catholic Education, and was accredited by the Association of Theological Schools in 1970, and by the Higher Learning Commission in 1976. The Josephinum maintains its missionary spirit, but its emphasis on German-language ministry has given way to a program of formation for service among Spanish-speaking peoples in the United States. The student body, about a hundred in 2000, includes candidates from Ugandan and Burmese dioceses. The full-time faculty, made up of diocesan and religious priests, religious women and laity, numbers more than thirty.

Bibliography: L. J. FICK, The Jessing Legacy, (Columbus, OH 1988). R. P. CLOONEY, ed., The Spirit of John Joseph Jessing: Priest, Orphan's Friend, Visionary (Columbus, OH 1999).

[J. F. GARNEAU]

JOSEPHITES

(SSJ, Official Catholic Directory #0700); a congregation of priests and brothers, officially designated St. Joseph's Society of the Sacred Heart (SSJ), but popularly known as Josephite Fathers or Josephite Missionaries.

Origin. The Josephite society, numbering more than 250 priests and brothers in 1963, was founded in 1866 at Mill Hill, London, England, by Herbert VAUGHAN, later cardinal archbishop of Westminster. Vaughan's plan to found a society of missionary priests was encouraged by Cardinal Nicholas Wiseman, who recalled that St. Vincent Pallotti had declared that England would not be rewon to the Catholic Church until she resumed her pre-Reformation practice of sending priests to the foreign missions.

In 1871, when Vaughan asked Pius IX for a mission field for his new society, the pope suggested that the first Josephites be sent to the U.S. to work among the more than four million recently emancipated African Americans. The suggestion was an answer to the appeal of the American hierarchy who, during the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1866, begged for priests who would devote themselves to the service of black Americans. In December 1871 four priests from Mill Hill arrived in Baltimore, Md., to begin work.

Within the next two decades, more missionaries came from Mill Hill to the U.S., but experience showed that the African-American missions could be served better by an American community. Thus, in 1893, by mutual consent of Cardinal Vaughan and Cardinal James Gibbons of Baltimore, an American community was established under the direction of Gibbons. The original community, St. Joseph's Society for Foreign Missions of Mill Hill, or MILL HILL MISSIONARIES, continued to flourish both in England and on the Continent and in many mission areas of the world. The American community, under the original four Josephites, formed the new Society of St. Joseph, which received the decree of praise in 1932, officially establishing it as a pontifical society.

Development. The society was founded to work exclusively within the African-American community. The original members dedicated themselves by vow to this particular vocation. In the years following 1871, missions were established in Washington, D.C.; Richmond and Norfolk, VA.; Charleston, SC; and Louisville, KY. In the 20th century, the work spread, with the greatest concentration of Josephites in Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. The generalate is in Baltimore, MD.

Bibliography: The Colored Harvest (Baltimore 1888–1960) superseded by the Josephite Harvest (Baltimore 1960–). J. T. GILLARD, The Catholic Church and the American Negro (Baltimore 1930); Colored Catholics in the U.S. (Baltimore 1941). JOSEPHITE FATHERS, Society of St. Joseph of the Sacred Heart, 1893–1943 (Baltimore 1943). F. M. DEVRES, Remembered in Blessing: The Courtfield Story (London 1955).

[M. J. O'ROURKE/EDS.]

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS

Jewish historiographer and cultural apologist whose main works, The Jewish War and Jewish Antiquities, are of great value for the history of the Jews; b. Jerusalem, between Sept. 13, A.D. 37 and March 16, 38; d. place and date unknown, probably c. 101.

Life. Josephus [in MSS Ἰωσὴφ(π)οῦς or Ἰωσῆπ(π)οῦς] was the son of Matthias, a "priest of the first course,"

who was himself descended from the Hasmonaeans in both the paternal and the maternal line. He was educated for public office from an early age; between his 16th and 19th year he acquired personal experience of the doctrines and practices of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, and also spent some time in the wilderness of Judea with an ascetic solitary. On his return to Jerusalem, he became a member of the Pharisee group and entered public life. He went to Rome, c. 63–64, on a successful embassy and made friends in Nero's circle and even with the pro-Jewish Empress Poppaea. Upon returning to Palestine on the eve of the Jewish revolt, Josephus appears to have supported his party's position on the inexpediency of revolt. However, to maintain power after Cestius Gallus's defeat, the Pharisees had to show signs of militancy, so they sent Josephus to take command in Galilee. For this period there are two inconsistent accounts. In The Jewish War (De bello Judaico, hereafter, B.J.), he portrays himself as the general in command of the revolt in Galilee. In his autobiography (Vita), written years later, Josephus replies to Justus of Tiberias, who accused him of causing the revolt of Tiberias against Rome, and explains that he was sent to restrain, not to command, the revolt; in this account, the relationship between his actions and his motives is more complex. He organized the defense of the region but temporized with both Zealot and Roman; when, however, Vespasian started subjugating Galilee, Josephus opposed him resolutely. He skillfully defended Jotapata for a while and finally, by an unprepossessing stratagem, surrendered to Vespasian. The prisoner then prophesied that Vespasian would become emperor, which helped his chances of survival.

If his earlier motives are unclear, subsequently at least, he was sincerely convinced that Rome would conquer and that it would be better that the Romans should destroy only the Jewish ZEALOTS, not the whole people and religion, of which he remained a sturdy apologist. In Vespasian's entourage, as a prisoner and talisman, he observed the subjugation of Galilee and Judea. On Vespasian's departure from Alexandria for Rome, Josephus returned to Palestine in the suite of Titus, and witnessed the siege of Jerusalem, taking notes, interrogating deserters, and helping in negotiations between besiegers and besieged. From the final carnage he succeeded in saving several friends and relatives and some scrolls.

After the war he received compensation for the loss of his property in Jerusalem by the gift of other estates in Palestine. However, he followed Titus to Rome, became a citizen, and devoted himself to literary studies. Vespasian dismissed a charge that he was implicated in a Jewish revolt in Cyrene. Josephus received a pension and seems to have become the official war historian. Between 75 and 79, he composed The Jewish War, which he offered to Vespasian; Titus praised it and ordered its publication. Henceforward, under Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian, his life was one of ease.

He was married at least three times, and twice divorced. It is not clear whether he already had a wife, left in Jerusalem during the siege (B.J. 5.419), but in any case he married, at Vespasian's command, a captive Jewess from Caesarea. Later, a lady from Alexandria bore him three children, of whom one, Hyrcanus, survived. These women being each in her turn divorced, a Cretan Jewess of distinguished family bore him two further children, Justus and Simonides Agrippa.

Under Domitian, Josephus had a literary patron, one Epaphroditus, who was either a freedman of Nero who died in 96, or a grammarian who, according to the Souda, lived until the days of Nerva. In either case, Josephus's literary activity ceases about this date; the latest events implied are the death of Agrippa (between 92 and 95) and the 13th year of Domitian (A.D. 94). The circumstances of his death are not known. Eusebius's (Ecclesiastical History 3.9.2) tells us that a statue was erected in Rome in Josephus's honor. Perhaps this still survives (in the Ny Carlsberg Glyptotek, Copenhagen).

The Jewish War. Immediately after the Jewish revolt Josephus composed, in Aramaic, an account of it for the Jews of Adiabene and Mesopotamia and for the native populations of Parthia, Babylonia, and Arabia, in order to dissuade them from attacks on Rome. Between 75 and 79, he finished the seven books of his work on the same subject in Greek.

Josephus wrote The Jewish War for diffusion in the Greco-Roman world to show the greatness of the Roman victory and the folly of further sedition. He joined with these congenial emphases the theme that it was the "Jewish tyrants," i.e., the Zealots, who were responsible, an exculpation that was very timely for both the Pharisees and the Jews of the Diaspora. Josephus insists that his account of the fighting, in contrast with other histories now lost, is that of an eyewitness who took notes on the doings of both sides during the war. He further acknowledges the help he derived from the field commentaries of Vespasian and Titus and from critical remarks by King Agrippa. His relationship to his rivals' histories is not clear. This main part of his work is of great historical value. He prefaced it with an ill-proportioned history of the Jews from the days of Antiochus Epiphanes until the start of the war. This may be divided, on bases of style, content, and sources, into three parts. The first covers events from 170 B.C. until Archelaus's deposition in A.D. 6. Until the rise of Antipater, Herod's father, the account is brief, but from then until the accession of Archelaus the fortunes of that dynasty are detailed. Here Josephus uses the Uni- versal History of Nicolaus of Damascus, a non-Jewish, pro-Herodian source composed before A.D. 14. Josephus, or some intermediary, has reworked this source, especially in its account of the Maccabean period. The second part is the account of the three Jewish sects. This derives from a Jewish ethnographic writing used by Philo and perhaps Hippolytus. The third part is an account of the procuratorial period that is jejune up to the time of Felix (A.D. 52–60) but thenceforward abundant.

The Jewish Antiquities. The 20 books of the Ἰουδαϊκὴ Ἀρχαιολογία were modeled, in their title and number, on The Roman Antiquities of Dionysius of Halicarnassus. The Jewish Antiquities is a history of the Jews from Creation to the start of the Jewish revolt, and a piece of cultural propaganda showing the Greeks how the Jew's God-given constitution made their nation prosper. This apologetic motive accounts for numerous modifications and additions that the Biblical sources undergo, and for a sustained anti-Samaritan note. A 21st book, Life, a revised account of Josephus's conduct in the Galilean campaign with introductory and concluding biographical material, was appended to The Jewish Antiquities. The entire work was finished after Agrippa II's death. The date of completion given, A.D. 94, may refer to this edition of The Jewish Antiquities or to an earlier one finished before the Life, in its present form, was projected. The value of The Jewish Antiquities depends on the value of the sources available to its author. In delimiting these, however, certainty has not yet been attained. Some scholars see Josephus as an academic historian critically selecting details from several sources, although occasionally revealing his own bias. Others hold that he merely abridged the offerings of some two or three late sources, which already reflected selectivity and bias in dealing with the events. This latter solution, in itself probably extreme, merely shifts the question of value to the sources of Josephus's putative precursors.

Specifically, in the period covered by the Hebrew OT it is possible that Josephus had not read all the numerous Hellenistic historians whom he cites. He will have found many citations from them in one or two Jewish historical school texts, and these texts could also be the source of the Alexandrian exegetical material that he uses. But almost certainly he used the Hebrew OT and Greek Septuagint (often in the Lucianic text-type) directly and not merely in such a school text's adaptations of the paraphrases of Demetrius or Artapanus. Again, Josephus's clear stylistic affinity with such historians as Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Nicolaus of Damascus implies that he read them; he could surely utilize their contents as well as their style. Besides, his own education would have familiarized him with much of the traditional Jewish material that he used. Josephus, or his immediate source, clearly lacked information about the period from the end of the Persian empire to the start of the Maccabean revolt. Little but the Alexander Romance, the Epistle of Aristaeus, and Polybius was drawn upon. For the revolt itself, he had a shorter form of 1 Maccabees; but not, it seems, 2 Maccabees. Thereafter, Strabo and Nicolaus of Damascus, together with Jewish tradition, whether oral or written, are his ultimate sources.

For his account of King Herod it has been suggested that Josephus used Nicolaus of Damascus only indirectly, in an anti-Herodian Jewish redaction. Josephus himself, however, especially after Agrippa II's death, could well be responsible for some of these anti-Herodian elements. It is doubtful that he had direct access to Herod's Memoirs or to the biography, sympathetic to Herod, of a certain Ptolemy. The differences between the account of Herod in The Jewish Antiquities and that in The Jewish War show that Josephus either secured new sources or made different use of the old ones. In favor of his direct use here of Nicolaus—and this would affect the analysis of the sources of all the second half of The Jewish Antiquities—it is significant that, after the point where Nicolaus's History stops, Josephus's information is scanty until he reaches the period of Agrippa I. Thenceforward he is better informed. Some material will have come from Agrippa II; some, from what Josephus himself had seen and heard. In Rome he had access to Roman decrees; not all those that he cites will have been found in his sources. His account of Gaius's assassination, the accessions of Claudius and Nero, and of Parthian and Adiabenean history follows closely that of a Roman patrician historian, probably Cluvius Rufus.

The Jewish Antiquities contains a much discussed passage, the so-called Testimonium Flavianum, seemingly one of the earliest non-Christian references to Jesus Christ. Internal arguments for a lack of authenticity are inconclusive, but formal and external evidence suggests that it has undergone glossing [see J. P. MEIER, Catholic Biblical Quarterly 52 (1991) 76–103]. The Greek text of The Jewish Antiquities, of which a Byzantine Epitome also exists, was translated into Latin at the order of Cassiodorus, but there is no evidence for any Latin translation of the Life.

Against Apion. This inadequate but now standard title derives from Eusebius and St. Jerome. Origen (Celsus 1.16, 4.11; ed. P. Kotschau, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 1.68, 281) and Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 3.9.4., etc.; ed. E. Schwartz, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, 2.222, etc.) usually call it “On the Antiquity of the Jews” and this title is supported by the text of the work. Porphyry [De Abstinentia 4.14 (ed. A. Nauck, Teubner ser., 251)] says Against Apion came in part from Josephus's To the Greeks. It was composed after The Jewish Antiquities, but still during the life of Epaphroditus; Josephus wrote it, in two books, in reply to criticism of Antiquities. It presents and refutes the anti-Jewish propaganda current in the Hellenistic world (see ANTI-SEMITISM). First, the relatively greater antiquity of the Jews is demonstrated, and the silence of certain Greek writers on this subject is explained. Then, current accusations against Jewish history, religion, and morals are refuted, and finally there is a brief exposition of Moses and his laws, and a comparison with Greek law and theology. The value of Against Apion as a source of observations on Jewish history by lost historians and especially of fragments of the anti-Jewish polemicists—Manetho, Chaeremon, Lysimachus, Apollonius Molon, and Apion himself—is inestimable. In its day, however, its originality must have been small. It shows traces of deriving from an Alexandrian Jewish tradition of academic polemic, and many of the citations may have been commonplaces of this tradition.

In his apologetic works, Josephus appears to represent no one school of Judaism. His own training was Pharisaic and Palestinian, but his apologetic, HAGGADAH, and HALAKAH, contain many characteristics of Alexandrian Judaism. His relationship, literary and ideological, with Philo merits further study.

Recent Developments. The last quarter of the 20th century was a period of especially intensive activity in Josephus scholarship. In that period appeared two important research tools: a complete concordance to Josephus's I writings and a compendious, annotated bibliography of the relevant secondary literature. New translations of commentaries on the historian's works in English, French, and German were in progress. L. H. Feldman authored numerous studies on Josephus's depiction of Biblical characters as compared with their portrayal in Scripture itself and elsewhere in Jewish-Christian tradition. Authors like T. W. Franxman and C. T. Begg investigated the Josephan reworking of selected Scriptural segments in detail. In line with a wide tendency in Biblical studies, Josephus's stance toward women has likewise underwent considerable scrutiny in these years. Several volumes of collected essays were published in the 1980s and 1990s, offering investigations of a wide range of special questions in the Josephan corpus. All indications were that the renaissance of Josephus studies that marked the end of the second millennium would continue into the third.

Bibliography: Editions, Translations, Commentaries, Tools. Opera, ed. B. NIESE, 7. v. (Berlin 1887–95); Eng. tr. H. ST. J. THACKERAY et. al., 10 v. (Loeb Classical Library; 1926–1965); Fr. tr. E. NODET (Paris 1990–). S. MASON et al., Commentary on Flavius Josephus (Leiden 1999–). L. H. FELDMAN, Josephus and Modern Scholarship (1937–1980) (Berlin 1984); Josephus: A Supplementary Bibliography (Berlin 1986). K. H. RENGSTORF, A Complete Concordance to Flavius Josephus, 4 v. (Leiden 1973–1983). Studies. H. W. ATTRIDGE, The Interpretation of Biblical History in the 'Antiquitates Judaicae' of Flavius Josephus (Harvard Dissertations in Religion 7; Missoula, MT 1977). C. T. BEGG, Josephus' Account of the Early Divided Monarchy, (Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologiarum Lovaniensium 108; Leuven 1993) 212–420; Josephus' Story of the Later Monarchy (Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologiarum Lovaniensium 155; Leuven 2000). P. BILDE, Flavius Josephus between Jerusalem and Rome (Sheffield 1988). C. A. BROWN, No Longer Be Silent: First Century Jewish Portraits of Biblical Women. Studies in Pseudo-Philo's 'Biblical Antiquities' and Josephus's 'Jewish Antiquities' (Louisville 1992). S. J. D. COHEN, Josephus in Galilee and Rome: His Vita and Development as a Historian (Leiden 1979). L. H. FELDMAN, Studies in Josephus' Rewritten Bible (Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic, and Roman Period Sup 58; Leiden 1998); Josephus's Interpretation of the Bible (Hellenistic Culture and Society 27; Berkeley, CA 1998). L. H. FELDMAN and G. HATA, eds., Josephus, The Bible and History (Leiden 1989). L. H. FELDMAN and J. R. LEVISON, eds., Josephus' 'Contra Apionem': Studies in Its Character & Context with a Latin Concordance to the Portion Missing in Greek (Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums 34; Leiden 1996). R. K. GNUSE, Dreams and Dream Reports in the Writings of Josephus: A Tradition-Historical Analysis (Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums 36; Leiden 1996). K.-S. KRIEGER, Geschichtsschreibung als Apologetik bei Flavius Josephus (Tübingen/Basel 1994). B. MAYER-SCHÄRTEL, Das Frauenbild des Josephus: Eine sozialgeschichtliche und kulturanthropologische Untersuchung (Stuttgart 1995). S. MASON, Flavius Josephus on the Pharisees: A Composition-Critical Study (Leiden 1991). S. MASON, ed., Understanding Josephus: Seven Perspectives (Sheffield 1998). E. NODET, Le Pentateuque de Flavius Josephus (Paris 1996). F. PARENTE and J. SIEVERS, eds., Josephus & the History of the Greco-Roman Period: Essays in Memory of Morton Smith (Leiden 1994). B. SCHRÖDER, Die 'vaterlichen Gesetze', Flavius Josephus als Vermittler von Halachah an Griechen und Römer (Tübingen 1996). S. SCHWARTZ, Josephus and Judean Politics (Columbia Studies in the Classical Tradition 18; Leiden 1990). P. SPILSBURY, The Image of the Jew in Flavius Josephus' Paraphrase of the Bible (Tübingen 1998); G. E. STERLING, Historiography and Self-Definition. Josephus, Luke—Acts and Apologetic Historiography (Novum Testamentum Sup 64; Leiden 1992). E. C. ULRICH, The Qumran Text of Samuel and Josephus (Harvard Semitic Monographs 19; Missoula, MT 1978). P. VILLALBA I VARNEDA, The Historical Method of Flavius Josephus (Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums 19; Leiden 1986).

[J. STRUGNELL/C. T. BEGG]

JOSHUA, BOOK OF

The first book of the Bible after the Pentateuch; it stands at the beginning of the collection that the classical division of the Hebrew Bible calls the Earlier Prophets (see PROPHETIC BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT). It is named after the man who figures most prominently in its pages. The overriding theme of the book, namely, the idea that the land of Canaan had been won by the Israelites ultimately because of Yahweh’s promise to the Patriarchs and His special help to Joshua, determined its structure and its literary forms. The theme of conquest by Yahweh’s will and power also points to the period of the 13th–12th centuries B.C. as the time during which the traditions that make up the material of the book began to form.

Illumination from the Book of Joshua.

Structure. The Book of Joshua falls naturally into three parts. Chapters 1–12 are concerned with the conquest of Canaan, and ch. 13–21 with the partitioning of the land among the Israelite tribes, while ch. 22–24 contain certain supplements. Although the differences that set off these three sections are such as to suggest that they were at one time independent literary units, a final editor has connected them into a further unity that must be read as a whole. The following summary of the three parts will provide a concise view of the content of the whole book.

First Part (ch. 1–12). Chapter 1 introduces the theme of conquest by linking Joshua to Moses and by describing the Israelite tribes in Transjordan on the verge of attempting entry into Canaan. Chapter 2 shows the scouts sent by Joshua gathering information about the land around Jericho to assess its strength and weakness, so that plans may be laid for an attack in that area as soon as the crossing of the Jordan has been managed. In ch. 3 the crossing of the river is made by the special help of Yahweh, who dries up its waters when the priests who carry the ark wade in. In ch. 4 after memorializing the wonderful event by two sets of 12 stones. Joshua camps at Galgal east of Jericho, where he sets up a third group of 12 stones. Chapter 5 says that, in preparation for the holy war in the offing. Joshua, at Yahweh’s command, took care of the matter of circumcision, which the Israelites had neglected during the desert years. The climax of this alert is the celebration of the Passover at Galgal and Joshua’s vision of a mysterious captain of the host of Yahweh.

Chapter 6 tells about the capture of JERICHO as the result of special help from Yahweh through the relentless marching and trumpeting of the priests. In the general destruction of the city the harlot Rahab’s house and family are spared because of the help she had given earlier to the Israelite scouts. Chapter 7 tells about the disastrous defeat suffered by the Israelites at Ai and accounts for it by pointing to the disobedience of Achan, who had kept part of Jericho’s doomed property for himself. When Achan, his family, and all his possessions are destroyed as a punishment for this crime, Ai falls easily to Joshua’s strategy (8.1–29). The high point of this first phase of the conquest that carried the Israelites into central Canaan comes at Mt. Ebal, where a sacrifice is offered and the law is proclaimed in the form of blessings and curses (8.30–35).

Chapter 9 is an account of Israel's agreement with the clever Gibeonites, natives who trick Joshua into sparing their lives by pretending to be travelers from a distant land who had heard of the power of Joshua's God and want to join up with God's people. Because this agreement is sealed by oath, it has to be honored even when the trick is discovered. So the Gibeonites are spared, but they are forced to become slaves. Chapter 10 tells of a coalition of five Canaanite chieftains and their defeat by Joshua at GIDEON. This victory is accomplished, like those at Jericho and Ai, by the special help of Yahweh. Chapter 10 concludes with a description of Joshua's conquests in Canaan's southland. Chapter 11 tells about another coalition, this time among the northern Canaanites, to oppose Joshua's march, and about his victory over them at Hazor and other northern cities. Chapter 12 sums up the whole work of the conquest by listing the kings whose cities had been invaded and taken by Joshua.

Second Part (ch. 13–21). These chapters are for the most part a description of the way in which the conquered land was partitioned among the Israelite tribes. This unit of the book contrasts sharply with the first 12 chapters. In the first part of the book, Joshua is in the full vigor of his military power, and all opposition seems to crumble beneath his march. In this second part he is an old man, and a very large part of Canaan remains unconquered.

Chapter 13 tells of the settling of the tribes of REUBEN, Gad, and half of Manasseh in Transjordan. In ch. 14 attention is given to the problems of the tribes attempting to settle west of the Jordan, with a special note about Caleb, who had been Joshua's fellow scout in the earlier years when Moses was still leading the Israelites (Nm 14.5–7). Caleb receives the hilly land around Hebron, which still remains to be taken from the native Anakim. Chapter 15 details the boundaries of JUDAH. Then, after a further note about Caleb's victory over the Anakim at Hebron and about his daughter's successful request for some property of her own, a list of Judean cities is given, which shows the writer's close knowledge of that area. In ch. 16–17 the settling of the Joseph tribes, EPHRAIM and the other half of Manasseh, west of the Jordan, is recounted. In ch. 18 the work of conquest is said to be complete, and Joshua sets up headquarters at Shiloh to direct the work of settling the remaining seven Israelite tribes. Land is assigned to the tribes of BENJAMIN, SIMEON, ZEBULUN, ISSACHAR, ASHER, NAPHTALI, and DAN. Chapter 20 lists the cities of ASYLUM, or refuge, throughout Canaan, where a person may find safety if he has committed unintended homicide. Chapter 21 lists the cities allotted to members of the priestly tribe of Levi, who had not received a special territory of their own.

Third Part (ch. 22–24). The supplements are among the most important parts of the whole book (their place in the book's general teaching will be considered later). Chapter 22 tells about Joshua's blessing on the members of the Transjordanian Israelite tribes who helped in conquering Canaan west of Jordan. Chapter 23 gives Joshua's final exhortation to his people. Chapter 24 continues this appeal in more detail. At SHECHEM he reviews the SALVATION HISTORY of the Israelites since Abraham, and they renew their COVENANT with YAHWEH, who has been the author of these great saving events in their past. The book concludes with a note about Joshua's death and burial and another about the reburial of the bones of Joseph, which had been brought along when the Israelites escaped from Egypt, and a final word about the death and burial of the priest Eleazer.

Literary Forms. The wide variety of the materials that entered into the Book of Joshua points to a variety of literary forms in which that material is cast. The Book of Joshua belongs to the category of historical narrative. But the sense in which it is a history has to be carefully qualified.

Etiological. After ch. 1, which has the form of an introduction to the whole book, the literary form that has been operative in the writing of much of ch. 2–9 is that of the etiological story. See ETIOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE). The etiological story is a special kind of narrative about a person or place. It is not simply a record of what happened at a certain place or to a certain person. It is a narrative built up in such a way as to explain the reason (or cause, α'τιία) why a place or person has such and such a name, or why certain objects are found in a certain place. The ultimate purpose of the etiological story is, of course, deeper. The etiological story of Adam's being taken from the 'ādāmā (farm land) in Gn 2.7 is not so much interested in explaining the first man's name as in saying something about his God-given task of working the land. The strictly historical value of the etiological story varies from one such story to the next, depending on the nearness of the storyteller to the event he is describing. In the case of the Book of Joshua there are good reasons for holding that the traditions about Jericho, Ai, Gibeon, etc., began to form at a time not far removed from the actual period of the conquest of Canaan in the 13th–12th centuries B.C. The narratives in Jos 4.3, 5–9, 20–24; 5.9; 6.25–26; 7.26: 8.28–29; 9.27 show the characteristics of the etiological story as it appears elsewhere in the Bible. The passage in 4.1–9 invites the Israelites of a later, more settled period to connect the big stones of the Jordan Valley with Joshua's crossing of the Jordan by the power of Yahweh at a critical point in their earlier history. This function of the story in the text is more important than the information about the actual reason why the stones are there at all.

Epical. The literary form characteristic of ch. 10–11 is the epic, or saga, in which the central figure, Joshua, is presented in heroic proportions. The whole work of the conquest is attributed to him in such a way as to put into almost complete obscurity the contributions of any other men. The work of the conquest is presented as coming off without any great difficulty. This triumphalism and the centering of attention so predominantly on Joshua is certainly the result of the hyperbolizing and simplifying tendencies proper to the saga. The battle of Gibeon in ch. 10, where at Joshua's command the sun and moon "stop" while he gains a total victory over the enemy, is perhaps the clearest instance of the epic form in the book. The poetic quality of 10.12–13 and the enthusiastic conclusion in 10.14—"Never before or since was there a day like this"—heightens the impression that the writer is consciously hyperbolizing his hero. If we are dealing here with the epic form, the problem of the so-called miracle of the sun and moon may be an unreal problem. See SUN MIRACLES (IN THE BIBLE). The passage in 10.28–43, in its account of the campaign in southern Canaan, shows Joshua moving easily from one triumph to another. The whole thing comes off without a hitch because it is all happening at the command of Yahweh and by His help. This would seem to be the theological point of the epic story in this case. The picture presented in other parts of the book from ch. 13 through 21 shows that Joshua had far from finished the work of conquest. Such a picture points up the epic nature of these narratives in ch. 10–11 by way of contrast. In 11.23 it is stated: "Thus Joshua captured the whole country, just as the Lord had foretold to Moses. Joshua gave it to Israel as their heritage, apportioning it among the tribes. And the land enjoyed peace." Yet, a little further on in the book (13.1) God says to Joshua, "Though now you are old and advanced in years, a very large part of the land still remains to be conquered."

Geographical. Chapters 13–21 are heavily geographical. These long lists of place names can be boring to the modern reader, although they have not ceased to stimulate and challenge the archeologist and the cartographer. Whether or not one may speak of a special geographical form, it seems that these accounts were not set down merely for the sake of mapping out the story of the conquest and partitioning of Canaan. The repeated mention of these cities serves, like the memorial stones in the Jordan Valley, to remind the Israelites of Yahweh's favor and protection during the critical days when they were struggling to get a firm grip on the land He had promised them. In the more settled period of the Israelite monarchy and during the sad years of exile when the land had been lost, the believing Israelite could reflect on these long lists of cities and recall how dear his land really was. In some ways this section of the book, e.g., in 13.1, counteracts by its realism some of the exaggerations proper to the heroic stories in ch. 2–12. In other ways, the picture of Israel's possession of Canaan is also exaggerated in ch. 13–21. According to 13.1–7 Yahweh tells Joshua to portion out lands of which some, for instance those in the far north, probably never belonged to the Israelites at any time. These chapters were intended to give the Israelites who would read them not only a picture of what had happened but also a hope for the future that was nourished by the loving recital of the names of these cities. Yahweh had given them the land, so their faith convinced them; it must be a good land, fertile and spacious.

Deuteronomic. The supplementary ch. 22–24 that close the Book of Joshua are written in the style of Deuteronomy. The farewell discourse of Joshua in ch. 23 is similar in form to that of Moses in Dt 31.26–29. Joshua, in his old age, reviews the history of his people and promises that Yahweh will continue to protect them if they obey Him faithfully. He warns of terrible punishment in the event of disobedience. Characteristic of this discourse form is its tone of serious exhortation. It is addressed to the hearts of its readers and makes its appeal over and over. The plea to "remember" what Yahweh has done in the past and to be aware "today" of what He will do in the future is a part of this style. Chapter 24 duplicates ch. 23 to a large extent. It may well be that ch. 24, with its specific reference to Shechem, is the older of the two accounts of Joshua's farewell address. In ch. 24, too, the style of Deuteronomy can be felt in the review of salvation history, the reminder of Yahweh's faithful love, the exhortation to fear and obey Him, the warning against disobedience. Chapter 24 differs from ch. 23 mainly by being more specific geographically; it places the discourse at Shechem. It also leads more explicitly than ch. 23 to the renewal of the covenant. Chapter 24 is written in the style of Deuteronomy ch. 29–30. Because of the detail about Shechem, between Mt. GARIZIM and Mt. Ebal, Jos 24.1–15 may be an expansion by the DEUTERONOMISTS of the material in Jos 8.30–35, which already speaks of the sacrifice and the renewal of the covenant at those mountains in central Canaan in the early stages of the conquest.

Origin. The ancient Jewish and early Christian tradition that Joshua himself wrote this book has been universally abandoned. In Jos 24.26 the recording of laws in a book of the Law of the Lord is indeed attributed to Joshua, and in 5.1 (in the Hebrew text but not in translations) the writer speaks of "our crossing" the Jordan River; also, the "us" in 5.6 might imply that the writer was there. But these texts, in view of the tendency of the Israelites to identify themselves with the corporate personality of their ancestors, cannot be read as clear indications that Joshua wrote the book. The variety of literary elements that make up its contents shows that it was not written by one author but by many compilers. If Joshua wrote any of it, today it would seem impossible to isolate what he may have written. Rather, a rough history of the compilation of these materials can be sketched over a long period of time from the events that lie at the book's source (c. 1200 B.C.) to the time of the exile (c. 550 B.C.). The frequent repetition of the statement that some situation or other has continued "until this day" (4.9; 5.9; 6.25; etc.) heightens the impression that much of the material in this book took written shape long after the events described.

The idea was put forward for a while in recent times that the Book of Joshua formed the sixth book of a HEXATEUCH and that its contents could be analyzed in the same way as the PENTATEUCH into the four classical documents or traditions (Yahwist, Elohist, Deuteronomist, Priestly). But studies, by M. Noth especially, gave a new direction to this question. He developed the idea that the Book of Joshua belongs, not to the Pentateuch, but to a Deuteronomic corpus of writings running from Deuteronomy through Kings. The analysis of the formation of this book is now commonly made within the larger framework of the whole Deuteronomic corpus. Centering the attention here on the part of this corpus that is the Book of Joshua, the following reconstruction of its formation can be suggested.

Benjaminite traditions preserved at Galgal, along with scattered traditions from other parts of Palestine, were collected and organized in written form by a Judean about 900 B.C. to produce much of what is now in ch. 2–12. Chapters 13–21, which deal with the partitioning of the land, present a geography of Palestine that reflects various periods of Israelite history from David (d. 970 B.C.) to Josiah (d. 609 B.C.). The merging of these materials into the actual unit that is ch. 13–21 took place about 600 B.C. The Deuteronomist editors who did this work in the process of incorporating the Book of Joshua within the whole Deuteronomic corpus left traces of their editorial activity in ch. 1, which consciously connects the Book of Joshua with Deuteronomy. Also in Jos 8.30–35 such traces are to be found in repeated references to the Law and in the writer's concern to link the position of Joshua with that of Moses. Chapter 23 is best read as a Deuteronomist's reworking of the more detailed account in ch. 24.

Doctrine. If the Book of Joshua is a history, it is above all a religious history. Events are narrated in such a way as to make a point. The writer is concerned to present a teaching about Yahweh's action in Israel's life. A summary of this teaching can be given as follows.

The conquest of Canaan was due to Yahweh's power and His special guidance of Joshua, rather than to any purely human effort. Israel's possession of the land was the manifestation of Yahweh's loving fidelity to the Patriarchs, who had received His promise that their children would in fact one day possess this land. Continued possession of the land would depend on Israel's fidelity to Yahweh through obedience to the law of Sinai. Chapter 23 sums up the doctrine of the whole book with a special emphasis on its moral lesson: "If you transgress the covenant of the Lord, your God, which he enjoined on you, and serve other gods and worship them, the anger of the Lord will flare up against you and you will quickly perish from the good land which he has given you" (23.16).

From the standpoint of its doctrine, as well as that of its relevance for the modern world, the Book of Joshua poses some problems that seem far more troublesome than the historical problem raised by the archeology of Jericho and Ai. A major one is the book's attitude toward the wars of extermination that the writer attributes to the command of Yahweh. In what sense did Yahweh will and command the killing of the men, women, and children of Canaan? Joshua's way of waging war was of a piece with the customs of warfare in ancient Egypt, Mesopotamia, Moab, and Europe. Yahweh manifests and accomplishes His will in a wide variety of ways, sometimes through the sinful actions of men in war. According to the Bible's way of speaking, what later theologians call God's permissive will is spoken of in terms of divine commands. Against this background one may understand the "divine commands" underlying Joshua's wars of extermination. Yahweh permitted Joshua's objectively immoral killings in order to accomplish His purpose of punishing the Canaanites for their idolatry, fulfilling His promise to give Canaan to the Israelites, and removing from them some of the danger of idolatrous worship. The author of the book, precisely in order to insist on the fact that these divine purposes were being accomplished in the actions of Joshua, expressed Yahweh's permissive will as divine command. The author neither denied nor affirmed the guilt of Joshua for these massacres; possibly because such a judgment would not have served his purpose in writing the book, possibly because the writer simply did not know what judgment to make. It has been said that modern men must not too quickly point an accusing finger at Joshua or at the writer of the book that bears his name, since men have developed or allowed to develop ways of making war that have proved far more destructive of human life than anything known in the ancient world. This is true. But it does not remove the problem of the link between Joshua's wars of extermination and the will of God. Perhaps one of the greatest values of the book for the modern world is precisely its function in stimulating thought about this intense modern problem.

Bibliography: Commentaries. F. M. ABEL, Le Livre de Josué (Bible de Jérusalem 6; 1950). D. BALDI, Giosuè (Turin 1952). F. NÖSTSCHER, Das Buch Josue (Echter Bibel: Die Hl. Schrift in deutscher Übersetzung Würzburg 1947). M. NOTH, Das Buch Josua (2d ed. Handbuch Zum Alten Testament 1:7; 1953). Articles. P. AUVRAY, Dictionnaire de la Bible, supplement ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:1131–41. J. SCHARBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1145–46. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, translated and adapted by L. HARTMAN (New York, 1963) 1218–22. L. ROST and W. WERBECK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:873–874.

[M. STRANGE]

JOSHUA, SON OF NUN

Joshua, son of Nun and protagonist of the Book of Joshua, is the most prominent of several Biblical persons who bore the name Joshua in the Old Testament period. The meaning of his name (Heb. yehōshua' and in post-exilic times yēšūa'), "Yahweh saves," is not exploited in the Book of Joshua, as it is exploited implicitly in Nm 13.16 and much more clearly later in Sir 46.1. In the Septuagint he is called Ἰησοῦς, JESUS.

Biblical Portrait. In the book that bears his name, Joshua overshadows all the other human figures in the story of the conquest and division of the Holy Land. In ch. 1 he is seen as the man who, by Yahweh's will, steps into the role of Moses, whose death is described in the closing chapter of Deuteronomy. The continuity of leadership and Yahweh's presence with Moses are thus established in the early history of Israel.

The book pictures Joshua as a man fearless in battle, not because of his own strength and courage, but because of the powerful presence of Yahweh. Convinced that Israel's success in the struggle for possession of Canaan would be due entirely to the will of Yahweh, Joshua took drastic steps when he thought Yahweh's will was being opposed. The death of Achan and his family in ch. 7 exemplifies this uncompromising side of his character.

In ch. 8 Joshua is seen as an expert military strategist whose ability is attributed to the guidance of Yahweh. In ch. 9 he appears as a man true to his own promised word even though the promise had been spoken as the result of a trick on the part of the Gabaonites. In ch. 10 he thrills to his victory over the AMORRITE KINGS, but he gives credit to Yahweh as the one who fought and conquered for Israel. He killed these chiefs in a way that was in keeping with the chilling description of his war policies in Jos 10.40—sparing no one, but the massacre of every living soul. At times he needed encouragement in face of great opposition (Jos 11.6).

In general, the first part of the book (ch. 1–12) presents Joshua's work of conquering Canaan as coming off without any doubt of the outcome. The setback at Ai was remedied as soon as the offending Achan was destroyed. The general picture in Yahweh's name and by His power, moving easily from one triumph to another throughout the whole land of Canaan. As will be seen, this picture must be altered when the life of Joshua is examined from a critical historical point of view.

The second part of the book (ch. 13–21), which deals with the division of the land among the Israelite tribes, does not add much to the earlier chapters' portrait of Joshua, except a stress on his wisdom and fairness in seeing to the distribution of the land.

The farewell addresses in the supplementary conclusions to the book (ch. 22–24) show Joshua as a man deeply concerned about the people's loyalty and obedience to Yahweh and deeply aware of Yahweh's own fidelity in making good all His promises. In the summary of salvation history that is given in ch. 24 Joshua appears as a leader who had a remarkable respect for the people's freedom to choose between Yahweh and the other gods.

Other books of the Old Testament help to fill in the picture of Joshua. According to Ex 17.9–10, Joshua was Moses' attendant and the commander of the Israelite battle forces in the desert skirmishes before Sinai. In Ex 24.13–14 Joshua is placed in close association with Moses during the latter's communion with Yahweh. In Nm 11.27–29 Joshua is shown as jealous for Moses when he thinks that Moses' position as prophet is being threatened by the prophetic spirit stirring among the people. In Nm 14.5–7 Joshua, along the Caleb, get credit for giving the right advice about marching in against the land they have scouted, though this advice went unheeded. In Nm 28.18–23 the authority of Moses passes on to Joshua, who is described as a man fit for this role. According to 32.6–15 Caleb and Joshua were the only ones among the men who came out of Egypt who would actually enter the promised land because they were faithful to Yahweh. According to Dt 1.37–38 Moses, who admitted that he himself would not enter, considered it his mission to encourage Joshua, whose work it would be to lead the desert-born generation into their possession. When Dt 34.7–9 describes the transfer of Israel's allegiance from Moses to Joshua, the new leader is said to be full of the spirit of wisdom. In 1 Chr 7.27 it is stated that a Joshua, son of Nun, belonged to the Joseph tribe of Ephraim, an interesting fact in connection with the special treatment given by Joshua to the Joseph tribes (Joshua ch. 17). According to Jos 19.49–50 Joshua's hometown, Timnath-erah, which later was to be his burial place (Jos 24.30), lay in the mountains of Ephraim. In Sir 46.1–6 Joshua is praised for his ability as a soldier, his prophetic activity, and in a general way for living up to his name as a savior of his people.

This Old Testament portrait of Joshua is carried over to the New Testament and given a new dimension in Heb 4.8–11; with the same Greek name, he is compared with the new Jesus who leads His people all the way to the perfect rest as Joshua had done in his imperfect way.

Criticism of the Biblical Portrait. An analysis of the literary forms of the Book of Joshua and of the archeological facts about such cities as Jericho leads to an alteration of the Biblical portrait of Joshua. The epic or saga form, which is prominent in the Book of Joshua, is characterized by its hyperbolizing and simplifying tendencies. Its simplifying tendency is seen when it attributes the whole work of the conquest to Joshua, thereby playing down or neglecting altogether any other human agents. Its hyperbolizing tendency is evident when it pictures the conquest as a triumphant movement from one victory to another without any doubt of the final outcome. In Jos 11.23 this side of the picture is summed up by saying that Joshua conquered the whole land and then distributed it among the various tribes of Israel. However, the statement in Jos 13.1 about the amount of work that remained to be done even when Joshua was an old man fits the setting supposed by the Book of Judges and points up the exaggerating tendencies of the first 12 chapters of the Book of Joshua.

If one ask what Joshua really had to do with the conquest, no fully satisfactory answer can be given. That a man whom the Bible calls Joshua, son of Nun, had something important to do with the Israelite people's entry into Canaan in the 13th century B.C. seems beyond reasonable questioning. Exodus and Numbers show that Moses was concerned about his successor. Deuteronomy records the tradition about the way the problem of succession was handled. As far as the actual conquest is concerned, the Book of Joshua places most of his activity in central Palestine, which fits the statement of 1 Chr 7.27 that Joshua belonged to the Joseph tribe of Ephraim. The saga form would build on a core of fact. If central Palestine was the scene of Joshua's real battles and victories, the Israelite storyteller could start with this fact and expand it into a picture of Joshua taking over the whole of Canaan. The statement in Jos 13.1 that even when Joshua's battles were all over "very much" of the land still remained to be conquered provides a sobering balance in the attempt to answer the question about what really happened. The archeological problem about Jericho's apparent nonhabitation during the whole period in which Joshua's activity must be placed (the second half of the 13th century B.C.) further complicates the historical question. Only conjectural answers can be given. While one can affirm Joshua's importance in the conquest phase of Israel's history, it must be admitted that an exact delineation of his activity is impossible.

Joshua's Place in Salvation History. More important and possible than determining exactly what Joshua did is an understanding of his place in the theology of the Old Testament writers. Joshua stands forever in the shadow of Moses. This fact does not diminish him. It highlights his indispensable role as the man who led the people all the way into the Holy Land. Through Joshua's activity as well as that of Moses, Yahweh's loving fidelity was manifested as He saved His people from Egypt and the desert and brought them into the land He had promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

Iconography. The many events narrated in the Book of Joshua gave artists copious material to work with. Such scenes as Joshua's crossing the Jordan, his siege and capture of Jericho and Ai, and victory over the Amorite kings are frequently represented. Among the best-known cycles of these scenes are the 4th-century mosaics in St. Mary Major, Rome; the famous Joshua Scroll in the Vatican Library from c. A.D. 800 and the 13th-century Psalter of St. Louis in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris.

Bibliography: H. H. ROWLEY, From Joseph to Joshua (London 1950). J. SCHARBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche<sup>2</sup>, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:1145. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 1212–18. For additional bibliography see JOSHUA, BOOK OF. Iconography. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 1.2:219–227. K. KÜNSTLE, Iconographie der christlichen Kunst, 2 v. (Freiburg 1926–28) 1:301–302.

[M. STRANGE]

JOSIPPON

A medieval Hebrew chronicle of Jewish history from Adam to the end of the first Jewish revolt, consisting essentially of a partly abbreviated, partly expanded translation of Hegesippus, the free Latin version of Flavius Josephus's Jewish War. Josippon means "the Little Josippus," Josippus (like Hegesippus) being a Latin form of the historian's name. Because of the inadequacy of published information on the MS tradition of the text and its earliest versions, little is certain about the compiler, his sources, and the original extent of his work.

In its vulgate form, Josippon starts with an introduction covering Jewish history from Adam to the Seleucids, with digressions on Roman, Persian, and Macedonian history. The OT, Josephus's Antiquities, and Jewish legend have all contributed to this section, which contains in addition a form of the Alexander Romance dependent upon the 12th-century redaction of Leo the Archpresbyter's Latin version of Pseudo-Callisthenes. This last is demonstrably a later addition to the original work. The remainder of the book treats of Jewish history from the Machabean period until A.D. 73. The author's basic source here is Hegesippus, with additions from the Latin translations of Josephus's other works—his Life, of which no Latin version existed, is not used. Other details are taken from 2 Maccabees, which Josephus himself never used, and still others from Jewish oral tradition.

The unknown author claims to be Flavius JOSEPHUS (ben Mattathiah), but confuses him with Joseph ben Gorion (cf. Hegesippus 3.3.2, ed. V. Ussani, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 66.187.12–14), and so calls himself Joseph ben Gorion. Occasionally, Pseudo-Josephus, forgetting his role, expressly cites Josephus.

Internal evidence suggests southern Italy as the place of composition, and some form of Josippon is attested there c. A.D. 950. Thereafter it rapidly gained popularity, being often cited by Jewish scholars and translated into other languages used by the Jews. It was well known not only among Jews; a 10th-century Arabic version by Zakariya ibn Sa'id was used by Muslim historians and, in part, by Christians of Egypt. From the Arabic an Ethiopic version was made (probably 12th–14th century) and was highly regarded by the Ethiopic church, which until the 16th century had no text of Maccabees. A Slavonic version also was made, and translations into French, German, and English show its popularity among Christians.

Bibliography: The poorer two of the three Hebrew text-types have been published. The Mantuan editio princeps was reprinted by D. Günzburg and A. Kahana (Berdiczew 1896–1913); all other printings give the Constantinople vulgate text. A critical edition is by D. FLUSSER. M. KAMIL, Des Josef Ben Gorion (Josippon) Geschichte der Juden (Zēna 'Ayhūd) (New York 1938), contains the Ethiopic text and a comparison with the Arabic. On the Arabic, which, like the Slavonic, still needs scientific editing, see also G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur, 5 v. (Studi e Testi 118, 133, 146, 147, 172; Vatican City 1944–53) 1:221–223. Literature. S. W. BARON, A Social and Religious History of the Jews, 8 v. (2nd ed. New York 1952–58; index 1960) 6:189–195, 417–421. E. SCHÜRER, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, tr. J. MACPHERSON et al., 5 v. (Edinburgh 1897–98) 1.1:165–166.

[J. STRUGNELL]

JOUARRE-EN-BRIE, ABBEY OF

French abbey of Benedictine nuns, Diocese of Meaux. The foundation of Jouarre-en-Brie between 630 and 634 was sponsored by Bl. Adon, former treasurer to King Clotaire II. Originally it was a double monastery for monks and nuns, the former coming from LUXEUIL. The nuns eventually took over the entire foundation. The abbess enjoyed full seignorial authority over the abbatial domains. In Carolingian times the abbey was a famous school for girls of the nobility. From 1225 to 1690 the abbess, always of the highest nobility, exercised a quasi-episcopal authority over the parishes on her estates, appointing the pastors and maintaining a chapter of 12 canons in the abbey, who served as chaplains. The abbey was sacked three times during the Hundred Years' War. The ruined and depopulated house was reformed in 1523, but the subsequent religious wars precipitated another decline. Abbess Charlotte of Bourbon, who had been forced to enter the convent by her family, escaped in 1572 and embraced Protestantism. Early in the 17th century the church and convent were magnificently rebuilt by Abbess Jeanne of Lorraine. Later Abbess Henriette of Lorraine was involved in a famous debate with Bishop BOSSUET of Meaux and was forced to relinquish many of her privileges. The French Revolution suppressed the abbey in 1791. The church was destroyed but the convent was reoccupied by Benedictine nuns in 1837.

Bibliography: J. B. BOSSUET, Oeuvres complètes, 48 v. (Paris 1828–31) 30:187–323. H. THIERCELIN, Le monastère de Jouarre, son histoire jusqu'à la Révolution (Paris 1861). U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Topobibliographie, 2 v. (Paris 1894–1903) 1:1577. L'Abbaye royale Notre-Dame de Jouarre, 2 v. (Paris 1961). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1489–90.

[L. J. LEKAI]

JOUBERT, EUGÉNIE, BL.

Religious of the Holy Family of the Sacred Heart; b. Feb. 11, 1876, Ysingeaux, France; d. July 2, 1904, Liège, Belgium. In 1895, Joubert joined the new congregation of the Soeurs de la Sainte-Famille de Sacré-Coeur, founded at Puy by Mère Marie Ignace Melin. She taught catechism to small children at Saint-Denis and Aubervilliers to carefully prepare them for their First Confession and Communion until her health failed. From that time she was assigned to Liège, where she died at age 28 after a two-year illness. She is known for her devotion to the Sacred Heart and her practice of the "Little Way." Joubert was beatified by John Paul II, Nov. 20, 1994.

Bibliography: J. BOUFLET, Le charisme et la catéchèse (Paris 1998).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

JOURNET, CHARLES

Swiss cardinal and theologian; b. Vernier near Geneva, Jan. 26, 1891, d. Fribourg, April 15, 1975. After classical studies in Geneva and Mariahilf College, Schwyz, and St. Michael's College, Fribourg, he entered the diocesan major seminary in Fribourg. Ordained to the priesthood on July 15, 1917, he was appointed professor of dogmatic theology in the same seminary on Sept. 25, 1924, and remained on the faculty until 1970. In 1926 he founded with F. Charrière the theological journal Nova et vetera, of which he remained the editor for most of his career. In 1965 he was named titular archbishop and cardinal. He was a member of the preconiliar theological commission for VATICAN COUNCIL II and made several significant interventions during the council. In addition to his theological teaching and writing he was also active in other pastoral activities in both Geneva and Fribourg, where he is remembered for his humility and gracious wit. He maintained a lifelong friendship and correspondence with Jacques Maritain.

Journet is customarily identified with the THOMISM practiced by J. MARITAIN, E. GILSON, and the French Dominicans generally. Indeed, he describes his masterwork as "a comprehensive work in which I hope to explain the church, from the standpoint of speculative theology, in terms of the four causes from which she results—efficient, material, formal and final. This work is to be in four books" (The Church of the Word Incarnate. An Essay in Speculative Theology, v. 1, The Apostolic Hierarchy, tr. by A. H. C. Downes [New York 1955] xxv). Unfortunately only this first volume appeared in English. The original French, L'Église du Verbe incarné was published in Paris by Desclée de Brouwer et Cie. in 1941, 1951, and 1969. While remaining deeply indebted to St. Thomas, he posed significant challenges to the NEO-SCHOLASTICISM of his time. Although ecclesiology was his speciality, Cardinal Journet's works indicate his other interests: L'Esprit du Protestantisme (Paris 1925) and L'Union des Églises (Paris 1927); mysticism and the knowledge of God, The Dark Knowledge of God, tr. J. F. Anderson (London 1948) and Introduction à la Théologie (Paris 1947); and The Primacy of Peter from the Protestant and from the Catholic Point of View, tr. John Chapin (Westminster, Md., 1954); and the Christian-Muslim dialogue, Théologie de l'Église (Paris 1958) and "Qui est membre de l'Église," Nova et vetera, 36 (1961) 199–203; and The Meaning of Evil, tr. Michael Barry

(New York 1963), which are still significant. Journet and Yves Congar carried on a prolonged discussion about the status of the sinner in the holy Church from 1953 when Congar reviewed v. 2 of La Théologie du Verbe incarné. These reviews and other remarks by Congar have been collected in Journet's Sainte Église (Paris 1963) 618–669. According to Journet, as late as 1965, "the church is indeed not without sinners, but it is without sin." See his "Il carattere teandrico della Chiesa fonte di tensione permanente," in G. Baraúna, ed., La Chiesa del Vaticano II (Florence 1965) 361. Congar, on the other hand, expressed what is today the more commonly accepted view that the Church itself is sinful, thus avoiding awkward distinctions between sinful member and holy Church, which end up making the Church not a real, historical People of God, but an imaginary construct.

Cardinal Journet will be justly remembered for his contributions to the theological model of the Church as the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST. His Thomistic background enabled him to maintain the balance between the Church's visible and invisible dimensions, which had been so severely sundered in previous theology. Likewise, his Thomistic sacramental insight enabled him to understand that the ecclesial institution and structure form the sacramentum of the more mystical inner life of grace of the Church. His ECCLESIOLOGY was a significant contribution to the spirit and theology which matured at Vatican II.

Journet is perhaps found by the generation after his death to be too conceptualist, too "scholastic," too beholden to abstract thought. His true spirit, however, is better indicated by the dedication of his masterwork not only to the Doctors Augustine and Thomas but also to the Virgin Catherine of Siena, and especially by a quotation from the Persian Bisthami, which concludes his The Dark Knowledge of God (122): "For thirty years I travelled in search of God, and when, at the end of this time, I opened my eyes, I saw that it was He Who sought me. A voice cried to me: O Abu Yazid, what is it you desire? I replied: I desire to desire nothing, for I am the desired and You are He Who desires!"

Bibliography: S. JAKI, Les tendances nouvelles de l'écclésiologie (Rome 1957). D. M. DOYLE, "Journet, Congar, and the Roots of Communion Ecclesiology," Theological Studies, 58 (Sept. 1997) 461–479. P.-M. EMONET, "Le Cardinal Journet: Portrait intérieur (Chambray-les-Tours 1983). L. MÉROZ, Le Cardinal Journet, ou La sainte théologie (Lausanne 1981). P. CHENAUX, ed., Charles Journet (1891–1975): Un théologien en son siècle: Actes du colloque de Genève, 1991 (Fribourg 1992).

[R. KRESS/D. M. DOYLE]

JOY

Understood in a strict sense, a pleasant state of quiescence in which the will rests satisfied in a good object (thing, person, action) that has been desired and is now possessed or has been accomplished (rational or spiritual joy). Such joy is proper to rational creatures because it requires an intellectual, reflexive awareness that the good has been attained; joy is distinguished from delight (delectatio), which can be experienced by nonrational creatures and by man in his nonrational faculties (Thomas Aquinas, ST 1a2ae, 31.3). In a broader sense, the feeling of pleasure or delight that is experienced when the sensitive appetite has attained a good for which it has been striving may be called joy (sensible joy). From this point of view, joy may be considered either as the pleasurable end product (as described above) or the passion (emotion) of joy from which the pleasant experience proceeds. Thus joy is one of the 11 basic passions (emotions) listed by St. Thomas (ST 1a2ae, 23.1 and 4). More precisely it is the third of the concupiscible (i.e., mild or ordinary) passions. Its object is a simple good, i.e., a good apprehended on a nonintellectual level without reference to difficulty involved in its attainment. Its product or termination is a pleasant state of quiescence in the good that is possessed.

Joy is also one of the fruits of the Holy Spirit listed by St. Paul (Gal 5.22). These fruits are derivatives of human actions performed under the influence of the virtues and of the gifts of the Holy Spirit that cause a certain intimate delight in the soul of the doer. Joy as a fruit of the Holy Spirit corresponds to the gift of understanding (ST 2a2ae, 8.8).

Either rational or sensible joy is morally good when the object, the possession of which causes the joy, is morally acceptable and has been attained by good means. Conversely, joy is morally bad if it is occasioned by an object that is morally bad or has been attained by evil means.

The highest and most complete joy of which man is capable is the spiritual joy resulting from the blessed vision of God.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a2ae 23, 25, 31; 2a2ae 28. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT Tables générales 2673–74. E. SCHICK and A. AUER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:361–363. G. MANISE, F. ROBERTI et al., Dictionary of Moral Theology, ed. P. PALAZZINI et al., tr. H. J. YANNONE et al., from 2d Ital. Ed. (Westminster, MD 1962) 663–664. P. NOBLE L'Amitié avec Dieu (new ed. Paris 1932).

[P. CURRAN]

JOYEUSE, HENRI, DUC DE

Comte du Bouchage, Capuchin Friar Minor, known in religion as Ange de Joyeuse, a notable figure in the civil and religious life of France at the end of the 16th and beginning of 17th centuries; b. Couiza, Languedoc, September or October, 1562; d. Rivoli, Sept. 28, 1608. He was the third son of Guillaume de Joyeuse, lieutenant general for the king in Languedoc. His family was staunchly Catholic and loyalist, a fact that greatly influenced his career. In 1577 he entered the College of Navarre and from there, following his two elder brothers, joined the mignons, the exclusive circle of friends surrounding Henri III. He was appointed Grand Master of the Royal Wardrobe in 1579, and won distinction that year in a military engagement at La Fère. The king influenced him to marry Catherine de Nogaret de la Valette, sister of the Duke of Épernon. From this marriage a daughter was born. As governor of Anjou, in 1585 Joyeuse took the town of Angers without loss from Condé's troops, for which he was awarded the governorship of Touraine, Maine, and Perche. His wife died in August of 1587, and he, having never become attached to a worldly career, entered the Capuchins in Paris the next month. The year following his profession in 1588, he was ordained, and he went to Italy to study theology. He returned to France, but was drawn from the cloister to partake actively in the Wars of Religion.

After the death of his three brothers, the people of Toulouse desired a Joyeuse to lead them. Cardinal François de Joyeuse, Archbishop of Narbonne, refused on the ground of military inexperience; it was left to Père Ange, now rightful duke of Joyeuse, to become leader of the League in Languedoc. Ange accepted in 1592, provided that he received papal approval. Meanwhile he began reorganizing the local forces of the League. His position was eventually regularized by Clement VIII, who sanctioned his exclaustation and transference to the company of priests of the Order of Malta. In 1596 he was reconciled to Henry IV, who appointed him Lieutenant-governor of Languedoc and marshal of France. He reentered the Capuchins on March 25, 1599. His remaining years were spent in the apostolate and in the office of provincial, to which he was appointed twice. He was much appreciated as a preacher and spiritual adviser, his teaching being influenced evidently by Benedict of Canfield (William Benedict FITCH). In 1608, while attending the general chapter of his Order in Rome, he was elected a definitor general, the first non-Italian to be so promoted. He died on the way back to France and was buried in the Rue St. Honoré, Paris.

Bibliography: J. BROUSSE, The Lives of Ange de Joyeuse and Benet Canfield, ed. T. A. BIRRELL from R. ROCKWOOD'S tr. of 1623

(New York 1959). FATHER CUTHBERT, The Capuchins, 2 v. (London 1928). L. DE GONZAGUE, Le Père Ange de Joyeuse, Frère Mineur Capucin, Maréchal de France, 1563–1608 (Paris 1928). AGATHANGE DE PARIS, Un Cas de jurisprudence pontificale: Le P. Ange de Joyeuse, Capucin et Maréchal de France (Assisi 1936). Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 73–74 gives full bibliography.

[C. REEL]

JUAN DE LOS ANGELES

Franciscan Observant, mystical theologian, court preacher; b. probably near Oropesa (Ávila), 1536; d. Madrid?, 1609. Juan de Los Angeles (Martinez) studied at the University of Alcalá, and after joining the Friars Minor sometime before 1562 was transferred to the Province of San José (Madrid). He spent the rest of his life preaching, confessing, writing, and traveling on foot in Spain and abroad. He was spiritual director to the Infanta, Sor Margarita de la Cruz (a nun) and preacher to the royal chapter of her mother, the Empress Maria. In 1601, having served as guardian of San Antonio in Guadalajara (1595) and of San Bernardino in Madrid (1598), he was elected provincial minister of San José, but resigned in 1603 because of ill health. He remained active, however, until his death. His writings may be classified as Neoplatonic, affective, and psychological; they deal with such problems as the absorption of the soul in God, love without knowledge (which he seems to admit), active and passive recollection, kinds of ecstasy, mystical phenomena, and spiritual enslavement to Mary. His works, which are numerous and have appeared in many editions and translations, include: Triunfos del amor de Dios (Medina 1589–90), Conquista del reino de Dios (Madrid 1595), Lucha espiritual y amorosa (Madrid 1600), Tratado de las soberanos misterios . . . de la misa (Madrid 1604), Cofradia y devoción de las esclavas y esclavos de . . . Virgen María (Alcalá 1608?), and the Manual de vida perfecta (Madrid 1608).

Bibliography: JUAN DE LOS ANGELES, Obras místicas, ed. J. SALA, 2 v. (Madrid 1912–17); Fray Juan de los Angeles (Antología), ed. J. DOMÍNGUEZ BERRUETA (Madrid 1940). M. MENÉNDEZ-PELAYO, Historia de las ideas estéticas en España (4th ed. Madrid 1928—) 3. J. DOMÍNGUEZ BERRUETA, Fray Juan de los Angeles (Madrid 1927). A. TORRÓ, Fray Juan de los Angeles, místico-psicólogo, 2 v. (Barcelona 1924). F. DE ROS, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al., (Paris 1932—) 2.2:2015–16; “La Vie et l’oeuvre de Jean Anages,” Mélanges offerts au R. P. Ferdinand Cavallera (Toulouse 1948) 405–423. Místicos Franciscanos españoles, 3 v. (Madrid 1948–49) 3:461–701. E. A. PEERS, Spanish Mysticism; A Preliminary Survey (New York 1924); Studies of the Spanish Mystics, 2 v. (London 1927–30) 1:347–405.

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

JUAN DIEGO, BL.

According to tradition, the name of the Native Mexican to whom the Virgin Mary appeared at Tepeyac, a hill outside of Mexico City, on Dec. 9, 1531. According to this same tradition, Juan Diego’s given name was Cuauhtlatotzin, and he was born around 1474 in Cuautitlán, about 20 kilometers north of Tenochtitlán (Mexico City). He was married but had no children. When he and his wife were baptized in 1524, he took the name Juan Diego, and his wife the name María Lucía. The earliest written account (1649) of the apparitions, the Nican Mopohua, calls him a macehualli (poor Indian). In 1666 when a formal ecclesiastical inquiry was made into the apparitions, Juan Diego was described as being devout and religious even before his conversion. After this, he was said to have walked weekly to Tenochtitlán to attend Mass and receive catechetical instruction. When his wife died in 1529, he went to live with his uncle, Juan Bernardino. Juan Diego was 57 at the time of the apparitions and from then on he lived in a small room attached to the chapel that housed the image of OUR LADY OF GUADALUPE, as its custodian. He is said to have received special permission from the bishop to receive communion three times a week. He died on May 30, 1548 at 78 years of age.

Juan Diego was recognized as blessed by means of an equivalent beatification on May 6, 1990, at the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe in the presence of Pope John Paul II with the reading of a decree from the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints. It recognized that public devotion to Juan Diego was a long tradition, approved an obligatory memorial for the archdiocese of Mexico City and an optional memorial for other dioceses. The decree set December 9, the date of the first apparition, as the day for the memorial.

Although there are written accounts from the 16th century that mention both the shrine and devotion to the Virgin of Guadalupe, the first written mention of Juan Diego is in the above cited Nican Mopohua. This so called silencio guadalupano of over a century has led some, including the abbot of the Basilica of Guadalupe, Msgr. Guillermo Shulemberg Prado, and the Vincentian historian Stafford Poole, to question the historicity of Juan Diego. This view caused a certain amount of controversy in 1996 and led to the resignation of the abbot. In 2000, Asunción Garcia Samper of the Center of Guadalupe Studies published a book proving the historicity of Bl. Juan Diego, as a nobleman. This information will be used during Juan Diego’s now-advanced cause for canonization.

Feast: Dec. 9.

Bibliography: V. ELIZONDO, Guadalupe: Mother of the New Creation (Maryknoll, NY 1997). R. NEBEL, Santa María Tonantzin

Pilgrims on their knees in front of the shrine to Our Lady of Guadalupe, where Juan Diego claimed to have had visions of the Virgin Mary in 1531. (©Hulton Getty/Liason Agency)

Virgen de Guadalupe: Continuidad y transformación religiosa en México. tr. C. W. BUSTILLOS (Mexico City 1995). Center of Guadalupe Studies, El Mensajero de la Virgen (Mexico City 2000). S. POOLE, Our Lady of Guadalupe: The Origins and Sources of a Mexican National Symbol, 1531–1797 (Tucson 1995). The Story of Guadalupe: Luis Laso de la Vega's Huei tlamahuicolitica of 1649, ed. and tr. L. SOUSA, S. POOLE, and J. LOCKHART (Stanford 1998).

[J. A. RUBIO]

JUANA DE LA CRUZ

Franciscan tertiary and mystic, often referred to as “Madre” or “Santa.” b. Juana Vázquez Gutiérrez, daughter of Juan Vázquez and Catalina Gutiérrez, in Azaña, near Toledo, in 1481; d. 1534. At the age of 15 she entered the beaterio of Santa Maria de la Cruz near the town of Cubas, between Madrid and Toledo. This was a religious house of women, founded as a result of apparitions of the Virgin Mary, which followed the rule of the Secular Third Order of Saint Francis. It would later become a cloistered monastery and follow the rule of the Regular Third Order of Saint Francis until 1970 when it adopted the Rule of Saint Clare. In 1509, when she was 28, Juana was elected abbess and embarked upon a program of refounding and spiritual leadership that, with few interruptions, lasted until her death in 1534.

Her influence is most evidenced in her spiritual teachings especially in her sermons which were eventually written down and comprise the book El libro del conorte (The Book of Consolation). These sermons reflect a stylized form that includes a novel retelling of a gospel pericope, descriptions of allegorical pageants that take place in heaven on major feasts, and interpretations pertinent to those seeking spiritual growth. People of all classes, including Cardinal Cisneros, the confessor to Queen Isabella, and the Emperor, came to hear her.

In 1621 Mother Juana's beatification process was officially opened in Rome. She was declared "venerable" in 1630, but the official process was never concluded. The cause for her formal canonization was reopened in 1986 and is still in process.

Bibliography: I. GARCIA DE ANDRES, La Santa Juana, Grande y Legítima Maestra Franciscana (Separata de "Vedad y Vida" 1994). R. SURTZ, The Guitar of God: Gender, Power and Authority in the Visionary World of Mother Juan de la Cruz (Philadelphia 1990); Writing Women in Late Medieval and Early Modern Spain: The Mothers of Teresa of Avila (Philadelphia 1995).

[G. SCHINELLI]

JUBILEE YEAR

Israelite institution to be kept on every seventh Sabbath year by restoring alienated lands, freeing Hebrew slaves, and abstaining from sowing and harvesting. (On this "fallow" and on "slave-release," see SABBATH YEAR.) In the OT the jubilee year is treated only in Lv 25.8 to 25.55, with secondary references in Lv 27.17 to 27.21 and Nm 36.4.

Meaning of the Name. The jubilee year is called šēnat hayyōbēl (the yōbēl) in Lv 25.13, 28, 40, 50, hayyōbēl (the yōbēl) in Lv 25.15, 28, 30, and simply yōbēl in 25.10 to 25.12. In Ex 19.13 the word yōbēl (?Phoenician "ram") stands for the ram's horn (qeren yōbēl) blown as a trumpet (šōpār), as is clear from Jos 6.5 to 6.13. According to the common explanation, therefore, the jubilee year was called šēnat hayyōbēl (year of the ram's horn) because it was inaugurated by the blowing of a ram's horn trumpet. However, in the only passage that mentions this manner of opening the jubilee year (Lv 25.9) the horn that is blown is called simply a šōpar (trumpet), not a yōbēl.

Hence, some scholars hold that originally the term yōbēl as used in šēnat yōbēl has no connection with the ram's horn trumpet, but was a synonym for dērôr (release, LXX áphesis) used in Lv 25.10; Ez 46.17 (šēnat dērôr, year of release; Is 61.1 áphesis; so now Lemche, Carmichael; Ringe; Kutsch. ybl Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65). The late Greek loanword ἰωβηλαῖος, from Heb. yōbēl, should have produced a Latin loanword in the form of jobelaeus; but by a mistaken etymology, as if the word were connected with Latin jubilum (backwoods gaiety, joyous shouting), the word turned out in Latin as jobilaeus, whence English jubilee.

Legislation. According to Lv 25.8, the jubilee year is to be celebrated on every seventh SABBATH year, and it is thus expressly stated as ending a cycle of 49 years; when it is called "the 50th year" in 25.10, this should be understood as merely a round number, since two fallow years in a row would hardly be plausible (pace Josephus). The jubilee year, though a joyful homecoming, is to begin on the Day of Atonement (25.9).

Legislation for the jubilee year, a uniformizing development of various seventh-year laws, aims essentially to protect the small farmer against monopolizing landholders, by contriving that all land shall ultimately remain forever in the same "family." But counterproductively this means "the few important clans to whom each plot was assigned" (presumably by Joshua—and to be retrieved by the returnees from exile). But repurchase-right of a wealthier brother (go'el Lv 25.25–28) could over some generations result in huge monopolistic landholdings.

The precept given in 25.10, 13, "Every one of you shall return to your own estate and family," may have referred originally to an ancient homecoming celebration. But in 25.14 to 25.17, 25.23 to 25.31, this is interpreted to mean that title to a foreclosed mortgage is to be regained in the jubilee year, in (or after) the seventh seventh-year debt release called šēmittâ in Dt 15.1 to 15.9, and akin to Ex 21.2.8 in the Covenant Code. Apparently the final redactor of the Jubilee law judged that an indenture terminated after only seven years was so impractical that the social-justice aim would be better served by imposing as a last resort a definitive manumission in the seventh-seventh year (Lv 25.40–41). Similarly for the prohibition of retaining, beyond a certain period, any pledge or gage, such as fields (mortgages or nonliving gages) or children (live gages: 2 Kgs 4.1; Neh 5.5), preference is indicated for the six- or seven-year limit (cf. Dt 15.1), but in the legislation for the jubilee year a period seven times as long is tolerated as more realistic (Lv 25.35–55).

Recent researches on the growth of biblical-era cities force reevaluation of the real-life status of the small farmer reduced by debt to a tenant—"slave," who is plainly the proximate concern of the jubilee law. It has been assumed that he continues to occupy and till the same plot, but now for an absentee owner. But sociological statistics (V. Fritz 1995, F. Frick 1977, both titled The City in Ancient Israel; Lemche, Early Israel 1985) on the proportion of the total "agrarian" population living in cities make it likely that many of those working either their own or an absentee-owner's farm really lived in one of the 48 major cities (all called "levitical!"). As much as one fourth of the 16-hour work day might have been required simply to plod an ox to work and back. This would hold also for both small-owners and free hired laborers. On the other hand, the new "owner" may well have lived on his acquired property, either alongside or without his (“slave”) tenant.

At least in its present form the legislation on the jubilee year, which was drawn up by the Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS, is postexilic. For the framing of a festive calendar, a sort of moral unity of the separate cases of debt servitudes, pictured as expiring on the seventh Sabbath year after the first entry into the Holy Land (cf. 25.2), was visualized from the viewpoint of the end of the Exile. To this liturgical framework belong such casuistic ramifications as Lv 25.32 to 25.34; 27.17 to 27.21; Nm 36.4. The primary theological value is inculcated in Lv 25.23: only God is the true owner of all the land, which He decrees is to be utilized as private property, yet is to be managed (nowadays taking into account that small farming is uneconomical), so that all the world’s population may have reasonable access to its resources.

See Also: HOLY YEAR.

Bibliography: R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 175–77. T. SEIDL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. W. KASPAR et al. (Freiburg 1993–2001), 5: 854–56. C. WRIGHT, Anchor Bible Dictionary 5 (1992), 857–61. D. BERGANT, “Jubilee,” Bible Today 37 (1999) 342–48. E. NEUFELD, “Socio-economic Background of Yobel and Šmitta,” Rivista degli Studi Orientali 33 (1958) 53–124. A. MEIN-

HOLD, “Jubeljahr,” Theologische Realenzyklopädie 17 (1988) 280–81; “Zur Beziehung Gott, Volk, Land im Jobel-Zusammenhang,” Biblische Zeitschrift 29 (1985) 245–61. ERHARD S. GERSTENBERGER, Leviticus (Göttingen 1993) 337–64. K. EL-LIGER, Leviticus (Tübingen, Mohr 1966). C. CARMICHAEL, “The Sabbath/Jubilee Cycle and the Seven-Year Famine in Egypt,” Biblica 80 (1999) 224–39. N. C. HABEL, The Land Is Mine: Six Biblical Land Ideologies (Minneapolis 1995). J. FAGER, Land Tenure and the Biblical Jubilee (Sheffield 1993). K. HENREY, “Land Tenure in the OT,” Palestine Exploration Quarterly 34 (1986) 5–15. Y. AMIT, “The Jubilee Law—an Attempt at Instituting Social Justice,” in H. REVENTLOW et al., eds., Justice and Righteousness (Sheffield 1992) 47–59. S. RINGE, Jesus, Liberation, and the Biblical Jubilee, Overtures to Biblical Theology 19 (Philadelphia 1985). Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 1224–25. R. NORTH, The Biblical Jubilee: After Fifty Years (Rome 2000). Sociology of the Biblical Jubilee (Analecta biblica 145 & 4: 2000 & 1954). M. WEINFELD, Social Justice in Ancient Israel (Minneapolis 1995). N. LEMCHE, Early Israel (Leiden 1985); “Andurarum and mišarum,” Journal of Near Eastern Studies 38 (1979) 11–22; “Manumission of Slaves—The Fallow Year—The Sabbatical Year—The Jubilee Year,” Vetus Testamentum 26 (1976) 38–59. S. HOENIG, “Sabbatical Years and the Year of Jubilee,” Jewish Quarterly Review 59 (1969) 222–36. D. CHARPIN, “L’andurarum à Mari,” Mari 6 (1990) 253–70. E. CORTESE, “L’anno giubilare . . .,” Rivista Biblica 29 (1981) 129–46.

[R. NORTH]